The cry that treaties must be respected is undoubtedly sound; and no suggestion is here made or intended that present holders of land, by virtue of ancient rights, should be interfered with; but is it right to allow incompetent descendants to hold immense power for evil under an enlightened Government such as ours is? It is impossible in a sketch of the description to enter into detail; but it is my sincere and earnest conviction that so long as the present narrow system is persisted in, so long will it be impossible to protect the law-abiding citizen. An immense increase has taken place in Police expenditure, and, so far as I can judge, everything points to the burden becoming still greater. The remedy, in my opinion, is the Village Committee as suggested in my attached note. In view of the fact that there will be five members on the Committee, I do not think I am suggesting anything very ambitious in asking that one respectable member at least should represent Police interests in each village.

The mere fact that the Police are voiced on the Village Committee will immediately secure sympathetic and respectful treatment from every class, and the result will be hearty co-operation.

In conclusion, I cannot be better than quote the following lines in support of my scheme:—

> "The Commission regard it as of great importance to maintain and develop among the people a spirit of self-reliance and self-help, not only in regard to Police matters, but also in regard to other matters of local importance. They would favour any reasonable measures to prevent the destruction of the principle of co-operation in village life and the decay of the influence of the Village authorities."

R. P. LAMBERT.

Certain inhabitants of Ahmednagar.

Ahmednagar, 12th December 1907.

To—The Secretary to Government, General Department, Bombay.

Sir,

Agreeably to paragraph 3 of the Government Resolution No. 6533 General Department, Bombay, dated 31st October 1907, on the subject of enlargement of Legislative Councils and connected questions, a meeting of the citizens of Ahmednagar was called on the 17th of November 1907 to express public opinion on the subject in question. We, the members of the committee appointed to draw up and forward a representation embodying the opinion and sense of the meeting, beg most respectfully to submit the following representation for favourable consideration of Government.

2. We beg to express our thanks to the Government of India for having, of their own initiative, taken into consideration the question of giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters. The reforms, such as the enlargement of Legislative Councils, the recognition of the elective principle, the admission of interpellations and the free discussion of the budget which were introduced for the first time in 1892 have been more than justified by actual results. It is admitted on all hands that since then education has made a great advance and penetrated to circles which a generation ago had hardly been affected by its influence. It is also admitted that a greater employment of Natives of India in the actual administration of their own country, further extension of the elective principles and the giving of the increased opportunities to the people to make known their wishes and desires in respect of administrative and legislative questions and in shaping the action of Government have become a necessity. We also beg to thank the Government for recognizing the essential justice of the claim put forward by the people and for holding out a hope to fulfil, in no grudging spirit, the pledge which the people of India are entitled to regard as inviolable.

3. To satisfy the legitimate demand of the people for an increased share in the administration of their own country and also to remove the difficulties encountered by Government in India in making their measures and motives generally understood, and correct erroneous or mischievous statements of facts or purpose imputed to them, the Government of India have put forward certain proposals with regard to the Supreme and Provincial Legislative Councils and the establishment of what are called Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils. It is to be seen, after a careful study and examination of the recent proposals put forward by the Government of India, whether they can fulfil the objects in view. The principal reforms proposed are the increased numerical strength of the Legislative Councils, Government standing majority being always maintained, and the creation of new electorates to represent the various landed interests, races and creeds, the discussion of the budget, in the first instance, by separate heads or groups of heads which would be explained severally by the members in administrative charge, this discussion being followed by a general debate in which members would enjoy the same freedom, as at present, of criticising the administration. The Government propose to give more time to the discussion of the budget and promise that the remarks made in the course of the ampler and more practical discussion which is now contemplated would be borne in mind when making financial arrangements in subsequent years and on occasions, when possible, even to alter the budget actually under review.

4. The people are all at one with the Government on the question of the increase of the numerical strength, but beg leave to say that they differ most strongly on the question of maintaining the standing majority of Government. We fully admit the legitimacy of the paramount power of Government in India and yet we are fully convinced that it is not at all necessary that Government should always be able to reckon on a numerical official majority. We are willing to concede that there are certain questions of public policy, the relation of Government with foreign powers and the like, that cannot be discussed by members of the Legislative Councils and Government of India alone must have the power to decide them. The Indian Councils Act, 1861, has, by section 43, limited the power of the Provincial Governments in Legislative matters in certain respects therein mentioned and section 52 has reserved all rights and powers to the Sovereign and the Secretary of State for India in Council in relation to the Government of this country. In matters of education, imposition of land, income or other taxes, police, famine relief, &c., i.e., in matters of internal administration which immediately affect the people of India, more respect and consideration should be shown to public opinion as expressed by their representatives. This can be secured by allotting only one-third of the number of seats to official members, one-half to elected members and one-sixth to nominated non-official members. For the present we shall be satisfied even if one-fifth of the total number be nominated by Government. No official can give his vote against the Government which he is serving even when he entertains a different opinion, and when the number of official members is always greater, the discussion on any question coming for discussion is always a foregone conclusion. Any measures passed by a majority of votes of the official members only cannot command that confidence in the people which they would otherwise do. Where is the use of having a debate and of ascertaining the real heart and mind of the people through their representatives on any public measure brought forward by the Government which is opposed by the responsible and sensible representatives of the people when there is a standing official majority? If the Government want really to take a step in advance and to admit the people to an increased share in the administration of the country, the question of standing majority of Government must be treated as an open one and free public criticism thereon must be invited. The proposed reform of increasing the mere numerical strength is not, and cannot be, a step in advance.

5. Again, the establishment of new constituencies of wealthy landlords, traders, artizans, castes and creeds, is not only a step in advance, but decidedly a most retrograde step. We are really surprised to find that the Government of India dislike the legal profession and have expressed their dislike openly by saying "that the elective system has given to the legal profession a prominence in the Provincial Councils to which it is not entitled," and further on, "that the Government of India are not prepared to allow them a virtual monopoly of the power increased by the Councils, and that they believe that the soundest solution of the problem is to be found in supplying the requisite counterpoise to this excessive influence by creating an additional electorate recruited from the landed and monied classes." The elective system that has been in force since 1892 has brought the legal profession and the school masters prominently forward, not because the other interests, castes, and races were not allowed to elect representatives from among themselves, but because men belonging to the legal profession and school masters are the only people, so to speak, who always come in contact with all sorts of people, know the people, are of the people, and, above all, are rightly considered by the people to be the fittest persons to represent them in such Councils by their education, general knowledge and powers of debate and legal acumen. The work done by the school master and the legal profession in the Council shows that they fully represented and fought for all the classes of people. The Government of India have also suggested that Mahomedans should be allowed to elect a certain number of representatives from among their own number because they are Mahomedans. Suggestions are also made that Local Governments shall determine how many seats in the local Councils are to be filled by elected representatives of the most important classes into which the population of the province is divided by race, caste or religion and shall allot these seats to the several classes. The Local Government are also asked to introduce into the system of election and nomination for the Municipal and Local Boards the principle of assigning a fixed number of seats of each of the leading classes into which the population is divided by race, caste or religion and permitting the members of that class to select its own representative. The Local Governments are also asked to allot each of the two communities, that is Hindus and Mahomedans, seats proportionate to their numbers and to equally distribute the number of seats allotted to the Hindus alone between landlords, traders, cultivators and artizans; from the census statistics supplemented by the local enquiries determine what castes should be elected for the purpose of electing members for each of these groups. No doubt literary and property qualifications in the voter and representative are insisted on.

6. The people are unable to understand the real object of the Government of India in introducing these new principles of election and selection. They will, in the opinion of the people, lead to mischievous consequences and do no good either to the Government or to the people. The Sovereign has given a promise that "none be in any wise favoured, none molested or disquieted by reason of their religious faith or observances, but that all shall alike enjoy the equal and impartial protection of the law" (vide Queen's Proclamation of 1858). All have been preaching to the people of India to forget racial or religious prejudices and the leaders of the Native community of India have always insisted on the non-recognition of such distinctions in political matters. The Hindus at least have never asked the Government to recognize and act on such distinctions in political matters. The ambition of liberal statesmen must always be to bring about the political unity of the people, a condition precedent to any form of healthy representative Government. To introduce electorates for the first time after the lapse of so many years since the introduction of the elective principle on the basis of caste, class or creed, is not only to undo the good work of a generation but to make the people misunderstand the motives of Government. If these principles and suggestions are given effect to, they are sure to produce bitterness and animosities and lead to much trouble. The people are likely to carry the impression that Government favours the "Divide and Rule Policy." In the interests of peace and of good and civilized Government, therefore, the creation of such an impression must be entirely avoided.

7. We therefore beg most humbly and respectfully, but earnestly to request the Government not to introduce these innovations. Representatives elected by the new constituencies from among themselves are certain to prove a failure, and the failure, it is apprehended, may afterwards be pointed out for the purpose of showing that elective principle is unsuited to this country.

8. The proposal of giving more time to the discussion of the budget would really be a step in advance, if those in charge of the preparation of the financial statement were made to feel that they were responsible, not only to Government but to the people in general. To make the discussion of practical use it is now high time that the non-official members should be given some voice in its preparation. This can be effected only by bringing the draft budget for discussion before the Council at least a month before the commencement of the financial year and in certain cases and under certain safeguards to give the members the right to challenge a division. With regard to interpellations the present arrangements are not at all satisfactory. If any member of Council thinks that he has not received a satisfactory reply to his question and if the question is of sufficient public importance, he must have permission to move a resolution. Government should therefore confer this right on the people. The Government also might make provision as to the nature and subject of such interpellations and the procedure to be followed when moving the resolution. We are firmly of opinion that unless some such thing is done in the direction just indicated no practical good will result.

9. With these remarks, which are intended to apply to the Supreme as well as Provincial Legislative Councils, we beg to suggest that the Councils may in future be constituted on the following lines :—

Advisory Councils.

10. As regards Advisory Councils, Imperial and Provincial, we are glad to find that all Indian Governments have made it their business to elicit the opinions on administrative measures and proposals for action of those qualified to advise them in all ranks of society. It is admitted that such advice and opinions as are thus obtained are the indispensable foundations upon which good administration is built up and the regular consultation of persons qualified to give them is part of the necessary procedure of Government. It is also admitted that the best traditions of oriental policy have always recognised that the Sovereign, however absolute, should make it his business to consult competent advisers and should exercise his rule in accordance with what, after such consultation, he deems to be the best mind of his people. It is said that the existing practice will, of course, continue, but considerable advantages might be expected from any measures which would, in some degree, associate the great ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates of British India with the Governor General in the guardianship of common and Imperial interests, and, as the realisation of this idea has been rendered more practical by the existing circumstances enumerated, the establishment and recognition of a determinate body of advisers under certain conditions mentioned in the Resolution, be a marked step in the constitutional progress. The Government of India have also made certain proposals which are tentative, of course, with regard to their formation. We frankly admit that there are certain interests and questions common to British India and the Native States, but we are unable to understand how an Advisory Council composed on the lines suggested would be of any use to the people of British India. The ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates of British India can never know, at first instance, the wishes and desires of the common people of British India and are not, therefore, expected to represent them in any way. No elective principal is recognised, no initiative power is given to them. It is only on certain occasions, when the Government of India so desires, that they are to assemble in a body. The deliberations are not open to the public. The Government of India are not bound to follow the advice tendered by the Council even as a body. All the things that go to make them members of a body to feel a sense of responsibility are thus wanting. A measure passed by the Government even on the unanimous advice of such a body cannot command public confidence. The real object seems to be that Government wants to make use of their opinion when its motives are misunderstood or misrepresented. But this object also, we are afraid, can hardly be fulfilled. The same remarks apply to Provincial Advisory Councils. If the Advisory Councils are to do any good we beg to offer the following suggestions with regard to their formation:—

(1) Elective principle to be recognised.

(2) The Council to give advice only in questions common to their territories and British India.

(3) The Council should meet in a body and at regular periods.

(4) The Council should possess the power of initiative.

(5) In matters which are to be laid before them the opinion of three-fourths of the councillors should prevail.

11. We beg to thank the Government for having invited full and free criticism on the new proposals. We earnestly request that the whole body of public opinion will be carefully considered and the weight and respect which is its due will be given to the same.

Members appointed to draw up and forward the representation in a public meeting assembled on the 17th November 1907.

Anjuman-i-Islam of Bombay.

Anjuman-i-Islam,

Bombay, 21st December 1907.

To—The Secretary to Government, General Department.

Sir,

Pursuant to the Government Resolution in the General Department, No. 6533, dated the 31st October 1907, inviting representations from Public Bodies on the letter from the Government of India, Home Department, No. 2311, dated the 24th August 1907, we have the honour to lay before you the opinion of the Anjuman-i-Islam of Bombay on the subjects dealt with in the aforesaid letter.

2. The Anjuman desire to express their gratification at the recognition by the Government of India of the claims of the important Mahomedan minority to direct representation on the Legislative Councils by election, and while approving generally of the scheme that has been sketched out in the said letter as far as it affects the Mussalman Community the Anjuman beg leave to make the following suggestions for favourable consideration.

3. With reference to the Advisory Councils the Anjuman agree with the opinion of the Government of India that the formation of the Advisory Councils would be a step in constitutional progress if properly worked and constituted.

4. The Anjuman think that the Imperial Advisory Council should not be restricted to the Ruling Chiefs and the territorial Magnates but persons possessing educational and intellectual qualifications should also be included therein and that in large cities and Presidency Towns of India the selection to these Councils should be extended to the Presidents of Representative Anjumans and Associations and as far as such Councils are concerned the Anjuman trust that the interests of the Mahomedan Community will be properly safeguarded.

5. With reference to the enlargement of Legislative Councils, the Anjuman view with approval the desire of the Governor-General in Council that the Legislative Councils in India should now be enlarged to the fullest extent compatible with the necessary authority of the Government. The Anjuman cannot, however, help observing that the present number of seats allotted to the Mahomedans cannot be considered as fair or adequate having regard to their numerical, political and historical importance in the country. The Ajuman think that the present condition of the Mahomedans entitles them to claim more seats by election than are allotted to them in the scheme under consideration. In their opinion the Mahomedans should be given at least six seats, four of which should be offered for election by purely Mahomedan Constituencies. This, we submit, can be easily accomplished by throwing open to election the two seats specially reserved for nomination of Mahomedans under the scheme and if in the provinces of the Punjab and Eastern Bengal and Assam two Mahomedans are returned by election under heads C and D then the Mahomedans would secure the minimum representation, which in the Anjuman's opinion they are entitled to. In the event of the two possible seats in the above Provinces not being secured by Mahomedans it is submitted that the Governor-General in Council should be pleased to fill up the two seats by nomination under head F or the remaining seats under head E. The suggested arrangement would enable the seven Provinces (Bombay, Madras, Central Provinces, Punjab, the United Provinces, Bengal and Eastern Bengal and Assam), to share the benefit of representation on the Supreme Council more regularly. This arrangement will preserve the recommendation of the Government of India inasmuch as apart from offering the four seats for election the Viceroy will only be called upon to exercise the power of nominating two additional representatives in case the Punjab and Eastern Bengal and Assam failed to return a Mahomedan member each.

6. The Anjuman, however, do not feel certain that two Mahomedans will be returned by the Provinces in question. They venture to submit that from the fact of the Mahomedans being in a majority in these two Provinces it does not necessarily follow that they will secure any of the seats provided for their representation.

7. The Anjuman further beg to add that if the aforesaid suggestion is not considered feasible, the two seats reserved by the Viceroy for nomination may be so distributed among the seven Provinces by rotation as to enable the then unrepresented Provinces to be represented on the Supreme Council.

8. The Anjuman think that the electorate suggested in clauses A, B and C of paragraph 18 of the said letter is suitable as a tentative measure only. It might be added here that the Mahomedan claims to be fairly and equitably nominated as Fellows of the University require to be attended to.

9. In the absence of any definite scheme put forward by the Government the Anjuman are unable to offer any remarks. They, however, request the Government to offer them an opportunity of submitting their representation before finally approving of any scheme of the formation of the Local Councils. They would, however, like to add that having regard to the paucity of Mussalman graduates the franchise should be extended not only to all registered graduates but also to unregistered graduates of 5 years' standing.

10. In conclusion, the Anjuman hope that the Government will be pleased to favourably consider and accept the few points which have been submitted by them in the interests of the Mussalman Community.

We have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servants,

Certain Lingáyats of Hubli.

To—His Excellency the Governor in Council, Bombay.

May it please Your Excellency—

We, the Lingayets of Hubli in a a meeting assembled, crave permission to submit our views on the proposed enlargement of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils and establishment of Advisory Councils, Imperial and Provincial, with our aspiration to a due proportion of seats in those bodies.

2. At the outset of these lines we beg leave to thank the Supreme Government for the sympathy and consideration evinced by them for the Indian peoples especially the backward ones in undertaking on their own initiative this scheme for a wide representation of all classes and interests in the said Councils.

3. We are humbly of opinion that the scheme contemplated by the Government of India will contribute in a great measure to remove those misunderstandings and misrepresentation between the Government and the people of India which it is unhappily the mischief of some to foster and will promote that good understanding and sympathy between them which is so essential to a benevolent and effective administration of a country.

4. In a land diversified by so many interests often antagonistic as India, it is of the utmost importance that they all should have a voice on matters affecting them, and we fully appreciate the proposal of the Government of India to effectuate by means of the contemplated measures a mode of class representation that will answer the purpose.

5. Taking advantage of the benevolent intentions of the Supreme Government we take this opportunity of inviting the attention of the Government to the backwardness of our community in administrative matters and trust that they will accord to us that share to a voice in the consultative assemblies which our position in the scale of the Indian peoples demands.

6. Moved by an address of the Mahomedans of India the Supreme Government have been pleased to apportion to them a certain number of seats on the Imperial Legislative Council.

7. It is our most humble submission that the position and importance of our community in this part of the country entitles us to the same favour and indulgence at the hands of the Government as the Mahomedans. It is a long accepted and widely known fact that the Lingáyats are people with a religion of their own, owing no superiority of the Bráhminic or any other priests except their own. They form an independent community, integral in itself, and are a race known for their industrious, meek and law-abiding nature. Their number in the whole of India comes to about 3,400,000. Of this large number as many as about 1,100,000 of people are spread over the Bombay Carnátic. They are thus one of the most numerous communities of these parts. It is not their numbers only that speak in favour of their claim. In all branches of industry we find them working diligently and peacefully. Most of them are agriculturists, but not a few of them are weavers, dyers, oilmen, shopkeepers and carpenters. We find amongst them also potters, barbers and smiths. It is they who contribute in the shape of land revenue and income-tax and other assessments to the coffers of the Government. There are communities in this Presidency which can surpass them in numbers, but a community which will beat down in the variety of callings, professions and interests cannot be found. There are about 12 lákhs of Maráthás, but one cannot find amongst them these numerous interests and professions noticed above.

8. There was a time now dim to the vision when the Lingáyats were a race of political importance. The scattered Jághirs over the Kánarese districts of the Presidency speak effectively to their past political greatness. There are amongst them even now territorial magnates and big land-owners. A community so important from its numbers, industries and passed connections must deserve, it is humbly submitted, that favour and indulgence at the hands of the Government which they are ready to extend to any that ask for it in a constitutional way. We trust, therefore, that the Government will consider in a favourable light the proposals which we are now making on behalf of our community.

Imperial Legislative Council.

9. It is our humble craving that the Supreme Government will graciously be pleased to reserve for our community two seats in the Imperial Council. It has come to the notice of the Supreme Government that the system of territorial representation has signally failed in yielding the desired effect. Unless therefore each community has its seats fixed in the Councils to which it can elect its own members its interests will not be safeguarded. It is our submission that our community, though not so widely spread as the Mahomedans, is not for that reason any the less entitled to that share in the voice of the administration of the country which its importance otherwise merits. There is not a single measure of the Supreme Government which will not affect in one way or other this community presenting so diversified interests, nor is it incapable of returning able members to the Councils. True it is that a quarter of a century ago the case was otherwise. What with the help and sympathy of the Government, what with their own efforts the Lingáyats of the present day have made a progress in the path of education which, though not complete and perfect as yet, still is sufficient to entitle them to an humble share in the deliberations of the Imperial and Provincial interests. In clause (E) of the 12th paragraph of their letter to the Provincial Government the Government of India propose to reserve four seats to represent minorities or special interests to be filled by nomination by the Viceroy. It is our humble prayer that of these four, one may be allotted to our community. In clause (D) of the same paragraph they have proposed to reserve two seats for Mahomedan members, to be elected by their community. It is our submission to the Government that one seat should be reserved to our community, to be filled by election by us. With reference to an electorate to select our member for the Supreme Council, we have to submit that it should be formed on lines proposed by the Supreme Government in paragraph 18 except that in sub-clause (C) of the first clause of that paragraph the annual income upon which income-tax is paid should be 15,000 in the case of Lingáyats.

Imperial Advisory Council.

The third proposal formulated by the Government of India in paragraph 5 of their letter leaves 40 seats to be filled by territorial magnates of every province where land-holders of sufficient dignity are to be found. We are happy to state that there exist in our community land-holders, Desais, Deshpándes and other Watandárs whose aggregate income ranges from 10 to 50 thousand rupees a year. Of these, we submit, at least two should be elected to seats in the Advisory Council.

Provincial Legislative Council.

We beg to suggest that in the Bombay Legislative Council four seats should be reserved for our community—

(1) Two to represent land-holders and cultivators.
(2) One to represent commerce.
(3) One to represent manufacture and industry.

An electorate to select these members should be formed on the lines suggested by the Supreme Government in paragraph 17 of their letter, but it is humbly submitted instead of a separate list for each of the districts, one list for the whole community should be prepared.

Of these four we suggest two should be returned by the electorate and two should be nominated by the Government. In this connection we most humbly submit that the proposals of the Supreme Government sketched in paragraph 22 of their letter will help in a great measure to secure an equality of distribution of seats in Local Councils and Boards amongst all classes; it is our humble prayer that, as in the case of Mahomedans, in our case also proportionate number of seats should be allotted to us in those Municipalities and Local Boards in whose circle our community preponderates.

Provincial Advisory Council.

10. Four seats, it is prayed, should be reserved for us in the Bombay Advisory Council—two to be nominated from the land-holders and agriculturists, one from the commercial class and one from industrial and manufacturing classes.

Praying that these proposals will attract a favourable consideration at the hands of the Government.

We beg to remain,

Your Excellency's most humble servants,

SIDDHARAMAPPA DUNDAPPA PAWATI, B.A., LL.B., and others.

Hubli, 16th December 1907.

Certain Lingáyats of Dhárwár.

Dhárwár, 13th December 1907.

To—The Secretary to Government, General Department, Bombay.

Sir,

Before expressing our opinion in accordance with paragraph 3 of Government Resolution No. 6533 of 31st October 1907 on the subject contained in the letter from the Government of India, we, the Lingáyats of Dhárwár, crave permission to express our sincere and hearty thanks to them for the measures they have undertaken to carry out in the creation of the Advisory and the reconstruction of the Legislative Councils. The principles intended to be adopted are quite suited to the times through which the country is now passing. Various communities in India have begun to entertain a growing desire to have some share in the affairs of the Government on account of their social and intellectual advancement, and any measure that is calculated to satisfy their aspirations cannot but have a beneficial effect on the whole of the Empire. The introduction of Western knowledge brought about a new civilization, altogether foreign to original Indian notions, and a few communities that had the good luck to accommodate themselves to the new conditions were enabled to rise high, while other communities that had, in days gone by, distinguished themselves in several spheres of public utility, were relegated to an humble and almost insignificant position. The new measures will, we think, change the present state of things, and give prominence to races and interests that really deserve it and with whom the interests of the Government are more intimately and directly connected. The existing state of things requires a closer union between the rulers and the ruled, and the principles now intended to be adopted in the creation of Advisory and the reconstitution of the Legislative Councils are surely expected to bring about such result. The proposed changes will, we presume, create cordial feelings between the Government and the subjects, a genuine sympathy and regard for the British Government, an appreciation of every benevolent measure framed for the good of the people and an intelligent and sympathetic co-operation with the Government in their intricate relations with the subjects. Such a direct contact with the heads of the Executive will surely produce a healthy influence on the public, to whom will be opened hereafter a political life which was, till now, practically barred to them.

2. We now beg to draw your kind attention to the claims of the Lingáyat community of being represented in the various Councils referred to in the letter from the Government of India. The Lingáyats do not acknowledge the seperiority of any other religious community in India. The community includes within itself persons following all sorts of professions from the highest to the lowest, although those following the professions usually considered as degrading are only called the followers of Lingáyats. In short, the community may be said to be integral in itself. The total population of Lingáyats in India is more than 2,600,000. They have lost much of their importance by being distributed over four political divisions, the Presidencies of Bombay and Madras, the Mysore State and the Nizám's Dominions. In the Madras Presidency they are thrown into obscurity and have been allowed to neglect themselves. We do not exactly know what position they hold in the Nizám's Dominions. They are more prominent in Mysore and the Bombay Presidency.

3. Confining ourselves to the Lingáyats of Bombay we can safely say that both in point of numbers and importance they deserve special consideration at the hands of Government. Numerically the community is as big as any other community in the three divisions of the Presidency, except the Maráthás, as may be seen from the following figures taken from the recent census report :—

1.	Musalmáns	1,280,000
2.	Márathás—
	(a) Maráthás proper	1,571,000
	(b) Kunbis	1 306,000
3.	Lingáyats	1,140,000
4.	Kolis	1,012,000
5.	Bráhmans	685,000
6	Vánis	271,000
7.	Jains	226,000

Apart from their numbers the Lingáyats can claim precedence over the other communities referred to above in point of agricultural, commercial as well as industrial activities. The bulk of the regular husbandmen in the districts of Dhárwár, Belgaum and Bijápur are Lingáyats. Many of the big Zamindárs, that is, the Desais, the Nadgowdás and others and a great majority of watandár pátils in the Southern Karnátic are Lingáyats. As regards the importance of the Lingáyat husbandmen we cannot do better than refer your kind attention to the remarks of the author of the Dhárwár Gazetteer at page 252 of the volume.

4. We further beg to submit that Lingáyats are a predominant commercial class in the part of this Presidency. Their activities in this direction may not be as high as those of the Pársi and other communities centred in the capital of the Presidency. We submit that they are the leading merchants of the Southern Karnátic, and we venture to hope that the present lift which they expect to have at the hands of Government will enable them to rise still higher in every branch of public utility.

5. They are also not the less noted for their industrial activities. Many of the ginning factories and pressess in this part are owned by Lingáyats, and many of the indigenous industries, e.g., dyeing, weaving, oil-pressing, pottery, etc., are chiefly in their hands.

6. Lastly, we may note here the progress which the leaders of the Lingáyat community have been making to bring about the educational advancement of its members. By the efforts of the Lingáyat Educational Association established at Dhárwár in the year 1883 a great change has come over the Lingáyat community. This change the leaders have been able to achieve only with the sympathetic help of Government and the district officers and in the future also they only look upon Government for the uplift of their community. Seeds of movements of this nature have also been sown in the other centres of Lingáyats, e.g., Sholápur and Kolhápur. By means of these and the recent munificent donation of Shrimant Sir Desai of Shirsangi, we hope to attain in the near future a position as high as that of any other community of the Presidency.

7. We thus beg to submit that the claims of our community possessing all-sided activities as shown above will be fairly dealt with in the general adjustment the Government is going to make.

Imperial Advisory Council.

8. As regards representation we beg to request that the Government of India may be pleased to nominate two Lingáyat members to the Imperial Advisory Council. We are humbly of opinion that as the Advisory Councils are a sort of training ground for preparing persons to participate in other departments of Administration, the results will be beneficial in proportion to the attention bestowed on these by the Imperial and Provincial Governments.

Imperial Legislative Council.

9. We think that the total number proposed for the Imperial Legislative Council by the Government of India leaves no scope for a prayer that one seat at least should be reserved for election by Lingáyats. But we think that of the four members to be nominated by the Viceroy under clause E of paragraph 12 of the letter of the Government of India, one seat may be reserved for our community as representing special interests.

Provincial Advisory Council.

10. From the number and importance of our community we think we can claim four seats in the Provincial Advisory Council, or at least as many as the Mahomedan community can claim. As already explained above, we submit that persons representing the various interests and able and willing to serve as members of this Council are at present available in our community and there will be no difficulty for the Government in finding out such persons.

Provincial Legislative Council.

11. For the Provincial Legislative Council we propose that four seats should be reserved for Lingáyat members—two to be nominated by Government and two to be elected by the community. We submit that as in the majority of cases the agricultural, commercial and industrial interests are combined in the same individual, only one electorate of the whole community should be formed and it should be empowered to elect both the members. The electorate may be formed to consist of—

(a) all Zamindárs i. e., Desais, Nadgowdás, etc.;
(b) all land-holders paying an annual assessment to Government of not less than Rs. 200;
(c) all persons paying an annual income-tax of not less than Rs. 50;
(d) all graduates and pleaders of not less than three year's standing;
(e) all the members of the Lingáyat Education Association, Dhárwár.

An electorate formed on these lines will, we think, be simple and easy to be worked out.

12. Our last prayer is with regard to the representation of Lingáyats in the Local Boards and Municipalities. No doubt the Lingáyats have, of late, begun to take an active interest in these matters; still the advanced classes in many cases manage to keep back the backward classes. The proposals sketched out by the Government of India in paragraph 22 of their letter will, we hope, tend to bring about the desired result.

We beg to remain,
Sir,
Your most obedient servants,
S. V. MENSENKAI and others.

Mr. Kazi Kabiruddin, Bar.-at-Law.

To—The Secretary to Government, General Department, Bombay.

Sir,

Pursuant to the Government Resolution in the General Department, No. 6533, dated the 31st October 1907, inviting views and representations on the letter from the Government of India, Home Department, No. 2311, dated 24th August 1907, I have the honour to submit the following observations for the consideration of the Government.

2. I shall confine my remarks to that portion of the letter which concerns the Mahomedan community. As I am connected with the Bombay Anjuman very intimately (first as Secretary and now as Vice-President) for the last 12 years, and as I have had occasion to study the system of election in the Central Division, in which I had twice stood as a candidate for the Local Council, I hope my views would prove of some use and interest to the Government.

3. At the outset I have to thank His Excellency Lord Minto for his statesmanlike grasp of the problem of representation by class and express general approval of the scheme. It must be remembered here that the reasons upon which the Mahomedans have their claim for separate representation have been fully and frankly set forth in the address which the Mahomedan Deputation, under the Presidency of His Highness the Aga Khan, was presented to His Excellency the Viceroy in October last. If the Government of India has seen fit to recognise the justice of the Mahomedan claim for separate representation on the Legislative Council, surely the representation so conceded ought to be adequate. If this was not done, Government will have, on the one hand, incurred the displeasure of a class of Indian politicians for alleged partiality to Mahomedans, and, on the other hand, have failed to materially benefit the Musalmáns or to satisfy the just demands of the educated Mahomedans for the adequate representation of their special interests on the enlarged Council.

4. In allotting seats to the Mahomedans in Municipalities, Local Boards, Provincial Council, Supreme Council or Advisory Council, the following important general principles and considerations must be borne in mind :—

(1) The proportion of Mahomedan members should not be determined on the basis of the numerical strength of the community alone. Due regard may be had of the political and social importance of the community and also of the value of contribution which they make to the defence of the Empire.

(2) The Mahomedan representation should not be an ineffective minority.

(3) The number of Mahomedan members should be one-third at least if not one-half of the total number fixed. Because the total Mahomedan population is over 62 millions or between one-fourth to one-fifth of the whole Indian population. Furt .er, if a reduction was made of those who were classified as such but were not Hindus, then the Mahomedan percentage would be over one-third of the whole Indian population.

(4) Election should be given preference over nomination; and the electorate should be formed on the territorial basis on groups formed according to the number of seats allotted.

(5) The electors as well as the candidates both should be Mahomedans.

(6) A Mahomedan revising officer to prepare lists would have to be appointed to avoid a contingency of being declared that eligible Mahomedans were not available.

Municipalities and Local Boards.

5. These institutions, apart from dealing with the important local interest, deal also with religious concerns, and really speaking form a school where the first lessons of local self-government are learnt. In the interest of good government the position of the Mahomedans in these bodies should be governed by higher principles :—

(1) The number of Mahomedan members ought to be one-half. The Hindus cannot honestly object to it because no question of higher policy was involved in them. This could be conveniently adopted by doubling the existing constituencies and electing one Hindu and Mahomedan each.

(2) The qualification of Mahomedan voters should be fixed somewhat low to enable larger number of people to take part in the local self-government and also to allow a sufficiently large electorate to be formed, which will ultimately be called upon to elect a member to the Local Council.

(3) The electorate should be formed on the territorial basis on groups formed aording to the number of seats allotted.

Provincial Legislative Council.

6. My remarks under this head will apply to the Bombay Presidency. The Bombay Government having not laid any proposal before the public, as was done in some other provinces, it is difficult to express one's views.

7. There are two modes by which the Mahomedan population may be fixed. The number ought to be equal to the Hindus, to make the representation commensurate with the weight to which the community was entitled, or they should be one-third, as the former are 6 crores to the 22 crores of the latter. On the equitable and just grounds one-third would be a reasonable number. In the absence of any number fixed by the Bombay Government I can only say this that excluding Sind at least six seats ought to be reserved for the Mahomedans :—

(1) Four seats offered to election—(a) Three seats should be reserved for three divisions of the Presidency, that is, Northern, Central and Southern Divisions of the Presidency may elect one member each. This could be accomplished very easily and conveniently by doubling the constituencies and preparing a separate list of Mahomedan voters.

(2) Two seats may be reserved for nomination by Government. The nomination may be confined to (a) Muslim Sardárs, Tálukdárs and Jaghirdars of the presidency, and (b) Muslim gentlemen of Bombay, who would be in trade, commerce or industry.

(3) The sixth seat may be offered for election to the City of Bombay, to be elected by (a) Graduates, (b) Fellows, (c) Justices, (d) Associations (i) of at least 15 years' existence and (ii) possessing an endowment fund of at least Rs. 25,000.

8. Thus there will be four electoral circles, unless the Government would choose to form a fifth one for the Sardars. As regards the qualifications of voters I would suggest the following :—

(1) Mahomedan land-owners paying land revenue of Rs. 600 or over annually.

(2) Mahomedans paying an income-tax on an annual income of Rs. 1,500 or over.

(3) Mahomedan graduates of one year's standing.

(4) Mahomedan Fellows of the local University.

9. After a most careful study I have prepared a most exhaustive scheme, but that is kept back not to make the letter too long.

Supreme Council.

10. I view with thorough approval the desire of His Excellency the Viceroy that the Supreme Council may be enlarged, along with others, to the fullest extent compatible with the necessary authority of the Government. I cannot help remarking that the Mahomedans have been very badly treated with respect to seats in this Council. The four seats allotted to the Mahomedans and two more to be gained by them in Punjab and Eastern Bengal (a highly unsound and wrong calculation) can by no means be sufficient for an adequate representation of this community. If that hypothetical case was granted, even then six seats out of 54 is too small a number to safeguard the admittedly large and diversified interest of 62 millions of Mahomedans.

11. I would therefore urge that six seats be reserved for Mahomedans. This can be accomplished by the following alternations :—

	Government proposal.	Suggested alternation.
A.—Ex officio	8	8
B.—Additional officials	20	19
C.—Ruling Chief	1	1
D.—Elected members—
(a) Chambers of Commerce	2	2
(b) Non-official provincial members ...	7	7
(c) Nobles and land-owners	2	4
E.—Nominated non-official members, including at least two Mahomedans	4	4
F.—Nominated experts	2	1

12. With reference to alternative (i) by reducing one official and one expert, two more seats could be given to Mahomedans. His Excelleney the Viceroy will always have an option of nominating more than one expert under head E.

13. If this was not approved, then increase two officials along with two Mahomedans and increase the total from 53 to 57.

14. I cannot feel certain that Punjab and Eastern Bengal will return two Mahomedan members. The simple fact of the Mahomedans being in majority in those provinces will not be sufficient to allow that the Mahomedans will have majority in the provincial Councils. Further, the constitution of the extended Provincial Councils having not yet been framed it would not be possible to make any calculation at all.

15. As regards the electorate, I am of opinion that it should not be confined to the non-official members of the provincial Council alone; because their number would be too small. A special electorate ought to be formed on the following basis :—

(1) Mahomedan non-official members of the Provincial Councils.

(2) Mahomedan Fellows of the local University.

(3) Mahomedans paying income-tax on an income of Rs. 25,000 a year.

(4) Mahomedans paying land revenue of Rs. 20,000 every year.

(5) Registered graduates of 10 years' standing.

(6) President and Vice-President of such Muslim associations as have an endowment fund of Rs. 50,000 and are in existence for at least 10 years.

Advisory Councils.

16. I entirely agree with the opinion of the Government of India that the formation of an Imperial Advisory Council would be a marked step in constitutional progress. It will be in accordance not only with the best traditions of the Oriental policy, but also with the scriptural injunctions of Islam.

17. I think some intellectual qualification ought to be placed upon its membership.

18. I also think that councillorship should not be restricted to the ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates, but in large cities and Presidency towns the President as well as the Vice-President of representative associations of at least 10 years' standing with an endowment of at least Rs. 50,000 may be included in the number of Imperial Councillors.

19. What I wish to impress very strongly upon the Government is that a certain number of seats should be fixed for the Mahomedan community in the Imperial as well as the Local Advisory Councils and that they should be filled up with as great latitude as possible.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Yours, etc.,

KAZI KABIRUDDIN, Bar.-at-Law. J.P.,

Vice-President, Anjuman-i-Islam,

Sassoon Hall, Nesbit Road, Mazagon, Bombay, Dated 14th December 1907.

Mr. Janardan Virbhadra Pathakji, Jághirdár of Motavarachha, Surat.

To—The Secretary to the Government of Bombay, General Department,

Most Respected Sir,

The undersigned respectfully begs to draw the attention of the Government to the following few lines so that the matter contained therein may be of some avail, though very limited and humble, in forming a practical and correct view regarding the enlargement of Legislative Councils and connected questions.

I belong to an old respectable leading Hindu family of Surat, I may come under the category of territorial magnates as I am a superior holder of an important and big inám village near Surat; I am an under-graduate of the University of Bombay and was a student at the Government Law School at Bombay for full three years; I hold a seat on the Surat District Local Board as a representative of the Inámdárs of the District of Surat. A sub-commitee of the abovementioned Board was appointed to consider the scheme of the Government of India for the enlargement of the Councils and connected questions; the undersigned, being a member of the sub-commitee appointed, was furnished with a copy of the Government Resolution No. 6533 for information and guidance. The committee has considered the subject as well as it could during the short time at its disposal and the President would forward its report.

The undersigned, being desirous to render some humble service to the benign Government in connection with such a scheme of much importance and far-reaching consequence, and feeling himself interested in it a little, has made bold to express his frank and humble opinion as under, though unasked to do so, although other non-official gentlemen, it is understood, are specially asked to do so. And consequently the undersigned thinks it proper to tender, in the beginning, his apology for his intrusion and frankness of opinion, in anticipation of its being granted.

The following lines are in answer to the set of questions received from the Commissioner, N. D., in the form of help in forming an opinion :—

1. Mr. Ishvardas J. Store is a fit gentleman of our district to have a seat on the Imperial Advisory Council; he is a territorial magnate holding about three villages in the Surat District; is an under-graduate of the Bombay University; belongs to a very old and respectable family; is a recognized leader of the Hindu community; is perhaps the oldest standing Municipal Councillor; has often served on the District Local Board; was a president of a local cotton mill; has still to do much with the cotton industry and other commercial interests in Gujarát, besides being an Honorary Magistrate.

2. The following are the gentlemen fit to be on the Provincial Advisory Council :—

Mr. Ishvardas J. Store.

Mr. Kekhushrow E. Modiji: he is an old graduate of the Bombay University; is created a Sardár of the Deccan which speaks much of him; is looked upon as a leader of the Parsis; was a Municipal Councillor for some years; holds large tract of lands at Broach and other places.

The Honourable Mr. Sayyad Zein Al Adrews: his merits and qualifications are well known to the Government as he is already nominated on the Provincial Legislative Council. His late revered father was also on the Bombay Legislative Council, as I understand.

Mr. Janardan Virbhadra Pathakji: the undersigned blushes to mention his own name.

3. The following institutions should be added to those that are already mentioned: the Native Chamber of Commerce, Bombay; the Cotton Merchants' Association, Bombay; the Grain Merchants' Association, Bombay; the Graduates' Association, Bombay; the Agricultural Co-operative Societies in the Presidency.

4. The undersigned begs to suggest the following other method of election: an electorate should be formed comprising all the territorial magnates and big landholders; and these electors should elect a representative for the Legislative Council, be he member of the Imperial Advisory Council or of the Provincial Advisory Council or not.

5. Besides the gentlemen mentioned in No. 2, the following are other gentlemen fit for the purpose :—

Mir Muzfer Hosseinkhan: he is a scion of the old Nawab family of Surat, with a handsome income of more than Rs. 15,000 a year; is a territorial magnate in having a village in Broach District; is a recognised leader of the Mahomedans of Surat.

Mr. Ganpatráo Bhimashankar: he is a scion of the family of Gangadhar Shastri known to the student of the Maratha period of the Indian History and holding about three or four villages, some British and some Gáekwádi. It would be out of etiquette to mention one's own name. There may be others of whom the undersigned knows little.

6. The Sardárs of the Deccan with liberal additions would not sufficiently represent the land-owning class; and therefore the undersigned suggests that all the Inámdars and big land-holders should be given the franchise and then there would be a fair representation of the land-owning class.

7. Yes. They are mostly Inamdors.

8. This matter can be better ascertained by referring to the Government records.

9. In the first place the undersigned humbly opines that there is no such special representation necessarily required. Because the Government can assign a seat to a member of any community, backward or forward, in order to have its representative to look after its interests, by nomination; again the Government is in itself so very circumspect that it does and can look after their interests without any special representation. Elections should remain elections. Election should not be tinted by the slightest colouring of any kind—grace or favour. Again, such granting of special representations would invite other communities to ask for such special (or rather racial) representation for their communities as well. As for instance the Jains who are non-Hindus, the Sikhs, the Jews, who are more in number than the Parsis in India, the Native Christians and others. The undersigned knows of no such really representative institutions in Surat; there is an Anjuman-i-Islam for instance and Mir Muzfer Hoosseinkhan, a hereditary leader of the Suni Mahomedans of Surat, is not a member of it. The Bohras and the Shias are not represented by the above Anjuman. Also there is the Pársi Panchayát. Sir Jamsetji Jijibhai of Bombay, who is its President, claims to be the head of the Pársis, while the Modi family of Surat claims to be the hereditary head of them all. Under the circumstances both the aforesaid bodies are not really representative. There is no known body for the Eurasians here.

10. The following are the interests fit to be represented: commerce, mill and other industries, agriculture, science, education—specially technical—and the Municipal and local bodies.

11. It would be better if the representatives of the Local Boards and Municipalities on the Provincial Legislative Council be themselves members of the respective bodies.

12 and 13. The Government would get more proper information as regards matters contained in the questions by looking into the Government records.

I beg to remain,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

JANARDAN VIRBHADRA PATHAKJI,

Jaghirdár of Motavarachha.

14th December 1907.

Gujarát Sabha, Ahmedabad.

To—His Excellency SIR GEORGE SYDENHAM CLARKE,

Governor of Bombay in Council, Bombay.

May it please Your Excellency,

We beg humbly and respectfully to submit, by direction of the General Committee of the Gujarat Sabha, Ahmedabad, the following representation in regard to the Government of India's proposal for reforms in the Indian Administration, for the kind consideration of Your Excellency's Government.

2. The Sabha is respectfully of opinion that the proposals require to be considerably modified before they can serve the purpose, for which they are intended, and so satisfy in some degree at least the legitimate aspirations of the people of India to claim an increasing share in the concerns of their country.

3. The principal objects which the Government of India have in view in creating Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils, namely, "of bringing all classes of the people into closer relations with the Government and its officers," and "of increasing the opportunities of the people of India of making known their feelings and wishes in respect of administrative and legislative questions" are, in the opinion of the Sabha, not likely to be secured by Advisory Councils constituted in the manner indicated in the Despatch. The members of all the Advisory Boards, whether of the Supreme or Provincial Governments, are to be nominated and not elected. They will therefore be answerable to know public constituency for the advice they may have chosen to tender on a particular administrative measure, but only to the Government which has nominated them. The recognised leaders of the middle class are to be entirely excluded from the Imperial Advisory Council which is to consist solely of Ruling Princes and territorial magnates. A Council which finds no place for men of such acknowledged abilities and character as the Honourable Sir P. Mehta, Dr. Rash Behari Ghose, Mr. Ananda Charlu, Mr. Gokhale, and others who, by common consent, are representative leaders of Indian thought and public opinion, would be worse than useless if not mischievous. Moreover, Ruling Chiefs can hardly be said to be the representatives of the masses and the middle class of British India, and their interest would generally lie in what they think would be the supposed wishes of political officers. Many of the magnates have, by the nature of their position and environment, to remain aloof from the common people, and are therefore not expected openly to sympathize with the feelings and the ideas which are agitating the public mind at the present day. The interests of the landed aristocracy of India are bound up with the land-revenue system, and they cannot afford to give fearless and independent advice to Government on any momentous question on which the opinions of the executive and the feelings of the people are likely to be in conflict. Whether they were the natural and hereditary leaders of Indian society in times gone by is a debatable question entirely foreign to the present issue, for times are now changed, and new political conditions have arisen under which Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates are less fitted to enter into and to voice the sentiments of the Indian people than the great body of modern men whose growing influence His Excellency the Viceroy was gracious enough to recognise in his speech from the Supreme Legislative Council in November last.

4. To invite such gentlemen to offer their advice to the Government is hardly tantamount to "bringing all classes of the people of India into closer relations with the Government and its officers," nor can Advisory Boards so constituted be expected to present a correct idea of the feelings and sentiments of the people as a whole on a particular measure. Further, the Sabha strongly protests against the opinions of the members and the proceedings of the Board being kept secret. The people on whose behalf and in whose name the Advisory Boards are expected to tender advice ought to have, in common fairness, the right to know what the advice is particularly because such advice is liable to be utilized by Government as the collective opinion of the common people. To make the Boards and their members immune from responsibility to public criticism would be not only harmful to the public interest, but opposed to all canons of good Government.

5. It would be a matter of little surprise if the advice sought in secret, and offered also in secret, of such members as are nominated by Government alone, and are responsible to none but themselves, is often not in consonance with public feeling. The people will have no faith in Advisory bodies so constituted. They will naturally think that the Boards are created for the purpose of making a show of the people's approval of the measures of Government officers. The people's cause is not in any way advanced by the creation of such Councils, and looking to what the Government of India say in their Despatch that even before these proposals came into being "they as well as all administrative officers have made it their business to elicit the opinion on administrative measures of those qualified to advise them in all ranks of society," and that "this process will of course continue," the formation of Advisory Boards on the lines indicated in the Despatch would be an unnecessary if not a superfluous proceeding.

6. The proposals of the Government of India in this matter have originated in the questionable assumption that an Advisory Council like the one formulated by them is "in accordance with the best traditions of Oriental polity where a Sovereign however absolute" was "to make it his business to consult competent advisers, and to enforce his rule in accordance with what, after such consultation, *he deemed to be the best mind of his people." The analogy of a benevolent but an absolute Oriental Sovereign is inappropriate and misleading. The good-intentioned absolute monarchs of old are reported to have often gone about their kingdoms incognito to learn the sentiments and the wishes, not of the Ruling Chiefs or territorial magnates, but of the common people; and the authority of an Oriental Sovereign which was seldom absolute and unlimited in the sense assumed in the Despatch, was exercised, and plans of administrative reform were devised and carried out, by officers who were exclusively Natives of India, who could understand the feelings and sentiments of their fellow-subjects, and were amenable to Indian public opinion. The Sabha has no fondness for past absolute monarchies, nor does it intend anything in disparagement of the modern system of Government; it only means respectfully to urge that the analogy of the traditions of an absolute Oriental polity utilized by the Government of India in formulating their proposals is unsuited to modern conditions, unless the whole hierarchy of officials happens to be recruited solely from the people of India.

7. In order that the Advisory Councils might serve their legitimate purpose the Sabha would take the liberty to suggest—

(a) that the Advisory Councils should have legislative recognition;

(b) that three-fourths of the number of members constituting such Councils should be elective, the method of election being similar to that in vogue at present in the matter of returning non-official members to the Provincial Legislative Councils;

(c) that due provision should be made for the representation of the middle and professional classes on the Imperial Advisory Council;

(d) that an adequate and a fair provision, to the extent of at least one-third of the total number of members on the Provincial Advisory Councils, should be made to represent the middle and professional classes;

(e) that the Councils should meet at stated intervals at the call of Government, at least four times a year;

(f) that they should also have the power to meet suo motu and pass resolutions on Government measures;

(g) that the opinions of the members and the proceedings of the Boards should be public; and lastly

(h) that they should have the power to initiate resolutions and proposals for the consideration of Government.

8. Coming to the Legislative Councils, both Imperial and Provincial, the main idea that runs through the proposals of the Government of India in this regard is to curtail the influence of the educated classes, particularly of lawyers and "school-masters" who, in the opinion of the Government, have, by reason of their "excessive" influence, hitherto enjoyed a "virtual monopoly of the power exercised by the Councils." The remedy proposed is to "supply the requisite counterpoise to their excessive influence by creating an additional electorate recruited from the landed and monied classes."

9. To speak of the educated classes having hitherto had a "virtual monopoly of the power exercised by the Councils" is manifestly untenable. Such a monopoly of power in the Legislative Councils has always remained with Government officials who invariably possess a standing majority there. The Sabha is not aware of a single instance of elected representatives having ever scored a victory against the solid phalanx of official members. In the matter of such Bills for instance as the Official Secrets Bill, the Universities Act Amendment Bill, and the recent Seditious Public Meetings Bill before the Supreme Council, and the Bombay Land Revenue Code Amendment Bill of 1901 before the Bombay Provincial Council, Government could carry their Bills through by the aid of a compact official majority in the teeth of the earnest and unanimous opposition of the elected representatives of the people.

10 If lawyers form at present a majority of elected members of the Legislative Councils it is because their electors have confidence in them as the best persons who could advocate their interests and represent their views. The electors had therefore best be left to themselves to choose their own representatives, untrammelled by rules or restrictions that they shall elect only a particular class of representatives and none else. And experience has so far proved that their choice has not been badly exercised. The Government of India do not allege that lawyers elected as representatives have failed to do their duty by their constituents in the Legislative Council or that they have been guilty at any time of advocating their personal or professional interest to the prejudice of the public interests. Even in a free country like England, where electors are supposed to exercise their franchise in the best interests of their country, lawyers, school-masters, and journalists are returned as members to Parliament and hold seats in the Cabinet, not to talk of France, where a great majority of the Deputies and some of the Ministers are recruited from the learned professions.

11. But the Government of India desire to supply a counterpoise to the "excessive" influence of the educated classes by "creating an additional electorate recruited from the landed and monied classes." The Sabha would respectfully ask Government to consider whether this policy of creating a counterpoise will call into existence a better class of representatives, more independent more informed, more patriotic than the present class of lawyers and school-masters; and whether the policy will not very likely set up class against class, and so neutralize all the forces of Indian public opinion by causing their mutual destruction.

12. The scheme outlined by the Government of India for constituting the Imperial Legislative Council fails to make any provision for the commercial and trading classes. The Government of India say in their Despatch that they ought to be represented, at least to supply a "counterpoise" to the "excessive influence" of the professional classes; yet no provision seems to have been made for them, while the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay which are exclusively Anglo-Indian, have been given two seats on the Council. It is needless to say that the Indian commercial interest is increasing in importance day by day, and according to the suggestions of the Government of India it is to be represented on the Provincial Legislative Councils. The Sabha would therefore propose that the Indian commercial classes for the Presidencies of Bombay, Madras, Bengal and the United Provinces should each be allowed to return one representative to the Imperial Legislative Council, every merchant or firm payingan income-tax of Rs. 200 a year or more being considered as qualified to vote.

13. Again, the Sabha similarly fails to find any representation on the Imperial Legislative Council allowed to the educated classes as such. It might be urged that the non-official members of the Provincial Councils of Madras, Bombay, Bengal and the other provinces are to be authorized to return seven representatives to the Imperial, Council, and that as, out of those seven, some are very likely to be members of the educated community, no separate representation for the educated class is needed. But the non-official element of the Provincial Councils which is to return representatives to the Imperial Councils, is henceforth to be so constituted by the incorporation of the landed and monied classes, and by representation on the basis of creed, castes and religion, that the so called "excessive" influence of the educated classes is to be curtailed, for that is the purpose openly avowed by the Government of India in their Despatch. There is therefore less likelihood of the non-official members of the Provincial Council returning, as their representative to the Imperial Council, a member of the educated classes. The Government of India recognise that the professional classes are "entitled to a share of representation proportioned not merely to their numbers which are small, but to their influence which is large and tends continually to increase," yet on the Imperial Council they fail to obtain any representation whatsoever.

14. Under the present system four additional members are elected to the Imperial Council by the non-official members of the Councils of Bombay Madras, Bengal and the United Provinces. The Government of India propose to raise the number to seven by extending the privilege of election to the non-official members of the Councils of Eastern Bengal and the Punjab and Burma. So that, even if it were supposed that the non-official element in the reformed Provincial Councils will return a member of the educated class as its representative in the Imperial Council, the educated commuuity gains no additional privilege, for Bombay, Bengal and the United Provinces have been hitherto sending one member each, and they are to return the same number hereafter. There is doubtles an increase in the number of Provinces to be represented, but the Provinces of East Bengal, the Punjab and Burma are not sufficiently advanced in education like their sister Provinces of Bombay, Bengal and Madras, aud therefore there is less likelihood of their returning members of educated classes as representatives to the Imperial Council. The number and the influence of University graduates have greatly increased since 1893, yet not only is no attempt made to give them their due representation on the Imperial Council but retrograde proposals have been suggested the effect of which will be practically to shut them out from the Councils altogether.

15. The Government of India have, in their observations to the Local Governments for forming Mahomedan electoral constituencies for Provincial Councils, suggested that franchise might be granted to Mahomedan graduates of more then five year's standing. It seems to the Sabha therefore that in the opinion of the Government of India a constituency of graduates alone is quite feasible. Under the circumstances the Sabha would take the liberty of proposing that double degree graduates of more than five year's standing in the Provinces of Bombay, Bengal and Madras should have the privilage of sending one member each direct to the Imperial Legislative Council. The Sabha thinks hat no measure of Council reform would be productive of any good unless and ntil the educated classes are awarded due and direct representation.

16. Regarding the four seats reserved specially for Mohomedans in the Imperial Council, two by election and two by nomination, the Sabha has nothing to say against it. Out of twenty-five non-official members on the Council, two will be Anglo- Indians representing the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay, and two will be experts who may or may not be Indians and who, according to the scheme, are to be nominated when necessary for special purposes. Deducting these four seats from twenty-five, it seems that twenty-one seats are to be filled up exclusively by Indians, and as Mohomedans are certain to get four out of twenty-one, or nearly one fifth of the number reserved for natives of India, they obtain, in the Sabha's opinion, sufficient representation, whether their weight as a community or their proportion to the total population of non-Mohomedans is taken into account. The Sabha trusts that proportionate representation will simliarly be accorded to other creeds.

17. The qualification proposed by the Government of India to entitle a land-owner to vote for returning his representative to the Imperial Council is too high. The Government of India say that the "amount of land revenue giving the right to vote should not be less than Rs. 10,000 a year." The Sabha thinks that the qualification requires to be considerably lowered, especially in Bombay, where there are very few big Zamindars. The franchise can then be shared by an appreciable number of people and not remain concentrated in the hands of a few, who are more likely to be under the dominating influence of high revenue officials.

18. Further, the restriction that nobles and land-owners shall ellect only one of their class should be removed. To hamper electors in selecting a representative to their own liking by any such restrictions is to give them the shadow and not the substance of a real franchise. If the nobles think that a gentleman outside their class but otherwise worthy will represent their interests best, their judgment should be allowed to prevail, for they alone will know what is best for their own interest.

19. Coming to the Provincial Legislative Councils, it is not possible for the Sabha at this stage to express its views in detail as the Government of Bombay have not, like the Government of India, hitherto put forward any definite proposal. The Sabha has therefore to confine itself for the present merely to the making of general observations on the suggestions made by the Government of India to the Local Governments about the formation of Provincial Councils. It would also take the liberty of offering some suggestions of its own in anticipation.

20. The Government of India urge that representation to the Provincial Councils should be principally on the basis of caste, creed, race, or religion into which the population of a province is divided, with the reservation that members of a particular caste ought not to be allowed to return a representative of a different caste, creed, or religion. In the Sabha's opinion it would be a most objectionable proceeding. None will deny that all classes of His Majesty's subjects should, as far as possible, be represented on the Provincial Councils, but the mode of election by castes and creeds indicated by the Government of India will create regrettable, and at times acute, sectional jealousies between one caste and another which it is the duty of the Government to obliterate. There will also be practical difficulties in carrying out the scheme. The Local Government has to legislate on the economic, industrial, agricultural and political questions of the day which are common to all castes and religions, it has not to legislate on caste-rules, or religious dogmas. No presentation therefore on the basis of a caste or creed as such is either desirable or expedient in the interests of good government. Further, it is inadvisable to provide that a particular caste shall return a representative of that caste only. It will accentuate caste distinctions and retard the gradual evolution of the body politic as a homogeneous whole. The object of giving a wider franchise to castes and creeds will, in the opinion of the Sabha, be equally attained by dividing the people into territorial and occupational groups for the purposes of representation, so that no ill-feeling between caste and caste is likely to be created, while people of different castes and creeds who very often follow the same occupation will be duly represented.

21. The Sabha respectfully suggests that no restriction as to the caste, class, or residence of an elected representative should be imposed. Such restrictions have nothing to do with the fitness or capacity of a representative.

22. The educated classes ought to be given direct representation on the Provincial Councils. The Sabha would respectfully invite the attention of Your Excellency to paragraphs 13 and 14 of the present memorial on this head. The Government of India suggest the extension of the franchise to Mahomedan graduates of more than five years' standing. It is therefore but fair that the franchise of representation should be similarly given to non-Mahomedan graduates of five years' standing.

23. If it is intended to provide for a representative from the Bombay University, the right to vote should be given only to Indian Fellows. Non-official Anglo-Indian gentlemen possess a sufficient measure of representation for themselves.

24. Indian monied classes, that is, the Indian mercantile interest which is growing in importance every day, should also be represented on the Provincial Councils. The Sabha invites the attention of the Government to its observations in paragraph 12 of the present memorial on this head.

25. In order to give adequate representation to the rural as well as to the urban classes the Sabha would suggest that the Local Boards as well as Municipalities of the Bombay Presidency should both have a representative on the Provincial Legislative Council.

26. The Sabha would propose that strict rules should be made prohibiting Government servants from voting or offering themselves as candidates for the Provincial Legislative Councils. The rules hitherto in vogue have proved entirely ineffective. Government are to have a permanent official majority in the Councils, and they will also have to appoint some members by nomination. If the people are therefore to possess an elective franchise at all their choice of representatives should be unfettered and as free from official interference, direct or indirect, as Government could possibly make. In this connection it would not be amiss for the Sabha to urge that the elective franchise to be given to Local and Municipal Boards should be given to the elected and not to the nominated members of such Boards.

27. The Sabha begs to present here a brief summary of the foregoing remarks and suggestions as follows :—

(a) Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils, if constituted in the manner suggested by the Government of India, are not likely to attain the desired object in view; for members are to be nominated, the recognised leaders of the middle and educated classes are to be excluded, while the Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates cannot be expected by the very nature of their position and environment to voice the public feelings and sentiment fearlessly and independently.

(b) To keep the advice of individual members and the proceedings of the general Advisory Boards secret would be harmful to public interests, and such advice would be of little value as it would be irresponsible advice.

(c) The Government of India say that their officers have made it their business to consult competent advisers hitherto; therefore such Advisory Boards are susperfluous.

(d) The analogy of the best traditions of an absolute but a benevolent Oriental Monarch referred to by the Government is inappropriate, unsuited to modern political conditions, and inapplicable to the present system of Government.

(e) The Advisory Councils should have legislative recognition.

(f) Three-fourths of the number of members constituting such Councils should be elective.

(g) Due provision for the representation of the middle and professional classes on the Imperial Advisory Council should be made.

(h) At least one-third of the number of seats on the Provincial Advisory Councils should be allotted to the middle and professional classes.

(i) The Advisory Councils should meet at least four times a year.

(j) They should have the power to pass resolutions and to meet suo motu.

(k) The opinions of the members and the proceedings of the Councils should be public.

(l) As regards Legislative Councils, to speak of the educated classes having hitherto had a virtual monopoly of the power exercised by the Councils is manifestly untenable. Such monopoly of power has always remained with Government officials.

(m) In Bills before the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils hotly contested by the elected members, the latter have always been unsuccessful.

(n) The lawyers and school-masters have hitherto done excellent work, fearlessly and independently, and have never advocated their personal or professional interests.

(o) Even in a free country like England lawyers and journalists are in evidence in the Cabinet and in Parliament.

(p) The supplying of a so-called "counterpoise" to the "excessive" influence of the educated classes will not create a better and more informed class of representatives, and by setting up class against class, is likely to neutralise all the forces of Indian public opinion.

(q) In the Imperial Legislative Councils the Indian commercial classes whose influence is growing should be represented, the Anglo-Indian merchants being already represented by the Chambers of Commerce.

(r) The Indian commercial classes of the Presidencies of Bombay, Madras and Bengal should each be allowed to return one representative to the Imperial Council, every merchant or firm paying an income-tax of Rs. 200 a year or more being considered qualified to vote.

(s) The educated classes as such ought to be represented on the Imperial Legislative Council.

(t) The non-official members of the Provincial Councils are not now likely to return any members of the educated class as representatives to the Imperial Council, for the Provincial Councils are to be so modelled by the incorporation of the landed and monied classes, and of castes and creeds as to reduce the influence of the educated class,—an object openly avowed by the Government of India.

(u) Bombay, Madras, Bengal and United Provinces have each the right to send one member to the Imperial Legislative Council and therefore they do not get any additional members by the Government of India's present scheme.

(v) The Provinces of Eastern Bengal, the Punjab and Burma are not advanced in education, and they are not likely to return a member of the educated class to the Imperial Council as their representative.

(w) The Government of India have proposed that Mahomedan graduates of five years' standing might be given the right to vote for a representative for the Provincial Council; therefore it will be but fair if non-Mahomedan graduates are given the right to send a representative to the Imperial Council.

(x) The Sabha consequently proposes that double-degree graduates of more than five years' standing in the Presidencies of Bombay, Bengal and Madras should have the privilege of sending one member each direct to the Imperial Council.

(y) Mahomedans being assured by the scheme of four out of twenty-one seats to be filled exclusively by the natives of India, both nominated and elected, the other twenty seats (excluding one reserved for a Ruling Chief) should be allotted to non-Mahomedans.

(z) The sum of Rs. 10,000 a year as land-revenue suggested by the Government of India to entile a land-owner to vote for a representative for the Imperial Council is too high. It should be Rs. 2,000 a year.

(aa) The restriction that nobles and land-owners shall elect only one of their class should be removed.

(bb) As regards Provincial Legislative Councils, the Sabha has to confine itself for the present to making general observations in the absence of a detailed scheme in that regard.

(cc) For the Provincial Councils, representation on the basis of creed, caste, race and religion, is objectionable because it will create sectional jealousies.

(dd) The Legislative Council have to deal with economic, industrial and political questions, not with caste-rules or religious dogmas. Therefore, representation of a caste or creed as such is not advisable.

(ee) To give wider representation, the people should be divided into territorial and occupational groups.

(ff) No restriction as to caste class or residence of an elected representative should be imposed.

(gg) The educated classes as such ought to be given direct representation on the Provincial Legislative Councils by extending the franchise, to graduates of more than five years' standing.

(hh) If the University of Bombay is to be allowed the franchise, it should be allowed only to Indian Fellows.

(ii) The Indian mercantile classes should be represented on the Provincial Councils.

(jj) Municipalities and Local Boards should both be represented on the Provincial Legislative Councils.

(kk) Government servants should be strictly forbidden from voting for, or offering themselves as candidates; and, lastly, the elective franchise to be given to Local Boards and Municipalities should be given to the elected and not to the nominated members of such Boards or Municipalities.

28. The Sabha would further suggest that Local Goveenments should be called upon by the Government of India to prepare and publish a draft scheme for their respective Advisory and Legislative Councils, and to invite public opinion thereon before it is finally submitted for approval to the Secretary of State for India.

29. In conclusion, the Sabha thinks it would be failing in its duty to the Government and to the public at large if it were not to confess to a sense of keen disappointment at the reform-proposals formulated by the Government of India. Doubtless the extension of time proposed to be granted for the discussion of the Budget by compartments is a concession for which the Sabha is thankful; but the proposals taken as a whole, instead of being in the direction of progressive reform, are distinctly retrograde and reactionary. No provision appears to have been made for the purpose of giving power, however slight, to the people's representatives in the administration of public affairs,—powers for which the Indian National Congress and the public have been appealing so strenuously and so long. The Sabha is at one with the Government of India in affirming that the paramountcy of the British power should be maintained in undiminished strength, but there are numerous questions of domestic policy and administration, such as those of education, agriculture, commerce, irrigation, civil public works, abkári, customs and excise, where, without impairing British paramountcy, the representatives of the people in the Advisory as well as Legislative Councils could be safely entrusted with some power of administrative and financial control. The people should also have a voice in the Executive Councils of the Imperial and Provincial Government.

30. The Sabha would therefore suggest—

(i) That there should be Indian members on the Executive Councils of the Government of India and of Provincial Governments as well, and that they should be elected by the Indian elected members of the Provincial Legislative Councils.

(ii) Any measure of domestic policy or legislation which is objected to by two-thirds of the elected representatives of the people of those Councils should be dropped.

(iii) That any measure of domestic legislation or policy which has the support of two-thirds of the elected representatives of the people, should be carried irrespective of the votes of other members in those Councils.

(iv) That when the power to discuss the Budget in compartments is given the non-official members of the Council should have the further power to divide on questions of domestic policy in the Budget debates.

and humble servants,

Advisory Council.

(1) An elective principle to some substantial degree at least must be introduced in the formation of such Councils.

(2) That Ruling Chiefs in such Councils should only be consulted in questions of general military policy such as Imperial Service Troops, Cadet Corps or any other questions of a large administrative principle which is common to them and British India.

(3) That such Councils should meet at least twice a year.

(4) That there should be a sort of moral guarantee that no administrative or legislative measure would be introduced or passed by Government unless it is supported by three-fourths of such councillors.

(5) Generally the Council should be consulted in a body and not individually, informally and privately as proposed and that, too, for purely not consultative purposes.

(6) That it should include representatives of all classes who are morally and intellectually wellequipped except those whose advice is needed as experts.

(7) That such a Council should at least have the initiative of tendering occasional addresses to the Viceroy and Provincial Rulers on the wants and grievances of the people when Government too should take an opportunity of enunciating large measures of general policy as is done at the time of opening proroguing British Parliament.

Hon'ble Mr. Gokuldas Kahandas Parekh, B.A., LL. B.,

GIRGAUM, BOMBAY:
13th December 1907.

To—R. E. ENTHOVEN, Esq., I.C.S.,
Acting Secretary to the Government of Bombay, General Department.

Sir,

With reference to your letter No. 6534 of the 31st of October last, I have the honour to submit my views on the schemes of reform proposed in the letters Nos. 2310-7, dated 24th of August last, from the Secretary to the Government of India to the Secretaries of the different Provincial Governments and the Honourable the Chief Commissioner, Central Provinces, a copy of which accompanies the said letter.

2. In connection with the question of Advisory Councils, Imperial and Provincial, I am of opinion that if they are so constitued as to be able to voice the views of the people of the country and composed of persons in whom the people have confidence, they cannot fail to be of considerable utility. I am however of opinion that Advisory Councils constituted in a manner described in the letter of the Secretary to the Government of India are not likely to give the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters. They will not be of any appreciable help in preventing misunderstanding and ministerpretation of the motives and measures of Government and promoting a better understanding between the Government and the governed.

3. With reference to the suggestion that a certain number of Ruling Chiefs should be put upon the Imperial Advisory Council, I think their presence in the Council will not be of any use in promoting closer relations between the Government and the people. In the first instance the Ruling Chiefs would have no direct interest in the British territories and their inhabitants about whom they may be asked to advise; they are generally inaccessible; they are too high to know much of the views and wants of the people; they are in the habit of looking at administrative questions from the official point of view and in many respects the conditions of Government in the territories of Indian Ruling Chiefs are quite dissimiliar from those that exist in the British territories. The Ruling Chiefs are not much outspoken; they are generally averse to expressing views which they believe to be not acceptable to the higher officers and they would be most unwilling to express such views when it is not necessary to do so, either in their own interest or in the interest of their subjects. These Chiefs by their position and surroundings are least fitted to be mouthpieces for conveying the views of the people to Government or of those of Government to the people.

4. I am also of opinion that Ruling Chief's of ability and self-respect will not be agreeable to serve upon an Advisory Council, the advice of which the Government may accept or reject, when they would be exposed to the odium of all unpopular measures in respect of which Government may seek their advice.

5. Though I am opposed to the idea of Ruling Chiefs being placed upon Advisory Councils which have to advise on questions of administration in British territories, I am of opinion that an Advisory Council composed of them will be very desirable in advising Government on questions relating to their policy in dealing with Native States and other questions which affect their welfare.

6. Then, with reference to the presence of territorial magnates, i.e., landholders of high dignity and status, upon the Imperial Advisory Council, I am of opinion that though a small minority of them many be desirable to represent their special interest, a Council in which they have the sole or predominant voice cannot be regarded as a reliable one, nor will their advice command the confidence or respect of the people. These land-holders represent only one interest. They represent the interest of a small minority. One circumstance that has to be borne in mind in connection with them is that whatever might have been their position in the times previous to the advent of the British Government, they have not been able to maintain that position and are not now much respected by the people on account of their possessions outside the circle of their dependents and their tenantry. They have ceased to command influence among the people. It is unnecessary to dwell at length upon the reasons which have led to this result. It may be that they remained behind in profiting by the spread of education ; or that a majority of them got into habits of improvidence and extravagance and sank into debts and for a long time Government were unable to see their way to devise suitable measures to extricate them from their difficulties ; or that in these peaceful times there was no scope for the display of those high qualities which in previous times had brought honour, wealth and prosperity to their ancestors ; or their pride prevented them from taking occupations which they did not regard as honourable and they fell into habits of laziness ; or it may be that the condition of constant pupillage in which they have been kept by Government and their officers have destroyed their spirit of self-reliance and their energy and business habits have nearly disappeared. Whatever may be the reason, the present representatives of the old landed gentry of the country have ceased to be regarded as the leaders of the people.

7. Most of the representatives of the ancient landlord gentry are understood not to be able to protect their own properties and their own personal interests. Protective legislation has to be made to save them from the effect of their own foolish acts. The class is behind the rest of the country in education saving a few honourable exceptions. Most of these landed proprietors are so much under the influence of the Collectors or other officers who exercise supervision over them and these officers are vested with such large and general powers over them that very few of them would dare do anything which does not meet with their approval. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that representatives chosen out of this class are not likely to have ability, information and courage to be the exponents of the views of the people, nor will the people feel any respect or confidence in the advice that they give to Government in connection with their affairs.

8. I shall now state how, according to my ideas, an Advisory Council ought to be constituted. It ought to be elected. The men who form the Advisory Council must certainly be persons in whom the people at large have confidence. If Councillors are to be appointed irrespective of the wishes of the people, it makes no difference to them whether such Advisory Council exists or not. As it would be optional with Government whether to act upon the advice of the Council or not, I think there will be no harm if the whole body is elected. But if Government wish that some of the members of the Council may be nominated, the different Provincial Governments between themselves may be permitted to nominate Councillors equal to one-third of the total number.

9. Under this scheme I would propose 14 advisors on behalf of this province :—1 representative of the City of Bombay, 3 representatives of the urban population of the Mofussil, 4 representatives of the rural population of the Mofussil, 1 representative of the European merchants, 1 representative of the Indian merchants, 1 representative of the mill-owners of the province, 2 representatives of the educated and professional classes consisting of University graduates of a certain standing, and 1 representative of the zamindar or landlord class. The number of the represenratives of the other provinces should be fixed by reference to their population, education, wealth and contribution to the public revenue and the representation should be on the above lines.

10. I agree with the proposal that the members of the Imperial Advisory Council should hold office for a term of about five years and be eligible for re-appointment. Its functions may be purely consultative, but Government should not carry out any measure which meets with the disapproval of more than three-fourths of its numbers.

11. As regards the form of consulation, Government may consult the members individually or collectively ; but when there is any collective consultation , unless when there is any special reason to the contrary, the consultation should be open and public. If the consultation is public, members will feel a greater sense of their responsibility and are likely to bring more care and attention to bear on the questions that are the subject-matter of consultation. Views privately given would be deserving of much less weight, as in such cases there would be more room for intrigue and private considerations are more likely to influence them more than when they are given collectively and openly.

12. In connection with the question of the Imperial Advisory Council I have one more remark to make. When a particular interest is to be represented in the Advisory Council, the eletorate that has to make the election should not be restricted to select its representative out of its own body, but may be permitted to go outside the body for the selection. Education has not sufficiently advanced in India and it may very often happen that there may be no one of the persons representing that interest who would be able to command confidence and competent to discuss and advise on important public questions from the standpoint of that interest. Under such circumstances it would be a great injustice to the body to force it to elect as its representative a person whom it does not regard sufficiently competent to voice its opinions and feelings or in whom it has not sfficient confidence. The interest itself ought to be the best judge whether it ought to be represented by one of its own body or an outsider ; and when the interest itself feels that an outsider is necessary, that it should be represented by an outsider, there should be nothing to prevent it from being represented in that manner.

13. With reference to the question of the Provincial Advisory Councils no useful observations can be made unless a scheme has been framed and presented for discussion, but no such scheme is formulated. The scheme should define the approximate number of the members and the number to be taken from each of the different interests. I think in this Council each district ought to be represented in addition to the representation of each important interest. The remarks I have made in connection with the Imperial Council, that the members should be elected, that interests may be allowed to be represented by outsiders, and that the consultations should be open and public, apply also to the Provincial Councils.

14. Proceeding next to the question of the enlargement of the Legislative Councils, Imperial as well as Provincial, it will be noted that the letter of the Secretary to the Government of India views with disapproval at the number of Pleaders and Barristers that have been returned by the District Boards and the District Municipalities : it states that the existing elective system has signally failed to represent other important elements of the community, and it seeks to provide a counterpoise for the prominence enjoyed by the educated classes by creating an additional electorate recruited from the landed and moneyed classes.

15. The people of the country, on the other hand, look at this question from a different standpoint. The higher offices of the public service of this country are filled by gentlemen of the highest ability and education and the official side in the Legislative Councils is represented by the ablest, the cleverest and the most experienced officers out of this service. Most of the questions that come before the Legislative Councils affect the people generally and there are very few matters in which the interests of one section of the community conflict with those of another. Differences of interests between the persons following different trades and occupations have not yet become so emphasised as to create a desire for the representation of any particular interest as apart from the interest of the whole community. Under these circumstances it is nothing unusual if the voters of the District Boards and Municipal Boards do not prefer to choose a comparatively uneducated agriculturist or a trader for their representative in the Legislative Council, but choose in his stead a person who is as near as possible in ability, information and skill to the official representatives of Government in the Legislative Council. I am unable to understand why Government should feel disappointed at this result. It would be most undesirable that while on the one hand the measures of Government are supported by the best intelligence and ability available, they should be ineffectually criticised owing to inexperience, want of sufficient education, knowledge and skill on the part of the non-official members.

16. There is another point which it is necessary to note. The lawyers in India is not a separate class who have to watch the interests of their class which are different from the interests of the land-holding, commercial and agricultural communities. They come out of all classes of the people, big and small landholders, merchants, manufacturers and agriculturists. Many of them belong to and represent the moneyed classes. In India education has not yet spread so widely as to permeate through all the sections of the society. All classes do not get opportunities to be trained in and habituated to the discussions of public questions. They wish that their wants and views should be brought to the notice of Government. Feeling themselves unable to do so they wish to be represented by persons who are able to do this better than themselves. The circumstance that in the election by the District Boards and the District Municipalities the lawyers are preferred cannot really be attributed to the fact of their having as lawyers any particular influence, but because most of the electors understand that they are better qualified to act as the exponents of their wants and wishes than persons chosen from any other class of the community.

17. I understand that Government precludo from discussion the question whether there should be or should not be a standing official majority in the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils, and I therefore refrain myself from expressing my views on it.

18. In the scheme formulated by the Government of India out of 26 non-official members 2 are experts, to be nominated by the Viceroy for special purposes when necessary and 1 is a Ruling Chief who has no interests whatever involved in the work of the Legislative Council. Of the remaining 23, 16 members are proposed to represent minorities, the 2 members of the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay represent the non-official European community, 7 are to represent the nobles and the great land-owners, 2 are Mahomodans and 4 are to be specially nominated by the Viceroy to represent minorities or special interests. The only persons who may to some extent be said to represent the population of 250 millions would be the 7 persons who are returned by the non-official members of the Provincial Councils. I submit that a representation of 7 out of 54 given to the people of the country is most inadequate. I think that in a Council of 54 there should be at least 20 representatives of the people at large. I think the Municipal Corporations of the Cities of Calcutta, Bombay and Madras should be allowed each to elect a member; the agricultural classes through the District Boards should be allowed to elect 1 member for each province; the professional and educational classes of each province should be allowed to elect 1 member and Indian merchants and manufacturers where they have formed themselves into associations should be allowed to elect 1 member.

19. As regards the class of great land-holders I have already expressed my views. They would not necessarily represent the class of small landholders; in several respects their interests do not coincide. When 7 out of 23 seats are reserved for the large land-holders' class, the representation of this class would be disproportionately high when compared with that of the other sections of the community.

20. With reference to the special representation of the Mahomedan community I do not propose to offer any observations here. In connection with the question of the expansion of the Provincial Legislative Council I wish to offer a few remarks on the policy of the representation by castes and creeds.

21. In connection with the question of the Provincial Legislative Councils I submit that it would be inadvisable to require any special qualification for the members of the Council. If any appreciable difference be made between the pecuniary qualifications of the voters and the candidates, there may be a fear of gentlemen, otherwise the best eligible and who command the highest confidence of the people being shut out. The electors' field of election should not in any way be narrowed.

22. I beg next to submit that it would be most undesirable if elements of race, caste or religion are allowed to enter into the election of members of the Provincial Legislative Council. Questions in which the race, caste or religious interests of the different communities clash with each other rarely come before Legislative Councils. As things now stand the members of different creeds and race hardly think of their difference in this matter and harmoniously work towards the attainment of common good. At the time of making an election caste and race distinctions are altogether left aside and what is in the mind of electors when voting at an election is generally who is best qualified to advocate their cause. If elections are made on caste, race and creed basis, the spirit of harmony and toleration will be lost and that of narrowness and caste and race jealousies will be introduced. Persons would be elected on account of race and creed considerations irrespective of the question whether they are best suited in helping Government on Legislative questions.

23. I further submit that the proposal in respect of District Boards of assigning and distributing seats to be filled by election among occupational groups and of selecting certain castes as representing each group appears to me open to the most serious objections. Apart from the question that it would considerably increase the spirit of dissension and quarrelling, this proposal must raise difficult and complicated questions of administration, would tend to promote intrigues among the officers of Government, and would increase difficulties in the work of Government. Again, when Government have no objection to allow the Mahomedans to vote as a body, it is unjust that a different rule should be applied to the Hindus and they should be prevented from voting as a body, but they should be permitted to vote by occupational sections in such a way that the landlord section should vote for a landlord only, the agriculturist for an agriculturist only, and the trader for a trader only. If Government feel that occupational interests are not properly represented, the best remedy is to concentrate the interests and not to split them in such a way that there would be occupational interests on one side and the creed interests on the other. So far as the administration is concerned, the needs of an agriculturist would be the same whether he is a Hindu or a Mahomedan and the needs of a trader would be the same whether he is a Hindu or a Mahomedan, but according to the proposal made the Mahomedan agriculturist is prevented from joining hands with his Hindu brethren in electing a man who best advocates the agriculturist interests and in the same way about the other interests. If Government consider that there should be occupational representations I submit that in the present condition of education in the country Government will not consider it proper to restrict them to elect out of their own class or occupation, but leave them liberty to select any person in whom they may have confidence.

24. I am of opinion that the the Provincial Legislative Council may now be expanded by allowing each district to send a representative instead of each of the divisions sending one. Under the present conditions the members that represent the different divisions have not full knowledge of the wants and needs of each of the districts that they represent. I also think that the Mill-owners' Association who represent a very important industry should be allowed to elect one representative. I think the different associations of Indian merchants such as the Piece-goods Merchants' Association and the Rice Merchants' Association, etc, should between them be allowed to elect one representative and that an electorate composed of graduates of a particular standing be constituted to elect a member representing the educated classes.

25. In connection with the budget the letter remarks that the discussion is of a discursive and unfruitful character; but so long as the Council has to discuss a budget which has actually been sanctioned and which cannot be altered and when the members have no right to move amendments, the present condition of things must continue. I suggest, however, that if preliminary to the submission of the budget to the Government of India for sanction there is an informal conference between the Member of Government who is in charge of the budget and the non-official members and the non-official members are permitted to move one or two amendments subject to a time limit which Government may fix, the discussion is likely to be more pointed and useful.

26. In connection with interpellations I think it would be desirable if Government were to form rules for publishing their replies to questions sent to them by the non-official members, say, every two months when the Council is not sitting.

27. After the success of the experiments of local self-government and the reformed Legislative Councils that came into existence in 1893, the people of this country expected that the new shemes will be progressive, but they feel much disappointed, and I think the public are justified in regarding that the schemes that are proposed will have the effect of rather carrying the country backward instead of carrying it forward.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
GOKULDAS K. PAREKH.

Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau.

THE INDIAN MERCHANTS' CHAMBER AND BUREAU,
77—79, APOLLO STREET :
Bombay, 10th December 1907.

From—Mr. MUNMOHANDAS RAMJI,
Chairman, "The Indian merchants' Chamber and Bureau," Bombay,

To—R. E. ENTHOVEN, Esq., I.C.S.
Acting Secretary, General Department of the Government of Bombay.

Dear Sir,

The attention of the Committee of my Chamber and Bureau having been drawn to the Circular letter of the Government of India, dated 26th August 1907, is was resolved, in view of the advisability of the Indian mercantile interests of this great city being properly represented in the Councils of the Empire, to ascertain the views of the following leading Associations which severally represent these interests, viz .—

(1) The Bombay Native Piece-goods Merchants' Association.
(2) The Grain Merchants' Association.
(3) The Diamond Merchants' Association.
(4) The Bombay Cotton Exchange Company, Limited.

These were accordingly addressed on the subject, as will be more particularly seen from the annexed copy of the letter forwarded to them.

On receipt of the replies of the aforementioned bodies (copies of which are also annexed), my Committee proceeded to consider the proposal adumbrated for the expansion of the Legislative Councils in the Circular letter of 26th August 1907, and resolved that the following representation be made to the Government of India through your Government.

Having regard to the fact that Indian mercantile men form an important and integral factor of the British Indian Empire, and that their interests are paramount in the economic condition of the country, my Committee earnestly hope that the representation will receive a sympathetic and favourable consideration at the hands of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General in Council.

It appears from the Circular letter that it is proposed to allot two seats in the Imperial Legislative Council to mercantile interests, which are to be filled by representatives from the Bombay and Bengal Chambers of Commerce.

My Committee view with deep regret this proposal because, as they respectfully beg to point out, it will entirely leave out of account the large interests of the great Native Mercantile Community of India, and especially of Bombay. My Committee are sure that it cannot be the intention of the Government to ignore altogether such interests, which are equal to, if not superior to, the interests of the European mercantile members of Bengal and Bombay.

Without, in any way, deprecating the claims of these, my Committee beg to point out that Indian mercantile interests have an equal claim to be adequately and properly represented on the proposed expanded Council.

The two Chambers, it may be pointed out here, are exclusively European, havings perhaps not more than five or six Indian members; as a matter of fact, there is not a single Indian merchant on their Committees.

Thus those bodies cannot be said to represent even partially, let alone wholly the enormous interest of the Indian mercantile public.

Moreover, my Committee respectfully urge that the interests of the Indian merchants are sometimes not indentical with, but opposed to, those of the European merchants.

The two are sometimes in conflict, for, while the European members look at matters from their own point of view, the Indians find them prejudicial.

Such being the actual state of affairs, my Committee wish to press upon the attention of the Government the extreme importance of recognizing Indian mercantile interests, side by side with European. To ignore the claims of the former would not only be unfair, but would prove a great bar in the way of the Government in gaining a proper knowledge about the views and feelings of such a large and important class. The denial of their claims would be opposed to the liberal spirit of the policy of the Government, so long maintained and so often publicly declared, namely, equal rights to all classes of His Majesty's subjects.

If all large interests are to be seriously considered and recognized, then my Committee are strongly of opinion that the interests of so important a body as Indian merchants could not be ignored.

From the annexed papers it will be seen that the annual turnover of commerce in the hands of Indian merchants amounts to forty crores of rupees, a figure which represents about one-third part of the trade of the Bombay Presidency. The total aggregate of members of all the commercial bodies is twelve hundred, which is no mean index of the importance and strength of leading Indian merchants of Bombay. For the reasons set forth above, my Chamber repectfully pray that His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General in Council will favourably consider this representation, emanating from a truly representative body of Indian merchants and recognize their claim for at least one seat on the proposed expanded Council of the Empire.

In conclusion, I beg to state that, though this representation relates primarily to the expansion of the Imperial Legislative Council, it applies with still greater force to the scheme of the expansion of the Bombay Provincial Council, to which body Indian merchants of Bombay have a very strong right of sending representatives on account of the preponderance of their interests in this Presidency.

I beg to remain,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant,

MUNMOHUNDAS RAMJI,
Chairman.

From—The Secretary, The Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau, Bombay;

To—The Chairman (name of the Association).

Dear Sir,

You are no doubt aware of the scheme of the expansion of the Legislative Councils, recently published by the Government of India for the consideration and suggestions of the public. A copy of the State Despatch on the subject is herewith enclosed for your information. As the Committee of this Chamber are about to submit their representation on the subject, namely, on the great desirability of representing the vast Native commercial and trading interests on the proposed Legislative Councils, I am directed to state that the Committee will be glad to know the wishes of your Association on the matter.

An early answer will greatly oblige.

BOMBAY NATIVE PIECE-GOODS MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION.

Sheth Mulji Jetha's Cloth Market Hall:

Bombay, 11th October 1907.

To—The Secretary, The Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau, Bombay.

Dear Sir,

Your letter of 20th September 1907 was duly considered by our Committee, who have directed us to reply as follows.

The Bombay Native Piece-goods Merchants' Association is in full sympathy with the views of your Chamber in the matter of the proposed representation of important mercantile interests adumbrated in the Circular letter of the Government of India.

The Committee think that it is absolutely essential that the Association which have the largest piece-goods interests in this Presidency should have its representative on the proposed Legislative Council. It is only fair that, when European Chambers are to be allowed the privilege of such representation, the interests, not only of the Piece-goods Association, but also of the Cotton Exchange Association, the Grain Merchants' Association, the Diamond Merchants' Association, should have either the right of sending their respective representatives or should be represented by so influential a body as your own Chamber.

It may be of some interest to your Chamber, while sending the proposed representation to the Government, to know that our Association alone has four hundred members, all leading Native merchants dealing in piece-goods whose imported value yearly averages ten crores.

We trust, therefore, that if each individual interest referred to cannot have a seat, at any rate your Chamber, as representing all those interests, should certainly be enfranchised for the proposed expanded Council.

Yours faithfully,

THE GRAIN MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION.

2057, Musjid Bunder Road:

Bombay, 19th October 1907.

To—The Secretary, The Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau, Bombay.

Dear Sir,

Your letter of the 20th September 1907 was duly considered by our Committee, who have directed me to reply as follows.

The Grain Merchants' Association is in full sympathy with the views of your Chamber in the matter of the proposed representation of important mercantile interests adumbrated in the Circular letter of the Government of India of 26th August 1907.

The Committee think that it is absolutely essential that the Association which has the largest grain interests in the Presidency should have its representative on the proposed Legislative Council. It is only fair that, when European Chambers are to be allowed the privilege of such representation, the interests, not only of the Grain Merchants' Association, but also of the Bombay Native Piece-goods Merchants' Association, the Cotton Exchange Association, should have either the right of sending their respective representatives or should be represented by so influential a body as your own Chamber.

It may be of some interest to your Chamber, while sending the proposed representation to the Government, to know that our Association alone has 500 members, all leading Native grain merchants, whose yearly turnover averages twelve crores of rupees.

We trust, therefore, that if each individual interest referred to cannot have a seat, at any rate your Chamber as representing all these interests, should certainly be enfranchised for the proposed expanded Council.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,

Bombay Presidency Trades Association.

BOMBAY PRESIDENCY TRADES ASSOCIATION, LIMITED
29, ESPLANADE ROAD, FORT,
Bombay, 23rd December 1907.

To—The Secretary to Government, General Department, Bombay.

Sir,—I have the honour to enclose a petition to His Excellency the Governor in Council and shall be much obliged if you will be good enough to submit the same at as early a date as convenient.

I have, etc.,
H. GREGORY HYDE,
Master,
Bombay Presidency Trades Association, Limited.

To—The Right Hon'ble Sir GEORGE SYDENHAM CLARKE, G.C.M.G., G.C.I.E., etc., etc.,
Governor of Bombay and Presidency in Council.

The humble petition of the Bombay Presidency Trades Association, Limited, of Bombay.

Sheweth as follows:—

1. The Association is a body duly incorporated under the provisions of the Indian Companies Act, 1882.

2. Its 35 members have invested, roughly, nearly a crore of rupees in their several businesses, and employ a very considerable number of high class assistants on high salaries, and contribute largely to the Imperial and local taxes and revenues.

3. The purposes for which the Association has been formed, and which it steadily keeps in view are, as stated in its Memorandum of Association (amongst other things), the following:—

(a) To promote, consider, watch over and safeguard the interests, general or particular, of the trading community of the Bombay Presidency;

(b) To consider or watch any Legislative or other measures affecting trade and if deemed advisable, to address Government with respect thereto; and

(c) To collect and circulate statistics and other information relating to trade.

4. It is, therefore, submitted that the Association occupies an important position in the trading world, and makes it an important factor to be dealt with.

5. Government have frequently asked for, and obtained and acted on its views and opinions on points of administration in relation to the Customs and other departments of the State, and also in regard to matters for the time being pending in the Legislative Council. The Association is also from time to time furnished by Government with particulars of the business to be transacted at the meetings of the Council and with copies of the questions to be asked thereat.

6. The interests of the Association are, moreover, naturally bound up with all that pertains to the welfare and prosperity of the city, and in particular with its expansion and improvement on the lines sketched by Government in a recent communication to several of the local authorities. The members of the Association being also large importers of goods and merchandise, they are deeply interested in the success of the trade of the port, and the extension and improvement of the Docks and other works and in everything that facilitates transit by railway and other means of communication.

7. As it is understood that Your Excellency's Council is about to be enlarged with a view to strengthening it with the advice and counsel of representatives of the different classes of the population of the Presidency, the Association beg to urge that the election to it of a representative of the Association whose knowledge and great business experience of trade requirements and matters in general could not fail to be of the greatest advantage to Government and the public at large.

8. A member of the Trades Association of Calcutta has a seat in the Council of His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

The Association therefore prays that Your Excellency in Council will be pleased to favourably entertain their request that a seat on the Council may be reserved for at least one of the members (nominees) of the Association.

And the Association as in duty bound shall ever pray, etc.

The seal of the Bombay Presidency Trades Association, Limited, was on the 23rd day of December 1907 hereunto affixed in the presence of

H. GREGORY HYDE,
Master.

Mr. Bomanji Ardeshir Dalal.

Rustumpura, Panch Mahals, 28th December 1907.

From—BOMANJI ADESHIR DALAL, Esq.,

To—The Secretary to Government, General Department.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of a copy of Government Resolution No. 6533, General Department, dated 31st October last, regarding the enlargement of Legislative Councils forwarded to me for information and opinion on the 16th instant.

In reply I respectfully beg to express my complete accord with the principle laid down in the letter from the Government of India annexed thereto (Nos. 2310—2317), viz., that no "scheme of constitutional reform would meet the real requirement of the present time which did not make adequate provision for representing the landed aristocracy of India, the mercantile and industrial classes and the great body of moderate men, who, under existing conditions, have no sufficient inducement to enter political life, and find but little scope for the exercise of their legitimate influence." Hitherto the so-called educated classes consisting mostly of lawyers have professed to voice the needs and sentiments of the masses and have in a majority of cases pressed upon Government their own views in the name of the masses. But their stake in the welfare of the country is but small compared with that of the landowning and commercial classes who are better qualified to speak in the name of the masses and to give expression to their feelings and aspirations.

It is therefore desirable on the part of Government to give these classes wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters without exposing them to the rough and trouble ordeal of an electoral struggle with men who in many cases are socially their inferiors. I would go further and say that those classes have a right to be called upon to render a larger measure of assistance to the Executive Government than they at present have opportunities of doing.

As regards the Ruling Chiefs I am humbly of opinion that they should not be, as a rule, called upon to meddle in matters affecting British India. The assistance of some of the more enlightened and progressive Chiefs may on very rare occasions be sought with advantage by Government. They should, however, be allowed a larger scope on the administration of the affairs of their own States.

With the above exception the proposals outlined by the Government regarding the constitution of Advisory Councils will, if carried out, result in making a considerable advance in the direction of bringing all classes of people into closer relation with the Government and its officers.

As regards representation of classes and interest in His Excellency the Governor General's Legislative Council, I humbly submit that it would be invidious to give any special representation to any particular community. The ablest and the most respected leaders of Native opinion, to whatever community they may belong, ought rather to be invited to take part in the Legislative Council.

With regard to the elected members of the Provincial Councils the qualifications required both for electors and candidates need to be raised rather than that representation should be based on race, caste or religion.

The Universities and other educated and experienced bodies might be given a larger share in the election of candidates to the Provincial Legislative Councils, and so, too, some of the leading Native Chambers of Commerce and Merchants' Association and leading landholders might have a right to send representatives to these Councils.

Mr. Ram Mohunroy Jaswantrai Desai, Inamdar of Vintoj, Halol, in the Panch Mahals District.

To—The Secretary, Government of Bombay.

Sir,

I have the honour most respectfully to submit for the kind consideration of Government the following few suggestions on the draft scheme about the proposed Imperial and Provincial Advisory and the expansion of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils, placed before the public in or about August last.

It could not but have given great satisfaction to all thoughtful Indians to see that time has arrived when Government consider it right to take a step forward as regards educating and associating the people in the governing of the country. The draft scheme in its language and tone bespeaks great earnestness and anxiety for the well-being of the masses; and a noble resolve to invigorate weak spots in the methods of carrying on Government permeates the whole spirit of it.

There seems to be, however, an apparent conflict between generosity and responsibility, and if the latter has to some extent won, it must be admitted to be due to the fact that Government, who have very guardedly to pilot the ship of state through inter-actions, re-actions and counter-actions of party strifes and race rivalries, can surely hold themselves justified in feeling their way very cautiously. When the recent doings in some parts of British India, which may be real signs of a national awakening as is claimed for them, are causing grave uneasiness and heart-burnings in the Congress camp itself, it cannot be wondered that Government do not look on them with favour. The draft scheme therefore deserves all praise, and coming as it does in the wake of a period of disorder proves conclusively that the confidence of Government in the faithfulness of the nation remains unshaken. To the Indians themselves loyalty to the British Throne and trust in the righteousness of the British Rule are become a part of their life-creed, whatever differences of opinion may exist between them and Government as regards individual measures and policies. The Pax Britannica is come to be as indispensable to them as the bread and water by which men live.

2. It would undoubtedly have rejoiced the people to see in these Councils assemblies carrying on certain functions of Government, entrusted in the beginning to deal with some such matters as public charities, private trusts, religious and social questions, and Municipal and District Local Boards control, etc., and proceeding on—if they deserved the confidence—to the guidance of railways, irrigation and other public works, etc., matters which could have been entrusted as an experimental measure to them without great detriment to the prestige of power or Government, the circle of their jurisdiction with great care and gradually being widened.

But this grant of the consultative bodies, etc., comes at a time when Government believe themselves justified in bringing into force measures which have been thought to be repressive and re-actionary in their nature, and it is therefore a matter for congratulation that India gets even so much. It now remains for the people to deserve the great trust and to act so as to win the regard of Government, without which their self-expression, however promising, will certainly remain barren. Unless and until the country in its large majorities is able to secure their good-will and trust, Government will most probably deem it their duty to maintain the policy put forth in Mr. Morley's dictum that—in these Councils official majority must preponderate.

The Legislative Councils under the proposed scheme of expansion being as they will be governed to some extent by the elective franchise, and the Councils of Notables being declared to be purely advisory bodies, with no legislative or administrative powers and no functional obligations, the principle of nomination, which Government are putting on a re-trial, but this time on a grander scale, should be welcomed by the nation in all fairness.

I beg leave humbly to submit that nomination, if it brings together really representative men, would be superior to the present system of election which —although noble and exalted in theory—is in actual practice, as has aptly been remarked in the draft scheme, often disgusting and degrading; the notoriously selfish and vulgar contests of election campaigns deterring many a man, good and able, from going in for the membership.

Thus although nomination in governing the constitution of Advisory Councils can do an amount of good, there is one factor in the practice thereof which, if not guarded against, may render the remedy worse than the evil. The power of making selections which rests absolutely with Government will be exercised by its officials. These gentlemen, however just and capable, are likely occasionally to be carried away as human beings by prejudices or predispositions in mistaking reasonable opposition for selfish obstinacy. The inefficiency of nominated members is hence a baneful factor to be earnestly watched and closely guarded against. And therefore as a remedy, I beg respectfully to submit, Government will do well now and again to bring pertinently to the notice of the officers its earnest desire of elucidating true public opinion and making these nominations as perfectly representative as possible; as the principles of election and nomination will be working side by side, one in the Legislative and the other in the Advisory Councils, the latter will have to receive very careful attention and conscientious handling in order to prove its thorough success. For, otherwise, this great endowment of Government will remain simply fruitless.

Nomination has one important advantage over election, and it is this: in the latter any person, of whatever capacity, can get in, by hook or by crook, who manages to secure a majority of votes; while under the former, Government can send in really representative and experienced men, which, if practised in a majority of instances, cannot fail to obtain for the Councils and membership the very highest regard due to their position.

3. I beg leave now respectfully to propose the way in which the membership of the Provincial and Imperial Advisory Councils should, in my humble opinion, be distributed. Inasmuch as full Councils are only occasionally to be called, but ordinarily members individually, in committees, or by circulars are to be consulted, they would have become much more representative and not unwieldy, had the limit of membership been extended to 100, instead of being as at present proposed to be confined to 60. The membership in the Provincial Councils could then have been raised to 50 or 60 without any great inconvenience and disregard to the principle of proportion. But as it is, that for the Imperial being fixed at 60, I would respectfully submit that the number of members for the Provincial Council be 35, the distribution of seats being made on about the lines herein suggested :—

The Provincial Advisory Council.

1. 5—among Native Chiefs and administrators as well as great territorial magnates; this class may include ministers and Dewans of Native States also.

II. 5
- 2—among petty land-owners and zamindars, paying Government assessment of about Rs. 100 per annum; it is this middle class of watandars that is in close and direct touch with the masses, having to carry-on most of its affairs through its representative men; and not the great landed nobles whose estates, etc., are managed almost entirely by their karbharis and agents.
- 3—among merchants, manufacturers, miners, planters and artizan classes, etc.; the advantage of ascertaining their views on certain governmental measures cannot be valued too highly.

III. 5—among retired Government and Native States officers, who are bound to be experienced and capable and have grown grey with age and respect among the people. They are sure to be a real help to Government having been much more in touch with the administrative methods and workings than any other classes.

IV. 5
- 3—among Native Presidents and members of Municipalities.
- 2—among Native members of District Local Boards.

V. 5
- 2—among Fellows of the Universities, 1 being reserved for the Vice-Chancellor ex-officio, and 1 for Native fellows
- 1—among the President and members of the local Chamber of Commerce.
- 2—among the Indian and Anglo-Indian Editors of dailies or weeklies.

The Native Press in India, however young or inexperienced, is rapidly rising to be a living force, for good or evil. It is for Government to take it by the hand and associating it with itself in the governing, endow it with a new sense of responsibility. In order to keep both the sides of the balance equal the nomination of one Anglo-Indian and one Native journalist would supply a real desideratum and do permanent good. Educated India, though in small minority wields unsuspected considerable power over the masses who are bound to follow its lead as much as the body obeys the head: and the Press and the University are their most natural representatives.

Again, among the provisions made by Government in order to bring out representative men for these Councils, educational standpoint appears to be everywhere specially kept in view, though more in the case of Mahomedans than other Indians, probably because the former are a little more backward than the latter and therefore it is not necessary to enter at any length into this important question.

VI. 10—among the leaders of classes, castes and races, and their priests :—

- 4—among Hindus, including Brahmos and Sikhs, who are indigenous to particular provinces.

There are at various places recognized leaders of the people, Nagar Seths, Seths of the Mahajans and communities and others, who, though not coming under any of the abovementioned heads, often exercise authority not less than, and High Priests who wield power often more potently than, Government officers even, over their respective followings. On inquiry it will soon be patent to Government that they are no negligible entity from the point of utility in the scheme under consideration.

The Imperial Advisory Council.

I. 20—among Native Chiefs, administrators, great territorial magnates nobles, ministers and Diwáns of Native States. His Excellency Lord Lytton's noble scheme of making Native Princes Imperial Councillors and associating them in the governing of the country, which being perhaps in advance of the times, has remained so long on paper, gets a new lease of life under this provision and will surely have better opportunities of justifying its conception. Native Princes, coming as they will in closer touch with Government, and feeling greatly the responsibility laid on them, will begin to think and act more freely, more earnestly for themselves; Native States also may be the gainers by their rulers viewing and reviewing the principles and practice in all their pros and cons, which they will be called upon to discuss, relating to and current in British territories and ending as a natural consequence in adapting the same to the requirements of their subject-peoples. But there are a couple of possible drawbacks to the thorough success of this portion of the scheme, which will have to be looked to; what Government wish for would certainly be independent opinion about any question referred to by them, and it is also very likely that Native Chiefs would prefer, from the peculiar nature of their relations with Residents and Political Agents, to have the fewest differences possible from the latter in material points. Government will therefore have to request these officials to maintain strictly a policy of non-interference as regards Council matters; otherwise there may be, it is to be feared, little chance of getting healthy and independent criticism from these noble councillors. Again, the discussions carried on in the same assembly among members consisting of men, of all sorts and conditions, coming from ruling dynasties and from the classes and the masses, and having and enjoying an apparent equality of membership, are certain ultimately to lessen appreciably the high respect in which the latter hold the former. The institution of two separate Chambers would probably do away with this difficulty.

4. The proposed expansion of the Legislative Councils.—In this part of the scheme there are to be met with some praiseworthy additions, and representation will probably be the gainer by elections being conducted along the lines suggested therein; but it is respectfully submitted that, as in the case of nominations, it would be but fair to give the principal of election the fullest possible scope; and therefore to election should be allotted all the non-official places Government could spare. For, instead of, as in the case of Provincial Legislative Council, Government nominating voters after consulation with Panchávats, etc., it would purhaps be better to give elective franchise to certain specified bodies and to ask them to elect their own voters.

Place should also be made for the elected representatives of the Universities, of merchents, etc., and also for those of the smaller landed gentry.

Some places being reserved for Mahomedans, it would be more in the fitness of things that those for other communities should also be created in proportion.

Inasmuch as Government have been pleased to come out with a definite and carefully thought out plan as regards the constituency of these Councils and as all such schemes, coming from whatever quarters, must be experimental in their nature, it would be the best that the measure which must have emanated as a result of expert opinion should first receive a fair trial. It is therefore unnecessary, I humbly beg to state, to enter here into minute details as regards it.

5. The plan suggested for crippling lengthy debates by making them follow consultations, it is sincerely to be hoped, will work real and substantial good. In such matters as these the committee is invariably superior to the Senate and often better state of things is brought about round a table than on the chamber floor. The interchange of views and consultative deliberations which will precede Council debates are sure to recompense the loss of time occasioned by the introduction of this system of prior conferences.

6. I now am coming to a point, I fear, on which Government seem definitely to have made up their mind and probably on strong grounds, and so the less said about it the better it would be. But I will try to put the matter before Government as shortly and respectfully as I can, which I believe to be highly essential, because I fear that Government may be liable to misrepresentation as regards its present action or in future be possibly involved in heated controversies about the subject.

The question I mean is that of making race distinctions. I would be the last person to grudge Government's taking by the hand of Mahomedans who are a very backward community at present, and whose forefathers even in the beginning of the last century divided with Bráhmans almost a monopoly of official places and patronage. They are a noble, generous and intelligent race, and as the state of things brought about is really deplorable, Government could surely see some other way to facilitate their advance; but to go back upon race, distinctions and creed patronage, which are abandoned everywhere in the Empire by British Government, may perhaps be reactionary as to its possible effects.

Looked upon from a historical standpoint the plea does not seem to hold ground. Canada and the United States and the recent Governments of Orangia and Transvaal, not to speak of older organizations, contain mixed populations. Transvaal indeed has shown in late elections almost a reprehensible greed of race interests and yet very little, if any, fault has been found with the state of things by the Anglo-Indian Press, which is a very high authority in matters which affect all British interests throughout the world. Thus when in all other places race distinctions at least among people with equal rights and responsibilities are not thought necessary, it is most respectfully submitted, there is no reason for their introduction here also. Such distinctions will but dwarf the national, all-Indian spirit, slowly but surely coming into being, fostered by English education and British ideals.

If, however, this is a temporary measure only, to be so brought into force that the sensibility of other creeds and races may not feel the sting thereof, there can be nothing to fear from it. The one thing therefore that Government will have to do, in order to do away with the possibility of future petitionings and race troubles, is as suggested above in clause 3, etc., to provide proportionate space for the representatives of all the chief creeds and races.

7. In conclusion, I beg, most dutifully and respectfully, to lay before Government my cordial good wishes for the success of these great measures. It will now remain for the people to realise their responsibility as regards this noble gift and to act so as to deserve well both of Government, and of their future generations for whom they will be leaving a benefitous and rich inheritance.

With heartfelt prayers to the Almighty Lord for the unqualified usefulness and success of these new schemes.

Jaint Report of the Commissioners of Divisions with their Notes of Dissent.

No. T.R.-68, dated the 10th January 1908.

From— J. DEC. ATKINS, Esq., I.C.S., Commissioner, N. D., W. DODERET, Esq., I.C.S., Commissioner, C. D.,
The Hon'ble Mr. R. P. BARROW, I.C.S., Commissioner, S. D.,

To—The Secretary to Government, General Department.

We have the honour to submit the report called for in Government Resolution No. 6533, dated the 31st October 1907.

2. We will endeavour in the first place to deal with the large body of non-official criticism—mainly destructive—of the principles underlying the proposals of the Government of India, and in the second place attempt to present to Government a constructive scheme for the two sets of Councils. We may say that as regards Advisory Councils we are not unanimous.

3. To take the Advisory Councils first, it will be observed that the main points of non-official criticism may be summarized as under:—

(a) The scheme does not recognize the elective principle.

(b) It is contended that in so far as the Imperial Council is concerned, a body composed entirely of territorial magnates will be unable to advise the Government of India as regards the varied interests appertaining to the numerous communities spread over the Indian Peninsula. It is urged that the territorial magnates are not cognisant of those varied interests, and it is more than hinted by some writers that the Indian Chiefs as a body do not possess that degree of enlightenment and education which ought to be a necessary qualification for the possession of an adviser of such an august body as the Government of India.

(c) It is contended that the scheme of occasional, non-collective and confidential consultation will not conduce to that healthy expression of opinion so essential in an advisor.

(d) It is urged that the scheme disappoints public opinion in that no power of initiative is given to the Councils.

(e) And finally it is claimed that such bodies should have a deciding and decisive voice in matters referred to them, provided that a large majority, generally stated at three-fourths, is unanimous on a particular question.

4. Before proceeding to deal seriatim with the five points noted above, we would beg leave to remark that the whole purport of the projected reform appears to have been misunderstood by non-official critics. It is assumed that it is the intention of the Government of India to call into being the germs of Parliamentary Government from which in the eflux of time the full-grown form of representative Government might be involved by enlarging the basis of representation. As we understand the proposals, nothing more was intended than to provide Government with a readily accessible body comprising noblemen and gentlemen, representing the best opinion available in the country, who could be consulted on matters affecting the public weal.

5. With regard to (a) (non-recognition of the elective principle) we would take leave to remark that the objection urged against a system of nomination, namely, that the nominees would not feel at liberty to tender to Government their free and unbiassed opinion, contains within itself the most conclusive reason why a system of election to these Councils would be unsuitable in present-day conditions. For it is clear that if it be admitted that the gentlemen to be nominated by Government as being the most valued advisers in this Presidency are restrained by the very fact of such nomination from freely expressing their opinions, they and others, who would be their competitors in an election, must be generally unfitted for expressing any opinion at all, and cannot have reached that state of enlightenment when the mode of appointment ceases to affect the opinion of the person called into consultation. The truth is that the elective principle, an exotic of the West, is still on its trial in the East, where for centuries the opposite principle of nomination has obtained. The latter prevails in the methods adopted in selecting the principle advisers and often the subordinate public servants of Native Rulers. It prevails in the system of caste panchâyats. And finally the acknowledged apathy of the general body of electors in Local Board and petty Municipal elections indicates that the elective principle is in India little understood, except perhaps by the small body of educated men, who have taken the greatest advantage thereof.

6. With regard to the second objection, we assume that it was the intention of the Government of India to constitute for their own Advisory Council a body composed of the highest in the land for consultation on large questions of policy concerning which a Ruler of a Native State would be qualified to give as the result of his own experience in the art of governance, a valuable opinion. We are not altogether prepared to admit that the modern Indian Ruler, trained as he now is in special colleges and having acquired, in the course of travel both in the East and in the West, a broad and varied view of men and things, is not a capable adviser of the Supreme Government. And we assume that, having admitted the necessity of their interests besides that of the landowners being directly represented in the Provincial Councils, though not in the Council of India, it is the intention of the Supreme Government to leave matters with which trade and professions are mainly concerned for discussion in local areas.

7. With regard to objections (c) and (d) we regret that we have been unable to arrive at a unanimous opinion as to the functions to be required of Advisory Councils if constituted: we have accordingly recorded to our opinions separately.

8. As regards (e) as it is not intended to create miniature Parliaments, the suggestion that a majority of $\frac{3}{4}$ths of the Council should have power to impose their wish on the Executive need not be considered further.

9. Assuming, as we understand we are entitled to do, that the scheme put forward in outline by the Government of India is purely tentative, that frank criticism of details is desired, and that the principal of neither portion of the scheme has been so definitely decided upon as to preclude our questioning its suitability, we would respectfully express the opinion that the Advisory Council, and more especially the Provincial Advisory Council, is not unlikely to exasperate the educated classes and those who claim to be their representatives, as professing to embody a concession which, when examined, will be found to concede no more than is already enjoyed, that it is not required by present-day needs, and that it may conceivably prove a source of weakness to Government.

10. As we understand the scheme, it provides for the constitution of a Council the members of which will be consulted, occasionally collectively, but more frequently individually, on a few points with regard to which Government desire to be informed on the opinions and wishes of the people. The Council will have neither power of inititation nor even permission to suggest, of its own motion, measures of improvement or reform for the consideration of Government. When consulted in session its deliberation will be presided over by one of the high officials of State, and in that case it will of course be afforded an opportunity of ascertaining the motives and intentions of Government with regard to the particular subject under discussion. When, however, the consultation is individual—that is to say, in what will probably be the majority of cases—and its results are treated as confidential, the members of the Council who are apparently to be provided with no machinery for obtaining information will have no more knowledge of the motives of Government than any intelligent reader of the public journals may acquire for himself. We would with deference submit that since there is no small probability of the general meetings of the Council being of rare occurrence there is no small risk of its members being unable to perform the second, and not perhaps the least important, of the two functions required of the Council.

11. We would take leave to represent our respectful conviction that a formally constituted Advisory Council will furnish Government with no more capable advisers on general questions than are now at their disposal. The Council can be formed only from that very class of loyal, substantial and well informed men whom Government even now, either directly or through the medium of their district officers, consult before undertaking important measures, and we are unable to discover the probability of any material advantage to the State accruing from the process which the Government of India have described as giving "clear defination and continuity to methods already partially and occasionally adopted."

12. Lastly we entertained the apprehension that on occasion the Council may hamper Government in the exercise of their discretion. Ex-hypothesi the Council must consist of men whose opinions Government consider worth having and certainly reliable, and it appears to us to follow logically that whenever the Council is consulted in session its advice must usually be accepted, adverse though it may be to the desires of Government. To neglect its advice when tendered would be to make the institution of the Council a farce and its members objects for public ridicule. It may quite conceivably happen that some measure of reform, especially one touching some popular custom of long standing, which Government know to be desirable and right, may fail to commend itself to the people at large or to a majority of their leaders, who sit on the Advisory Council, and there is, we would submit, some ground for fearing that Government may find their hands tied and their power curtailed by an agency designed to assist and strengthen.

13. Assuming that Advisory Councils are to be constituted, we consider that in the case of the Provincial Councils a small number of members—not less than ten—should suffice for all practical purposes. We would beg leave to point out that a high money qualification does not necessarily imply that the possessor of a large income would be a qualified adviser and hence we do not suggest it. We would rather that the qualifications necessary for a Councillor should be laid down somewhat on the following lines: Divisional lists should be prepared containing the names of (a) territorial magnates and substantial landholders of sufficient capacity, wealth and trustworthiness, fit in every way to fulfil the functions of advisers; (b) eminent professional men, not omitting retired officials; (c) prominent merchants. We would deprecate the fixing of any proportion which these interests should bear to the total number of Councillors, for the reason that our enquiries show that, so far as this Presidency is concerned, the numbers under each of the above heads is limited and may vary from time to time among themselves. We would lay stress on the point that Councillors may, with the general advance in education, be reasonably required to have a good knowledge of the English language. And, finally, considering that the system is one of nomination, we would leave His Excellency the Governor liberty to choose his own advisers from among the entries in a carefully prepared list, without the needless formality of subjecting his choice to the approval of the Viceroy, a device which is characteristic of a system of over-centralization.

14. According to the scheme laid down by the Government of India the Bombay Presidency might reasonably expect to send 6 territorial magnates, out of a total of 40, to the Imperial Advisory Council. In the practical application of this projected allocation we are confronted with the difficulty that we have been unable to compile a sufficiently large list of such persons, who by reason of their intelligence as well as in virtue of their financial qualifications could be considered fit for the responsible position of Imperial advisers. We are driven therefore to suggest that the number of representatives to be sent from Bombay to the Imperial Advisory Council should be restricted to 3 and that these representatives should be elected by the Provincial Council, the only qualification to be insisted upon being that the representatives selected should be themselves substantial land-owners.

15. We now turn to the question of the expantion of the Legislative Councils. It is urged by several non-officials that it is a useless formality to expand these Councils unless the non-official members are given a decisive voice in the deliberations. One official (Mr. Orr, Collector of Ahmednagar) has stated that he would like to see a trial of the experiment of reducing the official element below the strength of the non-official element in those bodies, provided that certain safeguards in the shape of a veto and the exclusion of members who have been convicted of an offence or have been bound over under Chapter VIII, Civil Procedure Code, or are obviously disloyal, are provided. The Government of India have laid it down as a cardinal principle that the official majority on these Councils must be maintained, and we conclude that the point is beyond discussion. We would, however, beg leave to remark that the acknowledged difficulty of creating a satisfactory electorate should give reason to pause before any scheme, involving the transfer of legislative power from the Executive to a body of non-officials, who incompletely represent public opinion, is adopted. We are further of the opinion that the exercise of the veto might give rise to situations which it is desirable to avoid. The veto is an expedient adapted to more advanced countries and is only exercised in extreme cases. There is no guarantee that public opinion in this country is sufficiently advanced to render the exercise of the veto necessary only on rare occasions and in unusual circumstances.

16. There has been considerable comment on the question of caste and class representation. We agree with Mr. Jackson, the Collector of Násik, that it is idle to ignore the fact that separate castes and therefore separate interests exist in this country, and we think that any scheme which fails to secure adequate representation to all prominent castes or classes is open to the objection urged by the Supreme Government against the result of the present system of election. It must be confessed, however, that apart from the educated professional classes very little real interest is taken in even Council elections, and that the history of the past shows that less forward communities are content to send lawyers to Council as their representatives. That this process must continue until the general body of the electorate is awakened to political life seems to be inevitable. We see, therefore, little advantage in creating a fictitious and apathetic supplementary electorate for the backward classes, and in the formulation of any such scheme we should be confronted with almost insuperable difficulties. In the forefront is the obstacle that to secure complete representation of individual castes, legislation would be required to remodel the Municipal and Local Board electorates. Any raising of the franchise for these elections would result in the exclusion of a considerable body of petty ratepayers of the backward classes, who under the present system have, at any rate, a voice in the election of representatives to the local bodies. That the educated professional classes preponderate on these bodies is the inevitable result of the apathy and want of interest shown by less advanced communities even in their local affairs. And as things are the output of work is better in quality, speaking generally, when the local bodies are composed in the main of members of the educated professional classes, than we imagine it would be if they were otherwise constituted. Any attempt to redress the balance would, owing to the large number of separate castes and their sub-divisions, result in the creation of an unwieldy supplementary electorate and would necessitate the election by each of the classes or castes represented in the supplementary electorate, of members from their own class or caste. There would be the further difficulty that it would be an invidious task to lay down which castes should have separate representation and which not. We do not think that it is desirable to accentuate caste differences in this way and we are conscious that the principle of election by a particular caste of a representative of that caste alone, conflicts with the broader principle on which the elective system is based, namely, the right of an elector to choose his own representative: nor is there evidence, as far as this Presidency is concerned, to show that the elected members of the professional classes have failed to represent the interests of other classes, or unduly put forward their own. The conclusion emerges that an electorate which cannot be trusted to take care of its own interests is unfit to be entrusted with the exercise of the power of election at all, and this is probably the truth as far as present-day India is concerned.

17. If the above be conceded, we are driven to suggest that the inequalities of the elective method can best be removed by the device of nomination which would ensure such limited representation as is necessary for the less advanced communities and castes, and we are encouraged to advocate this for another reason, namely, that in the case of Mahomedans no regularly constituted Anjumans exist. It is true that in large cities, such as Ahmedabad, societies exist, but it is also well known that they are not representative and that considerable jealousies exist among the different sections of the community, which are reflected in the acts and discussions of the Anjumans. As regards other communities and castes, no doubt caste panchâyats exist, but they are irregularly constituted bodies and their jurisdiction extends only to the decision of purely caste questions. They are in no sense representative bodies and amongst them are to be found members who are chosen more for their proficiency in deciding knotty questions of caste custom and usage than for their social standing. They would therefore in no way be useful as electoral colleges.

18. We now proceed to the consideration of a constructive scheme for the Legislative Councils, taking the Provincial Council first. We regard it as axiomatic that it is necessary to restrict the number of Councillors in order to ensure the prompt despatch of business and also in view of the limited number of high officials, who can conveniently be spared from their ordinary duties for the purpose of providing an official majority at the meetings of the Council. We propose therefore that the Council should be limited to 32 members, of whom 11 should be elected and 21 nominated. The elected members should be chosen by the following electorates :—

	Number of representatives.
By Municipalities in the Northern Division ...	1
By Local Boards in the Central Division ...	1
By Local Boards in the Southern Division ...	1
By the Bombay Municipality	1
By the Chamber of Commerce, Bombay ...	1
By recognised Native Trades' Associations ...	1
By the Chamber of Commerce, Karáchi ...	1
By the Sind Jághirdárs	1
By the Sardárs of the Deccan	1
By the Bombay Mill-owners' Association ... / By the Ahmedabad Mill-owners' Association ...	1(alternately)
By the Senate of Bombay University ...	1
Total ...	11

Of the 21 seats available for nomination we would allot 7 to non-officials, it being understood that 3 seats (one for each Commissioner's Division in the Presidency proper) would be reserved for land-holders, one for the Tálukdárs in Gujarát and one for Sind.

19. We consider that the present representation of Municipalities in the Northern Division on the one hand and of Local Boards in the Central and Southern Divisions on the other cannot well be discontinued. The representatives chosen by these bodies may be regarded as representatives of the advanced opinion of the Mofussil—an opinion which undoubtedly deserves representation though not directly representative of persons with a great stake in the landed interests of the country. With regard to the proposal to prescribe special qualifications for members to be elected by these bodies we are of opinion, judging by the experience of the past, that no such prescription is necessary, for it may be assumed that they will continue to elect the individuals who are in their opinion most likely to adequately represent their special interests. Similarly the Bombay Municipality seems to be entitled to retain its representative as voicing educated opinion in the City of Bombay.

20. The Chambers of Commerce in Bombay and Karáchi are excellent institutions for the representation of the general European commercial interests of those cities, and we consider that the Native Trades' Associations are equally entitled to representation.

The mill industry is so prominent and so important in Western India that we have been induced to suggest that the Bombay and the Ahmedabad Millowners' Associations should be represented on the Legislative Council. The position of Bombay needs no discussion, and as regerds Ahmedabad we would record our opinion that the steady growth of the city as a commercial centre, especially during the past decade, entitles it to be recognized as a factor in industrial politics. It possesses some 50 factories managed by men who in intelligence equal, while in close attention to business they possibly out-rival, their Bombay competitors. A representative millowner from Ahmedabad would furthermore represent three interests—the mill industry in particular; capital and the local interests of the second city in the Presidency in general. We would gladly have recommended a separate representative for each city, but are prevented from doing so owing to the necessity of restricting the members of the enlarged Council. We consider that alternate representation will for the present effectually safeguard the interests of both.

21. In the matter of professional interests the Bombay University at present forms the best electorate we can suggest. The special representation of professional interests appears to us to be altogether impracticable. A money test is not a test of intellectual wealth and the mere possession of a University degree would be too wide and too intangible a prescription to impose. Nor are we persuaded that a professional man qua his profession requires to have his electoral interests specially safeguarded. It is recognized—nay, even eagerly urged by non-official critics—that by the very force of his intellectual qualifications he is enabled to champion the cause of his fellowmen engaged in other walks of life, and the fact that in the past he has not failed to secure a voicein the representative institutions of his land leads us to expect that in the future he will continue to dominate electorates in which by reason of qualifications other than those of his profession he has a vote.

22. The Sardárs of the Deccan and the Sind Jághirdárs and land owners now each select a representative for the Council and we would recommend that they should continue to do so. They will adequately represent the great landlord interest in a way no other electorate could, and there probably will be little question that they are in every way entitled to separate representation, especially in view of the opinion of the Government of India that landed interests should receive adequate representation on the enlarged Councils.

23. We have suggested that the representation of the smaller land holders should be by nomination rather than by election. After giving the matter our best consideration we find that there are considerable difficulties in the way of forming a satisfactory electorate. We feel thal to create an electorate composed entirely of revenue-payers paying an amount fixed, say, at Rs. 5,000 or over, would not necessarily imply that the interests of the smaller land holders would be in safer hands than under some scheme of nomination from a carefully selected list of land holders, not necessarily possessed of a given income, but certainly endowed with intelligence and having a boná fide and substantial interest in land. We note that most of the larger land holders are Inámdárs whose interests are often opposed to those of their tenants. We realize that a money qualification suitable for one district would be unsuitable for another. We fear that having regard to the indefinite sub-division of land and the incomplete state of the record of rights it might frequently be discovered that a landholder entered in the list of electors as paying a large amount of land revenue was in reality a very small holder in his own right. And, lastly, we are aware that the payment of a small amount of land revenue in the shape of quit-rent is not inconsistent with the possession of a large income from land in the shape of rent. Such anomalies as these could only be remedied by very careful enquiry into and scrutiny of nominal rolls of electors which would be a work of time. In view of these difficulties, and bearing in mind the general unsuitability of an elective system for a class of the population who have hitherto evinced little interest in choosing representatives in their petty local affairs, and in deference to the desire of Government to formulate some scheme for the enlarged Councils which can speedily be introduced, we would advocate the resort to direct nomination as being the most satisfactory temporary solution of the problem of giving direct representation to land holders. We advocate territorial representation with a view to interesting the land holding classes in legislative questions affecting their local area, and we consider that the most convenient method is to have one representative for each Commissioner's Division. In point of population the Northern Division with $3\frac{1}{2}$ millions is unequal to the Central Division with 6 and the Southern Division with 5. But the inequality in numbers in the Northern Division is more than redressed by the acknowledged greater intelligence and wealth of the Gujarát peasantry.

24. Divisional lists of all substantial land holders might be prepared after careful local enquiry. These lists might eventually form the basis of a nominated electorate, should it be found advisable hereafter to apply the elective principle to the selection of representatives of the landed interests. They would be framed on a non-racial, non-caste basis, and entry therein should not be difficult of attainment by a substantial man with genuine and ascertainable interests in the soil.

25. We consider that the Gujarát Tálukdárs may fairly be allotted one nominated seat. We should have liked to suggest the election of a representative by this class from among themselves. But there are certain obstacles in the way. It would be difficult to fix the payment of a particular amount of "Jama" (quota of land revenue) as the qualification of a tálukdári elector. Estates in Gujarát vary from the true "táluka" or large estate, held by such Tálukdárs as the Thákors of Amod and Sanand, where succession is governed by the law of primogeniture, to the petty holdings of the Chuval Tálukdárs in Viramgám, which have already been considerably sub-divided and are liable to further subdivision in the future. Instances could be cited of Tálukdárs (e.g., Utelia) who are superior in point of education and intelligence to other Tálukdárs who own larger estates. Finally, as the legal definition of "Tálukdár" includes a mortgagee in possession and covers the cases of those persons who have acquired an interest in tálukdári estates by right of purchase without being descended from the original grantee of the estate, it is desirable to secure by the method of nomination that the true squire and not the money-lender shall represent the interests of the yeomanry of Gujárat.

26. Our scheme of nomination thus leaves three sheets for Muhammadans or representatives of other communities which may fail to secure representation in the elections.

27. Fourteen nominations would be reserved for officials. At present ten officials are represented on the Council, and it would not be difficult to find four others who could be selected to sit on the Council, with due regard to the convenient discharge of their ordinary duties.

28. We would suggest that the representative of the Bombay Legislative Council to be elected by the nobles and great land owners of the Bombay Presidency to the Viceregal Legislative Council should be elected by the whole body of the non-official members of the Provincial Legislative Council, but should belong only to one of the following classes of constituent members of the Provincial Council :—

The nominated land holders.
Sind Jághirdárs.
Gujarát Tálukdárs.
Deccan Sardárs (if not a Ruling Chief).

29. Similarly, owing to the difficulties already described in the course of this report as regards the creation of a satisfactory and representative Muhammedan electorate, we would recommend that the whole body of the non-official members of the Provincial Council should elect a Muhammadan member of the Provincial Council to represent that community in the Viceregal Council.

30. Turning, in conclusion, to the question of the discussion of the Budget in Council we venture to offer this criticism of the suggestion made by the Government of India, that while they undoubtedly tend to a more complete understanding of the items of the Budget by the Additional Members, they yet make no provision for an effective discussion of the current year's Budget before it has been sanctioned, nor for allowing Government who are responsible for the Budget the advantage of the local experience of members in deciding how surplus revenues can most profitably be spent or a deficit met with the minimum dislocation of the machinery of general administration. It would, we conceive, be no part of our province on the present reference to comment on the faultiness of the existing arrangements for the passing of the budget, but we venture to point out that those arrangements render it almost impossible for the Budget to be discussed in the Provincial Council until it has received the sanction of the Government of India. It would, in our respectful opinion, be of material advantage if a skeleton Budget were first prepared and fully discussed in the Provincial Council before being cast into final shape by the Honourable Board for submission to the Government of India.

31. The reports of the Collectors and opinions of officials and non-officials are being submitted separately.

Note of Dissent.

I am unable to accept the proposals of Messrs. Doderet and Barrow, in paragraphs 13 and 14 of the report, for the constitution of Provincial and Imperial Advisory Councils. I fear that such Councils would be regarded by the public as a sham, and in fact would be little better than a sham. The members as a class, though worthy and intelligent men, useful for the discussion of local affairs, would be out of place as the constituted advisers of Government. Their advice would be less weighty than the advice of Collectors of the Presidency, and, though the representatives of the up-country districts, they would not necessarily be better representatives thereof than the elected members of the Legislative Council. The latter would in fact be their rivals and competitors, competing for popular favour and also for the attention of Government. An Advisory Council that did not carry weight would be worse than no Council and would be mischievous. It is necessary, beyond everything, that an Advisory Council, if constituted at all, should command respect and should not be Ludibrium. The only sort of Council likely to command the requisite respect is a very small and select Council, having no pretensions to be representative, and consisting exclusively of men of the highest capacity and reputation as Indian statesmen. It is impossible to explain my meaning without mentioning names: so I venture to say that the sort of Advisory Council that would command the respect of Government on the one hand and the public on the other would at the present moment consist of His Highness the Aga Khan, Mr. Justice Chandavarkar, Sir Phirozsha Mehta, the Honourable Mr. Gokhale and Mr. T. J. Bennett (now in India). Such a Council of statesmen could give, on great questions, really weighty advice, so weighty indeed that, if it were unanimous, the Executive Government would be unable to ignore it. The members of the Council would in fact come to be recognized as assessors of the Executive Government. Questions of principal alone would be the province of these Councillors: individual cases would be beyond their sphere: there should be no possibility of their becoming petition-brokers.

If such a Council were appointed, it might be given the status of a Privy Council. The members ought, at the same time, to be Privy Councillors of the Governor of Bombay for Bombay questions, and of the Viceroy for Indian questions. There would then be no separate Advisory Council for India. The Viceroy would—and could—depend on the Privy Councillors of the various provinces. They would be more useful to him than Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates. Though the number of Privy Councillors for each province must necessarily be very small it cannot be a fixed number. There must be elasticity. There must be room for the Telang or Ranade of the future. And even for such a man a seat on such a Council would be an object of ambition.

J. DEC. ATKINS,
Commissioner, N. D.

Note of Dissent.

Assuming that it is open to us to discuss the necessity for Advisory Councils, then I would record my view that such Councils, if constituted with proper safeguards against the possibility of encroachment on the powers of the Executive, would materially assist Government to make their intentions and motives better known to the general public. At present Government possess no recognized agency such as is supplied by the semi-official newspapers in Europe of making known the official view. Non-official opinion is consulted and non-official views are elicited in an informal manner by Government. All that it is proposed to do is to systematize this occasional and inchoate consultation by creating a regularly-constituted consultative body which would meet at stated intervals. I am of opinion that the formal recognition of the principle of consulting non-official opinion, and the greater publicity of such consultation in the future, will be a gain to the administration.

I am opposed to giving the Councils any power of making suggestions to Government because (i) the Legislative Councils already possess the right of interpellation, (ii) the power is liable to abuse. It should rest with Government to decide what questions they will seek advice on and it should not be in the power of the Council to hamper the Executive with unsolicited advice. Free and full communication of motives and intentions concerning all matters on which advice is not specifically sought and which it is to the public interest to divulge there should and would be. Thus freer transmission of authentic information to the general public would be secured.

W. DODERET,
Commissioner, C. D.

Note.

Paragraph 7 of our report indicates that there is considerable diversity of opinion between us as to the share of responsibility which should be made over to the Advisory Council should the Government of India hold the institution to be necessary. I will endeavour to explain as briefly as possible my personal views on this point.

I adhere to the opinion expressed in paragraphs 9 to 13 of our report that the formal constitution of a Council will not only probably prove ineffectual towards the ends which the Government of India have in view, but may possibly tend to fetter the freedom and tie the hands of Government. It is needless, of course, to labour this point further, and I will only note on what appear to me to be essentials if these Advisory Councils are called into being.

The functions of the Council have been clearly defined—they are to advise and to act as Government interpreters—and the point for consideration is whether, under the outlined scheme, they will ever be in a position to effectively perform their dual obligations. I am respectfully of opinion that they must fail to do so unless it be required that the Council shall meet at regular intervals and conceded that its members are entitled to ask questions as well as authorized and even encouraged to suggest reforms and changes for the consideration of Government.

To me it appears that to leave the meetings of the Council to be fixed by chance whenever its existence is not overlooked will gradually result in a meeting becoming a thing of the rarest occurrence and the bulk of the advice received being obtained from individual members. The Council if constituted must never cease to be, at least at periodic intervals, before the public. It should, I think, meet at least once a year for collective discussion of matters referred to it by Government so that there may be an open acknowledgment of its utility in the eyes of Government.

I fail to see how the Council may reasonably be expected to truly interpret to the people the intentions of Government with respect to any measure under consideration unless it may ask for the information the absence of which would cave it ignorant of that which it is desired it should publish. I do not for a moment suggest that at a collective meeting members should be allowed to pound Government with formal questions to which replies must be given; all I suggest is that the Council should have at its disposal some machinery for getting at the Government view. I would suggest that any member, not on behalf of the Council but on his own, should be permitted to write in to Government and ask for information needed to clear his own doubts or uncertainties. I would note that a prescribed yearly general meeting would as an additional advantage afford a regularly recurring opportunity for an exposition of Government views and policy.

I consider it most essential that to give the Council a chance of real vitality and to make it of unmistakeable use to Government and the country the members should have, not what is usually called the right of interpellation, but clear authority to make in their collective capacity suggestions of all kinds for the consideration of Government. This would be giving the members no right which they do not even now possess as private citizens, for any man is at liberty to ask Government to do this, that or the other although Government may not be disposed to allow any weight to the representations made. Suggestions made by the Advisory Council are certain not to be frivolous and might often be most valuable, for the Council is by hypothesis to comprise the best material we can find. No obligation to act on the suggestion would be thrown on Government, nor would the Council suffer from the rejection of any of its own original proposals the same loss of public respect as would follow the rejection of its advice on a particular subject tendered by request.

R. P. BARROW,
Commissioner, S. D.

Chamber of Commerce, Karáchi.

No. 56, dated the 28th January 1908.

From—The Secretary, Karáchi Chamber of Commerce,

To—The Acting Secretary to Government, General Department.

With reference to your letter No. 6534 of the 31st October and Government Resolution No. 6533 of the same date on the subject of the enlargement of Legislative Councils and connected questions, the only comments my Committee desire to make are as follows:—

1. No provision appears to have been made for giving the commercial interests any adequate representation on the proposed Imperial Advisory Council.

2. No opportunity for influencing the expenditure of public revenues beyond what may result from a more detailed criticism of a budget already prepared appears to be contemplated.

3. No advance upon the present system of representation of the commercial interests of Karáchi and Sind appears to be contemplated.

2. With regard to 1 and 2, my Committee would respectfully urge that it would be in the interests of the commercial communities of India and therefore in the best interests of India as a whole, if an advance in the directions indicated were made. Especially would this be the case if expenditure on Railway, Irrigation, Telegraphs and the Postal Department could be in some measure influenced by the wishes of the mercantile communities of India.

3. With regard to 3, this Chamber was in 1892 granted the privilege of recommending a member for nomination to the Legislative Council of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay. Owing to an alteration in the constitution of the Council in 1895, this privilege was withdrawn. My Committee would respectfully urge that the status of the Chamber is now such that it should be placed on the same footing as Bombay in the matter of commercial representation.

Jain Young Men's Association, Jaipur.

No. 294, dated Jaipur, the 6th January, 1908.

From—G. DHADDA, Esq., President, Jain Young Men's Association;

To—The Private Secretary to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay.

I have the honour to forward herewith copy of the Resolution unanimously passed at Conference of the Jain Young Men's Association of India, held at Surat on the 29th, 30th and 31st December 1907, and request you to kindly lay it before His Excellency the Governor for favourable consideration.

Resolution XII.

That the various Provincial Governments be requested to consider favourably the claims of the Jain community to have their own representatives on the Legislative Councils of the various provinces and the President be authorized to submit the prayer duly to the Government concerned.

Ráo Báhadur Motilal Chunilal, President, Broach City Municipality.

No. 269, dated the 14th December 1907,

From—Ráo Bahádur MOTILAL CHUNILAL, President, Broach City Municipality,

To—The Acting Secretary to Government, General Department.

In response to the Government letter No. 6534, dated 31st October, I have the honour to submit my respectful opinion as well as my humble suggestions on the formation of the Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils and questions connected therewith.

2. I has been proposed in Resolution to form the Imperial Advisory Council chiefly out of the Ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates of the country. But I doubt whether the rulling Chiefs will receive this proposal in the same spirit in which it is offered. Rulers of prominent Native States, such as the Nizám, the Gáekwár, the Scindia, the Holkár, the Máhárájas of Mysore and Kashmere and a host of others will be very loath to accept places in an Advisory Council where the sense of dignity and independence which they are prone to entertain is likely to be offended. It is true, no doubt, that some of them were prepared to play the sattellite to the Supreme Power in the pre-British period, but the times and the forms of the paramount Government never fail to make corresponding changes in the notion of independence.

3. Besides, I fear that the Ruling Chiefs will not be, in any way, useful instruments for diffusing correct information in regard to the motive of Government, nor will they be able to correct erroneous and mischievous statements of facts or purposes. The Indian Rulers, with the few exceptions, have neither the eloquence to undeceive the people nor the opportunities to communicate their thoughts nor the willingness to stand on the same platform with any but their peers. They have their own code of State etiquette and dignity; and if their own inclinations are consulted, I think they will very probably prefer to be left alone.

4. For these reasons it will be better if the Ruling Chiefs are excused from joining the Advisory Council, but a separate Council of their own might with advantage be formed, where questions relating to the common interest of the Native States and the British Government, in other words international questions, may be discussed, but no question affecting the internal affairs of individual State should be brought within the purview of this Council.

5. In my humble opinion the Imperial Advisory Council of the Rulers may be formed of the members given below:—

(1) The Viceroy.
(2) Twenty ruling Chiefs.
(3) The Commander-in-Chief for India.
(4) The Governors of Bombay and Madras.
(5) The Lieutenant-Governors.
(6) The Chief Commissioners of the Central Provinces.
(7) The members of the Executive Council of the Viceroy and the Governors of Madras and Bombay.

6. From the Resolution it is difficult to understand what business, and that also to what extent, the Advisory Council shall perform. It has been stated in the Resolution that "the body of advisors" should have the peculiarity of "requiring no legislative recognition and possessing no formal powers of initiative;" that the members of this body are to be consulted individually or collectively at the discretion of the Governor-General; and that they can meet only when called together. These conditions, would, I think, hinder the attainment of the objects for which this Council is sought to be instituted.

7. The want of legislative recognition and formal powers of initiative will make the existence of the Council merely nominal, and consequently no constitutional requirements will be satisfied, and no greater sense of responsibility will be felt by those whose advice is sought. Moreover, the Councillors will fail to command the respect and influence the minds of the people because no active share will be given to them in the administration of the country.

8. The only object for instituting this Council appears to me to be the diffusion of correct information about the acts and intention of the Government. But the Councillors will not be in a position to explain the motives of the Government and to correct "erroneous and mischievous statements of facts or purpose" imputed to them unless they are very intimately associated with the Government by being called together twice or thrice a year, and allowed to exchange views by discussing formally as well as informally all the questions mooted or measures contemplated. Close contact and free intercourse with Government alone will make them realise the real objects and intentions of the Government.

9. I would respectfully beg to suggest that the Imperial Advisory Council should consists of the following:—

(1)	Two of the non-ruling Chiefs and Nobles (whose annual income is not less than Rs. 50,000) from each of the Provinces of (1) Bombay, (2) Madras, (3) Bengal, (4) Eastern Bengal, (5) the United Provinces, (6) Punjab, (7) Burma, and (8) one from the Central Provinces	15
(2)	Mill-owners	3
(3)	Tea-planter	1
(4)	Mine-owners	2
(5)	Representatives of the Chambers of Commerce existing in the country	2
(6)	Representatives of the political associations existing in the country	2
(7)	Representatives of the Railway Companies	2
(8)	Representatives of the Native States of—
	1 Hyderabad 1 Mysore 1 Baroda 1 Gwalior 1 Kashmere 1 Jeypur and Udeypur (alternately) 1 Patiála	7
(9)	Eminent Lawyers	2
(10)	Eminent Medical Men	2
(11)	Eminent Educationists	2

(12) Eminent Engineers and Scientists 2

(13) The Presidents of the Municipalities 2
(The selection being made by rotation from among the Presidents of the Metropolitan or other big Municipalities of cities with a population of 200,000 and upwards.)

(14) Government pensioners of high position who have, while in the service, served in various high offices and acquired considerable experience of the administration 2

(15) Military representatives to be selected from the distinguished Military officers of the Native States Armies and pensioned Military officers of the Indian Army 2

(16) Gentlemen whom His Excellency the Viceroy may consider from their special qualifications and intelligence to be worthy of nomination on this Council 4

10. I may be allowed to note here that the allotment of special seats to Mahomedan members has the undesirable tendency to create invidious controversies, and to hinder the "promotion of intimate relations between the component parts of the Indian Empire." All the appointments being by nomination, it will be very easy for the Government to silently maintain the principle by a representative selection from all the different races and communities.

11. As to the Bombay Provincial Advisory Council, I beg, with your permission, to suggest the following members :—

A.—Land-holders 12

1 member from the Zamindárs of Sind.
1 member from the 3rd, 4th and 5th classes of the Chiefs of Káthiáwár.
1 member from the Tálukdárs of Gujarát.
1 member from the Sardárs of the Deccan.
1 member from the Khots of Konkan.
1 member from the Chiefs of the 3rd and lower classes of Mahi Kantha, Pálanpur and Rewa Kantha Agencies.
6 land-holders whose annual income from lands is not less than Rs. 5,000 per annum—one from each of the Provinces of Gujarát, Konkan, Karnátak, Sind, Khándesh (including Ahmednagar and Násik) and Deccan (including Poona, Sholapur and Sátára).

B.—Industry 4

2 members from the mill-owners of the Presidency.
1 member from the Railway Companies.
1 member from miscellaneous industries.

C.—Commerce and Capital 8

1 merchant from Bombay.
1 merchant from Sind,
1 merchant from Gujarát.
1 merchant from Káthiáwár.
1 merchant from Karnátak (Kánarese-speaking districts).
1 merchant from the Deccan (Poona, Soláput and Sátára).
1 merchant from Khándesh (including Násik and Ahmednagar).
1 merchant from the Konkan (Thána, Kolába and Ratnágiri).

D.—Professions 8

2 eminent Medical Men.
2 eminent Lawyers.
2 eminent Engineers and Scientists.
2 eminent Educationists.

E.—Municipalities and Administration 8

2 Presidents of the City Municipalities.
2 Government pensioners who have rendered brilliant services in different departments.
4 Gentlemen whom His Excellency the Governor may select for special qualifications.

12. The members consisting the different races in the Bombay Presidency (exclusive of the Bombay City) is as follows :—

Hindus	11,685,000
Jains	213,000
Mahomedans	3,620,000
Pársis	27,000
Eurasians, Christians and Jews ...	116,000
[Europeans are excluded because the non-official population is insignificant.]
	15,661,000

Taking this population, as well as the vital consideration of the differences of race and language, it will be very convenient to divide this Presidency into the following groups :—

(1) Sind, (2) Káthiáwár, (3) Gujarát, (4) Konkan, (5) Karnátic, (6) Deccan (Poona, Sholápur and Sátára), (7) Khándesh (including Nagar and Násik) and (8) Bombay City.

By a judicious system of selection, His Excellency the Governor will be enabled to select five representatives from each of the divisions and one at least from the smaller and two from the larger districts, and thus a proper representation of each district and community may be easily ensued.

13. I have already said under the head "Imperial Advisory Council" why special seats need not be reserved for the Mahomedans, and the same arguments apply to the Provincial Advisory Councils also. The Mahomedan population is about 3,900,000 (including Bombay) as against 12,000,000 Hindus. The large Mahomedan population of Sind and the numerous Mahomedan merchants of Bombay and the Barristers will afford a large field to select about ten Mahomedan gentlemen which would seem to be the proper number, in proportion to the population, to represent the community. The population of other religions may be approximately taken (including Bombay) as follows :—

Jains	225,000
Pársis	80,000
Eurasians, Christians and Jews, etc.	175,000

Legislative Councils.

Imperial.

14. After a careful perusal of that portion of the Resolution which deals with the Imperial Legislative Council, what strikes me more is the entire ignoring of all the other numerous industries and professions except the land-holders, the Chambers of Commerce and the Mahomedans. This appears to me to go against the very intention of the Government as given in paragraph 9 of the letter. It is explicitly stated that "the Government of India are far from denying that the professional classes are entitled to a share of representation, proportioned not merely to their numbers, which are small, but to their influence which is large and tends continually to increase." But the scheme as given in paragraph 12 shuts out nearly all the influential professions. This will inevitably evoke general disapproval even from the most conservative. In my humble opinion the Imperial Legislative Council will be more aptly representative of the varied shades of opinion in the country, if it is formed on some such line as I venture to give below :—

(a) Land-holders 8

7 land-holders by the Nobles and the great land-holders of Madras, Bombay, Bengal, East Bengal and Assam, the United Provinces, the Punjab and the Central Provinces; the franchise being given to those whose annual income is Rs. 25,000 and upwards.
1 by the Tea Planters' Association.

(b) Commerce 10

8 { 1 merchant to be elected from each of the abovementioned 7 Provinces and 1 from Burma.

1 to be elected by the Chambers of Commerce in India.

1 to be elected by all the banking firms in India.

1 to be elected by the mill-owners in India.

1 to be elected by the mine-owners in India.

1 to be elected by the Railway Companies.

1 Lawyer to be elected by the Barristers and High Court Pleaders.

1 Doctor to be elected by Graduates in Medicine of over 10 years' standing.

1 Engineer and Scientist to be elected by the Graduates in Engineering and Science only.

1 Educationist to be elected by proprietors of private and aided Colleges.

2 Government pensioners to be elected by those in receipt of a pension of Rs. 200 and upwards per mensem.

(e) Provincial 7

1 member by the non-official members of each of the 7 Provincial Councils.

(f) Special by nomination 5

2 Mahomedans, provided the elected number is less than 9.

1 Eurasian and Native Christian, provided no one is elected under other heads.

2 Experts.

The Government may fix the number of Government officers.

15. No one whose annual income is less than Rs. 25,000 should be allowed to stand a candidate because he must have sufficient means to keep up the dignity of a Councillor of the Imperial Legislative Council.

16. The Bombay Legislative Council formed on the following lines will be fully representative of all the occupations and interests in the land.

The whole Presidency should be divided into the following six divisions so that the language, commercial and numerical interest may be equalised :—

	Population.
A.—Gujarát (five districts of Ahmedabad, Kaira, Panch Maháls, Broach and Surat)	2,702,000
B.—Konkan (Thána, Kolába and Ratnágiri)	2,585,000
C.—Carnátic (Kánara, Dhárwár, Belgaum and Bijápur)	3,397,000
D.—Deccan (Sholápur, Poona and Sátára)	2,863,000
E.—Khándesh (East and West, Násik and Nagar) ...	3,082,000
F.—Sind	3,250,000

Elected Members.

(a) Land-holders 7

1 from the Zamindárs of Sind.
1 from the Tálukdárs of Gujarát.
1 from the Khots of Konkan.
1 from the Bhil Chiefs and Inámdárs of Khándesh.
1 from the Sardárs of Deccan.
1 from the Sardárs of Karnátic.
1 from the Chiefs of Káthiáwár.

(b) Representatives of the Municipalities and the Local Boards, combined 7

1 Sind.
1 Gujarat.
1 Konkan.
1 Karnatic.
1 Deccan.
1 Khandesh.
1 The Bombay Municipality.

(c) Representatives of professions 7

1 Lawyer (the Barristers, Attorneys, Solicitors, LL.B.'s and High Court Pleaders of more than five years' standing being given the franchise).

I have proposed one seat for the Lawyers because some will possibly be elected by the Municipalities and the District Local Boards.

2 Doctors (all M.D.'s, M.B.'s, L.M. & S. and holders of diploma of Indian and European Universities in Medicine, Surgery and Veterinary of more than five years' standing should be given the franchise).

2 Engineers and Scientists (all holders of degrees in Engineering and Science of five years' standing and the pensioned Executive Engineers to have the franchise).

2 Educationists (all Graduates of European and Indian Universities holding degrees in Arts, Philosophy, Divinity, and the Principals and Professors of private and aided Colleges to have the franchise).

(d) Representatives of industry and commerce 7

1 of Railway Companies.
2 of Mill-owners.
1 of the Chambers of Commerce of Bombay and Karachi.
1 of Banks.
1 of the merchants whose annual income exceeds Rs. 25,000.
1 of the Port Trusts of Bombay and Karachi.

4 Government officers to be elected, viz.—

1 by the Provincial Judicial Departments including Statutory Civilians.

1 by the Provincial Revenue Department including Statutory Civilians.

1 by the Provincial Police Force (Indian Superintendents of Police, Assistants and Deputies).

1 by the Educational Provincial Service.

(f) Non-official gentlemen whom His Excellency the Governor may consider worthy of nomination 8

Out of these 8 as many Mahomedan gentlemen may be appointed as would bring the total number of elected and nominated Mahomedans to 8 which is the maximum number which can be allowed in the ratio of the population and commercial and agriculturist interest as compared to the Hindus. As some Parsis and Europeans will be elected and also some Mahomedans by the different electorates the number of Hindus in the ratio of the population will, perhaps, be less than that of the Mahomedans; therefore, a general provision to appoint 8 non-officials "whom His Excellency the Governor may consider worthy of nomination" will meet the requirements on each occasion. There are other conditions necessary for proper representation which would also, I submit, be enforced. The candidate should belong to the same class from which he is elected, e. g., the Zamindars of Sind can elect as their representative only a Zamindar, and the Lawyers can elect only a Lawyer. The candidate should not be only a resident of the area for which he is elected, but he should also be following the profession, which he represents, within his electorate.

17. The Government of India and Secretary of State have desired that the official majority should be maintained under any circumstances. It will be possible to carry out their orders by nominating all the Heads of Departments and the Collectors of the districts as members. The following list may be found suitable. Even leaving a large margin for unavoidable absences, the working majority will, I believe, be always available :—

2 members of the Executive Council of the Government.
1 Lieutenant-General Commanding Bombay Presidency.
1 Lord Bishop.
1 The Chief Justice.
1 The Commissioner of Customs.
4 Divisional Commissioners, including Sind.
1 Inspector-General of Police.
1 The Director of Public Instruction.
1 The Chief Secretary to Government.
1 The Accountant General.
1 The Surgeon-General with the Government of Bombay.
1 The Director of Agriculture.
1 The Secretary to Government, Political, Special and Judicial Departments.
1 Do. do. General and Educational Departments.
1 The Chief Engineer, Public Works Department.

1 The Settlement Commissioner and Inspector-General of Registration, etc.
1 The Advocate General.
1 The Remembrancer of Legal Affairs.
1 Agent to the Governor, Káthiáwár.
1 The Post Master General.
1 The Sanitary Commissioner.
1 The Conservator of Forests.
23 Collectors of Districts, including Sind.
1 The Collector of Bombay.
1 The Collector of Salt Revenue.
1 Principal, Grant Medical College.
1 The Municipal Commissioner of Bombay.
1 The Chairman, Bombay Improvement Trust.
1 The Commissioner of Police, Bombay.

18. I fully agree with the views of the Government of India that the interests of smaller communities like the Mahomedans should be secured by obtaining a proper representation of them, but I very respectfully venture to submit that the mode thought of, viz., allotting special seats, would create invidious distinction, which it is, on moral and political grounds, undesirable if the same object can be attained otherwise. I verily think that from the large Mahomedan population of Sind and the big Mahomedan merchants of Bombay some Mahomedan gentlemen will be elected. Of the seats which my scheme proposes, some will be occupied by the election of Parsi gentlemen and some by that of Europeans and perhaps one or two by the Jains, many of whom are rich merchants and mill-owners. The number of Hindu members will, therefore, probably be, in the ratio of population, in equal population with the Mahomedan members. I have proposed seats for nomination by His Excellency without any reservation as to the community so that it may be possible for him to nominate the gentlemen of any community whose representation in election may be found on any occasion to fall short of the proportion in the ratio of the population. The new scheme may be expected to be in force for a fairly long period before any change will be made, but it may not be long when the Government themselves might find that the Mahomedan representation by election is, if not more, in the ratio of the population and at that time the seats which it is intended to reserve exclusively for that community will be found to be excessive. But if there is no communal reservation made, His Excellency will be able to meet the requirements of the time without any legal embarrassment. I am also humbly of opinion that the creditable advance made by the community in education is due more to the answering policy of Government in maintaining firmly the policy of appointment to posts in the service of Government on the educational standard, but if that principle is relaxed and special grace shown to the community, their future educational progress will be a little slower. It is therefore desirable in the interest of the community itself as a whole and also in that of the Empire not to show any special favour by reserving any seats for any community whatever, but practical favour can, when necessary, be shown by nominating as many members of that community as might be deemed proper to give it an adequate representation at every time the Councils are formed. When it is known that nominated seats are intended to make up deficient representation of any community and Hindus, Parsis and Christians all alike are eligible to be nominated thereto when any of these communities is not properly represented, there will not remain any cause for grumbling or criticizing by any community.

19. In conclusion I beg to take the responsibility of the foregoing views upon me alone and are not binding on the Municipality over which I preside. The Municipality has appointed a special committee consisting of Dr. Barjorji Sorabsha Munsifna, Vice-President, Mr. Kirpashankar Bhagwavji Vyas and Mr. Ambashanker Uttamram Malji, a copy of whose report to the Municipal Council is hereto appended for immediate reference, but I will submit my formal report embodying the opinion of the Municipality when the same has been adopted at the next Special General Meeting which is fixed for the 14th instant.

Honourable Mr. Montagu de Pomeroy Webb, C.I.E., Karachi.

Karáchi, 5th February 1908.

To—The Acting Secretary to Government, General Department, Bombay.

Sir,

Enlargement of Legislative Councils, etc.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 6534 of the 31st October 1907. I have carefully studied the letter from the Government of India, No. 2310—2317, and am fully in accord with the principle of giving to the educated and influential classes in this country opportunities for coming into closer contact with the officers of Government, for expressing their views on matters of practical administration, and for giving to those who are capable and efficient a larger share (wherever practicable) than at present in the actual work of Government.

With regard to the several proposals outlined by the Government of India, I venture to give below the conclusions I have arrived at with regard to each.

An Imperial Advisory Council.

Regarding successful commerce as the ultimate source of all social, economic and political strength, it appears to me desirable that the proposed Imperial Advisory Council should include representatives of the commercial communities.

Provincial Advisory Councils.

The scheme seems wholly admirable. "Industry, commerce and capital" are, I notice, all especially mentioned as sections of society that it is essential should be adequately represented.

Legislative Councils.

If Advisory Councils be brought into existence, there does not appear to me any necessity for further enlarging existing Legislative Councils. Debates are already exceedingly verbose, and constructive work of a legislative character is more likely to be hampered than facilitated, if the number of Councillors be still further increased.

Discussion of the Budget.

The proposal to discuss the budget in more detail is a move forward, provided at the same time two radical changes are made in the present methods of procedure—(1) discussion should take place before the budget is finally adopted by Government; and (2) the Council should be given authority to control in some measure the allotment of expenditure under such heads as Irrigation, Railways, Telegraphs, Post Office, Education and Police. These are changes that might well be introduced when it is remembered that Government, by the number of its official representatives on Council will continue to maintain its executive authority in undiminished strength.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL REFORMS.

The questions which arise, directly and indirectly, out of the Government of India's communication on the subject of Council Reforms, are so numerous, so varied and at the same time of such far-reaching importance that it is impossible to exhaustively deal with them, unless one has ample amount of space, which, however, it is not practicable for each individual, who gives his opinion, to utilize; so that I will confine myself to only those questions that either concern the Mahomedan community to which I belong, or to general questions of such vital and imperial importance as I may be called upon by a call of duty as a loyal and devoted subject of His Majesty the King-Emperor, to raise my voice and bring my honest, independent opinion prominently before the Government. Moreover, it is not only my own strong personal opinion that I write, but my firm convictions based on much careful information which I have been at pains to collect, by personal conversation and deliberate communications carried on with a view to thoroughly acquaint myself with the trend of public opinion, and with the views of leading Mahomedans of all schools of thought not only in this Presidency, but in all parts of the country.

2. Nor have I limited my enquiry to such Mahomedans alone who take an active part in politics—educated men belonging to legal and other professions—but I have tried every avenue of reliable information—from practical men of the world to landlords and traders, and men who have been either prominently connected with mercantile and commercial interests or identified themselves with the industrial development of the country. I have carefully weighed the views expressed by prominent men in various walks of life—politicians and non-politicians. Most of the opinions point in general results to the same conclusions as I have arrived, after much careful thought and consideration of various circumstances applying to the peculiar conditions of Mahomedan Political Life.

IMPERIAL ADVISORY COUNCIL.

3. Before considering, in detail, the question of Mahomedan Representation in which I am greatly interested, I will proceed to deal, first of all, with that important Imperial question, the Imperial Advisory Council of Notables, the possible failure of which involves serious consequences to the State. As a loyal subject of the Emperor, I feel, therefore, very strongly on the subject and I am sure I would be wanting in my duty towards the Government and the country if I hesitated in freely expressing my opinion thereon. The suggested Advisory Council of 20 Ruling Chiefs and 40 Notables sounds very well in theory, but I doubt very much that it is so in practice. Politically it is inexpedient; and I very much doubt its wisdom, from a practical point of view. In my humble opinion, it is a great mistake to mix ruling Princes with other men on one and the same Advisory Council. There are so many arguments against and not many that I know of in its favour. I have had opportunities to discuss the question with many men qualified to pronounce an opinion thereon, but so far I have not yet met one man who approves its wisdom in an unqualified manner; nor have I even heard one voice in its favour. Every one with whom I have come in contact has pronounced it as inpracticable or so defective as to easily ensure its failure. The arguments urged against it seem to me to be absolutely convincing. The hereditary pride of Ruling Chiefs, their notions of themselves, their rank and their status and dignity make it highly improbable that they would freely mix up with even each other, but more so with those who are only landlords and who do not belong to a princely family or who have no royal blood in them. Most of them at least, if not all, will consider it derogatory to their dignity and honour to sit side by side with persons whom they do not consider to be their equals; in fact there are not forty aristocratic persons of sufficient intelligence and knowledge, who may be deemed worthy of sitting side by side with twenty Ruling Chiefs. Their natural jealousy with each other would lead to a divergence of opinion which would only end into confusion. Those who know anything of Indian Princes will not fail to assert that it is impossible to secure an unanimity among them, however non-contentious and simple an issue may be.

4. But apart from these valid considerations, there are, to my mind, other solid and substantial reasons of state and expediency as to why these Princes should be kept aloof from other elements in the Advisory Council. But to this aspect of the question I shall presently refer again.

5. To begin with, the preliminary objection that can be urged against the Advisory Council of Notables is that the majority of Native Chiefs are not always up to date in regard to their knowledge of the ever-changing conditions of modern British India, and its problems, with which they are imperfectly acquainted. The problems they have to deal with all these years are different from the problems that concern British India, and with which the British statesmen are now confronted. They know nothing of the new desires and new spirit of the people in British India and their needs and requirements.

6. It will not be easy to reconcile the Princes to the new duty they will be called upon to perform as Imperial Advisors. Some of them could hardly find leisure—they are so engrossed in their own state or in luxury—to give more than a cursory attention to the questions that come before the Advisory Council regarding British India, even if they have an inclination to do so.

7. To my mind the proposal is of doubtful utility and a doubtful honour to Native Princes to be called upon to give advice in company with ordinary subjects and which might or might not be accepted. In the latter case, the result could not but be unpleasant, as the Chiefs whose advice is not accepted might take it as a personal effront and want of confidence in them. I think unanimity in such a Council will be an impossibility.

8. But as I have hinted above, the chief difficulty lies in their being brought into contact with forty other men. There are discontented people and agitators in British India: and they have acquired a great deal of influence in Native papers; and it is quite possible that notwithstanding the extreme care to keep out any disturbing element, a representative of theirs might get into the Advisory Council and might come in contact with the Native Chiefs. This would be a bad augury for the future of the Advisory Council. Besides, the action of the Chiefs would, when they supported Government proposals, expose them to the venomous shafts of agitators and the bitter attack of that portion of the Native Press which is always at the beck and call of the discontented agitators. Such bitter attacks would adversely affect the position of the Chiefs, their traditions, and their prestige among their own people. There is a type of Native Chiefs, too, who delight in attacking Government and its measures in private, and if a Prince of that character finds himself on the Advisory Council, which is probable, and if he plays into the hands of a discontented agitator or a rapid press, it will terribly complicate matters and expose Government to all kinds of novel abuse. It would mislead the credulous masses of the native public and bring into being another element of unrest and disorder: and it will probably affect other Chiefs. The action of the loyal Chiefs who sympathise with the measures of Government would be misrepresented and adversely criticised by their countrymen in British India and even by their own subjects. I am thoroughly convinced of the fact, and I, therefore, repeat it that many of the Native Chiefs would not like to mix up with their colleagues; that it would not be possible to blend the orthodox and advanced types of Princes into a harmonious whole; that India does not contain forty non-ruling educated and enlightened men worthy of sitting with the Ruling Chiefs.

9. However, far be it from me to offer merely destructive criticisms. I quite recognize the desire of Government to give the Aristocracy of India the influence which should be theirs, and if it is deemed necessary to utilize the influence and advice of the Native Chiefs on Imperial questions that affect the relations of the Imperial Government with Feudatory States, there is an easy way out of the difficulty. I should take the liberty of suggesting that there should be two Imperial Advisory Councils, one consisting of Ruling Chiefs only and the other consisting of sixty Notables for the whole of India. If the Government of India so desire, four or five Aristocratic members from the Assembly of the sixty Notables might be selected to assist the Chiefs in their deliberations on Imperial questions. These four or five members should be out and out the best and most tried men in British India.

10. The best thing, all the same, is to keep the Chiefs entirely apart from non-ruling Chiefs, and confine them to such questions as do not affect British India; but if it is thought essentially necessary that they should be consulted on British Indian measures of exceptional importance, then, as a compromise, I should suggest the addition of four or five carefully selected non-Ruling Chiefs to their number. But as I have said above it would be wise to refer to them only such questions as concern the ruling Princes of India and as come within their special province. If this is done—if the modifications I have suggested are adopted—then I have nothing more to say about the Imperial Advisory Council. I do not wish to reflect in any way upon the qualifications or abilities of Native Chiefs in general, some of whom are as clever and versatile as any eminent Indian statesman, but these are exceptions and not a rule. Under the circumstances, if the vitality of the Imperial Advisory Council is to be kept unimpaired, then only such questions as they are qualified to pronounce an opinion upon, by reason of their personal experience, should be referred to them. The course of forming two Advisory Councils that I have suggested will on the one hand give the Native Princes an opportunity to give their opinions on questions of sufficient moment to themselves and so would establish happy relations between the paramount power and the Feudatory Native States, while on the other hand, the other Council of forty Notables including territorial magnates of every province, and landlords and leading merchant princes of every province would give a direct representation to the stable classes of British India. With these few remarks I will now pass on to the Provincial Advisory Council.

PROVINCIAL ADVISORY COUNCIL.

11. As to the Provincial Advisory Councils, I fail to see what kind of work can be constantly referred to them by the Local Government, when we take into consideration the fact that the number of questions of public interest is limited, and that all Imperial things go to the Imperial Advisory Council. When we still further take into consideration that provincial measures are to be discussed in the greatly enlarged Legislative Council, it is apparent that there will not be sufficient business for the consideration of a Provincial Advisory Council. Still that depends a great deal upon the personality of a Lieutenant-Governor or a Governor of a Province if he be really anxious to find work for this Provincial Council and if he referred everything to them, he may succeed in getting some utility out of them, but I doubt very much that the majority of Local Governments would all the time consult a non-representative and irresponsible Advisory Council. In most provinces these local Notables will have not much to do, and their importance will, therefore, be minimized. It is only constant and important work which could give prestige to the Assembly. I may humbly suggest that it would be a good thing to put off the institution of the Provincial Assemblies of Notables for a few years till the public are educated to take a still more active interest in public affairs. Let us wait for the experience and result of the working of the Imperial Advisory Council. Then there will be time to consider the lines on which such Provincial Assemblies can be usefully employed. With these remarks I will now proceed to the consideration of the question of Mahomedan representation.

MAHOMEDAN REPRESENTATION.

12. As a Mahomedan, I am grateful to see—and the vast majority of Mahomedans, too, are grateful—that Government has recognized the principle of special representation for the Mahomedan minorities in the provinces where they are actually in minorities. This is, as it should be, in consonance with the political and historical importance of a loyal community which the Government has recognized. But like all the gentlemen with whom I have conversed or communicated, I fell surprised—nay, I am painfully shocked—to learn that Government suggest nominating two of the four Mahomedan representatives. I fell constrained to raise my voice against such an arrangement. It must be remembered that in allotting four representatives to us, Government give us no more than our due right of representation according to the number of the population. In common with the vast majority of Mahomedans I fell that we must be allowed to elect our four representatives. If we are denied this, the result will be that we will have less elected members than what is our due in the Imperial Legislative Council. And that is no reason why Government should, out of these four, reserve the right of nominating two members and leave only two to the electorates. Government must remember that Mahomedans nominated by them cannot be of a representative character, and even if they be so, they can never carry that weight and importance which an elected and popular representative does carry. If Government had allowed two Mahomedans more than their purely numerical strength in the country deserved, then we could see the reasonableness of their right to nominate such two members. If it were a case of a special favour, then, of course, Government could very well reserve to itself the right of nominating two members. In giving them four representatives, Government give them nothing more than what they are entitled to, and they are not justified in robbing them of two seats by reserving them for nomination. The Government sticks to the letter, but breaks the spirit. To be plain, of what Government gives with one hand it takes away half with the other. If the Mahomedans are allowed—as they ought to be allowed—to elect four members, the body of electors could easily be found. Those who pay a very high income-tax, or who have very high scientific qualifications, or who have held seats previously in the Legislative Councils in their respective provinces, or those who hold high honours and titles from Government, may be turned into a constituency for electing those four Mahomedan members. I take a strong exception to the proposal of Government to keep the nomination of two members in their hands. Government have not in the past distinguished themselves by the way in which they have selected Mahomedans for seats in the Councils. In some of the provinces for years together they have appointed the same members. These men have in a way monopolized the seats on the Council. If we look back to Bombay, for instance, for thirty years, we find that only three or four names from the City of Bombay itself appear as the members of Council. Again, in other provinces if Government ask the opinion of or obtain information from various individuals, as I have constantly done, they will find a great deal of discontent in consequence of many deserving men being excluded from the Council owing to the faulty system of nomination. Government officials do not come into close contact with the people—and this is not due to any fault of theirs—but once they come into contact with an individual with whom they are impressed, they at once give him a lift and appoint him again and again to a seat in the Council, forgetting that there are many others whom the officials have not had the good fortune of coming in contact with, but who are nevertheless able and well qualified to a seat in the Council, and are far more representative of real Mahomedan opinion than those who are official nominees.

13. Again as to the Mahomedans who are nominated to the Councils, I doubt that even a fair porportion of them would have ever been returned by electors. Only those men who take sufficient interests in public affairs would stand for election while in case of nominations by Government, men who are wanting in public spirit and who are not in touch with the masses, and therefore unable to represent them, will succeed in being members of the Council, either through advantages of birth or fortune or other adventitious circumstances. It will benefit sycophants, and nincompoops who have no influence in the community and once such persons are lucky enough to get into Council they will enjoy the monopoly thereof. It is said that it is not necessary to throw open all the seats to election as gentlemen of position refused to offer themselves as candidates to an electorate, because they disliked canvassing. If these gentlemen have not the public spirit to canvas and the moral courage to face a defeat, why then Government should encourage men, who had not sufficient patriotism to come forward for election, by nominating them as Councillors. Therefore, as a loyal subject to His Majesty, and as the leader of the Mahomedan deputation that waited on His Excellency Lord Minto in October 1906, I protest most emphatically against the proposal of Government to give only two seats to Mahomedan electors, and I earnestly appeal to it to hand over all the four seats to the electors. I may add here that if Government persist in keeping two of the four Mahomedan seats for nomination, then I most respectfully urge that in fairness and justice to Mahomedans half the number of seats in the Imperial Councils allowed to Provincial electors should be filled by Government nomination instead of by election by Local Councils.

LOCAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

14. The question of local Legislative Council except in Bombay does not concern me. I have already expressed my opinion that the four Mahomedan seats for the Imperial Council should be reserved for election and the arguments that I have urged for it also hold good in the case of Local Council. As far as the general principle of election goes, I think that a fair arrangement would be to apportion the seats for Bombay like this :—

One seat might be given to the Mahomedans of Sind, another to Bombay City, one to Northern and one to the Southern Division, and the fifth to the Central Division.

15. It may be urged that in some divisions the Mahomedan population is small, and, therefore, franchise should not be conferred upon them. But it should be borne in mind that persons living in one area are not acquainted with the peculiar needs and conditions of other areas, and therefore each division should be allowed to send one representative. The electors should be those who pay a high income-tax or the University graduates. So far as the City of Bombay is concerned, the standard of qualifications required for electors might be raised by fixing the amount of income-tax at double the amount required from the mofussil electors and the educational qualification should be M.A. instead of B.A. But in case the Government at any time considered it necessary to have expert Mahomedan opinion, they might nominate their own man.

16. In conclusion, I beg to state that I have offered the criticism in no carping spirit. I recognise the good intention of Government to broad base the fabric of Legislative Machinery and I have spoken my mind frankly and fully because I am convinced the value of the reforms will be judged by the results and if they fail to produce the desired end, then it will give a peg to the agitators on which to hang their real or imaginary grievances. I am, therefore, much concerned with the success of the experiments and if the shortcomings in the Government proposals that I have pointed out are remedied a distinct step forward would be said to have been taken towards safeguarding the interest of minorities. I therefore once more humbly pray to Government to uphold my arguments and hand over the four Mahomedan seats for election.

Report of the Commissioner in Sind.

No. T.-255, dated the 11th February 1908.

From—A. D. Younghusband, Esq., C.S.I., I.C.S., Commissioner in Sind;

To—His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir George Sydenham Clarke, G.C.M.G., Governor, and President in Council, Bombay.

As desired in Government Resolution No. 6533, dated the 31st October 1907, I have the honour to submit my opinion on the proposals for the enlargement of Legislative Councils and kindred matters contained in the letter of the Government of India in the Home Department, No. 2311, dated the 24th August 1907.

2. On the merits of the general policy underlying these proposals it is scarcely necessary that I should enlarge. I accept unreservedly the view of the supreme Government that an experiment should be undertaken in the direction of constituting Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils and of enlarging the existing Legislative Councils on a more popular and really representative basis.

3. But, in considering this policy from the point of view of the Province of Sind, I cannot but feel that the occasion is one for laying special emphasis on the utter natural aloofness of this province from the Presidency of Bombay to which, for administrative purposes, it has been annexed, but from which it is geographically remote and in physical characteristics dissimilar, and with the population of which its people have nothing in common, and practically no sort of inter-communication. If then in the administration of Sind the views of the people are to be more largely consulted than at present, it is essential to secure that it shall be the views of the people of Sind, and not of the people of the Bombay Presidency. A separate Legislative Council is not suggested; but it is hoped that the present opportunity may be taken of securing for Sind more direct representation, both on the Imperial and on Your Excellency's Legislative Councils. On the other hand, Sind questions should be entirely excluded from the scope of the references which may be made to any Advisory Council constituted for the presidency. If Sind is to have the benefit of a Provincial Advisory Council at all, it should be a separate Council of its own, sitting in the Province, and treating the questions referred to it from the point of view of the people of the Province.

4. With regard to the proposed Imperial Advisory Council, it is enough to say that it is hoped that His Excellency the Viceroy will be able to see his way to the appointment of at least one Sind member, and will realize that no ruling Chiefs or territorial magnates of the Presidency can be regarded as having claims to represent the people of Sind. I may here add that the suggestion of the Karachi Chamber of Commerce for the provision of some representation of commercial interests on the Imperial Advisory Council appears to me to deserve sympathetic consideration.

5. On the enlarged Imperial Legislative Council also it is hoped that room may at least occasionally be found for one special representative of Sind interests, which are at the same time very largely Mahomedan interests. Perhaps the simplest suggestion, and the one presenting least difficulty, to this end is that Sind should be added to the number of Provinces to which the 18th paragraph of the Government of India letter proposes to give in rotation the privilege of electing a Mahomedan member. If this should for any reason be deemed impracticable, it can only be hoped that His Excellency the Viceroy, in his selection of representatives of minorities and special interests, will occasionally be pleased to take into his consideration the exceptional conditions of Sind.

6. Turning now to Your Excellency's Legislative Council, it is to be hoped that any enlargement of this which may be in contemplation will include a larger representation of Sind, no less than of the divisions of the Presidency proper. At present the jaghirdars and zemindars of Sind paying Rs. 1,000 land revenue return one member to the Council, the number of the electorate being 989. And in practice the Chairman of the Karachi Chamber of Commerce is usually or invariably nominated to one of the seats at Your Excellency's disposal. The Chamber have expressed a wish that the privilege of recommending a representative, which formerly belonged to them may now be restored, and it is hoped that, along with other reforms, there will be no difficulty in making this small concession, which would not practically affect the constitution of the Council.

7. I would strongly advocate the addition to Your Excellency's Council of a representative of Sind Municipalities, to be elected on lines similar to those now prescribed for the Municipalities of the Northern Division. The Hindus of the Province, though numerically a minority of the population, are an exceptionally able and influential minority, whose views deserve attention. The best of them are to be found in the large towns, where indeed the majority of the population is Hindu and a member returned by the Municipalities might be expected ordinarily to be a Hindu, and would primarily represent Hindu interests. If such an additional member is allowed, it would perhaps be advisable to stipulate that the representative of the jaghirdars and zemindars must be a member of their own body. Even so there would always be some danger of the seat falling to a Hindu whose real interests were far more urban than rural, and whose land-holding qualification was purely incidental. From some points of views it might be desirable to insist on the zemindars' representative being always a Mahomedan; but I am disposed to deprecate any unnecessary stress being laid on racial or religious distinctions; and I do not consider it necessary in the present connection.

8. The conditions of the Municipal franchise in Sind are not in my opinion open to the criticism suggested in paragraph 21 of the Government of India letter. The qualification alike for voters and for councillors is payment of not less than Rs. 10 house-tax or Rs. 20 direct taxes of other kinds. There has never been any complaint of Municipal councillors being elected who have not a substantial stake in the Municipality. And I do not anticipate any such danger in respect of persons who may be elected to represent the Municipalities in the Legislative Council. There seems therefore no need for introducing special qualifications for such persons. Proposals similar to those in paragraph 22 (c) of the letter have, I may observe, been repeatedly and exhaustively discussed in Sind of late years, and a full report on the question was recently submitted to Government. The general view, in which I concur, is that election on a basis of class representation is unnecessary and unsuitable to the conditions of Sind, and that inequalities in representation resulting from Municipal elections can best be rectified by a judicious use of the power of nomination. A difficulty which has to be reckoned with here is that capable representatives of (e.g.) the Mahomedan interest are not invariably to be found in the particular Municipality.

9. Similar considerations apply to the qualifications prescribed by section 10 of Bombay Act I of 1884 for voters and candidates in the case of our District Local Boards. Should the future constitution of the Bombay Legislative Council be such as to justify any further representation of Sind than has been already suggested, it might be practicable to allow the District Local Boards to return a member, on lines similar to those at present prescribed for the District Local Boards of the Central and Southern Divisions of the Presidency. But it is to be observed that the rural interests, with which these Boards are concerned, will be already the special care of the representative of zemindars and jaghirdars. And perhaps it would be best that any further seats on the Council which it may be practicable to reserve for Sind should be filled by nomination of Your Excellency on the recommendation of the Commissioner in Sind, who will be in the best position to judge from time to time what special interests in the Province are most in need of representation, and what individuals can most safely and suitably be trusted to represent them. Among the special interests which might well receive their share of consideration are those of the Parsi and domiciled Christian communities, and of Indian traders.

10. As regards the Provincial Advisory Council, I have already expressed my view that Sind should be excluded from the purview of any such Council that may be constituted for the Bombay Presidency, and that, if advice on questions affecting the administration of this Province is to be sought from a Council, it should be from a local one, composed of inhabitants of the Province, and meeting in the Province. As to the constitution of such a Council, I am of opinion that it might include representatives of the Karachi Chamber of Commerce and Port Trust, of the Karachi and Hyderabad Municipalities, of the other Municipalities of the Province collectively, of the Local Boards, and of the jaghirdars and zemindars. The last-named representative, as also the representative of the Chamber of Commerce, would be identical with those recommended for the Provincial Legislative Council, and all Sind members of that Council, as also any Sind member or members of either of the Imperial Councils, should be ex-officio members of this local Advisory Council. The members should have the same status as members of Provincial Advisory Councils elsewhere.

11. Mr. Mules, Collector of Karachi, has suggested that the Sind Advisory Council should consist of any local members of the Imperial Councils and of Your Excellency's Legislative Council together with representatives of each of the principal racial sections of the community. While on the whole disposed to prefer my own suggestion, I consider his a very good one, and should be quite prepared to accept it as an alternative.

12. I append the opinions of Collectors in Sind, together with those of other persons which have reached me either through them or direct.

I have, etc.,
A. D. YOUNGHUSBAND,
Commissioner in Sind.

From

THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY ASSOCIATION,

APOLLO BUNDER, FORT,

Bombay, 24th February 1908.

To

THE SECRETARY TO GOVERNMENT,
GENERAL DEPARTMENT.
BOMBAY.

Sir,

We are directed by the Council of the Bombay Presidency Association to respectfully submit the following representation with reguard to the proposal contained in the Letter from the Government of India, Home Department (Public) No. 2311, dated the 24th August 1907.

2. The Council readily acknowledge their appreciation of the Government's desire to give the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters: to make adequate provision that the needs and sentiments of the masses may find expression through those acquainted with their daily life and qualified to speak with authority on their behalf; to bring all classes into closer relations with Government and its Officers and enable them to take a more effective part in shaping the action of Government; and, in the result, to give them larger share in the actual work of administration and more extensive employment in the higher offices of the State.

3. The Council are grateful to the Government of India for recognising the essential justice of the claim that has been put forward on the public behalf in the above matters, and for declaring the conviction that it is possible without neglecting other interest and obligations to move forward gradually but in no grudging spirit towards the fulfilment of the pledge which the people of India are entitled to regard as inviolable.

4. The Council cannot at the same time refrain from expressing their keen disappointment and regret that the proposals put forward in the Government of India's letter are hardly calculated in any sufficient or satisfactory measures to carry out the Government's desire or to fulfil the Government's pledge. The Council however note with satisfaction that the proposals are only tentative and provisional and that Government have invited careful scrutiny, sympathetic consideration and detailed statements of desired alterations on behalf of the public. The Council thankfully avail of this invitation to submit for the consideration of Government the following representation showing in detail the objections they entertain and the alterations they would request.

5. The Council are fully persuaded of the advisability of adequate provision for the representation of the landed aristocracy and the mercantile and industrial classes in the proposed scheme for constitutional reform. But the Council cannot admit that the needs and sentiments of the masses will find expression through the Ruling Chiefs or the territorial magnates or the merchant princes or the leaders of industry,—whose interests are dissimilar if not adverse,—and who are neither acquainted with their daily life nor qualified to speak with authority on their behalf. Such needs and sentiments must find expression only through the educated class which has sprung from the masses, which is acquainted with life in the village and in the smaller town; and which has mixed freely with the agricultural, commercial and industrial people. At the same time this Council take leave to doubt if the landed aristocracy and the mercantile and industrial classes are anxious to be afforded the opportunity of expressing their views on matters of legislation and practical administration by their own months. They as a rule have not requisite capacity and would prefer to express their views through capable and trusted spokesmen, net confined to their own ranks.

6. The difficulty of Government in making their measures and motives generally undertsood and in correcting erroneous and mischievous statements of facts or purpose imputed to them, is due, the Council respectfully venture to submit, to causes which it has generally been in the power of Government to prevent or provide against. The right of interpellation accorded in 1892 has failed of its full purpose not so much because the elected non-official Councillors have been slow to avail of it to the fullest extent, as because of the restrictions unduly placed on the full exercise of that right, and the disinclination on the part of the members of Government, manifested with painful frequence to reply with frankness and fulness. The Council have often observed with regret that the Official tendency has been more to resent the exercise of the right and keep the non-official members at arm's length than to take the public into the confidence of the rulers.

7. The proposed establishment of Advisory Councils is a measure which the Council would be disposed to regard with hopefulness if the proposal were unattended with conditions which must deprive it of the greater portion of its usefulness and may even render it capable of public mischief.

THE IMPERIAL ADVISORY COUNCIL.

8. The Government of India propose the formation of an Imperial Advisory Council for purely consultative purposes as follows:—

(a) It is to be composed of 60 Members for the whole of India including 20 Ruling Chiefs and a suitable number of territorial magnates of every Province where land-holders of sufficient status and dignity are to be found.

(b) These Members are to be appointed by the Viceroy and are to hold office for five years but to be re-eligible for appointment.

(c) They are to receive no legislative recognition and to be vested with no formal powers of any sort.

(d) Their functions are to be purely advisory and they should deal with matters specifically referred to them from time to time.

(e) They are to be consulted individually or collectively or by means of committees, at the will of Government. When occasionally called together either in whole or in part for collective deliberation their proceedings are to be, as a rule, private, informal and confidential, and would not be published although Government might make any use of them which Government thought proper.

9. The principal object in view is declared by Government to be free and close consultation whereby to elicit on administrative measures and proposals for action the opinions of those qualified to advise in all ranks of society. Such a Council is also to be an agency for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions and objects of Government.

THE RULING CHIEFS.

10. The Council are at a loss to understand how the independent Rulers of Native States, which do not form part of British India, can appropriately or usefully form part of an organisation undertaken for these objects.

11. The association of the Great Ruling Chiefs with the Governor General in the guardianship of Common and Imperial interests, which has become more practicable because of the closer conformity of general principles and methods of administration in the more advanced Native States to those in British territory, is acknowledged by the Council to be a measure likely to be of great benefit alike to the Imperial Government and to the Ruling Chiefs. But the Council venture to submit that such a measure however useful and admirable in itself can form no appreciable part of a constitutional scheme intended to reform the administration of British India or to promote the welfare of its people.

12. No doubt common interests have arisen; and it is true that in such questions as those relating to famine and plague and education as also to customs, salt, opium and Abkari and Railways which affect the subjects of the Ruling Chiefs equally with the people in British India, the co-operation of the Independent Chiefs and Princes would satisfy a growing want, and tend to promote more intimate relations between the component parts of the Indian Empire. But the Council must point out that such co-operation will be the co-operation by Ruling Chiefs in their own States in measures recommended or approved by the British authorities. These measures might fairly be expected to be beneficial to their subjects. But it is not possible to claim for such a proposal any credit for reforming the administration, or for gratifying public aspirations, in British India.

13. The interests of the Native States have always appealed to the Presidency Association's sympathy and the Council would avail themselves of the occasion to submit that questions defining the relations of those States to the Paramount Power and questions relating to succession and adoption and the co-operation of the Protected States in the Defence of the Indian Empire may now well be recognised as matters on which also free and frank consultation between the Ruling Chiefs and the Governor General is desirable and is likely to satisfy a long-felt want.

14. For such purposes as the above the establishment and recognition of a determinate body of advisers from the ranks of the Ruling Chiefs would undoubtedly be a step which would commend itself to public opinion. The Ruling Chiefs may with dignity and usefulness find a scope there for the exercise of their legitimate influence, particularly if they are invited, as the Council respectfully think they ought to be, to take part therein not as nominees of the Governor General, but as entitled thereto, in the case of the greater Chiefs, by right of their own high position, and in that of others, by the suffrages of their compeers.

15. But to call upon the Ruling Chiefs to sit side by side with the territorial magnates who are subjects of the British Government, take a more prominent part in public life, render a larger measure of assistance to the Executive, make known their feelings and wishes on administrative and legislative questions, and take a more effective part in shaping the action of Government in British India, seems to the Council of this Association undesirable in the interests of the Chiefs themselves, no less than in the public interest.

16. It cannot but injure the Ruling Chiefs in public estimation and in their own self respect to be appointed members of a body with no recognized status and no real powers, whose members might be consulted individually or partially or wholly at will, whose advice and opinions might be disregarded, and whose responsibilities might be misapprehended. It can be neither fair nor kind to place them in a position where they must choose between the good will of those on whom the peaceful enjoyment of their powers in their own States must largely depend, and the interests of people outside their own territories with whose wants and grievances they can have no direct concern.

17. It cannot be to the public interest, to invest the Ruling Chiefs with any power to influence administration or legislation in British India. They are absolute rulers who can have little direct sympathy with the aspirations of the people for political progress. They have hardly any personal knowledge of administrative problems or of the wants of the people in British India. The great majority of Native States are too small to afford scope for a close study of great administrative problems. The Chiefs themselves have mostly been debarred from independence of thought and action. They cannot be expected to understand, and still less to interpret, the new aspirations which stir society to its depths in British India. There can be no frank interchange of views without equal knowledge, equal capacity, equal sense of responsibility, and equal independence, on the part of those who consult and those who are consulted. The conditions do not and cannot exist in the case of the majority of the Ruling Chiefs, under present circumstances.

THE TERRITORIAL MAGNATES.

18. The case with regard to the territorial magnates and the landed aristocracy is not dissimilar except that they are subjects of the British Government and are entitled as such to exercise their legitimate influence and to have their wants and wishes and views duly considered in all measures of administration and legislation. They may be expected to become valued mediators between the Government and those who come within the circle of their influence; and their co-operation in measures of administration, particularly in those relating to famine and plague, may become of increasing value as higher education penetrates to them and developes their fitness for such employment.

19. The Council, however, feel constrained to submit that the territorial magnates and the landed aristocrats generally have hitherto given no proof of their qualification for taking a more prominent part in public life or of their anxiety to be afforded the opportunity of expressing their views on matters of legislation and practical administration. Rightly or wrongly the effect of British Rule has tended not to develope but to obliterate their social influence and individual usefulness; and any attempt at artificial resurrection now would be undesirable, as it must be futile. The social evolution of the country can only be mischievously retarded by such attempts.

20. The Council note that in the Government of India's letter no argument has been advanced for giving to the territorial magnates what is obviously a disproportionate importance in the Advisory Councils. In the Bombay Presidency territorial magnates like those on the Bengal side do not exist. We have only the Talukdars of Gujarat, the Zamindars of Sindh and the Sirdars of the Deccan. The sudden change in Government's estimation in regard to the landed aristocracy has been more a matter of public surprise than of public acceptance. They have hitherto been regarded very differently. The Statute Book bears witness to a number of measures passed to save these territorial magnates from themselves. In the course of the last 30 years five different measures have been passed for the purpose. Many

Acts XIV of 1876: XX of 1881: XI of 1834: XX of 1896: & 11 of 1906. } of them are hopelessly involved in debt, and are incapable of managing even their own affairs. Their encumbered estates are administered by Special Officers. Education has made no noted advance among them. Very few of them know the English language. The general level of their attainments is far from high. They have as much by their own short comings as from circumstances beyond their control ceased to be the natural and hereditary leaders of the people. The Ryot has hitherto looked upon them with the acquiescence of the authorities as a class from whose oppression he required to be saved. Trade and industry have received from them no appreciable support. Nor have they shown themselves capable of enlightened sympathy with progressive movements.

21. The Council have already admitted their title for the exercise of their legitimate influence, in so far as they are capable of doing so. But at the best they can express only one phase of Indian opinion, the opinion of a very limited and generally a selfish and an unenlightened class. Their dependence on the executive will, besides, hamper their freedom of opinion. The Council respectfully submit that to rely on their views or opinions as carrrying with them the suffrages of the people would be a grave mistake and a public misfortune.

THE MIDDLE CLASSES.

22. One remarkable feature of the scheme for an Imperial Advisory Council is the total absence from it of the representatives of trade and industry, and the professional classes generally. It is difficult for the Council to understand if they have been excluded intentionally or inadvertently. But whatever the reasons for their omission may be, the Council must submit that the great merchant princes and pioneers of industry have an equal stake in the country and are not less powerful and stable elements of Indian Society; and that the educated men of the middle classes have by their knowledge, independence and disinterested devotion to the public interest secured to themselves the confidence of the general public which Government cannot prudently or safely ignore. The exclusion of these elements must necessarily create the suspicion that in the proposed reform the authorities wished to retain the power to select such opinions only as they will be pleased to hear, and to secure the same by preference from the least advanced and independent classes.

THE EXECUTIVE AUTHORITY.

23. The total exclusion of the elective element from the organisation of the Imperial Advisory Council cannot be regarded as a step in constitutional progress or as proof of Government's confidence in those whose opinion and advice are declared to be the indispensable foundation upon which good administration is built up. If all the Members are to be nominated by the Viceroy the result must be that those only will be appointed who will be recommended by the local authorities, for His Excellency cannot be supposed to exercise the privilege from any personal knowledge. The local authorities are not likely to select or recommend as advisers those conspicuous for their independence or opposition to the prevailing policy, and the Viceroy's choice must be hampered thus on the side which should in the public interest find adequate representation. Appointed members are not unlikely to be swayed by the feeling that they should act in accordance with the wishes of those to whom they owe the honour of their recommendation; and to be deterred from expressing themselves with requisite freedom against the measures of those who have the power of influencing their reappointment. Even if they acted without such bias or fear the public could not be blamed if it attributed their agreement not to honest conviction but to interested complaisance. Such a result cannot be desired by Government and the Council trust Government will be persuaded of the advisability of providing against it.

24. If a determinate body of advisers is created requiring no legislative recognition; possessing no formal powers of initiative; to be summoned at will and consulted at pleasure; to have its opinions taken in such manner as the Executive may please, and its proceedings kept private, informal and confidential; to have its advice and opinions regarded or disregarded as the Executive may choose and not to be published but to be made use of as the Executive may think proper,—the consequence can only be what His Majesty's present Secretary of State for India declared in Parliament when speaking in opposition to Mr. H. Robert's amendment to the address (26-2-06) :—

> "I would point out that these Advisory Boards would have no responsibility and I doubt whether good results would follow."

25. Such conditions and procedure as are above laid down will make the whole scheme valueless and illusory. It will only mean that the Executive will do what it has always done, except that its selected advisers will have their names published and they will be called Imperial Councillors. It will be no improvement to have the choice restricted and the circle narrowed, when hitherto there has been no restriction and no limitation, and Government can consult whom they please and when and how they please.

26. The Council of the Presidency Association respectfully submit that there is no occasion for any protest that the authority and responsibility of the Executive Government should remain unimpaired. They are not aware that any responsible spokesmen or representatives voicing the growing aspirations which it is the purpose of the Government Scheme to satisfy have desired otherwise. All that has been claimed by them is that their authority should be less uncontrolled and their responsibility made more amenable to public opinion.

27. No control can be exercised by a body which has no legislative recognition and which is vested with no formal powers of any sort. The privilege of being consulted will be a barren privilege if matters are to be referred to it only when the Executive is so minded and there is no guarantee that its views shall be respected. Its work will be a thankless task when there is no security that the public shall know its true opinions and advice. Individual consultation will only give rise to interested intrigues to which secrecy will only ensure security from the risk of exposure. No useful assistance can be expected from a body whose deliberations are to be shielded from public knowledge and public criticism by being kept private, informal and confidential. Opinion and advice so evoked can neither be representative nor free. They will not be representative because they will be the advice and opinion of a privileged and select few. They will not be free when there is no power of initative and no right to discuss the general policy, and when even the right of petition—the right to express popular wishes and wants and seek relief—is withheld. There can thus be no legiti-mate or proper outlet for public opinion through such a body; and official responsibility will remain as distant from its reach and influence as it has been hitherto.

ORIENTAL POLICY.

28. The letter from the Government of India seeks to defend the scheme as in accordance with the best traditions of oriental policy which has always recognised that the Sovereign should consult competent advisers and should after consultation exercise his rule in accordance with what he deems to be the best mind of his people. It adds, somewhat gratuitously as the Council are constrained to think, that the scheme would thus be no innovation in principal as are some applications of Western methods to Eastern society. The Government of India seem to the Council to have paid greater attention to Oriental policy in the days of its decline than in those of its prime. When Oriential Princes held consultations in open Durbar they paid homage perhaps unconsciously to a form, no doubt very crude, of representative Government. No Oriental Prince as a rule set aside at his will the opinion of the Majority of those whom he consulted, and acted as he pleased, if he was a really sagacious and successful Ruler. In all well regulated and settled States the advice of those consulted in open Durbar was substantially as little liable to be set aside by the Prince's prerogative as any measure passed by the Houses of Parliament is liable to the Sovereign's Veto under the British Constitution. Neither must it be forgotten that the Oriental Ruler had advantages which Rulers who are not of the same race cannot enjoy; and that to the latter the checks which prevail against arbitrary authority in the West are all the more necessary than to the former.

29. The Council of this Association would moreover respectfully request attention to the fact that the Policy to which the Government of India now seem so strangely inclined was when propounded nearly 50 years ago deliberately abjured by the British Parliament. Prior to the passing of the India Council's Act of 1861 Mr. Ayrton in the House of Commons and Lords Ellenborough and Grey in the House of Lords had suggested the adoption of similar Oriental Policy without acceptance. Mr. Ayrton had asked Sir Charles Word to strike out many of the complicated provisions of the Act and to render the whole measure more consonant with the simplicity of Asiatic Ideas. Lord Ellenbourough had declared that the best form of legislative machinery suited to India was the Durbur in which an Indian Prince would simply consult his subjects and ascertain their wishes and would then act as he thought proper. His Lordship had also advocated that the Council should carry on its business in Secret Sessions and in confidential intercourse. Lord Grey had moved an amendment to the above purpose, but the amendment was negatived without division after the Earl de Grey and Ripon had declared on behalf of His Majesty's Government that the amendment sought to establish a body of a novel character and without precedent in any previous system pursued of England since the acquisition by it of its Indian possessions. Such a Council, Earl de Grey and Ripon said, "would have no real power, would be unable to influence the Governor General and would find its opinions constantly disregarded, in which case men of influence and weight would decline to sit upon it and, as a deliberative body, it would fall into desuetude and disgrace."

30. The Council of this Association would have been disposed to view with considerable alarm the Government of Indias declaration in favour of Oriental policy and its traditions but for the recent unmistakable declaration at Arbroath of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India himself—

> "We are representatives not of Oriental civilisation but of Western civilisation, its methods, its principles and its practice."

This is the lesson which India has learnt, and the policy India has been taught to appreciate and to accept, from its earliest connection with British authority, and the Council feel sure that any departure therefrom and any attempt to slide back to Oriental traditions at this late hour would tend only to disturb the public mind and to discredit the Government's position.

31. The scheme for an Imperial Advisory Council seems to the Council, therefore, to require complete modification, if not abandonment. with the exception of the purposes for which the Ruling Chiefs may well be consulted as above submitted, there seems no real scope for its usefulness. The Administrative measures with regard to which in the main Advisory Councils are to be created and utilized will not always be the same for all India. With regard to them the Provincial Councils with, as the Council venture to suggest, District Advisory Councils are all that is required. The Government of India will of course always be kept informed of the advice and opinions of these bodies. An Imperial Advisory Council would, so far as it confirmed such advice and opinions, be a superfluity; and might, if it is disagreed with them, become an embarassment, or, if it helped to overrule them, be a source of grave mischief.

THE PROVINCIAL ADVISORY COUNCILS.

32. With regard to the Provincial Advisory Councils, so far as the Provisions and conditions, to which the Council have drawn attention above, apply to them, the Council of this Association trust they need not repeat the objections and the desirable alterations to which they have thought it their duty to request the attention of Government in the above remarks.

The Council note that the Government of India desire that the local Governments should be furnished with a selected body of advisers chosen upon a wider basis whom these Governments should consult upon all measures of Importance; and that it deems it "Essential that the smaller land-holders, industry, commerce, capital, and the professional classes should also be included in these Advisory Councils.

33. It is suggested that the number required for this purpose might be made up by adding to the Provincial members of the Imperial Advisory Council representing the great land-holders of the Province, representatives of the other important Provincial interests who would be nominated for the Viceroy's approval by the Head of the Local Government. The Council have already submitted that the Ruling Chiefs should find no place and are not entitled to any voice in the consideration of measures of administration in British India. There are no such territorial Magnates in this Presidency as the Maharajas of Burdwan and Benares and Durbhunga. The landed interests and the interests of commerce, industry, capital, and the professional classes should, the Council respectfully submit, be represented in the Provincial Advisory Council by a commensurate number of elected Members, if Government really desire to bring these classes into closer association with the authorities, and to enable them to have an effective voice in shaping the action of Government in regard to measures of administration and proposals for action.

34. The mode of Procedure lald down in the scheme should, the Council respectfully request, be so modified as to leave ample scope for initiative and independent usefulness. The Advisory Council should be left free to suggest action, or submit advice, or formulate objections, as might be necessary in respect of all important measures affecting the population within their Province, instead of being restricted to such functions only at the will of the authorities. Such measures should be statutorily determined. The Council also request that the provision for individual consultations ought to be omitted; as such consultations are more likely to injure than promote the public interest by encouraging intrigue and giving free play to interested motives, by creating distrust among the members themselves, and by removing all sense of responsibility from the entire body. The Council of this Association venture to believe that such a modification will not be unacceptable, as the Government of India have themselves declared that they attach the highest importance to collective deliberation since opinions thus obtained are different from and frequently more valuable than those elicited by individual consultations. The Council would further request that such collective deliberations should not be private and confidential but should be open to public knowledge and public criticism which alone can ensure the necessary sense of responsibility on the part of the Advisory Councils; and the necessary confidence in them on the part of the people concerned.

35. The association of the non-official Europeans with the Indian representatives in the Provincial Advisory Councils is in every way most desirable. Such association, however, can be effectual in promoting a better understanding and in removing injurious prejudices and misconceptions only if common consultation and collective deliberation, which will furnish occasions for the necessary intercourse, are adopted in preference to individual consultations and private references.

36. The Council are respectfully of opinion that, unless sufficient provision is made for giving effect to the advice and opinions of the Advisory Councils, the Scheme must end in disappointment and discredit. If the Advisory Council unanimously disapprove of any administrative measure, it should be abandoned. If two-thirds of the body disapprove of it, it should be altered to make it acceptable or should be postponed for a season. The best men available for such weighty functions would naturally avoid a position so disparaging when they know that their advice and opinions may be disregarded without check or control. Where there is no power there will be no responsibility. The men who will lend themselves to a position of questionable credit and doubtful usefulness will not be the men who can inspire general confidence. And in the result a scheme fraught with fair promise excellent usefulness and capable of great extension as a constitutional experiment will, as was remarked by the Earl de Grey and Ripon in 1861, fall into "desuetude and disgrace."

DISTRICT ADVISORY COUNCILS.

37. The Council are strongly of opinion that District Advisory Councils at the lower end are more desirable than an Imperial Adivisory Council at the higher. All the useful service that is expected of such Councils is not only more needed but is capable of being rendered more effectually and more advantageously in the Districts than in the Provinces or at the seat of the Supreme Government. The interests that are likely to be affected by administrative measures and proposals for action are more generally the interests of the populations in the District; and there such measures and proposals are likely to be more keenly felt and to be discussed with more informed knowledge. The education and training for public usefulness which the newly-created functions are calculated to afford will supply a needed want; and a healtheir public tone and a larger sense of public responsibility will call into existence a class which will be the best interpreter alike of the Government's intentions and of the people's wants.

38. The Council trust they need not add that in the case of the District Advisory Councils they would request the same safeguards and modifications that they have requested for the Provincial Advisory Council, viz.,—

(a) The election of the majority of the members instead of the nomination of the entire body.

(b) Larger initiative instead of the restricted function of giving advice only when the authorities please.

(c) Statutory determination of the measures on which they would be entitled to give advice.

(d) Collective deliberations in public instead of individual consultations or private references.

(e) Sufficient provision against the total disregard of the advice and opinions of those consulted.

39. With elected members possessing the public confidence and voicing with knowledge and independence the public opinion: with unrestricted opportunities and greater initiative: with collective deliberations open to public knowledge and subject to public criticism: and with due provision for giving effect to their advice and opinions, the Advisory Councils—both District and Provincial—may be regarded hopefully, and may reasonably be expected to render excellent service both to the Government and the people. The Council of this Association trust, therefore, that the views and suggestions submitted above may commend themselves to Government as calculated to promote the wishes that have prompted the authorities to propound the scheme.

THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCILS.

40. Before proceeding to discuss the proposed changes in regard to the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils, the Council of this Association desire respectfully to submit their views in reference to the general remarks and propositions advanced in Sir Harold Stuart's letter on behalf of the Government of India.

41. The Council regret to note that the general tendency of these remarks and propositions is to disparage publicly the labours of devoted and disinterested men without good or adequate cause, and to discredit a class which has necessarily failed to attract the sympathies of the authorities, because it has criticised their acts and exposed their failings with knowledge, independence, and courage. It is for Government to consider if it is in accordance with their own dignity that in a public document on an occasion of such grave importance such official animosity should be publicly displayed. But the Council are respectfully of opinion that it is not in accordance with good policy for Government to draw a line of separation between the educated Indians and those whose assistance is openly invoked to furnish a counterpoise, indicating a marked distrust of the former alike undeserved and unconcealed.

42. That the masses of the population of this vast country are thoroughly loyal to the Sovereign was shown on the death of the great Queen-

Empress by a depth of grief and fervour of devotio n which were as unmistakable as they were unexpected. This feeling of loyalty, the Council venture to declare emphatically, has permeated to the masses through the efforts not of the classes whose assistance is now invoked and relied upon, but of the educated Indians who have been so unwisely and ungenerously singled out for official disparagement and distrust.

43. In his speech before the Imperial Legislative Council at Simla in October last Sir Harvey Adamson after declaring that—

> "The Government of India have all along recognised that the unrest is not solely the outcome of seditious agitation, but has its basis in the natural aspirations of the educated Indians"— complained that the large and generous scheme of reform formulated by Government to meet those aspirations had not been sufficiently appreciated as an earnest of their desire to meet the grievances. The Council think it their duty to point out that such a result is very largely due to the undisguised hostility to the educated Indians which unfortunately characterises the whole tenor of the letter in which the scheme of reform has been placed before the public. The Council hope and trust that neither His Majesty's Government nor the Government of India seriously entertain any such feeling; and they would respectfully suggest that in the public interest the impression which Sir Harold Stuart's letter has undoubtedly given rise to may be removed.

THE ELECTIVE PRINCIPLE.

44. The absence of any recognition of the Elective Principle in Lord Cross's Bill was its great drawback; for it was generally felt that Parliament had disappointed the just aspirations of Indians for reform of the Councils on a partially elective basis, by ignoring the principle in the Bill, and leaving it for adoption to the good sense and discrimination of the Government of India only. It is necessary in this regard to quote the following from Mr. Gladstone's speech during the Debate on the Bill of 1892 :—

> "It is evident that the great question—and it is one of great and profound interest—before the House is that of the introduction of the elective element in to the Government of India. That question overshadows and absorbs everything else. It is a question of vital importance..... What we want is to get at the real heart and mind, the most upright sentiments and the most enlightened thoughts, of the people of India.....There are of course dangers in the way. There is the danger of subserviency. There is another danger and that is the danger of having persons who represent cliques or interests and who may claim the honor of representing India."

45. The responsibilities of governing a country alien in religion, habits, manners, and modes of life and thought, particularly when as now it is undergoing vast and constant transformation must increase appreciably in the near future ; and questions will arise which Government cannot be in a position to approach in ignorance of public feeling or by reliance only on the opinions of the selected few. It is by the aid of the elective element alone that Government would be enabled to judge how far the support of the people at large recommended any proposed or suggested measure of legislation. And unless the number of elected representatives was commensurate Government would not be adequately relieved of these grave responsibilities.

46. The Council feel it their duty to submit their respectful protest against the remark in Sir Harold Stuart's letter that " it is admitted that in the case of the Provincial Councils the results (of the introduction of the elective element) have not justified the expectations that were formed". The Council are not only not aware of any such admission but they would respectfully remind the Government of India that ever since 1893 the Governors and Heads of the Presidencies and Provinces where the reformed Councils exist have declared from their own personal knowledge their complete satisfaction with the work and their unqualified admiration of the assistance which elected Members of the Provincial Legislative Councils have performed and rendered from time to time. Even in the Imperial Legislative Council the services rendered by the elected representatives have been publicly acknowledged. The Council of this Association must for obvious reasons refrain from individual eulogy ; but they cannot hesitate to remark that the elected Members have rendered more efficient, more valuable, and more constant assistance to good Government than the nominated Members either in the Imperial or the Provincial Legislatures.

THE PREPONDERANCE OF LAWYERS.

47. With regard to the complaint that the Elective System has given to the legal profession a preponderance in the Provincial Legislatures to which it is not entitled, and that it has signally failed to represent other important elements of the community, the Council think it their duty to point out that such a complaint is neither reasonable nor fair. No doubt the number of lawyers and pleaders is greater than the number of landholders elected by the District Boards and District Municipalities to the Provincial Councils; but there is a twofold fallacy in the argument which is sought to be drawn from it. In the first place no account seems to have been taken of the well known circumstance that a greater number of the lawyers themselves are landholders. In the second place it is forgotten that the lawyers do not sit in the Councils as the spokesmen or representatives of their own particular and professional interests. The Professional class is not like the class of merchants or of landholders and has never sought to claim special representation.

48. That lawyers do preponderate is due only to their possessing the public confidence of all classes because of their capacity and their virtues. Their proficiency and success in their career give stronger and more trustworthy proof, than is otherwise available, of industry and capacity and self-denial. Their career forces them on the public attention and furnishes life-long training for the services required of them in the legislature. By education, observation, independence of thought and capacity to argue, they gain the suffrages of all classes as the men best fitted to give voice to their views and wishes. They do not seek to represent any single class; and they are impartial advocates of the interests of all classes. They are in no way dependent on the executive, and are therefore trusted as independent exponents of public grievances and popular aspirations. With minds disciplined by the study of law, and with accurate knowledge of its principles and practice, they are the fittest and most efficient representatives of the bulk of the population whose legitimate interests are chiefly involved in the work entrusted by the constitution to the Legislature. In every age and in every country the lawyers have been the champions of the people's rights and the defenders of their liberties. They have at once the knowledge to detect and the power to resist the illegitimate encroachments of authority. It is therefore not the fault but the merit of the elective system, that it has helped and will help to bring to the service of this country, with its diverse creeds and castes and races, those who combine with unselfish devotion and patriotism the highest qualifications to form a correct estimate of the greater problems which are likely to come to the front in greater measure, and which must be correctly solved, if our Legislative Councils are to accomplish the work entrusted to and expected of them.

49. There can be no force in the complaint about the preponderance of lawyers in the Legislature unless it can be shown that it has worked to the public detriment. The Council are glad to note that this has not been shown in Sir Harold Stuart's letter. The evidence furnished by the records of the improved legislature since 1893 points entirely to the conclusion that our legislation would show much poorer results if you strike out of it the work done by the lawyers. The Council of this Association must confine their remarks to the Bombay Presidency of which alone they can speak with full knowledge. They would therefore respectfully invite the attention of the Government of India to the work of the lawyers in the Bombay Legislative Council. They have represented and advocated alike the interests of the agriculturist and the occupant and the landlord and the Sowcar in recent revenue legislation. No one espoused the cause of the poor ryot in Gujrat with greater devotion and fuller knowledge than the distinguished pleader who represents the Northern Division of this Presidency in the local Council. When the Hon'ble Member's remarks were challenged in Council by the authorities he obtained a commission and assisted at the enquiry with unselfish devotion and untiring labour and the results of the enquiry not only established the substantial correctness of his views, but have led to administrative measures remedying effectively the grievances complained of. In the legislation affecting the District Boards, the District and Local Municipalities, as well as the Municipality for the city of Bombay, it was the lawyers and the lawyers in the main who moulded it to no small purpose in the interests of the urban and rural populations alike. During the recent debate on the Police Act their services were effectual in safeguarding the people's rights and in resisting illegitimate authority, as the success of the various amendments moved by them attests. These are only a few of the conspicuous instances of their valuable work, as the Council do not wish to trouble Government at greater length than is absolutely necessary.

THE EDUCATED CLASS.

50. The Council of this Association feel painfully the necessity of requesting the serious attention of the Government of India to the deplorable impression which has been created on the public mind by the unsympathetic if not hostile attitude evinced in Sir Harold Stuart's letter towards the class of educated men in this country. The gravest concern and wide-spread apprehension are felt on all sides that the authorities should seek to eliminate from public life the educated element and to divest the educated class of its legitimate influence in matters affecting the public at large. The educated class in India is the proud product of British Rule. It is the only class in this country imbued with ways of thought more akin to those of the rulers, and with keener and more sincere appreciation of the benefits conferred by and expected from good Government. Loyalty to British Rule had its origin in the enlightened appreciation of its present and potential good by the educated class which accepted it not as a necessity but as a benefit; and as already stated above that loyalty has permeated from that class to the masses. To discriminate between the legitimate aspirations voiced by the responsible leading men in that class and the illegitimate views to which they are opposed, is not a task beyond the capacity of Government. To alienate the entire class by denying its legitimate aspirations and leaving it no reasonable prospect of steady development is a course which ought prudently to be avoided. There is obvious danger in driving the educated Indians into a despondent mood by leaving them no occupation for present ambition and no hopes for the future. The British Government cannot afford to neglect, and cannot smother with advantage, the opinion of the educated class because it has become inconveniently articulate for some of the authorities. To draft a few of the educated class into official service will not be enough. The qualifications of the educated non-officials must be afforded free scope to control the conduct of public affairs and to supervise administrative action. It is by their co-operation that the rulers and the ruled among all classes will be brought together and official efficiency will not be impaired but will be strengthened. The educated class must mould the mind of the rising and future generations and to look upon it with unconcealed distrust is a policy which only the enemies of British rule can view with approval.

THE POLICY OF COUNTERPOISE.

51. The keynote of the proposals for reform is the creation of a counterpoise to the influence of the educated class. This of course will be no difficult task. The highest and lowest classes are generally adverse to the thinking and intellectual class. The former oppose it because its tendencies are hostile to their interests; and the latter because those tendencies are apt to assail their prejudices. But the task will be unworthy of enlightened and beneficent statesmanship.

52. There can be no objection, and there should be none, to Government giving to the landed and monied classes sufficient inducement to enter political life and full scope for the exercise of their legitimate influence. But for Government to call to their aid the interested and the unthinking in order to check the increasing influence of those who advocate reforms commensurate with the growing needs of advancing communities is altogether different and altogether objectionable. The counterpoise may for a time help to maintain the Executive at its present level of excessive power; and though the Council of this Association cannot believe that such is the intention, they cannot disguise from themselves that such will be the end; and they must respectfully point out that such an end will not be compatible with Government's desire to rally the better mind of the communities to their side.

53. The Council respectfully submit that the proper aim of the reforms now required should be not cleavage or counterpoise but the readjustment and expansion of the proportionate representation of the different communities so as on the one hand to enable Government to secure the benefit of the knowledge, experience, advice and co-operation of the most capable and the best trusted representatives of all classes and interests; and on the other to stimulate and encourage the latter to strive and work for the common good by promoting the advancement and welfare of all, irrespective of class and race and creed.

TERRITORIAL REPRESENTATION.

54. The Council must take exception to the remark that territorial representation is unsuited to India. The territorial principle cannot be unsuitable in regard to the requirements of administration and legislation when it has entered so largely into the people's life in so many directions.

55. There can be no more rigid institution than the caste system among Hindus and even that has been penetrated by territorial influence. Homogeneous institutions like the Brahmin and other castes are divided into sub-castes on the basis of territory, so that men of the same caste are prohibited thereby from intermarriage and not seldom from interdining. The Mahomedans too are divided by territorial influence into distinct bodies like the Punjaubee Mahomedans, the Mahratta Mahomedans, and the Bengalee Mahomedans ; and the Gujeratee Bohras and the Cutchee Memons.

56. Indian Kingdoms and Principalities were founded and based only on the territorial principle. There has never been a King of the Mahrattas or a Raja of the Rajputs or an Emperor of the Punjaubees. We have only had the Emperor of Hindoostan, the Nizam of Hyderabad, the Raja of Satara, the Nawab of the Carnatic, the Maharajas of Udaypore and Mysore and Kolhapore, the Gaekwar of Baroda, the Holkar of Indore, or the Scindia of Gwalior.

57. Hindu law has not stood unaffected by the territorial principle ; and to day the High Courts interpret and administer it differently in the different provinces according to the commentaries of the learned with their distinct modes of interpretation, and separate schools of thought, in Calcutta and Benares and Madras and Bombay.

58. From the earliest times the village community has formed in India the unit of the political and administrative system. Each village community was an organic whole composed of men of different castes and creeds and containing men of every occupation such as the priest and the landowner, the cultivator and the tradesman, the carpenter and the smith, the potter and the barber, the shoe-maker and the sweeper. Its only basis was the land or territory it occupied. This system has stood every test and has come to be recognised as that most suited to the country. It was accepted alike by every Hindu and Mahomedan Ruler; and if of late it has failed to be so recognised and accepted the change has not counted towards progress or public welfare.

59. It is a grave mistake in spite of all this evidence of the effect of territorial influence on the national life, to declare that territorial representation is unsuited to India, and to endeavour to replace it by a system of artificial devices injurious to the public interest, and of racial and class and religious distinctions, which can only promote discord and disunion.

THE PROPOSED ELECTORATES.

60. All attempts to base political institutions on considerations of class interests or caste prejudices or racial and religious differences seem to the Council of this Association so entirely dangerous that they earnestly request the Government of India to give their most serious consideration to the all but universal protest and the general feeling of alarm and distrust with which the proposals contained in Sir Harold Stuart's letter have been received.

61. These attempts involve a violent departure from the principles and policy hitherto recognised and pursued by the British Government, which has always stood outside all class and racial and religious considerations with strict impartiality. Such a departure will only increase the difficulties of Government by placing it in opposition to the powerful tendencies which now prevail and which have been fostered hitherto by wise persistence in the strictest neutrality. If racial and social idiosyncracies and differences have not altogether ceased to exist, they should not be utilised for marking the ultimate direction, or shaping the final aim, of the policy which Government should pursue. To bring the differing races and creeds into harmony with each other, and to induce the best minds in all communities to apply themselves to what is necessary and practicable for promoting the common good should, the Council earnestly submit, be the only aim of British policy, and the great task to which Government should apply itself.

62. The electors hitherto have paid little heed to race or creed or social rank, but have chosen the men who most faithfully represented and were capable of most effectively enforcing their views. Instead of encouraging this course the new Policy will encourage class ascendancy, and religious and sectarian partisanship with the inevitable result that Government itself will be distrusted by one party or another.

THE PREPONDERANCE OF HINDUS.

63. If under the present system the Hindus largely preponderate and comparatively few Mahomedans have been elected that is due to causes which have not been fully recognised in Sir Harold Stuart's letter.

64. Electorates everywhere are based on numbers, property, and education as the main qualifications. If the Hindus are an over-whelmingly numerical majority, and if the qualifications of property and education are found in them in no smaller proportion than in others, they are in the Council's opinion perfectly entitled to proportionately larger representation than any other community. Every attempt to interfere with a right so obvious must lead to discontent which it is not prudent to provoke nor safe to despise.

65. To single out 62 millions from a population of nearly 300 millions for exclusive and exceptional treatment on account of their religion would be an attempt impolitic enough to be perilous. If the Mahomedans under special or exceptional circumstances require their proper rights or interests to be safeguarded by special measures, the same consideration and the same protection should be afforded to the Hindus under similar circumstances. To leave the Mahomedan majority where it exists unfettered, and to seek to provide checks against the Hindu majority alone, must appear to the latter an act of intolerance on the part of Government which they are entitled to resent.

66. When it is proposed in the case of District and Local Boards to distribute the seats set apart for election among occupational groups of Hindu landholders, cultivators, traders and professional classes and to select certain castes as representing each group, the question must arise why when there are Mahomedan cultivators, traders, landholders and professional classes there should be a differential treatment of the latter from the former. The Council can see no justification for the different and contradictory lines thus suggested for the election of Hindu and Mahomedan representatives.

67. It is said in Sir Harold Stuart's letter that the general principle to be borne in mind is to give the widest representation to classes, races and interests subject to the condition of maintaining the official majority. Apart from the reasons and considerations submitted above, the Council respectfully take leave to doubt if such an attempt would be practicable.

68. As regards interests, the Council fail to see what is the Mahomedan or Christian or Parsee interest which is opposed to the Hindu interest in matters of legislation. Conflicting interests arise and come into play only in the case of Government employment and Government favours in matters of administration. As long as the same laws are made and administered irrespective of race or religion or caste, there is no need and no good ground for recognising differences between Hindus and Mahomedans in the Legislative Councils whose primary concern is to make laws. The interests of Mahomedans and Hindus are identical under British Rule, and the best way of safeguarding and promoting them is for Hindus and Mahomedans to work together in a spirit of co-operation and mutual sympathy. What is most desirable is to keep out what is narrow and bigoted, and to rally to the cause of good government the sound sober and conciliatory element from both the communities, so that the Mahomedan and Hindu members in our Legislature may be regarded and may regard themselves not as representatives of their respective communities but of the electorate as a whole.

69. This is the policy which has been hitherto followed; and its tendency has been unmistakably to unify the different races, classes and creeds into a political whole. The Council cannot believe that it is desired to counteract this beneficent tendency; and the Council trust that the Government of India will eliminate from their proposals the devices and distinctions which are calculated to have that effect.

70. Attention has been invited to the address of the Mahomedan Deputation to H. E. the Viceroy in October last, and it is observed that the Government of India concurred with the presenters of the address who had complained that neither in the Imperial nor in the Provincial Legislative Councils had the Mahomedan community received a measure of representation commensurate with its numbers and political and historical importance. As regards numbers the Council will not repeat what they have already submitted above. It must not be forgotten that there is a large Mahomedan population of Hindu descent living in the same way as, and with habits and modes of thought akin to those of, the Hindus in many parts of the country.

71. As regards political and historical importance it is necessary to point out that too much stress has been laid on the point; and a good deal of what has been urged is historically incorrect. The Mahomedan Empire was already in its decline when the British power came upon the scene. The Mahratta power was then at least not less important politically. The Rajputs were certainly not less important historically. With the exception of Deccan Hyderabad and Bhopal there is no Mahomedan Native State of first class importance like Mysore and Cashmere and Travancore, or the Mahratta States of Baroda, and Kolhapore, and Indore, and Gwalior; or the Sikh States of Patiala and Nabha, or the Rajput States of Udeypore, and Meywar, and Jodhpore, and Jeypore.

72. With the exception of those Mahomedans who strive naturally enough to get a larger share of public employment and honours, the wants and needs of the Mahomedan masses, agriculturists, artisans, merchants, traders, and labourers are very much the same as these of the population of which they form part. Whatever might be imagined and said to the contrary, their attitude towards the Anglo-Indian administration and their views of local questions are identical with those of their Hindu neighbours.

73. That the great and important Mahomedan community should have adequate representation in the Councils and in all public affairs is what this Council are prepared to advocate and recommend without reserve. They have every sympathy with Mahomedan aspirations and they feel bound to point out that those aspirations have never been ignored, but have always been promoted by the political activities of the Hindu and other communities in this country. Every movement for securing greater rights for the populations at large has benefited the Mahomedans not less than the other communities. It has opened up avenues for public recognition and for public employment to the Mahomedans equally with the other communities; and if the Mahomedans have failed to avail of it all to the extent they desire, the result is due to their unfortunate backwardness in taking advantage of the educational facilities provided by Government, and not to the selfishness or opposition of the other communities. Government themselves have used every effort to put them into line with the other communities, and if the effort has not been as successful as it might have been, it is unjust to ascribe the failure to any other cause than the want of sufficient materials and the absence of the requisite number of those qualified to avail of the advantages offered to all classes and communities without exception.

74. It is due to the general movement towards progress and development that the most capable Mahomedans have been able to secure some of the highest posts in the public service. The seats on the Benches of the High Courts and of the Magistracy have not been the monopoly of the Hindus, and if Mahomedans have been able to attain to them by their capacity and talents, it is due not to the special efforts of that community or the special favour of Government, but to the success of the general demand that the natives of this country should not find the avenues to the highest employment closed to their ambition and deserts.

75. In the Corporation of the City of Bombay every capable Mahomedan has been called to the President's post by the acclamation of all communities. In the Town Councils and Standing Committees a larger number of Mahomedan gentlemen than was justified by the number of Mahomedans in the Corporation was elected by their Hindu and Parsee colleagues. In the Legislative Councils the Mahomedans have seats commensurate with their numbers and qualifications. The non-official Members of the Bombay Legislative Council have never been guided in their choice by narrow distinctions of caste or creed or race. They have elected a Parsi and a Mahomedan and a Hindu with equal appreciation when he was the fittest for that honour. Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and the Hon. Mr. Sayani were elected with the same unanimity as the Hon. Mr. Gokhale. From Madras, too, the non-official Members of the Provincial Legislative Council have sent to the Imperial Council Mahomedan representatives like the late Meer Humayun Jah Bahadur, C.I.E., and the Hon'ble Nawab Syed Mahammad Saheb Bahadur, who has been chosen twice in succession for that high honour. From the United Provinces, again, the non-official Members chose the late Nawab Faiyazali Khan of Pahasu as their representative in the Imperial Council. The landowners of Behar, of whom nine-tenths are Hindus, unanimously chose at the last election the Hon'ble Mr. Sharif-ud-din, a Mahomedan, as their representative in the Bengal Legislative Council. These facts so creditable to the Hindus should not be lost sight of. In absolute justice to them it should be recognised that whenever really qualified representatives were available from the Mahomedan community, they have found no difficulty in obtaining the generous suffrages of their Hindu colleagues.

76. There is no reason whatever to doubt that, if such results can be pointed out in the short space between 1893 and now, better results will and must be attained with the increase of progress and enlightenment, provided of course the authorities do not interfere with mistaken measures which are calculated to encourage and exasperate racial and religious animosities.

77. There is no injustice in the fact that the Hindu representatives are found in a majority when on any and every secular test they prove themselves entitled thereto. To encourage any idea of injustice on that account can serve no honest purpose. It is not honest or fair to the Hindus to attribute their advantage to anything unworthy when the legitimate and solid claims of number, property and education are demonstrably on their side. It is not honest or fair to the Mahomedans to encourage delusive hopes and keep them in darkness as to the true causes of the backwardness of which they are becoming conscious and for which the remedy is so largely in their own hands.

To hold the balance evenly between Hindus and Mahomedans is undoubtedly an obligation of Government; and this Council accept unreservedly the principle that the representation of minorities should be adequately provided for. No scheme for providing such representation can give universal satisfaction; and the British Parliament itself has not succeeded in devising a scheme which can satisfy all parties. But the Council would respectfully suggest the following for Government's favourable consideration :—

(a) That the electorates should be fixed on a territorial basis.

(b) That the requisite number of members should be assigned to each electorate.

(c) That the proportion of Mahomedan and Hindu Members should be determined according to local circumstances, whichever community happens to be in a minority.

(d) That the members should be elected by the general body of Voters.

79. Whatever arrangement is adopted to safeguard or protect the rights of the minority, it is essential that such an arrangement should be uniform, and not devised specially in the interests of one community. Government cannot afford to introduce a scheme invidious to the Hindus, and open to the suspicion that the authorities favoured one particular community.

80. The Council must, therefore, submit the strongest objection to the adoption of the measures suggested in Sir Harold Stuart's letter (para. 17) for giving additional facilities and special privileges to the Mahomedan community by creating a special Mahomedan electorate to elect Mahomedan Members exclusively, in addition to the Mahomedan Members who may secure election in the ordinary manner. These measures are bound to create in the public body feelings of race and religious animosities dangerous to peace and contentment; and in the legislature itself a spirit of faction which will mar the utility, and lower in public esteem the character, of the Legislative Councils.

81. The Council venture to believe that the proposals submitted by them (ante para. 78) would sufficiently protect the rights of the minority wherever it exists, avoid all individiousness, promote no discord, and ensure the election of both Hindus and Mahomedans of the right type as the trusted representatives of the entire electorate.

NOMINATIONS.

82. It is stated that the Government of India do not think it necessary to throw open all the seats to election, but hold it advisable to reserve a proportion of seats to be filled as at present by nomination because Indian gentlemen of position refuse to be candidates before a wide electorate.

83. The obligation to seek the suffrages of the people compels those who seek it to consider the interests of their countrymen in general; and there is no reason why Indian gentlemen of position should escape it by refusing to be candidates before a wide electorate. The Mahomedan Deputation to His Excellency the Viceroy expressed in no uncertain language their dissatisfaction with the results of nominations. Generally they help only to create a non-effective if not mischievous element always ready and willing to conform to the wishes of those to whom they owe their selection. It is most desirable that people should know when Members agree with Government that the agreement is arrived at as the result of independent views. The value of the agreement is diminished when people understand that it is the expression of the views of those who are nominated and who desire re-nomination.

84. The system of nominations has only this to recommend it that it enables Government to redress the balance if and when the results of the elections render it necessary and advisable. The Council respectfully submit that with this power in their hands which can be exercised wisely and to good purpose, Government need not resort to any special and invidious device for safeguarding the rights of a particular community where it is in a minority.

85. Nominations will also be the only means for the representation on the Legislative Councils of the official element.

OFFICIAL MAJORITIES.

86. The Council respectfully trust that they need not entertain any apprehension of being accused of a desire to dispute the legitimacy of the Paramount Power itself if they take the liberty to deny the validity of the principle that the maintenance of a standing official majority is the legitimate and necessary consequence of the nature of the Paramount Power in India. Of course the principle is accepted by Government; but that does not and cannot mean that it has never been disputed, or, that it is not an open question. To argue that those who object to any particular form in which British supremacy is exercised object therefore to the existence of British supremacy itself is alike unreasonable and undignified on the part of the authorities. Nobody in India dreams of claiming that the Legislative Councils should wield the sceptre. All that is claimed is that they should not be reduced to a position of constant impotence and inutility.

87. The Government of India themselves admit that the provision for an official majority imposes the necessity of limiting the number of Non-official Members. It obviously therefore cripples so far the usefulness of the Legislature by preventing the adequate and efficient representation of the varied interests which are entitled to representation. This in itself would be sufficient cause for enquiring and considering carefully the necessity for the provision of official majorities.

88. The existence of a Standing Majority must minimise the sense of power and therefore of responsibility on the part of the Non-official

Members, and increase the sense of power and of irresponsibility on the part of the Officials. Both these results are to be deprecated and should as much as possible be provided against.

89. The Council can see no necessity for a numerical majority of Officials strong enough to be independent of the fluctuations caused by the occasional absence of Official Members when admittedly the withdrawal from their important administrative functions of such a large number of Officials of standing and experience cannot take place without detriment to the public interest. In the ordinary sphere of legislation, if the non-official members both Indian and European, drawn from so many different directions and representing so many varied interests, were to combine and oppose the proposals of Government, it cannot weaken the power or injure the prestige of Government to yield to the opinion of such a majority. The time has come when it may be safely recognised that greater confidence on the part of Government in the people's representatives would beget greater confidence on the part of the people in Government itself; and that unreasonable and excessive distrust on the part of Government can benefit neither the rulers nor the ruled.

90. Questions may no doubt arise on which it may not be advisable to yield to the opinion of the combined non-official majority; and among them the most important will be the questions relating to the financial administration. In such a case what this Council would claim for the majority is the power of delaying measures so as to ensure their reconsideration by the Government, or a reference to a higher constitutional authority, unless their emergency is such as to make any delay injurious to the public interest in the opinion of Government. In the latter case the power of veto which will always vest in His Excellency the Viceroy would be a sufficient safeguard. In the former case the Council would request that if Government do not think it proper to reconsider their measures or proposals, the opinions of the majority may be recorded, and the matter may be referred to a higher tribunal as a Court of final appeal.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE.

91. This Tribunal or Court of appeal should draw its authority and strength from the British Parliament. There is no question that under the constitution the Government of India and His Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council are responsible to Parliament in the last resort; and there can be no question of the propriety of a Committee appointed by Parliament being the final referee, when the majority of Members in the Imperial Legislative Council record their votes against the proposals or measures of the Government of India. Provision may be made for drawing up a reference, where the reasons for the majority's vote may be submitted, with the Government of India's reasons for differing from them.

92. Such a Committee should be composed of Members of both Houses of Parliament, and from both the great parties, so as to secure to the final authority the highest prestige and the confidence of all parties. The liberty of action of the Government of India would be controlled only by the decision of Parliament through its appointed delegates, and their prestige and power would suffer no diminution, but remain as hitherto under the constitution. The only difference will be that the control of Parliament will be more real and effectual in matters of the greatest moment to the Indian people.

THE IMPERIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

93. Under the India Councils Act of 1892 the number of additional Members of the Imperial Legislative Council was fixed at not less than 10 and not more than 16. Under Section 1 (4) of the Act, Regulations were framed by the Viceroy and published by notification dated the 23rd June 1893 declaring that of the additional Members not more than 6 should be officials and that 5 should be non-officials recommended, one each by the Non-official Members of the provincial Councils of Madras, Bombay, Bengal and the United Provinces, and one by the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce. It was left to His Excellency the Viceroy to nominate at his discretion to the remaining seats not filled by the officials such additional Members as he pleased for the due representation of the different classes. The Members of the Executive Council, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, the Commander-in-Chief, and His Excellency the Viceroy were to be Members ex-officio. The composition of the Imperial Legislative Council was thus made up of the maximum number of 25 as follows:—

9 Members ex-officio including the Viceroy.

6 Official Members.

4 Non-official Members elected by the four Presidencies and Provinces.

1 Non-official Member elected by the Chamber of Commerce.

5 Additional Members nominated by the Viceroy.

94. It is now proposed that the maximum strength of the Imperial Legislative Council shall be 53, and including the Viceroy 54, made up as follows:—

9 Members Ex-officio including the Viceroy.

20 Official Members.

18 Elected Members.

7 Members nominated by the Viceroy.

THE NOMINATED OFFICIAL MEMBERS.

95. When the Official Members under the existing regulations were not to be more than 6 out of 25, the proposed change would increase their number to 20 out of 54. When the increase in the whole Council would be somewhat over double their present maximum number, the increase in the Official Members would be somewhat over-treble their present maximum number. The only reason put forward is the necessity for an Official Majority. As to this the Council of this Association have already submitted their remarks.

96. If the figures are examined carefully they show that His Excellency the Viceroy can always count upon a much too excessive Majority. The elected Members are only 18 of whom the two recommended by the Chambers of Commerce will be Europeans. This Council cannot understand the necessity of a Majority composed of 37 members, Ex-officio, Officials, nominated, and Europeans, against 16 elected Non-Official Indian Members. They respectfully trust Government themselves will see the obviously excessive disproportion, and will be disposed to regard with favour this Council's request that there should not be more than 16 Officials as Additional Members.

THE NOMINATED NON-OFFICIAL MEMBERS.

97. The Nomination of a Ruling Chief as an Additional Member seems to this Council neither necessary nor appropriate; for the reasons already submitted above they would request Government, alike in the interests of the Ruling Chiefs themselves and of the public, to abandon the idea.

98. As to the 6 Additional Non-official Members to be nominated by the Viceroy as experts, and as representatives of minorities and special interests, of whom not less than two are to be Mahomedans, this Council respectfully trust that considering the variety of important interests that must remain unrepresented if the proposals are not altered, the Government of India will not be indisposed to reduce the number. There is already a provision for the special election of 2 Mahomedan Members; and the further provision for at least 2 Additional Nominated Mahomedan Members is not necessary. It is also, for the reasons already submitted above, very undesireable. This Council would therefore request that the number of Nominated Non-official Members may be reduced to four of whom the Viceroy may appoint as many Mahomedans as His Excellency finds necessary according to surrounding circumstances. It is by no means unlikely that the Provincial Councils themselves would elect Mahomedans to the Imperial Council as the Councils of Madras, Bombay, and the United Provinces have already done, as shown above. Those of the Punjab and Eastern Bengal and Assam can with reason be expected at least to do likewise.

THE ELECTED MEMBERS.

99. It is more important in the public interest to consider the number and composition of the elected Members. As the proposals of Government stand there number is fixed at 18 to be elected thus :—

By the Chambers of Commerce	2
By the Non-Official Members of the Provincial Councils	7
By the Nobles and great land-owners	7
By Mahomedans	2

It is submitted with the greatest respect that to leave 7 Members to be elected by the representatives of the vast masses who can be counted to so many millions, and to reserve 11 Members for election by Minorities and special interests, is calculated to cause the greatest concern, if not dismay, to those who have advocated a reform of the existing system. It is not a step towards progress but towards retrogression. The changes proposed are not for the general good of the masses, but for the special behoof of the classes. They seem intended not to satisfy the aspirations of the educated but to place the educated at a disadvantage. It is difficult to understand how if the Government of India believed as Sir Harvey Adamson declared on the 18th October last that the unrest in India has its basis in the natural expirations of educated Indians, they could persuade themselves than they were giving a proof of their desire to meet the grievances by a change of which it is difficult to admit the justice or generosity.

100. The real increase of the people's representatives is from 4 to 7; and this increase is due to the addition of the 3 Provincial Councils of Eastern Bengal and Assam, and of the Punjab, and Burma, which do not now possess the privilege of electing representatives to the Imperial Council. The Council fail to see how the aspirations of the educated Indians in Madras and Bombay and Bengal and the United Provinces are met by including Eastern Bengal and Assam and the Punjab and Burma within the pale.

THE GREAT LANDHOLDERS.

101. It is said that the Government of India are impressed with the necessity for giving substantial representation to the great landowners who not only constitute the aristocratic and stable elements in Indian Society but also represent the interests of landholders great and small. It is proposed therefore :

(a) That seven Members should be elected direct to the Imperial Council—one from each Presidency or Province—by a provincial electorate varying in size from one hundred to one hundred and fifty composed of landowners paying not less than ten thousand rupees a year as land revenue; or

(b) That a representative of the landholders should be elected to the Imperial Council by the landholding Members of the Provincial Councils either from among their own number or from landholders paying not less than ten thousand rupees a year as land revenue; or

(c) That seven representatives of this class should be obtained on the Imperial Council by a system of nomination.

The Council of this Association are not surprised at Government's embarrassment. As regards the first, Government themselves point out how unsatisfactory and objectionable it may prove. As regards the second, it is difficult to understand what Government mean by the landholding Members, and if lawyers and merchants holding land can claim the privilege. As regards the third it is perfectly intelligible and would certainly be feasible; but it would mean only an increase of the number of Government nominees.

102. It is, however, not the method of their election, or their nomination by Government which need create any concern. It is the proposal itself which is most objectionable. To give to an electorate of from seven hundred to one thousand privilege electors the same number of representatives as are given to so many voiceless millions in the whole country, has been universally felt as a painful mockery by those whose aspirations, admittedly legitimate, it is the avowed desire of Government to satisfy.

103. The insistence that the Members elected to represent this class must themselves belong to it has been interpreted as a desire on the part of the authorities to exclude from the Legislature the cultured and the capable, even if they command the confidence of the privileged few. This is not an unreasonable interpretation. Government have no right to restrict the choice of the seven hundred or one thausand landholders, and to insist that they shall not elect a man however capable and however trustworthy only because he is poor. What reason can there be to tell the landholders that they shall not elect representatives like the Honorable Mr. Gokhale, if such is their will and confidence?

104. This Council would earnestly request Government to reconsider this part of their scheme and to modify it so that the vast interests of the public at large may not be sacrificed to the interests of the privileged few. It has been already shown above that the importance attached to the latter is not in keeping with their present position. In the Bombay Presidency there are very few landholders who pay not less than Rs. 10,000 a year as land revenue. Neither can it be said fairly or correctly that they represent the interests of all landholders great and small. No doubt in a few of the other Presidencies and Provinces there is a larger and more influential class of landholders. And if it is the desire of Government that they should be specially represented, this Council respectfully submit that the number of representatives allotted to them should not be more than three.

THE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

105. The proposal to give the Chambers of Commerce in Calcutta and Bombay the right to elect two representatives, is one to which this Council will not object if at the same time the great mercantile interests of the larger number of Indian merchants are duly represented. the Indian merchants are not excluded from the Chambers of Commerce in Calcutta and Bombay, but it is the fact that these Chambers represent principally the interests and wishes of the European Mercantile Community; and the interests of the Indian Mercantile Community will remain unrepresented as the proposals now stand.

106. In the Bombay Presidency we have the Millowners' Association, the Association of Piece Goods' Merchants, and a large and increasing class of other merchants and traders, who are entitled to equal representation with those whom the Chambers of Commerce represent. All over India this class is growing in numbers and importance; and this Council respectfully submit that Government should in justice to them make provision for their due representation in the Imperial Council by giving them the privilege of electing two members from all the Presidencies and Provinces. Those who pay a certain amount of Income Tax may be given the right to vote, and Electoral Colleges may be formed according to the importance and value of the different trades and industries in the different Presidencies and Provinces. If necessary the right may be exercised by rotation.

THE ELECTED REPRESENTATIVES OF THE POPULATIONS.

107. The Council respectfully submit that the number of representatives elected to the Imperial Council by the Non-official Members of the Provincial Councils should be raised from seven to sixteen, so as to allow two members each to the eight different Presidencies and Provinces of (1) Madras, (2) Bombay, (3) Bengal, (4) Eastern Bengal and Assam, (5) The United Provinces, (6) The Punjab, (7) The Central Provinces, and (8) Burma. The Imperial Council will thus be composed of:—

The Ex-officio Members	8
The Nominated Officials	16
The Nominated Non-officials	4
The Non-officials elected by the Chambers of Commerce	2
The Non-officials elected by the Indian Mercantile Communities	2

The representatives of the Landholders 3
The Elected Representatives from the Provincial Councils 16
The Elected Representatives of the Mahomedan Community 2

It may be fairly presumed that the Government can count on no obstruction or unreasonable opposition from the 30 representatives composed of the Ex-officio Members (excluding the Viceroy) the Official Members, the Nominated Non-officials, and the Members representing the Chambers of Commerce in Calcutta and Bombay. These as against the 23 elected Members would for all ordinary purposes furnish a sufficient and reliable majority. The Council of this Association are fully persuaded that there is no desire any where at any time to defeat the Executive; and that the legitimate aspirations of those who desire only that the public interests should be sufficiently represented shall be satisfied if the above suggestions are favourably received.

108. The Council would submit very earnestly that those who are allowed the privilege to elect the representatives should be unfettered in their choice, and that no restrictions of property or wealth may be imposed as to those who claim or may receive the confidence of the different electorates.

THE PROVINCIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCILS.

109. The remarks submitted below have reference only to the Bombay Legislative Council. Under the Act of 1892 it was laid down that the number of Additional Members should, besides the Advocate General, be not less than eight and not more than twenty. Under S. 1 (4) of the Act, Regulations were framed whereby it was provided that in Bombay, of the persons, other than the Advocate General, to be nominated additional Members not more than nine should be Officials, and that nominal tions to eight seats should be made by His Excellency the Governor on the recommendation of—

A. The Corporation of Bombay.

B. Such Municipal Corporations or Group or Groups of Corporations other than the Bombay City Corporation as the Governor in Council may prescribe by Notification.

C. District Local Boards.

D. The Sirdars of the Deccan and such other class of Landholders.

E. Associations of Merchants Manufacturers and tradesmen.

F. The Senate of the Bombay University.

Not more than one Member each was allowed to the Bombay Corporation and to the University Senate, and as regards the rest it was provided that at least one member should be nominated on the recommendation of each of them. It was left to His Excellency's discretion to nominate persons to such of the remaining seats as were not filled by officials as should in his opinion secure a fair representation of the different classes of the Community.

110. The Government of Bombay regretted (See G.R. No. 115 of 17-5-93) that with the number of seats for election laid down by the Regulations it was impossible to meet the legitimate wishes of the several public bodies to have the privilege of election granted to them. They apportioned the 8 seats thus:—

3. To Local Boards and Municipalities.
2. To the Chambers of Commerce at Bombay and Karachi.
2. To the Deccan Sirdars and the Sind Zamindars.
1. To the University.

THE MUNICIPALITIES and DISTRICT BOARDS.

111. It is stated in Sir Harold Stuart's letter that at present the large number of the elected members of the Provincial Councils, who again constitute the majority of the electorate for the Imperial Council, are chosen by the Municipalities and District Boards. That such is not the case in Bombay is shown by the above.

112. It is complained that on an examination of the franchises framed for the Municipalities and District Boards it was found that the qualifications required both for electors and for candidates were extraordinary low. The qualifications for candidates and voters in the District Municipalities of Bombay are (under S. 12 of Act III of 1901):—

(a) Every Honorary Magistrate.
(b) Every Fellow and every Graduate of any University.

(c) Every Advocate and every Pleader holding a Sanad from the High Court.

(d) Every Juror and Assessor resident in the District.

(e) Every person paying taxes, other than octroi or toll, of an amount not less than the minimum fixed by the Governor in Council or the Commissioner.

113. There is one particular feature of this subject which ought not to escape attention, and that is the proportion of the Ex-officio and nominated to the elected Members in the District Municipalities and the District and Taluka Local Boards. The following are from the Administration Report for 1904-05 based on the Census of 1901 :—

MUNICIPALITY.

Division.	Population.	Ex-Officio Members.	Nominated Members.	Elected Members.
Northern	743,823	135	204	181
Central	778,118	158	284	402
Southern	453,616	99	171	228
Sindh	391,861	76	217	73

Thus for a total population of 2,380,745 within Municipal limits throughout the Presidency there were 2,252 Councillors of whom 881 alone were elected. The remaining 1,371 were made up of 473 Members Ex-officio and 898 nominated. In all there were 603 Officials and 1,043 Non-officials.

LOCAL BOARDS.

Division.	Area in Square miles.	Population	Members. Ex-officio.	Nominated.	Elected.
Northern ...	13,710	3,513,532	11	390	327
Central ...	37,160	5,944,447	6	631	576
Southern ...	3,998	1,167,927	15	85	65
Sindh ...	48,823	2,822,469	10	431	309

Here again for a total population of 17,351,827 (or 17 and a half millions nearly) there were 3,607 Members of whom only 1,608 were elected. Of the remaining 1,999 the nominated Members were 1,957. There were in all 762 Official and 2,845 Non-official Members.

114. It is not accurate to speak of the franchises devised with a view to the management of Local affairs the unsuitable foundation for the election of legislators. It is not the elected Members of the Municipalities and Local Boards who alone choose the elected members of the Provincial Councils. All the Non-official Members including the Government Nominees choose them. Of the total Non-official Members in the Local Boards numbering 2,845 the Government Nominees number 1237 or about 44 per cent. Of the total Non-official Members in the District Municipalities numbering 1,649, the Government Nominees number 753 or about 43 per cent. At present the Non-official members, of the District Municipalities in the Northern Division, and, of the Local Boards in the Central and Southern Division, elect one representative each to the Provincial Council.

115. The Council of this Association are thankful that the Government of India do not propose to withdraw from the District Boards and Municipalities the privilege of election to the Provincial Councils enjoyed for the last 14 years. As regards changing the present system of voting it is not easy for this Council to criticise the fancy franchise proposals suggested in the letter. Neither will it be appropriate to do so until they know which of them has received the approval of the Local Government. The Bombay Government have enunciated no scheme as yet. In the Madras Presidency the Local Government have done so, and his Council need do no more than respectfully point to the result. There is very general disapproval and very painful disappointment.

116. It is stated that a solution might perhaps be arrived at by introducing special qualifications for members of Council while leaving the electoral franchise in other respects unchanged This repeated desire to attempt to fetter the choice of those who are given the privilege of electing Members is perhaps the least satisfactory part of the Government proposals. That classes and interests and races and castes shall elect members from among their own class or race or caste is a proposal which has not unreasonably been regarded as an attempt on the part of the administration to emasculate the privilege for the purpose of replacing those who are the most capable and the most apt, by those who are likely to have no capacity or aptitude, to control or criticise its conduct.

117. It seems to the Council that the proposals to distribute the seats to be filled by elected among occupational groups and to select certain castes as representing each group is one unsuited to the conditions of the country, and impracticable. The suggestion that in a particular area to which 8 members are allotted 4 should be reserved for Mahomedans if their number is large enough, and that the remaining 4 should be distributed among Hindus so as to give one seat to landholders and one to traders and one to cultivators and one to artisans, seems to the Council invidious, because there is no fair reason for treating the Hindus differently from the Mahomedans; and incapable of realisation, because no such clear line of demarcation among the occuaptions exists anywhere.

118. There is no definite proposal before the public of the number and composition of the Provincial Councils and it is difficult for this Council to know how the suggestions of the Government of India are to be adopted and carried out in this Presidency. They have already submitted there views as to the principles and general propositions advanced in Sir Harold Stuart's letter. It only remains for them respectfully to request that the following suggestions for the number and composition of the Legislative Council of this Presidency may receive favourable consideration. Admittedly, the Municipal and District Boards, the University, the Presidency Corporations, the Trades Associations, the Industrial Interests, and Indian Commerce, are essential elements entitled to adequate representation in the Provincial Councils. This Council would therefore, propose that the Presidency Council may be composed of seventy-five Members including His Excellency the Governor and the 2 Members of the Executive Council who shall of course be members Ex-officio; and that the 72 additional Members may be divided equally into Elected and Nominated Members. The 36 Members may be elected thus :—

By the 22 Districts in the Presidency	22

N. B. To provide for the representation of the urban and rural interests equally this Council would suggest that the 22 Districts should be formed into eleven groups of two Districts each with the right to elect two Members and that in each group the District Municipalities and Local Boards should elect one Member each.

By the Corporation for the City of Bombay . .	1
By the Senate of the University	1
By the registered Graduates of 10 years standing .	1
By the Chamber of Commerce, Bombay . . .	1
By Do. Do. Karachi . . .	1
By the Millowner's Association	1
By the Native Merchants	1
By the Sirdars and Inamdars of the Deccan . .	1
By the Zemindars of Sindh	1
By the Talukdars and Khots (alternately) .	1
Mahomedan Members (one from each Division) to safeguard the rights of the Minority	4
	36

The 36 Nominated Members will be composed of course of Officials and Non-officials, and with regard to them this Council need do no more than request attention to what has been already submitted above in regard to the principles and general propositions which are to be borne in mind.

INTERPELLATIONS.

119. There should be no other Restriction on the right of interpellation than that which Government has the undoubted right to impose by refusing to answer any question on the ground that it was not in consonance with the public interest to do so at the time.

120. Under the present Rules it is required that the questions should be so framed as to purely request information and must not be in an argumentative or hypothetical form; and no discussion is permitted in respect of an answer given to any question. This Council would request that reasons for putting a question should be allowed to accompany it, so that there should be no misapprehension as to its object, and so that there should be no excuse for the generally unsatisfactory nature of the reply. They would also request that supplementary questions should be allowed when the answers do not give the required information through inadvertence or misapprehension.

121. Considering that there are no meetings of the Imperial Council from April to January as a rule, and that the Provincial Councils sit at long intervals, it is desirable that Members should be allowed the privilege of sending written interpellations at stated intervals when the Councils are not sitting. These written interpellations may be allowed every two months. This will prevent the accumulation of interpellations which swell their number to an extent which has been complained of. It will also be of advantage that long intervals should not elapse before explanations are given in respect of measures and motives when they are misunderstood, and before corrections are made in respect of erroneous or mischievous statements of fact or purpose imputed to the administration.

122. This Council would further request the following:—

(a) That any Member may submit a request or move a Resolution for the production of papers relating to any question, and be allowed to divide the Council if their production is refused.

(b) That when more than a third of the Elected Members request the President of the Legislative Councils that any question of importance required immediate or early discussion, a meeting of the Council should be called for that purpose without unnecessary delay.

This will enable Government to give timely explanation of their policy, and remove the misconceptions and misapprehensions to which Sir Harold Stuart's letter has drawn attention.

THE BUDGET DEBATES.

123. This Council are thankful that the unsatisfactory character of these debates, and the necessity for a remedy are admitted and recognised. The proposal that the Budget should be discussed in the first instance by separate heads or groups of heads which would be explained severally by the member in administrative charge, to be followed by a general debate, will be a step in the right direction. The change will no doubt afford far better opportunities than now for systematic criticism, and will perhaps help to make the discursion less discussive. But this Council are respectfully of opinion that it will not help to make the discussion less unfruitful.

124. Both in the Imperial and in the Provincial Councils these debates are carried on under the blighting conviction that whatever might be said, however diligently the members might devote themselves to their task, and however ably they might perform it, the result must be the same whether they are right or wrong in their views. It is this sense of want of power which makes the discussion so unfruitful, by discouraging all initiative, and removing to no inconsiderable extent the required sense of responsibility. The advantages of mere discussions of the budgets without the power to move Resolutions and to claim divisions and record votes are not clear to this Council.

125. The power to vote on financial questions is the most useful and important that could be conferred on the Members. There is no reason to apprehend a misuse of the power; and this Council feel sure that if the confidence of Government is extended to them, it will not be misplaced. No one could dream in India of putting the Government out of power thereby. The importance of divisions on the budget proposals lies in this, that it will help to concentrate public attention and will enable Government to gauge the public feeling and opinion. It will remove the obvious necessity which at present compels member after member from among the non-official representatives to repeat the same arguments. The usual complaint that too much importance is attached to mere talk is not fair to Members when they are deprived of the means of declaring their opinion by votes.

126. As already submitted above, Government will usually be in a position to command a majority, and if under exceptional circumstances the majority goes against them, it will emphasise the necessity for reconsideration, or for reference to the superior authority vested in a committee appointed by Parliament. There can be no danger, therefore, in an adverse vote.

127. It may not be unimportant to request the attention of the Government of India to what passed in the House of Commons during the debate on cl. 38 of the India Councils Act of 1861. When Sir Charles Wood said that no financial measure should be introduced without the previous sanction of the Governor General, Mr. Bright asked if it was meant that no Member should be able to propose a Resolution on the question of Revenue as they could in that House. The reply of H. M'.s Secretary of State was that the effect of the clause would be precisely the same as in England. Half a century has nearly intervened since, and what was so clearly contemplated then may not unreasonably be claimed now, and may be safely allowed.

128. It is not desired that there should be no limit fixed to the budget debates. If one amendment is allowed to each Member, if a week's time limit is fixed for the whole debate, and if the order of amendments is regulated by His Excellency the President of the Council, all inconvenient results will be avoided.

129. This Council would respectfully submit for consideration the advisability of a Preliminary Conference, between the Members representing the Government and the elected non-official Members of the Council, on the budget proposals, both in the Imperial and in the Provincial Legislative Councils. It would ensure a free and frank interchange of views, and to a great extent prevent the necessity and inconvenience of open opposition to Government's proposals.

130. As regards the budget debates in the Bombay Provincial Council there is the additional difficulty arising from the fact that the local budget has been determined and acted upon before it is brought up for discussion before the Council. This reduces the discussion to meaningless exhibition involving considerable discredit. It is not impossible to make some provision for preventing it. The Imperial budget may well be passed in the first week in March; and the Provincial budget before the end of the same month. If necessary, the exodus to the hills may well be postponed for a short time in the public interest.

131. The Rules for debate which now prevail ought also to be altered as they result in the grave inconvenience that the Members of Government make observations which can be replied to or refuted generally after a year's interval. The rules now require all the additional Members in the Imperial Council to speak consecutively, beginning with the latest addition, and the Members of Government remain reserved till the end. It is the general practice in the Provincial Council that the non-official Members should speak first, the official Members next, and the ex-officio Members last. The observations of the Official and especially of the Ex-Officio Members either remain altogether unanswered or can be answered only in the following year. This is a grave disadvantage to those who criticise the measures or policy of Government. If when any objection is made or amendment is proposed observations in reply are at once made on Government's behalf, they may, if satisfactory, put an end to further unnecessary talk; and, if otherwise, may be rebutted at once by those who differ. The value of discussion will thus be enhanced and the waste of time will be greatly reduced.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL.

132. The ommision of some provision for the entrance of Indian gentlemen into the Executive Councils of the Provincial and Imperial Governments invites consideration. No reason whatever is advanced to show that such a provision is inadvisable or impracticable. This Council respectfully submit that the time has come when such a reasonable demand should be acceded to. Already two Indian Members have been appointed as colleagues of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council. That step has been taken, as Mr. Morley himself declared recently, with the view to show not by words alone but by act that the Indian is perfectly worthy of being given a share in the Councils of the Paramount Power, and thus to do something to soothe the discontent due to racial domination. This Council earnestly trust that the same generous and wise measure may at no distant date be adopted both by the Imperial and Local Governments by the admission of one or two Indian Members into the Executive Council of His Excellency the Viceroy; and by the addition of two Indian Members to the Executive Councils of the Local Governments. In this way only can the object which Government themselvs have at heart, viz. of enabling all classes to take a more effective part in shaping the action of Government, and a larger share in the work of administration, can be effectively and substantially carried out.

133. In conclusion, the Council of this Association are aware that they owe an apology to Government for the great length of this submission. But the importance of the occasion and the number of subjects discussed in Sir Harold Stuart's letter have made it necessary. They have earnestly desired to omit no criticism, and withhold no comment or suggestion, which may help Government in their great and difficult task of giving the people gradually, but with courage and trustfulness, those rights and privileges which have been withheld too long, but which may well satisfy even now the aspirations of all reasonable and well intentioned subjects of His Majesty in India.

The Bombay Municipal Corporation.

No. 7564.

Municipal Corporation Office,
Bombay, 28th February 1908.

From—JAMES MACDONALD, Esq., Chairman of a meeting of the Municipal Corporation of Bombay held on the 27th February 1908,

To—The Secretary to the Government, General Department.

Sir,

With reference to the correspondence ending with your letter No. 933 dated the 18th February 1908, regarding the proposed enlargement of Legislative Councils and connected questions, I have the honour by the desire of Municipal Corporation of Bombay to submit for the consideration of Government the following representation on the subject.

2. At the outset I am desired to state that the Corporation cordially approve of the desire of the Governor General in Council that the Legislative Councils in India should now be enlarged to the fullest extent possible and that these bodies should be so constituted in respect of non-official members as "to give the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters," "to take a more effective part in shaping the action of Government" and thus to lead "to a larger share in the actual work of administration and more extensive employment in the higher offices of the State."

3. Coming to the specific proposals made in the Resolution of the Government of India, I am to state that the Corporation have thought it desirable to confine their rpresentation to the requirements of the City of Bombay only and they beg to submit for the consideration of Government the following suggestions :—

(1) That in view of the proposed enlargement of the local Legislative Council the Corporation's representation should be proportionately increased.

(2) That the representation of the University on the Council should remain the same as at present.

(3) That the Trades Association be given a voice in the election to the Council and be associated for this purpose in some manner with the Chamber of Commerce in electing their representative to the Council.

(4) That the Indian Mercantile Community, including the Mill industry, be given the right of returning two members to the Council, one of these being elected by the Mill-owners' Association and the other by the Indian Mercantile Community through the medium of properly organised Associations, care being taken by the imposition of a minimum subscription or entrance fee or otherwise to secure their representative character.

(5) That adequate representation by election should be conceded to important minorities such as the Mahomedan and the Parsi Communities.

(6) That when representation is given according to community, profession or residence, the representative elected shall be of that community, profession or residence.

4. I am further desired to point out in the scheme put forward by the Government of India for the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council no provision has been made to give representation by election to the native mercantile community of the City of Bombay. The Corporation consider it desirable to invite the attention of Government to this omission and to express their desire that provision should be made to give to this important interest adequate representation by election on that Body.

5. In conclusion, I am to express the regret of the Corporation for the delay that has taken place in submitting their views on the subject.

I have, etc.,

(Signed) JAMES MACDONALD,
Chairman.

From—The Honourable Mr. Ibrahim Rahimtoola, C.I.E.

To—The Secretary to the Government, General Department.

SIR,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 6534 of 31st October 1907, enclosing a copy of Government Resolution No. 6534, regarding the enlargement of Legislative Councils and connected questions. In submitting the following views on some of the points involved in the propsals, I have to express my regret at my inability to forward them earlier.

I very heartily welcome the desire of the Governor-General in Council, in formulating the proposals for the enlargement of the Legislative Covncils, to give due and ample representation to the different classes and interests of the community. I concur in the view that, under the system of administration prevailing at present in India, it is essential that Government should always be able to reckon on a numerical majority in the Legislative Councils. I do so specially for the reason that the function of these Councils is not merely to make laws, but also to amend and repeal existing statutes. It would create a very undesirable state of affairs if the ruling authority was obliged, for want of numerical majority in the Council, to veto measures comming with the sanction of the vote of a majority of the Legislative Councils. While readily conceding, for reasons mentioned the dseirability of retaining a clear Government majority, I strongly feel that some provision should be made to prevent the official majority from acting arbitrarily. A clear Government majority means the power of carrying any Legislative measure in spite of, and in the face of, a strong adverse public opinion. I think it is essential that some safeguard should be provided to prevent such an arbitrary exercise of the power of the mojority, and I respectfully submit that, in amending the Council's Act, a special section should be introduced, by which a measure before these Councils must become postponed for a period of six months in the event of a large majority of the elected members voting against it. The present procedure in the matter of Legislative measures for the various Provinces requires that they have to be previously submitted for sanction to the Government of India and the Secretary of State. These two authorities, after making such enqniries as they deem necessary, authorise the introduction of the measure in the Provincial Councils. At the time when such sanction is accorded, the non-official view is generally not before them. The public come to know of the measure when it is published in the Government Gazette after the requisite sanction of the higher authorities has been previously obtained. If it appears to them objectionable their objections find expression in the Vernrcular Press and in the representations of public bodies. Any criticism or representations at that stage lose most of their value. The main principles of the proposed Legislation become fixed between the Local and the Imperial Governments before publication, and they are almost always strictly adhered to. The only opportunity which the non-official element get for discussion and amendment is in the Select Committee, but on that body also Government provide a clear official majority. In these deliberations slight changes on matters of detail are alone possible; the principles having been previously settled remain unaltered. The clear Government majorities can thus prove efficient weapons for the exercise of arbitrary authority.

The suggestion I have ventured to submit while securing to Government a clear majority will, to a great extent, safeguard the interests of the public. I would give to a certain large majority of the elected members the right to ensure postponement for a period of, say, six months. The new section should provide that when any measure is submitted for consideration before a Legislative Council, and when it is found on the matter being put to the vote that three-fourths of the number of elected Councillors vote against it, it must be considered as postponed, and must not be brought forward for reconsideration within a period of, say, six months. The proportion of elected members to whom I desire the power to be conceded has been fixed so high in order to prevent wilful obstruction, and if Government so wish I would not object to raise it even to four-fifths. I would also provide that in any case of this kind where the required proportion of elected members have recorded their votes against a measure, and the matter, is considered of a most urgent character, H. E. the Viceroy should have the power to overrule the wishes of the elected members, and by special sanction authorise the re-introduction of the measure within the period of postponement fixed by the new section.

My suggestion, while securing to the representatives of the people the right to prevent the Provincial Government from an arbitary exercise of the power which a clear majority provides, ensures against wilful obstruction on the part of non-official members, and has the further advantage of leaving the hands of Government reasonably free in urgent matters.

The reasons which have induced me to recommend a postponement for a reasonable period in preference to the rejection of the measures are perfectly obvious. I wish to ensure that the sanction to be given to Provincial Legislation by the Governor General in Council and the Secretary of State should become real and not nominal. At present such sanction is obtained on the exparte representation of provincial Governments. The public do not get any chance of being heard till after the sanction is accorded. In all cases in which there is no feeling in the matter amongst the public the present procedure may be allowed. But in cases in which there happens to be a pronounced adverse opinion the higher authorities should obtain an opportunity of reconsidering their sanction. This will be secured under the suggestion I have made. The speeches delivered in the Legislative Councils are reported in full in the proceedings, and after the vote is taken and a measure becomes postponed, all the arguments urged against it by the non-official members would be published in the proceedings, and the sanctioning authorities would thereby be put in possession of the complete case both official and non-official. The Governor-General in Council and the Secretary of State will thereby be enabled to give a considered opinion, and this may well be accepted as final.

There is an additional advantage in giving effect to the suggestion I have made. If one thing has clearly come out of the wide-spread criticism to which the reform proposals have been subjectd, it is that the public do not secure any additional powers under the scheme. It is quite true that an opportunity will be afforded to a larger number of people to give expression to their views before the ruling authorities, but the power to force upon the people unpopular and distasteful legislation will remain unimpaired. The extent of the reforms thus allowed, while enabling more interests to voice their views, falls far short of the legitimate aspirations of the people. I would, therefore, strongly urge upon Government the desirability of conceding at least the very limited power to the people which I have suggested. It will enable them to be effectively heard in matters in which there may happen to be a pronounced difference of opinion amongst the official and non-offiicial members of the Legislative Councils.

It is gratifying to find that Government have recognised the right of the Muhamadan minority to representation by election on the Legislative Councils. I am in entire agreement with the views expressed in the letter under acknowledgment, justifying the proposal of the Government of India to concede this right. While recognising the spirit in which the right is conceded I regret to observe that only two elective seats are allotted to this important commuuity on the Imperial Legislative Council. The future constitution of the enlarged Legislative Councils, foreshadowed in the letter of the Government of India, provides 25 non-official seats by election and nomination. Out of these, 2 by election and 2 by nomination are allotted to the Muhamadan community. I venture to submit that both on the consideration of their numerical strength and their historical and political importance, to which the Government of India have very rightly given due weight, the Muhamadan community is entitled to largar representation. A reference has been made on the subject in Mr. Secretary Stewart's letter, and it is pointed out that the Muhamadan community may secure one or two seats by election in Provinces in which they are numerically in a majority. The election of a Muhamadan will largely depend not upon the numerical strength of the community so far as the population is concerned, but upon the numerical communal strength upon the constituencies brought into existence. I am not in a position to express any opinion as to whether, in the Provincess referred to, the Muhamadans will be in a majority in the electorates created under the scheme. But apart from this aspect of the question I am strongly of opinion that more than four seats on the Imperial Council should be alloted to the Muhamadan community. With this view I would submit for the consideration of Government the desirability of throwing, open to election all the four seats which have been reserved for the Muhamadans in the scheme. The two nomination seats set aside for the Musalmáns should be converted into elective seats. If the expectation of Government in the matter of ordinary elections in the two Provinces is realized, the community will secure adequate representation on the Imperial Council which their numbers and their political and historical importance entitle them to. If such expectation is not fulfilled, then one or two nomination seats out of those still remaining in the discretion of H. E. the Viceroy should be filled by the appointment of Muhammadans.

In submitting this suggestion I wish it to be clearly understood that I am most strongly in favour of obtaining for the Muhamadan community their full representation by election. The Musalmáns have had in the past representation by nomination on the Legislative Councils, the Municipal and Local Boards, and it is this form of representation against which the community has complained. In future we desire representation by election as far as possible in decided preference to nomination. I do not wish to enter into any arguments in justification of this course. The reasons for such preferene are so obvious that it is quite unnecessary to lengthen this communication by detailing them. I am not convinced by the plea advanced by Government that better class of candidates will be detered from offering themselves for election against men of inferior social statues. I am strongly of opinion that those men who do not possess the courage to face a constituency of their own co-religionists residing in their own districts have no right to be considered as representative men. I would go a step further and say that Government have no right to interfere in the free choice of the community as to the person they desire to be represented by. He may belong to a lower rung of the social ladder, but if he proves at the polling booth that he enjoys the confidence of the people he should be allowed to be the exponent of their views. It cannot reasonably be argued that under such circumstances Government should step in and select their representative who should be some one other than the person whom the Muhamadans would elect. If the apprehensions entertained by Government come to be realized, and members of the educated middle classes are elected under the scheme, it will serve as a most useful lesson to the upper class Muhamadans, and will have the effect of bestirring them into throwing off their lethargy in matters educational and induce them by educational and other efforte to try and occupy the position their wealth and status may rightly warrant. If represer tation is to be conceded to the Muhamadans, let it be quite real. Let them select the men in whom they have confidence and through whom they desire to be heard, irrespective of considerations which appear to me foreign to the point.

I have seen it urged that if Government decide to concede representation by election to important minorities, such as the Muhammadans, it should be laid down that such elections shall be made by the other constituencies brought into existence. In other words, it is suggested that the representatives of the Muhamadans should be selected not by them but by an electorate in which the sister-communities will largely predomidate. If the Muhamadan community is to secure a spokesman to voice their views in the Councils of the State let him be selected by themselves and not by others. It is manifestly absurd to say, for instance, that representation by election should be conceded to the Pársis but that a member of that community should be selected not by themselves but by the Muhamadans. Such a procedure would cut at the very root of direct representation, and I trust Governmedt will pay no heed to it.

I notice that under the scheme formulated by Government, representation by election has been provided for the Calcutta and the Bombay Chambers of Commerce. These bodies are very largely European and represent the important mercantile interests of the European community in the two principal cities in the country. Subject to the remarks I propose to make later on the question of the constituencies to be created for electing representatives to the Bombay Legislative Council, I readily recognise the desirability of providing adequate representation to the European mercantile community of India. The only suggestion I should like to offer is that it would be preferable to treat these seats on the same principle as the elective seats provided for the Muhamadan community. This course will ensure the privilege being enjoyed at different times by all the important European trade centres in India.

I wish to invite the attention of Government to the omission that is noticeable in the scheme in the matter of representation by election of the vast Indian mercantile interest in the country. No provision has been made to secure to indian trade, commerce and industries any direct representation at all. The claims of this important interest are so strong and so obvious that I do not propose to dilate upon them. I trust, now that the matter has been brought to their notice, the omission will be rectified.

Dealing with the Imperial Advisory Councils, I am in entire agreement with the views generally expressed that they will serve no useful purpose if the members are drawn largely from the ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates. No one can question the right of Government to consult such people only as they chose. They can easily do this without the creation of any special Councils for the purpose. If, however, the object of government is to elicit the real views of the people as a help towards better government and if they propose to give statutory status to these Councils, I venture to submit that that object can alone be attained by recruiting largely from the educated classes. The principle of nomination that is proposed to be applied to these Councils will frustrate the object in view. In dealing with the Legislative Councils I have readily recognized the necessity of having a clear Government majority. This provision ensures the power of action in a manner that Government may deem best. Such being the case I fail to see why, in the constitution of Councils purely advisory, wider opportunities are not proposed to be offered to the popular element. The final determining voice in all matters being in the hands of the Government of India they ought to invite the free expression of views held by the different classes and communities through their accredited representatives. I would strongly advocate the policy of inviting opinions from quarters which can most intelligently and competently submit them. It is best to know fully all that can be said against the views entertained by Government in order to enable them to judge carefully the pros and cons of every question. It is only in this way that a considered opinion can be formed. Measures emanating from Government after they have been revised in the light of the criticism to which they may have been previously subjected will stand a much better chance of acceptance than those formulated under the existing system. Such criticism though made confidentially, if so desired, will serve a really useful purpose and will undoutedly conduce to better government.

If Advisory Councils are proposed to be brought into existence for this object, and if they are constituted in such a manner as to secure it, then I would welcome the measure as a step in the right direction. On all occasions when I have had an opportunity of doing so I have impressed upon the high officials on this side of India the extreme desirability of consulting popular representatives before any measures are decided upon and published. It usually takes a long time before all the officers concerned are consulted and each measure assumes adefinite shape. Instead of publishing it forthwith I have strongly advocated the desirabilily of taking into their confidence the representatives of the people. If it is once recognized that the people who have distinguished themselves in public life are actuated by as keen a desire as Government to promote the welfare and well-being of the people, that the interest of both are in no way antagonistic but common, that both desire the greatest good of the people, much of the feeling of estrangement, which does unfortunately prevail, would be swept away and the official and the non-official element would be able to work harmoniously together towards a common end. The gain to the country under such a system would be immense. In one of his speeches the Hon'ble Mr. Muir Mackenzie, the then Acting Governor of Bombay, expressed himself emphatically in favour of what he called the round-table conferences. It is this form of exchange of views which I have always advocated. Let the papers be first submitted confidentially for perusal to representative Indians and then let the officer in charge call them together and personally discuss the matter with them. I am fully confident that if this was done much of the prevailing dissatisfaction will be largely dissipated and greater confidence and good feeling will take its place.

As far as I can see, the suggestion I have ventured to submit is not open to any objection. The ultimate power of taking action will remain absolutely with Government, and they can, if so inclined, refuse to be guided by the opinions which will be elicited under the new system. The difference will be that while at present action is proposed to be taken in ignorance of the views and sentiments of the people, in future Government will be fully aware of these and will have had an opportunity of considering all the points that can be urged on the other side. Believing as I do that Government and the representatives of the people are both actuated by the earnest desire to secure the greatest good of the people I have not the least doubt that the result of consultations and round-table conferences will be eminently satisfactory and will lead to smooth and better government. Let Advisory Councils be constituted on some system of this kind, and I feel certain they will be heartily welcomed and will do a great amount of good.

I will now deal with the enlargement of the Bombay Legislative Council. It would have greatly facilitated an expression of opinion if the public had before them the outlines of the scheme which is proposed to be introduced here. The Government of India, in notifying the reform proposals, have published the basis on which the Imperial Legislative Council is proposed to be enlarged. If the same procedure had been followed in the case of the Local Council, I would have been in a better position to discuss the matter. I have seen some suggestions made on the subject, but before dealing with them I wish to express the earnest hope that adequate representation will be provided in the scheme for the important Muhamadan minority both in the City of Bombay and in the Mofussil. The right of the Muhamadan minority to representation by election has been recognized by the Government of India, and I feel confident that in the scheme for the enlargement of the Bombay Legislative Council adequate provision will be made for such representation. I do not therefore propose to deal further with the subject.

In determining the constituencies for the Local Legislative Council I hope care will be taken to ensure the realization of the object underlying the reform proposals. The Government of India state that their object is "to give the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters," "to take a more effective part in shaping the action of Government," and thus to lead "to a larger share in the actual work of administration and more extensive employment in the higher offices of the State." It is clearly the intention of the authorities to invite free expression of non-official opinion with a view to better government and to educate the people to take greater interest in the work of administration and to qualify them for greater political privileges in the future. In order that these objects may be fulfilled it is essential that the right of election to the Legislative Councils should be enjoyed by as large a number of people as is reasonably possible. To enlarge the number of elective seats on the Council and to restrict the number of voters in each electorate will, in my opinion, frustrate the very object with which the reform proposals have been formulated.

In the representation which the Bombay Municipal Corporation has submitted for the consideration of Government they recommend that the City should secure a minimum of seven and a maximum of nine elective seats. Much will, of course, depend upon the extent to which the Local Council is proposed to be enlarged, but I may be permitted to say that, in fixing the number of elective seats to be provided for the Muhamadan community, care should be taken that adequate representation, commensurate not only with their numerical strength but with their importance in other respects, will be ensured.

I venture to trust that nothing short of two elective seats will be provided for the Muhamadans of the City in the scheme which the Local Government will have to frame for the future constitution of the Provincial Council.

Reverting to the question of the constituencies to be created for electing Councillors, I notice that, if effect is given to the recommendation of the Corporation, the total number of voters for the seven or nine seats which may be alloted to the City's representation will not exceed 1,500. It appears to me that out of a total population of a million souls, to fix upon only 1,500 men to enjoy the right of voting will hardly be in consonance with the primary object of the scheme. To give effect to it a much larger number of people should be invited to exercise the privilege. This can easily be done if the basis of income-tax and educational attainments is substituted for bodies or associations in the formation of electorates. To my mind the constituencies should be—

(1) the European merchants and traders paying a certain amount of income-tax;

(2) the Indian merchants and traders selected on the same basis;

(3) persons substantially interested in the industries of the Presidency;

(4) Fellows of the University and Graduates of ten years' standing;

(5) communal representation on the basis of income-tax and educational qualifications.

Besides the manifest advantage of securing larger constituencies for the elections, my suggestion has many other points in its favour. It confers the right to people who become entitled to it not because they belong to any association but on the ground that they have a substantial stake in the interest concerned. Dealing with trade and commerce, I think the best test for this purpose is the payment of income-tax. A man may have no real interest in trade or commerce and may still belong to one of these associations and thereby exercise an important influence in the election, while another person, not belonging to it, who may be largely so interested, would have no voice in the selection of a representative. I can see no reason why a person, fully qualified in every sense of the word to have a voice in the election of a representative for a special interest, should be forced to become a member of an association, to get a vote to which he is otherwise clearly entitled. Why should Government force him to pay the entrance fee and annual subscription to an association in order to secure the privilege of voting when the extent of his interest in that particular representation can be otherwise clearly proved? I do not think there is the smallest justification for Government, by giving the right of election to associations, to compel people to become members thereof.

This system is open to another and a more serious objection. Each association has its rules and regulations for the admission of members. New members are admitted either by the vote of the whole body or that of the Managing Committee. Each association very rightly retains in its own hands the absolute power of admission into its numbers. But it is obvious that such power is open to grave abuse. The total number of members can easily be largely increased or unduly narrowed down. I cannot see why, in order to secure the right of voting, a fully qualified person should be at the mercy of a small body of individuals, themselves keenly interested in the elections. He can be effectively shut out of his right by being refused to be enrolled as a member. Under this system cliquism can have full sway and legitimate aspirations can be suppressed.

Any system which is open to the objections I have briefly referred ought not to receive the sanction of Government. Let the privilege be conceded to people not because they belong to any body or association but on the ground that they are clearly entitled to it, on some independent test which may be generally applicable.

In my opinion the best test for the representation of trades and commerce is the payment of a certain amount of income-tax, while for industries the right of voting should be given to owners of industrial concerns and large shareholders. For communal elections I would recommend the basis of income-tax and educational qualifications.

For the representation of the University I would associate Graduates of ten years' standing with the Fellows of the University.

My object in doing so is not only to enlarge the numerical strength of the constituency but also to introduce a substantial proportion of non-official element into the electorate, and to give the educated classes a voice in the election. Under the scheme Government have provided a clear official majority, and they will secure it outside the seats thrown open to election. It is, therefore, necessary that in all constituencies the non-official independent element should predominate. The present number of Fellows who have the right of voting is about 250, but under the operation of the Universities Act this number will be gradually reduced to 100. A very large proportion of these will be chosen by Government for a definite term of office. It is to my mind necessary that a large non-official element should be associated with them for the choice of a representative.

In order that there may be no misapprehension on the point I wish to state that my remarks do not apply to the Bombay Corporation, as that is a body constituted by an Act of the Legislature and consits largely of elected councillors.

In conclusion, I may be permitted to tender to Government our grateful thanks for the recognition of the right of the Muhamadan community to direct representation by election on the Legislative Councils, and to express the hope that, in formulating the final scheme, care will be taken to provide adequate representation for them commensurate not only with their numbers but also with their historical and political importance.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
IBRAHIM RAHIMTOOLA.

Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal,

TO THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA,

HOME DEPARTMENT.

Dated Caclutta, the 29th February 1908.

APPOINTMENT.

SIR,

IN Sir Harold Stuart's letter No. 2312, dated 24th August last, the Government of India set forth "provisional and tentative proposals" to give the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters. The Government of India requested that, after consultation with important bodies and individuals, representative of the various classes of the community, this Government should submit its matured conclusions to the Government of India on each branch of the subject. The replies of the public bodies and individuals consulted have now been received. A list of them is appended, they are forwarded with this letter.

The present situation.

2. In paragraphs 2 and 3 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter the Government of India pointed out the great advance that has taken place in the development of the educated classes sinces' Lord Dufferin's Government passed the Councils Act of 1892. Education has penetrated to circles which were then hardly affected by its influence. The Ruling Chiefs and the landholding and commercial classes are now become qualified to take a more prominent part in public life and to render a larger measure of assistance to the executive Government. They are anxious to be afforded an opportunity of expressing their views on matters of practical administration. It is now essential to make adequate provision for representing the landed aristocracy of India, the mercantile and industrial classes, and the great body of moderate men who under existing conditions have no sufficient inducement to enter public life and find little scope for the exercise of their legitimate influence. In all this the Lieutenant-Governor heartily agrees with the Government of India. He concurs also in the conclusion that, subject to this essentail condition that the executive authority of the Government is maintained in undiminished strength, the time has come for a considerable advance in the direction of bringing all classes of the people into closer relations with the Government and its officers, of increasing their opportunities of making known their feelings and wishes, and of giving them a larger share in the actual work of administration. The difficulty encountered in making Government measures and motives generally intelligible, and in correcting erroneous and often mischievous statements of fact or purpose on the part of the Government, is also fully recognised. This difficulty demands that means for confidential and intimate consultation between Government and its subjects should be devised. The Government of India have therefore proposed Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils.

Are Advisory Councils necessary?

3. The first question that arises is whether the creation of Advisory Councils as a means for this free and close consultation is necessary or desirable, or whether the object in view might not be secured by extending and enlarging the functions of the Legislative Councils. Primâ facie it would appear that, if satisfactory measures could be adopted for providing that a Legislative Council should be fairly representative of all sections of the community, there would be obvious advantages in consulting its members rather than in creating an entirely new body. Under the present law the Legislative Council can meet only when there is legal business to be transacted. It cannot meet even for the purposes of allowing interpellations. This has been found to be a serious drawback to the usefulness of the Council in Bengal; and the Lieutenant-Governor has been compelled occasionally to call the Council together for purely formal business so as to enable the members to exercise the right of interpellation which they greatly value. There seems no reason why the law should not be amended in this respect, so as to secure more regular and frequent meetings of the Council. In this province the Lieutenant-Governor has made considerable use of the non-official members of his Council in the way of ascertaining non-official opinion on important questions; and if the Council were enlarged as is now proposed, the field of selection would be considerably extended. The great advantage of consulting members of the Legislative Council is, that the gentlemen consulted feel, or ought to feel, that they have a clearly defined share in, and serious responsibility for the administration.

4. On the other hand, there is this objection to making use of the Legislative Council as an advisory body, that it is to a great extent elected, whereas it may reasonably be urged that the head of the Government should be allowed entire freedom in selecting his own advisers, just as in England the King selects the members of His Majesty's Privy Council. Another objection is that there are certain interests or classes which cannot be represented on the Legislative Council, and which at the same time it is desirable to have represented on an Advisory Council. Instances will readily suggest themselves. The principal argument, however, in favour of the creation of a new body to be known as an Advisory Council is, that the Head of the Government should be able to choose his own advisers, and many of those whom he might desire to choose might not be found on the Legislative Council at all. The Lieutenant-Governor considers the proposal to have Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils an excellent one. The idea is not entirely new; for there have been many Heads of Local Governments, and also officers holding charges under Local Governments, who have habitually consulted certain Indian (and some times also European) gentlemen in regard to questions of importance. These gentlemen have ordinarily been consulted individually, but sometimes also collectively. They have been selected on account of the opinion of their position and intelligence and uprightness held by the officer who desired their advice. Where they have been treated in a frank and confidential manner, experience has shown that this is a valuable way not only of obtaining information and ascertaining the views and feelings of the people, but also of removing misconception regarding the intentions of Government. It is therefore desirable that such a system should be more formally adopted, and more generally and permanently organised.

5. The objects with which some District Officers, Commissioners of Divisions and Heads of Government have hitherto consulted, fully and frankly gentlemen of position and capable of giving advice have been twofold, namely:—

(1) to discuss a particular question fully with these gentlemen, so as to ascertain how it might present itself to the public mind, and what difficulties there might be from the point of view of the public in adopting the course which seemed primâ facie reasonable, and to obtain suggestions and advice regarding any measure under discussion, and

(2) to explain clearly to those consulted the object of a particular measure, so that they might intelligently follow the course of policy adopted, and be able to understand themselves, and explain to others, its real object.

In other words, the objects which the Government of India now have before them are precisely the same objects which have influenced certain officers to adopt for themselves something like the system which it is now proposed to organize. Each officer has chosen his own advisers. Sometimes the Head of a Government has left for his successor a list of gentlemen likely to be able to give good advice or to render assistance in ascertaining and enlightening public opinion; and these gentlemen have remained the advisers of the new Head of the Government until he has been able to select advisers for himself. Similarly the Lieutenant-Governor urged on Commissioners and District Officers, that the Darbar lists should be utilized by them for making notes as to the capacity and worth of gentlemen whose names are on the list, so that a record may be left to be utilized by any succeeding officer, until he should become himself sufficiently acquainted with the people to select his own advisers. The principle underlying the proposals of the Government of India is therefore one which the Lieutenant-Governor's experience has led him to recognize as valuable, and which he thinks should be accepted.

The Government of India's proposals for the Imperial Advisory Council.

6. Turning now to the proposals of the Government of India, the Lieutenant-Governor observes that it is proposed "that the Imperial Advisory Council should consist of about 60 members for the whole of India, including about 20 Ruling Chiefs and a suitable number of territorial nagnates of every province where landholders of sufficient dignity and status are to be found." It is not quite clear whether this is meant to be an exhaustive definition of the constitution of the Council. It has indeed been said, in paragraph 4 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, that it would be a great advantage to associate the great Ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates of British India with the Governor-General in the guardianship of common and imperial interests; and it is proposed to achieve this object by the establishment and recognition of a determinate body of advisers, who would be consulted individually by the Governor-General, and would occasionally be called together, either in whole or in part, for the purpose of collective deliberation. But the reference made in a previous part of the letter to the educated classes, and the recognition given to the stake in the country possessed by both "the landholding and commercial classes," lead the Lieutenant-Governor to think that the definition above quoted is not exhaustive. At the same time there is no reference in the definition to certain classes which in His Honour's opinion ought clearly to be represented; and the distinct inclusion of these classes in the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Councils indicates that their omission from the Imperial Advisory Council is intended.

7. Among these the first that suggests itself is the educated class. Sir Harold Stuart's letter begins with a clear statement of the advance which education has made of recent years; and it does not appear logical to omit the direct representation of education from the Imperal Advisory Council. This may partly explain the coolness with which the scheme has been received in the Indian press. No doubt education will be represented on the Council, even if constituted on a rigid interpretation of the definition above quoted, in the person of some of the Chiefs and territorial magnates who will be members; but that would give no representation of the educated classes as such. Later on in Sir Harold Stuart's letter it is said that "the Government of India are far from denying that the professional classes are entitled to a share of representation, proportioned not merely to their numbers, which are small, but to their influence, which is large and tends continually to increase." This passage indicates the objection to the proposed constitution of the Imperial Advisory Council which is now being started. Education should be directly represented. It would be perfectly easy for His Excellency the Viceroy to select, in any province in India, one or more representatives of the educated and professional classes, whom it would be a great advantage to have on the Imperial Advisory Council, and association with whom would be only honourable to the Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates. It will be found that most of the gentlemen consulted are strongly in favour of some such representation of the educated classess. Without this the scheme will not be a popular scheme. It will not satisfy the growing aspiration of the educated among all classes. It will not gain their confidence. On this account it will less effectively bridge the gulf which tends to separate the rulers and ruled in India. It is a step forward to enlist the support of those who have a real stake in the country; but it would be retrogade to alienate the educated class which we have ourselves created.

8. The Lieutenant-Governor is also much in sympathy with those who think that in the Imperial Council there should be some representation of commerce and industry. When the Advisory Council is convened as a body it would be decidedly disadvantageous to have the great interests of commerce and industry unrepresented. On account of the practical advantage to be derived from the presence of members representing these great interests, their representation is distinctly desirable. It is also desirable on grounds of policy, as emphasising the necessity in India at the present time for commercial and industrial advancement, and the importance of commercial and industrial interests. As already stated, the Government of India have distinctly associated in Sir Harold Stuart's letter "the landholding and commercial classes" as "possessing a material stake in the country and representing the most powerful and stable elements of Indian Society." It is perhaps unnecessary to make any suggestion as to the precise constitution of the Council. To have about one half composed of the great landlords, and the other half divided equally between the Ruling Chiefs and the representatives of Commerce, Industry and the Learned Professions would not be unreasonable.

9. The next point calling for consideration, is the method of consulting these bodies. The proposal is, to have a determinate body of advisers who would be consulted individually by the Governor-General or the head of the Local Government, and would occasionally be called together, either in whole or in part for the purpose of collective deliberation. This proposal has not been thoroughly understood by all the gentlemen consulted by this Government. The proposal is, that the members should be consulted (a) individually, (b) as many together as the subject may seem to require, or (c) all together in certain cases. This seems a perfectly sound proposal; and when it is thus carefully stated, the mere statement disposes of the unfavourable criticism which some have made. Experience shows the great value of personal consultation and discussion with Indian gentlemen. Such personal discussion leads to frank and confidential expression of opinion which cannot always, at present at least, be obtained when others are present. At the same time, the advantages of conferences are fully established by experience. A circular letter or separate personal conferences with individuals may secure the franker expression of individual opinions; but it prevents the consideration of other opinions; it shuts out from consideration many points of view which might otherwise be suggested; it leaves every one more ignorant of the advice given by his fellows, of the decision of Government, and of the grounds for that decision, that he otherwise would have been. The exchange of views and opinions at a meeting is thus found of the greatest importance.

10. In regard to the Imperial Advisory Councils, there remains the question as to whether the proceedings and results of the collective consultation should not be recorded. It appears to the Lieutenant-Governor that, when the members of the Advisory Council are called together, either in one section or as a whole, a record should be kept of the consultation, so that His Excellency the Viceroy may have before him, at any time, a record of the opinions of his Advisory Councillors, as they were actually expressed at the time. This need not in any way interfere with the private informal and confidential character of the consultation. It has been pointed out indeed by some that, if the opinions are wholly confidential, then no one is aware of the support which the Government may have received from these confidential advisers, the mouths of the Councillors are shut, they cannot explain the objects of Government, and people will be unable to judge of the manner in which the Councillors are exercising their influence. In regard to the last point there may be considerable danger. It is intended that the Councillors should frankly advise the Viceroy; not that they should play a part before the public. But the objections to keeping the discussions confidential are strong. What is proposed in paragraph 5 (7) of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, namely, that, after confidencial discussion, it may be advisable to provide for some public conferences, seems to meet the difficulty. In other words, after there has been confidential discussion, the Councillors may go on, either on the same day or on a future date, to a discussion, the proceedings of which will be made known to the public. This seems a sound proposal. At the same time it is clearly important to preserve the confidential character of the communications between His Excellency the Viceroy and his Councillors until it has been decided by him in consultation with them, that their views may be given to the public. It seems also necessary to provide that the wish of any Councillor to have his views recorded as confidential, and not given to the public, should be respected.

11. Another point which deserves special attention is the sixth clause of the scheme, as laid down in paragraph 5 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, where it is said, that "the functions of the Imperial Advisory Council should be purely advisory; and it will deal only with such matters as may be specifically refered to it from time to time." This takes from the Council all power of initiation, which has been interpreted by gentlemen consulted to mean that individual Councillors, or the Councillors assembled together, may not make any suggestion in regard to any matter which has not been distinctly referred to them by the Viceroy. The Lieutenant-Governor does not believe that this can be the intention. There may be difficulties in the way of allowing the Councillors assembled together, either in part or in whole, by His Excellency's mandate, to discuss any question which has not been referred to them, though His Honour does not clearly see such difficulties. The Councillors ought certainly not to be assembled for any purpose except by the order of the Viceroy. But they should apparently be left free to make any suggestions which they may see fit to make, when they actually assemble by His Excellency's order, provided that the Viceroy should have the power to veto discussion. There may be difficulties in this which His Honour does not see. There is, however, one matter in respect of which he has no doubt, namely, that Advisory Councillors should be allowed individually, either by letter to the Viceroy or in an interview with His Excellency, to make any representations that they may choose to make, in regard to any question which interests them, whether they are consulted about it or not. Gentlemen of their position have that privilege now; and it cannot have been intended to deprive them of it.

Provincial Advisory Council.

12. One point which may be mentioned as having attracted attention in regard to the Provincial Advisory Council is that it is distinctly stated, that when the members of the Council are consulted individually, they are to be consulted by letter, and are to submit their views in writing. The object of this is not apparent. It is often far more valuable for the Head of a Government to send for a gentleman and talk the question over with him than to write a letter asking for his opinion. Even exceptionally intelligent gentlemen are apt to misapprehend or misunderstand, in some degree, the object of a reference; and a quiet friendly personal discussion often prevents considerable difficulty. It may be that the object of the provision to which reference is now made, is that the opinion of the gentlemen consulted should be properly recorded, especially if it is going to be used afterwards in any reference to the Government of India or otherwise. But this can easily be achieved without excluding personal consultation and discussion, which are ordinarily of far greater value than consultation by letter. The Lieutenant-Governor would recommend that it should be distinctly stated that the proceedings of the Provincial Advisory Council, like those of the Imperial Advisory Council, are to be private, informal and confidential, until it is decided by the Head of the Government, in consultation with the members of the Council, that they may be made public, and that it should be added that any Advisory Councillor should have a right to ask that his opinion be kept confidential.

13. Subject to the above remarks the Lieutenant-Governor would approve entirely of the proposals regarding these Advisory Councils. It is not necessary to emphasise the necessity for the greatest care (especially at the first) in selecting the members. The constitution of the Imperial Council should be modified, so as to include the commercial, industrial and professional class; and the term of office should be a substantial one (say five years), with eligibility for re-appointment. About thirty members might form the Bengal Provincial Council, representing large and small landholders, Feudatory Chiefs, the Bengal and National Chambers of Commerce, the Tea and Indigo Industries, Professions, the University, District Boards and Municipalities. If the proceedings are absolutely confidential in the first instance, with publication when that seems expedient to all, there will be great advantage from the establishment of these Councils. The precise conditions under which proceedings will be public or will remain confidential, as the case may be, ought to be distinctly laid down. Individual Advisory Councillors should be consulted in any way which may seem fit to the Viceroy or the Head of the Local Government, as the case may be; and the opinion obtained should be placed on record, if required. Where Councillors are consulted collectively, a record should ordinarily be preserved. In no case should any opinion be made public without the consent of the Councillor or Councillors concerned. Under these conditions the Lieutenant-Governor believes that the scheme would have great success.

Enlargement of Legislative Councils.

14. In paragraphs 8 to 10 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter the Government of India discuss the necessity for the enlargement of Legislative Councils. It is pointed out that, when the Councils were enlarged and the elective principle introduced under the Indian Councils Act of 1892, an endeavour was made to constitute the electorates so that the more important classes and interests should, as far as possible, be represented, but in the case of Provincial Councils, it is admitted that the results have not justified the expectations formed. It is stated that out of 54 members elected by District Boards to the Provincial Councils only 10 have been landholders, while 36 have been Barristers and Pleaders; and similarly out of 43 members elected by the District Municipalities 40 have been Barristers and Pleaders, and only two landholders. This state of things is decidedly unsatisfactory, especially in regard to the District Boards; but the facts are not quite so bad as the figures represent. Although an unduly large proportion of lawyers have got into the Council in the past, it cannot be said that they do not at all represent the landed interest. Many of them are themselves fairly large landholders. Some of them are in close touch with the landed class; and in certain cases they owe their election into Council largely to the votes of members of these classes. At the same time, it is undoubtedly true that the object aimed at, namely, the representation of all the more important classes and interests, has not been achieved; and even nomination has failed adequately to supply the defect. Anything approaching adequate representation of the different classes cannot be secured without a very considerable enlargement of the Councils. As, however, this view is universally accepted, it is unnecessary to say anything more about it.

Proposed constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council.

15. In respect of the proposed constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council, as sketched in paragraph 12 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, there are not many remarks to make. Nothing need be said about classes A and B, that is the ex-officio members and the officials nominated by the Viceroy. The former are already fixed; and no one can take any objection to any of them being on the Council. The number of the latter will depend on the number of the non-official members. These, that is, the non-official members, are the only members whom it is necessary to discuss. The first of these (C) is a Ruling Chief to be nominated by the Viceroy. To this no exception can be taken; for it cannot be held that the Ruling Chiefs are altogether without concern in Imperial Legislation. I am therefore to pass on to class D, namely, the elected Members. All the proposals made in regard to this class may be accepted; but there are certain additional interests which appear to the Lieutenant-Governor to require representation. The first of these is the Universities. Sir Andrew Fraser is of opinion that there should be one member representing the Universities, as a separate and additional member under class D. Such a member would not only represent the educated classes generally, but would especially represent the important interests of the Universities. This seems to be very desirable. The question as to the best method of appointing such a member then arises. In the opinion of the Lieutenant-Governor he should be elected by all the five Universities together, and not by each University in rotation. It does not seem a matter of much difficulty, to devise a constituency composed of representatives of all the Universities who might elect this number for the Imperial Council.

16. The Chamber of Commerce, in their letter No. 27, dated 11th January last, copy of which is appended, proposed to increase by two the number of non-official Europeans, so as to represent the planting and manufacturing industries of Northern India; and the Government of India, in Mr. Fell's letter No. 212, dated 21st January last, have requested that the claims of the domiciled community to representation should be considered. Both of these claims are entitled to much consideration. But it will probably be best not to include these three new members under class D, but to include them under class E: that is to say, to raise the number of the latter class (non-officials nominated by the Viceroy to represent minorities or special interests) from four to seven. The special interests thus to be represented should then include not only racial minorities such as Eurasians, Muhammadans, Parsis and Jains when these require representation, but also large industries such as tea, jute, mines indigo, cotton and the like. The Viceroy ought to be unfettered in his decision as to the particular interests requiring to be represented from time to time, subject to the proviso that there must be not less than four Muhammadan members in the Council. But when an interest has been selected as requiring representation, the usual practice should be to ask the association (if there is one) which represents that interest to select a particular person to be nominated; or (if there is no such association) to devise some other means of ascertaining the wishes of those concerned as to the nomination.

17. It does not seem to the Lieutenant-Governor necessary to have an official majority of three in Council, excluding the Viceroy; but that is what is given in the sketch of the Council in paragraph 12 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter. It is proposed to have, excluding His Excellency, 28 officials and 25 non-officials in the Council. In fact, as the experts need not always be non-officials, the official majority may even, under the proposed constitution, be more than three. It would probably suffice if the officials and non-officials were equal in number. It is inconceivable that all the non-official members, coming as they will from so many different classes, and representing so many different interests, will ever combine against the Government; and even if they did so, they would not be in a majority, if the officials, excluding the Viceroy, were equal to them in number. The experts to be nominated under class F would either be officials, when they might be nominated under class B, or the representatives of special interests, when they might be nominated under class E. If they were only required temporarily for one particular measure, they might be nominated (in the manner indicated by the Chamber of Commerce in their letter) to advise without having a vote. The Lieutenant-Governor would therefore recommend that the four additional members above indicated be added, and that the separate class F be excluded altogether. The constitution of the Council would then be:—

Official members in classes A and B	28
Non-officials under classes C, D and E, together with the four additional non-officials now proposed . .	27

This would leave an official majority of one, excluding the Viceroy.

18. In dealing with the method of election of the members under class D, it is unnecessary to say anything about subdivisions (a and b) The present system of election of the members representing the Chamber of Commerce in Calcutta and Bombay, and of those recommended by the non-official members of the Provincial Councils, may remain unaltered. As regards subdivision (c), the principle may be accepted that the Provincial electorate should have, roughly, a strength of from 100 to 150 members. Payment of cesses indicating an annual value of a certain figure, say half a lakh, should, as far as Bengal is concerned, give the franchise. It ought to be laid down that the member elected to represent the nobles and great landowners of a Province, must himself belong to that class. There will be no difficulty in massing together for voting purposes all the qualified landholders of this Province. Most of the large landholders have houses in Calcutta; and those who have not would find no difficulty in coming here for so important an object. The Lieutenant-Governor does not propose therefore any system for alternately representing different parts of the Province.

19. As regards the election of Muhammadans [subdivision (d)], the Lieutenant-Governor would suggest that a voter should have one or other of the following qualifications:—

(1) He should have an income of Rs. 15,000, to be ascertained from the valuation in the Road-cess returns, or from the Income-tax returns, as the case may be. A qualification of Rs. 25,000 is regarded by representative Muhammadans in this Province as too high.

(2) He should be a graduate of any University of five years' standing. There is no reason for limiting this qualification to graduates of Indian Universities. A graduate of an English University has quite as strong a claim. This educational qualification has been urged by representative Muhammadans in the Province. It is, however, open to question whether it should not be omitted altogether, or whether it should not be confined either to Masters and Doctors or to Muhammadan Fellows of the University.

(3) He should be a titleholder.

There would be no difficulty in forming a constituency in this Province on these lines. The seats assigned to Muhammadans in the Imperial Council should be given in turn to the different Provinces at the discretion of His Excellency the Viceroy. The Lieutenant-Governor does not generally approve of the alternate representation of different Provinces; but he is unable to suggest any better method of obtaining the Muhammadan representatives referred to in subdivision (d).

The constitution of the Provincial Council.

20. I am now to consider the enlargement of the Provincial Legislative Council. The number of non-official members of the Council would be limited by the number of officials available. It would be quite possible to provide, say, 18 official members. It would be possible to provide a few more; but this would not be necessary, unless there were more than 18 non-official members. Sir Andrew Fraser sees no reason whatever for having more official than non-official members, excluding the Lieutenant-Governor from the list. He does not consider it at all likely that, in any case, all the non-official members would combine against the Government; and, even if they did, the Government would still retain its majority in the casting vote of the Lieutenant-Governor. The non-official members, whom the Lieutenant-Governor would propose, are the following:—

(1) One member for each of the six existing Divisions and a representative of the new Division to be created by the partition of the Patna Division	7
(2) The representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, the Trades Association, the Calcutta Corporation, and the University, as at present, and a new representative of Indian Commerce	5
(3) Representatives of the landed proprietors, who must be zamindars elected by zamindars	2
(4) Representatives of any special class requiring representation	4
Total of non-official members	18
Add—Official members	18
Total Members of Council	36

21. This would give a Council of 36 members, excluding the Lieutenant-Governor. The representatives of the Divisions would be elected for each Division alternately by the agency of the Municipalities and District Boards, so as to have not less than three members representing either District Boards, or Municipalities on the Council. The system of electing the representatives of these bodies would remain unchanged, except that it would be provided that a candidate must be a resident qualified voter, and that the word 'resident' means that the candidate has his family-home in the locality. The new representative of Indian Commerce has been demanded very earnestly by Indians in Bengal, especially in Calcutta. It has been proposed that he might be taken alternately from the National and Marwari Chambers of Commerce. The two representatives of the landed proprietors would represent the large and the small zamindars, respectively. The zamindars of each class in each district would elect their delegate; and these delegates would meet in Calcutta and elect a member for nomination to the Council. This would be much better than alternate representation for different parts of the Province by rotation. The special classes to be represented under the fourth item in the above list would be selected by the Lieutenant-Governor as occasion seemed to require; and suitable arrangements for electing representatives would be made. It will be observed that this method provides for the representation of the domiciled community (as well as any other), provided that it were found that this community had not been adequately represented in the other elections. The above scheme gives a maximum of 36 members of Council, excluding the Lieutenant-Governor. If it was not necessary to include four representatives of special classes, the Council would not be quite so large. These views are the result of a full discussion of the whole subject at a conference consisting of the Members of the Board of Revenue, Heads of Departments, Commissioners of Divisions, and a considerable number of non-official gentlemen, members of the Bengal Council and others, representing the different classes of the community, who were invited to share in the discussion.

Representatives of Municipalities and District Boards.

22. In paragraph 21 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, the Government of India make certain remarks regarding the franchise upon which the election of the Bengal members of the Provincial Council ultimately rests. With these remarks the Lieutenant-Governor is in complete accord. The franchise, in connection with the District Boards especially, has failed altogether to secure a due representation of different classes. This matter has engaged the serious attention of the Lieutenant-Governor. He has consulted most of the District Officers and all executive officers in the province of senior rank to theirs. He has also consulted many non-officials, both privately and in formal conferences, the results of which have been placed on record. He is very clearly of opinion that the system must be modified very materially. It is in the districts, in the work of Local Boards and Municipalities, that Government first of all requires the co-operation of the people; and it is there that real education in self-Government must be given. It is the men who do work in the interior that are best fitted to take a worthy place in the Provincial and Imperial Councils. It is in Local Self-Government that sound political training is to be obtained. This has been practically lost to the classes who have a real stake in the country. They have hardly been directly represented at all amongst the elected members of the District and Local Boards: that is to say, the most important interests in the country, and the divers classes concerned in these interests, have not been represented.

23. The Government sometimes succeeds in getting advisers and coadjutors, whose interest in the country makes them both prudent and useful, by selecting them from amongst certain classes and nominating them to the local bodies. It is admitted that the system of election under the present law will not secure such persons: and an attempt is made to remedy the defect by a system of nomination. The electoral system has not been introduced in the majority of the districts of the Province; and even where it is introduced, it is supplemented by a system of nomination. Good men are not infrequently secured in this way; but the men nominated are in a very invidious position. An influential and very capable zamindar, for example, who has a large stake in the country, may be nominated to the District Board or to the Provincial Council; but when he has been thus nominated, he is, by some at least, regarded as a man who has been "captured" by the Government. He is credited with nothing but a desire to please the Government. This may be absolutely unjust. He may, and very often does, speak perfectly frankly the views that are in his mind; but he does not always get credit with the outer world for sincerely representing the views of his fellow countrymen and, all the time, he feels that he is the object of the suspicion, and often the object of the vituperation, of his own countrymen. It is a most undesirable position. What is required is, to get the same class of men, without putting them into this position. This is nowhere more important than in the District or Local Boards.

24. It is so highly inexpedient as to be practically impossible to go back on what has been done in regard to the franchise, that is to say, to withdraw from any one the privilege of the franchise which has been given to him. The scheme which the Lieutenant Governor has in his mind—and it has received the full concurrence of all the officers he has consulted and also of the non-officials, including all the non-official members of the Bengal Council—is that those who now enjoy the franchise should be divided into such sections as will secure the representation of different classes and interests. It is unnecessary in this letter to go into the details of the scheme which the Lieutenant-Governor has framed and separately placed before the Government of India. It will be enough here to indicate briefly the lines on which the scheme has been framed. First of all, there must be separate representation of the large zamindars. The electors must be zamindars and their representative must be a zamindar. The smaller zamindars should be similarly represented separately. A third electorate of agriculturists, namely, the smallest class of landowners and the larger raiyats or tenants, also require separate representation. A fourth electorate would consist of the professional classes; and a fifth, of the trading classes. Finally, a sixth constituency would be formed to provide for the representation of any special interest. It is proposed that, so far as non-officials are concerned, nomination should cease altogether and separate constituencies should be formed which should provide for the election of persons representing all the various interests. A system such as this would provide a non-official element which could be thoroughly trusted, subject to financial and other limitations provided by rule, and to the supervision of the District Officer and Commissioner, to do good work in the District and Local Boards. A few official members would be added; the Subdivisional Officer to the Local Board, and one or two officials, such as the Inspector of Schools, the Civil Surgeon, and the like to the District Board.

25. As has already been stated, this scheme has met with the universal approval of the officers and non-official gentlemen consulted. The Lieutenant-Governor has greatly regretted that it could not be carried through at once. In Sir Harold Stuart's letter [paragraph 22 (c)] encouragement was given to the introduction of such a scheme in Local Boards. And it appeared a very opportune time to carry it through when it received such widespread support. It has, however, been deemed expedient to postpone the consideration of this scheme until the matters under discussion in this letter are disposed of. When it is possible to take it up and carry it out, it will provide a reasonable hope of sound representation in the Provincial Council. This reform of the electoral system of District and Local Boards is an urgent necessity. On the other hand, there does not appear to the Lieutenant-Governor to be any special necessity at the present time for interfering with the electoral system of Municipalities. It can be considered later.

26. In paragraph 22 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, the opinion of this Government is requested regarding the desirability of providing for the representation of special classes other than the Muhammadans. The Lieutenant-Governor does not consider that this is necessary. There are undoubtedly considerable sections of the population, such as the so-called Kolarian tribes and numerous depressed castes, which are not, and probably never will be, represented in Council under existing conditions; but this cannot be helped. These classes must trust to Government for protection whenever their interests clash with those of other classes.

Special classes.

27. In paragraph 23 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, the Government of India state that they are anxious to introduce such changes in the existing system of discussion of the budget in Council as will make the debates on the budget less unreal and will bring them into closer relation with the financial policy and administrative decisions of the Government. The Lieutenant-Governor considers that the best way to effect this object will be to have one or two unofficial discussions with representative members of the Legislative Council before the budget is formally laid before the Council. He would suggest that there might be two such discussions, one in the first week of February before the second edition of the Provincial budget is submitted to the Government of India through the Accountant-General, and the other in the first week of March before the third edition of the budget is submitted. The Committee appointed to hold these unofficial discussions would be of the nature of a Select Committee, and might consist of the Hon'ble Members of the Board of Revenue, the Secretaries to the Local Government and half of the non-official members of Council, nominated for the purpose with special regard to their representative character.

28. At the first meeting a preliminary note on the budget, briefly explaining the general lines thereof, with statements of both receipts and expenditure, showing under each of the major heads the actuals of the preceding year, the sanctioned estimate and the revised estimates for the current year, and the budget estimate for the ensuing year, should be laid before the members by the Financial Secretary. This note should also show all additional recurring charges and the principal items of a non-recurring nature proposed to be incurred during the ensuing year. The Public Works Department should also furnish a note showing all important items in their programme for the year, with the estimated cost of each, which would form an appendix to the Financial Secretary's note. At the second meeting a further note would be laid on the table by the Financial Secretary, giving revised estimates based on later actuals and on such suggestions made at the previous meeting as could be adopted, and giving separate figures under the principal minor heads subordinate to major heads.

29. For the purpose of the debates in Council, the suggestion thrown out by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor in his speech on the budget debate last year might be given effect to, namely, that statements should be appended to the budget explaining the principal reforms in progress and in contemplation in the several Departments of Government. For the purpose of these statements the subjects should be grouped together according to the departments dealt with by the different Secretaries. This would greatly simplify the discussion. In order also to give fuller effect to the intentions of Government, two days should be allowed for the discussion of the budget in Council. This would give the Hon'ble Members the fullest opportunity for discussion compatible with the exigencies of the administration.

30. In reference to the remark contained in the last sentence of paragraph 23 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, that "it might perhaps on occasion be found possible to alter the budget actually under review," I am to point out that under the existing arrangements the budget cannot be altered after it is laid before the Council. Unless therefore the Government of India are prepared to authorize alteration after the budget has been finally passed in the Imperial Financial Department, it will not be possible to give effect to the suggestion.

31. The Lieutenant-Governor has nothing further to add regarding the schemes proposed for consideration in Sir Harold Stuart's letter.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

E. A. GAIT,

Chief Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal.

From—The Maharaja Dhiraj of Burdwan.

To—His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

Imperial Advisory Council.

I think that the proposal of the Government of India is a sound one, and the idea should be put into effect and the scheme launched without much delay. The constitution as contained in the letter might be accepted as the basis; for, I am sure it will undergo some changes as we proceed and as experience reveals itself, specially when we may have to take into consideration any such worthy criticism or proposals as might appear hereafter.

2. At the very outset, however, I desire to say that in the 24th and 25th lines of paragraph 4 of the letter it contains the following words "and possessing in themselves no formal powers of initiation." This of course means that whenever the Government will desire to consult the Council the Councillors will give their advice, but they will not be entitled to prefer any advice, by taking an initiative on any subject that is not referred to them, even, if any such matter in their opinion be one on which they as advisers consider the measure to be too strong or weak, improper, unfair or impolitic, in any way, and feel it their duty to bring the matter before the Government. Therefore I think that the Councillors should have some privilege at any rate of taking initiative steps on all such matters, and represent such cases to the Government either in writing, confidentially, individually or collectively, or by waiting on the Viceroy either individually or collectively. The Government might consider on receipt of such communications or deputations whether or not in its opinion the advices of the Councillors are worthy of consideration. This point I want Your Honour to carefully consider, and if you agree with me I trust that you will kindly take necessary steps.

3. About the formation of the Council as stated in paragraph 5 (3) of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, i. e., that of the sixty members it is desired to take about 20 Ruling Chiefs and about 40 territorial magnates from every province under the Government of India, I may be permitted to observe that for political reasons it might be quite right to have about 20 Ruling Chiefs in the Council; but I really do not see how these Chiefs could be of much help in giving counsel on schemes and on the subjects referred to them which mainly concern the administration of country under direct British rule. This body no doubt will be directly interested only when questions of famine, education, railway, canals (specially passing through or close to their territories), Imperial Service Troops and Imperial Cadet Corps, etc., are referred to them. Of course when any question of general principles is discussed, their advice and opinion would certainly be useful and helpful; but in questions affecting the general interest of the landholders and tenants, trade, commerce, industry and other professions in British territory they could not be of much help.

4. Moreover, this proposal does not contemplate to take in any specially qualified persons of education and culture, nor does it embrace any representatives from classes, such as industry, commerce, capital and other important professions to advise on questions relating to these subjects, of which they would undoubtedly be the most likely persons to have special experience and knowledge. I think therefore that representatives from such important classes should be taken into the Council; specially as they will also be able to represent the opinions of those who discuss things in the press and also represent a certain amount of the popular views. For these reasons I beg to suggest that of the 60 Councillors proposed I would have 15 Ruling Chiefs, 30 territorial magnates from the different provinces, and 15 educated representatives from the industrial, Commercial, capital and other professional classes, so that the Council would then be complete and a really representative body.

5. I consider that the functions of the Advisory Council seem to be very little. It is impossible at present to say anything about its practical utility until it is put into practice and its usefulness gradually appreciated. There is no doubt, however, that through these Councillors the Government will be able to make its measures and motives generally understood by the people and also be able to correct erroneous and often mischievous statements of fact or purpose imputed to it.

6. In paragraph 5 (7) it is stated that the proceedings of the Council will "as a rule be private, informal and confidential, and they would not be published although Government would be at liberty to make any use of them it thought proper." There is no general objection to this paragraph, but I should like to suggest that when any member is consulted individually (as stated in the middle of paragraph 4) if any member expressly desires when submitting his opinion that his opinion should be treated as strictly confidential such a request should be respected and the opinion of such a member should not be made public or used otherwise.

Provincial Advisory Council.

7. I consider that the constitution, functions and proceedings as contained in paragraph 6 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter may be accepted as it is, as a basis of establishing the Council. It provides for the representatives of all classes of people which I consider to be a sound thing.

8. There is one point, however, which vastly differs from the proceedings of the "Imperial Advisory Council" and which calls for remarks—while the proceedings of the "Imperial Council" are clearly stated as "private, informal and confidential" the proceedings of the "Provincial Council" when consulted collectively are to be recorded by a Secretary to Government, But it does not say whether these proceedings should be treated as "private, informal and confidential." No doubt this is what is implied; nevertheless this point should be made clear. I propose that the proceedings of the "Provincial Advisory Council" be treated as "private, informal and confidential" like the proceedings of the "Imperial Advisory Council." In this points the same principles should equally apply to both the advisory councils.

9, There is another point which I wish to allude to, i.e., that should there be no real objection, the members of the Council might be consulted by the Governors of the Provinces by personal interviews wherever it is possible, without taking their opinion in writing. This course, I think, is important, for many members will be saved the trouble of writing out their opinions as well as be perhaps, able to be more explicit than they would care or dare to be when putting down their views in writting. As stated in paragraph 5 above, here also I desire to say that when any member is consulted individually and submits his opinion in writing, confidentially, and expressly desires that his opinion sh ould not be made public, his request should be respected and his opinion should not be made public or used otherwise.

10. I generally approve of the proposals for the proceedings of the Council as contained in paragraph 7 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter. I think this will be of great use and will have the effect of preventing many erroneous rumours and imputations of improper motives on the Government actions.

11. I think that some general rules might be framed under which the Advisory Council is to meet and the procedure to be followed by that body. Something on the line of the meetings of the Legislative Council or other Council meetings would serve the purpose.

A suggestion.

12. One other matter of detail I desire to suggest, namely, that a rule should be made under which the cost of travelling, etc., of the Councillors of both Advisory Councils is to be paid by Government when they attend the meetings unless of course they be residents of the city where the Council meets.

13. In conclusion, I beg to request Your Honour that I might be permitted to supplement my opinion hereafter if, after going through the criticisms which are bound to appear in the papers, etc., I think such an action to be necessary.

Dated the 20th September 1907.

From— The Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad,

To—His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

THE sealed cover containing your letter of the 13th instant enclosing copy of Sir Harold Stuart's letter No. 2310, dated 24th ultimo, has been redirected to me here from Murshidabad. I am here for a short change, temporary cessation from work having been advised for me after my recent indisposition. I should otherwise have been very glad to have the subject-matter of Sir Harold's letter personally talked over with Your Honour. But, as it is, the subject being a very important one, I have given it the careful consideration it deserves, having already thought over the matter since its publication in the newspapers. I give below, as concisely as I can, my views on the schemes.

2. (I) As regards the Imperial Advisory Council, I am afraid (a) the constitution proposed will not meet all requirements. I do not forget that the main object which underlies the scheme is the giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters. I do not think that sixty ruling Chiefs and "territorial magnates," as such, will be sufficient either as exponents of public opinion on administrative measures, as channels for the diffusion of correct information on public matters, for correcting imputations based upon incorrect information, or for free consultation in matters of public importance. To me it seems that the development of the educated classes has made such advances as can in no way be ignored in the formulation of any scheme the real object of which is the taking the people into the confidence of Government for a free and close consultation in matters of common and Imperial interest. Moderate representatives of the educated classes, who have an adequate sense of responsibility and who have proved themselves worthy of the confidence of Government, are no less capable of making Government measures and motives more generally known and better understood. I do not for one moment imply that among the ruling Chiefs and the "territorial magnates" there are not many who, having taken advantage of the opportunities placed at their disposal and benefiting by the educational advantages, have not qualified themselves to advise Government on matters of importance; but at the same time I think that the claims of the educated classes, the creation of the Government itself, can hardly be overlooked. Shortly, therefore, so far as regards the constitution of the Advisory Council, I think that, of the sixty Imperial Advisors, at least one-sixth, that is, ten, should be representatives of the educated classes, men of approved loyalty and character, of moderate views and unselfish motives. These ten will represent the interests of a variety of departments and branches, and will make the scheme as acceptable as can be expected under existing circumstances.

3. (b) Properly constituted, that is, the best available persons being chosen, there is no reason why the Imperial Advisory Council should not very satisfactorily discharge the functions which the scheme would expect of them. The necessity,however, will be enhanced of getting the best available persons. These being secured, the success of the advisory body seems to be assured. But I should suggest and submit that the functions of the Council should not be merely consultative, but should extend to empower the Councillors to suggest measures and bring to the notice of Government the state of public feeling, public requirements and various other kinds which Government may not otherwise be in a position to know. Such suggestions and information received from persons in actual touch with the people are sure to prove more beneficial to Government than mere advice offered when consulted. Thus constituted with extended function, the utility of the Council is sure to be enhanced.

4. (c) As regards the proceedings of the Council, I think that the whole body of the Councillors should be consulted individually or collectively in all questions of Imperial and common interest.

5. (II) Then as regards Provincial Advisory Councils, my observations regarding the constitution of the Imperial Advisory Council (a) apply equally to them. I think that the educated classes cannot be wholly ignored in consideration of the object with which the Councils are proposed to be formed. I do not think the constitutional requirements of the country will be adequately met if the responsible leaders and representatives of the educated society, representing the masses, who, in a country, where education has not made such strides and has not yet penetrated into the lower strata, must, of necessity, for some time yet at least, be represented by them, were excluded from enjoying the privilege of being the confidential recipients of such information as the Government would give and of being the mouth-pieces of a people who cannot represent themselves otherwise.

6. (b) The function of the Provincial Advisory Council need not prove useless if only the right persons are selected and if they are extended on the line suggested by me in regard to the Imperial Advisory Council.

7. (c) Their proceedings may be by correspondence or personal discussion, as the importance or urgency of each particular case will call for. There is no reason why their deliberations should not be private before the result can be put into definite shape for public consideration or criticism.

Dated 20th the September 1907.

From—The Late Maharaja Bahadur Sir Jotindra Mohun Tagore, K.C.S.I.,

To—His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

I have received Your honour's favour of the 13th instant, requesting an expression of my opinion on the constitution of the proposed Advisory Councils. I wish I could confer with Your Honour personaliy on the subject. I could then fully and freely explain my views. As this is not possible at present. I must satisfy myself by giving brief replies to the questions Your Honour has been pleased to put to me.

2. The conception of establishing Advisory Councils is, no doubt, excellent. The organisation, if it be discriminately constructed and sufficiently well developed, will be productive of great benefit. The Imperial Council, it is proposed, will be composed of ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates. The former will be gratified and perhaps benefited by their association with the Viceroy in guarding Imperial interests; and the latter will feel honoured by being appointed confidential advisers of the representative of their Sovereign. They are the natural and hereditary leaders of the people, and the recognition of their status and influence will serve to strengthen their attachment to the British Raj, and induce them to readily co-operate with the Government in the effective administration of the Empire.

3. The constitution of the Imperial Council, however, as it is contemplated at present, does not seem to my mind to be quite a sound one. The ruling Chiefs live isolated from British India, and do not, I presume, take any active interest in the general administration of the country. They have no touch with the people and are ignorant of their needs and sentiments. I do not think, therefore, that they will be able to give any material advice in administrative matters. The large landholders have so long been unaccustomed to take any prominent share in public life, that their want of training and experience, however well disposed they may be to assist in administrative work, will not enable them to render any valuable services. It will be necessary, therefore, to introduce new and more vigorous elements into the organisation to ensure its success. To be really useful and not merely ornamental, the Council must be strengthened by men outside the sphere of ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates. Educated and cultured men, of moderate political views, of trained intelligence and energy, and of proved merit and ability should be invited to become members of such a Council to vitalise the organization, and to make it fit to produce substantial work

4. If I may be permitted to speak frankly, young and inexperienced British officers, encouraged by the spirit of latter-dry legislation, have done their level best to undermine, by openly pronouncing their radical views, the influence and position of zamindars and landholders and to destroy harmony and good-will between them and their tenants. It is, therefore, absolutely essential in the interest of good government to counteract the evil effect of the mischievous and radical propaganda. There are men among the educated classes—men of sterling worth who, by their sound training and intimate knowledge of the trend of aggressive radical thought of the present day, and being more in touch with the people themselves, are qualified to meet the specious arguments against the propertied classes and to preserve equilibrium among the different elements composing the Council. It is my firm belief that, under present conditions, if propertied classes and our educated men be judiciously combined, their joint influence would be productive of incalculable benefit to the State, in promoting the welfare of the mass of the people—especially when we consider that our educated men belong mostly to the upper middle class (who form part of the mass themselves), and their opinions and counsels would naturally have greater effect upon them.

5. It goes without saying that the success of the Council would mainly depend upon the men chosen as Councillors. They should be most discriminately selected, and they should possess, as Manu, the ancient law-giver of India, says, all the qualifications essential in trusted and competent advisers—men of mature age and experience, who have the capacity of throughly grasping, in all their bearings, the subjects presented for consideration, and can freely, but respectfully, represent their views to His Excellency the Viceroy, or to his representative who may be deputed to confer with them.

6. It is difficult to understand, from the scheme before me, the real function of the Council. I am unable to see what useful purpose can be served by the work assigned to it. It appears to me that this work is indefinite in its character. In the first place, the Councillors will not be allowed any original powers of initiation. If these powers be withheld from them, I do not see what incentive they will have to devote their time, talent and energy to the consideration of any question, however vitally it may affect the welfare of the people, especially when they have the discouraging pronouncement before them that the Viceroy may or not may accept their views. Under such a depressing consciousness, men would hardly take any interest in questions placed before them and be willing to sacrifice their time and energy upon any fruitless deliberation.

7. The principal object in view for organising such a Council is that it may supply "a means for free and close consultation." But there will be no record of this consultation. No trace of the opinion given will be left behind. The Government of India may use the opinion tendered for any purpose of its own, but strict silence is enjoined upon the Councillors. It is believed that "only confidential communications will secure frank interchange of opinion." Granting this remark to be generally true, there are, I beleive, occasions when such communications, if guardedly worded and judiciously selected, would, when published, be of immense value. The Government of India say that the Council should be made "an agency for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions and objects of the Government." It is thus expected that "the Councils should be interpreters of Government to the people"; but if all communications with them be of a private and confidential nature, the mouths of the Councillors would be shut and their hands would be tied, and they would have no opportunity, nor incentive, to correct misstatements or remove erroneous impressions. To perform this task effectually, motives of action must be thoroughly explained; but this cannot be done unless the Councillors are at liberty to disclose the information placed before them. Considering both the advantages and the disadvantages of "free and confidential communications," I am inclined to think that—except on those questions in the consideration of which inviolable secrecy must be maintained—the opinions of Councillors taken either individually or collectively on all important subjects should be published. Such publication would be of great value, inasmuch as it would show to the people that the Councillors have exercised their utmost influence and made most strenuous exertions to do their duty both to their countrymen and to the Government by a correct representation of popular opinion on any given subject. The consciousness of doing this duty would act as an invigorating stimulus and afford them a healthy inducement to express their views freely on all measures of Government, both actual and prospective. It must be always borne in mind that the views of the Councillors will be of importance only when they are based on an appreciation of the needs, wishes and sentiments of the people. Without an adequate sense of responsibility, the deliberations of even the most trusted advisers of Government would be utterly fruitless.

8. The total number of teritorial magnates is to be forty. This is to be distributed, of course, among the eight provinces of British India. I am of opinion that the number should be distributed in proportion to the area and importance of the provinces.

9. My remarks with regard to the constitution of the Imperial Advisory Council apply with equal force to the consitution of the Provincial Councils. The organisation of the latter body is to be on a wider basis. Representatives of "other important provincial interests" are to be admitted to it. There is, I think, a material difference between proceedings of the Imperial and the Provincial Council, as the latter are not to be "informal and confidential" and are to be reduced to writing. This is a material advantage, as it will enable the heads of the Government to have a permanent record of the opinions of their Councillors.

10. The admission of the representatives of smaller landholders, of industry, of commerce, of capital, and of the "professional classes" (including of course the educated classes) would be of great benefit.

11. There may be (according to the Oriental custom) some difficulty, considering the dignity and the high position of the ruling Chiefs, in associating them, in the Imperial Council, with our educated men who have comparatively a lower social status; but in Provincial Councils no such difficulty is likely to be experienced; and I believe that in the long run the latter body would prove of greater utility than the former, for if I may be permitted to give my honest opinion, the Provincial Council would ultimately do more substantial work than the Imperial Council.

12. The provision for tendering "a collective opinion" would, to my mind, be also an advantage, as it could be employed, when necessary, to correct all prejudices and misconceptions, by its publication, and would serve to strengthen both the hands of the Government and of the Councillors.

13. The Provincial Council is to be of a smaller size, but it ought not to be so small as not to be capable of including representatives of all important interests. I believe the number, considering the variety of interests, ought not to be less than thirty at least.

14. In this connection I wish to say that consultation with, and the expression of opinion of, a smaller number of Councillors, selected with reference to the special nature and importance of a given subject, would be of greater value than either individual or collective opinion taken in the manner proposed.

15. In conclusion, I do not wish to say anything in this place about the proposed reform of the Legislative Council. The condition that "official majority must be maintained" would, according to popular opinion, considerably interfere with the usefulness expected of it and would not be able to secure the confidence of our countrymen in its work and would thus fail to meet their requirements and satisfy their aspirations.

Dated the 21st September 1907.

From—His Highness the Maharaja of Cooch Behar,
To—His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

I AM in receipt of Your Honour's confidential communication of the 3rd instant, enclosing a copy of Sir Harold Stuart's letter No. 2310, dated the 24th ultimo.

2. Your Honour has been good enough to ask me to candidly express my views on the proposals made by the Government of India relating to the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils. I explained briefly my views to you at a personal interview thejday before yesterday; and I now give expression to those opinions more fully.

3. I will first take the Imperial Advisory Council.

(a) In my humble opinion the Imperial Advisory Council should consist of two sections, one composed entirely of Ruling Chiefs, and the other of territorial magnates and representatives of commerce, industry, capital and the professions. In suggesting the inclusion of representatives of commerce, etc., I consider the Council will be more complete and representative and therefore better able to cope with all questions affecting Imperial policy. Of the 60 members which will form the Council, 20 as suggested should be Ruling Chiefs; the remaining 40 may be divided as follows: 28 territorial magnates and 12 representatives of commerce, industry, capital and the professions distributed equally.

(b) As regards their functions, I quite agree that they should be purely advisory for the present, but I would suggest certain modifications—

(1) The Council should be called together at least once a year as a collective body. This will afford the Councillors an opportunity of exchanging their views and discussing questions of Imperial interest at least once a year, even if there be no question referred to them by Government.

(2) Their opinions should be recorded and, if considered advisable or necessary by Government, made public.

(3) Dissenting opinion should be recorded, if so desired, by the dissenting Councillors.

(4) The Ruling Chiefs should meet separately when matters affecting them personally or their States are in question.

I hold that our opinions in a collective form would be of greater value to Government and will carry greater weight with the public.

(c) The proceedings of the Council, when called together for collective consultation, may be private and confidential but not informal, and such proceedings should be always recorded.

4. I also think that any member or body of members of the Council, singly or collectively, should have the privilege of bringing to the notice of Government such matters as they consider of Imperial importance, with a view to their discussion in Council.

5. With reference to the Provincial Advisory Councils, in my opinion, Ruling Chiefs, as a rule, should not be included. I would also suggest that the Provincial Advisory Councillors be consulted oftener collectively than individually. As I have suggested in the case of the Imperial Advisory Council, the Provincial Advisory Councillors should have the privilege of requesting Government to seek the advice of the Provincial Council in regard to matters of grave importance other than those referred to them.

6. I must thank Your Honour for the opportunity you have kindly given me of explaining my views on such an important matter. I have no doubt the proposed Councils will be of material assistance to Government and will be the means of maintaining and strengthening that cordial relationship between the rulers and the ruled, which is the aim of Government.

Dated the 22nd September 1907.

From—The Maharaja of Darbhanga,
To—His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

I WAS away in Bankipore, and Your Honour's letter reached me after my return some days after you had sent it. This and the difficulty of the question explain the delay in replying. I am very sorry Your Honour did not order me down to Calcutta when you were there. It would have been far more satisfactory to have talked over the matter with you.

Your Honour asks me about the constitution of the Council and the desirability or otherwise of advising "other classes." The second question is a most difficult one to answer. I suppose the Associations will recommend the inclusion of other classes, but I would suggest that the Government of India should at present confine its selection to the classes mentioned in the Resolution and after some time appoint individuals like Sir Gurudas Banarji, regarding whose loyalty and integrity there can be no question. It will be invidious to say what classes should be included and excluded; and the only way of evading the difficulty appears to me to put in certain individuals of proved merit and judgment as circumstances permit.

I would suggest also that the whole sixty should not be appointed at once: that the first appointments at least of Princes and noblemen should be unexceptionable. The noblemen should be only those about whose proved loyalty and merit there can be no question and who are at the same time in touch with the people. This must be the case if they are to be interpreters of Government to the people and, as a necessary corollary, interpreters of the people to the Government. The position will be one of very great, and I may also add, thankless responsibility. The first appointments will be most closely scrutinised, and the success of the scheme will greatly depend on the way it is worked during the first few years: I am decidedly of opinion that no one who asks to be a Councillor should be made a Councillor.

(b) Functions and utility of the Advisory Council.—I believe we have discussed this aspect of the question at Belvedere. If the relationship of the Heads of Government with the Councillors are to be, if I may say so, such as exist between you and me, I am confident that much good will result, but not otherwise. There must be mutual trust and confidence. If not, the opinions offered will necessarily be of very indifferent value. The position of the Councillors will be, if I understand the duties rightly, one of no power but very great responsibility. The integrity of the Councillors on the one hand and the confidence that may be reposed upon them by Government will be determining factors in securing the success of the experiment. Let all Indians and friends of India pray to the Almighty that it will result in India's good.

(c) I quite agree in these proposals of consulting the Councillors "individually, collectively, either in whole or in part." There will of course be occasions for following each separate course.

PROVINCIAL COUNCILS.

The proposals of the Government of India in paragraphs 6 and 7 appear to me to be admirable both as regards their functions and constitution, but I would respectfully urge that the importance of "private informal and confidential" proceedings should not be minimised, as I strongly believe that these will not be less useful to Government than written communications. I would also demur to the proposal that opinions are to be presented in writing only. There are yet many persons, especially amongst the landed aristocracy, like the late Maharaja of Sonbarsa, whose knowledge and experience of their special subjects will enable them to give opinions of considerable value, but who cannot give a competent written opinion, and on whom this restriction will press rather unfairly. There will be also cases where a man, even if he can express himself properly in writing, will not care to do so with the same freedom as he would if he was addressing the Head of a Local Government at a private interview. I submit that this aspect of the question should not be lost sight of

I would make the term of the appointment of the Advisory as well as the Legislative Councils at least five years, if it is not possible to make it equal to the Parliamentary term of seven years. Two years is much too short a period for a man who does not belong to the Bar or to the Press to make himself properly conversant with public questions.

In conclusion, I would submit to Your Honour's consideration and to that of the Government of India, in case Your Honour approves of this idea, that there should be advisory bodies—they need not be termed Councils—for each division and each district, at least so far as your provinces are concerned. I am most certain that these Divisional and District Committees will be most helpful to the cause of sound administration and in keeping the Commissioners and the Collectors in touch with the people. I trust that influential persons in each division and district will be glad to serve, that a compact body of local helpers will be selected and that a considerable amount of the suspicion that is bred in ignorance will disappear.

I hope Your Honour will be pleased to tell me if any portion of these remarks meets with your approval, and that you will give me a little longer notice in case you may care to ask my opinion on the remaining portions of the Resolution.

No. 692, dated Calcutta, the 10th October 1907.

From—T. A. MILNE, ESQ., Honorary Secretary, Anglo-Indian Association,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I AM directed by the Council of the Anglo-Indian Association to submit the following representation in reply to your letter No. 1977A.—D., dated the 18th September 1907.

2. The Council observe with some regret, not unmingled with surprise, that the scheme of representation presented for public criticism is in the main a scheme for Indianising the administration, and hardly takes that account of the agents and instruments of the British capitalists, who have done so much to develop the resources of the country and increase its wealth, which any such scheme would naturally be expected to take.

3. The Association does not venture to question the paramount right of the Indian masses to consideration. But the Government knows, as well as all intelligent observers of the conditions prevailing in the country, that, while the only Indian class which possesses much influence among, or much knowledge of the feelings of, the masses, is the class of resident country magnates from Rajas down to hereditary landholders on the one hand; on the other, the class of our Indian fellow-subjects which has become most urgent and successful in its demands has not only done comparatively little, if anything, for the benefit of the masses, but comes little into contact with them, and probably knows less of their feelings and their wants than an ordinary District Officer of experience and average ability.

4. It may therefore amount to a wrong to the masses to give a disproportionate share of representation to professional men and politicians residing and working chiefly in cities, or securing the support of bodies like District Boards in the mofussil.

5. While referring to the securing of votes, the Council of this Association would most respectfully question the wisdom of introducing into, or enlarging within, this country, an elective machinery and electioneering methods based on British models, which have been shaped by experiences for which no equivalent is to be found in India. With every desire to refrain from any language that need be objected to upon any ground, the Council feel bound to acknowledge the truth of the remark that Municipal elections in Calcutta usually represent the determination of some one person to elect himself and to secure the confirmation of his self-election by a process that can only nominally be described as a rational exercise of the franchise by genuine voters. So-called elections out of Calcutta among our Indian fellow-subjects are believed to possess all the disadvantages and none of the advantages, if they have any, of city elections.

6. The Council believe that the small share allowed to non-official Europeans in the mofussil in voting is more real because of their upbringing before coming to India, and their truer sense of the privilege of voting.

7. The remarks offered on the practical alienation of Indian town communities from Indian rural masses do not apply to non-official Europeans in or out of cities, because they do not pretend to represent the Indian masses but their own class, which holds a peculiar position in India and one of growing importance.

8. The Council submit that in all such schemes as the present, the respective claims of the masses of India, of Indian townfolk, and of non-official Europeans, ought to be carefully considered in their true perspective which an earnest effort has been made in this letter not indeed to delineate for the first time, but to place in its proper position in relation to any scheme of representation.

9. As regards their own community, the Council realise that their comparative insignificance in numbers, if in no other respect, has usually led to their being virtually ignored in all large schemes. They respectfully submit that the valuable services which they have rendered the State at all times, alike in war and during peace, establish for them a distinct claim to be regarded as a useful minority which ought not to be ignored in the body politic. Whether Government intend to recognise them at all in the present scheme, the papers circulated do not afford them any means of ascertaining.

10. The Council recall with satisfaction the remarks made by the Hon'ble Mr. E. N. Baker when passing the present Calcutta Municipal Act through the Legislature that the Domiciled Community had as good a claim as, or a better one than, some others which had demanded to be recognised. The whole community would feel deeply thankful if some practical expression were now given to this opinion.

11. One suggestion has been published of which advantage might be taken. It is that responsible Associations already exist which represent different classes in the country, and that if these were allowed to recommend representatives whom the Government might afterwards appoint or not as it thought fit, a much truer representation might be secured than any now obtained by existing electioneering methods.

12. In conclusion, I am directed respectfully to urge that while the detailed arrangements proposed for discussions in legislatures seem to hold out prospects of somewhat better results than any which have followed the reading of lengthy and discursive essays, no concessions such as those now contemplated to our Indian fellow-subjects seems likely to satisfy the unreasonable demands that have been advanced for a preponderating influence in the Administration.

Dated the 24th October 1907.

From—The Maharaja of Moharbhanj,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

WITH reference to your letter dated the 18th September 1907, inviting my views on the matters dealt with in the letter of the Government of India, No. 2312, dated the 24th August 1907, I have to say that the measures which the Government proposes to adopt with the object of satisfying the constitutional requirement of the Indian Empire, cannot but be regarded as a move in the right direction and will be specially welcome to the ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates, whose claim to a share in the counsels of the Empire has received liberal recognition. As observed by the Government of India, the ruling Chiefs and the landed aristocracy possess a material stake in the country and represent the most powerful and stable elements of Indian society, and any advice coming from them will be all the more responsible. By bringing these classes into closer relations with the Government and its officers, I am sure the expectations of the Government of India that correct information will be diffused and erroneous and mischievous impressions removed as regards the acts, the objects, and the intentions of the Government, will be fully justified.

2. With reference to the Imperial Advisory Council, I may suggest that when it is summoned to meet for deliberation the ruling Chiefs may be allowed to sit separate from the other members. Family traditions may stand in the way of their sitting and deliberating all together. There would, I believe, be no objection to their discussing matters with others in an informal way, after formal deliberations.

3. I would further suggest that one-fourth of the members of the Imperial Advisory Council may be selected from classes other than the ruling Chiefs and the landed aristocracy. Selections may be made from the classes representing commerce, industry, capital, &c. Retired Government servants, such as retired High Court Judges, may find a place in it. Persons of moderate views, who have attained to a position of eminence and influence in their professions or communities, may also be appointed. This would give a wider basis to the Imperial Advisory Council, and would ensure questions which come before it being considered from different points of view. Concentration of different elements and interests may lead to protracted discussions and difference of opinion, when the Council meets, but I believe the result would be beneficial than otherwise, and the advice that would be given would be more authoritative and representative.

4. In order to enable members to study fully the questions upon which their opinion is asked, they should be allowed the privilege of asking, when necessary, for information and papers which bear upon such questions and their request should be complied with unless the Government thinks that it would not be conducive to the public interest to supply such information or papers.

5. The Imperial Advisory Council should meet at least once in the year. This would not only enable members to meet and discuss all questions of importance collectively, but would enable them to meet the head of Government and high officers at least once in the year. This would be the means by which confidential and intimate consultation with the Government may be possible.

6. What I have stated in paragraphs 4 and 5 above apply to the Provincial Advisory Council as well. I have nothing to add to what has been stated in the letter of the Government of India about the selection of its members.

7. As regards the enlargement of the Legislative Councils, I have no suggestions to offer. The proposals of the Government of India commend themselves to me.

Dated Calcutta, the 30th October 1907.

From—Nawab A. F.M. Abdur Rahman,

To—The Officiating Under Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I have the honour to acknowledge with thanks receipt of your memorandum No. 1906A.—D., dated the 14th September 1907, forwarding a copy of the Resolution of the Government of India, No. 2310—2317, dated the 24th August 1907, on the question of the constitution of Advisory Councils and enlargement of Legislative Councils.

2. In reply, I beg to express my fullest approval of the proposal of Government to constitute Advisory Councils for the purpose of confidential and intimate consultation between Government and its subjects. In these Councils, men who belong to the class of agitators, however cultured they may be, should be eliminated as much as possible, and only men of proved loyalty and ability, either territorial magnates or others should be appointed. I am also strongly in favour of a continuance of the policy of Government to elicit the opinions of Indian gentlemen in all ranks of society on various administrative measures. Indian gentlemen who have had the privilege of advising Government on various matters for a number of years should be encouraged by continued confidence of Government.

3. With regard to the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Councils, I have no objection to a selected body of advisors being chosen on a wider basis; but I am of opinion that the members of the enlarged Bengal Legislative Council, as a rule, should not be permitted to sit on the Bengal Provincial Advisory Council, as they are likely to carry with them the traditions and characteristics of the former, and afford opportunities for fruitless discussions. I beg to suggest that members representing industry, commerce, capital and the professional classes, should be grouped into different sections to advise upon the particular interests they represent.

4. I also beg to observe that in the constitution of the Bengal Provincial Advisory Council, a due representation of classes should not be overlooked, and a certain proportionate number of Muhammadans should be appointed in order to secure adequate representation of that body. I venture to suggest that the number of this Council be fixed at 25, of which at least 4 may be Muhammadans, and that the latter may be selected from among suitable gentlemen, whose names are submitted by the Commissioners of Divisions, and from among representative Muhammadans of proved loyalty and merit residing in the metropolis.

5. As to the constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council, I cordially support the proposals of the Government of India, and respectfully convey to Government the grateful thanks of the Muhammadan community for the representation of their special interests on that august body. With regard to the mode of election of Muhammadans, so far as Bengal and Eastern Bengal and Assam are concerned, I am not in favour of a special Muhammadan electorate. My intimate knowledge of the Muhammadans of the Old and New Provinces induces me firmly to believe that a special Muhammadan electorate cannot be safely constituted on a workable basis. I therefore respectfully beg to suggest that the Muhammadan seats be filled by nomination, until Muhammadans are sufficiently advanced educationally to appreciate the advantages of the franchise and are above the influence and intrigues of wire-pullers and others.

6. I am also of opinion that of the four seats which the Government of India have proposed to set apart for Muhammadans, those for Bengal and Eastern Bengal and Assam be filled by nomination by His Excellency the Viceroy, and the remaining seats be filled by election by the other Provinces on the lines indicated in paragraph 18 of the Resolution of the Government of India.

7. I also beg to submit that the four Muhammadan seats in the Bengal Legislative Council should be filled by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor by nomination from among non-official and official Muhammadans of proved loyalty, merit and ability.

No. 110, dated Calcutta, the 6th November 1907.

From—Nawab Bahadur Syed Ameer Hoossein, c.i.e., Honorary Secretary to the Central National Muhammadan Association,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I am directed by the Committee of the Central National Muhammadan Association to acknowledge the receipt of your confidential letter No. 1985 A.—D. of the 18th September 1907, forwarding a copy of the Government of India Circular No. 2312 of the 24th August 1907, and in reply beg to state as follows.

2. The principles enunciated in the circular letter of Sir Harold Stuart can hardly be improved upon, and they breathe a genuine desire on the part of Government to an enhancement of the political rights and privileges of the people of India. But the subject as elucidated in the various paragraphs of this letter shows the difficulties that are to be met with at every stage of the several schemes of "Constitutional reforms" laid out in this letter, and the Committee avail of the opportunity so kindly afforded them by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor to submit the expressions of their views on the subject.

3. The Imperial Advisory Council.—No one will deny that the time has arrived for the creation and formation of the Imperial Advisory Council, nor can any one gainsay the advantages that will be derived therefrom, and the question of questions is what should be deemed the sufficient size and weight of this Council.

4. Of the several sub-sections in which paragraph 5 is divided, sub-sections (1), (2), (4) and (5) must meet with concurrence from every one of us, but if this Advisory Council is to be an agency for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions and objects of Government, the Committee do not think 60 members, of which 20 are to be the Ruling Chiefs, could diffuse correct information throughout India.

5. The procedure or method of nomination to the Council should be clearly defined and laid down at the very outset. This is particularly necessary in the case of the 20 Ruling Chiefs. The number of Ruling Chiefs throughout India being virtually fixed and limited, their nomination could easily be fixed by rotation, so that they themselves may not feel that their appointment is due to chance or caprice. The rotation should, however, be so arrived at, as to have a number of the Chiefs of the first importance in each batch of 20. For instance, if the Nizam, Kashmere, Mysore and Baroda were included in the first batch of 20, and if they were displaced on the termination of their five years' office, for (unless it is the intention of Government to make these first-class Chiefs a permanent fixture) this probably will have to be done by a batch of 20 Chiefs of a secondary importance, the collective weight and importance of these 20 Chiefs of the second batch of advisers will be such as to cause the advice they may give not to be acceptable to Chiefs of the first importance, it being felt by such that the advice emanating from feudatories who are not their equals, and whose subjects and territories being insignificant in comparison with their own, they may be considered incapable to advise Government on matters which may affect their bigger States. It will, therefore, be necessary to avoid friction and heart-burning, to determine at the very outset that the appointment of the Ruling Chiefs should be by rotation. In each batch should be included some of the Ruling Chiefs of the first importance; say, if the Nizam, Kashmere, and Travancore are in the first bath, in the succeeding batch should be Mysore, Baroda, and Jaypore. In other words, all these leading Chiefs should not be in the first Council so as to reduce the importance of the succeeding Council.

6. When these 20 Ruling Chiefs are excluded, if the number of the Council is to be 60, then only 40 remains to be selected from among the "territorial magnates" of the whole of India, and taking the provinces and great administrative divisions of the country to be 10, we find there will be only 4 for each province or division, and the Committee are of opinion this is too small a number for the proper diffusion of the correct information throughout India. The number of the Imperial Advisory Council should therefore be increased by at least 20 and brought up to 80.

7. As regards sub-section 6, paragraph 5, while the functions of the Council may be confined to what is laid down in this clause, the Committee would nevertheless expressly lay down that it will be open to any Imperial Councillor to bring to the notice of Government any question which he may think deserves being brought under the consideration of the Advisory Council. This provision is necessary, as it will induce the Imperial Councillors to take interest in the public questions of the day.

8. As regards sub-section 7, paragraph 5, the Committee are strongly of opinion that the proceedings of the Advisory Council should be strictly confidential. But apart from the idea somewhat vaguely expressed in the way of public conferences, the seal of privacy and confidence should only be maintained, say for five years, after the question discussed is disposed of confidentially by the Advisory Council, unless it shall be at the expiry of the five years expressed by the Governor-General in Council that this subject should still remain confidential.

9. One other remark the Committee desire to make in connection with the Imperial Advisory Council, and that is, if the number be increased, the European non-official community should have its representative on the Council.

10. Provincial Advisory Council.—The Committee are fully in accord with the views of Government as stated in paragraphs 6 and 7, but Government have left unsettled one or two matters which should be fully determined upon before the final formation and establishment of these Councils. It is presumed the appointments to the Provincial Council will be made by the Governors and the Lieutenant-Governors, respectively, and not by the Governor-General, and as those of the Imperial Council are to be designated Imperial Councillors, these will be called Provincial Councillors in contra-distinction to those of the Imperial Advisory Council.

11. The Committee understand from the language of paragraph 6 that the Imperial Councillors belonging to the province will be ipso facto members of the Provincial Advisory Council representing the great landholders. The members of the Provincial Council should not exceed 40. This number should suffice to enable the Council to enhance all the interests of sufficient importance to claim representation on behalf of the small landholders, industry, commerce and professional classes, and also retired Government officers.

12. Enlargement of the Legislative Council.—Paragraphs 8 to 11 of the circular letter clearly indicate the desire of Government to be further enlightened as to how this enlargement of the Legislative Councils should be effected so as to give representation to the views of the different races, classes, corporations and associations. These paragraphs therefore need no comment, save that the Committee are fully of opinion that the official majority must be maintained as long as there is no possibility of party government coming into vogue in the administration of this country.

13. As regards paragraph 12, the Committee are not sure whether 54 will not make the Council somewhat unwieldy; but considering the various interests which have to be represented they cannot see how the number of members constituting the Council can be curtailed; but if it could be curtailed without injury to the various classes concerned, the Committee should like to see the maximum strength reduced.

14. The Committee beg to suggest that for the representative under D (b) the choice of the electors should not be limited to a selection from amongst themselves only, but it should be open to the non-official members to elect any one who has been a member of the Legislative Council of the province, so that their choice may not be limited to the 6 or 7 non-official members then serving on the Provincial Council.

15. As regards paragraph 14, this question will have to be considered most carefully in connection with the special peculiarities of each province; for instance, in Bengal it will be possible to find many more than 150 landholders paying land revenue of Rs. 10,000 per annum, but, in provinces where the raiyatwari system prevails, it will hardly be possible to find 150 persons in the whole province who individually pay land revenue to that amount. In such cases the franchise should be conferred on those whose income may be a substantial one according to the discretion of the Local Government.

16. Paragraphs 16 to 19 appertain to the Muhammadan community, and the Committee beg to be permitted to add their humble testimony of gratitude and thanks to the countless grateful communications already sent to the Government of India for the careful and kindly regard and interest manifested in these paragraphs for the welfare and well-being of the Muhammadans; and if anything were wanting to attaching our community in its devotion and loyalty to the British Raj, these kindly and thoughtful sentiments of the Government as expressed in these paragraphs will certainly go to supply and fill the deficiency, if any there be.

17. To the views expressed in these paragraphs the Committee can add nothing of their own. They appear to meet all the requirements of the day of our community. The Committee would, however, only observe that to paragraph 18 (a) their remarks under paragraph 14 hereof apply, and that the electorate under A should be constituted of both past and present non-official members of the Provincial Council, while under C it is desirable that Muhammadans holding the pecuniary qualifications mentioned therein should form a portion of the electorate.

18. The Provincial Legislative Council.—Government have stated a truism when they state in paragraph 21 that the Municipal and Local Board franchises are extraordinarily low. This has been the view of many who take interest in this subject, and the Committee shall be glad to see not only the Municipal or Board members' qualification for nomination to the Legislative Council being raised, but also if the qualification for membership of the Boards were raised.

19. When Local Self-Government by means of Municipalities or Local Boards was first inaugurated or rather introduced by Lord Ripon, it was an experiment, and it was then thought desirable to make the franchise as less as possible to induce the people to take interest in Local Self-Government; but since that period, to use the phraseology of the circular letter, the extent of the advance that has taken place in the development of the educated classes who are anxious to be afforded an opportunity of discharging their public duties is now so great that the franchise may safely be raised without any loss or detriment to public interest.

20. The Committee entirely agree in the views expressed by the Government of India in paragraph 22, sub-sections A, B, and C.

21. Discussion of the Budget in Legislative Council.—The Committee would respectfully suggest that the preliminary discussion should be of an informal character something of the kind inaugurated last year by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor at Belvedere, for it will be a most desirable improvement to the present discussion of the Budget.

22. The Committee would here suggest that with the enlargement of the Council a time-limit should be imposed to a speech, and on no account should members be allowed year after year to harp on their own time-worn hobbies or theories which had been fully argued time out of mind in former years, unless the member is able to advance new facts or fresh arguments in support of these theories; but the member should be allowed just to refer to the question in which he is interested, but which still remain undetermined.

Dated Uttarpara, the 9th November 1907.

From—Raja Peary Mohan Mukherji,

To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

With reference to your memorandum No. 1904A.—D., dated the 14th of September last, I have the honour to submit the following observations on the subjects on which opinion has been invited in the letter of the Government of India, No. 2310-2317, dated the 24th of August 1907 :—

1. The proposal for an Imperial Advisory Council for purely consultative purposes is justly based on a recognition of the value of the opinions on matters of practical administration of the ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates of proper dignity and status. In many cases their rank and wealth form but a small portion of their eminence, and it is but reasonable to expect that any defect in their political outfit would, in a short time, be made up by, the very sense of the responsibility of the great and sacred trust reposed in them as Imperial Councillors. Specious arguments in favour of associating with them men of academic distinction may no doubt be advanced, but it should be borne in mind that in India, at any rate, it is not the talkers but men of action who have made its history. On questions of legislation and other measures affecting the interests of millions of men, the opinions of men with mere intellectual attainments hold only a secondary place compared with the opinions of men of position and character, men to whom the Almighty has vouchsafed the influence of example. Even for the purposes of judicial administration Lord Lyndhurst is reported to have said :—"When I want a Judge I look out for a gentleman ; if he knows a little law, so much the better but it is only a secondary consideration." One of the effects of associating the ruling Chiefs with practised speakers would be to check free discussion and make them tongue-tied. The reason assigned by Gibbon for not opening his mouth in Parliament is true to nature :—"The great speakers fill me with despair, the bad ones with terror."

2. I do not attach much importance to the fact that the opinions of the Councillors will not have any binding force or legal effect. In the initial stages of the institution it would be enough if Government be simply informed of the opinions of the ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates on particular administrative questions. If a large number of the Councillors hold a certain opinions, that opinion would have a moral effect which no Viceroy would care to ignore.

3. The service which these trusted advisers will render by disseminating among their subjects and tenants and other people under their influence the intentions and motives of Government in regard to particular measures would be invaluable.

4. In every respect, therefore, both as regard the constitution and scope of the Imperial Advisory Council, the scheme appears to have been happily conceived and the proposals of the Government of India to be unexceptionable.

5. So far as the scope and constitution of the Provincial Advisory Councils have been indicated in the Government letter, I am of opinion that these Councils would be of great benefit to the administration.

6. As regards the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council I am of opinion that so far as "official majority" and restriction of election to persons belonging to the class form parts of the scheme, it is based on sound principles. The most objectionable feature of the scheme, however, seems to be the introduction of the principle of representation by creed. If Muhammadans be given a definite number of representatives in Councils, persons of other creeds might as well justly claim to have on the Council a minimum number of their representatives proportionate to the number of their population. In the absence of such recognition, unworthy motives might be ascribed to Government and such apparent neglect would inevitably lead to the creation of mutual jealousy and rivalry among the different sections of the community.

7. The scheme propounded by the Government of India is a most welcome advance on the present system of administration. It would be a marked step in constitutional progress and promote more intimate relations between the different factors which compose the Indian Empire.

No. 1565, dated Bankipore, the 10th November 1907.

From—Babu Krishna Sahay, Honorary Secretary, Behar Landholders' Association,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter no. 1978A.—D., dated the 18th September 1907, forwarding therewith copy of a letter no. 2312, dated the 24th August 1907, from the Government of India regarding the formation of Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils, and in reply thereto I am desired by the Committee of the Bihar Landholders' Association to express their thanks and worm appreciation for the recognition by the Government of India of the importance of the landholders as a class and their claims to a due representation in the Councils of the Government. Considering that the letter under reply outlines only the broad features of the scheme now in contemplation for associating more largely the people of this country in the actual work of administration, leaving the details thereof for future consideration the Committee have confined themselves only to the points raised in the scheme and venture to offer the following suggestion in regard to them.

2. The Imperial Advisory Council.—The Committee are of opinion that the "Imperial Councillors" should not only be titled as such, but that special privileges be conferred on them befitting their high position and their admission into the Councils of the Empire.

3. As regards its constitution, the Committee think that in order to make it thoroughly representative and useful it should not only consist of the ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates, as suggested, but should also include the representatives from the commercial, industrial, educational and professional classes. If this Council is to consist of 60 members, 20 seats may go to the ruling Chiefs, 20 allotted to the territorial magnates, and 20 should go to the representatives of the commercial, industrial, educational and professional classes collectively.

4. While the Council may be a purely consultative body, its utility may be further increased by conceding to it and its members individually the right to take the initiative in bringing any particular matter affecting the well-being of the country to the notice of Government.

5. The proceedings of the meetings of the Council, in the opinion of the Committee, should not in all cases be strictly confidential and private, but may also, according to the requirement of the circumstances or the exigencies of the political situation of the country, be given publicity to, with of course the consent of the Councillor and the sanction of Government. Such a course is likely to enhance the value of the proceedings and assure the public mind of the reasons underlying a particular course of action adopted by Government in regard to any legislative measure or executive action.

6. The Provincial Advisory Councils.—As regards the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Councils, the Committee are of opinion that the Bengal Advisory Council should consist of as many members as there are districts in the province, having regard to a due representation of all classes of which the Government contemplates forming this Council.

7. As to its function and proceedings, the Committee are of opinion that they should be similar to those suggested in the preceding paragraph in regard to the Imperial Advisory Council.

8. The Imperial Legislative Council.—With regard to the expansion of the Imperial Legislative Council, the Committee generally approve of the scheme propounded in the letter of Sir Harold Stuart and note with satisfaction the desire of Government to give the landholders as a class a substantial representation on it. They think that this will not only be regarded as a boon conferred upon the landlords, but would also greatly add to the weight of the deliberations of the Council. They consider, however, that the qualifications of voters should be determined by the income of the landlords and not by the amount of land revenue that they pay; and should in the case of Muhammadans be somewhat lower than that of the Hindus.

9. The Provincial Legislative Council.—The Committee are unable to agree to the scheme outlined by the Government of India for the representation of classes on the local Council. It seems to them, regard being had to the variety of race, caste and religion among the people, that it is not feasible to form an electorate on that basis, and even if any could be formed, it might land the administration into difficulties which might prove very embarrassing. I am to add, however, that the Committee approve of the suggestion to introduce a system of franchise by forming electoral groups without making use of the caste organisation for it, on the basis of the four classes as specified in the letter under reply and fixing for each electoral group a distinct and appropriate qualification for voting. As suggested, the qualifications for the landholders may here be the payment of a certain sum as land revenue or cesses, for cultivators a certain amount as rent, and for traders and professional men a certain amount as income-tax, and thus raise the franchise.

From—T. R. FILGATE, ESQ., General Secretary, Bihar Planters' Association, Ld.,

To—The Offg. Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal,

With reference to your no. 1979A.—D., dated the 18th September 1907, I have the honour to submit the opinion of the Bihar Planters' Association on Officiating Secretary to the Government of India's letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907. This Association approve of the suggestions of the Government of India, but are of opinion that in order that there should be no weakening of the paramount British power in India, it is essential that both in the Supreme and Provincial Legislative Councils there should be a majority of official members.

2. Taking into consideration the stake they have in the country and the fact of the commercial and industrial development of India by British capital a larger non-official European representation should be provided for on the Provincial and Supreme Councils, and furthermore the Association are of opinion that the large interests the European community have in Bihar and elsewhere in the mufassal entitle them to representation by Europeans.

Dated Calcutta, the 12th November 1907.

From—Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur, Honorary Secretary, Bengal National Chamber of Commerce,

To—The Officiating Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter no. 1983A—D., dated the 18th September last, forwarding copy of a letter from the Government of India in connection with the formation of Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils and inviting an expression of opinion of the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce thereon.

2. The Committee of the Chamber beg to submit the following observations on the subject.

3. The Committee observe with satisfaction that the Imperial Government of their own initiative intended to introduce measures of constitutional reform which have in view the bringing together of the people of the country in closer contact with the works of administration. The Committee rejoice to see that the scheme formulated recognises that ruling Chiefs and landholding classes, possessing a material stake in the country and representing the most powerful and stable elements of Indian society, should take a more prominent part in public life and render a larger measure of assistance to the Executive Government. Further, it is stated that for "the present at any rate, the needs and sentiments of the masses of the people must find expression through those, whether officials or non-officials, who are acquainted with their daily life and are qualified to speak with authority on their behalf." For the attainment of this object the Government of India propose to establish Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils. As regards the Imperial Advisory Council, it is proposed that it should consist of about 60 members, including about 20 ruling Chiefs and a suitable number of "territorial magnates." The Council will be purely advisory, without any legal status and with no formal power of any sort. The proceedings of the Council will be private, informal, and confidential.

4. The Committee agree in thinking that the "territorial magnates," which they presume mean principal landholders, rajas, zamindars, are the natural medium by which the requirements of the tenants might be properly ascertained and through whom the object and reason of any measure adopted by Government may be rightly communicated to them without any fear of misrepresentation or misconstructions; but they can, however, in no sense be called the representatives of the people.

5. As a matter of Imperial policy, the inclusion of the ruling Chiefs in the Council may be desirable, but the Committee consider that their advice will be of little practical value owing to their knowledge being confined to the requirements of their own territories and to their ignorance of conditions, wants, and aspirations of the people residing in British India. It is also doubtful whether so many independent ruling Chiefs could be brought together and whether they would give expression to their frank and independent opinion when such opinion would militate against the avowed views of the Government. If they are to be associated only for the purpose of co-operation in certain measures, such as famine relief or education, that could be attained by other independent means. The appearance of the ruling Chief in the deliberations of the Council means heavy expenses to them, which will be considered as a great burden.

6. The Committee consider that the possition of the Councillors will be an anomalous one, as they will have no defined work, no legal status, and no formal and recognised position. Their opinion will, therefore, carry very little weight either with the people or the Government which may accept or reject it as they may please. In these circumstances, the Committee submit that it is very doubtful whether the members, be they the ruling Chiefs or "territorial magnates," rajas or landholders, would care to serve with alacrity at the sacrifice of their time, energy and money, if they come to realise that no statutory obligation will be attached to their opinion.

7. The same remarks apply to the constitution of Provincial Advisory Councils which have to perform analogous functions.

8. In order to make the Councils more effective and useful the Committee submit that it is absolutely necessary that the Councillors should be vested with some statutory functions, should enjoy certain privileges, and should be called together for the purpose of deleberation twice or thrice a year, whenever any important measure, financial or administrative, is proposed to be introduced by the Government, and that it will be binding on the Government not to pass any measure when it is disapproved by a majority of, say, two-third or three-fourths of the members. Unless some such power is vested in them, it will be merely an apology for a Council. The Committee do not for a moment suggest that the paramount power of the Government should in any way be weakened, but what they want to emphasize is that the opinion of the members, who are in a manner the mouthpiece of the people, should have due weight, and any representation made by them about the wants and grievances of the people should not be lightly passed over.

9. To make the Advisory Councils, both Imperial and Provincial, really useful and practical working bodies, it is, the Committee consider, of the utmost importance that leading intelligent Indian merchants, propertied men and men of culture, of mature age and experience, should be associated with the "territorial magnates." The even balancing of various interests, intellect and wealth will go to strengthen the Councils, add to their dignity, and lend a healthy tone to their deleberations and advices which will be respected alike by the rulers and the ruled. Otherwise the Councils as proposed would be ornamental but not useful bodies. In view of the importance of the internal trade it is essential that it should be represented on the Council boards by Indian merchants of position and wealth.

10. The Committee do not see any reason why the Imperial Advisory Council should in all matters deliberate in secret, and why the proceedings should not be recorded and preserved for future use. Deliberations made openly and publicly will command respect and confidence and the Councillors themselves will be impressed with a proper sense of responsibility when expressing their views. On special occasions, whenever necessary their deliberations might be treated as confidential.

11. The Committee are glad to observe that an attempt is being made to expand the Legislative Councils with a view to meet the growing needs of the country and aspirations of its people. But the principles of creed representation and the proportion of elected members do not meet with their approval. If the distribution of seats in Councils is analysed, it will be seen that a very small portion of seats has been left for election. In fact, only seven members who are to be elected by the non-official members of the Provincial Councils and a certain number to be elected by the nobles and landholders, may be reckoned upon as representing the interest of the people and who may to a great extent be relied upon to give expression to their views and sentiments. The principle that the Government should always be able to reckon on a numerical majority and that this majority should be strong enough to be independent of the minor fluctuation that may be caused by the occasional absence of an official member, has been carried rather to far; and in furtherance of this the Government has propounded a scheme by which it will have an overwhelming majority and the voice of the minority will be practically drowned.

12. The Committee regret to observe that any special favour should be shown to a particular creed by reserving a certain number of seats for them in supersession of the claims of all other races and creeds. If the principle of creed representation is to be recognised as is proposed in the case of Muhammadans, then Sikhs, Parsis, Native Christians, Buddhists and followers of other creeds would have equal claims to a similar recognition, and it would be a gross injustice if no special provision be made for their representation.

13. The criterion of fitness of members should, in the humble opinion of the Committee, be their intellectual capacity, and any departure from it would lower the dignity of the Council in the estimation of the people.

14. In a Legislative Council expert opinion is absolutely necessary, and though Government propose to counteract the influence of the professional classes by the creation of new electorates for the landed and monied classes, it would not be a wise policy to reduce to a minimum the lawyer element in Council.

15. The Committee regret to observe that while the Chambers of Commerce of Bombay and Calcutta have been given the privilege of electing members, the Indian Chamber which represent the internal trade of the country have been altogether ignored. Some provisions should be made to remedy this defect.

16. The test that the payment of Rs. 10,000 in the shape of Government revenue (including probably Road and Public Works cesses) will give a landholder the right to vote and make him eligible for a seat in the Council, is in the opinion of the Committee too high, and it would have the effect of narrowing the electorate to a limited few and its fallacy would be apparent from the following few illustrations.

17. There is a small zamindar in the district of Howrah who owns a very large estate in the district of Chittagong, but assessed with a disproportionately high Government revenue for which he has to pay for Government revenue and cesses about Rs. 55,000 a year, but his margin of profit, after payment of Government demands and the establishment charges, is very small indeed, amounting to about Rs. 5,000 a year, if not less. While the estate was under his own management he could hardly realise enough rent to meet the Government demands and the result was that he soon got involved in debts; he had therefore the good sense to make over the estate to the Court of Wards in Chittagong which is able through the certificate procedure to realise a much larger amount and thereby pay the Government revenue every kist regularly, besides gradually liquidating his debts.

18. There is another small zamindar in Calcutta who has a large estate in the Diamond Harbour, sub-division of the 24-Parganas for which he has to pay Government revenue including cesses about Rs. 28,000, but his profit is almost nil, and at every kist he has to borrow money to meet the Government demands. Now under the test proposed, while the above two impecunious landlords, because of their paying revenues of about Rs. 55,000 and Rs. 28,000, would be entitled to vote and be members of the Imperial Legislative Council, the propietor of Aula Fuljuri, a very large estate in Backerganj, the Government revenue with which is only about Rs. 300, but which yields a net profit of about $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 lakhs of rupees a year, would, if he had no other estate, be debarred from the right of voting and would be deemed ineligible for a seat.

19. The instances cited above will illustrate that the mere payment of a certain amount of Government revenue is not a proper test and is not criterion of one's wealth, income or position.

20. The Committee therefore suggest that the payment of Rs. 2,000 Government revenue and cesses or a net income of Rs. 25,000 from landed property, or payment of income-tax on an income of Rs. 25,000 should entitle a person to vote or become a member of the Imperial Legislative Council.

21. As regards the constitution of the Provincial Council, the remarks of the Committee on the principle of creed representation apply with equal force. In the opinion of the Committee, the appointment of Muhammadans, qua Mahammadans, irrespective of all considerations of fitness, in preference to others of different creeds, possessing, it might be, higher abilities and wider experience, will be looked upon as a retrograde step and will tend to lower the dignity of the Council.

22. The Committee regret to observe that no provision has been made for the representation of the educated, professional and commercial classes, who by their intellectual superiority and experience are best fitted to assist Government in the deliberations of the Council.

23. It also strikes the Committee that in the matter of the franchise as detailed in pragraphs 17 and 22 of the letter of the Government of India, undue favour has been shown towards the Muhammadans, which the other races will naturally take exception to and which, in the opinion of the Committee, should be modified. For instance, if a Muhammadan graduate should have the franchise to elect a Muhammadan representative, it is not conceivable why the same privilege should not be enjoyed by a Hindu or a Christian graduate or a graduate of any other race. The limit as to the amount of income-tax payable in both the cases markedly differentiates the classes, and this restriction should, the Committee consider, be removed.

24. The proposal made for the discussion of the Budget is no doubt an improvement, but the Committee think it falls far short of the expectation of the Indian people. Unless the members are allowed to move amendments and to raise debate on matters relating to the Budget and to alter any of its items, the academical review of a financial arrangement "even if it be borne in mind by Government when making arrangement for subsequent years" cannot be of much use. The Committee submit that the representatives of the people should be allowed a substantive voice in the administration of the finance, and the settlement of the Budget should, at least a month before the debate takes place, be referred to a Select Committee of even number of official and elected members of the Council, the Budget items to be fixed according to their recommendations.

25. The Committee beg further to suggest that some portion of the revenue should be ear-marked and left to the control of the non-official members to be utilised by them for such purposes as might be conducive to the welfare of the people.

26. In conclusion, the Committee are thankful to Government for the formation of the Advisory Councils and enlargement of the Legislative Councils, which they consider as a step in the right direction, and it will be a great satisfaction if Government could see their way to adopt the suggestions made by the Chamber. They consider these measures as the first instalment of a series of other measures which will lead to still higher concessions being granted in the future.

Dated Bhagalpur, the 28th November 1907.

From—Rai Tarini Prasad Bahadur, Honorary Secretary, Bhagalpur Landholder's Association,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I have the honour to submit by the direction of the Association its veiws on the scheme for the formation of Advisory Councils and the enlargement of Legislative Councils as proposed in the Government of India Despatch No. 2310—2317, dated Simla, the 24th August 1907 (Home Department).

2. The Association is thankful to Government for the solicitude shown for giving a wider representation to the landed interests of the country, and thinks that it affords good grounds to hope that better results will follow therefrom.

The Association considers that the proposal to form Advisory Councils is decidedly a step in the right direction. It only thinks that the scheme as proposed in the despatch requires to be considerably modified in order to make the Councils really useful. The object of Government in forming these Councils is to create means for obtaining appropriate advice from competent persons in respect of measures of Government, as also of making Government measures and motives generally understood by the people. In order to make such advice really valuable, it should repres[illegible] the veiws, ordinarily, of the people of the country. Consequently, the advis[illegible] ought to be such men as can properly represent such views. The scheme does not lay down any rule as to how these advisers are to be appointed. It only says that the Viceroy should appoint them himself, or on the nomination of the local authorities. This Association suggests that it would be better and more desirable if the appointments be made chiefly on the basis of election by the people. The despatch alludes to the traditions of old Oriental policy and states that the Sovereign used to make it his business to consult competent advisers. This Association begs to point out that the advisers have to be competent, that is, they should be such persons as would be able to represent the views of the people. At the present day, the best way of finding such persons is by election by the people. It is very desirable that, when the Councillors are appointed, the appointments should always include only such persons as are really competent to represent these views.

3. The scheme contemplates that only ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates should be appointed to form the Imperial Advisory Council. The Committee of the Association further submits that this will be a very narrow field. There ought to be in the Council persons representing trade and commerce, the industries and education, professions and capital. It further submits that as the ruling Chiefs can hardly have any knowledge or information about the internal circumstances of British India, their advice would be useful only as to matters affecting themselves and imperial policy and may be sought in regard to these matters. About the professional classes, although the despatch makes certain unfavourable observations on them, this Association ventures to submit that they form a powerful body in the country and ought to have their representatives in the Councils. In almost all cases where professional men were in the past elected to the Council, even by Landholders. Associations they did not exercise their power and influence for the aggrandisement of themselves or of their professions, but did so for the welfare of their constituencies and the Association strongly deprecates the slur cast on the professional classes in the Government letter. As a matter of fact all the landholders, when submitting their views to the Government, consult their professional advisers.

4. The state of things in ancient India has undergone great change. In those days the territorial magnates had considerable real influence over the people and could guide their opinions, but during British administration that influence has largely disappeared, the British Courts and authorities having taken much power to themselves. It is, therefore, necessary that in addition to the territorial magnates, the other interests, especially education interests, should obtain representation.

5. The despatch states that these Councils should receive no legislative recognition and should not be vested with formal powers of any sort. This Association ventures to think that such a course will not make the Councils attractive to really representative men of the country. It will not also bring home to the members sufficient sense of responsibility, as only real responsible work can create it. It is necessary, therefore, that statutory recognition should be given to these Councils.

6. The Committee of this Association begs further to suggest that although, generally, it will be in the discretion of the Government to refer matters to the Councils for advice, still the rules ought to provide and make it incumbent on Government that it should invariably seek their advice in all matters relating to the Budget before it is framed, and in all matters relating to any particular measure of legislation before a determination is arrived at, for placing it before the Legistative Councils, and generally in all other important matters affecting the interest of the country. While the mind of Government is not yet settled, such advice ought to be sought, so that in coming to a determination it may really have the benefit of it. The Councils should also have the right of initiation in placing their views before Government in important matters affecting the interest of the country when they may think it necessary to do so.

7. The scheme provides that all advice given by the Council should be informal and confiidential and would not be published, although Government will be at liberty to make any use of them. This Association submits that such a wholesale provision for privacy is likely to diminish the sense of responsibility in both parties. It is, therefore, suggested that a return of all cases where Government acts in contravention of the advice given by a majority of the Councillors should be periodically submitted to the Secretary of State with a view to the ultimate submission of the same to Parliament and published, giving the matter on which advice was sought, the advice given, and the reasons why Government acted against it.

8. With reference to the Imperial Legislative Council, the Association views with satisfaction that in the scheme framed in the despatch, provision has been made for 7 members to be elected by the nobles and great landowners of the country. But it thinks that the alternative provision for election of these 7 members by the landholding members of the Provincial Councils is not satisfactory. In each province the election should be made by a separate electorate of moderate size. The landholding members of the Provincial Councils wlll be few in number and the great body of landholders in the Province cannot consider that the provision for election by those few members would be satisfactory. As such election is to come on once in five years, it cannot operate as a hardship on the landholders. The Association agrees with Government in thinking that the members elected to represent the classes must themselves belong to those classes, but submits that in Behar the proper test of eligibility for a franchise should not be that of Government revenue paid but the amount of income of the landholder, which may be fixed at Rs. 50,000 a year.

9. In the Imperial Legislative Council these should be members from all sections of the community. It appears that officials, trade representatives, and landholding interests have been, to some extent, properly taken in. But the industries, agriculture, education, and the professions have all been included under 12 (2), D (b), which provides for 7 members, that is, one member for each province. There is no direct recognition of these interests in the rules, but as the Provincial Councils are likely to contain members representing these interests, they may elect such members. Our Association thinks that for the interests of the country, a more suitable provision should be made for the representation of these classes. Seven more members may be added to the Imperial Council from the seven provinces.

10. Paragraph 12 of the despatch provides for the election of two members to the Imperial Council by Muhammadans. Our Association has every sympathy for them and would be glad to see that they are fully represented in the Imperial Council. On the score of a provision being made in their favour, our Association has little to say. But as a matter of principle, it seems that it is unbecoming to class them along with trade, landholding interests, and interests represented by the non-official members of the Provincial Councils. When the right of election is granted to a certain class, it ought to be granted to all other similar classes. Consequently the provision in 12 (2) (d) seems unsatisafctory. If it be necessary to allow due and adequate representation to the Muhammadans, that may be done by increasing the number under head 12 (2) (e), and the Viceroy himself, with the object of nominating members, may frame rules for election.

11. With regard to the Provincial Legislative Councils, our Association notes with regret some of the directions given in the despatch for electing members to these Councils. The scheme proposed is a new departure altogether and is not quite in harmony with the traditions of British rule in India. It is based on consideration of the different races, castes and religions in the Provinces, and is not only complicated but fraught with evil, as it would have the inevitable effect of accentuating the difference among the different races and religions of the country and of bringing in its train all the concomitant evils thereof. Bengal, Madras, and Bombay have under the auspices of British rule made suffiicent progress, and a scheme based on these differences is not likely to suit them. Our Association thinks that separate electorates for the various interests of the country may be formed to elect their respective representatives for the Provincial Councils, these interests being the landholding, capital, industries and manufactures, commerce and trade, labour and service, education and professions.

12. The Association views with satisfaction the scheme put down in the despatch for improving the character of the Budget Debate, but submits that it should be found possible to make provision for altering the Budget under review on good ground shown in the debate for such alteration. It is a measure of doubtful utility only to provide that the discussion made one year in the Council should be remembered ta the time when the Budget for the next year is framed. The observations made in pragraph 6 of the letter will be found, it is hoped, of great utility in this connection.

No. 59, dated Cuttack, 10th December 1907.

From—Babu Ram Sankar Roy, Secretary to the Orissa Association,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

With reference to your letter No. 1981A.—D., dated the 18th September last, forwarding the Government of India's letter regarding the formation of Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils, and inviting an expression of opinion of the Orissa Association, I have the honour to submit the following opinion of the Association.

2. The Association while appreciating the initiative taken by the Government of India in proposing measures to bring "all classes of the people into closer touch and relations with the Government and its officers and of increasing their opportunities of making known their feelings and wishes in respect of administrative and legislative questions," would at the outset submit that Western culture and education have awakened, in the best minds of all classes, aspirations to be not only associated with the Government in the "guardianship of common and imperial interests," but to have a larger sphere of self-Government under the guidance of the paramount power. The Association fully appreciate the generous recognition by Government of the same as the legitimate consequence of the liberal education which they have given and their endeavour to afford every facility and opportunity for their gradual attainment. But the Association after mature deliberation are of opinion that the measures proposed are not commensurate with the noble intentions of Government and are likely to bring about contrary results.

3. It is stated that "no constitutional reform would meet the real requirements of the present time which did not make adequate provisions for representing the landed aristocracy of India, the mercantile and industrial classes," "as possessing a material stake in the country and representing the powerful and stable elements of Indian society and the great body of moderate men who under existing conditions have no sufficient inducement to enter political life and find but little scope for the exercise of their legitimate influence." Now, there are no classes in Indian society whose interests are not intimately connected with the land of their birth and intermingled with one another, and all the classes have in consequence a material stake in the country such as to invest it with that stability of interest which is essential for their existence, growth and future progress.

4. Imperial Advisory Councils.—This Council is proposed to be composed of ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates. The avowed objects of Government being to afford all classes increased opportunities of making known their feelings and wishes in respect of administrative and legislative questions, the Association consider that by confining the Imperial Council to the aforesaid bodies without reference to their culture and independence of character, the only criterion of eligibility which the extent of advance of education at a rapid pace during the last twenty years has not only justified but demanded its recognition, seems to be disregarded. These ruling Chiefs beyond their dominion, and the territorial magnates, do not now hold the same position and influence of hereditary leaders as before. In this respect the best traditions of Oriental polity as also other social and religious traditions are fast melting away under the strong and levelling influence of Western education and ideas, and such a wise and statesmanlike Government as the British would not fail to recognize and grasp the new elements and conditions which are working so fast such marvellous changes in the Eastern minds who do and must slip away from the influence of so called hereditary leaders, who cannot combine with their dignity and status strong personalities endowed with education and moral character. It is a matter of common knowledge that wealth yields its influence to the power of intellect and character, and this fact is amply borne out by the complaint about the low return of the representative of the former in the Legislative Councils whose interests are so anxiously sought to be safeguarded.

5. The Association further beg to observe that the knowledge and experience of the ruling Chiefs being based upon special local conditions confined within the narrow limits of their respective States, and they having very little opportunities of knowing the real requirements of the British subjects, their opinion on matters affecting the interests of British subjects would not be of much value. Their inclusion in such large numbers would hardly inspire confidence in the minds of the people, who would question their competency on account of their peculiar political position to advise and, if necessary, give their independent opinion, even though they might happen to be otherwise competent.

6. The Association would, therefore, suggest that not only such of them who on account of their culture and independence of character have acquired the confidence of the people might be selected, but their number should be reduced in order to give greater room to the natural leaders, that is persons of culture and independence of character in British India whose services would be more valuable in matters affecting British subjects.

7. The Association would further suggest that half the number of members composing the Council might, with great advantage, be selected by election from the Provincial Councils and the representatives of recognized public Associations.

8. The Council being devoid of powers of any sort and possessing no power to initiate any measure, their proceedings being private, informal and confidental, there is hardly any guarantee of their being impressed with a sense of responsibility, hardly any incentive for ungrudging patience and painstaking which the gravity of the questions to be dealt with will entail. If there is any serious difficulty in the way of any legislative recognition of their proceedings, the Association do not see any objection to their being vested with some power to suggest any administrative or legislative measure after collective consultation. The Government cannot have failed to notice the popular demand for the aquisition of an effective voice in administrative and legislative matters. No reform which is not some concession to such demand sufficient to inspire confidence would hardly satisfy the aspirations of the best minds in all classes of Indian society whose co-operation the Government is so anxious to seek, even for the purpose of removing erroneous impressions regarding the motives and intention of Government.

9. Besides, the condition of secrecy will frustrate the main object of utilizing the Counsellors as interpreters between the Government and the people, for it will reduce their responsibility to a shadow and take away the edge of all incentive for a free and independent expression of their opinions. The Association would, therefore, suggest that their opinions and proceedings should be published in order that they might satisfy public curiosity and give them greater weight and value, and remove all suspicions against their independent character, as the people will have little confidence in those who would hesitate to give their frank opinions the light of publicity.

10. Provincial Advisory Council.—The general observations made above in connection with the Imperial Council apply mutatis mutandis to the Provincial Council. As the Council will be organized on a wider basis, the Association would point out the necessity of extending the principle of election to at least one-half of the entire number composing the Council, the other half being selected by nomination. The Municipal and District Boards at present exercise the power of electing members to the Legislative Council. In vesting these bodies and also recognized public Associations or other Unions representing special interest in the district with powers of election, the Government will not only invest these bodies with a greater sense of responsibility and infuse them with greater activity, but through them effectually make known to the public the motives and intentions of Government. The Association believe that such a measure will be a gratifying step forward towards the "fulfilment in no ungrudging spirit of a pledge which the people of India are entitled to regard as inviolable."

11. Imperial Legislative Council.—The Association before submitting their opinion on the measures proposed would at the outset humbly subimit that there is hardly any justification for the complaint about the preponderance of the legal profession in the Legislative Councils. The very fact of their influence being on the increase is an admission of their special qualification due to their special training and independence of character and their close touch with all classes and interests, and this entitles them to represent the views and wishes of all classes and interests in matters affecting them by any legislative measure. They are not only men of culture but have landed or monied interests, and it would hardly be wise and politic to minimize their influence, as is anticipated to result from the principle under which the Council is proposed to be constituted.

12. A seat for a ruling Chief in the Council seems to be quite unnecessary, as he will be unfit on account of his ignorance of the requirements of the British subjects to give any help in any legislative measure. That seat may be more advantageously spared for a backward province, to be filled up by nomination of a man of culture and independence of character.

13. For reasons stated at length above, the Association would humbly suggest that seats should be allotted to the representatives of the five great Universities in India and recognized public Associations and Unions representing special interests.

14. The Association would suggest that in forming electorates for landholders the amount of land revenue, Rs 10,000, giving a right to vote, should be reduced to Rs. 2,000 in order to encourage these landholders to take greater interest in public affairs. So far as Orissa is concerned, the reduction is necessary, as otherwise the right will be extended only to a very few, most of whom are again non-resident.

15. Provincial Legislative Council.—No definite scheme has yet been formulated for the organization of the Provincial Legislative Council, and the Association are therefore unable to give any definite opinion upon it.

16. The Association would generally deprecate any undue importance being attached to racial, caste, or class representation in the organization of Municipal or Local Boards, without having due regard to their efficiency and competency in the management of the affairs of such Boards.

17. The Association would suggest that to give each part of the Province an equal share or facility in the exercise of its right of representation, one seat for each Commissioner's division might with advantage be reserved to be filled up by election by the District Board or Municipalities (by turns or jointly) in the division. This step will afford each division to repre sent its special needs and requirements.

18. In conclusion, the Association would earnestly press upon the attention of Government the special claims of Orissa for a seat in the Legislative as well as in the Advisory Councils. Having regard to the special land-tenure system of Orissa, and the backward condition of the people, with their peculiar manners and customs, it would be giving bare justice to allow them special facility for constant representation of their interestes in the Council. In the absence of proper representation their interests have not only greatly suffered but at times been overlooked in the matter of legislation. Some legislative measures suited to the advanced conditions in Bengal proper have been made applicable to, or have been extended to, the limited and backward conditions in Orissa, and in consequence, practical difficulties have arisen in their application and operation, and have most injuriously affected the interests of the less advanced classes in Orissa. The local officials, if referred to, will bear out the truth of this statement. As the territorial magnates or big landholders in Orissa are only very few, and most of whom are even non-residents, the Association would suggest that the Municipalities and recognized Associations in Orissa might be vested with the power of selecting a special representative for Orissa in the Provincial Legislative Councils.

No. 397, dated Calcutta, the 10th December 1907.

From—Maharaj-Kumar Sir Prodyot Coomar Tagore, Honorary Secretary, British Indian Association.
To—The Offg. Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter, with enclosure, No. 1976A.—D., dated the 18th September 1907, requesting an expression of opinion of the British Indian Association on the proposed formation of Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils. In reply I am desired by the Committee of the Association to submit the following observations for the consideration of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor.

The Imperial Advisory Council.

2. The Committee cordially approve of the proposal for establishing both Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils. The Imperial Council will be invested with much dignity and will command great respect, and, if well-constructed, will supply the means of giving political education to the ruling chiefs and territorial magnates. It will ultimately form the nucleus of an Upper House, having immense possibilities before it. When sufficiently well-developed it will be a source of great power to the Government and the people. The Government of India are right in saying that the establishment of such a Council would be no innovation in principle, as an organisation of this nature existed in ancient India. Such an institution was recognized by ancient Hindu polity, and Hindu sovereigns in the plenitude of their power were guided in all their measures, domestic or foreign, by the counsels of competent advisers. The revival of the institution, if it be adapted to modern requirements, is sure to meet with general satisfaction. The Councillors will be brought into closer relations with the Government, and will be greatly honoured and benefited by being intimately associated with the Viceroy in safeguarding Imperial interests.

3. The constitution of the Council, however, is, in the opinion of the Committee, wanting in several essentially useful elements to make it complete and capable of advising Government on questions of Imperial importance in connection with the administration of the country. The ruling chiefs have no intercourse in daily life with the residents of British India, and have little opportunities to know "the needs and sentiments of the masses of the people." The landed aristocracy, or the territorial magnates, who are recognised as "the hereditary leaders of the people," and some of whom are very capable and intellectually advanced, will represent, however worthily, only one special interest—though the largest interest,—namely, the landed interest. But there are a great many other interests unconnected with land, the representatives of which ought to be introduced into the Council. To make it a really useful body of advisers to the Government, persons of culture and experience and of well-balanced political opinion, who are fully capable of freely expressing their views on all questions of public importance, and—what is most important of all—of diffusing correct information as to facts and intentions of the Government, should be associated with the Ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates on the Council. In this connection, the Committee are reminded of the words of Manu, one of the oldest law-givers of India, when he speaks of the personnel of the advisers of Kings. They ought to be men "of property and culture, able and experienced, who are capable of thoroughly grasping in all their bearings the subjects presented for consideration."

4. Neither the functions nor the proceedings prescribed for the Council commend themselves to the Committee. They are not of a substantial character. The Councillors will possess no powers to initiate any measure, and will not be held responsible for their work. They may individually, collectively, or by Committees be consulted on any actual or prospective measures of Government, but the result of the consultations or deliberations will not be recorded, and no trace of the work done by them will be left behind. The functions are to be purely advisory, and they are not to be vested with formal powers of any sort. Strict silence is to be maintained by them in regard to their relations with the Government. The proceedings are to be private, informal and confidential. The Committee believe that under such conditions it would be difficult to induce really good men to accept the office of Councillors. They are expected to act as interpreters between the Government and the people, but if they are to maintain inviolable secrecy and silence with respect to all questions placed before them for consideration, how can they be qualified, or able, to correct misconceptions or erroneous impressions, or to explain the motives of official action? For this purpose, it is absolutely necessary that the Councillors should be empowered, under proper safeguards, to use all the information placed before them. This is necessary for another powerful reason. In order that the Councillors may effectually be able to influence the people, they must acquire their confidence, and this cannot be acquired unless the people are convinced that full information is given to them, and that there is nothing veiled in mystery. The Committee would suggest that, when necessary, individual opinions, or collective deliberations, should be published for the purpose of satisfying legitimate public curiosity, and also for strengthening the influence and the weight of the advice of the Councillors. Let secrecy be by all means maintained, when such secrecy is required for public weal, but when it is harmful, and would be calculated to unnecessarily mystify the people, it should not be enjoined, as it would destroy public confidence. The Committee, therefore, respectfully venture to propose that as regards the functions of the Council, the members should have the privilege of bringing to the notice of Government such matters as they consider of importance, and of inviting discussion thereon at a conference.

5. The number of Councillors should be distributed in proportion to the area, population, importance and varied interests of each Province.

Provincial Advisory Councils.

6. The Committee are gratified to notice that there is to be material difference between the constitution, the functions and the proceedings of the Imperial and those of the Provincial Councils. The latter are to be organized on a far wider basis, though the analogy between the two Councils is to be formally maintained. Besides Provincial magnates, there are to be in the Provincial Councils representatives of the smaller landholders, of industry and commerce, of capital, and of what are called "the professional classes," the latter including, no doubt, educated and cultured men of the Province. Thus the representatives of all important interests of the Province are to be admitted in the Council. The Committee are also glad to observe that the opinions and deliberations of the Councillors, taken either individually or collectively, are to be recorded. In this way, without destroying the advantage of close and confidential communication, importance will be given to the proceedings; and the written record may enable the Government, when necessary, to appeal to the people by publishing the matured opinions of their natural and hereditary leaders. The Association of non-official Europeans, representing important interests, with representative Indian gentlemen, is to be welcomed on various grounds. They will be mutually benefited by such intimate association.

7. The Provincial Advisory Councils are to be of smaller size. But they ought not to be so small as to be incapable of including in them the representatives of all important Provincial interests. In Bengal the number ought not to be less then thirty-five. All the different districts of the Province, in the opinion of the Committee, should be adequately represented.

8. The Committee would beg His Honour to consider their remarks, with regard to the constitution, functions and proceedings of the Imperial Council, as equally applicable to those of the Provincial Advisory Councils.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

9. The principle upon which the proposed enlargement of the Legislative Councils is based marks a most gratifying step in constitutional progress. The proposed addition to existing members of the Council, representing various important interests, will be of great public advantage. The Councillors, under the proposed system, will be able to adequately represent the thoughts, feelings and wants of different classes of the people, and bring to the knowledge of the Legislature the most pressing requirements of the country. Their views are sure to have considerable weight with Government. The details of the scheme, however, require careful consideration.

10. The pronouncement that "official majority" must be maintained will, the Committee regret to say, have the effect of considerably diminishing the value of the work done by the Council. The number of seats has been increased to 53, with the Viceroy to 54. Excluding the experts, there are to be 23 non-official members. The number seems to be large, but taken side by side with 29 official votes, its significance is not of great value. It is clear, therefore, that the proposal for enlargement of the Council would in no way alter its official character. The non-official members would, as regards effective voting power, be left exactly where they were. The proceedings will be lengthened by academic discussions without affording any appreciable public benefit. Then, again, the most valuable time of a large number of official members would be wasted to the detriment of public service. This is a consideration which, in the interest of good government, ought not to be overlooked.

11. The Committee fail to understand why a standard official majority in the Council should be insisted on. Any suspicion that the paramount power of the Government would ever be disputed is entirely baseless. A conflict of opinion between the official and non-official members, where public welfare is concerned, is a far-fetched contingency. Even if it should ever occur, the remedy is in the hands of the Viceroy. He has the casting vote and the power of veto, and on emergent occasions, for special purposes, for special legislation, in which exceptional Government intesests are concerned, he is empowered to nominate members whose support could be most safely reckoned upon. In distributing seats in the Council, the good old English maxim that "confidence begets confidence" should never be forgotten. Equality of votes may, at first sight, seem to be too large a political concession. But, when carefully examined, it will be found to be a source of great political strength and not of weakness. It will be calculated to ensure the cordial co-operation of the people, and this by itself is an immense political gain.

12. The Committee are unable to realise the justice or expediency of granting four seats to Muhammadans as Muhammadans. They are opposed to creed-legislation. If one religious class be favoured, members of all the prevailing religions in India would clamour for special representation. Already they understand, more than one religious community have put in their claim. Ever since the establishment of British rule, class distinctions, in legislative matters, have not been observed. Neither the substantive nor the adjective law of the land has been found unsuitable to the requirements of any community. The Committee cannot conceive of any emergent occasion when special legislation for Muhammadans would be necessary. If such an occasion should ever occur, votes for special purposes, reserved in the hands of the Viceroy, would supply what might be needed. Competent Hindus, Muhammadans, Parsis and Christians have hitherto been admitted to the Council, no because they were members of different religions, but because they were distinguished members of the Indian community, and no objection has ever been raised to their admission. We have been told that special preference should be shown to Muhammadans on account of their numbers, and social, political and historical importance. The Committee do not see the value of the so-called "importance," and fail to find any reason why they should be singled out for special treatment, or why a separate Muhammadan electorate should be created. Exclusive electorates are mischievous and tend to break the growing solidarity of the various races in India. The Muhammadans or rather more correctly speaking, those who profess the Muhammadan faith, constitute about 21 per cent. of the whole population of India, the bulk of whom belong to East Bengal, the Punjab and the Frontier Provinces. The Committee venture to invite Government to consider whether the above facts could justify the creation of a special constituency based on any special religion. They would suggest that the item D (d) in the scheme for the constitution of the Council be omitted to make room for the representatives of the several Universities of India.

13. Two alternative proposals are made for forming electorates of landholders—an independent electorate in each Province, or an electorate formed of landholders of Provincial Councils. The number of electors in the latter body would be necessarily very small; the Committee would, therefore, prefer an independent electorate. But they submit that the amount of land revenue per se will not in many cases give the correct financial position of a landholder. A net income of Rs. 12,000 from landed properties ascertained from the Road Cess returns or otherwise should be the minimum qualification.

14. The Committee regret that the claims of education to representation in the Imperial Council have been ignored. It cannot be too often repeated that men of property and of culture must be associated together, for political purposes, and they cannot be separated from each other without impairing the efficiency of both. The Committee, therefore, beg to recommend that a certain number of seats be reserved for the five great Universities of the country.

The Provincial Legislative Councils.

15. There is no definite scheme for the organization of Provincial Legislative Councils, and it is not possible to offer any opinion upon it till it is clearly formulated. The general principle which Provincial Governments are enjoined to follow in organizing these Councils is that "the widest representation should be given to classes, races and interests, subject to the condition that an official majority must be maintained." Stringent provisions are directed to be made regarding representation based on racial, religious and caste or class distinctions. Local Boards forming electorates are to be composed of voters recruited from most heterogeneous groups of men. As the constitutions of the Provincial Councils, it is said, must largely depend upon the Municipal and other Local Boards, the organization of the latter bodies must be so changed that landlords, traders, capitalists, professional men, cultivators artisans and other occupational classes may be freely admitted into them. The effect of all these revolutionary changes would be that all respectable men, belonging to the higher classes of society, would keep themselves aloof from taking a share in public affairs. Landlords as a class would refuse to sit on the Board with men who are their own raiyats, and who are mudies, banias, or people belonging to the lower strata of society. Good and respectable persons would not be induced, under such conditions, to offer themselves as candidates for election for the Council, or to take their seats as electors.

16. The defects of racial, religious, caste and class representation are manifold, and the Committee consider it inimical to popular advancement. It cannot but be viewed with great disapprobation. If such representation be adopted, social and political progress would be checked, and the country would be subjected to the most enervating influences.

17. The Government of India say that "for the present, at any rate, the needs and sentiments of the masses of the people must find expression through those, whether officials or non-officials, who are acquainted with their daily life, and are qualified to speak with authority on their behalf." This pronouncement is not compatible with the injunction that the widest representation should be granted to races, creeds, castes and "occupational groups"—who mainly compose the masses above referred to. The Committee find from the Census Reports that 78 to 80 per cent. of the people are agriculturists or cultivators, who, as a rule, are steeped in ignorance. They are acquainted with their crops and cattle, but are entirely ignorant of the mysteries of political representation. A time may come when their level of intelligence may be raised, but that time has not yet arrived. Cultivators and the occupational groups must wait for a long time yet before they can aspire to an adequate recognition of their political rights.

18. The remarks made by the Government of India against Municipalities and District Boards regarding the men elected by them for the Provincial Councils are neither just nor merited. The gentleman selected are invariably qualified to occupy the office of legislators. The remarks are based upon misapprehension of their social status, pecuniary means and political influence. In most cases, if not in all, they are landholders or propertied men, in addition to being cultured men or members of the so-called professional classes. If a school-master, or a lawyer is sometimes selected, he is so chosen because he is a cultured man, in comfortable circumstances, who commands extensive social influence, and is well qualified to speak with authority on behalf of the people. These men are the ornaments of our society, and represent the intellectual forces of the nation.

19. The Committee beg to propose that the non-official portion of the Bengal Council may be constituted as follows:—

(a) Each Division should return a member through the District Boards and Municipalities alternately;

(b) The Chambers of Commerce—European and Indian,—the Trades Association, the Calcutta Corporation and the Calcutta University should each return a member;

(c) Large landed proprietors or territorial magnates should return two members from amongst them, the minimum qualification being a net income of Rs. 25,000 a year from landed properties;

(d) Smaller landed proprietors should return two members, the minimum qualification being a net income of Rs. 12,000 a year from landed properties;

(e) Two non-official members nominated by Government to represent minorities or special interests.

Budget Discussions.

20. The Committee have only one word to say with regard to the proposed Budget Discussions. The Government of India propose that the Budget may be discussed by "separate heads." The Committee generally approve of the proposal, but they are afraid that such discussion would not be productive of any practical benefit. Proceedings may be lengthened, and valuable time may be wasted, but the core of the evil would not be touched. The faltering and hesitating suggestion made, that the additional light thrown by the discussion may enable the authorities to alter the Budget under consideration, holds out but a very feeble hope of amendment. That in "subsequent years" the discussions may bear fruit is an equally vain expectation. Some other radical change is necessary, in which the representative leaders of the people may take a prominent part, to make the Budget Discussions productive of real benefit to the country. In dealing with questions of raising taxes and other sources of income, and in questions concerning national expenditure, the representatives of the people should have a powerful voice. Such a reform would meet national requirements, and satisfy national aspirations.

21. In conclusion, the Committee would recommend the holding of informal conferences before making definite financial arrangements for the year. The Bengal Government, the Committee understand, held such a meeting during the present year with profitable results.

No. 25—O., dated Calcutta, the 10th January 1908.
From—H. M. Haywood, Esq., Secretary, Indian Tea Association,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I am directed by the Committee of the Indian Tea Association to address you with reference to the proposals recently made by the Government of India, in their letter No. 2310-17, dated 24th August 1907, to the Local Governments and Administrations, for the formation of Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the existing Legislative Councils. The Committee have had an opportunity of submitting their views on the proposals as a whole to the Government of Eastern Bengal and Assam, and all they desire here is to make certain suggestions in regard to the representation of the industry on the Advisory and Legislative Councils of Bengal.

2. The Committee think it well to preface their remarks with some statistics which will serve to indicate the importance of the industry. In the whole of India the quantity of land under actual tea cultivation was, in 1906, 531,808 acres, while the land occupied by planters, although not under tea, was 1,011,815 acres. The capital of the Joint Stock Tea Companies registered in India and in London amounts to nearly 22 crores of rupees, to which has to be added the large amount of private capital engaged in the industry; and all this capital is irrevocably sunk in the country. More than five-sixths of the area under tea is situated in the Provinces of Bengal and Eastern Bengal and Assam, and the whole of the tea industry of Northern India is very largely controlled from Calcutta. The Committee therefore think it reasonable to ask that this Association should be allowed a representative on each of the two Provincial Councils of Bengal. They are aware that, as the Bengal Legislative Council has been hitherto constituted, it has not been possible to make room for a representative of the tea industry, but they submit that in any scheme of enlargement it should be made possible to place at its disposal one seat. Although representation is already given to the general commercial interests of the Province, it is strongly felt that the importance of the interests represented by this Association amply warrant the Committee in making this request, and they trust that it will receive the sympathetic consideration of Government. In the absence of detailed information as to the functions of the proposed Advisory Council, the Committee are not easily able to determine to what extent the questions likely to come before it will be of interest to their own industry, but important questions affecting the latter can hardly be excluded from its deliberations, and they accordingly ask that a seat on this Council also should be allotted to a representative of tea interests.

No. 27—1908, dated Calcutta, the 11th January 1908.

From—H. M. Haywood, Esq., Secretary, Bengal Chamber of Commerce,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 1982A.—D., dated 18th September 1907, in which you ask for the views of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce upon the proposals, which have been recently made by the Government of India, for the formation of Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the existing Legislative Councils.

Letter No. 2310-17, dated 24th August 1907, from the Government of India, Home Department, to the Local Governments and Adminstrations.

2. Before proceeding to consider these proposals in detail, the Committee of the Chamber wish to record their sense of satisfaction at the step which has thus been taken by the Government. For years past they have been impressed with the need which exists for bringing all classes of the people into closer relationship with Government and its officers, and any measures designed to achieve this end are bound to be supported by the commercial community. The legislation of 1892 undoubtedly marked a great advance. The free discussion of the annual financial proposals of the Government, which was then permitted for the first time, was in itself an innovation of no small consequence. And the enlargement of the Councils, the introduction of the elective principle, and the other changes which were also then made, have rendered possible the further scheme of reform which is now under discussion.

General.

3. But while the Committee thus welcome the measure, as evidencing the desire of the Government of India to move forward in the path of constitutional reform, they do not hesitate to criticise certain of its principal details. They offer their criticism the more freely, because they observe that the scheme is, in its main features, entirely provisional and suggestive. It is not their wish to enter into political questions, nor do they propose to offer any opinion as to what classes of the Indian population should be represented, or upon what principle the representatives should be elected or nominated. They are concerned more particularly with the position to be accorded to the commercial community in the Councils; and they say at once that they consider the proposals to be in this respect altogether inadequate. As the scheme stands at present, the commercial element is to be entirely excluded from the Imperial Advisory Council. With regard to the Provincial Advisory Councils, it is stated in the letter from the Government of India that "the association of non-official Europeans standing for these important interests (industry, commerce, capital, etc.,) with the natural leaders of Indian society in common consultation on matters of public importance, would tend to promote a better understanding and to clear away on both sides injurious prejudices and misconceptions." This somewhat indefinite statement is the only reference to the point so far as these Councils are concerned, and it gives no idea of the extent to which the interests in question will be represented. Coming next to the Imperial Legislative Council, the Committee find that, of the fifty-four members, two only are presumably to be non-official Europeans, although it is possible that one more may be nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy. The representation of the community on the Provincial Legislative Councils is not defined, but in paragraph 11 of the letter it is mentioned.

Representation of Commerce.

4. The Committee of the Chamber are not unmindful of the fact that, in framing their proposals, the Government of India had, of course, to consider the country as a whole. But even so, they cannot help feeling that the interests for which the non-official Europeans stand have been, to a large extent, overlooked. The fact that these interests vary in size and importance in the different provinces no doubt contributes to the difficulty of providing for their adequate representation. For, while in some parts of the country they are of small extent, in others, and notably in North-East India, they are of great magnitude. In Eastern Bengal and Assam they are concerned chiefly with planting; but in Bengal proper both manufacturing industries and mining enterprise have made remarkable progress under European direction. The value of the jute manufactured goods exported from Calcutta amounted to more than Rs. 15½ crores in 1906-07; while upwards of 8 million tons of coal were raised from the Bengal mines. The general commercial interests of the province are also of far greater consequence than those of any other province, and they are rapidly expanding. How rapid the expansion has been is shown by the fact that during the last fifteen years the shipping entered at the port of Calcutta has increased from rather more than 2½ million tons to close upon 6¼ million tons yearly. And at the present time Calcutta is responsible for about 42 per cent. of the total value of the import and export trade of India. For while the trade of the whole country (excluding treasure) aggregated Rs. 284 crores during the last official year, that of Calcutta amounted to Rs. 120 crores. It is an admitted fact that the bulk of this trade may be correctly termed European; and the figures lend much support to the claim that those who are so largely concerned with the commerce and industry of the province are entitled to adequate representation in both the Imperial and Provincial Advisory and Legislative Councils.

Imperial Advisory Councils.

5. The existence of the official majority makes the provision of an adequate representation of European interests on the Legislative Councils a matter of difficulty. But this difficulty will not be experienced in the case of the Advisory Councils; for as they are to be consultative bodies only, the question of an official majority will not arise. Upon the Advisory Councils, therefore, the European element may expect to be fully represented; and the Committee of the Chamber would venture respectfully to express a hope that the Government of India, in reconsidering their scheme, will be able to provide for this. The functions and duties of the Imperial Advisory Council are not defined in detail in the papers, but agricultural, commercial and industrial questions can hardly be excluded from its discussions. If this assumption be correct, it will not be unreasonable for the Committee to suggest that two seats on this Council should be allotted to Europeans. One of these might be given to a nominee of those of the community who are engaged in commerce and industry in the great towns; and the other to a nominee of the planting and zamindary interest in the mofussil.

Provincial Advisory Councils.

6. Coming next to the Provincial Advisory Councils, the Committee restrict their suggestions to the Council for Bengal, in which there should be, they consider, not fewer than seven European members. The general commercial, industrial and shipping interests of the province are, as has been already shown, of quite sufficient consequence to be given one seat; and the mining, tea and jute industries may justly claim to be entitled to separate representation. The European zamindary and planting interests of the province should also not be overlooked, and in that behalf, the Behar Planters' Association might be permitted to nominate one representative, while a second could be chosen from the lower parts of the province. The growing importance of the interests centred in the Calcutta Trades' Association should likewise be borne in mind; and the Committee suggest that that body should be permitted to nominate a member.

Imperial Legislative Council.

7. The Committee now turn to the other and, as they think, equally important branch of the present proposals, namely, the enlargement of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils. Dealing first with the Imperial Council, they notice that the scheme outlined in paragraph 12 of the letter is tentative only. They are glad that this is so, because they do not hesitate to say that in their opinion mercantile interests would be most inadequately represented in a Council constituted on the lines suggested. They recognise and admit the limitations which are imposed upon the Government by their determination to maintain an official majority. But a full examination of the whole scheme raises the question whether this principle is not being carried somewhat beyond what is absolutely necessary. The Committee are inclined to think that it is, but they do not seek to emphasise this opinion on the present occasion; for the object which they have in view can be attained without any real encroachment being made on the official majority.

8. The scheme defined in the Government letter provides for a Council of fifty-four members, including His Excellency the Viceroy. Excluding His Excellency, twenty-eight of this members are to be officials, and twenty-five are to be non-officials. Of the official members, eight will be the members of the Executive Council, and the remaining twenty are to be appointed for the purpose of maintaining the official majority. The proposal which the Committee of the Chamber venture to make is that, of the non-officials members, the two experts who may be nominated when necessary by His Excellency for special purposes should either not be permitted to vote at all, or should vote only under such restrictions as may, in the opinion of Government, be advisable. If this were done, it would be possible to limit the number of additional officials to eighteen, and to increase the number of non-official Europeans by two. The Council would then consist of twenty-seven official members, including His Excellency, and the some number of non-official members. But as two of the latter would only be appointed for short periods in special circumstances, and would only vote, if they voted at all, under restrictions, there would still remain a permanent official majority of two members.

9. It may be urged that the Indian representation might be curtailed to such an extent as to permit of the appointment of two additional European non-officials. But the Committee of the Chamber do not support this view, firstly, because they recognise the importance of an adequate representation of Indian interest, and, secondly, because, as they understand the matter, the Government do not suggest that so many additional officials members are necessary, except for the purpose of maintaining the majority. If the majority can be maintained, as the Committee think it can, with fewer officials, there would appear to be no objection to the adoption of their proposal. Should the Government be inclined to consider it favourably, they would recommend that the two additional non-officials should represent, respectively, the planting and the manufacturing industries of Northern India. The nominee of the planting interest might be selected alternately by the Indian Tea Association and by the Behar Planters' Association. And as the principal manufactories under European management are situated in Bengal and the United Provinces, the Bengal Chamber of Commerce and the Upper India Chamber might be entrusted alternately with the selection of the representatives of this interest. In order that the European community of Southern India may be provided for, the Committee suggest that one of the four members, who are to be nominated by His Excellency in behalf of minorities, should always be a European non-official from the Madras Presidency.

Provincial Legislative Councils.

10. The Provincial Legislative Councils still remain for consideration. The Committee are unacquainted with the views entertained by the Government of Bengal in regard to the composition of the Bengal Council. But they have observed that His Honour Sir John Hewett is of opinion that the Council for the United Provinces might consist of thirty-five or thirty-six members, of whom about seventeen would be non-officials. Assuming that the Bengal Council would not be of smaller dimensions, the Committee would recommend that there should be at least five non-official European members. Two of these might be appointed by the Chamber of Commerce, one on behalf of the general commercial interest, and the second as representative of the jute and other manufacturing industries, while the third could be nominated by the Indian Tea Association. The Calcutta Trades' Association would, of course, continue to appoint a member; and the fifth seat could be filled by a representative—to be nominated by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor—of the European zamindars and landholders of the province.

The Budget.

11. Reference has been already made to the valuable change which was introduced fifteen years ago in regard to the Budget. The further advance which is now proposed will be now less highly appreciated by all concerned in commerce and finance; but the Committee of the Chamber venture to think that it does not go quite far enough. It is stated in the letter that, although the remarks offered in the course of the discussion may perhaps occasionally result in the alteration of the Budget under review, they will usually be borne in mind by the Government of India, or the Local Governments, when making financial arrangements in subsequent years. But this is surely the principal defect of the existing system, and, so long as it is maintained, the Committee question if the debate will be divested of the unreality which is admitted to be one of its characteristics at present. They hold the view that the Budget should be submitted to the Council in the form of financial proposals, in regard to which the Government would be prepared to consider any criticism which might be offered. If this were done, and if the Government accepted and acted upon such of the suggestions as might meet with their approval, the debate would almost certainly become less discursive and much more real and practical that it is now. For the speakers would be in much closer relation with the policy and aims of Government than they can possibly be under a system whereby their ideas and proposals cannot ordinarily be considered until the financial arrangements for subsequent years are being formulated.

No. 3977-A., dated Calcutta, the 24th July 1908.

From—F. W. Duke, Esq., I.C.S., Officiating Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

In continuation of Mr. Gait's letter No. 1746-A., dated the 29th February 1908, I am directed to submit a copy of a letter from the Secretary to the Calcutta Trades Association, dated the 30th June 1908, regarding the representation of the European non-official community on the Imperial Advisory Council and of that Association on the Bengal Provincial Advisory Council. In paragraphs 8 and 13 of Mr. Gait's letter the Lieutenant-Governor has already expressed his views regarding the constitution of these Councils.

2. The Trades Association requests that its representation on the Bengal Legislative Council may be legally secured. Under the existing Regulations for the nomination of Members of the Council, this Association has not the right of recommending a representative. The Association has, however, always been represented on the Council since 1861, and on the occurrence of a vacancy, the Lieutenant-Governor invariably invites that body to recommend a person for nomination to one of the three non-official seats which are not filled on the recommendation of the prescribed public bodies and associations. In this connection I am to invite attention to the proposals made in paragraph 20 of the letter of the 29th February 1908, referred to above.

Dated Calcutta, the 30th June 1908.

From—G. Hickie, Esq., Secretary to the Calcutta Trades Association,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I have the honour to address you with regard to the proposals which are now before the Government on the subject of the enlargement of the Legislative Councils, Imperial and Provincial, and the establishment of the Advisory Councils.

2. The Committee of the Trades Association have read with much interest the letter which has been addressed by the Secretary to the Government of India is the Home Department to the Government of Bengal in which the new scheme is exhaustively dealt with, and as public opinion is invited on the question, the Committee desire to place before His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor their views on some of the points referred to.

3. The Committee regard the principle underlying the whole scheme as one that will commend itself to all sections of the community: at the same time they notice with regret that in dealing with the reconstitution of the Imperial Advisory Council, the Government of India have found no place for a representative of the commercial community. The Committee trust that upon further consideration the claims of the European non-official community to representation on this Council will be recognised.

4. In regard to the Advisory Council for the Province of Bengal in which this Association is directly interested, it is observed that the Government of India propose that it shall comprise the great landholders, the smaller landlords, the industry and commerce of the province, as well as the professional classes; the association too of non-official Europeans standing for these important interests with the natural leaders of Indian society will, it is hoped, add to the utility of the Council. It appears to the Committee of the Association that the constitution of this Council might be extended to include adequate representation of the interests of the European trading community which in the scheme under notice has been practically ignored.

5. In this connection the Committee would beg leave to submit that the opportunity should be taken while the formation of a Provincial Advisory Council and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils are under discussion, to place the representation of the interests of the trading community on a more satisfactory basis than it stands at present. In making this suggestion the Committee would point to the prominence occupied by individual members of the Trades community in all great cities even when the representation depends on the general suffrage and not on sectional representation; they would further, in passing, observe that Trade guilds were the origin of Municipal freedom. These facts, if they convey any meaning, bear testimony to the fitness of the Trades as a class for the duties and responsibilities of public life, and for which in India they are well equipped by their intimate knowledge of the country and its people, knowledge acquired by the journeys far and wide to all parts of the land, and of a kind not ordinarly attainable by the official and commercial classes. In the Advisory Council which is designed "to bring all classes of the people into closer relations with the Government," the leading representatives of the Association would, the Committee believe, by their exceptional knowledge of the people, from the Ruler of a State to the smallest landlord, be in a position to render service to the Government.

6. In regard to the Legislative Council, by the courtesy of the Lieutenant-Governor the Trades Association is now, and has been for some time, represented on the Bengal Legislative Council; the Committee respectfully submit that this privilege should be continued in the reorganised Council and conferred by legislative enactment, thereby following the procedure observed in the election of representatives on the Port Trust and Corporation of Calcutta. The interests for which this Association stands are of increasing importance and there are few Acts passed by the Legislature which do not affect those interests either directly or indirectly. As the oldest public body in the city it has been consulted by the Government on all important questions which have arisen since its formation nearly eight years ago, and the development of Calcutta during that period has been materially influenced and advanced by its operations and by the community its represents. We now respectfully request that the Association and the important interests it represents may have distinct representation on the proposed Provincial Advisory Council, and that its representation on the Bengal Legislative Council may be legally secured.

No. 447 OF 1908.

FROM

THE HON'BLE MR. J. M. HOLMS, C.S.I., CHIEF SECRETARY TO GOVERNMENT,
UNITED PROVINCES,

TO

THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA,
HOME DEPARTMENT.

Dated Allahabad, the 16th March 1908.

SIR,

GENERAL ADMINISTRATION DEPT.

I AM directed to reply to your letter no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th August 1907, dealing with the creation of Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils and other connected matters, in which you request this Government to submit its matured conclusions on each branch of the subject, together with a detailed statement of the alterations in the Council regulations necessary to carry its proposals into effect. His Highness the Maharaja of Benares, the British Indian Association of Oudh, the Landholders' Association for the Province of Agra, the University of Allahabad, the Upper India Chamber of Commerce and the Trustees of the Muhammadan Anglo Oriental College at Aligarh have been consulted, as well as all members of the Provincial Legislative Council, official and non-official, and all Commissioners, and in addition the Lieutenant-Governor has had the advantage of perusing a considerable number of opinions either furnished to Government by gentlemen interested in the question or published in the press. The copies of opinion which accompany this letter embrace those of all the public bodies consulted, those of all the members or former members of the Imperial or Provincial Legislative Councils which have been furnished to Government, and the opinions of the officers consulted which are of most value. I am to express regret that it was not found possible to despatch this letter so as to reach the Government of India by the desired date, the 1st of March.

2. The proposals put forwarded by the Government of India, as well as the subsidiary proposals placed by the Local Government before those consulted as a basis for discussion, have been subjected to considerable criticism. In some quarters they have been attacked as wholly inadequate: in others the criticism has been limited to the details of the proposals. The Lieutenant-Governor does not think it necessary to examine objections taken to the principle of the proposals, nor to discuss every detailed suggestion which has been made for their amendment, but will confine the expression of his opinion to those which seem to call for notice.

3. In paragraph 2 of your letter the Government of India refer to the increase that has taken place in the past twenty years in the number of scholars studying English from 298,000 to 500,000, in the number passing the annual matriculation examination of the Indian Universities from 4,286 to 8,211 and in the number annually proceeding to the degree of Bachelor of Arts from 708 to 1,570. The United Provinces have not moved in the matter of education as rapidly as some other parts of India. Twenty years ago the number studying English was 30,972 (including 10,100 in the lower primary stage, in which English is no longer taught); the University of Allahabad had only just been established; the students who passed the matriculation examination numbered 477, and 66 proceeded to the Bachelor of Arts degree. In 1907, there were 37,804 students studying English, 772 students who passed the matriculation examination, and 245 who proceeded to the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Out of the total population of India, inclusive of Europeans and Eurasians, 75 per ten thousand were recorded at the last census as knowing English: the corresponding figure in the United Provinces was only 40. English is disseminated in these provinces to a very much smaller extent than in the other large provinces, and they are, it is to be regretted, very backward in education in the varnacular languages also. The number returned as literate at the last census over the whole of India was 105 per thousand; in Madras it was 128, in Bombay 125, and in Bengal 109, in the United Provinces it was 59. In the cities the figures were for the whole of India 308, for Madras 400, for Bengal 339, for Bombay 404, and for the United Provinces 196.

A Legislative Council in these provinces was established by the proclamation issued by Her late Majesty on the 9th of November 1886, many years after the establishment of Legislative Councils in the Presidencies of Fort St. George, and Bombay, and the Lieutenant-Governorship of Bengal. In considering the proposals made by the Government of India it is, in the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion desirable that due regard should be paid to the backwardness in education of these provinces. It would be unwise to treat every part of India alike in the matter of the number of members of which its Legislative Council should be composed and the manner in which it should be constituted. If, then, some of the proposals which will be made in this letter, fall short of what will be attempted in other provinces, the reason is to be found in the fact which will, the Lieutenant-Governor feels assured, be admitted by all those who are well acquainted with them, that these provinces are not so ripe as some other parts of the country for measures of reform directed to giving the people wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters.

4. The first proposal put forward in your letter is that for the creation of Advisory Councils, Imperial and Provincial. These Councils are designed to ensure a more free and a more intimate consulation with those who are in a position to offer counsel of value than is afforded by the present Legislative Councils. The Lieutenant-Governor was, when he began to study this proposals of the Government of India, apprehensive that it might not be possible to give to these Councils sufficient occupation after they had been called into being, and that they might perish of inanition. But he no longer thinks that apprehension to be justifiable. There are many directions in which the Government could look to them for advice and aid. It is not, His Honour thinks, necessary or desirable to attempt an enumeration of the matters that might be referred to them for advice, but among questions that have recently had to be considered in these provinces, and in regard to which the opinion of such a body would have been of value, are measures against the plague, the extension of primary education, the administration of secondary education in its higher grades, developments in technical and industrial education, the working of co-operative credit societies, municipal taxation, the housing of the poor in congested areas and connected sanitary questions, and the organization of charitable famine relief. In the view, then, that there will be occupation for such Councils the Lieutenant-Governor welcomes the proposal to create them.

5. Before proceeding to refer to the proposals for the constitution of these Councils it seems desirable to notice a difference which the Government of India appear to make between the Imperial Advisory Council and the Provincial Advisory Council. In the last sentence of paragraph 4 of your letter it is stated that the Imperial Advisory Council will be consulted by the Governor General either individually or collectively, or by means of committees appointed from among their number, on questions of sufficient moment to call for their advice; they are to be used not only to draw out opinion on measures in contemplation, but also to diffuse correct information regarding the acts, intentions, and objects of the Government. As regards the Provincial Advisory Councils, it is said in paragraph 6 of the letter that each Local Government should be at liberty to consult its Advisory Council, either individually or collectively! in regard to any provincial question. In the former case they would be consulted by letter and would submit their views in writing: in the latter case they would be specially called together by the Head of the province and would tender a collective opinion. There thus appears to be a difference in treatment between the two Councils, in that the Government of India contemplate that opinions should be called for from committees of the Imperial Advisory Council, but not from committees of the Provincial Advisory Council. The Lieutenant-Governor feels unable to support the proposal that Government should formally consult a portion only of an Advisory Council.

Imperial Advisory Council.

6. The Lieutenant-Governor cordially agrees with the idea of associating the ruling chiefs in the general conduct of the affairs of British India, believing them to be likely to be shrewd and competent advisers on matters connected with our administration. The opinion of those consulted by this Government is practically unanimous that the forty members whom the Government of India propose to associate with twenty ruling Chiefs in constituting the Imperial Advisory Council should not be confined to the class of territorial magnates, and with this view the Lieutenant-Governor entirely concurs. He considers that, in the constitution of the Imperial Advisory Council, provision should be made for eminent retired Indians of either the judicial or executive service or other services of Government and for gentlemen who have been distinguished in the professions or public services or who have been selected by Government for titles and honours. I am therefore to suggest that the constitution of the Council should be modified so that it may contain twenty ruling Chiefs, twenty-five territorial magnates, and fifteen persons to be selected on account of their public services, their character,r their pre-eminence in other directions.

The attitude that the ruling Chiefs are likely to take up as regards their position in the Councils raises an important question. Sir John Hewett has reason to believe, from conversations that he has had with some of them, that they do not altogether appreciate their being grouped together with the territorial magnates of British India, as they have been in paragraph 4 of the Government of India's letter. They are there spoken of, along with the territorial magnates of British India as the hereditary leaders of the people both in British India and the native states. It has been represented to His Honour that they would like to see some distinction drawn between them and the other members of the Council, and in His Honour's opinion this wish is a very reasonable one. It might be acceded to by declaring that the ruling Chiefs, when appointed to the Imperial Advisory Council, should be appointed for life, the other members being appointed for five years. The tenure of office of either a ruling Chief or any other member of the Council would be determinable also on his committing any act showing him to be unworthy to remain in it.

7. Various suggestions have been made to this Government that a portion of the Advisory Councils should be elected, but this idea appears to the Lieutenant-Governor to be inconsistent with the whole scheme of the functions of the Councils being advisory. Nor is the idea of an Advisory Council that of a Council to be established by legislative authority, and His Honour is unable to support the suggestions which have been made for the legislative recognition of the Advisory Councils, and the creation of a constitution for them by legislation.

8. The functions which the Government of India propose to assign to the Imperial Advisory Council are stated in paragraph 5 (6) and (7) of your letter. It is proposed that these should be purely advisory, and that the Council should deal only with such matters as may be specifically referred to it from time to time; that the proceedings of the Council when called together for collective consultation should, as a rule, be private, informal, and confidential, and that they should not be published, although Government should be at liberty to make any use of them that it might think proper. It has been very strongly represented that the Imperial Council, as well as the Provincial Advisory Councils, should be empowered to bring matters of their own motion to the notice of Government, and that much of the advantage that would ensue from the establishment of the Councils would be lost if their functions were restricted in the manner proposed. It is also suggested that they should be epowered to request Government to give information on any particular subject. The Lieutenant-Governor supports both these suggestions. The Government could always refuse to give information upon any particular subject, but, inasmuch as one of the chief functions of the Councils will be to diffuse correct information regarding its acts, intentions and objects, it seems most desirable that they should be in a position to ascertain what these acts, intentions and objects are. The Lieutenant Governor is not in accord with the proposal that the proceedings of the Imperial Advisory Council when called together for collective consultation should, as a rule, be private, informal and confidential. The Government would naturally retain the power of declaring that any individual matter must be treated as confidential, and it might often happen that the Council itself would prefer that its deliberations upon a particular question should be so treated. The rule in His Honour's opinion, should be that no proceedings, except in regard to matters specifically declared by the Government of India to be confidential, need be confidential unless the Council so determine.

9. Another suggestion that has been made is that it is desirable that the Imperial Advisory Council as well as the Provincial Advisory Council should be called together at stated intervals. If they are to be of value, it appears certainly desirable that they should be necessarily called together at least once a year. The further question arises whether the members of the Council should be able to take action so that they may be specially called together on other occasions, and I am to suggest that a rule might be made that the Council should be called together on the request of not less than one-third of the members.

It is urged by some that the Government should defer to the views of the majority of the Council and that, supposing such numbers as two-thirds three-fourths of the Council are opposed to a proposal, the Government should not proceed with it. The Government would naturally pay deference to so strong an opinion, but the proposal that it should be compelled to act upon the advice seems to be inconsistent with the position of these Councils as advisory.

Provincial Advisory Councils.

10. The scheme outlined for the Provincial Advisory Council is that it should consist of "a select body of advisers chosen upon a wider basis whom it should be understood that Provincial Governments would consult upon all measures of importance affecting the populations committed to their charge." The nucleus of the Provincial Advisory Council would be the provincial members of the Imperial Council. The Provincial Councils are to be smaller in size than the Imperial Council, but it is intended "that their membership shall be large enough to embrace all interests of sufficient importance to claim representation on such a body." The great landowners would be represented by the Imperial councillors, and arrangements have to be made to include representatives of the smaller landholders, industry, commerce, capital, and the professional classes, while non-official Europeans are to be associated with the leaders of Indian society. The Local Government is to be at liberty to consult its Advisory Council either individually, or collectively, in regard to any provincial question; in the former case the consultations are to be by letter, and in the latter in an assembly where it would give a collective opinion. A provision, not made in regard to the Imperial Council is that when the Provincial Advisory Council is specially called together to give a collective opinion the Held or the Government himself, or some high official deputed by him for the purpose, should preside over their deliberations, and tha the conclusions arrived at should be recorded by one of the Secretaries to Government. Exception is taken, and in the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion very rightly, to this proposal. He holds that the Council should be free to choose its owa president and secretary and conduct its deliberations in the absence of any Government official.

11. In the proposals which this Government circulated far criticism the number suggested for the Provincial Advisory Council was twenty-five. A good many of those consulted hold that this number is not sufficiently large, and the Lieutenant-Governor, on reconsideration thinks that the number might be fixed at thirty-five.

The constitution of the Council need not be strictly defined. The Lieutenant-Governor should be at liberty to nominate the members after due consideration, not only of the interests to be represented but—what is at least of equal importance—of the best men who are available. The nucleus of the Council would consist of the representatives of the provinces on the Imperial Advisory Council, while the Lieutenant-Governor will arrange to nominate four out of the elected members of the Legislative Council. The balance will be available to represent the landholders, small and great, if the latter are insufficiently represented by the members of the Imperial Council, industry, commerce, the planting community, the professional classes, and educational and religions interests. It is not proposed to specify the proportion of the different classes, e. g. Muhammadans and Europeans, to be represented or to enumerate too closely those entitled to be represented or to assign specified numbers of seats to different parts of the provinces.

A proposal is made that when the Lieutenant-Governor visits a division he might call together the members of the Advisory Council belonging to that division. Any formal calling together of the Council except as a whole appears undesirable, but the Lieutenant-Governor would naturally take advantage of his presence among representatives of the Council to discuss matters with them in which they were interested.

Enlargement of the Legislative Councils.

12. It is remarked in paragraph 9 of your letter that the expectation that the electorates constituted on the enlargement of the Council would ensure the representation as far as possible of all the more important classes and interests, has not been realized. The figures given in your letter seem to give general support to this conclusion, but the remark which follows that the district boards in particular have conspicuously failed to fulfil the expectation that they would represent the landed interests is not supported by experience in these provinces. An element of error may have been imported into the figures quoted in support of this conclusion owing to each individual member, even though he may have been re-elected several times having been counted once only. The facts as they relate to these provinces lead to a conclusion different from that arrived at by the Government of India. Since 1893, when the system of election was first introduced in the United Provinces, there have been seven general elections to the seats thrown open, namely one each for two groups of district boards and one each for two groups of municipalities. The representives of the district boards who have been elected in the course of the last fourteen years have invariably been landholders, though one of them was a banker as well, and another, who was twice reelected, was also a retired judicial officer. On three occasions landholders were nominated by Government to represent one of the groups of district boards owing to no one having obtained the requisite majority of votes. All the gentlemen who have represented district boards in the past fourteen years have been talukdars of Oudh or large landholders of Agra. The representatives appointed to the seats thrown open to election by municipalities during the same period have been only four in number; one of those, a taluqdar of Oudh as well as a lawyer, has been elected at each of the seven elections, while two lawyers, were each elected three times respectively, and the fourth, a landholder, once. Thus half of the representatives of municipalities have been gentlemen with a substantial stake in the land, and out of twenty-eight representatives of district boards and municipalities in the past fourteen years twenty-two have been landholders. The only other elective bodies at present, besides the district boards and municipalities, are the Senate of the University of Allahabad and the Upper India Chamber of Commerce. The former, as is only to be expected, has always recommended lawyers, and the latter representatives of commerce. In the past fourteen years, of the two members nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor at his own discretion he has on thirteen occasions nominated landholders and on one occasion a retired judicial officer of eminence. If, then, representatives of two interests are shown as shared equally between these interests, out of the fifty-six appointments of non-officials made either after election or otherwise, 29½ or 53 per cent. have represented the land, 19 or 34 per cent. the law, and 7½ or 13 per cent. commerce and banking. These figures show that it is not the case in the United Provinces that the professional classes, as represented by the Bar, have been given a virtual monopoly of representation. Two features, however, stand out—the fact that no Muhammadan has ever been elected to the Council, and the fact that the representation of commercial interests other than those of the Upper India Chamber of Commerce has been inadequate.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

13. The provisional proposals for the constitution of this Council are stated in paragraph 12 of the Government of Ind a's letter. The Lieutenant-Governor does not deem it necessary to express any opinion regarding the details of these proposals except in so far as they concern the members to be elected by the Chambers of Commerce, by the nobles and great landholders of the United Provinces, and by the Muhammadans of the United Provinces respectively, and except on the question of wehther any classes not specially provided for ought to be included.

14. In the first place, His Honour desires to support the suggestion which has been made by the Upper India Chamber of Commerce that it and the Punjab Chamber should have the right of electing a representative either alternately or jointly. He is aware from his personal experience that the Chambers of Commerce on the sea-board do not always understand and appreciate the needs of commerce in the interior of the country, and that the interests of the sea-board Chambers may clash at times with those of inland ones.

15. In the matter of election of members by the great landholders of the United Provinces His Honour is unable to approve of either of the alternatives to election by the landholding class that are mentioned in paragraph 15 of the Government of India's letter. The first is that a representative of the landholders should be elected to the Imperial Council by the landholding members of the Provincial Council either from among their own number or from among landholders paying the amount of land revenue that may be fixed as giving the right to vote for, or to be a member of, the Provincial Council. Election in this manner would not satisfy the landholding classes. The second suggestion is that in some provinces representatives of the landholding classes might be better obtained by a system of nomination. In the United Provinces this would not be the case. The Lieutenant Governor considers that in present circumstances the representatives of the landholders in these provinces on the Imperial Legislative Council might be taken alternately from Agra and Oudh, and with this view most of those consulted agree. The British Indian Association of Oudh is a body which can certainly claim to elect its own representative. There is no association of equal position in Agra, for the Landholders' Association for the Province of Agra is not fully representative of the landholders of that province, while it admits persons who, being landholders themselves, are interested in the welfare of landholders and tenants. The Lieutenant-Governor, however, apprehends no difficulty in arranging for a suitable electorate for select representatives of the landholders in Agra. A suggestion has been made that this electorate should be nominated by Government, but it does not commend itself to the Lieutenant-Governor.

The amount of land revenue which will give a right to vote in Agra might suitably be fixed at Rs. 10,000 a year. Such a franchise will give an electorate of 284 persons, which, though higher than the figure of from 100 to 150 suggested by the Government of India, is, in His Honour's opinion, not inconveniently high. And the Lieutenant-Governor thinks that it ought also to include all title holders who hold the title of Raja or Nawab, or the hereditary titles of Mirza Bahadur, Mirza, Rajwar, Rai, Rao Bahadur, Rao, Diwan, or Chaudhri which have been officially recognized by the Government. This suggestion will not involve a large addition to the electorate, while it will have the effect of including in it some gentlemen, such as the Rajas of Rampura and Jagamanpur and the Rao of Gopalpara in the Jalaun district, who have great influence in the country-side, but do not now possess landed property paying Rs. 10,000 of revenue a year. The Lieutenant Governor supports the proposal of the Maharaja of Benares that a landholder, in order to qualify for election as a representative, should reside on his estate at least six months in the year, and he should also be qualified as an elector.

The method of recording the votes of this electorate presents some difficulties. It is out of the question to arrange for the meeting in one place of so large an electorate resident over so wide an area, and the Maharja of Benares has suggested that the electors for each district should elect a representative and that the body of representatives should attend at Allahabad and vote there. In order to carry out this proposal the number of representatives for each district would have to be allotted according to the voting power of the district. But this voting power varies so much (some districts have no landholders paying Rs. 1,000 or over as land revenue, while others have over twenty) that the suggestion could not be given effect to. Again, it has been suggested that the electors resident in a particular division might elect one or more representatives for the division according to their voting power and that the divisional representatives might meet for the election at Allahabad, the candidate securing the largest number of votes being elected to avoid the difficulties which occur under the present rules in elections by representatives of district and municipal boards, which require that a candidate to be elected must obtain the support of the majority of the representatives. Under this scheme the number to meet and vote at Allahabad would be about 30. Past experience, however, shows the great difficulty of collecting voters in electorates distributed over smaller areas than the province of Agra, and the Lieutenant-Governor despairs of being able to make suitable arrangements for the collection of voters from every part of it in one place. He is unable to suggest any better arrangement for recording the votes than that voters should be allowed to send them by registered post, the letter after having been closed being attested by the seal of the office of the District Magistrate so as to prevent false votes from being sent.

16. As regards the election of a member of the Imperial Legislative Council by the Muhammadan community, it is generally agreed that in the United Provinces a limit of Rs. 25,000 per annum for the minimum amount of land revenue or the income on which income-tax is paid is too high for the Muhammadan electorate; and this is borne out by the figures, which show an electorate on this basis as one of thirty-four persons only. A more suitable electorate would be one formed on the basis of a similar limit of Rs. 10,000 per annum, which would give 160 persons. To these should be added the Muhammdan members of the Provincial Legislative Council, the Muhammadan Fellows of the Allahabad University (some 20 in number), and such of the Trustees of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College at Aligarh as are resident in these provinces and are not otherwise qualified. The Lieutenant-Governor is unable to support the proposal of the Raja of Mahmudabad to give votes to Muhammadan graduates of over six years' standing. As regards the method of voting, the Raja has suggested that the electors of this class and those of the classes of large landholders and income-tax payers in each division should each elect a representative, and that these representatives (three for each division) along with the other electors should meet at Allahabad and elect a provincial representative. An analysis of the voting power of each division shows that it varies so much that such a scheme would be impracticable. I am to suggest that, as in the case of the representative of the large landholders of Agra, voting for the Muhammadan representative should be by registered post after the cover of the letter has been stamped with the Magistrate's seal.

I am to say that it appears to be desirable that, when Muhammadan representatives are elected from two of the six provinces named, the Muhammadan seats to be filled by nomination should be distributed over the unrepresented provinces. It is of course out of the question that the special representation of the Muhammadan community can be carried to the extent that the Trustees of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College and their President desire, namely, that each of the eight larger provinces should always have an elected Muhammadan representative. The Lieutenant-Governor is unable to support a further recommendation made by the Trustees that they should also have the power to elect a representative of their body on the Imperial Council. On the other hand, he does not agree with the arguments against the reservation of seats for Muhammadans on which the Hon'ble Rai Nihal Chand Bahadur and the Hon'ble Munshi Madho Lal lay stress in their opinions, nor with the recommendation of the Hon'ble Rai Sunder Lal Bahadur that if seats are reserved for Muhammadans they should be reserved for other communities also. In the United Provinces out of a population of 47½ millions, 40½ millions are Hindus and 6¾ millions Muhammadans; the Jains number 84,400, the Sikhs 15,300, Christians of different races 102,000, and Aryas 65,000. These figures disclose no need for any further special representation for these provinces.

17. In this connection I am to refer to Mr. Fell's letter no. 213, dated the 21st January 1908, asking that the question of the claims of the Eurasian community to representation on the Councils in India should be given special consideration. According to the last census there are in these provinces 5,218 Eurasians, but it is likely that the number is understated on account of the reluctance of Eurasians to record themselves separately from Europeans. Out of the Eurasians recorded as such in the United Provinces, 3,456 only are estimated to be educated, and the number of males among the total number was 1,839. It is therefore quite clear that no separate representation of this community is required in these proivnces. It ought to be possible to select a representative of the Eurasian community to sit on the Provincial Advisory Council, but no special right need be given to this body to elect a member on either the Imperial or the Local Legislative Council.

18. The Maharaja of Benares has put forward a scheme which is ingenious, but does not appear to be feasible, under which the number of official members on the Imperial Legislative Council should be reduced, and the position of the Government secured by giving them a double vote on certain scheduled matters and reserving to the Viceroy the right of veto in other cases. Another suggestion affecting the constitution of the Council which has been made is that special provision should be made for an elected representative of Indian commerce as distinguished from a European one. His Honour thinks very strongly that there should be a representative of Indian commerce on the Imperial Council, but he is unable to suggest a method by which he could be chosen by election. He is therefore in favour of a representative of Indian commerce being nominated to the Council. He is opposed to another proposal that has been put forward that the Indian Universities should be allowed in rotation to nominate a member to the Council. Each University will be empowered to elect a member of the Provincial Legislative Council, and it will through its representative have an effective voice in the selection of an elected member from its province on the Imperial Council.

Provincial Legislative Council.

19. The United Provinces Legislative Council is at present composed of the Lieutenant-Governor and seven other officials and eight non-officials; the non-officials are five Hindus, two Muhammadans, and one European, and of these all the Hindus and the European are elected, while the two Muhammadans are nominated; both the Muhammadans and three out of the five Hindus are landholders. No representative of Indian commerce is on the Council nor any representative of the agricultural classes other than the landholders. The Lieutenant-Governor does not consider that it is possible to arrange effectually at present for representation by election of Indian commerce. As Sir James LaTouche pointed out, no Chamber of Commerce to represent the interests of Indians only exists, and there is no prominent leading industry in the provinces which demands representation. The agricultural classes, apart from the landholders, are, speaking generally, poorly educated and cannot, for some time at all events, be directly represented.

The intention of the Government of India is that the provincial Council should be enlarged to the fullest extent compatible with the necessary authority of Government, it being constituted in respect of the non-official members so as to give due and ample representation to the different classes and interests of the community. In paragraph 3 of this letter the reasons for not treating these provinces in the same way as other more advanced provinces have been set forth, and it was for these reasons that when opinions on the constitution of the Council were asked for the Lieutenant-Governor suggested that a Council of thirty-five or thirty-six members might be suitable. Some of those who have given their opinions would have a Provincial Legislative Council as large as the reconstituted Imperial Council. The Lieutenant-Governor does not think this is necessary, but on a reconsideration of the matter, he is prepared to advocate the increase of the number of the Provincial Council to 45. Should these provinces in the future approximate more nearly to the large provinces on the seaboard in material wealth, industrial prosperity, and the general spread of education, it may become possible to raise the number to that which may be fixed for Madras, Bombay, and Bengal. From this point of view the scheme of election and representation which is now put forward should be regarded as tentative only, and liable to revision in the light of further experience both in respect of increase in the numbers and alteration of the method of election.

20. In paragraph 10 of your letter under reply the Government of India lay it down as essential that the Government should always be able to reckon on a numerical majority, and that the majority should be strong enough to be independent of the minor fluctuations that may be caused by the occasional absence of an official member. In the suggestions put forward for the constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council it is proposed that it should be composed of 28 officials, including His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General, and a maximum of 26 non-officials. The present constitution of the Provincial Council in the United provinces is, as stated in paragraph 19 of this letter, 8 officials (including the Lieutenant-Governor) and 8 non-officials. Sir John Hewett thinks that the Government majority in the Provincial Council of 45 members will be effectively provided for by constituting it so as to consist of 23 officials (including the Lieutenant-Governor) and 22 non-officials. The following is the list of officials who, in his opinion, might be ordinarily appointed to the Council without any serious hindrance to the performance of their ordinary duties being involved in their attendance at its meetings:—

the Lieutenant-Governor,
the two Members of the Board of Revenue,
the General Officer Commanding the Lucknow Division, the five Secretaries to Government,
the Inspectors General of Police, Civil Hospitals, and Prisons, the Directors of Public Instruction and of Land Records and Agriculture,
the Sanitary Commissioner,
the Legal Remembrancer,
the Government Advocate, four Commissioners,
a district officer, and the Superintending Engineer of the Lucknow circle.

The proposal to appoint to the Council the General Officer Commanding the Lucknow Division, if the Government of India in the Army Department see no objection, is a novel one, but, in the judgment of the Lieutenant-Governor, one that can readily be justified by the fact that, in a province that contains 21 cantonments with a population of 187,505, matters connected with cantonments from time to time come under the purview of the Council. As the budget will in future be discussed in parts, it will be of great advantage that the head of the department whose business is under consideration should be present to assist in the debate as well as the Secretary to Government charged with the supervision of that particular department. The attendance of four Commissioners can, when necessary, be secured without any inconvenience. The Commissioners of Allahabad and Lucknow could usually be appointed members of the Council, and Benares and Fyzabad are a very short distance from either Allahabad or Lucknow.

21. The proposals that the Lieutenant-Governor desires to make regarding the selection of the 22 non-official members of the Council are the following:—

A.—That sixteen members should be elected by the following electorates:—

(1) 1 by the Upper India Chamber of Commerce, as at present;

(2) 1 by the Senate of the University of Allahabad, as at present;
(3) 8 by the district boards and certain municipal boards of each division, except Kumaun, one for each division;
(4) 2 by the municipal boards of the following six cities; Allahabad, Lucknow, Benares, Cawnpore, Agra and Bareilly, in rotation, two of these cities each having a representative for a term of two years;
(5) 1 by the British Indian Association of Oudh, to represent the landholders of Oudh;
(6) 1 by the landholders of Agra;
(7) 2 by the Muhammadan community;

B.—That six members should be nominated by the Government,—

(1) 1 as representative of Kumaun when a suitable representative is available;
(2) 2 Muhammadans, one of whom would be a trustee of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College resident in the United Provinces;
(3) 3 as representatives of special classes who cannot be represented by election, as, for example, the Indian commercial classes and the planting community.

22. The suggestions for the representation of the general community which were placed as a basis for discussion before those consulted were that two out of the six largest municipalities should each in rotation elect a member, and that the small municipalities should be grouped so as to elect two representatives, while the district boards should elect three representatives—two from Agra and one from Oudh. The Lieutenant-Governor from the first, however, recognized that this scheme might be deemed to be defective in that it did not provide as much as is desirable for the representation of local interests. The six large municipalities have, indeed, in many respects identity of interests. But the system at present in force of grouping together municipal boards which have little in common (involving as it does the inclusion in one electorate of municipalities as far apart as Dehra Dun and Gorakhpur in the first group and Muttra and Ballia in the second) does not give much opportunity for election to members living at a distance from the head quarters of the provinces, for, so long as the electors are divided into groups and asked to travel long distances from the sphere of their own influence, the candidates at head quarters must, as has been observed in certain comments made in the public press, have a better chance of success. To the present grouping of district boards which includes tracts so dissimilar as the Meerut, Agra, Rohilkhand and Lucknow divisions in the first group and as the Allahabad, Gorakhpur, Benares and Fyzabad divisions in the second, these remarks have equal application. A proposal has been made to group the municipalities into four groups according to divisions for the purpose of forming an electorate, but this scheme, though reasonable in some ways, is defective in that it would give a disproportionate share of representation to the two groups consisting of the Benares and Gorakhpur divisions and of the Lucknow and Fyzabad divisions respectively. The view that representation of the general population by divisions would be the best means to ensure that different interests should be safeguarded is held by many. There are indeed, not a few points of difference between the western and the eastern tracts, and, after a careful consideration of the question, the Lieutenant-Governor has come to the conclusion thatmo re real representation would be secured if a representative came from each division. In Kumaun, owing to the backward character of the country, all the members of the three district boards are appointed and not elected, while there are only three municipalities in the division, none of which has a population of over 20,000. Nor are theremany leading men in the division. For these reasons the Lieutenant-Governor thinks it advisable to exclude it from the scheme of election. Its representation can be best secured by nominating a representative of it when a suitable man is available. For the election of representatives in the other eight divisions of the provinces the Lieutenant-Governor would propose to group the municipalities and district boards of the other divisions together, giving to each district board two votes and to each municipality voting power on the following scale:—

4 representatives in towns of over 100,000,
3 „ „ between 100,000 and 50,000
2 „ „ „ 50,000 and 20,000, and
1 representative „ of 20,000 and less,

the power of appointing representatives being limited to those municipalities that contain a population of 20,000 or more, or with a less population are situated at the head quarters of districts, or are already included in the electorate mentioned in this Government's notification no. 44C./ III—807A., dated the 19th July 1899, printed at page 34 of the Laws and Rules of the Legislative Council of the United Provinces. The effect of this arrangement would be to give the following voters in the different divisions:—

	Municipalities.	District board.	Total.
Meerut	20	12	32
Agra	15	12	27
Rohilkhand... ...	24	12	36
Lucknow	10	12	22
Fyzabad	7	12	19
Allahabad	13	14	27
Benares	12	10	22
Gorakhpur	4	6	10

The small number of electors in the Gorakhpur division is at first sight a defect of this scheme, but it is not many years since the Gorakhpur division was separated from the Benares division, with which it has many affinities, and the Lieutenant-Governor thinks that the two divisions may be amalgamated for purposes of electing two members to the Provincial Legislative Council on the condition that electors of both divisions assembled together should elect one representative of the Benares division and one representative of the Gorakhpur division. In the years in which any of the six large municipalities which are to be given special representation have representatives in the Council they would not be allowed to vote for divisional representatives.

The qualifications for the representatives both of the large municipalities and of the divisions which the Lieutenant-Governor would propose are that they should be ordinarily resident within the area which they represent, and that they pay either land revenue of not less than Rs. 3,000 per annum or income-tax on income of not less than that amount. Election by the municipal boards of the large municipalities in turn would present no difficulties, while the representatives of the district boards and selected municipal boards of a division would assemble at the divisional head-quarters and elect the divisional representative on the Privincial Council.

23. The election of the two representatives of the landholders does not present any great difficulty. A representative of Oudh might be elected by the British Indian Association and of Agra by an electorate consisting of landholders who pay at least Rs. 5,000 land revenue a year. Such an electorate would consist of 672 persons. As has already been pointed out, the Landholders Association of Agra has no title to represent the whole of the landlords in that province. The British Indian Association would be free to nominate any one of its members, while in the case of Agra a candidate for election should be qualified to vote. No feasible way of voting in Agra suggests itself except that the votes should be sent by registered post, after the cover had been sealed by the District Magistrate in the way already suggested. The election of the representative of the British Indian Association would be made at a special meeting called for the purpose.

24. The Government of India suggest that the Muhammadan electorate for the purpose of filling the two seats on the Provincial Council should include all payers of income-tax and all payers of a fixed amount of land revenue sufficiently low to embrace the great body of substantial landholders. A limit of Rs. 5,000 both in the case of land revenue and of the income on which income-tax is paid would give an electorate of 408 persons. This limit seems to the Lieutenant-Governor to be sufficiently low, and with the addition of Muhammadan Fellows of the Allahabad University (20 in number) and registered Muhammadan graduates of an Indian University of over five years' standing the total electorate would probably exceed 700 persons. There is no registration of the graduates of the Allahabad University, but from the time degrees began to be given in 1889 up to five years ago 459 Muhammadans obtained degrees, though there are no means of ascertaining how many of these have died or left the provinces. A system of registration of names and addresses would have to be introduced, and only those resident in the provinces should be allowed to vote. The Muhammadan electorate might conveniently be divided into two groups, each of which would elect a member—(1) the four northern and north-western divisions, which have a Muhammadan population of 3,273,000, and (2) the two Oudh divisions and the three eastern divisions, which have a Muhammadan population of 3,458,000.

An electorate of between 700 and 800 persons divided between these two groups would not be too large: they might send their votes by registered post in the way suggested in other cases.

While the Lieutenant-Governor fully accepts the principle of giving special representation to the Muhammadans on the Provincial as well as on the Imperial Legislative Council, he cannot support the claim made by the Trustees of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College that the Council should be enlarged so as to allow of the Muhammadans of each division electing a Muhammadan member or their claim that they themselves should be permitted to nominate a Muhammadan member. He is, however, prepared to nominate from among the Trustees of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College resident within the provinces one of the two Muhammadans to be nominated to the Provincial Council. He is not able to accept the contention that, if the idea of having special representation of the Muhammadans of the provinces is carried out, instead of there being separate representation for Muhammadans, it should be left to mixed constituencies to elect Muhammandans among others, and that the Government should fix a minimum number of Muhammandans to be elected to the Council and itself nominate the number necessary if the minimum is not reached at the elections. The past experience of the United Provinces shows that with a mixed electorate Muhammadans will never be elected, and this suggestion cannot be entertained. Nor can the proposal that all the Muhammadan members should be nominated by Government. The qualifications of Muhammadan candidates should, the Lieutenant-Governor suggests, be that they should be qualified as electors, and should have at least the same property qualifications as are proposed for candidates for the representation of division.

25. I am now to refer to the remarks contained in paragraphs 21 and 22 of your letter regarding the electorate for municipalities and district boards. The election of members not only of the Provincial, but also in large degree of the Imperial, Council rests ultimately, it is said, on the local franchise, and the first question therefore which arises is the correlation of local and provincial or Imperial representation, and the necessity of adapting the local franchise in order to secure suitable representatives for the central Councils. On this point the Government of India observe that the qualifications required both for electors and for candidates are extraordinarily low; the franchises, they say, where primarily devised with a view not to election of Councils, but to the management of local affairs, and their unsuitability as a foundation for the election of legislators seems to have escaped notice in 1893.

These remarks are not, I am to say, fully applicable to these provinces. For district boards the qualifications, which are prescribed in rules made by the Local Government under section 56, United Provinces Act III of 1906, are the same for electors and for candidates and the selection of electors rests almost entirely with the District Magistrate. The persons qualified in each tahsil are—

(1) honorary magistrates having jurisdiction;

(2) a number fixed by the Commissioner on the recommendation of the District Magistrate, not being less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred, of such other persons literate not less than twenty-one years of age, and residing or owning landed property or carrying on trade or business in the tahsil, as the District Magistrate, having regard to their position, interest, or influence in the tahsil, may consider fit persons to be electors. Ordinarily the number of electors is fixed at fifty or sixty for each tahsil, and the bulk of them are landowners.

Under the Municipal Act (United Provinces Act I of 1900) the Local Government may make rules applicable to all or any municipalities as to the qualifications of electors and of candidates for election. These qualifications vary from one municipality to another. In most municipalities an elector must be—twenty-one years of age; and an owner or occupier of premises paying an annual rental for which the minimum fixed is generally Rs. 24 or Rs. 36; or in receipt of an income not less than Rs. 120 to Rs. 500 per annum, or assessed to pay in Imperial or municipal taxation a sum for which the minimum generally fixed is Rs. 2 or Rs. 3 per annum; while a candidate must be a magistrate having jurisdiction or an elector who is—an owner or occupier of premises paying an annual rental for which the minimum generally fixed is Rs. 72, and in the large municipalities Rs. 120 to Rs. 300, or in receipt of an income not less than Rs. 360 to Rs. 2,500.

The Government of India have drawn attention particularly to the qualifications demanded in Bengal, and have observed that in other provinces they are of much the same order of magnitude; in these provinces, however, so far at least as district boards are concerned, they are distinctly higher and it can certainly not be said that the representatives either of district boards or of municipalities elected to the Provincial Council have been unsuited to their position.

Experience, then, has not established any necessity for a general enhancement of electoral qualifications, and on general grounds also it appears to the Lieutenant Governor that no such enhancement is called for. He is quite prepared to admit that in particular municipalities the existing franchise may be too low, though every case would have to be considered on its merits, and in small municipalities a low qualification is essential for the preservation of a sufficient electorate. But the objects to be kept in view in fixing qualifications for representation on local bodies and on Provincial and Imperial Councils are distinct, and it would be a mistake to confuse them. The proper course is, Sir John Hewett would urge, to fix for municipalities and district boards such qualifications as their functions demand, and to impose additional qualifications for candidates who seek election to the Provincial and Imperial Councils.

26. The second question that arises in connection with the electorate of municipalities and district boards is the application to them of the principle of class representation. This matter, it may be observed, was considered by the Government of India, partly at least, in relation to a general scheme in which class representation on municipal and local boards was suggested as the basis [paragraph 22(c)] of class representation in the Provincial Council. The proposal of this Government, however, proceeds on different lines, the electorate which will return representatives of special classes being constituted independently of local bodies, and the question of class representation has now to be considered merely in its bearing on local interests.

In considering this question it is necessary first of all to examine the constitution of existing boards, and returns have therefore been compiled which give the following results. Of 663 members of district boards (exclusive of official members), 455 are Hindus and 189 are Muhammadans : of the Hindus 115 are Brahmans, 114 Rajputs, 63 Kayasths, 60 Vaish or Banias and 51 Khatris ; 526 are landholders, of whom 36 are also traders (bankers and money lenders) and 71 are lawyers. Of 965 members of municipal boards (exclusive of official members) 562 are Hindus and 310 are Muhammadans ; among the Hindus the Kayasths and Brahmans take the lead with 132 and 127 members, followed by Banias (107), Vaish (86), and Khatri (55) ; landholders are still in the majority, returning 428 members, of whom 54 are engaged also in trade, but the proportion of lawyers (207) and of bankers, traders and money lenders (150) is much higher than in the case of district boards. These results appear to the Lieutenant Governor to be,on the whole, satisfactory. The proportion of Muhammadans to Hindus in the municipal population is as 1 to 1·6, and for the provinces as a whole roughly as 1 to 6 : the proportion among members of municipalities is as 1 to 1·8 and on district boards as 1 to 2·4, and though the Muhammadans are no doubt entitled to more than a proportional representation, it cannot be said that the present system affects them unfavourably. The conclusion drawn from the statistics is confirmed by the reports received from District Magistrates ; it is only in a few exceptional cases that Muhammadans fail to obtain a fair share of the representation, and the Lieutenant Governor thinks it would be a pity to disturb the generally amicable relations at present existing between Hindus and Muhammadans by introducing religious distinctions into the electoral system. As between Hindus the representation of a few castes is no doubt out of all proportion to their numbers, but it must be remembered that the mass of the Hindu population is to be found in the lower castes—Chamars, Ahirs, Pasis, and the like,—the separate representation of which is not within the range of practical politics, and the Lieutenant Governor doubts whether any system of caste representation is either necessary or workable. It will be observed that on district boards a full share of the representation is obtained by the Rajputs, the only large caste apart from the professional and trading classes, the members of which are qualified by education and position to be representatives.

27. The question of the possibility of representation by occupational groups remains to be considered. On district boards the only occupation the interests of which have to be considered is agriculture and it has been seen that the landowning interest is fully represented while the time has not yet come for election by tenants of representatives taken from their own class. In municipalities as in district boards the bulk of the representation still goes to the landowners, who stand in both for the upper classes ; and trade also secures its proper share. The remainder, it may be said, is secured by lawyers, not only because it is to their interest as professional men to keep themselves before the public, but because, apart from landowners and business men, they are practically the only class with sufficient capacity and education to fill the position. That the legal element should be largely represented appears under present conditions to be inevitable, and the Lieutenant-Governor is not in favour of any artificial reduction of its influence. And, apart from this, it is not clear what interests within a municipality except those of trade can be differentiated or require separate representation. The considerations which apply to the case are essentially different from those governing the case of Provincial Councils, which deal with general as well as local questions in all branches of the administration. The subjects with which, on the other hand, a municipality has to deal are limited in number ; they affect the community, not by classes but individually, and they are considered in their application only to the special conditions of the single town. Apart from trade, which has a special interest in some municipal questions, such as taxations, and which is adequately represented, it is difficult therefore to see what occupational groups could be formed for municipalities. There is a local solidarity which it is not desirable to break up, and the question with regard to municipal representatives appears to be, not so much what interests they represent, as whether they are suitable men to administer the affairs of their town and to safeguard the general interests of its inhabitants.

28. Finally even if class representations were considered desirable its introduction would be seriously impeded by a peculiarity that exists in the actual working of district boards and municipalities. It is not as an attendant at district board meetings at headquarters that a member of a district board is most useful, but as an unofficial inspector of roads, school, and the like in his tahsil. The same argument applies if with somewhat less force, to municipalities. Districts boards and municipalities are not in the main deliberative bodies ; their chief function is administration, and the administrative unit is not the district but the tahsil, it is not the town but the ward. Now the number of representatives of each ward or tahsil is necessarily very small It would be impossible, therefore, without making the boards unwieldy to apply to either the principal of class representation, and to ignore the actual organization and deal with the district or town as a whole would undoubtedly impair the efficiency and usefulness of the boards. Taking a general view of the case, the Lieutenant-Governor does not indeed, regard the present system as free from defects or its results as in all cases satisfactory. He believes, for example, that the method now in force of preparation of electoral rolls in municipalities by members of the board is open to abuse, and that it would be preferable to have the rolls made up by an independent authority. The procedure of the ballot also, which does not at present secure the independence of the voter, may require amendment. And in the case of district boards the Lieutenant Governor is prepared to abolish the present system of nominating electors and to substitute a definite franchise entitling all persons to vote who are possessed of certain qualifications. Amendments of this nature do not, however, depart from the principle of the existing system, but merely seek to give that system greater reality. And if, again there are individual cases in which the application of the system leads to inequalities, with the result that the Muhammadans in one town or the traders in another fail to secure their proper share of representation, such inequalities should in his judgment be corrected by local expedients, by the re-allocation of wards for example, or an increase in the number of nominated members and not by the introduction of new methods, such as the subdivision of the electorate which is certain to cause much more heart burning than the extended use on specific occasions of the power of nomination. On the whole, therefore, the Lieutenant Governor agrees with the general consensus of opinion, official and non-official, that there is no necessity for any radical change of principal, and the application to local bodies of any system of class representation appears to him uncalled for and inexpedient.

29. A few miscellaneous matters may now be referred to. The question of residential and proprietary qualifications has been dealt with under each class of candidate; but the suggestion that a knowledge of English, that is of the language in which the proceedings of Council are conducted, should be insisted on may be mentioned. Such a rule might exclude members whose presence on the Council would be desirable, and it does not appear to be needed for the Provincial Council any more than for the Imperial Council. It has been suggested that the number of officials in the Council might be reduced were Government to reserve to itself the right of veto to be exercised when necessary; but it is clear that nothing could be more undesirable than a constant exercise of the right of veto by the Government. The general opinion is that the uneducated classes must remain without direct representation, and it is difficult to see how this is to be avoided. A criticism of the scheme which has been put forward is that the monied classes as well as the tenantry have not received due attention. The case of the tenantry has already been referred to, but provision is needed for the representation of the monied classes. It may be hoped that some of them may be elected by the large municipalities, and in any case the Lieutenant Governor proposes by the exercise of his powers of nomination to ensure that they are represented in the Council. It has been suggested that all merchants, manufacturers, capitalists, and bankers paying income-tax of Rs. 250 or over should be formed into an electorate and given a member, but at present no satisfactory electorate of the kind could be formed.

30. A matter to which I am to invite the attention of the Government of India is the difficulty that is now felt owing to the Lieutenant-Governor not being able to call together his Legislative Council except when there is legislative business to bring forward. The need for legislation in these provinces is not acute, and it is to be hoped that it will not become so; but there is a strong feeling, and to His Honour's mind a justifiable one, that the Council ought to be able to meet once every quarter, and he would be glad to see the law altered to admit of this.

31. The Lieutenant Governor heartily agrees with the proposals made in paragraph 23 of the letter of the Government of India regarding the discussion of the budget, and proposes to present the budget to an informal committee of the Provincial Legislative Council in the form of financial proposals in respect of which the Government is prepared to consider criticism. He is not prepared to advocate the conferment on members of the Provincial Council of the right to move amendments in the budget at a meeting of the Council. Were there no other objection to a change of this nature he does not understand how it would be possible to adopt it in respect of the financial statement of a Local Government, which has to be definitely and finally sanctioned by the Government of India before it can come before the Provincial Council.

32. In conclusion, I am to submit a detailed statement of the alterations that should be made in the regulations of the Provincial Legislative Council in order to carry into effect the proposals contained in this letter.

I have the honour to be,
SIR,
Your most obedient servant,
J. M. HOLMS,
Chief Secretary.

(c) where the recommendation is to be made by the landholders of the province of Agra, the person to be recommended must pay land revenue of not less than Rs. 5,000 a year;

(d) where the recommendation is to be made by members of the Muhammadan community, the person to be recommended must be duly qualified to make a recommendation under rule II-G and, if he is not so qualified by virtue of the payment of land revenue of a certain amount or of income-tax on an income of a certain amount, he must pay land revenue of not less than Rs. 3,000 a year or income-tax on an income of like amount.

VIII.—If within three months after receiving notice as provided by rule V the body or association or group of bodies or class of persons fails to make a recommendation, the Lieutenant-Governor may nominate at his discretion a person belonging to the class which the body, or association, or group or class of persons is deemed to represent.

IX—If the Lieutenant-Governor shall decline to nominate any person who has been, under these Regulations, recommended for nomination, a fresh notice shall be issued as provided in rule V and the procedure laid down in rules VI and VIII shall apply.

X.—(a) As soon as conveniently may be after these Regulations come into force sixteen of the seats held by non-official persons shall be filled up by recommendation under rule II.

(b) If there shall not be the full number of sixteen vacancies available at once for the purpose, the Lieutenant-Governor shall determine at his discretion, subject always to the provisions of rule III, to which of the bodies or groups or classes of persons notice shall be given to recommend the persons to fill up such vacancies as may then be available: and so whenever and as often as any further vacancies among non-official councillors become available, until the full number of sixteen has been completed.

No. 2, dated Lucknow, the 6th January 1908.

From—Maharaja Sir Bhagwati Prasad Singh, K.C.I.E., of Balarampur, President, British Indian, Association, Oudh,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of G. O. no. 1517/III 416-1907, dated the 7th October 1907 (with its enclosures), relating to the question of the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Council and the expansion of the Local Legislative Council.

2. In the first place the British Indian Association, Oudh, beg to tender their hearty thanks to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor for giving a favourable response to their prayer and alloting a seat permanently to a representative of the Association in the Legislatve Council of the United Provinces.

3. The Government order referred to, together with its enclosures, was taken into consideration by the members at a meeting of the executive committee of the Association, and I beg to submit herewith the conclusions arrived at by them and their suggestions relating to the points on which the Government has been pleased to ask the opinion of the Asssciation.

The Provincial Advisory Council.

4. It appears that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor considers that the number of members of the Provincial Advisory Council may be fixed at twenty-five. The Association think that it is not open to them to say anything with regard to an increase in the numercial strength.

5. In the circumstances, the Association beg to submit their suggestions as regards the constitution only of the Provincial Advisory Council. They consider that the principal object of the Government in establishing such a council is to have a medium through which Government may be able to acquaint itself fully with the views of the different sections of the community on subjects of public importance, and to get the advice of the representatives of those communities on such subjects. It is not seldom, that interests of the different sections of community are not identical but rather divergent. It is therefore essential, as pointed out in paragraph 6 of Government of India's letter, that the membership of the Provincial Advisory Council should embrace all interests of sufficient importance, and that not only the landholding class, but industry, commerce, capital, and the professional classes should have their representatives in such Council.

6. With due regard to the aforesaid principals the Association beg to submit their suggestions relating to the constitution of the proposed Advisory Council of these provinces. They think that if the selection of members be made on basis like those indicated below, all the important communities and interests will have a proper representation. The Council should consist of :—

Ruling chiefs	2
Taluqdars of Oudh	3
Representative of other landholders of Oudh	1
Representatives of landholders of the province of Agra	4
Representative of the Upper India Chamber of Commerce	1
,, Indian merchants	1
,, municipal boards, Oudh	1
,, the municipal boards of the province of Agra	1
,, the district boards, Oudh	1
,, ,, of the province of Agra	1
,, the Allahabad University	1
,, the Indian Bar, Oudh	1
,, ,, Agra	1
,, the mills and other industries	1
Non-official Europeans	1
Capitalists of Oudh	1
,, the province of Agra	1
Representatives of other inrerests and communities whom the Government may think fit to be represented ... ... — ...	2
Thus making a total of ...	25

IMPERIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

7. On the subject of representation of the landholders of the province of Oudh in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Government order expresses the view that only one seat is to be allotted to the landholders of both the Provinces of Oudh and Agra in that Council, and the representative from each province is to be taken alternately. The Association most respectfully beg to submit that the Government will be graciously pleased to confer on them the privilege of sending their representative in each term and not alternately. In paragraph 18 of their letter the Government of India have been pleased to recognize the necessity for giving substantial representation in the Imperial Legislative Council to great landholders. The British Indian Association of Oudh cannot sufficiently express their feeling of gratitude to His Excellancy the Governor General in Council for making the pronouncement of a policy indicative of such wise and sound statesmanship. Relying on the expression of policy and on the consideration that the Taluqdars of Oudh occupy a high and permanent position in the rank of the landed aristocracy of India; that the aggregate sum of, the land revenue paid by them comes to Rs. 1,00,21,201-2-0 annually: that their Association, viz., the British Indian Association, is one of the oldest institutions of that class, having been founded nearly half a century ago: and that they have always been the recipients of special privileges and distinctions from the Government, they venture to submit that the Government will be pleased to bestow on them the privilege asked for by them.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

8. The British Indian Association are grateful to the Government for enlarging the number of non-official members on the Local Legislative Council. They, however beg to submit that an alteration should be made in the proposal contained in the Government order respecting the representation of the municipal boards. Instead of allowing the Lucknow municipal board to elect a representative every third time, and placing the other municipalities of Oudh in a group with others of the province of Agra, all municipalities of Oudh should form one electorate as in the case of Oudh district boards. The constitution of such an electorate will bring in more homogeneity and will result in a member being returned to the local council who will be better acquainted with the wants and requirements of his constituencies. The Association approve the rest of the proposals contained in the Government order on the subject of election or nomination of councillors.

9. On the subject of the qualifications of electors and candidates for election as members of the municipal boards, the Association do not consider that any changes are necessary: they think that the method at present followed is a suitable one and is adapted to the needs of respective municipalities.

10. As regards the electors and candidates for election as members of district boards, the Association are of opinion that some property test should be attached to them. They would suggest that only those persons should be qualified to be brought on the list of electors and should be eligible as members who are either landholders paying Government revenue of Rs. 300 or upwards, or other persons paying income-tax on an annual income of Rs. 1,200.

11. The Association do not consider that any other qualification than that of being a member of the British Indian Association should be required of a candidate for nomination as representative in the Local Legislative Council of the landholders of Oudh, to be nominated by the British Indian Association.

No. 1646, dated Allahabad, the 11th January 1908.

From—Honorary Secretaries, Landholders Association for the Province of Agra,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

SIR,—In compliance with G. O. no. 1516/III 416-1907, dated the 7th October 1907, we are directed to submit the views of this Association on the proposals of the Government of India and the Local Government regarding the creation of Advisory Councils and enlargement of Legislative Councils.

2. While the Association fully appreciates the sprit which has prompted the Government of India in initiating the proposals for the promotion of constitutional government in this country, and while it finds itself generally in agreement with that Government and the Government of these provinces as to the manner in which it is contemplated to give effect to these proposals we are directed to indicate a few points, chiefly of detail, on which the Association is of opinion that the proposals might be modified with advantage.

PROVINCIAL ADVISORY COUNCIL.

3. As regards the proposed Advisory Council for these provinces, the Association is of opinion that twenty-five members cannot adequately represent the vast territory of these provinces. As the function of this council will, to a large extent, be similar to those of the Imperial Advisory Council, its members will no doubt be expected to interpret the acts and intentions of Government to the people of the area which they represent in the council. Bearing this consideration in mind, the Association is of opinion that twenty-five members can scarcely be expected to efficiently act as interpreters to forty-eight districts.

4. The Association ventures to think that the voice of the members of the council will carry greater weight with the people if at least a portion of them are elected by the leading men of the area which they represent. We are therefore to suggest for the consideration of Government whether it would not be advisable to appoint a portion of the members by election, the remainder being nominated by the Government.

5. As industry, commerce, capital, and the professional classes are to be represented in the council along with the landholding class, the Association would, in consideration of the preponderance of this class, suggest that at least half the members of the council should be landholders.

6. It appears to the Association that it would be an advantage to Government as well as to the people if the Council were authorized not only to advise Government on matters on which it is consulted, but on such matters as appear to it to call for consideration by Government.

7. In the absence of any provision in the proposal of the Government of India or the Local Government as to when and how often the Provincial Advisory Council should meet, the Association would suggest that the Council should meet at least once a year, and in special circumstances on the requisition of one-third of its member.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

8. The Association agrees with the proposal contained in paragraph 3 of your letter regarding the composition of the non-official portion of the Provincial Legislative Council except as to the following points, on which we are to make the suggestions noted below.

9. As all the merchants, traders, capitalists, and manufacturers in these provinces are not represented on the Chamber of Commerce, Cawnpore, the Association would suggest that the Council should include a member elected by such merchants and other mentioned above as are unconnected with the Chamber of Commerce, provided that they pay an income tax not less than Rs. 130 per annum.

10. The council is to have two representatives of district boards from Agra province and only one from Oudh. This is no doubt due to the large area and population of the former province. For the same reason this Association would suggest the landholders of the Agra province, being represented by two members—one to be nominated by it and one elected by other recognized landholders' associations in the province.

11. There is a diversity of views in this Association regarding (a) the special representation of the Muhammadan community in the Council, (b) the qualifications of members of municipal and district boards and of their electors, and (c) the principle of assigning a fixed proportion of seats in these boards to each of the principal classes into which the population is divided by race, caste or religion, and in the absence of unanimity the Association refrains from expressing any views on these three subjects.

88. The Association thinks it necessary that members of the council should be residents of circles from which they are elected, and should have an annual income of at least Rs. 5,000 and a fair knowledge of the language in which the proceedings of the council are conducted.

IMPERIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

13. The Association would suggest the landholders of the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh being represented in this council by one member to be elected by landholders paying a land revenue of not less than Rs. 10,000: but if this suggestion cannot be accepted and the representative of the landholders in these provinces is taken alternately from Agra and Oudh, we are to suggest that the electorate for Agra should consist of this Association and other recognised landholders' associations in the Agra province, the number of votes assigned to each association being determined by the Local Government.

UNIVERSITY OF ALLAHABAD.

Report of the sub-committee appointed under resolution no. 89 of the meeting of the Syndicate held on the 15th November 1907, as accepted by the Senate at its meeting held on the 13th January 1908

READ—

(i) Letter of the Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces, No. 1514—III—416-1907 dated the 7th October 1907.

(ii) Letter of the Government of India No. 2310-17, dated the 24th August 1907.

The sub-committee are of opinion as follows:—

I.—As to the proposed Imperial and Provincial Councils—

(a) that it will promote free discussion and frank expression of opinion if the meetings of the councils are presided over by a non-official chairman, but in view of the possible difficulties in the selection of such a chairman in the case of the Imperial Advisory Council, which will comprise twenty ruling chiefs among its members, the meetings of the said council should, as proposed by the Government, be presided over by His Excellency the Viceroy, or some high official nominated by him, but in the case of the Provincial Advisory Council, the meetings should be presided over by a non-official chairman appointed by the Government;

(b) that the scope of the work of the two councils should not be limited to giving advice when asked, but that they should have the right to tender advice and also to invite the attention of the Government to matters which in their opinion call for the consideration of the Legislature of the Executive Government;

(c) that meetings of the council should be called whenever the Government thinks expedient, but at least once a year, and in the case of the Provincial Council on the request of not less than ten members;

(d) that any measure against which three-fourths of the members vote should be deferred for further consideration for a year except when the Governor General in Council declares the measure to be urgent;

(e) that the Government would get a more useful Imperial Advisory Council if its choice were not restricted, as appears to be the intention, to ruling chiefs and territorial magnates, and they would suggest that other persons of eminent position, such as retired High Court Judges, Vice-Chancellors, and ex-Vice-Chancellors of Indian Universities, those who have rendered eminent services to the State, Prime Ministers of Native States, retired civilians settled in the country, professional men of distinguished attainments should also be eligible for appointment;

(f) that the general scheme as indicated in paragraph 6 of the letter of the Government of India, which requires that all interests of sufficient importance should be represented in the Provincial Council be approved and that the number suggested in the Chief Secretary's letter, viz., twenty-five for the Council, is sufficient and that the various interests should be thus represented, viz.—

(a) Zamindars by nine members;

(b) Capital, industry, and commerce by three members

(c) The University. of Allahabad by two members;

(d) The professions by two members;

(e) Hindu, Muhammadan, Christian, and Jain religions by five members.

The remaining members to be selected by the Government to represent any other interests which the Government considers should also be represented.

II.—As to Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils:—

(a) that the members appointed and elected should have a sufficient knowledge of English to be able to follow the discussions in Council and that all voters should be literate:

(b) that the electors for seats under section 12D (c) should be landholders paying not less than Rs. 5,000 as Government revenue, or who own land assessed to Government revenue at the same amount, and also all persons paying income-tax on not less than Rs. 5,000. The candidates for membership should pay Rs. 25,000 or more on account of Government revenue or own land assessed to a like amount, or should pay income-tax on like amount.

(c) that as to paragraph 17 of the Government of India's letter the franchise in the case of Muhammadans appears to be unnecessarily low.

III.—As to paragraph 22 of the Government of India's letter:—

(a) that there is much force in what is said in the concluding portion of a letter published in the Pioneer of the 2nd December 1907, headed "Government reform proposals," and the sub-committee would deprecate the further extension of class representation;

(b) that with the time at the disposal of the sub-committee it is not possible to make detailed proposals as to paragraph 4 of the Chief Secretary's letter, but they would suggest that the claims of education as well as of the professions should be recognized, and that all graduates of not less than five years' standing should be entitled to vote for and should be eligible for election as members, both of district and municipal boards. Subject to this they would retain the existing franchise and rules for the qualification of candidates for the board;

(c) that residential and property qualifications for representation of boards in the Legislative Council should be prescribed. In the case of representation of district boards the proprietary qualifications should not be restricted to payment of land revenue, as this would exclude an important and daily increasing number of persons carrying on trade or business outside municipal limits; they should be eligible if paying sufficient amount of income-tax.

Dated Cawnpore, the 2nd January 1908.

From—A. SHAKESPEAR, ESQ., Secretary to the Upper India Chamber of Commerce,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

SIR,—In continuation of my letter dated the 11th November last, I am directed to submit the views of my committee on the proposals referred to in your letter no. 1514 III—416-1907 of the 7th/14th October last, and in doing so to express their regret that this communication has been unavoidably delayed a couple of days beyond the appointed time.

Provincial Advisory Councils.—As regards the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Council, the committee consider that the following important interests should be represented by Government nominations :—

2 Unofficial members for commerce and industry, one of whom, if possible, to be specially selected for his connection with indigenous industries.
1 Unofficial member for banking and finance.
„ education.
„ the legal profession.
„ municipal affairs.

3. With regard to the qualifications of candidates for seats on municipal and district boards, there is a very prevalent belief that in both cases the position of members is in many instances sought for, and made use of, as a means of self aggrandizement or an opening for making money. The committee would like to see the management of local affairs more in the hands of persons having the real interests of the rate-payers at heart, and they are of opinion that the Government of India's suggestions for the amendment of the system governing election to municipal boards would do much to improve the status of these corporations and their utility.

There seems to be no doubt that, be the reason what it may, the electorate is not using its voting rights to the advantage of the rate-payers, of which the extremely small number which apears at the poll is clear evidence, and it is questionable whether Government would not do well to make wider use of their powers of nomination in the case of municipal and district boards, until with the speard of education the electorate comes to better realize the advantage of local self-government.

4. The committee agree with the conclusion arrived at by the Government of India, that the importance of any particular section of the community, and not its numerical strength, should be the determining factor in fixing the number of seats to be allotted to each class of the population. To alter the franchise without at the same time bringing about a re-distribution of the seats on the municipal and district boards bearing some relation to the various roups into which Government consider the population should be divided, would not, the committee consider, tend to confer any benefit on the community at large.

5. The Imperial Advisory Council.—The committee approve of the proposals set forth by the Government of India, and have no recommendations to offer in this connection.

6, The Imperial Legislative Council.—The committee agree as to the desirability of enlarging the Imperial Legislative Council, and, in general, as to the procedure which it is proposed to adopt. They consider, however, that in view of the highly important interests connected with the trade and industries of northern India, and which cannot be held to be adequately represented by the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay, the Upper India and the Punjab Chambers of Commerce should be allowed the privilege of electing a commercial member alternately or jointly.

7. The committee also approve of the proposal that one member should be elected by each Provincial Legislative Council to the Imperial Legislative Council.

8. The committee are at one with the Government of India as to the changes proposed to be introduced in the discussion of the budget in the Imperial Legislative Council, vide paragraph 28 of the Government of India's letter.

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

Sir,—The scheme for the reform and enlargement of the existing Legislative Councils and the creation of the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils as authorized in the Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th

August 1907, and explained, with reference to its application to the particular requirements of the Provinces of Agra and Oudh, in the letter of the United Provinces Government no. 1518-117—41-1907, dated the 7th October 1907, has been carefully considered by the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College Aligarh Trustees, who beg to thank His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor for giving them an opportunity of expressing their views upon a measure which is of such supreme impor tanceboth to the Government and the people of this country.

It may be mentioned at the outset that the Trustees have examined the scheme mainly from the point of view of the Muhammadans of India, whose due and real representation in the councils is the chief object of the suggestions made in the following remarks on the proposed reform scheme.

With a view to a clear expression of their views, the Trustees have considered the main points of the scheme in the following order :—

(1) The desirablity of establishing the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils.
(2) The constitution of such councils and the method of selecting their members.
(3) The functions and meetings of such councils.
(4) The proposed changes in the constitutions of the Imperial Legislative Council, with special reference to the representation of Muhammadans.
(5) Electorate for the election of Muhammadan members for the Imperial Legislative Council.
(6) The proposed changes in the constitution of the Provincial Legislative Council of the United Provinces with special reference to the representation of Muhammadans.
(7) Electorate for the election of Muhammadan members for the Provincial Legislative Council of these provinces.

I.—The desirability of establishing the imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils.

The Trustees fully endorse the view that the establishment of these councils would prove beneficial both to the Government and the country. Those who know the real situation in India must be aware of the influence which the ruling chiefs, territorial magnates, and the landed aristocracy possess and, in fact, exercise upon the ideas and sentiments of the people in general. The association of what are termed as the "stable element" in Indian society with the ruling power and the intellectually advanced sections of the Indian people will be a distinct step forward in the direction of general advancement of the country. So far the elements which are proposed to be included in these councils have practically kept aloof from and have not been in touch with the Government in its great work of governing India, but under the proposed scheme they will play an important part at times of need and crisis. The Trustees therefore welcome the establishment of these councils.

II.—The constitution of the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils and methods of selecting their members (paragraph 5 of the Government of India's letter.)

As regards this matter, the Trustees are of opinion that it may safely be left to the discretion of the Government, who are themselves anxious to secure due representation of his section of the Indian people. They merely wish to add that the Muhammadan element in these councils should be sufficient to secure due representation of Muhammadans inhabiting the various provinces of India.

III.—The functions and meetings of the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils.

In paragraph 4 of the Government of India's letter it is laid down that "the establishment and recognition of a determinate body of advisers, who, while requiring no legislative recognition and possessing in themselves no formal powers of initiative would be consulted individually by the Governor General and would occasionally be called together, either in whole or in part, for the purpose of collective deliberation, and would be entitled, when so summoned, to offer their counsel on matters affecting the welfare of the people would, in the opinion of the Government of India, be a marked step in constitutional progress."

From the above it appears that the function of these councils would be confined to their members expressing their opinion when consulted either individually or collectivelly. The trustees are of opinion that the members of these councils should also be empowered to lay their views on their own initiative as members of these councils, before the Government on any question which in their opinion may be of sufficient importance to call for such action on their part, and they should also have the right as members of these councils to request information on any particular subject from the Government. This would give the members of these councils a real interest in their work and position and would tend to make these councils really useful institutions.

The Trustees further think that it would be desirable to hold a meeting, so far as practicable, of all the members of the Imperial Advisory Council at least once in every three years, and of the Provincial Advisory Councils at least once every year. Such meetings would bring home to the people the existence of these councils as living institutions, and would be an effective means of impressing upon their members the importance and responsibility of their position.

IV. The proposed changes in the Constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council.

The Trustees fully endorse the view, as explained in paragraph 10 of the Government of India letter, that whatever may be the constitution of the legislative councils, it must always be subject to two main principles :—

(1) that the Government should have a standing majority "independent of the minor fluctuations that may be caused by the occasional absence of an official member;"

(2) that the legislative councils "should be so constituted in respect of non-official members as to give due and ample representation to the different classes and interests of the community."

The Trustees believe that the proposition requiring a standing and effective majority for the Government is, with regard to the situation in India, the first and an absolute condition for all schemes of reform, and is so important, sound, and axiomatic that no time or word need be wasted in stating or supporting it.

As regards the second principle quoted above, the Trustees not only feel satisfied but grateful to find that justice and need of "due and ample representation" of "the different classes and interests of the community" have at last been publicly recognized by the Government of India. The Trustees have naturallay examined and considered this scheme with special reference to the "due and ample representation" of the Muhammadan community of India, on whose behalf they venture to express their opinion and convey it to the Government.

According to the scheme as set forth in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter, the total number of members in the Imperial Legislative Council would be fifty-three or including His Excellency the Viceroy, fifty-four.

So far as the proposals under heads A, B and C of sub-paragraph 2 of paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter are concerned, the Trustees do not think it necessary to offer any suggestion, as they regard them fair and reasonable.

Coming to head D of the same sub-paragraph, the Trustees think that the proposals laid down in sub-heads (a), (b) and (c) also appear to them reasonable and do not call for any special remark.

The total number of non-official members, according to the proposed scheme now under consideration, would be, including a ruling chief, twenty-five. Of these eighteen are to be elected by various electorates and seven to be nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy. Of the eighteen elected members, two are to be [under sub-head (d) of head D, sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter] Muhammadans; and of the seven nominated members also two will be Muhammadans. Thus out of a total of twenty-five non-official members, both elected and nominated, there will be at least four Muhammadan members in the Council.

The Trustees believe that the recognition by the Government of India of the principle of having a fixed number of Muhammadan seats in these councils is most satisfactory, and they feel grateful to the Government of India for acknowledging in such clear terms in paragraph 16 of their letter that "neither on the Provincial nor in the Imperial Legislative Councils has the Muhammadan community hitherto received a measure of representation commensurate with its numbers and political and historical importance," and that "the total representation thus effected has not been commensurate with its right to which the Muhammadan community is entitled." But the chief question before the Trustees has been whether the number of seats allotted in the proposed schemes to the Muhammadans of India would secure to them "due and ample" representation "commensurate with their political and historical importance" and sufficient for their special needs in this country.

After nature consideration the Trustees are of of opinion that the measure of representation allowed to the Muhammadans of India in the scheme now under consideration, far from being "due and ample," actually falls sort of their needs and requirements. It need not be pointed out now that the Muhammadans constitute a distinct community not only in the country as a whole, but also in each province, and that those inhabiting the various provinces of the country have besides their national needs, which are common to the community as a whole, special interests of their own which are peculiar to their situation in particular provinces. The country is so large, the various provinces are so far apart and have such a wide variety of needs and conditions, that for the proper and due representation of each province a special study and thorough knowledge of local conditions and circumstances would be necessary, which a member from a distant province is not likely to possess or acquire. The Trustees beg therefore to suggest that each of the eight provinces namely (1) Bengal, (2) Eastern Bengal and Assam, (3) Bombay, (4) Madras, (5) United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, (6) Punjab (7) Central Provinces and Berar (8) Burma, should each have at least one elected Muhammadan representation.

The Trustees desire to state that, so far as they are aware of the wishes of the community as a whole, Muhammadans of each province wish to have the right of being represented by an elected member. It is true that out of the six members who are, under this scheme, to be nominated by his Excellency the Viceroy two will be Muhammadans, but to have one province represented by a member who is elected and another by one who is nominated would not be desirable; and after taking everything into consideration the Trustees endorse the view advocated, in the address of His Excellency the Viceroy, by the Muhammadan deputation in October 1906 that the Muhammadans be granted the right of returning by election their representatives on the councils.

According to the scheme under consideration, Muhammadans are given the right of electing two members only, and therefore out of the eight provinces mentioned above only two at a time would be represented by such members, which means that every province, after its turn is over, will be without an elected representative for at least seven years. For instance, if the two elected members be returned from the provinces of Bengal and Eastern Bengal for a period of two years, say for 1908-9 their turn will not come again till 1916.

The object of the proposed reforms being to afford greater opportunities to the people, through their accredited representatives, to convey their wishes and sentiments to the Government, it appears to the Trustees only fair to ask that Muhammadans of each province be granted an equal opportunity for this purpose. It is not always that such reforms are or can be undertaken by the Government, and it is after a long experience that they have now recognized the distinct character of Muhammadan interests in this country. If, therefore, the Muhammadans of India fail to get the rights which alone can secure to them "due and ample" representation the Trustees apprehend that such an opportunity they are not likely to have for a long time to come.

In addition to the above-mentioned eight members, the Trustees respectfully beg to pay for the privilege of returning one member, on their own behalf, to the Imperial Legislative Council, and they wish to base their request upon the following grounds :—

It is needless to tell the Government of the history, the works, and the success of what is called "the Aligarh movement," for no one knows it better than the Government. It is enough to observe that, ever since the advent of British rule in India the Indian Musalmans had kept themselves entirely aloof from all those conditions, and institutions which were the result of British Government in this country. The aloofness on their part naturally created a breach between them and the Government, and the consequent was that on the one hand the Muhamadans as a community not only failed to appreciate the blessing of British rule and the great qualities of the English people, but looked upon them with suspicion and distrust; and on the other the Government failed to realize the real sentiments and estimate the real value of this important section of the Indian people and regarded them as antagonistic to the new régime. It was the late Sir Saiyid, the founder of the Aligarh movement, who first realized that both sides were in the wrong, and that their attitude towards each other was the result of ignorance, and that, as a matter of fact the essential interests of both were identical. Having realized this great fact, he set to impress it both upon the Government and on his co-religionists. But he found that without educating his community he would not be able to remove the barrier of ignorance which lay between them and the Government, and therefore he started the educational movement which culminated in the foundation of the Aligarh College and the establishment of the Muhammadan educational conference. The chief work of the Aligarh movement has been on the one hand (1) to make the Indian Musalmans understand that the permanence of British rule, in full vigour and strength, in India is the first condition of their own safety and continual advance, and (2) to impress upon them the absolute necessity of receiving English high education and sound training, and thereby qualifying themselves to take their place as useful citizens of the great British Empire, and on the other to convince the Government that Muhammadans are not only loyal to the Government by sentiment but also by self-interest, and that their progress and advance would mean so much strength to the Government.

The success of the Aligarh movement may be measured by the representative character of the address presented on behalf of the Muhammadan deputation to His Excellency the Viceroy on the 1st October 1906. Their address embodied the essential principles and features of the Aligarh movement endorsed practically by the whole community and recognized by His Excellency the Viceroy in the following passage of his reply :—

"Aligarh has won its laurels. Its students have gone forth to fight the battle of life strong in the tenets of their own religion, strong in the precepts of loyalty and patriotism, and now, when there is much that is critical in the political future of India, the inspiration of Sir Saiyid Ahmad Khan and the teachings of Aligarh shine forth brilliantly in the pride of Muhammadan history, in the loyalty, common sense, and sound reasoning so eloquently expressed in your address."

Thus it may fairly be claimed that the Aligarh movement is not confined to any particular province or part of India but represents the united sense and sentiments of practically the whole of that portion of the Muhammadan community in this country of which the voice counts for something and which exercises a real influence on the rest of that community. The Trustees, who have been in charge of this movement from the lifetime of its founder, may therefore be allowed to submit that there is no other corporate body of Muhammadans in India that reflects the views of the community in the manner and to the extent in which they themselves have the honour of doing so.

Therefore, if they desire to have the privilege of returning a member to the Imperial Legislative Council, they do so for the benefit of their community, whose best interest it has been their constant duty to study and advocate.

It may be stated that the body of the Trustees consists of Muhammadan gentlemen of position, learning, and influence representing almost all the provinces of India and all sections of the community. Among them are to be found talukdars, nawabs and raises such as—

(1) the Hon'ble Nawab Sir Amir-ud-din Khan, K.C.I.E., Wali of Loharu State (Punjab);
(2) the Hon'ble Raja Ali Muhammad Khan Bahadur of Mahmudabad (Oudh);
(3) the Hon'ble Nawab Sir Faiyaz Ali Khan, K.C.I.E., C.S.I., of Pahasu (United Provinces);
(4) the Hon'ble Nawab Emad-ul-mulk Maulvi Saiyid Husain, Bilgrami (Hyderabad);
(5) Nawabzada Nasr-ul-lah Khan (Bombay);
(6) Sardar Yar Muhammad Khan, C.I.E., Prime Minister, Jaora State (Central India);
(7) the Hon'ble Nawab Saiyid Amir Hasan Khan Bahadur, C.I.E., of Calcutta (Bengal);
(8) the Hon'ble Nawab Bahadur Khawaja Salim-ul-lah Khan, C.S.I., of Dacca;
(9) Nawab Vikar-ul-mulk Maulvi Mustak Husain Sahib of Amroha (United Provinces);
(10) Mushir-ud-daula Mumtaz-ul-Mulk, Khalifa Saiyid Muhammad Husain of Patiala State (Punjab);
(11) the Hon'ble Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Bahadur Qazalbash, C.I.E., of Lahore (Punjab);
(12) the Hon'ble Raja Tasadduq Rasul Khan, C.S.I., of Jahangirabad (Oudh);
(13) Khan Bahadur Mirza Shujaat Ali Beg, Persian Vice-Consul, Calcutta; and many other big landholders representing the "stable elements." Besides them the Trustees have among themselves the most distinguished of the educated and intellectual people such as—

(1) Shams-ul-Ulama Maulana Hafiz Doctor Nazir Ahmad Sahib, LLD., of Delhi (Punjab);
(2) Shams-ul-Ulama Maulvi Khwaja Altaf Husain Sahib Hall, President, All India Muhammadan Educational Conference, Karachi, (Sindh);
(3) Shams-ul-Ulama Maulvi Amjad Ali Sahib, Professor, Muir Central College, Allahabad (United Provinces);
(4) Shams-ul-Ulama Khan Bahadur Maulvi Muhammad Zaka-ullah Sahib (Delhi);
(5) Khan Bahadur Saiyid Ashraf-ud-din Sahib, Matawalli, Imambara, Hooghly (Bengal);
(6) Surgeon-Major Saiyid Hasan, Bilgrami, of Hyderabad (Deccan), London;
(7) Hakim Muhammad Ajmal Khan Sahib, Delhi,
(8) Haji Muhammad Ismail Khan Sahib, Aligarh,
(9) Saiyid Aftab Ahmad Khan, Esq., B.A., (Cantab.), Barrister-at-Law, Aligarh;
(10) Saiyid Sultan Ahmad Khan, Esq., B.A., (Cantab.), Chief Justice, Gwalior State;
(11) the Hon'ble Khan Bahadur Muhammad Shah Din, Barrister-at-Law, Lahore;
(12) Maulvi Nazir Ahmad Sahib, B.A., LL.B. Judge, Kashmir State;
(13) Muhammad Rafique, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, District and Sessions Judge, Fyzabad;
(14) Nawab Muhammad Ishak Khan Bahadur, S.C.S., District and Sessions Judge, Farrukhabad;

(15) Saiyid Muhammad Ali, Esq., C.S., District and Sessions Judge, Mirzapur;
(16) Maulvi Aziz Mirza, Esq., B.A., (Hyderabad, Home Secretary to His Highness the Nizam's Government;
(17) Khan Bahadur Colonel Abdul Majid Khan, Foreign Minister, Patiala State;
(18) Saiyid Ali Inam, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, Bankipur, Patna (Behar);
(19) Shaikh Abdul Kadir, Esq., B.A., Barrister-at-Law, Delhi;
(20) Maulvi Nizam-ud-din Hasan, B.A., LL.B., Deputy Commissioner, Central Provinces;
(21) Maulvi Abdul Majid, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, Allahabad:

and many other distinguished graduates of the Indian Universities who are in the Government service as Deputy Collectors and Extra Assistant Commissioners.

It may also be pointed out that on the one hand the Trustees are frequently in touch with the "Visitors" of the Aligarh College, among whom are included such names as—

(1) His Highness Nawab Sahib of Rampur,
(2) His Highness Sir Agha Khan, G.C.S.I.;
(3) the Hon'ble Justice Amir Ali, C.I.E.;
(4) the Hon'ble Mr. Theodore Morison:

and with the Heads of the Governments and high officials, and on the other, through the operations and annual meetings, at various centres in India, of the All India Muhammadan Educational Conference, which is a part of the Aligarh movement, they come in direct and constant contract with all sections and classes of Musalmans in widely distant portions of the country.

Thus the Trustees believe they are justified in regarding themselves as a thoroughly representative body, recognized as such both by the Government and the Muhammadan community as a whole and they therefore trust that the privilege they have prayed for will be granted to them.

But the Trustees wish it to be clearly understood that they do not prefer this claim merely as managers of an educational institution, but rather in their capacity of directors and organizers of the "Aligarh movement," which comprehends many important interests of the community. Their work as managers of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College is only a part (regulated by fixed rules and regulations) of what Sir Saiyid Ahmad Khan did and they themselves have been doing ever since the beginning of this movement. The body of the trustees consists practically of all the leaders of the community in various parts of the country, and the fact of their connection with the great trust at Aligarh must not be allowed to deprive them of their position as representatives of their co-religionists in matters other than educational.

The suggestions made by the Trustees, would, if accepted, necessitate an increase in the number of the members of the Imperial Council: but considering the extent or the country and the importance and varied nature of the interests involved it may be submitted that any such increase would be amply justified by the nature of the case.

V.—Electorate for the election of Muhammadan members for the Imperial Council.

It has been suggested above that the eight provinces and the trurtees of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, Aligarh, as a body, should be given the right of returning one member each to the Imperial Legislative Council. So far as the election of the representative of the Trustees is concerned, they, as a corporate body would constitute the electorate and, by a majority of votes, elect one of their members as their representative.

As regards electorates for Muhammadan non-official members from each province the Trustees beg to suggest the following constitution for such electorates:—

(a) Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Legislative Council.
(b) Muhammadan fellows of the Provincial University, and in the case of the Central Provinces and Burma those fellows who represent these provinces in any of the Provincial Universities.

(c) Muhammadans paying a land revenue of Rs. 10,000 per annum.
(d) Muhammadans paying income-tax on Rs. 10,000 per annum.
(e) The Trustees of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College permanently residing in the province concerned, if there be any.

The first four of the above five heads do not call for any remark as they are based upon the suggestions of the Muhammadan deputation to His Excellency the Viceroy. The Trustees have ventured to suggest the reduction of the amounts of land revenue and income-tax payable by electors in view of the present financial position of many of the Muhummadan aristocracy, and in order to make the Council more representative.

The fifth head has already been explained above when explaining the position the Trustees occupy in the community, and the extent to which they are competent to represent their best interests. By including the Provincial Trustees in the proposed electorates, the Government will have the advantage of consulting, so to speak, the united voice of practically the whole community in the election of provincial representatives for the Imperial Council.

VI.—The proposed changes in the constitution of the Provincial Legislative Council.

After a careful consideration of the needs and requirement of the Muhammadans of these provinces, the Trustees beg to suggest that Muhammadan inhabitants of each division should be given the right to elect one Muhammadan non-official member of the Provincial Legislative Council from among themselves.

In addition to the above, the Trustees pray for a similar privilege for themselves, that is to say for the right of electing one of themselves as a member of the Provincial Legislative Council. In connection with these suggestion it may be stated that of the total number of seventy Trustees of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, Aligarh, thirty are elected from among the Muhammadans of these provinces alone the rest being distributed throughout the other parts of India.

So far as the Muhammadans of the United Provinces are concerned, it would be difficult to find for them another body of men so influential and representative as the Provincial Trustees of the college.

As regards the claim of one Muhammadan member for each division, it may be respectfully submitted that, the Muhammadans being in the minority in these provinces, their needs and wishes riquire special study and thorough local knowledge to be successfully placed before the Government.

It is true that these suggestions, if accepted, would necessitate the increase in the number of members of the Council, both official and non-official, but the object to be gained is, in the opinion of the Trustees, of sufficient importance to justify such an increase.

VII.—Electorate for the election of Muhammadan members for Provincial Legislative Council of these Provinces.

In this connection it would be better to begin with municipal and district board franchise. The Trustees are of opinion that in each municipality and district board the number of Muhammadan members should be fixed, and they should be returned by Muhammadan electors residing in any particular municipality or within the limits of a district board.

The Trustees suggest that the qualification for electors should remain the same as at present, and that a rental or an income of Rs. 10 a month should be required as a qualification for a candidate for membership of the municipal board; and in the case of district boards payment of Rs. 100 as land revenue should be necessary as a qualification for the membership.

Thus the electorate for non-official Muhammadan members of the Provincial Council should consist of the following:—

(1) Muhammadan members of municipal and district board.
(2) Muhammadan fellows of the Allahabad University.
(3) Muhammadan graduates of the Allahabad University of five years' standing residing in these provinces.

(4) United Provinces Muhammadan landholders paying Rs. 3,000 as revenue.
(5) Muhammadan gentlemen paying income-tax on Rs. 3,000 a year.

No. 561, dated Ramnagar the 30th November 1907.

From—His Highness Maharaja Sir Parbhu Narayan Singh Bahadur, G.C.I.E., of Benares,

To—Agent, Governor-General, Benares.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 5-I—83 dated the 21st ultimo, forwarding copy of G. O. no. 1560-III—116-1907, dated the 10th October 1907, inviting my opinion about the proposed Advisory and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils. I have very carefully considered the proposals and take the liberty to express my opinion about them as follows.

2. First, as to the creation of an Advisory Council :—

From the preamble given in the letter of Sir Harold Stuart, I find that His Excellency the Viceroy is introducing this reform with a view (a) to associate the ruling chiefs, big landholders, and commercial classes who are the most powerful and stable elements of the Indian society, more closely with the actual administration of the country; (b) to know the real needs and sentiments of the people through their natural leaders and make the true motives of the Government known to the masses of the people through the same agency; (c) to encourage the aristocratic and other important classes to take larger share in the actual work of administration and make them fit for more extensive employment in the higher offices of the State, subject of course to the proviso that the executive authority of the Government is maintained in undiminished strength. In the light of the above-quoted principles I would examine the concrete proposals made for the establishment, constitution, and working of this Council.

3. There can be no two opinions as to the advisability of associating the great ruling chiefs and the territorial magnates of British India with the Governor General in the guardianship of the common and imperial interests; and at the same time it is also very necessary that they be not vested with any formal power or receive a legislative recognition. By being thus bound down the Council will lose the great object for which it is established, as the freedom of expressing ideas and opinions will be hampered by other considerations and the healthy, frank, unrestrained, and unprejudiced opinion will not be coming forth.

4. I fully agree with the Government in the seven conditions laid down for the creation, nomination and working of the Council with one exception only, which is as follows :—

I would not bind down the Council to deal with such matters only as might be specifically referred to it from time to time. If the councillors are responsible to inform the Government of the true needs and sentiments of the people and to make known to the latter the real motives of the Government, they might be authorised to communicate to His Excellency the Viceroy any matter of sufficient importance even without being asked for and at the same time express their opinions about them. Similarly, they might be empowered to ask the Government confidentially about such subjects and measures which, in their opinion, were likely to give wrong impression to the people. Until these two important privileges are granted, the councillors will naturally fall short of the expectations formed of them, and they will not take the trouble to keep themselves informed of the real needs and sentiments of the people, and will remain only a set of irresponsible advisers. The grant of these powers will make them mindful of the confidence which the Government was reposing in them and they will try to prove themselves worthy of it. By this means the Government will be in a position to know much more of the people and the people much more of the Government, and the Viceroy will receive very timely notice of many a momentous subject agitating the public mind, which somtimes these days he receives rather too late; and the people will at the same time know without any fuss what was the true motive of the Government regarding any particular measure. Of course the Government shall reserve to itself the power to refuse to give information regarding any matter which, in its opinion, it will not be in the public interest to disclose.

5. In this way there will be a continuous free and confidential interchange of ideas and opinions between the Head of the Government and the leaders of the people, which will very effectually bridge the great gulf that lies between the rulers and the ruled just at present.

6. I would also propose that all correspondence passing between the councillors and the Government be recorded confidentially for use if need were, and their opinions about all matters be carefully noted down, although the Government shall not be bound to follow them. It will also be very beneficial if, before introducing a bill in the Legislative Council, the Government might consult these councillors about the measure, subject, of coures, to the proviso that the matter is not of a sufficiently urgent nature which would admit of no delay.

7. As to the composition of the Council I agree in the proposal to have it composed of ruling chiefs and territorial magnates, but I would like to include in it such other persons of note who, although neither ruling chiefs nor territorial magnates, are still looked upon by the people with equal, if not greater, respect, and who know much more of the country and wield greater influence over the people than the princes themselves. I would also associate with them some of the merchant princes and the pioneers of commerce and industry, who are no less a powerful and stable element of the Indian society. Such, for instance, His Highness Aga Khan is neither a ruling chief nor a territorial magnate, but his influence amongst his people and the respect which he commands in the country far exceed those which a ruling chief possesses. The late Sir Sheshadri Iyer of Mysore, the late Sir Saiyid Ahmad Khan, Baba Khem Karan Bedi of the Punjab, and many others might, be so instanced. Persons of their influence and parts would be real acquisitions to the Council. Similarly, such merchant princes as the late Jamshedji Jeejeebhoy or Sir David Sassoon, and such pioneers of industry and commerce as the late Mr. Jamshedjee N. Tata of Bombay, or Messrs. Cooper and Allen of Cawnpore, would add to the weight of the Council and its usefulness. I would, therefore, propose that from out of the total number of sixty, fifteen seats be allowed to ruling chiefs and twenty-five to territorial magnates in British India, five to noblemen in native states, eight merchant princes and pioneers of industry and commerce (both native and European), and seven to specially qualified persons of note. The last might be elected by the aforesaid fifty-three members and appointed after the approval of the Governor General.

8. As to the Provincial Advisory Council, I agree to all the proposals made, subject to the modifications suggested, as to their functions in the case of the imperial councillors. I would also not have a Government official presiding over their deliberations or a Government secretary recording their proceedings and conclusions. I would leave them free to choose their president and secretary, as free discussion will not be possible in the presence of Government officers. Of course a Government secretary ought to be close at hand for the purpose of furnishing such information as might be required regarding the matters under discussion.

9. As to the enlargement of the Legislative Councils, I fully agree with the statement that the elective system introduced into it did not fulfil the expectations formed. The more respectable classes whose opinions would have been of value to the Government and whose interests were affected by the different measures passed, were left in the dark, and their places were taken by the people who had nothing to recommend themselves except the fluency of the tongue. Both the head and the hand had to give way to the lungs.

10. The objects of the Government of India in enlarging these Councils appear to me as follows :—

(a) To give the people of India more voice in the administration of the country.
(b) To give due representation to all important classes, crafts, and creeds in the Council and to see that it is not monopolized by a particular section or class.

(c) To introduce the elective element in the administration of the country so far as it is compatible with the safety of the interests of the different societies and creeds of India.

(d) To encourage the aristocracy of the country, who stand shy just at present, to enter the public life and take part in its actual administration; subject to the condition that

(e) The official majority be strong enough to carry out important measures which otherwise might be hampered by the non-official members.

There can be no divergence of opinion about the soundness of the above principles, but it is necessary to see how they would stand the test of actual working.

11. I fully admit the fact that it is not advisable in any case to leave the legislative business of the Government of India at the mercy of the non-official members, and specially with such members as have filled the post till now. But at the same time it is a pity to sever specially experienced and talented Government officials from their work and coop them up in Calcutta during the most important part of the year, for the purpose of simply serving as a counterpoise to the non-official members and to counteract the evil of their adverse votes. This, in my opinion, will not be in the true interest of the country. Such officers of the Government as will be chosen to sit in the Legislative Council will, in most cases, be the cream of the service, and it will be a bad policy to enlist them in a corps of sinecures to simply attend certain meetings in a year and "ditto" the proposals of the Government. The opinion of such officers is necessarily taken before any important bill is introduced in the Council, and it is not necessary to drag them once again to Calcutta at great personal inconvenience and no less expense, what to say to the detriment of the public service, simply to approve of the measures to which they have already given their assent.

12. There is really no good in enlarging the Legislative Councils when its composition will cause so much difficulty. The enlargement of the Councils is intended to be of real benefit to the country and it is not intended to honour the few political agitators. The Council is also expected to be a working Council and not simply an Advisory Council. As the matter stands just now the non-official members know full well that they will not be able to carry out any measure in the Council, and that any matter, however objectionable in their opinion, will certainly be carried out if the Government so desires. The feeling makes the non-official members feel that they are only a set of irresponsible advisers and their post is really an honorary one. They have no sense of responsibility weighing over them, and the result is that we have much more light talks in the Council which would never be forthcoming if the members were weighed down with a sense of responsibility. They know that their action can have no effect upon the actual administration of the country, and so they prefer to talk whatever is uppermost in their mind.

13. The scheme proposed for the enlargement of the Councils will give satisfaction to no party and will not improve the usefulness of the Council. I would therefore propose a bold scheme which, if carried out, would, in my opinion be hailed with unmixed satisfaction throughout the country and would be a measure of real benefit to the people and would pave the way for further progress and reform in future.

14. I would leave the composition of the Council as proposed in the draft scheme as it is, but cut down the number of official additional members from twenty to seven. One officer from each province will be quite sufficient to watch its interests. There will thus be fifteen officials and twenty-five non-official members, and the total strength of the Council will be forty or, including the Viceroy, forty-one. All measures except the following, which should be scheduled together, might be permitted to be carried out by a majority of votes, subject to the very material safeguard that the Viceroy shall have the power of vetoing any such measure passed by the Council which, in his opinion, might not be in the public interest. The Viceroy should also have the power to dissolve the Council before time if they prove unworthy of their office.

15. The measures which I would exclude from being carried out by a majority of votes and would like to be put in a schedule would be the following :—

(a) All measures relating to military administration.

(b) All measures relating to sedition or disaffection.

(c) All measures affecting any religion.

(d) All measures affecting the fiscal arrangements of the country.

(e) All measures regarding the imposition or remission of taxation.

(f) All measures tending to affect the executive authority of the Government or interfering with administration or of political nature.

(g) The framing of the budget.

(h) Any other measure which, in the opinion of His Excellency the Viceroy, might be put in the schedule.

For these scheduled measures I would make it legal for the vote of each official member to be counted as two. In this way there will be thirty-two votes for the sixteen official members including the Viceroy, and as there will be only twenty-five non-official members there will be a clear majority of seven on the official side. As the members will prove themselves worthy of the confidence reposed in them, some of the above-named measures would be taken out of the schedule list. I am inclined to believe that this will be a real education for the people of India in the art of administration. The whole tone of non-official members will be changed for the better in no time and the administration of the country will be immensely improved and facilitated.

16. But in case the Government is not prepared to sanction this scheme and would adhere to the principle of numerical official majority and at the same time must enlarge the Council, I would propose to allot seven places out of the twenty places to be filled with officials under the head "B" from the seven principal provinces of India, and there maining thirteen seats filled by Secretaries and Under Secretaries of the Government, who are always at the headquarters and can be easily summoned to attend the meetings of the Councils and vote with the Government without any great interruption to their regular works. I would strongly deprecate the employment of district and divisional officers of the Government for such purpose.

17. In the composition of the non-official members I have nothing to add except that I would expunge the words "not less than two to be Muhammadans" from the head "E." I fully agree in the view that Muhammadans are a very important element of the Indian society, and they must get a place in the Legislative Councils commensurate with their numerical strength and their high position. I would regard the four places reserved for them out of the twenty-two (excluding the ruling chiefs and the experts) rather t o little. But it is possible that they might be returned in large numbers under the heads "B" and "C," and then it might not be necessary to nominate them under the heads "E." I would therefore not place any restraint upon the choice of the Viceroy. He might nominate all four Muhammadans if necessary.

18. Now as to the electors for electing the landholders, I think it very desirable to have a provincial list of such electors numbering between 100 and 150. This will give an idea of importance and responsibility to the electors themselves and shall have a beneficial effect upon the guild. The actual amount of revenue giving the right to vote should be left to be determined by the Local Governments, as they would raise or lower the amount in view of the number of such landholders available in the province. These electors might assemble at the headquarters of their district and elect one of their members to be their representative. Representative from each district would then assemble at the capital of the province and, under the presidency of the Commissioner of the place, give their votes by ballots for the candidates. The indispensable qualifications for a candidate ought to be (a) that he knows English language sufficiently to understand the proceedings before the Council (or in special cases is wealthy enough to employ a highly educated secretary to translate all the proceedings for his consideration); (b) that he must be paying a land revenue to the Government not less than rupees ten thousand; (c) that he must be living in his own estate at least for six months in a year (an absentee landlord would be of no practical use to the Council). The above proposals will be very useful and will result in securing a man of proper stamp. If the election will be limited to the non-official members of the Provincial Councils it will be of very little use and will not serve the purpose which the Government has in view.

19. As for the election of the Muhammadan representatives in the Council, it is wholly undesirable on more grounds than one to have an all India electorate for the election of Muhammadan candidates. The proposals put forward by the prominent members of the Muhammadan deputation which waited on His Excellency the Viceroy in October 1906 seems to be very workable with some modifications, i.e., the Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Councils, the Muhammadan fellows of the local Universities, the Muhammadans paying income tax upon an annual income of not less than Rs. 20,000, and Muhammadan landholders paying Government Revenue of Rs. 20,000, and upwards might be asked to return one member for the Imperial Council. Two provinces in rotation will thus return two members every two years. The Punjab and the United Provinces, the Bengal and the Eastern Bengal and Assam, Bombay and Madras, might return members alternately, and the Viceroy's nominee in case of necessity might be chosen from the other provinces which don't return members that year, and if need were, he might nominate one from each of the four remaining provinces if the Muhammadans are not sufficiently returned under other heads.

20. As to the Provincial Legislative Councils, I have nothing to add to the Government proposal, which seems very well considered. I have, however, to point out one thing. It proposes that the distinction of classes, such as landholders, traders, cultivators and artizans, should be made in the case of Hindus only, and the Muhammadans might be returned as one class. This ought not to be done, as the Muhammadans of the present day are as much divided into such classes as the Hindus. The weavers of Benares are a very important class in themselves, and so are some other classes also. I would therefore agree with the latter proposal of the Government, i.e., simply forming electoral groups on the basis of the four classes specified above, without regard of creed and fixing for each group a distinct and appropriate franchise. And if Muhammadans be not sufficiently returned then, the omission might be supplied by nomination.

21. As to the discussion of the budget, I have nothing to add to the Government proposal, which seems all that is desirable in the present state of the country.

I hope the above proposal which I have taken the liberty to express will meet with the approval of the Government. I have very frankly given my opinion on the Government proposals, and, though this letter has become unduly large, I hope you will excuse me for it as I had to express my ideas as fully as I possibly could.

Dated the 31st December 1907.

From—The Hon'ble Raja Muhammad Ali Muhammad Khan, Khan Bahadur, Talukdar of Mahmudabad, Oudh,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the honour done to me by your letter no. 1518-III—416, of 1907, dated Nani Tal, the 7th of October last, which has afforded me the opportunity of laying before the Government my views upon the important proposals of reform there referred to. I am glad to avail myself of this opportunity, and hereby submit my humble opinions for the consideration of the Government as briefly as possible.

The first point noted in the letter under reply is the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Council. The number of members proposed by His Honour for this council will, I think, meet general approval, but, having regard to the principle adopted by the Government of India in their letter of which a copy has been forwarded to me, a certain minimum number is also required to be fixed for Muhammadan members, and I am strongly of opinion that this number should not be less than eight. With this qualification I would suggest that the 24 members of the said Council should be made up as follows:—

2 Ruling chiefs.
3 Talukdars of Oudh.
4 Landholders of Agra.
1 Landholder of Oudh.
1 Representative of Allahabad University.
1 „ Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, Aligarh, trustees.
1 „ the legal profession of Agra.
1 „ „ „ Oudh.
1 „ the Chamber of Commerce.
1 „ Indian mercantile community.
1 „ the banking community.
1 „ railways.
2 Representatives of municipal boards.
2 „ district boards.
1 Representative of non-official European community.
2 Representatives of minorities or other interests which may, in the opinion of the Local Government, require to be safeguarded.

With regard to the qualifications of the members of the Provincil Advisory Council, I am inclined to think that no one should ordinarily be eligible unless he pays Government revenue amounting to rupees six thousand or income-tax on a like amount (or perhaps also) if the aggregate of his revenue and the taxed income amounts to the said figures.

I may also mention that, in my opinion, the term of office of the members of this Council should be the same as that fixed for the Imperial Advisory Council.

As to the number and composition of the non-official portion of the Provincial Legislative Council, I believe the suggestions of His Honour would satisfy all reasonable requirements of the present if only in one respect it is slightly modified. I refer to the case of the Muhammadan community, and I would suggest that of its two representatives proposed to be nominated by Government one should be nominated on the recommendation of the trustees of Aligarh College.

With reference to the municipal and dstrict boards I am of opinion that these electorates do not require any alterations. The circumstances of each municipal and district board will have to be separately considered, and no rule can be satisfactory which fixes a uniform standard of qualification either in all municipal boards or even in all the district boards. I therefore think it would be better to retain the existing franchise for both municipal and district boards.

Then with regard to the qualifications of candidates for the board, I understand that in municipal boards there is already a distinction made between the qualifications of electors and of candidates, and no alteration of general application appears to be called for in this respect. But for district boards, where no such distinction is observed, I am of opinion that the following qualifications should be fixed for candidates to district boards:—

(1) Honorary Magistrates, honorary munsifs, and village munsifs having jurisdiction in the district.
(2) Landholders paying Government revenue amounting to not less than Rs. 500.
(3) Under-proprietors in Oudh and tenants at fixed rates in Agra paying rent amounting to not less than Rs. 500.
(4) Residents outside municipalities.

Again, with regard to the representatives of the municipal and district boards on the Provincial Legislative Council, I am of opinion that a residential qualification is not needed, but no candidate should be eligible for such seats unless he pays a Government revenue of not less than Rs. 3,000 or income-tax on a like amount or the aggregate of his revenue and taxed income amounts to not less than Rs. 3,000.

In conclusion, with the Municipal and district boards, paragraph 22 of the letter of the Government of India suggest that Local Government should introduce into their system of election and nomination for these boards the principle of assigning a fixed proportion of seats to each of the leading classes into which the population is divided. Having regard to this view, I am of opinion that for each district and municipal board a minimum number of seats should be reserved for Muhammadans, and that these seats should be filled by elections in which the Muhammadan electors alone take part (as was also suggested by the Muhammadan deputation), or by nomination in localities where, owing to smallness of Muhammadan population or other causes, it would be impracticable to have any Muhammadan electorate.

As to the Muhammadan electorate for the Imperial Legislative Council, the proposals of the Muhammadan deputation, referred to in paragraph 5 of your letter, with regard to the amount of land revenue and income-tax the payment of which should form the qualification of an ordinary elector, seem to me to fix the limit at too high a figure. Even the limit of Rs. 10,000 which we seem to suggest does not appear to me to be sufficiently low to satisfy the needs and circumstances of the Muhammadan community. The qualification of a Muhammadan elector to the Imperial Legislative Council should not be higher than that required from a candidate for the Imperial Legislative Council. I would, therefore, suggest that the electorate should be formed from the four classes mentioned in paragraph 5 of your letter, with this modification that in respect of classes (c) and (d) the limit of land revenue and taxed income should be reduced to Rs. 3,000, which I have proposed for the candidates for the Provincial Legislative Council. To these four classes the Government might add a fifth corresponding with class (b) mentioned in paragraph 6 of your letter as under:—

(e) Muhammadan graduates of any Indian or British university of more than six years' standing.

An important question with regard to the Muhammadan electorate, however constituted and whether for the Governor General's Council or for the Provincial Legislative Council, is the method of carrying out the elections. It appears doubtful if it would be possible to collect together the whole electorate of a province in one place on the same day, and even if their votes could be properly taken at different places, the canvassing of votes would involve an amount of trouble and expense which few would be willing to undertake.

The Government of India obviously recognize this, as appears from the concluding part of paragraph 17 of their letter, but they provide what seems to me to be not an unpopular remedy, but one that hardly avoids the difficulty.

I am of opinon that the difficulty should be met by providing that, except the classes (a) and (b), the members of the other three classes, (c), (d) and (e), of the Muhammadan electorate should assemble at the headquarters of their division and should each elect one of their members to represent them, and these representatives (three from each division), together with all the members of the classes (a) and (b), could conveniently meet together for electing a councillor on behalf of all. If this suggestion is accepted I believe that the objection of Indian gentlemen of position to offer themselves as candidates to avoid electorate will be practically removed, and with it the reason as given in the said paragraph 17 of the letter of the Government of India for filling half the seats allotted to the Muhammadans by nomination instead of by election.

With reference to paragraph 6 of your letter I have already expressed my opinion on the points raised in the first two sentences. As regards a Muhammadan electorate for the Provincial Council I take the same view as that suggested in your letter with this exception that, in my opinion, for classes (c) and (d) the limit of land revenue and taxed income should be reduced to Rs. 1,000.

With regard to paragraph 7 of your letter I strongly feel that, having regard to the distinctive status which they occupy by reason of their unquestionable loyalty and historic privileges, which the Government has always been pleased to accord to them, the talukdars of Oudh deserve that one of their members should at all times be on the Imperial Legislative Council.

For the landholders of the province of Agra I am of opinion that the Northern Landholders' Association is not sufficiently representative of the whole province, and the best thing would be to form an electorate by fixing property qualification. I would suggest that all landholders paying Government Revenue amounting to not less than Rs. 5,000 should be entitled to elect a representative on the Imperial and Local Legislative Councils. As to the candidates for the Imperial Council, I think they should be landholders paying land revenue amounting to not less than Rs. 10,000.

Dated Aligarh, the 27th December 1907.

From—The Hon'ble Nawab Mumtaz-ud-daula Sir Muhammad Faiyaz Ali Khan, K.C.I.E., C.S.I., of Pahasu,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

Sir,—In reply to your letter No. 1418/416-III of 1907, dated the 7th of October 1907, I beg to make the following suggestions regarding the matters referred to in the above letter:—

I.—Construction of Provincal Advisory Council.

In connection with this head the suggestions in Government of India's letter, paragraph 16, are to be followed, and therefore after considering the purposes for which the Council is to be organized I would suggest that the Council should consist of about thirty members and its composition may be as follows:—

1 Member nominated by the Allahabad University.
1 Member to be nominated by the Chamber of Commerce, Cawnpore.
1 Representative of the legal profession to be elected by the representatives of the various Bar Associations in the Province.
6 Representatives of the six municipalities of towns, namely Allahabad, Agra, Benares, Cawnpore, Lucknow and Bareilly.
9 Representatives of the other municipal towns, one from each division.
3 Representatives of district boards—two for Agra and one for Oudh.
2 Representatives of the landholders of Agra, to be elected.
1 Representative of the landholders of Oudh to be nominated by the British Indian Association of Oudh.
4 Representatives of the Muhammadan community—one to be nominated by the Trustees of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College at Aligarh, two by other Muhammadan Anjumans, and one by Government.
2 Representatives of the non-official Europeans.

II.—Composition of the non-official portion of the Provincial Council.

The suggestion of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor in this respect is very fair, and it requires no addition or alteration.

III.—Qualifications for Electorate and Candidates for Seats in Municipal Board.

In addition to the condition already laid down for electors and candidates, I think that the standard of income of electors should be a little raised. No person should be eligible to vote unless he possesses property yielding an income of, or residing in a house of which the rent is not less than, five rupees a month. In the case of district boards only one condition regarding the candidates should be attached—that he should either posses property of which the yearly revenue paid is not less than hundred rupees a year or he should pay income-tax on an income of rupees five hundred.

I quite agree with the suggestion of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor in requiring the qualifications from the representatives of district and municipal boards on the Provincial Legislative Council.

In the case of the representative of the district board the amount o land revenue required should be not less than Rs. 5,000 a year, and in the case of the representative of the municipal board such amount should not be lees than Rs. 3,000 a year.

I may further be allowed to say that in each municipality and district board there should be a fixed number of Muhammadan members to be elected by Muhammadan electors.

I have no suggestion to make in the electorate suggested in paragraphs 5 and 6 of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor's letter.

The electorate for the elected Muhammadan member of the Provincial Legislative Council :—

1. Muhammadan members of municipal and district boards.
2. Muhammadan fellows of the Allahabad University.
3. Graduates of the Allahabad University (of five years' standing, residing in these provinces).
4. The landholders paying Rs. 3,000 Government revenue.
5. Other Muhammadan gentlemen paying income-tax on Rs. 3,000 a year.

As regards the representation of Muhammadans of India in the Imperial Legislative Council I have to submit that the number of Muhammadan members in that Council should be eight, one member to be elected from each of the following provinces :—

1. Province of Eastern Bengal and Assam.
2. Bengal.
3. Punjab.
4. United Provinces of Agra and Oudh.
5. Bombay.
6. Madras.
7. Central Provinces and Berar.
8. Burma.

The electorate should be constituted on the lines similar to those suggested in the case of Provincial Legislative Councils and increase to be made in the amount of land revenue and income-tax paid by the elector.

Electorate to elect the representative of the landholders of Agra in the Provincial Council.

As there is no such association of landholders in the province of Agra as there exists in Oudh, therefore the electorate to elect the representatative of the province of Agra should consist of all landholders paying rupees 10,000 (ten thousand) or above land revenue to Government.

I think no other qualification is necessary for such a representative except that he should be elected by the majority of landholders forming the electorate.

Dated the 27th December 1907.

From—The Hon'ble Raja Partab Bahadur Singh, C.I.E., of Kila Partabgarh, Oudh,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge your letter of the 7th October last, jointly addressed to me and the Honourable Rai Sri Ram Bahadur, C. I. E.

The first point upon which I have been asked to submit my opinion relates to the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Council. His Honour has fixed the number of this council at 25. But having regard to the scope of the Provincial Advisory Council, which should be large enough to include the great landholders, smaller landholders, industry, commerce, capital and the professional classes, it is submitted with great respect that the number fixed is low. It may suitably be raised to 30. Out of these 30 seats, 10 seats may be allotted to Oudh and the remaining 20 seats may be assigned to the Province of Agra. The Imperial Advisory Council will consist of 40 great landholders out of a total number of 60. There are altogether eight provinces into which British India is divided.

Calculated roughly, five Imperial advisory councillors may be chosen from the United Provinces, although it is quite possible a larger number may be taken. But it is always safe to base our calculations upon the minimum number to which our province may be entitled. Five provincial members of the Imperial Advisory Council will form the nucleus of the Provincial Advisory Council. These five gentlemen will represent the great landholders. Out of these five two may be allotted to Oudh and three to Agra. Ten seats to be allotted to Oudh may therefore be filled in this way :—

1. Provincial Imperial advisory councillors representing the great talukdars of Fyzabad and Lucknow divisions	2
2. One talukdar, and one smaller landholder paying a Government revenue of at least Rs. 2,000 a year of the Lucknow division	2
3. One talukdar, and one smaller landowner paying a Government revenue of at least Rs. 2,000 a year of the Fyzabad division	2
4. Representative of lawyers	1
5. Representative of capitalists	1
6. Representative of commerce	1
7. Representative of industry	1
Total ...	10

Oudh being essentially an agricultural province, the number of landholders to be selected for the Provincial Advisory Council may suitably be fixed at six.

To represent the Bar any lawyer of fifteen years' standing and of requisite status and experience may be selected.

To represent capital, commerce, and industry any gentleman standing for those interests, provided he is of the age of majority and pays income tax upon an annual income of Rs. 5,000, may be appointed.

In the same way twenty seats assigned to Agra may be filled as below :—

1. Ruling chief	1
2. Provincial members of the Imperial advisory council representing the great landholders	3
3. Seven smaller landholders, one from each division, paying a Government revenue not less than Rs. 2,000 a year	7
4. Lawyers	2
5. Representatives of commerce	2
6. Representative of industry	2
7. Representative of capitalists	2
8. One European member of the Upper India Chamber of Commerce ...	1
Total ...	20

The qualification for lawyers and representatives of other interests should be the same as have been suggested for Oudh.

The second point relates to the constitution of the Provincial Legislative Council.

Under the existing regulations there are only eight non-official members of the Provincial Legislative Council. His Honour proposes to raise that number to 17. I have examined the existing franchises as well as those suggested by His Honour with some diligence and care. But to my great regret I find that they are not sufficiently elastic to give the widest representation to the different classes and interests which require to be represented. Take, for instance, the existing groups of municipalities, which will remain unchanged under the scheme laid down by His Honour. Can the interests of Rae Bareli or those of Gonda or Bahraich be sufficiently represented by a member of the municipality of Saharanpur, who may be elected to represent those interests under the present arrangement? A difficulty is also experienced in canvassing by the candidate before so large an electorate with a greater portion of which he is quite unfamiliar. To be brief, such an electorate is open to all objections which are enumerated with sufficient clearness and precision in paragraph 15 of the letter of the Government of India, which you have been kind enough to enclose with your letter. The same objections hold good in respect of the present groups of the district boards. And it is apprehended that His Honour's proposals which give one seat more to the district boards will not solve matters to the fullest extent.

The right of special representation proposed to be given to the six large municipalities—Lucknow, Allahabad, Cawnpore, Bareilly, Benares, and Agra,—to elect two members in rotation, does not command itself to my humble view. There does not appear to be any necessity why the populations of those large towns should be honoured with this special privilege; which might involve other more urgent and important interests being ignored. Moreover, if the importance of those large towns calls for any special representation, it is open to this objection that at any rate in the four years out of any six successive years the interests of the two towns not allowed to elect in those years by the rotation rule will go unrepresented.

The suggestion has been made that in the Provincial Legislative Council a certain number of seats may be assigned to Muhammadans in order that they may be filled exclusively by them. The principle of this rule is also open to objection.

It will tend to widen the gulf between Hindus and Muhammadans, which is not desirable. The necessary result of this rule will be that in other electorates an attempt will be made not to return Muhammadan candidates. And the Muhammadans themselves will feel great diffidence of offering themselves as candidates before other electorate. It may also create the desire of having special privilege of representation in other small communities, whose interests may be slightly different from those of the community in general. In this way the Christians, the Sikhs, the Jains, the Parsis, and several other communities that may be named, may claim for this privilege. The idea may go on diffusing as widely as possible, until it may stop one does not know where.

With these preliminary observations in view I proceed to formulate my own proposals for the constitution of the Provincial Legislative Council.

The United Provinces Legislative Council may consist of 54 members, out of which 26 may be non-officials, who may be appointed as below :—

1. Representatives of district boards (one from each division) to be elected ...	9
2. Representatives of municipal boards (one from each division) to be elected ...	9
3. Representative of the Senate of the Allahabad University to be elected ...	1
4. Representative of the Upper India Chamber of Commerce to be elected ...	1
5. Two representatives of landowners (one for Oudh and one for Agra) to be elected	2
6. To be nominated by the Government	4
Total ...	26

It may in the first sight appear that the above number, viz., 26 of the non-official members would create difficulties in securing the majority of the official members, but the following distribution easily solves the apparent difficulty.

The official members may consist of the following :—

1. His Honour the Lieutenant Governor		1
2. Members of the Board of Revenue		2
3. Secretaries to the Government		4
4. Legal Remembrancer and Government Advocate		2
5. Nine Heads of departments—
Director of Agriculture and Commerce
Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals
Registrar, Co-operative Credit Societies
Director of Public Instruction
Inspector-General of Prisons
Sanitary Commissioner		10
Chief Plague Officer, United Provinces of Agra and Oudh ...
Inspector-General of Police
Inspector-General of Registration and Commissioner of Excise and Stamps
Director of industry (new post)
6. Commissioners of divisions		9
Total	...	28

Gentleman paying income tax or paying at least Rs. 1,000 per year as Government revenue may be appointed electors to elect representatives of district and municipal boards.

The candidate for the Legislative Council must be a gentleman paying income-tax upon an annual income of Rs. 2,000 or annual land revenue of Rs. 2,000. But the rule may be relaxed by the Government in favour of any gentleman of special qualifications upon the unanimous recommendation of the electors concerned.

The proposal of the Government that a representative of the talukdars of Oudh may be nominated by the British Indian Association appears to be sound.

The proposal that an electorate for the province of Agra to elect a representative of landowners may be formed consisting of landowners paying Government revenue of Rs. 10,000 per year is perhaps open to this objection that it imposes a very high qualification, not in accordance with the status of the landed interests of all the divisions of that province. In fact there are certain districts in the province of Agra where there is not a single landowner paying a Government revenue of Rs. 10,000. Therefore it may reasonably be reduced to Rs. 2,000.

The proposal of His Honour that the representatives of landowners in these provinces on the Imperial Legislative Council might be taken alternately from Agra and Oudh is an excellent one.

As regards their qualifications I would humbly suggest that in order to give a wider scope for representation the amount of Government revenue paid by them may be fixed at Rs. 2,000 a year for Agra and for Oudh a talukdar member of British Indian Association will suffice.

Dated Lucknow, the 26th December 1907.

From—The Hon'ble Rai Sri Ram Bahadur, C.I.E., Member, Legislative Council, United Provinces.

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of G. O. no. 1515 III—416, dated the 7th October 1907 (with its enclosure), and of G. O. no. 1571 III—416, dated the 13th idem, asking for my views on the proposals for the establishment of an Advisory Council for these provinces and the expansion of the Provincial Legislative Council. I beg to submit my views on these two subjects as follows :—

Provincial Advisory Council.

2. The first question relating to the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Council is the fixing of the number of its members. His Honour the Lieutenant Governor considers that the number of the members may be fixed at 25. Regarding the numerical strength of these councils the Government of India, in paragraph 6 of their Home department letter no. 2310 2317, dated the 24th August 1907, say : "Membership should be large enough to embrace all interests of sufficient importance to claim representation on them." As the object of establishing these institutions is to "elicit the opinions on administrative measures and proposals for action of those qualified to advise" the Government "in all ranks of society" and "of giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters," the Government of India in their letter above alluded to very appropriately say further that the selection of members should be so made as to represent not only the great landholders of the provinces, but also "smaller landholders, industry, commerce, capital, and professional classes."

3. The territorial area which is officially designated the United Provinces has for its population a conglomeration of peoples, inhabiting its different tracts who have dissimilarity not only in customs, lunguages and land tenures but also in local sentiments. Except religion, there is very little in common among peoples of Bundelkhand, Kumaun, Oudh or other portions of the province of Agra. This diversity exists even among the people of the different divisions of the last-named province; take, for example, the population of the Benares and that of the Meerut division. With respect to population the United Provinces now occupy the first place among all the provinces of India, the number being 47,691,782. Having regard to the principles laid down by the Government of India regarding the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Councils and the peculiar circumstances of these provinces, it is respectfully submitted that 25 is not an adequate number of members for the proposed Advisory Council; the number should be fixed in such a way as to embrace the representation not only of the different classes and interests, but also of territorial units so that each division may be properly represented. This object cannot, in my humble opinion, be attained by limiting the number to 25.

4. In the paragraph immediately following I beg to offer my suggestions as to how the 25 seats proposed by the Government should be allotted so as to secure the representation of the different interests and classes, as far as it is pssible to do so with such a limited number. This distribution does not, however, take into account the principle of territorial representation. In my opinion by raising the number to 35 and by readjusting the allotment of seats, proper territorial representation might be obtained.

5. If the number of 25 be retained I would suggest that the selection of members should be made as indicated below :—

From ruling chiefs	2
From talukdars and landholders of Oudh	4
From landholders of the province of Agra	4
From non-official Europeans, districts of Agra	2
From non-official Europeans, districts of Oudh	1
From municipalities of Agra and Oudh respectively	2
From Upper India Chamber of Commerce	1
From Indian merchants	1
From Allahabad University	1
From bankers and capitalists of Agra and Oudh	2
From Indian Bars of Agra and Oudh	2
From mill owners and other industries	1
From other such communities and classes whom the Government may consider that they should be represented	2
Total ...	25

6. Neither the Government of India's letter not the Government order does give any indication of the weight to be attached to the advice of the members of the Advisory Councils. I venture to suggest that in laying down the principles on which the rules for regulating the procedure for these Councils are to be framed there should be a distinct provision to the effect that, in case the opinion of a fixed majority of the members, say two-thirds, is unanimous on a certain question, than, notwithstanding the fact that that opinion be in conflict with the official view, the Government should accept the unanimous view of the majority. Unless some rule as indicated above is made and is followed by the Government the Councils will not be of much practical usefulness.

Expansion of the Provincial Legislative Council.

7. The Government order proposes to raise the number of non-official members to 17. The Government, it appears, wishes to fix this number not from any desire to have only a comparatively small number of non-official members, but on account of the difficulty which it feels in getting a larger number of official members of requisite qualification and sufficient experience to attend the council meetings without detriment to the interests of the public service, the avowed policy of Government being to have a preponderance of the official over the non-official element at all the council boards. Though in my humble opinion the number of non-official members as proposed by the Government is inadequate for a province like ours, having such a large population who have different manners and customs and interests of various natures, yet having regard to the policy which the Government pursues in having the official majority, I refrain from suggesting an augmentation in the non-official element.

8. Coming now to the question of representation of the different communities and bodies, I find that the Government proposal is to give four seats to the municipalities of these provinces. Two of these seats are to be filled by representatives of the six larger towns having a population of over 100,000; two of these towns each to have a representative for a term of two years. The other two seats are contemplated to be allotted to the representatives of two groups, to be formed of smaller municipalities having a population of over 20,000 and of the four towns of over 100,000 inhabitants not represented. I respectfully beg to say that, in my opinion, the allotment of seats to the municipal boards as set forth above appears to be open to several objections. I have always considered the groupings at present in force not to be proper ones. The proposal to give to only two out of the six larger municipalities the franchise of electing one representative each and leaving the other four to be joined with the groups of minor municipalities is open to this objection that the two former towns will, as a matter of certainty, be directly represented, while the latter four will be grouped with a number of minor municipalities and have the mere chance of getting one of their citizens elected. They will remain under this disadvantage until their turn comes to return representatives individually. As regards the proposal of grouping together of the four larger towns and the smaller municipalities into two constituencies, I beg to submit that it does not seem to me to be a suitable arrangement. The principle which, in my opinion, ought to be observed in forming the constituencies should be that the electorates be constituted of tracts inhabited by persons who have some homogeneity, community of interest and unity in local sentiments. It can hardly be said that the system at present in force is based on a due consideration of the principle of proper representation. I therefore beg to suggest that, instead of the two different kinds of municipal representations indicated in the Government order under reply, all the municipalities having a population of over 10,000 inhabitants should be formed into four separate groups, each of which should include the municipalities of two divisions, as indicated below, except the first group, to which the municipalities of the hill districts should also be added :—

I group	Meerut division. Rohilkhand division. Kumaun division.
II group	Allahabad division. Agra division.
III group	Benares division. Gorakhpur division.
IV group	Lucknow division. Fyzabad division.

The four proposed seats should be allotted to the representatives of each of these groups. I admit that the grouping suggested by me is not free from objections; but as the Government proposal limits the number of seats to four, I beg to urge that, in view of all the circumstances bearing on the question, my suggestion may receive due consideration. I subjoin below a list of the municipalities having populations of over 10,000 and classified according to the proposed groups: —

9. As regards the question what would be a suitable electorate to elect a representative of the landholders of the province of Agra, I beg to say that as that province has no Landholders' Association, like the British Indian Association of Oudh, which consists of the representatives of the landholding classes of all its districts, I would suggest that in the first-named province the electorate should be constituted of the landholders of all the districts who pay a Government revenue of Rs. 5,000 or upwards. The franchise to elect a representative from among themselves should be given to that electorate. The qualification of payment of Rs. 10,000 annual revenue will be rather too high, and I do not think that in some of the districts zamindars paying revenue to that extent will be found. The qualifications for a candidate for election to membership should be the same as those for electors.

10. Respecting the qualification of the representative to be nominated by the British Indian Association of Oudh, I think that every member of the association should be eligible for nomination. No condition as to the amount of land revenue payable by the candidate should be imposed.

11. On the question of allotting four seats to the representatives of the Muhammadan community—two by election and two by nomination,—I beg to submit that the power of nomination by the Government should be exercised in case no Muhammadan member is elected or nominated by the other bodies and electorates to whom the privilege of election or nomination is proposed to be given. If no Muhammadan member or members are returned by any other means Government should nominate one or two Muhammadan members to complete the full number of four and not otherwise.

12. Subject to the modifications suggested by me as above, I approve of the rest of the proposals contained in the Government order for the election or nomination of non-official members.

13. The subject of qualification to be possessed by the electorate to elect candidates for seats in the municipal boards is a very complicated and difficult one. According to the rules at present in force the qualifications both of voters and of candidates for election as members vary in the different municipalities. The conditions of these municipalities are so different that no uniform test can be laid down with regard to the qualifications either of the voters or of the members. I would like that the existing franchise should be retained and no alterations made. In my opinion, except the residential no proprietary qualification should be required from representatives of the municipal, boards, on the Provincial Legislative Council. The elective system was introduced for the first time in 1893, and the elections which have since then taken place in these provinces, so far as I know, have not been subjected to any criticism, nor have they ever been received with disapproval, either by the public or by the Government.

14. There remains the question of qualification required from the electors and candidates for seats in the district boards. The way of the preparation of lists of electors now in vogue, especially the manner of fixing the number of electors is very unsatisfactory. I consider the fixing of some proprietary qualification to be essential. Only those persons should be considered qualified to be voters or eligible for membership of district boards who are landholders and pay at least Rs. 300 a year as Government revenue or those who pay income-tax on annual incomes of Rs. 1,200 or upwards. No special qualification except that of residence should be required from persons who are candidates for council membership.

Imperial Advisory Council.

1. The motives which have actuated the Government of India to establish Advisory Councils and to extend the Legislative Councils for satisfying the constitutional requirements of the Indian Empire and giving the people wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters, are noble and benevolent, and the people are much thankful to His Excellency the Viceroy. But I cannot help pointing out that the scheme has not been framed on such liberal lines as the people expected, which was probably due to the late lamentable disturbances in Bengal and the Punjab. It was given out that some short-sighted persons advised the Government to give up the idea of extending the rights of representation to the people; but, thanks to the Right Honourable Mr. Morley and His Excellency Lord Minto, that they were not prevailed upon by such advices and drew up the present scheme to elicit public opinion. Since then certain circumstances have shown that the disturbances were not due to disloyalty of the people to the British throne, but that some irresponsible persons were at the bottom of them.

People now entertain high hopes and expect that by the time the scheme will be laid before His Excellency the Viceroy for final disposal, nothing will stand in the way of giving them their legitimate rights and privileges, and the matter will be dealt with in a more liberal and statesmanlike spirit.

2. As to the fact that the people of India have sufficiently advanced to get wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters, the Government remark:—"The reforms then introduced (by the passing of the Councils Act, 1892) comprising the enlargement of the Legislative Councils, the recognition of the elective principle, the admission of the interpellation and the free discussion of the budget were held to be justified by the spread of English education, by the increased employment of natives of India in the actual administration of the country and by the indubitable proof which they had given of their intellectual fitness for such employment," and that "the extent of the advance that has since taken place in the development of the educated classes can hardly be judged by statistical tests. But it may be mentioned that within the last 20 years the number of scholars studying English has risen from 298,000 to 505,000, whilst the number of students passing the annual Matriculation Examination of the Indian Universities has increased from 4,286 in 1886 to 8,211 in 1905, and the number of Bachelors of Arts from 708 in the former year to 1,570 in the latter. During this period higher education has penetrated to circles which, a generation ago, had hardly been affected by its influence." It is further remarked "that for the present at any rate the needs and sentiments of the masses of the people must find expression through those, whether officials or non-officials, who are acquainted with their daily life and are qualified to speak with authority on their behalf." And that "the Governor General in Council has been much struck by the difficulty encountered by the Government of India in making their measures and motives generally understood, and in correcting erroneous and often mischievous statements of fact or purpose imputed to them." Here I would like to say that in framing the scheme, the future progress in education that the Indian people are bound to make under the benevolent British Government should also be kept in view.

3. The Hindu law, as well as the Muhammadan law and the established usages of the country have made it obligatory on the kings to consult the people on their affairs. The Government say:—"The traditions of oriental polity have always recognized that the Sovereign, however absolute, should make it his business to consult competent advisers and should exercise his rule in accordance with what, after such consultation, he deems to be the best mind of his people. . . . Accordingly, all Indian Governments and all administrative officers in their respective positions have made it their business to elicit the opinions on administrative measures and proposals for action of those qualified to advise them in all ranks of society; and this process will, of course, be continued. Such advice and opinion as are thus obtained are the indispensable foundation upon which good administration is built up, and the regular consultation of persons qualified to give them is part of the necessary procedure of Government."

4 Now, the question arises, that if the old system of consulting people individually answers the purpose, why the new system of Advisory Councils is contemplated; and if not, why it is to be kept up along with the Advisory Councils. The fact seems to be, that the old system of eliciting opinions is defective and should be improved.

5. The Government of India believe that the proposals submitted by them represented a considerable advance in the direction of bringing all classes of the people into closer relations with the Government and its officers, and of increasing their opportunities of making known their feelings and wishes in respect of administrative and legislative questions. The Government remark that "these are the provincial and tentative proposals, and lay them before the public in the fullest confidence that they will receive the careful scrutiny and sympathetic consideration that their high importance demands."

6. The main features of the Advisory Councils as proposed are (1) that all the Members of the Advisory Councils are to be appointed by the Government (2) the Council is to consist of the ruling chiefs and the territorial magnates only, (3) it will consist of about 60 members (4) it will not be vested with formal powers of any sort (5) its functions will be purely advisory and it will deal only with such matters as might be specially referred to it from time to time and (6) the proceedings of the Council will be private, informal and confidential and would not be published although Government would be at liberty to make any use of them that it thought proper.

7. I fail to understand how the objects in view can be attained from these Advisory Councils unless their scope is extended. With due deference to Government I beg to submit that these proposals require reconsideration and I beg to make the following suggestions which I hope, if approved by the Government, will make these councils really useful and more acceptable to the people.

8. Instead of the proposal that all the members of the Imperial Advisory Council would be appointed by the Government, I would suggest that elective principles should not be ignored in these councils when even the district and municipal boards have been given that right; if the number is to be kept 60, and 20 of them are to be ruling chiefs as proposed by the Government; the rest 40, three-fourths i.e., 30, may be appointed by election from among the territorial magnates, landholding classes, industry, commerce, appointed by capital and professional classes and the remaining one-fourth, i.e., 10, may be appointed by nomination.

The experience gained in England and other European countries as well as in India has been that the system of nomination is nowhere looked upon with favour. Before Lord Ripon's time there were district committees for education, dispensary and other branches of administration, the members of which were nominated by the district authorities, but they did not work satisfactorily. Lord Ripon then introduced the system of Local Self-Government and gave the people the right of election. That system has worked statisfactorily during the last 22 years and its utility has all along been recognized by the Imperial and Local Governments and is also appreciated by the people. Therefore the objects of the Government in establishing these] Advisory Councils could best be secured only by having those men on the council in whom people have confidence and trust and who are well acquainted with their wants and wishes. If the members will be nominated by the Government they could not be called representatives of the poople. As matters stand the official members support the Government's views, and the appointed non-official members also deem it their duty to do so. Those who have experience of the district and municipal boards and of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils will testify to it. In the times of the East India Company officials in the Government service used to be appointed in England by recruitment, but this system was found defect and was replaced by the system of competition. This supports the view that the system of election is better than nomination. Even the Muhammadans in their address presented to the Viceroy in October 1906 expressed their disapproval to the system of nomination in the following words:—"While, therefore, we are bound to acknowledge with gratitude that such representation as the Muhammadans of India have hitherto enjoyed has been due to a sense or justice and fairness on the part of Your Excellency and your illustrious predecessors in office on the heads of Local Governments by whom the Muhammadan members Legislative Chambers have almost without exception been nominated, we cannot help observing that the representation thus accorded to us has necessarily been inadequates to our requirements and has not always carried with it the approval of those whom the nominees were selected to represent. This state of things was probably under existing circumstances unavoidable, for while on the one hand the number of nominations reserved to the Viceroy and Local Government has necessarily been strictly limited, the selection on the other hand of really representative men has, in the absence of any reliable method of ascertaining the direction of popular choice, been far from easy."

9. As to the system of election I would suggest that the Provincial Advisory Councils should be composed first and they should elect 30 members for the Imperial Advisory Council from among themselves or any one else resident of the province, as is done in the case of election of members for the Imperial Legislative Council. In my opinion the Government proposal that the Imperial Advisory Council should be composed first and that its provincial members should form the nucleus of the Provincial Advisory Council is not based on sound principles.

10. In clause 3 of the Government letter it is proposed that "the Council should consist of about 60 members for the whole of India, including about 20 ruling chiefs and a suitable number of the territorials magnates; where landholders of sufficient dignity and status are to be found," but there seems to be no reason why industry, commerce capital and the professional classes should be excluded from the Advisory Councils. As to the total number of this council I beg to remark that in my humble opinion the proposed number of 60 is too small when we see that in Great Britain with a population of about four crores the number of members in the House of Commons is not less than 670 and in the House of Lords 594, while the population of British India is not less than 23 crores. In fixing the number of members of the Advisory Councils there will be no such difficulty as has been mentioned by Government in the case of fixing the number of non-official members of the Legislative Councils where the official majority is to be kept up on political grounds.

11. It is provided in clause 5 that "the councils should receive no legislative recognition and should not be vested with formal powers of any sort." I would suggest that the council should be given a definite constitution and powers so that the members may be inclined to serve on it.

12. In clause 6 it is laid down that its functions should be purely advisory and that it should deal only with such matters as might be specifically referred to it from time to time. I would suggest that these Councils should be at liberty to bring to the notice of Government other matters also which they consider to be necessary or important for the general good of the country, also matters which they consider essential according to the circumstances of the time for the good of the Government. In that way only the Government can be in touch with the people and the objects mentioned above can be attained.

13. In clause 7 it is laid down that "the proceedings of the council when called together for collective consultation should, as a rule, be private, informal and confidential, and they would not be published." There seems to be reason why the proceedings for the council should be kept private and confidential, although Government would be at liberty to make any use of them. I would suggest that the proceedings should be made public, because such matters are to be kept confidential on political grounds will not likely be referred to them.

The Provincial Advisory Council.

14. The Local Government of United Provinces of Agra and Oudh proposed to fix the number of the Provincial Advisory Council to be 25, but in any opinion it seems to be too small and I would suggest that each district may be allowed to send to the council at least one member by election and one-third of them may be nominated by the Government. Thus there will be 48 elected and 16 nominated members. This number may seem to be very large, but the propriety of it can be judged by the fact that the population of the United Kingdom of Great Britain amounts to 41,976,827 to represent whom there are 670 members in the House of Commons, while I suggest only 64 members to represent these Provinces whose population is 47, 691,782 i. e. 57 lakhs more than the former. The Government of India desire that the great landholders, the smaller landholders, industry, commerce, capital and professional classes and the Europeans should be included in the councils, and it is difficult to understand how all these different interest can adequately be represented by the small number of 25.

15. I quite agree with the proposal of the Government of India that collective deliberation is more valuable than opinion elicited by individual consultation and I attach much importance to it. In my opinion individual consultation is not required at all, but in the case of absence of any member in the meeting his written opinion should be accepted.

16. I would like to suggest further that the council should meet at least twice a year and that when His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor may visit a division he should hold a meeting of the members of the council residing in that division and give them an opportunity of pointing out the local requirements.

Imperial Legislative Council.

17. In 1889 Lord Lansdowne's Government observed that "the spread of education and enlightened public spirit, and the recent organization of Local Self-Government might render it possible to give representation to the views of different races, classes and localities through the medium of corporations vested with definite powers upon a recognized administrative basis, or of association formed upon a substantial community of legitimate interest, professional, commercial and terriorial." However, when the councils were framed under the India Councils' Act, 1892, the number of non-official members on the Imperial and Provincial Councils was kept too low to represent adequately the interest of 230 millions of people under the British rule.

18. The electors tried to send to the councils such persons as were well qualified to represent their interests and such persons were mostly found among the legal professions, and it is for this reason that the lawyers predominated in the Councils.

The people of India have all along been asking the Government to increase the number of non-official members so that all classes might adequately be represented, and thanks to the Government that after all they have considered the advisability of such an extension. But it is to be regretted that even now the number of non-official members for the Imperial and Provincial Councils is not fixed on a liberal scale and is not expected to fulfil the requirements of the time. The Government indirectly admits this fact, but finds itself as if unable to do justice to the people in giving sufficient representation, on the ground that they could not spare more officials than proposed, in order to be equal to the number of the non-official members, without detriment to their duties. This difficulty, I believe, can be overcome by order methods than the proposed one. But it is absolutely desirable that the number of non-official members should be raised, having due regard to the number of persons whose interests they are going to represent. Out of the total number of 54 members on the Imperial council it is proposed to appoint 36 members by nomination, i.e., 29 from among the officials and 7 from the non-officals and the remaining 18 by election. In other words the council would consist of two-thirds of the Government nominees and only one-third, of the elected members. Can such a council be said to be a representative one and can 18 members fairly represent the interests of 230 millions of the people? Not only this but even these 18 elected members are not to be elected at the free will of the electors, because their power of election has been confined to particular classes. In India, many persons of the legal profession are highly educated and devote their time and energy to the public good even at the sacrifice of their personal interest. The very fact that their number so much preponderates in the Imperial and Provincial Councils shows that the people have more confidence in them than others. It is a matter of daily experience that when a man has to appoint his representative (council) in a court of law like the High Court he would not select that Barrister or Vakil, who is a man of property or wealth, but one whom he would find a better qualified man to defend his cause. Even the most intelligent landholder or banker has to consult expert opinion in transacting his business. The business of the Legislative Councils is to pass laws, and who else on behalf of the people are best fitted to help the Government in making laws for the land than the men who have to help the administration of those laws? History tell us that almost all the philosophers, prophets, lawgivers, politicians and statesmen, &c., were men of intellect and genius and not men of property and wealth. Messrs. Disraeli, Gladstone and other English statesmen of the present day were not territorial magnates. The ministers of Akbar, viz. Birbal, Todermal, Khan Khana, Faizi, &c., were men of genius only. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan was not a man of property. Even the school masters so much deprecated by the Government of India have found favour in the estimation of the Secretary of State as appears from his selection of the Honourable Mr. Morrison and Hon'ble Mr. Bilgrami for his own Council.

19. Under these circumstances I beg to suggest that the number of elected members should be increased and the power of electorate for making their elections should not be hampered, but should be allowed a free hand in the use of their discretion. Regard should of course be had that the electorates may be composed of all classes and creeds.

20. It has been noted in paragraph 16 of the Government letter that "under the system of election hitherto in force Hindus largely predominate in all or almost all the electorates with the result that comparatively few Muhammadan members have been elected." With due deference to Government I regret to say that I cannot share in this view. In my humble opinion the electors try to select the best possible man for the seat without regard to his religion or profession. This was the reason of the men of legal profession predominating in the councils and of there being more Hindus than Muhammadans. In the United Provinces the Honourable Pandit Bishambar Nath, the Honourable Sir Faiyaz Ali Khan and the Honourable Rai Bahadur Sri Ram, were elected for the Imperial Council unanimously by the Hindus and Muhammadans. Religion or profession has nothing to do with such elections.

But in the proposed scheme certain seats have been allotted exclusively to the Muhammadans. This is certainly a departure from the old neutral policy of the British Government. Up to this time there was no special electorate for any religion, nor were any restrictions imposed on the electors to elect a person of a certain religion. They could elect any whom they thought to be the best qualified for representing their interests. Similiar was the case with the appointments in the Government service of all ranks. The Government appointed any they thought well qualified for the post. Although there was a predominance of Muhammadans over the Hindus in some Provinces, yet the latter, relying on the justice of the Government, did not grumble and press their claims upon the Government. But the Muhammadan gentlemen have preferred to open this controversy and press their claims, sparing neither the Hindus (for not electing Muhammadans), nor the Government officials (for selecting unfit persons) from blame. Therefore if it is advisable in the opinion of the Government to open this controversial point, it should be settled once for all and the principle upon which Government should distribute posts in the councils and in the Government service determined. In this respect the safest guide can be the proportion of a religion or class to the population of the whole Province and then suitable arrangements can be made to secure the fixed number of seats for them.

Under the present scheme out of 25 non-official members, four seats have been alloted exclusively to the Muhammadans, i.e., two by election made by the Muhammadans and two by nomination made by the Government in addition to as many more seats as they will be able to get by election. Therefore great heart-burning is naturally produced in the different classes of His Majesty's subjects such as Sikhs, Parsis, Marhattas, Khatriyas, Marwaris and Eurasians. If the contemplated change in the old policy is kept up it is feared lest it will sow the seed of everlasting animosity.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

21. The number of non-official members on the council has been fairly increased and the Government of Sir John Hewett is thanked for this liberality. But I would suggest that the electors should have a free hand in making their elections and the proprietary qualifications for a member of the council should not be forced upon them. But for the sake of the members being really useful in conducting the council business which is done in England, it may safely be laid down that a person who is not a graduate or has not in the opinion of the Local Government a fair knowledge of English to be able to understand and conduct the business of the council himself will not be eligible for the post.

22. Under paragraph 3 of the Local Government's letter, four seats out of 18 non-official members, have been reserved for Muhammadans, which will be in addition to what they will secure by election. In other words, this means that the Muhammadan element in the council will never be less than one-fourth of the non-officials and it may go up to any limit. I have mentioned above my views in paragraph 20 on this subject. The proportion of Muhammadans to the population of these Provinces is only 14 per cent., and it is for the Government to decide how many seats they are entitled to get at such a time when there is so much unrest on this point in the public mind. The wisest and safest course for the Government would be to adhere to their old policy of neutrality hitherto followed and to let the people of every class come in by election.

23. In my opinion the term of office of the members of the Provincial Council may be fixed at three years as the present term of two years is too small.

24. The Council should meet at least four times a year.

Dated Allahabad, the 7th January 1908.

From—THE HON'BLE RAI SUNDAR LAL, BAHADUR, B.A., C.I.E., Advocate, High Court, North-Western Provinces,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter no. 1516 III.—416, dated the 7th October 1907, forwarding copy of the Government of India letter no. 2310—17, dated the 24th August 1907, relating to the question of giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters, for an expression of my views on the proposals. Opinion is more specially asked on matters referred to in paragraph 2 and the subsequent paragraphs of your letter under reply. Suggestions are invited as to the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Councils and the Provincial Legislative Council and the formation and recognition of electorates and public bodies to elect or nominate members to it and to the Imperial Legislative Council in Calcutta.

2. The Indian community is thankful to the Government of India for taking the question into consideration and for formulating their proposals for an expression of public opinion on them.

3. The Government of India propose to effect the object in view by—

(i) the establishment of an Imperial and also Provincial Advisory Councils;

(ii) the expression of the existing Legislative Councils, the reallotment of seats in the councils to represent various represents, and by recasting the rules for the appointment of their members.

I will take up the two proposals in their order.

IMPERIAL ADVISORY COUNCIL.

4. The object and the constitution of the proposed Imperial Advisory Council are set out in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Government of India's letter quoted above. This council, according to paragraph 5 (3), is to consist of about 60 members for the whole of India, including—

(a) about 20 ruling chiefs and

(b) a suitable number of territorial magnates of every province where landholders of sufficient dignity and status are to be found.

As the first practical measure of its kind which has for its objects the enlistment of the co-operation of the ruling chiefs in the Government of India, I welcome it. Much of course will depend upon the selections of the chiefs for the council. The ruling chiefs, however, have no direct contract with the masses of the people under the direct Government of the British Crown, and therefore cannot be the best representatives and exponents of their views on administrative measures, which will affect the most, and it will be through the other members of the council that the views of the people of British India on such administrative measures will be really expressed. It is upon their selection that the success of the council will, I think, really depend.

5. The second class of persons who will find place in the council are described as "territorial magnates" and will, I imagine, be big landholders holding titles of Maharajas, Rajas, Nawabs and the like, and who come immediately below the ruling chiefs in rank. In thus restricting the field of selection I fear the council will not be, as it ought to be, as good and useful an exponent of public opinion as it should become if the range for selection had been wider and persons of the position of retired Indian Judges of the High Court, or retired Indian members of the Civil Service, or gentlemen on whom the Government has conferred titles, honours or distinctions, or gentlemen distinguished for valuable public services, or members of the professions who occupy prominent positions in life, or ministers of native states, and other persons of the same class are made eligible for appointment to it. The "ruling chiefs" and "territorial magnates" often fall back upon the advice and assistance of persons of the attainments I have mentioned in the disposal of their own affairs; and by including them the council will not only represent the landed, but also the intellectual, aristocracy of the land.

6. The council should meet at least once a year and also on the written requisition of not less than one-third of its members. It should be permitted to bring to the notice of the Government matters which in its opinion require the consideration of the Government. By confining it to its scope to a consultative body only on matters referred to it for opinion the Government would not be utilizing it to the full extent to which it can be of service to the administration. It would be better if the council could be given legislative recognition, so as to form part of the constitution of the Government of India. Although the council will not be invested with formal powers of any sort, I think it would give the weight due to the advice of such a body if the Government made it a rule to defer for further consideration any measure against which not less than three-fourths of the members of council have voted.

PROVINCIAL ADVISORY COUNCIL.

7. The number of the members of the Provincial Advisory Council should, I think, be fixed at 30, that is 25 in addition to the provincial members of the Imperial Advisory Council. It is difficult to fix with any precision the qualifications for membership or the proposition in which members should be appointed to represent various interests in the province. It would be better that the constitution is more or less in a fluid state until more experience is gained, but I would suggest as a tentative measure a constitution on the following lines :—

That the council should consist of—

(a) Provincial members of the Imperial Advisory Council, about	5
(b) One landholder to represent each of the nine Commissionerships of the United Provinces	9
(c) Industry, commerce, capital and manufactures to be represented by	6
(d) The professions to be represented thus—
Oudh	1
Agra	2
(e) University of Allahabad	2
(f) Non-official European, Eurasian and Native Christian communities	2
(g) To represent other interests not otherwise represented	3

Members of group (a) will represent the big landlords of the United Provinces and group (b) the smaller landholders. There will thus be at least 14 landholders on the council.

Group (c) will include a member of the Chamber of Commerce, bankers, merchants and a leading planter. There may possibly be room for one or two Europeans in this group.

Groups (d) and (e) require no explanation.

In group (f) the Government might appoint a member of the missionary class who has been long in touch with the people or a member of the English Bar or a retired member of the Civil Service of long Indian experience.

The last group will enable the Government to appoint representative of any particular class, creed or race who are not sufficiently represented by persons selected under the preceding groups.

8. The observations contained in paragraph 6 relating to the Imperial Advisory Council are equally applicable to this council.

9. To promote a free discussion of the matters coming before the council it seems desirable that the council should be presided over by a non-official member. This consideration applies equally to the Imperial Advisory Council, but, as it will have 20 ruling chiefs among its members, there may be possible difficulties in the selection of a non-official chairman, and I have therefore, in consideration of this aspect of the question, made no similar suggestion in connection with the Imperial Advisory Council.

10. The constitution of Imperial Legislative Council is outlined in paragraph 2 of the letter of the Government of India. I have no observation to offer under heads (A) and (B), nor to the representation of the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay, and of the non-official members under (D), clauses (a) and (b). If the constitution of the Provincial Councils is altered on the lines proposed in the said letter landholders will be returned much more largely by the non-official members of the Provincial Councils than they have been in the past, and it will not perhaps be necessary to give them the large separate representation that it is proposed to give them under head (D), clause (c).

11. It is proposed to definitely reserve four seats for Muhammadans, two of which are to be filled by election. These two Muhammadans will be elected by a separate Muhammadan electorate constituted of the following classes :—

(1) All who pay land revenue in excess of a certain amount.

(2) All payers of income-tax, this would comprise trading and professional classes exceeding Rs. 1,000 a year.

(3) All registered graduates of Indian University of more than, say five years' standing.

I think that the Muhammadans, like other minorities, should be represented by nomination made by the Government as hitherto, if not already returned by election in sufficient number. It is of course desirable that the Muhammadan community should be fully represented in the council, and their is no objection to four or even a larger number of seats being assigned to them. Under the scheme proposed Muhammadans get three special advantages over other members of the Indian communities, viz. :—

(a) a reservation of four seats in addition to any to which they may be otherwise elected ;

(b) election by their own co-religionists, whereas others will have to depend for their election upon the votes of their own co-religionists as well as others ;

(c) they obtain a very large electorate of landholders and all persons having an annual income exceeding Rs. 1,000 and in which all graduates of certain standing will be represented.

These privileges will be possessed by no other community. A Hindu, Parsi, or Christian graduate will have no franchise as such which his more lucky Muhammadan brother will enjoy. This is by no means a small advantage and I have no doubt that if it is granted to Muhammadans, every other community in India will vigorously claim it. It will be a matter of considerable practicable difficulty to adjust these claims on a satisfactory basis. In these days of caste, class and religious conferences much will be made of this apparent disparity of treatment. The best interests of the Government, I believe, require that if the Muhammadans are given the proposed special electorate, a similar special electorate on exactly the same lines should be given to other communities.

The selection of the representatives of a class, by members of that class alone, is necessary where the differences between it and other classes of the community are such as will render the nomination or election of a representative futile by the ordinary method. This does not, so far as my experience goes, exist in the case of Muhammadans. I have not come across one legislative measure in which the interests of the Hindus and Muhammadans were not common. Differences no doubt exist, but they are mainly in the question of the distribution of official patronage and honours in which the candidates themselves are very often the more interested persons.

The scheme proposed will tend to perpetuate whatever differences there are between the various communities, if not to create some more. The interests of the Government and public will be better served by a continuation of the existing system of securing representation of the minorities.

Another feature that I note in the constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council is the absence of a representative of Indian capital, industry or commerce. The Chambers of Commerce at Calcutta and Bombay will not sufficiently represent the mufassal. The representative of these bodies will very inadequately, if at all, represent the Indian side of it. A representative of the leading Indian merchants and capitalists might be elected in rotation from each province by the persons of this class who pay income-tax above a certain figure.

The universities also are not represented in it. The Indian universities might in rotation be permitted to nominate one member to the Imperial Council.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

12. The proposed constitution of the Local Legislative Council seems to be good except in two respects. Firstly, there is no Indian representatives of trade, capital or industry as such in the council. I think that all merchants, manufaturers, capitalists, bankers, &c., paying income-tax in the sum of Rs. 250 or over should be formed into an electorate and one seat given to them for election. Similarly all Indian legal practitioners above the grade of mukhtars or pleaders (as the Government may determine) should (as has been proposed to be done in Madras) be formed into an electorate and elect one for a seat in the council. At present some lawyers will come in through the municipal board, but as members of other communities advance education in the municipal towns they will claim their proper share of the representation.

My observations relating to the special representation of the Muhammadans in the Imperial Legislative Council apply equally to the Provincial Legislative Council.

13. I think that there should be no change at present in the franchise, and in the qualification of members for election to the district and municipal boards, but candidates for election to the Legislative Council from the district boards or the municipal boards should have an income of not less than Rs. 5,000 a year. It would perhaps be enough to prescribe that the candidate from the district boards should pay Government revenue in the sum of Rs. 5,000 or more a year and in the case of candidates from municipality income tax on a like amount. The proposals in paragraph 22 (c) of the letter of the Government of India as to the constitution of municipal and district boards are not needed, and the lines on which it is proposed to reconstitute them present many practical difficulties. The reservation of seats for members of the diffirent religions, and the constitution of special electorates for each religion, are not at all called for and will bring discord where harmony now exists. It is not also practicable to frame caste or class groups of electors as suggested. Unchangeable as the East has been said to be, in these days, though one cannot change his caste, the class, i. e., whether a man is an agriculturist, artizan, tradesman, soldier or a professional man, frequently changes; for example, a Brahman may be a priest, a moneylender, or merchant, or landholder, or lawyer, or medical man, as also a soldier or a cultivator. He may belong to more than one class. The same remark applies to every class or community. The success of the scheme of municipal or urban self-government depends upon the consolidation of the various communities within its territorial limits into one homogeneous whole and not upon the disintegration of its solidarity.

14. I think that a single representative of the landholders of the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh to represent the landed interest in the Imperial Council should be elected by all landholders paying revenue on the sum of Rs. 10,000 or over in both the provinces.

The proposal to give the provinces of Agra and Oudh a right to elect in alternate terms seems to be open to the objection that it places the more numerous landholders of the province of Agra on the same footing as those in the smaller province of Oudh. It tends to perpetuate the distinction between the two provinces, which ought to disappear in course of time.

15. All candidates for election as members of the Imperial or Provincial Legislative Council should possess a fair knowledge of English so that they may be able to follow the discussion and take an active part in the proceedings of the council.

I regret very much the dalay of a few days that has occurred in the submission of the reply, which I trust you will kindly overlook.

Opinion of the Hon'ble Munshi Madho Lal, Member, Imperial Legislative Council and zamindar, United Provinces, dated Benares, the 30th December 1907.

The object of the Government in inaugurating the proposed reforms is admittedly to give the people of India "a more effective part in shaping the action of Government," "a larger share in the actual administration and more extensive employment in the higher offices of the State." The initiative taken by His Excellency the Viceroy has not been taken a day too soon. The spread of English education amongst Indians, the indubitable proof of their intellectual fitness, the new ocial and political conditions which affect the course of Indian affairs have rendered the introduction of some such schemes as the proposed ones of paramount importance. They are, I take it, the outcome of a generous and sympathetic policy of the British Government, with whose interest the destinies of the three hundred millions of Indians have providentially been knit together.

2. The reforms contemplated are not intended to weaken in any way the executive authority of the Government, or to impede its free action in the general conduct of affairs. The Government of India have with this view, we are informed, formulated certain proposals on which public opinion has been invited. It is obvious that the schemes put forward are tentative and are intended at best to form the bases for the public to work upon. Thanking the Government for its good intentions I proceed to an examination of the Government proposals. I shall first take up—

The Advisory Boards.

3. The regular consultation of persons in all ranks of society, qualified to advise on administrative measures, and proposals for action is, in the words of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, part of the necessary procedure of the Government; such advice and opinion are the indispensable foundation upon which good administration is built up. How to secure such advice and opinion in a constitutionally recognized and well regulated form is the question. The establishment and recognition of a determinate body of advisers would, in the opinion of the Government of India, be a marked step in constitutional progress. So far there can be no two opinions. But it is with regard to the scope and function of that determinate body that a considerable difference of opinion arises. A body of advisers, bereft of legislative recognition and shorn of powers, summoned together or consulted by letter at the will of the Head of the Government, their deliberations private and their opinions confidential, without having the privilege of volunteering advice on any matter of vital importance to the people, would, in my humble opinion, be more ornamental than useful, and would hardly subserve the end in view of affording to the people a more effective part in shaping the action of the Government.

4. I now pass on to the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Boards Assuming that the Board for the United Provinces should consist of 25 members only as suggested in the Chief Secretary's letter, dated the 7th October 1907 (though I should like to have double the number), I would distribute the seats as under:—

9 to municipal boards, each division sending up one member.
9 to district boards, each division sending up one member.
1 to a nominee of the British Indian Association, Oudh, Lucknow.
1 to a nominee of the Landholders' Association of Agra, Allahabad.
2 seats to University men, to be elected by M.As., D.Scs., and M.Ds., of not less than five years' standing and B. As., M. Bs., or L.M.Ss., and B. C. Es., of not less than ten years' standing.
2 seats to members of the legal profession to be nominated by the Bar Associations of the High Court, Allahabad and Judicial Commissioner's Court, Lucknow.
1 seat to trade, commerce, and industry to be nominated by the Chamber of Commerce.

5. To make the proposed body of advisers helpful adjuncts of the machinery of administration they ought to have a legal status; be required to meet periodically; be authorized to submit to Government, suo motu, their views on administrative questions. I would have the Provincial Advisory Board of the United Provinces assemble at least twice a year—once at Allahabad, say in November, and once at Lucknow, say in March. I would have such of the numbers of the Provincial Advisory Board as reside within a revenue division summoned for consultation on the occasion of the visit of the Lieutenant-Governor to that division. I would grant to the members every facility to correspond with the responsible officers of the Government on all important administrative questions and to obtain correct information thereon or in connection therewith. I would, on an emergency, let at least seven members sign a requisition and call for an extraordinary sitting of the Board. I would let each member hold office for three years and make him eligible for reappointment or re-election for a further like period.

The Imperial Advisory Council.

6. I regret I am unable to agree in the proposed method for the constitution of the Imperial Advisory Council. Granting that the council should not consist of more than 60 persons, I would recruit them in the manner following :—

32 seats to be representatives elected by the non-official members of the eight Provincial Advisory Boards.

8 seats to representatives of trade, industry and commerce, one nominated by each Local Government or Administration.

8 seats to territorial magnates, one nominated by each Local Government or Administration.

10 seats to ruling chiefs nominated by the Viceroy.

2 seats to representatives of minorities to be nominated by the Viceroy

Every Provincial Advisory Board should nominate not more than four representatives from amongst them, the election being made by ballot and determined by a majority of votes. The head of each Provincial Government should nominate a representative of the territorial magnates of the province, who may or may not be a member of his Advisory Board. Similarly a representative of trade, industry and commerce may be nominated.

The Provincial Legislative Council.

7. With regard to the Legislative Councils I congratulate the Government upon its desire to enlarge them to the fullest extent compatible with the necessary authority of the Government. The advance in education, the change in the social conditions, the growth of political aspirations of the children of the soil demand the enlargement of the Legislative Councils. The proposal to give the landed and the moneyed interests in the country a chance to voice their opinion on legislative measures would no doubt tend to a better understanding betwen the rulers and the ruled. As the Government of India rightly observes, the needs and sentiments of the masses of the people must find expression through those who from their knowledge, experience and education are qualified to speak on their behalf. That no particular class should have a monopoly of representation is but fair : it is equally fair and necessary that no class disabilities should be permitted. That men of law and literature should preponderate in the Legislative Councils under the elective system is not surprising. One cannot fairly expect an unlettered man of means to assist in the making of the law of the land. While every attempt should be made to focus all shades of opinion on public questions, the real work of formulating the law cannot be expected properly to be done by an illiterate or an uneducated person who is not fitted for the task by his ignorance of the language in which that law is framed.

8. The Government naturally desires always to have a standing majority of its own in the Legislative Councils. It is equally natural on the part of the people to desire to have their interests fully represented in the councils by their own nominees if the Government really means to make the councils sufficiently large to be representative of the various and varied peoples over whom it exercises sway, the numbers of non-official members should be substantially increased In order to counterpoise the strengthened non-official opinion in the Legislative Councils, the appointment of an inconveniently large number of Government officers would be needed. But the necessity of their presence might be obviated if the Government reserved to itself the right of veto, which could, whenever necessary, be exercised, full reasons therefor being recorded and published. The existing machinery of Government is such that the collection of official opinion on any question is a simple affair. It is the non-official opinion which, in the absence of a well-organized system, it is practically impossible to properly ascertain. Assuming that the membership of the Provincial Legislative Council should be limited to 37, I would suggest that it be formed thus :

10 seats to be allotted to municipal boards with a population of not less than 100,000.

5 seats to minor municipalities.

4 seats to the district boards.

1 seat to the Chamber of Commerce, Cawnpore.

1 seat to the University of Allanabad.

4 seats to the Secretaries to the Government.

1 seat to a Medical or Sanitary Officer of Government.

1 seat to a Member of the Board of Revenue.

4 seats to Commissioners of divisions.

2 seats to landholders to be nominated—one by the British Indian Association of Oudh and the other by the Landholders' Association, Agra (the candidate should be one who pays Government revenue of not less than Rs. 25,000 per annum).

2 seats to trade or commerce to be selected by the Local Government (the candidate should be one who pays income tax of not less than Rs. 100 per annum).

2 seats to representatives of minorities to be nominated by the Government.

9. I am strongly averse to any representation based on race, religion or guild as being opposed to the admittedly salutary and sound principle of Government neutrality that has always been the characteristic feature of the British administration in India in its dealings with the different religious and class interests in this land of various races and creeds. From the municipal boards I would limit the representation in the council to such members as have an annual income of not less than Rs. 2,000 and possess the necessary knowledge of English to enable them to follow the proceedings of the council. I am not of opinion that the present rules regarding the qualification of candidates for election to municipal boards in the United Provinces, which, generally speaking, answer fairly well, should be altered. But I am of opinion that the conditions of membership of dirtrict boards should be changed, being based more largely on the elective principle as is now the cases with the membership of municipal boards and confined to men paying Government revenue of not less than Rs. 500 per annum.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

10. Having indicated the lines on which the Provincial Legislative Councils may be built up, I shall now proceed, in the only logical and convenient mode of dealing with the question possible, to constitute the Imperial Legislative Council. To make it representative of all interests and classes the only way is to recruit its non-official members from recognized electorates, viz. the Provincial Legislative Councils. Any other method of recruitment is bound to fail, and I would strongly urge the Government not to take the retrograde step of discarding the elective system. I am decidedly of opinion that any method of racial or sectarian nomination and religious representation is foredoomed to failure and is sure to lead to difficulties. Bearing this in mind I would suggest that the Imperial Legislative Council should consist of the following assuming that its maximum strength might be 54 only :—

(a) Ex officio, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal or of the Punjab (as the case may be), the Commander-in-Chief, and the members of the Executive Council	8
(b) Additional officials to be nominated one by each principal Government	8
(c) A ruling chief to be nominated by the Viceroy	1
(e) Representatives of the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Karachi and Cawnpore	5
(f) Representatives of Provincial Legislative Councils of Bombay, Madras, Bengal, Eastern Bengal and Assam, United Provinces, Punjab and Burma, (three from each)	21
(g) Representatives of the Central Provinces, Berar and Ajmer, Merwara, to be nominated by recognized public bodies within the Provincial Administrations	2
(h) Non-officials to be nominated by the Viceroy to represent minorities or special interests	4
(i) Experts to be nominated by the Viceroy when necessary or by any community whose interests may be specially concerned	1
(j) Two representatives of the Press (Anglo Indian and Indian) one of each, the paper being of not less than ten years' standing, the nomination being made by the Press	2
Total	53
Including His Excellency the Viceroy	54

Such a council of nominated and elected representatives would, I think, mee the present requirements of the country.

II. In conclusion I venture to suggest that if two members of the Advisory Boards and the Imperial Advisory Council, one to be nominated by Government and the other to be elected by the Board or Council, be required to be always at the headquarters of Government in order to be within easy reach of the Government, free consulation would be facilitated.

Opinion of RAJA RAMPAL SINGH, C.I.E., Talukdar of Kori Sudauli, district Rae Bareli, dated the 25th December 1907.

I NEVER studied the question of reform scheme with a view to write anything on it, though I have been perusing with interest the literature that has appeared on it from time to time in the press. But now as you have been pleased to call an expression of opinion from me, I beg to submit it in a brief form for there is no time to discuss the scheme in detail with reasons.

The scheme consists of two heads of reform :—

(1) Advisory Councils (Provincial and Imperial).

(2) Expansion of Legislative Councils (Provincial and Imperial).

Taking the needs of India into consideration I strongly support the proposal of Advisory Councils, both Imperial and Provincial, but I do not quite agree with the consitution and the restricted functions that the scheme proposes to give them. In order to satisfy the public and to make these bodies fulfil the objects for which they are proposed to be formed and for other various reasons which I need not detail here, I think it necessary that one-third of the members of the Advisory Councils, both Provincial and Imperial, should be elected members and the rest should be nominated by the Government. I beg to suggest that the Provincial Advisory Councils should consist of 30 members. Out of these 15 should be nominated by the Government from amongst the landlords paying revenue not less than Rs. 10,000 a year and five should be taken as representatives of other interests and 10 should be elected by the registered graduates of any university of 15 years' standing, but residing within the province to all intents and purposes. In the same way the Imperial Advisory Councils should have two-thirds of its members nominated by the Government and one-third of its members elected by the different Provincial Advisory Councils. That is to say that the Imperial Advisory Council should consist of 63 members instead of 60 and out of these 21 should be ruling chiefs, 21 should be nominated by the Government from amongst the territorial magnates who shall be members of the Provincial Advisory Councils of the different provinces (three from each province), and 21 should be elected by the Provincial Advisory Councils (three from each province). These councils should not only deal with matters that may be specifically refered to them, but should also be given the privilege of bringing before the Government of their own accord any matter that they may think important for the country or for the Government. The proceeding of these councils should not, as a rule, be kept private, but should be published as the country has a right to know them.

As regards the constitution of the Imperial Council as proposed in paragraph 12 and page 5 of Government of India's letter I have not much to say. In sub-section 2(e) of the same paragraph, after the words " Non-official nominated by the Viceroy . . . Muhammadans " the words " Provided they are in the minority " should be added. I do not think it is intended that if a sufficient number of Muhammadans be elected, the Government will even then nominate two Muhammadnas to make the number too large. In my opinion if the Government is bent upon reserving a few seats for the Muhammadans, the number of the seats should be fixed once for all. The proposal in the scheme is apt to cause bad blood between the Hindus and the Muhammadans, who have been living as brothers for centuries, and the Government will be blamed for that. The same should be the case with the Provincial Councils.

In the scheme of the Local Government for Provincial Council I beg to suggest that there should be two representatives for the municipalities of Agra Province and one representative for the municipalities of Oudh as is the case with district boards.

In the case of the members of Legislative Councils, both Imperial and Provincial, it should be made a strict rule that no member should be taken, unless he has a sufficient knowledge of English to understand the proceedings of the council.

No. 4660/XII—601A., dated the 17th December 1907.

From—HON'BLE MR. A. W. CRUICKSHANK, C.S.I., Senior Member, Board of Revenue, United Provinces,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

SIR,—I have the honour, in compliance with your no. 1519/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907, to submit my opinion on the points therein indicated.

Of the wisdom of increasing the opportunities of ascertaining the views of the ruling chiefs and their subjects—as well as those of the inhabitants of British India—on essential items in the social, industrial and political life of the Empire there can be no shadow of doubt.

The saying, attributed to the wisest of Eastern kings, " Where no counsel is the people fall, but in the multitude of counsellers there is safety," is as true now as erstwhile.

Whether the proposals in paragraph 5(d)(1) to (7) of the Government of India letter no. 2310/2317, dated the 24th August 1907, as to the creation of an Imperial Advisory Council, are the most suitable expedients for eliciting the real opinion of the imperial counsellers, and through them of the people they are intended to present, is one of the subjects on which I am requested by the Local Government to submit my opinion.

I may promise my remarks by stating my conviction that a council of counsellers is an idea more consonant to the ideals of Western civilization and freedom of expression of the thought than to the practice of the secretive East.

Whether the members of the proposed Advisory Council called together for collective consultation would be the ready exponents of the views of their countrymen may be open to question. That the opinions of these selected counsellers obtained individually and confidentially would be of the highest value is a matter that goes without saying. I believe, however (I write subject to correction), that under existing arrangements ruling chiefs can be, and are, consulted individually and confidentially on matters of imperial or local importance affecting the interests of India or the states over which they rule.

In such confidential correspondence a ruling chief is much more likely to enunciate with freedom and sincerity his personal knowledge and real opinion that in a collective assembly, where he would be hampered by doubt as to what his compeers might think of his attitude. He knows that such confidential corrospondence will be kept sacred.

Though the proceedings of the proposed Advisory Council would not be published and would ostensibly be private, informal and confidential, there is no ruling chief or other counseller but would in his heart of hearts fear that in some way or other the veil of secrecy might be lifted. This might quite unconsciously be effected by some counseller unable to maintain a guard upon his lips.

The apprehension, based possible on experience, of the extreme difficulty or keeping oral communication confidential might tend to restrain open disclosure of real facts and opinions in council.

Ruling chiefs would no doubt appreciate the honour of being individually consulted by His Majesty the King-Emperor's Viceroy on matters connected with the public weal. It is however, a point deserving deliberate consideration whether ruling chiefs would appreciate as a distinction the privilege of sitting in an Advisory Council with approximately twice their number of other counsellers, not ruling chiefs, however estimable and respectable such others might be.

Ruling chiefs differ in dignity inter se as regards salutes, titles, measure of independence and other considerations of birth, caste, creed and social rank, but each one of them considers himself politically superior to the most distinguished subject of His Majesty the Emperor, who is not a ruler. It is proposed that all the members should be appointed for a term of five years and at the end of that term should be eligible for re-appointment.

I have no hesitation in recording that this limitation of the term of appointment would be unpalatable to all ruling chiefs, who would naturally think that, if fit to be counsellers at all, they are fit to hold that distinction for life or at least quamdiu se bene gesserint.

The term of five years for appointment of others than ruling chiefs on the Advisory Council seems open to little objection, but I would strongly advise permanence of appointment in the case of ruling chiefs. Briefly, the ruling chiefs selected as imperial counsellers should be recognised as a different grade of counseller from the subjects of His Majesty the King-Emperor in British India.

With regard to the selection of counsellers for British India, it would avoid much invidious distinction and at the same time add to the dignity of the Imperial and Local Legislative Councils if the members of the last-named councils were ex-officio members of the Imperial Advisory Council. If this would swell the number of the Imperial Advisory Council too much, the members of Provincial Legislative Councils might send delegates.

It is possible that the consultation collectively of the Imperial Advisory Council would involve considerable expense on the members, and it is not apparent whether it is intended to provide against such a contingency.

For the constitution of the Local Advisory Council, presumably to be composed chiefly, if not entirely, of non-officials, I would suggest—

(a) whatever number of imperial advisory counsellers (other than members of the Local Legislative Council) may be chosen for the representation of the territories in the Local Government concerned, the same individuals should also be included in the Local Advisory Council;

(b) the non-official members of the Local Legislative Council;

(c) if more than those in (a) and (b) are required, they should be selected by Government from the list of Muhammadan and Hindu title-holders, who are presumably the élite of their respective classes.

The enlargement of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils on the lines proposed by the Government of India is a wise measure and should enlist the sympathy of all.

The proposal of the Government of India as to the selected and nominated members seem open to little criticism.

Turning to the proposals of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor with reference to the number of members and the constitution of the Local Legislative Council, I have nothing to suggest. These proposals would secure a fairly representative body of expounds of the opinion of the most important classes of the community.

Lastly, the proposed extension of the discussion of the Budget on the lines proposed in paragraph 29 of the Government of India letter is a distinct step in advance. The present system is undoubtedly discursive and eventuates in a collection of chiefly infructuous observations rather than an informing debate.

No. 2572/XV—7, dated the 30th December 1907.

From—H. C. Conybeare, Esq., Commissioner, Meerut Division,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

Sir,—In obedience to your letter no. 1520—III—416 dated the 7th October last, I have the honour to submit an opinion on the correspondence therewith sent regarding the constitution of Legislative and Advisory Councils.

Advisory Councils.

2. With the remarks made regarding Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils by paragraphs 4 to 7 of the Government of India's letter of the 24th August last I venture in the main to concur. Provincial Advisory Councils need probably consist of not more than 30 members, that is half the number composing the Imperial Advisory Council. I would not allot any rigidly fixed number of seats on the Provincial Advisory Council to any particular class, but would leave it to the Lieutenant-Governor to nominate as many of any class as he considers expedient with regard to the circumstances of the time. Not less than half of this council should, in my opinion, however, be territorial magnates, of whom in the United Provinces we have a sufficiency. The rest might be retired native military officers of distinction, past or present chairmen or vice-chairmen of the Cawnpore Chamber of Commerce, eminent railway officials, the Vice-Chancellor of the Allahabad University, and a professional man or two, preferably doctors and engineers, as the legal profession, including retired judges such as the Hon'ble Munshi Madho Lal, will always be sufficiently represented amongst the landholders. The fact to be recollected in constituting such councils is that at present the military, the landed, the manufacturing and commercial, and the railway interests are the principal interests of India. Although very vocal, the professional element is so small that it may almost be ignored. It seems unnecessary in these provinces separately to represent the European planters, as several of these gentlemen, General Sir Robert Hume for instance in Dehra Dun or Mr. Holdsworth in Gorakhpur, would probably be eligible as influential landholders. I would not, as suggested by the Government of India, appoint small landholders unless, in addition to being landholders, they happened to be important representatives of some special interest. It seems almost superfluous to add that the Lieutenant-Governor of the time would certainly appoint an adequate proportion of Muhammadans to his Advisory Council.

Imperial Legislative Council.

3. Differing from paragraph 10 of the Government of India's letter, I should myself think that a large number of senior officers of different departments could be spared from their duties for a few days to vote with the Government in the Imperial Legislative Council. The official members need not belong to the Indian Civil Service only. Colonels of regiments, Inspectors-General of all descriptions, Postmasters-General, Superintending Engineers, retired native officers of distinction, and many others might be trusted loyally to support the Government, as well as to supply a rather needful width of experience. It might be understood that they were present to vote rather than to read wearisome essays. Most of them would be quite content to accept those conditions.

4. For the word "officials" in paragraph 21 (2)B of the same letter I would substitute the words "civil and military officers." The proposals do not, in my opinion sufficiently recognize the fact that in India military interests are paramount. I would, moreover, amend this paragraph as suggested by paragraph 15, appointing the seven representatives of the territorial class by nomination and not by election. An elective system would introduce a number of members whose primary occupation was not that of landholders. A wealthy moneylender is in these provinces almost always a landlord, and often a bad landlord. As a moneylender he has much influence over other proprietors; and he could always therefore command votes at the landholder's elections for the Imperial Legislative Council. A prosperous lawyer also generally owns land; and he, too, by promises of advocating a permanent settlement or otherwise, might obtain votes enough to make him an Imperial Legislative councillor. A landholding Hindu priest, again, who promised to suppress, if possible, the slaughter of bovine cattle would be almost certain of election.

Provincial Legislative Council.

5. The system which the Government of India's twenty-second paragraph suggests for securing class representation would in practice probably be found too complicated. In these provinces no change in the qualifications of electors and of candidates for district boards seems necessary. But the qualifications for membership of municipal board are generally inadequate; and I remember a man who had been imprisoned for receiving stolen property obtaining a seat on such a board. No one who is not literate and who does not pay income tax or a land revenue of Rs. 1,000 yearly should, in my judgment, be accepted as a candidate for the board of any municipality. If that precaution were adopted the varying franchises of the different municipalities might be allowed to remain as at present. It seems unnecessary to fix any property qualification for the persons elected to Provincial Legislative Councils by district and municipal boards, as these persons have always hitherto been men of considerable substance.

BUDGET DEBATES.

6. In their twenty-third paragraph the Government of India invite suggestions regarding the discussion of the budgets in Imperial and Provincial Councils. The change chiefly needed seems the suppression as far as possible of written speeches and the substitution of debates in the conversational style. At present the budget discussions are no more debates than penny readings are. Those members alone who do not know English should be allowed to furnish written abstract translations of their speeches. The rest should be required to speak as members of European Parliaments speak, with the aid of notes only. India can probably furnish shorthand writers quite capable of reporting and of gramatically revising such speeches.

No. 1958/XV—726, dated the 3rd January 1908.

From—A. L. SAUNDERS, ESQ., Commissioner, Lucknow division,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

SIR,—In reply to your letter No. 1520, dated the 7th October 1907, asking for opinions on the proposed expansion of Imperial and Provincial Councils, I have the honour to say that I consulted the Deputy Commissioners of Lucknow, Kheri, Rae Bareli, Sitapur and Hardoi, but have only received replies from the two latter, of which I enclose copies. As the time fixed by Government for an answer has elapsed, I do not wait for further replies.

2. As regards the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Council I think that the nomination to this council had better remain in the hands of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor without fettering his discretion as to selections, except of course that the Imperial Advisory Councillors would, as stated in paragraph 6 of the Government of India's letter, be members. Apparently the Imperial Council is to be appointed in this manner, the only restriction on His Excellency the Viceroy's selecting being that about one-third are to be ruling chiefs. For the Provincial Council the right of membership might be reserved to the Raja of Teri, the Nawab of Rampur, the Maharaja of Benares, and the President of the British Indian Association. Otherwise I think there should be no restriction.

3. As to the Provincial Legislative Council the number suggested in your letters enclosed seems suitable. The representation of the different interests enumerated also seems open to no objection except, perhaps, the representation of the lesser municipalities and of district boards. There is, I think, an object to be gained by giving a representative to a specified important city, such as the six towns enumerated, but a group of local bodies, either towns or districts, seems to me a most unsatisfactory constituency. There is no common interest and no local solidarity and the election falls into the hands of the professional politician. Both large towns and district boards will obtain representation otherwise, through both non-official and official members. This objection of course does not apply to the adaptation of the electoral registers of municipal or district boards for the purpose of elections to the councils.

4. It would be better, I think, to extend the system of class representation, which is more suited to this country. A class to which, I think, specified representation should be secured is the Army. One member of the Legislative Council should be a pensioned native officer. It is a most important class and they will never canvass for election. The Eurasian and Native Christian community should also be represented.

5. I agree in the suggestion made at the end of G. O. no 1514, etc., dated the 7th October, that the existing franchises for both municipal and district boards should be retained, and additional qualifications proposed for the Provincial Legislative Council. The former are conceivably open to improvement, but if so, it would be better to deal with the question from the point of view of the fitness of the constitution of those boards for their proper functions. The additional qualifications should, as suggested, be (a) residential (b) the payment of land revenue or income tax, for rural or urban representatives respectively.

No. 1560/XV—27, dated the 24th January 1908.

From—W. R. PARTRIDGE, ESQ., Offg. Commissioner, Gorakhpur Division,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

SIR,—In reply to your no. 1520/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907, I have the honour to enclose copies of the opinions submitted by the district officers of this division as per margin.

No. 496/XII—240 (VIII), dated the 22nd November 1907, from the Collector of Gorakhpur.
No. 957/XV—2, dated the 15th December 1907, from the Collector of Basti.
No. 66/XV—5, dated the 20th January 1908, from the Collector of Azamgarh.

The delay in receipt of the Azamgarh reply accounts for the delay in the submission of an answer to your letter.

2. I agree generally with Mr. Molony's views, with the exception of paragraphs 8 and 11 of his letter. His apprehensions seem to me groundless. The Government of India would not propose such a measure as the introduction of an inconvertible paper currency without the sanction of the Secretary of State first obtained, and he would not direct or sanction the introduction of such a measure unless there were sufficient reasons for it.

3. Paragraph 3 of G. O. no. 1514/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907.—I can suggest no alteration in the composition proposed, but I think paragraphs 5 and 6 of Mr. Crawford's letter deserve consideration

4. Paragraph 4 of G. O. no. 1514/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907.—As regards the qualifications for electors and candidates for seat on district boards, I think it will be generally admitted that the elections of members of district boards have been hitherto very much in the nature of a farce. The electors in each tahsil are a very small number, and there is practically no competition whatever for election.

As far as my experience goes, the retiring members are generally re-elected without a contest.

District board's powers have been lately largely extended, and if it is desired to make them really representative, the number of electors might be considerably increased.

At present the electors are "a number fixed by Commissioner on recommendation of the district magistrate (25 to 100), persons literate, not less than 21 years of age, and residing or owning landed property and carrying on business in the tahsil, selected by the district magistrate on consideration of their position, interest and influence in the tahsil."

The Government order of 6th June 1906, quoted on page 52 of District Board's Manual, says that in all ordinary tahsils the number of electors ought to be at least 50.

I suggest that in all ordinary tahsils the number so nominated should be at least 100 and that in addition all village headmen, who are able to read and write, be given a vote.

These men are presumably men of some importance in their villages, or at any rate they ought to be, for rule 6 on page 167—VI, Manual says—

"In appointing village headmen the magistrate shall have regard to character, position and influence."

Government have been looking about for some way of making the position one of some little honour, and this seems an opportunity.

How many of the village headmen in these provinces are able to read and write is a question which at present nobody is in a position to answer with exactitude.

I should imagine that on an average at least 200 per tahsil in these provinces can do so.

If that be so, the electorate for each tahsil for the district board would be at least 300 instead of somewhere between 25 and 100.

Of course it is possible that if such a change were made the electors would still take no interest whatever in the elections, but we should at least have given them the chance.

Every man entitled to vote at election to the district board should, I think, be, as at present eligible for election as a member of the district board.

I would retain the existing franchise for municipal boards and also the qualifications laid down for candidates for such boards.

For representatives of district boards on the Provincial Legislative Council, a residential qualification and a proprietary qualification consisting of the payment of Rs. 2,500 per annum land revenue might be required. If it be thought that this limit is too low, I reply that there is no necessary connection between the amount of land revenue a man pays and his good sense and general capacity as a repesentative of the public or a section of the public on a legislative council. Take, for instance, Shaikh Inayat-ullah, talukdar of Saidanpur in Bara Banki district. A qualification of Rs. 5,000 annual land revenue would, I think, shut him out, but no one who knows him can deny his intelligence and shrewdness.

For representatives of municipal boards on the Provincial Legislative Council a residential qualification and a proprietary qualification, taking the shape of the payment of Rs. 2,500 land revenue or of income tax on not less than Rs. 4,000 per annum would, I think, be suitable.

5. Paragraph 5 of G. O. no. 1515/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907.—The suggestion in the first sentence of this paragraph seems to me the best arrangement practicable. I agree with the last sentence of paragraph 5 of Mr. Crawford's letter. For the representatives of the landowners on the Provincial Legislative Council, I consider a residential qualification and the payment of Rs. 5,000 per annum land revenue would be suitable. It appears to me unnecessary (paragraph 8 of Mr. Crawford's letter) to divide up the landowners in the province of Agra into two separate electoral bodies. If any leading landowner of the eastern part of the provinces is left out in the cold and would be useful on the council he could be nominated by Government, as one of the "two others nominated by the Government."

Paragraph 5 of G. O. no. 1576/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907.—I think the payment of Rs. 5,000 per annum land revenue would be a suitable qualification for the electors to elect the representative of the landholders in the province of Agra.

The higher the limit the smaller the electoral body, and as the Government of India say that their object is to bring "all classes of the people into closer relations with Government and its officers." I think that the larger the electoral body the better so far as is consistent with the object in view, viz., the representation of a certain class of the community.

6. Paragraph 5, G. O. no. 1518/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907.—Here, too, for the reason just given, I should prefer the larger to the smaller electorate, and therefore I prefer the limit of Rs. 10,000 land revenue or Rs. 10,000 income for the purposes of income tax to the Rs. 25,000 limit. In addition there is the further consideration that the larger the number of voters the more difficult wire-pulling becomes, and the less wire-pulling we have the better.

7. Paragraph 6 of G. O. no. 1588/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907.—Here, again, the same consideration comes in. For (c) I suggest "Muhammadans paying land revenue of Rs. 2,500 or over," and for (d) "Muhammadans paying income tax on Rs. 4,000 or over."

8. Paragraph 22 of the Government of India's letter.—I am opposed to these suggestions. We are presumably not acting on the principle of "Divide et impera," and should rather encourage the obliteration of religious, racial, caste and occupational divisions, instead of emphasizing and encouraging them by splitting up the electorate into the watertight compartments suggested. I agree with the opinion expressed by Mr. Crawford in paragraph 4 of his letter, but my own opinion was written some days before his letter reached me.

No. 1834/XV—107, dated Benares, the 19th December 1907.

From—H. V. Lovett, Esq., Offg. Commissioner, Benares division,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

Sir.—In reply to your circular no. 1520/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907, I have the honour to submit herewith a letter from His Highness the Maharaja of Benares and to state that my own views are as follows.

2. It is proposed to form an Imperial Advisory Council, consisting only of ruling chiefs and territorial magnates—of those who are the natural leaders of the peoples of India and have the largest stake in the country. A Brahman gentleman in Government service whom I have consulted in this connection observes—

"In Advisory Councils of olden days there were men of wisdom like Viswamitra and Vasishta and Abul Fazal and Faizi. I as an orientalist cannot help thinking that no council can be perfect unless there is in it an element not only of power, as in the present proposal, but of wisdom and sagacity, too, as distinct from power. This only can allow men of the type of the late Sir Syed Ahmad—a voice in the council as a councillor."

His Highness the Maharaja of Benares writes—

"I would like to include in it (the Imperial Advisory Council) such other persons of note who, although neither ruling chiefs nor territorial magnates, are still looked on by the people with equal, if not greater, respect and who know more of the country and wield greater influence over the people than the princes themselves, I would also associate with them some of the merchant princes and the pioneers of commerce and industry . . . His Highness Aga Khan is neither a ruling chief nor a territorial magnate, but his influence among his people and the respect which he commands in the country far exceed those which a ruling chief possesses. The late Sir Sheshadri Iyer of Mysore, the late Sir Saiyid Ahmad, Baba Khem Karan Bedi of the Punjab, and many others might be so instanced."

3. The Maharaja goes on to propose that on the Imperial Council 15 seats be allotted to ruling chiefs, 25 to territorial magnates, five to noblemen in native states, eight to "merchant princes and pioneers of industry and commerce (both native and European), and seven to specially qualified persons of note." The last seven to be elected by the 53 other members and appointed after the approval of the Governor General.

4. Other Indian gentlemen whom I have consulted seem to think that the landed interest should not be the sole interest represented in the Imperial Advisory Council, and I am myself of opinion that the best plan would be to reserve a certain number of seats on that body for persons of note and influence who are neither territorial magnates nor ruling chiefs, but have been specially selected by His Excellency the Viceroy on account of their character and pre-eminence. Otherwise I approve of the Council as proposed. I would refer you to paragraph 4 of the letter from His Highness the Maharaja of Benares enclosed. It is obvious that Imperial advisory councillors would have the powers suggested in that paragraph. In fact such persons as would become councillors possesses them now.

5. The constitution of the proposed Provincial Advisory Councils is to be much more democratic. They are to be assemblies where great landlords and talukdars may find themselves sitting next to and arguing with lawyers, merchants, and school masters. The Government of India consider it essential that "smaller landholders, industry, commerce, capital and the professional classes should be included in these councils." There are also to be non-official Europeans, and the whole association is to offer its most valuable opinions in collective deliberation.

6. The following are the noteworthy criticisms on these proposed councils which have been offered by Indian gentlemen whom I have consulted:—

(a) that the powerful religious interest of India find no voice thereon;

(b) that there should be no Government official presiding over their deliberations and no Government secretary recording their proceedings and conclusions.

These are the observations of His Highness the Maharaja of Benares, who adds—

"I would leave them free to choose their president and secretary, as free discussion will not be possible in the presence of Government officers."

7. I doubt if such a mixed assemblage as that foreshadowed by the Government of India would be suitable to present conditions or would serve the purpose intended. I cannot imagine some of the territorial magnates who are to form its nucleus doing much more than sit silent throughout its deliberations. Individually no doubt they would be glad to give free opinions, but they are generally unused to argument and discussions with those who are much their inferiors in rank or special status. As Provincial Advisory Councils are to be formed, I would give to Lieutenant-Governors the fullest discretion in the nomination of their members. I would not require the Local Government necessarily to go beyond the aristocracy and the really influential representatives of the commercial and professional classes.

Should there be a pre-eminent representative of any religious community, who interests himself in public life, he should be eligible. The following might compose the Advisory Council of these Provinces:—

(a) Representatives of the talukdars of Oudh	6
(b) Representatives of the landholders of the Agra province	8
(c) Representatives of the commerce and industries of these provinces	5
(d) Specially selected by Government	6

I would not necessarily attach supreme importance to collective deliberation.

8. The suggestion of His Highness the Maharaja of Benares to make the council a body holding its meetings independently, with a Government secretary in attendance appears to me to fail to appreciate the true object of these advisory councils, which is to foster a spirit of co-operation between the governors and the governed. Nor do I in the least see why persons of the stamp to be selected as councillors should fear to speak their minds freely at such meetings so long as their intentions are honourable and straightforward.

9. The proposed constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council is, I think, well devised. I would suggest that representatives thereon of the greast landholding classes should be appointed by nomination and not election. Nomination would commend itself to the persons most concerned and would be in consonance with their traditions and ideas. Moreover, it would be more likely to secure the best men available. It may, however, be considered by higher authority that election is desirable; and in that case the proposal of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor to elect from Agra and Oudh alternately is obviously the best solution of the problem. In Oudh the British India Association would make its election by nomination. In Agra the Northern India Landholders' Association cannot well do the same, as it is not, so far as I know, a stable working society. Moreover, I believe that it includes persons who have little or no title to be considered representative landholders. If, therefore, landholder councillors are to be appointed after election, I would recommend the formation of a landholder electorate for the Agra province, a high proprietary and residential qualification being exacted. This seems to me the only alternative to nomination although on looking over the list of landholders of this division who pay a revenue of Rs. 10,000 or over I was startled to see how poor it is in names which indicate even mediocre education or capacity. The representative of provincial landholders, however selected, should be himself a large landholder. I am hardly in a position to offer an opinion on the Muhammadan electorate suggested by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor.

10. In regard to the discussion of the budget in the Imperial Legislative Council some criticisms of Sir Edward Law, which appeared in the Pioneer of October the 24th, appeared to me worthy of consideration, but this is a matter on which my observations are superfluous.

11. Last of all I come to the Provincial Legislative Councils, and here to get to the root of the matter it is advisable to examine the working of our present municipal and district board elective system. My own experience of this has convinced me that it fails generally to bring to our municipal boards the real leaders of the people. It attracts too often little more than the pleader, the would-be demagogue, the nonentity who wishes to gain importance from membership, the office clerk, and other such like persons. With here and there an exception, in any time of trial the influence of these men counts for little or nothing with the people whom they are supposed to represent and indeed, is hardly exerted. As intermediaries between Government and its subjects they are often worse than useless.

12. Again, I have seen a board swamped and too much influenced by a predominant Hindu element the leaders of which belonged to the advanced party of politicians. There were a few Muhammadans, but these with one exception appeared to me to have only procured election by permission of the Hindus. However this may be, they were certainly as a rule afraid to open their mouths in opposition to the latter. The only man of any apparent backbone among them was a Government clerk who had been won round by the advanced Hindu members and almost invariably worked with them. The consequence of all this was that constant watchfulness was required to prevent jobs and schemes which were intended to promote the exclusive interests of the majority. On one occasion I had to strongly intervene to prevent the perpetration of gross injustice.

13. On district boards there are always a good proportion of sub-divisional Government officers, and these bodies as a rule do little more than register the wishes of their chairmen. The non-official members are generally useless for any purpose whatever except the above. They are in fact, although not nominally, elected from the nominees of the tahsildars, and well qualified persons may very possibly be omitted from the latter. Moreover, the electoral groups are only a small section of the community. In a district where the bulk of the inhabitants are Hindus there may be a preponderance of Musalmans on the board because the big landholders are mostly Musalmans. In Benares the electoral body is manipulated through the larger landholders, who mostly live in the city, and the majority of the members of the board are lawyers or towns people who care little or nothing about the district.

14. My experience leads me to think that the qualifications prescribed for electors and candidates for municipal boards are, as a rule, too low and that class representation is sometimes required. Moreover, the qualifications for candidates should be higher than those for electors. The qualifications for electors in Allahabad, for instance, seemed to me absurdly low and I would particularly instance that board as one on which class representation is desirable. It must always be remembered that genuine independence of character is rare in this country, and that minorities require special protection on any board here which is not really dominated by its chairman. I would raise the qualifications in Allahabad and other places for both electors and candidates, and in each instance I would consider how far class representation based on the principle that each group of electors should elect candidates from its own group is desirable or might be introduced. It should then perhaps be possible to procure more real representation of diverse interests and to prevent the danger of a capture of a board by a few schemers. On some boards of course the various classes of the community are sufficiently represented.

15. Another defect in municipal electoral systems lies in the registration of voters. In some municipalities not a tithe of those entitled to vote are ever registered at all. Mr. Radice writes of Benares, "Registration is entirely in the hands of the sitting members, and they usually take care that only those voters should be registered who will vote as they are bid. The result is that the members of the board become a close corporation, to which they can admit or from which they can exclude whomsoever they choose. If registration were once for all placed in the hand of disinterested persons e.g. officials, the rules would not need much alteration. Here and there it might be necessary to alter the electoral areas so as to secure the representation of a particular class, but this would seldom be necessary. Here in Benares, for instance, a Hindu city par excellence, the Muhammadans always secure a very fair representation as they have practically two wards at their disposal, . . . A judicious arrangement of the ward boundaries can usually secure the representation of any particular class."

16. In regard to district boards a proprietary and residential qualification should give a vote for the election of members. The system of nominating electors should be discarded. Mr. Radice has suggested that the qualifications should be—

"All residents of the districts who pay or through whom is paid Rs. 200 or more of revenue.

"All residents, exclusive of those who reside within municipal limits who pay income tax.

"All honorary magistrates who have jurisdiction in the district, exclusive of the municipality.

"All 'protected' tenants who pay Rs. 400 or more rent."

He lays stress on the desirability of "excluding city traders and bankers, who might otherwise swamp the electoral group."

17. If the principle be admitted that a district board electorate based on some such lines with residential and proprietary qualifications is desirable, the terms for its constitution will be subsequently discussed, but I agree generally with his proposal. I also agree with him in thinking that the qualifications for candidates should be materially raised. I would suggest that candidates must be electors who are either—

(a) honorary magistrates,

(b) or pay not less than Rs. 1,000 revenue,

(c) or pay not less than Rs. 2,000 rent,

(d) or pay an income tax not below Rs. 100.

Some such scheme as this might procure district boards of capacity, to sit on which would confer distinction.

18. With electorates for municipal and district boards reformed on lines above suggested, the electorate for the Provincial Legislative Council should be materially raised and less easily influenced by wirepullers and pecuniary considerations than it is at present credited with being. The qualifications for candidates for these councils should be residential and proprietary. The limit of proprietary qualification should not be below an annual income of Rs. 5,000 or the payment of revenue to an equal amount, as Mr. Radice suggests. He also urges that candidates should be members of the boards which elect them. In this connection he writes :—

"I consider that a provision of this kind would have a most excellent effect. It would, I believe, secure for the council men who have had actual experience of local needs and of some of the difficulties of practical administration, and it would add attraction to the membership of the boards—an attraction which would, I think, work for the good of local administration, in which few really big men ever take much interest. The objections to this proposal are unfortunately many. If the proprietary qualification is made much higher than necessary for a membership of the boards, the choice of a candidate for the council may be undesirably limited; if it is made the same, persons who have not sufficient means or status to render them independent may be elected. A return showing the income, as far as can be ascertained, of members of district and municipal boards as at present constituted might afford a guide; without this it is difficult to say whether the suggestion is practicable. I consider it, however, none the less desirable."

It would, I think, be desirable to stipulate that representatives of municipal or district boards on the Provincial Legislative Council should have had at least three years' municipal or district board experience in these provinces. Such a stipulation appears to me reasonable enough, and should undoubtedly tend to raise the tone and prestige of our boards.

19. The only criticism which I would offer regarding the composition of the Provincial Legislative Council as proposed by His Honour the Lieutenant Governor is that the representative of the landholders of Agra should be a resident landholder himself with a high proprietary qualification. He should, in my opinion, be selected by nomination; but if he must be elected, he might be chosen by the landholder electorate which appoints to the Imperial Legislative Council. He should be a resident landholder of considerable estate.

20. Similary in the case of Muhammadan candidates a residential qualification should be essential. An Indian gentleman whom I have consulted urges that "Indian capitalists, merchants and tradesmen should have a representative on the council." He writes: "The Chamber of Commerce, Cawnpore, has been allowed to elect a member for the council, but it is believed that the said Chamber represents the European interest . . . . As the interest of the one class often clashes with another, the Indian capitalists, merchants and tradesmen should have a fair claim for representation on the Council."

I see no objection to the adoption of this proposal.

21. In conclusion, the Collector of Benares writes: "I have taken the opportunity of discussing the proposals of the Government of India with many people, but have been unable to elicit anything very illuminating. Many of the criticisms were of the type of those to be seen every day in the vernacular or Anglo-vernacular press. The suggestions, however, may be mentioned. One is that the advisory councils should be called together at least once a year to listen to a general exposition of the policy of Government, and another that the advisory councils should be empowered to meet suo motu."

To the former proposal I see no objection. The policy of Government is at present expounded by the Lieutenant-Governor at the budget meeting of the Legislative Council. The latter proposal appears to me somewhat similar to the proposal of the Maharaja of Benares that the meetings of the advisory council should not be under the presidency of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor or a Government official. This council is the council of the Administrative Head of the provinces. It is he who should convene it and preside over its meetings. It would of course always be open to individual members to suggest to him that a meeting might be called.

No. 496-XII—240 (VIII), dated the 22nd November 1907.

From—E. A. Molony, Esq., Collector of Gorakhpur,

To—Commissioner, Gorakhpur division.

Sir,—With reference to your no. 295/XV—27, dated the 22nd October 1907, on the subject of the proposed constitutional changes, I have the honour to give my opinion as follows.

2. There is no doubt whatever that it is advisable that the Government of India should have a better machinery than at present exists for ascertaining the general desires of the people on the matters of importance that arise from time to time and of making understood the reason for various measures concerning which misconceptions have arisen and are in future likely to arise.

3. If the proposed measures are likely to tend towards the attainment of these objects they are distinctly a step in the right direction.

4. I have no doubt whatever that the representation of minorities as aimed at in the proposals is a very wise and statesmanlike measure.

5. Taking first the proposed advisory councils. I think that it is doubtful policy not to invest them with formal powers of any sort. There is no doubt that in the eyes of the public the official status of any person depends very much on the powers and responsibilities committed to him, and I think that the absence of formal powers will seriously affect the dignity of the position of advisory councillors or especially as it appears that the conferences will be private and confidential.

I think it would be better to have a portion of each session, at least, public matters of a delicate nature being reserved for confidential deliberation.

The publication of the proceedings of the public sessions would bring the conferences before the public and, I think, raise the status of the councillors.

6. I think, [moreover], when a body or an individual has been asked to advice on any particular matter and has tendered the advice asked for, that body or individual is entitled to receive in reply the reasons of the executive for not following that advice or an assurance that the advice was being, or would be, acted on when possible.

I think that some mention of this matter might be made in the proposals as a guarantee that the advisory councils would be taken seriously.

7. It is probable that the advisory councils will not consist of advocates of revolution or sedition or dangerously rapid changes, and I would suggest that they be given the right of making suggestions. Suggestions by individual members might first be made to the president confidentially. Some suggestions would no doubt be carried out and others could be shown to be unnecessary or impossible to the satisfaction of the member making it. The remainder might be brought on to the agenda for the collective meeting and could be classed by the president as suitable for the confidential or the public sessions.

In this manner I think that a fair number of reasonable and moderate proposals would receive the seal of support by a public body representaitve of the opinions of the vast body of the people who are opposed to violent or revolutionary changes, but who would be glad to see improvements where possible in the administration.

The resolutions of the executive that would doubtless be published for public information on the public resolutions of the advisory councils should serve to explain to the public the reason for the policy of the Government.

8. In paragraph 10 of the resolution of the Government of India the necessity for maintaining an official majority is laid down. This principle is very good in its way, but it is capable of being pressed to unnecessary lengths.

If the official members are held to be bound by the "mandate" theory it seems to me that the legislative councils may as well be made advisory. Supposing, for instance, that a mordern Muhammad Tughlak were to rise to a position which enabled him to propose an inconvertible paper currency, I take it that if the "mandate" theory were carried to its ultimate conclusion, much damage might be caused.

I think that in the maintenance of the executive power some check should be placed on the possibility of too great centralization of that power.

9. Paragraph 14 of the letter of the Government of India.—I think a land revenue of Rs. 10,000 per annum would be a fair qualification for a votor for the Imperial Council, and I think that the representative might be chosen alternately from Agra and Oudh.

10. Paragraph 18 of the letter of the Government of India.—I think that an income of Rs. 10,000 should be the qualification for the Musalman electorate for the Imperial Legislative Council.

11. Paragraph 21 of the letter of the Government of India.—There is no doubt that the question of the municipal franchise requires consideration. I do not think that the district board franchise requires any alteration.

12. I am not in favour of making the constituencies consist of homogeneous occupational groups. In this district at least the Musalmans have a fair representation on the municipal board, and it is not necessary to divide the constituencies by religion. Here fortunately the Hindus and Musalmans get on amicably together.

13. In the municipal franchise the crying necessity is, I think, to make the ballot a reality. At present the system styles itself voting by ballot, but it does not in any way safeguard the secret of how a man has voted.

In many places I fear the result is that the voters are more influenced by the power of a candidate to make himself unpleasant than by their opinion of his capacity to administer local affairs. Occasionally cases occur when men of most notorious bad character get on to the boards to the great discredit of the system of local self-government. Good men of course shun membership under such circumstances.

I am further of opinion that all illiterate voters should be disfranchised.

14. For the constitution of the Provincial advisory council I would suggest—

(a) the Imperial advisory councillors belonging to the province;

(b) an equal number of men chosen from the list of darbaris and title-holders;

(c) a representative from the railways;

(d) two or three representatives from each of the following interests—

(i) manufacturers,

(ii) other capitalists or traders,

(iii) universities,

(iv) the professional classes;

(e) one or two more representatives when required for any unrepresented minority that should have a representative.

No. 745, dated Allahabad, the 23rd December 1907.

From—The Hon'ble Mr. B. Lindsay, Secretary, Legislative Council and Legal Remembrancer to Government, United Provinces,

To—Chief Secretary to Government, United Provinces.

Sir,—In compliance with the request contained in your letter no. 1519/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907, I have the honour to submit herewith a note of my opinion on the proposals relating to the establishment of Imperial and Provincial advisory councils, and the enlargement of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils.

Note.

I.—The Provincial Advisory Council.

The scheme outlined in paragraph 6 of the Government of India's letter contemplates the constitution of a Provincial advisory council which is to be, as far as possible, representative of all the important interests in the province.

In considering the introduction of a scheme of this nature into the United Provinces we ought to bear in mind that these provinces include two areas which, though grouped together for purposes of administration, are nevertheless, from the point of view of their respective histories, in many ways distinct.

The province of Oudh has been in our occupation for just fifty years, and the circumstances under which we assumed possession rendered it necessary to provide for it a special system of land tenure, and a code of personal law which, in so far as it affects the body of large landed proprietors, is together different from the ordinary Muhammadan and Hindu law which obtains in the province of Agra.

Economic conditions, too, vary in these two areas. Oudh is at present a purely agricultural province; industrial and commercial enterprise is, so far, confined to the province of Agra.

It seems necessary, therefore, to postulate that in any scheme involving representation the province of Oudh should have special representatives of its own.

Again, we have the very large area of Kumaun, in which the conditions differ entirely from those of the provinces of Agra and Oudh. Its inhabitants constitute a class by themselves: it has a distinct system of land tenure of its own, and a personal law which has its own peculiarities.

As yet a backward province it is not materially affected by the administrative measures applied to other portions of the United Provinces; but its assimilation to the rest of the provinces in the matter of administration is only a question of time, and when this problem is attacked it would be of the greatest advantage to have a representative of Kumaun on a council which would presumably be consulted in the matter.

According to the proposals of the Local Government the Provincial advisory council for these provinces is to consist of 25 members, amongst whom would be included the provincial representaitves nominated to the Imperial advisory council. The number of these representatives is not stated; but if we assume the number to be four, we are left to consider how the remaining 21 seats on the Provincial council should be distributed.

Having regard to the population of the areas, and the importance of the different local interests to be represented, I would suggest that these 21 seats should be allotted as follows:—

To Agra	14
To Oudh	6
To Kumaun	1

The interests of the great landholders of the provinces as a whole are sufficiently provided for by assigning to them the four seats to which they will be entitled as members of the Imperial advisory council, and we have only to provide for the other interests which are referred to in paragraph 6 of the Government of India's letter.

In the case of Oudh we may leave out of consideration industrial and commercial interests; and of the six seats reserved for this province, five might be apportioned to representatives of the minor landed gentry and one to a representative of the professional classes. Of the five seats assigned to minor landholders three might go to Hindus and two to Mahammadans.

In dividing three seats available for Hindus it would be advisable to provide as far as possible for caste representation. The majority of the minor Oudh proprietors belong to the Thakur class, but there are landholders of other castes whose opinions would be of value. There ought to be no difficulty in selecting the representatives of the minor talukdars and zamindars of Oudh. We know who the educated and influential members of this class are; and we can also avail ourselves of the advice of the British Indian Association, which is the recognised mouthpiece of talukdari opinion.

In the case of the Agra province we have a greater diversity of interests to deal with. In the case of the landed proprietors we have representatives of castes which are not included in this category in Oudh. The Jats, for example, are a numerous body in the western districts and have at least one influential member in the person of the Raja of Mursan. Similarly in the eastern districts the Kurmis, a numerous body, have a leader in the Rai of Padrauna (Gorakhpur district).

If we assign six out of the 14 seats for the Agra province to representatives of the minor landed interests, we might so arrange as to have one representative from each division. Four seats might be given to Hindus and two to Muhammadans, representation by castes being secured as far as possible in the case of the Hindus. We are left then with six seats to be divided among the other interests which are entitled to representation.

In considering the allotment of these seats I find it difficult to suggest what other interests than industry and commerce could be represented by non-official Europeans, whose inclusion in the council is made a point of by the Government of India. At the present time there are no Europeans in these provinces that I know of holding substantial landed interests except a few grantees in the Basti and Gorakhpur districts, and those, I believe, are, now absentees. Possibly it would be advisable to have one non-official European as a representative of the educational interest. On the whole I should say the eight seats might best be allotted as follows:

(a) Three to representatives of industry and commerce, one of whom should be an European.

(b) Three to representatives of education, one to be an European.

(c) Two to representatives of the professional classes.

To sum up, the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Council which I suggest is as follows:—

(a) Oudh—
(i) to represent minor landed interests	5
(ii) to represent professional classes	1
(b) Agra—
(i) to represent minor landed interests	6
(ii) to represent industry and commerce	3
(iii) to represent education	3
(iv) to represent professional classes	2
		14
(c) Kumaun		1
(d) Members of the Imperial advisory council		4
Total		25

II.—The Imperial Legislative Council.

According to paragraph 12 of the Government of India's letter there are to be eighteen elected members on the Imperial Legislative Council, of whom two will be representatives of the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay. The others are to be elected by various classes in the different provinces.

(A).—The non-official members of each Provincial Legislative Council are to have the privilege of sending one member to the Imperial council.

In the case of the United Provinces it is proposed to have seventeen non-official members on the Provincial council, and I think there is no need to seek an electorate outside this body. The candidate should be himself a member of the Provincial council, and membership should be the qualification for voting.

(B).—Representation of nobles and great landowners.—The proposals of the Local Government are that the member of this class to be returned to the Imperial council should be selected alternately from Agra and Oudh; that in the case of Oudh the representative should be the nominee of the British Indian Association, and that in the case of Agra he should be elected.

To these proposals there cannot, in my opinion, be any objection.

The question then remains as to the constitution of the electoral body in the Agra province to which the task of selection would be entrusted.

It seems necessary to fix a high proprietary qualification for this franchise, and the Government of India express the opinion that the minimum standard of qualification should be the payment of Rs. 10,000 a year Government revenue.

If we accept this as a reasonable standard the electorate in the Agra province will number 283.

If payment of Rs. 25,000 a year land revenue be set up as the standard, the number of qualified electors is reduced to seventy-two. By adopting the higher standard we obtain one advantage in facilitating the process of election.

The lower standard will, on the other hand, provide for that wider representation which the whole scheme of enlarged councils is designed to secure, and for this reason I am in favour of the adoption of Rs. 10,000 limit. I do not think that an electoral list of 280 odd is too large in the case of large landed proprietors.

Another reason way I advocate this standard is that in the case of Muhammadan representatives I propose that the qualification should be the same.

One point will have to be decided which is not mooted in the letter of the Government of India, viz., whether or not the right to vote is to be given to females as well as to males. Out of the 283 landed proprietors in the Agra province paying Rs. 10,000 a year revenue and upwards at the present time no less than thirty-nine are females. This number is not of course likely to remain constant, and the fact that at a given time the person in possession of a large revenue-paying estate is a female is a matter of accident pure and simple. There will, however, always be females who, if the only qualification is to be the payment of land revenue, will be entitled to a vote. The usual arguments pro and con in the problem of female suffrage may be advanced in support of either proposition. But as the object is to secure the representation of an influential class, I think it would be only fair to allow a female vote in this case, subject of course to any safeguards which might be deemed expedient in order to prevent the exercise of undue influence.

In paragraph 15 of the Government of India's letter it is suggested that there may be objections to the adoption of the principle of election in the case of a heterogeneous body of landowners scattered over the entire area of a province. I see no reason for apprehending that an electoral body composed of landed proprietors possessing the qualification proposed would fail to return a suitable representative. I think we ought to assume, until experience has proved the contrary, that the proprietors of large estates have sufficient independence to enable them to resist any attempt to coerce their opinion; while the fact that the electorate is distributed over a large area appears to me to negative rather than to confirm any theory that there will be an opportunity for the exercise of improper practices.

The wirepuller finds greater scope for activity among an electorate which is confined to a small area.

(C)—Muhammadan representation.—There are to be two elected Muhammadan members of the Imperial Legislative Council. The proposals of the Government of India as to the method of election are to be found in paragraph 18 of its letter The intention appears to be that each of the six specified provinces should elect two representatives in turn.

As an improvement on this plan I would suggest that on each occasion, when the council is being constituted or reconstituted, two of these provinces should be allowed to return one representative each; and that the other two seats reserved for nominees should be divided among the four unrepresented provinces. In this way we should ensure the representation of four out of the six provinces on every Imperial council.

As regards the Muhammadan electorate the suggestion is that it should consist of—

(a) Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial councils;
(b) Muhammadan Fellows of the local University;
(c) Muhammadans paying income tax upon an annual income of Rs. 25,000 or an amount of land revenue which would indicate a corresponding income.

I agree that the classes mentioned in (a) and (b) should have the right to vote. As for (c) we can in these provinces compile a list of voters who would be qualified for the franchise on the terms set out above, but the list would be a small one. The standard of Rs. 25,000 appears to me to be pitched too high, much too high in the case of Muhammadans, who are not a wealthy community.

I am in favour of the alternative standard proposed by the Government of these provinces, viz., the payment of Rs. 10,000 a year as land revenue or the payment of income tax on the same amount. This would give us an electorate of about two hundred, a sufficiently large (but not too large) body, which would fairly represent the enlightened opinion of the Muhammadan community.

III.—The Provincial Legislative Council.

Paragraph 20 of the Government of India's letter lays down the cardinal principle to be observed in the constitution of Provincial legislative bodies, namely, that the widest representation should be given to classes, races and interests, subject to the condition that an official majority must be maintained.

It is pointed out that the present system has failed to secure representation on these lines, and that the defect lies in the methods by which elections are made to the municipal and district boards, the constitution of which determines, to a great extent, the character of the provincial councils. To this defect is attributed the undue predominance of the professional classes in the legislative councils.

Treated in the abstract, the proposition that a legislative body should be as widely representative as possible is one the truth of which no one would be concerned to deny. Legislation assumes many shapes and affects a large variety of interests in which particular sections of the community are vitally concerned, and measures of law which have received the stamp of approval from representatives of the classes which are to be affected by them are those most likely to achieve their object.

An ideal legislative assembly would comprise representatives of all important sections of the community, but in India such an ideal appears to me to be for the present unattainable. We cannot entrust the discussion and approval of legislative measures to persons who have neither the intelligence nor education to qualify them for the task. It follows, therefore, that the uneducated classes must remain without any direct representation in a council the function of which is to pass laws. For the present the only course appears to be to leave the representation of such sections of the community to the official members whose duty it is to safeguard the interests of all classes.

With regard to the constitution of municipal boards and the influence exerted by such boards on the character of the council, I am not disposed to hold that we have any substantial grounds for interfering with the present system of municipal elections.

The raison d'être of municipal boards is not to furnish members for a legislative assembly, but to regulate and administer parochial affairs. Municipal boards are concerned with matters affecting the community individually and not by classes, and I fail to see how any principle of class representation can properly be applied in the election of such bodies. I believe I am right in saying that in these provinces it has been left to the municipalities themselves to determine who of the inhabitants shall have a right to vote at municipal elections. As Government has hitherto refrained from laying down any general rules to regulate the qualifications for electoral franchise in municipalities it may well be doubted whether it is expedient to intervene now. Again, it is difficult to conceive how any rules of general application could be laid down in this matter. There are great diversities in the circumstances of municipalities, and it would be imposible to apply to a small municipality in a rural district the standard which might fairly be laid down for a populous town municipality. These remarks apply alike to qualifications for the right to vote and to qualifications for candidature.

It is admitted that the problem of municipal franchise is an intricate one, and it seems to me advisable to leave the present system of municipal election alone as long as it serves in an adequate manner the purpose for which it was directly intended.

On the other hand, when we come to consider the question of the representation of municipal bodies on the Provincial Legislative Council, it is clear that Government is entitled to lay down a standard of qualification which seems to be essential in the case of a member of a legislative body. A person whose social standing, education and experience may well entitle him to have a voice in the control of the affairs of his own town is not necessarily qualified to deal with questions which affect the community of a province at large.

In the case of district boards I do admit that there is scope for the system of representation by classes. These boards control the administration of large areas, and in the exercise of their functions they are called upon to consider the interests of different classes of the community. They deal with such problems as education, public works, the improvement of agriculture and industries, public vaccination, sanitation and the establishment of famine preventive works. We might therefore very well alter the electoral system of the district boards so as to provide for representation on a wider basis than we have now. Under the present rules the minimum number of elected members for each board is twelve, and it would be possible under these conditions to secure the representation of occupational groups in the manner suggested in the Government of India's letter. If necesry the boards might be enlarged for this object.

No difficulty can arise here as in the case of municipal boards, for Government has always kept in its own hands the power of selectiug the electoral body, and the electoral body is small, not exceeding 100 members for each tahsil of a District. Any alteration we should make would be in the direction of enlarging the list of voters, and would not be open to the objection of being a reactionary measure. I would propose, therefore, that the electorate for district boards should be enlarged by the bestowal of a right to vote upon the better class tenants, artizans, and traders in each tahsil. A tenant paying a rental of Rs. 100 a year, a trader paying an income tax of Rs. 20 a year, and an artizan paying any income tax at all should all have a right to vote, and every district board should have at least one representative from each of these classes.

As in the case of municipal boards, so in the case of district boards, it is necessary to lay down a special qualification for those who aspire to represent district boards on the Provincial Legislative Council. Insistence on this special qualification will no doubt debar tenants, petty traders and artizans from direct representation; for it is not likely that any member of these classes will fulfil the required conditions at present. We do, however, achieve something in the way of wider representation by giving these sections of the community seats on the district boards and the right to vote for representatives of those boards on the Council.

The proposal of this Government is to allot four seats on the Provincial Legislative Council to representatives of municipalities. Two of these places are to be divided among the six large municipal towns in turn, the remaining two being reserved for representatives of the smaller municipal towns and of the large municipal towns which are for the time being without a member. There are at present in these provinces (according to the Municipal Manual) eighty-nine municipalities divided into five classes on the basis of population. Under our present system only forty out of these have a voice in the election of municipal representatives on the council. These forty consist of—

Class I	...	...	...	7
Class II	...	...	...	10
Class III	...	...	...	13
Class IV	...	...	...	10

so that six municipalities of class III, twenty-six of class IV, and all of class V are excluded from participation in the elections.

It is now proposed to restrict representation on the council to municipalities having a population of over 20,000; that is to say to the municipalities which fall within classes I, II, and III only, the number of which is thirty-six. The result will be that fewer municipalities will be represented (thirty-six as against forty) while ten municipalities of class IV which now enjoy the right to vote will be deprived of it.

On this score the proposals of this Government appear open to objection as involving a restriction instead of an extension of representation. I think it would be sounder, and more in harmony with the policy of the Government of India as expressed in their letter, to provide for the representation of all municipalities. By doing so I think we should stimulate the interest taken in local self-government.

I agree that the large municipal towns are entitled to separate representation, but I think at the same time that this is adequately secured by the allotment of two seats.

I would suggest that the two remaining seats should be reserved exclusively to the smaller municipalities, giving one of them to a representative from municipalities of classes II and III (twenty-nine in number) and the other to a candidate chosen by classes IV and V (fifty-three in number).

In carrying out this proposal it would be necessary to lay down different standards of qualification. We could not hope to obtain from minor municipalities representatives of the same standing as we should get from the large cities.

For municipal candidates for the council I should fix the qualifications as follows.—

(I) Class I	Income of not less than Rs. 5,000 a year.
(II) Classes II and III . .	Income of not less than Rs. 3,000 a year.
(III) „ IV and V . .	Income of not less than Rs. 1,500 a year.

In all cases residence within a municipality to be an indispensable condition. (Literacy is of cource assumed to be an essential qualification in the case of all candidates for the council).

District boards.—These are to supply three members to the council—two from Agra and one from Oudh. I have already put forward suggestions for the reconstitution of these boards on a more thoroughly representative basis.

The qualifications necessary in a candidate for the council from these boards should, in my opinion, be—

(a) in the case of landowners, payment of not less than Rs. 5,000 a year land revenue;

(b) in the case of traders, an income of not less that Rs. 5,000 a year. Every candidate to be a resident of these provinces.

Landholders.—This class is to furnish two members of the council—one elected from Agra, the other being nominated for Oudh by the British Indian Association. I think this number is sufficient, particularly as one or two of the three district boards representatives will in all likelihood be drawn from this section of the community.

The qualification for a seat should be in this instance the payment of land revenue of not less than Rs. 5,000 a year. I should prescribe the same qualification for a right to vote. To fix a lower standard would give us an inconveniently large electorate.

Muhammadans.—The proposal is to have four Muhammadan membsrs—elected and two nominated.

In the case of elected members the electoral body is to consist of—

(a) Muhammadan fellows of the Allahabad University;

(b) Muhammadan registered graduates;

(c) Muhammadans paying land revenue Rs. 5,000 a year and upwards;

(d) Muhammadans paying income tax on Rs. 5,000 a year.

I am in favour of this scale of qualifications, although as regards (d) it is less liberal than the proposal made in paragraph 17 of the Government of India's letter to confer the franchise upon all Muhammadans who pay any income tax at all. India's suggestion would give us an unduly large electorate and would probably result in an undue representation of the trading and professional classes.

The qualifications prescribed for Muhammadan electors would serve as qualications for candidates as well. I do not think any special qualification for these latter is called for. The reservation of two seats by nomination will enable the Local Government to arrange for the representation of any special section or sections of the Muhammadan community which may be deemed expedient.

No. 66/XV—5, dated the 20th January 1908.

From—C. E. Crawford, Esq., Magistrate and Collector of Azamgarh,

To—Commissioner, Gorakhpur Division.

Sir,—With reference to your no. 297/XV—27, dated the 22nd October 1907, I have the honour to say that I have consulted the members of the district and municipal boards and the leading officials and gentlemen of the district, and to report as follows.

2. To begin with the composition of district and municipal boards. Setting aside the general question of the representation of Muhammadans, it was agreed that the present system of district board election was satisfactory, and that the members may be regarded as fairly representative of the landholding interest and the people generally as far as they are concerned with matters within the purview of the district board. It was suggested that the elector's lists required rather more inspection and supervision by the Collector personally. With these opinions I agree. There seems to me no necessity for endeavouring to force occupational group on the district board, and the idea of having representatives of tenants as opposed to landholders is entirely inapplicable to this district.

3. With regard to the municipal board the present system is not so satisfactory as the trading classes are almost entirely excluded from representation. It is said that this is not regarded as a grievance, and that the efficient members of those classes are not willing to give up the necessary time, but this absence of traders on the board is certainly a serious defect and in my opinion requires remedy. I would suggest that a certain number of seats should be reserved for persons actively engaged in banking and commerce; this number to be fixed by Government after consideration of the circumstances of each municipality. The general opinion here is decidedly adverse to the constitution of occupational electorates, and I personally cannot see that there is any necessity for them. It will be time to consider the matter when it is seen that members elected by the ordinary constituencies are not really as representative traders as could be obtained from election by a trading constituency. It will not, I think, be difficult to select the wards in which one or more seats should be reserved for the trading classes.

4. With regard to the representation of Muhammadans it cannot be denied that there is a strong body of Muhammadan opinion in favour of a determination of the number of seats due to Muhammadans, and the constitution of a separate Muhammadan electorate for those seats. It seems to me, however, distinctly undesirable for Government to admit that there is any real difference of interest between Hindus and Muhammadans in mattersof district and municipal administration or to discriminate between them until it is absolutely compelled to do so. The original constitution of separate electorates would certainly lead to ill-feeling, and, I believe, to the election of intolerant rather than tolerant persons on either side. I would suggest that any determination of Muhammadan seats be confined to those boards from which it is clear that they are being habitually excluded, and that senior inequalities due to apathy or chance rather than design be rectified by nomination. When the number of Muhammadan seats has to be deprived the election should be left in the hands of the ordinary constituency until it is clear that Muhammadans so elected are not truly representative of their co-religionists.

5. To continue this question into the constitution of the Provincial Legislative Council, the necessity for some special representation of Muhammadans may be admitted and no exception can be taken to the proposal that they should elect two members themselves. But for Government to bind itself to nominate two more regardless of any that may be elected to the seats open to general election, is at any rate liable to be construed as a declaration that the other seats are in practice to be reserved for Hindus. This seems to be an undesirable declaration to make,—at any rate until it is clear that even with the largely extended number of seats open to election Muhammadans have no chance of being elected by a mixed constituency of Hindus and Muhammadans. I would suggest that Government should reserve these two seats for the purpose of rectifying irequalities should such arise, if necessary assuring the Muhammadans that the total number of seats occupied by them shall never be less than four.

6. As to the proposed constitution of the council, no one has made any suggestion for altering the distribution proposed by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor except that the confining of municipal representation to towns of over 20,000 excludes the town of Azamgarh itself. This town appears to have at least as good a claim to representation as outlying municipalities in other districts with population of over 20,000, and I would suggest that all headquarters municipalities should be represented or at any rate all with population of over 10,000.

7. With respect to the qualifications for membership of municipal and district boards, the general opinion (with which I agree) is that no new qualification is required, and I am not aware that any persons have been elected here who would have been excluded by any reasonable qualification. With respect to the membership of council, as long the present system of election at a meeting is observed, there does not appear any great reason to apprehend that persons of insufficient standing will be elected; but as it is possible that a class of professional politicians may arise, it would, I think, be advisable to fix some moderate proprietary qualification at the outset as a matter of course rather than to introduce it afterwards.

8. With regard to the system of election in the case of the two Muhammadan members, no one here has any suggestion to offer. I presume that votes may be recorded in the district of residence of the voter, as otherwise the candidates at the election centre will have an overwhelming advantage and election is likely to fall into the hands of a small section of the electors—a most undesirable result. With respect to the representative of the landholders of Agra it would appear advisable to select him alternatively from the western and eastern halves of the province. The conditions of the two are very different, and a system of election by landholders paying over a certain fixed amount of revenue would, I believe, give a permanent preponderance of votes to the western districts. It seems probable that a better system of election in this case would be for landowners of each district paying over a certain amount of revenue varying according to the conditions of the district to meet and elect a representative and the representatives could then meet and elect a member for their section of the province. It has been suggested to me—and this seems a very reasonable suggestion—that in all these special electorates titleholders of the class concerned should have a vote regardless of their income.

9. Their remains, then, the question of the advisory council. The members of the municipal board have sent me proposals for the election of this council (with the exeption of four members) by the district and municipal boards of each division. I do not imagine that a useful council will be obtained in this manner, but the proposal seems sound in one respect, namely, that every division should be represented on the council, and I would suggest that one prominent landholder should be selected from each division in the province which is not already represented on the Provincial council by an Imperial council. I presume that a certain number of the councillors will be selected from the elected non-official members of the Legislative Council, and do not think that public opinion at all requires or desires any further admission of the elective element into this council.

The only other suggestio n I have to make is that one, or possibly two, retired servants of Government should invariably be appointed councillors. There are no better advisers avaliable.

SIR,—With reference to your endrosement no. 296/XV—27, dated the 22nd October 1907, asking for opinion on the proposals contained in G. G. O. no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th August 1907, in regard to advisory councils, &c., I have the honour to report that I have endeavoured to discover what local opinion is on the subject, but have not obtained anything more than negative criticisms.

2. As regards the Imperial advisory council, the feeling is that the proposals made in paragraph 5 of the Government of India's letter are inconsistent with the reasons for the proposals given in paragraph 2. It is contended that with a few honourable exceptions native chiefs and territorial magnates know nothing of the wants and aspiration of the people, and that a council which includes this element only will be out of touch with the country. If the council is to be representative of the people it should contain some proportion of elected members. It is also urged that the council should be invested with some power of initiative, and that its proceedings should be public in order to give effect to the wishes of the Government of India as expressed in paragraph 3 of their letter. All these suggestions appear to overlook entirely the essential difference between an advisory council and a legislative or executive council and the fact that the large mass of the people look up to the territorial magnates as their natural leaders.

3. As regards the Provincial advisory council, it is contended that the legal profession and educationists should find adequate representation. This, however, is already conceded by the Government of India in paragraph 6 of their letter. Probably five members will be imperial councillors. Of the rest eight might be representative of the smaller landholders, who form the backbone of the country, four of the professional classes, six of the commercial and trading classes, and two of the non-official Europeans.

4. As regards the constitutions of the Imperial Legislative Council it is suggested that commerce should be represented by at least four members instead of two, and that two of these at least should be Indians. It is also suggested that the Universities should have two representatives, and the professional classes two more; and that the experts nominated by the Viceroy should be Indians whenever possible.

5. Similarly on the Provincial Legislative Council they would have two representatives of the University and two of the legal profession. The latter suggestion appears to be entirely superfluous considering that the representatives of boards are generally of that profession, and that their number has hitherto crowded out other interests.

6. I have not been able to obtain any opinion of any value on the matter of elections for boards. All are agreed that the present system of election is a farce, but attribute this rather to the extent of official control over the board than to the fact that the selection of voters rests ultimately with the patwari. Any distinction of electors on the basis of caste or religion is deprecated, and this although it is admitted that in India religion and politics have generally gone together and that caste associations are probably stronger to-day than they have ever been before. The idea seems to be that the recognition by the State of any connection between caste or religion and politics would endanger the results of western education. The suggestion that the electorate should be divided into classes representing large landholders, small landholders, tenants, artizans, traders, and professional classes, and that each class should have seats alloted them, meets with greater favour. The qualifications for the landed classes would remain as at present; the voters in the other classes would be payers of income tax.

SIR,—With reference to your circular no. 23-333/XV—7-2, dated the 21st October 1907, forwarding for opinion certain proposals of the Government of India and of the Local Government on the question of giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters, I have the honour to submit a few remarks. I regret that press of work in connection with the preparations for famine relief has precluded my giving the subject the detailed study which its importance demands.

2. I have freely consulted, in oral conference and in writing, representatives of enlightened local opinion in various walks of life. The Raja of Kurwar seems to voice general opinion in pointing out that some educational qualification in the members, both those appointed to the advisory councils and those elected to the Legislative Councils, would make the membership more appreciated by their recipients and more respected among the public at large. The immemorial tradition of the East has been in favour of the association of "the learned" with the executive power. This tradition is carried to extreme lengths in China, where the class of the literati forms the official hierarchy, but it has always been recognized in both Hindu and Muhammadan systems of government, and its recognition wherever possible in the reconstitution of the machinery by which Government is to be brought into closer touch with the people of India would have the advantage of a deep-seated tradition to recommend it to the people.

3. I am aware of the crudeness of some of the proposals that are put forward on this head, such, for example as an "entrance" qualification for members of the advisory and Legislative councils. Nor do I lose sight of the fact that university representation is among the recognized principles governing election to the Provincial Legislative Council of these provinces. But I venture to suggest that men of both the old and the new learning should have a voice in the advisory councils and in the Imperial Legislative Council, and that the principle of university representation, already recognized in the Local Government's proposals for the Provincial Legislative Council of these provinces, may be embodied in the general principles accepted by the Government of India for the constitution of Provincial Legislative Councils. To reduce the suggestion to definite shape, I would propose for consideration the following propositions:—

(a) That all persons holding the title of Shams-ul-Ulama or Mahamahopadhyaya or corresponding titles in Burma should be appointed to the Provincial advisory council of the province in which they reside.

(b) That such persons should in each province constitute a special electorate for the election of a single member from among themselves for the Imperial advisory council.

(c) That they should also elect from among themselves one or two members, acquainted with English, to their Provincial Legislative Council.

(d) That each University in British India should, in rotation, elect a member, being a graduate of that university, to the Imperial Legislative Council.

(e) That in all provinces in which there is a University, the University should elect one of its graduates to the Provincial Legislative Council.

4. As regards the constitution of the Provincial advisory council, if the suggestion made in paragraph 3 (a) above is approved, there will be for this province seven Mahamahopadhyayas and four Shams-ul-Ulamas, or eleven representatives of the old learning. Then there would be the Imperial councillors belonging to this province, and representing its aristocratic landed interest, to the number of (probably) ten. The smaller landed interest might be represented by representatives nominated by district officers, one for each district of half the province alternately for five years, to the number of twenty-four. The Chamber of Commerce, Cawnpore, the mill owners of the province, the Bar Associations of Allahabad and Lucknow, and the University of Allahabad might each have a representative to the number of five. This would give about fifty representatives in the aggregate, but the number of Shams-ul-Ulamas and Mahamahopadhyayas might vary from quinquennium to quinquennium. I would not rigidly fix the number for the Provincial advisory council. If the approximate number fifty is considered too large, the smaller landed interest might be represented by a representative for each division nominated by the Commissioner—nine for the whole province instead of twenty-four. But it will probably be found in practice that the attendance at advisory councils, when they are actually summoned to meet, will not be anything like full, and bearing this consideration in mind, I do not think that fifty would be too large a number.

5. The composition proposed for the non-official portion of the Provincial Legislative Council in the Local Government's proposals provides for the representation of all the important interests in the province. The landholders of Agra are to be represented by an elected representative, and those of Oudh by a representative nominated by the British Indian Association. The landed interest in Oudh will thus be represented by the talukdari interest only: if possible I should like to see the other landholders, not being talukdars, also represented. The election of such a member, I would suggest, might be by electors, landholders who are not talukdars, but who may be under-proprietors, nominated by the district officers for each of the Oudh districts. If this suggestion is accepted, the province of Agra may be put on a footing equal to Oudh by the grant of two elected representatives of the landed interest—one representing the big landholders paying in Government revenue Rs. 25,000 or over, and the other representing the smaller landholders.

6. On the subject of Muhammadan representation the proposals made in the Local Government's letter no. 1511/III—416, dated the 7th October 1907, appear to be suitable, except that for the electorate for the Imperial Legislative Council I would have Muhammadans paying a land revenue or income tax of Rs. 10,000 or over. The limit of Rs. 25,000 appears to be too high considering the circumstances of the Muhammadan community of the United Provinces.

Legislative.

SIR,

WITH reference to your letter no. 2314, dated 24th August 1907, I am directed by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor to submit, for the information of the Government of India, the opinions which have been collected in this province on the subject of the proposed creation of Advisory Councils and reform of the existing Legislative Councils. In this letter an endeavour is made to review these opinions, to appraise their value with reference to the position and status of the critics as well as to their contents, to epitomise concurrent views, and in the case of conflicting opinions to indicate the party or class in the community ranging itself on each side and the proper importance to be assigned to each. For Sir Louis Dane's final conclusions and recommendations, I am to refer you specially to paragraphs 20, 25, 26, 39 and 43—50.

2. In explanation of the form in which most of the enclosed opinions are framed, I am to say that your letter of 24th August last was circulated under cover of a letter* from this office in which the points referred for opinion were formulated in a series of questions. The numerals so constantly appearing in the replies have reference to these questions.

* No. 2643 S., dated 27th September 1907—copy enclosed.

3. The opinions received may be classified as follows:—

European officials	36
European non-officials	2
Native officials	20
Lawyers	34
Muhammadan non-officials	24
Hindu non-officials	44
Societies	25

European officials.—These include the Financial Commissioner (Hon'ble Mr. Wilson), 2 Judges of the Chief Court (Sir W. O. Clark and Mr. Justice Robertson), 5 Commissioners and the Settlement Commissioner, 25 Deputy Commissioners, 1 Settlement Officer (Mr. Gibson), Colonel Dallas, Major Popham Young and 1 Assistant Commissioner.

Native officials.—These include Mr. Justice Chatterji, Khan Abdul Ghafur Khan of Zaida, Divisional Judge, Diwan Narindar Nath and Dewan Tek Chand, Deputy Commissioners, 13 Extra Assistant Commissioners and 3 Tahsildars. Only 7 of the officials are Muhammadans.

*European non-officials.—These are Sir David Masson and Mr. G. W. Hale of the Gurgaon district.

Lawyers.—Of these 27 are Hindus, 6 Muhammadans and 1 (Mr. Parker) European.

*Muhammadan non-officials.—The principal personages are M. Rahim Bakhsh, President, Bahawalpur Council of Regency, Hon'ble Malik Umar Hayat Khan, C.I.E., Khalifa S. Muhammad Husain of Patiála, and the Editor of the Observer. The remainder are of the Rais and Honorary Magistrate class with a few Zaildars.

*Hindu non-officials.—These include Sikhs. The Rajas of Nábha, Jind, Kapúrthala, Náhan and Chamba have sent in replies, but only the Raja of Nábha has attempted to deal with the case in detail. Opinions have also been furnished by the Tika Sahib of Nábha and the Hon'ble Sardar Partap Singh. The remainder are of the Rais and Honorary Magistrate class, chiefly belonging to Lahore, Delhi and Amritsar.

Societies.—These include 10 Muhammadan bodies, 5 Hindu and Sikh Sabhas, 2 Bar Associations, 3 Municipal Committees and 5 miscellaneous (chiefly commercial) societies.

4. In resorting to the plan of counting heads for the purpose of estimating the weight of opinion it is always necessary to bear in mind the very different degree of value attaching to the opinions of the separate units, and also the circumstance that, outside the class of European officials, it would be possible to collect perhaps three times the number of opinions of persons belonging to the same classes. For instance, instead of replies from 13 Extra Assistant Commissioners, 3 Tahsildars, 34 lawyers, half a dozen Zaildars, 3 petty Municipal Committees, 3 or 4 yeomen grantees and 2 Bar Associations, it would have been possible to collect three times the number of opinions from similar sources, and the operation of counting heads might then bring out very different results. On the whole, however, the district officers have, in determining the persons to be consulted, made a good selection. In the nature of the case only persons capable of understanding the scope and meaning of the Government of India scheme could be consulted, and, as such critics in general belong to the better educated classes, it is only to be expected that in a large number of opinions there should be a bias towards those measures which tend to the realization of the aspirations of that community. The difficulty of drawing out what may be regarded as rural opinion is illustrated by the reply submitted on behalf of the Muhammadans of Shujabad that "they approved the proposals of Government," a reply which ignores the circumstance that many of the proposals of Government are alternative in form. The preponderance of Hindu opinion in the replies has also to be kept constantly in mind, especially in dealing with issues which raise the Hindu-Muhammadan question. The Hon'ble Malik Umar Hayat Khan enters a caveat against attaching too much importance to the various leagues, anjumans and sabhas. Many of these are no doubt one-man institutions or are operated by wire-pullers for selfish motives. It should at least be recognised that even when constituted on a more popular basis they represent the views of the urban rather than of the rural population. It is difficult to secure an adequate expression of the true views of the latter, but the graphic report which Major Fox-Strangways furnishes of his interview with Khan Bahadur Raja Aurangzeb

* Other than lawyers.

Khan will be recognised by most persons who are acquainted with the people as exhibiting a true view of the attitude towards Government and Government measures of the vast mass of the agricultural population. There are, it is true, some among those whose opinions have been submitted who can be reckoned as agriculturists and who generally seem to welcome the proposals for constitutional changes, but it will be dangerous to attach much weight to indolent or unreasoned assent of this nature. It will always be necessary to bear in mind Sir Henry Maine's warning, given specially with reference to India, against such uncritical acquiescence in vague propositions.*

5. The value of the opinions under review differs considerably. The following deserve special notice :—

European officers.—In addition to those of the Financial Commissioner and Commissioners, the opinions of Colonel Parsons, Major Popham Young, Mr. Sykes, Major Burlton, Major Fox-Strangways, Mr. Estcourt, Mr. Humphreys, Mr. Malan and Mr. deMontmorency.

Native officials.—Mr. Justice Chatterji, Diwan Narindar Nath, Khan Abdul Ghafur Khan, Narayan Das, Extra Assistant Commissioner, and Chaudhri Sardar Khan, Extra Assistant Commissioner.

Lawyers.—M. Shah Din, Muhammad Shafi, Lala Mul Chand, Rai Bahadur Lal Chand, Mr. Bhagat Ram and Mr. Ahsan-ul-Hakk.

Muhammadan non-officials.—The best are those of the gentlemen mentioned in paragraph 3.

Hindu non-officials.—The Raja of Nabha, Rai Sahib K. B. Thapar, Rai Sahib Mohan Lal, Narain Singh, Zaildar, Sardar Partap Singh and Lala Barkat Ram.

Imperial Advisory Council.

6. The principle of an Imperial Advisory Council has the great weight of native public opinion in its favour. The opponents of the proposal belong to two classes. The first class contains some of the most senior and experienced officers of the Punjab Commission. The second class consists of a few of the most advanced members of the educated section of the community. But while officers like Messrs. Younghusband, Diack, Millar, Sykes, Atkins, Estcourt Colonel Davies, Majors Burlton, Popham Young, Thompson, Fox-Strangways and Sir W. O. Clark foresee in the proposed Council a future of either embarrassment and trouble or of uselessness, critics like Mr. Bhagat Ram, the Ambala District Association, Mr. Gulab Singh, Mr. Nihal Chand and a few others condemn the proposals because they do not go far enough to meet their aspirations. Before referring to the views of those who consider that their should be no such Advisory Council at all, it will be well to notice the vast mass of opinion which, as above observed, accepts the principle of the Government of India proposal.

7. Perhaps it is not quite correct to say that the principle of the Government of India proposal meets with general acceptance. It is certainly not correct to do so if we regard the case as one in which the principle is bound up with and involves the details. The inclusion of Ruling Chiefs, the dominant position assigned to territorial magnates, the exclusion of the aristocracy of wealth, intellect and commerce, the limitation of the Council's functions to giving advice only when asked, the absence of legislative recognition, the secrecy imposed as regards the proceedings of the Council—all these details meet with much hostile criticism. The nature of this criticism cannot be adequately represented otherwise than by liberal quotations from the opinions which have been collected. To avoid encumbering this letter with such quotations they have been collected in three appendices, A, B and C.

* Popular Government, 3rd edition, page 108.

8. As will be gathered from the extracts collected in appendix A, the exclusion from the Advisory Council of representatives of all classes except Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates meets with adverse criticism from most of those consulted. Some critics indulge in attacks on these two aristocratic classes. It cannot be denied that there is a solid substratum of truth in much that is said by way of disparagement of the aristocracy. No doubt it is much too readily assumed by these critics that Government will fail to exercise care in the selection of the individuals who are to constitute the Advisory Council. But the incessantly repeated assertion that Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates are "not in touch" with the people cannot be disregarded. In addition to the critics who dispute the claims of the two classes favoured by the Government of India proposals, there is a considerable body of opinion, including that of the more conservative element in the province, which pleads for a recognition of ability when found in representatives of other classes of society. The magnates of commerce and industry are thought well fitted to take their place in the Imperial Council, and to deny a position therein to the leaders of thought and of public opinion among the educated classes would be regarded as a failure to appreciate the spirit of the times. This view is urged not merely by or on behalf of what may be called the Congress party, but by persons who have no sympathy with that party. As observed by the Government Pleader of Sialkot, "By these leaders from the educated classes I do not mean of course any political criminals who attempt directly or indirectly to minimise the importance of the British Government, or who would in any way reduce our genuine respect for the administration." The claims of native officials are championed by Colonel Parsons, who shows that the arkan-i-daulat of the oriental potentate were his great ministers and prominent officials. To take non-officials into council, he argues, is an innovation without precedent in oriental tradition. Mr. Wilson too emphasises the importance of the native official. Mr. Justice Chatterji pleads the case of the lawyers. Mr. Maynard shows that it is by no means the landed classes only that have a stake in the country. It is quite true, as he points out, that next to life and property there is nothing so dear to the native as his personal dignity or izzat and the preservation of that order of society in which a status of high degree has been acquired and is enjoyed constitutes a strong motive for a stable policy in the case of dignitaries of all classes.

9. The demand for some sort of legal recognition and for a right of initiative on behalf of the Advisory Council is made not only by pleaders and native societies, but by critics like the Raja of Nabha, the Khalifa of Patiala, Mr. Justice Robertson, Mr. Humphreys, Mr. Henriques, Major Burlton, the Tika of Anandpur and Diwan Narindar Nath. Messrs. Wilson and Douie would confer such a right on individual members of the Council, but not on that body in its corporate capacity. At the present stage of this case the question is not one upon which the attention of the persons consulted has been specially focussed, but it is easy to see that with a Council already in existence it would assume a position of very prominent importance. Mr. Maynard's remarks as to the absence of legislative recognition impairing the dignity of the membership of Advisory Councils are worthy of perusal. A selection of the opinions on this point will be found in appendix B. The inconvenience of conferring a power of initiative is noticed by Mr. Meredith, who points out that the work of the Home Department of the Government of India would certainly bel largely and unnecessarily increased.

10. The Government of India proposal that the proceedings of the Council when called together for collective consultation should as a rule be private, informal and confidential meets with considerable opposition. A perusal of the selected opinions on this head (appendix C) discloses the existence of a distinct tendency on the part of native critics not to trust their representatives to work otherwise than in the light of publicity, coupled with a feeling that the opportunity of justifying to his own people the advice and action given and taken by each councillor should not be withheld. There seems to be an apprehension that titles, rewards and honours and the sunshine of Government favour may exercise an influence over councillors whose votes and opinions are veiled from the scrutiny of the persons who regard themselves as their constituents; and it is this influence which the same constituents desire to paralyze by exhibiting the no less-tempting bait of popularity and public favour.

11. As regards the number of members in the Imperial Advisory Council, very few of those consulted notice the point. It seems to be generally assumed that the number will be 60. Where suggestions have been made by native critics they are in the direction of increasing the total number (see Mr. Shah Din's, Lala Ram Saran Das' and Bhai Gurbaksh Singh's opinions) so as to provide for representation of all classes, and of cutting down the number of Ruling Chiefs. Messrs. Wilson and Douie consider 60 too large a number, and would reduce to 35 and 25, respectively. Mr. Malans' remarks as to the difficulty of housing 60 Imperial Councillors in Simla deserve notice.

12. A minor point may be noticed. The Raja of Jind is concerned because of the possibility that Ruling Chiefs may have to sit on seats like common or ordinary councillors, and asks for "distinct seats." Colonel Dallas is also apparently apprehensive that Rajas may suffer in dignity unless a distinction is made in the matter of seats. Major Egerton fears that the question of precedence among Ruling Chiefs may lead to misunderstandings. The language question will also prove a difficulty, but this is not noticed by critics.

13. It is next necessary to consider the opinions of those officers who do not regard it as desirable to create an Imperial Advisory Council. Many will probably agree with Messrs. Younghusband and Diack that such a Council will not be a suitable agency for the dissemination of correct information about the motives and intentions of Government. The six or seven territorial magnates from each province cannot possibly produce the same effect as can be better obtained by publication through the Local Government and its official organization. If to carry out this object the territorial magnates can secure the assistance of the Native Press, well and good. But the Native Press are not likely to lend such assistance unless is suits their political views to do so, and if it suits such views to disseminate correct information, they will be just as ready to take such information from Government as from Imperial Councillors.

14. In other respects the utility of the proposed Council is questioned. It will in Mr. Diack's opinions be an unnecessary addition to the present machinery for ascertaining the opinion of a province. If the opinion obtained through such agency is in accord with that ascertained through the Local Government, it will, as remarked by Mr. Diack, be superfluous. If it is at variance with it, which opinion is to be accepted? Is that of the Local Government to be overridden? This question is raised by Colonel Davies. Sir W. O. Clark remarks on the cumbrousness of two separate Councils so similar in their duties and personality. Mr. Sykes condemns such duplication of Councils as likely to prove an unnecessary embarrassment to Government. It is curious that so little is said by any of the persons consulted as to the functions of the Advisory Council. What will be the subject matter of their deliberations? As observed by Major Powney Thompson, almost all questions of interest to Indians are provincial rather than imperial. Mr. Diack is no doubt correct in presuming that only measures and proposals which would be applicable to India as a whole would be referred to the Council. But when an attempt is made to imagine the concrete questions which might be so referred the extreme paucity of subjects suitable for reference will become strikingly apparent. The great majority of questions would be unsuitable for reference, because they are concerned with the machinery of administration and its improvement, and because no useful opinion or advice in regard to questions of that nature can be expected from those who are ignorant of the existing machinery and its working, or who are at least ignorant of those minutiæ and technicalities without a knowledge of which a useful opinion on the subject referred could not be given. Having regard to this technical character of almost all the general questions which are the subject of reference by the executive departments of the Government of India, there is a great deal of force in the arguments by which

Colonel Parsons supports his proposition that the proper native advisers of the British Government are its own native officials, the men who are responsible for and may have to act on the advice which they give, the men who have a knowledge of the existing system and its requirements and who can best gauge the practical effect of any proposed measure. It will probably be held that the objections on the score of discipline to constituting an Advisory Council recruited from the ranks of Indian officials must prevail, but Colonel Parsons has done good service in drawing attention to the unwisdom of overlooking in favour of non-officials the claim to recognition which this class is entitled to receive. As observed by Mr. Wilson too, "It is also to be remembered that the whole of the details of administration are already carried out by educated Indians, who form the vast body of the servants of Government in this country. These men are carefully trained, and as they prove themselves fit are invested with high powers, which they usually exercise with great ability and trustworthiness; and it might well be argued that in this manner the educated classes of India already enjoy a share in the actual government of the country out of all proportion to their numbers. To those who, in the name of the educated classes, claim a greater say in measures of legislation and administration, it might well be answered that Government is ready to accept men of their class as its servants, to give them the careful training that is necessary to fit them for exercising power over their fellows, and to give due weight to their opinion when they have proved themselves worthy of regard."

15. Notwithstanding lack of utility, absence of necessity from the point of view of efficiency and possible inconveniences and embarrassments, few British officers would fail to appreciate the moral advantage and benefit to the paramount power which would accrue from the existence of a body of trusty and loyal Indians belonging to the highest ranks and to the most stable and conservative elements in the community, associated as a Council in confidential communication with the Government of the country. To the British public and to the outside world generally such an administrative development would be symbolic of a very long step in advance and would go far to attenuate much of the stock criticism which has as its sole capital the word bureaucracy with all its fancied enormities. But neither will educated India accept a symbol as satisfying its aspirations, nor will any body of councillors, however safe and trusty they may be as judged by antecedents, consent for long in the environing conditions of modern India to occupy a merely symbolic position.

16. What the ultimate fate of the Government of India's proposal for a council of aristocrats will be will depend upon the reception which it meets in other provinces of India as well as in the Punjab. In the Punjab this part of the scheme, intended to satisfy the aspirations of the educated classes, is by them regarded in its unmodified form "rather as an appearance of a concession than a real concession"*; as more or less a sham;† as a "huge mockery and a sham palliative"‡; that it is "damned with faint praise"§; that the council is regarded as consisting "of mere figure heads"‖, "who will only raise a storm of ridicule and hostile criticism."¶ Such disparagement is with the majority of the critics the prelude to suggestions for a modified Advisory Council scheme, and there is a prevailing assumption that criticism and suggestion will suffice to induce or impel the Government of India to convert a project for the establishment of a Privy Council or House of Lords into a scheme out of which the ultimate growth of a popular democratic assembly can readily be discerned.

17. On page after page of the opinions under review the word "representative" attracts notice by frequent repetition. The territorial magnates are condemned because they have ceased to represent any class but their own. Secrecy in the proceedings of the Advisory Council is regarded as incompatible with the right which constituents claim to keep an eye in their representatives. Those who advocate a reduction in the number of Ruling Chiefs or an increase in the total membership of the Council do so in order to provide for the representation of as many sections of the people as possible on that body. The inclusion of members of the educated classes is pressed for because it is asserted that they are best fitted, not to advise Government, but to represent the people. This conception of a representative assembly differs toto cælo from the aristocratic Privy Council scheme of the Government of India. An even more fundamentally important distinction depends upon the question of the grant or withholding of the initiative and of legislative recognition. If there is to be created in India a deliberative body with powers of initiative, with publicity of proceedings and with members looking to the native press for an appreciation of their sayings and doings, it may not be found easy to devise methods for controlling its extravagances; and to revert to the status quo ante will be impossible. The step once taken can never be retraced.*

18. Colonel Parsons' anticipations as to the attitude of the non-official councillor cannot fail to be shared by those who study the phenomena, indications and tendencies of present day politics. "I do not believe," he says, "that the non-official councillor, albeit nominated, will be found tongue-tied or at all partial to the jo hukam attitude. He, on the other hand, admittedly not being 'responsible' will be likely to be less submissive than oppositionary. The tendency will be that way; experience shows it. The few elected councillors are likely to leaven the mass of nominated ones until the Councils become mere opposition benches..... A Council almost entirely in opposition would result. And in this case Government would quite possibly often be incurring the odium of passing measures which it considered called for in conflict with the advice of its councillors; a situation absolutely courted by itself ..... Disingenuous attack of proposed governmental measures, misrepresentation, exaggeration and appeals to the gallery are among the tactics employed by all parliamentary opposition benches in all western countries, and these possibly would be assimilated, elaborated and improved upon by Advisory Councils in opposition in India."

19. There is another aspect of this Imperial Advisory Council project which deserves notice. The scheme is the negation of the idea of decentralization. At a time when devolution is in the air and is rightly engaging the attention of a Royal Commission it will appear to some to be inconsistent to promote a measure which is calculated to undermine, if not distroy, the devolutionist's ideal—the district as the primary unit of administration. The dangers ahead are graphically portrayed by Major Popham Young, whose picture will carry conviction to many.

In paragraph 9 of the Government of India letter it is stated that when the Councils were enlarged in 1892 it was recognised that territorial representation was unsuited to India. There is distinct evidence in the papers now under review of the growth of a territorial spirit. In connection with the proposal for Provincial Councils there are numerous suggestions from all quarters of a representation based on district territorial units, and similar suggestions for the revenue divisions as constituencies for the Provincial Legislative Council. See the opinions of Messrs. deMontmorency and Henriques, Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram, Muhammad Amin Khan, Kamir (Zaildar), Kishen Lal (Pleader) Sevak Ram (Barrister), Mul Chand (Pleader), Anjuman-i-Islam, Batàla, Tika Ram Narain Singh of Anandpur, Gyan Chand, Bishen Das, Extra Assistant Commissioner, Khalifa Muhammad Hussain of Patiàla, Radha Kishen of Montgomery. The Arya Samaj and Singh Sabha, Multàn, would, like Major Popham Young, build up from below and establish District Councils as preliminary to Divisional and Provincial Councils. See also the opinion of Mohendro

It may be fraught with calamity or ruin, public or private, and correction is virtually impossible. It is practically taken for granted among us that all constitutional changes are final and must be submitted to, whatever their consequences. Doubtless this assumption arises from a general belief that in these matters we are propelled by an irresistable force on a definite path towards an unavoidable end—towards democracy and death. Essay on Progress by Sir Henry Maine, K.C.S.I.

Nath Banerjee of Multàn. It is curious that members of the lawyer class should advocate a basis of representation under which they would probably have little chance of selection. Nevertheless there are undoubtedly in existence the germs of a "district spirit," and the spirit is one which it would be impolitic to discourage. The employment of the energies of the people in District Councils, where the realities and actualities of local administration, not the theories and aspirations of political parties, engage the attention of the constituent members, will be the policy best calculated to promote practical utility.

20. The Lieutenant-Governor's general conclusion is that the creation of an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines indicated in the letter of the Government of India is not expedient. Sir Louis Dane is adverse to the idea of having 20 Ruling Chiefs sitting along with territorial magnates. He believes that most of the important Chiefs in India are opposed to any such arrangement, and he does not think that it is likely to be found a feasible one. It is, however, possible that a smaller Council of Princes to discuss matters of imperial and general importance might be of considerable advantage. To this Council there might be admitted a few men of wide reputation throughout India as statesmen, such as the late Sir Madhava Rao, Sir Sheshadri Iyer, and Sir Sayad Ahmad. Such men could be appointed as Life Councillors, while the Chiefs would serve for shorter terms of years. They would serve to keep the discussions within practical limits. If their numbers were limited and only men of the highest reputations were appointed, it is probable that no objections to their admission would be raised by the Chiefs. The case is very different as regards territorial magnates. It is very difficult often to define the line that separates a Ruling Chief from the magnate class, and the Chiefs might easily view with considerable distrust what they might consider to be an attempt to level them down to the magnates. In any case the disadvantages of having a joint Council of Ruling Princes and magnates are so serious, both in regard to the status of the Chiefs themselves and also on the score of the difficulty of securing a common language at present without excluding some of the best Chiefs, and the undesirability of allowing the Chiefs to have too direct a voice in affairs concerning British India only, that, though some of the Punjab Chiefs might be willing to serve on such a joint Council, it does not appear to Sir Louis Dane to be desirable to incur the risks involved in any such novel departure, though he would be glad to see a Council of Ruling Princes as above suggested more closely associated with the British Government in the task of governing India as a whole.

To a Council of persons other than Ruling Chiefs there are not the same objections, but it is a matter in which the Punjab in its present stage of development could not render much assistance. As the Government of India are well aware, the Punjab has great difficulty in securing suitable non-official members even for the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils, and would be very hard put indeed to provide any considerable number of members for the Imperial Advisory Council. His Honour's views in this connection are further developed in paragraph 39 following in relation to the recruitment of the Imperial Legislative Council.

Provincial Advisory Council.

21. Comparatively little has been written on the subject of Provincial Advisory Councils. Most of the critics who have unburdened themselves regarding the Imperial Advisory Council are content to note that their criticisms apply equally to a provincial institution of the kind; and it is therefore to be assumed that those who accept the former only on condition that the aristocratic element shall be reduced, that the right of initiative shall be conferred, and that obligations of secrecy shall not be imposed, agree to the establishment of a Provincial Council only if the same conditions are observed. Legal recognition and statutory meetings are also by many regarded as essential. Among European officers the Provincial Advisory Council meets with much less opposition. Only Messrs. Younghusband, Millar, Henriques, Malan, Boughey and Sir W. O. Clark and Colonel Parsons of those who condemn the Imperial Council extend their condemnation to a Provincial assembly of the kind. Mr. Diack, it is true, regards the latter as equally wanting in utility, but he "has no objection" to it. Major Popham Young has his own scheme of building up a Provincial Council out of District Councils and therefore he cannot be cited as supporting the Government of India scheme. Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram has also a building-up scheme of his own. The other native critics who are wholly hostile consist of some ten pleaders, the Ambala District Association, the Anjuman-i-Islamia at the same place and the Gurgaon Bar Association.

22. In regard to the constitution of the Provincial Advisory Council, the vast majority of those consulted say nothing on the score of number of members and it may be taken that 20, the number suggested in the Punjab Government letter, is accepted as appropriate. Several critics (see names mentioned in paragraph 21 ante) suggest one member per district. Majors Egerton and Fox-Strangways, Captains Elliot and Buck among Europeans, and the Indians noted in the margin, besides those who would have one member per district, are in favour of a larger Council. On the other hand, Mr. Douie points to the difficulty of securing even 20 qualified persons, and suggests that the Council should consist of 10 or 12 persons only. Mr. Justice Chatterji is also in favour of a small Council. Rai Bahadur Lal Chand of the Chief Court has recorded some remarks which go to support Mr. Douie's view that fitness to act in an advisory capacity is the principal consideration governing not only the selection of members, but the number to be selected.

Anjuman-i-Islamia, Punjab.

Tilok Chand, Extra Assistant Commissioner.

23. The adoption of elective methods for the recruitment of the Advisory Council has very few supporters. Those which have been noted are Mr. Bosworth-Smith, Rai Bahadur Hari Chand, Ganda Sing Uberoi, Bhai Gurdit Singh, Singh Sabha, Multàn, Punjab Trades Association and Anjuman-i-Islamia, Batàla. The principle of nomination is generally approved. Many Muhammadan and some Sikh critics stipulate for class representation. Diwan Teck Chand, Khan Abdul Ghafur Khan of Zaida, and Rai Tilock Chand, Extra Assistant Commissioner, each presents a cut-and-dried detailed scheme. Two critics for the Gurdàspur district would include officials. Lala Shadi Ram would have a University representative. The Raja of Kapurthala would have no Ruling Chief on the Council. Diwan Narindar Nath thinks it anomalous that the Lieutenant-Governor should preside in the Legislative, but not in the Advisory Council. Mr. Maynard considers the grant of allowances to meet expenses to be necessary.

24. Mr. Diack and the other officers who see little utility in the proposed Provincial Advisory Council and the extremists who fear that it will be an ornamental body only have no doubt much reason on their side. But the ornamental largely appeals to the oriental mind and the general welcome which these Council proposals have evoked testifies to the fact. It is true, as remarked by Mr. Diack, that the Lieutenant-Governor can and does consult a great many more persons than would find places in the Advisory Council. The Council scheme would therefore come to be regarded as nothing but a plan for conferring an additional honour on some 20 native gentlemen.

25. In regard then to the proposal for a Provincial Advisory Council, Sir Louis Dane finds a difficulty in realising what such a body is to do which an expanded Legislative Council, based mainly on a system of nomination, could not do. The weight of collected opinion would restrict the Advisory Council to 15 or 20, and the Legislative Council would be a body of approximately the same or a slightly greater strength. If we have even 7 or 8 non-officials on the latter, it will be difficult to find suitable men for the former. The Lieutenant-Governor's personal opinion therefore is that the case of this province would for the present be sufficiently met if the Legislative Council were expanded to 16 or (as His Honour would propose, in order to meet the wishes of the more advanced Indian gentlemen consulted) even to 22 members, including the Lieutenant-Governor. The Council or the non-official members of it could be utilised as an Advisory Council as well as for a legislative body. If the Advisory Councils worked well elsewhere, a similar body could be formed in the Punjab hereafter.

26. If for the sake of uniformity—though nothing is worse than rigid uniformity in India—we must have an Advisory Council as well in the Punjab, the Lieutenant-Governor would confine that Council to the smallest number compatible with adequate representation of the main creeds, classes and interests of the province and world urge that all the members should be selected by the Lieutenant-Governor in the exercise of his prerogative of selecting his own councillors. Five or at the most seven councillors would be sufficient, and even to secure these it might be necessary to indent in the services of members of the Legislative Council, which again might give rise to a sort of caucus in that Council—a result which would not be altogether desirable. There is of course an advantage in being able to say that in regard to a particular legislative or executive matter the Lieutenant-Governor has consulted has Advirsory Council and is supported by their opinion, but Sir Louis Dane doubts if very much weight would be given by the newspapers or educated classes generally to the collective opinion of such an Advisory Council as alone is possible in the Punjab, Indeed the main advantage of having such a body would be that non-English speaking councillors could be appointed to it and so would have some voice in public affairs. This is no doubt something, and though the Lieutenant-Governor personally feels that it would be just as well not to appoint such a body, he is perfectly willing to do so if the Government of India consider it in any way desirable provided that the members are nominated and appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor on his own initiative ; that there is no attempt to distribute them formally to given areas in the province and that the proceedings of the council are informal and cofidential. Members could be consulted individually or collectively and only the net result of their deliberations and not the opinion of individual members would in any case be published and this only would be done when it was considered to be desirable by the Lieutenant-Governor.

Imperial Legislative Council.

27. This portion of the Government of India scheme raises four questions, viz—

(1) Enlargement of the Council.
(2) Election by Provincial Legislative Councils.
(3) Election by land-owners.
(4) Representation of Muhammadans and minorities.

Without doubt the question of making special provision for the representation of Muhammadans has stirred up by far the largest share of interest among the native community.

28. The enlargement of the Council so as to provide additional representation for the non-official classes meets with almost universal approbation. Of the native critics, Mailk Umar Hyat Khan and Rai Tilock Chand, Extra Assistant Commissioner, alone are opposed to enlargement. Of the European officers the great majority recognise that enlargement is inveitable. Sir W. O. Clark, Mr. Robertson, Colonel Dallas and Major Fox-Strangways hold out against the proposal. Mr. Meredith would fix the number of members at 35 or 36. Mr Malan too considers that a Council of 54 would be too large. It may be taken, however, that the general sense of the officials of the province, as well as of the non-officials, is in favour of the Government of India proposal, not perhaps as desirable in itself but as inevitable.

29. The inconvenience and expense which will result from taking so many high officials away from their duties to attend the sessions of the Council is of course noticed. In the case of the Punjab there would perhaps be two officials.

annually summoned to Calcutta with the Financal Commissioner holding a third place, but only summoned for the Simla session Mr. Wilson's proposal * for meeting this inconvenience does not get rid of the difficulty. When in session the Council meets once a week or once a fortnight, and it would never do to have the additional members spending the cold weather travelling back and forward between their provinces and Calcutta. Mr. Maynard mentions two expedients for minimising the inconvenience in question. The first is that of giving to official members two or more votes, either generally or in relation to questions which the President has declared to involve the supremacy of tho executive authority. The second is the obvious one of voting by proxy. The first plan Mr. Maynard fears might form an awkward precedent and lead to the undesirable introduction of inequalities of voting in other spheres. A decorous system of voting by proxy, he thinks, might easily be devised.

* "I think they [the additional members] should as a rule be required to perform their duties as such in addition to their ordinary duties and only be summoned to actual meetings of Council, unless in the case of those members for whom really useful work can be found to justify their detention for a time at head-quarters."

30. The great majority of critics have accepted or taken for granted the number 54 proposed by the Government of India. The principle of an official majority is controverted only by Amar Singh, pleader of Jullundur, and by the Ambála District Association which would have less than one-third officials. A total in excess of 54 is proposed by the Anjuman-i-Islamia, Hoshiárpur (58), Sardar Sundar Singh (60), and three Lyallpur colonists (60). Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram has a special scheme of his own for a Council of 45. As regards the distribution of the 53 seats there are numerous proposals for readjusting the Government of India scheme. The proposals fall into two categories. Many of the Muhammadan critics put forward devices for increasing the number of seats reserved for their community. On the other hand, the many Hindus who would do away with special Muhammadan representation are ready with proposals for allotting to other interests the seats thus becoming available. The Ruling Chief meets with opposition from the Muhammadans of Lahore [Punjab Muslim League, Anjuman-i-Islamia, Punjab, Editor of Observer, M. Shah Din, M. Muhammad Shafi] on the ground that it is anomalous that an outsider should legislate for British India. Sir D. Masson and Rai Bahadur Lal Chand take the same view, and Mr. Douie considers that the appointment of a Ruling Chief should not be obligatory. On the other hand, five persons consulted would increase the number of Ruling Chiefs to two, vide opinions of Major Lowis, Rahim Bakhsh, President, Bahawalpur Council, Singh Sabha, Multán, Sultan Ahmad, Extra Assistant Commissioner, and M. Muhammad Ali.

31. The circumstance that commerce is to be represented only by the delegates of the Calcutta and Bombay Chambers of Commerce meets with adverse comment, and increased representation for commerce is asked for by Messrs. Wilson and Humphreys, Lala Harkishen Lal, the Delhi and Lahore Chambers of Commerce, Hindu Sabha, Lahore, Trades Association, Lahore, Sham Das, Multan Chand, Mehdi Shah, Mohan Lal and Chiragh Khan. Special representation for the Universities is asked for by the Arya Samaj, Multan, and three lawyers (Rai Bahadur Lal Chand, Shadi Ram and Sham Das.)

32. The proposal in paragraph 13 of the Government of India letter that the unofficial members of the Provincial Legislative Council shall elect a member for the Imperial Legislative Council meets with practically universal acceptance from native critics. Some European officials express a doubt whether the electoral body is large enough. Accordingly Mr. Wilson suggests that past and present members of the Provincial Legislative Council shall be entitled to vote, and Messrs. Douie and Sykes would include the Advisory Council in the constituency. Major Popham Young and Mr. Atkins would give to the Advisory Council the right of selection. Messrs. Diack and Younghusband would appoint by nomination. Mr. Miles Irving has recorded some remarks which are very true as to the discord which the voting for this member will create. Malik Umar Hayat Khan takes the same view, and fears that life-long enmities will arise in consequence. Sardar Partab Singh, Rai Sahib Mohan Lal, Pir Bakhsh, Pleader, and Malik Chiragh Khan are also advocates of nomination, but otherwise native opinion is in favour of extending to the Punjab the plan already in operation in other provinces. Perhaps it is nothing but the existence of the precedent which has created the unanimity in favour of election by the non-official members of the Legislative Council. The objection noticed by Mr. Irving and Malik Umar Hayat Khan could no doubt be minimised by a system of counterpoise. If for instance the selection of a representative of the landed classes were, in accordance with the weight of opinion, to be by nomination, it could be arranged that if the Legislative Council elected a Muhammadan the landowner would be a Hindu or Sikh and vice versâ.

33. In regard to the method of recruitment of a member to represent the landed classes, opinion is divided as between nomination and election. In many cases no opinion is recorded or is recorded so vaguely as to be unintelligible, but so far as can be ascertained the voting is as follows:—

Class of critic.	Number for Nomination.	Election.
European Officers	26	9
Native officials	13	5
Hindu non-officials (lawyers excluded)	8	20
Muhammadan non-officials (lawyers excluded)	12	7
Lawyers	12	7
Anjumans, Sabhas and Societies	4	14
European non-officials	1	1
Total	76	63

The majority in favour of nomination would probably have been much larger had not the Government of India proposals been presented as primarily one for election. The European officers who vote for election are Messrs. Agnew, Bosworth-Smith, Sykes, Wakefield, Maynard, Boyd and deMontmorency, Major Thompson and Captain Elliott. A reference to their opinions suggests the inference that they too readily assumed that the question was not one as between nomination and election, but as between different methods of election. The same remark is probably true in regard to the opinions of many of the native critics who have advocated election. The reasons against election is that, as observed by Mr. Douie, "no satisfactory electorate could be formed. If payment of a large amount of land revenue is the qualification, I fear the list of electors will include persons who in no sense belong to the aristocracy or represent the old land-owning classes." Thise is quite true.

34. An analysis of the proposals of those who vote for election indicates preference for the various methods as follows:—

	Number of votes.
(1) A constituency on the basis of amount of revenue	30
(2) Land-holding members of the Provincial Council (as suggested by Government of India)	19
(3) Various forms of electoral colleges	7
(4) Other methods	7

Those who are in favour of the first of the foregoing methods differ as to the amount of revenue which should qualify for the franchise, the sums suggested varying from Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 5,000. The majority are in favour of the larger figure. It is needless to discuss the suggestions for electoral colleges and other methods of election as the weight of opinion in the province is in favour of nomination by the Lieutenant-Governor of the member allotted under head D (c) of paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter. This power of nomination will, as above noted, facilitate the redressing of inequalities as between Hindus, Sikhs and Muhammadans.

35. The Government of India proposal that two members should be elected by special Muhammadan electorates has excited much controversy. It is resented by the great majority of the Hindu critics, but with one exception all the Muhammadans are in favour of such a special measure to secure their minority rights. The exception is Chaudhri Sardar Khan, Extra Assistant Commissioner. The following Hindus allow the proposal to pass without objection:—Rana Lehna Singh, Jiwan Singh, Sardar Sundar Singh, Lachmi Sahai, Sardar Arur Singh, Narain Singh, Shiv Deo Singh, Sardar Harnam Singh, Miyan Anrodh Singh, Lala Sheo Parshad, Pandit Banke Rai, Sardar Partap Singh, Diwan Tek Chand, Diwan Narindar Nath, Lala Bishen Das, Extra Assistant Commissioner, Arjan Das, Extra Assistant Commissioner, Ramji Das, Tahsildar, and Badri Pershad, Tahsildar. Many of the above, however, stipulate that some corresponding provision be made for Sikhs and also that it is not necessary to specifically reserve nominated seats for Muhammadans under head E of paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter. The bitterest opponents of any concession to Muhammadans are the Hindu lawyer class, headed by Mr. Justice Chatterji.

The majority of the European officials are opposed to the election of two members by Muhammadans. They are not opposed to the protection of the minority rights of Muhammadans. The objection is to the conferment of a right of election on Muhammadans which would not be enjoyed by members of other communities. The only European officers who support the Government of India proposal under head D (d) are Messrs. Maynard,* Waring, Clarke, deMotmorency, Bosworth-Smith, Malan, Henriques, Wakefield, Gibson, Irving and Boughey and Majors Egerton and Barton. It will be noticed that the names of most of the senior and more experienced officers are absent from the above list. By the latter the proposal is condemned—

(1) on account of objections to the elective system generally;

(2) on account of the difficulty of forming an electorate;

(3) because by nomination the rights of Muhammadans can be safeguarded;

(4) on account of the invidiousness of professedly class legislation in general;

(4) in particular because Hindus and Sikhs would justly resent electoral privileges being conferred on Muhammadan fellows and graduates, Muhammadan income-tax and revenue payers and Muhammadan members of the Provincial Council which would not be enjoyed by Hindus and Sikhs of the corresponding classes.

36. There is little in the Muhammadan opinions under review that would support the view that nomination, provided that their requirements in the matter of the number of seats to be reserved for their community be met, would be accepted by them in lieu of election. There are only five or six voices raised in favour of nomination, but these include M. Rahim Bakhsh, President of the Bahâwalpur Council, the Patiâla Khalifa, Makhdum Hasan Bakhsh and Malik Umar Hayat Khan. The proposal for election was included in the Government of India scheme at the instance of the Muhammadam deputation which waited on His Excellency in October 1906. It has the advocacy of the Muslim League and the various Anjumans as well as of the Observer newspaper, and Muhammadan opinion is therefore more or less committed to its support. Doubtless the circumstance that elective privileges of the kind exclusively enjoyed would be a distinctive privilege of their religion explains the welcome which the proposal has met among the Muhammadans, but it is incumbent on an impartial Government not to lend its countenance to any such accentuation of a specially privileged position. The Muhammadan community will have no just cause for complaint if provision is made to secure for them such number of seats as their special position entitles them to occupy. This can be done without making an unnecessary parade of the privilege. The work of compilation of electoral lists and the publicity attending Muhammadan elections would unnecessarily emphasise their privileged position. Moreover, the chances which an election system would create for the lawyers, wire-pullers, Anjuman leaders and organizers and other pushing and ambitious spirits among the Muhammadan community, would excite the keen envy of the similar classes of Hindus, who would have no corresponding scope for their own advancement. Paragraphs 29 to 31 of Mr. Maynard's opinion may be referred to in this connection. Another forcible objection to the D (d) proposal is connected with the claims of the Sikhs. It is necessary to dilate on these. They are urgently pressed by many of the Sikh gentlemen whose opinions are among the enclosures and are of course generally admitted by European officers. There is no good reason in the case of the Punjab at least for refusing to the Sikhs a recognition accorded to the Muhammadans. Such recognition, while differing in extent, should be ejusdem generis. If elective privileges are conferred on Muhammadans, why not on Sikhs also? To do so would, however, further intensify the dissatisfaction of the Hindus at being excluded from elective privileges. Only by nomination can the rights of both Muhammadan and Sikh minorities be secured without giving rise to the charge of class preference.

37. Coming now to the question of numbers, the total number of Indians in the Viceroy's Council will include—

C Ruling Chief	1
D (b)	7
D (c)	7
	21

Assuming that class D (d) will be nominated, the Viceroy will be able to utilize the appointment of Ruling Chief and the six appointments under D (d) and E to redress the balance of religions, should elections under D (b) and D (c) indicate the need for counterpoise. In the Punjab the member appointed under D (c) will also probably be nominated. Of the two Punjab members under D (b) and D (c) it will always be possible to secure that one is a Muhammadan, and it will always probably be right that it should be so. The other will be either a Hindu or a Sikh. If he is a Sikh, no special minority seat for Sikhs would be necessary, nor would such provision be necessary if the Ruling Chief were a Sikh. As regards Sikhs, then their claim on one seat under E should be subject to the proviso, that the community is unpresented under C or D. Having regard to this contingency of having to provide a Sikh seat under E, it would not be feasible to definitely appropriate more than four seats under E to Muhammadans. This would give Muhammadans a certain five seats, the fifth being the Punjab seat under D (b) or D (c). They would furthermore have the chance of another seat under E, of a seat under C (Ruling Chief), and of an Eastern Bengal seat under D (b) or D (c).

A maximum of 8 and a minimum of 5 seats would very fairly represent their just claims. Muhammadan advocacy presses for a minimum of 6, but due regard for the claims of Sikhs and the necessity for keeping one minority seat under E for other minorities, such as the Parsis, Jains, Planters and the like, points to the impossibility of definitely allocating more than 4 seats under E to Muhammadans. Most Hindus and many European officers would avoid any definite allocation, that is to say, would ask the Muhammadan community to trust in the Government generally that their minority rights will be adequately safeguarded. It is perhaps too late to put off the Muslim community with such an assurance. If elective privileges are withheld, there will be all the more need for conciliation, and nothing less than a definite promise of four seats under E will satisfy the expectations which have been created.

38. The letter with which the Government of India proposals were circulated asked for opinions as to a Muhammdan electorate on the assumption that one is to be formed. Many of those consulted offer no suggestions under this head, chiefly because they are averse to any special Muhammadan electorate. In paragraph 18 of the Government of India letter it is mentioned that the special Muhammadan deputation to the Viceroy suggested the following electorate:—

(a) The Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Councils as ultimately expended.

(b) The Muhammdan Fellows of the local University.

(c) Muhammadans paying income-tax on Rs. 25,000 per annum or land revenue (amount to be determined separately for each province).

Most of the opinions now under review follow the above suggestion. The opinions of Hindus and Hindu societies may be left out of account as they are not concerned. An analysis of the opinions of European officials and Muhammadans (including Anjumans, etc.) gives the following results:—

	Government of India plan (a).	Government of India plan (a), (b) and (c)	Variants of column 3.	Special.
Europeans	15	7	...	3
Muhammadans	9	7	13	4
Total .	24	14	13	7

It is assumed that "Provincial" under (a) means the Legislative Council. Only 2 of the 24 who recommend this plan would include the members of the Advisory Council among the electors. The objection to plan (a) is that the body is too small, and also that in electing under D (b) they will already have exercised the franchise. The variants of the Government of India plan (a), (b) and (c) combined are nearly all in the direction of reducing the income-tax qualification. For land revenue Rs. 5,000 is generally suggested: a few would add Muhammadan graduates to the electorate. The European officials who suggest special electorates are Messrs. Robertson, Douie, Meredith and Humphreys.

39. The examination in the foregoing paragraphs of the proposals for enlarging the Supreme Legislative Council assumes that the number of members will be fixed round or about the figure proposed by the Government of India. But the Lieutenant-Governor desires to repeat what has been said in paragraph 20 above in connection with the Imperial Advisory Council as to the difficulty of providing any large Punjab contribution to the membership of either body. If however, the province is to supply members, this at present can only be done by nomination. Sir Charles Rivaz in an informal expression of his opinion recognised this difficulty. He would have allowed one or two members to be elected, but he did not indicate what electoral body would so elect the members. He said that for the Provincial Legislative Council he would allow the University to elect a member, but he did not apparently think that the University should be given a member on the Imperial Council. Indeed, unless the Imperial Council is very large, it would be impossible to allow one member to the Punjab University alone, though this University might perhaps join with other Indian Universities in electing one or more members. The number of non-official members on the Provincial Legislative Council will probably remain small, and they will be largely nominated so that it would be difficult, though not of course impossible, concede to them the righ of electing a member for the Imperial Council, whether Advisory or Legislative. The real fact is that the province is hardly sufficiently advanced to be able to provide suitable men other than officials for Councils of which the proceedings must practically be conducted in English and on Western lines. Fortunately the Punjab is a province in which due respect is still paid to age and experience. It would be little short of disastrous if we were to unsettle men's minds on this matter by having to select only young men with an imperfect education on Western lines or lawyers only as the representatives of the province. This has been to some extent the case of late years in the Punjab nominations both for the Imperial Legislative Council and for the Punjab Provincial Council. It is therefore desirable in the interests of this province that the number, whether of the Imperial Legislative Council or of an Advisory Council, if one is to be created, should not be too large, so that the few Punjab members who may be able to represent the province in these assemblies may not be so hopelessly outnumbered as to be unable to do adequate justice to the province which they represent. His Honour much regrets that such should be the case, and he can only hope that with an expanded Provincial Legislative Council and the rapid spread of literary and political education, this deficiency will soon be removed. It is pretty certain at any rate that no general elective system, suited to the present conditions of the Punjab, can be suggested, and if large Imperial Advisory and Legislative Councils are formed and the Punjab is to be represented on them, this can only be adequately done by nomination of members in such a way as to give a proper proportion ate voice to the various classes and interests of the province.

Provincial Legislative Council.

40. The first question for decision is whether an increase in number is necessary, and if so, what figure shall be adopted. There is an almost unanimous vote in favour of some increase. The following only would leave matters as they are :—

Colonel Dallas.
Mr. Waring.
Major Fox-Strangways.
Mr. Younghusband.

Tilok Chand, Extra Assistant Commissioner.
Saradar Partap Singh.

The present number of members being 9 (excluding the Lieutenant-Governor), the proposals for increase mainly favour the numbers 12, 15 or 20, with or without the Lieutenant-Governor in each case. Many of the Indian critics propose numbers in excess of 20, but any increase much beyond that total raises two difficulties, viz., the difficulty of finding suitable non-officials and the inconvenience of arranging for a large official majority. As observed by Mr. Douie "the choice of even four suitable non-official members in the past has not always been free from difficulty." It will be necessary moreover to vary the personnel of the Council from time to time, as the constant re-appointment of the same person would be open to criticism. Accordingly the Council should not be so large as to absorb all the available talent. It is furthermore to be borne in mind that the officials who will represent the province on the Imperial Legislative Council will be absent from the Punjab during a portion of the cold weather, and it may not be found feasible to utilise the same officers for both Councils. This is a consideration pointing to the desirablity of a small Council. On the other hand, if the non-official members have the right of electing a member to the Imperial Legislative Council, the larger the electorate for this purpose the better. It would serve no purpose to tabulate the suggestions of the native critics. Very many of them do not clearly indicate what number they recommend, and few of them pause to consider the practical inconveniences of a large unwieldy Council. Generally, it may be stated that the favourite numbers are 20 and 25. There are, however, not a few votes in favour of 15.

41. The next question is whether the non-official members shall be elected or nominated. The Government of India have in paragraph 20 of your letter under reply given an intimation that nomination may prove to be best adapted to the provinces which are not already familiar with election. The Financial Commissioner* and all the Commissioners except Mr. Maynard are in favour of nomination. The Deputy Commissioners who would allow some of the seats to go by election are Messrs. Clarke, Boyd, deMontmorency, Atkins, Agnew, Sykes (one only), Majors Young, Burlton, Thompson and Barton and Captain O'Brien. Sir W. O. Clark would allow of the election of two members. As to native opinion, there is among Hindu critics a great preponderance in the favour of some of the members being elected. The Muhammadans, counting heads, are exactly divided, but the more influential members of the community favour nomination. The following vote for that method :—Punjab Muslim League, Delhi and Batala Anjumans, Malik Umar Hayat Khan, the President, Bahawalpur Council, the Editor of the Observer, three Extra Assistant Commissioners, Makhdum Hassan Shah Bakhsh of Multan and the two chief Muhammadan lawyers of Lahore—M. Shah Din and M. Muhammad Shafi. Among the few Hindus who favour the nomination of all the non-officials are Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram, Tika Ram Narayan Singh of Anandpur, Rai Sahib K. B. Thapar, Lala Ram Saran Das, Rai Sahib Mohan Lal, Sardar Partap Singh, the three principal Hindus of Delhi and two Sikh lawyers. If election were conceded in the case of representatives of the University and the educated and professional classes, then there would be a decided preponderance of opinions in favour of nomination of the remaining non-official members. Generally it may be stated that the verdict of the province as represented by the great weight of official opinion and of the most influential portion of the Muhammadan community is in favour of nomination. There is, however, a strong body of opinion in favour of the view that if a representative of the University is to have a seat, he may appropriately be chosen by election. A similar case, though not so strong a one, is made out in favour of the election of a representative of the educated and professional classes if a seat is assigned to that community. As this question of election versus nomination is one of considerable importance, and as His Honour is an advocate of the principle of nomination and would admit election only in the exceptional cases referred to in paragraph 44 following, it has been thought desirable to put together in an appendix (appendix D) the evidence which the present papers contain—largely that of native critics—as to the unsuitability of the elective system generally in the present stage of development of this province. It will be observed that the condemnation of elections is based on concrete experience. On the other hand the advocates of election rarely support their case by either appeals to experience or by arguments. No attempt is made to traverse the allegations of those who assert that the method of election is unsuitable, distasteful to respectable candidates and productive of many abuses. There is nothing but a vague suggestion that the people are ripe for the enjoyment of elective privileges, that representatives so chosen carry the confidence of the people, and that nominated members are apt to be servile and deficient in intellectual ability.

42. As regards the desirability of prescribing the number of seats for Muhammadans, Hindus and Sikhs, respectively, the answer of majority* of Europeans and of a great majority of natives is that it is desirable that there should be, if not a rule, at least a very definite understanding as to the number of seats to be allotted to each religion, or, in the opinion of some critics, to each interest. The majority includes Messrs. Wilson, Robertson, Diack, Maynard Atkins, Agnew, Waring, Sykes and Humphreys. Among the natives the minority opposed to such a rule are a few of the more advanced societies and educated Hindus, chiefly pleaders. The Muhammadans and many of the more oldfashioned Hindus are in favour of a recognition of the claims of respective religions. Many of those who answer the question in the negative proceed to suggest the definite allocation of seats to particular interests, e.g., landowners, educated classes, commerce, municipalities, &c. Of course the introduction of election ipso facto involves the allotment of the elective seats to the class or interest for which they are intended, but nearly all of those consulted have rightly understood the question as applicable also in the event of nomination being adopted. The question of representation of classes or interests other than religions is noticed below. It is sufficient in the present connection to note that there is an undoubted demand for a rule, assurance or understanding in the matter of the number of seats for each religion. Among those European officers who deprecate such a rule the apprehension is that it may cause strife or may unduly tie the hands of the Local Government. The opposition from native sources proceeds partly from the Hindus, who recognise that their community would be likely to secure a number of seats in excess of their claims based on population if apportionment by religions were not the rule, and partly from those whose political foresight deprecates any measure which might accentuate differences and retard the hoped for union of all classes in opposition to the British domination.

43. The scheme of utilizing Municipal Committees and District Boards as electorates which is contemplated in the Government of India letter finds but little support in this province, even in the event of the local franchises being altered in the manner proposed. In only 39 opinions it is suggested that Municipal Committees or District Boards should be utilized for constituting electorates or should receive recognition in the allotment of seats by nomination. Of these 39, one-third are lawyers. The Europeans included in the total are Sir W. O. Clark, Sir D. Masson, Messrs. Diack, Irving, deMontmorency and Clarke, Majors Young and Egerton, and Captain Buck. The general view is that these bodies are unsuitable as electorates; and that they are too heterogeneous in composition to represnt and definite interest. Some of the minority who recommend their utilization only do so on the understanding that the franchise will be reformed. Sir Louis Dane is however prepared to go with the minority, and in order to give the trading and industrial classes a larger voice in the affairs of the province, he thinks that the committees of the larger urban areas might be invited to nominate candidates, and of the candidates so nominated, one might be appointed.

* 21 against 16.

44. Apart from Municipal Committees and District Boards, the principal interests which have been mentioned as entitled to representation are:—

Agriculture and the landed interests.
Trade and Commerce.
The professional classes.
The legal profession.
The University.
Territorial interests.
The Native States.
Non-official Europeans and Eurasians.
Retired officials.
Anjumans and Sabhas.

Many of the critics have taken great pains to elaborate fancy constitutions. Among the classes whose claims to representation are brought forward are 'capitalists,' 'artizans,' 'the Press,' &c.

It will be useless to analyse these schemes. If there is to be any appropriation of seats to particular interests, an appropriation on the basis of religion will, as above noted, be more in accord with popular sentiment than an appropriation by occupational classes, and will have the advantage of including practically all Indians. An appropriation on the basis of occupation would be very difficult to work. In the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion therefore the table of membership need not particularise the interests to be represented more specifically than by reserving a certain number of places for the chief religions, for the nominees of the urban classes, for the University and for the Native States. As regards the University, it is because its graduates would constitute a highly intelligent and easily registerable electorate rather than on account of any need for representation of academical interests that its claims are urged. The creation of such a constituency will go some way to meet the demands of the educated classes for a more popular constitution for the Legislative Council, and Sir Louis Dane is therefore in favour of the Punjab University electing a member to that body. His Honour, however, sees no reason to give votes to graduates of other Universities who will be able to vote probably for their own University members elsewhere. The right of electing a member might, in the first place, be given to the Senate, and subsequently transferred to the body of graduates when experience showed that this was desirable. Some of the Chiefs of Native States whose interests in the Punjab are very closely bound up with those of the province at large might also perhaps be willing to sit as in the past.

45. With the introduction of the foregoing elements, we should have a fairly complete representation of all interests in the Punjab, and the Council, assuming the larger number of 22 including the Lieutenant-Governor to be adopted, might be constituted somewhat as follows:—

Unofficials—
Ruling Chiefs or great officers of Native States . .	1
European and Anglo-Indian and Native Christian unofficial and commercial classes	1
University	1
Larger cities	2
Muhammadans	3
Hindus	2
Sikh	1
	11

Officials -
Financial Commissioner	1
Settlement Commissioner	1
Secretaries to Government	3	including one Irrigation Secretary.
Commissioners	2
Manager, North-Western Railway	1
A high military officer	1
Legal Remembrancer or Government Advocate	1
	10

In selecting the European and Anglo-Indian representatives the Punjab Chamber of Commerce and the Trades Association might be consulted. The University member would be elected. The distribution over the creeds of the general members need not be rigid, but the members shown for each creed would probably be the normal strength, and most, if not all, of these members would belong to the landholding classes.

The urban representatives would be selected out of members nominated by the following centres. Where the cantonment population is large the Cantonment Committee might vote jointly with the Municipal Committee for a member, as their interests also require representation. This and the fact that a considerable proportion of the Municipal Committees are nominated and that the Chairman is generally an official would tend to secure the nomination of reasonable men. As the existing committees would nominate the member for each centre, no new special electorate would be required :—

Delhi	206,534	2,041	208,575
Ambála	28,200	50,433	78,633
Simla (summer population)	35,690	1,917	37,607
Jullundur	54,455	13,280	67,735
Ludhiána	48,649	...	48,649
Ferozepore	23,475	25,865	49,340
Lahore	186,884	16,080	202,964
Amritsar	161,039	1,390	162,429
Siálkot	45,374	12,582	57,956
Ráwalpindi	47,077	40,611	87,688
Multán	74,627	12,767	87,394

The Government need not be tied down by any rules as regards the official appointments to the Council, but they might in the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion be suitably distributed in the manner sketched out above.

As it would be necessary to appoint a separate Secretary to the Council, it would be well to have the Legal Remembrancer or Government Advocate on the Council itself.

The Punjab furnishes the backbone of our Indian army, and military interests are naturally great in the Province, which also contains a large number of great cantonments, many of which are thriving industrial and commercial centres. It seems, therefore, necessary to obtain the services of a high military officer to safeguard these interests as well as to give the cantonments a voice in the selection of one member.

46. Sir Louis Dane recognises that the proposals thus put forward are not entirely in accordance with the general sense of the schemes indicated in the letter of the Government of India. At the same time that letter fully recognises that having regard to the wide variety of conditions in different parts of India it is improbable that any one scheme will prove to be equally adapted to all provinces, and that it may be necessary in certain cases to resort more freely to nomination. The Punjab has only enjoyed the benefits of British rule for 60 years; it is a province mainly of simple but brave peasant proprietors who are still happily for the most part unsophisticated. Land is not held by large owners, and the number of men paying large sums in land revenue is small as shown below :—

Number paying over Rs. 1,000 ...	273
„ „ „ „ 2,500	61
„ „ „ „ 5,000	35

The number of large income-tax-payers is also small, as appears from the following table :—

Income over Rs. 2,500	2,104
„ „ „ 5,000	723
„ „ „ 10,000	307

It would be difficult to form any suitable electoral body from such classes, as the men paying the largest land revenue are often not those who represent the bulk of the landholders. Large commercial and industrial enterprises are rare, though there is a move in the direction of such developments which we should do all in our power to foster and encourage. Hence His Honour has thought desirable to give special representation to the commercial classes. The Legislative Council has only been in existence for 10 years and is in a very rudimentary stage. Even on this it has been found very difficult to secure the services of able and experienced men of suitable age, capable of discussing questions on Western lines as must always be desirable if not inevitable in the case of all such Councils. Everything therefore points to the desirability of proceeding slowly and with the utmost caution, and Sir Louis Dane believes that in the proposals above indicated we have gone to the limit of what is desirable in the interests of the province and its people and of the security of the present form of government. It is possible that in his desire to meet the natural wishes of the educated classes, His Honour may have overstepped this limit and that he ought to have recommended a smaller Legislative Council with a more pronounced official element. His Honour has confidence, however, in the general good sense and loyalty of the Punjab, and he believes that free and open discussion in such a Council of all matters of public import can only be attended by beneficial results.

47. General assent is given to the proposal in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter for the introduction of more reality into the budget debates in the Imperial Legislative Council. The truth is that few of those consulted know anything about the subject, but welcome a measure which carries a promise of greater freedom of debate. The objections to the present system are well put by Mr. Robertson. Whether, as he surmises, "the alteration suggested should go far towards remedying this" seems doubtful. The evil referred to is the flood of irresponsible paper eloquence intended not to influence the audience, but to appeal to the outside public. The remedy which naturally suggests itself is the prohibition of read speeches, but there is no suggestion in the Government of India letter that any change will be made in this respect. It must be admitted that the question is not without difficult. It would be impossible to prohibit notes, and it would be difficult to draw the line between documents containing copious notes and those containing large portions of text matter.

48. As regards budget debates in the Provincial Council, throughly there is a generally expressed desire that in this respect the Punjab shall be put upon a footing of equality with other provinces, some of the European official critics seem to apprehend that such debates may embarrass Government.

Such an anticipation is hardly warranted. Nothing but gain can result from any measure which will serve to dispel the generally prevailing ignorance of the actualities, the limitations and the difficulties of provincial finance, and by giving to the non-official councillors opportunities of acquiring knowledge of the working of our system and of the problems of ways and means which confront us we shall render them less irresponsible and better interpreters to the people of the true spirit of our administration. As pointed out by Mr. Wilson, the House of Commons precedent enables us to brush aside without scruple any suggestions of a right to take part in the drawing up of the budget or to tamper with it when completed. But, as observed by the Government of India, "Remarks made * * * would be borne in mind by the Local Government when making financial arrangements in subsequent years, and it might perhaps on occasion be found possible to alter the budget actually under review." It might also be well if after the first edition of the budget had been prepared to place the heads before a committee of the Council consisting of three official and two non-official members. One official member would be the Financial Secretary, who would preside. Suggestions made by the committee which could be accepted might be incorporated in the second revised issue of the budget. It is to be hoped that the result of the labour of the Royal Decentralisation Commission will be to give Local Governments a much freer hand in the allotment of the funds at their disposal, and consequently that this examination and the subsequent discussion of the budget will be more of a reality than has been the case in the past. Such discussions, the President of the Patiala Council of Regency truly observes, will be of educative value, and ought to do much good in explaining to the people the real conditions of public finance in the Punjab. At present the Punjab provincial finances are so small that very little latitude of distribution will be possible, but it ought to be possible with the additional check that such public discussions would afford to proceed further on the path of decentralisation even to the extent of giving the Punjab a larger voice in the matter of its railways and canals.

49. As to the power of interpellation in the provincial Legislative Council, the native gentlemen consulted are practically unanimous in welcoming the proposal which, as Mr. Wilson observes, is evidently very much valued. In the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion the right should be granted. The European officers who are not in favour of the proposal, and the reasons for dissent are noted below:—

Name.	Nature of objection to interpellation.
Colonel Davies	Not much use.
Mr. Diack	Waste of time.
Mr. Henriques	Ditto.
Colonel Dallas	Not necessary or advisable.
Mr. Millar	No good reason for innovation.
Major Fox-Strangways ...	Inexpedient.
Mr. Sykes	Not suited to existing conditions.
Mr. Meredith, Mr. Humphreys, Mr. Malan, Colonel Parsons, Mr. Waring ...	The Council is yet young. Await further experience and watch operations elsewhere.
Major Thompson, Mr. Wakefield, Mr. deMontmorency ...	No reason given.

It will be observed that the reasons against the innovation are wanting in substance. The weight of official opinion is in favour of the measure.

Mr. Wilson remarks: "It [illegible] cause some inconvenience to Governmen preparing the answers to troub[illegible] questions, but the privilege is evide much valued, and we must be prepared to face some inconvenience in ord afford members the information they desire on matters that interest th Mr. Douie refers to the greater publicity which can thereby be given t actions of Government. It would, as remarked by Mr. Estcourt, give Gov ment an opportunity to explain any course of action which has led t content in any quarter. There are many occasions on which it woul an advantage to Government to give publicity to its policy and intentions in which neither a Gazette resolution nor a Press communiqué would mee situation. The first is much too formal, and the second always has a sugge of qui s'excuse s'accuse, of lack of dignity, about it. To give an explan in reply to an interpellation is very different from volunteering an explan in a sort of defensive attitude.

Some native critics recognise that the right of interpellation may be ab and that restrictions would be necessary. The president should have the rig disallow any question as improper. It is understood that the speaker o house of Commons exercises such a right, and that all questions under scrutiny before they are printed on the agenda paper.

50. The Council might in the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion be moned with reasonable frequency, say once a month at least from Nove to April and twice between May and October, whether or not ther legislative business for discussoin. This would give members an oppor of ventilating matters of public interest and importance, and would Government to issue such explanations as the circumstances of any case render desirable.

I have the honour to be,

SIR,

Your most obedient Servant,

E. D. MACLAGAN,

Chief Secretary to Government Punj

APPENDIX (SEE PARA. 7 OF LETTER).

Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates on the Imperial Advisory Council.

(Selected opinions.)

Major Burlton.—I do not think the Ruling Chiefs or the territorial magnates from the various provinces are in any sense in touch with the people, nor have they advanced with the times, with but few exceptions, nor, except in matters where Imperial India is concerned, do I see how Ruling Chiefs can possibly have the requisite knowledge to make their advice and opinion worth having.

I don't think that as regards this province we can say that the territorial magnates occupy the position now aa hereditary leaders of the people, which they did half a century ago. . . . We cannot ignore the leading representatives of the educated community, who in a far truer sense are leaders of the people.

Mr. Atkins.—The magnates do not represent the feeling of the country to any great extent, and much less the feeling of the party which is now striving to make itself felt and which has led to this desire on the part of Government to meet its wishes so far as is consistent with good government. The formation of such a council would be apt to aggravate rather than pacify the cry for self-government.

Mr. Ahsan-ul-Hakk, Barrister-at-Law.—The Ruling Chiefs are, as a rule, so ignorant of the affairs of their own States that it is rather difficult to believe that they shall be able to offer any intelligent and useful advice to the Viceroy on questions of vital importance.

Pandit Devi Chand, Government Pleader.—There are very few Ruling Chiefs, Sardars or territorial magnatas who can have or care to have an opportunity of seeing the people and of getting a genuine idea about their views on a given question. The information which such people get is either through the agency of newspapers or their servants and hangers-on, and which cannot in a majority of cases be relied on.

The Hon'ble Sardar Partap Singh (in a newspaper article).—I may be excused for remarking that it (the aristocracy) is far below the standard it is expected to occupy. The middle classes and masses consider them to be dullards and dissipated imbeciles, and therefore do not reckon them as their leaders of thought and action. I must paintully acknowledge that there is a good deal of truth in this statement of them.

Mr. Bhagat Ram, Barrister-at-Law, Jullundur.—I do not think, as some would have us believe, that Indian Chiefs and men of position are all as a class unworthy of being consulted in matters of the State, for among their number there are a good many who are entitled to the great esteem of their countrymen on account of their high intellect and noble virtues as men and as rulers of their subjects. Unfortunately, however, it cannot be denied that the majority of the Indian Chiefs and the territorial magnates are as much, if not more, out of touch with the people as most of the European officials.

I am certain that the Chiefs and territorial magnates will not represent any other class but their own; for the interest of the petty land-owners and those of the tenants could not safely be left to their care.

Rai Sahib K. B. Thapar.—A council consisting exclusively of Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates would not command to the extent that it should the confidence of the people.

Mr. E. W. Parker.—While it may be highly desirable to have a separate council (on the political side so to speak) recruited from the direction, it is obvious that the Rulers and people of Protected States should have no voice in the government of British India and British subjects.

The Observer.—The idea is to confine the membership of the council practically to the Ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates. This will detract from its representative character, and its views and deliberations will fail to command general confidence . . . . It is undeniable that the Ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates as a class are still standing aloof from the new social and political conditions which affect the course of Indian affairs, and they can never be trusted to present to Government the point of view of the more progressive classes.

The Hon'ble Mr. Harkishen Lal.—I would omit the Ruling Princes altogether from such councils, as they are not in touch with the people of British India, and any interference on their behalf with the affairs of British Indians would expose them, their States and their character to public criticism which may not be welcome to them and which may embitter their feelings against the British subjects.

Rai Bahadur Lal Chand.—With few exceptions, speaking generally, the proposed class of members are unable to efficiently manage their own estates. They themselves stand in need of proper advice which even when tendered they are unable to appreciate and follow for want of a power of discrimination.

Even as means of diffusing correct information I am afraid the Ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates are not likely to be of much use; I might say of any use. It is extremely improbable that they will ever condescend to personally communicate information to the people, and if it is done through their servants or ministers, it is more likely than not that the facts will not, to put it mildly, be truly represented.

Anjuman Islamia of the Punjab.—However much the Ruling Chiefs may know of their own territories, they have hardly any opportunities of knowing the wants and feelings of those who live in British India.

Rai Sahib Narayan Das, Judicial Extra Assistant Commissioner.—The persons who as a class stand most in need of advice in the management of their own affairs from the British Government and its officers are those who form the aristocracy of the country. And yet it is these very men who, according to the proposals as made, would figure as the advisers of Government in its work of administration.

Hindu Sabha, Lahore.—Neither of these classes of men are in touch with the masses of the people of British India.

Mr. Miles Irving.—So many of the territorial magnates of the Central Punjab have proved themselves incapable of managing their own affairs that there is, I think, some uneasiness lest men of this type should be selected.

Hindu members of Gurdaspur Bar.—The interests of the Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates largely clash with those of the people, because they themselves are interested in putting down the public spirit for fear of their own subjects catching the infection of independent comment.

Mr. R. Sykes.—There does not appear to be any strong attachment to territorial magnates or to Rulers of Native States.

Mool Chand, Government Pleader, Sialkot.—To ask the natives of this country to look upon the Ruling Chiefs or the territorial magnates with awe and veneration as their hereditary leaders simply because they are such Chiefs and such magnates would be anomalous. Having been now under the British régime for a long time, our sense of respect and proportion cannot admit of any idea of competition with the might and magnificence of the British Sovereign and his representatives, and it will be wrong to expect us to do homage to both . . . . . The Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates are not in touch with the daily life of the masses of the Indian population, and as to their power of serving as an agency for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions and objects of Government, I might very well say what Napoleon once said of such dignatories, 'that they spoke to no one and no one spoke to them, so they brought home no information.'

Nihal Chand, Barrister-at-Law.—The proposals of the Supreme Government to establish Advisory Councils of the type and character mentioned appear to me not only a huge mockery and a sham palliative, but a whited sepulchre breeding but loathsome maggots and ugly worms.

Mr. Maynard.—I fear that there will be disappointment in regard to the council's work as an agency for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions and objects of Government. Except when they occupy a quasi-patriarchal position like that of the Baloch tumandars, the Chiefs and magnates are not generally in very close touch with the mass of the people. Those who will understand the proceedings best will be the Europeanised, whose education and mode of life has in some measure alienated their sympathies. But even the Chief or magnate of the old-fashioned type is somewhat apt to have conceptions of his own dignity which preclude confidential intercourse with his inferiors other than personal followers and attendants . . . . . All territorial magnates are not tribal or patriarchal Chiefs. Sometimes, as is the case with the great cis-Sutlej jagirdars, they live like strangers in an enemy's conquered country.

Ganga Ram, District Judge.—The landed aristocracy, at least in the Punjab, are not sufficiently well educated to give sound and independent advice on public questions.

Kishen Lal, Pleader.—Such an aristocracy never consents to stoop down to speak to the masses.

Mr. de Montmorency.—Some object to the phrase "territorial magnates," as they say that many of the so-called territorial magnates in official favour are brainless, dissipated, inefficients.

Pensioned Risaldar Malik Chiragh Khan.—The wealthy and the big landholders are naturally ignorant of the welfare of the public at large.

Sayad Mehdi Shah, Honorary Magistrate.—A large number of the territorial magnates would be of no use, as they generally do not know about the condition of the poorer classes.

Anjuman-i-Islamia, Hoshirapur.—These Chiefs are not fully in touch with our requirements.

Sardar Khan, Extra Assistant Commissioner.—The Ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates in general have of late forfeited the confidence of the people, and hence a reasonable number of average land owners who might be in touch with agricultural life might be selected.

Mr. Justice Chatterji.—I am doubtful whether there will be any benefit in enrolling Ruling Chiefs in the council. . . It is questionable whether they will be competent advisers, as without good educational and administrative training their opinions and sympathies will be likely to be in favour of the course they would pursue in the matter put before them had it arisen within their own territories . . . . . Further, they cannot be expected to intimately know or to carefully investigate the conditions obtaining in British India . . . . . In giving their advice they will presumbly act in ignorance of facts, and be swayed by their personal predilections.

Major Egerton.—One or two gentlemen whom I have consulted are rightly, I think, of the opinion that Ruling Chiefs are not always in touch with public feeling in India.

Mr. Donie.—I would not limit the Viceroy's choice to Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates: real leaders of the people are to be found who belong to neither class.

Major Fox-Strangways.—The 20th Century Ruling Chief or territorial magnate may be competent to collate opinions and give them expression as a Secretary to Government, but, I maintain, he is not in touch with, nor would he represent the interests of, the men who pay the revenue and fight the battles of the Government of India.

Diwan Narindra Nath.—A tahsildar wields, as the representative of the paramount power, greater authority than a territorial magnate with an income of a lakh of rupees a year. The enormous value attached to the proprietary rights in land is only of recent orgin. During the Sikh rule in the Punjab the worth of a nobleman depended not so much on the amount of land revenue that he paid, but on the amount of land revenue that he received in jagir.

Baba Gurbakhsh Singh, Bedi.—If the council were limited to landholders only, it is just quite possible that the Government may not have disinterested opinion.

APPENDIX B (see PARA. 7 OF LETTER.)

Question of the initiative and of legislative recognition in connection with the Imperial Advisory Council.

(Selected opinions.)

Raja of Chamba.—These councils are not to receive any legislative recognition. I do not think such is needed unless it is considered necessary to remove any misunderstanding on the part of the people that these councils will continue to be maintained. I mention this as people are apprehensive that these councils are not likely to last long, and they are being compared with the "Councillors of the Empire" who were appointed by Lord Lytton.

Raja of Nabha.—That it should deal only with such matters as might be specifically referred to it from time to time is not well conceived. When journals of the day are suffered to criticize all administrative and executive measures of the Government so freely and openly, there can be no justification, I think, in withholding from the Chiefs and notables of the country in whose staunch and unwavering fidelity the Government has perfect trust, the right of propounding in a private conclave measures apertaining to the Government or public welfare.

Khalifa Sayad Muhammad Hussain of Patiala.—I think the members of the council should also be entitled to submit their individual views to the head of the Government on any other matter that might occur to their own minds as worth inviting the attention of Government.

It is necessary that it (the council) should have a programme fixed for it every year, and should, as a rule, hold once or twice during the year ordinary meetings.

Tikka Sahib of Nabha.—I think it would be much better to call the meetings of the council regularly every winter in Calcutta.

Both the Imperiel and Provincial Councils should have the power of informally submitting their proposals and opinions of the Supreme and Local Governments respectively . . . . . even on those matters about which they have not been formally consulted.

These councils should in my opinion receive some sort of legislative recognition and should be invested with some sort of formal work and responsibility, for, unless

Even as means of diffusing correct information I am afraid the Ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates are not likely to be of much use; I might say of any use. It is extremely improbable that they will ever condescend to personally communicate information to the people, and if it is done through their servants or ministers, it is more likely than not that the facts will not, to put it mildly, be truly represented.

Those who will understand the proceedings best will be the Europeanised, whose education and mode of life has in some measure alienated their sympathies. But even the Chief or magnate of the old-fashioned type is somewhat apt to have conceptions of his own dignity which preclude confidential intercourse with his inferiors other than personal followers and attendants . . . . . All territorial magnates are not tribal or patriarchal Chiefs. Sometimes, as is the case with the great cis-Sutlej jagirdars, they live like strangers in an enemy's conquered country.

Ganga Ram, District Judge.—The landed aristocracy, at least in the Punjab, are not sufficiently well educated to give sound and independent advice on public questions.

Kishen Lal, Pleader.—Such an aristocracy never consents to stoop down to speak to the masses.

Mr. de Montmorency.—Some object to the phrase "territorial magnates," as they say that many of the so-called territorial magnates in official favour are brainless, dissipated, inefficients.

Pensioned Risaldar Malik Chiragh Khan.—The wealthy and the big landholders are naturally ignorant of the welfare of the public at large.

Sayad Mehdi Shah, Honorary Magistrate.—A large number of the territorial magnates would be of no use, as they generally do not know about the condition of the poorer classes.

Anjuman-i-Islamia, Hoshirapur.—These Chiefs are not fully in touch with our requirements.

Sardar Khan, Extra Assistant Commissioner.—The Ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates in general have of late forfeited the confidence of the people, and hence a reasonable number of average land owners who might be in touch with agricultural life might be selected.

Mr. Justice Chatterji.—I am doubtful whether there will be any benefit in enrolling Ruling Chiefs in the council. . . . It is questionable whether they will be competent advisers, as without good educational and administrative training their opinions and sympathies will be likely to be in favour of the course they would pursue in the matter put before them had it arisen within their own territories . . . . . Further, they cannot be expected to intimately know or to carefully investigate the conditions obtaining in British India . . . . . In giving their advice they will presumbly act in ignorance of facts, and be swayed by their personal predilections.

Major Egerton.—One or two gentlemen whom I have consulted are rightly, I think, of the opinion that Ruling Chiefs are not always in touch with public feeling in India.

Mr. Douie.—I would not limit the Viceroy's choice to Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates: real leaders of the people are to be found who belong to neither class.

Major Fox-Strangways.—The 20th Century Ruling Chief or territorial magnate may be competent to collate opinions and give them expression as a Secretary to Government, but, I maintain, he is not in touch with, nor would he represent the interests of, the men who pay the revenue and fight the battles of the Government of India.

Diwan Narindra Nath.—A tahsildar wields, as the representative of the paramount power, greater authority than a territorial magnate with an income of a lakh of rupees a year. The enormons value attached to the proprietary rights in land is only of recent orgin. During the Sikh rule in the Punjab the worth of a nobleman depended not so much on the amount of land revenue that he paid, but on the amount of land revenue that he received in jagir.

Baba Gurbakhsh Singh, Bedi.—If the council were limited to landholders only, it is just quite possible that the Government may not have disinterested opinion.

APPENDIX B (see PARA. 7 OF LETTER.)

Question of the initiative and of lesgislative recognition in connection with the Imperial Advisory Council.

(Selected opinions.)

Raja of Chamba.—These councils are not to receive any legislative recognition. I do not think such is needed unless it is considered necessary to remove any misunderstanding on the part of the people that these councils will continue to be maintained. I mention this as people are apprehensive that these councils are not likely to last long, and they are being compared with the "Councillors of the Empire" who were appointed by Lord Lytton.

Raja of Nabha.—That it should deal only with such matters as might be specifically referred to it from time to time is not well conceived. When journals of the day are suffered to criticize all administrative and executive measures of the Government so freely and openly, there can be no justification, I think, in withholding from the Chiefs and notables of the country in whose staunch and unwavering fidelity the Government has perfect trust, the right of propounding in a private conclave measures apertaining to the Government or public welfare.

Khalifa Sayad Muhammad Hussain of Patiala.—I think the members of the council should also be entitled to submit their individual views to the head of the Government on any other matter that might occur to their own minds as worth inviting the attention of Government.

It is necessary that it (the council) should have a programme fixed for it every year, and should, as a rule, hold once or twice during the year ordinary meetings.

Tikka Sahib of Nabha.—I think it would be much better to call the meetings of the council regularly every winter in Calcutta.

Both the Imperiel and Provincial Councils should have the power of informally submitting their proposals and opinions of the Supreme and Local Governments respectively . . . . . even on those matters about which they have not been formally consulted.

These councils should in my opinion receive some sort of legislative recognition and should be invested with some sort of formal work and responsibility, for, unless this is done, I am afraid that though they might remain as an ornament, they would be of little or no real use both to the public and the Government, and after some time the whole scheme might fall through.

Mr. Justice Robertson.—It appears to be worth considering whether it would not be well to extend to the members of such a council the right to address the President (the Viceroy, I presume) in an autograph communication on any subject of public importance . . . . . It would be well to enable councillors to offer advice, or opinions, if they so desire.

Major Burlton.—I think it should be definitely stated that they should be called upon to meet at least once a year and be allowed to present addresses on any serious occasion or necessity to Government.

Mr. Ahsan-ul-Hakk, Barrister-at-Law.—In the absence of any provisions conferring better rights upon the Chiefs and magnates, the proposals laid down in paragraphs 4 and 5 will not benefit the country materially . . . . They will only raise a storm of ridicule and hostile criticism, and defeat the praiseworthy effort of Government by creating doubts about the bonâ fides of this step in the minds of the people.

Hon'ble Sardar Partap Singh.—I venture to suggest one amendment to sub-paragraph (6) of paragraph 5 to the following effect:—

> "and any of its members will be at liberty to report to the Governor-General a particular state of public feeling with regard to a certain act or measure of the Government individually, and ask for such information confidentially about any particular matter as may be desirable."

Anjuman Islamia, Ludhiana.—The council should be allowed the permission to bring any point, of its own accord, to the notice of Government.

Tikka Ram Narain Singh of Anandpur.—Imperial councillors' powers must not be limited to give their opinions only on matters referred to them for consultation.

Diwan Narindra Nath.—Unless due weight is given to the opinion of the members and a sort of unwritten rule is observed as to the extreme undesirability of Government acting in opposition to the opinion of the majority, the position of Ruling Chief and territorial magnates will be worse than that of the members of the Legislative Councils, and eventually they will be unwilling to work on the council and to give their honest opinions.

Amir Ali, District Judge.—Provisions may be made for councillors to bring important matter to notice.

Gujrat Bar Association.—The members of the council should have the right to offer voluntary advice and make proposals consonant with the public interest, the main reason for this being that if no such right is given, many a matter of great public importance may never strike the Government to be put before the council.

Mr. Douie.—In the case of consultation with individuals, I would not provide that the first step must in all cases be taken by the Viceroy. I would allow every member the right to address the Viceroy on any matter of public importance.

1. There are some features in the proposals regarding the Imperial Advisory Council which might be modified with advantage. This will become clear if we consider in what light the dignity of membership will present itself to those who are likely to be asked to serve upon it. Side by side with an Imperial Legislative Council, having certain definitely recognised powers at law, with the right to assemble to interpellate and to discuss, and an important share in the work of legislation, it is proposed to establish another council, which will only meet when specially summoned, only express opinions on subjects specifically referred to it, enjoy no legal status or legal powers, and exercise no authoritative influence on the decisions of Government. When these conditions are fully realized, it will, I believe, be found that the most able and influential of the Chiefs and territorial magnates will regard membership of the Advisory Council as lacking dignity,* and will contrast unfavourably their own position as members with that of the men, often their social inferiors, who have attained to seats on the Legislative Council. To those who know anything of the Indian aristocracy, it is a truism that they value personal dignity above most other considerations. The supiscion that they occupied an inferior position in the Advisory Council would do much to impair the usefulness of that institution.

2. Without any surrender of the postulated supremacy and independence of the executive authority, it is possible to change these conditions for the better by giving to the proposed Imperial Advisory Council the legal right to meet and to tender collective advice on any subject on its own initiative. I suggest that, upon a requisition signed by at least five members, Government should bind itself to summon a meeting. I am also inclined to think that either His Excellency the Viceroy or the Hon'ble Member in charge of the subject under discussion should preside. This would probably have no tendency to stifle discussion, if the subject were one on which strong views were held. But it would add to the dignity of membership.

3. Incidentally the legal right to tender collective advice unasked will meet the criticisms which have been levelled against the council as a mere device for assisting Government to resist the pressure of the educated and reforming classes. A body, which has legal authority to insist on recording its collective opinion on any subject, is in a very different position from one which lends itself to the suspicion that Government calls for advice only when advice is likely to be acceptable.

Three Pleaders of Muzaffargarh.—The Imperial Advisory Council as suggested would be an ornamental body without being of any use to the country. Either it must have some legislative recognition or at least so much that a Bill before being put before the Legislative Council be first discussed in the Advisory Council.

Mr. deMontmorency.—A contemplative council of elders without power of initiation and with doubtful power of commanding attention to their views, but saddled with certain unremunerative duties, seems to these critics a more fancied than real concession to progress.

Anjuman-i-Islamia, Multán.—The councillors should be at liberty to confidentially make any suggestion in case of need and importance to His Excellency, who of course may or may not take action on it.

Sardar Bikram Singh, Honorary Magistrate.—It should be given a statutory recognition in this wise that any matter proposed in the Imperial Legislative Council be referred to the Imperial Advisory Council.

It should meet at least once a year.

Bhai Gurdit Singh, Pleader.—When the majority of these councillors are opposed to a certain measure it ought to be abandoned.

Bhai Gulab Singh.—I would recommend that some legal status must be given to its functions. All matters should as of right be referred to it before they are finally adopted. If legislative recognition is not given to such councils, they will have very little value in the eyes of the public.

Karm Ilahi, Honorary Magistrate.—In the event of Imperial Advisory Council not being vested with formal power, satisfactory results would not issue.

Mr. Henriques.—They (the people consulted) have almost all been struck by the anomaly of a determinate body of advisors with no power of initiative.

Mr. Humphreys.—It seems to me that if these councils are ever to have any real vitality and to fulfil the object for which they have been designed, some power of initiative, subject to proper safeguards, must eventually be granted.

There should, I think, be regular times of session for the councils when questions for their collective deliberation would be considered by them. This question seems to me important if the councils are to be of any real use.

Mr. Wilson.—I would allow any member to ask for information or to make suggestions, but it should be entirely for Government to decide whether the information be given or the suggestion acted on. The council should discuss only questions referred to it by Government.

The conferment of a power of initiative is also recommended by the Anjumans Islamia of Delhi, Batála, Lahore and Ambála, by the Sanatan Dharm Sabha, Multán, and by Ram Saran Das (of Lahore), Rai Narayan Das, Extra Assistant Commissioner, Multan Chand, Banker, Bhai Gurdit Singh, Hakim Muhammad Ajmal, Khan, Ghulam Muhammad Hassan, Raj Narain, Barrister-at-Law, Sheikh Abdul Hakk, Rai Bahadur Hari Chand, and a few others.

APPENDIX C (see PARA. 7 OF LETTER).

Question of secrecy of proceedings of Advisory Councils.

(Selected opinions.)

Raja of Nábha.—Clause 7, paragraph 5, is well intended, but not well conceived. Where so good a number of the people do assemble and discuss, to try and keep the proceedings strictly confidential and secret is to contend against impossibility. Public curiosity is bound to be on the tiptoe on such occasions, and it is but unnatural to expect from all the members who do take part to be strictly close secret keepers.

Tikka Sahib of Nábha.—It would be highly politic to give publicity to the fact that the Government is consulting the people's representatives on the Advisory Councils, and this object, I am afraid, will be defeated if the said council does not formally meet for discussion of, and deliberation on, important public affairs, if its proceedings are always confidential and informal, and if it has no powers of initiative.

Major Burlton.—The results of their consultations and meetings should not be private and confidential, but be given the widest publicity. How can any public or section of the public have any confidence in such Star Chamber sort of meetings?

Pandit Amar Nath, Pleader.—They would not be able to withstand the press interviews and other like intrusions on the secrecy which may be entrusted to them by Government, and thus they may be the means of spreading incorrect information.

Mr. Bhagat Ram, Barrister-at-Law.—In treating the opinions of councillors as confidential the Government will afford the critics of the council a weapon which would effectually be used in undermining its influence as well as usefulness. Besides, I regret to say that I do not believe that confidential communications will secure frank expression of opinion.

Mr. Douie.—I think undue stress is laid on the privacy and confidential character of the council's proceedings. Of course the meetings should be private in the sense that press reporters should not be present, but real secrecy is little to be secured with a council of 60 or even 25 members . . . . . The mystery which envelopes the actions of Government and the motives which underlie them is often in these days a source not of strength, but of weakness.

Mr. Maynard.—Similar considerations lead me to doubt whether it is judicious to provide that the proceedings of the council should as a rule be private, informal and confidential. It is politically undesirable that Government should be charged with suppressing unpalatable advice, but such charges will certainly be made by unscrupulous opponents unless every pretex for them be removed. Nawab Bahram Khan, C.I.E., the Mazari tumandar, who is probably the ablest and most representative man in the South-West Punjab, has talked to me on this subject. He holds that a member of the Imperial Advisory Council should be in a position to satisfy his kaum as to the advice which he gave on any question affecting its interests, and he does not think confidential proceedings desirable.

Anjuman-i-Islamia, Multán.—Proceedings of the council should not be confidential.

Rai Sahib K. B. Thapar.—To treat proceedings of this body as confidential would be to afford the critics of the council a weapon which would be effectively used in undermining its influence as well as usefulness.

Secretary, Hindu Sabha, Amritsar.—Councillors owe some obligations and responsibility to the masses in whose behalf he or they are expected to speak with authority . . . . . Thus it is necessary that some provision be made that the councillors, with the permission of Government, may have the right of declaring to the public the opinion they had given on certain matters; in the absence of such provision, there shall be a general cry that the representatives do not properly represent the state of the masses.

Other opinions favouring publicity rather than secrecy are those of the Islamia Anjuman of Batála, the Sanatan Dharam Sabha, Multan, Barkat Ram, B. A., Abdul Aziz, Radha Kishan, Pleader, Muhammad Amin Khan, Honorary Magistrate, Rai Narayan Das, Extra Assistant Commissioner, Rai Sahib Mohan Lal, Multan Chand, Banker, Arjan Das, Extra Assistant Commissioner, and Major Barton.

APPENDIX D (PARA. 41 OF LETTER).

Objections to an elective system in the Punjab.

(Selected opinions.)

M. L. WARING, Esquire, Deputy Commissioner, Dera Ghazi Khan.

Owing to the many unedifying features of the elective system, I would not introduce it until there were a very strong and general feeling in its favour. This feeling does not appear to exist in the Punjab.

Captain A. J. O'BRIEN, Deputy Commissioner, Miánwali.

I am certain that election would result in election of wire-pullers of Lahore, and the outside districts would have no chance.

KISHEN LAL, Bahel, Pleader, Bhakkar.

The election of unofficial members through municipal and district boards would meet the case, if the members to these boards have been appointed by election: where the condition of the district is backward, the membership to be awarded by the Deputy Commissioner.

Lieutenant-Colonel C. M. DALLAS, I. A., Political Agent, Phulkián States and Bahawalpur.

All these opinions, except that of the Hon'ble Tikka Sahib of Nábha, have been given in the form of answers to the questions which form an enclosures to your letter. The opinions differ in many ways, but all, except the same hon'ble gentleman, are agreed that election pure and simple is not suited at present to the people of this country. I append also a digest of these opinions which may be of use in comparing the answers to the various questions.

The people as a whole are not yet sufficiently educated to think for themselves, and consequently their votes are either sold or else obtained by canvassers who do not shrink from all sorts of malpractices and other devices to secure them For this reason many suitable, but respectable, persons will not offer themselves for election.

Khan Bahadur Khalifa Sayad MUHAMMAD HUSSAIN.

I prefer the latter course, because I believe that if the former is adopted, the electors will be unacquainted with the candidates, and the result inevitably will be that residents of Ambála or Delhi will find themselves at a loss in trying to choose between the candidates from Rawalpindi and Multán, and vice versâ. The ultimate evolution of a 'representative' will become a mere matter of chance, and will lead to all sorts of malpractices, wire-pulling and speculating.

I consider election of any sort uncalled for and ill-suited to the present condition of the Sikhs.

Many native gentlemen of position and ability, who dislike presenting themselves as candidate for election, will be found ready to be appointed by nomination.

Rai Bahadur GANGA RAM, C.I.E. (late of Punjab Public Works Department, retired), Patiala.

In municipalities the system of election has signally failed, the right of voting is not exercised according to the dictates of voter's conscience, and all sorts of of malpractices are resorted to. I have known cases where most desirable candidates (in point of leading and light) have been defeated by illiterate men, simply because the latter could stoop to all sorts of devices to canvassing in order to secure votes in their favour.

The Hon'ble Sir W. O. CLARK, Chief Judge, Chief Court, Punjab.

I am opposed generally to election as entirely unsuited in this country, and I think the formation of a special voting constituency is objectionable.

Lieutenant-Colonel H. S. P. DAVIES, Commissioner, Jullunder division.

I do not consider that in the Punjab it would be possible to obtain a really representative body, except by nominations the difficulties in any scheme of election are very great, and I am very doubtful whether election, under the present conditions, would either be popular or effective.

It is well known that a member, nominated to either a municipal committee or to a district board, considers his status rather superior to that of an elected member, and men have been known, not infrequently, to decline nomination for an elective vacancy, through their dislike of being obliged to compete with others for such a post. As long as election is regraded in this manner, it must surely be unwise to select members for the Legislative Council by this method.

The elective system, so far as it has been tried, has not proved a success, while nomination has been by no means a failure, and no sufficient arguments have been advanced to justify the change.

In spite of the preponderance of Mussalman population, the Hindus hold nearly all important posts under Government, and a large number of them is serving on municipal and district boards. In case of election the Hindus will secure a larger number of seats than is commensurate with their numerical strength in the province.

I disapprove of the principal of election in connection with Oriental Government. I hold that it is entirely foreign to the traditions of any Eastern nation, even where the nation is democratic, e.g., the trans-border tribes of the North-West Frontier, and that it has proved dismal failure in the shape of local self-government in India. If the principle is insisted on, the franchise should only be extended to persons nominated by the paramount power or its officers, and there should be no qualification, whether educational, financial or social.

It would be better if the present system of the nomination of the members was allowed to continue on the Provincial Legislative Council for a few years longer. (Reasons are many and cannot be recorded in a public document like this.)

For my own part, I hope that the suggestion to increase the number of elected seats from 5 to 18 will not be carried out Although many of those who have been consulted support and wish to extend the principle of election, I am convinced that in many cases this is because they think that representation by election is looked upon as the mark of an "advanced" community. Even in the Punjab Government letter the doubt is expressed whether the Province is "as yet sufficiently advanced" for the introduation of a system of election for the Legislative Council. I venture with all deference to submit that this is not the right way of looking at the question. We all hope for and work for the advancement and progress the country, but does that necessarily imply an ideal of representation by election? I venture to think that it does not, and that the progress and advancement of the country can best be attained without Government by elected representatives. There is much in the opinions now forwarded to show that our English system of election is foreign to the traditions and genius of the people of this country. We all know that the system of election which has been introduced into our municipal committees and district boards, in this Province at all events, has been an egregious failure. In the municipality of Lahore itself, which might be expected to set an example to the rest of the Province, the purchase of votes and the personation of voters is notoriously a universal practice. Even in the elections for the Imperial Ligislative Council, it is admitted that the system of election has not been a success, and the whole tenor of the Government of India letter supports my contention that a system of election is not suited to the people of this country.

Lieutenant-Colonel C. G. Parsons, Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

Election by the land-holding members of the Provincial Council is open to the same criticism. To impose the duty of election upon the land-holding classes (whatever reservations as to the high status for the voter were made) would be in my opinion to introduce perhaps well meant but none the less iniquitious discord among those classes. An inexcusable experimentalisation with Western methods among an Eastern race is what I would condemn it as. I consider it would be an iniquity not to be atoned for by subsequent extenuation on the plea of good intention obscured by want of insight. 'I came not to introduce peace but a sword' is the question which most readily occurs to me on comtemplating the proposal. The proposal would be the thin edge of the sword. The continual foisting of debateable Western methods on to the East is in my opinion deplorable.

Rai Sahib K. B. Thapar, Lahore.

I am in favour of maintaining the present system of nomination and would not have any of the non-official seats filled by election except that assigned to the University. I do not think that under any system of election that can be devised in this province it would be possible to give the needful representation to all the interests enumerated in Mr. Maclagan's letter and to secure the right stamp of councillors. Besides, I am not sure that it is possible to devise an elective system in this province which would prevent men being elected who could hardly be regarded as likely to enhance either the dignity or the utility of the Council. A system of nomination would, on the other hand, enable the Government to apportion the seats at their disposal with due regard to the various interests requiring nomination and without the risk being run of any particular class or interest being over represented. In filling the seats the interests of the various parts of the province would also have to be considered, and these I think would be better protected under a system of nomination than under any elective system that can possibly be invented.

E. W. Parker, Esquire, Advocate, Lahore.

The introduction of a system of election into municipalities, in Lord Ripon's Viceroyalty, on lines altogether foreign to the genius of an Oriental people and to the history and traditions of the peoples of India, has been fraught with disastrous results, the chief of which lies in the antagonism between Hindus and Muhammadans which has since become so accentuated.

In the existing circumstances of the Punjab, I am a strong supporter of the present system of nomination, as I am persuaded to think that this province, though it is advancing with rapid strides, has not yet made sufficient progress in the arts of life to enable its population to exercise the privilege of election with manifest advantage.

It is a well known fact that, under existing conditions, very few men of light and leading present themselves for election to municipal boards, and those who do, almost invariably get defeated by men who are unscrupulous enough to use all kinds of electioneering tricks to gain a victory.

I am strongly opposed to the application of the system of election to the Punjab. This province is not yet sufficiently advanced for it, and, notwithstanding the rapid progress made of late, we are still very backward as compard with other Indian provinces. The system of nomination is by no means an ideal system, but, to my mind, it presents the lesser of two evils. If the mistakes of other provinces are not be repeated in the land of five rivers, and if the Punjab Government is to avoid the embarrassments of other Provincial Administrations, Government should be in no hurry to grant the privilege of election for the local Council to a population who cannot exercise it with advantage. I would therefore retain the present system of nomination, regard being always paid by Government, in making nominations, to the relative importance of various interests and communities and their respective claims to representation.

The fact is indisputable that gentlemen of light and leading do not offer themselves as candidates for them. Municipal boards are swamped by men who secure victory by means of the most questionable character, and party cliques and racial factions dominate their deliberations. it is impossible for any improvement to take place in their condition until their constitutions be radically changed.

Past experience has proved it beyond a shadow of doubt that given a promiscuous system of representation by election, the Muhammadan community, and for the matter of that any other minority, e.g., Christians, cannot hope to succeed in placing one of their real representatives on the Legislative Councils of India.

Conceding in the abstract the desirability of this reform in the Legislative Councils of the country, it seems to me that time is not yet ripe for the introductions of a system of election in the Punjab. Past experience in the case of municipal boards has demonostrated beyond all doubt that the people in this province have not yet fully realised the responsibilities attached to the possession of a vote for electing representatives to the local bodies, and the results so far have been extremely unsatisfactory. I would therefore advocate, for the present, the maintenance of the existing system of nomination of members of the Provincial Council.

Khan Bahadur Mian MUHAMMAD SHAH DIN, Barrister-at-Law, Lahore.

Sheikh ABDUL AZIZ, B. A., Editor, The Observer, Lahore.

Mian MUHAMMAD SHAFI, Barrister-at-Law, Lahore.

Lala RAM SARAN DASS, son of Rai Bahadur Mela Ram, Lahore.

I strongly advocate that the present system of nomination by Government be maintained for some years to come for filling the unofficial seats. Various difficult and awkward points shall require solution in the circumstances, which exist in this province, to ensure a satisfactory working of the measure if election be adopted for filling those seats, and I am afraid it will not be an easy matter to effect such solution in a manner to give satisfaction to all parties concerned; while it is feared that the result may be quite unsatisfactory.

Rai Bahadur Lala LAL CHAND, Pleader, Chief Court, Punjab.

This scheme does not give the right of election in this province to rural population, which forms a very considerable majority. But in my opinion the rural population is not yet sufficiently advanced to exercise the power of election for the Provincial Council, and their interests would be best safeguarded by direct nominations made by the Government.

SIR DAVID MASSON, C.I.E., Lahore.

Many of the best men would undoubtedly not be available under an elective system, for they would not incur the risk of being worsted in an electoral struggle.

I do not consider that the Punjab is yet ripe for appointment by election: I believe that the best men would be secured by nomination rather than by election.

Rai Sahib NARAYAN DAS, Judge, Small Cause Court, Lahore.

The changes proposed seem to be intended to remove the evils which are alleged to result from the system of election at present in vogue. The remedy, however, in my humble opinion would seem to be worse than the disease. The only true solution of the difficulty, if it is found to exist, is to boldly declare that the election system based on principles in harmony with the spirit of the laws in force is unsuited to the existing circumstances of the country, and to have resort to a system of nomination such as might result in a better and more satisfactory representation of the people on the municipal and district boards.

Rai Sahib Lala MOHAN LAL, Proprietor, Mufid-i-Am Press, and Honorary Magistrate, Lahore.

I am of opinion that the wisest and safest course would be by nomination, as the time has not yet arrived for healthy election to be possible. This is proved in the election of members of district boards and municipalities, where it has been shown that it is impossible by election to secure the right body of men who have the welfare of the country and people thoroughly at heart.

MILES IRVING, Esquire, I.C.S., Deputy Commissioner, Amritsar.

The system of election has proved a signal failure in this country, and no electorate can be devised, however select, which will not be liable to be influenced by importunity coupled with family and caste connections. Instances will readily occur to memory in which sheer importunity and wirepulling have procured recommendations on behalf of entirely undeserving persons from the most unexpected quarters. The opinion of the Hindu Sabha is most frank on this point.

Rai Bahadur GOPAL DAS Bhandari, Pleader, Municipal Commissioner and Secretary, Hindu Sabha, Amritsar.

The province is not yet far advanced and mature to appreciate fully the good of the system of the election, and besides the election system should be as yet a new one in this Province and untried.

Till the electorate be complete and the electors of sufficient capacity and learning, to understand fully, and rightly, the importance and the advantages of the franchise, it shall be in no wise a right step, all at once, to introduce to its full extent the election system.

The lack of interest on the part of those appointed to supervise the preparation of the registers, and the strict scrutiny as to the means of the persons coming to get themselves registered as voters, has made bold, and given courage to many, to form a combination, with a motto not to object one another's actions, with deplorable result that a good and fit person don't stand for election, and thus causes gains an advantage of securing majority in seats and commanding a false and unreal influence. There are other evils attached, and bad results incident to the present system, and in all probability, nay, certainty, there shall be immense and untold exertion, fair and foul, to get majority in the seats of the boards and municipalities, and thus shall open door for a class of persons too ambitious, though otherwise unfit, to get a seat in Provincial Legislative Council. If the right of electing a member remains in the hands of the men of most ordinary means, incapable of understanding and estimating the worth and nature of the franchise, it is almost certain that the expense of the election shall rise to an enormous and fabulous amount, which in the end in many cases shall prove to be a source of misery and great pecuniary trouble.

Anjuman Islamia of Batala Sharif, Gurdaspur and Sujanpur, district Gurdaspur.

The present system of election of municipal and district boards is undesirable, nor capable and honourable people like thus to compete; the mode of election through municipal and district boards is not considered to suit.

Shiv Deo Singh, Siranwali.

Gentlemen of position will refuse to offer themselves as candidates to a wide electorate as they dislike canvassing and by reason of reluctance to risk the indignity of being defeated by rival candidate of inferior social status.

M. Fazl Karim, Revenue Assistant, Sialkot.

As far as this province is concerned, the best plan is to appoint such a representative by nomination. The system of election is not popular in this province even in the case of municipal and district boards, and the appointment by nomination is looked upon more honourable than that by election.

E. A. Estcourt, Esq., C.S., Deputy Commissioner, Gujranwala.

The only question on which the majority of those consulted have been able to express a definite opinion is that dealing with nomination versus election. Nearly all are agreed that election will only lead to malpractices, further trouble, and will keep the best men from coming forward.

Chaudhri Hayat Muhammad, Zaildar and Honorary Magistrate, Wazirabad.

The system of nomination is the most suitable, while that of election is defective for the following few reasons:—

(1) Reasons given in paragraph 17 of Government of India letter.

(2) Reason assigned in paragraph 15 of Government of India letter.

(3) All the classes of the people are not allowed to be represented. Indeed many classes remain altogether unrepresented, a fact admitted in paragraph 16 of Government of India letter.

(4) The electorate try to get undue advantages by improper means from the elected members and often succeed in gaining their object.

(5) The candidates, and especially the more incompetent ones among them, secure their return by offering illegal gratifications to the voters and then recoup themselves by unfair means.

(6) Many elected members with a view to pleasing the electorate so as to secure their re-election in future so far from guarding the interests of the public do not care even for the interests of Government.

(7) Incompetent members are elected under the present system of election while capable men are defeated. This shows that the people of the province are incapable of electing able persons as their representatives.

(8) At the time of election there is an apprehension of a breach of the public peace and the police have to be called in to preserve order.

(9) Owing to the incapability of the electorate, Government is very often compelled to withdraw the privilege of election so as to preclude the possibility of a breach of the public peace, etc.

(10) The fact that the office of Zaildar is no longer allowed to be filled by election shows the undesirability of the system of election, which has already ruined many respectable zamindars owing to their being compelled to incur undue expenses at the time of election for pleasing the voters. Ever since the discontinuance of the system the people live peaceably and (the zaildars) have begun to perform their duties in a satisfactory manner.

(11) The nominated members will assuredly be capable men, who will never be unmindful of the rights of either the Government or the public. Wherever members have been appointed by Government they have won the confidence of the people and have also given satisfaction to the Government.

(12) If the system of election were adhered to much time would be spent. Government would have to be put to diverse troubles, and unnecessary expenses would have to be incurred.

Here the people have had very little experience of the system of election by majority of votes, and many who are qualified to vote have failed to exercise their right or have shown themselves unworthy of it. The best men have also shown much reluctance to expose themselves to the annoyance of an election, while quite willing to serve if nominated by Government. I think therefore we should be very chary at present of introducing any system of election of representatives to Councils in the Punjab.	The Hon'ble Mr. J. WILSON, C.S.I., Financial Commissioner, Punjab.
The system of election is quite unsuited, in my opinion, for the filling of such an appointment. The best men will not come forward for election; the idea, in this province at least, would be entirely repugnant to their feelings and traditions.	A. MEREDITH, Esquire, Commissioner, Delhi division.
The present system of nomination should be maintained as regards all members, whether official or non-official. The best men will not come forward for election; the idea of canvassing and posing before their fellow-countrymen as candidates is distasteful to the leading native gentlemen of this province, as far as my experience goes, and the introduction of a system of election will result in the Council being swamped with members of the legal profession. A provincial electorate, moreover, is, in my opinion, quite impracticable.
Anything more unsatisfactory than the present constitution of and method of election to district boards it is hard to imagine, but not strange when one sees how the majority of the electorate are intellectually unfit to vote.	Captain A. C. ELLIOT, Deputy Commissioner, Hissar district.
All, except the Bar, agree to the principle of nomination instead of election.
The elective method is, in my opinion, entirely unsuitable for the selection of a great Punjab land-owner for a seat on the Imperial Council, to judge from the deplorable features usually associated with municipal elections in this province. Nomination by the Lieutenant-Governor is the only possible solution.	W. MALAN, Esquire, Deputy Commissioner, Simla.
For the present I cannot recommend the election system because the Indians have not yet proved themselves fit to work impartially and satisfactorily. The selections by the Governments would be the safest system, and will leave no room for complaint to any one in India.	MUHAMMAD MAHMUD ALI, Ambala.
I do not think the Punjab is yet sufficiently advanced to permit of the elective principle being introduced with satisfactory results. If it were generally introduced it is almost certain, I think, that in the present state of society in the Punjab the best men would not come forward as candidates. This I consider has been sufficiently demonstrated by the attempts which have been made at various times to introduce the elective system in the Punjab.	R. HUMPHREYS, Esquire, Deputy Commissioner, Delhi district.
I very strongly urge that I am quite against the system of election, which has been the cause of many vices, and by which the object in view is not secured. I prefer nomination.	Rai Bahadur Lala HARDHIAN SINGH, Delhi.

No. 2643-S. (Home—Legislative), dated the 27th September 1907.

From—The Hon'ble Mr. E. D. Maclagan, C.S., Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab,

To—All Commissioners of Divisions in the Punjab.

I am directed to forward a copy of a letter no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th of August 1907, from the Secretary to the Government of India in the Home Department, regarding the measures proposed by the Government of India for giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters. I am to request that you will be good enough to forward your opinion on these proposals to the local Government by the 1st of December next, after having consulted the Deputy Commissioners of your Division and other selected officers whose opinion you think would be of value, and also such individuals or bodies in each district as may be taken as representatives of the various classes of the native community. Translations into Urdu of this letter and its enclosure will shortly appear in the Government Gazette, and copies can be obtained on application to the Superintendent, Punjab Government Press, Lahore.

2. It will be convenient if in replying to this letter you would be good enough to put your opinion in the form of answers to the series of questions which form an enclosure to this letter, and it is requested that the persons consulted by you should in the same way put forward their opinions in this form. This suggestion only applies to the arrangement of the subject-matter of the opinions, and is in no way intended to prevent the fullest discussion of the points which emerge from the Government of India letter.

3. With reference to the proposals made in paragraphs 4 to 5 of the Government of India letter regarding the constitution of an Imperial Advisory Council, the Lieutenant-Governor has no special remarks at this stage to communicate.

4. The Provincial Advisory Councils are discussed in paragraphs 6 and 7 of the Government of India letter. If such a council is to be constituted for the Punjab, it might perhaps consist of a nominated council of some 20 members, of whom perhaps six or seven, including one or two ruling Chiefs, would be members of the Imperial Advisory Council and the rest would be nominated (but not necessarily in any fixed proportion) to represent the landed and other interests mentioned in the Government of India letter.

5. With reference to the proposed enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council (paragraphs 11 to 19 of the Government of India letter), it may be useful for you and the gentlemen whom you may consult to read the following description of the constitution of the present Imperial Legislative Council as described in Volume IV, Chapter V, of the new Imperial Gazetteer:—

"The Executive Council of the Governor-General at present (1906) consists—besides the Governor-General himself and the Commander-in-Chief, who is usually appointed by the Secretary of State to be an Extraordinary Member—of six ordinary members, of whom one must be an English or Irish Barrister or Scottish Advocate of not less than five years' standing. For the purposes of legislation, it is provided by the Indian Councils Acts of 1861 and 1892 that the Governor-General shall summon as an Additional Member the Lieutenant-Governor or Chief Commissioner of the Province in which the council is assembled, and shall also nominate such other persons, not less than ten or more than sixteen, as he may think fit. Of these Additional Members, who are appointed for two years at a time, one-half at least must be non-officials *; and, in order to give the Council an elective as well as a representative character, statutory rules now require the nominations to five seats to be made on the recommendation of the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce and the non-official members of the local Legislative Councils at Madras, Bombay, Calcutta, and Allahabad. The remaining seats may be filled in such manner as appears to the Governor-General most suitable, regard being had to the business in hand and the different classes of the community to be represented . . . . ."

* Under the existing statutory rules not more than six of the nominated Additional Members may be officials.

The maximum number of members therefore is at present 24 excluding the Viceroy, and it is now proposed to raise this figure to 53 in the manner outlined in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter, the number of elected members being at the same time raised from 5 to 18. In dealing with the constitution of the proposed council the chief points for consideration are—

(1) The general representation of classes and interests which the composition of the council affords.

(2) The method of election by the Provincial Councils (paragraph 13 of the Government of India letter).

(3) The method of selection from the great land-owners of this province to one seat on the Imperial Council (paragraphs 14 and 15).

(4) The method of selection from the Muhammadans of this province to Muhammadan seats on the Imperial and Provincial Councils (paragraphs 16 to 18).

As regards the third of these questions, it may be noted that from enquiries made in May last it was ascertained that there were in this province 52 land-owners paying a land revenue of Rs. 5,000 and over, distributed as follows:—

Class.		Hindus.	Muhammadans.	Christians.	Total.
	Rs. Rs.
I.—Paying land revenue	5,000 to 10,000	13	22	7	42
II.— „ „ „	10,000 „ 15,000	3	2	..	5
III.— „ „ „	15,000 „ 20,000	..	1	..	1
IV.— „ „ „	20,000 „ 25,000	..	..	1	1
V.— „ „ „	25,000 „ 50,000	2	1	..	3
Total . .		18	26	8	52

As regards the fourth question, enquiries have been instituted with a view to obtaining statistics of the classes of possible Muhammadan electors referred to in paragraph 18 of the Government of India letter, and these will be forwarded when obtained. It will be noticed that paragraph 17 refers to election for the Provincial Council only, see also paragraph 8 of this letter. In discussing the constitution of a special Muhammadan electorate the question whether its members should or should not be allowed to vote in the open elections also must be considered.

6. As regards the Provincial Legislative Councils, which form the subject of paragraphs 17 and 20 to 22 of the Government of India letter, the general system now in force in India is described as follows in the Gazetteer:—

"The subordinate Legislative Councils are constituted on the same lines generally as the superior legislature of the Governor-General. In Madras and Bombay the Governor is assisted by an Executive Council of two Ordinary Members, and these three form the nucleus of the larger Legislative Council: but in each of the other provinces the Lieutenant-Governor stands alone at the head of the local administration. The Acts of 1861 and 1892 provide that the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor, as the case may be, shall nominate as members, for two years at a time, the Advocate-General of the province or other officer acting in that capacity and—subject, save in Madras and Bombay, to the sanction of the Governor-General—such other persons, not less than eight nor more than twenty,* as he may think expedient, at least one-half being non-officials. In Madras, Bombay, Bengal, and the United Provinces some of these members are appointed on the recommendation of the groups of municipalities and district boards, Universities, Chambers of Commerce, and the like, and the elective principle is thus to some extent recognised."

* These are the maximum and minimum numbers fixed by the statute for Madras and Bombay. As regards the other provinces, the statute fixes a maximum of 20 for Bengal and 15 for the United Provinces, but otherwise leaves the numbers to be determined by the Governor-General.

The Government of India in their letter now forwarded have chiefly in view the case of provinces where a Legislative Council is of some standing and a certain number of its members are elected. In the Punjab a Legislative Council was first constituted in 1897, and it consists of not more than nine members in addition to the Lieutenant-Governor. The members are all nominated and at least one-third of them must be non-officials.

7. In considering the future constitution of the Punjab Council, the necessity of maintaining an official majority, and the limitation which this necessity imposes upon the total number (paragraph 10 of Government of India letter) must be borne in mind.

8. It is for consideration whether the province is as yet sufficiently advanced for the introduction of a system of election for the Legislative Council. The results of the present system of nomination have been that on an average the council has contained five non-official members, of whom one has been a Hindu, one a Sikh, two Muhammadans, and one a Christian. Of 19 such members appointed since the council was initiated, five have been ruling Princes or their near relatives, five have been land-owners, five have been distinguished officials of Native States or retired officials of Government, three were lawyers, and one was a banker. In considering how far the council as thus constituted has been representative of the different classes of the people, and in what manner representation should be insured if the system of appointment is altered, it may be convenient to have before you the statistics of the last census, which show that the percentage of the agricultural to the total population in the British districts of the province is 54 per cent., the Government officials, etc., constitute 1·8 per cent., the land-holders and tenants 52 per cent., the land-holders alone 34 per cent., the commercial classes 5 per cent., the literate population 3·8 per cent., those literate in English ·4 per cent., the population of the towns 1·1 per cent., the Hindus 38·8 per cent., Sikhs 7·5 per cent., and Muhammadans 53·3 per cent. At the same time, too much importance must not be attached to these statistics, as the interests represented by a given class are often important out of all proportion to its mere numerical weight. It has in this connection been suggested that even if the present system of nomination is otherwise maintained, the Senate of the University might be asked to elect one member for the council, and there are of course advantages in this method of receiving a representative of the educated classes, but there is, on the other hand, a certain inconvenience attending the introduction of a political element into a body, which is constituted for purely educational objects. The Lieutenant-Governor would be glad if this suggestion would be considered.

As regards the possible constitution of a Muhammadan electorate for the selection of special Muhammadan members, such as is suggested in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter, I am to say that statistics relating to the classes of electors suggested in that paragraph have been called for and will be forwarded on receipt (see also the end of paragraph 5 above).

As regards the proposed discussion of the Budget in the Legislative Council, it will be observed that the system of discussion of the Provincial Budget has not yet been introduced into the Punjab Provincial Council; but it is possible to introduce the system without difficulty if its results are thought likly to be useful. Should the Provincial Budget be brought before the council in the near future, it may be that, for some time at least, a general debate on the whole Budget would suffice for its proper discussion, but the Lieutenant-Governor would be glad to have opinions on this point, as well as on the advisability of permitting discussion.

10. The Lieutenant-Governor is sure that the officers consulted will recognise the very great importance of the questions now referred to them for opinion, and will give them their best consideration. It is specially desirable that the opinions of natives of all classes should be represented. The number of associations or individuals from whom formal written opinions will be obtained must necessarily be limited; but opportunity should be freely taken to discuss the matter verbally with as many as possible of all classes who are capable of forming an intelligent opinion upon it, and the general trend of the opinions thus elicited should be reported to Government. The officers consulted should give their opinions upon each of the questions referred to them. For instance, an officer who does not think that election should be allowed should nevertheless give his opinion, as to the best method of election, if that system is decided upon. In the Government of India letter the separate representation of Muhammadans only is considered; and the questions attached to this letter follow it. But in the Punjab the Sikh community also is of the greatest importance; and it should be considered whether any, and what, measures are necessary to ensure its adequate representation.

Questions on which opinions are desired in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th August 1907.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—Do you consider that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter would be of service to the country, and, if so, do you suggest any alterations in the proposals made in paragraph 5 regarding its constitution and duties?

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—Do you think that a provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution, and, if so, would you suggest any modification in the proposals made above and in paragraph 6 of the Government of India letter regarding its constitution and duties?

III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—Do you approve of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council, and, if so, would you suggest any modifications in the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter?

(4) In particular, do you approve of the proposal that one member should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council, as proposed in paragraph 13 of the letter?

(5) Do you approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners of this province to the Imperial Council, and, if so, by which of the three methods suggested in paragraph 15 of the letter (or by what other method) should he be selected? If by direct election, what should be the electorate?

(6) Do you approve of the proposed appointment of 4 Muhammadans to the Imperial Council, 2 by election and 2 at least by nomination, as suggested under heads D (d) and

E of paragraph 12 of the letter? Would you recommend that the elected members should be elected by the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Councils or by some such electorate as that described in paragraph 18 of the letter?

IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—Would you advocate an increase in the present number of members, and, if so, to what figure?

(8) Would you maintain the present system of nomination or would you have any or all of the unofficial seats filled by election?

(9) In either case would you advocate a fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class (paragraph 22 (a) of the Government of India letter), and, if so, what classes do you consider should be represented and in what proportions?

(10) If election is resorted to for the appointment of all or any of the unofficial members, would you advocate election through municipal or district boards? If so, on what system would the election be made? If not, what electorates would you suggest?

(11) If you advocate separate representation of classes as proposed in paragraph 22 (a) of the Government of India letter, would you carry it out in the manner proposed in paragraph 22 (b), and would you suggest any corresponding changes in the constitution of municipal and district boards in the manner indicated in paragraph 22 (c) or in any other manner?

(12) If you think provisions should be made for the separate representation of Muhammadans in addition to that open to them by nomination or election in the ordinary way, would you provide for such representation by nomination or by election, and, if by election, would you adopt the form of electorate suggested in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter, or what other form would you propose?

V. (13) Discussion of the Budget in the Legislative Council.—Do you consider that the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter?

(14) Do you consider that the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council, and, if so, would you advocate its discussion by separate heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter?

(15) Do you advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members?

No. 4680-G., dated Lahore, the 29th November 1907.

From—H. D. CRAIK, Esq., I.C.S., Registrar, Chief Court, Punjab,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

In reply to your letter no. 2644-S. (Home—Legislative), dated 27th September 1907, I am directed to forward herewith copies of the opinions recorded by the Hon'ble Sir W. O. Clark, Chief Judge, the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Chatterji, and the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Robertson on the proposals made by the Government of India for giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters.

H. D. CRAIK,

Registrar, Chief Court, Punjab.

Opinion by the Hon'ble Sir W. O. Clark, Chief Judge, Chief Court, Punjab.

I doubt if the present proposals will satisfy the desire of even the moderate Indians, who wish to see more power and influence made over to them. Advisory Councils with no powers and no legal status will not be valued by them, and will be looked upon rather as an appearance of a concession than a real concession.

It seems a somewhat cumbrous proposal to have two separate councils, so similar in their duties and personality as the Legislative and Advisory Council would be.

2. There are patent inconveniences in increasing the Legislative Councils to the extent proposed. It has suggested itself to me that the object could be attained with one council only consisting of (1) Members of the Legislative Council as at present, (2) an additional number of members (the proposed Imperial Councillors) who would have the right of discussing but not voting on legislative measure (this would obviate the necessity of increasing the number of official members), and of interpellation of the Budget

This would give these Imperial Councillors some definite position and power of influencing the Government and would ensure their being summoned at definite periods and having an opportunity of putting forward their views.

The whole council could of course still be used in the way it is now proposed to utilize the Advisory Councils.

3. I would slightly increase the Imperial Legislative Council by elected members as proposed in paragraphs 12 (2) D (a) (b), but not D (c) (d): these latter members would be much better nominated than elected.

I would have no special reservation for Muhammadans or classes. Equilibrium can be maintained by nomination, and this special reservation for Muhammadans is calculated to be disagreeable to other religions.

4. As regards the Imperial Councillors referred to in paragraph 5, I think that the ruling Chiefs are not desirable to the extent of 20. I do not think that the ruling Chiefs are as a rule sufficiently conversant with affairs in British India.

Though I am opposed generally to election as entirely unsuited in this country, and I think that the formation of a special voting constituency is objectionable, yet I should be disposed to allow certain bodies such as Municipal Committees of large towns and Senates of Universities and Chambers of Commerce, Bar Associations to elect members, and I think it is very desirable to admit a considerable number of members of the legal profession to the Advisory Council. They are highly intelligent, independent, and familiar with the sentiments of the people.

5. The above general remarks deal with questions I, III put by the Punjab Government.

As regards question II, I would deal with the Provincial Advisory Council on similar lines.

As regards question 4, I think perhaps one or two of the non-official members might be elected by the Senate and by the Municipal Committees of Amritsar, Delhi, and Lahore in rotation. The number of members might be increased from 10 to 12.

I would have no fixed rule as to representation of classes; this can be provided for by nomination.

As regards question 5, I would answer yes on all three heads.

W. O. CLARK,

Chief Judge, Chief Court, Punjab.

Opinion by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice P. C. Chatterji, Judge, Chief Court, Punjab.

In writing this note I have spoken in some matters with a certain amount of freedom which I would not ordinarily use, but without which I could not have given full expression to my views.

I shall endeavour to keep to the lines indicated in the letter of His Honour, but before I begin to discuss the questions taken up in the letter of the Government of India, I may be permitted to make one remark with reference to paragraph 9 of the letter in which the Government of India speak of the preponderance of lawyers in the Provincial as well as the Imperial Councils after the amendments of their constitution in 1892. They are pleased to say that they "do not deny that the professional classes are entitled to a share of representation proportioned not merely to their numbers, which are small, but to their influence, which is large and tends to increase. But they are not prepared to allow them a virtual monopoly of the power exercised by the council." They then proceed to devise the requisite counterpoise.

Let me observe here that this excessive representation appears not merely in the elections by district boards and municipalities, but also in the nominations by the various local Governments and the Imperial Government as well. The preponderance evidently has not been hitherto thought prejudicial and is clearly due to natural causes. Lawyers represent people in courts and in numerous other matters in ordinary life. There is nothing wonderful therefore in the electors trusting to their representation in the councils. Some of the selections, however, were educational men and their election is also capable of explanation on somewhat similar grounds, viz., to the confidence reposed in them by the various classes composing the electorate with whom they come in contact in the discharge of their teaching functions.

The fact is that Indian lawyers at present represent the cream of the educated classes. The educational standard for degrees in law is high, and the work of the lawyer calls forth some of the best powers of the human mind, which get developed and matured in the practice of his profession. The best of our educated men who are conscious of possessing abilities and who like freedom and consider there is not a sufficient opening for them in Government service naturally join the Bar. Lawyers have prominence also under the parliamentary system of England and France, and it may be observed that some of the ablest ministers of His Majesty in the present Liberal Cabinet are distinguished lawyers.

The legal profession, however, is now overstocked and no longer offers the same attractions to talented young men as before. It may be expected that a considerable section of these will in future betake themselves to other profession such as manufactures and trade. In that case the present preponderance of lawyers in the councils will probably diminish. The evil, such as it is, will considerably abate in the course of a few years, and I venture to doubt whether it is necessary to devise special measures to combat it.

I might also state here that English educated Indians are as a rule friends of the British Government, the methods of which they might desire to be changed in certain respects, but which they have not the remotest wish to see removed from the country. They also belong to the best and most intellectual classes of the population, those in fact who have administered the country from the earliest times, if they have not ruled it, and that they are not in any sense base-born as they are sometimes represented to be, particularly in certain Anglo-Indian newspapers. Brahmins, Khshatris, Kayasthas, and Vaysias form the cream of the Hindu castes, and the remark applies with more or less force to Muhammadans also. The number of base-born educated men whom once it used to be the boast of the British race to have drawn out of obscurity and subjection is still small.

With these preliminary remarks I proceed to discuss the questions raised in the letter of the Government of India.

1. Advisory Councils.—Purely Advisory Councils are a cumbrous device, but in the present circumstances I think on the whole they are likely to be beneficial. They would afford the representatives of the people opportunities to express their views on measures of administration affecting themselves. If this can be provided by the constitution of the councils their usefulness will be demonstrably apparent in a short time. Other advantages are stated in the letter of the Government of India.

(a) Imperial Advisory Councils.—According to the constitution proposed by the Government of India, the members of the Imperial Advisory Council are to consist of 20 ruling Chiefs and 40 territorial magnates drawn from the different provinces. The members for each province will also be members of the Advisory Council for that province. The functions of the council will consist in giving advice to His Excellency the Governor-General when asked either individually or in small groups or committees. But there is no provision for their meeting together and their advice will be confidential.

I am doubtful whether there will be any benefit in enrolling ruling Chiefs in the council. They might be interested in the affairs of India collectively in dealing with a foreign State, viz., when a treaty is to be made or a war with a foreign power to be declared by the Government of India, but they have little or no interest in the administration of the internal affairs of British India. It is also questionable whether they will be competent advisers, as without good educational and administrative training their opinions and sympathies will be likely to be in favour of the course they would pursue in the matter put before them had it arisen within their own territories. The original theory of Government among Hindus is that the King is the father of his people uncontrolled in his power, but bound to follow their collective opinion. The most notable example of this is furnished by the hero of the Ramayana whose memory is cherished throughout Hindu India as the model king, and who put away his virtuous, faithful, and dearly loved wife merely because his subjects disapproved of her living with him. History does not record a greater instance of deference to public opinion by a warlike and despotic king well able, by his military powers, to enforce obedience to his authority. Among Muhammadans the despotic power of the king is controlled by the ullema. But modern rulers of India have hardly kept up to these ideals, and as under the ægis of British protection they are safe from foreign invasion as well as internal rebellion, there is no need for them to consult the wishes of their subjects. The only check upon them is the notice that might be taken by the paramount power if their misrule passes all bounds. There are of course a number of noble exceptions such as the Gaekwar, the Maharaja of Mysore, and some others, but the bias of the majority presumably would be in favour of the despotic use of the kingly power. Further they cannot be expected to intimately know or to carefully investigate the conditions obtaining in British India and the opinions of the better classes of His Majesty's Indian subjects. In giving their advice they will presumably act in ignorance of facts and be swayed by their personal predilections.

His Majesty the King-Emperor has certainly the right to the advice of any of them if he condescends to ask for it. They would doubtless regard the title of Councillor as a great addition to their dignity, but I am disposed to think that they would value it more if it was conferred permanently, i.e., for life. It may be doubted whether they would relish the idea of its being taken away after a term.

I do not also quite see why the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils should be recruited on wholly different principles and why only territorial magnates should be admitted to the former and no other class of His Majesty's subjects as in the latter. The territorial magnates might form a larger proportion of it and the qualifications as to property and position of the other members might be higher, but it should possess a representative character. It must not be forgotten that the Legislative Councils have no advisory functions and can only interpellate or criticize the policy of Government at the time of Budget debate. The Advisory Councils should therefore reflect the opinions of His Majesty's subjects as a body as far as possible and not merely those of territorial magnates and of ruling Chiefs having no interest in the internal administration of the country. The Provincial Advisory Councils are thus projected on more practical and useful lines and the Imperial Advisory Council should be formed somewhat on the same model. Besides, on the proposed plan, all the members except some ruling Chiefs will have already given their opinion in the Provincial Council on questions affecting the provinces. These would often be of Imperial interest also. Thus there will be few matters on which Imperial Coucillors alone, as such, will require to be consulted, and on which they will not have already given their opinions as Provincial Councillors. If therefore besides the ruling Chiefs there are no other members who are not also on the Provincial Councils the use of the Imperial Council will be small, and it will be something of a merely ornamental body. Further the proposals contained in paragraph 5 (7) of the Government of India letter as to its mode of meeting will also tend somewhat to give it the same character. If the members have not to meet and to consult together collectively, except on rare and uncertain occasions, and there are to be merely separate references to them in secret at the Governor-General's pleasure, the public and they themselves will be likely to lose interest in their functions as well as the sense of responsibility.

I would therefore suggest that the constitution of the Imperial Advisory Council be made similar to that of Provincial Councils as respects recruitment of members, and that a definite rule be laid down fixing the mode and time of their meetings and prescribing the procedure for such meetings. The proceedings might be confidential unless specially ordered otherwise by the Governor-General.

(b) Provincial Advisory Councils.—I have stated my views above sufficiently in respect of such councils. I am disposed to think that they will be productive of considerable good. I would further suggest that a definite rule be laid down as to the time of their meeting. They might meet at least once a year if not twice. Matters previously referred to them for consideration might be threshed out at such meetings.

I further venture to think that neither kind of Advisory Council will fully meet the requirements of the times, as they are to be given no power of initiative as regards advice and would not be in constant touch with the Executive. What is wanted is a small body of responsible advisers who should give their opinion on all Government measures in so far as they affect the people and serve as a sort of medium of communication between Government and its subjects. But it is doubtful whether any such proposal is within the scope of this reference, and I therefore content myself with merely mentioning it.

Enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council.—I consider that an expansion of this council is imperatively required. As regards its constitution, it is difficult to make an alternative proposal to that of the Government of India in paragraph 12 of their letter without proceeding on radical lines which would be inconvenient and for which the country is probably not yet fitted. I therefore refrain from proposals for a different kind of electorate, and suggest the following modifications:—

I would reduce the maximum in clause 2 A to 19 which would make the council consist of 27 officials and give them a majority of one in 53. With the Viceroy their number would be 28 or a permanent majority of two.

I have at present nothing to say against the proposal contained in sub-head (b) under head D of paragraph 12 (2) of the Government of India letter and explained in paragraph 13. This is merely an extension of the existing practice.

As regards sub-head (c) I have nothing to urge against the Government of India's proposal, but would reduce the qualifying annual revenue payable by the elector to Rs. 5,000 a year in order to allow of a proper representation of this class. A joint estate paying such sum should be held entitled to vote though the shares of the owners taken separately would disqualify them, the vote being a single one. This would constitute an electorate of 52 persons in this province—a small and easily manageable body, though it will perhaps be wanting in solidarity. But no other method will give perfectly satisfactory representation, certainly not election by the land-holding members of the Provincial Council. I speak here with particular reference to this province about which some information is before me. The election will of course be subject to confirmation by His Excellency the Viceroy.

As regards (d) I am inclined to take exception to the representation here allowed to Muhammadans. If the rules hitherto in force do not allow of adequate representation of Muhammandans something doubtless ought to be done to secure that representation, but in my humble opinion the method in (d) appears to be open to very serious objections. The Muhammadans are entitled to adequate representation not over-representation. Now seeing the recent activity of Muhammadans in support of their interest which is of course quite legitimate and perfectly reasonable it might easily happen that they would obtain undue preponderance in numbers in the council. According to the Government of India scheme non-official Indians will be appointed mainly, if not entirely, under heads D and E and excluding sub-head (a) under which Europeans alone will probably be selected, there are about 20 places for them. If the Muhammadans get four places for certain under D (c) and E, they will obtain one-fifth of the seats, which is about the ratio they bear to the population. Then they are sure to get one if not two seats under D (c) and probably under D (b) also. They will thus get about seven or eight seats for certain and possibly more. In that event there will be over-representation in their case as compared to Hindus, allowing for the probable elections of Sikhs or Christians. In numbers they form little more than one-fourth of the Hindus. This, considering their comparative solidarity, would be over-representation and probably be resented by other classes of His Majesty's subjects.

Secondly, the concession of a special right of representation on the ground of religion is dangerous in principle and must lead to claims by other important religious minorities also, such as the Sikhs to whom a concession of this nature can hardly be made without further trenching on the rights of Hindus. Perhaps, I should say that a special favour of this nature granted to Muhammadans will probably mortify the Hindus. It must not be wholly forgotten that when they ceased to be reinforced periodically by fresh swarms from Central Asia the Empire of India was lost to Muhammadans, before the advent of the British who won it by fighting the Hindus.

The adjustment of the balance of representation in the case of Muhammadans must be left as before in the hands of Government. If the number of officials be reduced from 20 to 19 and (d) eliminated there will be 7 nominations in the gift of Government under E, and there will be ample margin left for rectifying inequalities in the case of Muhammadans. They are also practically sure to get 2 if not 4 seats under (b) and (c) of head D. If a fixed number is to be allotted to them at all under any head, which is to be deprecated, I would prefer a minimum of 2 under E (i.e., leave the clause as it stands) to giving them any under a special sub-head like (c) which would cause heart-burning and probably give offence. Allowing for their importance they should get 5 seats instead of 4 which is about their proper share, and if the Government is disposed to favour them still further they might give them 6 seats out of the 20 or 21 mentioned by me. Probably the best plan is to give them an assurance that the nominations will be so made as to secure them 5 or 6 (if that is decided on) seats in all under E. The nomination will of course be made after seeing the result of the elections under sub-heads (b) and (c) of D.

To complete my remarks I further state that in case it is decided to maintain sub-clause (d) as it is, the electorate should be composed of men falling under classes (a) and (c) of paragraph 17 which should be made mutually exclusive but not those falling under (b). The concession of the right of election to Muhammadan fellows alone of the local University would be extremely objectionable and likely to offend non-Muhammadans and to give rise to opposition. There ought not to be much difficulty in compiling registers of voters falling under (c). The same electorate might be asked to send up some names for nomination by Government under E if sub-clause (d) of D is struck out. It would also be unadvisable to confer the right on the very small body of Muhammadan members of the Provincial Council as it would entirely destroy the representative character of the member who will simply reflect the views of the persons electing him.

Provincial Legislative Councils.—I was at first opposed to the creation of a Legislative Council for the Punjab, and this was the view of Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick as well. The history of the council since its formation has, I should think, to a certain extent justified the misgivings as to its usefulness originally felt, but as it is now established I am of opinion that it should be expanded.

As at present advised, I think an addition of five elected Indian members would suffice. There are five members appointed by nomination, and I think this system and the principle on which the nominations are at present made should be maintained. The elected members I would distribute thus. Two members, one Muhammadan and one Hindu or Sikh, by the land-holding electorate as shown in the figures given in the Punjab Government letter, page 2, paragraph 5. The electorate is small and may be slightly increased by lowering the annual revenue to Rs. 2,000 or Rs. 2,500, but the qualification of the member should not I think be reduced, though this has its drawbacks too. The Muhammadans might vote for the Muhammadan member and the Hindus and Sikhs for the Hindu member, and I think the Christians might be allowed to vote with the Hindus as this would tend to improve the quality of the Hindu member. But the alternative of all of them being allowed to vote for both is perhaps preferable, and I should be on the whole in favour of it.

The other two members, one Hindu and one Muhammadan, should be allowed to be elected by the district boards and the municipalities voting together and not alternately.

The electorate of both the municipalities and the district boards I believe provide for the representation of Hindus, Muhammadans, and Sikhs, and I have no doubt that where this is wanting suitable changes can be made in order to secure that result.

The fifth member might be elected by the University though this would introduce a political element in that body which is not altogether desirable. But such a measure is in force elsewhere and there can be no more feasible method of allowing representation to the English educated community.

As a counterpoise to the five elected additional members, I would suggest the nomination of four more officials and one European at the suggestion of the local Chamber of Commerce to represent trade interests. The fifth member among the five non-officials selected under the existing rules might be an Indian Christian or member of some other religious body. The council of twenty would then be fairly representative. The only drawback will be the large number of officials required for nomination, but I would minimise the difficulty by nominating one or two Indian officials. Moreover the Punjab Council does not meet often or hold its sessions for long.

I think the above scheme answers the points raised in questions 8 to 11 of the Punjab Government letter as far as I am able to answer them.

As regards question 12, I do not think special representation should be allowed to Muhammadans. The reasons have already been given. Under the scheme suggested by me, I think they will have adequate representation. If the Sikh nominated member is excluded from consideration they would have a majority over the Hindus. If he is included there can be no harm done, as Sikhs and Hindus form 46·3 per cent. of the population of the Punjab and the Muhammadans have only 7 per cent. more, a difference which cannot be conveniently taken into account in arranging for representation. I further believe, though I speak subject to correction, that the aggregate wealth of the Hindus and the number of educated men among them is greater, which is a sufficient counterpoise.

I would deprecate the formation of a special electorate for Muhammadans only as proposed in paragraph 17 of the letter of the Government of India and particularly the concession of the right of voting to class (3) where a similar right is not given to Hindu graduates who I believe are much more numerous.

Discussion of Budgets.—I consider the method of discussion of Budgets proposed by the Government of India will be beneficial and have no suggestions to make.

It will be an useful improvement if Budget was discussed in the Punjab Council also, but I hardly think a detailed discussion like that for the Imperial Budget is required for this council. I am not clear whether any motion can be proposed by non-official members, but, if it can be, sufficient notice of the contents of the Budget which will doubtless be given will enable them to do so.

Interpellation by members in the Punjab Council.—I advocate the introduction of this power. It will be beneficial and will put the Punjab on a footing of equality with other Provinces.

P. C. CHATTERJI,
Judge, Chief Court, Punjab.

Opinion by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice F. A. Robertson, Judge, Chief Court, Punjab.

Question (1).—I think some such Advisory Council would be of benefit to the country. I think that one-third, 20, is too large a proportion of ruling Chiefs, one-fourth, 15, would be better. But I think "brain and enterprise" should be represented on the council as well as the hereditary leaders of the people. There are questions of great importance constantly arising on which the hereditary leaders of the people might not be the most competent advisers, and it is in my opinion very desirable to have the intellectual and commercial leaders of the people represented as well as, what, of course, must form the main body, the hereditary leaders. The apparent intention of excluding them has given rise to much alarm and dissatisfaction among the educated Hindus. It appears to be worth consideration whether it would not be well to extend to the members of such a council the right to address the President (the Viceroy I presume) in an autograph communication on any subject of public importance. Such communications should be always autograph, otherwise demagogues might get hold of one or more of the members and send in their own concoctions under the member's signature. Such further restriction as may be necessary might be imposed, but it would, I think, be well to enable councillors to offer advice, or opinions, if they so desire. This at least merits further consideration.

Question (2).—I am not sure that Provincial Advisory Councils are so desirable as an Imperial one, but on the whole I think it would be a useful experiment. Subject to the remarks made above, regarding the Imperial Advisory Council, the general proposals in paragraph 6 appear to be suitable. I entirely concur in the view that "it is essential that the smaller land-holders, industry, commerce, capital, and the professional classes should also be included in the council." These classes at present do not appear to understand that this is the policy to be pursued, and are rather alarmed than pleased in consequence at the proposals put forward.

Question (3).—I think it would be a great mistake to increase the size of the Imperial Legislative Council to the extent proposed. It would be an exceedingly unwieldy body, and one extremely difficult to call or to keep together. I would reduce the number to 28 thus:—

I would cut out seven non-official members to be elected by the Provincial Councils. The non-official members of those councils do not appear to me to form sufficiently large or influential or representative bodies to make them suitable constituencies for the purpose. I would then cut out the two members to be elected by Muhammadans. I think this is a proposal based on a wrong principle, and it is one which has caused much alarm and has given great offence to the Hindu community. I would retain the four seats to be filled by nominations to represent minorities, but here again I would not specifically lay down that two or any number should be of necessity Muhammadans. It would be rather inconvenient, if the Muhammadans were found to be already over-represented, to be obliged to nominate two more. No doubt Muhammadans will have in all probability to be nominated for some time, but the present proposal seems to be unnecessarily invidious and calculated to create unnecessary alarm and annoyance.

I would also reduce the number of the nobles and great land-owners to 4 instead of 7. This class will be so largely represented on the Advisory Council that it is not necessary to crowd the Legislative Council in order to represent them more largely.

As to the number of officials, it is difficult to see how 20 could possibly be got together.

The council as it would stand under these proposals would consist of—

Ex-officio	8
Additional officials	7
A ruling Chief	1
By Chamber of Commerce	2
By nobles and great land-owners	4
Non-officials to represent minorities	4
Experts	2

A total of 28 which is ample now that the Advisory Councils are to be established. It would consist of 15 officials and 13 non-officials.

One word more. I would ask leave to add, and that is that I think it is a great misfortune for the councils that Judges are not allowed to be members. I quite see the point that those who are to declare the law afterwards should not be members of an assembly that makes it, but two points in this connection have been overlooked. The first is that the principle is perpetually violated by the appointment of Revenue-Judicial officials, especially to the Provincial Council, when it is employed in making laws to be administrated by revenue courts. It is a common occurrence for the presiding officer of the head revenue court of a province to introduce a law to be entirely administered by revenue courts of which he is the chief, and very frequently such Bills contain clauses taking away jurisdiction from the ordinary civil courts and conferring it on revenue courts, several of the presiding officers of which are sure to be on the council. If it is correct for, say, a member of a Board of Revenue, or a Financial Commissioner, to be on a council passing a law of which he will, as a revenue court (not revenue officer), be the final exponent, it is difficult to see where the objection to putting a Judge in a similar position arises. And as a matter of fact, the appointment of one or two Judges to the Imperial Council would really be quite unobjectionable, and their presence would tend very largely to diminish a class of mistake in legislation only too common. At the same time I have no wish to see Judges of the Chief Court, still in office, on Local Legislative Councils. But retired Native Judges would be very useful and should be freely employed both in the Imperial and Provincial Councils, and officers serving in the judicial ranks, whether European or Native, might be put into Provincial Councils with advantage.

Question III (4).—I have already answered this. I think the Imperial Legislative Councils should not exceed 28, and I would cut out those members to be elected by local councils.

Question III (5).—At present I think the only possible means of selecting one of the great land-owning classes to represent the province is nomination by the local Government.

The only modifications, which appear possible, would be to allow all land-owners paying a land revenue of, say, Rs. 1,000 and upwards to vote for, say, 2 or 3 members of their own district to be placed on a Provincial list from which the local Government should select its own nominee. This would give a Provincial list of 60 to 90 for selection. Any system of direct nomination or election would, I think, be quite unsuitable and objectionable in the Punjab.

Question III (6).—I approve of the appointment of 2 Muhammadans to the Imperial Council by nomination, when necessary. But I do not think, as noted above, that the 4 places should be reserved absolutely for Muhammadans, and I think the appointments should be by nomination by the Viceroy and not by election.

As regards election, if there is to be election, I would suggest that a list of fit persons, say 20, should be nominated by Muhammadan land-owners paying land revenue of Rs. 1,000 or over; non-agricultural Muhammadans paying an income-tax representing an annual income of Rs. 25,000 on a land revenue and income-tax combined of Rs. 1,000 and over; Muhammadan Fellows of the Punjab University.

From the 20 persons so nominated the local Government of the Punjab, when it is the turn of that Province, should select its nominee.

Question IV (7).—I must say frankly that at present I doubt very much if the Punjab is sufficiently equipped for the very difficult and technical work of Legislation. It would be idle to pretend that the council has so far proved a great success. In my opinion there should only be one Legislative body for India, but if, as I presume and regret is the case, it is intended to maintain the local councils, they, at least the Punjab one, certainly require some strengthening. It would increase the number slightly, say to 12, 7 official and 5 non-official, provided new fields for recruitment can be devised.

Question IV (8).—I would have no election, but would have the whole number nominated, it being understood that of the 5, at least one should be Muhammadan, one a Hindu or Sikh, and one a non-official European. I do not think any system of election would be advisable, but if any should be introduced, the election should be of a number of suitable persons from whom the local Government should nominate.

Question IV (10).—I do not advocate any system of election, certainly not one through municipalities and district boards.

Question IV (11).—I have already answered this. I would nominate.

Question VI (12).—I think sufficient provision for the representation of Muhammadans would be made by the rule, one of the 5 should always be Muhammadan, and by using the remaining 2 nominations as might be desirable.

Question V (13).—I have consulted Mr. Justice Kensington, who is more familiar with this part of the subject than I am, and after doing so I am much in favour of the alteration suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter in regard to discussion of the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council. The Budget debate, as at present conducted, appears to be uninitiated to be at best infructuous and at worst a source of positive mischief. The certainty, which certain members of the council now feel that nothing they may say has the smallest chance of being accepted, tends to encourage them in making wild and irresponsible speeches, which are not really addressed to the council so much as to the outside world controlled by wire-pullers. The alteration suggested should go far towards remedying this.

Question V (14).—I am inclined to say that no useful purpose would be achieved by discussion of Budget in the Punjab Legislative Council. The conditions under which a Provincial Budget is framed preclude such discussion from practical result.

At the same time, if there is any real feeling among the non-official members of the Council that they should not continue to be deprived of such facility for Budget discussion as is given in other provinces, I would concede the point rather than make a somewhat invidious distinction. But in that case it would be well to, as far as possible, introduce the system of discussion by separate heads, and I would make it clear from the start that practical suggestions only are wanted and not an aimless discussion of things in general.

Question V (15).—Yes. I do not think that it would be of advantage to introduce the power of interpellation in the Punjab Legislative Council.

Opinion on Punjab Government letter No. 2643-S., dated the September 1907.

The proposals formulated by the Government of India have been made with the view of giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters, and with the particular object of devising a scheme of constitutional reference in making adequate provision for representing the landed aristocracy of India, the mercantile and industrial classes and the great body of men, who, under existing conditions, have no sufficient inducement to political life, and who find but little scope for the exercise of their legitimate influence. It is stated that these classes have profited greatly by the educational advantages offered to them under British rule, and they are anxious to be afforded an opportunity of expressing their views on matters of practical administration.

Before entering into the details of the proposals, it seems necessary to discuss the proposition stated above, and the reason for the present position of affairs. In most questions involving administrative changes or proposals for new legislations, the opinions of the heads of districts are called for, and are given not only as representing their personal views, but also as representing the general opinion of the residents of the district. Formerly the head of a district had special days set apart for visitors who were received by him at his house, and who not only expressed their views on any matters discussed, but also ventured remarks on matters of general administration. In this manner the head of the district saw all the men of influence in his district individually some five or six times during the year. Owing partly to increased pressure of work, the time the district officer is now able to allow the visitors is far less than it used to be, with the growing result that there is less informal conversation with visitors, who mostly approach him for some particular object. The result has been that his intimate acquaintance with the views held by the residents of his district is not the same as it used to be. This state of things has been further accentuated by the progress of education; men who have obtained position through their educational abilities and who, perhaps, have taken their degree in England, do not consider that they are being treated with the respect due to that position, when they have to take a seat in the verandah, as is almost always the case, and wait until the district officer is at leisure to receive them. This leads them to discontinue such visits, and their lead is followed by others until finally the district officer has very little chance of hearing the opinions of this class except through the newspapers, which are too often unreliable. The breach which undoubtedly exists between the officers of Government and the educated classes, taken as a whole, is, I consider, not only political but in a large measure social.

As the proceedings in the Legislative Councils are, and must be, in English, the choice of members, whether by election or nomination, is necessarily very limited, owing to the small number of possible candidates who possess such a qualification. It is stated in the letter of the Government of India that out of the 388 non-official members who have been appointed to the Provincial Councils since 1893, whether by election or nomination, 36 per cent. have been lawyers and only 22 per cent. landowners. It may be accepted that, had it been possible, the proportion of land-owners would have been larger, and that the reason why so few were nominated is to be found in the fact that a greater number having English qualifications were not available. At the present moment the men who not only have a good colloquial knowledge of English, but who are also in daily communication with all classes of the community, are the lawyers: no other class can be compared with them in this respect. It is true that many of the sons of the landed gentry attain a fair knowledge of English during their course at the Aitchison College, but in many cases they either fail to keep it up and gradually forget what they had learned or else they rather lose touch with their surroundings by adopting European customs and manners. This question of language will affect the result of all elections on whatever basis they may be held, as it will speedily be recognised who lacks the power of expressing himself in English will be unable to represent the views of the electors.

I. (1) I do not consider that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter would be of sufficient service to the country to warrant its formation. The government of this country is in the hands of the Governor-General in Council, and in all matters of importance it is assisted by the advice of local Government and administration. It can hardly be expected that the opinion of an Imperial Advisory Council would be accepted as against the advice of local Government and administration, and though membership of such a council might confer honour and prestige, it would have little other effect. The territorial magnates whom it is proposed to appoint to such councils would in almost every case have given their opinion on the subject to their own local Government, and it seems almost useless to call upon them again to give a confidential and secret opinion. It can hardly be supposed that any would be submitted to such a council which had not previousy been discussed with the local Governments. At the same time, I consider that it would not be unwise to associate the great ruling Chiefs with the Government of India, and to ask for their advice on matters of sufficient importance, though it is doubtful whether any advantage would be gained from their collective consultation.

If an "Imperial Advisory Council" be formed as suggested I agree with the proposals in paragraphs (2), (3), (4), (5), (6), but have doubts whether it would be possible or expedient, the collective consultations should be kept confidential. This is particularly the case if such a council is to be used as an agency for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions, and objects of Government.

II. (2) I consider that a Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution. As regards its duties, there seems no objection, and at the same time no particular benefit, in the opinions recorded by individual members being treated as confidential, but I consider that any collective opinion recorded by the council should not be treated as confidential; it would be very difficult to keep secret the matter on which the council had been consulted, and in order to prevent misrepresentation of the conclusion the council had formed on such a subject it would be advisable that such opinion be published.

The Advisory Council will be specially summoned for deliberation by the heads of the province, in cases when a collective opinion is required from it, but I consider that in addition there should be an obligatory meeting at least once during each year. In paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter it is stated that the Advisory Council, when summoned for the purpose of collective deliberation, would be enabled to offer their counsel on matters affecting the welfare of the people.

The proposals made in paragraph 5 (6) are not quite the same as the above, as it is stated that the functions of the Advisory Council should be purely advisory, and that it should deal only with such matters as might be specifically referred to it from time to time. If my interpretation of paragraph 4 is correct the proposal is one which seems likely to lead to most important results, in affording means of an expression of opinion on matters affecting the welfare of the people. The collective opinion of such a body on any question of social reform would undoubtedly carry great weight with the Government, and I think would be welcomed as a constitutional method in which an authoritative opinion could be put forward.

It is one of the chief complaints against our system of government in this country that the inhabitants of the province have as yet been given no way of expressing their views in a recognised manner; this would be afforded to them under these proposals. My view is that the opinion of this council should be taken on any matter affecting the welfare of the people, which a councillor may desire to bring forward subject always to the proviso that such proposal or resolution be previously submitted to the head of the province and that he approves of its discussion. It does not follow that it need necessarily be discussed, as the council would always have the power to decline to discuss it, or to formulate any collective opinion on it.

As regards the constitution of this body, half the members should be land-owners, having not less than some fixed property qualification; the others should be as representative as possible of the various classes, having either qualifications as income-tax payers, as land-owners, or as having an educational qualification; the qualification in all cases must be sufficiently high.

I do not consider that in the Punjab it would be possible to obtain a really representative body, except by nominations the difficulties in any scheme of election are very great, and I am very doubtful whether their election, under the present conditions, would either be popular or effective. As regards minor details, my opinion is that the term of appointment of members should be limited to three years, and I am unable to agree that the deliberation of such a body should be informal, but think that specific rules of procedure should be laid down and implicitly followed.

III. (3) The proposal is to increase the council up to a total of 541 by the appointment of additional members. These additional new members would be—

14 nominated officials.
2 ,, non-officials.
13 elected members.

It seems doubtful whether, with the addition of so many members, the progress of legislation will not be rather retarded than improved, but it is difficult to see how an increased elective membership can be of much use, unless the members are raised as suggested.

III. (4) Yes. At the same time it is not stated whether the member elected is to be one from among the non-official members of the Provincial Council or not. In the latter case, I consider that qualifications, to enable a man to stand for election, should be distinctly laid down.

III. (5) I consider that in the present circumstances of the Punjab, a better result would be obtained by the nomination of a member to represent the land-owners than by any form of election. The number of land-holders on the Provincial Council would be too few to form an electorate, and an electorate composed of the entire body of land-owners would not be satisfactory, specially as there appears to be no standard of qualification.

III. (6) I do not approve of the proposed appointment of 4 Muhammadans to the Imperial Council—2 by nomination and 2 by election. I consider that the words "not less than two to be Muhammadans" should be struck out. It hardly seems necessary to tie the hands of the Viceroy in such matter; he would nominate non-officials to represent minorities, and his discretion need not be fettered by legislative enactment.

I have great doubts as to the advisability of reserving special appointment, by election, for Muhammadans; it introduces the matter of religion into politics, and singles out the members of a particular persuasion for special treatment. I should prefer to see these two elected appointments reserved for nomination by the Viceroy, who would always be able to consider the interests of minorities.

In case election is resorted to, I do not consider that the power of election should be put into the hands of the few Muhammadan members of the Provincial Council, but think that the electorate should be on a wider basis, the register of voters being compiled from Fellows of the Universities, payers of income-tax, and landed proprietors together.

IV. (7) Yes. I consider that a larger representation of the non-official element is required. The whole number should not exceed 20, of whom 10 should be officials, exclusive of the Lieutenant-Governor.

IV. (8) I would maintain the present system of nomination in preference to election. Both methods are open to objection, but judging from the results of elections for the district boards and municipalities, I hardly think that the best men would, under the present conditions, either stand for election or would be elected. It is well known that a member, nominated to either a municipal committee or to a district board, considers his status rather superior to that of an elected member, and men have been known, not infrequently, to decline nomination for an elective vacancy, through their dislike of being obliged to compete with others for such a post. As long as election is regarded in this manner, it must surely be unwise to select members for the Legislative Council by this method. It may be, that by degrees, the hereditary principle will give way to election and we shall then find an electorate to our hand on the basis of the village. It does not seem improbable that, in the future, headmen of the village will obtain their posts by election and not for life but for a limited term; then they in their turn will be able to elect zaildars, who will elect representatives of tahsils, and in this way a real electorate may be formed.

But the hereditary feeling is still very strong in the country and the people are not ready to receive the principle of election on a popular basis, and if such system was commenced, there would be fear of raising up a class of professional politicians, whose opinions would not represent in any way the real opinion of the people.

On the other hand, a member nominated by Government is somewhat inclined to think that his selection is an honour paid to him personally, and in return, that it is rather his duty to support any measures of Government; this feeling is not so strong as it was, and a nominated member is beginning to recognise that his appointment is not so much personal as representative. The present choice lies between these two systems: nomination, under which members have a leaning to support measures generally, and election, under which members come in, rather with the object of destructive criticism, than with the view of assisting the deliberations of Government. The elective system, so far as it has been tried, has not proved a success, while nomination has been by no means a failure, and no sufficient arguments have been advanced to justify the change.

IV. (9) I am not in favour of determining the proportion of seats to be allotted by race, or by caste, or by religion.

IV. (10) I am unable to advocate election through municipal boards, the election of the members of such boards depending so much, as they do, on matters of purely local interest. With the present low franchise, I am also unable to advocate election through district boards, but if the franchise were raised considerably, it might form an electorate. I should prefer to have the electorate divided among tax-payers, men with education, and revenue payers.

IV. (11) The only separate representation of classes that would be possible would be on the basis of religion; I think that for the purpose of district board elections villages of the same religion should be grouped together more than they are at present, so that a fair representation of men of different religions could be obtained. In towns this could also be done by arrangement of the elective circles. I think that both district and municipal boards would be improved by the formation of such electoral groups, and by the insistence that the election should be literate and have proper qualifications higher than are necessary at present.

IV. (12) If a municipal electorate for Muhammadans is to be formed, I would suggest that the qualifications of electors should be that they were graduates of the Punjab University and were also qualified through payment of income-tax or by land revenue.

V. (13) Yes.

V. (14) The Budget as now published is almost unintelligible except to experts, but I think that if it could be expounded in a comprehensive and simple form, that there would be no necessity for detailed discussion. As education advances, people take more interest in the finances of the province, and display a laudable anxiety to know in what manner the revenues are being spent. I would rather leave it to the Advisory Councils to make suggestions on it than have a formal debate in the Legislative Council on its separate heads.

V. (15) I do not consider that the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation would be of much use; the meetings are so few and are held at such long intervals that were such power to be granted it could be but very seldom exercised.

H. S. P. DAVIES, Lieutenant-Colonel,
Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

Imperial Advisory Council.

Question 1.—Personally, I do not think that an Imperial Advisory Council as sketched in the Government of India letter will be of much good. From what I have been able to gather from persons with whom I have talked over this matter, there is a general feeling that a council constituted as laid down in clause (3) of paragraph 5 would only be a sort of make-believe and not accepted as a genuine attempt by Government to cope with a difficult situation.

As regards the people and their wants, I do not think the ruling Chiefs, or the territorial magnates from the various provinces, are in any sense in touch with the people, nor have they advanced with the times, with but few exceptions, nor, except in matters where Imperial India is concerned, do I see how ruling Chiefs can possibly have the requisite knowledge to make their advice and opinion worth having.

I don't think that as regards this province we can say that the territorial magnates occupy the position, now, as hereditary leaders of the people which they did half a century ago. For this education the British Raj is wholly responsible, and we cannot ignore the leading representatives of the educated community, who in a far truer sense are leaders of the people than those mentioned in paragraph 5, clause (3), of the letter under discussion, and who would in many respects make more competent advisers. I would have an Imperial Advisory Council most certainly; the idea I suppose is to have a sort of upper house, but to make them really useful I would invest them with responsibilities. If the ruling Chiefs' idea is to be maintained then add another 20 members, and have 20 ruling Chiefs, 30 territorial magnates, and 30 representing the educated and other classes of the community. Then, the results of their consultations and meetings should not be private and confidential, but be given the widest publicity. How can any public, or section of the public, have any confidence in such Star Chamber sort of meetings, and what good can be obtained by the public not knowing what the opinions of these councillors are. Presumably it is impossible to give them the power of assembling on their own motion, but I think it should be definitely stated that they should be called upon to meet at least once a year and be allowed to present addresses on any serious occasion or necessity to Government.

Provincial Advisory Councils.

Question (2).—No, I do not think so; as regards the Punjab, at any rate, it would be an unnecessary complication and be misunderstood. If it is decided in the affirmative, then it should be amplified as proposed by me above.

Question (3).—Yes, as follows:—

A . . . . . 8.

B . . . . . 20.

C I would eliminate, or if wanted for any special Imperial question, could be included in E for a special period only.

D Elected members—

(a) by Chambers of Commerce, Bombay, Calcutta, United Provinces, and the Punjab—4.

(4) (b) As stated in paragraph (13)—7.

(5) (c) I would keep the Imperial Legislative Council free from the turmoil of elections. Nor do I see how it is possible to raise a satisfactory constituency for the purpose of electing one member from an entire body of land-holders of an entire province. I think better representation would be obtained by nomination, but I would not confine the system of nomination to a representative of the great land-owners. The nominees should be the best man available, no matter what his caste, creed, or opinions might be—7.

(6) (d) This is, I think, unnecessary.

The Muhammadans are given quite a fair chance in (b). They will be entitled to two seats by nomination under E, which is a concession to the Muhammadan minority if the need arise, but there does not seem to be any necessity in the formation of a separate Muhammadan electorate for the Imperial Legislative Council, if the Provincial one is carefully constituted. If a separate Muhammadan electorate is to be formed, and it is also ruled that under (c) of D there are to be election, then as a matter of equity the Muhammadans must be excluded from the general electorate. But I think it is a pity to differentiate between races and creeds. If so, as regards the Punjab, the claims of our Sikh community are as equal if not more powerful than those of the Muhammadans.

If, however, there must be a Muhammadan electorate, I would make it as small as possible and confine it to the non-official members of that community in the Provincial Council. Leaving out (d), I would increase E to (5), of which not less than 2 to be Muhammadans, the number would be the same 53.

Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.

(7) Question (4).—In considering the future constitution of the Punjab Legislative Council the necessity of maintaining an official majority must be borne in mind. As at present constituted it consists of not more than 9 members, excluding the Lieutenant-Governor, of which one-third must be non-officials.

The new constitution might be—

A (a) His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor	1
(b) The Honourable Financial Commissioner and Settlement Commissioner	2
B Additional officials to be nominated	16
C Elected members—
(a) By the Chamber of Commerce	2
(b) By the members of municipalities (excluding minor municipalities)
(1) elected member for each revenue division of the Punjab . . .	5
D (a) Non-officials to be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor, one for each revenue division in the Punjab, to be chosen from the elected district board members of the districts of each division	5
N.B.—This system to be eventually replaced by one of election, as time may show the advisability when the qualification of such members has been greatly raised from the present low qualifications.
(b) Non-officials to be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor to represent minorities or special interests not less than two to be Muhammadans .	4
TOTAL .	35

(8). At present I would only have as elected members the 2 non-official members elected by the Chamber of Commerce, and the 5 to be elected by the members of the various sadr municipalities of each division.

I am quite aware that this last will work unequally, and that in divisions like Lahore and Delhi the superiority of the sadr divisional town, if I may so call it, may be too great; on the other hand, if there is to be any election, what, other than the revenue division, can be the territorial limit. The only other thing is nomination all round, but that can hardly be called much of an advance, if that is all we are going to give. The people must, to a certain extent, work out their own salvation, and mistakes will undoubtedly be made. But unless a step forward is made now it will not be made for some time, and now is the time to make it. There are only two doctrines which can be accepted in this matter—(1) is that Liberty alone fits men for Liberty, and (2) the counter doctrine, "wait till they are fit." In all countries experience has shown that the latter has led to more abuses than the former, and as if we really mean to give India a constitution of its own, then the first step must be by these so-called elections.

But the qualifications both of electorate and the elected must be advanced, both district board elections and municipal towns. The latter must certainly, and, in the degree of advance, the qualifications of the elected should be greater than the electorate.

(9). I would not advocate any rule, determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class. This is Hot-house legislation of the worst type, and I can see no argument in favour of dividing the country into a set of political watertight compartments. Moreover, it is this very proposition which has found so much disfavour amongst the people I have discussed these propositions with. The stock argument of divide et impera is advanced against us with some show of reason, and it is on our part surely a retrograde step to accentuate existing difference between men of opposite creeds and castes, by our legislation than by attempting to weld a hetherogeneous mass into a homogeneous whole, with some idea of national union. The arguments advanced against this proposition are than whilst ostensibly a movement to do justice to minorities or special interests, it will result in crushing any attempt at national opinion or union, and that the sustitution of electorates on the basis of caste, class, community, religion, and occupation for the territorial electorates, which are the only natural electorates for political representation, is a step backward in the political education of India.

To my mind the most important objection to the formation of an electorate on the above basis is the fear that it will accentuate racial and religious differences, because, although in any election there is always the tendency to bitterness and racial animosity, there would be nothing to prevent a Hindu voting for a Muhammadan or vice versâ, or a Khatri for a Sikh, and so on, yet this would be impossible where there are class electorates, and so there never will be political or national unity.

(10) and (11). If, however, there is to be a class electorate, there would be under—

C (b) 5 members to be elected.

D (a) 5 members to be elected.

As there would no longer be any election by municipal members, or members of the district board, and these should be allotted—

Muhammadans	3 seats.
Hindus other than Sikhs	2 ,,
Sikhs	1 ,,
Christians	1 ,,
Trade	1 ,,
Profession	2 ,,

but the difficulties of forming this electorate and of preventing a professional man who is a trader by caste and a Hindu as well, of voting for more than one representative, will be almost superhuman. I certainly would not sub-divide any more.

(10) and (11). I would only advocate election for 5 members at present, one for each revenue division, and the electorate to consist of all existing municipal members of sadr municipalities after raising the status of the electorate in such towns, and the qualifications necessary to become a member.

The 5 members for the corresponding territorial electorate from district boards should at first be nominated, and the system to election extended gradually.

(12). I am against a separate electorate for Muhammadans, for reasons already stated, but if this is decided to be necessary, I would recommend the adoption of the proposals laid down in paragraph 17 of Government of India letter.

As regards the proposals in paragraph 22 of Government of India letter, if it is determined to have class representation by election in the Provincial Council, then it follows that some sort of plan as is proposed in (c) of this paragraph will be necessary.

It will be necessary to divide the municipalities and district boards into compartments first Muhammadans and Hindus, the proportion of each being divided according to the electorate of each, and then consider what sub-divisions of the two main divisions are necessary. There should be for each race, land-holder class, and a professional class, nothing further would be necessary for the Muhammadan community. As regards the Hindu, two other sub-divisions would be necessary to provide for the trading class and cultivating class, and the qualification for the electorates of each class are only a matter of detail; but in each class the electors must be literate.

I must confess that I don't like these political watertight compartments, and that these suggestions are only made in the event of it being decided that class representation and electorates are necessary.

Questions (5), (13), and (14).—Budget discussion should be allowed freely in both councils, and under separate heads or groups of heads.

(15). Certainly, I don't see what harm can be done, and it may be productive of much good.

P. S. M. BURLTON, Major,
Deputy Commissioner, Jullundur.

No. 3833, dated 16th November 1907.

From—T. Millar, Esq., C.S., Deputy Commissioner, Kangra,
To—The Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

With reference to your circular no. 161—3372, dated the 9th October 1907, I have the honour to say that within such a limited time I have not had that opportunity of consulting with others which is so necessary when such important questions are under discussion.

Questions I and II.—It is exceedingly doubtful whether any useful purpose would be served by the appointment of Advisory Councils. An extension of the Legislative Councils would, however, probably meet every demand for increased representation and at the same time confer power on the members.

But if it is deemed advisable to have an Advisory Council in this province it should be formed on the lines indicated in paragraph 4 of no. 2643-S., dated 27th September 1907, from the Chief Secretary to Government, Punjab and its Dependencies, to all Commissioners of Divisions in the Punjab; all the members being nominated not elected.

Question III.—If possible, it would probably be better if only members or ex-members of Provincial Legislative Councils were nominated to the Imperial Legislative Council. Such a plan would probably not cause such an increase in numbers as proposed, but perhaps this would be an advantage from a working point of view. It would be a great pity to introduce any element of election or any religious distinctions. A suitable number of Muhammadans could always be obtained by nomination, the power of nominating a certain number of members being retained by the Viceroy.

Question IV. (7) I would suggest that the number of the Punjab Provincial Legislative Council be raised to 15 as a maximum.

(8) The present system of nomination should be maintained.

(9) A fixed rule determining the proportion of seats is not advisable, but if possible there should be at least—one non-official member representing Trade and Commerce;

one non-official member representing Law;
one Hindu official member representing the great landed interests of the province;
one Sikh official representing the great landed interests of the province;
one Muhammadan official member representing the great landed interests of the province.

The questions of election and electorates introduce so many points that I would prefer to express no opinion without an opportunity of full discussion.

Question V. (13) The system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council as suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter might well be adopted.

(14) There would be an advantage in discussing the Provincial Budget by separate heads or groups of heads. Points raised could well be considered in the next year, if the Budget then under discussion could not be conveniently altered.

(15) There seems no good reason why the power of interpellation should be introduced into the Punjab Legislative Council.

With reference to paragraph 2 of your circular endorsement under reference, I am unable to suggest any individuals or bodies in this district who might be asked about the representation of the various classes of the native community. The district is almost entirely Hindu.

T. MILLAR,
Deputy Commissioner, Kangra.

Replies to questions circulated by the Punjab Government in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907.

I. (1) I consider the formation of the proposed Imperial Advisory Council a great step towards popularizing British Government with the aristocratic and educated classes of India. The only suggestion I have to make in regard to the proposals contained in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter is that the number of ruling Chiefs who are to take part in the council may be cut down to 6. Twenty is a very large number, and besides there are very few Native Chiefs who keep themselves in touch with the current events in British India.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—In my opinion it is highly desirable to have a Provincial Advisory Council which might be constituted as follows:—

(a)	Chiefs, Princes, and Ministers of Native States	3
(b)	Representatives of Provincial and Divisional Darbaris . .	2
(c)*	Representatives of municipalities 2 and district boards 2 . .	4
(d)	Retired officers of Government (civil and military) one from each division	5
(e)	One representative of each of the following—
(i)*	Senate of the Punjab University	4
(ii)*	Chambers of Commerce
(iii)*	Members of the legal profession
(iv)	Crown colonies in the Punjab
	TOTAL . .	18

* These seats might be filled up by election and the rest by nomination.

III. (3) I am entirely in favour of the proposed enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council and the manner in which it is proposed to distribute the seats.

I, however, wish to strike a note of caution that it would still be advisable to recruit a fairly large proportion of barristers and pleaders, and members of learned professions, as the representatives of these classes can best voice forth the statements of the people in a foreign tongue. For a long time to come the land-holding classes would not, I am afraid, be able to produce men, in sufficiently large numbers, who could efficiently take part in the council debates and who could make speeches in English or draft bills if required to do so. It seems to me that the Imperial Advisory Councils should be largely recruited from landed aristocracy, while the Legislative Councils should be manned by experts and members of what may be termed the aristocracy of letters.

III. (4) In the Punjab I would propose that the electorate for this seat should consist of all the members (official and non-official) of the Punjab Legislative Council, as well as all the members of the proposed Provincial Advisory Council.

III. (5) In a province of peasant-proprietors like the Punjab, where there are very few territorial magnates, and where the land-holders do not form a homogeneous class, it is, I think, not necessary to reserve a seat for them or to create a separate electorate in their interest. But if it is decided to take a representative of that class, then he should be selected by the Local Government from among the Provincial Darbaris.

III. (6) I approve of the proposed appointment of four Muhammadans to the Imperial Council. In clause E of paragraph 12 of Government of India it would perhaps be better to divide the four seats as follows:—

(1) Muhammadans	2
(2) Sikhs	1
(3) Indian Christians and Parsis (by rotation)	1
TOTAL . .	4

The electorate for the two Muhammadan seats by election should consist of:—

(1) Muhammadan members (official and non-official both) of Provincial, Legislative, and Advisory Council.

(2) Muhammadan members of municipalities and district boards.

(3) Muhammadan graduates of the Punjab University.

It is not necessary to add to this list Muhammadan Fellows of the University, as most of them will be included in clause 3. Similarly I do not think it advisable to include in the electorate income-tax payers or revenue payers of amounts not falling below certain figures, as the leading men among them will be found on municipalities and district boards. The standard of education is low in the Punjab. I would therefore advise not to make the electorate too wide or extensive.

IV. (7) In my opinion the Punjab Legislative Council should be constituted in such a way as to allow for the following non-official members to take part in its deliberations:—

(1) One nominated member from each division.

(2) Two elected representatives of the legal profession, one of whom should be a barrister and another a pleader.

(3) One elected representative of municipalities and district boards.

The total number, might, I think, be fixed at 18, and it might be composed as follows:—

A.—Officials (Europeans 8, Indians 2)		10
B.—Non-officials arranged as follows: if possible:—
(1) Hindus and Sikhs	3
(2) Muhammadans	3
(3) Indian Christians and Europeans	2
	—	8
TOTAL . .		18

IV. (8) I would fill 5 seats by nomination and 3 by election as explained under head IV (7).

IV. (9) If it is decided to have a class representation on the Provincial Council, then I would recommend the proposition indicated under head IV (7). The only important class, however, which stands the risk of being unrepresented in the Punjab is that of the Sikhs, so all that the Government need provide is that at least one of the five nominated seats should go to that body.

IV. (10) In my scheme only one elected seat will go to municipalities and district boards, and for this only the presidents, vice-presidents, and honorary secretaries (past and present) of these local bodies will be allowed to compete.

All practising members of the legal profession will be allowed to form an electorate to elect their own representatives.

IV. (11) I do not think the system referred to in paragraph 22 (b) would work well in this province. I am, moreover, not in favour of giving any official status to the socio-religious bodies like the Anjumans and Panchayats.

IV. (12) Hindus and Muhammadans are equally matched in the Punjab, and I do not think the latter require any separate representation.

V. (13) I am in favour of the Budget being discussed in the Imperial Council by separate heads, as proposed in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

V. (14) Yes.

V. (15) If power of interpellation is allowed in other Provincial Legislatures, it should, I think, be allowed in the Punjab Legislative Council also. All the questions should, however, be first shown to the President, and if he objects to any of them being put his decision should be final.

From—C. H. ATKINS, Esq., Deputy Commissioner, Ferozepore,

To—The Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

I have the honour to submit my opinion on the Government of India proposals with regard to Imperial and Provincial Councils as requested by you in your circular letter no. 161-3372 of 9th October 1907.

C. H. ATKINS,

Deputy Commissioner, Ferozepore.

OPINION.

I. (1) I do not think that an Advisory Council so consituted is either practicable or likely to be of service.

If it be desired to consult the magnates of a province individually, this can be done without making them "councillors."

If consulted collectively the proceedings of so large a body cannot be kept confidential or private, and I do not think that an "informal" gathering would lead to any satisfactory result. Unless there is considerable formality there will be disorder and even possibly wrangling.

Again the magnates do not represent the feeling of the country to any great extent and much less the feeling of the party which is now striving to make itself felt and which has led to this desire on the part of Government to meet its wishes so far as is consistent with good government. The formation of such a council would be apt to aggravate rather than pacify the cry for self-government. I think that the Advisory Council might well be constituted by election and on a more extensive electorate than the Legislative Council.

I would have the elected members of the Imperial Legislative Council elected by the members of the Imperial Advisory Council. The members of this Advisory Council might all be elected. The number should not be large at present, but might be increased gradually.

At first the suggested number of 60 seems appropriate, say 10 from each province.

I am inclined to think that the 10 might be elected by the Provincial Advisory Council and that the 10 might be in the Punjab:—

(a) not less than 6 land-holders, of whom 2 should be Muhammadans, 2 Hindus, and 2 Sikhs;

(b) one representative of the lawyer class;

(c) at least one representative of the mercantile class;

(d) one representative of the Punjab University.

I am not sure whether they should be elected only by the members (of the Provincial Advisory Council) of the class which they represent or by the whole body of members, but I am inclined to think that the whole Provincial Council might elect all the members.

Clauses (4), (5), and (6) of paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter are appropriate, but the Imperial Advisory Council might also have the power of electing from among its members the elected members of the Imperial Legislative Council.

II. (2) I think that a Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution, and in the main the proposals in paragraph 6 of the Government of India letter seem appropriate.

In the Punjab I do not think that at present the members of this council should be elected.

It should be provided that each class should be represented.

A certain number should be appointed by the local Government and the other appointments left to the Commissioners with rules to ensure that each class and religion should be represented according to its relative importance in the division.

Should it be thought advisable to have the council constituted by a system of election, the electorate for the various representatives would seem to be—

(a) for the land-holders either the district board or the body of zaildars for each district;

(b) for the native mercantile classes, the income tax-payers;

(c) for the lawyers, the pleaders of the 1st grade and advocates;

(d) for the educated classes the Fellows of the Punjab University, or perhaps graduates of at least five years' standing;

(e) for the commercial and capitalist interest, the managers of banks, the heads of large commercial concerns, etc., etc.

The functions of the Provincial Advisory Council might be—

(1) to elect the elected members of the Provincial Legislative Council;

(2) to elect members for the Imperial Advisory Council;

(3) to deliberate and advise on matters submitted to it by the Provincial Government. The deliberation should be collective.

III. (3) I have little to suggest except that the 7 elected members D (b) should be elected by the Imperial Advisory Council not by the Provincial Legislative Councils: so also should the 2 Muhammadans D (d) and the whole 9 should include—

(a) at least 3 Muhammadans;

(b) at least 3 Hindus;

(c) at least 2 Sikhs.

III. (4) I have already suggested that the Imperial Advisory Council should consist of members elected by the Provincial Advisory Councils and should in turn elect 9 members of the Imperial Legislative Council. As the provinces would be equally represented in the Imperial Advisory Council and interests in India are rather religious than territorial I do not think it necessary to make a further provision that one member should necessarily be from each province.

His Excellency the Viceroy would have the power of nominating 4 members to represent any provinces that might seem to lack representation.

III. (5) I think that the 7 representatives of the great land-owners should be nominated, but if elected I think that the electorate might be the body of the Provincial Darbaris, and that the representative might be one of their number.

III. (6) With my proposals nothing further would be necessary to secure the representation of Muhammadans.

IV. (7) The number might perhaps be increased to 13, i.e., 12 and His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor; of these 3 should be elected by the Provincial Advisory Council—One Muhammadan, one Hindu, and one Sikh. Two should be nominated and 7 officials, also of course nominated.

IV. (9) Yes. Muhammadans, Hindus, and Sikhs should each have one representative, of the nominated members one at least should represent the mercantile and banking class.

IV. (10) No, I think election through municipal committees most undesirable. We have not as a rule a good class of men nor a representative class on these bodies.

District boards are better, but I do not see how a direct election of some 3 or 4 members for the whole province can be made by the district boards. Most of the members of these bodies would not know the candidate. I suggest the Provincial Advisory Council as the electorate: if any of the members of this last council be elected, the district boards might serve as electorates for representatives of their several districts.

IV. (11) The electorate for both district and municipal boards is too wide and the qualifications for membership too low. If we are to get a good class of men on these bodies we must raise considerably the qualifications of both members and elector. I think that as regards municipal committee the separate representation of classes is very necessary, and I would similarly have separate lists of voters so that each class should vote for its own representative. This is not so necessary in respect to district boards for which I would (as at present in this province) make a land-holding qualification essential in the case of both members and electors.

IV. (12) I think that the district boards and municipal board if improved as I have suggested would form the best district electorate.

V. (13) Yes.
V. (14) Yes. Yes.
V. (15) Yes.

C. H. ATKINS,
Deputy Commissioner, Ferozepore.

Dated 10th November 1907.

From—Mr. AHSAN-UL-HAQ, Bar.-at-Law, Jullundur City,
To—The Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th October 1907, and have the honour to forward to you my opinion on the proposals contained in the papers sent to me along with your letter.

AHSAN-UL-HAQ,
Bar.-at Law, Jullundur City.

I. (1) I am doubtful whether the Imperial Advisory Council, on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4, would be of much service to the country.

The ruling Chiefs are, as a rule, so ignorant of the affairs of their own States that it is rather difficult to believe that they shall be able to offer any intelligent and useful advice to the Viceroy on questions of vital importance. To take the case of the Punjab, almost all the present ruling Chiefs are hopeless administrators. Good management and proper administration wherever it exists is due more to the state officials than to the Chief, who in most cases is a passive agent for the expression of the views of his officials.

British India has undergone a change recently. New ideas and notions have sprung up and rights and concessions that were undreamed of by the past generation are being demanded by the present one. Reasonable and proper or otherwise as these demands may be, the fact remains that they require careful consideration, and that a person requires a thorough knowledge of the advance of the times to tackle them. Now the ruling Chiefs are, as a rule, the most conservative of the Indian conservatives in these matters, and it is unlikely whether these demands will ever receive a careful and impartial hearing from them. Nor do I think that the ruling Chiefs shall be able to appreciate the full significance of these demands.

As regards the territorial magnates, they are undoubtedly the natural leaders of the people and, although as a class they can scarcely be deemed competent and intelligent advisers, they have a great many men amongst them who could be consulted with advantage about questions of importance. Their opinions carry a great deal of weight with the general public, and the influence that they exercise among their poorer neighbours is decidedly greater than that of the so-called "leaders." There are some men of this class in whom the new education and old traditions have brought about a wholesome blending of thoughts and ideas, and their advice would go a long way to solve the present difficult situation.

Viewing the provisions of paragraph 5 generally I am inclined to think that the proposal of forming an Imperial Advisory Council does not improve the state of affairs, as defined in the beginning of paragraph 4, to any marked degree.

It only means the creation of an office that will no doubt carry a great deal of izzat with it, but not much more, and, at best, it only means the introduction of further red-tape in the machinery of Government.

Construed very liberally the provisions lay down nothing more than this that the Viceroy can consult a given number of people (selected by himself) whenever he likes, regardless of the importance of the question pending. He has been at liberty to do this informally so far as the paragraph confers no new rights upon him.

The magnates remain much in the same position. However strongly they might feel about certain questions, they are not to be allowed to say a word till their advice is sought, and when they are allowed to express an opinion it is not obligatory for the Viceroy to follow it.

I consider that in the absence of any provisions conferring better rights upon the Chiefs and magnates the proposals laid down in paragraphs 4 and 5 will not benefit the country materially. On the other hand, I am afraid, they will only raise a storm of ridicule and hostile criticism, and defeat the praiseworthy effort of Government by creating doubts about the bonâ fides of this step in the minds of the people.

The step contemplated in paragraphs 4 and 5 might incidentally elevate the character of the Chiefs and magnates, but that is another matter.

II. (2) Most of the remarks that I have made about the Imperial Advisory Council apply to these councils too. The wider range of selections in the case of these councils, however, will at least guarantee a more competent body of councillors.

The plan sketched out in paragraph 6, Government of India letter, and paragraph 4, Government of Punjab letter, is rather vague, and it is somewhat difficult to express an opinion about the usefulness of these councils till some idea is given of the number of representatives of the different professions who are to be selected.

I am alive to the difficulty of allotting the membership to the different professions and occupations, and consider that it would be rather unsafe to prescribe the numbers to be selected from the different professions. I must, however, observe that the prominence given to the land-holding class scarcely provides a remedy for the present difficult situation. The land-holders are certainly the natural leaders of the people, but I question whether they represent the ideas and the ever-growing ambitious notions of the people. Again, the field of selection amongst the land-holding class is so limited that Government could never reasonably hope to have more than 2 or 3 competent advisors out of the whole lot of them in the Punjab. What we ought to have in the Advisory Council for the Punjab is a class or set of people who are constantly in touch with the general public and can advise Government by laying the real ideas of the people before it.

At the same time I welcome this happy thought on the part of the Government. The so-called "leaders" of the Indian people are constantly airing the grievances of their fellow countrymen in the press and elsewhere. When we come to look closely into their grievances we find that they relate to a class of people that does not constitute even 1 per cent. of the Indian population. If I am not mistaken nearly 75 per cent. Indians subsist on cultivation, and yet, as far as I can remember, very few, if any, of the "leaders" have championed the cause of the cultivator. The cultivators in the Punjab are a very important factor of the Empire, providing as they do material for over half of the Indian army, and any proposals that secure a representation of this class in the Advisory Council is most welcome.

The standard set forth for the selection is somewhat high, and might be reduced with advantage.

The proposal, if carried out, will save Government from such unpleasant situations as was created recently by the passing of the Colonization Bill in the Punjab Legislative Council.

III (3). Yes. This step provides for a larger representation of Indians in the Council, and is most opportune.

I have no suggestions or modifications to offer as regards the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12, Government of India letter.

(4). Yes.

(5). Yes. He should either be selected by the land-holding members of the Provincial Advisory Council or selected by nomination from amongst the land-holders of the Province, including members and non-members of the Provincial Advisory Councils.

(6) Yes. Heads A, B, D (a), and F would absorb 32 seats (all non-Indians) out of the proposed 54. It is only fair and just that steps should be taken to ensure the proper representation of Muhammadans by setting apart at least 4 appointments for them out of the remaining 22.

Objections have been urged against this proposal by most Hindu papers. Other communities in minority have put forward their claims. To my mind these objections are unwarranted, for head E safeguards the interests of these claimants, e.g., Parsis and Indian Christians.

As regards the election of these members, I agree with the proposals described in paragraph 18, Government of India letter.

IV. (7) Considering the general advancement of this Province the present number of members is inadequate, specially the non-official element.

If this council is to form a sort of electorate for the Imperial Legislative Council its number should be increased to ensure better selection.

I would advocate that this council should consist of at least 19 members, excluding His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor—10 official and 9 non-official.

(8) The present system of nomination is open to objections.

A Legislative body, to be useful, should consist of members of different and independent opinions so that when a question comes up for decision a careful consideration may be made of all its different aspects. Judging from the past the nomination system has not secured such members.

At the same time the present condition of the Punjab, which is likely to continue for some time yet, does not ensure a proper representation of all interests by election.

In my opinion it would be desirable if some of the non-official seats were filled by nomination and some by election.

(9) The rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted should be elastic to a certain extent.

I have advocated in IV (7) that the number of the members of the Punjab Legislative Council should be increased to at least 19—10 official and 9 non-official.

Of the 9 non-officials 6 should be elected and 3 nominated.

The principal representative classes in the Punjab, taken in order of population, are—Muhammadans, Hindus, and Sikhs. I have not been able to find out the exact percentage of these classes to the total population, but judging from the old census reports it appears that the Muhammadans form about 52 per cent., Hindus abovt 32* per cent., and the Sikhs about 8 per cent. of the total population.

I would suggest that of the 6 elected members 3 should be Muhammadans, 2 Hindus, and 1 Sikh.

The elasticity that I advocated in the beginning of this answer can be maintained by reserving the filling of the 3 remaining seats by Government nomination. The claims of the minor communities would also be safeguarded by this means.

I have purposely abstained from apportioning the seats according to the educational qualifications of the different classes.

(10) I do not advocate the election of non-official members through the municipal boards and district boards.

The electorate should consist of Fellows of the University, barristers, pleaders, 1st class municipal commissioners, members of the district boards, zaildars, divisional darbaris, and persons paying tax for incomes over Rs. 1,000 a year.

This electorate can be sub-divided into three classes for the elections of the members of different religions, i.e., Muhammadans, Hindus, and Sikhs.

(11) My answer is in the affirmative both as regards paragraph 22 (b) and 22 (c) subject to the additions that I have proposed in (10).

(12) I have already expressed my views about the separate representation of Muhammadans in the council.

I think it would be desirable to fill the seats allotted by nomination after consultation with the managing committees of the leading Muhammadan associations and institutions.

V. (13), (14), (15) I regret that owing to want of sufficient knowledge of the subject mentioned in the above questions I am unable to give an expression of my opinion. I have devoted some time to the study of the subject, but have failed to grasp it.

Questions and answers in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907.

Question.

I. (1) Do you consider that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter would be of service to the country, and, if so, do you suggest any alterations in the proposals made in paragraph 5 regarding its constitution and duties?

Answer.

The appointment of an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in Government of India letter, paragraph 4, will be of great service to the country. I would not suggest any alterations regarding its duties, but I venture to state that the constitution of the council should be so modified that besides the ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates of every province, the council should have a number of men of the middle classes representing trade, professions, industries, &c.

Unless we have men of the latter class, the real object of the Advisory Council will not at all be achieved.

The object of the establishment of this Advisory Council is to enable the Government to know the views of the people as regards matters affecting the welfare of different classes living in India, and that any sort of misrepresentations or false impressions which may in any way be created on the minds of the people by false rumours or mischief-mongers may be removed, and that the members of the council so consulted may be able to disseminate the views of the Government among the people and also place the Government in possession of true information regarding any questions of importance that may be before the Government.

In my opinion this object can be best attained by having some men on the council who may be in touch with the people and who may have the opportunities of finding out the views of the people on a special subject or on a particular occasion.

As the matters now stand there are very few ruling Chiefs, Sardars, or territorial magnates, who can have or care to have an opportunity of seeing the people and of getting a genuine idea about their views on a given question.

The information which such people get is either through the agency of newspapers or their servants and hangers-on, and which cannot in a majority of cases be relied upon. The object of the Government in constituting the council seems to be to have a class of people who may help the Government with their advice and try to remove any popular misunderstanding on a particular point by putting the views of the Government before the people.

Ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates will hardly be persons who would be of much substantial help in the attainment of the very laudable object which these councils are intended to accomplish. I will therefore suggest that there should be at least two men of sufficient status, position, and intelligence from each province to represent the interests of trade, industry, and professions on the council.

II. (2) Do you think that a Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution, and, if so, would you suggest any modification in the proposals made above on paragraph 6 of the Government of India letter regarding its constitution and duties?

Yes, the Provincial Advisory Council will also be very useful, and I have no other suggestions to make in addition to those mentioned in the Government letter.

III. (3) Do you approve of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council, and, if so, would you suggest any modifications in the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter?

The enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council is absolutely necessary so that the interests of the different classes, creeds, and professions may be adequately represented on the highest Legislative body of the land.

It is necessary that all available intellect of the country may be utilized while laws which are to govern the people are being discussed.

The scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter is one which in the main is not open to objection, but I would certainly object to a particular class being specially favoured.

It is against the principles of British Government to favour any particular class or individual at the sacrifice of another. There is absolutely no reason why Muhammadans as a class should have a special and additional privilege of electing two men to the Imperial Council. If any special services may be considered as the basis of the concession, why are not Sikhs, who are really the fighting power of the Government, given the same privilege. If the fact of the Muhammandan minority as a class, as compared with other classes, be the consideration for a special advantage being given to them then there are other classes who deserve this favour in a higher degree, i.e., Sikhs and Christians. If want of education be the ground for this special privilege the Sikhs cannot be said to be in a better position.

Their case is rather worse. Though Muhammadans as a class as compared with the Hindus are backward in education, still they have in recent years made a great progress, and with the special facilities given to them in that direction, they are sure to make a steady progress. If demand for extension of the councils be considered as the criterion, then Hindus have been trying hard for it since a long time, and Muhammadans have, as a class, either remained neutral or were to some extent against it. On principles of fairness and justice there is absolutely no reason why one class should have a special privilege, while in point of fitness for the post other classes can beat the Muhammadans far behind in the field.

I would therefore make this modification that I would remove sub-clause (d) in clause D in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter, and would make the figure 6 instead of 4 as it now stands in clause E and would remove the words "not less than two to be Muhammandans" from the said clause. This would place all classes on an equal footing and give them the chances of winning the post by ability, intelligence, and capacity for work. In my humble opinion the principle "fair field and no favour" ought to apply. If Muhammadans want to get a stronger representation on the council than their brethren of the other classes then they should try to improve themselves and gain the object by their own exertions.

(4) In particular, do you approve of the proposal that one member should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council as proposed in paragraph 13 of the letter?

Yes. This is what is actually desirable, and it would enable the people of all Provinces to gain an advantage of the representation of their Provincial Council on the Imperial one.

(5) Do you approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners of this Province to the Imperial Council, and, if so, by which of the three methods suggested in paragraph 15 of the letter (or by what other method) should he be selected? If by direct election, what should be the electorate?

I approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners of the Punjab to the Imperial Council, and that in my opinion may be done by nomination by the Government of India of the representative of the land-holders to the Imperial Council from amongst the land-holding members of the Provincial Council; but if election is to be resorted to, then the electorate should be the land-holding members of the provincial Council alone, and a general election of such a member by the land-holding classes of the country will be a thing quite unworkable and at the same time unsatisfactory.

(6) Do you approve of the proposed appointment of 4 Muhammandans to the Imperial Council, 2 by election and 2 at least by nomination as suggested under heads D (d) and E of paragraph 12 of the letter? Would you recommend that the elected members should be elected by the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Councils or by some such electorate as that described in paragraph 18 of the letter?

No, I have given my reasons in my reply to question III (3), but if any election is to be made, I would suggest that the electorate should be composed—

(a) of the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Council,

(b) the Muhammadan Fellows of the Punjab University.

IV. (7) The Punjab Provincial Legislative Council.—Would you advocate an increase in the present number of members, and, if so, to what figure?

I would propose an increase in the Punjab Legislative Council, and would suggest the number to be 25.

(8) Would you maintain the present system of nomination, or would you have any or all of the unofficial seats filled by election?

I would prefer the system of election as being a step in obtaining the best possible help from the available intellect, fitness, and experience of the Province, and would suggest that all non-official seats to the Provincial Council to be filled by election so as to enable all classes, races, and interests to be properly represented, subject of course in all cases to the condition that an official majority is maintained.

(9) In either case would you advocate a fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class (paragraph 22 (a) of the Government of India letter), and, if so, what classes do you consider should be represented and in what proportions?

I would not suggest any fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class, but if that is to be adopted in any case, I would suggest the representation of the following classes and in the following proportions:—

Hindus	2 seats.
Muhammadans	2 ,,
Sikhs	1 seat.
Christians	1 ,,
Trade	1 ,,
Professions	1 ,,
TOTAL	8 seats.

The remaining 17 seats may, in my opinion, be filled up as follows:—

(1) Lieutenant-Governor	1
(2) Financial Commissioner, Legal Remembrancer, Settlement Commissioner	3
(3) Nominated members	13
TOTAL	17

(10) If election is resorted to for the appointment of all or any of the non-official members would you advocate election through municipal or district boards? If so, on what system would the election be made? If not, what electorate would you suggest?

I would prefer election by the municipal and district boards to any other form of election. Almost all the leading men of the towns and the district have seats on these boards, and an election from amongst them, so far as the first 6 seats for Hindus, Muhammadans, Sikhs, and Christians are concerned, would, in my opinion, be the best and simplest electorate.

In the remaining two seats for trade and professions, I would suggest that Chambers of Commerce or Trades Associations wherever they exist may be called upon to elect one member for a seat to represent their interest in the Provincial Council, while for the seat for the professions I would suggest that the best way would be to ask the University to elect one member out of their Fellows.

As regards election by the district and municipal boards, I would suggest that for the purposes of election, the whole Province should be divided into six sections representing the six revenue divisions and one division should elect one member out of the municipal committees of headquarters of the district and the district boards.

(11) If you advocate separate representation of classes as proposed in paragraph 22 (4) of the Government of India letter, would you carry it out in the manner proposed in paragraph 22 (b) and would you suggest any corresponding changes in the constitution of the municipal and district boards in the manner indicated in paragraph 22 (c) or in any other manner?

I do not advocate any separate representation by classes at all, but if that is done, I would not carry it out in the manner proposed in paragraph 22 (b) and would not agree to any nomination by Government after consulting the Anjumans and panchayats and other bodies. It is absolutely necessary that there should be changes in the constitution of the municipal and district boards, but not in the manner indicated in paragraph 22 (c) of the Government of India letter. I would not advocate the introduction into the boards of the system of election and nomination by assigning a fixed number of seats to each of the leading classes of the population by race, caste, or religion, but would leave the present system of election and nomination unaltered. I would particularly suggest that the qualifications of the candidates for a seat in the municipal or district boards should be considerably raised.

For instance in the case of a land-holder he should be paying a considerable sum not less than Rs. 50 per annum as Government revenue.

In case of a trader his income should not be less than Rs. 40 per month.

In case of other persons the property immovable should be such as would bring him a rent of Rs. 50 a month.

For other persons who do not fall under one or other of the above classes, it is necessary that the candidate should be a graduate of some University.

(12) If you think provision should be made for the separate representation of Muhammadans in addition to that open to them by nomination or election in the ordinary way, would you provide for such representation by nomination or by election, and, if by election, would you adopt the form of electorate suggested in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter, or what other form would you suggest?

I would not advise that there need any provisions be made for the separate representation of Muhammadans in addition to those open to them by nomination or election in the ordinary way, and would not suggest any form of election for that purpose.

(13) Do you consider that the system of discussing the budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter?

Yes.

(14) Do you consider that the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council, and, if so, would you advocate its discussion by separate heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter?

The Provincial Budget should in my opinion be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council, and it should be discussed by separate heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(15) Do you advocate the introduction into Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members?

I would certainly advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members because in most cases it leads to very useful results.

DEVI CHAND,

Pleader, Jullundur City.

12th November 1907.

Dated Jullundur City, 14th November 1907.

From—Pandit Amar Singh, Pleader, Jullundur City,

To—The Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

In reply to your circular no. 168—3519, dated the 19th October last, I have the honour to submit my opinion on the proposals contained in the papers forwarded to me therewith.

2. Advisory Councils.—The principal object in view in organising the Advisory Councils is certainly laudable, and as regards this there can be no difference of opinion. The further object to be kept in view is to see whether the end in view and the proposals made are compatible and consistent with each other.

3. I think the scheme of Advisory Councils is based on the misconception that ruling Chiefs, territorial magnates, and so forth are the leaders of the people in their capacity as such, that they know the needs and sentiments of the people, and are acquainted with their daily life. Over India has come a change so sweeping that the hereditary gods are displaced from their pedestal. The people know full well the position of the Chiefs and magnates in the State. Their own demoralization and apathy towards the people have driven them out of the hearts of the people. I quite agree with Hon'ble Sardar Partap Singh in his estimation of the so-called Indian aristocracy. He writes:—"I may be excused for remarking that it (aristocracy) is far below the standard it is expected to occupy. The middle classes and masses consider them to be dullards and dissipated imbeciles, and therefore do not reckon them as their leaders of thought and action. I must painfully acknowledge that there is a great deal of truth in this statement of them." He remarks further:—

> "It is a regrettable circumstance that in all movements in which the public is concerned and which emanate from the Government the aristocracy has more or less share of co-operation, but in popular movements they are absolutely left in the back-ground, for the obvious reasons that they are too weak internally to exercise any influence over the public generally."—C. & M. Gazette—1-11-06.

4. I may say in a few words that the Chiefs and magnates, with a few honourable exceptions, are looked down by the people, and the feelings of contempt for them are growing rapidly. Such men should not be supposed to be the leaders of progressive India. They are unable to give expression to the needs and sentiments of the people or to make motives and measures of the Government generally understood. They themselves are understood not to be free agents in their actions or expression of opinion. The wholesale system of nomination would make them resort more and more to sycophancy and lower them still further in the eyes of the people. They would not be able to withstand the press interviews and other like intrusions on the secrecy which may be entrusted to them by the Government, and thus they may be the means of spreading incorrect information. An Advisory Council of such men only is inconsistent with the principal object in view.

5. The nomination rule, want of formal powers of any sort, and lack of legislative recognition counteract the usefulness of the institution. Furthermore the consultation and consideration of opinion given being optional with the Government the measure is not likely to give the advisers any greater sense of responsibility. The opinion will be as lightly given as it will be sought.

6. The inclusion of the educated element appears not to have been taken into consideration. This fact will give rise to certain misgivings in the mind of the people. They would think, and rightly so, that the Government have organised such a body to carry out arbitrary measures in the teeth of popular opposition with their help and then turn round and say whatever is done is done with the consensus of opinion of the Indian people. I think the inclusion of educated men of suitable position, who in this age may be said, without fear of contradiction, to be the true leaders of the people, will help to make the Advisory Council really useful to the country.

7. I am impressed with the usefulness of the Advisory Councils, but I fear the lines proposed would not lead to the end in view. In the light of my above remarks I humbly suggest some alterations in the proposals made in paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter.

8. The proposals as altered will be somewhat on the following lines:—

(1) That a Council to be called "The Imperial Advisory Council" should be formed for consultative as well as advisory purposes on all matters respecting welfare of India.

(2) That one-third of the members should be nominated by the Viceroy; (ii) one-third to be elected by the ruling Chiefs and magnates, not so nominated out of their own number; (iii) the remaining one-third to be elected by the nominees of the Viceroy and the other elected members. That members should receive the title of Imperial Councillors.

(3) That the council should consist of about 60 members for the whole of India, including 40 ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates and 20 experts, Judges of the Chief Court of the Punjab and different High Courts, and Hon'ble Members of Legislative Councils of whom taken together not less than three-fourths shall be Indians.

(4) That the members should hold office for a substantial term, say, for five years, and should be eligible for reappointment.

(5) That the council should receive no legislative recognition and should be vested with power necessary to the attainment of its purpose.

(6) That its functions should be advisory as well as consultative on all matters respecting welfare of India.

(7) That the proceedings of the council should be published. That the Government would be at liberty to prohibit publication of any matter specifically referred by them to the council. That there should be collective deliberation and not individual consultation.

9. My remarks apply to Imperial as well as Provincial Advisory Councils. I think the same principle applies to both. The Provincial Councils may be formed as indicated above.

10. Enlargement of the Legislative Councils.—The enlargement of the Legislative Councils as proposed entails the enlargement of the existing defects and the addition of fresh ones. The standing official majority has been a sore point, and as long as this is maintained, there cannot be any representation of the Indian people. At present the representation of the people simply amounts to permission to enter the Council Hall and amuse the audience with fine orations. The people can on no account make themselves heard. As the Government have declared this question not open to discussion, I would ask the Government so to frame proposals for the enlargement of the Legislative Councils as to minimize the effect of standing majority.

11. The first, the foremost, and the most regrettable innovation the measure tends to make is the acceptance of the principle of granting enfranchisement on the basis of beliefs and traditions. The racial questions now rampant in the country and so violently convulsing the Indian community shall, in future, fetch their first head and spring from this principle. Under its pressure the Hindu-Muhammadan question, already expanded into Hindu-Muhammadan-Sikh question, shall assume the gigantic form of Hindu, Muhammadan, Sikh, Rajput, and Mahratta question. The racial question, to the misfortune of India, will go on adding names of communities to it and as many difficulties to confront the Government. The virulence of racial questions shall tempt the Government to resort to favouritism now towards one community and again towards the other. The policy of favouritism shall be the precursor of wide-spread discontent in the country. In that case the Government, with all the up-to-date destructive art at their command, would find it an impossibility to hold down so many millions of discontented people with Japan, China, and Russia as neighbours.

12. The proposal is innovative in another respect. The partiality to Muhammadans stands out in bold relief. No amount of emphatic assurances will do to persuade other communities to believe the country. There are other communities in minority more important than Muhammadans. The Mahrattas and Sikhs are the immediate predecessors of the British in India. There is no reason why they should not receive the same consideration at the hands of the Government. I wish to say with due reserve, but I am bound to say that the Government have long been suspected of acting on the policy of divide et impera, and a section of the community, beneficially affected by the measure, look upon the measure with diffidence. Musalman of Calcutta writes:—"But however much the principle is appreciated by the Musalmans they at least, a section of the community, doubt the sincerity of the Government in so suddenly recognising their just claims and special interests when the political atmosphere is so tempestuous. It may be a mere dodge played with a view to dissuade the community from joining the popular cause. If it be so, and if it produces the desired effect, then it must be considered as mischievous. But it cannot be productive of any mischief if we Musalmans are not carried away by the idea that the Government is overflowing kindness for us, and that we should not, therefore, do anything in furtherance of our national cause that may be detestable to our alien masters whose national interests and ours are quite conflicting. It is hoped, however, that this dodge, if it be any dodge at all, will not deter us from making common cause with our advanced fellow countrymen, for the regeneration of our common motherland."

The undue bias towards the Muhammadans have rendered the scheme of the enlargement of the Legislative Councils inapplicable to whole of India.

The Hindus are in minority in the Punjab and Eastern Bengal. No provision is made to protect the Hindu minority in those provinces. In consequence of this undue favour, Muhammadans will get a majority of non-official members in the Punjab Provincial Councils, and they will always return a Muhammadan to the Imperial Council. The second member is to be returned exclusively by Muhammadans. The third one, a big landlord, must also be a Muhammadan, as in the Punjab Muhammadan land-owners are in majority in the ratio of 26 to 18. This way all the members of the Imperial Council from the Punjab will be Muhammadans. Thus as far as the Punjab is concerned Hindus are nowhere. The number of Muhammadans in the Imperial Council will be out of all proportion. As the scheme stands, the number of Muhammadans in the Imperial Council will come up to 9 under head D. and E., i.e., 3 for the Punjab, 2 (at least) for Eastern Bengal and Assam, 2 by election exclusively by that community, and 2 by nomination by the Viceroy.

The proposals for enlargement of the Legislative Councils requires further consideration at the hands of the Government, and I am unable to approve of them as they stand.

13. Briefly my reply to the questions forwarded to me is as follows:—

I. (1) I do not consider that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines suggested would be of any service to the country. I have suggested alterations—vide paragraph 7 of this letter.

II. (2) Ditto ditto ditto.

III. (3) I do approve of the enlargement of the Council, provided the existing defect (standing official majority) is minimized and fresh defects are not allowed to creep in.

ANSWERS.

(1) I consider that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Government of India letter would be of service to the country.

(2) The Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution. The only modification which I would submit in paragraph 6 of the Government letter regarding its constitution and duties is that the University of the Province should be represented in its Provincial Advisory Council.

(3) I approve of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council. But I have to suggest that the right of representation should be conferred on the Indian Universities also on the same lines as the English Universities are represented in the House of Commons. In order to make the Imperial Legislative Council more useful all the important different communities should be represented in the council, and the representation should be proportionate to the numerical strength of the community.

(4) I approve of the proposal as proposed in paragraph 13 of the letter.

(5) I approve of the selection of one of the great landlords of this Province to the Imperial Legislative Council. A representation of the landlords should be selected to the Imperial Council by the land-holding members of the Provincial Council from among the land-holders paying the amount of land revenue that may be fixed as giving the right to vote.

(6) Please see answer no. 3.

As for the selection of the Muhammadan members for the Imperial Council I would recommend that the elected members should be elected by the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Council.

(7) I would advocate an increase in the present number of members of Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.

The number of members should range from 12 to 25.

(8) I approve of the system which now prevails in Madras, Bombay, and Bengal to be introduced with some necessary modifications in the Province.

(9) Please vide answers 3 and 7.

(10) Please vide answer 8.

(11) I approve of the class representation and also approve the procedure in the manner proposed in paragraph 22 (b) and 22 (c).

(13) I consider that the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23.

(14) I approve that the system of discussion of the Budget should be introduced in the Punjab Legislative Council also.

As to the part II please vide no. 13.

(15) I approve that the power of interpellation with some restrictions should be introduced in the Punjab Legislative Council.

SHADI RAM, B.A., LL.B., (Cantab.),
Barrister-at-Law, Ludhiana.

Translation of the opinion expressed by Rai Wazir Khan of Bhangala in the Hoshiarpur District.

I. In my opinion the constitution of an Imperial Advisory Council is much useful for the good of the country, and the suggestions made in paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter as to the constitution and purposes of the council are correct; but it is very necessary that the number of the members of it should be fixed with regard to population and the religion of the people.

II. The constitution of a Provincial Council is beneficial and the Council should be quite in accordance with the principle laid down in paragraph 6 of the Government of India letter.

III. It is very necessary to enlarge the Imperial Legislative Council, and the scheme sketched out as to it in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter is correct, but the number of the members of it should be fixed with regard to population and the religion of the people, as it would be satisfactory.

IV. Of course the members should be selected by the Provincial Legislative Council as mentioned in detail in paragraph 13 of the Governmnt of India letter.

V. It is advisable that one of the great land-owners of this Province should be elected as a member of the Imperial Council. The mode of election should be that the zamindars should themselves elect their representative with regard to educational qualifications and abilities, due regard being had to the amount of revenue paid.

VI. The suggestion of the Government of India that 4 Muhammadans should be appointed to the Imperial Council, 2 by election and at least by nomination, is very proper. The appointment of elected members should be in the hands of such persons as are mentioned in the 3 clauses of paragraph 18 of the Government of India.

VII. The number of the members of the Punjab Legislative Council should be increased to a figure which may be considered proper by the Government.

VIII. The present system of nomination is not right. All the non-official seats should be filled by election.

IX. In every case the seats to be allotted to each class should be fixed with regard to population and religion, as no class will thus have any opportunity of complaining. This is a principle of equality and real proportion.

X. Election should be resorted to for the appointment of all unofficial members through the following persons:—

(1) Educated persons of the great land-owners.

(2) Educated persons of the large tax-payers.

(3) Graduates of the Universities.

XI. I like the representation of all classes separately in the way stated above in reply to question X.

XII. Provision should be made for the separate representation of Muhammadans in addition to that open to them in the ordinary way. It should be by election, but the electors should be a body of educated Muhammadans.

XIII. The discussion of the budget in the Legislative Council in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter is very proper, as it will afford full time and opportunity.

XIV. I consider that it is proper to discuss the Provincial Budget in the Punjab Legislative Council by separate heads in the manner given in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

XV. The members of the Punjab Legislative Council should have the power of interpellation.

WAZIR KHAN,
Rais of Bhangala, Hoshiarpur District.

Dated Jullundur, 14th November 1907.

From—Mr. Bhagat Ram, Barrister-at-Law, Jullundur City,
To—The Commissioner Jullundur Division.

I have the honour to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of your office circular no. 168—3519, dated the 19th October 1907, inviting my opinion on the proposals of the Government of India for the establishment of Advisory Councils, both Imperial and Provincial, and for the enlargement of the Imperial and Provincial Councils.

I have no doubt that the people will feel highly grateful to the Government for the solicitude which it has evinced for gaining a close insight into the views of the people, with the object of the better administration of the country. Taken generally the proposals in question constitute a distinct step in advance, and I am disposed to welcome proposals which would afford more frequent opportunities of mutual consultations and exchanging confidences between Government and the representative men among the people.

Measures, inaugurated by the Government with the best of intentions, are often opposed because its motives are misunderstood, with the deplorable result that the progress of the country is retarded.

2. As desired by Mr. Maclagan I would offer my views on the points under discussion in the order in which they have been formulated in questions appended to the Punjab Government letter.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—As stated above in paragraph 1, I am of opinion that Advisory Councils properly constituted would be a great boon to the country. But I have great doubt, as to whether the councils sketched out in paragraph 4 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, dated 24th August 1907, would be of any service to Government or the people.

The main objects the Government of India have in view are—(a) The association of the Indian Chiefs and territorial magnates in the guardianship of the common and Imperial interest of the country.

(b) The diffusion of correct information upon acts, intentions, and objects of Government among the people.

I am of opinion that the association of the Chiefs and territorial magnates in the discussion of questions concerning the people of the country in general will certainly have a beneficial effect in creating a harmonious working throughout the whole of the country, and will undoubtedly tend to improve the conditions of the subjects of most of the Native States, though the constitution and status accorded to the councillors can hardly be said to be a step towards their association with the Government. But I have not the least hesitation in saying that the councils as proposed will fail, in what I consider to be their most important function, viz., the diffusion of correct information as to the motives of Government among the people.

I do not think, as some would have us believe, that Indian Chiefs and men of position are all, as a class, unworthy of being consulted in matters of the State, for among their number there are a good many who are entitled to the great esteem of their countrymen, on account of their high intellect and noble virtues as men and as rulers of their subjects. Unfortunately, however, it cannot be denied that the majority of the Indian Chiefs and the territorial magnates are as much, if not more, out of touch with the people as most of the European officials.

Besides the rigid rules and systems, which bound together the men of a class, have all given way before the advance of Western education, and the former hold, which the chieftains had upon the people, is entirely gone.

The middle and the poorer classes have taken full advantage of the opportunities, which the British Raj afforded them, for bettering their position, but the hereditary nobility and aristocracy have lagged behind in the race for culture and progress, intellectual as well as moral.

Thus it is no wonder that the territorial magnates have to a large extent ceased to occupy the high place as leaders of the people which the accident of birth had given to them.

The people at large are not disposed to recognise the claims to leadership of a class whose only merit is the ownership of a certain amount of property, but regard culture a claim for it.

My conviction is that Advisory Councils formed as suggested in the Government of India letter will not engender that confidence which they should have in order to be of any utility.

I am certain that the Chiefs and territorial magnates will not represent any other class but their own; for the interests of the petty land-owners and those of the tenants could not be safely left to their care, as they might in many instances clash with their own, leaving aside altogether the educated class, which to a great extent is influencing the future of the country.

Regarding the proposal (7), paragraph 5, of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, I am of opinion that the objects aimed at by the formation of these councils will not be attained, if the proceedings of the councils are not given publicity.

In treating the opinions of councillors as confidential the Government will afford the critics of the council a weapon which would effectually be used in undermining its influence as well as usefulness. Besides, I regret to say that I do not believe that confidential communications will secure frank expression of opinion.

I am firmly of conviction that no Advisory Council will prove useful, unless men of all shades of opinion are allowed to partake in its deliberations; a council consisting exclusively of ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates will not command to that extent that it should the respect of the people, especially the educated classes of the country. I do not think it would be difficult for the Government to find men of education and culture suitable for nomination to the Advisory Councils, outside the ranks of territorial magnates; men, who in social status and in their influence over the country men, are inferior to no territorial magnate in the land.

The inclusion of a few such men will be a long way to disarm adverse criticism. I am urged to press this view by the fact, that the educated classes have not taken kindly to the proposals of the formation of the Advisory Council, and some men go to the length of saying that these councils are likely to be used as shields, for unpopular measures, by the authorities.

II. (2) A Provincial Advisory Council.—A Provincial Advisory Council can be a useful institution, if conducted on the lines suggested above with regard to the Imperial Council.

III. (3) I approve of the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council.

I have no suggestions to make regarding points (1) and (2) of paragraph 12 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter and also as regards A., B., C. of the same paragraph, but I am opposed to 2 seats being reserved for Muhammadans under (d) D and 2 under clause E.

(4) I approve of the proposal of electing one member by the Provincial Council to the Imperial Legislative Council.

(5) I am not opposed to the selection of one of the great land-owners of the Province to the Imperial Council. Though I would vote for election, but I am aware of the difficulties, which election of one member from the whole Province involves and, for that reason, I think it will be better if a land-owner is nominated by the Government.

(6) Under the head (d) of D I would not have any members elected by Muhammadans, nor do I approve of the nomination of two Muhammadans under E. I see no reason why special advantages should be secured to any particular community.

We allow Muhammadans to take part in electing members like all other communities, and I fail to see any particular interest of that community, which is specially to be safeguarded. On principle I am opposed to creed or class representations in the Legislative Councils, and four seats out of a small number of seats will form an undue preponderance of one community, creating as it would invidious distinction, which doubtless will be resented by other communities. The constitution, sketched out by Sir Harold Stuart in paragraph 12 of his letter, is much too favourable to the Muhammadan community, and I would be sorry to see the impressions strengthened in the minds of the Hindus that at their expense the followers of Islam are unduly favoured by the Government.

If the proposal of electing two members under (d) D is decided upon by the Government then I would suggest that such members be elected by an electorate, as suggested in paragraph 17 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, but if that be not found feasible then by the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Council.

IV. (7) Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—I would advocate an increase in the present number of members, and would raise the total strength to 30.

(8) I am in favour of having all the non-official members elected.

(9) This question has already been answered in paragraph (6).

(10) I would suggest the following electorate:—

1. The municipal committees of the Punjab 1
2. The district boards of the Punjab 1
3. All graduates of 5 years' standing of any Indian University . 1
4. Every Revenue division in the Punjab to elect 2 members, leaving a majority of 4 of official members.

(11) I would suggest no change in the constitution of the municipal and district boards.

(12) I would adopt the electorate suggested in paragraph 17 of Government of India letter.

V. (13) I approve of the discussion of the Budget under separate heads as suggested in paragraph 23 in the Government of India letter.

(14) I would suggest that the Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Council only if the system of election is introduced.

(15) I would advocate the introduction of the right of interpellation in the Punjab Council.

BHAGAT RAM,

Barrister-at-Law, Jullundur City.

Translation of the replies sent by Rana Lehna Singh of Manaswal in the Hoshiarpur District.

I. (1) There is need of such an Imperial Council for the country. I concur with the proposals made in paragraph 5 of the letter.

II. (2) A Provincial Advisory Council is necessary for every Province, and I agree with the proposals, regarding its constitution and duties, made in paragraph 6 of the Government letter.

III. (3) The Imperial Legislative Council requires enlargement, and I concur with the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter.

(4) I approve that one member should be elected as proposed in paragraph 13 of the letter.

(5) A great land-owner paying Rs. 2,000 revenue should be selected by election.

(6) The four Muhammadan members of the Imperial Council should be appointed by election.

IV. (7) The number of the members of the Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab should be increased; and the members of every class and body should be selected with regard to position and abilities.

(8) Some offices should be filled by nomination and some by election.

(9) In every case the proportion of officers for every class should be fixed on a fixed rule.

(10) If election is resorted to for the appointment of all or any of the unofficial members it should be through district boards, having regard to abilities.

(11) As suggested in paragraph 22 (c) of the Government of India letter, the great land-owners paying Rs. 2,000 Government revenue and money-lenders and traders paying an income-tax of Rs. 500 should be elected.

(12) The separate representation of Muhammadans should be by election in the form suggested in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter.

V. (13) I agree that the discussion of the Budget in the Legislative Council should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(14) The Provincial Budget should be discused in the Punjab Legislative Council by separate heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(15) It is proper to introduce into the Punjab Legislative Council the power of interpellation by members, for a correct conclusion cannot be drawn until every point is discussed by putting questions. Hence every matter should be decided in accordance with the majority of votes.

LEHNA SINGH,

Rais of Manaswal, District Hoshiarpur.

Dated Hoshiarpur, 26th November 1907.

From—Rai Bahadur Sham Das, Government Pleader, and Vice-President, Municipal Committee, Hoshiarpur,

To—The Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

In obedience to your circular no. 172—3541, dated the 22nd October 1907, I beg to submit herewith my answers to questions on the subject of reformed councils.

I further beg to be excused for not being able to comply with your orders within the time fixed owing to sudden rush of criminal cases which did not admit of sufficient time for this purpose.

SHAM DAS,

Government Pleader, Hoshiarpur.

Answers to questions in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907, on the subject of reformed councils.

Question I.—(1) Such a council would, in my humble opinion, prove of immense service to the country, but I would respectfully suggest the following modifications and alterations in the proposals contained in paragraph 5 of Government of India letter.

Paragraph 5.—(3) (a) The number of ruling Chiefs may be reduced to ten and they must be selected from among men who have had the benefit of the high English education as well as actual administrative experience as ruling Chiefs for at least five years, and who have by their high abilities, both educational and administrative, proved their fitness for such a post of trust and responsibility.

(b) That the selection of territorial magnates be not confined to merely land-holding or any other class, but should be extended to people of all classes and creeds, the necessary qualification being the ability and capacity for proper discharge of the duties required of a councillor. The men should especially be selected from the trading and legal professions who alone have real touch with the general masses and are considered the best medium for voicing the public opinion, being fully conversant with the general condition and grievances of the masses.

Paragraph 5.—(7) The proceedings may be confidential, but the council should in each and every matter be consulted collectively and individual opinion wholly disregarded. The consultation must be held in a meeting with due deliberations and free and open discussions and the decisions arrived at communicated to Government.

Question II.—(2) There can be no doubt that a Provincial Advisory Council would be a very useful institution, but I think the constitution should be so arranged as to admit of the members of each Provincial Council to act as members of the Imperial Council at one and the same time. The number of members of the Imperial Council should be so fixed as to leave margin for a sufficient number of additional members other than the members of a Provincial Council: for instance, of the sixty members twenty should be such who may not be members of any Provincial Council, while the other forty should be members of the Provincial Councils.

The constitution and duties of these councils should be in accordance with the constitution and duties of the Imperial Council, and the selection should be so arranged as to represent deserving people of all classes (including land-holding, trading, and professional).

Question III.—(3) I approve of the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council, but beg to suggest the following modifications in the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter:—

(a) No provision has been made in the scheme proposed to represent the interests of education which is hardly justified. The Indian Universities must be allowed the privilege of representing the educational interest in the Imperial Legislative Council, and each University may be allowed one representative at least.

(b) To adequately represent the commercial and industrial interests of provinces other than Calcutta and Bombay the number of commercial members should be raised. In my humble opinion these interests would be sufficiently represented if the number of commercial members is raised to five by allowing the commercial and industrial classes of the Madras, Punjab, and the United Provinces to send one representative each.

(c) I do not at all approve of the idea of giving the special privileges as proposed in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter.

(4) Yes. I approve of the proposal that one member should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council as proposed in paragraph 13 of the letter.

(5) I approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners of this Province to the Imperial Council, and I don't think that in this case election will succeed. Nomination would be the best method of selection.

(6) I do not approve of the suggestions made under heads D (d) and E of paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter.

In my humble opinion no special concession or privilege should be given to any community of His Majesty's Indian subjects by reason of differences of religion or creed. This policy would be open to very serious objections, and would likely lead to unpleasant jealousies.

Question IV.—(7) I would certainly advocate an increase in the present number of members of the Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab to at least 20.

(8) I would suggest that at least half of the non-official seats be filled in by election.

(9) In my humble opinion seats to Hindus, Sikhs, and Muhammadans should be allotted in proportion to their population in the Province as is the case in certain municipalities, for instance, Hoshiarpur.

(10) I would suggest the following electorates:—

(a) Municipalities.

(b) District boards.

(c) Commercial and industrial classes.

(d) Universities.

(e) Educated classes.

(11) I approve of the suggestions made in paragraph 22 (b) and (c) of the Government of India letter.

(12) I don't think there is any pressing necessity for making a provision for the separate representation of Muhammadans in addition to that open to them by nomination or election in the ordinary way.

Question V.—(13) Yes, the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(14) Yes, I think the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(15) Yes, I certainly advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members.

SHAM DAS, Rai Bahadur,

Government Pleader and Vice-President,
Municipal Committee, Hoshiarpur.

Dated Ludhiana, 22nd November 1907.

From—MUHAMMAD HASSAN, President, Anjuman Islamia, Ludhiana,

To—The Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

I most respectfully beg to submit herewith the opinion of the Anjuman Islamia, Ludhiana, regarding the measures proposed by the Government of India for giving the people of India wider opportunities for expressing their views on administrative matters, as requested in your circular no. 172—3541, dated 22nd ultimo.

MUHAMMAD HASSAN,

President, Anjuman Islamia, Ludhiana.

Translation of the opinion of the Anjuman Islamia, Ludhiana, submitted by Muhammad Hassan, President of the Anjuman.

I. (1) So far as the answer to this question can be found from the history of India it is nothing except that such an Advisory Council would be of much service to the country. To find out whether such an Advisory Council existed in India or not and how its results proved to be for the Government and the people of this large country, though not easy and certain, as the incontinuous state of the past history has not left any such opportunity for a historian, but so far as can be ascertained, is that in the reign of two great kings who were fond of governing the country with justice and of making their government more firm appointed such Advisory Councils. Both of these kings not only succeeded in strengthening their reign in the country, but they also established their good reputation in the future generations of the people, and it is only due to this superiority that the people of India as yet have been praising them, and it is not improper to say that their good qualities have charmed the minds of the people of India. Those great kings were Maharaja Bir Bikrama Jit and Shah Akbar. These kings constituted an Advisory Council on a very small scale. The council was called "Nauratan." The word means the Wazirs or the selected persons of the country. These persons were not selected by the people who were never consulted in their appointment, suspension, or dismissal which were made by the king alone, through his intellect and capability, keeping in view the object of governing the country well, for he had a great mind of doing justice, which principle alone guided him in making the appointment. The council thus selected consisted of members distinguished for their abilities, knowledge, experience, and wisdom, and each of them was matchless in a special branch, and free from all kinds of prejudices and partisanships. The qualities were controlled by the Government which had appointed them. Whatever opinion they used to give was given with the special intention of giving a best opinion. This quality was the only reason why their opinion was accepted. Hence the Supreme Government was in a way bound to accept their opinion and advice. The goodness of the opinion obliged the king, who had despotic authority, but who was desirous of doing justice to the people, to accept the opinion with his willingness. This was the reason that the reputation of their justice prevailed among the subjects and their government was approved and their reign established, and no opposite voice was heard from the subjects. This superior management charmed the minds of the people. The important duty of the councillors was to enquire into the condition and views of the subjects personally; and the points complained of by the people when ascertained by any of them were brought to the notice of the highest officer without adding or lessening anything. Thus the matter complained of was removed. The principle of making the highest authority agree to an arrangement, by a majority of the votes of the members of the council, was not in force in those days, for, it is possible, that the majority of the members of a council agree in an opinion, and it is also possible that the concurred matter be injurious for the people of the country, for it is possible that the voters are, on religious, tribal, personal, or political grounds, interested in having the thing done, which may affect the interests and ideas of the people badly, and the rule when put in force may put them to great inconvenience and trouble on the part of the Government. The only remedy for such cases is that the highest authority should check the opinion very intelligently, and no voter should have the courage of giving an opinion merely in hope of its being passed by the majority of votes.

The greatest misunderstanding that requires notice at all times is that the members of the council are considered the representatives of the country, and their every opinion is taken to be the opinion of the country. The opinion of the country is the opinion of all persons, but when a few persons represent it, it cannot be the opinion of the country, but is the opinion of those few persons. If a voter has succeeded in ascertaining and adducing the correct opinion of the country he has done his very sacred duty and has served the Government well. If the voter is mistaken in ascertaining the opinion of the country or has, after ascertaining it, preferred his own opinion to that and has produced his own opinion, his mistake would cause many evils and great anxiety if acted upon. This happens in cases in which matters are decided by the majority of votes, and the rights of some people of the country are totally destroyed and many other evils of various kinds take place which would not have taken place had this opinion not been acted upon.

A few persons cannot in any way be the representatives of the different tribes, classes, and persons of the country. Nor can such honest men of pure principles be available in every case, as would express the exact opinion of the people they represent. It is, therefore, very necessary and obligatory that the number of the members of the council should be extended to a limit required for the representation of any tribe not only having regard to its population, but also to its political status, although the number of the representatives may have no proportion to the population of the tribe. Until such is the state the council should only have the right of giving an opinion, so that the members of the council may have in view that their opinion can be accepted only if found excellent. Thus good opinions will be obtained. These opinions should be checked ably as was done by the former rulers. Thus a despotic Government can be of more advantage to the people of the country than a republic Government is thought to be, for the republic and parliament Government cannot be free from the objection that sometimes the majority of votes pass such opinions which are not only disadvantageous for the country, but neither of the parties considers their issue useful; and the useful arrangement becomes spoiled in laying it before too many persons for opinion. This is the reason that sometimes the management of despotic kings proves to be better than the republic and parliament Government; especially in countries where there are more than one tribe the republic or the parliament Government can in no case be useful, nor is such an arrangement possible as be free from all defects. In countries the people of which are only one nation, the Government of the members elected by them is not free from objections. In a country like India where people of different religions and tribes reside and whose political state is of a special nature, I am of opinion that, on the above grounds, only an Advisory Council, whose opinion may or may not be accepted by the Supreme Government, can be useful, if the Supreme Government very intelligently examines the opinions expressed and keep a supervision over the councillors, so that the members may refrain from giving wrong opinions. Otherwise the same defects will result as took place in the Punjab at the close of the Sikh Government, by the appointment of the Sikh Khalsa Panchayat, for it was not controlled by any superior authority, and their opinion was not taken as a mere counsel, but it was acted upon if agreed to by the majority.

As to the proposals made in paragraph 5 (of the Government letter) regarding the constitution and duties of the council, I can say that the principles stated above throw much light on the subject. I think the council can be useful if the above state principles are followed. I therefore agree with the proposals nos. 1, 2, and 5. As to the proposal mentioned in paragraph 3, I beg to say that in the whole of the British India there are nearly 150 Chiefs of States, Nawabs, and Rajas under the British Government. These Chiefs belong to the different tribes and religions of India, and with regard to the extent of their States they are not equal, nor is the number of the Maharajas and Nawabs proportionate to the political state of the different tribes, for the number of Muhammadan Chiefs is less than the Hindu Maharajas, though, having regard to the extent of the country and power, the Government may be considering the degree of the Muhammadan Chiefs to be specially high, yet the necessary effect of this proposal seems to be that either the ruling Chiefs will be selected with regard to their degree and the extent of their State and admitted into the council of India, or one after the other will be selected without regard to their degree and country. In the case of this change, the effect of the respectable members of this part of the council will create special results, some of which are specially worthy of the Government consideration.

(a) The people of India, who have hitherto been considering themselves merely under the British Government and do not like the mode of government of the Native States, would in a way take themselves to be under the Native Chiefs and Nawabs, and in order to better their prospects would try to obtain the sympathy of such ruling Chiefs. This effect would produce an improper consequence in the case of the British subjects, and the Native Chiefs will create a special kind of connection with the British subjects, and the Native Chiefs, if consulted, will have the power and authority as to the life and property of the British subjects. It is also possible that the Native Chiefs, having in view their own political condition, may overlook the rights of the British subjects, for, they being the respectable members of the Advisory Council, the other members of the council, having regard to the respect due to them, and being influenced by the weight of their opinion more than the proper degree, may naturally refrain from expressing the correct opinion.

(b) The greatest fear is that the Native Chiefs, who have as yet been considered free from prejudices and factious feelings may by joining the council be subjected to these tribal and religious prejudices, the results of which can be understood if considered fully.

(c) It is also worth mention that the appointment of the Native Chiefs to the council of (British India) administration may not put the British subjects into any mistake at any time. Hence the inclusion of the ruling Chiefs in the Council is objectionable in two ways. Firstly, with regard to number and degree and the complications at the time of selection. Secondly, on account of government on the British subjects by way of giving an advice. It would have been far better that instead of these the Government should have selected able and honest persons out of the subjects who may themselves be equally affected by their opinions expressed in the council, and who may be thought well acquainted with the real circumstances of the people of the country and may be possessed of the special means of acquiring the acquaintance.

Having regard to population and the extent of the country the number of the members is also less, and should be doubled. As the land-owners are the better portion of the people of the country therefore a proper number of them should be taken as members. In electing the members due regard should be had to the political condition of other tribes at the time of nominating members.

Proposal no. 4 as to the term of office and as to appointment is very proper and reasonable.

As to the proposal no. 6 I suggest so much amendment that the council should be allowed the permission to bring any point, of its own accord, to the notice of Government, while every British subject can, with a good intention, bring matters, relating to legislation or administration, to the notice of Government. It is a different thing whether the Government would attend to it or not. Hence this Advisory Council should not be debarred from moving on any point a right which every soul enjoys already, specially because the council has no legal powers, and it is in the hands of Government to accept or reject their opinions. Hence in presence of this condition there is no need of adding the further condition contained in proposal no. 6. Of course, if time requires, special conditions may be imposed as to move matters for discussion. By this liberty all the views of the people of the country will be represented in the council, which, when called on by Government to give an opinion on some matters, will be ready beforehand to give a good opinion; and the views and opinions now expressed in disrespectful words in political circles will all be discussed in the council of civil and responsible persons reasonably, and thus the views of the general agitation of the country will be changed in the shape of the reform of the country under the influence of the selected men of the country, and there will be an end to the general agitation now prevalent in the country, and affection with Government will improve.

As to the proposal no. 7 I fully concur. The meeting should be held only once a year.

II. Provincial Advisory Councils.—In accordance with the principles stated in reply to question no. 1, these are as necessary as the Imperial Advisory Council is. The members of the Imperial Advisory Council should not be the members of the Provincial Advisory Council at one time. This would give more opportunity, for the leading men of different tribes, to be members of the council, and the views of the country could become known through many persons, and the defect of smallness of number will thus be removed. Otherwise it is possible to happen that the greater number of the members of the Provincial Council will be filled by the members of the Imperial council, and the Provincial Council will not be found so advantageous to the country as it would have been had its members been separate from those of the Imperial Council. Moreover, it will afford opportunity to the small tribes, of special political degree, of supplying a member of theirs, and thus the local Governments will be furnished with opinions on a large scale. If the services of the members in the Provincial Advisory Council be proved to be meritorious there is no doubt that they should be promoted to the membership of the Imperial Advisory Council on the recommendation of the local Governments, and, some other member may have the opportunity of giving his opinion in his stead. Moreover, the opinion of the Provincial Advisory Council relating to matters common in both the councils may be of some help to the Imperial Advisory Council, and the Government will be in a better position to weigh and check the opinion of the Imperial Advisory Council. As the proposal of appointing these councils are based on the best principles of governing a country, which reach Government through the advantage of advice, and the acceptance or rejection of the opinion lies in the power of Government, therefore, in order to obtain detailed advice, if the number of these members be more than or equal to that of the Imperial Council members the representatives of the large population can appear before Government in a proper proportion, and there can be no harm but advantage and satisfaction of the public. In joining the Chiefs of States there is the same objection as stated before. The appointment of the members should be for a fixed period, and the power of giving an opinion should not be restricted to the points referred to as laid down in proposal no. 6 relating to the Imperial Advisory Council. In support of this opinion all the reasons given above, relating to the non-restriction of the powers of the members of the Imperial Advisory Council may be used here too.

This council should also meet annually.

I fully concur in the mode of questioning.

III. Enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council.—Whatever has been said before relates to the Advisory Councils, and in the whole of the opinion it has been thought obligatory that the acceptance or rejection of the opinions expressed by those councils should depend on the highest authorities' abilities of check and examination. It has also been stated above that in a country populated by different tribes of different religions, not having an equal footing in it with regard to historical facts, but having had for centuries the relation of conqueror and conquered, a parliament or republic Government principles if once applied would cause an astonishing change; for the principles on which a member of a parliament is selected are suitable only to the case of one limited tribe the constitution of whose government be in view, and they cannot at all suit the country, where different tribes, having the relation of a conqueror and a conquered nation, have resided for centuries and established this status in the political and trading matters and condition, for the conqueror nation in Asia never gave a tendency towards trade. In countries where the parliament principles have been in force the nations there are trading classes and their political rights are also on an equal footing. The Muhammadans in India settled like a conqueror nation or like those having connection with them. And the Indians, who adopted the Muhammadans' religion helped and assisted the management of the Muhammadan conquerors according to the principle of Muhammadan brotherhood. And for their livelihood they adopted the means required to complete the requirements of a military conqueror and managing nation. Hence the most part of the Muhammadan population either engaged in military requirements and performed military services for generations or took up an art or labour for the requirements of the military class, but being in the religion of the conqueror nation, naturally enjoyed the preferential rights over their neighbour tribes, and in political and religious matters obtained the privileges, which a nation being in the religion of a conqueror could naturally get. It was on account of this preference that they obtained a good position in dealings and affairs over the conquered nations, a position to which they would not have been entitled had they not been in the religion of the conqueror. In spite of these circumstances, the conquered nations had for centuries nothing to complain against.

The Muhammadan kings maintained the distinction between the conqueror and conquered nations as regards the Arya people, and never allowed the residents of India equal rights with the Arya people; else the number and condition of the original residents of India was in no case so low that if they had been given rights equal to the conquered nations or the nation of a different religion it would have been improper or prejudicial to the management. Hence it cannot be declared in any case that the different tribes of India have in the administration of the country an equal right in proportion to their population; for the measure of the population proportion is much against the principles for the better government of such country and will prove to cause a great change in the political condition of the people, and the obligatory result of it would be that the condition and status of the tribe having less population would fall greatly, and their affairs would change. It is not astonishing that at any future time that nation, which once was a conqueror one and was considered respectable, may fall from the dignity owing to its population proportion, and become an inferior and neglected nation, and the priority, which it has over the other conquered tribes on account of political considerations, may fall from the degree of equality also, and it is not strange that the people with more population may think that the Muhammadans have no right to claim equal rights, whereas the grant of equal right to Muhamadan nation is to negative the preference and distinction it enjoyed for one thousand years in this country on account of being a conqueror nation or having connection with it.

As trade among the Muhammadans in India has been very less (on the ground stated above, being a conqueror nation or having been attached to it), as compared with the other subordinate tribes, and they are not accustomed to trade, and because they do not take interest, therefore the principles of trade in the present conditions cannot be enforced among them, hence election of the members for the purpose of government, on the measure of trade, is not useful for this tribe, specially because in the Legislative Council the members of the trading class will probably be elected as traders, on the Western principles of election. By the application of this mode of election the Muhammadans' political condition and status will suffer doubly. Hence enlargement of the Legislative Council in India with regard to population and trade cannot be useful to the Muhammadans. If the council be enlarged with regard to the political condition of every tribe there is no harm, and it can be useful also. For if there are many members in the ruling council of any country better laws for the country will be enacted. There is no doubt that to be a member for a tribe, and to act according to the needs of a tribe, and to lay the claims before Government by means of his best opinion and advice according to the need of the tribe, are quite different things. In case of a large number of the members it is possible that there may be a special member able to consider every point, and there may be others having a better opinion, on special points separately, and be thus preferable to men of common-sense and they be able to bring to notice such defects and qualities in any special matter and thus influence the Government authorities to agree with them, and the consequence will be that most useful laws may be passed for the country, and the wrong laws be not passed as soon the mistakes in them are pointed out.

Hence, with due regard to the principles stated above, I am of opinion that the enlargement of the Legislative Council is proper and useful. The proposal made in paragraph 12 of the Government letter as to the election of members is subject to the following objections. In nominating a ruling Chief there are the objections stated above under head of Imperial Advisory Council. If there be a necessity of joining a ruling Chief for the purpose of taking his opinion as to the law to be enacted affecting other ruling Chiefs, then there will be the following defects:—

(a) In accordance with the treaties made by the Government with the ruling Chiefs, and the kindness which the Government shows to them, the enactment of such laws can be of satisfaction to all the ruling Chiefs. Therefore it is unnecessary to join any one of the Chiefs in the council.

(b) All the reasons given before are against the inclusion of a ruling Chief.

(c) On account of the difference of religions and tribes, the addition of a ruling Chief to the council would create inequality in the measure of representation of the other tribes. Among the elected members would be elected two Hindu members of class (a) necessarily and the equality would not exist, to maintain which the appointment of the Muhammadan members was desired. As there can be other members aware of the principles of trade and willing to help in such matters therefore there is no necessity of electing them at this measure. Instead of these, members of the learned class should be substituted; or two members should necessarily be selected from the religious leaders of the Muhammadans and Hindus called Shekh-ul-Islam and Shastri, respectively.

In other proposals contained in paragraph 12 (of the Government letter) the objectionable point is that the Muhammadan community is thereby represented in a quite insufficient degree. The Government admit that in the councils the Muhammadan community hitherto have not received a measure of representation commensurate with its number and political and historical importance. When once the cancellation of the measure of proportion has been proposed for which they are thankful, it is expedient that their representation should be sufficient. For if any important object of this kind is left out the Government would incur the displeasure of a body of politicians without actually benefitting the Muhammadans. Therefore in supporting the proposal of giving the Muhammadans a separate representation it is necessary to state that the seats reserved for them should be increased from 4 to at least 6, and it is possible as follows:—

	Government proposals.	My proposals.
A.—Ex-officio	8	8
B.—Additional officials to be nominated	20	19
C.—A ruling Chief to be nominated by the Viceroy	1	...
D.—Elected members—
(a) by Chambers of Commerce	2	*2
(b) by the non-official members of Provincial Council	7	7
(c) by the nobles and the great land-owners	7	7
(d) by Muhammadans	2	4
E.—Non-officials nominated (not less than 2 to be Muhammadans	4	4
F.—Experts	2	2

* Religious leaders.

(4) I agree with the proposal that one member should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council as proposed in paragraph 13 of the letter.

(5) The intention of Government that the great land-owners should be entitled to be represented is not a new thing, and it is proper that the class of such men who are men of influence and status in the native society should be given a share in the legislative work. The proposal that one of the great land-owners of the Punjab should be selected as a member of the Imperial Council is very reasonable. He should be selected by election. A special Provincial electorate body of the zamindars paying not less than Rs. 5,000 as revenue should select one of them. A condition more strict than this as to the payment of Government revenue should not be imposed, for the number of electors will then be much less.

(6) It has been stated before, giving detailed reasons, that the appointment of 4 Muhammadans to the Imperial Council is very insufficient. As stated in reply to question no. (3) 7 Muhammadan members are required:—

D.—(a) Muhammadan religious leader	1
E.—Non-officials nominated	2

The first-mentioned one member should be appointed by the Viceroy from the whole of India. The 4 members mentioned next should be elected from the Punjab, the United Provinces, Bengal, Eastern Bengal, Bombay, and Madras by rotation. The election to be made by the electors mentioned in clauses (a), (b), and (c) of paragraph 18 of the Government letter.

(7) The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab may be extended on the grounds given in reply to question III above. Then it can be proper and useful. As this province is near other Muhammadan countries, nay, adjoins them, and the Muhammadan population in it exceeds that of the other tribes, and it had been a part of Muhammadan government much time before the other parts of India were, therefore the condition of the Muhammadans of this Province as compared with that of the Muhammadans of other provinces is somewhat deserving of distinction. As by chance some time before the British Government one other tribe ruled this Province for a short time and destroyed the Muhammadan rights by its Sikha Shahi reign, therefore the condition of the Muhammadans of this Province is deserving of more attention of the Government. The British rule in this Province has not been so long a time as in other provinces of India; hence education has been yet backward in the Province to acquaint people with the rights of freedom; and (the Province) is not aware of how to lay its claims before (Government) without any fear or mistake. The Legislative Council for the Province was established only in 1898 hence if the members of the council be increased it should be increased mostly by the method of nomination as this alone can be useful. The number of the members of the council should be at least equal to the number of the districts in the province, for the districts of it are different in territorial nature and position. The languages used in one district are different from those used in other districts, and the customs of these districts are also different, and the circumstances of the people are also separate from those of others.

(8) Appointment by means of nomination on the grounds mentioned in reply to question no. 7 is very proper for this Province, and in no case should more than half the members be appointed by election, for there are two tribes of political importance in this province—Muhammadans and Sikhs. Though the number of Sikhs is much less than the number of Muhammadans, but because some time ago they ruled the country and the remainder of the Sikh government still exists in the shape of Rajas, jagirdars, and numerous land-owners, therefore this remainder would necessarily occupy some position of distinction in the political circle. In order to maintain the political condition of the Muhammadans it is necessary to keep in view that the total number of the Hindu and Sikh members should not exceed the Muhammadan members, for it often happens that the Sikh members join the Hindu members and express opinions against the Muhammadan rights. There is a small difference between Sikhs and Hindus. They join in eating and drinking with each other and also in their political state, and in religious duties both of them join to a great extent. It is only one tribe divided into two parts; for example, Sikh Khatris and other Khatris. Relationship also takes places among such tribes. Hence the number of Sikh members is a portion of the Hindu members in general condition, and they help each other except in a few and special matters. Under the circumstances the total number of the Sikh and Hindu members should in any case remain below the total number of the Muhammadan members.

(9) In the Punjab Province the population proportion should not be lost sight of, but should be kept in view both as regards the nominated and elected members. The increase in the Sikh members should in no case be so admitted as to create a change in this proportion, for a Sikh member will necessarily be elected from the zamindar and cultivator class. If the appointment of these members be made in the following manner the representatives of all the tribes in the Province will properly be included:—

(1) Muhammadans—
- (a) Agriculturists.
- (b) Non-agriculturists.

(2) Hindus—
- (a) Sikh subjects.
- (b) Agriculturists.
- (c) Non-agriculturists.

(3) Christians or other miscellaneous tribes.

The above proportion should be maintained in the nominated members also elected from the tribes (1) and (2).

As to the election of the members to be selected from the agricultural class with regard to the above proportion every revenue-payer should have the right to vote, for before the issue of the Land Alienation Act the lands passed into the hands of the non-agricultural classes, and thus it created a change in the proprietorship of the agricultural class, but they have continued to be cultivators, hence if the measure of proprietorship is adopted in their case it would be a wrong estimate. Among the non-agricultural class are included the people of many classes, most of them maintain themselves by labour, profession and art. Hence it would be hardship if only tax-payers of them be entitled to vote. The tax-paying class is only the trading class, most of whom are Hindus. Hence the payment of tax should not be a measure for voters, but among the artisans a special age and special amount of income should be the measure of voting. And among the traders, voters should be those who pay a special amount of tax.

Among the Sikhs voters should be those who either in the class of land-holders pay land revenue, or pay a certain sum as tax. And in other miscellaneous tribes the voters should be those who have received a certain amount of education or pay a certain amount of tax.

The election or nomination of these members should be in the following proportion:—

Muhammadans	7
Hindus, including 1 Sikh	4
Other tribes, including Christians	1

(10) The district boards and the municipal committees are not the correct estimate of the tribal condition, hence the election should not be restricted to these bodies only, for the district boards and the municipal committees do not contain the members of every tribe proportionate to the population, nor have all the persons, who properly have the status of being the representative of any tribe, joined these bodies in a due proportion, for no such provision was made in the rules before.

The election should be in accordance with paragraph 22 (a) of the Government letter, and the votes of those persons should be taken who are mentioned in reply to question no. (9).

(11) If the Muhammadan members be selected in the population proportion as against the other tribes and the same proportion be maintained in the nominated members then there is no need of a separate representation. But if this cannot be done, then these members should be increased in the population proportion, and the increase should be made by nomination or election made by the elected Muhammadan members or Muhammadan voters. The district boards and the municipal committees are unable to supply proper members as explained in reply to question no. (1) above. They may perhaps supply proper members if the tribal proportion and political conditions be introduced into them which is very difficult. Hence the most proper mode of election is that the following persons of every tribe should be proposed to be the voters, and their lists should be prepared. The voters should only be entitled to vote for the member of his own tribe and their number should be fixed beforehand and should be from among the following:—

(a) All those who pay land revenue to a certain extent annually, so that zamindars of average class be able to vote.

(b) All those who pay tax on an annual income of Rs. 2,000.

(c) All the registered graduates of the Punjab University of more than 5 years' standing.

(12) The reply to this question has been given above as reply to question no. (11), namely, if the Muhammadan members be elected in the proportion of population and political importance as against the other tribes and the same proportion be observed in the nomination, then there is no need of a separate representation. But if this cannot be done, then an increase should be made in them as suggested in reply to question no. (11) above; and the increase can be made in the manner mentioned in the reply to question no. (11).

V. (13) Discussion of the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council by separate heads is very proper for convenience' sake. But it is necessary that after the result of all the heads is drawn, discussion be made in one meeting in a general manner.

(14) It would be very proper and suitable if the above manner is followed in the Punjab also.

(15) The introduction into the Punjab Council of the power of interpellation by members is necessary.

To—The Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

I acknowledge the receipt of your esteemed letter, dated 2nd October 1907, with the object of expressing my views on questions on which opinions are desired in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, by the Government of India and the local Government from different personages. I most submissively send my views for the same in papers attached to this letter in the form of answers. I hope the answers will meet your kind perusal.

TIKA RAMNARAYAN SINGH,

OPINION.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—Such a council would be of great service to the people of India.

With respect to paragraph 5, clauses (2), (6), and (7), I am of opinion that in the appointment of suitable territorial magnates our Province be given the special preference as regards number, without any distinction of dignity and status of land-holders as compared with other provinces. The reason for this is quite obvious. Punjab is the foremost Province from the military and political points of view. The Government knows the full force of it, and need not be discussed here at length. Moreover, Imperial Councillors' powers must not be limited to give their opinions only on matters referred to them for consultation. Their business must be extended somewhat, that is to say, they ought to be empowered to lay before the Viceroy any important matter having political connection without reference, and that matter must be given full attention. The proceedings of the matter which is brought to the notice of the Viceroy without his reference, in case of mover's failure, must remain strictly confidential. As regards the other proceedings the rule laid down in paragraph 5, clause (7), is very good. The number of councillors is sufficient.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Council.—This Council, too, would be of great use for the country, but the number of the members be not limited to 20. Each district must have its own representative. In this way full information would be available. I advocate no change in its constitution and duties as laid down in paragraph 6 of the Government of India's letter.

III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—If this council be enlarged better results would be obtained. The number of 53 as proposed is sufficient enough to meet the purpose.

(4) The proposal is a wise one.

(5) As the land-holding class is generally illiterate, I am of opinion that the proposal won't do any good unless greater weight be given to the personal qualifications of the land-owner than to the revenue he pays. Revenue must not only be the test of selection.

(6) The Sikh community, possessing a double capacity, i.e., they are in peace as meek as a cow and in war as furious as a lion, are far behind from their Muhammadan brothers in education and pecuniary status. Though, generally speaking, the Muhammadan population is greater than the Sikh one, yet the latter don't lack in fidelity, bravery, and devotedness to the Crown, compared with the Muhammadans. The Sikh's fidelity, etc., is known to the Government as broad-day light. I don't think it is needful to discuss this matter fully here, and suffice to say that the Government should show the same special favour and confer the same privileges and rights to the Sikhs which are showered down to their Muhammadan brothers. In my opinion instead of four Muhammadans, two ought to be Sikhs, one to be nominated by the Viceroy and the other be elected by the Sikh members of Provincial Advisory Council from among their community, paying an income-tax upon an annual income of Rs. 10,000 or paying an amount of land revenue, which will indicate a corresponding income, i.e., of Rs. 10,000.

IV. (7) Provincial Legislative Council.—If the present number be increased there would be great facility for the people to express their views. In my opinion the number be raised to about 16 members. Nearly one-half must be non-officials and be chosen from among all classes.

(8) The present system of nomination would do. There is no necessity for election of the non-official seats.

(9) There are four broad classes in this Province.—(1) Singhs (commonly called Sikhs); (2) Hindus; (3) Christians; and (4) Muhammadans. Under the second heading various smaller classes step in. No fixed rule can be drawn up for the representation of these classes, that class must be fully represented whose interests coincide with the welfare of the British rule.

(10) I am against election, the Deputy Commissioner and Commissioner should form electorate of their own choice.

(11) If election be resorted to, the proposals of the Government of India as given in paragraph 22 are sound enough.

(12) Please vide my discussion under paragraph III, clause (6), in Imperial Legislative Council.

V. (13) and (14) Discussion of the budget in the Legislative Council.—The proposals for discussion in the two councils as given in paragraph 23 of the Government of India's letter is most useful.

(15) The powers of interpellation must be introduced in the Provincial Legislative Council, the matters will thus be shifted properly.

TIKA RAMNARAYAN SINGH,

Hony. Magst. and Civil Judge, Anandpur, District Hoshiarpur.

Dated Bagrian, 1st November 1907.

From—BHAI ARJAN SINGH, Honorary Magistrate, Bagrian (Ludhiana),

To—The Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

In reply to your circular letter no. 172—3541, dated 22nd October 1907, I have the honour to state that I have very carefully gone through the circular letter of the Government of India no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th August 1907, and its enclosures, regarding the enlargement of Legislative Councils and the formation of Advisory Councils. This would of course give people wider opportunities of expressing their opinions on administrative matters. But the peculiarity of these proposals which strikes one in reading the letter is the partiality shown to the Muhammadans and the want of proper consideration of the rights of other communities.

The Sikhs form a separate community of their own, and should be treated as such. From the religious point of view, they have nothing to do with the Hindus and are as distinct from them as are Muhammadans and Christians. They are not a trifle less important than the Muhammadans. Their importance is admitted by the Hon'ble Mr. E. D. Maclagan in his letter. But it is rather strange that no mention is made of their rights in the Government of India's letter under discussion. Their loyalty and unfailing faithfulness to the British Crown has won for them admiration from all quarters. Their sense of duty both in the office and in the field is best known to those who come in contact with them. Not a century ago they were the rulers of the land and could dictate law to others, but it is a strange irony of fate that their case is quite different now. The Sikhs have a firm belief that their fate is bound up with that of the English. They feel proud of saying so, as it was the prophecy of their 9th Guru, Teg Bahadur, which brought the English here, and led to the gradual extinction of the line of persecutors. This is the reason why they are so steadfastly attached to the English Government. The Government is well aware of the important part which the Sikhs play in the military administrative machinery of India. But the treatment meted out to them is not in proportion to their importance to the State. This is because their rights are not impressed upon the Government, and they are in minority.

It is now the intention of the Government to represent minorities also in the councils. The Sikhs are more in minority than the Muhammadans even. Considering their importance and minority it would be only fair if some special provision is made for their due representation in Imperial and the Punjab Provincial Councils, both Advisory and Legislative. I am of opinion that four seats should be set apart for the Sikhs in the Legislative Council of the Punjab—two to be nominated by the Government, and the other two to be elected by all the Sikhs; and that two seats should be reserved for the Sikhs in the Imperial Legislative Council—one to be nominated by the Government and the other to be elected by the Sikh members of the Provincial Legislative Council. Sikh representation should similarly be dealt with in the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils.

As regards the question of introduction of election system in the Provincial Legislative Council of the Punjab, I think that election should be recognised to be as necessary in the Punjab as in other sister Provinces. You may have realised the fact that our Province is sufficiently advanced for the purpose, as the principle of election is quite familiar to many people as is to be observed in municipal and other elections.

To represent the educated class of the Province, in my opinion, the Senate of the University should be empowered to elect one member to the Legislative Council. The member thus elected should be a graduate of not less than five years' standing. The representation of this class to the Imperial Council should similarly be made by all Universities by electing one member in rotation.

As regards the proposed discussion of the Provincial Budgets in Legislative Council, I recommend that the system should be introduced in the Punjab. The Budget should be laid before the council, and a general debate on it by all the members should be allowed. This would give the members ample opportunities of criticising the financial policy of the Government.

The members of the Punjab Legislative Council should also be given the power of interpellations in the council. This would tend to bring questions of public utility in a more legitimate form before the Government and would prove beneficial in the end.

These are my views on the proposed reform of councils. I am sure, in your reply to Government's letter, you would be kind enough to give proper attention to this letter of mine.

ARJAN SINGH,
Rais and Honorary Magistrate,
Bagrian (Ludhiana).

Dated 11th November 1907.

From—Khan Bahadur Ahmad Shah, Honorary District Judge, 1st Class, Jullundur,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Jullundur.

In obedience to your kind orders I have expressed my humble opinion as required by the Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907, and beg to lay them before you.

AHMAD SHAH, Khan Bahadur,
Honorary District Judge, 1st Class,
Jullundur.

Answers to questions in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907.

I. (1) In my humble opinion the Imperial Advisory Council proposed in paragraph 4 of Government of India letter will be useful for the country, and there seems to be no need of alteration in the proposals made in paragraph 5 regarding the constitution and duties of the said council.

II. (2) In my opinion the Provincial Advisory Council will be of great service to the country, and the scheme drawn in paragraph 6 rquires no modification.

III. (3) I agree to the extension of the Imperial Legislative Council, and like no change in the proposals put forward in paragraph 12.

(4) I approve of the election of one member by the Provincial Legislative Council as is stated in paragraph 13.

(5) I approve of the nomination of one member out of the big land-owners of this Province for the Imperial Legislative Council as mentioned in paragraph 15.

(6) I entirely agree that four Muhammadans should be appointed to the Imperial Council, two to be nominated at least and two to be elected either by the Muhammadan Fellows of the Punjab University or by the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Legislative Council.

IV. (7) In my opinion the number of members should be increased in proportion to the increase suggested as regards the Imperial Council.

(8) In my opinion the existing method of nomination should be maintained; election is premature for the Indians generally.

(9) In my humble opinion appointments should be made according to a fixed rule. There are practically four communities in the Punjab—Muhammadans, Sikhs, Hindus, and Christians. In the first place each class should be represented in proportion to the number of their population. Then some weight should be attached to the historical and political importance of the Muhammadans as the Government of India letter contemplates. The Sikh community also possesses some political distinction in this Province, but numerically they are nearly half way inferior to Muhammadans. Therefore I am of opinion that two members from the Sikh community should be appointed to the Provincial Legislative Council, and these appointments should be made by nomination.

(10) I am entirely against it that all or some non-official members should be elected by the people. At present Government only can select duly qualified men.

(11) In my opinion each class should be represented separately, but I do not agree to what is stated in (a), (b), and (c) of paragraph 22 of Government of India letter.

(12) I fully concur with the view that Muhammadans should be allotted separate representation. Out of four, three should be nominated, and one to be elected by the graduates of five years' standing of any Indian University, domiciled in the Punjab.

V. (13) In my opinion the manner of discussion on Budget should be altered according to paragraph 23 of Government of India letter.

(14) I agree that the discussion on Budget should be conducted in the way as suggested in paragraph 23.

(15) I consider it advisable that members should be given the power of interpellation in the Provincial Legislative Council.

General Note.

I have expressed my humble opinion above as required in order of succession. I beg to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that in the Punjab most of the land-owners and men of mercantile and other professions do not possess extensive properties and large incomes as is the case in other provinces. Therefore the qualification for a Provincial Councillor should be an annual payment of Rs. 400 as land revenue in case of land-owners and an income of Rs. 2,000 per year for other persons. If election is going to be adopted at all as the means of appointment to the Provincial Advisory Council only those persons should be entitled to vote who possess the corresponding qualifications necessary for membership. Similarly if election becomes the rule for appointment to the Legislative Council, only those persons should be empowered to vote who pay an annual revenue of Rs. 1,000 a year in case of land-owners, who earn an income of Rs. 5,000 a year in case of mercantile and industrial people, who are graduates of five years' standing of any Indian University, domiciled in the Punjab, or Fellows of any University, in case of educated classes, and who have retired from Government service after holding an office equal in grade to Extra Assistant Commissioners in the Punjab. Corresponding qualifications should of course be enjoyed by those who are going to be appointed to the Legislative Council. Besides these near relatives of ruling Chiefs in this Province should be entitled to vote and obtain seats in the councils. In the Imperial Advisory Council if the rule of election is established at all, ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates paying a land revenue of Rs. 5,000 a year or drawing an annual income of Rs. 25,000 should be classed as electors and each community should in all cases elect its own members. In conclusion I lay particular stress on nomination, because, in my humble opinion, nomination is the best means of appointment to every council at present.

AHMAD SHAH, KHAN BAHADUR,
Honorary District Judge, 1st Class,
Jullundur.

No. 1045—99-07, dated Multan, 27th November 1907.

From—M. W. FENTON, Esq., I.C.S., Officiating Commissioner, Multan Division,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

In continuation of this office endorsement no. 1035, dated 26th November 1907, I have the honour to forward two opinions on the proposed constitutional reforms which have been submitted by the Deputy Commissioner of Jhang. The one by Chaudhuri Sardar Khan, Extra Assistant Commissioner, represents the Muhammadan view of the case. The other emanates from the members of the Jhang bar, all Hindus. Mr. Latifi, in view of his impending transfer, has not found time to record his own views.

M. W. FENTON,
Offg. Commissioner, Multan Division.

OPINION.

The institution of the Advisory Councils, Imperial as well as Provincial, proposed by the Government of India in their letter no. 2310—17, dated the 24th August 1907, would be of much use to the country and of great service to Government, provided their constitutions are arranged in such a manner as to secure the selection of such persons as are really leaders of the people and possess actual influence among their clans or tribes, and to admit of frank expression of opinion on all matters connected with the administration of the country. Otherwise the institution in question would operate as a mere blind between the subjects and the administrators, and hence would rather harm than do any good to the country by increasing discontent among the masses.

2. It is a fact that of late each and every class of the subject races, that is, the bania, the agriculturist, the trader, the workman, etc., is being affected by discontent, and hence the few mischief-mongers have got great chances of working out sedition among the masses. The original cause of all this disaffection of the people lies in the dismemberment of village societies as the result of the British method of administration. According to oriental usages and customs obtaining in this country before the advent of the British rule, all classes of the community except the land-owners were regarded as subservient to and dependents of the land-owner, and the latter never permitted them to usurp any powers over any of their fellow-classes, not to speak of the land-owner himself. With the advent of the British rule all these oriental ties were suddenly broken asunder, and the general policy of the rulers was not only to encourage the dependent classes against their leaders, but also to weaken the latter by destroying their influence among the masses. This state of affairs resulted in demoralizing the land-owners who used to be leaders of the people; and they took to efforts to win over the rulers by debasing flatteries. In the meantime the dependent classes, getting free of control and taking advantage of the ignorance of the rulers, avenged themselves each and all upon the poor land-owner, their late master, and diligently assisted rulers in not only destroying his influence, but also in completely ruining him. The banias, shoe-makers, weavers, carpenters, etc., encouraged by Government officers became deputies, tahsildars, munsifs, pleaders, munsarims, peshkars, etc., and their joint efforts were directed against the poor land-owner, who believes that these people have been set upon him by the Government, and this is the cause of his disaffection. On the other hand, the dependent classes never accustomed to power and never knowing the principles of administration were spoiled by the favours shown to them, and prompted by their natural greediness (which underlies the habits of usury) yearned for more and more power, while their gradual success encouraged them further and further. When they saw that the land-owner was completely broken down and there was no chance of his resuming his place in the society or claiming any rights or privileges, they became avaricious of self-government, or failing that, a share in the Government of the country. These aspirations not meeting with the usual encouragement, to which they were accustomed at the hands of Government officers, led them to overawe the authorities by their discontent and misbehaviour.

3. Apart from these causes there is another reason also which led to the spread of discontent and disaffection among the masses, that is, the treatment which our Anglo-Indian rulers have, of late, been meting out to the subject races. Had it not been for the sympathetic and considerate treatment of the pioneers of the British Raj, immediately after the annexation, the country (at least the Punjab Province) would have never settled down so peacefully under the British Government. It is a mistake to believe that by better treatment the subjects would be encouraged and would eventually claim equal rights with the ruling class. With the exception of any specially mean natures no Indian would ever jump to any such conclusion. On the other hand, better treatment even to one's own slaves makes them enamoured of their master and elicit thoroughly loyal and submissive feelings. There is no doubt that the sword is a good instrument of rule, but it is impossible to have the sword ready to chastise at every moment for any reasonable length of time. Of course the subjects which are ruled by a hanging sword have no sympathy or feeling for their rulers, and hence always wish to snatch an opportunity to shake off such a Government. At any moment therefore that the sword slacks through some cause or another, the subjects jump at the throats of their rulers and the latter therefore never feel easy, even for one moment, in their life. Such a Government has no status and can never be stable, and in fact can never be termed a Government in the proper sense of the word. In the interests of better government it is always necessary to introduce honest and frank communication between the rulers and the ruled.

4. The people who are made to play certain parts on behalf of the subjects at the instance of the rulers cannot be expected to be thoroughly loyal and faithful to the interests of either the rulers or their fellow-subjects. Such people inspire no confidence, and hence have no influence among the subjects—they are known to be mere creatures of their selfishness. The people look upon their acts and words with distrust, and generally believe that their every word or action is a trick to entrap them.

5. The educated members of the society have generally sprung from the dependent classes, who are utterly void of fellow-feelings and hence have no sympathy with the masses; while their every effort is directed towards self-aggrandisement. They are therefore the last persons to be taken into the confidence of Government as representatives of the people. Thus neither the so-called leaders who have risen from dependent classes and who have assumed leadership on account of modern education and lucrative professions, nor the demoralized old type persons who are known among the people as satbachnias are of any use as advisers. The persons who really possess any influence among their class or race do not care for the existing methods of aggrandisement, and hence they avoid the district and other officers who sometimes do not like plain-speaking.

6. In the light of these remarks I now proceed to answer the questions on the subject.

I. (1) An Imperial Advisory Council would be of immense use to the rulers and the ruled provided its constitution and duties admit of proper councillors being selected and of these acting as advisers. The proposals in paragraph 5 might be amended as follows:—

(a) Only such persons should be selected for the council who will perform their duties honestly and frankly, and are really in the confidence of the people. The ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates in general have of late forfeited the confidence of the people, and hence a reasonable number of average land-owners, who might be in touch with agricultural life, might be selected.

(b) Whenever any matter is referred to the Advisory Council for consultation, all councillors should have a chance of advising on the matter. With the exception of important matters of State of a confidential nature, all matter affecting the administration should be referred to the Advisory Council. Such an arrangement will not only inspire confidence in the people, but will also keep the Government informed of the state of public feelings and afford more chances to the higher authorities to know the likes and dislikes of the subject races.

II. (2) The Provincial Advisory Council will also be of great service to the country if its constitution and duties are determined in view of the remarks made in the answer to question I (1) above.

III. (3) The enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council will be useful, but the scheme contained in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter might be modified in the light of the following remarks:—

(a) The reservation of four seats for Muhammadans, particularly as proposed under heads D (d) and E, appears, on the face of it, as an undue favour of one class of the subject races and hence is likely to give other races an apparent cause for heart-burning and disaffection. The internal relations of the subject races are also likely to be embittered which would stand in the way of the peace and prosperity of the country. I do not think also that the Muhammadans would profit by such a reservation of seats; and if the other communities set themselves against Muhammadans on the ground that Government is favouring them, which is not unlikely, it is probable that only few Muhammadans would be returned to the Legislative Council, and that they would be driven away from every place or office where the other communities are predominant. If all the communities are given the right of representation according to their population in each province, and in such computation the menial classes, which are classed non-Muslims, are excluded, the Muhammadans would secure 8 seats as against 12 by Hindus and 2 by Christians, vide table annexed (enclosure A).

(b) The population of British India is roughly 23 crores, and there are 22 members who are to represent the subject races, i.e., one member is to be appointed for every crore of the population. According to the population of the towns all over India of these 22 members 9 should represent the urban classes while 13 should be taken from the rural population. The heads D and E of paragraph 12 (2) might therefore be amended as follows:—

(a)	Chamber of Commerce, Calcutta	1 Christian.
(b)	Chamber of Commerce, Bombay	1 alternately Hindu and Muhammadan.
(c)	Nobles and land-owners of Bombay and rural classes	1 Hindu.
(d)	Nobles and land-owners of rural classes, Punjab	1 alternately Hindu and Muhammadan.
(e)	Nobles and land-owners of United Provinces ..	1 ditto.
(f)	Nobles and land-owners of Punjab	1 Muhammadan.
(g)	Nobles and land-owners of Central Provinces ..	1 Hindu.
(h)	Nobles and land-owners of Madras	1 Muhammadan. 1 Hindu.
(i)	Nobles and land-owners of Bengal and Eastern Bengal and Assam	3 Hindus. 3 Muhammadans.
(j)	Provincial Legislative Council of Bengal and Eastern Bengal and Assam	1 Hindu.
(k)	Provincial Legislative Council of Madras ..	1 Christian.
(l)	Urban classes of Burma	1 alternately Hindu and Muhammadan.
(m)	Urban classes of Madras	1 Hindu.
(n)	Urban classes of United Provinces	2 Hindus. 1 Muhammadan.
	TOTAL	22

III. (4) The answer is contained in the answer to question III (3) above. The smaller Legislative Councils need not be given the right.

(5) According to population both members for the Punjab should be taken from the rural class, that is one Muhammadan and one alternately Hindu and Muhammadan. I would propose selection, as the rural classes are not in a position to make a proper election. If election is to be resorted to the average land-owner, say, those who pay Rs. 500 annual revenue, and average non-agriculturist, say, those who pay income-tax Rs. 5,000, should have a chance. Each revenue division should elect, say, ten members to vote at the general election by the Province.

(6) No, for reasons discussed above. If election is resorted to, I would not support election by the non-official Muhammadan members of the Provincial Legislative Councils. The electorate suggested in the Government of India letter, paragraph 18, would do. If it be found impossible to frame a list of voters under head (C) the graduates of a certain standing as suggested in paragraph 17 (3) might be substituted for voters under that head.

IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council should be enlarged so as to admit of a large number of officials and non-officials to take part in the discussions. There should be at least 20 members and two-thirds of the non-officials should be persons in touch with agricultural life in villages.

(8) The existing system of nomination is proper and safe so long as mere title hunters are not selected and purely satbachnias are avoided. If election is to be made the scheme sketched in answer of III (5) above should be adhered to for all or any of the seats open to election.

(9) According to population each class should have separate seats allotted. If 8 seats are allotted to non-official members 5 may be allotted to Musalmans, three to Hindus, and one to Sikhs.

(10) If real election is to be adhered to, the scheme mentioned in answer III (5) and referred to in answer IV (8) might be adopted because the district boards' members are generally selected and very few of them are elected by the people, and the municipalities shall have only a few members to elect, say, to the extent of one-fourth of the non-official seats at the highest.

(11) The seats on the district boards and the municipalities should also be allotted according to population, and if this is done, then the electorate might be found as suggested in paragraph 22 (b) of the Government of India letter.

(12) If it be found necessary to form a special Muhammadan electorate the scheme mentioned in paragraph (7) of the Government of India letter would do very well, provided that all payers of income-tax have to get a right of voting, the limit of annual revenue in the case of land-owner should be fixed at Rs. 100 or at most Rs. 250.

(13) The proposal is useful.

(14) If the budget is discussed in the Provincial Council, the scheme sketched in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter might be followed with advantage. I think the discussion of the Provincial Budget will lead to good results.

(15) The power of interpellation would serve many useful purposes.

OPINION.

Imperial Advisory Council.

I. (1) When the country is going to have enlarged Legislative Councils, as proposed, in which all important interests and communities are to be adequately represented, we do not think a separate Advisory Council is necessary. Advisory Councils, whether Imperial or Provincial, will have very little to do as their constitution shows, and those functions too that are allotted to them can be discharged by the non-official members of the Legislative Councils, who are expected to be the representatives of the country.

If it be considered necessary to have Advisory Councils, then we beg to suggest the following defects in the constitution as sketched in paragraph 5 of the Government letter which may be removed:

(a) The Imperial Advisory Council, as proposed, cannot be representative. Only territorial magnates and ruling Chiefs can come in, there is no provision for merchant princes or professional magnates or educationists or representatives of other interests to be taken as "Imperial Councillors."

(b) When the object of the Government is to take advice from such councillors on important administrative measures and hold consultation with them in private, it is most essential that the members of such councils should be intelligent enough to form their own independent opinion on such difficult questions as concern the vast country like India and are to be put before them for solution. It must, therefore, be put down as a condition that only those magnates are eligible for membership who are sufficiently educated.

Provincial Advisory Councils.

II. (2) As to these councils we hold the same opinion as we have expressed with regard to Imperial Councils, but the Government of India letter makes provision in the constitution of Provincial Advisory Councils for all interests to be represented on the council, while it does not in the case of Imperial Advisory Council as pointed out above. Such a council is particularly unsuited to the Punjab. This Province has not got a large number of landholders of sufficient dignity as hinted in the Government of India letter, nor people consider such magnates as their leaders. A few enlightened persons that may be found of importance to represent different interests are sure to come on the enlarged Provincial Legislative Council.

Imperial Legislative Council.

III. (3) We are in favour of the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council, but in view of the principles laid down in the Government of India letter itself we suggest some modifications in paragraph 12. It is desired that all communities and interests must be adequately represented to which no exception can be had. In order that representation may be adequate those communities that constitute the majority of the population must have majority in the non-official members of the Legislative Council, but the proposed scheme keeps the Hindu community in minority in the Imperial Legislative Council while it assures majority for the Muhammadans who are only a minority in the country.

There are to be 22 members of the people, because 2 under head F are not to be permanent members and are only to be nominated by the Viceroy as experts for special purposes and one under head C is to be a ruling Chief.

Under head D, clause (a), there is very little chance for any Hindu or Muhammadan to be elected, a European in Calcutta and a Parsi or a European in Bombay are very probably to be taken.

Under clause (b) in the Provincial Councils as they are now to be constituted, the Punjab and Eastern Bengal and Assam are sure to return Muhammadans, and one other Muhammadan you may safely count from the remaining Provincial Legislative Councils, thus 3 Muhammadans are sure to come in under this clause and one Burmese and 3 Hindus if no Christian or Parsi takes a chance.

Under clause (c) for similar reasons 3 Muhammadans are sure to be returned while 4 Hindus are not so sure.

Under clause (d) and head E, 4 Muhammadans are provided for while no Hindu can come in; two other members, to be taken under head E, are to represent minorities and cannot certainly be Hindus.

The above calculations make it clear that 10 Muhammadans are sure, while not more than 7 Hindus can come in, and this number, too, is subject to decrease if any Christian or Parsi is returned.

We would, therefore, for the sake of fairness, ask that head E may be altered as follows:—

Head E.—Non-officials nominated by the Viceroy to represent minorities or special interests or to safeguard the adequate representation among different communities.

(4) The proposal contained in paragraph 13 of the letter is in no way objectionable.

(5) We are not in favour of making only land-owners eligible for membership under clause (c) of head D; why not open the door for other people of equally high position and status under this clause? Right of election should not be conferred on an electorate of a few members of a particular class of the Provincial Legislative Council. We would propose an electorate consisting of all land-owners paying annual land revenue above a particular amount and all people paying income-tax above a specified sum or having had education to a fixed standard.

6. We have already noted the modifications we consider necessary to be made in head E. We recommend election to be made by an electorate formed in the principles laid down in paragraph 18 of the letter.

Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.

VI. (7) We are in favour of an increase in the present number of members in the Punjab Legislative Council. The number may be safely increased to 17 as follows:—

A. Official members including the Lieutenant-Governor, 9.

B. (a) One ruling Chief to be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor.

(b) One Sikh and two Hindus by election.

(c) Three Muhammadans by election.

(d) One to be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor to represent special interests or minorities.

We are opposed to the election being made by municipal or district boards. They are in no way representative bodies. We suggest electorates to be constituted for different communities by land-owners and other people, some standard of income being fixed as a qualification for voting, and for others some standard of education being fixed.

We think paragraph 17 of the letter does not apply to the Punjab where Muhammadans are in no way a minority, rather they form majority of the population, and their representation by ordinary methods will be adequate. The objection that Indian gentlemen of position do not offer themselves as candidates to a wide electorate, we think, won't hold when election is for such a high position as membership of a Legislative Council.

Discussions of the Budget.

V. (13) The system proposed for the discussion of the Budget, if adopted, is sure to prove useful.

(14) We think Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Provincial Legislative Council and the system should be adopted as is discussed in paragraph 23.

(15) We are in favour of power of interpellation being conferred on members of the Punjab Legislative Council.

No. 3686, dated Patiala, the 26th-27th of November 1907.

From—Lieutenant-Colonel C. M. Dallas, I.A., Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

With reference to your letter no. 2645-S. (Home—Legislative), dated 27th September 1907, I have the honour to forward herewith, in original, the opinions of the four gentlemen mentioned therein regarding the proposal made by the Government of India for giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters.

All these opinions, except that of the Hon'ble Tikka Sahib of Nabha, have been given in the form of answers to the questions which form an enclosure to your letter.

The opinions differ in many ways, but all, except the same Hon'ble gentleman, are agreed that election pure and simple is not suited at present to the people of this country. I append also a digest of these opinions which may be of use in comparing the answers to the various questions.

2. From my own personal experiences in this direction I am quite in accord with this opinion. The people as a whole are not yet sufficiently educated to think for themselves, and consequently their votes are either sold or else obtained by canvassers who do not shrink from all sorts of malpractices and other devices to secure them. For this reason many suitable, but respectable, persons will not offer themselves for election. In my opinion, therefore, election pure and simple should not be resorted to. I would prefer nomination, but if election is required, I think a compromise might easily be made, something between the two methods suggested by Khalifa Syad Muhammad Hussain and Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram.

The latter suggests that three Chambers—Commerce, Law, and Agriculture—should be nominated in each district, and these Chambers should elect for Divisional Chambers, who would elect for Provincial Chambers, and these in their turn would elect for the Imperial Chamber. The Khalifa Sahib advocates the formation of an electorate which should consist of all zaildars and sufedposhes, together with a certain number of jagirdars, muafidars, lambardars, members of certain professions, graduates and so on [vide replies to III (5) and III (6)]. I think the electorate in the district should be all nominated by the local Government. The district officer may, I think, be fully trusted to recommend for nomination representatives of all the leading classes and castes in his district and this electorate might be left to elect representatives for its district, who with those of other districts would elect representatives for the whole province. I would have one and only one electorate in the district, but let it be sufficiently large to embrace representatives of all classes and kinds, and if the election of any particular class is required only the members of this electorate of that class should vote.

3. I now proceed to answer the questions sent with your letter, to the best of my ability:—

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—I am afraid I cannot hope for much advice from the Advisory Council, but I have no doubt that it will be useful as an "agency for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions, and objects of Government." I certainly think its members should be nominated. I have no alterations to suggest in the proposals of Government regarding its constitution and duties. For ruling Chiefs there will, no doubt, be some distinction made in the matter of seats or place occupied by them.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Council.—My opinion about this is the same, as about the Imperial Advisory Council.

III. (3) No, I do not approve of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council. The council can at present consist of 24 members exclusive of His Excellency the Viceroy which, I think, is quite large enough and which can, I think, be quite representative enough. The larger the council the more time will be taken up in discussion, and so, I believe, the disposal of business will be retarded, without any compensating advantage. If, however, it is considered essential that there should be more unofficials on the council I would suggest something of this kind—

(A) Officials, ex-officio members	8
(B) Unofficials, ruling Chiefs	1
(C) To be nominated by Chambers of Commerce, Bombay and Calcutta	2
(D) From each province mentioned in paragraph 12 D (b) and D (e) of Government of India letter to be nominated by the head of the Province	8
Official or unofficial to be nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy .	15
(E) To represent minorities, special interests, experts and to maintain Government majority not more than one-third to be unofficial.
Total, excluding His Excellency the Viceroy .	34

If, however, it is considered desirable that all those mentioned in paragraph 12 C and D (a, b, c, and d) are to have seats on the council, I do not see how the number can well be reduced below 53.

III. (4) If the other Provincial Councils are to elect members for the Imperial Council I do not see why the Punjab should be excluded, but I would prefer that a representative from the Province should be nominated by its head.

(5) Yes, I approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners of this province to the Imperial Council. The Punjab is essentially an agricultural province and its interests should be represented in that direction. I would rather a land-owner were on the Imperial Council than the selection of the unofficial members of the Provincial council. I would certainly prefer to see the land-holder nominated by the head of the province, but if elected then by the agriculturists of the nominated electorate such as I have mentioned in paragraph 2 of this letter.

(6) If the Muhammadan community is not adequately represented in the council by other means I see no objection to some Muhammadans being nominated in order that they may be properly represented. It would, however, I think, be sufficient to include D (d) with E, and if more Muhammadans were required they could be nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy under E. I do not think it is necessary to specify that of the four members to be nominated under E not less than two should be Muhammadans. It is, I think, quite likely that the Muhammadans will be adequately represented by members under D (a), (b), (c), and it might be necessary to reserve all nominations under E for other minorities or special interests. For the election of the Muhammadan elected members under D (d), if that remains, I should prefer the electorate to be the unofficial Muhammadan members of the Provincial Councils. I do not think that it would be advisable to give the University, as such, any voice in political matters. I do not see, however, why the election should not be made by the Muhammadan members of the nominated electorate above mentioned, though I think the best course would be for them to be nominated.

It is possible that the Sikhs might require some representation on the Imperial Council, as I certainly think they ought to have at least one representative and he might be nominated under E.

IV. (7) No, I do not advocate an increase in the present number of the Provincial Council. With 4 unofficial members, all classes can be quite adequately represented.

(8) I would maintain the present system of nomination.

(9) No, I do not advocate a fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class. I would leave this entirely in the hands of the head of the Province.

(10) If election is resorted to for appointment of all or any of the unofficial members I would advocate a nominated electorate such as I have mentioned in paragraph 2. If any particular class of member is to be elected only the members of the electorate of that class should be allowed to vote, e.g., should a land-owner be required only agriculturists and land-owners should be allowed to vote, should a Muhammadan member be required only the Muhammadan members of the electorate should be called upon to vote, and so on.

(11) I do not avocate separate representation of classes—see answer to (9).

(12) I do not think that in this province provision for the separate representation of Muhammadans is necessary, but if it is considered so, I would provide for it by nomination and not by election.

V. (13) No. (14) No. (15) No. I do not think any useful purpose would be gained by making any alteration in the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Council, and I certainly do not consider it necessary or advisable that the Budget should be discussed in the Provincial Councils or that the members of the Provincial Councils should have powers of interpellation.

Digest to answers to Advisory Council's questions.

Khalifa Sahib.	Ganga Ram.	M. Rahim Bakhsh.	Tikka Sahib.
Question I.—Yes, but council should not be restricted to land-holders, but should include "leaders of thought," &c Council should have a fixed programme, and individuals should take the initiative in offering advice to Government.	No; will be mere figure-heads and quite useless.	Yes . . .	Yes, but council should have fixed programme, and members should offer advice informally. Council should receive some legislative recognition.
Question II.—Yes, with similar modifications.	No. Own scheme preferred.	Yes. Twenty members sufficient to include 2 ruling Chiefs.	Yes, with same opinions as in regard to question I.
Question III.—Yes, but there should be more non-officials nominated by Viceroy than at present proposed to represent minorities, e.g., Muhammadans.	No; as suggested by Government of India too unwieldy. Own scheme provides for 45. Viceroy always to have the power of veto.	Yes; should be 2 ruling Chiefs and number of land-holders reduced to 6.	Yes; but at least 6 members should be nominated by Viceroy (i.e., presumably non-official members).
Question IV.—Yes. . . .	No answer . .	Yes . . .	No answer.
Question V.—Yes; nomination by Lieutenant-Governor preferable. If by election, franchise should be restricted to zaildars, jagirdars, &c., to be selected by district officer. Country not rife for direct election.	Yes. But should be nominated, and should not necessarily be the biggest revenue payer.	Nomination preferable to election.	Ditto.
Question VI.—Yes, but four Muhammadans are too few, as none will be elected under other heads. Muhammadan members should preferably be selected by Lieutenant-Governor in consultation with Muhammadan members of Provincial Council. If by election, then this should be restricted to graduates and well-to-do men.	No . . .	Yes, but by nomination by Lieutenant-Governor and Viceroy.	Strongly objects to this proposal, as he thinks it unfortunate to introduce racial feeling by giving undue prominence to any particular community. Besides there is no mention of any special representation of the Sikhs.
Question VII.—Yes, minimum 20, maximum 25.	Total number should be 12. Lieutenant-Governor to have casting vote and veto.	Number should be 15: 9 officials and 6 non-officials.	No answer.
Questions VIII and IX.—Election quite unsuited to present condition of Sikhs. One Sikh member to be nominated. At least 2 special Muhammadan members to be elected as above. Other seats to be thrown open to all other classes without laying down fixed proportion.	No answer; own scheme provided.	Nomination preferable to election. There should be 3 Muhammadans and 3 Hindus. No distinction necessary between Hindus and Sikhs.	Ditto.

Question X.—Election of two members should be through municipal and district boards. Punjab University need not be represented.	No answer; own scheme provided.	Already answered .	No answer.
Question XI.—There should be separate representation of classes in municipal and district boards, e.g., agricultural and non-agricultural. Electorates should be as suggested by the Government of India by fixing an appropriate franchise for each class. Some seats must in any case be filled by nomination. Dated Patiala, the 14th November 1907.

From—Mashir-ul-Daula Mumtaz-ul-Mulk Khalifa Syad Muhammad Hussain, K.B., Member, Council of Regency, Patiala State.

To—The Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur.

In reply to your no. 3116, dated 3rd October last, regarding the proposals made by the Government of India for giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters, I have the honour to enclose herewith my replies to the questions framed by the Punjab Government.

2. With reference to paragraph X of Hon'ble Mr. Maclagan's letter of 27th September last, I beg to state that in this country, particularly for some time to come, I consider the system of nomination of prominent and acclaimed leaders preferable to election. But as it was required under the same clause that I should also give expression of my views as to the best way of election I have, therefore, dealt with the matter in detail in the course of my replies.

3. On the questions raised by the Punjab Government in their letter regarding (1) the special representation of Sikhs, (2) the representation of the Punjab University, (3) the right of the members of a special Muhammadan electorate to vote in the open election also, I have stated my views in the course of replies to questions no. IV (7, 8, 9, 10, 11).

Since I received your letter under reply you are aware I have been seriously ill, and am still far from being well, and this has unavoidably prevented me from sending my replies by the 10th November, and for the same reason I could not give the proposed scheme as thorough deliberation as its high importance deserves, and hope that I will be excused for the delay.

SYAD MUHAMMAD HUSSAIN,
Member, Council of Regency, Patiala State.

Questions and answers on the Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907, by Khalifa Syad Muhammad Hussain, Khan Bahadur.

I. (1) Yes, but with the following modifications:—

(a) It appears from paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Government of India letter that only "hereditary leaders of people" and "territorial magnates" or, in more plain words, "land-holders of sufficient dignity and status" would be eligible for the membership of the Imperial Advisory Council, in addition to ruling Chiefs. I am of opinion that besides Chiefs and nobles private gentlemen of recognised ability, who may be called "leaders of thought" and of "movements of reforms" in the country, and of a type approved by the Government should find a place in the council. As, for instance, Mr. Behramji Malabari, though he is not a big land-holder, is eminently suited to become a member of the proposed council. As all members are to be nominated no undesirable man can ever enter. The Government might, if it is deemed necessary, limit the number of such members.

(b) It is understood that while inviting expression of opinion from a member of the council the Government will forthwith furnish him with all reports, correspondence, and other necessary information connected with the measure on which his opinion is required; and similarly if the member ask for any information (not already supplied by the Government) to help him in forming his opinion, it will also be furnished to him.

(c) Further, I think, the members of the council should also be entitled to submit their individual views to the head of the Government on any other matter that might occur to their own minds as worth inviting the attention of the Government.

(d) The form of the Advisory Council suggested by the Government of India letter appears to be defective in one respect. To establish the council as an active and a living institution, I think it is necessary that it should have a programme fixed for it every year, and should, as a rule, hold once or twice during the year ordinary meetings to discuss matters referred to it by the head of the Government for collective opinion, and extraordinary meetings when called by the head of the Government for a special object.

(e) Some of the ruling Chiefs would not perhaps like the idea of being associated on equal terms with men of lesser positions. I, therefore, suggest that they should have some sort of distinction, for instance, in the form of chairs, when attending the meeting of council.

II. (2) Yes, with the modifications suggested above.

III. (3) Yes, but the number of seats under head E is, in my opinion, small. Either this should be increased or, still better, to avoid the necessity of a corresponding increase under B, I think a new head G, with some reserved seats to be filled (when necessary) by nomination, should be added. These should, as a rule, remain vacant, but officials or non-officials, in due proportions might be appointed to occupy all or some of the seats if, at any time, some minority or special interests might fail to get adequate representation through other means or the Government might wish to add some official or non-official of its choice for whom sufficient room might not be available under other heads.

III. (4) Yes, because this privilege is already enjoyed by non-official members of the councils of other Provinces, there is no intention to withdraw it, and I see no sufficient reason to make an exception in the case of the Punjab.

III. (5) Yes, and as to the method of election my opinion is that direct election from top to bottom cannot suit the present state of this country. An electorate can, without much inconveninence, be appointed for the comparatively small area of a country or district; but no single body of electors can work intelligently and harmoniously to elect a representative from a whole province as big as the Punjab. I think election should be confined to districts. The district should have for its electorate the whole body of zaildars and sufedposhes, plus a limited number of jagirdars, muafidars, and others to be selected at the discretion of the district officer, out of the land-owners and assignees of land revenue of a certain fixed and defined status. The total number of electors should not be the same for all districts. The district electorate should elect the number of representatives fixed for their district by the local Government. The district representatives, thus elected, can similarly elect from among themselves a fixed number for each division, the divisional representatives a fixed number for the Provincial Council and the representatives of the zamindars in the council can elect some one from among themselves for the Imperial Council. The other and the better course, in my opinion, is that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor should nominate, after private and informal consultation with the zamindar members of his council, and out of the elected representatives of districts or divisions, the required number of members for the Provincial Council and out of the past and present members of the Provincial Council a representative of zamindars for the Imperial Council.

I prefer the latter course, because I believe that if the former is adopted the electors will be unacquainted with the candidates, and the result inevitably will be that residents of Ambala or Delhi will find themselves at a loss in trying to choose between the candidates from Rawalpindi and Multan, and vice versâ. The ultimate evolution of a "representative" will become a mere matter of chance, and will lead to all sorts of malpractices, wire-pulling, and speculating.

The franchise should not, in my opinion, be determined in this province of mostly small land-holders on the basis of a rule that the payment of fixed minimum amount of land revenue confers the right to vote.

The system described above is, I think, simpler and much better suited to the conditions of this province. The zaildars, sufedposhes, lambardars, jagirdars, and other agriculturists selected by the district officer will be recognised representatives of the zamindar community, and no better electorate can be formed than by incorporating these natural leaders of their class. If it is considered necessary to base the right of vote on the payment of a certain minimum sum as land revenue, the limit must be different for each district, and low enough to give a voice in the elections to the prevailing type of zamindars in the districts, and not only to the big land-owners, who are not often, on account of their position, habits, and inclinations, in touch with the real and typical zamindars of this Province, and who are not, consequently, entitled to be regarded as their true representatives.

III. (6) Yes, and, moreover, I think that apart from other considerations in favour of the importance of the Muhammadan community and on the basis of the proportion of population alone the only four seats in the Imperial Council, reserved for Muhammadans out of the total number of 23 unofficial seats (under heads C, D, and E) can be hardly regarded as sufficient. Because as the address presented to His Excellency the Viceroy by the Muhammadan deputation on the 1st October 1906 correctly points out: "the Muhammadans of India number, according to the census taken in the year 1901, over sixty-two millions or between one-fifth and one-fourth of the total population of His Majesty's Indian Dominion; and if a reduction be made for the uncivilised portions of the community enumerated under the heads of animists and other minor religions, as well as for those classes who are ordinarily classified as Hindus but, properly speaking, are not Hindus at all (and who are regarded quite separate and distinct both religiously and socially by the Hindus) the proportion of Muhammadans to the Hindu majority becomes larger."

It must also be borne in mind that with the exception of heads D and E a Muhammadan will rarely, if ever, reach the Imperial Council by other ways. This conclusion is fully borne out by the experience of the past, which the Government of India letter shows to be that "under the system of election hitherto in force, Hindus largely predominate in all or almost all the electorates, with the result that comparatively few Muhammadan members have been elected." This will, I believe, be the result of election in future also. The Government has, no doubt, very kindly given much consideration for the needs and claims of the Muhammadans of India in their proposed scheme, and for this attitude of the Government they are very grateful. But, for the reasons stated above, and also because the Muhammadans are scattered in all the Provinces, though not bulking as large as in Eastern Bengal and Punjab, there should be a fixed rule to provide that each Province be represented by one Muhammadan either by nomination or by election because the local needs and interests of a Province cannot be very well represented by the representative of another province or by the system of rotation proposed.

The requirements of this rule can be fulfilled in various ways, i.e.—

(1) By increasing the number under head E.
(2) By keeping it in view while making appointments under heads B and E.
(3) If members under head D (c) are selected according to my opinion, that is, by nomination out of elected representatives, by appointing a Muhammadan member under this head.
(4) If head G of reserve seats is added as suggested by me, by making appointment under this head.
(5) Or in any other way which the Government may think best.

The election of Muhammadan members should, in my opinion, be as follows:—

Every district should have a separate electorate divided into three groups as follows:—

A.—Muhammadan zaildars and sufedposhes with the addition of a limited number (selected by the district officer) of lambardars, jagirdars, and muafidars.

B.—Muhammadan graduates of 5 years' standing.

C.—All Muhammadans (with the exclusion of groups (a) and (b)) possessing (for the purpose of income-tax) an income above one thousand with the addition of a limited number of such other men of influence as the district officer may at his discretion exempt from this restriction.

In paragraph 17, clause 3, of the Government of India letter it is suggested to include in the Muhammadan electorate graduates "of an Indian University." I have omitted the words "of an Indian University" because there are some graduates of European Universities also, and their number is increasing. Group C will, I think, be sufficient to include all men of influence inadmissible to groups A and B, e.g., lawyers, physicians, priests, retired civil and military officials, merchants, honorary magistrates, municipal commissioners, &c., &c.

The number of representatives for each group and for the whole district will be fixed by the local Government. After the representatives of districts have been elected in this way the further process of election might be the same as that suggested for land-holders, i.e., the representatives of districts might elect from among themselves representatives for divisions; the representatives for divisions might similarly elect members for the Provincial Council, and all the non-official Muhammadan members, whether appointed by election by Muhammadans or any other way, might be combined to elect a Muhammadan member for the Imperial Council.

The alternative course, which I prefer, is that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor would in private and in formal consultation with the Muhammadan members of his council select members from the representatives of districts or divisions both for his and the Imperial Council.

If it is considered necessary that His Excellency the Viceroy should have a wider scope for the selection of a Muhammadan member for his council I would suggest that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor should submit 4 or 5 names selected as above from the elected representatives, and His Excellency the Viceroy would then give preference to whomever he thinks fit.

Similar procedure can be followed for the selection of a representative of the landed classes for the Imperial Council. The method proposed secures the advantages of both election and nomination.

IV. (7), (8), (9), (10). Yes, the minimum number should be 24 and maximum number 25 including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor in each case.

The constitution of the council in case of 19 seats should be as given below:

A. Ex-officio			3
B. Official nominated			7
C. Non-officials—
(1) Without denomination.	elected 2, nominated 1		3
(2) Land-holders	elected 1, nominated 1		2
(3) Muhammadans	elected 1, nominated 1		2
(4) Sikh (nominated)			1
(5) Reserve seat (nominated)			1
		TOTAL	19

or including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor as President with a casting vote 20

No sub-divisions of the heads given above is, in my opinion, necessary.

The minimum number under each head should be as stated, and the relative strength must, I think, be maintained unaltered, so that if any alteration is made under any head corresponding alterations should be made under other heads also.

As regards methods of election for land-holders and Muhammadans, I have already stated my opinion in answers III (5) and III (6).

I consider election of any sort uncalled for and ill-suited to the present condition of the Sikhs, but, as they constitute an important community in the Punjab, it is only fair that they should have special representation.

Accordingly I propose that one seat to be filled by nomination should be set apart for Sikhs.

Muhammadans constitute by far the larger proportion of the population in this Province, but on account of various reasons they do not possess sufficient strength and influence to hold their own against other classes. They must, therefore, have at least two special representatives as suggested above.

After land-holders, Muhammadans and Sikhs, having secured special representation I think the remaining seats should be intended to be filled chiefly by representatives of non-agricultural, urban, and educated classes, among whom Hindus bulk largely. The system of election should be so devised as to secure the interest of these classes, but at the same time it must be an election perfectly open to all classes. In this connection I may state as my answer to the question raised at the end of paragraph 5 of the Punjab Government letter, that I am unable to understand what the objections are on account of which it is thought necessary to question the right of the members of a special electorate to vote in the open elections also.

The meaning of the special representation which is considered desirable for land-holders and Muhammadans of all Provinces except Burma and for Sikhs in the Punjab is to guard weaker communities against being thrust aside by stronger communities, and the measure is, I believe, intended to supplement the results of open elections. The protected classes are not, I think, by the grant of special representation, deprived from anything which they enjoy on strictly equal terms with others. Consequently, I think, that they must not be excluded from or handicapped in the open elections. To disallow the special electorate whether of Muhammadans or land-holders, to take part in the open elections, would effect a serious decrease in the relative strength of the whole community in competing with others in the struggle for the undenominational seats, because the loss of its best and most influential men chosen to form the special electorate will in many ways be irreparable. I, therefore, consider that members of special electorate of Muhammadans and land-holders both must not be prevented from taking part in the open elections. So much will suffice for this side issue.

Now coming to main points under discussion, the experience of open elections in the past has shown that the Hindu non-agricultural class will be most successful in the election for seats under C (1). As this class must also have adequate representation, and it is, in my opinion, of a fairly uniform character for all political purposes and its minor sub-divisions are of no great importance individually, I think its interests will be best served by having no "fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class" under head C (1).

(10) and (11). The election of two members under head C (1) should be, in my opinion, through municipal and district boards.

I do not think there is any need to grant a special right of representation to the Punjab University. It represents no particular interest, and it is not advisable to introduce a political element into a body which is constituted for purely educational objects. If at any time His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor finds a desirable person in the Province, particularly fitted to represent the views of the educated classes on public matters, there will be ample scope for his appointment to any one of the seats to be filled by nomination.

I advocate separate representation of classes in the municipal and district boards.

For this purpose the people of this Province can be divided into only two classes, agricultural and non-agricultural. And each of these two classes can be sub-divided by religions, (1) Muhammadans, (2) Hindus, and (3) others (to include Sikhs, Christians, etc.) No more details are necessary, and this classification would, I believe, prove quite sufficient for all particular purposes.

Jagirdars and muafidars should be included in the class of agriculturists, and the non-agricultural class will comprise commercial, industrial, and professional classes, retired civil and military officials, lawyers, etc. These different sections of the non-agricultural population are not numerous or important enough to form separate classes of their own, and therefore they must be amalgamated to form one big class for the purposes of representation. Besides, their interests and sentiments too are much the same as long as the religious differences or rather pretexts and prejudices are not intentionally brought into play. A similar classification can be made in other Provinces after having due regard to the internal circumstances of each Province.

The Councils, Imperial and Provincial, cannot contain a sufficient number of seats for separate representation of each of the six divisions of the population suggested above, but I am decidedly of opinion that in district boards and as far as possible in municipal committees also a fixed proportion of seats should be assigned to the classes mentioned above. I have had no experience of the practical working of district boards and municipal committees, but I think their electorates, divided into the above-mentioned groups, can be formed as suggested in the Government of India letter by fixing for each group an appropriate franchise for each district in terms of land revenue, rent, or income-tax. Each group should elect its representatives of a fixed and defined personal qualification to fill some of the number of seats allotted to it. The rest should be filled by the district officer by nomination of suitable men out of the section to be represented.

There must, in my opinion, be a number of seats to be filled by nomination because many native gentlemen of position and ability, who dislike presenting themselves as candidate for election, will be found ready to be appointed by nomination. In any case, it is, I think, necessary to a limited number of seats to be filled by the choice of the district officer.

The restriction suggested in paragraph 22 (c) of the Government of India letter that only literate persons should have the right to vote is, in my opinion, totally inapplicable at least for the present to this province. The other condition laid down by the Government of India that elector should elect representatives (literate only) from among themselves is of course perfectly right.

The municipal and district boards thus constituted should either each or both together (as the local Government may by a rule fixed for each district direct) elect from among themselves a fixed number of representatives of a defined social status and education qualification without any restriction of caste, creed, or profession. These district representatives should similarly elect representatives for the division, and the latter should elect members for the Provincial Council.

As regards the representation of landholders and Muhammadans, I have expressed an opinion that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor should himself select suitable men for the council out of the elected representatives. I do not consider this suggestion applicable to the appointment of two elected representatives under head C (1), because I think that this share of seats in the council is a concession particularly in favour of those who advocate out and out election and are opposed to nomination of any sort whatever; and these people should be given an opportunity, at least tentatively, to elect by their own desired method, if they can, suitable men who will represent their views and interests.

I am also of opinion that the interests of big towns having population of one lakh or more, such as Lahore, Delhi, and Amritsar, be separately represented by rotation in the Provincial Legislative Council by adding one or two seats for such towns.

IV. (12) I have already answered this question in my reply to question no. III (6).

V. (13), (14), and (15) I for my part do not consider that the discussion of the Budget whether as a whole or by separate heads can be of much practical advantage at present. I think the people of India generally are not sufficiently advanced and capable of taking an intelligent and useful part in such matters. I have the same opinion as regards the power of interpellation by members which the experience already gained has hardly shown to be of much profit.

I recognise the educative value of these measures, and I am of opinion that the Punjab is not so particularly backward or different from the rest of India that might be excepted in respect of these measures from what is decided upon in case of other provinces.

PATIALA:
The 14th November 1907.

KH. SAYAD MUHAMMAD HUSSAIN.

Dated Patiala, 1st November 1907.

From—RAI BAHADUR GANGA RAM, C.I.E., (late of Punjab P. W. D., retired) Patiala,

To—The Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur.

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your no. 3116 of 3rd October 1907, forwarding, for my opinion, the proposals of the Government of India, together with the Punjab Government's suggestions for giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters.

2. In reply, I beg to state that, having spent the whole of my life in Government service, I have never taken any part in politics, but as I have been an ex-officio member of several municipal and district boards, I have had opportunities of observing the practical working of local self-government as already granted by Government through these institutions.

3. In my humble opinion the state of education of the masses together with the divergence of religions and creeds which practically guide our actions, social as well as political, do not justify any further extension of self-Government. Indeed I may boldly say that political teachings have gone far ahead of our advancement in commerce and industries and science and agriculture.

4. Even in the present institutions it is no secret now that the district boards are practically run by Deputy Commissioners. Members not being educated enough to understand the responsibilities and powers take no intelligent interest in their working.

5. In municipalities, the system of election has signally failed, the right of voting is not exercised according to the dictates of voter's conscience, and all sorts of malpractices are resorted to. I have known cases where most desirable candidates (in point of leading and light) have been defeated by illiterate men, simply because the latter could stoop to all sorts of devices to canvassing in order to secure votes in their favour.

6. Nevertheless the present system does require modification, and taking the above circumstances into consideration, I submit a new scheme of my own which will, I believe, meet the objects of Government and yet be the real and practical means of educating people in local self-government.

7. My scheme is, to put briefly, as follows:—

Let each district have three district Chambers—

(a) District Chamber of Law;

(b) District Chamber of Commerce and Industry;

(c) District Chamber of Agriculture;

each to have 5 to 7 members according to the importance of that district, but they should be all nominated by Government, with due regard to the minority of a class or community in each district.

District boards to be abolished and absorbed into the Chamber of Agriculture. Municipalities to remain as they are; but their proposals for octroi and other taxes should be subject to the scrutiny of the Chamber of Commerce and Industries.

These 5 to 7 members (say, 6 in the average) of each district Chamber should form an electorate to elect 20 men for their respective Provincial Chamber, that is to say, there should be 3 Provincial Chambers to be called—

(a) Provincial Chamber of Law;

(b) Provincial Chamber of Commerce and Industries;

(c) Provincial Chamber of Agriculture.

For the word Provincial Chambers names of their Provinces might be more suitably substituted calling them Punjab Chamber of Commerce, so on, and so on.

8. The candidates for these Chambers should have certain qualifications which I need not specify, as these are matters of detail, but they may or may not be members of district Chambers. Election to these Chambers should by secret voting as done in the University for election of Members of Faculties, and those who could not attend should have the right of sending their votes in sealed cover to the Deputy Commissioner, or whoever is appointed to conduct these operations. Member of one Chamber should not be allowed to have a seat in the other Chamber. This should apply to both the District and Provincial Chambers.

9. These 20 members of each Chamber elected as above should elect (by ballot) their own president and two vice-presidents.

10. The president should ipso facto become member of the Imperial Legislative Council and the two vice-presidents members of the Provincial Legislative Council.

11. Thus the whole system will become thoroughly representative and Government will have their Advisory Councils in each Province.

12. Having thus briefly described the outlines of my scheme, leaving the details to be considered hereafter when general principles are accepted, I proceed to answer the questions laid down by Punjab Government:—

I. No, they will be mere figure heads, will hardly ever meet together, and their opinions will be individual opinions from which no satisfactory conclusion could be derived.

II. No, my scheme admits of all that is required of a Provincial Advisory Council.

III. The Imperial Legislative Council as sketched by Government of India will become unwieldy and should, in my humble opinion, be constituted as follows:—

(A) Ex-officio including His Excellency the Viceroy	9
(B) Additional officials	10
(C) One ruling Chief	1
(D) Elected members (3 from each province)	21
TOTAL	41

N.B.—Three from each province—one to represent each department as sketched in my scheme above:—

Punjab, together with Frontier Province	3
United Provinces	3
Bengal	3
Eastern Bengal and Assam	3
Central Provinces and other Chief Commisionerships	3
Bombay	3
Madras	3
TOTAL	21
(E) Retired native officials	2
(F) Experts	2
TOTAL	45

His Excellency the Viceroy to have a right of veto on all Acts of the Legislative Council.

III. (4) This is satisfactorily met in my scheme.

(5) Decidedly yes, but a member thus appointed will have the serious responsibility of representing the needs of agriculture in his Province, hence the one who pays the biggest revenue need not necessarily be the most qualified person to give an opinion on agriculture. I have known cases of very big landlords who could not tell how much ground would be covered by a bigha, who indeed could not give the names of spring and autumn crops.

A person to represent landed interest should be nominated by Government with due regard to his qualifications, the interest he may have shown in the subject, and practical improvements he may have made in agriculture.

(6) No, my scheme will give adequate scope for representation of minorities.

IV. The number in the Punjab should be—

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor	1
Chief Secretary	1
Chief Judge	1
Financial Commissioner	1
Retired officials	2
Non-official members	6
To represent Law	2
To represent Commerce and Industry	2
To represent Agriculture	2
TOTAL	12

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor to have a casting vote and to have a right of veto.

(8) If my scheme is adopted the right of election is there, if my scheme is not adopted, then by nomination.

(9), (10), (11) and (12) are all sufficiently answered in my scheme.

V. (13) The Imperial Budget should, in the first instance, be sent to Advisory Councils (Provincial Chambers) for any suggestions they might have to make, and then forwarded through local Governments to the Imperial Legislative Council. After this the procedure laid down in Government of India's paragraph 23 might be followed.

(14) Yes, but the Advisory Councils (Provincial Chambers) should get the opportunity of expressing their views, before it is discussed in the Provincial Legislative Council.

(15) Yes.

13. In conclusion I may add that the basis of my scheme is nomination, see paragraph 7, and I am strongly of opinion that the start should be made by nomination only, but later on if Government thinks proper to extend the system of election to district Chambers, it can be easily done by forming electorates as under:—

For Chamber of Law.—All legal practitioners and Government servants up to a certain limit.

For Chamber of Commerce.—Members of municipal committees and all tradesmen paying a certain income-tax.

For Chamber of Agriculture.—All zaildars and revenue officials up to a certain limit.

GANGA RAM,

No. 84, dated "Villa Carignano," Mashobra (Simla), 1st November 1907.

From—SARDAR RIPUDAMAN SINGH of Nabha,

To—The Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur, Patiala.

In reply to your letter no. 3116, dated the 3rd ultimo, I herewith enclose a letter containing my opinion regarding the new constitutional reforms proposed by the Government of India, which please forward in original to the Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab, and acknowledge the receipt and oblige.

RIPUDAMAN SINGH, of Nabha.

Dated Simla, 1st November 1907.

From—Sardar Ripudaman Singh, of Nabha,

To—The Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur, Patiala.

With reference to your letter, dated the 3rd October, forwarding, for my information, a copy of the letter, dated the 27th September, from the Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government, to all Commissioners, together with its enclosures, regarding the new constitutional reforms proposed by the Government of India and asking my opinion about the same, I have to write to say as follows:—

As regards the Imperial Advisory Council, I generally agree with the proposals of the Government of India, but I beg to offer a few observations. It is stated that (1) the Governor-General will consult the members of the Imperial Advisory Council, either individually or collectively; (2) that they will occasionally be called together either in whole or in part for the purpose of collective deliberation; (3) that they will possess no formal powers of initiative; and (4) that the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils will receive no legislative recognition.

Now, as regards the first and second point, I beg to say that though His Excellency may have of course full right to consult the members, individually, I think it would be much better to call the meetings of the Imperial Advisory Council regularly every winter in Calcutta, like the meetings of the Imperial Legislative Council, and that His Excellency the Viceroy should graciously preside over them, just as it is proposed that in the case of Provincial Advisory Councils the head of the local Government himself will preside over the deliberations. This will involve extra trouble, but the object is worth the trouble and inconvenience. I fully agree with the observation that "the Government of India attach the highest importance to collective deliberation, since the opinions thus obtained are different from and more valuable than those elicited by individual consultation." And at least for this reason it seems necessary that meetings of the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils should be called regularly.

As regards the third point, I beg to suggest that both the Imperial and the Provincial Advisory Councils should have the power of informally submitting their proposals and opinions to the supreme and the local Governments, respectively, as the case may be, on questions of important public interest that from time to time may arise, i.e., even on those matters about which they have not been formally consulted.

As regards the fourth point, these councils should, in my opinion, receive some sort of legislative recognition, and should be invested with some sort of formal work and responsibility; for, unless this is done, I am afraid, though they might remain as an ornament to the supreme and the local Governments, they would be of little or no real use both to the public and the Government, and after some time the whole scheme might fall through, and the object for which the councils are now constituted would not be attained. Besides, it would be highly politic, I think, to give publicity to the fact that the Government is consulting the people's representatives on the Advisory Councils, and this object, I am afraid, will be defeated if the said council does not formally meet for discussion of, and deliberation on, important public affairs, if its proceedings are always confidential and informal, and if it has no powers of initiative.

Coming to the proposals regarding the Imperial Legislative Council, in my humble opinion it would be most unfortunate and undesirable to introduce racial feeling in this scheme or to give any sort of prominence to any particular community. This would cause great heart-burning among other communities.

Under paragraph 12 of Government of India letter, I strongly object to the proposal that in the Viceroy's Council two members should be elected by the members of a certain community, and that out of four non-officials to be nominated by the Viceroy two seats at least should be filled by members of the same class. Thus four seats will exclusively be the monopoly of a certain community, while no such provision is made for the other communities like Hindus, Parsis, Jains, and Sikhs. The reason given by the Government for this proposal is that the Muhammadans form a minority and that their interests should be safeguarded. Now as for minority, the Sikhs form even a smaller minority numerically than the Muhammadans, and yet no provision is made for their representation. When no provision is made for other communities, it does not seem fair to favour one particular community and to give it special prominence. The same reasons apply to paragraph 17 of Government of India letter, as to the proposal that a certain number of seats should be exclusively reserved for and filled by members of a particular community in the Provincial Legislative Councils.

The Government of India in paragraph 19 itself admits that as in two of the seven Provinces with Legislative Councils the followers of Islam constitute a majority, therefore a certain number of Muhammadans may also be returned to the Imperial Council under sub-head (b), head (D), head I apprehend that perhaps they have overlooked the fact that in the same way under sub-head (c) of head (D) a certain number of Muhammadans may also be returned to the Imperial Council. Therefore if the proposals, as they now stand, are finally sanctioned there would be a great preponderance of Muhammadans in the Imperial Council, and perhaps at times this number might be as much as three-fourths of the whole non-official Indian members. Therefore, in my opinion, in paragraph 12, head (D), sub-head (d), two seats, and the four seats under head E, i.e., altogether six seats, should be reserved for nomination by the Viceroy, and there should be no such distinction as is mentioned therein. The Government of India, in the concluding portion of paragraph 17, itself admits that Indian gentlemen of position sometimes refuse to offer themselves as candidates to an electorate, and even for this reason, as I have suggested above, the six seats should be reserved for nomination by His Excellency the Viceroy.

I have read, with great pleasure and satisfaction, in Mr. Maclagan's letter that the Government admits the fact that the Sikh community is of the greatest importance and "that it should be considered whether any and what measures are necessary to ensure its adequate representation," and also that "too much importance must not be attached to these statistics as the interests represented by a given class are often important out of all proportion to its numerical weight." I am fully confident that the rights and privileges of the Sikhs, who have always proved themselves firm supporters of Government, who are not men of words but of deeds, who have fought the battles of their King under the burning rays of the sun and on snow-clad mountains, and who are always ready to lay down their lives for their beloved Emperor, will be fully safeguarded both in these Imperial and Provincial constitutional reform schemes.

I have noticed in Mr. Maclagan's letter that on page 2, in the list of land-owners of this Province, the Sikh land-owners are not mentioned at all. I attribute this omission to an oversight, and nothing else.

I have ventured to offer these observations and suggestions in the hope that they will receive due consideration at the hands of the Government, who say that they reserve to themselves the fullest discretion to modify their proposals in the light of comments and criticism which those proposals may elicit from the local Governments and the public.

No. 822, dated Bahawalpur, the 11th November 1907.

From—M. Rahim Bakhsh, President, Council of Regency, Bahawalpur State,

To—The Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur.

With reference to your letter no. 3116, dated the 3rd ultimo, I have the honour to submit my opinion on the proposal made by the Government of India for giving the people of India more opportunities of expressing their views on the administrative matters.

2. I have discussed these suggestions with my colleagues and other officials of the State verbally.

3. I am sorry that I am one day late in submission of my opinion, but I assure you that I was very busy with other important matters of the State.

I hope that you will kindly excuse me for the delay.

RAHIM BAKHSH,
President, Council of Regency, Bahawalpur.

Opinion.

I. (1) The Imperial Advisory Council would be a boon to the people as it would be quite in accord with the old panchayat system of the country. I have nothing to add to the proposals sketched out by the Government of India in paragraphs 4 and 5 of their letter regarding its constitution and duties, as it has been fully discussed in their letter, and I believe such constitution would be fruitful and fulfil the desires of the people.

II. (2) A Provincial Advisory Council composed of 20 nominated members would be quite enough for the Punjab; the land-holding classes and the high officials of the Native States should be a prominent factor of such council. There should be at least two ruling Chiefs, members of this council.

III. (3) It is quite appropriate to enlarge the Imperial Legislative Council, as in doing so more representations will be available. The introduction of ruling Chiefs should be made more liberally, as it would enable them to apply their capabilities to a very useful work. I would suggest two ruling Chiefs to be members of the Imperial Legislative Council, and to meet this the number of nobles and the great land-owners may be cut down to 6.

(4) The proposal of electing one member by the non-official members of each of the Provincial Legislative Council is suitable.

(5) I would prefer the system of nomination by the Punjab Government of one of the great land-owners of the Punjab for the Imperial Legislative Council to the system of election as the election would involve many difficulties.

(6) I quite approve the appointment of four Muhammadan members to the Imperial Legislative Council, of which two should be nominated by the local Governments (by rotation) in which the Muhammadan population forms a big part, and two to be nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy.

IV. (7) In my opinion the number of members of the Provincial Legislative Council might conveniently be increased to 15—9 officials and 6 non-officials.

(8) From my own experience of the municipal and local board election of this province I can safely say that the system of nomination is more secure and appropriate than the system of election.

(9) I would suggest three seats for the Muhammadans and three for the Hindus including Sikhs. I would not make any distinction between a Sikh and a Hindu, as there are intermarriages among them, and in some cases one brother is a Sikh and the other a Hindu. If, however, special representation is desirable, then I would suggest three Muhammadans and two Hindus and one Sikh in the Province.

(10) Already answered.

(11) Already answered.

(12) I would not elaborate any qualifications for the election of Muhammadans as I am advocating the system of nomination, and, in so doing, I believe, the Government will select most suitable men for their council.

V. (13) The system of the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council sketched out in the Government of India's letter, paragraph 3, will be a great improvement to the existing arrangements.

(14) I do not think it necessary to place the Provincial Budget before the Provincial Council, as I believe they can only give an opinion on the Budget who compile it and deal with it; one debate in the Imperial Legislative Council is quite sufficient, as the Provincial Budgets also are part of the Imperial Budget.

(15) To grant the power of interpellation to the members of the Punjab Legislative Council would be advantageous, and there will be no harm to introduce this system in the council.

No. 1-C., dated 12th December 1907.

From—J.McC. Douie, Esq., C.S.I., Commissioner, Rawalpindi Division,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

Introductory.—With reference to your no. 2643—S., dated 27th September, on the measures proposed by the Government of India for giving the people of India further opportunities of expressing their views on public matters, I have the honour to submit the correspondence noted at the end of this letter, and to give my own opinion. I shall forward that of the Deputy Commissioner of Shahpur when it is received.

2. Existing position.—The Viceroy has hitherto had an Advisory Council composed partly of non-official members to help him in dealing with projects of legislation embodied in bills framed by the Government of India. The drapery of forms under which the business of that council is carried on does not change and hardly veils its real character. In the framing of bills the unofficial members have as such no part. The Provincial Legislative Councils follow the same model.

3. Summary of present proposals.—It is now proposed to greatly enlarge the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils, and to create in addition Imperial and Provincial bodies of councillors to advise the Viceroy and the heads of the great provinces, not only on the policies which it is intended to embody in bills, but also on any other important measures which may be submitted to them individually or collectively.

In the rest of this letter I shall follow the wording of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, and call these bodies Advisory Councils.

4. Object and importance of Advisory Councils.—The formation of such councils is to my mind the more important branch of the new policy. If fit men only are appointed, these councils should fulfil the object of their creation, to interpret the people to the Government and the Government to the people.

5. Field of choice for councillors too narrow.—It is suggested that the Advisory Council of the Viceroy should consist of 60 members including "about twenty ruling Chiefs and a suitable number of territorial magnates" of the different provinces. It is intended to "represent the views of the hereditary leaders of the people." The council is therefore to be an aristocratic body. I am wholly in accord with those who think that the existence of an aristocracy and its association in the work of administration is a source of strength to a country. I think that the council should consist mainly of members of ruling families and of men of high birth having a hereditary connection with the land, and that the other members should be persons of a social status such that no sensible chief or nobleman need disdain to sit with them in council. But I would not limit the Viceroy's choice to ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates: real leaders of the people are to be found who belong to neither class. There is, at least, in Native States an official as well as a landed aristocracy, and in it there exists the hereditary principle, which affects so deeply the best natures. There was in France before the revolution a noblesse of the robe, and there is one of a different kind to this day in England. Some of the Indian lawyers, who have served with distinction as Judges of High Courts, have surely been well fitted to advise the Government not only on legal matters, but on questions of administration affecting the welfare of their fellow-countrymen. The presence of ruling Chiefs on the council will be of great value, if it is clear that the merits of a Chief and not the size of his territory is the title to admission. It will be unfortunate if some of the largest States cannot furnish fit councillors in the persons of their rulers, but it would be worse if any one could repeat with regard to the council of the Indian Empire Lord Melborne's famous encomium on the Order of the Garter. In looking to Native States for councillors the claims, not only of the Chief himself, but of his near relatives and distinguished ministers should be considered.

6. A council of 60 members too large.—But, while I think the field of selection should be widened, I consider that the proposed number of councillors is much too large. A smaller council would really be a more weighty one. The position should be one of great dignity so as to be an object of ambition to the best man. The qualifications should be great influence maintained or attained by worthy means, marked independence of character, and that practical wisdom which is learned in the school of experience. It will, it seems to me, be extremely difficult to form a council of 60 in all of whom these three things will be found. Besides, if there are many councillors, nomination will confer little honour. I think a council of 20 or 25 members would be far better than a council of 60.

7. Business of the council.—I agree with the proposals in paragraphs 5 (2), (4), and (5) of Sir Harold Stuart's letter. I also agree with that in paragraph 5 (6) as regards advice tendered by the council as a body. But I attach even more importance to consultation with individual councillors than to collective consultation. Many of the questions with which the Government of India have to deal are of local importance or concern the interests of particular classes, and not of the people as a whole. In the case of consultation with individuals I would not provide that the first step must in all cases be taken by the Viceroy. I would allow every member the right to address the Viceroy on any matter of public importance, and I would give also the privilege of asking for a private audience for the purpose of further explaining his views. Of course no such audience should be claimable as a right. If the council should unfortunately at any time contain a busy body who abused the privilege, there would be no difficulty in repressing him.

In paragraph 5 (7) I think undue stress is laid on the privacy and confidential character of the council's proceedings. Of course the meetings should be private in the sense that press reporters should not be present, but real secrecy is little likely to be secured with a council of 60 or even 25 members. When secrecy in any business is a matter of State necessity, it should only be discussed in the Executive Council or with individual members of the Advisory Council who can be trusted to comply to the letter with a request to treat a matter as confidential. For the rest the mystery which envelopes the actions of Government and the motives which underlie them is often in these days a source not of strength but of weakness.

8. Provincial Advisory Council.—What has been said above applies mutatis mutandis to the Provincial Advisory Council. I confess I do not see how a council of 20 members is at present to be formed in the Punjab, even if the representatives of the province in the Imperial Council are included. I should prefer a council of 10 or 12 persons. The Government of India do not propose that Provincial Councils should be constituted on the purely aristocratic lines which it seems to favour in the case of the Imperial Council, and I do not think that in this province a satisfactory council on that basis is possible. The Sikh rule, which preceded our own, brought many old Muhammadan families very low. The able men who moulded the early administration of the Punjab had little desire to restore them to their old position or to prop up the tottering fortunes of the great Sikh Sardars. I doubt the wisdom of the course they took, and their policy as a policy was short lived. But the effect of their action has been lasting. Besides there are large parts of the province where the original framework of society is really democratic and such aristocratic families as survived the strain of the periods of Indian and English rule which preceded the mutiny have in many cases failed to lead lives of real dignity or usefulness. That is not wholly their own fault, and it is our duty and our interest to foster any aristocratic elements that exist. But it is useless to pretend that the influence of men of rank and large estate is at present very powerful in the Punjab, or that many persons of that class possess all the qualities required for councillors. Other elements should be admitted, though the representatives of Native States and of the landed gentry should be in the majority.

The claims of the professional and commercial classes, of religious leaders, especially hereditary religious leaders, and of retired officials should not be overlooked. But personal fitness must be the final test, and I admit that it may sometimes be difficult to find suitable representatives of all the classes just named. When, as at present, we have a fit representative of the unofficial European community he should certainly have a seat.

9. Difficulty arising from artificial constitution of Legislative Councils.—In dealing with the question of the remodelling of the Legislative Councils, it is difficult to leave out of account the artificial character of their proceedings. The forms of free debate and free voting have been adopted, though every one knows that, so far as official members are concerned, neither is a reality. I do not believe that on these lines permanent satisfaction can be given even to the classes which the Government rightly consider have been hitherto too little represented in the Imperial Legislative Council. Intelligent members of these classes will for the time being be gratified by the enlargement of the council and the fuller opportunity which will be given them of making their wishes known. But the larger and more representative the council, the more anomalous will the contrast between its real and its apparent constitution appear, and the more irritation will be felt on any occasion on which the votes of unofficial members are overborne by the deadweight of a mechanical official majority. Sensible men will admit that in India the will of the Government must prevail in legislation as in all other important matters. But that will not prevent irritation in concrete cases, and will give opportunity for adverse criticism, virulent but not always wholly insincere, in the Indian press.

10. Possible change of procedure.—I believe a procedure could be devised which will frankly recognise the fact that the real legislature is the Viceroy and his Executive Council, and that the function of the so-called Legislative Council is advisory, and which would at the same time increase the real influence of the latter. If the action of the council was not final, the official members representing the different provinces could be allowed freedom of speech and vote, and the unofficial members might hope to influence their action by their arguments. The permanent retention of the principle of an official majority would not be necessary, though it would be wise to adhere to it for a time. The official members not belonging to the Executive Council and unofficial members might for the present be equal in number, and the former might be re-inforced when any measure of legislation was under discussion only by that member of the Executive Council who was in charge of the Bill. He would preside, unless the Viceroy himself desired to be present, would speak and vote, and be Chairman of the Select Committee. Bills which had been discussed and voted on in the council could be reported to the Viceroy and his Executive Council, who together would be the final authority to decide whether the bill should or should not become law and what amendments should be accepted. It does all this in effect at present, but in a way which causes misconstruction and irritation. When notice of an interpellation had been given the member of the Executive Council, to the business of whose department the question related, would attend to answer it. The other members of the Executive Council only attend when the Budget was under discussion. In the same way the result of the free deliberations of the Provincial Council could be reported to the Government of India for final orders. Even now the action of a Provincial Council cannot make a bill law. The occasions would, I think, be rare in which a Lieutenant-Governor would advise the Government of India to pass a bill rejected by a majority of members giving a free vote, or to refuse an amendment of which a majority of the members approved. A change of system such as that suggested above might at the present juncture be misunderstood and therefore be outside the range of practical politics. But it would really be more conducive than is their present constitution to the influence of Legislative Councils as a whole, and especially to that of their unofficial members. It would further make it possible in the future to alter the relative proportions of official and non-official members in favour of the latter.

11. It will be gathered from what is said above that I feel some doubt whether a council of 54 including 25 non-official members will be of much greater value as an instrument of Government than is the present Legislative Council of the Viceroy and whether the proposals now made will in the end prove satisfactory to the part of the Indian community which concerns itself with these matters. Debates will be much longer, but will be no more real than they are at present. But an enlargement of the council is now inevitable, and I admit that the proposals possess two advantages. They secure a fuller representation of classes whose voice has been too little heard and thereby make it less likely that we shall have frequent unhappy examples of a unanimous vote of the unofficial members against proposals supported by the Government. It is inconvenient that the enlargement of the councils should withdraw a larger number of high officials from their ordinary duties, but any enlargement of the councils, while their present constitution is unchanged, must involve this.

12. Constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council.—I approve of the proposal to have 25 non-official members as a maximum. While I fully appreciate the importance of associating ruling Chiefs more closely with ourselves in the work of administration, I do not think it should be obligatory to nominate one of them as a member of the Legislative Council of the Viceroy. I am not sure that the greatest Chiefs would care for a seat. Their proper place seems rather to be on the Advisory Council. I think that the privilege of electing a member now enjoyed by the Chamber of Commerce of Calcutta should be extended to that of Bombay. I would allow the non-official members of the Provincial Legislative Council of the Punjab and the members of the Provincial Advisory Council jointly to elect a member. An elective body consisting only of members of the former would to my mind be too small. I am wholly opposed to the election of a member by the great land-owners of the Punjab. No satisfactory electorate could be formed. If payment of a large amount of land revenue is the qualification, I fear the list of electors will include persons who in no sense belong to the aristocracy or represent the old land-owing classes. If on the other hand the right of election were given to Provincial Darbaris, no Muhammadan would have a chance of being chosen to represent a province which contains a majority of Musalmans. Another objection to finding an electorate in the Darbar List is that many of the electors would be persons possessing very little real influence, and that some of them would be persons of small education and others not of the highest character. In the case of the Punjab the representative of the land-owning classes should be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor. I would provide that the nominations made should be alternately of (a) Muhammadan, (b) a Hindu or Sikh. The number of Hindus and Sikhs in the province is not far short of the number of Musalmans.

I would club together classes C, D (d), E, and F, and provide that nine members shall be appointed by the Viceroy, of whom at least one-third shall be Musalmans. As regards the two Muhammadan members referred to under D (d) the turn of the Punjab would apparently come round once in six years, if members are appointed for a term of two years. Any attempt to form a Muhammadan electorate in this province seems to me most undesirable. A Muhammadan should be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor for the approval of the Viceroy. While three of the nine members to be appointed by the Viceroy should be Muhammadans, I think His Excellency should have a perfectly free hand as regards the choice of the other members. His choice would naturally fall on retired Indian officials and on men eminent in the legal, medical, or teaching professions. I certainly would treat retired officials as eligible, for the class is one which should always be able to furnish men of high character, experience, and sober judgment who are fully in touch with their fellow countrymen.

13. Possible electoral bodies.—If election is to be resorted to for the choice of the members to represent the Punjab under class D (c) I can only suggest that the electoral body should consist of—

(a) Land-owners paying land revenue exceeding Rs. 5,000 per annum;

(b) Jagirdars, the value of whose assignments exceeds Rs. 5,000 per annum.

It appears that (a) includes 35 persons, of whom 6 are Hindus, 4 Sikhs, 18 Muhammadans, and 7 Christians.

The number of large Christian land-owners is quite out of proportion to the importance of the small Christian community in the Punjab.

For the election of the Muhammadan member to be sent from the Punjab an electoral body might be formed consisting of—(a) Muhammadan Fellows of the Punjab University.

(b) Muhammadan land-owners paying over Rs. 2,500 per annum as land revenue.

(c) Muhammadan jagirdars, the value of whose assignments exceed Rs. 2,500 per annum.

(d) Muhammadans paying income-tax on an income exceeding Rs. 10,000 per annum.

As already noted, I do not advocate the formation of these electoral bodies.

14. The Provincial Legislative Council.—I would increase the number of the members of the Provincial Legislative Council to fifteen, or including the Lieutenant-Governor to sixteen, providing that seven of the members shall be non-officials. I do not think a larger council desirable. The choice of even four suitable non-official members in the past has not always been free from difficulty. I consider that all the members should be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor. I am opposed to any fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class. With nomination by the head of the Government no need for such a device arises. I think municipal committees and district boards are quite unfit to elect members of a Legislative Council. I cannot suggest any satisfactory electoral bodies. Something might be said for a plan by which the members of the Senate of the University were allowed to nominate three persons, out of whom the Lieutenant-Governor should select one. In the same way the Chambers of Commerce in Lahore and Delhi might nominate three or four persons, one of whom would be chosen. It would have to be settled whether each Chamber of Commerce should make its nomination separately. I understand the two bodies are not on the best of terms. I only mention the above as possibilities. For the present I advocate that the whole business of appointing members should be in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor. I am not in favour of the separate representation of Muhammadans. Under the system I advocate they will obtain proper representation.

15. Budget discussions and interpellations.—I would in the Imperial Legislative Council adopt the plan for the Budget discussion advocated by the Government of India. I think in the case of Budget discussions the members of the Advisory Council might sit with the members of the Legislative Council. I would allow a discussion of the Budget by the Punjab Legislative and Advisory Councils sitting together. For the present a general discussion of the whole Budget should suffice. I do not know that any very valuable results have hitherto flowed from the right of interpellation enjoyed by members of other Legislative Councils. But interpellation can be used as a means of giving greater publicity to the actions of Government, and there is no reason why a right enjoyed by members of other councils should be denied to councillors in this province.

With reference to your circular letter no. 2517, dated 3rd October 1907, forwarding copy of Punjab Government letter no. 2643-S. (Home—Legislative), dated 27th September 1907, and enclosures, regarding the measures proposed by the Government of India for giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters, I have the honour to forward my opinion on the subject.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Councils.—The first paragraph of the Government of India letter makes it clear that the question of giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views has been taken into consideration by that Government on its own initiative; in other words, the Government of India does not recognise that there is a demand by the "people" for such opportunities, whatever the demands of a certain class may be. This is undoubtedly the case in rural areas. In consulting the more intelligent of my visitors, I have always adopted the plan of asking them to describe the present system of Government to me, and have invariably found that, as was to be expected, they were sublimely ignorant of the functions and even of the existence of the various parts of Government from the Secretary of State to the Provincial Legislative Councils. Discussion of this important question was, under these circumstances, necessarily somewhat one-sided, and I was reduced to explaining the proposals of the Government of India, stating my own opinion, and asking them if they agreed. This of course they usually did, but not invariably, and one of the exceptions (Khan Bahadur Raja Aurangzeb)was so much in earnest in his dissenting views that I recorded our conversation as nearly as I could verbatim, and have ventured to attach it as an appendix to this report. I trust that this document will not be thought too frivolous for consideration in connection with a serious subject, for in no better way, I think, can the point of view of a very influential section of the public be represented; I refer to the experienced retired official. The opinions expressed below therefore are not entitled to any weight as reflecting local opinion. It is asserted that the scheme now proposed would be in accordance with the best traditions of oriental polity which have always recognised that the sovereign, however absolute, should make it his business to consult competent advisers, and should exercise his rule in accordance with what, after such consultation, he deems to be the best mind of his people. The place of the absolute sovereign having been taken by a benevolent but foreign bureaucracy, the necessity of seeking the advice of competent advisers is more urgent. The question is how and from whom should such advice be sought. At present no measure of importance is undertaken by the Imperial Government until the views of local Governments have been expressed, and the local Governments do not express their views until they have gauged local opinion through local officers. I am very strongly of opinion that it is at this stage that the people should be given an opportunity of expressing their views. Local officers do, no doubt, strive to reflect local opinion when reporting on contemplated measures, but it is difficult for those they consult to give well weighed opinions on matters which they have not perhaps specially studied in desultory conversations. I think that the proper solution of the question "How should advice be sought?" is to be found here. What is required is to give local opinion a status and recognized channel of expression. This could be done by creating local Advisory Councils to whom references, especially those which effect the daily life of the people, could be sent for opinion. It is unnecessary here to discuss the manner in which such councils should be constituted, as they are not contemplated in the letter of the Government of India and they are only suggested as an alternative method of learning the views of the people of India to that put forward by the Government of India, and I submit a more direct method. It appears to me impossible to conceive a great central Advisory Council which will really represent the views of the people of India. The twentieth century ruling Chief or territorial magnate may be as competent to collate opinions and give them expression as a Secretary to Government, but, I maintain, he is not in touch with nor would he represent the interests of the men who pay the revenue and fight the battles of the Government of India. I do not therefore consider that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter would be of service to the country.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—The reply to the first question should be read with the reply to this. If the necessity of recognizing local opinion and encouraging and solidifying it by the creation of local councils is admitted, such assemblies should be constituted of fair average representatives of the districts, and there would be no place in them for the great territorial magnates, non-official Europeans, and representatives of other interests who would fairly claim that their voices should be heard.

I think that a Provincial Advisory Council of the nature indicated in paragraph 6 of the Government of India letter would be a useful institution. I would however make it very much larger and more representative than is contemplated in paragraph 4 of the Chief Secretary's letter. The Provincial Advisory Council should, in my opinion, be able to give the ultimate expression of the views of the aristocracies of birth, brain, and money of the province on matters that affect the province. I would go further. There are certain measures, recent instances could be cited, which are enacted entirely in the interests of the people, and in which Government only has the indirect interest of the people's welfare. If a responsible Advisory Council opposes such measures by a sufficiently large majority, I maintain that they should not come before the Provincial Legislative Council until they had again been reported on by local officers after consulting local opinion. Unless Provincial Advisory Councils are given this measure of legislative authority, that is a limited veto, I am of opinion that they will entirely fail to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the educated classes of the people, and that their creation will render the Government open to the imputation of insincerity.

My reply then to the second question is that I think Provincial Advisory Councils would be useful institutions if they are made sufficiently representative and are permitted to exercise limited rights of veto on legislation that purely affects the interests of the people of the province.

III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—The proposal of the Government of India is to quadruple the Imperial Legislative Council while maintaining the official majority. I am opposed to any enlargement of the council. The working members of it will always be the members of the Viceroy's Executive Council. I doubt very much whether the proposed enlargement would result in anything but a grievous waste of time, and it is difficult to imagine where the twenty additional official members are to come from. This latter point is not touched on in the Government of India letter, but presumably they would be men of some standing, and, as it would be impossible to find the members at Simla or Calcutta, they would have to be drawn from other provinces, and the public service would be seriously disorganised.

(4) No.

(5) No.

(6) No. I disapprove of the principle of election in connection with oriental Government. I hold that it is entirely foreign to the traditions of any Eastern nation, even where the nation is democratic, e.g., the trans-border tribes of the North-West Frontier, and that it has proved a dismal failure in the shape of local self-Government in India. If the principle is insisted on, the franchise should only be extended to persons nominated by the paramount power or its officers, and there should be no qaulification, whether educational, financial, or social. My reply to the second question indicates the legitimate share of legislative power to which the representatives of the people of India are, in my opinion, entitled.

IV. (7) Provincial Legislative Council.—I would leave the Punjab Legislative Council as it is, except that, as noted above, I would give the proposed Provincial Advisory Council a limited power of veto on legislation that involved the interests of the people of the province alone.

(8) I would maintain the present system of nomination.

(9) I am of opinion that the Lieutenant-Governor should not be tied in any way as to the class from which he may nominate non-official members to his council.

(10) If election is resorted to at all, the very worst basis would, in my opinion, be the municipal and district boards. The suggestion appears positively dangerous. If it is decided that the non-official members of the Provincial Council should represent different classes in certain proportions, then the electorate for each class should consist of persons of that class who are nominated as voters by Government. The number of nominated voters might be distributed through the districts on a census basis. An essential qualification of a candidate for election would be the approval of the local Government that he was a fit person to represent his class.

(11) I do not; but if it is to be, I would strongly deprecate the agency of municipalities being used in any way unless the constitution of these bodies is fundamentally remodelled. This can only be done by abolishing the elective principle, and even then I doubt whether it would be possible to find men in the smaller municipalities fit for nomination if that nomination carried with it the right to vote at elections for membership to the Provincial Council. The members of the district boards are, of course, very much more respectable than those of municipal committees, but many of them are ignorant and quite incapable of exercising the right which it is proposed to give them with discretion. I much prefer the personal nomination of voters suggested in the answer to the previous question.

(12) I do not. If special provision is made for Muhammadans, it should be by nomination. If they are to be elected, it should be by a special electorate of nominated Muhammadans as indicated above.

V. (13) Discussion on the Budget in the Legislative Councils.—Yes. The present system is quite infructuous.

(14) Yes; by separate heads.

(15) No. I think that the power of interpellation is very much abused in the Imperial Legislative Council at present, and that its introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council would be inexpedient.

APPENDIX.

Report of conversation with Khan Bahadur Raja Aurangzeb Khan, retired Extra Assistant Commissioner.

"Salaam Raja Sahib. I am glad you have come to see me to-day as I want to ask your opinion about this new scheme that the Government is proposing."

"What new scheme Sahib? Is a new law being made for the Punjab? I think we have enough laws."

"Well not exactly, but I suppose you don't see the newspapers?

"Tobah Sahib. Why should I?"

"Well the matter is this. The Lord Sahib thinks that the people should be consulted more before the laws are made, and he proposes to give them a chance of giving their opinions, but before I ask you your opinion on the scheme I should like to know whether you think the present system seems to want improvement."

"I don't quite understand, Sahib. The Sarkar is well meaning."

"Yes, but I mean do you understand who makes the laws by which you are governed now."

"The Sarkar makes the laws."

"But what is the Sarkar? You have heard of the Legislative Councils at Simla and Lahore."

"Oh, of course."

"Do you know who the members of these councils are?"

"Not exactly. There are some native members who sit with the Sahibs and say 'han,' 'han.'"

"Well, perhaps, I had better try and explain the Viceroy's scheme to you and then we will discuss it.

"The system of Government at present is this. There is the Emperor in England with two parties who are elected by the people. Sometimes one party is larger, and sometimes the other. The larger party has a representative who advises the King, and he is called the Secretary of State for India."

"Oh yes, Sahib, I have heard of him. He is Sir John Morley."

"More or less. Then he has a council. Then in India there is the Viceroy with an Executive Council which is the Government of India, and that is the real Sarkar. But for the purpose of making laws the Viceroy has a larger council called the Legislative Council, and, as you say, there are some native members in that. In the same way in the provinces there are Governors or Lieutenant-Governors, and they have little Legislative Councils to help them to make laws. Now the Viceroy first of all proposes to make some more councils to help him to know what the people think. He suggests having a big assembly which is to be called the Imperial Advisory Council and to consist of 60 members, 20 of whom are to be ruling Chiefs and the rest big zamindars. This council is only to give advice when asked for it, and not to have any power. Now, Raja Sahib, what do you think of that idea?"

"Let me think, Sahib, I am rather confused with all these 'Councils.' You say the Lord Sahib wants another 'Council' made up of Rajas and zamindars. First, who would the Rajas be? There is Patiala in the Punjab, and he is a boy, and Bahawalpur is dead, and Kashmir. Well! Oh, but there are others, and the zamindars would be the more important people."

"The zamindars. How would they be selected?"

"That's the question. How would you select them?"

"Sahib, if you ask the truth, I would say do not mention the name of councils. What good will they do to the people? The Sarkar is well meaning as I said, but it will do what it thinks right if there were fifty councils."

"That's just it, Raja Sahib, and you may be very sure that it will in this instance too, whatever you and I may think about the matter. The Viceroy has proposed this scheme, and Morley Sahib has approved it, so that all sensible men will understand that it is useless to condemn it wholesale. What we have to do is to examine it and see if we can suggest weak points. One suggestion is that all land-holders who pay more than Rs. 10,000 per annum land revenue should vote for members for the Advisory Councils. What do you think of that?"

"It is no good, Sahib. I say again, do not mention the name of councils."

"Well, you old Tory, suppose I explain my own views, you will at least tell me whether you think there is anything in them."

"Certainly."

"I think myself that the present system is a very good one. But it is quite true that the Sarkar sometimes makes mistakes in legislating for the people, because the people who finally make the laws do not live with the people who are affected by them. The Viceroy never makes a new law without asking the advice of the Lieutenant-Governor, and the Lieutenant-Governor does not express his opinion till he has asked for the views of Commissioners who again consult district officers. Now you know that we always consult our visitors about any change that is proposed, but just as you say the native members of the Legislative Councils simply sit and say "han," "han," so you must admit most of our visitors do. I think the time to consult the people is when the proposal is being reported on by the district officer, and that if he had a little council composed of selected native gentlemen of the . . . . . "

"No, Sahib, consult us by all means, but do it secretly. It is not right to put people in opposition to Government. I will tell you the truth. The Sarkar is well meaning, as I have said, but it has made two fatal mistakes.

"First, it has given education to people unfitted for it; second, it has put the tenants above the land-lords. Now it wishes to put the kamins above itself. The Sarkar should never be a defendant. I will tell you a story, Sahib. When I was Tahsildar at Muzaffargarh about thirty years ago, there was an outbreak of cholera. There was a pond near the kutchery, and the Deputy Commissioner ordered me to have it drained, which I proceeded to do. When all the water was drained away the fishes were left, so I auctioned them for Rs. 8 and put the money in revenue deposit.

"The fishing rights had been leased by the villagers to a man for Rs. 20 and the lessee sued villagers for that amount. Abdul Aziz was the Munsif, and he said that the tank was drained by the Deputy Commissioner's order, and that the lessee should have the value of the fish in deposit, and dismissed the suit. The lessee appealed and the District Judge, who was a young Sahib, made the Deputy Commissioner co-defendant! The Deputy Commissioner was Gladstone Sahib! Of course, this could not be, so I arranged a compromise, but the whole scheme of Government would collapse if the Deputy Commissioner could be made a co-defendant."

"I quite agree with you, but as I said before, this council scheme is going to come whatever we may think, and I am trying to explain what I think might be done. If we had these little district councils that I suggest, they would be asked to give their opinion on any proposed measure and the Deputy Commissioner would report what local opinion was. But there are some men in nearly every district who are too big and influential to be members of the local council. I think that from them a Provincial Advisory Council might be selected to advise the Lieutenant-Governor. You know there are two sorts of legislation—that which affects the Sarkar and that which only affects the people. For example, the Land Alienation Act or Co-operative Credit Societies Act. I think that such measures should be sent to the Advisory Council I have suggested, and if a majority of that council disapproved of the measure it should not be put before the Legislative Council of the province until local opinion had again been called for."

"But how would you select the members of the Provincial Advisory Council?"

"Certainly not by election any more than I would the local councillors. I think the Lieutenant-Governor should select men of every creed and class from among influential men of the province, but not from among ruling Chiefs."

"No, Sahib, the Lieutenant-Governor should no doubt consult influential men of the province as you would in the district, but he should do it privately."

"But the Viceroy says that the sovereigns in India, however absolute, have always sought the advice of councillors.

"Yes, Sahib, but the councillors were appointed by them and dismissed by them when they gave advice that was not acceptable. The Sarkar seems to be seeking to set up an opposition, so that it may argue with it. What good? The councils would know that they had no power and would not give advice opposed to the suggestions of Government."

"Very well then, Raja Sahib, I understand that you are opposed altogether to the proposed Advisory Council, and would not have them in any shape or form."

"Yes, Sahib. The name of 'council' should not be mentioned."

"Then what about the Legislative Councils? The Viceroy proposed to increase his to 53 members."

"And they would be empowered to make laws?"

"Yes, but, as there cannot be two Kings in the country, the Sarkari members would be in the majority."

"Then there would only be more bakh, and the same result. The Sarkar would make the laws that seem right to them.

"And the Provincial Councils?"

"It is the same thing.

"I must admit, Raja Sahib, that you have not said "han," "han" to me this morning. Now is there anything that I can do for you?"

"There is one request, Sahib. In the matter of the Sub-Registrarship, &c., &c."

H. S. FOX-STRANGWAYS,
Deputy Commissioner, Jhelum.

No. 4356-G., dated Campbellpur, 13th November 1907.

From—B. N. Bosworth-Smith, Esq., Deputy Commissioner, Attock,

To—The Commissioner, Rawalpindi Division.

In compliance with your circular letter no. 2517, dated 3rd ultimo, I have the honour to give, so far as I am able, answers to the various questions.

I. (1) Yes; but a limited power of suggestion would increase its use. The proportion of ruling Chiefs might well be reduced to 15, and that of territorial magnates to a like number.

The remaining 30 seats might then be distributed amongst the various provinces according to their importance and population. And the local Governments might be asked to recommend for the Viceroy's nomination (a) landlords paying over Rs. 2,500 land revenue, (b) presidents or members of big social or academical societies, (c) others whose learning abilities, public spirit, or service mark them out for such an honour.

II. (2) Yes; a limited power of suggestion might also be given. It would seem that nomination is more desirable for the Legislative Council, and that the ideal to aim at in Provincial Advisory Councils would be ultimately a system of election.

If persons paying Rs. 1,500 revenue or Rs. 3,000 income-tax were allowed a vote and one member were elected for the more important districts or for two small districts, this privilege would be appreciated by all thinking persons in the province. The very existence of such Advisory Councils may otherwise never become known to the majority of people.

III. (3) Yes; the words in paragraph 12-E of the Government of India's letter "not less than two to be Muhammadans" might easily be omitted, as the Muhammadan interest would appear already to be sufficiently guarded.

(4) Yes.

(5) Yes; by direct election; the electorates to be all persons paying Rs. 1,500 land revenue or Rs. 3,000 income tax. Fellows of the Punjab University, graduates, and legal practitioners of five years' standing.

(6) Yes, subject to the remark under III (3). They should be retained by election as suggested in (J).

IV. (7) Yes; to 15, excluding the Lieutenant-Governor—8 officials, 7 non-officials.

(8) Nomination.

(9) Non-official seats should be allotted to communities of one religion in proportion to their numbers in each province.

(10) Supposing election is adopted, the electorate should be the similar to that proposed in answer to III (5), subject to the restriction that no religious community should be represented out of proportion to its numerical strength.

(11) No; separate electorates would be unnecessary when the allotted number of one class is full. The candidate of any other class getting most votes would be considered elected.

(12) I do not think such provision necessary.

(13), (14), and (15) I can give no useful opinion. The native gentlemen whom I have consulted reply in the affirmative to all these questions.

B. N. BOSWORTH-SMITH,
Deputy Commissioner, Attock.

No. 247, dated 20th November 1907.

From—Diwan Narendra Nath, M.A., Deputy Commissioner, Gujrat,
To—The Commissioner, Rawalpindi Division.

I have the honour to forward my answers to the questions formulated in connection with Government of India's letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907, and to state as follows:

2. When I say that the changes proposed in the way of giving to the people of India a wider share in the councils of the Empire are desirable, I must not be understood to say that these reforms will remove all difficulties of administration. On the other hand, new difficulties will be created which will have to be faced and overcome. The spread of education, the more even distribution of wealth, and the equality of rights secured by Anglo-Indian laws, subverting class domination, have made the changes now proposed necessary. One cannot be, however, very sanguine as to how far these changes will meet the situation. To what extent it will be possible for Government to have regard for public opinion, how far the councillors, who will not themselves be burdened with the responsibilities of administration, will be able to co-operate with Government, remains to be seen. One thing which is necessary amongst others is that there should be a constant flow and inter-change of good feelings on both sides. Much has been said and written about the promotion of social intercourse between Europeans and Indians. Although the last 30 years have seen many social changes in the Punjab, and the next 30 years may see still greater changes, yet the fact remains that diversity of custom and habit between Europeans and Indians is very great. Another difficulty is that the classes most imbued with European ideas are just the classes whose political opinions are not shared by an average European officer. Further social changes will create further political aspirations, and this conflict will continue as long as the period of transition lasts, or in other words until there is complete assimilation, if such a consummation is ever to reach. Of the state of things that existed for some time after the annexation of the Punjab, and of the relation which then prevailed between the rulers and the ruled, I know something partly from tradition and partly from memory which relates only to the latter end of the period, when the old order started with the annexation was coming into decay. Owing to the adoption of the policy of John Lawrence, as opposed to that of Henry Lawrence, a severe shock was given to vested interests. Yet there was no discontent, no disloyalty. The reasons are manifold, but they can be summarised in two sentences. Those whose vested interests suffered got from the British Government what they wanted, and they were treated by British officers in a manner in which they liked to be treated. Besides, concessions and advantages were given which were unknown before the word "Inglis" for pension affords sufficient testimony of this.

3. The present discontent of the middle classes is mainly an economical question. It is impossible to restore the old state of things. I beg to invite your attention to copy of extract from a letter no. 2372, dated 26th October 1907, addressed by me to the Chief Secretary in connection with the decentralization scheme, in which I have made some suggestions, about meeting the pecuniary aspirations of some of the leading men of the middle classes. The proposal made therein may appear to be visionary, and working out of details may present some difficulties. But the main idea, in some shape or other, I submit forcibly, is worthy of adoption. Coming to the higher classes who are not troubled with the question of livelihood, there is no discontent amongst them, but there is a lot of grumbling.

4. Government can do nothing to promote social intercourse between Europeans and Indians. As to courtesy and general treatment strict orders already exist. What I think is needed, not with reference to the change of times only, but with a view to restore the mutual good feeling which existed in old times, is that the old custom of European officers calling on Indian gentlemen of position, without any invitation from the latter, should be revived. In Lahore this courtesy was generally observed with old courtiers of Maharaja Ranjit Singh. The bad feeling created between the two races by the mutiny of 1857 caused the custom to abate to some extent. With the death of the old courtiers the custom died out completely. The courtesy was not extended to any of their sons. In 1876 or 1877 the only vestige that remained of the custom, was that the Deputy Commissioner paid a visit of condolence to the heirs of a deceased grandee. Since that year, I do not know of any instance in which a European Deputy Commissioner paid even a visit of condolence, except perhaps on the death of a titular Raja or some relation of a ruling Chief.

5. The times have completely changed, and democratic ideas have advanced to such an extent that it would be impolitic to make any distinction between old families and new families. Men should be respected for the position they hold quite apart from the consideration as to what was their past. I think that the privilege of a return visit by the Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner should be extended to all members of Councils, Provincial or Imperial, Advisory or Legislative. A Commissioner in the expanded council will be a colleague of a member of Provincial Council.

6. There are no anjumans or societies in this district. I asked the District Judge, Shekh Amir Ali, to convene meetings separately of the leading Muhammadan gentlemen and the leading Hindu members of the Bar. I enclose for your perusal the answers given at the two meetings by the gentlemen who took part in the discussion.

NARENDRA NATH,
Deputy Commissioner, Gujrat.

I.

I certainly think that the formation of "Avisory Councils" would be a boon to the people and the establishment of such a council is a step forward. As to its constitution and duties I have a few suggestions to offer. The standard fixed for selection from amongst territorial magnates of the province is payment of land revenue from Rs. 5,000 to Rs. 50,000. It cannot be denied that the amount of revenue paid by a person goes far to show the extent of landed interest he possesses; but there are other matters also which should not be lost sight of. It must be remembered that the enormous value attached to the proprietary rights in land is only of recent origin. During the Sikh rule in the Punjab the worth of a nobleman depended not so much on the amount of land revenue that he paid, but on the amount of the land revenue that he received in jagir. Husbandry was looked down upon as an inferior occupation. Are the biggest jagirdars in the Punjab included in these 52 men paying revenue from Rs. 5,000 and Rs. 50,000, who evidently will be the class from which selection will be made? This is a point which might be enquired into. These 5 men probably include some wealthy merchants of the province, who having made their money in trade have purchased large areas of land and possibly exclude some very important aristocratic families who still retain to a great extent their past influence in society.

2. Some very important families in the Punjab own large areas of land outside of the province. These were grants made of taluqas in Oudh for valuable services rendered during the mutiny of 1857. In constituting the class out of which selections for the "Advisory Councils" will be made, landed interest possessed by a family in provinces other than the Punjab should not be ignored.

3. In the aristocratic class of the province it has always been customary to include near relations of ruling Chiefs, excluded from inheritance by the operations of the law of primogeniture. These members of the nobility may not possess an area of land in British territory, and may not be paying revenue to Government. It would not be right to exclude such men from the class of which they have hitherto been recognised as important members.

4. The rapidly changing condition of Indian society should be borne in mind. India of to-day is very different from India of 20 years back, and 20 years hence may see changes in economic and other conditions which it is difficult to foresee. It is undesirable to frame a rigid and inflexible constitution which Government may find necessary to change ten or fifteen years hence. To lay down hard and fast standards as to the amount of revenue paid or of jagir enjoyed is impolitic for many other reasons. Actual selection may be confined to the very highest men in the aristocracy of the province, but it would not be right to raise expectations and hopes which it may not be possible to fulfil amongst those who come up to the standard, whilst it would be undesirable to create disappointment in the minds of a large number of men who do not satisfy the pecuniary qualifications fixed by Government. I would, therefore, make the system elastic, and lay down only general rules by which Government may be guided in selecting members for the "Advisory Councils"—

(a) The present social position and influence of the person to be selected and of his family in the past, amongst the Provincial Darbaris of the province. The word Darbari is of recent origin, and is indicative of the decay of the aristocratic classes of the province. Formerly they were designated Chiefs as distinguished from ruling Chiefs. Sir Lepel Griffins's History is called the History of the Punjab Chief.

(b) The extent of landed property owned and the amount of land revenue paid in the province or outside the province.

(c) Amount of jagir enjoyed.

(d) Relationship to a ruling Chief.

(e) General capacity to serve as a councillor.

The last does not necessarily mean University education; but if the council is to be of any use, ability to understand the various political problems on which the opinion of the councillors will be asked should be considered by no means an unimportant test. Personally I am disposed to think that amidst various conflicts which arise over questions affecting the administration of the country, it requires ability of no mean order to hit upon a point in a higher plane on which right thinking men on both sides, that of the Government and of the people, would be unanimous.

5. Out of 40 seats now reserved for territorial magnates, I would set apart a few for men who have no aristocratic claim, who have risen to highest position in society through the dint of personal ability and merit. Men who have risen very high in service, or who have made a name for themselves in the professions, or who represent commercial and industrial interests in the country should be eligible to them. I am not sure as to what number it would be right to reserve for these classes, but there should be at least 3 seats, one for each class, whilst 6, i.e., 2 for each class, would also be a reasonable number.

6. The members of the aristocracy, barring ruling Chiefs, retain nothing of their former influence. In the Sikh times administrative powers were concentrated in the nobility. A Sardar was not only in receipt of certain emoluments or of certain amount of income from land, but was also considered to be the Chieftain of the tract. He therefore exercised power and authority which was limited or unlimited according to his position. Administrative power is now concentrated in officers representing the Imperial Government. A Tahsildar wields, as the representative of the paramount power, greater authority than a territorial magnate with an income of a lakh of rupees a year. This fact, as also the complete disappearance of the feudal type of old native society, has considerably lessened the influence of the aristocratic classes, and has brought into existence classes directly connected with the administration, Government servants, and lawyers. The former retain in their retirement some of the influence which they exercised and the honour which they received whilst in Government service.

Theoretically an Indian is eligible to any office in the State, and in practice we have seen them selected for such high offices as officiating Chief Justiceship of a Chartered High Court. It would be impolitic on the part of Government to alienate the sympathies of this class, and to drive them to the opposition to wield against Government the influence which they have acquired in Government service.

7. The class of lawyers, independent and wealthy hitherto, the recruiting ground for the highest offices of the State, is a creation of British rule. They are interpreters of Anglo-Indian law, and therefore the necessary outcome of it. The fact that Indians who have risen to highest offices of State in British territory have come from this class considerably enhances their influence. The way in which this tends to subvert the influence of the old aristocracy is not always realised by European officers; but a little reflection will make it clear, how in Indian caste communities the man, who is more wealthy, wields greater authority, receives more respect from Government, must take precedence over the scion of an old family. The influence of this class needs every recognition at the hands of Government. To reserve one or two seats for them will create a healthy ambition amongst them and will regulate and mould the lives and careers of many.

8. As regards the commercial and industrial classes, I am fully aware of the fact that this class has not yet come into prominence, but it has a great future before it. Scientific and technical education is increasing rapidly. Considering the mischievous turn which industrial development in India may take, and of which we have received a fair amount of warning from the movement called Swadeshism, it is very undesirable to shut the door of the highest council of the Empire to men belonging to this class.

9. I have read something of the criticism against the reforms proposed. Much of what has been suggested above will remove a great deal of the opposition that has been shown. It has been said that ruling Chiefs are not affected by the laws made for British territory, but they have a large stake in the integrity of the Empire and in the maintenance of order, and as such must take share in the councils of the Empire.

10. An objection may be raised that in a body consisting of ruling Chiefs and the landed nobility and gentry, it is undesirable to introduce political opinions held by persons outside of this class. To this my answer is that the ruling Chiefs and members of aristocracy have ample opportunities outside the Council Chamber of learning, the political views of men who do not belong to their class. As long as the majority consists of men representing stable interests of society, the chances are that the men outside of their class will be influenced by their views rather than the other way.

11. The Advisory Council will receive no legislative recognition, its functions will be purely advisory and its proceedings informal. With such constitution as the council will have, consisting purely of non-officials, I do not think that it is possible to give it a statutory existence or to lay down any rule in writing, as has been suggested by an ex-member of the Viceroy's Council, about the weight to be given to the opinion of the majority of its members. I am doubtful if a council, having statutory powers, in which Government was unrepresented, would be the safe custodian of Imperial concerns and interests. Such a council must have therefore purely advisory functions. It is, however, necessary to point out that unless due weight is given to the opinion of the members, and a sort of unwritten rule is observed as to the extreme undesirability of Government acting in opposition to the opinion of the majority, the position of ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates will be worse than that of the members of the Legislative Council, and they will eventually be unwilling to work on the council and to give their honest opinion. I think it is advantageous to keep the proceedings confidential, but I do not understand why the proceedings should be informal. I notice a slight difference in the procedure to be observed in consultation with members of the Provincial Advisory Council and that to be followed with members of the Imperial Advisory Council. The word informal is nowhere applied to the deliberations of the Provincial Advisory Council. With respect to consultations with the individual members of the Imperial Advisory Council, I do not find that this would be done by letters. A purely informal talk on weighty matters of State is absolutely useless. To give opinion on important questions, it is necessary to study all the connected papers and to think over the pros and cons. A passing remark in a casual conversation does not elicit the true opinion. I therefore think that all consultations with individual members of the Advisory Council should be in writing. If it is feared that in the case of certain members opinions in writing would reflect more the views of the amanuensis than of the member, then at least an option should be given of submitting opinions verbally or in writing. Men who have not thought over the questions that come before council are not likely to be of much help in the deliberations of the council. I believe that amongst ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates it is possible to get a sufficient number who are educated enough to take interest in public questions, to form opinions on them, and to submit them in writing. I presume that the privilege of giving opinion on questions referred to the council by Government carries with it the privilege of addressing Government, in a purely advisory capacity, on important public questions.

II.

I think that a Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution. I have no modification to suggest, in the proposals made by Government of India, regarding its constitutions and duties. There is, however, only one thing to which I wish to draw attention. Members for the Advisory Council, Provincial or Imperial, will be selected from a higher class than those for the Legislative Council. Why should the deliberations of the Provincial Advisory Council be presided over by a high official deputed by the Lieutenant-Governor, while he himself presides over the Legislative Council. This will be felt as derogatory by the members of the Advisory Council, will be apt to make the proceedings too informal, and will detract from the earnestness and interest of the members.

III.

(a) I approve of the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council. As to the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12, I have a few words to say. The scheme does not appear to me to be consistent in its various parts. Four seats have been promised to Muhammadans—2 by election and 2 by nomination. If two seats must go to Muhammadans, which means Muhammadans in the whole of India, including this province, by election, there is no reason why non-official members for the Imperial Council for this Province and Eastern Bengal should not be elected D (b). It is also difficult to say whether election will not or will be the ultimate mode of selection of the land-holding class of this and other provinces.

I am one of those who think that Muhammadans in India are a more important class than the numerical proportions of their population would seem to indicate. But I do not think that it was ever contemplated or intended by Government that no regard is to be paid to the numerical strength of the Hindus in Hindustan, whilst in respect of education and wealth, though perhaps not in respect of solidarity, they occupy a much more important place than the Muhammadans. There are 20 seats under D (b), (c), (d), and E, which will be held by Indians—Hindus, Muhammadans, Sikhs, Parsis, and Jains. I do not think that a ruling Chief should be counted to lend his influence either to the Hindus or Muhammadans, and the nominees of Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay will be Europeans. If 4 seats are allotted to Muhammadans as an important minority, what guarantee is there that, coming from other sources, they will not occupy as many seats as the most influential majority in the population. There is a possibility, if not a likelihood, of a Muhammadan being elected by the non-official members of the Punjab, Eastern Bengal, and United Provinces. This gives them 3 seats. Then they may get 3 seats under D (c) by election, from the nobles and great land-owners of the Punjab, Eastern Bengal, and United Provinces. This gives them 10 seats in all. It is, I think, anomalous that, coming through the trap-door of a special provision for the representation of minorities they should secure as many seats as any other class including Hindus, who are numerically the largest. Having given election to Muhammadans D (b) I do not think it would be right to withhold it from any other class desiring it.

It has been suggested that to make any reservation in favour of Muhammadans will accentuate racial and religious feeling and will introduce it into the council, and that such a feeling once roused will spread even to the territorial magnates and ruling Chiefs, and might infect the members of the Advisory Council. There is great force in this argument, but I think it is not now possible to recede from the position already taken by Government, though the whole scheme described in the Government of India letter is said to be a tentative one. Nothing would now be gained by unravelling the past records to see if Muhammadans have occupied on the council a number of seats greater in proportion to their mere numerical strength in the population. I would therefore suggest only a slight addition in clause E. I would insert the following proviso:—"Provided that the number of Muhammadans coming from other sources including special election under clause D (d) is not more than 4." This would not tie down the hands of Government as to any special method of recruitment for other classes. It would give 6 seats to Muhammadans out of 20 for Indians of all creeds. This is much above the numerical proportion of the Muhammadan population.

(b) I think that the time has come when a member should be elected for the Imperial Council by the non-official members of the Provincial Council. It cannot be denied that election gives a more popular basis to the mode of selection. In other provinces having a Legislative Council, a member of the Imperial Council is returned by election. In these provinces election will be introduced with regard to the two seats under D (d) for Muhammadans. In view of these facts it is unreasonable to deny to the province the election of one member for the Imperial Council.

(c) I approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners for the province to the Imperial Council, but I do not wish to introduce election in their case. Canvassing, which is so essential for election, is not very agreeable to the land-owning classes, greater number of whom constitute the aristocracy of the province. In case election is resorted to, an electorate should be formed of the Provincial Darbaris of the province paying a certain amount of revenue and of others outside of this class paying a larger amount.

(d) As regards the Muhammadan electorate for the selection of Muhammadan member under clause D (d), I have not yet received the statistics referred to in paragraph 8 of Mr. Maclagan's letter. In the absence of this information, all that I can say is that the Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Council should form the electorate.

IV.

It is difficult for a district officer to say to what figure the number of present members of the council should be increased. But I think that 20 would be a fair number. I would have 11 official members and 9 non-official. The 11 official members to consist of—

Lieutenant-Governor	1
Chief Secretary	1
Financial Commissioner	1
Settlement and Revenue Commissioners	6
Principal Law Officer of Government	1
Out of the various heads of departments by turn	1
TOTAL	11

I would fill up the 9 non-official seats in the following way:—

By nomination—

Ruling Chief	1
Land-holders	3
Mercantile community	1
Minorities (Sikhs and Christians)	1

By election—

Profession	1
University	1
Municipalities and district boards	1

I do not think that out of 9 seats it is possible to make a special reservation for Muhammadans. Besides, Muhammadans in the Punjab are not in a minority and cannot claim the special provisions for minorities in a representative scheme. The seats by nomination may be filled after the result of election is known. If members returned by election are all of one class, there are 3 seats set apart for land-holders, and those may be filled up by men belonging to the other classes. To follow the analogy of the Imperial Council in reserving a number of seats for Muhammadans, I am afraid that it will be necessary to expand the council to a much larger figure. It is, however, possible to maintain Government majority even in a council of 28 by nominating all the heads of departments, Sanitary Commissioner or Chief Engineer, Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals, Inspector-General of Prisons, Inspector-General of Police, and Director of Public Instruction. One objection to such a large council would be that, some of the departmental officers, who are not directly concerned with the measures coming before the Council, will be taken away from their legitimate sphere of work. If this difficulty is not considered unsurmountable, I would have 13 non-official to 15 official members including the Lieutenant-Governor. The 13 non-official seats may be distributed as follows:—

By nomination—
Ruling Chief	1
Land-holders	4
Sikh	1
Muhammadan	1
European mercantile and commercial community	1
By election—
Muhammadan	1
Profession	1
University	1
Municipalities	1
District boards	1

For the Muhammadans an electorate may be formed of the Muhammadan members of the district boards and municipalities in the province. By profession I mean the legal profession and the Bar Association in various districts of the province or the Indian Association of Lahore in which the majority of the members are lawyers, may be called upon to elect. The setting apart of a seat for the legal profession in the Provincial Council will, I think, considerably strengthen the position of Government in keeping open to nomination a number of seats representing very important interests in the country, i.e., interests of classes to whom election is unsuitable. Indirectly it will also give to the legal profession a voice in the Imperial Council as non-official members of the Provincial Council will be eligible for election to the Imperial Council. I have suggested above how in my opinion the Provincial Council should be formed. If the number is fixed at 20, representation by religion will be difficult to arrange. I wish, however, to offer a few observations on the subject dealt with in paragraph 22. I am opposed on principle to have representations in any council or board by religion or caste, much more so to have election for each separate class. The case of Muhammadans for representation in Imperial Council only might, for various reasons, on which I need not dwell here, be treated as exceptional, though I am of opinion that there are disadvantages in this also. But to have class representation on every district and municipal boards and every Provincial Council is, I submit, a mistake. To give representation to castes and religious communities on the bases of religion or caste will introduce into the council or board men strongly imbued with class and religious bias, bigoted Hindus, bigoted Muhammadans, and bigoted Sikhs. Now each delegate may be expected to fully guard the interests of his own class, and there is the European Government to see that justice is done to all, but I think that there is one great weakness of human nature which is overlooked when the system of class representation on the basis of religion is advocated. A bigoted man is always exclusive, he is all for his own class. A European Government or a European system of administration will derive little help from a collection of bigoted Hindus, Muhammadans, and Sikhs. Such men to further their own ends may temporarily and outwardly help the system, but the co-operation does not proceed from the heart. To give elections on the bases of religion is to make a most terrible mess of Eastern and Western systems. It amounts, I think, to retaining the evils of both systems, and doing away with the good of either, I would open certain seats to election, reserve a few for nomination, and then supplement by nomination the defects of election. Election hitherto might have resulted in returning men imbued with a certain set of political opinion. To introduce class representation may or may not remedy this tendency, but will certainly introduce evils of a much greater magnitude.

Nothing would, I submit, be a greater mistake than to have this kind of representation in district boards and municipalities. The electorate for these bodies consists of ignorant men. The pecuniary qualification is law for eligibility as voters or as members. Amongst ignorant men, low in the grade of society, class bigotry easily degenerates into fanaticism. To drive religion or class bias into hearth and home is to augment the difficulties of administration. Notwithstanding all this, in the districts in which I have been, class representation on any basis other than that of religion is not possible. In dividing themselves into groups, people of India think less of their occupation, and more of their religion or hereditary castes. I do not see how in Gujranwala or Gujrat, or, for the matter of that, in any town in the Punjab, it is possible to have representation by occupations, ignoring the religions. Classification by occupation may be acceptable to the people when it fits in with classification by religion, but not otherwise. But in each and every town it will be difficult to devise a system which will satisfy both the religious and the occupational tests. In district boards there is only one preponderating class, viz., the land-holders, which needs representation, and under the present system it is fully represented. In the Punjab cultivators, tenants, or kamins are not sufficiently advanced to require representation. Traders and others can get in by nomination if they satisfy certain conditions. The system of representation in local bodies in the Punjab therefore requires no change.

V. I think that the system of discussing the Budget should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23.

Discussions by separate heads is likely to confine the debate to financial policy of Government, and will prevent to a certain extent the introduction of extraneous matters. The provincial Budget should be discussed in the Provincial Council and that by separate heads, and the right of interpellation should be given to the members of the Punjab Council.

As to these privileges as well as the introduction of election for the Punjab, I wish to remark that, with the exception of Burma, all other Provincial Councils enjoy these rights. The Punjab is no longer a frontier Province. It is not in any way less advanced than the United Provinces. There appears therefore to be no reason why these privileges should be withheld from the Punjab Council.

NARINDRA NATH,
Deputy Commissioner, Gujrat.

The 20th November 1907.

Extract from letter no. 2362, dated 26th October 1907, from Diwan Narindra Nath, Deputy Commissioner, Gujrat, to the Under Secretary to Government, Punjab, Revenue Department.

In connection with this subject, I venture to lay before you some idea about a scheme of grants of land to be made by local Government on the recommendation of local officers. Ever since the desirability of decentralization was first suggested in Parliament, I have been thinking how the potency of local Governments for beneficence could be materially increased. Absolute sovereignty implies unrestricted powers of punishment and reward. In the system of British Indian Government at present organised, the power of punishment is, and must be, regulated by a well defined constitution. Similarly, it is impossible to revive the old idea of unlimited and extensive powers of doing benevolence. I, however, think that, with due regard to modern economic and other conditions, it is possible to bring into greater relief the benevolent character of the absolute system of Government which we must have for an undefinitely long time if not for ever the powers which local Government and the officers representing it in various spheres have of giving Government posts is felt to be inadequate. The supply vastly exceeds the demand.

2. Whilst in list (a) I have suggested that Government should take much wider powers than exist now of granting assignments of land revenue for a life time, I fear that much cannot be done in this direction. The powers of granting hereditary jagirs will not be of much use. Hereditary assignments of land revenue were made after the annexation of the Punjab, under conditions and circumstances which do not exist now. Under the altered economic conditions of the Province, jagirs which, in many cases in old days, constituted a substantial help towards the maintenance of the jagirdars, are now valued more on account of the distinction which they bestow than as sources of income. It is neither possible nor desirable for Government to create a new class of hereditary jagirdars when position and prestige might militate against, and come into conflict with, those of the old jagirdars. These have in course of generations acquired for themselves a position in Indian society, which it will not be wise on the part of Government to disturb.

4. The colonization schemes have been a source of immense good to the people and of profit to the State. But as in all things good there is a spirit of evil, so these schemes too have not been unmixed blessings. The colonies constitute in the Punjab one of the greatest democratic forces that have been created by the British rule. One direct result of them is that Government no longer possesses the vast power which it had of making large grants of land. This detracts largely from its power and therefore from its aristocratic form, yet it is not possible to make any material changes in the form of Government. The situation now is this that people have not the regard and respect which they had for Government officers in the past, for the simple reason that Government officers can give very few things. Appointments are few, jagirs cannot be granted, and if nothing is done to put some limit to further colonization there will be no land left before long at the disposal of Government to grant.

5. At the same time schemes are afloat for associating people on a large scale in the work of administration, not by giving them more stipendiary offices, but by enlisting their co-operation in local self-government and in the work of legislation. All classes must take part in this work. It is therefore necessary to see that people should come to the work with a conciliatory attitude of mind—to advise and to criticise, but not merely to carp and find fault. In view of all these circumstances, I would invent a system of life grants (not hereditary grants which would soon exhaust all the land that there is), for which people who have rendered honorary services to Government should become eligible after a certain age. Each grant should secure an income of about Rs. 5,000 a year to the grantee, and should be lightly assessed.

I think that 20 squares well irrigated by a perennial canal will secure that much income. In each district of the Province a certain area should be set apart out of which these grants should be made to men of the districts or of neighbouring districts. Regard should be paid to the importance of the district and to the facilities which it has in respect of irrigation and communication. For instance, in Gujrat, an area of about 26,000 (I am giving the figures from memory) of Government land is likely to be irrigated from Jhelum Canal. It would not be too much to set apart 5,000 acres for this purpose. In Gujranwala and Lahore districts, I do not think it would be impossible to set apart 7,000 and 10,000 acres, respectively, for this purpose. Retired Government servants of high position, large land-owners, and hereditary jagirdars drawing large jagirs might be excluded from the benefit of these grants. The power of making grants should, of course, vest in the local Government, on the recommendation of local officers. The prestige of local officers depends on the powers which vests in the local Government, for the former exercise only delegated authority. The enhancement of the powers of Government in the direction indicated will enhance the powers and prestige of local officers. The above is but a bare outline of a scheme which has been in my mind for some time past. Details may be thought out, if the suggestions made are worthy of any consideration.

The following was passed at the meeting of representative Muhammadans of Gujrat held in the Public Library Hall on 20th October 1907 at 8 A. M.

Answers to questions on which opinions were desired in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907.

I. (1) An Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter will, in our opinion, be of service to the country, but we suggest that provisions be made for councillors being allowed to bring important matters to notice.

II. (2) We think a Provincial Advisory Council will be a useful institution, and can suggest no modifications in the proposals regarding its constitution and duties.

III. (3) We approve of the proposed enlargement of Legislative Council, but we wish that the interests of the Muhammadan community may be duly represented.

(4) We approve of the proposal that one member should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council.

(5) We approve of the selection by nomination of educated and experienced zamindar, irrespective of the amount of land revenue paid by him.

(6) We approve of the proposed appointment of 4 Muhammadans to the Imperial Council—2 by selection, and 2 by nomination, but we recommend that elected members should be elected by the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Council.

(7) We advocate an increase in the present number of members to 20 (not less than 20), but we recommend the appointment of non-official members by nomination in proportion to the numbers and population of various classes inhabiting the Province.

(8), (9), (10), (12)

(13), (14), and (15) We approve of the discussion of the Budget by separate heads in Imperial and Provincial Councils, and we are in favour of the power of interpellation being given to members.

AMIR ALI,
District Judge.

The proceedings of an extraordinary meeting of the members of the Gujrat Bar Association held on the 13th October 1907.

The members of the Gujrat Bar met at the Bar Room on the 13th October 1907 to consider the Legislative Council's reforms as proposed in the published letter of the Government of India. Sheikh Amir Ali, B. A., District Judge of Gujrat, was in the chair. After the District Judge had clearly explained the scheme of the proposed reforms, the questions required by the Government of the Punjab in its letter to be answered and discussed were put before the meeting and the following unanimous answers were the result of its deliberations.

Question 1.—(a) The establishment of an Advisory Council is essential.

(b) Along with the standard of landed property or wealth of the nominee for the membership of the Advisory Council some decent qualification of education and public and general experience should be necessary.

(c) While the proceedings of the Advisory Councils are to be kept quite secret it is submitted that the proposals put before the various meetings of such councils and the conclusions to which they arrive should be made public, so that the people may be kept in touch with what is being done for them.

(d) The members of the council should have the right to offer voluntary advice and make proposals consonant with the public interest. The main reason for this being that, if no such right is given, many a matter of great public importance may never strike the Government to be put before the council, and thus remain the source of inconvenience both to the rulers and the ruled.

Question 2.—Agreed to with the same changes as mentioned in the answer to question no. 1.

Question 3.—(a) An enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council approved of.

(b) At least one member of the Imperial Legislative Council to be elected by the High Court or Chief Court Bar Association of each Province.

(c) Paragraph 4 agreed to.

(d) Paragraph 5, election by the land-holders in the Provincial Councils agreed to in preference of nomination. The nominee should have educational and public experience qualifications.

(e) The electorate should be, in case of Muhammadan members in addition to clauses (a), (b), and (c) in paragraph 18 of the letter of Government of India, the following as clause (d):—

"Important Provincial Muhammadan Associations."

Question 4.—(a) Paragraph 7 agreed to.

(b) There should be 12 elected non-official members of the Punjab Legislative Council, viz., 2 members from each division, these seats to be equally filled up by Hindus and Muhammadans, 3 extra seats to be filled up by elected or nominated members from the other minorities in classes.

(c) The local municipal and district boards along with other local important bodies and persons should unitedly form the electorate of each district, and the gentlemen of each division thus elected may elect from amongst themselves 2 members for the Legislative Council as mentioned above in paragraph (b).

Question 5.—(a) The discussion on the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be altered, as in paragraph 23, under separate headings.

(b) Answer to paragraph 14 is the same as above.

(c) The right of interpellation in the Punjab Legislative Council should be given to the members.

KISHORILAL, Pleader, Secretary. AMIR ALI, District Judge.

Dated Gujrat, the 23rd October 1907.

No. 500-G., dated 27th November 1907.

From—P. D. AGNEW, Esq., I.C.S., Deputy Commissioner, Rawalpindi Division,

To—The Commissioner, Rawalpindi Division.

With reference to your no. 2517, dated the 3rd October 1907, I have the honour to report that I have consulted in these questions the following, viz.:—

1. Baba Gurbakhsh Singh Bedi, of Kallar.
2. Mr. Dhanjibhoy, C.I.E.
3. Khan Bahadur Adamji Mamooji.
4. The members of the municipal committee, Rawalpindi.

The opinions of the first three I shall quote in the proper place. The municipal committee has merely expressed general approval of the Government of India's proposals, and I have been unable to get any definite opinion as to the questions framed by the Punjab Government from the members of the sub-committee appointed to consider the papers. These members included Malak Mohan Singh, a large contractor and house-owner, who is now vice-president of the committee, Diwan Bahadur Daulat Rai, who is a pleader in large practice here, Sardar Bahadur Buta Singh, who is well known to you, and a pleader's Munshi named Karam Ellahi.

I regret that there is no large land-owner in the district capable of appreciating the proposals or of expressing an opinion of any value.

To take the questions in order—

II. (1) I think the Imperial Advisory Council would be a useful institution. Those constituted are of the same opinion and have no suggestions to offer. I would suggest, however, "magnates" other than "territorial" might be eligible for appointment. After all, in these modern days, there is an aristocracy of wealth in India, as elsewhere, and many of the most difficult problems of the day concern commerce and industry. Apart from this a well-known spiritual adviser in one of the great religions of India or a respected political or social leader such as the late Sir Sayad Ahmad Khan might often be a counsellor of value to the Government of India.

(2) I and those consulted agree cordially in the advisability of establishing the Provincial Advisory Council, and think the number suggested, viz., 20, is suitable.

(3) As regards the third question I submit copy of the joint opinion of Messrs. Dhanjibhoy and Adamji, also that of Baba Gurbakhsh Singh.

I agree that the Imperial Legislative Council should be enlarged as proposed.

I am inclined to agree with the suggestion that the official element might be reduced with advantage. I think 2 memberships might be taken from class "B" and put into class "D" (c). I also think that the election of 2 special Muhammadan members, class "D" (d), is a mistake. The electorate will be excessively difficult to form, and after all, if it is necessary to give class representation, a step in itself opposed to liberal principles and only necessitated by the peculiar circumstances of this Eastern country, it is surely better to nominate such members frankly. To give disproportionate electoral power is likely to create a feeling of dissatisfaction in the minds of other creeds; less odium attaches, I think, to nomination by the Government. I would therefore transfer class "D" (d) to class "E." As regards the reduction of the official majority, there is, I think, no conceivable question on which a majority of elected and nominated members might combine to override the official vote in which it might not be fairly presumed that the latter were in the wrong, or at any rate that their vote was being cast for a universally unpopular measure.

(4) I answer this question in the affirmative.

(5) In connection with this subject I quote below the opinion of Baba Gurbakhsh Singh and of Messrs. Adamji and Dhanjibhoy (paragraph 5):—

(i) "In my opinion the chief land proprietors of the Province should have a right to elect a member in the Imperial Legislative Council. This election should be as suggested in paragraph 14 (1) of the Government of India letter quoted above. The alternative method suggested in the same letter would not be right as the number of the land-owners in the Provincial Legislative Council would not be enough to afford a chance of their electing one from among themselves."

"For this election there are 52 such land proprietors paying revenue over Rs. 5,000 (Punjab Government letter, paragraph 5, last part)."

"If the number of the voters were raised to 100, which should at least be the minimum, the limit of Rs. 5,000 revenue will have to be reduced. In my opinion therefore the limit of revenue should be lowered, that the number of the voters may be 100."

(ii) Paragraph 5.—"Yes, it would add to the dignity of our great land-owners in the Province, and will also enable the Government to secure the opinion and advice of such gentlemen, and we respectfully suggest the method no. II in paragraph 15 would be most suitable."

I think that the limit qualifying for membership might be reduced to Rs. 3,000. It would be easy to frame a list of land-owners paying revenue of Rs. 3,000 or over. These might be asked to give in their votes to their Commissioner in person; any 5 land-holders paying Rs. 3,000 or over might nominate any other such land-holder in a given division: a list of the names so received would be sent to each Deputy Commissioner and each voter be asked by letter to record his vote in presence of the Deputy Commissioner of his district.

(6) I have already answered this question in (3) above. I am against the election of Muhammadan members.

If, however, there are to be two elected Muhammadan members I can think of no better electorate than that suggested in paragraph 18 of the Government of India letter. The amount of land revenue might be Rs. 10,000 and the members of class (c) be allowed half the voting power, as compared with one-fourth each to be allotted to classes (a) and (b).

(7) The opinions of Baba Gurbakhsh Singh and Messrs. Adamji and Dhanjibhoy on this question may be perused.

If an official majority is to be maintained the only officials of sufficient rank available for addition would seem to be the 5 Commissioners of divisions. Apart from the President and Secretary the present Provincial Legislative Council consists of 3 official and 3 non-official members. If 5 Commissioners were added this would allow of the appointment of 6 non-official members in all, and still leave a margin on the side of the Government sufficient to allow of the occasional absence of official members. The 3 official seats might be filled by nomination, as at present, and the 5 Commissioners would be ex-officio members; with this official majority there seems to be no reason why the remaining 6 seats should not be filled by election.

(9) I would distribute the seats as follows:—

1. One to be elected by the Senate of the University.

2. Two to be elected by municipalities, each to have a vote for each member, but the vote to count according to population. The population of the smallest municipal committee in even thousands might be taken as the unit, and the votes of those larger to be multiplied in proportion to the number of thousands of inhabitants.

3. Two to be elected by district boards.

For the present I would allow the constitution of the district boards to remain as at present. The interests of different classes and religions are already regarded in nominating to memberships of the boards. In the Punjab any attempt at open election to memberships of the district boards might lead to faction feeling. For instance, suppose we were to say that a given zail or group of zails might elect a member. The electorate would probably consist of village headmen, land-owners paying over a certain amount of revenue and income-tax payers. If any one set up a candidate in opposition to the local zaildar or jagirdar factions would be formed and intrigues set on foot which would result in the usual train of quarrelling either in the courts or in the open. Moreover, the practical difficulties of conducting such elections would be very great.

As the members of the boards in Musalman districts consist chiefly of Musalmans I do not think that the Muhammadan element would, on the whole, be overlooked.

4. One seat to be reserved for a Muhammadan. All Muhammadan land-holders paying Rs. 500 a year or upwards; all Muhammadan payers of income-tax, and all registered Muhammadan graduates of an Indian University to have the right to vote.

(10) As regards the subjects noted in V (13), (14), and (15), I am not competent to express an opinion; such matters are for decision on broad grounds of policy. The privilege of interpellation seems, so far as I can learn, to be one valued by educated Indian opinion and it is certainly a good method of bringing local grievances to the notice of Government.

P. D. AGNEW,

Deputy Commissioner, Rawalpindi.

Opinion by Baba Gurbakhsh Singh, of Kallar, dated 9th November 1907.

I have carefully gone through the papers. I have not had sufficient time to satisfactorily go through this important matter, and consequently beg briefly to reply the questions therein asked as follows:—

(1) I think the Imperial Advisory Council as proposed would prove very useful to the country. But I would point out that (though I am a land-owner myself) that it would be better if raises other than jagirdars and proprietors of land as well were included, so that the Government may have a chance of consulting every class of community. If the council were therefore limited to land-holders only it is just quite possible that the Government may not have disinterested opinion. Election would not at all be necessary. His Excellency the Viceroy may himself nominate fit persons.

(2) The Provincial Advisory Council would also be beneficial. It appears from the Government of India letter that all classes of persons could be nominated for it. There seems no reason why the same should not be done with regard to the Imperial Advisory Council.

(3) I like the increase in the number of the members of the Imperial Legislative Council and generally approve of the proposals contained in the Government of India letter. But I wish simply to say something on one or two points.

In my opinion it would not be improper if for the council (i.e., Imperial Legislative Council) two members at least were selected from the Imperial Advisory Council.

Though it has not been considered advisable to give the Imperial Advisory Council the status of a legal body (assembly), it would not be proper if no member of it were taken in the Imperial Legislative Council.

Some cases may probably rise where the draft bill of any particular law be prepared by the Imperial Advisory Council. But under the Government of India letter the Imperial Advisory Council or its members will have no right (in their capacity of the members of that council) to take part in any discussion with regard to that bill or express any opinion thereon. I have not got sufficient time to give an opinion in detail about the rules contained in the Government of India letter with regard to selection of members from each class and creed. I think it, however, necessary to point out that extending the system of selection so far as to cover each class and creed would be extremely difficult and dangerous. There would be no end to this chain, as there is an unlimited number of religions and communities in India. In my opinion endeavours should be made to unite the opinions of various classes. The system of selection should not be based on religions and communities but on ability alone. If it be found that any religion or community is not sufficiently represented in the council, the Government can reserve to it the right of filling certain offices by nomination.

(4) Yes, I agree in the proposal that one member of the Imperial Legislative Council be elected from among the Provincial Legislative Council.

(5) In my opinion the chief land proprietors of this Province should have a right to elect a member in the Imperial Legislative Council. This election should be as suggested in paragraph 14 (1) of the Government of India letter quoted above. The alternative method suggested in the same letter should not be right, as the number of the land-owners in the Provincial Legislative Council would not be enough to afford a chance of their electing one from among themselves.

For this election there are 52 such land proprietors paying revenue over Rs. 5,000 (Punjab Government letter, paragraph 5, last part).

If the number of the voters were raised to 100, which should at least be the minimum, the limit of Rs. 5,000 revenue will have to be reduced. In my opinion, therefore, the limit of revenue should be lowered, that the number of the voters may be 100.

(6) I think no favour should be shown to the Muhammadans. In the first place, as I have said above, the question of class or creed should not enter in election; secondly, if any special favour were shown to the Muhammadans, the other communities who, also like Muhammadans, are less in the number would raise a cry that they also may be similarly treated; thirdly, by this special favour the Muhammadans will think that they are particularly under protection of the Government and have prior claims to other communities. It may also create a corresponding thought in the minds of the other classes that the Government does not favour them, and that their rights have been overlooked. The ignorant people may use these thoughts as a means of spreading dissatisfaction and enmity among different classes of community. In my opinion, therefore, instead of particularly nominating the Muhammadans, the Government should reserve to it the right of filling a certain number of offices under section "E," paragraph 12, of the Government of India letter. I may also mention that if this favour were shown to the Muhammadans it would in some instances be found that in the Imperial Legislative Council the number of the Muhammadans would be equal to that of all the other communities. Another difficulty may arise, viz., that in the Punjab where the number of the Muhammadans is greater a similar favour will have to be extended to the Hindus and the Sikhs, as otherwise under the proposals in the Government of India letter there would be a very little chance of any Hindu or Sikh being elected. There would be only one way of nominating Hindus or Sikhs from the Punjab, and under section E, paragraph 12, of the Government of India letter where out of the four offices 2 were given to the Muhammadans and the remaining 2 reserved for other classes, it is just quite possible that out of those two also none may fall to the Punjab.

(7) I do not see any reason why in the Punjab like the United Provinces the number of the members of the Provincial Legislative Council be not increased. I think the number should be raised to 25, including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor. Out of these 14 should be officers appointed by the Government; one should be a chief of some State nominated by the Government; one should be taken from the Senate of the University; and one from each of the five divisions; the remaining 3 should be reserved to the local Government who would fill these posts (by nomination) from his Province with due regard to ability, &c.

(8) I think with the exception of one man who should be selected by the Senate, the remaining members should be nominated by the Government.

(9) The number of the non-official members in the Punjab with regard to class and creed should be as follows:—

1 Christian, 4 Muhammadans, 2 Hindus, and 2 Sikhs.

(10) It is not necessary to answer this question as I am not in favour of election.

(11) As in no. 10 above.

(12) I think there is no need for any special favour for the Muhammadans in this Province, because, as I have said above in no. 9, the number of the Muhammadans here is equal to that of the Hindus and Sikhs.

(13) I think the mode of discussing the Budget should, in accordance with paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter, be changed.

(14) I am of opinion that discussion should be held on the Budget in the Provincial Council as well, and that the mode of discussing should be that which is now proposed with regard to the Imperial Legislative Council, as the old system has been found defective as appears from the Government of India letter.

(15) In my opinion it is essential that the members should have a right of asking questions; as such questions and answers give the subjects the chance of putting their grievance before the Government and thereby the Government also gets an opportunity of explaining its subject.

The 9th November 1907. GURBAKHSH SINGH, OF KALLAR.

Answers to the questions on which opinions are desired in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th August 1907.

(1) Yes, it is needed and will be of great service to the country; the suggestion in paragraph 5 are well thought out, and at present does not appear to require any modification or improvement.

(2) Provincial Advisory Council will be a most useful institution, and in fact as important as Imperial Advisory Council; as to the modification time alone will develop the circumstances if so required, at present the duties in brief expected from the members are quite sufficient to give encouragement to the high class natives to join.

(3) The enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council is at the present moment of the utmost importance, and the suggestion that is put forward in paragraph 12 is commendable, it gives right and secures the privileges of all classes. But your committee would most respectfully suggest that the member in the tables "A" and "B" may be reconsidered as out of 53 members it gives 28 nominations for the Government officials. A slight reduction in the Government voting power is respectfully suggested.

(4) The suggestion in paragraph 13 is wise as it gives each province a right of having its own representative on the Advisory Council, and it will at once do away with a number of petty questions and answers required to them.

(5) Yes, it would add to the dignity of our great land-owners in the Province, and will also enable the Government to secure the opinion and advice of such gentlemen; and we respectfully suggest the method no. II in paragraph 15 would be most suitable.

(6) Yes, we recommend the appointment of the Muhammadans to the Imperial Council by the same method as suggested in the preceding paragraph.

(7) Yes, it would be better if His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor had few additional members on his Legislative Council, and if three nominated members are added it will always give the Government the majority of 7 to 6.

(8) It would be better if the present system of the nomination of the members was allowed to continue on the Provincial Legislative Council for a few years longer. (Reasons are many and cannot be recorded in a public document like this).

(9) In the event of majority of the people reporting in favour of the system of election we then suggest that only one-fourth of the seats be filled by the elected representative.

(10) Election of unofficial members had better be through the municipality than the district board and the election may be without distinction of caste and creed, otherwise it will cause endless trouble to the authorities; and mischief will be carried out by wire-pullers to any extent.

(11) Time has not arrived in Punjab for the election of "class representation," and though it has been a success in some other provinces your committee fear that it will not be so in Punjab for few years to come.

(12) In this particular instance a separate representation of the Muhammadans would be invidious and may lead to the issue of unpleasant questions, but if the majority of the Muhammadans wishes then there is no better course open to Government than to constitute a special Muhammadan electorate as defined in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter.

(13) Yes, it would be better that the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council was altered as recommended or suggested in paragraph 23 of the Imperial Government's letter as many side issues are brought in at the time of Budget discussion instead of the purely financial question.

(14) Yes, it is to the interest of the province if the Budget was discussed in brief as suggested above.

(15) Yes, your committee would respectfully advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members.

OPINION.

Preliminary remarks.

Before replying the various questions asked by the Punjab Government, a brief history of the political condition of India at various epochs will throw light on the constitutional advancement that India has made under the British Government. Of all the oriental countries India is perhaps the most heterogeneous, conservative, and orthodox. Before the Muhammadan invasion India was almost entirely inhabited by the people who professed Hinduism. But Hinduism in itself was divided and subdivided into so many creeds and sects that one was totally different from the other. The difference in religious belief was, however, not the only cause of the weakness of Hindu India. According to the Hindu theology the followers of that religion were divided in four principal sections. Both from the point of view of religion and political condition, Brahmans, Khatris, Vesh, and Shudras occupy distinctive positions in the religious and political institutions. Brahmans or the priestly class were the religious guides, advisers, and propounders of the doctrines of faith and holy books to the general populace. Their advice and instructions had even to be sought by the ruling classes in all secular and administrative matters. Thus it was that knowledge and learning was the peculiar monopoly of the Brahmans, while the Khatris attended to the duties of the rulers and soldiers, Vesh followed agriculture and commerce, and Shudras occupied the position of menials and serfs. Though the ruling power was invariably vested in the Khatris, the influence of the learned and religious class, viz., that of Brahmans, was the guiding factor in all administrative matters. The Vesh and the Shudras were even more markedly dependent on the good wishes of the Brahmans for support and maintenance. The domination of the literate class over the other classes, however, did not prove an entire success. Schism due to rivalry between various religious leaders began to be felt and eventually divided India into hostile parties and separate rival kingdoms. Internecine warfare followed and resulted in the eventual invasion of India by the Muhammadan king of Ghazni. The Ghazni Dynasty was followed by other Muhammadan dynasties. The Mughals were the last, the most long stayed, the most advanced, and the most liberal of all the Muhammadan rulers in India. The name of Akbar for his toleration and wisdom, that of Shah Jahan for his grandeur and the magnificence of his buildings, that of Aurangzeb for his religious zeal, and the extent of his empire are even now remembered in India. But though Akbar was tolerant and understood the needs of his empire, his rule was not marked by that advancement of learning among the Hindus as to render them fit associate with Muhammadan rulers in matters of administration as largely as their numbers demanded. No doubt the example of Raja Todar Mall, the greatest financier of India, of Birbal, the witty and accomplished courtier, and of Raja Man Singh, the celebrated general, could be quoted to show Hindu influence in Akbar's court. The dominance of Muhammadan office-holders in all parts of the country was, however, a bar to the employment of a large number of Hindu officials. The only posts that were invariably held by the followers of that religion were infinitesimal and unimportant. There was, however, no discontent in the country and the empire flourished. But in the reign of Aurangzeb owing to his religious zeal and want of toleration the Hindus, who were the most numerous, became discontented and tried to throw off his yoke. Aurangzeb was succeeded by incompetent successors, and the touch of tyranny that was applied to the masses eventually culminated in a huge conflagration of revolt by the Mahrattas and the Sikhs. This led to the Mughal emperors of Delhi being reduced to mere shadows and to their being divested of all authority. Before, however, the absolute annihilation of the Muhammadan rule could be accomplished European nations established themselves in India and took part in the inter-tribal quarrels. The superiority of the British proved itself fit to establish a world-wide sway and the total subjugation of India. The British were totally different from Indians in enlightenment, civilization, education, and even toleration, and they by degrees began to throw open the doors of free learning, both Oriental and Occidental, to the huge masses of India without distinction of caste, creed, and colour. By degrees the benefits of education were comprehended by the people of this country, but various causes contributed to benefit only those whose profession directed their attention to it, or who by natural impulse or inferiority of position took advantage of the educational facilities that were given by the Government. This produced a class of educated Indians that had no aptitude for being entrusted with administrative positions of responsibility. But the Government of the country was never desired by the British to be carried on by them single-handed and to the exclusion of the people of this country. A large number of appointments was thrown open to Indians, who were gradually associated in matters of administration with the ruling class. This by-and-by gave the Indians acquaintance with the system of Government in England, and some ambitious but short-sighted persons began to demand constitutional Government. I am, however, constrained to remark that, with due reference to the opinions of some highly educated and accomplished individuals, representative system of government is absolutely unsuitable to this country. As shown above various classes with conflicting interests, position, religion, and social system inhabit India, and their aspirations in almost all matters are divergent. Can it be believed for a moment that by election only those administrators could be selected who could be styled the real representatives of all classes? I do not think that any serious thinking persons could seriously advocate the elective system in face of so many diversities. But I have no hesitation in saying that the genuine aspirations of the people should have due weight on the attention of Government. The Government of India letter, dated 24th August 1907, embodies the account of advancement that has been made from time to time in meeting the legitimate wishes of the people with regard to the system of administration and the association of Indians with Government as well as what is now intended to be done. With this preamble as regards the condition of India at various epochs I now give my reply to the various questions.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Councils.—The Government of India is carried on on a unique system. It is responsible for the safety of India and for the peace and contentment of its subjects. The laws framed are based partly on European principles, which are foreign to this country, and partly on religious customs as well as equity and good conscience. The administration is mainly carried on by a class of officers who with but few exceptions have little time to acquire a thorough knowledge of the inner tendencies, peculiarities and characteristics of the population and of their aspirations, ambitions, and requirements. These conditions have been productive of some inconvenience to the officers of State in carrying on the administration smoothly and also of discontent among some classes. It is therefore a matter of great importance that Government should be in a position to know through the agency of the real leaders of the various communities the real needs and requirements of the people and have a knowledge of their aspirations and complaints. This could be done only by the Government associating with themselves the leaders of the people. I therefore strongly support the proposal regarding the formation of Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils.

It is a matter of common knowledge that Government measures, however beneficial, are very often criticized and adversely commented upon by newspapers and others, simply because they emanate from Government without their being supported by the leaders of the people. This of course could not formerly be done owing to the absence of any method by which the opinion of such leaders of the various communities to those measures could be obtained. It is to my mind a great constitutional and beneficial step that the Government has recognised the need for the formation of these Advisory Councils. They could be of use in giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters. Hitherto the only Indians who could officially communicate with Government were the native members of the Legislative Councils. But it is admitted that these councils do not fulfil the requirements expected from the Advisory Councils owing to their too infrequent meetings which cannot offer the means of confidential and intimate consultation between Government and its subjects. They will also afford provision for representing the landed aristocracy of India and the great body of moderate men. Besides, as pointed out by the Government of India "the needs and sentiments of the masses of the people must find expression through those (whether officials or non-officials) who are acquainted with their daily life and are qualified to speak with authority on their behalf."

It must, however, be borne in mind that unless effort is made to select the real leaders of the people with requisite qualification to be able to give a sound advice about matters referred to them the object with which these councils are formed would not be attained. I have, however, nothing to say as to the method of selection of members for these councils. The Government, I am sure, will be able to select men to sit on the Imperial Advisory Council who really possess the qualifications and attainments expected of them. I, however, humbly suggest that the 60 members proposed to be nominated for this council may be selected as follows:

1. There is no objection to the introduction of official element in this council, but this element should be confined to Indians only who should not belong to the executive department because this council is to act as the adviser of the executive. This body is to be composed of 60 members of which 7 only may be Indian officials, viz., 1 from each province.

2. The other 53 nominations may consist of the following:—

Indian Chiefs	20
Big land-owners, 2 from each province	14
Leaders of orthodox Hindus	5
Leaders of orthodox Muhammadans	5
Moderate and loyal Indian editors	2
Loyal members of legal profession	2
Traders and persons representing commercial interests	3
Un-official Europeans	2

Twenty-five out of these 60 members should be Muhammadans.

3. The terms of office as proposed should be 5 years, as there could be no bar to the re-election of members.

4. The meetings in general may be public, but in special cases the proceedings of the Council may be considered confidential.

5. It is not necessary to make it a rule that Government is bound to consult this council in all matters, but it may be of use to consult the council in the following matters:—

(a) In the matters relating to primary education;

(b) In measures for preventing plague;

(c) In matters for removing famine;

(d) In sanitary matters;

(e) In matters relating to the protection of endowed property;

(f) In matters relating to district boards and municipal committees;

(g) In matters relating to religious disputes; and

(h) In matters of controversial legislation.

II. Provincial Advisory Council.—The reasons given above about the formation of an Imperial Advisory Council apply with even greater force to the constitution of Advisory Provincial Councils. The Government of India shapes the policy of the country, but seldom interferes in internal provincial administration. It is therefore a matter of great importance that the head of a Provincial Government may associate with himself for consultation on all important administrative matters, members of high families, great landlords, representatives of commerce and industry, both Europeans and Indians, religious guides, and heads of well known shrines. Without such advice Government cannot always be in a position to know the real feelings of the masses about administrative or legal measures that may be desired to be undertaken. I am therefore strongly in favour of the constitution of Provincial Advisory Councils.

The Punjab Government proposes that the Provincial Advisory Council may consist of 20 members. I, however, beg to suggest that if the number is fixed at 25 it will afford a fair representation on the council of the various classes residing in this Province. On this assumption I give below the number of members for the Provincial Advisory Council to represent the various classes:—

Land-holders	7
Loyal members of legal profession	2
Representatives of trade and commerce	2
Representatives of Anjumans and associations having a representative character	2
Religious leaders of orthodox Hindus	2
Religious leaders of orthodox Muhammadans	2
Spiritual leader of Sikhs	1
Un-official European	1
Hindustani officials	2

The Government of India suggests that the deliberations of the Advisory Councils should be informal and confidential and not public. I beg to say that if this is strictly adhered to the object for which these councils are formed would be to a certain extent defeated. My reason for advocating the establishment of these councils is this, that Government will be in a position after consulting them or certain members of them to know the real opinion and needs of the public, and measures adopted for meeting the needs of the public could be based to some extent on the advice of the leaders of the public. Now if the councils are confidentially consulted the public will have no means of knowing to what extent the measures inaugurated by Government have been supported by the advisers of Government. It will therefore be beneficial if the Advisory Councils are convened regularly at various intervals and their meetings and deliberations are as regards ordinary matters of administration held public. Of course in important controversial matters or on other matters about which privacy is considered desirable the meetings may be held privately.

III. Divisional and District Advisory Council.—I beg permission to suggest that as the Commissioners and Deputy Commissioners are principally responsible for the peace and prosperity of their charge and also come directly in touch with the public and carry out all administrative measures it is highly important that they should have advisers in all matters of importance. This suggestion is made after realization of the circumstances under which and the methods with which the administration is carried out. Though the executive officers of Government very often consult persons of status in certain matters of administration, yet without a recognised advisory body whose advice may be available, it cannot be said that the informal mode of consultation hitherto adopted has often been productive of the desired results. It is also conceivable that some officers may not consider any such consultation with local gentlemen desirable or advantageous, and officers newly posted to divisions and districts may not sometimes know gentlemen of probity and integrity who could be consulted with advantage. It would therefore be of great benefit if a limited number of native gentlemen in each district are selected by district officers and on his recommendation nominated by local Government for membership of the divisional and district advisory boards. The services of these will be available also to the Commissioner for consultation in matters of importance and also in times of emergency, and I am confident that the repose of confidence with reference to administrative matters in them will be fully appreciated both by the public and the men selected. It is, I think, clear that Government desires the association with themselves and their officers of all representative men of position and integrity in certain contingencies in administrative matters, and if a scheme on the above lines is evolved it will afford opportunities for free expression of opinion by the representatives of the public. Without any such arrangement very often the services of representative men are lost both to the country and to Government, and they spend their life in despondency and even discontent. Besides the training of such men might prove of use on their being elevated to higher advisory boards where they will give their opinions after undergoing a training. No doubt the services of the members of the district boards and municipal committees are available to the executive officers in this direction, but whereas in these boards all members do not occupy high and independent position and are often men of low status the members of the advisory boards would be men of high position and attainment and real leaders of the public in the district whose advice could safely be trusted and followed.

III. (3) Enlargement of the Legislative Councils.—I fully approve of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council to the extent proposed by the Government of India letter. As shown in paragraph X of the Government of India letter it is essential that the Government should always be able to reckon on a numerical majority, and that this majority should be strong enough to be independent of the minor fluctuations that may be caused by the occasional absence of an official member even when the Legislative Councils are enlarged. The recognition of the facts that Government must have paramount power in India does not admit of the legitimacy of the official majority in councils being questioned. No reasonable man can dispute or question the correctness of this view. It is now to be considered in what form and numbers members to the Imperial Legislative Council may be elected or nominated with due regard to the representation on that council of the principal classes and communities inhabiting this empire.

Paragraph LX of the Government of India letter shows that hitherto elections to Legislative Council of the Governor-General generally resulted in the virtual monopoly of the power exercised in these councils by the members of the legal profession and schoolmasters, while land-holders and merchant classes seldom secure seats proportionate to their numbers and influence. As shown in the preliminary remarks above the population of this empire is so diverse and heterogeneous, and represents so many different and conflicting elements, that it cannot for a moment be urged that reperesentation on the council of one class to the exclusion of other classes can make no difference to the classes that do not secure representation. The condition of the public in this country is not on a par with that of European countries. However one may be inclined to shut one's eyes to the defects of the class system existing in this country, it cannot be truly denied that the interests of the various classes in this country are not identical. On the other hand, it is obvious that the representatives of each class make efforts to safeguard and serve the interests of that class only even though in so doing they may injure the interests of other classes. Examples are not rare in proof of this assertion, but it is not necessary to quote them here. It is also practically conceded that the majority of elections in the Imperial Legislative Council since the introduction of elective system was mainly confined to only one class. This could not have been the intention of Government, and could not be said to have equally served the interests of various classes. It is therefore absolutely necessary that on the Imperial Legislative Council all classes of Indian communities should have fair representation.

The scheme sketched out on paragraph XII of the Government of India letter appears to be quite suitable, and I do not propose any modification to it.

(4) I fully approve of the proposal that one member of the Imperial Legislative Council should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council.

(5) I approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners of this Province to the Imperial Legislative Council. As to the method of selection I am not inclined to say that the land-holding classes even those occupying high position are fit for or will appreciate the responsibility of electing a member as to the Legislative Council, and the only course which I advocate for adoption is that of nomination by the local Government. It cannot be said at this juncture that the number of members representing land-holding communities in the Provincial Legislature will be large enough to be entrusted with the responsibility of electing a member for the Imperial Legislative Council. As regards creating an electorate on the basis of the amount of revenue payable by each elector, the suggestion is open to the strong objection, that the most suitable person representing the land-holding classes might not possess the requisite qualification for election. The other alternative method as regards qualification for election and vote so far as this Province is concerned is to constitute an electorate to the Provincial Darbaris. But even that method is open to the objection that the number of Provincial Darbaris may not be in conformity with the number, position, and influence of the various classes residing in this Province and thus a member elected by the Provincial Darbaris might not possess the requisite qualification of being regarded as the representative land-holder in the Province. I therefore strongly urge that as Government can select the best man, it should nominate a representative of the great land-holding class in the Punjab to the Imperial Legislative Council.

(6) The reasons set forth in paragraph 16 of the Government of India letter clearly demonstrate the necessity for setting apart 4 seats on the Imperial Legislative Council for Muhammadans, and I entirely agree with those reasons. Muhammadans up to now, I regret to note, have received inadequate representation on the Imperial Legislative Council, not because the community did not possess representative men who were in every respect qualified to sit on the council, but because the system of election was so defective that it mainly enabled one class only to elect members to the council. It was therefore not possible for Muhammadans to secure adequate representation on the councils. The virtual exclusion of Muhammadans from representation furnishes the strongest proof in support of the assertion that the interests of various communities inhabiting this country are not identical, and that the so-called leaders who profess to shape the policy of the Indians for the benefit of India are only aiming at benefiting their own community. Unless a class or community is adequately represented on the councils the needs of that community cannot be expected to be attended to and safeguarded with regard to any measures that may be introduced in the councils. There is no doubt that the number of Hindus, as a whole body inhabiting India, is larger than that of Muhammadans, but as shown in the preliminary remarks of this note the Hindus among themselves are so divided into classes, sects, and creeds that each sect and class forms a separate body and represents divergent interests. Perhaps the division of Muhammadans into three principal classes by virtue of a slight difference of belief may be pointed to as showing that even the Muhammadans are not a single entity. But I think this is not correct. The Muhammadans whether they be Sunnis, Shias, or Mowahids all believe in one God and one prophet and intermarry among themselves while the Hindus though professing Hinduism believe in and worship different deities. Marriages also only take place among particular communities and not outside them. Even eating and drinking as well as social intercourse among different sects is not allowed. It is, therefore, clear that whereas the Muhammadans in India are a distinct political body the Hindus are not so, and it behoves the rulers to recognize this fact and safeguard the interest of this community by separate and fixed representation on the Imperial Legislative Council.

For the Imperial Legislative Council I approve of the nomination of two members by the Viceroy and of two being elected by the Muhammadan members of each province by rotation as suggested by the Government of India. If it be considered that this proposal is open to the objection that the number of electors will be small the Government may form an electorate of Muhammadans consisting of Provincial Darbaris and of Fellows of the Provincial University for the election of a Muhammadan member to the Viceroy's Council.

Sub-clause (c) in paragraph XVIII of Government of India's letter cannot meet the requirements of the case as the qualification of large income-tax payers and even revenue payers may not be of the required standard.

IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council.—I advocate the increase in the number of members of Provincial Legislative Council of Punjab to 19 to be composed of as follows:—

Official members including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor	11
Muhammadans	4
Hindus	2
Sikhs	1
Unofficial European	1

The population of Muhammadans in this Province is larger than both Hindus and Sikhs combined, and it is only fair that their numerical strength on the council should be proportionate to their numbers. The official majority is of course essential, and should be safeguarded.

(8) I think that some seats in the Provincial Legislative Council should be filled by election, and others reserved to be filled by nomination by the local Government. I will fix the number of the seats to be filled by election to five and the remaining three to be filled by nomination in the following proportions:—

Election.

Muhammadans	3
Hindu	1
Sikh	1

Nomination.

Muhammadan	1
Hindu	1
Christian and Sikh	1

As to the creation of an electorate the members of each community on the Provincial and Divisional Darbar lists, the Fellows of Universities, the Chamber of Commerce should be formed into an electorate for electing their representatives on the Provincial Legislative Council.

(9), (10), and (11) I do not think that municipal and district boards could safely be entrusted with the power of electing members to the Legislative Council. The members of different boards, and in fact on each board, do not occupy the same position and do not possess that qualification that could be expected to enable them to give a suitable vote on occasions of elections to councils. Besides in certain districts and towns there are influential and talented men who may or may not sit in these boards, while in others such persons are either non-existent or are very few. It will therefore be unfair to give equal power of voting to all members of municipal and district boards for purposes of these elections.

(12) This question has been replied under question 11.

Memo. of opinion on the proposals contained in the Government of India letter no. 2310-2317, dated 24*th August* 1907, by D. J. Boyd, Esq., late Deputy Commissioner, dated 25*th November* 1907.

A.—I have consulted the various political and religious societies of Multan, the Bar, and several of the more prominent land-owners and merchants on the subjects discussed in the letter of the Government of India. On the whole the interest taken in the matter is not quite what might have been hoped for. Several persons to whom the proposals were submitted for opinion have not favoured me with a reply, and I have been given to understand that the replies of at least one of the bodies consulted was the work of one member only and he was a pleader.

B.—With regard to the questions appended to the letter of the Punjab Government I have the honour to submit the following reply:—

I. All those consulted have agreed that an Advisory Council will be of great service to the country and I fully agree myself. It may seem superfluous to constitute a council which shall have no powers especially when Government already consults persons of the same status as the proposed Imperial Councillors. But it may be necessary at some distant date to have an assembly that shall form a check on legislative bodies constituted on a more popular basis than is at present dreamed of and if only for this reason the new Advisory Council appears to me a step in the direction. It should also go some way to remove any ground that may exist for the reproach of parochialism and narrow-mindedness level at the bureaucratic Government of India by one of its former heads. There are the further advantages of rendering the Government more popular and acceptable to the people, of providing a convenient means of making known the views of Government and the principles of its policy and of furthering the movement in the direction of unity.

With regard to the proposals contained in paragraph 5 of the letter of the Government of India several bodies and persons among those consulted would make the council an elected assembly, and most propose that it should contain representatives of the commercial and educated interests and of the legal profession. The council should certainly not be elected, but I think that it would be a mistake to confine the membership to territorial magnates. It is true that commercial interests are fully voiced through the various Chambers of Commerce, but an argument of this nature would apply with equal force in the case of the landed aristocracy who are in almost daily communication with Government or its officials. The number of members of the commercial classes called to the council need not bear a large proportion to the whole, but to exclude them altogether would, I think, be a great mistake. Their inclusion would not necessitate the representation of the professions and Universities, but I think that such representation is not inadvisable by any means. The wider the range of opinion that Government has at its disposal the better will be the chance of reaching a sound conclusion. I have no amendments to propose with regard to the remaining suggestion in paragraph 5 of the letter of the Government of India. Those consulted generally protest against the provision that the deliberations of the council when called together should be private and confidential, as they fear that the members will in such case be inclined to acquiesce in Government proposals too easily. I do not think that the fear is well founded and the advantage of getting an honest opinion, which is not meant merely for the benefit of the gods, far outweighs this objection.

II. (2) With regard to the Provincial Advisory Council I would not alter the proposals of the Imperial and Provincial Governments in any way. The Arya Samaj suggests that the Provincial Advisory Council be elected or else that Advisory Councils be elected for each district or division and the members of the Provincial Advisory Council selected from these bodies. The proposal of the Bar is similar to this. The Singh Sabha favour a combination of election and nomination. The establishment of Divisional Councils would, I think, introduce an unnecessary complication into the administration and district boards as at present constituted appear the fittest councils for Punjab district.

III. (3) The proposal to enlarge the Imperial Legislative Council has met with universal approval. I would not suggest any modifications in the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter.

(4) Yes.

(5) I approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners of the province to the Imperial Legislative Council, and think that he should be elected by the land-owning members of the Provincial body from among the land-owners of the province who pay over Rs. 2,500 land revenue.

(6) Hindus generally object strongly to the proposal to appoint four Muhammadans to the Imperial Legislative Council. In municipal committees it has sometimes been found necessary to fix a definite proportion between the Hindu and Muhammadan members. Since experience has shown that under ordinary systems of election the Muhammadan community does not get a fair representation, it seems to me best to reserve a certain number of seats in the Imperial Legislative Council for Musalmans.

But to give Muhammadans the right of electing two members when no other class enjoys any right of election seems to me unwise, as it is certain to rouse bitter ill-feeling and undo most of the good that the new liberal policy is calculated to effect. The object aimed at would be effected equally well by adding the two seats which it is proposed to reserve for election by Musalmans to the number at the disposal of the Viceroy. This would raise the number of seats to be filled by nomination to six, and it should be provided in the new constitution that at least six members of the council shall be Musalmans, the deficiency in the number elected in the ordinary course being made up by nomination. It is a pity that such a provision should be necessary, but I believe it to be so, and the arrangement proposed above seems to me less invidious and less likely to provoke ill-feeling than the grant of special electoral privileges to the Muhammadan community. If the proposal contained in paragraph 12 (d) of the Government of India letter be adopted the electorate for Muhammadan members proposed by the deputation might well be tried, I think. The experiment is proposed by leading Musalmans themselves, and there is nothing objectionable in it. The difficulty of compiling a register of voters under section 18 (c) does not seem very serious. If the electorate were confined to Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Councils, they would have a disproportionate voice in the appointment of members of the Imperial Legislative Council. I would not in any way restrict the Viceroy's choice in the nomination of four members and would delete the words "not less than two to be Musalmans" in paragraph 12 E.

IV. (7) The general opinion seems to be that the Punjab Legislative Council should be increased in number to 20 or 21. The local Bar considers that, in view of the power of electing members to the Imperial Legislative Council possessed by the non-official members of the Provincial Council, the membership of the latter should be raised to 37, of whom 20 should be officials. It would be very difficult to spare so many officials from ordinary work, but it would always be possible to get 10 official members of the council besides His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor.

(8) Of the non-official members I think that 3 should be nominated and the rest elected. At least one of the seats for nominated members should be reserved for a commercial man.

(9) This question is answered below.

(10) The method of election that I would propose is one that has found favour with several of the persons consulted by me, but the Bar, Arya Samaj, Singh Sabha, deprecate any proposal to make district boards and municipal committees into electoral college, on the ground that the members are too much under official influence. The non-official members of the district boards of each division might elect one member, who need not be of their number, but should be a land-owner paying not less than Rs. 2,500 land revenue. This would secure an adequate representation of the land-owners of the province. The remaining two seats should be filled by the election of a representative possessing one of the following qualifications:—

(a) The payment of not less than Rs. 2,500 land revenue.

(b) The payment of not less than Rs. 1,000 income-tax.

(c) The fellowship of the Punjab University.

The electorate for these two seats might be the non-official members of 1st class municipal committees. This electorate has the disadvantage of excluding the members of minor municipalities who are many of them quite as intelligent as their brothers who inhabit large cities, but any other electorate would be unwieldy, and simplicity should be aimed at to start with. Election should be direct in the case of both municipal committees and district boards. It would not be necessary for all the electors to assemble in one place. Their votes could be recorded at the head-quarters of each district.

(11) I would not advocate any further representation of classes than indicated above. I do not think that any changes in the direction of special class representation are called for in the district boards of the Punjab. In a few municipal committees it may be advisable to secure adequate representation of minorities, but each case should be dealt separately as at present. The general opinion seems to be that there is no need for changes in the constitution of local bodies in this province.

(12) If the system proposed by me above be adopted there will be no necessity for any special representation of Muhammadans. The latter form the majority of the agricultural classes of the province and would probably secure a majority of the seats in the elections by district boards. It would be a pity to introduce any principle of special representation unless it were absolutely necessary.

V. (13), (14), and (15) Yes.

Finally, I should note that although election has been advocated generally as a means of appointment to the various councils, opinion is not unanimous on the subject. Muhammadan land-owners of the old school do not seem anxious for its introduction.

D. J. BOYD,

(Late) Deputy Commissioner, Multan.

Opinion of the Anjuman-i-Islamia, Multan, in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24*th August* 1907.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—Undoubtedly such a council would be of great service to the country. Following alterations are respectfully suggested regarding its constitution and duties:—

(a) Number of its members should not be less than one hundred for the whole of India.

(b) In addition to the ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates, gentlemen of legal profession and representatives of Commerce and Education may also be appointed as its members.

(c) In each of the above classes number of Hindu and Muhammadan members should be equal.

(d) The councillors should be at liberty to confidentially make any suggestion in cases of need and importance to His Excellency the Viceroy of India, who of course may or may not take any action on it.

(e) Proceedings of the council should not be confidential.

(f) On every occasion of consultation more than one member should be consulted, and if possible the minimum number of members consulted should not be less than ten.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—Such institutions will be a boon to the country and should be on the same line with the Imperial Advisory Council.

(3) Imperial Legislative Council.—The Anjuman approves with heartfelt gratitude the enlargement of the council and recognition of the interests of land-holders in general and of Muhammadans in particular. It respectfully prays that the number of seats specially reserved for Muhammadans be raised from four to eight.

(4) Yes.

(5) The representative of the land-holders should be elected to the Imperial Council by the land-holding members of the Provincial Council.

(6) The Anjuman with a grateful heart approves of the scheme, and prays that the number of such Muhammadan members be raised from four to eight.

The electorate for Muhammadans be one that is described in paragraph 18 of the Government of India letter.

IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council.—Yes, the number of its members may be increased to twenty.

(8) One-third of the unofficial seats should be filled up by nomination and the two-thirds by election.

(9) Hindus and Muhammadans should be represented and in a fixed proportion, viz., one-third being Hindus and two-thirds Muhammadans.

(10) The two classes should elect separately their own representatives.

Following electorate is suggested:—

1. Fellows and graduates of ten years' standing of the Punjab University (Muhammadans or Hindus as the case may be).

2. Persons paying income-tax upon an annual income of Rs. 12,000 or paying an amount of land revenue indicating a corresponding income.

3. One representative of each 1st class municipality and district board.

(11) and (12) are answered under (8), (9), and (10).

(13) Yes.

(14) The Budget should be discussed by separate heads in the Provincial Council too.

(15) The Anjuman most strongly advocates the introduction into the Punjab Provincial Council of the power of interpellation by members.

MUHAMMAD BUKSH, B.A., Pleader,
Secretary, Anjuman-i-Islamia, Multan.

Opinion of Babu Mahendro Nath Banerji, Pleader.

Advisory Council is a good idea if its constitution is suited to attain the desired object in view, but much depends on its members. Prudence, moderation, independence, thorough insight of the Province, and high sense of duty and responsibility are the chief qualifications of the members in view of the aim, and if the majority lack in one or more of the qualities the council will be a useless measure and may result in evils in a country like India. Nomination by the Provincial heads is not likely to be satisfactory, and the interests of the different districts are not likely to be kept in view in the way it should be. As His Excellency the Viceroy has to depend chiefly on Provincial heads, so they in their turn have to depend mostly on the administrative heads of their divisions and districts; therefore Advisory Councils will, in our humble opinion, be likely more effective in operation, if they are made to work at the source from which the spring arises; therefore formation of District Advisory Councils is a desirable measure. The district boards in their present state will, we apprehend, not serve the purpose; the reconstitution suggested by getting all classes represented will not work well in India for various reasons. If District Advisory Councils are considered inexpedient, Divisional Advisory Councils may be constituted without making the measure unnecessarily complicated. The next question which naturally arises is—Should the councillors be nominated or elected? The best course is to have them elected by His Majesty's qualified subjects, who are likely to take some interest in the matter. Election by the mass is injurious. The voters should be limited in number with some standard of education and means for their eligibility. Such a measure has the additional advantage of educating His Majesty's deserving subjects politically and is calculated to develop their administrative faculties.

The Divisional Advisory Councils may be partly elected and partly nominated by the Commissioners, but the elected members should be in the majority.

District or Divisional Advisory Councils having thus been formed, the Provincial Councils are to be formed out of their members by nomination by the heads of the different provinces who will be allowed to have some additional members from outside these circles to make up want of deficiency of representation of class interests. In the same way the Imperial Advisory Council is to be formed out of the Provincial Councils with similar right of getting members from outside these circles.

Imperial Legislative Council.

The characteristic feature of the proposed measure is to allow the Muhammadans only the right of election. If more Muhammadan members be found desirable some elastic provisions may be made for the purpose; but to allow a class which is in the minority in the country such an important right, which is denied to the other class which is in the majority, especially when the latter class is far more advanced in education, both numerically and substantially, can hardly be considered a healthy sign of liberal British administration. It is a measure incompatible with the views of a governing nation remarkable for its love of free representative system. It is true that a desirable representation of class interest within the narrow scope of the privilege proposed is impossible in a country like India where the people are so divergent in creed and interest that they know of no common cause. It cannot be denied that Hindus and Muhammadans are antagonistic and can hardly be expected to agree even in a common cause; therefore any measure calculated to widen the gulf between the two classes would not be a wise policy. The difficulties in uniting them may be innumerable, but the chief aim of our wise Government should always be to educate its subjects in such a way that they may in distant future form into a nation for administrative deliberations.

Answers to Questions.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council would be of some service to the country if constituted on the line suggested, viz., formation of District or Divisional Councils by election and then nomination of Provincial and Imperial Councillors out of the Divisional and Provincial Councils respectively as suggested.

II. (2) Has already been answered.

III. (3) Enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council is expedient and desirable for various reasons, but it should be so enlarged as to afford sufficient scope for representation of class interests so far as possible within the narrow compass.

(4) Election of a member by each of the Provincial Legislative Council is a suitable proposal for India, provided the Government can afford to enlarge the Provincial Councils considerably, which means considerable loss of time of Government officers. But we should not care for the loss when we find no other system so well suited to the country. For the advanced provinces of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras some other method may be suggested, but it will not work well in other provinces.

(5) The election of one great land-owner of this province is desirable, but despite the disadvantages of election by the entire body of land-holders, a representative of the land-holding members of the Provincial Legislative Council, who may be very few, is not at all satisfactory. Direct election is therefore desirable.

The eligibility of an elector should be such that the total number of voters may not be less than 75 or more than 150 in each province.

The qualification therefore of an elector should be payment of Rs. 3,000 land revenue, but the eligibility of the representative should be higher and he should have a fair knowledge of English.

(6) The proposed appointment of four Muhammadan members certain in the council when there is no guarantee of even one member of any other class is undesirable, especially under the present state of circumstances and feelings. It is calculated to promote the existing breach between the two important sections of His Majesty's Indian subjects to such an extent as to render their union even in administrative deliberations a hopeless task. Therefore Muhammadans alone should not be given the right of electing two members and the nomination of the four non-officials should not be restricted by the clause "not less than two to be Muhammadans."

The other proposals for election being reasonable the two seats by Muhammadan election require disposal.

The universities or at least those well constituted and organised should be allowed some privilege as well as the Indian commerce, but regard being had to the seats at disposal it is difficult to make a satisfactory allotment till the Viceroy be pleased to make additional opening. The University of Calcutta is at present for two Provinces and Burma too. It is a well organized body of able and well qualified educated men. It has the reputation of being the first University in the country; therefore it may be safely entrusted to return one member by election and the other member may be allowed to the Indian commerce of Bombay or Bombay University which stands second in rank.

IV. (7) Certainly we advocate increase in the present number of members, and considering that its non-official members will have to elect a member for the Imperial Council it is desirable that interests of all classes should be represented. The land-holders who are to be principally affected by local legislation have better claim for representation. We suggest that the number may be increased to 37 excluding His Honour.

(8) Out of the 37 members 20 will be officials, 11 elected, and 4 to be nominated by His Honour to make up want or deficiency of class representation and 2 experts.

(9) The population may be divided in two grand divisions—agricultural including land-owners and non-agricultural. The Muhammadan zamindars are in the majority and they are not so as regards urban population.

We therefore suggest distribution of seats as follows:—

By land-holders (zamindars) one for each division	5
By Hindus	1
By Muhammadans	1
By Christians	1
By Sikhs	1
By Punjab University	1
By professional men, barristers, pleaders, doctors, engineers and graduates of 10 years' standing	1
Non-officials to be elected by His Honour to represent minority or special interest	4
TOTAL	15

(10) We do not advocate elections through municipal or district boards. Their present state is not so as to guarantee satisfactory election. Election by qualified voters of each class is desirable.

	Rs.
Land-holders paying Government revenue	2,500 a year.
Hindus and Muhammadans paying income-tax on an income of	5,000 ,,
Sikhs paying income-tax on	2,000 ,,
Christians paying income-tax on	2,000 ,,
Professional men, lawyers, doctors, engineers, and graduates of 10 years, paying income-tax on	2,000 ,,

(11) There should be general election by qualified voters.

(12) Not necessary.

V. (13) The proposed amendment of Budget discussion is salutary and we are for it.

(14) We advocate discussion of Provincial Budget in the Punjab Legislative Council.

(15) There should be power of interpellation by members.

18*th October* 1907.

Dated Multan, 21st October 1907.

From—LALA ISHWAR DAS, Secretary, Arya Samaj, Multan,
To—The Deputy Commissioner, Multan.

I have the honour to return papers relating to Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils, etc., with replies of the three Arya Samajes Inside Bohar Gate, Haram Gate, and Multan Cantonment to the questions on which replies were required.

ISHWAR DAS,
Secretary, Arya Samaj, Multan.

The following are the replies to questions as passed in the executive committees of the Arya Samajes—Haram Gate, Bohar Gate, and Cantonment, Multan:—

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—That the Council as proposed, if formed, will prove of some service to the country no doubt. But as regards its constitution, it is suggested that instead of all the members being nominated by the Viceroy, the majority of the members be selected by him from the elected councillors of the Provincial Advisory Councils of which mention is made in answer II.

Besides the interests of industry, commerce, capital, and other professional classes should also be kept in view when nomination or selection of members is made by the Viceroy.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—This council would serve a great purpose if the majority of the members are appointed by election. If the organisation of the general electorate for the province be deemed inadvisable by the local Government, it may get over the difficulty by assigning to each district or at least to each division a separate Advisory Council, the members of which should all be elected. From these minor or divisional councils the local Government should select members for its own council.

III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—Yes, the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council is essential, but in clause 12 D (d) of the Government of India letter the words "by Universities of India" be substituted for the words "by Muhammadans." And in clause 12 E the words "not less than two to be Muhammadans" should be omitted and that all the four seats should be left at the disposal of the Viceroy to safeguard the interests of the minorities and other unrepresented classes.

(4) Yes.

(5) Yes, a great land-owner of this province may be appointed a member of the Imperial Legislative Council by direct election. The electorate should consist of the following persons:—

(a) Persons paying land revenue Rs. 2,000 or more a year.

(b) Persons paying an income-tax on an annual income of Rs. 5,000 or more.

(c) All graduates of ten years' standing and over.

(6) No.

IV. (7) Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—Yes. The number of members of the Provincial Legislative Council can safely be raised to 20, but if sufficient number of officials whose majority is to be kept in view be not forthcoming the number may be raised to 15 for the present, including the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province.

(8) All non-official seats should be filled up by election.

(9) Yes, a fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each should be observed as follows:—

One Hindu, one Sikh, two Muhammadans. One seat should be allotted to the Senate of the University to represent education and another seat should be left for the representation of other minor interests such as commerce and capital. Thus out of 15 members of the council 6 at least should be unofficial members.

(10) The election should in no case be resorted to through municipal or district boards.

The same electorate would do as is mentioned in answer no. 5.

(11) The answer to this question is covered by the answer to the previous question no. 10.

(12) No separate provision should be made for the Muhammadans.

V. (13) Yes, the system of discussing the budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(14) Yes. The Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Provincial Council under separate heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(15) Yes, the power of interpellation should be introduced in the Punjab Legislative Council.

Letter dated Multan, 24th October 1907.

From—The Chief President, Siri Guru Singh Sabha, Multan,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Multan.

I have the honour to forward herewith answers to the questions in the Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907, for your kind consideration.

The enclosures were received for opinion and are returned herewith.

CHIEF PRESIDENT,

Siri Guru Singh Sabha.

Imperial Advisory Council.

Question 1.—Time has come when such a council may be constituted, and if properly constituted it will be of great service to the country.

Punjab Government letter.

Since the Government is already taking advice of the important and influential persons on occasions, it would be better to form a regular Imperial Advisory Council and thus to fix the councillors with some responsibility.

It should be elected and not nominated. But a few seats may be reserved for nomination by the Viceroy.

The object being to secure the opinion of the representatives of the people the councillors should be mostly elected by the people.

The Government rightly propose that their opinions will not be binding; and there is sufficient protection of the Government interests in this provision. The number should be raised from sixty to hundred besides the Viceroy. The members of the Executive Council of the Viceroy should be its ex-officio members. Each province may be authorized to elect a certain number. The whole province may have an electorate body; and the qualifications of both the electors and the candidate councillors should be fixed. Each province to maintain a list of electors and of the persons eligible for election.

Qualifications of electors.

1. Payment of Government revenue Rs. 500 a year.
2. Payment of income-tax Rs. 50 a year.
3. Graduate of university.
4. Pleaders, barristers.
5. President or manager of any religious society.

Qualification of candidate councillor.

1. Payment of Government revenue Rs. 5,000 a year.
2. Payment of income-tax Rs. 500 a year.
3. Pleader or barrister or graduate of a university with an income of Rs. 5,000 a year, and must be of 10 and 5 years' standing, respectively.

If these qualifications may be considered too low for any or all of them, they may be raised to proper limits.

The fact that a person is a pleader or barrister or graduate of a University does not afford sufficient guarantee that his opinion will be sound and practicable; so a further condition of income should be attached in the case. The few appointments to be made by the Viceroy by nomination would afford ample power to the Viceroy to secure a representation of special interests or of communities who may be found in a backward condition.

The Sikhs deserve a special consideration on account of their being mostly employed in the military department; they cannot look after the education of their children and so they are in a backward condition compared with the other classes.

The method of consultation should as a rule be at meetings held for this purpose.

But the Viceroy may for reasons recorded dispense with the holding of such a meeting on occasions when in his opinion a meeting is impracticable or inexpedient.

Their opinion should not be taken in private or individually. There are many ambitious people in this country who in order to advance their own private interest do not represent true facts to the Government and mislead the people as well. By taking their opinion openly such people will have less opportunity of doing this mischief.

The proceedings need not be published for public information. There are several societies in this country whose proceedings do not see the light of the day and there is no reason why the proceedings of this council may not be kept confidential and secret.

Paragraph 5 of Government of India letter.

Clauses—

1. May stand.

2. That a certain number may be nominated by the Viceroy and the rest elected, and their title may remain "Imperial Councillors."

3. The number may be raised to hundred as above stated, some of whom to be elected and some nominated.

4. That the members may hold office for three years. This will afford an opportunity to the Viceroy to see more of the qualified persons of the country.

5. May stand.

6. May stand.

7. The proceedings may remain confidential, but opinion should be taken at meeting. In the case of absent councillors their opinion, if received, should be laid before the other councillors for information and guidance.

Question II. Provincial Advisory Councils.—May be constituted on the same lines as the Imperial Advisory Councils. Some seats may be reserved for nomination by the Lieutenant-Governor and the other thrown open for election. The qualifications of the electors and persons eligible for election should be on the basis of property and educational qualification and not on the basis of religion or class.

The method of consultation and their proceedings should be of the same character as those of the Imperial Advisory Council. The Lieutenant-Governor may dispense with the holding of meetings on particular occasions when he finds for reasons to be recorded that a meeting is unnecessary or inexpedient. The reservation of some seats by nomination is a sufficient protection of special interests or to represent the backward communities like the Sikhs in the Punjab.

The number should be raised to thirty-three instead of twenty, so that each district may have a representative.

The Government have tried the method of private and individual consultation for a long time and admittedly without success. Let a trial be given to open consultation in the manner proposed above.

The name of the councillors: their powers may remain the same as in the case of Imperial Advisory Councillors. As the council is to receive no legislative recognition the interests of the Government are quite safe. Their opinion need not bind the Government.

Question III. The Imperial Legislative Council.—May be enlarged and the number may be increased to fifty-three besides the Viceroy; but the constitution should be as below:—

Para. 12 of Government of India letter:—

Sub-clause A. May stand.

B. May stand.

C. Two ruling Chiefs instead of one.

D. Elected members.

A. May stand.

B. May stand.

C. May stand.

D. By Muhammadans . . . 1
By Hindus 1
By Sikhs 1

E. Instead of 4, 2 of whom are to be Muhammadans only 2 may be nominated without any distinction of religion.

F. May stand.

Question IV.—The Provincial Legislative Councils may be authorized to elect one member as proposed in paragraph 3 of the Government of India letter.

Question V.—Yes, a list of electors should be kept in each province, and the electors should elect direct their nominee; but the qualification of a voter should not be fixed so high. Instead of ten thousand for this province it may be reduced to one thousand only.

Question VI.—No. Instead of two seats to be reserved for Muhammadans by election among themselves, one may be awarded to the Muhammadans, one to the Hindus, and one to the Sikhs.

Each class to elect one of their own class. Instead of the Viceroy nominating four seats two of whom to be Muhammadans, the Viceroy may be authorized to nominate two only, and those also without any reference to religion or class. They may be Christians, Europeans, Parsis, Sikhs, Hindus, or Muhammadans. The special mention of Muhammadans to the exclusion of the other communities might prove a source of ill-feeling among other classes, and might encourage the Muhammadans unduly, and they might assume feelings of hostility to the other classes, and this the Government would never intend or mean.

Question VII.—Yes, an increase in the number of councillors is necessary; may be raised from 12 to 15.

Question VIII.—The seats should be mostly elected, and the Lieutenant-Governor may have the power to nominate a few seats to secure the representation of special interests.

Question IX.—The best scheme will be to have an electorate body in each district, and the qualification of the electors should be fixed on the basis of property and educational qualifications. The distribution of seats on classes will be impracticable in this province. The Indian communities are divided into a variety of sub-communities, and it is difficult to extend the privilege to each of them; and until this extension reaches to each and all of them they will not be satisfied. For instance Hindu Khatris are divided into several sub-castes which forms a class in itself and differ from each other in their social dealings. It is impossible to satisfy each and all of the classes. So the best basis should be the property of qualification. One feels that his own interests may not be at stake. The reservation of some seats for nomination would afford ample safeguard in the hands of the Government to represent special interests or minorities. This electorate body should be quite independent of the municipal body or the district board. In the Punjab the official influence in both these institutions is so great that the elections made by them would not fulfil the very object of the Government, viz., to secure the voice of the people. As the Government is to maintain a majority of their own by appointing so many officials, there is no fear of the Government's interests being at risk.

Question X.—Therefore no election should take place through the district board or the municipal committees. The qualifications of the electors may be fixed on the same lines or with some modifications as those fixed for the Provincial Advisory Councils. All classes should be allowed to vote, if qualified, on the basis of property or educational qualifications.

Question XI.—We don't advocate a separate representation of classes as proposed in paragraph 22 (a) of the Government of India letter. Nor we suggest any corresponding changes in the constitution of the municipal committees or district boards in the manner indicated in paragraph 22(b) nor in any other manner. The Government has ample power to nominate members to either of these institutions. If the district officers would exercise their discretion carefully in recommending persons for nomination better members could be nominated. The district officer has his hands too full with other more important duties, the duties relating to the municipality or the district board being of a secondary importance to him; he is generally indifferent, and thus an opportunity is allowed to the officer to recommend people who are not desirable or fit. As great deal of the success of the administration depends on the district officer, the Government should make the best selection in posting an officer to be in charge of a district. As a rule, he should be liberal-minded, sympathetic, and of firmness of mind and character, and not in the least of sound opinion. He should never be a man of short temper, infirm, or revengeful, and in making recommendation for nomination should take into consideration the interest a candidate has taken in public matters. The suggestions made in paragraph 22 (b) of the Government of India letter dividing the seats into classes—land-holders, cultivators, artisans, and traders—could not be appreciated, as there is a great disproportion in the number of each of the said classes, and this will lead to jealousy and friction among them. There is a further risk that the class returning more members by election may not run with the idea that the Government is unduly favouring them, which idea when manifested by them is bound to lead to unpleasantness which the Government did never contemplate.

Question XII.—We do not propose that Muhammadans should have a separate representation to the exclusion of the other classes. And privilege should not be allowed in the interests of good administration. There is already a great deal of feeling in the country that the Muhammadans are unjustly favoured by the Government, and if it is declared so openly by the Government the feeling may become more intense and serious, which it is not desirable to encourage. Why the Sikhs should not be allowed this privilege? They will claim it.

Question XIII.—Yes, we consider that the discussion of the Budget be adapted to the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

Question XIV.—Yes, we consider that the Provincial Budget be discussed in the Provincial Legislative Council in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

Question XV.—Yes, we do advocate the introduction of the power of interpellation into the Punjab Legislative Council

I beg to attach replies to the questions which you were pleased to send me for my opinion, as desired in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310, dated 24th August 1907.

MULTAN CHAND, Banker.

Answers of questions on which opinions are desired in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310, dated 24th August 1907.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—The Council would be really more useful to the country if the following modifications are made in the proposals made in paragraph 5:—

(a) Power of initiation—

i.e., whenever ten or more members of the council make a joint requisition to the Government of India for purpose of consultation on a subject other than the political affecting India in general, Government should convene the council and take its advice on that matter. Whether Government may act upon it or not that is quite different thing.

(b) Publicity of its proceedings—

That the proceedings of the council when called together for consultation to be public, i.e., public may be permitted to the assembly room and its proceedings to be published. The assembly to be presided over by its own member and not by the head or the official of the Government.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Council.—It will certainly be a useful institution. The following modifications are suggested:—

(a) } Same as suggested in question I (1) Imperial Advisory Council above.
(b) }

(c) Government of India seem to have laid great stress on the due representation of landed interest, but I respectfully submit that goodly number of members should represent trade and commerce, to which I belong.

For the present for purposes of representation to the Provincial Council, member paying certain amount of income-tax to be nominated, as in case of land-holders paying certain amount of revenue. For the present I will fix tax of Rs. 2,500 per annum as the qualification for representation.

III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—I quite approve of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council. I beg to suggest the following modifications in the scheme:—

(a) In clause D.—Elected members—

Only two members are allowed to be elected by trade and commerce of the country; these two are by the leading Chamber of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay. In my opinion this privilege to be given to other Chamber of Commerce by rotation in case the number cannot be increased, and if this cannot be done, there should be limitation in election that one member to be Englishman and another Indian, to represent Indian side of trade and commerce.

(b) I will like to do away with special privilege given to Muhammadans in clause (d) of D and clause E.

III. (4) I do approve of the proposal that one member should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council.

III. (5) I do not approve of the selection (not by election) of one of the great land-owners of this province to the Imperial Council by the local Government, but the circle of selection to be limited by fixing a very high minimum grant of revenue.

III. (6) I do not approve of the proposed appointment of four Muhammadans to the Imperial Council under clause II (d) and E as suggested above.

IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—I will certainly advocate an increase in the present number of members to the Provincial Council. I will fix it to 20, excluding the Lieutenant-Governor, i.e., 21 altogether, including the Lieutenant-Governor.

IV. (8) I will have all the unofficial seats to be filled by election from a limited group, qualification of whose member to be fixed beforehand.

IV. (9) Seats to be allotted to each class beforehand. Out of 21 seats, 11 to be official and 10 non-official. Out of 10 non-official seats, I will allot—

3 seats to landed interest. Circle of candidates to be limited by fixing their qualification, say, to payment of revenue of Rs. 12,500 a year.

3 seats to trade and commerce. The candidate's qualification to be payment of income-tax of Rs. 2,500 a year on his own behalf.

2 seats to the learned profession. In this case qualification of candidate to be—

(1) Graduate of the University.

(2) Five years' standing.

(3) Income-tax payment of Rs. 150 a year.

2 seats to the municipalities in the province—

(1) Municipal committee to be of the first class only.

(2) Candidate to be vice-president or president of these committees or chairman of the sub-committees of these committees.

IV. (10) See answer to question IV (9).

IV. (11) Ditto ditto.

IV. (12) Ditto ditto.

V. (13) Discussion of the Budget in the Legislative Council.—Yes.

V. (14) Yes. I won't advocate its discussion by separate heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 22 of the Government of India letter.

V. (15) I do advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members.

MULTAN CHAND.

Dated Multan, 8th November 1907.

From—KHAN BAHADUR MAKHDUM HUSAIN BUKSH, Qurashi, Sajjada Nashin of the shrines of Bahawal Haq and Rukn-i-Alam, Multan,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Multan.

With reference to Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August last, I beg to answer the questions contained therein as follows:—

(1) An Imperial Advisory Council will certainly prove beneficial for India. I would suggest no alteration or addition to what has already been proposed in paragraph 3.

(2) A provincial Council will also be beneficial for Punjab as resolved.

(3) The Legislative Council should be increased as intended.

(4) I would recommend that one member should be selected by Provincial Council.

(5) I quite agree to the proposal that one zamindar should be selected as a member by nomination.

(6) I agree that 4 Muhammadans should be selected as members of the Imperial Council. All such members should be appointed by nomination.

(7) The number must be increased, say up to 20.

(8) The mode of appointment should be "nomination." Half of the members should be official and the other half should be non-official. Non-official members must also be appointed by nomination.

(9) In every class of people the proportion should be—

Muhammadans	2
Hindus	2
Christians	1

(10) The above should be selected out of—

Merchants.

Bankers.

Zamindars.

Makhdums, or priests of shrines as they obviously possess a great influence on the people, being their religious teachers.

(11) In my opinion election is not advisable. Nomination is the best way.

(12) Vide answer to questions 10 and 9.

(13) I quite agree that the Muhammadan members should all be appointed by nomination.

(14) The only alteration I would suggest is that proposed in paragraph 23 for discussing the Budget.

(15) In my opinion a debate must be held by Legislative Council of Punjab on the Provincial Budget, and different headings must be discussed.

(16) The members of the Legislative Council of Punjab must have the power of putting questions.

HASAN BAKHSH, MAKHDUM,

Qureshi Sajjada Nashin of the Shrine of Bahawal Haq and Rukn-i-Alam, Multan.

Dated 11th November 1907.

From—RAI BAHADUR HARI CHAND, Rais and Vice-President, Municipal Committee Multan,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Multan.

In reference to Deputy Commissioner's memo. no. 2966-D., dated 12th October 1907, I beg to submit the following replies seriatim to the questions of Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907.

I. (1) The Imperial Advisory Council.—That the council will be of great service to the country.

One-third of the Imperial Councillors should be by election, representing commerce, industry, capital, law, and other professional classes.

The Imperial Councillors should not be consulted only on matters referred to them, but they be empowered also to bring to the notice of the Viceroy such matters which are connected with the welfare of the public.

II. (2) Yes, I think Provincial Advisory Council will be very useful institution, but one-third of the members should be elected; and as to duties, the alteration be the same as stated in paragraph I above.

III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—The enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council is essential, but in clause 12 (D) (d) of the letter of Government of India, the words "Indian Universities" be instituted for the words "by Muhammadan," for the racial question should not be brought in such matters and merit should only be the guide.

In clause 12 (c) the words "not less than 2 Muhammadans" be omitted and if these are allowed to stand then there should be special provision for the representation of Sikhs in the Punjab and Indian Christians also.

(4) Yes.

(5) I approve of the selection of one great land-owner of this province to the Imperial Council and should be nominated and not elected.

(6) The answer to this question is covered by paragraph III for reasons given therein.

IV. (7) Yes, the number of members of the Punjab Legislative Council can safely be raised to 25 including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province.

(8) No. I don't approve of the present system of nomination. If not all, at least 7 unofficial seats should be filled up by election, 13 should be ex-officio members and 5 should be by nomination.

(9) Yes. The allotment of the elected seats to be—

By District Boards	2
,, Municipalities	2
,, Education	1
,, Commerce and Industry	1
,, Professional classes as Law	1

(10) The election should be made through municipalities and district boards as follows:—

Each 1st class municipality and district board should send one or more representative to give vote, and thus all the representatives of the committee and district board should elect members of the Legislative Council from amongst themselves. The University should elect a member through the Senate. The Commerce may be represented by a member who is elected by the Punjab Chamber of Commerce. Professions by the election of a pleader of at least 5 years' standing.

(11) No. I do not advocate separate representation of classes, but if it is allowed then the Sikhs and Hindus being in minority in the Punjab should have fixed number of seats on the same principle as is mentioned about the Muhammadans. There is no need of corresponding changes in the constitution of municipalities and district boards.

(12) No need of making any separate provision for the Muhammadans as it is not good to bring in racial distinction.

V. (13) Yes, the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(14) Yes, the Provincial Budget be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council under separate heads.

(15) Yes, the power of interpellation should be introduced in the Punjab Legislative Council.

HARICHAND, Rai Bahadur,

Rais and Vice-President, Municipal Committee, Multan.

Opinion of Ghulam Kadir Khan, Officiating Tahsildar, Shujabad.

In compliance with Government letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907, I have read the letter with all its enclosures to the leading zamindars of the tahsil during my tour, those of Shujabad promised to send me their opinions in camp which I have not received up to this day. Diwan Sultan Ahmad is out in Muzaffargarh district, others fully agree to the proposals laid down in Government of India letter above quoted.

Question of formation of district or Imperial Council was raised by some, which after deliberations they have decided and say that mere election will not be useful unless it is approved by district and divisional officers.

If my own humble opinion be asked I beg to say that after a careful perusal of the letter and its enclosures I fully agree to the proposals.

Translation of the foregoing read over to the undersigned:—

Malik Tota, sufedposh.
Sultan Bakhsh Khan, sufedposh.
Malik Abdullah, sufedposh.
Fatteh Muhammad Khan, zaildar Jugguwala.
Ghulam Muhammad Khan, sufedposh, and member, district board.
Abdullah Khan, sufedposh.
Malik Khair Muhammad, zaildar.
Chaudhri Asa Mal, zamindar, money-lender, and trader.
Mahmud Khan, zaildar.
Rana Palia, zaildar.

Replies from Chaudhries Narain Singh, Bhagwan Singh, and Hoa Ram were since received which are attached to this.

Their opinions differ from those of Muhammadans agreeing with one another except inasmuch as Chaudhri Bhagwan Singh approves of separate and special rules for Muhammadans. In the meeting held to read the letter of Government to the gentleman, all the Muhammadans present had authorised S. Daulat Shah to express their opinions. S. Daulat Shah has expressed the opinion in writing under the signatures of several persons which is also attached hereto, which means that they fully agree to the proposals made by Government with thanks.

Shujabad;
16*th November* 1907.

GHULAM KADIR KHAN,

Officiating Tahsildar, Shujabad.

Opinion by S. Abdul Haq, Vice-President, Municipal Committee, Multan, dated 19th November 1907.

Councils.—The question of councils is of vital importance to all classes in this country. The principles enunciated in the Government of India letter are conceived in a most statesmanlike spirit and are calculated to give impetus to the forces that have been hitherto at best neutral, thus leading to an all-round progressive movement "towards the fulfilment, in no grudging spirit, of a pledge which the peoples of India are entitled to regard as inviolable." The reforms that should ultimately be adopted must be directed to a complete overhauling of the entire machinery of self-government in consonance with the principles laid down, and I am gratified to find that the Government of India have touched upon the subject in their letter.

I. An Imperial Advisory Council would certainly be of great service to the country. With reference to paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter I have to suggest the following alterations:—

(1) Every Imperial Councillor should have the right to address communications to the Viceroy personally as well as to the Government of India on any subject whatsoever.

(2) The council should meet at least twice a year at the head-quarters of any two provinces.

(3) The proceedings of the council when called together for collective consultation may remain confidential for the present, but to ensure the council against inertia a rule might soon have to be made that they should always be published. For a longer time still the meetings should take place privately.

(4) The councillors should have their expenses paid by the Government, if practicable.

II. The same alterations apply to the Provincial Advisory Councils.

III. (3) An enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council is highly desirable, with the exception of the fact that the number reserved for Muhammadans is too small. The scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 is approved. The heartiest thanks of the community are due to the Government for the recognition of the principle.

(4) Is answered in the affirmative.

(5) The land-holders' representative for the Punjab in the Imperial Legislative Council should be elected by the land-holding members of the Provincial Council from among land-holders generally, paying Rs. 5,000 or more as land revenue.

(6) The principle of reserving seats for Muhammadans is the life and essence of the whole scheme. It is not only from their point of view, but in the interest of the well-being of the whole country as well as of the Government. Considering the present number of Muhammadans on the Imperial Legislative Council, however, the number now allotted would scarcely do justice to the intentions and views of the Government of India so eloquently set forth in their letter, unless indeed the Provincial Councils of the Punjab and the Eastern Bengal invariably return Muhammadans, and the land-holders of these provinces also do the same. For a variety of reasons it is scarcely possible that such should be the case. Other provinces, it may be taken for granted, would never elect a Muhammadan. Accepting the numbers set forth in paragraph 12 as appointed it is necessary that to sub-clause E should be added the following "so as to insure the presence of at least eight Muhammadans on the Council."

The elected Muhammadan members should be chosen by the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Councils and Muhammadan Fellows of the local University.

IV. (7) to (9) In view of the fact that the Provincial Councils have to play such an important part and regard being had to the opinion of the Government of India, the number of the non-official members on the Punjab Legislative Council should exceed ten (see paragraph 13). In my opinion the number of non-official members should be fourteen, of whom one should be a European or Indian Christian to represent the Punjab Chamber of Commerce. Of the remaining, three are to be nominated by the Government with a view to secure seven Muhammadans, four Hindus, and two Sikhs. The Sikhs are for all practical and political purposes as good Hindus as the rest belonging to the latter community, and it is of the essence of the constitution that the Muhammadans should exceed the Hindus and Sikhs combined. The number that I have assigned to the Sikhs gives due recognition to their importance. As regards Muhammadans the proportion prescribed above is necessary on account of their population, and their peculiarly superior claims fully entitle them to consideration. I am afraid as things stand at present many of the Muhammadan magnates pride themselves in winning the adulation of others, and for this they sacrifice the interests of themselves and their community. In any meeting they are conspicuous by their absence, and we cannot count upon their votes in any election. We cannot advocate an absolutely nomination system as nominations are very naturally made merely out of these magnates. Another argument in favour of class representation is the uncertainty as to the qualifications that might be fixed. The higher the revenue test the more the Muhammadans recede to the vanishing point (see table in paragraph 5 of the Punjab Government letter).

(10) Some seats could very well be allotted for the separate representation of municipal committees and district boards. In my opinion electoral colleges could be had by each of the privileged municipalities and district boards contributing a definite number of members to vote for the election of any man in the province possessing specific qualifications. The best course probably would be to have one electorate for the municipalities and two for the district boards in the province. Of course the representatives of the district boards should be land-holders.

(11) I am positively of opinion that unless corresponding changes are made in the constitution of municipal and district boards the class representation system would be of no avail. This is the best opportunity for remedying the present unequal state of things in this province. In this way the whole would be one co-ordinated system of self-government. The backward communities would have some motive to throw off their lethargy, and communal patriotism is the lesson that they would learn for the sake of India.

(12) I would prefer election for the Muhammadans. They so much need education in politics and public spirit. They so much lack in the real active support that they owe to their Government. They should be abreast of the times and of the system of government that reigns in India. I heartily approve of the electorate suggested in the Government of India letter, paragraph 17.

V. (13) The answer is in the affirmative. Members of councils may further be authorised to send in their suggestions whilst the Budget is preparing.

(14) The answer is in the affirmative.

(15) I strongly advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members.

In conclusion I would take leave to suggest that all the Legislative Councils should meet at least once a month in addition to the meetings held at present.

S. ABDUL HAQ,

Vice-President, Municipal Committee, Multan.

Opinion by Shiv Ram Das, Secretary, Sanatan Dharam Sabha, Multan.

The following are the replies of the Sanatan Dharm Sabha, Multan:—

I. (1) The Imperial Advisory Council would, if properly constituted and worked, be of great service to the country.

The members be selected by His Excellency the Viceroy from the Provincial Advisory Councils. In case nomination is resorted to not only hereditary but matter-of-fact leaders should be selected. They should be persons well-known for their wide sympathies, high moral culture. They should be well read, and in no case be bigots, religious zealots, or persons who owe their existence and position in life to the widening of the gulf between the Hindus and Muhammadans, &c.

The poor and the middle classes should also be represented through their highly educated members. The interests of commerce, industry of capitalists, and of professional classes should also be represented.

There should be periodical meetings and the members should have power of initiation. All matters should be openly discussed and the proceedings made public except matters of strict political privacy.

Persons of elastic conscience on whom the Government cannot depend for their frank interchange of opinion openly and publicly may better be not allowed to pollute the Chambers of Advisory Councils by their presence.

II. (2) Such council would be useful for the remainder—see answer to the first question.

III. (3) The strength of the Legislative Council may be increased to 53. Clause 12 D (d) words "by Muhammadans" should be substituted "Indian Universities."

In clauses 12 E the words "not less than two to be Muhammadans" should be omitted.

The special mention of Muhammadans would give them undue importance and would foster racial feelings. Capacity and capability and public spirit should be real tests, but no difference of race or religion.

III. (4) Yes.

(5) Yes, one great land-owner may be selected by the Viceroy from the Provincial Legislative Council who may be paying annual revenue above Rs. 30,000.

(6) No.

IV. (7) Yes, the number may be increased to twenty.

(8) All non-official members should be elected.

(9) The allotment shall be made thus—

Hindus	2
Sikhs	1
Muhammadans	2
Christians	1
Education	1
Commerce	1
Capitalists	1
Artists	1

IV. (10) The election should in no case be through municipalities or district boards. An electorate of the following qualifications should be formed in each district and division:—

(a) Persons paying an income-tax on an annual income of Rs. 5,000 or more.

(b) Persons paying land revenue Rs. 2,000 or more a year.

(c) All graduates of ten years' standing.

(d) Managers of banks and factories.

(e) Pleaders and barristers, and selection should be out of them.

(12) There should be no separate provision for Muhammadans.

V. (13) Yes, the system may be altered in accordance with paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(14) Yes, the Provincial Budget be discussed by separate heads.

V. (15) We advocate the introduction of the power of interpellation in the Punjab Legislative Council.

SHIV RAM DAS,

Secretary, Sanatan Dharm Sabha, Multan.

THAKUR DUTT, PANDIT,

President, Sanatan Dharam Sabha, Multan.

Translation of a petition, dated 2nd November 1907, from Syad Daulat Shah, Lambardar, Sufedposh, and Municipal Commissioner, Shujabad.

A great meeting presided over by Ghulam Kadir Khan, Tahsildar, was held to-day for considering the questions asked by the Punjab Government regarding the Imperial and Advisory Councils. The following gentlemen were present:—(1) Haji Rana Palia, zaildar of Basti Mathu; (2) Malik Ilahi Bakhsh, zaildar of Shahpur; (3) Malik Ghulam Nabi, zaildar of Mauza Wasan; (4) Mian Ramzan Khan, sufedposh of Soman; (5) Mian Imam Bux Khan, zaildar of Soman; (6) Khuda Baksh Khan, sufedposh of Khairpur; (7) Syad Gulab Shah, Lambardar of Basti Hajju Shah; (8) Quazi Aman Ullah, member of municipal committee, Shujabad; (9) Chaudhari Asa Nand, zamindar of Shujabad; (10) Syad Daulat Shah, sufedposh and member, of municipal committee, Shujabad; (11) Chaudhri Bhagwan Singh, sufedposh and member of municipal committee, Shujabad; (12) Chaudhri Hawa Ram, lambardar of Shujabad; (13) Chaudhri Narain Singh, zamindar and member of municipal committee, Shujabad; (14) Chaudhri Sham Singh, zaildar of Shujabad; (15) Bhai Ram Dyal, member of municipal committee, Shujabad; (16) Chaudhri Khushi Ram, sufedposh of Shujabad; and (17) Chaudhri Kala Ram. The Tahsildar opened the proceedings by reading the questions and the Government of India letter, dated 24th August 1907, and explaining the objects of the meeting. The Hindu gentlemen present took copies of the questions and of the Government of India letter in order to consider the matter, while the Mahammadans authorised the petitioner to inform Government on their behalf that they approved of the proposal made by Government. Petitioner accordingly submits this and prays for the stability of British rule in India.

Answers by Chaudhri Narain Singh, Zamindar and Rais of Shujabad, to questions asked regarding Advisory Council, etc.

(1) Imperial Advisory Council.—Such a council if constituted would be of service to the country, provided it is elected by and from among the members of the Provincial Advisory Council referred to in answer to question 2.

(2) Provincial Advisory Council.—This council would also prove a useful institution, provided its members are elected. This suggestion, if adopted, would remove the grievances (takalif) of each district or at least circle (halka). Government may select members for their (Imperial) Council from among these elected members.

(3) Imperial Legislative Council.—The enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council is desirable, but in paragraph 12 heads D (d) and E the words "Indian Universities" should be substituted for "Muhammadans." These seats should not be exclusively reserved for Muhammadans. On the contrary the 4 seats (referred to) should be filled up by nomination by His Excellency the Viceroy from among communities who happen to be without a representative in the council.

(4) Yes, this number should be increased as proposed in paragraph 13 of Government of India letter.

(5) The selection of one of the great land-owners to the Imperial Legislative Council is desirable. He should be elected direct, due regard being paid to the following qualifications:—

(a) That he pays a revenue of at least Rs. 5,000.

(b) That he pays income-tax on an income of Rs. 10,000 per annum.

(c) That he passed some high educational test ten years ago.

(6) It is undesirable to accord special treatment to any particular community.

(7) Provincial Legislative Council, Punjab.—The number of members might be increased to 20.

(8) All the unofficial seats should be filled by election.

(9) There should be one fixed rule for all classes.

One member should be taken from the Education Department to represent the educated classes. The other members should be the representatives and well-wishers of other communities, i.e., Hindus, Sikhs, and Muhammadans.

(10) and (11)The elections should be made according to rules regulating the election of members for committees and district boards, but due regard should be paid to qualifications detailed in my answer to question 5.

(12) No separate provision should be made for Muhammadans. The same rule should apply to all, and special treatment should not be accorded to any class.

(13) The rules regulating the discusion of the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be modified.

(14) It is also desirable that the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Provincial Legislative Council.

(15) I advocate the introduction of the power of interpellation into the Punjab Legislative Council.

Note.—The answers given by Chaudri Sewa Ram are an exact copy of the above, i.e., those given by Chaudri Narain Singh.

Replies approved by the Executive Committee, Zamindara, Shujabad.

(1) Such a council would, if formed, prove of some service to the country, provided its members, instead of being nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy, are elected by the members of the Provincial Advisory Councils referred to in my reply to question 2.

(2) Provincial Advisory Council.—The council would also prove beneficial to the country if the seats were filled by election. This suggestion, if adopted, would serve to remove the grievances of each district or at least each circle. The local Government can itself choose members for the Advisory Council from among the members elected.

(3) Imperial Legislative Council.—The enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council is desirable, but the words "Indian Universities" should be substituted for the word "Muhammadans" in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter. The words "by Muhammadans" occurring in the same paragraph should also be omitted. All these four seats should be filled by nomination by His Excellency the Viceroy to secure the interests of minors and other communities who happen to have no representative in the council.

(4) Yes.

(5) Yes, a large land-owner should be elected direct for the Imperial Legislative Council. The candidate must possess (one of) the following qualifications:—

(1) That he pays a land revenue of Rs. 5,000 per annum.

(2) That he pays income-tax on Rs. 10,000.

(3) That he is a graduate of 10 years' standing.

(6) Yes.

(7) The present number of members of the Provincial Legislative Councils should be increased to 20. But if the present number of official members be considered sufficient and they should be unanimous,* the number of members should even then be increased to 15, including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor. All non-official seats should be filled by election.

* Sic.

(9) There should be one fixed rule for each class. There should be 1 Hindu, 1 Sikh and 1 Muhammadan. One seat should be filled by a member of the Senate to represent the educated class and another should be reserved for a representative of minors, traders, &c.

(10) The member should be elected according to the rules regulating the election of provincial committees† and district boards. The qualifications of candidates for election should be the same as stated in my answer to question 5.

†Sic.

(11) The answer to this question is the same as the answer to the last question 10.

(12) Separate rules ought to be framed for Muhammadans.

(13) Yes, the rules relating to the discussion of the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be modified as proposed in paragraph 23 of Government of India letter.

(14) Yes. The Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Provincial Legislative Council as suggested in paragraph 23 of Government of India letter.

(15) Yes. The power of interpellation should be conferred on members of the Provincial Legislative Council.

(16) The members shoud be invested with some power or other according to their position.

Offg. Commissioner,

Multan Division.

NOTE.

I. In talking over the matter with various persons, I have noticed a certain eagerness and interest displayed in discussing the details of the Legislative Councils, but the Advisory Councils have been damned with faint praise. Some of the more candid have confessed that in the Advisory Councils they see a good deal of trouble and expense to those fortunate enough to be called to those councils, but little power for themselves or benefit to others from their installation. If the meetings are frequent and the references are numerous, these critics consider that after the novelty has worn off membership will become rather a hollow burden and expense. If the meetings are infrequent and the references are few the honour of belonging to the councils will be an empty one. Unless there is a very decided change in the morale of the people, a sustained interest on the part of the members or of the public in their doings is unlikely. It has been explained to me that the best traditions of oriental polity while allowing for a numerous body of advisers who both gave advice and diffused the authority and ideas of the supreme body to local entities, also gave the advisers a quid pro quo for the inconveniences of their position, by allowing them personal favours, or opportunities of dispensing patronage or acquiring wealth. In modern Native States this amount to a State carriage and pair at any rate. It short they say that the oriental man is a political animal in so far as politics means increased power or wealth. A contemplative council of elders without power of initiation and with doubtful power of commanding attention to their views, but saddled with certain unremunerative duties, seems to these critics a more fancied than real concession to progress.

A more numerous class do think that both the Imperial and the Provincial Advisory Councils would be a real gain to the people in understanding what Government means and vice versâ, and that the duties connected with such a council would be cheerfully undertaken and esteemed to be an honour.

As to constitution, the proposals of the Government of India appeal to most people with whom I have consulted. Some object to the phrase "territorial magnates," as they say that many of the so-called territorial magnates in official favour are brainless dissipated inefficients, and they would waive the idea of position in favour of territorial income alone, i.e., they prefer a rich zamindar unqualified to the latent idea of a rich and well connected zamindar. Three years is the term suggested for office in the Imperial Council.

II. With regard to the Provincial Advisory Council the consensus of opinion seems to be that collective deliberation alone should be allowed. The Commissioners are suggested as the proper persons to nominate representatives of various interests. Six per division are suggested as the most suitable allotment of members. This is an increase on the number suggested in the Punjab Government letter, but it is alleged that the number is not too numerous for collective deliberation and secures a wider representation of district and class feeling.

III. The real interest centres round the Imperial and Provincial Legislative assemblies.

(3) Almost all the persons whom I have consulted have been unanimous in declaring that the large export trade of the Punjab might receive the same recognition as that afforded to the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay. The Canal Colonies are vitally interested in every form of railway reform which would affect export trade, and for this reason people think that the Punjab traders should find a representative when legislation affecting commerce or Budget provisions are to come under discussion. This view has my sympathy.

Others have suggested that owing to its preponderance in the Punjab and the Native Army the Sikh interest should have a special representation similar to that accorded to Muhammadans. This is plausible.

The large increase of numbers in the Legislative Council is looked upon favourably. Personally I think it rather large for efficient and rapid disposal of business.

(4) The election of one member by the Provincial Legislative Council is approved.

(5) Persons do not seem to be able to imagine an electorate of any general composition. I consider an electorate should be formed of members of the district boards, who fulfilled a certain high landed property qualification and a list of a number of nominees selected by the head of the Provincial Government laid before them for selection of a member by election. Muhammadans in the Punjab should be electors in the elective body, and should not be excluded on account of their exclusive opportunities in the scheme.

(6) The proposal seems suitable. It is generally suggested that 2 Muhammadans should be nominated and 2 who should be members or ex-members of Provincial Councils themselves should be elected by Muhammadan members of Provincial Councils.

IV. (7) Persons whom I have consulted are all in favour of large increases. Probably some increase would be useful. I suggest 9 officials and 7 non-officials.

(8) Most people seem in favour of nomination. Some are in favour of election. If a real step is to be made in the direction of loosing the bonds of nomination, I should suggest election of selected nominees.

(9) The proportion of non-official members which suggests itself is:—

One member to be nominated by the Punjab Chamber of Commerce.

One member to be elected by Muhammadans alone owing to their numerical preponderance.

Five members without specification of class to be elected by district boards by divisions.

(10) I would suggest that the head of the Province select a number of nominees for the one reserved Muhammadan seat and the Commissioner select a number of nominees for the divisional seat; these names would then be put to the vote of those members of the district boards who fulfilled a certain landed qualifications standard. The landowners are the only very large class. For the purpose of giving the electorate a tinge of commercial and educational class feeling the municipalities of Lahore, Delhi, and Rawalpindi might be allowed to count as district boards for this purpose, their electors being obliged to attain to a high income-tax standard. The Senate does not seem to have attained to the dignity and position which in England secures to some universities special representation in the councils of the nation.

(11) No change is needed.

(12) The Muhammadan electorate would be Muhammadans among the selected district board electorate who would vote on the list of Muhammadan nominees selected by the Lieutenant-Governor for the reserved Muhammadan seat.

G. F. DEMONTMORENCY,
Deputy Commissioner, Lyallpur.

Letter, dated 9th November 1907.

From—LALA SEWAK RAM, P. O. Gangapur, District Lyallpur.

To—G. F. de MONTMORENCY, Esq., I.C.S., Deputy Commissioner, Lyallpur.

With reference to your letter no. 1196-S., dated 1st November 1907, forwarding a copy of the Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907, for my opinion, I beg to reply as follows:—

I shall reply the questions set forth in seriatim.

I. (1) I do not consider that an Imperial Advisory Council will be of any practical service to the country.

As sketched out in the Government of India letter, paragraphs 4 and 5, when such advisers know that they are to receive no legislative recognition, that they will not be vested with formal powers of any sort, and that they possess in themselves no formal powers of initiative, they are not likely to take much interest or be present in the meetings. In the constitution of the council the number of 20 ruling Chiefs is not at all necessary and is out of all proportions. If the Advisory Council is to be formed, it must at least be vested with some powers, the advisers may possess in themselves some powers of initiative, and may be given the right of interpellation.

II. (2) I think that a Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution. As regards its constitution, I beg to submit that each Deputy Commissioner of a district be asked to select one man as a member of this council and the total number of such men should form the Provincial Advisory Council.

III. (3) Yes, I do approve of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council according to the scheme sketched out in the Government of India letter, paragraph 12.

(4) Yes, I do approve of the proposal.

(5) I approve of the selection of a land-owner of this Province to the Imperial Council, but I beg to submit that any land-owner, whether great or small, providing he takes practical interest in agriculture, be selected for the Imperial Council; mere land-revenue qualification need not be the criterion of nomination. As regards selection or election, I beg to say that for the present selection by the head of the local Government in consultation with Deputy Commissioners of the districts is better.

(6) I do not consider it advisable to reply to this question.

IV. (7) Yes, I would advocate an increase in the present number of members. Excluding His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, I beg to suggest 15 should be the number of members; 5 out of them should be official members, 5 should be selected by the local Government, and 5 should be elected by the Provincial Advisory Council (as formed according to my suggestion in answer to question II (2) out of their own number).

(8) I have replied this question in the above answer.

(9) I do not advocate a fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class, let there be a fair field and no favour.

(10) I have replied this question in answer of question IV (7).

(11) I do not advocate separate representation of classes as they always lead to mutual dissensions.

(12) Please see my reply to question III (6).

V. (13) Yes, the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23.

(14) Yes.

(15) I do certainly advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members as early as possible.

SEWAK RAM,
P. O. Gangapur, District Lyallpur.

Answers to questions 1 to 9 and 11 to 15 are the same as given by Ishar Singh.

Answers to question IV.—(10) In each district the Deputy Commissioner in consultation with his district and municipal boards should nominate six efficient land-owners whether or not from among his boards. In the Punjab either the body thus formed should by mutual consultation elect members for the Provincial Council or His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor may himself nominate any six persons out of that body. To fix the proportion of these six members shall rest with the Deputy Commissioner and his district board.

Answers to questions re Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907.

Answer to question I.—(1) The Imperial Advisory Council is very important and useful for the administration of the country, but the number of the members should be still increased. It is better to make the number of the ruling Chiefs less than that proposed in the letter. The middle class land-owners whose annual income amounts to 5 or 6 thousand rupees should be admitted in this council, because the wealthy and the big land-owners are naturally ignorant of the welfare of the public at large.

Answer to question II.—(2) The Provincial Advisory Council too will prove useful for the management of the kingdom, provided that able and experienced members can be secured. This council too should include middle class land-holders and other persons of differnt classes. As to the rest I agree with paragraph 6 of the letter.

Answer to question III.—(3) The Imperial Legislative Council also requires an increase in its members. As the trade of the Punjab is increasing, it is especially necessary that the Punjab traders should be looked after; moreover the traders of all the provinces deserve the same favours as bestowed on the Calcutta and Bombay merchants.

Answer to question III.—(4) Members should be appointed by nomination and not by election because the latter mode is not useful. The member in question should be elected from among the fixed number of the Provincial Council members and the power of electing this number should be given to the council itself.

Answer to question III.—(5) This member should also be appointed by nomination. The method of election should be overlooked because it is useless.

Answer to question III.—(6) Out of the 4 Muhammadan members 2 should be taken by nomination and 2 by election.

Answer to question IV.—(7) As the number of the members in the Imperial Council is increased, the number of the members of the Punjab Legislative Council should also be increased a little.

Answer to question IV.—(8) In my opinion the mehod of nomination is better: I am against the method of election.

Answer to question IV.—(9) All classes residing in India should be represented having regard to their population and social status.

Answer to question IV.—(10) I would prefer nomination rather to election.

Answer to question IV.—(11) In my opinion the mode of nomination is more appropriate. The mode of election is not approved. If the Government approve the latter mode it is necessary to amend the constitution of district and municipal boards.

Answer to question IV.—(12) I do not like election, nomination is better.

Answer to question V.—(13) Members should be allowed to discuss.

Answer to question V.—(14) The members in the Provincial Council should also be allowed to hold discussion on the Budget.

Answer to question V.—(15) The members should always have liberty to interpellate; so long as it is not done it is impossible to solve the difficult problems in the administration of the country.

Answer to question I.—(1) The Imperial Advisory Council will prove useful for the country.

Paragraph 5, head (1) (2)—Agreed.

Head (3).—The number of the members is too few, it should be increased, i.e., in every division the municipal committee and the district board should appoint one man by election, and the ruling Chiefs should be nominated by the Government itself; the result would be that the member may be an adviser for the division. In case of land-owner, he should belong to an ancient land-owning family, he must be educated and efficient, and in case of a ruling Chief he must also be educated and efficient.

Heads 4 to 7.—Agreed.

Answer to question II.—(2) The Provincial Advisory Council will also prove useful for each Province. In paragraph 6 the number of the members of this council is shown less than that of the Imperial council, it should be equal if not more.

Answer to question III.—(4) I agree with paragraph 13 of the letter.

Answer to question III.—(5) I agree with the second form of paragraph 15.

Sikhs	1
3. Advocates—
Hindus	1
Muhammadans	1

6. Ruling Chiefs	2
TOTAL	24

In each district the municipal committee and district board should elect six land-owners. Out of the body thus formed in the Punjab the Punjab local Government shall nominate any six of them.

Answer to question IV.—(8) Appointments should be made by election.

Answer to question IV.—(9), paragraph 22 (a). Each class need not be represented. The classes and the proportion of representation should be that as laid down in answer to question IV (7).

Answer to question IV.—(10) The election should be made by the municipal committee and the district board as set forth in paragraph 22, head B, which should be read in the light of head C of this paragraph.

Answer to question IV.—(11) Vide answer to question IV (7).

Answer to question IV.—(12) The Muhammadans should be separately represented, and they should be elected by the Muhammadan members of the municipal committee and the district board, but a Muhammadan shall not be eligible unless he pays an income-tax on an income of 25,000 rupees, or owns 25,000 bighas of land, or owns land to the value of 25,000 rupees, or he pays land revenue amounting to 5,000 rupees.

Answer to question V.—(13) I agree with paragraph 23 of the letter.

Answer to question V.—(14) Discussion should be held on every head of the Budget.

Answer to question V.—(15) The members of the Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab should be authorised to put questions and hold discussions in the council.

Answers to questions re Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 28th August 1907.

Answer to question I.—(1) The Imperial Advisory Council shall prove useful.

Paragraph 5—

Head (1) is very appropriate.

Head (2) is appropriate.

Head (3)—There must at least be 60 members, including ruling Chiefs, whose number should be proportionate to the population; and in making their election education and ability should be kept in view, because high efficiency is essential for the advisers in political matters.

In case of land-holders, in addition to their position and respectability, due regard must be paid to their education and the length of standing of their landed qualification.

Head (4).—Three years seems a sufficient duration for holding office, for election may again be made.

Heads (5), (6), (7) are appropriate.

Answer to question II.—(2) The Provincial Advisory Council will prove useful and there seems no need to amend it.

Answer to question III.—(3) The Imperial Legislative Council needs increase of its members.

Paragraph 12, head (1).—The number should be increased from 54 to 56, because under head (D) of this paragraph it seems necessary that 2 Sikh members should be elected for the Punjab, having regard to the position of this community.

The other heads seem appropriate.

Answer to question III.—(4) It is appropriate.

Answer to question III.—(5) It seems proper that one member may be elected for the Imperial Council from the Punjab and his election be made in the following way:—All the district boards should elect one member each from among themselves, and then the body thus elected should elect a big land-owner whether or not from among themselves for the Imperial Council.

Answer to question III.—(6) It is proper that the Imperial Council should have 4 Muhammadan members, of whom 2 shall be nominated and the remaining 2 shall be elected by the Muhammadan members of the district boards in the manner detailed in the last answer.

Answer to question IV.—(7) In the Punjab the number of the non-official members should at least be 10.

Answer to question IV.—(8) We wish that non-official members should be appointed by election.

Answer to question IV.—(9) In the Punjab Province it is unnecessary to represent each class, it is sufficient to represent the following classes in the following proportion:—

Name of class.	No.
1. Muhammadan land-owners	3
2. Christian land-owners	1
3. Hindu land-owners	1
4. Sikh land-owners	2
5. Senate	1
6. Muhammadan traders	1
7. Hindu traders	1
TOTAL	10

Answer to question IV.—(10) In each district the Deputy Commissioner, in consultation with his district and municipal boards, should nominate 6 efficient land-owners, whether or not from among his boards. In the Punjab either the body thus formed should by mutual consultation elect members for the Provincial Council, or His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor may himself nominate any 6 persons.

Answer to question V.—(11) All classes need not be represented.

Answer to question IV.—(12) In the Punjab the Muhammadans should be separately represented, and this should be by election as set forth in answer to question IV (10).

Answer to question V.—(13) Discussion of the Imperial Budget should be held in the manner laid down in paragraph 23 of the letter.

Answer to question V.—(14) Discussion of the Provincial Council Budget should also be held on the lines suggested in paragraph 23 of the letter.

Answer to question V.—(15) In the Punjab Legislative Council the members should be allowed to interpellate.

ISHAR SINGH,
Yeoman grantee, of Chak no. 132,
Rakh Branch, Tahsil Lyallpur.

Letter, dated 8th November 1907.

From—SAIYID MEHDI SHAH, Honorary Magistrate, Mehdiabad, Gojra,
To—G. F. DEMONTMORENCY, Esq., Deputy Commissioner, Lyallpur.

In compliance with your wishes, I beg to submit herewith my humble opinion on the points in question on which opinions are desired in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th August 1907.

I.—Imperial Advisory Council.

This council would be much beneficial to the country, as has been sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter above.

The number of members 60 is too small. Ten ruling Chiefs are sufficient. These ruling Chiefs ought to be such who have proved themselves able rulers of their States, and have gained the good opinion of both the British Government and the subject. A large number of the territorial magnates would be of no use, as they generally do not know about the condition of the poorer classes. An ordinary zamindar, whose permanent annual income should not be less than Rs. 5,000, may be substituted instead of the territorial magnates.

I quite agree with sub-section 5 of paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter.

II.—Provincial Advisory Council.

This council is necessary, and will be a useful institution. Every member should be nominated by the Commissioners of each division after consulting the Deputy Commissioners of their respective districts.

III.—Imperial Legislative Council.

In my opinion the number of two members elected by the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay is not sufficient. One such member from the province of the Punjab should also be added as the trade of this Province is increasing daily with Europe viâ Karachi.

I agree with other sections.

(4) I quite agree with paragraph 13 of the Government letter.

(5) In my opinion one member should be nominated by the Governor-General from among the members of the Provincial Councils.

(6) Two Muhammadan members for the Imperial Council should be elected by the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Councils.

(7) There ought to be an increase in the members of the Legislative Council of the Punjab, as a small number of members could not represent the public feeling, and there should be one from each district.

IV.—The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.

(8) At present the system of nomination is better than election, as this country is rather backward in education, and especially the Muhammadans.

(9) The members should be taken from among the following classes:—

(1) Hindus,

(2) Sikhs,

(3) Muhammadans,

(4) Indian Christians, and they should be nominated and the number of members from each class should be fixed by Government according to the census.

If Government approves the election system, then I suggest that each class should elect its own member.

(10) I prefer nomination than election.

(11) If Government prefers the election system, then I suggest that every class should have the right of representing their own members for themselves, and it would also require the change in the present system of election of members for district boards and municipal committees.

(12) I suggest that Muhammadan members should be selected by nomination.

V.—Discussion of the Budget in the Legislative Council.

(13) I suggest that the right of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Council should be given to the members.

(14) Provincial Budget ought to be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council.

(15) The members of the Punjab Legislative Council should also have the right of interpellation.

MEHDI SHAH,
Hony. Magist., Mehdiabad, Gojra.

Punjab Government letter no. 46, dated 19th October 1907.

Proposals for giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters.

I. Imperial Advisory Council.—Question (1). I entertain no doubt that an Imperial Advisory Council would serve a very useful purpose as an instrument on the one hand for making the intentions of Government known to the people generally and removing the effects of misrepresentations by mischievous persons, and on the other for communicating to Government information with regard to the real trend of public opinion on its measures. I believe that if such a body had existed when the agitation of this year was going on, it would have done much good by counteracting the misrepresentations made in the press and at public meetings, and by removing the false impressions as to the intentions of Government that were being disseminated. The gap in the communication between Government and the people is a very wide one; and there is at present no means of bridging it by non-official agency. Only the most extreme views at present find expression, while the great mass of healthy public opinion remains silent. I think that an Imperial Advisory Council would justify its existence if it fulfilled no other functions than that of an intermediary between Government and the people, of an agency on which Government could on the one hand rely for having its intentions made clear and for being kept informed of the true state of public opinion, while on the other hand all that is sound in public opinion could look to the council to represent its views to Government.

This would at least be the initial idea of the functions of the council; but these functions appear capable of gradual development.

Advisory Councils, both Imperial and Provincial, consisting of nominated members, would be in accordance with native ideas of administration, far more so than Legislative Councils, partly composed of elected members whose sole object is often to criticise Government and to vote against it. We are too fond of transplanting bodily into our Indian administration systems which have sprung up and matured in the West, and of neglecting the essential difference of conditions.

II. Provincial Advisory Councils. Question (2) .—It seems scarcely necessary under this head to add to what has been said under the preceding one. The same necessity exists for a Provincial as for the Imperial Government to have some means, other than the ordinary official channels, of communicating its intentions and purposes to the people, and of ascertaining the real trend of public opinion on important questions.

A council of 20 chosen in the manner explained in paragraph 4 of the Punjab Government letter appears to be suitable. The body would not be unwieldy in dimensions, and it should be possible, with this number, to make selections so that all the various important interests existing in the province should be represented. It appears unnecessary to emphasize the fact that nomination as opposed to election is the only means in the present condition of society by which real representation can be secured.

III. Imperial Legislative Council. Question (3).—I think that the proposed number of the Imperial Legislative Council is too large and that the result would be an unwieldy body, that is of course if the power of nomination proposed were exercised to the full, which is perhaps improbable. It seems to me that the non-official members of a Provincial Legislative Council will never form a satisfactory electorate; and I would not add the four provinces proposed by D (b) in paragraph 12 of Government of India letter. The number under B might then be reduced to 16.

Question (4).—I have above expressed the opinion that election by the non-official members of the Provincial Council is not a satisfactory arrangement. At all events it is not for the Punjab.

Question (5).—The Government of India scheme (paragraph 12 of their letter) shows election by (i) nobles and (ii) great land-owners. In the question stated by the Punjab Government (i) are omitted, and the figures given in paragraph 5 are of land-owners paying land revenue. The Punjab is not a country of great land-owners, but it is a country of jagirdars, and if there is anything in the nature of a nobility in the Punjab, it is to be found in this class who are usually the representatives of former semi-independent Chiefs. This aspect of the question would appear to have been overlooked. It is possible that an electorate might be constituted, composed of assignees of land revenue and of land-owners receiving or paying, respectively, Rs. 5,000 and upwards per annum. But the number of jagirdars would be considerable, and the voters would be scattered all over the province, so that there could be no cohesion. I doubt, therefore, if any satisfactory system of election by such a constituency would be possible, and I think that nomination (third method in paragraph 13 of Government of India letter) is for the present at least the only way in which representation could be properly secured. Election might come later on. A list might be maintained of persons eligible, and these would ultimately be the electors.

Question (6).—I have not seen the statistics referred to in the closing section of paragraph 5 of the Punjab Government letter, but here too I think that, in the Punjab at least, we should be content for the present with nomination.

IV. Provincial Legislative Council of the Punjab. Question (7).—I think that experience has shown the necessity of increasing somewhat the present number of members of the Provincial Legislative Council. There has at times been trouble about securing a quorum, while there is not much choice for select committees. But the difficulty of maintaining the proper proportion of official members limits the possible total. Still I think the addition of two non-official members is advisable for the purpose of making the council more representative of the various interests in the province.

Question (8).—I think it would be premature to introduce any system of election at present. In this matter we must await the results of experience in older provinces and be content to follow their lead.

Questions (9)to (12).—A detailed answer to each of these questions does not in the above view appear to be necessary. I should be strongly opposed to giving the Punjab University an elected representative for the reason stated in the Punjab Government letter, i.e., that it would be a mistake to introduce a directly political element into that body.

V. Discussion of budget and interpellation. Question (13).—I have no opinion to offer under this head.

Question (14).—I do not think that the Punjab is sufficiently advanced, or that there is sufficient stability in the financial arrangements of this province to have Budget debates. This would no doubt, like other developments, come later. I see no fundamental objections to a system under which the Budget is laid before a Provincial Council and discussed, especially if there is some degree of decentralization in finance, but I do not think that in Punjab we are ready for such a system yet.

Question (15).—The power of interpellation would, if properly exercised, serve a useful purpose. But I scarcely think it can be said that in the Indian councils or indeed in the Imperial Parliament it can be said that there has not been a considerable amount of abuse of the privilege. Still I think I should be prepared to accept it with its attendant disadvantages.

H. S. P. DAVIES, Lieut.-Col.,
Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

Answers to the questions on which opinions are desired in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907.

(1) In the opinion of this Anjuman the proposed Imperial Advisory Council, if constituted on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter, would be useful and serviceable to the country.

As regards its constitution and duties, the Anjuman begs to suggest the following alterations:—

The number of ruling Chiefs may be reduced to 10. As the matter concerns British India generally these Chiefs are not fully in touch with our requirements, and the allotment of one-third of the seats to them seems to be out of proportion; besides, we are afraid these Chiefs on account of their own State affairs shall not be able to spare time.

As to the land-holders, only those who pay an annual revenue of Rs. 20,000 and above, should be held eligible for the nomination.

It is further respectfully suggested that the principle of representation by community formulated in connection with the Legislative Council should, here also, be kept in view, and not less than 8 seats may be reserved for the Muslims.

With reference to the tenure of membership, it should be limited to 3 years for the present; this short period would be expedient as the system is a new introduction.

The proceedings of the council, moreover, should not be kept confidential, as a frank interchange of opinion between the Government and the public will be rendered rather impossible thereby.

II. (2) Yes, a Provincial Advisory Council would certainly be necessary, in order to increase the utility of the Imperial Advisory Council. As to its constitution, duties, and number of members, this Anjuman begs to suggest the following:—

The number suggested by the Punjab Government in its letter, paragraph 4, is sufficient; as regards the qualifications of the members—

(a) Those land-holders who pay a revenue of Rs. 5,000 and upwards should be eligible for nomination.

Like the Imperial Advisory Council a certain number of seats should be reserved for Muslims in this council, which should be in proportion to their population and political importance.

We, however, agree with the Punjab Government, and think that there is no necessity of hampering the choice of the Government by fixing any number of seats for any particular profession.

III. (3) We beg to state that the enlargement of the Legislative Council would answer a long-felt want. We offer our profound gratitude to the Government for recognizing the importance of the Muslim element in the Indian politics by allotting them exclusively a certain number of seats. In this connection the following modifications are submitted:—

The maximum strength of the council might be raised from 54 to 58 including His Excellency the Viceroy. Out of the two seats thus obtained 2 more may be added under the head D (d) open to Muslims by election, as only 2 seats referred to in D (d) are hardly sufficient.

The remaining 2 seats might be added to the number of officials nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy under the head B in order to keep in tact the Government majority. The only other suggestion under paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter is that the electorate of nobles and great land-owners under the head D (c) should be confined to those only who pay an annual land revenue of not less than Rs. 5,000.

(4) We agree. The non-official element in the Provincial Legislative Councils as enlarged may safely be allowed to elect this one member.

(5) We beg to suggest that one of the great land-owners of this Province may be chosen by election, the electorates to consist of all land-owners paying an annual land revenue of Rs. 5,000 or above.

(6) We have already suggested that 6—4 by election and 2 by nomination—instead of 4 seats, should go to the Muslims. The composition of the electorate may be as outlined in paragraph 18 of Government of India letter, except that under sub-head (c) the amount of annual land revenue entitling a person to vote may be fixed at Rs. 5,000 or above and that of the annual income at Rs. 10,000 or above liable to income-tax.

The proposal to confine the electorate to the Muslim non-official members of the Provincial Council is not desirable, because of the numbers of the electors being too small.

IV. (7) The number of councillors for the Provincial Legislative Council may, with advantage, be raised to 27, including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor; out of this number 12 at least may be given to non-officials.

(8) Although the present system of nomination is working well, yet it is solicited that the principle of election should be recognized to a certain extent: 6 of the 12 non-official seats should be thrown open to election.

(9) It is difficult to suggest any precise rule for determining the proportion of seats and the particular classes to which they should be assigned, still we might present the following proposal in connection with this:—

The 12 unofficial seats may be distributed as follows:—

Muslims	6
Hindus	3
Sikhs	2
Christians	1
Total	12

Out of the six Muslims 3 may be nominated and 3 elected.

(10) As to the election of members it will be desirable to adopt the following scheme:—

Qualifications for candidates to membership—

(a) All persons paying an annual land revenue of Rs. 2,000 or above.

(b) All payers of income-tax on an annual income of Rs. 5,000 or above.

(c) All registered graduates of the University of at least 7 years' standing.

Qualifications of voters—

(a) Land-owners paying an annual revenue of Rs. 1,000 or more.

(b) Tax-payers on an income of Rs. 2,000 or above.

(c) Graduates of the University of at least 5 years' standing.

(11) The reply to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. In connection with the preparation of the list of voters, the Government may consult all well recognised Anjumans, etc.

As regards the second part we beg to represent that most of the evils in the present working of the municipal and district boards would disappear if the just principle of representation by community be also extended to these bodies as outlined in the Government of India letter, paragraph 22 (c).

(12) The method adopted should be election and the form suggested in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter.

V. (13) Yes.

(14) Yes. The answer applies to both the parts of the question.

(15) Yes.

ABDUL AZIZ,

Secretary, the Anjuman-i-Islamia,

Hoshiarpur.

The 16th December 1907.

Dated 1st December 1907.

From—Major F. Popham Young, C.I.E., Settlement Commissioner, Patiala,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

I have the honour to reply to your letter no. 46, dated 19th October 1907, in which my opinion is asked on the proposals put forward in the Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907, to your address.

2. On the general question of the association of the people of India with the administration my views are as follows:—

(a) It is clearly essential that we should make an advance in this direction. In doing so it will be a great mistake if we do not enlist on our side the brains of the country. We should endeavour to direct into the right channel the political activities of those who will certainly mould public opinion in the future. We must not enter into an offensive and defensive alliance solely with the conservative elements in Indian society. For we cannot be true to such an alliance. The British democracy is seated on the throne of Akbar. We must sink our foundations in full recognition of this fact, and of all that it means. The ruling Chiefs of India and the territorial magnates stand for prejudice, privilege, and reaction. This is of course a generalisation and as such contains, as all generalisations must do, an element of untruth. But it points, I think, the right moral. As the ferment of education spreads the process of disintegration will inevitably be accelerated. It will be wise and it will be right for us to delay that process, and to curb the impatience of the idealists. But not so, to fight it. I think that the educated Indian community regard the proposals put forward by the Government of India with suspicion. They think that we are making a bid for the support of the privileged classes on the one hand, and for that of the ignorant masses on the other. Is it inevitable that the educated middle class should be ranged against us? I do not think that it is. But if the proposals of the Government of India are accepted in their entirety, I do not think we shall have done anything to win them over to our side. Their political activities may be temporarily scotched. They certainly will not be killed.

(b) I think that the proposals to enlarge the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils, and to establish Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils on the lines sketched by the Government of India, begin at the wrong end. I would prefer to see an attempt made to associate the leading men of the district with the Deputy Commissioner. From that by a natural process of development will spring the association of the leading men of the Province with the Lieutenant-Governor. The spread of departmentalism, the root of which no doubt lies in a laudable desire for increased efficiency, has already undermined and weakened the position of the district officer. To my mind all our efforts should be directed towards repairing the mischief which has been done. A great opportunity lies before us in connection with the scheme now under consideration. I would build from the district upwards, and somewhat on the following lines.

3. I would establish in every district a council whose functions it would be to advise the Deputy Commissioner, to report on proposals (legislative or otherwise) affecting the administration, and generally to afford a channel of communication with the dawning intelligence of the country. I cannot attempt to elaborate this scheme in all its details. It will be readily understood how it would be carried out. Local municipalities and district boards would be represented. The delegates from these bodies might be elected. The Deputy Commissioner would nominate a number of councillors at least equal to the number of those elected. From the District Councils delegates would be chosen, partly by ballot, partly by nomination, to serve on Divisional Councils. These Councils would bear to the Commissioner of the division the same relation as the District Councils would bear to the Deputy Commissioner. From amongst divisional would be chosen the Provincial councillors, and from amongst the Provincial the Imperial councillors. The latter certainly, and the former probably, would be supplemented by members nominated by the Viceroy, or by the Lieutenant-Governor, and possibly there might be added to both bodies a few persons chosen by a limited and carefully selected electorate.

4. I am anxious to avoid entering into a lengthy disquisition on the scheme, the outlines of which I have thus briefly sketched. But I may perhaps usefully indicate the manner in which it might be worked. Say that the Government contemplate a Colonies Bill, or a Land Alienation Act, and that they want to invite the people to co-operate with them on certain lines for the improvement of village sanitation, or for the suppression of plague. The proposals and the ideas of Government, so far as these had been formulated, would be communicated to Deputy Commissioners through Commissioners. Before deciding the nature and extent of the reference to be made, the Imperial or the local Governments might consult their Advisory Councils. Detailed discussion of the measures proposed would then centre in the districts. All agitation (if agitation there must be) would at the outset be locally focused, and dissentient opinions would find a legitimate channel of expression. Professional opinion would, we will say, condemn a Land Alienation Act. Zamindari opinion would support it. Enlightened opinion would recommend radical measure for improving sanitation. The representatives of those who have more intimate acquaintance with "the harrow's tooth point" might beseech Government to "let ill alone." Eventually the District Councils would be ready with their opinions. These would again be considered, or, perhaps, debated in the Divisional Councils under the Presidentship of Commissioners. Here the conflicting views of Amritsar and Sialkot, of Ferozepore and Hoshiarpur, would be made apparent, perhaps reconciled, perhaps accentuated. Modified proposals might be submitted for further consideration to the District Councils. Finally, a similar process would enable the Lieutenant-Governor to accurately diagnose the feeling of the Province in relation to the measure under consideration.

I trust that I have said enough to make intelligible the general lines of the scheme which I would recommend for the consideration of Government. To attempt to clothe my skeleton with further detail would probably be to condemn it to prompt interment beneath the piles of manuscript which are no doubt accumulating as I write.

But I would most earnestly invite Government to consider whether they will not do wisely to build on the foundations, which have been dug for us by those who have created modern India in one short century. To me it seems that the airy structure contemplated by the Government of India will inevitably one day collapse and bury in its ruins not only the district officer but all that the district officer has achieved. I can imagine nothing more subversive of the relations which should subsist between the Deputy Commissioner and the people of his district, than a scheme which will eventually lead to the glorification of an irresponsible "member" with a lively imagination and a loose tongue at the expense of all the authority and all the prestige of the "Hakim Waqt." The Government of India may summon to their councils a Khan Sahib or a Lala Ji, in whom they may find a most obsequious adviser, with a marvellous aptitude for discerning the direction in which the breeze is setting. Or they may have thrust upon them a man, whose independent aptitude on subjects which he well knows to be safely outside the realm of practical politics, will make him the idol of a sensation-loving press. But they are not in a position to realise how the difficulties of local administration may be added to, when the honourable member returns home perhaps to patronise the Deputy Commissioner, telling him that he has mentioned to those seated in high places how well the district is being run; perhaps to thwart him by engineering popular contempt of his authority. The Government of India can hardly appreciate the bewilderment of the prosperous yeoman, well affected to the British Raj, who has always leaned on the strength of the "Bara Sahib," when he finds that the head of the district knows nothing of certain proposals, emanating from the seat of Government, of which all the bazar is talking. They will not witness the scene at the railway station when bands are braying and flags are flying, in honour of a gentleman to whom the Deputy Commissioner driving past in his modest equipage affords opportunity for the exercise of a nimble wit. I trust that it will not appear that I am introducing trivialities into the discussion of a subject of the gravest moment. But I do not think that any one who knows the East, and who understands something of the oriental outlook in regard to the dignity which should attach to the representatives of the "Sarkar," as well as to their actions, will regard the picture above presented as overdrawn, or minimise the importance of the consequences which may ensue from a careless disregard of sentiment. I fully realise that the suppression of brains, in whatever stratum of society they may develop, is neither practical nor desirable. Let us, however, train the man of advanced ideas (the idealist if he is entitled to arrogate that name to himself), by giving him opportunities for exercising a legitimate influence on the conduct of affairs at the outset, by associating him with others whose ideas differ from his, and by making him a responsible person, instead of allowing him to develop in irresponsibility until he is in a position to thwart our best efforts, owing to his having captured the imaginations of ignorant people by posing as the champion of all that is high sounding and hopelessly impracticable.

6. Since the effect of the proposals which I am venturing to put forward would be to shift the whole basis of the edifice which it is sought to raise, it is necessary for me to add a few more words of explanation before proceeding to answer the questions put categorically in your letter under reply.

I consider that the establishment of Advisory Councils is a most wise and necessary measure. But I would make these councils living things. We cannot establish a Parliament of the Indian people. But some of the main functions of a Parliament, the ascertainment of the views and wishes of the people, the dissemination of information, and the training in political responsibility of those who speak for the masses, can, as it seems to me, be very well discharged by such councils as I would propose to establish.

At present the flood of what passes for popular opinion in India is left to gather as it may. At times there seems to be no flood at all, nor even the possibility of any accumulation which could not be stemmed by the simplest embankment, hastily thrown up by the Executive or by the Legislature. At other times the tide goes roaring and there seems danger of encroachment in the highest sanctuaries. Instead of trying to deal with the flood when it is at its highest, should we not endeavour to control and regulate the runnels?

To this end I would invite those who by virtue of superior intelligence, or by virtue of hereditary associations, are entitled to be considered the real leaders of the general community to discuss with their Deputy Commissioners freely, and, as of right, all measures of the Government which directly or indirectly affect their interests.

The District Advisory Councils would for obvious reasons not be speciallly asked to air their views on the larger questions of Imperial policy. But even if they did offer to discuss such matters, no harm would be done. I would not therefore limit the intiative of District Councils in any way. Their main object would be to record their opinions in relation to any questions affecting local interests, and to afford to the district officer an opportunity of explaining the views and intentions of Government.

In addition to District Councils, I would establish Divisional, Provincial, and Imperial Advisory Councils. The real work of suggestion and criticism would be done by these councils. It would remain for the Legislative Councils to give effect to the deliberately framed policy of the responsible Government of the country. It seems to me that up to a certain point we cannot too openly and too freely take the people into our confidence: and that when we have made up our minds what line to take, we cannot too firmly and too decisively proceed to give effect to our conclusions. I do not suggest that absolutely no weight should attach to differences of opinion expressed in the Legislative Councils. But the stage of doubt and of deliberation should have passed before these bodies are asked to deal with the measures of Government. And it should only be necessary to accord due deference to expert opinion, directed to modifying those measures without altering their essential meaning. The demagogue, the professional orator, the "poseur" generally, is entirely out of place in a Legislative Council.

Such gentlemen will no doubt find their way into the Advisory Councils. But I would not invent a machinery for introducing them into the Legislative Councils, and then for nullifying their efforts by the force of official votes.

7. I cannot attempt to frame in the time at my disposal a complete scheme for the constitution, and for the working of Advisory Councils on the lines suggested. A rough outline of what is intended may be attempted—

(1) District Councils.

(a) Elected members	10	Possibly it would be better to have only 10 members in the District Councils, and to reduce the numbers of the Superior Advisory Councils also.
(b) Nominated by the district officer	10
	20

(2) Divisional Councils.

(a) Elected by each District Council 3, say	15 in all.
(b) Nominated by the Commissioner from each District Council 1, say	5 in all.
(c) Nominated by the Commissioner from leading men (native or European) not members of the District Council	3
(d) Elected by certain special constituencies, such as Universities, local Chambers of Commerce, planting or trading communities, etc.	2
	25

(3) Provincial Councils.

(a) Elected by each Divisional Council 3, say	15 in all.
(b) Nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor from the members of each Divisional Council 1, say	5 in all.
(c) Nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor from leading men (native or European) not members of the Divisional or District Councils	5
(d) Elected by certain special constituencies, such as Universities, local Chambers of Commerce, planting or trading communities, &c.	5
	30

(4) Imperial Councils.

(a) Elected by each Provincial Council 3, or	21 in all.
(b) Nominated by the Viceroy from the members of each Provincial Council 1, or	7 in all.
(c) Elected by each Advisory Council of the three Chief Commissionerships 2, or	6 in all.
(d) Nominated by the Viceroy from amongst the members of the Advisory Council of each Chief Commissionership 1, or	3 in all.
(e) Nominated by the Viceroy from amongst ruling Chiefs, nobles, and great land-owners, or the representatives of great industries	10
(f) Elected by the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay	2 6
(g) Elected by any other special constituencies
	55

I consider that if these councils are constituted somewhat in this way it will be easy to arrange that each and every class is adequately represented, without making any invidious distinctions, or unduly limiting the discretion of Government.

8. My answers to your questions are as follows:—

I. (1) I do not think that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter would be of any real service to the country. I think that an Imperial Advisory Council constituted in some such manner as has been suggested above, and given full opportunity to meet and discuss any measures proposed by Government, and to initiate proposals themselves, would be most useful.

II. (2) I think that a Provincial Advisory Council would be a most useful institution. I would suggest the modification previously stated in its constitution and duties.

III. (3) I do not think that much practical benefit to the country is likely to result from the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council. I think that a small addition to the number of that body would be politic. I would suggest that its constitution might be as follows:—

(A) Ex-officio—

As suggested by the Government of India 8

(B) Additional officials to be nominated not exceeding . . . 10

(C) A ruling Chief to be nominated by the Viceroy . . . 1

(D) Elected members—

(a) By the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay in rotation 1

(b) By the seven Provincial Advisory Councils 7

(c) By the Advisory Councils of the three Chief Commissionerships in rotation 2

(e) Non-officials nominated by the Viceroy to represent Universities or special interests 2

(f) Expect to be nominated by the Viceroy, when necessary, for special purposes 1

TOTAL 32

or including His Excellency the Viceroy 33

It will be seen that I propose to make the Advisory Councils the principal electorate. If these bodies be constituted as I suggest, I think they would fairly represent both the brains and the vested interests of India.

III. (4) I do not think that it is necessary to give to the Punjab Provincial Legislative Council, or indeed to any Legislative Council, a vote for a seat on the Imperial Legislative Council. I would transfer the voting power to the Advisory Council.

III. (5) I do not approve of the constitution of class electorates. By the scheme I advocate I consider that the great land-owners of the province will be given ample opportunity of swaying the counsels of Government in the Advisory Council. They will secure adequate representation on the District, Divisional, and Provincial Councils. And those amongst them who are members of the latter body will be able to vote for the Provincial representative on the Imperial Legislative Council.

III. (6) I would make no special mention of Muhammadans, or of any other castes or creeds, in defining either electorates or possible nominees. The machinery I propose would, I think, bring all classes into direct touch with the administration. Adequate representation of minorities or of politically backward communities could be secured without making invidious distinctions or advertising the necessity for State interference. My answers to the various questions enumerated under IV of the affix to your letter are necessarily coloured by all that I have written above.

(7) and (8) The enlargement of Provincial Legislative Councils is, I think, a matter of little practical importance. I would transfer to Advisory Councils certain of the present functions of Legislative Councils, which, having regard to the essential functions of those bodies, appear to me to be on the nature of excrescences. In order to appease sentiment, and to give to the more active and enlightened members of the native community an opportunity of fulfilling natural ambitions and for educating themselves in all branches of State-craft, I would increase the numbers of the Provincial Legislative Council from 9 to 12. Of these three should be elected by the Provincial Advisory Council, and three nominated from amongst non-officials by the Lieutenant-Governor. It would then be necessary for the Lieutenant-Governor to nominate six officials to his council. This could easily be done without dislocating the ordinary work of administration.

(9) I would not allot seats in the Provincial Council by classes. I would rather endeavour to make the electorate representative of all classes in the manner suggested above.

(10) I have already answered this question. By the method suggested district and municipal boards would in part elect the electors of members of the Provincial Council.

(11) I do not advocate the separate representation of classes. Nor do I think that, in connection with the reference under consideration, it is necessary to alter the present system of election for district and municipal boards. The composition of the proposed District Advisory Councils is the important matter. And I think that the representation of all interests on those bodies can best be secured by giving extensive powers of nomination to Deputy Commissioners.

(12) This question appears to require no further answer.

IV. (13) I would not give further opportunities to the members of either the Imperial or the Provincial Legislative Councils to discuss the Budget. I would give such opportunities to the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils instead. Members of the Legislative Councils would frequently be members of the Advisory Councils also. In any case they would, when the Budgets were discussed by the Advisory Councils, have an opportunity of considering them, and also of weighing such criticisms as might be offered in those councils. Probably it would be politic to allow to Legislative Councillors the same opportunities for expressing their opinions, as they have at present. The "ampler and more practical discussion" contemplated by the Government of India should, I think, take place in the Advisory Councils.

(14) I think that the Provincial Budget should be thoroughly discussed in the Provincial Advisory Council. The discussion in the Legislative Council can hardly be effective. An opportunity may, however, be given to Legislative Councillors to place on record views, which they will have an opportunity for forming with some deliberation. I think that the suggestion that the Budget should be discussed by separate heads is a good one.

(15) I think that the power of interpellation by members should be introduced into the Punjab Legislative Council. I fully recognise that this power has not in the past been exercised with uniform wisdom or discretion in other councils. And I have no doubt that in the Punjab questions will on occasions be asked, prompted solely by animus and not by any desire for information. But the questions will merely reflect the constitution of the council. And I think that it is best that they should find open expression.

9. I have only been able to present in outline the scheme which I would recommend for the consideration of the Government. Much remains to be said regarding the lines on which Advisory Councils should proceed, the opportunities which should be given to them for meeting, and many other matters which will suggest themselves to any one who may regard my proposals as worthy of serious consideration. They are based on the belief that it is of capital importance to maintain unimpaired the position of the district officer in India. They proceed on the assumption that a political education is even more of a necessity to the people of India than an appearance of political independence. I cannot help feeling that the only way in which we can really associate the people with ourselves in the business of administration is by inducing the natural leaders amongst the masses both to formulate opinions and to express them. At present they are hardly in a position to form any opinions at all, until they are asked to adopt those presented to them, with every artifice calculated to excite prejudice, by a class of irresponsible agitators. Moreover, I think that the class from which these very agitators spring can, and will, afford valuable assistance to the administration, if only the opportunity is given to them of exercising the influence which is theirs by right of superior education through legitimate channel and under the sobering influence of recognised responsibility.

I think that one of the main reasons for the unsatisfactory results which have followed our endeavours to allow to the people of this country opportunities for criticising Government measures is that we have sought to nurture in India a wholly foreign plant, instead of attempting to graft on an Eastern stock. It is absolutely foreign to Eastern ideas that the subject should stand up and vote against the expressed will of the ruler. But it is quite in accordance with practice that the subject should in open darbar urge his views upon his Chief, and endeavour to persuade him to reconsider his opinions. It will be perfectly consonant with the real Indian sentiment, if Deputy Commissioners, Commissioners, and Lieutenant-Governors hold darbars in which the counsels of those summoned to tender advice are presented with perfect freedom. The councils, which I suggest, will be such darbars. There will be no voting against the Government. Voting there will be, and the council may frequently not approve of the tentative proposals of Government. But in the result the collective opinion of the councils, or darbars, will be presented to the Government in the form of "advice." It will rest with the rulers of the country to decide whether the advice tendered should be followed or not. We shall in effect give to the people of this country full opportunities for placing on record their ideas and their wishes. And the machinery by which such ideas will be registered will create the least possible amount of friction. To invite the people of India to select by popular vote men, whose mandate will be to oppose the policy of the Government of India, when this has been deliberately framed, and unalterably fixed, is to invite them to acts which they, in their own minds, regard as acts of rebellion, pure and simple. And seeing that we have to make provision that the opposition shall be in the end impotent, the only results are the generation of heat, and the loss of dignity.

Answers to questions by M. Muhammad Hasan, Government Pensioner and Rais, regarding the proposed Imperial Advisory Council.

I. (1) The establishment of an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter is sure to prove of great service to this country.

As to paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter, I beg to suggest the following alterations:—

The number of ruling Chiefs proposed for the membership of the council is very large. It may be decreased; care should, however, be taken in the appointment of Musalman Chiefs who, although numerically few, enjoy a political and historical importance of their own.

The members should hold office for 3 instead of 5 years, as proposed in paragraph 5 (4) of the letter, in order that others may soon get a chance of being selected for the office. Besides, 3 years is the usual term of office for an office bearer in a meeting or a committee.

II. (2) The Provincial Council will serve the same purpose for a province as the Imperial one for whole India. I do not consider any modification necessary in the proposal made in paragraph 6 of Government of India letter.

III. (3) I am in favour of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council, and beg to suggest the following modifications in the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter:—

(a) The proposed strength of the Council may be increased by two members, who should be men well versed in Dharm Shastra and Muhammadan Law, respectively, as men well grounded in Hindu and Muhammadan Law are sure to prove of great help and advantage in the deliberations of the Legislative Council.

(b) In view of the fact referred to in paragraph 16 of the Government of India letter that the Muhammadan community has not so far received a measure of representation commensurate with its numbers and political and historical importance, I beg to suggest that the number of Muhammadan members referred to in paragraph 12, clause 2 (D), of the Government of India letter may be raised from 2 to 4. The proposed increase can be effected by decreasing the number of elected members mentioned in paragraph 12, clause 2 (D) (a) and (b), from 2 to 1, or in some other way.

(4) I entirely concur in the suggestions made in paragraph 13 of the Government's letter.

(5) I approve of the selection of one land-owner of the province to the Imperial Council, with this reservation that in provinces where land-owners are very backward from the point of education, they should be nominated by Government, while in case of provinces where education has sufficiently advanced the following methods of election can be resorted to with advantage by the following bodies:—

*(a) The Musalman members of Provincial Councils.

†(b) The Muhammadan Provincial or Viceregal darbaris.

(c) The Muhammadan title-holders of the province.

(d) The Muhammadan Fellows of the local University.

(e) The Muhammadan graduates of the University.

(f) The Muhammadan land-owners paying a certain sum of revenue to Government, the sum being fixed with regard to the capabilities of each province separately.

(g) The Muhammadan residents paying a certain amount of income-tax.

(6) As remarked in answer to question 3 (3), I recommend the appointment of 6 instead of 4 Muhammadan members to the Imperial Council. The election may be made by the following bodies:—

IV. (7) As an increase in the number of members of the Imperial Council has been considered advisable, I would beg to suggest that an increase should be made in the number of members of Provincial Councils also. I would add that at least one member should be taken from each district on the council.

(8) I am in favour of the present system of nomination for the Punjab on the following grounds:—

(a) The Punjab was annexed at a later period compared with other parts of British India.

(b) English education was introduced here subsequently.

(c) The Provincial Legislative Council was established here only recently.

(d) In spite of the preponderance of Musalman population the Hindus hold nearly all important posts under Government, and a large number of them is serving on municipal and district boards. In case of election the Hindus will secure a larger number of seats than is commensurate with their numerical strength in the province.

*(a) The zamindar members of the Provincial Council.

†(b) The zamindars who are eligible for an appointment as a member of the Council.

(e) In spite of the fact that perfect liberty is allowed to all sections of His Majesty's subjects in the matter of their religion, instances are to be found where Musalmans living in villages, where the Hindu or Sikh element preponderates, are forbidden to say their prayers, &c., in an open manner. It can, therefore, be well imagined how Musalmans so situated can dare to oppose their Hindu fellow-subjects in other matters.

(f) As the Punjab has been lately ruled by the Sikhs, they enjoy considerable influence in villages, and the Musalman population thereof dare not place themselves in conflict with the former.

(g) The Musalmans being as a rule indebted to Hndu Mahajans, &c., they are generally afraid to give an opinion adverse to their Hindu creditors.

(h) With regard to their numerical strength the following proportion is calculated to safeguard the interests of the different sections of native communities residing in the Punjab.

Muhammadan members	15
Hindu members	12
Christian members	1

and as the Sikhs exercise considerable importance in the Province, seeing that they were lately in exercise of supreme power and even now supply best material for the army, one-third of the Hindu members may consist of the Sikhs.

(10) In case election is resorted to through municipal or district boards, I would suggest that with the exception of the election of official members, the Musalman electors should elect Musalman members and the Hindus (who include the Sikhs) the Hindu members.

(11) I am in favour of the separate representation of classes as proposed in paragraph 22 (a) of the Government of India letter, provided the changes suggested in clause (c), paragraph 22, of that letter are caried into effect relating to the constitution of municipal committees and district boards.

(12) In case provision is made for the separate representation of Muhammadans I would recommend that their selection should be made by means of nomination.

(V). (13) I approve of the system suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter for the discussion of the Budget in the Legislative Council.

(14) I am of opinion that the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council, its discussion by separate heads being carried in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(15) Yes. I advocate that the concession be given to the members.

No. 28-P., dated Delhi, 12th November 1907.

From—A. MEREDITH, Esq., C.S., Commissioner and Political Agent, Delhi Division,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

With reference to your confidential letter no. 2610, dated 26th September 1907, I have the honour to inform you that I discussed the proposals relating to the establishment of Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils with the Raja of Sirmur on my recent visit to his State, but I could not induce him to give me a decided opinion, as he said he had not sufficiently studied the correspondence. He promised to send me his written opinion, and I now forward copy of his letter no. 12, dated 6th November 1907, on the subject.

To—The Commissioner and Political Agent, Delhi Division.

In acknowledging the receipt of your confidential letter no. 1821, dater 30th September 1907, forwarding a copy of a letter no. 2310—2317, dated Simla, the 24th

August 1907, from the Secretary to the Government of India, regarding the measures necessary for giving to the people of India a greater voice in administrative matters, and asking my opinion regarding the Advisory Councils, especially the services of the ruling Chiefs on them, I have much pleasure to say in reply to the said letter, and with reference to the verbal conversation we had at Nahan lately while you were here, that as the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils will be formed for purely consultative purposes and the ruling Chiefs will be consulted either individually or collectively on matters referred to them, I have nothing special to add, but quite agree to the proposals contained in the Government letter under reference which in my opinion will serve the purpose admirably for which the said councils are intended.

Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

Replies to questions in connection with Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th August 1907.

I. (1) I consider that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines suggested would be beneficial to the country, and this generally is the opinion of the Indian gentlemen whom I have consulted. As to its constitution the number of seats allowed to ruling Chiefs seems to be somewhat too large, and one or two gentlemen whom I have consulted are rightly, I think, of the opinion that ruling Chiefs are not always in touch with public feeling in British India. I think also that when the council was called together to deliberate the question of precedence with respect to ruling Chiefs might possibly lead to misunderstandings. Another question which arises is the natural dislike of a ruling Chief to leave his own dominions and become an individual member of a deliberative assembly.

II. (2) A Provincial Advisory Council would certainly be useful. There are no dissensions as to this among the Indian gentlemen with whom I have consulted. As to its constitution, that proposed in paragraph 6 of Government of India letter seems sound. The numbers proposed in Chief Secretary, Punjab Government's letter, paragraph 4, seem too small. In order to properly represent all classes and interests they should, I think, be increased. Again the question of ruling Chiefs comes in. Unless His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor were to preside himself over this consultative body the question of precedence would be a difficult one.

III. (3) I approve of the proposal to enlarge the Imperial Legislative Council and of the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter.

(4) I approve of the proposal that one member be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council as proposed in paragraph 13.

(5) I approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners in the Province, but as he must of necessity be well educated in English in order to properly understand the proceedings the choice will be extremely restricted. For the Punjab, therefore, there seems no necessity for resorting to election. I consider that he should be nominated. The majority of the gentlemen I have consulted are in favour of nomination rather than election of this representation of the land-owners of the Province.

(6) I approve of the proposal to appoint 4 Muhammadans to the Imperial Legislative Council—2 by election and 2 by nomination. I recommend that the two elected members be so elected by members of the Provincial Council and not by an electorate. If an electorate be decided on it might consist of graduates of the Punjab University and land-owners paying Rs. 1,000 and upwards land revenue.

IV. (7) An increase in the numbers of the Punjab Legislative Council appears necessary, I approve that there should be 10 official members and 8 non-official.

(8) I would maintain the present system of nomination.

(9) In either case I consider that a fixed rule determining the proportions of the seats to be allotted to each class should be made 4 nominated and 4 elected:—

Land-owners—	Hindu.	Muhammadan.
Nominated	1	1
Elected	1	1
Trade	1	1
Professions	1	1

(10) If elections are to take place it might be through district boards for land-owners and through municipal committees for trades and professions, but I strongly deprecate the introduction of elections into the Punjab.

(11) I do not consider that the proposals contained in paragraph 22 (b) are exactly suitable, and the proposals contained in paragraph 22 (c) appear too elaborate for the needs of the Province. If they be considered necessary I would prefer to consult municipalities and district boards separately and thoroughly as to the classes into which they would divide themselves before giving a definite opinion.

(12) As already stated, I consider that Muhammadans should be nominated. If they are to be elected the electorate should, I consider, consist of registered graduates of an Indian University and of more than five years' standing, and all payers of land revenue exceeding Rs. 1,000 a year, together with all payers of income-tax of Rs. 2,000 and upwards.

V. (13) I agree to the proposed alteration.

(14) I consider that the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Provincial Legislative Council under separate heads in the manner proposed.

(15) The power of interpellation might be usefully granted.

In conclusion I may add that no member should be appointed or elected to the Imperial or Provincial Legislative Council who has not a sufficient knowledge of English to thoroughly understand the proceedings. I have no statistics at hand showing how many of the land-owning and trading classes have this knowledge, and if they can only elect members from amongst their own community this choice will be very restricted.

Deputy Commissioner, Hoshiarpur.

No. 82, dated 20th November 1907.

From—R. E. Younghusband, Esq., C.S., Commissioner, Lahore Division,
To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

Your letter no. 2610-S., dated the 26th September last, reached me at Dalhousie just after I had completed a long tour in Chamba, in which I was accompanied by His Highness the Raja, and I did not have another opportunity of discussing the subject of your letter with him. We had, it is true, discussed the subject of the proposed Advisory Councils on more than one occasion during our tour, but the Raja is very guarded in the expression of his opinions, and I did not feel able to state fully what his views on the subject were. I therefore asked him to let me have them in writing for the information of Government. I now enclose a copy of a demi-official letter, dated the 16th instant, from him, in which he expresses the opinions that the establishment of Advisory Councils will be a wise and useful measure, and that ruling Chiefs will consider it an honour to serve on these Councils.

R. E. YOUNGHUSBAND,
Commissioner, Lahore Division.

Demi-official letter, dated 16th November 1907.

From—His Highness Raja Sir Bhure Singh, K.C.I.E., C.I.E., Chief of Chamba,

To—R. E. Younghusband, Esq., Commissioner, Lahore Division.

As promised in my previous letter, I beg to submit the following opinion with regard to the proposed constitution of the Imperial and Provincial Councils:—

1. I consider the establishment of such councils by Government as a most important and benign measure, having for its object the association of the aristocratic classes in the administration of India. I am sure that the class of men Government is likely to select to sit on the councils will be more suitable to represent the interests of their communities than would have been the case had the selection of the councillors been left to election. This method would have admitted educated men who would naturally have advocated things according to their new ideas and thoughts. I am sure these councillors will try their best to discharge the responsibilities with which Government is entrusting them faithfully and honestly. They will be in the position of advisers, and not critics who like criticising the actions of others, knowing that they will never be called upon to answer for or put their views into practice. I do not believe for a minute that these councillors will act so meanly as they are represented as likely to do in the Indian newspapers. They are to offer their opinions on measures from the side of the people, viz., to explain to Government how they think they are likely to affect the interests of the communities they represent, and also to state the case from their own standpoint. I do not believe the Indian gentry have fallen so low as not to have the courage of their convictions in stating the case clearly before Government for its consideration and final disposal.

2. I am only sceptical on one point where the letter says that such Councillors will be a sort of medium between Government and the people for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions, and objects of Government when the measures discussed with the councillors are to be treated as confidential. I believe that Government means that after the measures have passed the consultation stage, the councillors will be at liberty to explain the reasons and objects of the same to the people so as to avoid any chance of misapprehension on the part of the public.

3. These councils are not to receive any legislative recognition. I do not think such is needed, unless it is considered necessary to remove any misunderstanding on the part of the people that these councils will continue to be maintained. I mention this, as people are apprehensive that these councils are not likely to last long, and they are being compared with the "Councillors of the Empire" who were appointed by Lord Lytton.

4. I have personally nothing to say against the proposed constitution of these Advisory Councils, and am sure this step forward will be much appreciated by the ruling Chiefs and the magnates of India, and I am convinced that those who are nominated will regard it as an honour to serve on the councils. We Indians are deeply indebted to Lord Minto's Government for having seen the practicability of associating us in the administration of the country. I hope the people of India and the ruling Princes who are likely to have the honour of sitting on these councils will use every effort to help Government with their advice, and thereby show that they are loyal and faithful subjects of the Crown and capable of assisting Government in making the British rule in India a permanent blessing. I am sure the hope I have expressed here is general among all my brother ruling Chiefs and magnates in British India, and that they fully realize their obligation to identify themselves with Englishmen in asserting the British supremacy and in striving to further by every means in their power the best interests of India.

BHURE SINGH,
Chief of Chamba.

No. 4107, dated Jullundur, 13th December 1907.

From—Lieutenant-Colonel H. S. P. Davies, Commissioner, Jullundur Division,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

In compliance with the orders conveyed in your letter no. 2610-S., dated the 26th September 1907, I have the honour to report that I forwarded a copy of the Government of India letter no. 2314, dated 24th August 1907, regarding the measures necessary for giving the people of India a greater voice in administrative matters, to His Highness the Raja of Kapurthala on his return from Europe last month, and that I recently took an opportunity of discussing informally and privately with him the proposals so far as they concern the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils. I have now to report the views of His Highness as gathered during my discussion of the subject with him:—

Imperial Advisory Council.—His Highness is in favour of such a council on the lines suggested, but considers that half the number of members should be ruling Chiefs or their near relations, and that the remainder should be nominated from among the largest land-owners in the country. His Highness would advocate the admission of only territorial magnates having a very large income as members of such a council.

Provincial Advisory Council.—His Highness is in favour of the proposal, but does not consider it advisable that any ruling Chief should be a member, and is of opinion that this council should be of a representative character and should include land-owners, influential members of the professions, and mercantile community, etc.

H. S. P. DAVIES, Lieutenant-Colonel,
Commissioner, Jullundur Division.

No. 3687, dated Patiala, 26th-27th November 1907.

From—Lieutenant-Colonel C. M. Dallas, I.A., Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

With reference to your no. 2610 S., dated 26th September 1907, I have the honour to forward herewith, in original, the opinions of the Rajas of Jind and Nabha, regarding the proposals of the Government of India to form Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils.

His Highness the Raja of Nabha has also favoured me with his opinion regarding the other measures suggested by the Government of India for giving the people of this country a greater voice in administrative matters in the form of answers to the questions forwarded with your letter to all Commissioners. These he saw published in the Gazette, and so has answered them.

2. I have also discussed this matter with both the Chiefs, and I think the opinion they have given in writing express their real views. Neither of them, however, were very sure that the members of the Advisory Councils, except perhaps the ruling Chiefs, would give their true views when asked for their individual opinions.

The Raja of Jind also thought that although a more useful opinion could be obtained by collective consultation, still owing to the great expense and trouble of collecting many ruling Chiefs in one place, it would not be advisable to call them together frequently for collective consultation. He thought ruling Chiefs might be cousulted individually, and the other members collectively. His Highness of Jind also did not approve of the Muhammadans being specially selected for representation on the Legislative Council; he thought Sikhs ought to be also represented, and preferred that a certain number of seats for nomination by His Excellency the Viceroy should be reserved from among which His Excellency could nominate Muhammadans, Sikhs, or any other classes which required special representation. He had no objection to Muhammadans being nominated, but thought that if four seats were exclusively set aside for them, they might be unduly represented. I think this suggestion requires consideration. His Highness of Nabha too was really of a similar opinion, but he has expressed his opinion more fully than the Raja of Jind, and I cannot add anything to that opinion from our conversation.

3. On the whole I gathered that both the Rajas were in favour of the Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the Legislative Councils, but they were a little apprehensive lest these measures having been put forward at this time might lead the disaffected section of the people to think that it was on account of their agitation that these changes had been now suggested. It would, they thought, have been better to wait a little longer.

Another point His Highness of Nabha touched upon was that if the advice of the Advisory Councils was never taken, it would tend to disaffection, and therefore he hoped that their advice would sometimes be taken.

4. His Highness of Nabha also suggested that all the ruling Chiefs on the Imperial Advisory Council should spend the summer at Simla, so that His Excellency the Viceroy might consult them whenever he wished to do so, and also might keep an eye on them and prevent them from getting into mischief. This, however, seems rather a personal matter, and was no doubt suggested by His Highness in order to furnish an excuse for his own presence there. I told him I thought this might be rather hard on Chiefs whose States were at a distance from Simla and who had cool hill stations either in their own States or nearer to them than Simla. I mention this suggestion, however, as His Highness spoke of it.

C. M. DALLAS, Lieutenant-Colonel,
Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur.

Dated Sangrur, November 1907.

From—His Highness Raja-i-Rajagan Ranbir Singh, Chief of Jind,

To—The Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur.

With reference to your demi-official no. 3093, dated the 1st October 1907, forwarding a copy of a letter from the Government of India, no. 2310—2317, dated the 24th August 1907, I wish to express, at the outset, my warm appreciation of His Excellency the Viceroy's noble idea.

2. As I am chiefly concerned with the establishment of Advisory Councils, I need express my opinion only in their connection. To begin with, I am frankly of opinion that these institutions will be of considerable service alike to the Government and the people. They will also prove to be of great advantage to the ruling Chiefs, as association with the Government of India in important matters of common and Imperial interests will indirectly bring forth most happy results.

3. I am an advocate of the ruling Chiefs being included in the Advisory Councils, especially the Imperial.

4. The members of the Advisory Council may be consulted individually or collectively, but for ruling Chiefs preferably by the former method. In connection with collective consultations, I would like to suggest that ruling Chiefs' seats might be distinct from those of the other members.

RANBIR SINGH,
Chief of Jind.

Dated Nabha, 1907.

From—Colonel His Highness Raja-i-Rajagan Raja Hira Singh, G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., Chief of Nabha,

To—The Political Agent, Phulkian States and Bahawalpur.

In reply to your letter no. 3093, dated the 1st October 1907, I inform you that my personal views on the establishment of the Advisory Council are given in this letter which runs as follows, and formal answers to formal questions as given in Government Punjab notification no. 2643, dated 27th September 1907, are attached apart.

2. Proposals of the Imperial Government to disseminate widespread knowledge of the intentions and measures in contemplation of the Government anent public welfare and to invite opinions thereon are liberal. It is true indeed that inviting opinions on measures of sufficient administrative or legislative importance is in keeping with the traditions of the country, but it is equally true that in no period the process was graced with such formality and solemnity as is now proposed to be attached to it, and it is consequently undeniable that this new phase will in shaping the policy of the Government give weight and respect to the opinions tendered quite unprecedented. It is so, I see a very healthy and beneficent proposal, but that in its operation it may prove strictly true to its nature; it is highly essential that greatest care and circumspection should be bestowed upon the selection of the men who will be called upon to constitute Advisory Councils. Though these Councils are not for the time endowed with any legally binding or coercive power to enforce their views upon the Government, yet when once they come into existence it will not be an easy thing for the Government to thwart and ignore persistently the united volume of their views propounded. The institution which is at this time proposed to be set on foot as mere experimental seems in the long run destined to acquire an importance of its own and assume position entitling it to be regarded as an essential element of the constitution. The component parts of this institution, therefore, in my opinion, ought to be quite above the reach of any bias either this way or that, and who in their judgments should be guided by the principles of highest Government interests. In fact, their case ought to be that of the saw which pours forth bounties both sides and not that of the adze which works for the behoof of one side. It is equally essential that these noblemen should be sufficiently inured into politics, so that their judgments should be based upon rightful view of things. They are bound to be well aware with the nature and extent of the rights and duties of the subjects and the nature and extent of the prerogatives and responsibilities of the Government. It ought not to be regarded, moreover, I conceive inconsistent with the responsibilities of so sapient and impartial a class of the people of the land that besides dealing with the questions referred to them, they should be allowed to approach informally the Government suo moto with their suggestions on some vital questions of the day. Without some restrictive initiative being accorded to so high a class of the people as the proposed Advisory Councils are expected to consist of, it cannot be affirmed that they are conceded credit and trust which from their high position they do deserve. It is a matter of experience that most often it happens that the people are seething with a grievance, but the current of popular indignation does not run so high and boisterously that the existence of the grievance should come within the knowledge of the authorities. In such conjuncture too, this class of the notables are, by enlightening the Government with real state of things and by suggesting them how to manage the situation, likely to prove of material service to the Government.

The more I reflect upon the scheme set afoot, the more I find myself overpowered by the sense of thankfulness to the Government. The Bengalis and the Aryas may in their conceitedness ascribe to themselves place in as high an intellectual plane as they will, but I amongst many of my ways of thinking cannot but find reason to be diffident (for the present at least) of the capabilities of the Indians to take share with their leaders in the administrative work of the country, until the social regeneration of the natives is worth a bit. I admit that our brothers could enfranchise themselves sooner and claim position amongst the most advanced nations of the world, if they were not slow to raise themselves above the mischievous teaching of the Purans and to dedicate themselves devotedly to Vedant Philosophy. I am sanguine that English education, too, must have proved quite a boon to them, but the most regrettable thing it is that the incomparably elevating influences of the most learned language of the world are more than countervailed by the rigid traditional outpourings of the Brahmans who would resent implacably and uncompromisingly at our slightly cutting a new improved path. The baneful effect (and indirect effect of course) of these outpourings is sufficiently borne witness to by the present hostile stand taken by my countrymen against their benefactors.

3. If this stage of our condition it is very unparalleledly generous of the Government to take us in confidence, and to say and talk so euphemistically and flatteringly of our qualifications to take share in practical administration. For this act of pure generosity there will be none who will not feel extremely grateful to the authorities.

4. The responsibilities proposed to be imposed are, however, very onerous, and it is not an easy thing to discharge them adequately. I believe that only members will exert themselves well who join diffidently; those who are forward in their claims, and would have seats in the council as their undisputed right, are presumptuous, and their presumptuousness is attributable to their ignorance of the sacred nature of the duties to be done. Before enlisting any man for the purpose, it will therefore be advisable to gauge him in respect of all his phases—literacy, blood, social and moral aptitude. I by no means intend to suggest that only persons should be nominated who obsequiously take their cue from the overlords, that would mean no more than to pack the house with ornamental chairs. I, like others, on the other hand, would like to see only magnates of the realm assemble in the Council Halls who are men of sufficient independence, but at the same time it is essentially necessary that they in their judgments should be inspired and actuated by the most loyal, and beneficent, and by no means any sordid motives either this way or that.

HIRA SINGH,
Chief of Nabha.

Answers to questions as given in the Government of Punjab Notification, no. 2643, dated 27th September 1907.

Question 1.—(1) Imperial Advisory Council.—Do you consider that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter would be of service to the country, and if so, do you suggest any alterations in the proposals made in paragraph 5 regarding its constitution and duties?

Answer.—I am confident that this council will bear good fruit, provided only the best men of the soil are enlisted therein.

With reference to clause 3, paragraph 5, it is essential to suggest that from every section of the Indian community one or two ruling Chiefs who so deserve merely by virtue of their personal ability may be allotted seats in the council. As regards other members, it seems to be recommendable that first lists be drawn up of the best eligible inhabitants of all the districts, and then from amongst so selected people nomination be made of the most competent men of all.

On clause 4, paragraph 5, I have simply to remark that no doubt the term five years is most approvable, but this term may not be conterminous with the term of each Viceroyalty; on the contrary, it ought to span the half period of each Viceroy, so that the new Viceroy may have the benefit of the experience of the old councillors.

The limitation made in clause 6, paragaph 5, that its functions should be purely advisory, and that it should deal only with such matters as might be specifically referred to it from time to time, is not well conceived. When journals of the day are suffered to criticise all administrative and executive measures of the Government so freely and openly, there can be no justification. I think, in withholding from the Chiefs and notables of the country in whose staunch and unwavering fidelity the Government has perfect trust the right of propounding in a private conclave measures appertaining to the Government or public welfare, which they deem peremptorily called for. Sound policy necessitates it, however, that where a member has submitted a new proposal, and that has found approval in the eyes of the authorities, they in order that the propounder may not conceive an overweening opinion of himself must allow some time to elapse before bringing it into practice.

Clause 7, paragraph 5, is well intended, but not well conceived. Where so good a number of the people do assemble and discuss, to try to keep the proceedings strictly confidential and secret is to contend against impossibility. Public curiosity is bound to be on the tiptoe on such occasions, and it is but unnatural to expect from all the members who do take part to be strictly close—secret-keepers. Also it is impossible to identify the man who allows some thing to leak out from him deliberately or inadvertently: some bits or scraps of the proceedings are sure to transpire. Under such circumstances, the only result will be that this state of things will give rise to wild surmises, much misrepresentation, and much misunderstanding of the intentions of the Government. So in this instance the history of the British Parliament will repeat itself.

Question II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—Do you think that a Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution, and, if so, would you suggest any modification in the proposals made above and in paragraph 6 of the Government of India letter regarding its constitution and duties?

Answer.—I most vehemently approve of the establishment of the Provincial Advisory Councils; the system will be very serviceable; the manner of appointment of the councillors, however, should absolutely rest with the Government.

Question III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—Do you approve of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council, and, if so, would you suggest any modifications in the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter?

Answer.—I do not see reason to say anything against the enlargement of the Legislative Council. But as the motive of self-consideration is the great vice of my countrymen, it is therefore that we have so very irreconcilable divergence of views. It is unanimity and uniformity and smoothness of action that conduces to much good, and that is obtainable only by self-denial and self-abnegation.

Question (4).—In particular, do you approve of the proposal, that one member should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council, as proposed in paragraph 13 of the letter?

Answer.—The proposal that Provincial Legislative Council should send its one member of the Imperial Legislative Council is well conceived.

Question (5).—Do you approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners of this province to the Imperial Council, and, if so, by which of the three methods suggested in paragraph 15 of the letter (or by what other method) should he be selected? If by direct election, what should be the electorate?

Answer.—Indeed of the great land proprietors of this province, one member should be sent up to the Imperial Legislative Council; and his election may be made thus,—first every district officer may call on the land-lords of his district to elect one of themselves to form a body of electors which body again may elect one of themselves for Imperial Legislative Council.

Question (6).—Do you approve of the proposed appointment of four Muhammadans to the Imperial Council, two by election and two at least by nomination as suggested under heads D (d) and (e) of paragraph 12 of the letter? Would you recommend that the elected members should be elected by the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Councils or by some such electorate as that described in paragraph 18 of the letter.

Answer.—I cannot endorse the provision in contemplation for special representation of the Muhammadans; such distinctions are calculated to create breaches; otherwise every other section should be gifted with the right of special representation; but it is best not to make distinctions, and to make nomination or election depend upon personal worth alone irrespective of caste or creed.

Question IV (7). The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—Would you advocate an increase in the present number of members, and, if so, to what figure?

Answer.—The enlargement of the Provincial Legislative Council, it is hoped, will prove beneficial, and the number of the councillors may advantageously be increased to 16, 17, or 27.

Question (8).—Would you maintain the present system of nomination, or would you have any or all of the unofficial seats filled by election?

Answer.—I appreciate nomination of course, but this much deserves consideration that when members are elected by universal suffrage, public opinion has faith in them and backs them in all their representations whatever they be; so if it is intended to influence public opinion, the system of election ought to have preference.

Question (9).—In either case would you advocate fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class (paragraph 22 (a) of the Government of India letter), and, if so, what classes do you consider should be represented and in what proportion?

Answer.—One and the same principle should be the lodestar of both the Imperial and Legislative Councils, and in order to recruit both preferably personal worth should alone have regard.

Question (10).—If election is resorted to for the appointment of all or any of the unofficial members, would you advocate election through municipal or district boards? If so, on what system would the election be made? If not, what electorates would you suggest?

Answer.—The procedure that is current is alright, but election should be decidedly based upon personal worth.

Question (11).—If you advocate separate representation of classes as proposed in paragraph 22 (a) of the Government of India letter, would you carry it out in the manner proposed in paragraph 22 (b) and would you suggest any corresponding changes in the constitution of municipal and district boards in the manner indicated in paragraph 22 (c) or in any other manner?

Answer.—It has already been answered (vide answer (6)).

Question (12).—If you think provision should be made for the separate representation of Muhammadans in addition to that open to them by nomination or election in the ordinary way would you provide for such representation by nomination or by election, and, if by election, would you adopt the form of electorate suggested in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter, or what other form would you propose?

Answer.—Vide answer (6).

Question V. (13) Discussion of the Budget in the Legislative Council.—Do you consider that the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter?

Answer.—As regards the discussion on the Budget in the Legislative Council, the changes proposed by the Government are well advised.

Question (14).—Do you consider that the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council, and, if so, would you advocate its discussion by separate heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter?

Answer.—Here too the discussion is necessary and ought to be guided by the same principle as in the Imperial Council.

Question (15).—Do you advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members?

Answer.—The right of questioning in the Punjab Legislative Council, I believe, will prove as beneficial as it has already been in the case of the Imperial Council. This system necessarily brings many important points to light.

HIRA SINGH,

Chief of Nabha.

No. 884, dated Lahore, 20th December 1907.

From—The Hon'ble Mr. J. Wilson, C.S.I., Financial Commissioner, Punjab,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

I have the honour, in reply to your letter no. 46, dated 19th October 1907, to submit my opinion on the proposals made by the Government of India for giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters.

2. I may be permitted to say that I am in entire sympathy with the policy embodied in these proposals. I think that, notwithstanding the consistent efforts which have been made, at all events in recent years, to take the people more into the confidence of the Government, there is still among the masses of the people a great want of understanding of the intentions of Government which it is desirable to remove, and that one of the best means of encouraging that understanding will be the establishment of Advisory Councils, such as are now suggested in Sir Harold Stuart's letter, to which the executive Government should explain its action and the measures it proposes to adopt. I also recognise that the time has come when the true representatives of the people of India should be given a greater say in administrative measures, and these Advisory Councils and the enlarged Legislative Councils will form the most satisfactory medium for enabling them to express their ideas and wishes and to bring them to the notice of Government. But for the success of the scheme two precautions are essential. In the first place nothing must be done which will imperil the true welfare of the masses of the people in the interests of any class, however important or influential, or exacting in its demands. In my opinion no section of the population of this country is yet fit to be entrusted with uncontrolled power over its fellow-subjects; and whatever changes are made in the system of government, it is imperative that the real ultimate power of legislation and of executive action should remain in the hands of the Government as at present constituted, whose responsibility for the good administration of the country must remain unimpaired. I am, therefore, glad to see that under the present proposals the Government will continue to command a majority of votes on the Legislative Councils, and that the Advisory Councils will not be invested with formal powers of any sort.

3. The second essential is that, when inviting the people of India to take a larger part in devising legislative and administrative measures, we should see that we secure the advice of the true representatives of the people. A strong demand has lately been made for the special recognition of the claims of the so-called "educated classes" to a greater share in the government of the country, and this claim may to a certain extent be admitted. But care must be taken that the true importance of these classes is not exaggerated, as might well happen from the greater opportunities they have of pushing their claims through the public press, by speeches at public meetings, etc. As a matter of fact the "educated classes" comprise only a small fraction of the total population, a very large proportion of them have only a smattering of education, and the number of men, outside Government service, who have any real experience of the work of administration or any true idea of the responsibilities of an adviser on the principles and practice of good government, is infinitesimal. We must, therefore, be careful not to sacrifice the interests of the great body of the population to the noisy demands of a comparatively small fraction, merely because they can read and write and make fluent speeches. It is also to be remembered that the whole of the details of administration are already carried out by educated Indians, who form the vast body of the servants of Government in this country. These men are carefully trained, and as they prove themselves fit are invested with higher powers, which they usually exercise with great ability and trustworthiness; and it might well be argued that in this manner the educated classes of India already enjoy a share in the actual government of the country out of all proportion to their numbers. To those who, in the name of the educated classes, claim a greater say in measures of legislation and administration, it might well be answered that Government is ready to accept men of their class as its servants, to give them the careful training that is necessary to fit them for exercising power over their fellows, and to give due weight to their opinion when they have proved themselves worthy of regard. I am, therefore, glad to see that under the present proposals care is taken not to give an undue preponderance to the claims of men whose only qualification for the exercise of influence in the administration is their education, and that the intention is to invite to council the true leaders of the people, who have some experience of the difficulties of managing real affairs, and some true sense of responsibility.

4. I would also support the proposal to select representatives by classes, and even by religions. In this country, far more than in England, a man's religion determines his ideas and prejudices, his interests, and his wishes; for instance, a Hindu land-owner would not truly represent the interests of Muhammadan land-owners, though he might have been elected by a large body of land-owners, some of them belonging to one religion and some to the other. If therefore we want a real representation of the different classes of the people, we must not be content with a mere property qualification, but must provide for representation by classes and religions. I am, therefore, in favour of the proposal to provide that a certain number of seats shall be filled by Muhammadans, who would otherwise, in some parts of the country, be swamped by their Hindu fellows, though I would adopt a different method for securing this end. It is also essential that each class should be represented by one of its own members and should not be allowed to elect an outsider as its representative.

5. It must be borne in mind that the different provinces of India and the different classes of the people are at very different stages of development, so that it would be a grievous mistake to lay down a hard-and-fast rule as to the method of selecting representatives, to be applied to all provinces and all classes. This is especially the case as regards the question of nomination or election. In some provinces and among some classes the people have some understanding of the system of electing by majority of votes, and it might be safe to entrust them with the right of electing their own representatives. In others again they have had so little experience of elections that they do not really understand the system and have no proper sense of responsibility in giving their votes, and a system of nomination is the only one which will secure a true representative of the class. It is obviously much easier to advance from nomination to election than to withdraw the right of election once given. I therefore advocate the following general principle. When Government has determined the classes who are to be represented, and the qualifications for admission to each class, it should decide whether each particular class will be best represented by nomination or by election. In cases of doubt the question might be specifically referred to the members of the class for an expression of their wishes as to whether they would prefer to elect their representative by a majority of votes, or to leave it to Government to nominate a suitable representative from among them. But even where a majority of the class voted for a system of election, this privilege should not necessarily be conferred on them unless Government approved, though hopes might be held out to them that they would receive the privilege at some future time, when Government considered them fitted to exercise it.

6. In other respects also it would be wise to proceed cautiously. We are making a great experiment, and it is difficult to draw back. We should, therefore, begin by conferring restricted powers on these councils, and provide for gradually enhancing those powers as they prove themselves worthy of the confidence of Government and of the people. We should also at first impose a high standard of qualification for the members of each class, so as to have only a small body from whom a representative must be chosen. It will be easy in future to lower the qualification and increase the number of qualified members.

7. I now proceed to offer my suggestions as to what should be done in the Punjab, the province with which I am most familiar. Here the people have had very little experience of the system of election by majority of votes, and many who are qualified to vote have failed to exercise their right or have shown themselves unworthy of it. The best men have also shown much reluctance to expose themselves to the annoyance of an election, while quite willing to serve if nominated by Government. I think, therefore, we should be very chary at present of introducing any system of election of representatives to councils in the Punjab.

Punjab Legislative Council.

8. The Legislative Council at present consists of not more than nine members, in addition to the Lieutenant-Governor. The members are all nominated, and at least one-third of them must be non-officials. The council has been at work for ten years, and in my opinion has passed a number of Acts which are highly beneficial to the population of the province generally, and which would not have been passed in an equally suitable form had the council not been constituted. It has on the whole proved a most useful body, and there is no spontaneous demand on the part of the mass of the population for any change in its constitution. I recognise, however, that, in accordance with the spirit of the times, it is advisable to increase its numbers and enhance the functions of its individual members, and to make them more representative of the different classes of the people. At the same time, as pointed out by the Government of India, it is necessary to impose a somewhat narrow limit on its numbers, as otherwise the necessity of maintaining an official majority would entail a waste of time on the part of a number of busy officers. Municipal and local boards have hitherto had no say in this province in the election of members of the local Legislative Council, and I am strongly opposed to giving them any voice in the matter. Most of them consist of men who are only beginning to learn the rudiments of administration, and they are not likely to be fitted, for many years to come, to exercise the responsible function of electing a legislator. As I have already said, I think we should exercise caution in making our forward step, and the Punjab, which has been under British rule for less than sixty years, is not yet ripe for such an enlargement of its council or for so large an introduction of the principle of election as are some of the older provinces. I recommend, therefore, that the number of members of the Punjab Legislative Council should be fixed at not more than fifteen (in addition to the Lieutenant-Governor) and that the condition that at least one-third of these should be non-officials should stand. To maintain an official majority it will be necessary that eight should be officials, so that not more than seven will be non-officials. The classes for which representatives are mainly required are in this province (1) the Muhammadan land-owners, (2) the Hindu land-owners, (3) the Sikh land-owners, (4) the commercial classes without distinction of creed, (5) the educated classes, including the lawyers. The other classes of the population, who are mostly illiterate, are not at present fit to have representatives of their own, and their interests are generally sufficiently looked after by the official members. I would give a representative to each of the five classes above mentioned, and leave the Lieutenant-Governor a perfectly free hand to nominate the remaining two non-official members. This power would enable him to adjust any inequality of representation and to bring on to the council those men whose advice he considered most valuable.

9. I do not think there should be anything like a general election of simultaneous shifting of members. Each individual member should hold office for three years, and on the expiry of that term, or on his death or resignation, a new representative should be selected (the retiring member being eligible for re-selection) and should hold office for three years.

10. The whole of the members should in the first instance be appointed by nomination but each of the five classes should be asked to vote on the question whether it would prefer to be given the power to elect its representative by a majority of votes or would be content to leave the nomination to the Lieutenant-Governor. It should, however, rest entirely with Government to decide whether and when the right of election should be granted, and the decision need not be the same for each class.

11. I. The representative of the Muhammadan land-owners should be selected from among the 52 Muhammadan land-owners who pay Rs. 2,500 land revenue or more.

II. The constituency of Hindu land-owners, any of whom would be eligible for selection, should be about 50 in number. Possibly a qualification of about Rs. 1,750 of land revenue would give a suitable body.

III. There are 58 Sikh land-owners paying Rs. 1,000 land revenue or more, and this might be accepted as the qualification in their case.

IV. In the case of the commercial classes the interests of the different religions are not so diverse as to make it necessary to recognize any religious distinction. The Punjab Chamber of Commerce has put forward a claim to have the election of a member, but it does not include all the important firms in the Punjab, and is still in its infancy, though it promises to do useful work. As regards this class I would have a mere property qualification, and would confine the selection to individuals or representatives of firms paying income-tax on not less than Rs. 25,000 a year. This would give a constituency of 60 persons. If a large majority of this class, on being specially consulted, voted for a system of election, I would let them have it.

V. The educated classes of the Punjab are best represented by the graduates of the Punjab University, and in this case there is not so much objection to having a large constituency. I would make it consist of all graduates of over ten years' standing, and would grant them the privilege of election, if by a large majority, they voted for it. I would not, in the first instance, impose any restriction except that they must elect one of their own number, but I would retain the power of imposing some restriction in future. For instance, if the result showed that unrestricted election resulted always in the return of a Hindu lawyer, it might be advisable to prescribe that the member should be alternately (a) a Hindu or Sikh, (b), a Musulman, or alternately (a) a lawyer, (b) a man of some other profession. There is no doubt the objection that there is a danger of introducing a political element into the University, but I think the risk is not very great, and that it is advisable to go thus far to meet the demands of the educated classes as such.

12. Under my proposals, therefore, the Legislative Council of the Punjab would consist of not more than 15 members (besides the Lieutenant-Governor) as follows:—

1. A representative of the 52 Muhammadan land-owners who pay not less than Rs. 2,500 land revenue.
2. A representative of about 50 Hindu land-owners who pay not less than about Rs. 1,750 land revenue.
3. A representative of the 58 Sikh land-owners who pay not less than Rs. 1,000 land revenue.
4. A representative of the 60 persons or firms who pay income-tax on not less than Rs. 25,000 a year.
5. A representative of the graduates of the Punjab University of over 10 years' standing.

6 and 7. Two non-official members nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor.

8 to 15. Eight official members nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor.

Total 7 non-official and 8 official members.

13. I would give the members of the Punjab Legislative Council the restricted right of interpellation enjoyed at present in the Imperial Council. It may cause some inconvenience to Government in preparing the answers to troublesome questions, but the privilege is evidently much valued, and we must be prepared to face some inconvenience in order to afford to members the information they desire on matters that interest them. For similar reasons, I would allow a general debate on the Budget and on the financial policy of Government, but I do not think it advisable or necessary in the Punjab at present to go further and allow a discussion by heads.

Punjab Advisory Council.

14. As regards the proposed Advisory Council for the Punjab, I am in favour of such an institution for the general reasons I have already given, but its functions should be purely advisory, and it should be established in the first place on a tentative footing. It should bear as far as possible representative of the different classes of the people. The members of the Imperial Advisory Council who belong to the Punjab or its Native States and the seven non-official members of the Legislative Council should be ex-officio members of the Advisory Council, and all the remaining members should be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor. He should nominate an additional member from each of the five classes I have above enumerated, and in doing so would no doubt do what was possible to adjust the representation. For instance, if the Punjab University had returned as member of the Legislative Council a Hindu lawyer, he might add a Muhammadan doctor to his Advisory Council as the second representative of the University; or if the commercial classes had sent up a European member of Legislative Council, he might select a Hindu banker as second representative. He should also have the power to nominate an additional number of members, official or non-official, without any restriction as to qualification, chosen so as to represent other interests—the total number of the council not to exceed twenty-five. Each individual member should hold office for three years from the date of his nomination, but should be eligible for renomination. The council at its maximum would therefore consist of the following members:—

Members of Imperial Advisory Council, say	5
Non-official members of Provincial Legislative Council . . .	7
Additional representatives of the five classes enumerated . .	5
Additional members nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor . .	8
Total	25

15. This council would be purely a consultative body and would advise, either by letter or in general meeting, on any question referred to it by Government. It is very important that Government should obtain the true opinion of its members, and that no opinion meant to be confidential should ever be published. In referring any question to them therefore Government should distinctly say whether the replies are intended to be published, and no communication marked "Confidential" should ever on any account be made public. Each member should be at liberty to ask Government for information on any subject or to make any suggestion for consideration, but it should rest entirely with Government whether to give the information, or to take the suggestion into consideration, or to refer it to the council for opinion. Neither the council nor any member of it should have the power to insist on being given information which Government thinks it best to withhold, or to discuss any question which has not been referred to the council by Government. Possibly as time goes on and the Advisory Council gains experience and proves itself worthy of trust, it may become expedient to grant it this power, but it would be unsafe and embarrassing to give it at present.

Imperial Legislative Council.

16. As to the Governor General's Legislative Council, I recognise that it is desirable to increase its numbers and to extend the privilege of election more widely than hitherto; but it must be remembered that in order to maintain an official majority it is necessary to have available a sufficient number of official members, who must all be of some standing. The present somewhat clumsy device of calling in high officials from the Provinces as additional members, and keeping them in attendance at Calcutta and Simla, embarrasses the local administrations and involves a serious waste of power; for it is seldom possible to find sufficient important work on which to employ the official additional member during the season so that too often he remains idle at headquarters while he might have been doing useful work in some high post in his own Province. If, therefore, owing to an increase in the council, it becomes necessary to increase the number of official members, I think that they should as a rule be required to perform their duties as such in addition to their ordinary duties, and only be summoned to actual meetings of council, unless in the case of those members for whom really useful committee work can be found to justify their detention for a time at headquarters.

17. I would support the proposal that the council should include a representative of the non-official members of the Punjab Legislative Council and a representative of the larger Punjab land-owners. As regards the former, I would concede the privilege of election and would confine the constituency to the non-official members, past and present, of the Punjab Legislative Council, who should be required to elect a representative from among their own number. This constituency would be small at first, but would gradually increase in numbers, and would consist entirely of men who had served on the Provincial Legislative Council and who thus had some idea of the duties and responsibilities of a legislator. I would require them to elect alternately a Muhammadan and a Hindu or Sikh, unless they chose to elect a Christian, in which case his term of service would be excluded in reckoning the alteration.

18. The representative of the land-owners of the Punjab should not for the present be elected, but should be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor from among the land-owning constituencies I have suggested for the Legislative Council. He should have entire freedom of selection, but would no doubt ordinarily select a member of a different religion from the member elected by the non-official members of his council; so that the Punjab would be represented by two members, one of whom would ordinarily be a Muhammadan and the other a Hindu or Sikh. Government should remain the power at some future time to confer the privilege of electing their representative on the large land-owners of the Province, subject to such conditions as it might think fit to impose.

19. I think the proposal to allow the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay to elect a member each a good one, but I would provide for the representation of the commercial classes of the other Provinces also. Perhaps the privilege of electing a member might be conferred alternately on (1) the commercial classes of the Punjab, the United Provinces and the Central Provinces, and (2) those of Madras and Burma. In that case the constituency might consist of those individuals or firms who pay income-tax on not less than Rs. 50,000 a year.

20. I recognise that it is necessary to provide for the fuller representation of Muhammadans, but I think this might be done more indirectly than by the invidious plan of laying down that so many of the members must be Muhammadans. Under my proposals for the Punjab representation, one of the two Punjab members will almost always be a Muhammadan, and I should think it would be possible to attain the due representation of Muhammadans by some similar arrangement as regards the other Provinces. I doubt whether it is wise for Government to bind itself to any minimum number of Muhammadan members, any more than it would be to lay down that there must be so many Hindu or Sikh or Parsi members, and I gather that this favour so ostentatiously conferred on the Muhammadans is strongly resented especially by the Hindus. I should be inclined still to endeavour to attain the proper representation of Muhammadans by less direct means, such as I have advocated for the Punjab representation, and trust to the Viceroy's power of nominating additional members, which should be untrammelled, to redress the balance, if any. Especially am I opposed to the proposal to allow Muhammadans as such to elect two members of council for themselves, without distinction of Province. It seems an obviously unfair arrangement, and if it is adhered to, will always be a reasonable grievance to the Hindus, Sikhs, and members of other religions, who are denied a similar privilege. It would be much better to lay down for each Province the proportion that the representative members of each religion should bear to each other, and provide that the constituencies belonging to the different religions should elect the Provincial representative in rotation so as to give them the due proportion of representation in the course of a term of years. For instance, if it is decided that the land-owners of Eastern Bengal should have one representative on the council at a time, but that the Muhammadan land-owners are entitled to twice the representation of the Hindus, the Muhammadan land-owners of the Province might elect the representative member for two terms of office, and the Hindus for the third. Such an arrangement would secure the desired end, and would be generally admitted to be fair.

21. So far as the Punjab is concerned, I am strongly opposed to the creation of any such large purely Muhammadan constituency as is contemplated in paragraph 17 of the Government of India's letter, and I cannot think that it would be advisable to create such a constituency in any Province of India.

22. As to the Budget debates in the Imperial Council, I think it is desirable to meet the wishes of some of the educated classes so far as to allow the Budget to be discussed by separate heads as well as collectively, although this will entail greater labour on the official members and longer sittings of council. What the objectors to the present practice no doubt would like is that they should have some say in the drawing up of the Budget before it is presented to council, but this is hardly possible, and I believe such a privilege is not enjoyed by individual members of the House of Commons. All that can be done is to promise to take the suggestions of members into account in framing the Budget of the next year, and to explain, in presenting that Budget, what action has been taken on the suggestions made at the last Budget debate, and why some have not been given effect to. More than this it is unreasonable to demand and would be embarrassing to give. It would be fatal to all good administration to allow the Budget to be tampered with at the last moment by possible faddists.

Imperial Advisory Council.

23. As already said, I am in favour of the constitution of an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines suggested by the Government of India. Its functions should be similar to those I have proposed for the Punjab Advisory Council (paragraph 14). I think, however, that the number of ruling Chiefs suggested (20 out of 60 members) is too high. It should be considered a high honour for a Chief to be invited to advise the Viceroy as to the administration of the Indian Empire, and this honour should be conferred only on those Chiefs whose administration of their own territories is thoroughly satisfactory. I would therefore make the number of ruling Chiefs "not more than 15" for the present. I am strongly in favour of having on the Imperial Advisory Council a preponderating number of the territorial magnates of the different provinces, but I think it is going too far to shut out altogether representatives of the other classes,

I would provide for their representation by including in the Advisory Council the non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council for the time being. These men will have been chosen as representatives of the various important classes in the Empire and if they are fitted to have a voice in legislation their advice should surely be listened to on matters of general policy. This would also tend to prevent the Advisory Council from becoming a rival body to the Legislative Council, a result to be avoided if possible. I suggest therefore that the Imperial Advisory Council should consist of the following members :—

Not more than 15 ruling Chiefs selected by the Viceroy.

The non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council for the time being—about 24.

Territorial magnates to be selected by the Viceroy—about 20.

At least 7 of the non-official members (pobably more) would be large land-owners, so that this class would exercise a preponderating voice on the Advisory Council. A council so constituted with members representing all the great interests of the country would command greater confidence than one consisting of Chiefs and territorial magnates only. I would not bind the Viceroy as to his choice of territorial magnates, but he would no doubt select men from each province, and would probably choose two from the Punjab—one a Muhammadan and the other a Hindu or Sikh.

24. In the foregoing remarks I have dealt with the various questions in what seemed to me their logical sequence. I now proceed to answer seriatim the questions put in your letter :—

I. (1) I think an Imperial Advisory Council would be of great service, but I would have on it not more than 15 ruling Chiefs, all the non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council, and about 20 territorial magnates to be selected by the Viceroy (paragraph 23). I would not publish any documents or proceedings unless the intention to do so had been clearly intimated beforehand, nor any paper marked confidential. I would allow any member to ask for information or to make suggestions, but it should be entirely for Government to decide whether the information should be given or the suggestion acted on. The council should discuss only questions referred to it by Government (paragraph 15).

II. (2) A Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution. Its duties and powers should be the same as I have advocated for the Imperial Advisory Council. It should consist of the Punjab members of the Imperial Advisory Council, of the non-official members of the Punjab Legislative Council, of additional representatives of the Muhammadan land-owners, of the Sikh land-owners, of the Hindu land-owners, of the commercial classes, and of the Punjab University, and of not more than eight additional members nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor. Each individual member should hold office for three years, but should be eligible for renomination (paragraph 14).

III. (3) The Imperial Legislative Council should be enlarged, but the official members should mostly attend only at meetings and should carry on their own ordinary duties. It should include a representative of the non-official members of the Legislative Councils of each of the larger Provinces (including the Punjab) who should be elected by all the non-official members of the Provincial Council, past and present (paragraph 17). It should also include a representative of the great land-owners of each of the larger provinces to be nominated (for the present) by the Lieutenant-Governor (paragraph 18). Provision should be made for the representation of the commercial classes of provinces other than Bengal and Bombay (paragraph 19). No seats should be set apart to be filled by Muhammadans exclusively. Provision should be made for the proper representation of Muhammadans, and of the other main religions also, by confining the election or nomination of representatives to the different religions alternately, differences to be further adjusted by the Viceroy's untrammelled power of nomination (paragraph 20).

III. (4) Yes. See above.

III. (5) Yes. One of the great land-owners of the Province should (for the present) be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor. His power of selection should be untrammelled.

III. (6) I am opposed to the reservation of any seats on the Imperial Council to Muhammadans exclusively, and especially opposed to any such Muhammadan electorate as is described in paragraphs 17 and 18 of the Government of India letter (paragraphs 20 and 21).

IV. (7) I would increase the number of members of the Punjab Legislative Council to not more than 15 (besides the Lieutenant-Governor) (paragraph 8).

IV. (8) I would retain the system of nomination at present, but would consult each body of qualified electors, and probably grant the privilege of election to the Punjab University and possibly to the commercial classes (paragraph 11).

IV. (9) For my detailed proposals regarding the representation of classes, see paragraphs 8 to 12.

IV. (10) See last answer. I would strongly oppose election through municipal or district boards (paragraph 8).

IV. (11) As regards the method by which the representation of classes should be secured see paragraphs 8 to 12. I am strongly in favour of a constitution of municipal committees, and of those district boards in which the members are elected, on the lines suggested in paragraph 22 (1) of the Government of India letter, but I think this question should be taken up separately.

IV. (12) I would not make special provision for the election of Muhammadan members of the Provincial Legislative Council, otherwise than by arranging that the Muhammadan land-owners shall elect a separate representative, by retaining the power in the case of the University of requiring that at every second election the representative should be a Muhammadan, and by the Lieutenant-Governor's power of nominating additional members. I am strongly opposed to the form of electorate suggested in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter (paragraphs 20-21).

V. (13) Yes (paragraph 22).

V. (14) I would allow the Budget to be discussed, but only in a general way (paragraph 13).

V. (15) I would allow interpellation (paragraph 13).

25. I have discussed this important question with a few intelligent Indian gentlemen and have seen the opinions of a number of others. The general opinion among responsible men appears to be that the proposed enlargement of the Legislative Councils and the constitution of the Advisory Councils will bring Government and the people more closely together, will give the true representatives of the people a larger say in the administration of the country, and is as far as it is safe to go at present: with this I agree. There is a general feeling in favour of the election of representatives by votes, but many prefer that the system of nomination should continue for the present: with the latter opinion I agree. The Muhammadans are grateful for the arrangements proposed for their representation, and ask for more: I think this unreasonable. The Sikhs claim separate representation; I agree. The Hindus complain of the privilege of special representation proposed for Muhammadans: I think the complaint justifiable. The commercial and educated classes claim representation on the Imperial Advisory Council, and some of the land-owning classes support this claim: so do I. Almost all ask for the discussion of the Budget and the right of interpellation in the Provincial Legislative Council. I think this request should be granted.

To—The Commissioner, Rawalpindi Division.

With reference to your circular letter no. 2884, dated 16th November 1907, I have the honour to forward herewith a copy of answers to the questions regarding the Advisory Councils, recorded by the Honourable Malik Umar Hayat Khan, Tiwana, C.I.E.

Endorsement by the Commissioner, Rawalpindi Division, no. 542, dated Rawalpindi, 6th March 1908.

Copy, with copy of its enclosures, forwarded to the Hon'ble Mr. E. D. Maclagan, C.S., Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab, in continuation of correspondence ending with this office no. 387, dated 15th February.

Answers to the questions.

I. I think the Imperial Advisory Council will be useful for the country because it is simply advisory, and there are chances of it being useful while it cannot be dangerous in any way provided that the members are responsible enough to keep their views to themselves as confidential and should not abuse their position.

I agree as to their duties laid down in paragraph 5 and also its constitution in 1, 2, 5, 6, and 7. As to the 3, I would suggest that after choosing the ruling Chiefs who should be proportionate in numbers to the importance of the respective Presidencies or Provinces, etc. As to territorial magnates, I would suggest 4 to each Presidency, that is, Bombay and Madras; 3 to each province in which there is a Lieutenant-Governor; and 2 to each province presided by a Chief Commissioner, the total of which will be 29, and adding 20 as ruling Chiefs would make it 49; thus the remaining 11 seats could be given to certain industrial and commercial men or any others, representing big towns, interests, and minorities.

As to time, I think 5 years is too long, and 3 years would be more suitable if they are eligible for re-appointment.

II. Yes. And I think it will be better if each district is represented by a member whose name should be sent up by the Deputy Commissioner through the proper channel to the head of the department and then submitted if suitable for the confirmation of the Viceroy by the method of nomination and election combined if possible. This number would come up to 28 in the Punjab, and if it be considered that in certain provinces it might exceed the number which is desirable one man out of each division would do and the rest should be taken from classes which are already mentioned in the paragraph.

III. I do not approve of the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council which I think is quite sufficient for the purpose at present, as it is needless when Advisory Council of 60 is added to help them. If the enlargement of native members was meant to give them a chance of majority it would have been a different question, but when to keep them in minority the officials are also added, I do not think there will be any use of its enlargement except waste of time which I have alluded above in my introductory remarks.

But if Government chooses to enlarge the council being considered fit by themselves or the predominations of their such advisers I would also like to make certain remarks as to its constitution.

The method of election does not suit at all to our country, and it is far better that appointments should be left for nomination.

As to the election by Chambers of Commerce, there cannot be very much objection, but the election by nobles or the members of the Provincial Council would be greatly objectionable.

1. Each elector would at the same time like to be a candidate and thus there is a chance of each one getting a vote each.

2. If any one succeeds to poll more votes it will be merely accidental, and in great probabilities he will not be the fit and the best man.

3. As these all electors which will be of higher rank are generally uneducated and backward all round, the elected members would be of the same sort.

4. As to their knowledge limited to their own districts and divisions, it will be impossible for them to judge the ability or capability of a man whom they have never heard or never conversed with and thus are unfit to judge him.

5. The competition of such people would be so selfish and hotly contested that if one is chosen in face of the others they will consider him a life-long enemy. For all the above and many other minor considerations it will be advisable that the power should entirely with the head of the department who with his vast experience and superior knowledge and full acquaintance with the leading men of his province could easily pick out and nominate the fit person required for such posts. If this also fails to satisfy there is another suggestion, and that is a method of united nomination and election which could serve the purpose better than the mere election. For instance there are two men required from a province. The head of the department should pick 4 or 6 out of the candidates which would be towards nomination and then let the rest vote for them and elect the required men. Thus both the requirements would be fulfilled, firstly, that the picked people by the head of the department would be proper men and at the same time the electors would have the advantage of electing according to their own choice.

There could be another way of selecting the members and that is from Advisory Councils by the same above method, and that is that the head of the department should select double or treble the number required having regard to different classes, and then let the rest of the members vote for them, say each member being allowed to have a separate vote for different class representatives. In this way the Muhammadans, the Hindus, and the rest could be easily elected to the satisfaction of the authorities and the public.

Then again, coming to (d), that is letting the Muhammadans choose their own two members would be again very difficult, and the question would be who would be those Muhammadans to elect them. It is said that there are 72 different sub-divisions of the Muhammadan religion which are all different from each other, and it will be great difficulty unless the electing body is one which is authorised by all different classes which is impossible under the present circumstances.

Then, again, take Aligarh or the Islamia College, Punjab, or different Muhammadan rival associations of India, it will be difficult to recognise to which this privilege be given, and if any of them is particularly picked out it will cause a great heart-burning in the rest, and thus I would strongly advise, specially for Muhammadans, that at least these two appointments should not be elected, but should be nominated by the Government.

Here I would like to say something about the different organizations of India which are greatly misleading—

Firstly, that they are more on paper than in practice.

Secondly, they are generally the work of certain ambitious up-starts which are not the national leaders, and naturally being desirous of notoriety they devise such means of making so-called associations and try to show themselves as their leaders and prominent men, and thus bring themselves before the public and the Government. This is again a cause that such organisations or associations should not be given the power of election.

I hope I will again here be excused a bit if I go out of my way to say something more as to why should such organizations be discouraged. They might start on good lines, but by the change in years and time of the organizers or the coming in of the second generation it might entirely change its policy because it is a force which could be used either ways as histories of such organisations in India show a marked tendency of change towards the worst, and for this I have ventured to point out the advisability of its discouragement.

I think the big Muhammadan organisation of whole India is now being formed to get the chance and privilege of such elections and also to become one whole body. I am very much against it, and have refused to join it, though even asked as I think it is a bad policy for the people and the country of India. As to (E) and (F) I quite agree.

IV. (7) I don't think there should be an increase or alteration in the number of members of the Provincial Legislative Council, as it is sufficient as it stands, the reasons of which I have already given.

8. The nomination system is by far the best, but if it is to be elected, it should be elected in the manner as I have described above.

9. I think there ought not to be any fixed rules, as it would involve difficulties and cause dissatisfaction in the different communities. Whatever trouble be taken or justice be done, there will be discontent. So nobody should come to know the numbers except the head of the department who knows full well which interest at which particular time should be paid regard to.

10. The system of election should be done by district boards as already suggested above, added by the municipalities of the divisional headquarters of Commissioners or certain special towns as Amritsar, and let them be formed Provincial electorate body without any distinction of religious or creeds of different classes of people which might again lead to a sort of party feeling and might cause friction between different religions —a thing undesirable.

11. I have already mentioned above that no organisations or panchayats should be allowed to meddle and become electorate bodies, as they are mostly misleading, and the only best method is that of district boards and certain municipalities which should be electorate bodies. In the constitution of such bodies I don't think there is any change necessary in the least to begin with, unless the thing by practice seems to be unworkable. If Muhammadans and Hindus are separated to choose their own representatives and the two become two separate bodies, it would cause a great ill-feeling.

12. I have already suggested the nomination, as I don't find any real or legitimate institution who should be interested to do it unless causing an ill-feeling in the greater population of Muhammadans which are of the old type, being the disciples of certain big Pirs of fame and the numbers of which as a constitution under that one head is far extensive than any so-called Muhammadan associations, and if thus deprived of their rights they are sure to feel it deeply.

13. It will be seen from my introductory remarks that I hate such speeches. They do more harm than good, and the system suggested in the paragraph is far more desirable and useful for the purpose it is meant to serve; as it would do the material good while the former practice is unsuitable which will really be far from good.

14. I think it will be useful to discuss the Budget in the Provincial Legislative Council according to the new above method of Imperial Legislative Council and not like the former system of long speeches.

15. I think in Provincial Council such power of interpellation is entirely unnecessary. It will only give the members power of teasing the officials and giving them unnecessary trouble simply to see their questions and their names published in the press for their notoriety. The provinces being of a comparatively smaller magnitude the well-informed people such as the members of the council practically know all what is going on; because it is unlike the Imperial Legislative Council in which perhaps a member from Madras might like to know something about the Punjab and thus require a power of the sort to make himself acquainted with the desired information of a province of which he knows very little.

I think in the Provincial Legislative Council such a thing is entirely uncalled for and unnecessary.

The time at my disposal being short, I am sorry that I had to write these views rather in a hurry and thus have not been able to deal with it thoroughly, and the way also of putting it is so good as I could have done it in leisure as I have been lately very busy. I hope my ideas about it will be understood up to the greater extent.

Dated Lahore, 25th November 1907.

From—A. H. DIACK, Esq., Settlement Commissioner, Punjab,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of the Punjab.

In reply to your letter no. 46, dated 19th October 1907, on the subject of Legislative Councils and proposed Advisory Councils, I give below my answers to the 15 questions appended to your letter. I received your letter on my return from furlough in the beginning of November, and I regret that the time at my disposal for the consideration of the matters dealt with in its enclosures has consequently been too short to permit of my fully working out the suggestions which have occurred to me.

1. I do not clearly understand what "administrative measures and proposals for action" it is proposed to refer to an Imperial Advisory Council, but I presume that they would be only such measures and proposals as would be applicable to India as a whole. Even with this limitation, however, it seems to me that the proposed Imperial Council is open to the criticism that, consisting as it would of a number of non-official members who would be referred to direct by the Governor-General, it would be an attempt to obtain the opinion of a province on a measure without the intervention of the local Government. At present the opinion of a province is obtained by the Government of India by means of a reference to the local Government, which, through its officers, consults the people, including the territorial magnates who would under the proposed scheme be members of the Advisory Council. I consider that this, the present system, is a better means of gauging the opinion of a province than the proposed reference to an Imperial Advisory Council would be, and that, if it is proposed to continue it, the reference to the Imperial Advisory Council, be superfluous. It will scarcely be urged that the territorial magnates of a particular province who were on the Imperial Advisory Council would be more likely to give an independent opinion in that position than if they were consulted through the officers of their local Government. For the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of a province, therefore, the proposed Imperial Advisory Council seems to me to be an unnecessary addition to the present machinery. If it is intended to gauge the opinion of India as a whole, without reference to the opinions of its parts—the various provinces—the scheme is likely, considering the heterogeneous composition of the Indian continent, to give a very artificial result. As regards the second object aimed at by scheme, the dissemination of information about the motives and intentions of Government, I consider that this also can be obtained better by publication through the Government of a province than by intimation by the Governor-General direct to six or seven territorial magnates of that province. My conclusion is that an Imperial Advisory Council Committee on the lines sketched would not be of advantage to the country.

2. The proposed Provincial Advisory Council would not be open to the objection taken above. In the case of measures affecting the whole of India it might be made use of, if no Imperial Advisory Council is established, to aid the head of the local Government in ascertaining, for report to the Government of India, the opinion of his province. On the other hand, it is open to the parallel objection that under the present system all the men of the type who would be appointed to these councils are consulted on matters of either imperial or provincial import, through their district officers, and if it is proposed merely to set aside a few of them, say twenty for the whole of the Punjab, to be consulted direct by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, while the remainder and the great mass of the people are consulted (so far as it is possible to consult them) through district officers, it is a duplication of work. But it is no new thing for the head of the province to take opportunities of himself, ascertaining, at the personal interviews he accords to the leading men of the province, their opinions on the measures that are from time to time under the consideration of Government, and he is doubtless helped by these personal inquiries in arriving at an opinion of his own on the report submitted by district officers. So long as the eliciting of opinion through the district officers, who have the best opportunities of all of learning what the people think, is not abandoned, I see no objection to its being supplemented by the formation of a Provincial Advisory Committee such as is proposed. Whether it would be useful to formally constitute such a body, instead of leaving the head of the province free to consult personally whomsoever he may wish, is another question, and I am disposed to answer it in the negative. The only advantage that I can see in the former alternative is that it affords a means of conferring an additional honour on some twenty native gentlemen. From this point of view, if the present proposals do not result in an enlargement of the Provincial Legislative Council, the establishment of an Advisory Council for the Punjab is advisable. But if the Provincial Legislative Council is enlarged, the desired opportunity of honouring the native gentlemen of the province whose personal opinions are valued, will be afforded. In the former event I have no modifications to suggest in the proposals made in paragraph 4 of your letter and paragraph 6 of the Government of India letter. For the dissemination of information about the motives and intentions of Government a Provincial Council of this sort might be a useful machinery, but, on the other hand, it would be just as effective to publish, by means of leaflets distributed through the zaildar agency, information of the sort that it is proposed to spread through members of an Advisory Council. It is certainly the case that, although the objects and intentions of Government are abundantly explained in English in official notifications and resolutions, they often escape the notice of even the English reader of the non-official classes, and it is small wonder if, even when they are properly translated and published in the vernacular, they remain quite unknown to the native population whom they chiefly concern.

3. The arguments advanced in the Government of India letter in favour of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council appear to me to be sound, and I have no modifications to suggest in the scheme sketched in the paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter, except such as are indicated in my answers to the next three questions.

4. In regard to the proposals that one of the Punjab Members of the Imperial Legislative Council should be nominated by the non-official members of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor's Council (either from their own number or from outside the latter council) it is admitted in the Government of India letter that there would be objections to such a course so long as the membership of the latter council is limited as at present. The non-official members at present consist of a Sikh, a Hindu, and a Muhammadan; it would be somewhat invidious to ask them to combine to make a nomination, and if a nomination had to be made it would seem to be best that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor should make it, selecting the non-official member who had served longest in the council or given the most help in its deliberations. And if the membership of the Punjab Council is increased I think it would be best, for some years at any rate, to follow this course. If the operation of the new rules for increasing the membership of the council result in such a constitution that no objection can be taken to the right of election being conceded to its non-official members, it will be time enough to confer upon them the privilege of nominating one of their number to the Imperial Legislative Council.

5. I approve of the selection of one of the great land-holders of the Punjab to the Imperial Council. I presume that the holder of a large jagir would be regarded as a land-owner for this purpose, and would be eligible, even if his proprietary estate was not a particularly large one. As regards the method of selection, I do not think that a system of election would give satisfactory results in this province. I think I am right in saying that the system of election to local and district boards has been a failure in the Punjab. One reason is the aversion noticed at the end of paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter, of Indian gentlemen to come forward as candidates and risk the indignity of defeat by a rival candidate. If this aversion has been strong on the part of men of the class expected to serve as members of district boards it would probably be much stronger on the part of great land-holders such as it is desirable to ask to serve on the Imperial Council. Also, with the heterogeneous electorate which the Punjab would afford, it would be difficult to ensure that different interests—Sikh, Rajput, Biloch, Punjabi Muhammadans of the north-west, and Hindus of the south-east, to take a few instances—should be in turn represented. The same objections would apply to the second suggestion of the Government of India, that the land-holding members of the Lieutenant-Governor's Council should nominate either one of their number or another great land-holder of the province to the Imperial Council, though if a scheme is adopted of the nature suggested in my ninth answer below, it might be possible to adopt this suggestion. I think, however, that the third suggestion in the Government of India letter is the best one at the present stage of Punjab progress, and that the land-holding member of the Imperial Council should be nominated by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor. If, however, it should be decided to resort to election, the electorate should be framed so as to give each of the great interests—a few of which I have named above—an equal chance of being represented, or at any rate a chance which should depend not on the total number of great land-holders belonging to it, but on the total population pertaining to it, or on its influence in the province.

6. I approve of the proposed appointment of four Muhammadans to the Imperial Council, of whom two should be nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy as proposed in paragraphs 12 (2) E and 18 of the Government of India letter. I agree that the other two should be appointed in rotation from the six provinces in which the Muhammadan population is considerable, as proposed in paragraph 18 of the Government of India letter. And when the turn of the Punjab comes to depute a Muhammadan member, I would, for the reason already given against the elective system in the Punjab, leave him to be nominated by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor. If the selection has to be left to an electorate, the best would be, I consider, that composed of the Muhammadan non-official members of the Lieutenant-Governor's Council.

7. For the reason given in my answer to the second question—the desirability of adding to the number of native gentlemen who are honoured by being admitted to the councils of Government—I approve of the proposal to increase the present number of members of the Provincial Council. Considering the limitations under which the council works as regards its power to alter the bills that come before it, I do not think that there is any other reason for an increase. The figure must depend, as pointed out in the Government of India letter, on the number of official members who can be appointed without inconvenience to the proper discharge of their official duties, and on this point, therefore, I cannot offer an opinion, though I shall indicate below the number of interests that I think should be represented by non-official members.

8. I would maintain the present system of nomination. For the reasons given above, I consider the elective system unsuited to the Punjab.

9. I advocate a fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class on the ground that it is desirable that the people of the province should know the principles on which appointments to the council are made. At the same time the rule should not be a rigid one, as it is unfortunately the case that the classes which should be represented cannot always furnish suitable representatives. It might be announced that a certain scheme (to be published) has been framed for the appointment of non-official members to the council and will be adhered to as far as possible, but a rigid adherence to it cannot always be promised. The following is the scheme of representation which I would propose:—The number of non-official members should be 8, viz., one for each division, two for the Native States in the province, and one to represent the European non-official community. The members for the Rawalpindi and Multan divisions should be Muhammadans, and one Sikh member should be drawn from either the Lahore or the Jullundur division. If neither of the members representing Native States is a Sikh, the Lahore and Jullundur divisions should each contribute a Sikh, but if one of the Native State members is a Sikh, then of those two divisions the one from which the Sikh member is not drawn should contribute either a Hindu or a Muhammadan, according as the second Native State member is a Muhammadan or a Hindu. The member for the Delhi division should ordinarily be a Hindu, but might be a Muhammadan instead, if in the hypothesis stated at the end of the last sentence the best man available in the Lahore or Jullundur division, from which in that hypothesis a Muhammadan would be drawn is a Hindu and not a Muhammadan. The Native State members should be drawn from among either the ruling Chiefs themselves, or their families, or, with their consent, their sardars. The field of choice here would ordinarily be more limited than in a Punjab division, and hence the necessity for the adjustment which I have suggested between the Lahore, Jullundur, and Delhi divisions. For one of these divisions a Native Christian might occasionally be found to be a better representative than a Sikh or a Hindu or a Muhammadan, and might take the place of the representative of one of these divisions. There might be a similar substitution for the Muhammadan member for the Rawalpindi or Multan division, provided that not more than one Native Christian is in the council at one time. The scheme may be presented in the following statement:—

Division.	Religon.
	A	B	C	D	E
Rawalpindi	1 Muhammadan*	1 Muhammadan*	1 Muhammadan	1 Muhammadan	1 Muhammadan.
Multan	1 Muhammadan*	1 Muhammadan*	1 Muhammadan	1 Muhammadan	1 Muhammadan.
Native States	1 Sikh	1 Sikh	1 Sikh	1 Sikh	1 Hindu.
	1 Hindu	1 Hindu	1 Hindu	1 Muhammadan	1 Muhammadan.
Lahore	1 Sikh	1 Sikh	1 Sikh	1 Native Christain.	1 Sikh.
Jullunder	1 Muhammadan	1 Hindu	1 Native Christian.	1 Hindu	1 Sikh.
Delhi	1 Hindu	1 Muhammadan	1 Hindu	1 Hindu	1 Hindu.
All Divisions	1 European	1 European	1 European	1 European	1 European.

*On occasion, a Native Christian may be substituted for the Muhammadan member for one of these two division.

10. If it is decided to resort to election for the appointment of non-official members of the Provincial Council, the non-official members of district boards would form as suitable an electorate as any. I do not thing that non-official municipal commissioners are generally of such a standing as should be included in the electorate; those of them who are of a suitable position and influence would ordinarily be members of the district board. If the scheme I have suggested above were adopted the five members representing the five divisions would be elected and the other three would be nominated.

11. The separate representation of classes on the Provincial Council, which I have recommended in my ninth answer, would be best carried out in my opinion by nomination by the Lieutenant-Governor, and not by election. If election is resorted to, however, the suggestion which I have made in my tenth answer is in accordance with paragraph 22 (b) of the Government of India letter, except that in this province it would probably be necessary to supplement the electorate composed of district board members by other electors nominated after reference to anjumans and panchayats. Time does not permit of examining the constitution of the various district boards in the province to see whether any changes would be required to ensure the non-official members forming a suitable electorate. My general impression is that they would be suitable as they are, but if it is decided to have recourse to election the constitution of the boards should certainly be brought under scrutiny.

12. The scheme which I have suggested in my ninth answer would afford adequate representation of the Muhammadans of the province on the Provincial Council. Any system of election by members of district boards would probably have a similar effect. I do not think any further or alternate measure is required to secure their due representation in the Punjab, and the elective scheme suggested in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter appears to me to be inferior to a system of election by members of district boards.

13. The alteration in the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Council suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter appears to me to be suitable.

14. I am strongly of opinion that more publicity should be given to the Provincial Budget than it receives at present. I believe that I am not far wrong in saying that the majority of officials as well as non-officials know very little about the financial arrangements between the Imperial and the local Government, and the distribution for expenditure of provincial revenues over the various heads. I therefore welcome the proposal to bring the Provincial Budget before the Provincial Council, and I see no objection to its being discussed in the manner proposed in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

15. The manner in which the power of interpellation has been exercised in the Imperial Council leads me to the conclusion that its introduction into the Provincial Council would be a mere waste of time.

OPINION.

I. (1) The proposed appointment of an Imperial Advisory Council has on the whole met with general acceptance from those who have been consulted, but many of the more thoughtful consider that it will be of doubtful utility, and I personally share this opinion. It is no doubt most desirable that the Viceroy should be able to ascertain the opinions of the hereditary leaders of the people on measures which are in contemplation, but there are other methods of doing this; and I venture to think that it will be vain to hope that an Advisory Council will be of much use in diffusing correct information in regard to the acts and intentions of Government. In this province, at all events, they are extremely few territorial magnates whose influence extends beyond a small sub-division of their own district, and we must in my opinion look to the committees and councils of smaller areas for this purpose.

Among the opinions received, there is a good deal of criticism of the proposed constitution of the council. While some critics object the presence of ruling Chiefs on the council others advocate the inclusion in it of representatives of industry, commerce, the learned professions, and so forth. Others again urge that some at all events of the members should be elected. For my own part, I agree with Colonel Parsons in thinking that more use might be made of our native officials, both as exponents of popular feeling and as disseminators of the views of Government. I by no means go so far as Colonel Parsons in thinking that we should depend on our native officials to the exclusion of non-officials for this purpose, but I think that if an Imperial Advisory Council is formed, it will be strengthened by the inclusion in it of a fair proportion of native officials, and I think that it would be unwise to debar classes other than the landowning class from finding a seat on it. I invite attention to Sir David Masson's suggestion that in any formal announcement which may be made of the formation of the council, it should be stated that only those ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates will find a place on it who have administered their own estates successfully. It seems to me that this might have been taken for granted, but perhaps he is right in thinking that an announcement of the kind will forestall captious criticism.

II. (2) The proposal to form a Provincial Advisory Council has met with very general support, partly, I think, because the constitution proposed is such that a large number of those who have been consulted may hope to find a place on it. For instance, Mr. Sykes writes that appointments to this council will be much coveted, especially if the appointment carries the right to a seat in the Provincial Darbar. People hardly seem to realise that unless the council is to be so large as to be unwieldy, there will be less than one member on an average for each district, and only the very foremost men can hope to find a seat on it.

My own opinion is that in the Punjab, at all events, there is no real necessity for an Advisory Council. The Lieutenant-Governor is accessible to and admits to interviews with him a far larger number of native gentlemen of influence and position than he could find room for on a council, and he is in touch with representatives of all classes of the people. If it is decided to appoint a Provincial Council, I have no remarks to offer on the proposed constitution, except to repeat the suggestion which I have made in the case of the Imperial Council that it should contain a fair proportion of native officials.

III. (3) The reason given for proposing an enlargement of the Legislative Council of the Government of India is that under the present system seats on the council have been very much monopolised by lawyers and school-masters, while the land-holding interests have been insufficiently represented. The proposed enlargement of the council will entail a considerable expense in the payment of salaries of a large number of additional official members; it will also entail very considerable inconvenience in the temporary withdrawal of those officials from their regular duties; and the additional time which will be spent in debate will be a severe tax upon the Viceroy and upon the members of his Executive Council. It is for the Government of India to say whether these drawbacks will be compensated by the advantages to be gained from the proposed enlargement; or whether a smaller number than 54 will not meet the necessaries of the case.

If it is decided to enlarge the council to 54, the proposed classification of members (with some alterations) will no doubt be necessary. But if the Government of India is content to a somewhat smaller council, this elaborate classification will in my opinion be unnecessary.

It will be sufficient to prescribe a constitution of (a) so many members elected from or deputed from the Provincial Legislative Councils, and (b) so many members nominated by the Viceroy. This will enable Government to nominate members of those classes which are inadequately represented among the members deputed from Provincial Councils. I invite attention to the criticisms which have been directed to the reservation of a seat for a ruling Chief. Ruling Chiefs have in the past been nominated to the council without unfriendly comment, and at the present moment a seat on it is filled by the son of a ruling Chief. But there is a good deal of difference between the casual appointment of a ruling Chief to the council and the express recognition by law of the right of ruling Chief to sit on it. The council has no authority to pass laws for the territories of ruling Chiefs and there is a good deal to be said for the contention that a seat on it should not be expressly reserved for ruling Chiefs.

For my own part, I hope that the suggestion to increase the number of elected seats from 5 to 18 will be carried out. Although many of those who have been consulted support and wish to extend the principle of election, I am convinced that in many cases this is because they think that representation by election is looked upon as the mark of an "advanced" community. Even in the Punjab Government letter the doubt is expressed whether the Province is yet sufficiently advanced for the introduction of a system of election for the Legislative Council. I venture with all deference to submit that this is not the right way of looking at the "question." We all hope for and work for the advancement and progress of the country but does that necessarily imply an ideal of representation by election? I venture to think that it does not, and that the progress and advancement of the country can best be attained without government by elected representatives. There is much in the opinions now forwarded to show that our English system of elections is foreign to the traditions and genius of the people of this country. We all know that the system of election which has been introduced into our municipal committees and district boards in this Province, at all events, has been an egregious failure. In the municipality of Lahore itself, which might be expected to set an example to the rest of the Province, the purchase of votes and the personation of voters is notoriously a universal practice. Even in the elections for the Imperial Legislative Council, it is admitted that the system of election has not been a success, and the whole tenor of the Government of India letter supports my contention that a system of election is not suited to the people of this country. For these reasons I venture to deprecate very strongly the increase in the number of elected members now proposed. In particular, I would urge that if classes (c), (d), and (e) of group D in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter are retained, the members chosen to represent this Province should be nominated not elected. The nominations which have been hitherto made from the Punjab have not, so far as I am aware, been considered inappropriate, and I would continue the same system.

I will offer some further remarks on groups D (d) and E in my answer to question 6, and will only note here the opinion of local commercial men that their interests are not sufficiently represented by the election of 2 members by the Chambers of Commerce of Madras and Bombay.

III. (4) For reasons already given I think that the member to be deputed from the Provincial Legislative Council should be nominated, not deputed, except in those provinces in which the non-official members of the Provincial Legislative Council have hitherto been in the habit of electing a member for the Imperial Council.

IV. (5) If it is decided that the Legislative Council is to be constituted in the manner described in the Government of India letter, I think that the land-owner who is to be appointed from the Punjab should be nominated not elected. The opinions now forwarded show the difficulties which would attend any system of election. I cannot suggest any satisfactory method of election.

(6) The proposed reservation of 4 seats on the council—2 nominated and 2 elected—for Muhammadans has evoked a good deal of feeling. Many Muhammadans protest that 4 seats are not enough for them, and there is this to be said for their protest that if a special number of seats is to be reserved for Muhammadans, there will be a very natural feeling that they will have no right to any of the other seats. On the other hand, Hindus and Sikhs protest strongly against the special reservation of any seats for Muhammadans while the Sikhs and some Hindus urge that if some seats are to be reserved for Muhammadans other seats ought to be reserved for Sikhs. For myself, I feel very strongly that the special reservation of seats for Muhammadans (or, indeed, for any other class or religion) will engender strife, not peace. If the Viceroy is left absolutely free to make his own nominations, he will be able to secure the appointment of representatives of minorities or of special interests in the most appropriate way. In any case I would deprecate the creation of a special electorate such as that described in paragraph 18 of the Government of India letter.

(7) In the case of Provincial Legislative Councils the reason for proposing an enlargment is in order to give the widest possible representation to different classes, races, and interests, and it is apparently considered that the existing system does not allow for this in the case of those provinces in which most of the non-official members are elected. But where, as in the Punjab, all the non-official members are nominated, I venture to think that before enlarging the council or changing the present system, it is very desirable to consider whether under the present system the different classes, races, and interests of the province are fairly represented on it. I would submit that the analysis of the religions and occupations of the nominated members of the Punjab Council which is contained in paragraph 8 of the Punjab Council shows that the various classes and interests of the Province have been fairly represented on it; and if this is the case, I would strongly deprecate the suggestion of change for no real advantage. I fully admit that there is a real advantage in admitting as many natives of the Province as is compatible with practical efficiency to a share in the administration; but it must be remembered that there is really very little work for the Punjab Legislative Council to do, and it is a question whether the enlargement of the council would not be a hindrance rather than a help to the administration. It seems to me therefore that the Punjab Government is the only authority which can give a valuable opinion in regard to the possible enlargement of the local council. If any change is to be made, I would suggest that all that is required is that the maximum number of seats should be increased from 9 to, say, 15 or 20. It would then be possible for the Lieutenant-Governor from time to time to appoint as many non-official members as he finds it practicable to put on the council.

(8) For reasons already given in my answer to question 3, I would strongly deprecate the introduction of any system of election to seats on the Provincial Council, and in this opinion I am supported by a large number of those who have been consulted.

(9) The answers received to this question vary. The greater number of those consulted suggest a classification by religions, and if there is to be any classification this is the only one possible. I agree with the large minority which thinks that any hard-and-fast classification would be a mistake, and that the Lieutenant-Governor should be left unfettered to make his own nominations. If any classification is decided upon, the request of the commercial members for a special representative should receive consideration. If it were decided to adopt the principle of election, some division into classes would probably be necessary, but I am unable to suggest any suitable division.

(10) Opinions are almost unanimous in rejecting the proposal that district boards and municipal committees should form the electorate for the Provincial Council. If election is resorted to, a special electorate will have to be created, and this of itself is sufficient to condemn the proposal to introduce election into the Punjab.

(11) I agree in the general opinion that the proposals made in paragraph 22 (b) of the Government of India letter are not suited to the Punjab. As regards municipal and district boards the feeling is that, if their constitution is to be altered, the question should be considered as a separate one, and that they should not be considered in the light of electoral units for the Legislative Council.

(12) I advocate leaving the Lieutenant-Governor a free hand to make his own nominations. There will then be every reason to believe that, as has been the case in the past, so in the future all classes and interests will be adequately represented. If on the other hand there is to be a fixed number of seats allotted to each class, the almost universal opinion is that the classification should be by religions: in that case the Muhammadans will have a fixed number of seats reserved for them. In any case, if it is thought necessary to adopt special measures to secure the adequate representation of Muhammadans, it will also be necessary in this Province to adopt special measures to ensure the adequate representation of Sikhs.

V. (13) The defects, the unreality, the waste of time of the present Budget debates, are admitted by Government. For this reason perhaps the great majority of those who have been consulted welcome the proposed change. But I doubt very much if they realise what this will involve. My own feeling is that if the proposed changes are introduced, there will be a very much greater waste of time than at present with the same infructuous result.

(14) The greater number of those consulted answer this question in the affirmative. Some say yes, but not by separate heads. Would it then be wise to introduce into the Provincial Council a system which in the case of the Imperial Council has admittedly proved a failure? On the other hand, I doubt whether those who advocate discussion by separate heads have fully realised the amount of time which this will involve. I would deprecate the introduction of any debate on the Budget in the Provincial Council until a fairly workable system has been devised and tested by experience in the Imperial Council.

(15) Nearly all the non-officials who have been consulted answer this question in the affirmative. A few non-officials and several officials consider that the power of interpellation might embarrass Government. I think that so long as the constitution of the Provincial Council remains unchanged, its members may safely be trusted with the power of interpellation, and that this power, if exercised in moderation as there seems reason to think that it will be, should prove an advantage rather than an embarrassment to the administration.

R. E. YOUNGHUSBAND,

Commissioner, Lahore Division.

No. 383, dated 28th October 1907.

From—Captain C. H. Buck, Officiating Deputy Commissioner, Montgomery,

To—The Commissioner, Lahore Division.

With reference to your circular no. 233, dated 5th October 1907, I have the honour to forward the opinions of the following gentlemen:—

Lala Bishen Das, Extra Assistant Commissioner, Revenue Assistant,
Lala Radha Kishen, Pleader and Vice-President, Municipal Committee, Montgomery,
Kamir, zaildar and zamindar of Mehrpur,
Muhammad Amin Khan, Honorary Magistrate and zamindar, and also my own.

2. I have discussed the matter verbally with several other gentlemen, and the general opinion is that the Advisory Councils will be useful institutions, the number of members on Legislative Councils should be increased (the number of official and non-official members being equal), non-official members of Legislative Councils should be nominated (or at any rate selected out of lists voted by district boards and municipal committees somewhat on the lines sketched by me in clause IV (8) of my opinion), the proceedings of Advisory Councils should not be kept confidential. It is generally agreed that elections on any large scale would be objectionable and lead to a great deal of friction.

The principal zamindars in this district consider that the number of Muhamadan members on the Punjab Legislative Council should be half the total number of non-official members.

C. H. BUCK, Captain,

Offg. Deputy Commissioner, Montgomery.

Opinion of Captain C. H. Buck, Officiating Deputy Commissioner, Montgomery.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—I consider that such a council would be useful, and I agree with the proposals in paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—I think that such a council would be of use. I consider that it should consist of (a) the Provincial members of the Imperial Advisory Council, the non-official members of the Provincial Legislative Council, ten other members selected from the list resulting from the elections mentioned in IV (8) below, and two or more specially selected members.

III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—I approve of an enlargement on the lines laid down in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter, except that I would omit clause (d) in (2) D and the words "not less than two to be Muhammadans" in E.

(4) I approve of this proposal.

(5) I approve of selection by nomination.

(6) No. It seems to me that if Muhammadans are in the minority among those elected they can be appointed under clause E.

IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—I would advocate an increase to ten official and ten non-official members, with the Lieutenant-Governor as President, total 21.

(8) I would suggest that the non-official members be obtained as follows:—

They should consist of—

(a) 5 Agriculturists (4 being Muhammadans and 1 Sikh).

(b) 2 Lawyers (1 being Hindu and 1 Muhammadan).

(c) 1 Merchant, banker, or tradesman (Hindu or Sikh).

(d) 1 Representative of an Industry (Hindu or Sikh).

(e) 1 Graduate of the Punjab University.

As regards (a) an election should be held among the members of each district board and each board should send up the names of 4 Muhammadans and 1 Sikh. The names need not necessarily be those of gentlemen residing in the district concerned, but should be those of any land-owner in the Punjab. From the list thus obtained Government should select 4 Muhammadans and 1 Sikh.

For (b) 3 Muhammadans and 3 Hindus should be elected by vote among advocates of the Chief Court of 5 years' standing and 1st grade pleaders of 5 years' standing (shown in the Civil List as practising in the Punjab), and from this list 1 Muhammadan and 1 Hindu should be selected by Government.

For (c) and (d) elections should be held among the members of the 1st class municipalities, each committee sending up 1 name for (c) and 1 name for (d); Government should then select from the list so formed.

For (e) two names to be voted by Fellows of the Punjab University and a selection made by Government.

The appointments should be for five years and in case of a vacancy occurring in the interval Government would select a fresh member from the original list to act for the remaining portion of the quinquennial period.

(9) to (10) See (8).

(11) I would not advocate any change in existing arrangements for the constitution of district boards and municipal committees.

(12) See (8).

V. (13) Discussion of the Budget.—I approve of the suggestion.

(14) Yes, by separate heads.

(15) Yes.

C. H. BUCK, Captain,

Offg. Deputy Commissioner, Montgomery.

Replies of Lala Bishen Das, Extra Assistant Commissioner, Revenue Assistant.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—I consider that such a council would be of service to the country and approve of the suggestions in paragraph 5 regarding its constitution and duties except that the period should be for three years only.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—I think that such a council would be useful, but would suggest the selection of one member from each district.

III. (3) to (4) Imperial Legislative Council.—I approve of the scheme sketched out by Government, but would suggest the appointment of one member from the Sikh community.

(5) I approve of the proposal, but would appoint members by nomination and not by election.

(6) I approve. I would suggest that the members be elected as follows:—

One by Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Council.

One by Muhammadan Fellows of the local University.

IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—Yes, to 6 official and 6 non-official members.

(8) As below.

(9) Non-officials to consist of 2 Hindus, 1 Sikh, 2 Muhammadans, and 1 European or Eurasian.

Of the above 1 Hindu and 1 Muhammadan to be elected respectively by the Hindu and Muhammadan Fellows of the Punjab University; the remainder to be nominated by Government.

(10) As in (9).

(11) As in (9).

(12) As in (9).

V. (13) Discussion of the Budget.—Should be altered as suggested.

(14) Yes, by separate heads.

(15) Yes.

BISHEN DAS,

Extra Assistant Commissioner, Revenue Assistant.

Replies of Lala Radha Kishen, Pleader, Vice-President, Montgomery Municipal Committee.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—I consider that such a council would be of service. I approve of the suggestions in paragraph 5, but consider (a) that the Council should contain one representative from each Revenue Division throughout India in addition to ruling Chiefs, (b) that the proceedings should not be confidential but be published, as this would prevent any member giving interested advice, and (c) that the period should not be more than 3 years.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—I think such a council would be useful, but would suggest that it should contain one member from each district and such others as Government may select.

III. (3) to (6) Imperial Legislative Council.—I consider that the council should be enlarged, and approve of the arrangement suggested in paragraph 12 of the Government letter except that I do not see why Muhammadans should be specially represented under D (d), and think that the words "not less than two to be Muhammadans" might be omitted in E.

IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—I consider the number should be augmented—9 official and 9 non-official.

(8) Of the non-official members, I would suggest that 4 be nominated and 5 be elected.

(9) No representation of classes.

(10) I would suggest as an electorate persons paying Rs. 500 or more land revenue, Rs. 35 or more income-tax, and graduates of 5 years' standing or over.

(11) See (9).

(12) I do not think provision should be made.

V. (13) Discussion of the Budget.—Yes.

(14) Yes, by separate heads.

(15) Yes.

RADHA KISHEN,

Pleader, Vice-President, Montgomery Municipal Committee.

Replies of Muhammad Amin Khan, Honorary Magistrate and Zamindar.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—Yes, but regarding paragraph 5 (3) that one member be nominated from each Revenue Division and regarding paragraph 5 (7) that the proceedings be not confidential.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—Yes. I would increase the number and obtain one member from each district by nomination.

III. (3) to (6) Imperial Legislative Council.—I agree to all in paragraph 12, but consider that all should be appointed and none elected.

IV. (7) to (12) The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—It should be increased to 10 official and 10 non-official members. The non-official members to be half Muhammadans and the remainder Hindu or Sikh. To be elected by district boards and municipal committees and then selections made by Government.

District boards and municipal committees to consist of half Muhammadans and half Hindus (including Sikhs) in every district.

V. (13) Discussion of the Budget.—Yes.

(14) Yes, by separate heads.

(15) Yes.

MUHAMMAD AMIN KHAN,

Honorary Magistrate and Zamindar.

Replies of Kamir, Zaildar and Zamindar of Mehrpur.

I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—Yes, but regarding paragraph 5 (3) I would suggest that one member be nominated from each district; (6) and (7) nothing should be confidential.

II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—Yes, but would suggest one member from each district by nomination.

III. (3) to (6) I approve of all the suggestions in paragraph 12 of the Government letter, but consider that all members should be nominated.

IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—Yes, I would suggest that two persons be obtained from each division.

(8) I would allow election by the members of municipal committees and district boards and suggest that Government select from the names sent in.

(9) I would suggest that the non-official members be half Muhammadans and the other half consist of Hindus, including Sikhs.

(10) See (8).

(11) I suggest that the members of district boards be appointed by classes in proportion to numbers as shown by the census, Hindus, Sikhs, and Muhammadans being taken as classes; that members for municipal committees be elected, the classes being fixed as above.

(12) No opinion.

V. (13) Discussion of the Budget.—Yes.

(14) Yes, by separate heads.

(15) Yes.

C. G. PARSONS, Lieut.-Colonel,

Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

Opinion.

The retrospect in paragraph 4 is of the traditional council of diwans, wazirs, and other "pillars of the State" summoned by an oriental monarch whenever he wished to take advice. Such conferences or deliberations in councils were undoubtedly common, but attended probably for the most part by high State officials and persons whom from their known allegiance the monarch had placed in positions of trust. That persons outside such officialdom were on special occasions admitted to such conferences is possible, but more generally probably for examination or on their defence. At any rate there were probably no persons appointed as councillors pure and simple without any other office. Thus when it is said that the sovereign made it his business to consult competent advisers, and that therefore the scheme for an Imperial Advisory Council would be no innovation in principle, it might be replied, and with truth, that there would be no innovation in such a sovereign occasionally summoning to Advisory Councils a selection of officials called from all or any parts of the country, since these were his natural advisers, but that there would be novelty in the idea of appointing a body of non-officials to be "Advisory Councillors" and nothing else, who should be so summoned on occasions. In considering the scheme the question might be put by a living oriental ruler. "Why does not the Viceroy summon his officials to advise him instead of looking beyond these to non-officials? Are the non-officials more reliable and more capable of advice than the officials?" To a reply that Indian advice was more particularly aimed at, his rejoinder might be "Then why not summon selected Indian officials?" I say these might and probably would be the instinctive first questions of the ruler of an Indian State who had the traditional point in question put to him. But to the last imaginary question above the educated Indian who studies administration would at once give the answer "Because there are few, if any, Indian executive officials of high enough position to be admitted into oral council by the Viceroy with propriety." This I take it is the crux of the situation which has created the present correspondence, and the argument of a dissatisfied educated Indian of moderate views would be that there should be and ought to be sufficiency of such Indian officials. The argument of a dissatisfied educated Indian of extremer views would be that there should be plenty of them to pick and choose from all over the country. It is desirable to pause for a moment and reflect whether just as 2 Indian officials* and not non-officials have been admitted to the India Office Council at London, there are or are not a sufficiency of Indian officials of high enough position in the country at present, for the purposes at issue. Without the different provincial lists at hand for reference review is difficult, but it immediately occurs to one that there are a number of High Court or Chief Court Judges and of senior Indian Civilians in the executive and judicial lines, and that every year there are Indian recruits added to the latter lines, who in course of time obtain position and experience. The question therefore arises: "Why cannot occasional Advisory Councils be assembled from these?" It has been premised that such occasional assemblings would occur only for the discussion of questions of moment and for shaping the action of Government when any particular high affair of State attracting unusual interest was under contemplation, and I take it that such assemblings would be most called for and appropriate when racial aspects coloured any such high affair in issue, or when intimate knowledge of or advice upon Indian life and thought was a necessary preliminary to a decision. There would be nothing surprising in the Viceroy summoning to council chosen Indian officials from different provinces to tender their views and advice upon subjects such as these. What perhaps seems surprising is that while the present schemes contemplate summoning non-officials to such councils, this is so seldom if ever done in the case of officials. At least it is never regularly done except in the fashion provided by the Indian Councils Acts in respect of the Viceroy's Legislative Council, and this under the present correspondence is condemned as too limited and inadequate a practice. The Viceroy never or hardly ever says or occasions of moment that he will have a council and will call to it from all or any provinces such Indian officials as he wishes or thinks could aid him, and after examining them and ascertaining their views send them away back to their duties. It is incontestable that calling such conferences would be of immense value, yet it is hardly if ever done. Why it is never done, it is perhaps not for me to attempt to say, but among other reasons I presume that disciplinary considerations have had much force in suppressing the operation of any such inclinations, since it might be contended that to call junior Indian officers from different provinces into council with the Viceroy would be a slight to local Governments; and yet just as it proposed that the proposed Advisory Councils might be arranged with due regard to provincial prestige and considerations of etiquette, any such difficulty in calling up officials might easily be accommodated by, for instance, such expedients as the summonses to the officials emanating through and from the provincial Governors on the Viceroy's behalf.

It seems to me obvious that before you consult non-officials on matters of State you should consult officials, the former only being consulted with directly (as distinct from being freely heard in deputation or by other form of articulation) should the latter prove unworthy.

I would ask what a district officer does when a measure of moment, particularly one affecting Indian life and thought, is under contemplation. He summonses subordinate Indian officials in the first place, and consults with them and ascertains as far as possible through them what public thought and feeling would be. If he cannot get all he wants to know from them, he summons private individuals and examines them; and it is certain that if he wishes he will accurately feel the pulse of his district on any given subject.

Is it impossible for the Viceroy or for a Provincial Governor to do the same? I cannot see how that can be given a matter of moment requiring diagnosis from the point of view of Indian thought and life, and it seems to me that the Viceroy or the Governor can as well say "I will have such and such an Indian official from here and such and such a one from there, and will collect a body of these officials for the occasion to enlighten me in the matter; and if I do not get all I want to know from them I will have up knowledgeable private persons to further enlighten me, such as may be chosen as likely (if likely ones are unknown to me myself) by my Lieutenant-Governors or my district officers (as the case may be)." In fact I do not see why the Viceroy or the Governor should not act precisely as a district officer would, albeit from his loftier platform: and speaking with all deference and earnestness, I submit that the present correspondence shows that while it is within district officers' knowledge that many Governors and Lieutenant-Governors (although not to the extent that I contemplate in my present remarks) have acted like this, the Viceroy for the time being has less and less acted like this in proportion as the increasing congregation of bureaux and departmental encirclement at Calcutta and Simla has intervened between his direct touch with or opportunity for consulting Indian officials at any rate in the body. Before the environment of departmental offices became so pressing and complicated, to act as a district officer would, was obviously much more possible, and such action was I imagine not uncommon with the Viceroys like Lord Mayo and Viceroys earlier than he, but I submit that what may be called the elaborations of bureaux and their environment have had a tendency to frustrate the simple methods of conference and interview which presented themselves as easy at an earlier time. I may be considered presumptuous perhaps in saying this, but with a full consciousness of this and speaking in a spirit of real deference, I repeat that the present correspondence shows this on the face of it. And having ventured to say so much I must also submit that the elaboration of bureaux and the crush of business which they entail upon a Viceroy present entanglements, an escape from which is necessary to gain, or regain, lost touch with Indian officials and through them with the people. I expressly say Indian officials of course owing to the context; the Viceroy being in close touch with officials enough. But generally speaking they are English officials, and a dissatisfied educated Indian would exclaim that he is surrounded with a quick set ledge of these: an exaggeration which would serve to point the remarks I make.

* Said Husain Belgrami is an official (or was) of a State.

To put my case briefly, the present correspondence shows that Indian opinion, life, and thought is not considered to be sufficiently reached, and it is suggested that bodies of Indian non-officials should be summoned to advise the Viceroy. The point I wish to make is, and the question I wish to ask is, whether bodies of Indian officials are summoned to advise the Viceroy. To this I unhesitatingly answer in the negative: absolutely in the negative in the same sense I mean, and to the extent which in the present correspondence it is proposed to summon non-officials. The obvious question that occurs to me is "Why not try the officials first?"

The opinion of the youngest and most inexperienced Indian official upon questions or policies affecting Indian life and thought is often of more value than that of the generality of highly placed English officials. Therefore the absence of any highly placed Indian officials in a province, if this happened, need not necessarily preclude summonses to members of such a province; and the going behind senior English officials to consult junior Indian ones would, in the light of the context, be reasonable and intelligible, just as when the Officer Commanding an Indian regiment pushes through his staff of English officers to consult with his Indian officers on matters intimately concerning the life and thought of the men of the regiment.

There is a passage in the preamble of Sir Harold Stuart's letter which says that the needs and sentiments of the masses of the people must find expression through officials or non-officials acquainted with their daily life and qualified to speak with authority on their behalf. In connection with this passage my point is that we have not yet tried to let that expression be given by officials selected because they are Indian, not at any rate by Indian officials taken into council or conference in the regular fashion of assembling councils or conferences which the rest of the preamble pronounces to be desirable.

I have said above that to call councils or conferences of Indian officials, in regular fashion, would be of immense value, and it is certainly undeniable that they are qualified to speak with authority on behalf of the masses; for if an Indian official is not qualified to speak with authority, it is difficult to see who else is, without entering on the difficult distinction between properly constituted authority and authority constituted in other ways. What, for instance, is constitutional authority if it is not officially constituted authority? I saw somewhere a letter from a late Commissioner of the Punjab advocating the acquisition of assistance in Government through the peoples' "own rulers." I presume that these traditional hereditary rulers would be considered the constitutional non-official authority or constituted non-official authority best qualified to speak on behalf of the masses. Leaving Native Chiefs aside for a moment the point I make is whether traditionally constituted authorities would be better qualified than the constituted authorities proper, namely, the Indian officials. In the length and breadth of India officials are recruited from a large number of classes, and in time we may hope to say almost every class, and while individuals among them should thus be able to advise as traditionally constituted rulers might be expected to advise, officials have the merit of being disinterested or at any rate are expected by their Government to be disinterested. Non-officials are not expected to be disinterested or it is a wild flight of imagination to expect them to be, and, moreover, if to Advisory Councils are to be added individuals to represent every class, such as the landed aristocracy, mercantile, industrial, and the thinkers and writers as well as backward classes, a creation of large bodies of men is foreshadowed which we have already got, equally representative as far as that is possible, in the official classes. A reduplication is in fact contemplated, and reduplication with this difference that the large bodies contemplated would be unwieldy and individually interested wherever the interests of themselves and their class were at issue, while the large body already available is wieldy and is, or is expected to be, disinterested. Between which two bodies would one choose for useful advice, on the one hand self-interested, loose, discursive, and on the other disinterested (as far as that can be expected), compact, and ready to speak to the point? An untrained incoherent body and a trained coherent body? A body unaccustomed to weigh, to judge and advise and a body accustomed to these three duties? A body accustomed to talk and only asked to talk, not act; and a body accustomed to talk and act? In fact it can hardly be a question that a body of Indian officials would be of more value in advising on any given point than a body of non-officials. Yet the possibility of summoning councils of officials seems to have been brushed aside or never thought of. Is it not a slight upon the large body of officials that Government, without taking such thought, should contemplate going behind them to the non-officials? It appears extraordinary to me that an appreciation of this slight, if it is a slight, has not been voiced in any Indian newspaper seriously considering the question. The Indian officials themselves are naturally silent, but if they could speak openly it is possible to conceive them asking "First of all why not listen to us?" I repeat it is not subversive of discipline to take officials into confidence and advice, irrespective of position and seniority, at the Viceroy's table upon matters admittedly requiring special examination from the point of view of Indian life and thought.

And as for the making of Government measures and motives generally understood and in correcting erroneous statements or imputations Indian officials are necessarily so closely connected with the non-official classes that they are as good mediums and mouth-pieces as any non-officials. Suppose that a council of Indian officials had been summoned and dispersed. The results in dissemination would be the same.

The fact is that no one who reads the correspondence or the discussions in the newspapers, particularly the Indian ones, doubts that the motives underlying the proposals are mainly political.

Since the above passages were written I have elicited, from an Indian Revenue Officer serving immediately under me, admissions which satisfied me that the sense of slight spoken of above was not a possibility figured only in my imagination. He also admitted that a council or conference of Indian officials would be more practically useful than one of non-officials, and he did this although he had been explaining that a representative council in the embryo was politically desired by the educated classes. He also admitted that the results in dissemination of what transpired at council would be the same whether the councillors were official or non-official. I have also elicited, from the advanced thinker of most notoriety* in the Province at the present time, the admission that non-official councillors called into existence in the manner proposed in the correspondence would be regarded by advanced thinkers as inefficient because not "responsible," whereas it was of course impossible to deny that officials would be "responsible." What was exactly meant by the term "responsible," I need not discuss just here; but my conversation with both the persons named brought out plainly to my mind the incontrovertibility of my proposition above that practical utility less than the satisfaction of political aspirations is expected to be served by the proposals under discussion. For practical utility councils or conferences of Indian officers must, in my opinion, hold the field, and the question which suggests itself is whether they would not serve political ends too. I incline to think that the political effect would be great. In fact I would go so far as to say that it would be so great, and might in the past have been so great, had such councils been regularly summoned, that much of the correspondence now written might possibly never have been written at all. For what brought about the penning of this correspondence is appreciation of sense of lost touch (rather than want of touch), and I submit that this loss could have been saved through official councils, perhaps almost as well if not as well as by any official councils, especially if my argument, that officials are recruited from all prominent non-official classes, is borne in mind.

*Lala Lajpat Rai.

For a number of years we had reform in almost every department of State going on almost simultaneously, and simultaneously also with the creation of new departments of State and of new appointments: yet though previous opinions were duly elicited through officials these officials were mainly English officials controlling the channels of elicitation, and there were certainly no councils or conferences of Indians (whether official or non-official) called in the way now under consideration. The very conservatism of Indian character was, I believe, startled at the rush of change introduced, and, as the thinkers considered, without consultation with the Indians themselves where they were capable of judging upon the necessity for, in comparison with the expense of, some of the innovations and changes. This rush of change itself, I think, contributed to unrest, or put a premium upon it. In India it is the natural instinct of the Indian to "go slow" and when everything "went fast" all of a sudden, without, as it was considered, a taking into confidence, the effect was disturbing to the Indian mind. The summoning of councils or conferences of Indian officials would have been exactly that form of "taking into confidence" which would have allayed the startled, disturbed, or unrestful feelings. Such summonings would no doubt have delayed matters, have rendered some of the proposed changes impossible in the time, but from the point of view of the present correspondence this would have been desirable. It would also have suited the views of the educated Indian thinker. The present correspondence is an implied council to "go slow" in administration; and in India, as most Anglo-Indians of experience know, this is the best of watch-words for each succeeding Viceregal Government.

Yet the correspondence also might be accused of erring in going too fast in another direction, namely, the political direction. It is all very well to say that by nomination of members useful working councils can be obtained. The statutory rules which were resorted to to give the present Viceregal Legislative Council an elective as well as representative character, show that as soon as councils are established this is the way the tendency lies, and the pressure begins and continues. Pressure towards turning the Advisory Councils contemplated into elective and representative ones is bound to urge itself forward: and owing to this knowledge only do the proposals under consideration at all satisfy the impetuous advanced thinker. The advanced thinker considers a nominated member inclined to be a submissive member, and he considers him not a responsible person and therefore inefficient. He considers him not responsible because he has not got a vote. An elective electorate, elected councillors, and councillors with a right to vote for or against any measure proposed in council are the goal of the ambition of a large section of advanced thinkers, and the moderate and impetuous among them only differ as to the degree of limitation or reservation necessary at the present time to prevent councils, having these objects admittedly in the background, from stultifying themselves as manifest impossibilities in limine. It seems therefore desirable, before embarking upon reforms which must tacitly accept or countenance these ambitions, to consider whether lost touch cannot be regained by any less compromising experiments. I think that it is a very great pity that the idea of summoning councils of Indian officials in regular fashion in the past was not elaborated, and also a great pity that this notion did not find a place as an alternative proposal in the correspondence now under discussion.

I am a deeply earnest supporter of the desirability of maintaining touch which is incumbent on any conscientious and intelligent Government, but I would follow the conservative and traditional methods first, in preference to, when India is considered, new fangled ones. My point is that we have not yet followed the conservative and traditional methods; for I cannot find it possible to agree that the Badshah ever made it a rule to summon non-official councils. This was not in the least contended by the Indian official above mentioned, whom I conversed with.

Of course it would be contended by the pushing Indian politician that officials summoned to council invariably adopt, and would adopt, the jo hukm attitude. He would say, and says this also of the nominated councillor. But I think it is true neither of the one nor of the other at the present day, and that it is and will be every day less and less possible to urge this imputation. The Indian official recruited from the educated classes is, within the limits of due discipline, becoming every day more frank and outspoken in his attitude to his superiors. (I take the officer above alluded to as a case in point. He is a young Muhammadan (only 10 years out of college), an excellent officer, he is frank and outspoken, and in no way too timid before his superiors). So also are and would be the persons and notables who would be nominated councillors under the scheme. Nor is it clear why there should be a difference. The official and the councillor, in posse, come from the same classes. The insensate jo hukm attitude is likely to as fast disappear from among officials and the persons who would furnish these non-official councillors as from those educated classes who think and write and press politics. A most remarkable letter in this connection appeared in an Indian newspaper (Lahore) the other day under the heading "What the people of India want." I do not believe the Indian official would be found tongue-tied if called into council or conference, especially when he would be, as he is, perfectly aware of all the discussions antecedent to any such calling if it happened. He would know that in addition to this official position, he had a "mandate of the people," as the political phrase goes, for those purposes connected with Indian thought and life for which he was so called.

And a great deal more do I not believe that the non-official councillor, albeit nominated, will be found tongue-tied or at all partial to the jo hukm attitude. He, on the other hand, admittedly not being "responsible," will be likely to be less submissive than oppositionary. The tendency will be that way. Experience shows it. The few elected councillors are likely to leaven the mass of the nominated ones, until the councils become mere "opposition benches." This I think is inevitable.* The elected members being dissatisfied members—permeated with the ambitions above described—are bound to be in opposition. They would be, as their being elected would imply, generally pushing politicians, and, as such, dissatisfied at having no power of vote. Their dissatisfaction would gradually extend to nominated members with practical certainty.† I do not see how this can fail to happen: with the result that a council almost entirely "in opposition" would result. And in this case Government would quite possibly often be incurring the odium of passing measures which it considered called for in conflict with the advice of its councillors; a situation absolutely courted by itself. It is obvious that this would not mend matters or help to make apparent that "touch" of which the want, or loss, is deplored. The want, or loss, of touch would only be emphasized in the eyes of the public. I imagine that this hope is not far from the mind of the dissatisfied pushing politician at the present time when he considers the present proposals, or at any rate of that class of politician who wishes to see the Government embarrassed. He has shown himself ready to embarrass the Government, and he must doubly welcome any readiness displayed by Government to embarrass itself. Why the Advisory Councillor is likely, in the long run, to be in opposition would be explained by such thinkers on the ground, that he is not "responsible." The more pushing among them would resent their not being "responsible" (that is, having no right to vote), and they would close ranks in opposition. The attitude of opposition benches is notorious the world over. It may be seen at St. Stephen's any day. It is one of opposition for the sake of opposition (unfortunately so, from the point of view of those who hold that party politics should not obstruct public business) and one of objection for the purpose of creating embarrassment to the ministerial benches. To all intents and purposes the Indian Government would represent the last-named benches, and the Advisory Councils the opposition benches, and their tactics would be the same dictated by the same spirit, namely, one of party politics.

*To such extent as it is not counteracted by interested schism.

†Subject only to the above noted distractions.

Disingenuous attack of proposed Governmental measures, misrepresentation, exaggeration, and appeals to the gallery are among the tactics employed by all parliamentary opposition benches in all Western countries, and these possibly would be assimilated, elaborated, and improved upon by Advisory Councils in opposition in India.

Therefore I say we should "go slow" lest our latter state be worse than our first: or lest the suggested remedy be not worse than the disease. To be held up publicly as not only being not in touch but to be acting in conflict with advice tendered by councils is worse than to merely deplore a want of touch.

To try and establish touch by methods having at their root the satisfaction of political aspirations is a mixed procedure which confounds in my opinion "practical utility" and "expediency." The expediency may or may not exist as imperative. I cannot from my limited scope of vision judge whether it is absolutely imperative or not: but as to practical utility I deliberately say that touch can best be maintained or loss of touch regained by council which it had with Indian officials, namely "responsible" councillors as distinct from the "irresponsible." You will get real council from the one and irresponsible attack from the other. You will establish a real touch by means of the one and will be held up to the public as having none, and oftener as acting in conflict with expressed Indian opinion, by the other.

And I believe that the summoning of Indian official councils would be as politically effective as the other move with moderate thinkers, although it would never of course satisfy the pushing politician who aspires to a representative assembly with powers of vote. But neither do the present proposals satisfy him. He jeers at them.

These are my views written with all earnestness, but I regret to say as hurriedly as the press of work in this Lahore district is bound to occasion, especially in the case of a district officer who has only just taken charge and whose English office has, as it happens, just broken down under an inefficient ministerial personnel.

I have, however, to add that my objections to councils of irresponsible non-officials in general and to merely traditional rulers do not apply to councils of responsible actual rulers such as the Chiefs of States. Putting aside questions of individual capacity and temperament these Chiefs, selected in the body, would be anxious to give not only their opinions in connection with Indian thought and life but advice in what they considered to be the best interests of administration. Indirectly native rulers are interested in the administration of British India not only because they are often expected to follow suit upon the model, but because the attitude of their subjects is likely to be affected by new departure, especially when these are admittedly experiments which affect the political constitution of Government in British India. Their subjects are also liable to be affected by the spirit of thought generated by British rule in British India; and, in a measure, although with long interval between, they are likely to be confronted with the same problems of administration such as give rise to the present correspondence.

In a word, progress in British India and in the States should go on side by side, although perhaps not at equal pace, and to associate the rulers of States as Advisory Councillors with Government in facing the problems of administration seems to me a proposition natural enough to escape objection.

C. G. PARSONS, Lieut.-Colonel,

Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

Replies by Lieutenant-Colonel C. G. Parsons to the categorical questions, etc., written in continuation of his "general opinion" preceding.

I. (1) For the reasons given in my general opinion I do not consider so. It will be seen that I advocate Advisory Councils of responsible officials and of responsible rulers, not of irresponsible non-officials and merely traditional rulers. If the Advisory Councils contemplated are resolved on, I can suggest no modification in the manner of arranging its constitution and duties. As long as the manner announced is adhered to it would seem the least open to objection.

II. (2) I do not think so, for reasons already stated. If Provincial Councils of the kind contemplated are resolved on no modification of the proposals for constituting it occurs to me.

III. (3) That the elective principle crept into the existing council to the extent of 5 seats shows what the inevitable tendency is, and elected members are, for reasons given in my general opinion, almost bound to be "in opposition." To provide for 18 elected members out of 53 is to court the risks indicated in my "general opinion," I consider.

(4) The same criticism mutatis mutandis applies.

(5) Election by the land-holding members of the Provincial Council is open to the same criticism. To impose the duty of election upon the land-holding classes (whatever reservations as to the high status for the voter were made) would be in my opinion to introduce perhaps well meant but none the less iniquitous discord among those classes. An inexcusable experimentalisation with Western methods among an Eastern race is what I would condemn as I consider it would be iniquity not to be atoned for by subsequent extenuation on the plea of good intention obscured by want of insight. "I came not to introduce peace but a sword" is the question which most readily occurs to me on contemplating the proposal. The proposal would be the thin edge of the sword. The continual foisting of debateable Western methods on the East is in my opinion deplorable.

The third alternative suggestion of nomination commends itself to me.

(6) The same remarks apply to the proposed election of two Muhammadans. I approve of four Muhammadans being appointed, but would have all four nominated after examination of representations made to Lieutenant-Governors and Viceroys, which representation would be made freely enough either by memorial or deputation. It is election with all its evils which is so iniquitous in result. Representation is surely possible by other usual means.

IV. (7) I do not advocate any increase as my general opinion shows. If increase must be, let it be as restricted as possible.

(8) Nomination is the only form of appointment I consider justifiable.

(9) I would not advocate a fixed rule which would tie the hands of Lieutenant-Governors and court perhaps acrimonious discussions.

(10) I can suggest no electorate system which would not be open to evils far greater than the arbitrarily presumed political privileges. If election were unfortunately resolved on a closely discriminative electors' list would be needed.

(11) If the present proposals mature I would advocate separate representation of classes; and—

(a) I would carry it out by appointing persons named by anjumans and panchayats or communities by means of memorial or deputation.

(b) The "corresponding changes" contemplated in municipalities and district boards are an elaboration too intricate for practical adoption in my opinion. These bodies might be "consulted" about naming members when occasion required or circumstances allowed, but the constitution of them as elective arenas, and the constitution of elective arenas throughout the country, is the objection which I have tried to inveigh against to the best of my power.

(12) I think separate provision should be made, but the representatives should be nominated. There is no use in repeating my views too often.

V. (13) I think the alterations proposed reasonable, since the members of the council as responsible representatives of various interests should have full opportunity of discussion under the most facile means for rendering discussion less discursive and more fruitful. But lengthy sittings of council will no doubt have to be looked for.

(14) Not at present, either in one way or the other. I cannot conceive why developments should not be allowed to "grow" rather than be manufactured.

(15) If members showed a general desire for interpellation, I would in due course provide for it, but I would not introduce it as a necessary outcome of the present correspondence as this is what I mean by manufacturing a development.

Dated Lahore, 22nd October 1907.

From—Rai Sahib K. B. Thapar, Lahore,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

I have the honour to acknowledge, with thanks, the receipt of your office circular no. 6268, dated the 11th instant, inviting my opinion on the proposals of the Government of India for establishment of Advisory Councils both Imperial and Provincial, and for the enlargement of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils.

2. Taken generally the proposals in question constitute a distinct step in advance in the direction of giving the people of India wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters. I am disposed to welcome proposals of the nature, because I am convinced that the work of administration in this country is more difficult than it really ought to be on account of the opportunities of mutual consultation and of exchanging confidences between Government and representative men among the people being not as frequent as one would wish them to be. If the officials of Government and men of light and leading among the people meet in formal or informal conferences pretty frequently, there is sure to be much less room than at present for that misunderstanding between Government and the people which gives rise to difficulties of all sorts and at times causes considerable anxiety both to Government and those among the people who have a stake in the country. All well-wishers of the country who think that the interests of Government and the people are identical, unite in deploring the misunderstanding in question, because it retards the progress of the country on sound and harmonious lines in almost even direction.

3. As desired in paragraph 2 of Mr. E. D. Maclagan's lettter, dated the 27th September 1907, I shall endeavour to record my views on the proposals of the Government of India by answering the series of questions in the order in which they are stated at the end of the letter referred to above.

4. I. (1) Imperial Adisovry Council.—I am of opinion that an Imperial Advisory Council generally on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter, dated the 24th August 1907, would be of service to the country. As regards the proposals contained in paragraph 5 of the letter referred to above, I have nothing to suggest regarding nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, and 6. But with reference to no. 3, I am inclined to think that the council would be better able satisfactorily to discharge one of its most important functions, viz., (as stated in the conclusion of paragraph 4 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter), as an agency for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions, and objects of Government, if room could be found in its rank for a few representatives of the educated classes. A council consisting exclusively of ruling Chiefs and territorial magnates would not command, to the extent that it should, the confidence of the people, more especially of the educated classes whose influence in shaping the views and opinions of their countrymen is out of all proportion to their numerical strength. I do not think it would be difficult for Government to find men of education and cultures suitable for nomination to the Imperial Advisory Council outside the ranks of territorial magnates, and what is known as the hereditary nobility and aristocracy, men who in social status and in their influence over their fellows are inferior to no territorial magnates in the land. The inclusion of such men in the Imperial Advisory Council would go a long way to disarm adverse criticism against its constitution and, later on, against its work. I am urged to press this view by the fact that the people at large are not disposed to recognise the claims of land-holders, territorial magnates, and men of good families and their hereditary leaders to the extent they did 30 years ago. The freedom from control or bondage of any sort they have enjoyed during the past 50 years, and the levelling influences of British Raj have made them quite independent of the aristocracy and the nobility of the land; and the process has been a good deal hastened by the fact that the latter have allowed themselves to lag behind in the race for culture and progress, intellectual as well as moral. Educational facilities have been provided by Government for all classes of the people, but the aristocratic classes have failed to profit by them. And it is no wonder that they have, to a large extent, ceased to occupy the high place in the regards and even the affections of the people which their grandfathers did only 25 years ago. As regards proposal no. 7, I think it would add to the usefulness of the council and extend its sphere of influence if publicity was given to their work. To treat proceedings of this body as confidential would be to afford the critics of the council a weapon which would be effectively used in undermining its influence as well as usefulness. I am not disposed to deny that confidential communications will secure frank interchange of opinion, but I think that the Viceroy and Governor General could at any time confer or communicate confidentially with one or more of the members of the council, even if it was decided to give publicity to its formal deliberations.

5. II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—A Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution in the province. I have nothing to add to the suggestions in this connection contained in paragraph 6 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter. My remarks regarding proposal no. 7 in paragraph 5 of the same letter may be taken to apply to the Provincial Advisory Council also. The number of members need not, in my opinion, exceed 25.

6. III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—I approve of the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council generally on the lines sketched in paragraph 12 of the letter of the Government of India.

Under head D—Elected members (a)—I would increase the number to be elected by Chambers of Commerce in Calcutta and Bombay from 2 to 4 and give the National Chambers of Commerce (consisting exclusively of Indian merchants) at those places powers to elect a member each. Under the same head (d) I would not have any members elected by Muhammadans. The provision made under head E (non-officials nominated by the Viceroy to represent minorities or special interests, not less than 2 to be Muhammadans) is quite sufficient to safeguard Muhammadan interests. To allow Muhammadans to take part in the elections provided under head D (b) and (c) and also to allow them to constitute themselves into a special electorate to elect 2 more members would be to give them a preponderance of influence and to create invidious distinctions which are sure to be keenly resented by the other classes of the community, more especially the Sikhs and the Native Christians who have strong claims to the special consideration of Government. The constitution sketched in paragraph 12 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter is much too favourable to Muhammadans, and if accepted and carried out finally is sure to strengthen the impression largely prevalent among the Hindus all over the country that the Muhammadans are being unduly favoured by Government and at the expense of all the other classes of the community.

7. III. (4) Imperial Legislative Council.—I endorse the proposal that one member should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Council as proposed in paragraph 13 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter.

8. III. (5) I approve of the selection of one of the great land-owners of this Province to the Imperial Legislative Council. I would prefer a system of nomination to election in this case. But if it is decided by Government that he should be elected, I would favour the formation of a special electorate in each Province with power to elect direct. To prescribe the payment of Rs. 5,000, as land revenue as the qualification for a voter, would considerably reduce the electorate, the strength of which, in my opinion, should not be less than 100. It would also not be possible to prescribe a higher qualification in the case of candidates for election without seriously restricting their number.

9. III. (6) I do not approve of the proposed appointment of 4 Muhammadans to the Imperial Council—2 by election and 2 at least by nomination—as suggested under heads D (d) and E of paragraph 12 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter for reasons given in paragraph 6 of this note. In case it is decided to let Muhammadans elect 2 members, I would prefer some such electorate as that described in paragraph 18 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter. If the constitution of a suitable electorate is not feasible, the election might be entrusted to the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Councils. In case a special Muhammadan electorate is constituted, its members should not be allowed to vote in the open elections. Similarly if the Muhammadan members of the Provincial Councils are empowered to nominate a representative to the Imperial Council, they should not be allowed to take part in the elections by non-official members of the Provincial Councils.

10. IV. (7) The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.—I would advocate an increase in the present number of members and would raise the total strength to 30. I do not think less than 12 of these should be non-officials if adequate representation has to be accorded to all the important interests mentioned in paragraph 20 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter and in paragraph 8 of Mr. E. D. Maclagan's letter.

11. IV. (8) I am in favour in maintaining the present system of nomination and would not have any of the non-official seats filled by election except that assigned to the University. I do not think that under any system of election that can be devised in this province it would be possible to give the needful representation to all interests enumerated in Mr. Maclagan's letter and to secure the right stamp of councillors. Besides I am not sure that it is possible to devise an elective system in this province which would prevent men being elected who could hardly be regarded as likely to enhance either the dignity or the utility of the council. A system of nomination would, on the other hand, enable the Government to apportion the seats at their disposal with due regard to the various interests requiring nomination and without the risk being run of any particular class or interest being over represented. In filling the seats the interests of the various parts of the province would also have to be considered, and these I think would be better protected under a system of nomination than under any elective system that can possibly be invented.

12. IV. (9) There is good deal to be said for the suggestion of the Government of India regarding a fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class of the population of the province (paragraph 22 (a) of Sir Harold Stuart's letter), although I do not advocate the imposition of a hard and fast rule, in view of the fact that the number of seats to be filled up will be necessarily limited.

13. IV. (10) If election is resorted to for the appointment of all or any of the unofficial members I would not advocate election through municipal or district boards for the reason that the basal principle of the franchise for these institutions is governed by considerations totally different from those which ought to have weight in constituting a Provincial Legislative Council, and to introduce radical changes in that franchise merely to suit the requirements of the Legislative Council would not, I think, be conducive to the efficiency of the boards. I am in favour of a special electorate being constituted on the lines of the special Muhammadan electorate mentioned in paragraph 17 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter. To the list of electors proposed therein I would add the darbaris, the title-holders, and the fellows of the University in the province. A seat or two might also be thrown open for election by the members and office-bearers of local and municipal and district boards.

14. IV. (11) In case a separate representation of classes as proposed in paragraph 2 (a) of Sir Harold Stuart's letter is finally decided upon, I think it should be carried out in the manner proposed in paragraph 22 (b) of the same letter, corresponding changes being at the same time made in the constitution of municipal and district boards in the manner indicated in paragraph 22 (c) of the letter.

15. IV. (12) I am not in favour of any provision being made for the separate representation of Muhammadans in addition to that open to them by nomination or election in the ordinary way. The Muhammadan in the Punjab cannot be regarded as a backward community requiring special protection. In almost all branches of the public service and in the learned professions they quite hold their own, and in industry and handicraft they occupy a position of predominance. There is no fear that in any system of nomination or election that is likely to be devised in this province their interests will suffer.

16. I quite endorse the remarks made in paragraph 10 of Mr. Maclagan's letter that in the Punjab the Sikh community is of the greatest importance. Some measures are certainly necessary to secure its adequate representation on both the Imperial and the Provincial Legislative Councils. The best plan, so far as the Provincial Legislative Council is concerned, would be to make a definite allotment of seats to Muhammadan, Hindu, and Sikh communities with due regard not only to their numerical strength, but their weight and influence and their historical importance. The Sikhs are deserving of special consideration, because they supply the Indian Army with perhaps the best part of its fighting strength, and also because they constitute the backbone of the agricultural part of the provincial population. The fact that before the British occupation the Sikhs were the rulers of the Punjab and also the fact that they afford the British valuable aid in retrieving their fortunes in the dark days of 1857 deserve to be borne in mind when their case is under consideration. I trust that the claims of the Sikh community for representation on the Imperial Legislative Council will be duly pressed.

17. I have very carefully considered the suggestion referred to in Mr. Maclagan's letter that even if the present system of nomination is otherwise maintained, the Senate of the Punjab University might be asked to elect one member for the council. I am of opinion that it would be an advantage to have an additional representative of the educated classes, although it is not certain that the Senate would always elect an educated Indian gentleman. But any advantage that might accrue to the council by the election of another representative of culture and learning would be considerably outweighed by the disadvantage and inconvenience that would ensue on account of the introduction of a controversial political element into a body constituted for purely educational objects. If, however, it is decided in the case of every other Indian University that it should be empowered to return a member to the Provincial Legislative Council, to leave the Punjab University out would be to create an undesirable and an invidious distinction. In that case the Punjab might accept the inevitable.

18. V. (13) Discussion of the Budget in the Legislative Council.—I am in favour of altering the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter.

19. V. (14) I am of opinion that the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council and by separate heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of Sir Harold Stuart's letter.

20. V. (15) I advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members.

21. In conclusion I may be permitted to make a few general observations. The proposals discussed in this note are tentative, and, I understand, it is the intention of Government to modify them in the light of the opinions received from various parts of the country. The provision made for giving the hereditary aristocracy and nobility of the country wider opportunities for expressing their views on measures, both Legislative and Administrative, constitutes one of the most satisfactory features of the scheme. But I wish I could say that the interests of the educated classes are also adequately safeguarded. I fear that if the scheme is accepted as its stands, the educated classes will not receive adequate representation on the reconstituted councils. It is a mistake to judge of the weight and influence of these classes by their numerical strength in the population. I cannot help referring here to the impression unfortunately largely prevalent all over the country, that as the result of the deplorable occurrences of the past five or six months the Government are determined to put down the Hindus and the educated classes generally. This impression is by no means confined to those who take part in political agitation. On the contrary it is very general among those who have never meddled with politics in any shape or form, and whose loyalty to Government has always been above suspicion. It can never be the intention of Government to punish a whole community or a section of the people for the misdeeds of a few misguided and fanatical zealots. I would not have written on this point as I have, if I had not been sure that Government is very anxious to remove the unfortunate impression referred to above. I wish to point out that if modifications are not made in the scheme with the view to safeguard the interests of the educated classes and especially excessive representation as that proposed in Sir Harold Stuart's letter is accorded to the Muhammadan community, the impression will spread and the resentment caused will increase in both volume and intensity. I am anxious to make it clear that my remarks are not made in any spirit of hostility to the Muhammadan community which always has had and has my best and sincerest wishes for its progress and advancement.

K. B. THAPAR,

Lahore.

No. 6, Fane Road, Lahore, dated 27th October 1907.

From—E. W. PARKER, Esq., Advocate, Lahore,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your circular no. 6403, dated the 19th October 1907, asking my views on the questions raised in the proposals for the establishments of Advisory Councils. In reply I beg to state as follows:—

A point which may be mentioned in limine is whether ruling Chiefs or their subjects should find any place in the Legislative and Advisory Councils. While it may be highly desirable to have a separate council (on the political side, so to speak) recruited from this direction, it is obvious that the Rulers and peoples of protected States should have no voice in the Government of British India and British subjects. Apparently this aspect has not received much attention, although a Council of Rulers and Notables of Native States would be welcomed by those States, more especially in advising the Suzerain's representatives in cases of disputed succession and the like, the lines on which a Committee of the House of Lords deals with successions to peerages being followed.

I think that Advisory Councils for British India, on the lines proposed, might, in course of time, prove useful. They would confer honour on the members and bring them into touch with the Government.

I am, however, entirely opposed to all forms of election on Western lines.

The introduction of a system of election into municipalities, in Lord Ripon's Viceroyalty, on lines altogether foreign to the genius of an oriental people and to the history and traditions of the peoples of India, has been fraught with disastrous results; the chief of which lies in the antagonism between Hindus and Muhammadans which has since become so accentuated.

Whatever mode of selection is adopted, let it be based on methods indigenous to the country and let it avoid all forms of individual voting and ballot.

As to the Imperial Advisory Council it might be entirely constituted by selections made from the Provincial Advisory Councils, the membership to the latter councils being made by Government nomination.

It seems to me necessary, at this stage, to consider questions of detail which will, no doubt, be easily worked out when general principles have been settled.

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

With reference to your letter no. 6268, dated 11th October 1907, I have the honour to forward herewith my opinion on the proposals of Government of India for the establishment of Advisory Councils, both Imperial and Provincial, and for the enlargement of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils.

M. SHAH DIN,

Barrister-at-Law, Lahore.

OPINION.

I. Imperial Advisory Council.—The reasons set forth in paragraphs 4 and 6 of the Government of India letter regarding the desirability of establishing the Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils thoroughly commend themselves to me, and I think that the formation of such councils will prove useful both to Government and to the people. Owing to a variety of causes, which it is needless to enter into in this place, circumstances have come into existence in recent years which have rendered it much easier than before for interested persons and for political agitators of the extremist type to create in the popular mind a distrust of the motives and measures of Government, with the result that among large classes of the people there prevails at this moment an artfully stimulated feeling of discontent with existing conditions of administration, which constitutes a serious menace to the cause of peace and good government in this country. It would be wise, therefore, for the authorities to devise some means by which they would be enabled, with due regard to the necessities of the time and the expansive conditions of modern progress, to take the influential classes of the population more into their confidence, and through the latter to turn the dominant currents of genuine Indian thought and feeling into channels more in harmony with the needs of a sound Imperial policy. The necessity for adoption of measures calculated to bring about such a result is imperative, and I am persuaded to think that the establishment of Imperial and Provincial Advisory Councils would be a step in the right direction.

As regards the constitution and duties of the proposed Imperial Advisory Council, I regret I find myself unable to concur fully in the suggestions made in paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter. The modifications which I venture to propose are as follows:—

(1) The membership of the council should not be limited, as it is proposed to be limited, to the ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates of British India, but should be extended to the influential representatives of important interests in the country such as industry, commerce, the learned professions, &c., which the Government of India themselves have considered of sufficient weight to be entitled to a representation on the Provincial Advisory Councils. In this respect I see no cogent reason why a distinction of a radical character should be drawn between the Imperial Council and the Provincial Council; in fact, so far as this aspect of the constitution is concerned, instead of working down from the Imperial Council to the Provincial Councils, I would work up to the former from the latter, and I would include in the Imperial Advisory Council the representatives, however small in number, of all the interests which, in view of their relative importance in the country, can legitimately claim representation on the Provincial Councils. In my humble judgment the Imperial Advisory Council should be, as the Imperial Legislative Council generally is in its relation to local Legislative Councils, an epitome of all the Provincial Advisory Councils in the country, for it is then and only then that it will be fit to discharge the great functions for the performance of which it is proposed to establish it, viz., to act as a faithful exponent of the views and wishes of all races and nationalities both in British India and in the principal Native States, and to serve as a reliable "agency for the diffusion of correct information upon the acts, intentions, and objects of Government."

(2) If, as is proposed, the council should consist of about 60 members, I would suggest that the number of ruling Chiefs should not exceed 15, i.e., one-fourth the total number of members. If the inclusion of about 20 Chiefs in the council is for some reason considered desirable, I would raise the total numerical strength of the council to 80, which would probably be a suitable figure if, as I have suggested above, important interests other than those of the great land-holders should be considered entitled to claim representation on the council.

(3) I would also suggest that in finally settling the constitution of the council, the Government of India should make it clear that, so far as possible, the nominations to the council will be made with due regard to the numbers and the political and historical importance of the several communities which inhabit India. A declaration to this effect will, in a large measure, satisfy the vast majority of the Indian people who are outside the sphere of influence of the professional politician, who is almost pledged to oppose the political reforms undertaken by the Government of India, and who will endeavour to minimise the representative character of the proposed Advisory Councils, the institution of which obviously is not in harmony with his ideas of political advance.

II. Provincial Advisory Councils.—For the reason which I have set out above I think that a Provincial Advisory Council for the Punjab would be a useful institution. I have no particular suggestions to make in connection with the proposals made in the Government of India letter and in paragraph 4 of the letter from the Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government regarding the constitution and duties of such a council.

III. Imperial Legislative Council. Answer to question 4.—I certainly approve of the proposed enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council. I do not, however, see my way to concur fully in the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter. I would propose the following modifications:—

(1) I do not approve of the nomination of a ruling Chief to the council. A ruling Chief may fitly find a place on the Imperial Advisory Council, and the proposed constitution of that council, according to which a sufficiently large number of ruling Chiefs will under all circumstances be its members, affords ample scope for a full expression of the views of the heads of the principal Native States on most of the important matters affecting the Indian people in regard to which they might profitably be consulted. They have little practical knowledge of and take less interest in the legislative needs of British India, and with all possible respect for the Chiefs who have so acted as members of the Imperial Legislative Council, I do not think that their contributions, if any, to the discussions on the various legislative measures brought up from time to time before the council, would in the majority of cases be of much intrinsic value. A member from among the ruling Chiefs may no doubt on exceptional occasions ensure or strengthen the official majority in the council, but this object can well be secured without such a member being nominated; and I therefore do not see any reason why the anomaly, in view of the proposed institution of the Imperial Advisory Council of nominating a ruling Chief to a seat on the Legislative Council should be persisted in.

(2) The question of setting apart a fixed number of seats on the council for the Muhammadan community is one of great importance, and I believe I only voice the real feelings of my co-religionists in all parts of India when I say that the proposed reform in the constitution of council according to which a number of seats will be specially reserved for Muhammadans is viewed with great satisfaction by the community. This reform will not only serve to remove one of the grievances which have been long and sorely felt by Muhammadans in the past, but will also mean the timely recognition by the Supreme Government of a just principle of separate racial representation on the councils of the Indian Empire, which, when fully carried out, will tend to solve many of the administrative difficulties of Government. I, therefore, strongly support the proposal to allot a fixed number of seats to Muhammadans on the Imperial Legislative Council, though, at the same time, I cannot approve of the suggestion to limit this number to 4. After making due allowance for the possible return of, say, two Muhammadans (the return of more than two being exceedingly improbable) under sub-heads (b) and (c) of head D of the scheme sketched out in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter, it is not too much to say that the six Muhammadan members elected and nominated under heads D and E out of a total of 53 members would hardly suffice for the adequate representation of the vastly diversified interests of the Indian Mussalmans on the Viceroy's Council. If the Government of India have seen fit to recognize the justice of the Muhammadan claim to a separate representation on the Legislative Councils of the country, in the spirit of the generous reply given by His Excellency the Viceroy to the address presented to him by the Muhammadan deputation at Simla on the 1st October 1906 (referred to in paragraph 16 of the Government of India letter), surely the representation so conceded should be adequate. For, if this is not done, the Government of India will, on the one hand, have incurred the odium of Hindu politicians of the Congress school for alleged partiality to the Muhammadans in giving them a special representation on the councils, and, on the other hand, would fail to fully carry out the object which the Muhammadan deputation had in view, and to satisfy the just demands of the educated Muhammadans for an adequate representation of their special interests on the enlarged council boards. I would, therefore, suggest that six instead of four seats be reserved for Muhammadans on the Imperial Council, and that to carry out this idea two additional seats be given to them under sub-head (d) of head D. If this suggestion is adopted, then in the event of two Muhammadans being returned under sub-heads (b) and (c) of head D from the two provinces of the Punjab and Eastern Bengal and Assam, there will be altogether eight Muhammadans on the Imperial Council out of a total of 53 members—a representation which will be just adequate enough to safeguard Muhammadan interests, and can under no circumstances be regarded as an unduly large or extravagant concession in favour of Muhammadan demands.

The suggested increase in the number of special Muhammadan seats would necessitate a readjustment of the figures given under various heads and sub-heads as specified in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter, and I would therefore propose the following three alternative schemes:—

(i) The same scheme as that set out in paragraph 12 be adopted, except that I would strike out (2) (c)—no ruling chief to be nominated—and would reduce the number of additional officials to be nominated under head (2) (B) from 20 to 19. This would set free two seats which would be added to those reserved for Muhammadans under head D, sub-head (d).

Under this scheme the official majority, which must always be ensured, will still hold the field.

(ii) Same as above, with the modification that if the nomination of a ruling Chief under head (c) is considered essential, the number of experts under head F may be reduced from 2 to 1.

(iii) If it is considered inexpedient to reduce the number of additional officials under head B or to interfere with the proposed nomination of one ruling Chief and of two experts, then in order to secure an official majority 22 officials may be nominated instead of 20 under head B, so that the suggested increase in the number of Muhammadans under head D, sub-head (d), may be counterbalanced by a corresponding increase in the number of official members. The maximum strength of the council would thus be 57 instead of 53, and out of these 57 members there will be about 8 Muhammadans.

The above alternatives of course are not exhaustive, but they are put forward as tentative solutions of the question as to the redistribution of the seats on the council which would necessarily arise as a corollary to my suggestion regarding an increase in the number of seats proposed to be allotted to the Muhammadans.

Answer to question (4).—I thoroughly approve of the proposal set out in paragraph 13 of the Government of India letter that the non-official members of the Punjab Legislative Council should have the privilege of electing from amongst themselves one member to a seat on the Imperial Council.

Answer to question (5).—So far as the Punjab is concerned, I do not think the time has come for Government to confer on the great land-holders of the province the privilege of electing one of their class to a seat on the Imperial Council, and I am therefore inclined to the opinion that a system of nomination would be better suited to their requirements. In making a nomination, however, the Government of India should, so far as possible, give due weight to the wishes of the great body of substantial landowners on the subject, and to the conditions of the community to which the majority of them happen to belong.

If, however, the Government decide to confer the franchise on the nobles and the great land-owners of this province, empowering them to elect a representative of their own on the Imperial Council, I would suggest that for this purpose a provincial electorate be formed of those land-holders who pay land revenue of Rs. 5,000 and over, and that they elect direct to Imperial Council a member who must himself belong to their class. I do not approve of the alternative methods of selection proposed in paragraph 15 of the Government of India letter, nor do I think that an electorate of sufficient size and weight will be obtained in the Punjab if the amount of land revenue giving the right to vote is raised above Rs. 5,000.

Answer to question 6.—The first part of this question I have already had occasion to deal with in answering the second part of question 3. I have stated that I fully approve of the proposal to set apart a fixed number of seats for Muhammadans, but that the number of seats proposed to be so set apart is sufficient. I have suggested that six seats be specifically reserved for Muhammadans, four under head D, sub-head (d), and two under head E (see paragraph 12 of Government of India letter). Four Muhammadans will thus be elected, and two will be nominated by the Viceroy. The four seats reserved for elected Muhammadans should be filled by the privilege of election being exercised by the six provinces mentioned in paragraph 18 of Government of India letter in rotation. In each province the electorate should be constituted as follows:—

(a) Same as under head (a) in paragraph 18.

(b) Same as under head (b) in paragraph 18.

(c) Muhammadan graduates of not less than 10 years' standing.

In every case it should be made a condition that the member elected must himself belong to one of the three classes enumerated above.

I am disposed to think that, as pointed out by the Government of India, it will be comparatively difficult to compile a list of voters under head (c) as suggested in paragraph 18 of their letter; and, apart from difficulties of such compilation, some interested persons will, I am afraid, resort to improper means to bring themselves within the purview of the property qualifications proposed under the above head with a view to being able to vote in elections for, and to get election to, a seat on the Imperial Council. On the other hand, if the electorate be confined to the Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Council, the number of electors will certainly be too small for the object in view, and the result of the election will not always command the confidence of the Muhammadan community. The electorate should, I think, be large enough to represent the influence and the intelligence of the community; and this can be obtained by adopting the composition which I have ventured to suggest above.

IV. Answer to question 7.—I would propose that the maximum strength of the Punjab Legislative Council be 26, or, including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, 27.

Of the 26 members there should be 14 officials and 12 non-official members.

Answer to question 8.—In the existing circumstances of the Punjab, I am a strong supporter of the present system of nomination, as I am persuaded to think that this province, though it is advancing with rapid strides, has not yet made sufficient progress in arts of life to enable its population to exercise the privilege of election with manifest advantage.

Answer to question 9.—I would certainly advocate a fixed rule determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each community, and I would suggest the following composition of the non-official portion of the council upon a class basis:—

There should be 12 non-official members of the council, consisting of—

(1) Six Muhammadans.

(2) Five Hindus and Sikhs. { (a) Three Hindus. (b) Two Sikhs.

(3) One Christian.

As the Muhammadans constitute the major portion of the population in the Punjab and as they form a community which, apart from its members, is entitled by reason of its historical and political importance to special consideration in the proposed scheme of reform, at least half the number of non-official seats on the council must under all circumstances be appropriated to them. I have therefore proposed that they should have six out of twelve such seats on the council. Of the remaining six seats, five should go, I think, to Hindus and Sikhs, who for all practical purposes constitute one community and should be treated as such, so far as their representation on the council is concerned. If, however, either the Sikhs for some reason claim to be entitled to the privilege of representation as a separate community, or the Government chooses to treat them as a distinct section of the population of sufficient importance to stand by itself, then I would assign 3 seats to Hindus and 2 seats to Sikhs, which in the present circumstances of the province, I consider to be a fair division between the two religions. To the Christian community, I would allot one seat and I think that in view of their small numbers, their relative needs, and the character and extent of their interests as involved in the matter of legislation, they are not entitled to larger representation.

As regards the suggestion that the Senate of the Punjab University might be empowered to elect one member to the council, I am of opinion that the proposed concession will not, on the whole, be a step in the right direction. The educated classes can be sufficiently represented otherwise than by conferring the franchise on the Senate of the University as a corporate body, and, under the present circumstances of the province, one can see possible difficulties ahead in the practical working of the proposed franchise. The Senate represents many shades of political opinion, and it is highly probable that, unless the suggested election is conducted in alternate years on the basis of a class representation, the conflict of political interests involved in it will lead to undesirable consequences. Such a result should, if possible, be avoided; and I, therefore, strongly dissent from the proposal to give the University the right to nominate a representative on the Legislative Council.

Answer to question 10.—If the Government decides to introduce into this province the system of election, I would propose that the non-official portion of the council be constituted somewhat on the following lines:—

Out of 12 non-official members—

(A) Eight members may be elected as follows:—

(1) By the municipal committees	3
(2) By the great land-owners	2
(3) By the Muhammadans	2
(4) By the commercial community	1
TOTAL	8

(B) The remaining four members may be nominated by the local Government to represent special interests, and of these four not less than two must be Muhammadans.

According to the above scheme not less than four seats would be definitely appropriated to Muhammadans, who it is hoped may be able to secure two more seats on the council in the ordinary way, if the electorates for the election of members of municipal committees be constituted on the lines suggested in paragraph 22 (c) of the Government of India letter.

It will be further observed that I do not advocate election exclusively through the municipal committees, but only reserve one-fourth of the total number of seats for their representatives. The district boards are not yet sufficiently advanced for exercising the privilege of election profitably, and I would not therefore confer the franchise upon them for the present.

If the system of election is sought to be worked upon the basis of class representation (as advocated by me in answer to question 9), then I would suggest the following alternative scheme:—

(A) To be elected—7 members:—

(1) By Muhammadans	3
(2) By Hindus	2
(3) By Sikhs	1
(4) By Christians	1
TOTAL	7

(B) To be nominated by Government—5 members:—

(1) Muhammadans	3
(2) Hindus	1
(3) Sikhs	1

Answer to question 11.—I have already approved of the separate representation of classes as proposed in paragraph 22 (a) of the Government of India letter (see answer to question 9). I do not, however, approve of all the representatives of a particular class being elected by that class, for I think that (if the system of election is to be introduced into this province) a fair proportion of those representatives must be nominated.

As at present advised, I am not prepared to concur in the method of constituting electorates for the election of representatives of each class as suggested in paragraph 22 (b) of the Government of India letter. Whatever may be the case in other parts of the country, in the Punjab Hindus and Muhammadans who have held or are holding office in the municipal or local boards, as a general rule, are not regarded as representative men of either community. It is a well known fact that, under existing conditions, very few men of light and leading present themselves for election to municipal boards, and those who do almost invariably get defeated by men who are unscrupulous enough to use all kinds of electioneering tricks to gain a victory. Of the persons who are nominated to these boards, there are not many who command the respect of the progressive sections of the population, or who are alive to a sense of their civic responsibility. I would not, therefore, confer on the past or present members of the municipal and district boards the right of voting for the election of a large number of members of the local council; I would only give them the right of electing a small proportion of the representatives assigned to each class, and for the election of the rest I would constitute special electorates for the various classes of the population.

I strongly advocate a change in the constitution of municipal and district boards of this province upon the lines laid down in paragraph 22 (c) of the Government of India letter. Hitherto the representation of Muhammadans on these boards (more especially on the municipal committees) has been most inadequate, with the result that their interests have almost throughout the province greatly suffered at the hands of an unsympathetic Hindu majority which rules over nearly every municipal corporation. The system of promiscuous election in vogue at present in most of the important towns in the Punjab is radically wrong and is open to serious objections in practice, and I think the time has come when Government should replace it by a more equitable system conceived in the spirit of the judicious proposals embodied in paragraph 22 (c) of the letter from the Supreme Government.

Answer to question 12.—The first part of this question I have answered above (see answer to question 10). As regards the second part of it, I would suggest that a special Muhammadan electorate be constituted consisting of—

(1) All who pay income-tax on Rs. 2,000 and over.
(2) All who pay land revenue of Rs. 750 and over.
(3) All registered graduates of the local University of not less than 5 years' standing.

The standards of income tentatively proposed in paragraph 17 of the Government of India letter are in my opinion rather low, and as I do not approve of the electorate being too large and unwieldy, I have proposed the exclusion of payers of income-tax who earn less than Rs. 2,000 a year.

I would further prescribe special qualifications for a candidate who would stand for election to the council, viz., he must—

(1) either pay income-tax on Rs. 6,000 a year,
(2) or pay land revenue of Rs. 1,500 or over,
(3) or be a graduate of an Indian University of not less than 10 years' standing.

If Muhammadan members of municipal boards are at all empowered to elect a representative to the council, the privilege should be limited in all cases to the election of one member, and the remaining members should be elected by the special electorate as constituted above.

V. Discussion of Budget in the Legislative Council. Answer to question 13.—I approve of the proposed alteration in the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council upon the lines suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

Answer to question 14.—I think that the time has come when the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council. I do not, however, advocate its discussion under separate heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter, as I think that for some time to come the system of discussing the Budget as a whole will work quite satisfactorily in the Punjab.

Answer to question 15.—I certainly think that the power of interpellation by members should be introduced into our Provincial Council.

With reference to your letter no. 6343, dated 18th October 1907, I have the honour to submit herewith my answers to the questions set forth in the Punjab Government letter no. 2643-S., dated 27th September 1907, relating to the proposed Advisory Councils.

GURDIT SINGH,
Rais, Lahore.

OPINION.

I. Imperial Advisory Council.—The needs of the time seem to be that the Government should freely consult the public before adopting any measure affecting the welfare of the people in general. Free consultation with the public through its proper representatives would not only remove misunderstandings between the rulers and the ruled, but would often supply the missing link in the series of official information. The proposed Advisory Council will certainly become a great boon to India if the members are given ample opportunities to express themselves affecting the welfare of the public and are kept in sufficient touch with the officials so as to have their confidence and trust in full. The utility of the Imperial Advisory Council will depend upon its personnel as well as the measure of exchange of confidence between the members and the Government officials. The association of the Ruling Chiefs would conduce to the ornamental as well as the useful side of the council, only if those Chiefs are selected who can think of themselves without depending entirely upon their Private Secretaries. The council itself is a marked step in the constitutional progress, but the total absence of elective principle minimises the value of the boon. The object of "diffusion of correct information upon the acts, etc., of Government" would be better attained if out of the proposed number of 60 councillors 7 at least were chosen by the people of the country in the way the Government may deem fit and proper, and the rest are nominated by the Government, due regard being paid to the personal qualifications and usefulness of the candidates. I venture to think that the proposed Imperial Advisory Council with its members having powers of free criticism and opinion though no control of Government, cannot but be a blessing to the country. But the British Government, while so kindly training its Indian subjects in the ways of the Government of their country, should be prepared to confer more privileges of the kind in time. It is highly gratifying to see that the Government already aims at adequate representation of the interests of all classes, religions and creeds, and I feel therefore confident that the case of the Sikhs who care more to serve the Government than to talk loud and wide, and who depend entirely upon the benign British Government for their subsistence, protection, and welfare, will not be allowed to merge into that of the Hindus who seem to be rather under cloud in the scheme of reform.

II. Provincial Advisory Council.—Paragraphs 6 and 7 of the Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 27th August 1907, contemplates an Advisory Council for each Indian province similar to the one Imperial Advisory Council for all India; and I venture to think that the Provincial Council will be as good and useful an institution for the province as the Imperial Council will be for the whole country. Confining my remarks to my province I think that the Punjab needs an Advisory Council very badly, and its existence some months ago would have prevented the unfortunate events of which all sensible people are ashamed. But its usefulness will depend, as remarked in the case of Imperial Advisory Council above, chiefly upon the constituents of the council and the degree of the confidence reposed by the Government officials in the members and vice versâ.

Considering the past history and present conditions of the Punjab, I venture to think that the well-meant intentions of the Government in establishing the proposed Advisory Councils will be better fulfilled if all the members of the Punjab Provincial Council are selected by the Government; but in selecting members the number of the Sikh members should especially be larger than the proportion of their numerical strength would demand—because (1) in no other province of India there is any chance of a Sikh appearing on the Council; (2) their backwardness in education and consequent inability to give orations is apt to create wrong impressions about their rights and abilities; (3) their eminent services in the field of action mere look of which causes the classes now favoured with public appointments in all departments to apply for leave on private affairs; and (4) their helplessness and enitre dependence upon the Government; for all they had is now at the service and disposal of the Government willingly given and most loyally presented.

Under the circumstances I opine that out of the proposed 20 members of the Punjab Provincial Advisory Council, 10 should be officials with 1 or 2 Sikhs, and 10 non-officials, 3 Sikhs, 2 Hindus, 1 Christian, and 4 Muhammadans.

III. Imperial Legislative Council.—The proposed Government scheme has in view the highly commendable object of giving the children of the Indian soil a sound training in the administration of their country; and nothing would be more conducive to the attainment of that end than to give them more share in making the laws and regulations governing India. Hitherto the number of the members being rather small, the adequate representation of the interests of all Indian communities was impossible. By taking in more members now of approved qualifications the danger of interests of certain communities being neglected will be minimised.

The principle that the paramount power in India should have a predominating numerical strength implies the existence and recognition of another power within which is feared and has to be subdued seems to be rather hard to be swallowed by the loyal subjects of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of India. The internal enemy must vanish, the snake in the sleeves must be crushed. But the existence of the enemy or the snake should be found out and assured before any weapons are employed for its destruction. The British Government is the strongest Government in the world and has at his command the wisdom, wealth, and physical and other forces of the present age and has absolutely nothing to fear. Its vast and varied resources are too formidable to notice any puerile franks of any phantom foes. Moreover, the people of India and the Emperor of India are not antagonistic items of Indian Government, but the component parts of the same homogeneous whole. I see therefore no reason why the officials and non-officials should not be represented in equal proportions in the enlarged Imperial Legislative Council. I would therefore suggest that the council should be thus constituted—

(1) His Excellency the Viceroy	1
(2) Ex-officio—the head of the local Government where the council assembles, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, and the members of Executive Councils	8
(3) Additional officials to be nominated (all Europeans)	18
(4) A ruling Chief to be nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy	1
(5) Non-officials to be elected
(a) By Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta, Bombay, Punjab, and Karachi	4
(b) Non-officials of the Provincial Councils	7
(c) Raises and great land-owners of 7 provinces named in the scheme	7
(6) Non-officials to be nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy 3 Muhammadans, 2 Sikhs, 1 Christian and 1 Hindu	7
(7) Experts to be specially nominated when necessary	2
TOTAL	55

That all the Provincial Legislative Councils existing should be privileged to return one elected member out of themselves is just and fair, and is not likely to be gainsaid. Nor can the proposal of having one representative of nobles and big land-owners of India in the Imperial Legislative Council be disputed. This representative should be elected out of the voters who should consist of the 52 land-owners ascertained by the Punjab Government and those Provincial Darbaris of the Punjab who may not come in the list of the said land-owners.

While the Government is so much anxious to protect the interests of all communities, there is no cause of alarm for the Muhammadans. In the Punjab the Moslem community has been enjoying special favours of the Government out of all proportions and has now become much stronger than their fellow subjects of other denominations. The Government favours so lavishly showered upon the Moslem community have created among them internal union, leaders with faithful followings, and a growing community of interests with resourceful powers out of India, and these, coupled with physical strength of the masses and other forces working on them, are apt to become a two-edged sword that may harm the enemy of the constitution or the constitution itself as the requirements of the community may demand. So the Government should be very careful in raising this community to an enormous height at the expense of the Hindu community which owing to their peculiar condition of religion and society can never become united, can never have a leader with faithful followings, but who by their pen and tongue will always be useful to the constitution. Nor should the interests of the Sikhs be ignored or sacrified to those of the Moslem as the Sikhs are, by their religious instruction and physical and mental training, the most loyal subjects of the Crown, and have proved so on the battlefield as well as the Council Chambers. Again, elections are supposed to provide fair play and no favour to all concerned alike, and it is highly unfair to introduce racial differences in elections. For these reasons I do not think that Muhammadans shoud have any seats specially provided for by election in preference to other communities. Special considerations should guide the nominations, and I venture to suggest that all the seats that the Government desires to provide for the Muhammadans, because they are Muhammadans, should be given by selection and not by election; and while considering the claims of the Moslem community on principle of religion, the Sikhs and Christian communities should be favoured in the same way.

IV. The Provincial Legislative Council for the Punjab.—The new scheme for the Imperial Legislative Council necessarily implies the enlargement of the Provincial Legislative Councils, and the introduction of an elective principle therein. Some provinces are already enjoying the privilege of election, and if the other provinces are granted similar privilege, the people will be grateful.

The Punjab Provincial Legislative Council as at present constituted cannot admit of any scope of a suitable election for the Imperial Legislative Council, and it is highly necessary that the number of non-official and official members of the same should be sufficiently raised as to provide adequate representation of all interests and communities of the province. Now in the Punjab Council there are three non-official and 7 official members including the Lieutenant-Governor, and I propose that the total strength of the council be raised to 32 as detailed below:—

(1) His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor		1
(2) One ruling Chief to be nominated by the Government		1
(3) Officials to be nominated by the Government (10 Europeans, 2 Muhammadans, 1 Hindu, 1 Sikh and 1 Christian.)		15
(4) Non-officials to be elected by—
(a) Municipalities of Lahore and Simla	2
(b) District boards	2
(c) Punjab Chamber of Commerce	1
(d) The Punjab University	2
(e) Anjumans, Samajes, and Khalsa Diwans	3
	—	10
(5) Non-officials specially nominated by the Government to represent minorities, not less than 2 to be Sikhs in addition to those that may be elected		4
(6) Expert to be nominated by the Government when necessary		1
TOTAL		32

From the above it will be observed that I would have in the Punjab partly election and party nomination, because from the every day experience of municipal and other elections in the Punjab, it is noticed that worthy people are sometimes left out and that some of the best men do not stand in elections from fear of defeat and unnecessary trouble of canvassing, etc. Nominations would open a suitable ingress for such cases.

The land-holders, cultivators, traders, and professional classes should be represented by the proposed ten non-officials to be elected by various institutions named above. The reognition of castes for this purpose would hamper the choice of the electorates and may not succeed in the Punjab. The proportion of representation of these classes may be taken as 3 land-holders, 2 cultivators, 3 traders, and 2 professionals. I propose these proportions because the number of literate people among these classes varies considerably.

The municipal and district boards of the Punjab are not considered by the public as very successful institutions, because the influence of the Indians therein is not potent enough. These institutions nevertheless cannot be dispensed with as part of electing machinery for the Provincial Legislative Council; and as under the present conditions their usefulness is hampered, I think the rules for the constitution and guidance of their working as well as the qualifications of their voters should be revised.

The interests of the Muhammadan community will be quite safe if out of the ten non-officials proposed to be elected four are Muhammadans, three Hindus, two Sikhs, and one Christian according to the class distribution explained above. Thus out of 32 members proposed, at least 7 will be Muhammadans, about 5 Hindus, 5 will be Sikhs, and 14 Christians. Under the circumstances I do not think that any further provision of separate representation of the Moslem community is required.

V. Discussions of the Budget in the Legislative Council.—The present system of discussing the whole Budget in a single speech of the non-official members who sometimes try to vie with each other in speeces knowing full well that they are crying in the wilderness, is defective. The proposal to discuss by separate heads with the member in administrative charge first, and to criticise the administration afterwards, is certainly a step forward and a desirable improvement on the present system. The assurance that the practical and reasonable remarks of the members will be considered creates a delightful hope that the time and energy spent by the members in the service of their country and sovereign may bring forth happy results some day.

The Provincial Budget of the Punjab should be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council in the same manner as the Imperial Budget is proposed to be discussed in the Imperial Legislative Council.

The right of interpellation enjoyed by the members of other Legislative Councils of India should be extended to the Punjab and Burma Councils. Without this privilege the Legislative Council of the Punjab will not be so useful as it is intended to be.

No. 323, dated 10th November 1907.

From—Rai Sahib Tilok Chand, Extra Assistant Commissioner, in charge of the Kasur sub-district,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

As desired in your letter no. 6268, dated 11th ultimo, I have the honour to submit my views on the questions raised.

TILOK CHAND,
Sub-Divisional Officer.

Answers to the questions of Government of India letter no. 2310—2317, dated 24th August 1907.

I. (1) I certainly think that an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter would be of service to the country. The proposals made in paragraph 5 regarding its constitution and duties are suitable in my humble opinion.

II. (2) I consider that a Provincial Advisory Council would be a useful institution. The number of these councillors for Punjab should be not less than 42. The number to be made up as below:—

(a) Four members from among the agriculturists may be taken from each division	20
(b) Native retired gazetted officers one from each division	5
(c) Professional men such as lawyers and doctors, &c., one from each of five stations, viz., Multan, Lahore, Jullundur, Delhi and Rawalpindi	5
(d) Mercantile people, one from each five stations, namely Multan, Amritsar, Ambala, Delhi, and Rawalpindi	5
(e) Mahants and Pirs, religious guides of the people, one from each division	5
(f) Non-official Europeans from Lahore	2
	42

Half of the natives should be Muhammadans and the other half Hindus, including Sikhs. I have no suggestions to make, different from that proposed, regarding duties of the councillors.

III. (3) I am not in favour of an enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council.

(4, 5, & 6) I would maintain the present system.

IV. (7 to 12) I would not advocate an increase in the present number of members in the Provincial Legislative Council and would maintain the present system of nomination, &c.

V. (13) Certainly I consider that the system of discussing the Budget in the Imperial Legislative Council should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(14) I think that the Provincial Budget should be discussed in the Punjab Legislative Council in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(15) I would advocate the introduction into the Punjab Legislative Council of the power of interpellation by members.

Dated Lahore, the 11th November 1907.

From—Shaikh Abdul Aziz, Editor, The Observer,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

In compliance with your letter no. 6268, dated 11th October 1907, I have the honour to submit herewith a statement of my views on the proposals of the Government of India in regard to the establishment of Advisory Councils, the enlargement of Legislative Councils, etc.

ABDUL AZIZ,
Editor, "The Observer."

Note on the reform scheme of the Government of India, by Shaikh Abdul Aziz, B.A., Editor, "The Observer," and Fellow, Punjab University, Lahore.

Importance of the scheme.

No document published in this country in recent times has attracted greater public attention than the letter of the Government of India, dated 24th August 1907. Ever since its publication more than two months ago, it has formed the one interminable topic of free and unrestrained criticism, and a sharp controversy still continues to range round its main issues. Though it has met with opposition, at once strenuous and self-interested, on the part of one section of the Indian community, it is significant that another section, and an equally important one, has welcomed it with no less enthusiasm. Indeed, the intense interest which it has excited is fully justified, no other official measure having ever before touched such dear interests of the people so vitally. The Councils Act of 1892 has been in operation for the last 15 years; and the British Government in India is now about to review the policy embodied in it, to revise it in the light of past experience and, with the object of keeping abreast of the spirit of the age, to take yet another step in the direction of more intimately associating the people of the country with the work of administration. It was quite natural that on an occasion like this, the voice of the public should have made itself heard with peculiar force. Communities, whose interests had not been hitherto adequately considered, have hailed it with satisfaction; but others, who had usurped undue preponderance in the Council Chambers of the Empire, are resentful. It is, however, necessary to warn Government against overrating the significance of the agitation of interested persons, who represent no one except themselves and who are either hopelessly out of touch with the masses or deliberately blind to their interests. In fact, the clamour raised against the proposals of Government is the creation of a class of politicians who would apply school-boy maxims of Western politics to India without considering that the past traditions and the present social and political circumstances of the Orient so entirely differ from those of the Occident.

Muslim attitude.

2. At the very outset, I must convey to Government the sense of thankfulness which the Indian Muhammadans have received by its proposals. They have held meetings all over the country to express their appreciation of the recognition accorded by Government to the just principle of separate communal representation. India is inhabited by numerous races, with "a thousand varieties of circumstance and feeling and custom" and in different stages of political and educational progress; and yet the existing system of election and nomination to the councils was introduced in utter disregard of this paramount fact. The inevitable consequence has been that the scale has unduly inclined in favour of the Hindus. As I have said elsewhere, Muhammadans feel that unless the people in this country, by a process of progressive development, arrive at a stage of organic social evolution at which all distinctions of religion, race, and custom would merge in the popular mind into one dominant idea of territorial Government on Western principles, the British Government should not, in view of the very peculiar position it occupies in India, so utterly ignore these distinctions as to treat the Hindus and Muhammadans for all administrative purposes as one nation, nurtured in a uniform political atmosphere, having a community of interests, and governed by similar notions of temporal advancement. If, then, the very broadly marked distinctions, writ large by the differentiating hand of past history and further emphasised by recent occurrences, between the Hindus and the Muhammadans, as to their race, religion, social institutions, and political aspirations, are real and cannot be ignored, the English Government, as the arbiter of their destinies in this country, must so hold the balance between the two as not to allow one of them to entirely outweigh the other. So far Muslim interests have grievously suffered, but the proposed reforms are a proof that Government has at last realised that the existing system does not permit of Muhammadans securing the representation, which is their due and of which it was never intended to deprive them.

Agreement with general principles.

3. Before proceeding to a detailed consideration of the scheme, I must emphatically express full concurrence with its general underlying principles. They cannot but commend themselves to the patriotic sense of the Indian community. That the motives of Government are beyond suspicion will be readily recognised by those who are neither England's irreconcilable enemies nor theorists, but are proud to live under the protection of the British flag and take a common-sense view of things. They will not fail to perceive that the reforms in contemplation, while preserving intact the stability of English rule in India, aim at securing the co-operation of the real leaders of the people in carrying on the administration of the land, and mark a distinct step forward in the political training of the Indians. I need not discuss all of them here in detail, but will confine myself to a consideration of only such of them as are comparatively of great importance or need modification, or about the efficacy of which I am in doubt. A general agreement with the proposals may be understood to be implied at points that are left out in this note. The questions covered by the Punjab Government letter no. 2643-S, dated 27th September 1907, are considered below seriatim.

4. Question (1) I. Imperial Advisory Council.—The idea of establishing an Imperial Advisory Council, for reasons stated in paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Government of India letter and with the double object of drawing out responsible Indian opinion on measures in contemplation and of diffusing correct information upon the acts, intentions, and objects of Government, is one that will thoroughly commend itself to all. No Government can afford to remain in ignorance of the opinions of its subjects regarding its policy and measures, and though even now officers of Government "have made it their business" to elicit such opinion and to profit by it, still it is incontrovertible that the present system is defective in conception and haphazard in application. If, instead of this, "a determinate body of advisers" were organised, it would focus Indian opinion in one place and offer a handy means of ascertaining the trend of popular feeling concerning the questions of the day. Moreover, it will enable Government to take into confidence, through their natural leaders, the people who are easily misled by the professional agitator. With his proverbial credulity, the average Indian is apt to believe in the distorted version of the acts and intentions of Government not infrequently dished up for his consumption by politicians of the extremist type, and the importance of a measure calculated to counteract the evil cannot be exaggerated. I have no hesitation in agreeing to the proposal of establishing an Imperial Advisory Council.

5. But while accepting as sound and expedient the principle of establishing an Imperial Advisory Council, and supporting the proposals regarding the assignment of its duties, I would submit that the constitution laid down for it in clause 3 of paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter is open to objection. Pointed attention is solicited towards the following:—

(i) The idea is to confine the membership of the council practically to the ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates. This will detract from its representative character, and its views and deliberations will fail to command general confidence. Notwithstanding that "higher education has penetrated to circles which a generation ago had hardly been affected by its influence," it is undeniable that the ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates, as a class, are still standing aloof from the new social and political conditions which affect the course of Indian affairs, and they can never be trusted to present to Government the point of view of the more progressive classes—classes who already enjoy great influence and whose importance is steadily on the increase. Apart from this, Government has itself recognised the legitimate claims of these very classes for representation in the Provincial Advisory Councils, and there is absolutely no reason why the constitution of the Imperial and Provincial Councils, which are to perform identical functions though in different spheres, should be so materially at variance with one another. The Imperial Advisory Council, like the Provincial Councils, should be truly representative of all interests in the country, though the ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates may deserve special consideration in the matter of allotment of seats.

(ii) In spite of this concession, a proportion representing full one-third of the total seats is abnormally large for the ruling Chiefs; and if out of 60 members 20 be ruling Chiefs, the remaining number will be too small to allow of a proper representation of other interests, such as land, industry, commerce, learned professions, etc. Besides, the common interests which have arisen between British territory and the Native States are neither so numerous nor so strong as to call for the appointment of 20 ruling Chiefs; 15 should be enough, and perhaps some would consider even this number excessive.

(iii) A public declaration as to how the representation of the various classes and communities will be secured in nominations to the Advisory Council is indispensable. It is most essential that, having safeguarded the interests of minorities in the Legislative Councils, Government should not hesitate to apply the same rule to the Advisory Council as well. That will allay public apprehensions in the matter and ensure equitable representation of all sections of the people.

6. Question (2). II. Provincial Advisory Councils.—After what has been said above it is not necessary to repeat the reasons for which, I think, Provincial Advisory Councils would be useful institutions. I support the proposals of the Government of India detailed in paragraph 6 of their letter and of the Punjab Government embodied in paragraph 4 of their letter, with the suggestion that these councils too will inspire general confidence only if a proportion were fixed definitely, though approximately, in which various interests would be represented on them.

7. Question (3). III. Imperial Legislative Council.—Every fair-minded publicist in India will warmly approve of the proposed enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council. This will greatly enhance its measure of usefulness and enable its decisions to carry increased weight with the people at large. But, in my humble opinion, the constitution of the council, as laid down in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter, is capable of improvement in one or two important respects, my chief objection to it being the extremely inadequate representation which it concedes to the Muhammadan community. Government has recognised that the system of promiscuous election and nomination to the councils has deplorably failed to secure for the Indian Musalmans a degree of representation at all commensurate with their numbers and importance. Having once proposed to set apart a fixed proportion of seats for the Muhammadans, for which they are grateful, it is in the fitness of things that this representation should be adequate. For if such an essential desideratum is wanting, Government will have incurred the displeasure of a class of Indian politicians without having in any way materially benefited the Musalmans. While, therefore, strongly favouring the proposal of giving separate representation to the Muhammadans, I urge with equal emphasis that the number of seats set apart for them should be raised to at least 6. According to the constitution suggested in the Government of India letter, I believe, the maximum number of Muhammadans who can be at all returned to the Imperial Council is 6, i.e., 2 under head E, 2 under sub-head (d) of head D, and 2 under sub-heads (b) and (c) of head D, as it is only in the Punjab and Eastern Bengal that there is any possibility of Musalmans being selected in open elections also. But if the council is to have 53 members, surely 6 is too small a number to properly safeguard the admittedly large interests of Indian Musalmans. If after waiting so long, and in spite of the assurances held out to them and the jubilations expressed by Muslim meetings, the enlarged council is to be framed on the lines of Government proposals, Muhammadans will not find their position improved. Their gratification will have been expressed at a mere shadow and, it is to be feared, their future disappointment and anguish will be even keener than their present satisfaction. To give them 8 seats is by no means an unduly large number for a community of the "weight" of the Muhammadans: I would plead for 6 seats being set aside for them by raising the number of seats to be filled by the election of Muhammadans (sub-head) (d) of head (D) from 2 to 4. This will be bare justice, and it will relieve Muhammadans of the anxiety still rankling in their hearts.

8. As my humble suggestion, if accepted, will necessitate a readjustment of the entire constitution, the following three alternative scheme may be proposed, instead of that laid down in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter, the maximum strength of the council in (i) and (ii) being 53 (or 54, including the Viceroy) and in (iii) 57 (or 58, including the Viceroy):—

	Government proposal.	My three alternatives.
		(i)	(ii)	(iii)
A.—Ex-officio	8	8	8	8
B.—Additional officials	20	19	19	22
C.—A Ruling Chief	1	...	1	1
D.—Elected members—
(a) by Chambers of Commerce	2	2	2	2
(b) by non-official provincial members	7	7	7	7
(c) by nobles and land-owners	7	7	7	7
(d) by Muhammadans	2	4	4	4
E.—Nominated non-officials, including at least 2 Muhammadans	4	4	4	4
F.—Nominated experts	2	2	1	2
Total, excluding His Excellency the Viceroy	53	53	53	57

9. With reference to alternative no. (i) it may be explained that the figure for additional officials has been curtailed from 20 to 19 and the ruling Chiefs removed altogether from the Legislative Council. A loss of one in the former will still leave Government members in the majority and, even admitting for the sake of argument that all other members (whether nominated or elected) were to oppose a Government measure unanimously—a most improbable contingency—Government will nevertheless command a majority of 28 against 26, including the Viceroy's vote, so that the number of seats, reserved for officials to be nominated by the Viceroy, can be reduced from 20 to 19 without weakening the position of Government. The proposal of always having in the council a representative of the ruling Chiefs is open to grave objections. Their proper place is the Advisory Council, but that they should take active part in legislation for British India, with conditions of life in which they are so little acquainted, is wrong in principle and will be of doubtful utility in practice. But if on any special occasion it be necessary to have a ruling Chief in the Imperial Council, the Viceroy will be able to nominate one under head E (nominated non-officials).

10. As regards alternative no (ii), the only difference between this and no. (i) is that the ruling Chief may be retained if objections to his nomination do not appear valid in the eyes of Government, and instead the number of experts may be reduced from 2 to 1, the Viceroy always having the option, if necessary, of nominating more than one expert under head E.

11. If, however, neither of the two alternatives (i) and (ii) commend itself to Government, and it be deemed inadvisable to omit the ruling Chief or to reduce the number of either of the additional officials or the nominated experts, I would still urge the necessity of giving two or more representatives to the Muhammadan community. This may be accomplished in another way by raising to 4 the number of Muhammadans to be elected under (d) D, and to obviate the chance of reducing the official majority, the number of additional officials to be nominated by the Viceroy (B) may be at the same time increased from 20 to 22, as per alternative (iii). This will raise the strength of the Council to 57 (consisting of 30 officials and 27 non-officials) in place of 53 (consisting of 28 officials and 25 non-officials). An increase of 4 in the total strength is not at all large; and if a council of 53 is not an unwieldy body, then one of 57 too is not so; and if 20 officials "of the requisite standing and experience can, without detriment to the public service, be spared from their regular duties for attendance in Legislative Councils" then 22 of them may be also deputed for the same duty.

12. Question (4).—I entirely agree with the proposal that one member should be elected by the Provincial Legislative Councils as proposed in paragraph 13 of the letter.

13. Question (5).—The attitude of the Government with regard to giving substantial representation to the great land-holders is unexceptionable, and it is proper that a class of men who constitute the aristocratic and stable elements in Indian society should have their share in the legislative work of the country. The proposal that one of the great land-owners of the Punjab should be appointed to the Imperial Council is eminently reasonable and selection should be made by election, a special provincial electorate of land-owners, who pay not less than Rs. 5,000 as land revenue, electing one out of their number. At present there are but 52 land-owners possessing this qualification, and any attempt to further raise the limit of land revenue will narrow down the electorate to such an extent as to hardly justify the grant of the invaluable privilege of nominating a representative to the Imperial Council.

14. Question (6).—This question has been already discussed in part (above paragraphs 7 to 9), and I have expressed myself in entire agreement with the proposal of setting aside a fixed number of seats for Muhammadans, pointing out at the same time that the number so fixed should be 6—4 under D (d) and 2 under E. The latter 2 will be filled by nomination, the former 4 by election by the following provinces:—(i) Punjab, (ii) the United Provinces, (iii) Bengal and Eastern Bengal by rotation, and (4) Bombay and Madras along with the Central Provinces by rotation.

15. As regards the electorate for the Muhammadan members, I am of opinion that it should not be confined to the Muhammadan non-official members of Provincial Councils. Their numbers will be extremely small, and there is a possibility of its not exceeding one sometimes. The proposals may have the merit, as the Government of India remark, "of being uniform with the system under which the other non-official members are elected by the members of the Provincial Councils." But it would be unsound to sacrifice efficiency to uniformity. It will be best to form a special electorate, consisting of Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Councils, Muhammadan fellows of the local university, Muhammadans paying income-tax on an income of Rs. 25,000 a year or corresponding land revenue, and registered Muhammadan graduates of not less than ten years' standing.

16. Question (7). IV. Punjab Legislative Council.—The reform scheme under discussion naturaly includes the question of enlarging the Provincial Councils, and there can be no two opinions as to the desirability of expanding the Punjab Council as well. Its present maximum strength of 10 members, including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, is quite insufficient to satisfy the demand for representation of all classes and interests, and it will be in keeping with the spirit of the age and the changed aspect of public affairs in the Punjab to enlarge its Legislative Council. Taking everything into consideration, my humble suggestion is that the council should have 26 members (or 27, including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor), comprising 14 officials and 12 non-officials.

17. Question (8).—I am strongly opposed to the application of the system of election to the Punjab. This province is not yet sufficiently advanced for it, and, notwithstanding the rapid progress made of late, we are still very backward as compared with other Indian provinces. The system of nomination is by no means an ideal system, but, to my mind, it presents the lesser of two evils. If the mistakes of other provinces are not to be repeated in the land of five rivers, and if the Punjab Government is to avoid the embarrassments of other Provincial Administrations, Government should be in no hurry to grant the privilege of election for the local council to a population who cannot exercise it with advantage. I would, therefore, retain the present system of nomination, regard being always paid by Government, in making nominations, to the relative importance of various interests and communities and their respective claims to representation. But if it be considered necessary to adopt the elective method here also, I would introduce it gradually and, at the start, reserve some seats for being filled by nomination. This point is further explained in the answers to the next two questions.

18. Question (9).—As regards the allotment of seats to different classes, I think the only reasonable course is to fix seats according to religious communities and not different classes. We have not yet arrived at that stage of progressive development in national evolution, when the line of demarcation between the various classes becomes finally marked. At present, one class imperceptibly merges into another and the only distinct difference is the religious difference. Religion is the sole basis on which the entire superstructure of Indian society in the Punjab is mainly reared. Of course, there can be no objection to the fixing of proportion for various classes within the different communities after the number of members for the communities themselves has been settled. Having assigned its share to each community, the latter may be sub-divided into various groups according to classes and the number of seats for these groups specified. But promiscuous election by classes, consisting of Hindus and Muhammadans, would be a retrograde step in certain respects, adding to the difficulties of Government and making it possible for some interests to be disregarded.

19. Having suggested the fixing of non-official seats for various communities, I would divide them further as follows:—

Muhammadans	7
Hindus, inclusive of Sikhs	4
Christians	1
TOTAL	12

As is shown in the Punjab Government letter (paragraph 8), Muhammadans constitute more than half the population of the Punjab. Moreover, their historical and political importance in this province is unquestioned. In view of these two prominent facts, it is not too much to claim for them 7 out of 12 non-official seats. Of the remaining 5 seats, 4 ought to be assigned to the Hindus (including Sikhs) and 1 to the Christians. It is worth noting that the Hindus and Sikhs are, for all practical purposes, one community, and there is absolutely no justification for treating them as different communities, requiring separate representation in the councils of the country. The Christian community in the Punjab, as apart from the officials—the majority of whom will be Christians—is numerically too small to claim separate representation; but it has to be admitted that its interest and influence are more important than its numbers, which demand the setting apart of one seat for its members.

20. I advocate the allotment of seats according to communities, but if any division is to be made according to classes, then the case of the agriculturists will be entitled to special consideration. They largely preponderate in the province, supply valuable material for His Majesty's Indian army, and form in some respects the most important element of the population. Particular care will have to be taken that their claims are not overlooked.

21. Question (10).—As said above, I am opposed to the introduction of the elective system in the Punjab. But if Government ultimately decide to try the experiment here too, either of the following two alternative methods (A or B) may be adopted for the constitution of the council:—

A.—(i) By election—

(a) by municipal committees	2
(b) by big land-owners	2
(c) by Muhammadans	3
(d) by large traders	1
TOTAL	8

(ii) By Government nomination, care being taken that the total number of Muhammadans does not fall short of 7 out of 12 — 4

TOTAL — 12

B.—(i) By election by special electorates of—

(a) Muhammadans	4
(b) Hindus and Sikhs	3
(c) Christians	1
TOTAL	8

(ii) By Government nomination of—

(a) Muhammadans	3
(b) Hindus and Sikhs	1
TOTAL	12

In suggesting the above division of seats between the different communities, the following points have been kept in view:—

(i) Whichever way of filling the seats be adopted, it is necessary that the number of seats allotted to each community should be definitely settled.

(ii) Only a portion of all non-official seats should be thrown open to election by municipal and none by district boards.

(iii) I am strongly of opinion that it would be dangerous to introduce the political element in the University, "which is constituted for purely educational objects." It consists of conflicting and heterogeneous elements, and it would be unwise, in the Punjab at least, to throw the apple of discord in the Senate Chamber.

(iv) The special electorates referred to above should be constituted by separate lists being prepared of Muhammadan, Hindu, and Sikh and Christian voters. The following classes should be admitted to the franchise:—

(a) All who pay land revenue of Rs. 500 a year or above.

(b) All payers of income-tax on incomes of Rs. 2,000 a year.

(c) All registered graduates of the Punjab University of more than five years' standing.

22. Question (11).—I advocate separate representation of communities and not classes, and would carry it in the manner suggested in answer to question 10. In this country, where not infrequently associations spring into mushroom existence and where so many of them have no real hold on the public and cannot be said to represent the people in their corporate capacity, the task of selecting bodies deserving to be consulted in the preparation of lists of voters will be most difficult and leal to invidious distinctions. It will be quite sufficient to lay down the general qualifications of voters and to prepare lists accordingly.

23. It will be inadvisable to confer the privilege of election on district boards, nor will it be right to throw open all seats to election by municipal committees. All the same there are cogent reasons for altering the constitution of district and municipal boards. These at present are most defective, and the fact is indisputable that gentlemen of light and leading do not offer themselves as candidates for them. Municipal boards are swamped by men who secure victory by means of the most questionable character, and party cliques and racial factions dominate their deliberations. It is impossible for any improvement to take place in their condition until their constitutions be radically changed. This is all the more necessary in view of the fact that the constitutions of the enlarged Provincial Councils are to depend, to some extent at least, upon those of municipal and district boards. The principle of assigning a fixed proportion of seats to each of the leading communities into which the population is divided is already in vogue in some places and each community selects its own representatives. Wherever this is done, the results obtained are most satisfactory, and it is time the system were extended to all committees throughout the country. Promiscuous elections are a source of friction and operate to the disadvantage of certain sections of the people. They ought to be replaced by a system enabling Hindus, Muhammadans, and Christians to elect their own representatives in fixed proportions.

24. Question (12).—As stated above, I am in favour of giving separate representation to the Muhammadans, and the electorate for this should be the same as suggested in answer to question 9. But I cannot let this opportunity pass without respectfully protesting against the hint conveyed in paragraph 5 of the letter of the Punjab Government, implying that the question of the members of special Muhammadan electorates being allowed to vote in the open elections also is at all a debatable one. As I read the proposals of the Government of India, I find myself unable to put upon them any construction except that 4 seats are specified for the Musalmans to make up for their deficiency, because it is probable that a small number of them will "be able to secure election in the ordinary manner" as well, and it is to supplement this small number that Government proposes to set apart 4 additional seats specifically for them; so that 4 will be their minimum under all circumstances, but does not represent their full numbers. But if Muhammadan voters be not allowed to vote at the open elections also, no Musalman will be returned over and above these 4, though the total strength of the council will exceed 50. It is, I believe, enough to point this out to prove the utter absurdity of a system whereby the Indian Musalmans may be so inadequately represented. The new scheme, instead of doing any good to them will in that case make their position still worse. I therefore submit that it will be entirely subversive of one of the most important principles determining the whole scheme to deprive Muhammadan voters of their right to vote at the open elections also along with other sections of the people. The question is not a debatable one, and it should not have been opened in the way it has been.

The 11th November 1907.

Dated 8th November 1907.

From— MIAN MUHAMMAD SHAFI, Barrister-at-Law, Lahore,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

As desired by Mr. Mant in his no. 6268, dated 11th ultimo, I enclose herewith a memorandum containing my opinion on the proposals of the Government of India for the establishment of Advisory Councils and the enlargement of the Indian Legislative Councils.

MUHAMMAD SHAFI.

The Proposed Indian Councils Reform.

I. The Imperial Advisory Council: paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Government of India letter; paragraph 3 and question I (1) of the Punjab Government letter.—The establishment of an Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched in paragaphs 4 and 5 of the Government of India letter will, I am confident, prove a source of considerable benefit to the Government as well as the Indian people. As I understand the proposal, the council will be a purely advisory one, without possessing any legislative authority, and is intended not only to enable the Government to acquire, through the hereditary leaders of the people, a closer and more correct knowledge of the feelings and the needs of the masses, but to provide an agency for the diffusion of correct information concerning the acts, intentions, and objects of the Government as well. To me it is absolutely clear that the educated members of the urban population in this country cannot be looked upon as real representatives of the people inhabiting rural areas and are not in a position to voice the true feelings of those with whom they have so little in common. Of course, I am not here referring to that class of educated gentlemen who belonging to rural families and having their homes in villages have, for purposes of service or the professions adopted by them, taken up their abode more or less temporarily in the larger towns of the country and, therefore, stand on an entirely different footing from the class of non-agricultural urban residents to whom I have alluded above. It is gentlemen belonging to leading families of land-owners who are really in a position to supply true information as to the feelings of the vast rural population and, if properly selected, to give sound advice in matters concerning the agricultural communities. Moreover, being in close touch with the people, it is they who can best explain to the masses the intentions and objects of the Government with reference to any measure which the Government may have in view. The appointment of these natural leaders of the people residing within British India to the proposed Imperial Advisory Council in order to act as councillors of the Government as well as exponents of its intentions and policy to the people at large in matters of Imperial interest is, to my mind, a step in the right direction, calculated to be a source of great good to the country.

The proposal to allot a certain number of seats on the Imperial Advisory Council formed for purely consultative purposes to ruling Chiefs is one which, on the whole, has my hearty approval. As the council will not be vested with any powers of legislation for British India, and as in certain matters, some of which are mentioned in the Government of India letter, the Imperial interests involved are common to British India and the territories of the ruling Chiefs, it seems to me to be an act of sound policy to associate a certain number of the ruling Princes with the Government and the territorial magnates representing British territory in the kind of functions which the Imperial Advisory Council is intended to perform. I am, however, of opinion that the inclusion of as many as 20 ruling Chiefs in a council consisting of 60 members is hardly necessary or even wise. Bearing in mind the relative importance of British India as compared with the territories of the ruling Chiefs, the preponderance of British interests, the exigencies and possibilities of the future, and the requirements of Imperial policy, I would not allow the number of seats to be allotted to the Indian Princes to exceed a quarter of the entire number constituting the Imperial Advisory Council.

That all the members of the Advisory Council should be nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy is, in my humble judgment, a necessary result of the principles underlying the very constitution of the council, and is, to my mind, an extremely necessary as well as a salutary provision. I doubt not that in making these nominations His Excellency will take into consideration not only the numerical strength but also the political importance of the various communities constituting the vast population of the Indian peninsula.

With the rest of the proposals enunciated in paragraph 5 of the Government of India letter I am entirely in accord, and believe that a council thus constituted, if worked on proper lines and within due limits, will form a very useful factor in the machinery of administration in India.

II. The Provincial Advisory Council: Government of India letter, paragraphs (6) and (7); Punjab Government letter, paragraph (4), and question II (2).—For the reasons mentioned above, I consider that a Punjab Provincial Advisory Council will be a useful institution. The number of members as proposed in paragraph 4 of the Punjab Government letter and the general lines of the constitution of the council as laid down in paragraph 6 of the letter issued by the Government of India appear to me to be unexceptionable. The method of appointment of members to the Provincial Advisory Council being by nomination, and rightly so, it is to be hoped that, in making these appointments, the Government will bear in mind not only the interests of the agricultural, commercial, and other classes inhabiting the Punjab, but those of the Muhammadan community as such, in view not only of its numerical preponderance in this province, but of its political importance as well.

III. Enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council: paragraphs (8) to (19) of the Government of India letter; paragraph (5) and questions III (3) to (6) of the Punjab Government letter.—The proposal to enlarge the Imperial Legislative Council is one which ought to meet with the hearty approval of all who are capable of forming an independent judgment on questions of vital importance to the proper administration of the country. The council as at present constituted is not only not sufficient for the proper representation of the various communities and interests, but does not give adequate scope for the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of India. Without such expansion as is rightly proposed by the Government, the complaints which one so often hears from the platform and in the press will continue to disturb the political atmosphere; while, on the other hand, the enlargement of the Indian Legislative Councils, on proper lines and with necessary safeguards, will result in winning away a large number of those who are moderate in their political opinions and aspirations from the ranks of the malcontents and in bringing the vast majority of the thinking public still closer round the banner of the British Government. The absolutely irreconcilable minority will not, of course, be contented with these reforms nor, for the matter of that, will any measure of reconstruction of the administrative machinery, short of what they so unreasonably cherish and long for, satisfy their chimerical hopes and expectations. But if, as I trust, these proposed measures will bring contentment to the vast majority of the Indian population, the discontented minority may be safely ignored, for nothing that the benign Government may legitimately concede will ever please these revolutionaries. Given sufficiently large councils for the purposes of legislation in the country, with the various Indian committees and interests adequately represented thereon, all right-minded men will come to recognise the fact that the Government has done all that the real well-wishers of the country may, under the existing circumstances, reasonably demand, and this recognition by the vast majority of the justice of the measures introduced by the Government will bring an amount of satisfaction and contentment amongst the people which it is extremely difficult at present to measure.

I gladly accept the reasonablenes of the principle which recognises the necessity of reserving a majority of seats on the Imperial as well as Provincial Legislative Councils for the representatives of Government. I further regard it as necessary that the official majority "should be strong enough to be independent of the minor fluctuations that may be caused by the occasional absence of an official member." The proposal is undoubtedly based on sound policy and is absolutely essential for the security as well as stability of the British Government in India, and no right-minded British subject can take any exception whatsoever to a principle the necessity and justice of which are apparent, a principle which all Governments of all countries and in all ages have and cannot but have kept in view.

Question (4).—The proper representation of all the more important provinces on the Imperial Legislature is an obvious necessity, and any proposal of Government to secure such representation cannot but meet with universal approval. And as the Provincial Councils themselves enlarged under the proposed scheme of reform will include amongst their elected as well as nominated members a number of gentlemen who will be representative of the people of their provinces even to a greater degree than those who now have the honour of occupying seats on these councils, it is in the fitness of things and consistent with political principles to have upon the Imperial Legislative Council one representative of each of the Provincial Councils, elected by the non-official members thereof. The proposal, therefore, has my hearty support.

Question (5).—The population of India is, in the main, agricultural, and, in consequence, agricultural interests must naturally predominate in this country. And not only is this so merely from a numerical point of view, but the manhood of the country, the sources which supply its martial strength, and the natural resources with which God has endowed our country are to be found amongst the agricultural portions of the Indian continent. It is, therefore, one of the foremost principles of Indian administration to secure to the agricultural majority, rural as well as urban, due representation on the various Legislative Councils of the country, so that their interests might be adequately represented and safeguarded in whatever legislation the Government may undertake. And as the larger land-owners are undoubtedly the leaders of this portion of the Indian population and, living in their midst, are thoroughly well acquainted with their wishes and needs, the election by them of a representative from each province to the Imperial Legislative Council is obviously and exceedingly sound and necessary proposal. This is particularly true of our province of the Punjab where agricultural interests, numerically as well as politically, overwhelmingly predominate, and, in consequence, I entirely approve of the election of one of the great land-owners of this province to the Imperial Legislative Council. The electorate therefore should be neither too small nor so wide as to create undesirable confusion. Bearing in mind the fact that this is a province comparatively of small farmers, and that land-owners of the status of the Bengal zamindars and the Oudh taluqdars are, in this part of the country, exceedingly rare, I am strongly of opinion that the qualification of land-owning electors should in no case whatsoever exceed Rs. 5,000 in land revenue, and the amount of revenue realized or remitted for political and other services should be included when calculating the amount payable by each of the land-owners who may claim a vote under this head.

Government of India letter, paragraph 12 (2) (c).—The proposal contained in paragraph 12 (2) (c) of the Government of India letter, i.e., the appointment of a ruling Chief on the Imperial Legislative Council, is one which, in my humble opinion, is open to serious objection. The Legislative Councils, Imperial as well as Provincial, are intended for the enactment of laws for the territories administered by the British Government for the discussion of the Budget in relation to those territories, and for the regulation of other matters appertaining to the provinces directly under the control of the Government of India. The laws they enact may or may not be adopted by the ruling Chiefs in their own States; the system of administration of these laws prevalent in British India may or may not be introduced by the Indian princes in their own territories. The Chiefs who rule over the various Native States are themselves absolutely out of touch with the subjects of the British Crown residing in British India and are in consequence not cenversant with nor capable of representing their wishes and needs. And while I gladly recognize the loyalty of the present Chiefs to the Suzerain Power, and sincerely trust that they will continue to entertain towards the British Crown these healthy sentiments and feelings with which they are now inspired, I cannot regard this vital question from the point of view of sentiment only. As one who is out and out a sincere well-wisher of the British Government, I cannot but point out that the presence of ruling Chiefs in the Indian Legislative Councils is a factor which might, some day, become a source of embarrassment and anxiety to the Government. Concessions made from motives having their origin in pure sentiment are, in the process of time, liable to be looked upon as rights, particularly when embodied in Statutes, as I presume the present scheme will be. And I emphatically deny that any Ruling Chief has any right whatsoever to take part in legislating for the British territories. Legislative assemblies may be started by the Indian Princes in their own dominions: Mysore has already set the example. A fearful outcry would, I am positive, be raised if the British Government were to demand the appointment of one of its own representatives in these assemblies. Cries of undue interference, of treaty rights infringed, and of the paramount power seeking to usurp a right to which it was in no way entitled would be raised on all sides. A certain section of the press would characterize such a state of things as simply intolerable. Why should, then, the ruling Chiefs have a voice in the legislation for purely British territories when neither the necessities of the situation nor the requirements of Imperial policy call for the introduction of this, what I cannot help calling foreign element into the British administration? Looking at it from every point of view, I, for one, cannot find any justification for this dangerous innovation, and would, therefore, strongly urge upon the Government not to enact a provision of the contemplated reforms of the Indian councils which is open to grave objections and which, if once enacted, will bring about a position from which it will be simply impossible to recede in the future, near or remote, no matter what complications or difficulties it may lead to.

Question (6).—In conceding to the Muhammadan community the right of separate representation in the spirit of the reply graciously given by His Excellency Lord Minto to the All India Muhammadan deputation, of which I had the privilege of being a member, on the 1st October 1906, the Government of India are not only securing to the most important Indian minority a measure of representation in the councils of the country to which it is equitably entitled but they are winning the still deeper gratitude of that part of the Indian population which has over and over again demonstrated its deep-rooted loyalty to the British Crown. Past experience has proved it beyond a shadow of doubt that given a promiscuous system of representation by election, the Muhammadan community, and for the matter of that any other minority, e.g., Christians, cannot hope to succeed in placing one of their real representatives on the Legislative Councils of India. It is, therefore, absolutely essential that our benign Government should see that the various councils are so constituted as to allow of an adequate representation of the loyal Muhammadan community, not only proportionate to its numerical strength, but to its political importance as well. For these reasons while I gratefully welcome the proposal of the Government of India to reserve a certain number of seats on the Imperial Legislative Council for my community to be filled partly by election and partly by nomination, I regard the 4 seats, at present proposed to be allotted to the Musalmans of India, as inadequate to meet the justice and the necessity of the case. The success of Muhammadan candidates for election under the other heads being, as experience has already shown, an extremely doubtful matter, the presence of 4 Muhammadan councillors in an assembly of 54 is not calculated to serve the purpose which the Government has in view and to give the community its due share of representation on the Imperial Legislative Council. I would, therefore, respectfully submit that at least 6 seats should be reserved for the Indian Muslim community—4 to be filled up by election and 2 by nomination by His Excellency the Viceroy. To bring this proposal into effect a redistribution of the seats as at present laid down in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter will, of course, become necessary, and I venture to submit the following alternative schemes, either of which may easily be adopted without doing the slightest violence to any of the main principles underlying the scheme of reform as proposed by the Government of India:—

(a) Ex-officio members 8; additional officials 19; elected members as at present suggested in paragraph 12 (2) (D), with the modification that 4 seats be allotted to Muhammadans instead of 2; non-officials to be nominated by His Excellency, not less than 2 of whom to be Muhammdans, 4; and 2 experts, or (b) Ex-officio 8; additional officials 21; and the rest as above, thus making up the total of 55, instead of 53, exclusive of His Excellency the Viceroy.

The constitution of a special Muhammadan electorate for the election of Muhammadan representatives on the Imperial Council is a question which is not altogether free from difficulty. On a full consideration of the matter, I am of opinion, that the said election should not be left to the Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Councils alone. Such an electorate would not only be too small, but would not be considered as truly representative of the entire community. I would, therefore, give preference to the method sketched in paragraph 18 of the Government of India letter, with this proviso that the electors possessing the privilege of voting for the Muhammadan representatives in the Imperial Council should not be at liberty to vote for an outsider, but should elect the said representative from amongst themselves. As regards the class of voters referred to in paragraph 18 (c) of the letter under reference, I am of opinion that the limit of land revenue paid by land-owners in the Punjab vested with the right to vote should not exceed Rs. 5,000.

In connection with the question of an electorate for the separate Muhammadan representation on the Imperial and Provincial Councils, there is a remark in the Punjab Government letter which calls for special notice. Towards the end of paragraph 5 of the letter in question it is said that "in discussing the constitution of a special Muhammadan electorate, the question whether its members should or shold not be allowed to vote in the open elecfions also must be considered." Now, bearing in mind the observations contained in paragraphs 16 and 19 of the Government of India letter as well as the words in paragraph 17 that "in addition to the small number of Muhammadans who may be able to secure election in the ordinary manner, it seems desirable in each of the councils to assign a certain number of seats to be filled exclusively by Muhammadans," it is obvious that to deprive Muhammadan electors, who may have a voice in the election of Muhammadan representatives, of their vote in the open elections is to defeat the very object which the Government of India have rightly in view, and will result in considerable and serious injury to the Muhammadan community in general. Of course, if the number of Muhammadan members in these councils to be separately elected or nominated bore that proportion to the entire number thereof which not only the numerical strength, but also the political importance, of the community as such fully warranted, there could be no just ground for complaint in separating off the Muhammadan electorate absolutely and entirely from the open election for the rest of the seats on the various councils. But as the number of seats reserved for our community is to be fixed at a lower figure in view of the possibility of one or two Muhammadans being able to secure seats in the open election, it necessarily follows that the possession of a vote in the separate Muhammadan election should not entail forfeiture of the right to vote in the general elections, for, if this were so, it would be simply impossible for any Muhammadan candidate to secure a seat on the council under any of the other heads. I would, therefore, strongly urge that in this respect the proposal as embodied in the letter issued by the Government of India should, on no account, be departed from.

IV. The Provincial Legislative Councils; paragraphs (17) and (20) to (22) of the Government of India letter; paragraphs (6) to (8) and questions (8) to (12) of the Punjab Government letter.—For the reasons mentioned at the commencement of part III of this memorandum, I am of opinion that an increase in the number of members of the Punjab Provincial Council is desirable and will result in the council being thoroughly representation of the various sections of the population in this province. Taking into consideration the various interests, official as well as non-official, involved in the proposed scheme of enlargement, I would suggest that the maximum strength of the Punjab Council should be 26 or, including His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, 27. And bearing in mind the desirability of having a clear official majority on the council 14 out of the 26 seats might be reserved for official members to be appointed by Government.

Question (8).—With reference to the question whether it is desirable to introduce a system of election for the filing up of the remaining 12 non-official seats in the Punjab Council, I would, taking all things into consideration, maintain the present system of nomination. Conceding in the abstract the desirability of this reform in the Legislative Councils of the country, it seems to me that time is not yet ripe for the introduction of a system of election in the Punjab. Past experience in the case of municipal boards has demonstrated beyond all doubt that the people in this province have not yet fully realised the responsibilities attached to the possession of a vote for electing representatives to the local bodies, and the results so far have been extremely unsatisfactory. I would, therefore, advocate for the present, the maintenance of the existing system of nomination of members on the Provincial Council.

Question (9).—In filling up the 12 non-official seats on the Provincial Council, I would advocate the distribution thereof amongst the various communities inhabiting the Punjab in fixed proportions. The majority of the population in this province consists of Muhammadans who, as is mentioned in the Punjab Government letter, bear a percentage of 53·3 to the total population of the Punjab. For this very reason, I presume, the Muhammadan representatives have, speaking roughly, hitherto occupied one-half of the non-official seats on the council. And bearing in mind the fact that the political importance of our community in this province is, to say the least, proportionate to its numerical strength, I would strongly urge that at least 6 of the 12 non-official seats, should be allotted to representatives of the Punjab Muhammadan population. Of the remaining 6 unofficial members, 3 should, in my humble opinion, be Hindus, 2 Sikhs, and 1 Christian. In this manner the Hindu community will have 5 representatives on the council, for, as a matter of fact, Hindus and Sikhs constitute but one and the same community. The distribution thus suggested seems to me to be the most equitable to adopt, and would result in the due representation on the Punjab Council of the various communities inhabiting this province, bearing in mind their numerical strength as well as political importance in this part of the country. Should the Government, however, decide upon a class representation rather than on representation by communities I would, in that case, in view of the principles laid down by the Government of India, distribute the 12 non-official seats in the following manner:—3 representatives of municipal towns with a population of 20,000 or more, 3 land-holders, 4 Muhammadans, and 2 seats to be filled up through nomination by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor.

It will be noticed that in the distribution of seats noted above, I am not in favour of conceding to the Punjab University the privilege of being represented on the council through one of its Fellows. To me it seems extremely undesirable to introduce, what I cannot help regarding as, a political element in a purely educational institution. It would not only give rise to a spirit of political partizanship in the Senate of the University, but would create complications due to the diversity of creed and race which might result in irremediable injury to an institution which has the intellectual and educational advancement of the province in its charge. Should it, however, be decided to ask the Senate to elect one member to the council, I would reduce the number of representatives of the municipal towns from three to two and would strongly advocate the adoption of a procedure which would result in the election of a Christian, a Muhammadan, and a Hindu representative of the Senate alternately.

Questions (10) to (12).—I have already stated that in my humble opinion our province has not yet reached that stage of political advancement in which the introduction of a system of election would be conducive to the welfare of its population. Should the Government, however, decide upon trying this experiment in the Punjab, I would not throw more than one-half of the non-official seats open to election, in case the principle of distribution by communities is adopted. If this suggestion be accepted, three of the six seats to be allotted to the Muhammadan community would then be filled up by election. And in this connection one of two alternative schemes for the formation of an electorate may be adopted—(1) The Muhammadan electors to consist of all land-owners paying a sum of Rs. 750 or upward in land revenue, including the amount remitted or realized, all payers of income-tax on an income of Rs. 2,000 per annum or more, and all registered graduates of more than five years' standing; or (2) two of the three seats to be voted for by an electorate constituted as above and one by the Muhammadan members of the Punjab municipalities. Should the latter proposal be accepted, it would be necessary to reserve a number of seats in each municipal committee for the local Muhammadan community proportionate to its numerical strength and importance, as is even now the case in Lahore, Multan, Hoshiarpur, and some other towns in the Punjab. In either case it seems to me to be necessary that the qualifications of a candidate for election as a member of the Provincial Council under this head should be fixed on a higher basis than those entitling a person to vote in such an election, and I would suggest that the candidate should either be a land-owner paying at least Rs. 1,500 in land revenue or a person paying an income-tax on an income of Rs. 6,000 a year or a registered graduate of at least ten years' standing.

In case of the adoption of either of the two above-mentioned proposals a fixed number of votes may, further, be granted to a few selected anjumans which are recognised as representatives of the Muhammadan community in their own respective parts of the province.

A similar system may be sanctioned in the case of the Christian, the Hindu, and the Sikh communities.

Should the Government, however, decide upon a class representation, on the lines sketched previously, instead of representation by communities, I would, then, suggest that of the four seats reserved for the Muhammadan community, two should be filled by election, the constitution of the electorate being based on the lines of the first scheme noted above, and two should be reserved for nomination by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor. In case of the three or two seats as the case may be to be allotted to the municipal committees, the qualifications of the candidate for election to the council should be laid down as previously suggested. As regards the three representatives of the land-holding class, the amount of land revenue paid by the voter as well as by the candidate for election to the council should be fixed respectively at the sums already mentioned.

In reply to the latter portion of question (11) of the Punjab Government letter, I am strongly of opinion that the system already existing in Lahore and elsewhere, of allotting a fixed number of seats on the municipal committees to the Muhammadan and Hindu communities, to be voted for by the members thereof separately, should be extended to all municipal towns throughout the Punjab. The complaint is almost universal that wherever a system of promiscuous election prevails, Muhammadan candidates have, owing to diverse causes which need not be detailed here, very little chance of success in the elections, in consequence whereof our community is not at all properly represented on those municipalities.

V. Questions (13) to (15).—My answers to the last three questions noted in the Punjab Government letter are in the affirmative. With reference to the fourteenth question, however, I am of opinion that the discussion of the Provincial Budget, to be introduced for the first time in the Punjab Council, should not be by different heads in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter, but should be conducted on the lines hitherto adopted in the Imperial Legislative Council.

VI. In conclusion, I desire to avail myself of this opportunity to offer my most sincere thanks to the Government of India for the proposed reforms in the constitution of the Indian councils which, to my mind, mark a distinct step forward in the political development of this country. The step thus taken spontaneously by the Government of His Excellency Lord Minto should convince all right-minded persons of the readiness of our rulers to concede to His Imperial Majesty's subjects in India those political rights and privileges of which they may prove themselves worthy by reason of educational and general advancement. My co-religionists, whose feelings I am in a position to gauge and on whose behalf I may claim the privilege of speaking, gladly recognise the generosity and beneficence of the British Government in introducing such momentous constitutional changes in the administration of this country, and are sincerely grateful to their rulers for this priceless boon which the Government is about to confer on the subject races in India. That such a generous gift as this ought to bring happiness to all Indians, irrespective of caste and creed. I fully recognise that it will help to bind the loyal Muhammadan community still closer to the Government, I am positively certain.

LAHORE:
The 9th November 1907.

MUHAMMAD SHAFI,
Barrister-at-Law.

No. 100, dated Lahore, 11th November 1907.

From—LALA RAM SARAN DASS, son of R. B. MELA RAM,
To—The Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

With reference to your favour no. 6268, dated 11th ultimo, calling for opinion regarding the proposed scheme of the Government of India about Advisory and Legislative Councils, I beg to submit herewith my views on the subject for your favourable consideration.

RAM SARAN DASS.

OPINION.

Before proceding to answer the questions framed by the Government, I feel it necessary to make a few humble remarks of a general nature.

The main objects with which the Government intend to undertake the proposed measure, as expressed in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Government of India's letter, appear to be (i) "to bring all classes of the people into closer relations with the Government and its officers, and of increasing their opportunities of making known their feelings and wishes in respect of administrative and legislative questions"; and (ii) to remedy the "difficulty encountered by the Governments in India in making their measures and motives generally understood, and in correcting erroneous and often mischievous statements of fact or purpose imputed to them."

It is, therefore, most essential in attempting to discuss the proposed scheme to take into consideration certain unfortunate circumstances which in my humble opinion adversely effect these most laudable objects of the Government in the present condition of affairs. There are already large numbers of our countrymen who sincerely appreciate the conscientious efforts made by the British Government to conduct the administration of the country in such a way as to conduce to the welfare and advancement of the country. They feel most deeply grateful for the various blessings enjoyed by the people under the British administration.

Now, although the British Government has—since Providence placed our destinies in the hands of the British nation—done very many good things, there have been and now are certain other things which are felt painful by the people in general or by special classes of them. They are absolutely inevitable in the circumstances of the situation, and it has undeniably been the desire of the British Government to take steps to remove them or minimise their effects, as they became known to the authorities from time to time. There is, however, the drawback that the bulk of the population are quite illiterate and consequently unable to understand such matters. On the other hand, there are numbers among our countrymen who criticise the administration in a way to lead the people to believe that their troubles are due to the British administration. This wrong and mischievous notion has been gaining ground as years have rolled on, and has recently become more general than it ever was before.

Closely connected with the above, there is another equally unfortunate circum stance. It has generally come to be believed that many of our countrymen, who have occasion to visit officers of the Government and express their views on administrative matters, do not rightly explain to the authorities the views and ideas of the people in general; that they regard it impolitic and on occasions unsafe to speak out the truth when it differs from what appears to them to be the determined view or policy of the Government; that very many of them consequently avoid expressing any decided opinion in such cases, but that others try to please the authorities by expressing agreement with the Government view. As a result of this lamentable but undeniable notion prevailing among the masses, they do not regard as their representatives and leaders many of those who from their position and circumstances would naturally be regarded as their representatives and leaders. On the contrary, they readily swallow whatever is presented to them by the adverse critics of the Government even when such critics have recourse to direct misrepresentation and absolutely fallacious reasoning.

It has also come to be supposed by very many people that it is the determined policy of the Government to keep the various sections of the people disunited, and of late the suspicion has been growing among Hindus that in furtherance of this policy the Government has resolved to show favour to other communities (and especially to Muhammadans) at the sacrifice of the interests of the Hindus. Accordingly it is feared that although the Government of India have spent very much of their valuable time and attention in framing the scheme, yet it is not very likely that any appreciable number of persons believed by the masses of people to be acquainted with their daily life and qualified to speak with authority on their behalf will find a place in the Legislative or Advisory Councils.

With these humble prefatory remarks I now proceed to express my humble views regarding the questions in detail: —

Question I.—(1) Imperial Advisory Council.—Subject to the limitations on the usefulness of the measure arising from the circumstances noted in the preface, the establishment of such a council would be useful in eliciting the views of those consulted on such questions as may come under their consideration from time to time.

I would suggest that instead of confining their competency to submit their views on those quesions only that may be referred to them by the Government, it should be open to the councillors to communicate to the Government their own views and the thoughts of the people in general regarding any measure contemplated by the Government so as to enable the Government to receive information (in case where any contemplated administrative action may be misconceived) before the misconception ripens into discontent.

The number of councillors (viz., 60 for the whole country) is too inadequate to be of material service. Even double of this number would not be too many. Striking out the 20 ruling Chiefs, there would remain only 40 for the whole country which would give less than half a dozen for each province.

Question II.—(2) Provincial Advisory Council.—As in the Imperial Advisory Council, the members of the Provincial Councils should also be competent (besides expressing their opinions on questions referred by the Government) to tender their views and communicate the thoughts of the people on all acts and measures of the Government about which they might think it useful to inform the Government.

Question III.—(3) Imperial Legislative Council.—The time has certainly come for the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council. But no extension will give any satisfaction unless it results in ensuring to the people a greater chance than before of their views being heard.

Regarding its constitution, I beg to submit that the number of those that may be taken to represent the people's views is rather too small, viz., 18 of 54. The number of these may safely be increased without weakening the Government majority. For, unless a measure introduced by the Government were extremely misconceived, it would not be likely for all the various members of class D to offer a unanimous opposition. And in cases where all such members were unanimously opposed to a Government proposal, the authorities would be well-advised to attach proper weight to their opposition.

I have further to point out that the proposed constitution virtually limits the chances of election to the Imperial Legislative Council of those persons who are regarded by the Hindu section of the population as most competent to represent their views as noted in the prefatory remarks. The proposed constitution, while sufficiently safeguarding the interest of minor sections of the population, will be felt quite dissatisfactory by the Hindu community, constituting more than two-thirds of the entire population of the country.

Question IV.—(7) The Punjab Legislative Council.—In my opinion it would add to the weight of the deliberations of the council if the number of members, which is very small at present, were materially increased. Unless it be too inconvenient, the present number may be doubled.

(8) I strongly advocate that the present system of nomination by Government be maintained for some years to come for filling the unofficial seats. Various difficult and awkward points shall require solution in the circumstances, which exist in this province, to ensure a satisfactory working of the measure if election be adopted for filling those seats, and I am afraid it will not be an easy matter to effect such solution in a manner to give satisfaction to all parties concerned; while it is feared that the result may be quite unsatisfactory.

(9) It would indeed give more satisfaction if a practicable mode of fixing a proper proportion of seats for the different classes of the population could be adopted: but it does not seem an easy affair to adopt a satisfactory mode.

As to the different classes constituting the population of the province, the two important sections are of course Muhammadans and Hindus. Many Sikhs, however, claim that their co-religionists should be regarded a separate class, but as their number is very small (as compared with the rest of the Hindus and Muhammadans), it will be somewhat difficult to fix upon a fair principle for the distribution of the seats if separate representation were to be given to the Sikhs.

There are again several other minor sections of the community as well as certain special interests, e.g., the agricultural, mercantile, and other interests.

In my humble opinion, a fixed number of seats may be assigned to each of the two classes, Muhammadans and Hindus, according to their respective proportion in the population while a few special seats may be allotted to such other classes as Government may deem fit.

(10) Requires no answer.

(11) It will prove a very complicated and difficult matter to adopt for the seats in municipal and district boards a principle corresponding to that proposed for the Legislative Council. Hence I would not support any change in the present constitution of those boards until circumstances are so far changed as to justify a change of their constitution.

(12) I do not think there is any need in our province to allot any extra seats to the Muhammadans as their proportion is sufficiently large to ensure them a fair share of the seats. I do not, however, think it politic to discuss this delicate question, and would leave it to be decided by the Government as they deem fit.

(13) It would certainly conduce to the better understanding of the objects and wishes of the Government by the people if the proposed alterations were adopted in regard to the discussion of the budget in the Imperial Council.

(14) I do not think it opportune at present to subject the Provincial Budget to discussion in the Provincial Legislative Council.

(15) In my opinion the province is not as yet so far advanced as to require the grant of the right of interpellation in the Provincial Legislative Council.

I am very grateful to Government for favouring me with an opportunity of expressing my opinion on the points referred which I have endeavoured to candidly express and I am convinced that my remarks will be accepted in the loyal spirit in which they have been offered.

RAM SARAN DASS.

Dated Lahore, 12th November 1907.

From—Lala Harkishen Lal, Barrister-at-Law, Lahore.

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

I have the honour to submit my opinion on the question of reformed councils in the order of the questions put by the local Government.

(1) I think that an Advisory Imperial Council constituted on somewhat modified lines from those sketched in paragraph 4 of the Government of India's letter would be of service to the country, and I beg to suggest the following modification in the scheme framed by the Government of India:—

(a) I would omit the ruling Princes altogether from such councils as they are not in touch with the people of British India, and any interference on their behalf with the affairs of British Indians would expose them, their States, and their character to public criticism, which may not be welcome to them and which may embitter their feelings against the British subjects.

(b) I would include the elected members of the Legislative Councils in the Advisory Council, as they alone are likely to command the confidence of the people.

(c) That too much importance be not attached to the so-called territorial magnates as they are not necessarily the only influential people in the country and as often as not they are open to reproach, and the history of the court of wards legislation does not prove them worthy of the trust desired to be reposed in them.

(d) That interests other than land should be fairly and adequately represented on such a council.

(2) I have the same remarks to offer to the Provincial Advisory Council as to the Imperial Advisory Council.

(3) I approve of the enlargement of the Imperial Legislative Council, but would offer the following remarks on the scheme propounded by the Government of India:—

(a) The official majority of 36 to 18 including the nominated members is by far too much. It could be safely reduced to 30 and 24 without in any way endangering the position of the Government.

(b) The commercial interests could not be adequately represented by two members elected by the Chambers of Commerce at Calcutta and Bombay, as there are wider interests involved. As invariably these elections are likely to result in the return of Europeans to the council, the Indian interests and the interest of other provinces would not have any representatives; therefore, it is suggested that the number of commercial members be raised to 5, guaranteeing 3 Indians to 2 Europeans and having an adequate representation of the whole of India's commercial and industrial interests.

(c) The land-holding interests are being given too much importance. They may be reduced to say 5 members.

(a) Special privileges to Muhammadans are open to very serious objections of policy. The Government woud be ill-advised to set a class against a class: to begin to protest minorities by bestowing special privileges. They will not know where to end, and they will be sowing the seeds of discontent amongst unprivileged classes which will be hard to remove by mere palliatives. The Muhammadan interests will be adequately guarded when the land-holding classes of Punjab and the Eastern Bengal are allowed to send representations direct to the Imperial Council and also through the non-official members of the Provincial Councils; and if perchance they are not sufficiently strong, the nomination in the hands of the Viceroy can set matters right.

(c) The interests of education have been entirely ignored in the scheme. This is hardly justified. The 5 Universities should be given one representative each through their graduates of certain standing. Thus the scheme will work as under:—

The Viceroy	. . . . .	1
Ex-officio members	. . . . .	8
Ruling Chief	. . . . .	1
Other officials	. . . . .	16
Viceroy's nominees	. . . . .	4
		— 30
Land interests	. . . . .	5
Commercial and industrial interests	. . .	5
Education	. . . . .	5
Local council's elections	. . . . .	7
Experts	. . . . .	2
		— 24

(4) Yes, I approve of the suggestion made in paragraph 13 of the letter.

(5) I don't think election will succeed in this case. Artificial suffrages proposed would not have any coherence in interest; therefore nomination would be the best method of bringing land interests into the council.

(6) I don't approve of any special concessions to any community based on differences of religion or creed.

(7) I would advocate the increase in the number of members on the Provincial Legislative Council to at least 17.

(8) I would have at least three-fourths of the non-official seats filled in by election.

(9) I would have the following electorates:—

District boards by groups	 1
Municipalities by groups	 1
Universities	 1
Educated classes	 1
Chamber of Commerce	 1

Minorities, Hindus and Sikhs, one each, if the principle is adopted in the Imperial Legislative Council so far as Muhammadans are concerned.

Nominated 2 or 3 as the maximum number may be fixed and also whether minorities are to be specially privileged.

(10) See answer to question (9).

(13) Yes; discussion on Budget should be altered in the manner suggested in paragraph 23 of the Government of India letter.

(14) Yes; I think Provincial Budget be discussed in the Provincial Councils in the manner indicated in paragraph 23 of the letter.

(15) I certainly advocate the power of interpellation to be given to members of the Provincial Council in the Punjab.

(1) Imperial Advisory Council.—In my opinion the Imperial Advisory Council on the lines sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government of India letter is not likely to be of much service to the country. It might be of use if the proposed members were such as were in touch with the people at large and possessed independence of views and intelligence to be able to grasp and understand the matters laid before them. With few exceptions, speaking generally, the proposed class of members are unable to efficiently manage their own estates. They themselves stand in need of proper advice which even when tendered they are unable to appreciate and follow for want of a power of discrimination. They usually lack in initiative, and cannot by their short training and experience be expected to give proper advice on Imperial questions involving large and intricate problems and affecting the interests of a variety of people. Even as means of diffusing correct information, I am afraid the ruling Chiefs and the territorial magnates are not likely to be of much use; I might say, of any use. It is extremely improbable that they will ever condescend to personally communicate information to the people, and if it is done through their servants and ministers, it is more likely than not that the facts will not, to put it mildly, be truly represented. In order to attain the end sketched out in paragraph 4 of the Government letter, it seems to me to be essential that the Advisory Council should consist of members of intelligence, education, and character, and a certain amount of influence with the people and in the country. The mere hereditary incident of being a ruling Chief or a territorial magnate is not likely to achieve the laudable object aimed at. The usefulness of the proposed Advisory Council will therefore in my humble opinion depend upon the discrimination exercised in making the nominations. It would be proportionate to the character, ability, and personal influence of the members nominated. For a considerable time hence these qualifications are not likely to be met with in abundance or sufficient quantity among the members of the proposed class. In order therefore to make the proposed Imperial Advisory Council of any use to the country, it seems to me to be necessary that the deficiency in intellect and character be supplemented by nominating likewise a suitable number from amongst the educated middle class.

Curiously enough, the Government letter does recognise the utility of representing on the Provincial Advisory Councils interests other than landed. One would imagine that if it is useful to have the advice of persons representing such other interests in local matters, á fortiori it is so necessary in a place where the measures adopted would affect such interests more widely, vitally, and permanently. Moreover, the territorial magnates can at best represent their own interests, if at all. It is true that the vast proportion of the populaion of the country consists of agriculturists or of landed proprietors. But the laws enacted or the administrative measures adopted by the Government do not affect the landed proprietors exclusively or even mainly. There are very few enactments which deal only with land, and even as regards problems connected with land is it expected that the territorial magnates would correctly represent the views of the equally large and important class of tenants and agricultural labourers. If there is at all an idea of having representative advice, then it is inconceivable why the representation in the Imperial Council should be limited to territorial magnates and be not extended to other interests, as is in fact contemplated in the case of Provincial Advisory Councils. Possibly the distinction is made on the ground of difference in status, and it is perhaps regarded as repulsive to all decent ideas of Government prestige that a member of the commercial, professional, or middle class be given the privilege of being the councillor of the Government of India. But it is assumed in the thesis that in India prestige has always and generally attached itself to possession of a large number of acres only, and it is forgotten or at least overlooked that a ruling Chief or a territorial magnate even now considers it his pious duty to bow before and pay highest reverence to the learned, be he a Brahman or a Muhammadan Pir. I do not for a moment mean to minimise the importance of landed aristocracy, but it seems to me an egregious mistake to think that learning and character by themselves have no prestige or a low prestige in the oriental countries. The position is possibly just the reverse, but to say the least each class has doubtless an importance of its own which cannot safely be overlooked or ignored. I would therefore urge that the same liberal policy be adopted in framing the constitution of the Imperial Advisory Council as has been proposed for the Provincial Councils, and add to paragraph 3 that a suitable member be also nominated from among the educated middle class.

(2) Provincial Advisory Council.—I think it would be a useful institution, but its usefulness would be proportionate to the character of the nominations made. If the members nominated lack in the qualifications referred to while discussing the Imperial Advisory Council, it is not at all improbable that the proposed institution might prove the reverse of being useful and even injurious to the interests of the country at large.

(3) Imperial Legislative Council.—The proposed enlargement in the number of members for the Imperial Legislative Council is decidedly a move in the right direction. The present number is altogether inadequate, and considering the variety of interests and vastness of the population affected by legislation, the proposed increase does not appear to me to be sufficiently large. I would propose that the number be increased to 60, including His Excelency the Viceroy.

This number to be made up as below:—

(a) As in the Government letter.

(b) Ditto ditto.

(c) Nomination of a ruling Chief. This seems to me to be not only unnecessary, but devoid of all advantage and altogether out of place. The function of the Legislative Council for India is restricted to framing laws for British Indian subjects, apparently there is no reason why a ruling Chief of a Native State be called upon to take part in framing laws for subjects other than his own. Moreover, it is highly probable that he will consider the nomination as derogatory to his privilege as a ruling Chief. He might be consulted individually by the Viceroy, and he is likely to appreciate the confidence so reposed but not his nomination as a member of this Legislative Council. The step is useful in itself as tending to greater solidarity, but it is not likely to prove of any use in actual practice.

I would therefore eliminate (c).

As regards (d), elected members—

(a) As in the Government letter.

(b) Ditto ditto.

(c) Ditto ditto.

(d) By Muhammadans. This clause should in my opinion be altogether omitted for the following reasons:—

(1) In encourages a belief that the Government proposes and intends to favour specially one class of its subjects and thereby promotes not only class ill-feeling but also a feeling of ill-will against the Government for not dealing justly between the two great communities that compose the Indian population.

(2) The reservation is not based on any proper data; the elections were hitherto made only by the non-official members of the Provincial Councils, and even conceding that these elections did not result in giving a proper representation to the Muhammadan community, the experience so gained can be no guide for judging the results under the proposed scheme where a new element of election by land-holders is introduced. It would be altogether unreasonable to assume that with this new addition to the electorate which by itself is by no means unfavourable to Muhammadan cause, and particularly having regard to the persistence with which class interests are now being pressed by the enlightened portion of the community, that the results of the new election would still be unfavourable to them and would not properly represent their interests. At any rate under the circumstance it would be entirely premature to say so, and it is quite conceivable that in the next election or in any particular election under the proposed scheme the Muhammadans may have more than their proper share of representation. The reservation made in their favour in the case under clauses (c) and (d) would defeat the very object aimed at and convert the minority into a majority. If I mistake not, the Muhammadans have not hitherto displayed any keen desire and love for the elective principle, and I would therefore propose that the object aimed at, namely, protecting the minority, may equally but with less disadvantage be secured by omitting (d) and by increasing the number of nominations under (e) to 6 without any reference to any particular class or community. These nominations would be reserved in the hands of the Government to balance the several interests according to the results of the elections in any particular year. If the result of the election is unduly large in favour of Hindus, the whole number might, if necessary, be nominated from among the Muhammadans and vice versâ when the election gives an undue advantage to Muhammadans. Retaining (f), which in my opinion is a useful provision, the number left to be made up according to my proposal would be (7) in order to make up 60, and I would distribute this number over the seven provinces as in (b), each province to return one Master of Arts, Science, or Medicine by election. The electorate in each province would consist of graduates, and if their number is found or held to be too large or unwieldy, though I believe it is not, the privilege might be limited to Masters of Arts, Science, and Medicine only. According to this scheme the number of elected members would be 23 out of a total of 60 as below:—

(a) By Chambers of Commerce	2
(b) Non-officials by Provincial Councils	7
(c) Land-owners	7
(e) Masters of Learning	7
TOTAL	23

NOMINATED.

A. Ex-officio	8
B. Additional officials	20
E. Non-officials nominated	6
F. Experts	2
TOTAL	36
	37
TOTAL 23+37=60

There can be and is no objection to any further increase being made in the number of officials to be nominated in order to maintain an undisputed majority, but what is asked and prayed for is that there should be an adequate representation of all interests and not of some only, and that no undue favour be shown to one community against the other. The scheme, as set out in the Government letter, apparently transgresses against both these principle. It entirely ignores the literary class which at all times has influenced and cannot but influence the course of legislation, and it needlessly exhibits partial regard for the interests of a certain community which after all may not stand in need of protection or, if necessary, may be protected by a less offensive method. I would venture to say that the scheme proposed here would meet general satisfaction by giving adequate representation to the literary classes and by enabling the Government to protect the interests of various classes and minorities as the occasion may arise by making suitable nominations.

III. (4) I have already stated my approval of the proposal contained in paragraph 13. As regards the methods suggested in paragraph 15, I propose election by an electorate composed of land-owners possessing certain qualifications as regards payment of Government revenue which might vary in different provinces according to the circumstances.

IV. The Provincial Legislative Council in the Punjab.

(7) The number should in my opinion be increased to 20. The present number is too small to allow of a proper representation of all interests in the council.

(8) In my opinion the principle of election might with advantage be now introduced in the province, but for the peresent it should be applied only to some of the non-official seats and not to all.

(9) I would not advocate a fixed rule, determining the proportion of seats to be allotted to each class, for the simple reason that a division by race, caste, or religion in a matter of election of this nature is injurious and altogether out of place. As members of the Legislative Council, the members ought not be led to think that they represent any class or caste interest, but the general welfare of the country. If any caste or class questions do arise, they would better be settled by forgetting caste distinctions, or if that be not feasible, then by the Government which is expected and regarded to represent no particular caste, class, or religion. I would therefore prefer that there be no election at all rather than an election by castes, classes and religions. The only serious reason urged in favour of election by sections is a desire to protect the interests of minorities. The argument does not apply to Muhammadans in this province as they are not in a minority, and if in spite of their numbers they are possibly unable to take care of their interests by election, then the remedy lies in making up the deficiency by nomination and not by sectional election. There is good and special reason to support this view as the privilege of general election is valued by the other community and they are willing to leave the power of making up deficiency in election by direct nominations to be made by the Government.

(10) I would advocate election through municipal boards only, but would restrict the privilege to a few select municipalities only. Out of 20 members exclusive of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, I would reserve 10 seats for officials to be nominated by the local Government. Out of the remaining 10 non-officials, I would propose nomination of 5 by the local Government to protect class interests, such as that of the land-holders, &c., and the remaining 5 to be elected as below:—

(1) By select municipalities	4
(2) By an electorate of graduates	1

This scheme does not give the right of election in this province to rural population which forms a very considerable majority. But in my opinion the rural population is not yet sufficiently advanced to exercise the power of election for the Provincial Council, and their interests would be best safeguarded by direct nominations made by the Government. The urban population gets a larger share than can be fixed on the basis of population, but it is more advanced and better fitted to exercise the right, and what is needed at least for efficiency's sake is not merely a numerical representation on the council but also a fitness to transact the business. I believe one member out of 21 to represent the purely literary class elected by graduates of the province will not be regarded as an excessive encroachment by the class on the precincts of the Provincial Council.

(11) and (12). For reasons given under paragraph 9 and while discussing the Imerial Legislative Council, I am against either of these paragraphs.

(13) The manner suggested in paragraph 13 of the Government letter for discussing the Budget seems to me to be a move in the right direction.

(14) Yes.

Dated Lahore, 14th November 1907.

From—Nawab Fateh Ali Khan, Qazilbash, C.I.E., Lahore,

To—The Deputy Commissioner, Lahore.

In compliance with your letter no. 6268, dated the 11th October 1907, I have the honour to submit the accompanying statement of my opinion on the reform scheme of the Government of India.

FATEH ALI KHAN, Qazilbash,
Lahore.

Opinion on the reform scheme of the Government of India.

Preliminary.—The importance of the reform scheme of the Government of India, embodied in its letter of 24th August 1907, and referred to the representatives of the people for expression of views, is undoubted; and there can be but one opinion as to the far-reaching consequences of the reforms now in contemplation. In spite of the adverse criticism which has been expressed in some quarters, I venture to think that the scheme is practicable; is in the best interests of both the rulers and the ruled; and was called for by the exigencies of the present situation in India. That situation is daily becoming increasingly difficult, and Government has been well-advised in undertaking a measure of the utility and magnitude of the reform scheme under review. The object of the proposals, that of lessening the difficulties of Government and associating with it the real leaders of the people in the work of administration, is likely to be accomplished if men of light and leading co-operate with the Government in the project. The general principles underlying the scheme are eminently sound, and, excepting the discontented classes whom nothing short of absolute autonomy will satisfy, the Indian people are grateful to His Excellency Lord Minto's Government for the initiative which the latter has taken in the matter.

2. I. (1) Imperial Advisory Council.—I not only think that an Imperial Advisory Council, on the lines suggested by the Government of India, will be of great service to the country but express my general concurrence in the details of constitution laid down for it. There is, however, one point which deserves to be mentioned in this connection. As Government proposes, it is certainly desirable to give preponderance to the magnates and ruling Chiefs in the personnel of the council; but that its membership should be confined to these two classes only is a principle from which I respectfully beg to differ. Its deliberations will carry greater weight with the public, and it will become a better and more effective means of interpreting the wishes of the people to Government, and of diffusing among them correct information about its policy, if the Advisory Council were so constituted as to be an epitome of all the more important interests in the country. Moreover, the constitution for the Provincial Advisory Councils as proposed by the Government of India itself, recognises the necessity of epitomizing all interests in the Provincial Councils, and a similar course of action may be advantageously followed with regard to the Imperial Advisory Council also.

3. II. (2) Provincial Advisory Councils.—My answer to the first part of the second question is in the affirmative, and I have no special modification to suggest in the proposals of Government regarding the duties and constitution of the Provincial Councils, except to observe that it will give them greater weight and ensure increased confidence in their deliberations if general rules were framed specifying the manner in which the various interests and communities would be represented.

4. III. (3) Imperial Legislative Council.—I approve thoroughly of the proposal to enlarge the Imperial Legislative Council. Its expansion is a natural consequence of the concessions granted by the British Government in 1892, and nothing but an adequate enlargement of the highest legislative body for the Indian Empire can satisfy the demand for equitable representation of all races and interests existing in India. The only point worth noticing is the insufficient representation conceded to the Musalmans in paragraph 12 of the Government of India letter. According to this 2 Muhammadans will be nominated and 2 elected. There is a possibility of two or more Mussalmans being returned for the Punjab and Eastern Bengal, wherewith ends all chance of any more Muhammadan being either nominated or elected to the council. So that altogether, at the utmost, there can be but 6 Muhammadans in a council of 53 members. These figures represent a Muslim proportion which, to say the least, is too small to properly safeguard the interests of a community of 6 crores. I respectfully submit that the number of Muhammadan members should be increased by 2—3 instead of 2 being nominated and 3 instead of 2 being elected, thus securing a specified minimum of 6 and a probable total of 8 Muslim councillors. As it is essential to retain the official majority, I would have the figure for the officials increased also by 2, which would necessitate the raising of the total strength of the council from 53 to 57. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that a council of 57 will not at all be an unwieldy one.

5. (4) The proposal is commendable, and one of the best ways of securing proper representation for the various provinces in the Imperial Council is to concede the privilege of election to the Provincial Councils, as proposed in paragraph 13 of the Government of India letter.

6. (5) I thoroughly approve of the proposal to select one of the great land-owners of the Punjab to the Imperial Council, and recommend that his selection should be left with a special electorate of land-owners. The electorate should consist of all land-owners who pay as land revenue Rs. 5,000 a year or more and who should choose their representative by direct election. It is not desirable to raise the qualification for membership of the electorate higher than is suggested herein, as the number of those paying at least Rs. 5,000 is by no means very large.

7. (7) I am in agreement with the principle underlying the proposal; but am anxious, as explained above, that the number of seats specifically set apart for the Muhammadans should be increased from 4 to 6. Of the suggested 6, 3 should be nominated and 3 elected; the election to be in the hands of a special electorate. This electorate should comprise Muhammadan non-official members of the Provincial Council, Muhammadan Fellows of the local University, Muhammadans paying income-tax on an annual income of Rs. 25,000 or having corresponding status if paying land revenue, and registered Muhammadan graduates of not less than 10 years' standing. Of course the number open to election being only three for the whole country, elections will naturally take place in the various provinces by rotation, more than one province to be grouped together for uniformity and convenience.

8. IV. (7) The Punjab Provincial Council.—I would strongly urge an increase in the present number of the members of the Punjab Council from 10 to 20. This is essential to keep pace with other provinces and with the general progress of the country. The aim should be not to allow the strength of the Punjab Council to fall below that of any other Provincial Council. Should this equality be inadvisable, the proposal of having 20 councillors for the Punjab (in addition to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor) is fully justified by the circumstances of this province. These 20 I would divide into 11 official and 9 non-official members, and further sub-divide the latter into 5 Muhammadans, 3 Hindus, and 1 Indian Christian. The overwhelming preponderance of Mussalmans in the population of the Punjab gives them an undisputed claim for special consideration; which is further enhanced by their historic and political importance. In view of their numbers, past traditions, and present importance it is, I am convinced, not too much to ask for five seats, out of a total of nine, being set aside for Muhammadans in the Punjab. For the purposes of this allotment, as is ordinarily done in most other things, the Sikhs should come under the category of Hindus whose section they are.

9. (8) I would neither do away with the present system of nomination altogether, nor oppose the introduction of the elective method. We are not so advanced or public-spirited as to be able to dispense with the system of nomination without detriment to the public interest; while the conditions of life in India are not favourable to the adoption of the elective system to the exclusion of nomination. A compromise between the two would be the best method suited to a country with the history and conditions of India. A few seats might be thrown open to election and the rest—the larger number—filled by nomination. It seems to me that all wants will be adequately met if 2 Muhammadans, 1 Hindu, and 1 Indian Christian are appointed by election.

10. (9) I would, as specified above, advocate a rule fixing the proportion of seats to be allotted to each community, i.e., class as determined by religion. Religion is the most prominent ground of difference in this country, especially in the Punjab; and it will be sufficient if the number of seats for each community were fixed definitely. But if allotment of seats is to be based on class distinction also, within each religious community, the claims of the agriculturists should not be ignored. They form a very important element of the population; and as their needs have not been hitherto properly studied, it would be wise to effect a change in this respect.

11. (10) The system of election should be introduced gradually and special electorates formed. District and municipal boards, until their constitutions be radically changed, do not deserve the right of election being conferred upon them. As yet they are exotics in Indian soil, and it would make matters worse if the franchise were conferred upon them. Instead, I think, it will be in the best interests of Government, as well as all classes of the public, to form special electorates of the various communities and to concede to them the privilege of election. The electorates may consist of (a) all those who pay a certain amount of land revenue (e.g., Rs. 500 a year), (b) all those who pay income-tax on a specified yearly income (e.g., Rs. 3,000), and (c) all registered graduates of the local University of some years' standing (e.g., 7 years).

12. (11) I favour the separate representation of classes only in so far as they are differentiated from one another by religion. But, considering the intrinsic importance of district and municipal boards and also the possibility of their eventually helping in the determination of the constitution of the Provincial Legislative Council, and thus indirectly of the Imperial Legislative Council, I would emphasise the necessity for thoroughly everhauling the district and municipal boards. The most important improvement that can be effected in their constitution is to fix the number of seats to be allotted to the various communities and to allow their members to elect the representatives of their communities separately.
