the amendment which I then handed over to the Secretary of the Assembly, and if I am permitted to move it even at this stage by the Chair as well as by the Government, I think all difficulty will be avoided and the clause as then passed will have the effect of having everything that the Government wants.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, I stand aghast at the attitude adopted by the Honourable Sir Moncrieff Smith. What is it, Sir, that this Assembly has done to merit the covert rebuke which he has administered to it? He is going to appeal to a more reasonable Assembly! Sir, what is his complaint? His complaint is that this House adopted clause 162 as proposed by Government. Clause (1) of section 162; if Honourable Members will turn to page 12 they will find, has been adopted to its fullest extent by this House; I mean clause 33—section 162, clause (1). There was an attempt made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Pantulu Garu, to amend it. That attempt failed. So, the clause now accepted by the House is the very one proposed by Government. If he has any reason to be dissatisfied with anybody, he has reason to be dissatisfied with himself and his colleagues on the Treasury Bench. It is they that proposed this clause and this House had the good sense to accept the reasonable proposal made by the Government. Now, therefore, I do not see what the charge against this House is, that he should hold out this threat that he is going to another House, a more reasonable House,—a House in a more reasonable mood or more reasonable House, whatever it may be. Again turning to the proviso what is the crime, Sir, which this Assembly has committed? All that this Assembly has done is, it has modified the proviso as introduced by the Government. That is to say, we have provided that the accused should not be tried in the dark, that the accused should not be convicted on perjured evidence and that the prosecution should not hold up its sleeve former contradictory statements made by witnesses. The prosecution at a particular stage puts forward a witness as a witness to truth. The accused is given the right to inspect former statements made by that witness. Have we committed a very grave sin in giving that opportunity to the accused person who stands to lose his liberty and probably his life, because we give him an opportunity to inspect the previous statement made by a witness in the box? Certainly, I do not think any House, if it has any reason behind it, if it has any reason in its head, would object to such a clause, to such a power being given to the accused person when he is on his defence for his liberty and for his life. Sir, we are threatened with all sorts of horrors, all this arises out of the imaginary fear that the witness might have spoken not only to the particular case under investigation but to other cases—and this happens in very rare cases. That can be avoided by other methods. Why? Instructions can be given to police officers if really you are going to get a witness who will go about telling other stories than the story connected with the particular case then under investigation, to put those statements down not in the particular statement, but in their diaries, in which case it will be safe from inspection by the accused. Not only that. The Court has ample power always to instruct the pleader who appears—pleaders are officers of Courts—"you are not to use such and such portions because they do not relate to the accused." I suppose you can trust the pleader with a sense of responsibility. I suppose pleaders are amenable to the disciplinary jurisdiction of the Courts. I have known cases where the most confidential papers are handed over to Counsel for accused because they are trusted and they ought to be trusted. In any administration, in any civilised administration pleaders should be trusted. Therefore, I do not think any real serious risk is taken. The risk that there might be statements relating to other matters may be avoided by the policeman not recording it in the particular record, but in his diary and Government can certainly give instructions to that effect to the police officers. Even otherwise, the Court, if the accused is defended by a pleader, can trust the pleader to use his discretion in the matter. It is not every matter which is introduced in a Court which is made public. Is there not power in the Court to say, if it is really such a serious case where the witness has disclosed facts which are going to affect the public interests or the interests of the State or the safety of the State—the Court is not powerless to hold the hearing in camera and not allow it to be published? Therefore, there are ways by which these imaginary fears can be safeguarded. Such being the case, this House has done but bare justice to the accused. This is a thing in which the people of this country have been agitating for a long time, namely, that this sort of secret trial, the policeman holding up in his sleeve certain statements given by a witness and not being at liberty to disclose them to the accused person who is on his trial, is a grave reflection upon the administration of criminal justice in this country. I am glad that this House has risen to the occasion and removed that reproach from that administration. Rather than being sorry for it, I hope the Government will be glad that they are, at any rate, at the last moment doing justice to the accused persons who are on their trial.

Mr. President: Do I understand the Honourable Member from Karachi to move his amendment?

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: If I am permitted to do so.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In the proviso in clause 33 after the words 'Indian Evidence Act, 1872' add the words 'unless for special reasons to be recorded the Magistrate deems it inexpedient to grant a copy when he shall refuse to do so'."

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I ask for a ruling from you, Sir, whether this amendment should not be taken to have been vetoed when it was not moved on the last occasion? It was on the paper but it was not moved.

Dr. H. S. Gour: The amendment now proposed to be moved will be inconsistent with the amendment already carried by the House.

Mr. President: The amendment was handed at the table in manuscript, and as far as I know it was never on the amendment paper.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: If I remember aright, the Honourable Member had handed it over to the Chair. He says he handed it to the Secretary of the Assembly who must have handed it over to the Chair, and I take it from the fact that he did not move it or press it that it was given up.

Mr. President: It was never moved. It was certainly not put from the Chair and the question could not come before the House until it was put from the Chair on a motion moved.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: If I understand aright, the position was this. Mr. Hussanally had not sent in his amendment in proper time. He had brought it later on and objection was taken on the Government side that it was not in proper time and therefore it should not be allowed to be moved. That is what, if I am right, took place. In those circumstances it was not pressed. Therefore, not having been allowed to move it as it was not in proper time, is it now open to the Honourable Member to move it again? A number of amendments in that way were rejected.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): My own recollection of the case is this. In the course of a speech my Honourable friend, Mr. Hussanally, made a suggestion that if an amendment of this kind were embodied the amended clause might be acceptable to the Government, but no such amendment was moved by him, until at the end he said, "I am prepared to move," and then the Government I think said, "Well, it can be left to another occasion."

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I think Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas has correctly pointed out what happened on the last occasion.

Mr. President: The Official Report gives no indication whatsoever that the Honourable Member from Karachi moved any motion at all. The words with which he brought his speech to a close were:

"I would, therefore, Sir, with your permission suggest a sort of compromise between the two parties."

That is a long way from moving an amendment. Again it says:

"A compromise of this kind would suit both sides, and ought to be accepted by the Government as well as by my friends on this side."

Presumably, he threw out the idea in order to see whether it would catch on, and apparently it did not catch on. The Honourable Member is perfectly entitled to move the amendment now.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: We have had no notice of this amendment and I take objection to its being moved now. If you allow it, it is another matter.

Mr. President: As the Honourable Member has just been pointing out, though formal notice has not been given, he has known the substance of the amendment since the 31st of January. The amendment is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: So far as I am concerned, I have nothing more to add to what I have already said.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): May I ask that the amendment may be read out again as we have not got copies of it?

Mr. President: "In the proviso in clause 33 insert after the words 'Indian Evidence Act, 1872' the words 'unless for special reasons to be recorded the Magistrate deems it inexpedient to grant a copy when he shall refuse to do so'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 33, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. P. B. Haigh (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I wish to refer to the speech just made on the general clause 33 by Mr. Rangachariar. I fear, Sir, that on this occasion in the opening part of his speech Mr. Rangachariar has departed from his usual fairness. He asked with indignation and scorn why the Government found fault with the Honourable Members sitting round Mr. Rangachariar because they had opposed clause 33 which was drafted by Government. Sir, I think we may complain that that is a merely debating point. Clause 33, if Honourable Members will refer to page 21, includes the whole of section 162, that is printed in italics.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I said 162 (1) in clause 33. My wording was very exact.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: What difference does that make? Mr. Rangachariar spoke scornfully of Government because they complained that Honourable Members had passed clause 162 (1). 162 (1) contains a proviso. I ask the House to direct its attention to the exact wording. "No statement made by any person to a police officer, etc., shall be used for any purpose save as hereinafter provided." Then follows the proviso: "Provided that it may be used in particular circumstances therein detailed." That proviso has been cut out entirely by the amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The proviso is there.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: That proviso has been entirely changed in character by the amendment passed the other day and the first part of section 162 (1) is therefore rendered entirely meaningless. That is why Government justly object to having the clause passed as it has now been amended.

I wish to pass on to Mr. Rangachariar's general review of the position that has now been created by the amendment that was passed the other day. I would ask the House to remember that if a police officer is making a careful investigation of a case, then, in order to aid his own memory, in order that he may know exactly what every witness has said, he must if he is to do his work thoroughly in a difficult case take down the statements of important witnesses, and these statements cannot at that stage of investigation be expected to contain only matters that are strictly relevant to the inquiry and to the case as it will appear against the accused who is perhaps at this moment unknown. If the clause is passed, those statements must now be placed in toto in the hands of an accused person as soon as a witness who made them goes into the box. They will fall into the hands of the accused and he will thereby be possessed of all the information that was given by that witness to the police officer in the course of the inquiry whether it refers to the particular accused present, who is now in the box, or to other persons who have perhaps no connection with the crime or to persons who may be supposed to have had connection with the crime and are not yet detected or apprehended. All these things are to go into the hands of the accused. But Mr. Rangachariar says this can be easily cured. Why do not the superior officers of police and executive officers give instructions to their investigating officers, inspectors and sub-inspectors, only to take down the statements in a proper manner? Now, Sir, I am surprised that a lawyer of experience like the Honourable Member should make such a suggestion. It seems to me that he is practically inviting the subordinate investigating officers of police to cook the statements that are going to appear as the statements of the accused. Those statements are not signed by witnesses making the depositions.

[Mr. P. B. Haigh.]

They are not recorded solemnly on oath or in an office with people standing about. They are taken down on bits of paper in village chavadis, under trees, anywhere; and any sort of paper could be produced in those circumstances by the police officer and he could say "This is what the witness said to me and it fits in perfectly with his deposition in Court." A suggestion that instructions of this kind should be issued amounts to inviting subordinate police officers to prepare false statements in order to assist their case. Then there was another suggestion. There is no need, says the Honourable Member, for Government to be alarmed. Surely, he says, the Courts have power to prevent any mischief being done. The court can advise the pleader for the accused that grave public interests are involved, that he must not refer in the course of his speech to certain portions of the statements which he has just been allowed to see, that the matter must be kept entirely concealed. The pleader for the accused is, we are told, an officer of the court. He is subject to discipline. But I ask, what about the accused? The accused is not an officer of the court. The accused is the person who is to see these statements. There is nothing in section 162 about the statements being merely shown to the counsel or pleader for the accused or to an officer of the court. The accused is to see them. It is he who will find out exactly what witnesses have deposed against him or his associates. It is he who will be in a position to know what things have been suggested to the police about persons perhaps not connected with the case at all. Does the Honourable Member seriously suggest that no mischief can be done, that the court has full power, by merely instructing a pleader, to keep the matter confidential, to prevent any mischief being done. The Honourable Member knows perfectly well that if these statements are shown in their entirety to the accused person, there may on occasions be grave risk of injury to innocent persons and injury to the interests of the State. And yet he thinks that all this can be set aside by the mere suggestion that the court has full power to prevent any harm being done. I trust that the House containing as it does so many members of practical judicial experience will not accept an argument of this kind from the Honourable Member.

Finally the suggestion came from the Honourable Member that the court can always get over the matter by holding the case in camera. Sir, I am astounded that such a suggestion should come from the Honourable Member opposite. Even if the case is held in camera what difference does it make. The accused will see all these papers. The accused will be able to disclose the information. The accused will have every power to bring about injury to those who have spoken to the police against him and against his friends. Sir, this is really a serious matter which will gravely hamper the administration of justice and I submit that Government are perfectly justified in stating that as they have failed to persuade this House to reject that amendment, if they cannot persuade the House to reject the whole clause as it stands and restore the old clause, they will take the matter up in another House and safeguard the proper administration of public justice in the manner provided for by the constitution of this country. I trust that the House will reject this clause.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I am afraid the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith has unnecessarily added a tone in the course of this discussion which I strongly deprecate and I do not think my Honourable friend, Mr. Haigh, was even entitled to refer to the powers of another House and to the veiled threat that if this House is not amenable to reason, an appeal will be made to another House to correct its errors. As to this part of the constitution, it was quite unnecessary to remind this House about it. This House must decide this question fearlessly, and undismayed by any threat of correction by any other House or in any other place. I pass on, Sir, to reply to the more material objections raised by the Honourable Members. The Honourable Mr. Haigh saw daggers in the air, he told us that it will be a monstrous thing if statements recorded by the police officer in the course of an investigation were revealed to the accused, because those statements may contain other statements highly prejudicial to the interests of the State and which it would be therefore prejudicial to disclose to the accused. I am perfectly certain that the Honourable speaker was not unaware of the provisions of the Act of 1882, the old Criminal Procedure Code, which preceded the present enactment of 1898. What was the practice then? And how far was the safety of the State imperilled by the statements which were then available to the accused, and copies of which were delivered to him? Can my friends on the other side cite a single example that during these long years the statements taken by the police officer and made available to the accused ran the risk of which the Treasury Benches complain and of which their supporters, including the Honourable Member from Bombay, complain? That, I submit, is a short answer to the fears and apprehensions on the part of the Government Benches. I go further and say—you try the accused, the police officer has made an investigation into his case, the first statements of the witnesses have been taken down by him, these are the statements upon which the accused has been brought up on his trial. These statements have been subsequently improved upon or added to. The accused sees the statements made before the Court, and demands that contradictory statements made by the witnesses before the police should be made available to him so that his previous statements to the police be used to contradict him. Such a procedure is not only allowable by law but is directly contemplated in certain sections of the Indian Evidence Act which lays down that a witness may be contradicted with reference to his previous statements. His previous statements are there. The law allows that a witness may be contradicted with reference to his previous statements. What is the answer of the Government when they refuse the accused the permission to refer to statements which the law allows and which is a legitimate subject for cross-examination? It cannot be denied that witnesses in the course of the trial, as the case develops, keep on changing their statements. I do not say it is an invariable practice, but I do say that in many cases the true test and sometimes the sole test available to the accused is that the witness has gone back upon his previous statement which he made to the police and which he has since exaggerated for purposes best known to himself. If the Treasury Benches refuse to give copies of these statements, I ask them how is the accused to challenge the credibility of witnesses tendered by the prosecution? We are told that the Magistrate will look into it. I am sure, Sir, my friend, the Honourable Mr. Haigh, was present in the House when I pointed out, and it was also pointed out by the Honourable Sir Henry Stanyon, that the Magistrate cannot be, and is not, the proper person to act as the accused's cross-examining counsel. The Magistrate's duty is to hold the balance even, and to leave the prosecution and accused to conduct their case in the best way they can. To say that the Magistrate or the Court is entitled to refer to these statements, as is embodied in the provision now before the House, but not bound to give a copy of these statements to the accused, is to say that the Court has to find out what is in the mind of the accused and to do work which is the legitimate work of the accused's counsel. How is the Court to know upon what points the counsel for the accused is going to cross-examine these witnesses? What is his defence, and for what purposes he wishes to use the statements of these witnesses made to the police in the course of the investigation? These are all matters of very serious importance, and those who have practised at the bar or presided on the Bench know too well that the provision, the existing provision, namely, that the Court shall refer to the statement, is wholly inadequate, and in many cases wholly illusory to protect the accused. I submit, therefore, that on the last occasion this House by a very large majority (A Voice: "Only by two")—then at any rate by a much larger majority on this occasion, should decide that it would be in the interests of justice as also in the interests of the accused, and it would be, as Mr. Rangachariar rightly pointed out, in consonance with consistency, that these statements should be made available to the accused. After all, we are making no innovation. We are after all treading upon the old beaten ground; we are going back to the old practice; the innovation introduced by the Amending Act of 1898 has been found to be inadequate and insufficient in practice. Consequently we are going back to the old law, and I do not think that there need be any apprehension on the part of the Members of the Government or anybody speaking on behalf of the Government that there is likely to be any danger to the State, or that the prosecution would fail in cases where they do not deserve to fail. I therefore submit, Sir, that the amendment which we accepted on the last occasion and which was endorsed by the vote of this House ought to be reaffirmed on this occasion.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I desire to object to the statements which have been made by two Honourable Members of this House to the effect that my Honourable friend Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith used a threat. My Honourable friend merely said, what is a fact, that Government propose to use all their constitutional powers in putting this clause straight. That, Sir, is by no means a threat and I think it was quite a misnomer to say it was a threat. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "Was it intimidation?") My Honourable friend Dr. Gour refers once again to the Code of 1882. I stated on January 31st and I repeat now that we are not going back to the Code of 1882 by the proposal in the Bill. We are going to an entirely different position. The Code of 1882 did not, as my Honourable friend says, allow inspection of the whole of these statements to the accused person. I read out the provisions of section 162 on that occasion and there is not the least doubt about it that my Honourable friend's statement is in this respect incorrect. We are dealing, Sir, with a proposal to allow inspection of the whole of these statements to the accused. That, Sir, my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar thinks may be harmful in a few isolated cases. I say, Sir, that it will be harmful in almost all the cases which are under investigation in this country. There is practically no case, Sir, in which these statements do not include information as to the sources of police information, and it is quite impossible, Sir, for any Government without grave anxiety to allow such a clause as this to be enacted. I would now merely remind the House that they are proposing to do something which is not done in any country in the world.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, may I ask the Honourable Member to read the provisions of section 162 in the Code of 1882: we have not got that Code before us

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Section 162 of the Code of 1882 runs as follows:

"No statement other than a dying declaration made by any person to a police officer in the course of an investigation under this chapter shall, if reduced to writing, be signed by the person making it or be used as evidence against the accused."

My Honourable friend Dr. Gour says we are going back to the law as embodied in that clause. He knows quite well that we are doing nothing of the sort.

Dr. H. S. Gour: If my Honourable friend is prepared to reproduce that section 162 we are prepared to accept it now.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, the point in dispute seems to me to be very simple and I am afraid a good many things have been said which do not pertain to the matter in dispute. We are all agreed that statements made by a witness to a police officer relating to an accused person who is under trial before the Court ought to be shown to that accused person. Up to this point there is not much dispute. (A Voice: "A lot of dispute.") We have reached that stage. The danger which is now pointed out is that in the statement recorded by a police officer there may be matters relating to other persons who are not before the court. That is to say, a witness may give information to the police about matters in connection with people other than those before the court, and the objection is taken that matters relating to such persons ought not to be shown to the accused. A simple remedy for that is that a police officer should take care not to jumble up together matters connected with different people in one statement. Mr. Haigh said how is it possible for him not to mix up things; when a man makes a statement he may refer to several people. He added that it might end in police officers dressing up their statements or something like that. What I say is that a police officer before he takes down a witness's statement in writing naturally finds out orally what that witness can testify to. A policeman does not begin to write at once as soon as a witness begins to speak. He finds out the whole story first and then decides whether it is worth recording. That, I suppose, is admitted. A policeman is not a writing machine or a recording machine. He first examines a witness, finds out from him all the matters that he can speak of and then begins to write out his statement. Well, then, accepting the clause as passed by the Assembly, what the police officer has to do is to write out under separate heads the information which he knows he is going to get from witnesses. It will not be difficult to separate the details relating to one accused from those relating to another or to a person who is not involved in his inquiry. As I have said on another occasion, this will only make the policeman more careful and systematic in taking down these statements. And after all, statements which deal with a number of people are not of frequent occurrence. The cases about which so much anxiety is displayed by the Government Benches are not of frequent occurrence. It is only in rare cases, as those relating to a dacoit gang or in which a large number of people have conspired to commit an offence, in which there may be a witness who has been acquainted with the secrets of the gang or of the conspiracy—it is only in such cases that statements of an involved and complex character will be made. And these are very rare cases. In order to give a sort of protection in these rare cases, I do not think that the law should be altered so as to put in the hands of Magistrates the power to refuse or to exercise their discretion and then refuse inspection or a copy of statements of witnesses in ordinary cases. There is no use in the Government magnifying the dangers and difficulties. I am afraid for some reason or another, they have not taken a right perspective of this amendment. They have unnecessarily worked themselves up into a feeling that the whole administration of justice will crumble up and the State will be in grave danger if the accused are allowed inspection of these statements. What has been irregularly done, what has been done at great cost and what has been able to be done by wealthy people at the expenditure of a considerable sum of money, we ask now let it be the right of the poorest man as well to know what has been said by a witness. The importance of these previous statements has been referred to and I wish also to refer to it. A man says a certain rambling statement, almost amounting to hearsay, almost amounting to what he has heard, almost amounting to rumour, which is down in the record made by the policeman. But when he comes to Court to give evidence before a Magistrate some days afterwards, he gives a cut and dried, neat story, omitting all those things which would make it amount to hearsay or rumour and makes it straight and definite, in which case it is of great importance to the accused person to show up that witness and make the Court understand that this man has substantially improved his story and therefore he is not a reliable witness. And I am afraid any opposition to that course would simply make us believe that the Government is interested, as is the common repute, in getting persons accused of offences by hook or by crook, and, therefore, I deprecate very much the unnecessary anxiety and what has been styled to be a threat or the exposition of constitution under which we are working, that this section is the section on which the Government has pinned its faith and has staked its reputation.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, we the non-official Members on this side of the House expect, and constantly receive—perhaps not as often as we should like, but still frequently—consideration from the Government of propositions which we submit for the opinion of this House, and I feel sure that I voice the sentiments on this side of the House when I say that we regard ourselves bound to give reasonable consideration and re-consideration to propositions put forward on behalf of Government against views which we may entertain. We have, on a former occasion, adopted an amendment of clause 33 which the Government claim to be unworkable. I have already said that though more than one speaker has denounced this Resolution as unworkable, we have not yet had any detailed description of how it would be unworkable. Nevertheless, speaking for myself, I accept the absolute good faith of the objection put forward to our Resolution by Government. It seems to me—and I think in this matter I voice the sentiments of those with whom I have agreed on this clause—that the object of both parties in this controversy is the same, namely, the securing of a fair trial. We do not want on this side to give undue favour and advantage over the prosecution to the accused; and I think—indeed it is my own conviction—that Government do not wish to give undue advantage over the accused to the prosecution. The object of both parties to the controversy being the same, it does seem to be anomalous that we should not be able to arrive at an agreement on this particular clause. We claim that the statements made to the Police by persons who afterwards come up as witnesses in support of a prosecution should be made known to the accused. It has been said, though not directly from the Treasury Benches, that one difficulty of the proposal which was accepted in this House with regard to this proviso will be to give accused persons access to everything, relevant to the case or irrelevant, and matter which it may be of great interest in the administration of justice to keep unpublished. Some suggestions have been put forward as to how an accused can be prevented from obtaining information of anything except that which is relevant to the accusation against him. But these are matters of detail. They require very careful working out. I quite accept what the Honourable Mr. Haigh said, namely, that the record made by an investigating officer should be complete and not abridged, or I think he used the word "cooked". But it does seem possible, if the proviso so far accepted by the House goes too far and creates difficulties in the way, not of the prosecution but of the administration of justice generally,—the public interest,—for some modified form of that proviso, acceptable to both parties, to be devised. I am not prepared with any amendment. The subject is too difficult and I think beyond my capacity. But so long as we are given this principle (in accordance with, as Dr. Gour pointed out, the principles underlying our law of evidence) that whatever a witness states immediately after an offence is committed should be open to comparison with what he may say when he comes into Court, so long as that principle is ensured and the relevant part of his statement is made public for treatment and comparison, we on this side will be satisfied. This is urged not merely in the interests of the accused. In the present law we allow the court to aid itself with these statements. How many a prosecution has broken down because a witness is found by the Judge to have said at the investigation something different from what he said at the trial, and the Judge has not got before him any explanation from the witness, which, if he had been able to obtain it, might have entirely altered his view of the man's credibility. It is fair to the witness, it is fair to the prosecution, it is fair to the accused, it is fair to the Magistrate, that the true cause underlying the discrepancies in statements, e.g., either the original falsehood of the witness due to his desire to screen the accused or avoid trouble, or the subsequent falsehood of the witness, due to his desire to aid the prosecution,—should be laid open to the light of day in order that truth and justice may prevail. The suggestion that I have to make is that if any amendment of this proviso can be made which will do away with the difficulties and dangers which the Government apprehend and still leave this one principle available, namely, that conflicting and contradictory statements shall be open to comparison and explanation, then it will be possible to reach an agreement on a matter that most certainly should be settled, if possible, in this House.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Sir, at the very outset, I must say that we accept the statement from the Government Benches that the remarks of Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith were not intended to be a threat. We may also accept the statement made by Mr. Tonkinson that the old Criminal Procedure Code of 1892 in its provisions in section 162 did not go to the length stated by Dr. Gour. But what we are concerned with is, not what the old law was, or what the law of 1898 was, but whether the law as it is now going to be proposed should be acceptable and is in the interests of justice or not. Therefore we should strip the controversy of all the verbiage with which it has been surrounded and confine our attention to the merits or demerits of the provision now under discussion. It will be sheer waste of time on my part to repeat the arguments that have been from time to time advanced in favour of accused having access to the statements made before the police, and also what has been said against it. But I would remind the House to be practical men and to confine themselves to the facts and truth of the case and not to be taken off their feet or dragged by their heels by somebody conjuring up visions of horror, or declaring that Government would become impossible, justice would be impossible and so on. They might as well state there might be a revolution or an earthquake. They must show that and not merely give their ipse dixit. Much stress has been laid by speaker after speaker on the Government side on the statement that there is a good deal in the police records which it would be entirely unnecessary for the accused to know and dangerous for the accused to know. Now I have been wondering in my own mind as to why this should be so, and speaking personally, after having 37 years' experience as a practitioner, I certainly have never come across a case in which the police statement contained anything which was irrelevant to the inquiry, nor have I heard from any other practitioners in my own part of the country, or in any other part of the country that police statements contain so many other things. And why should they? A policeman can be credited with at least as much sense as to know whether what the witness is saying is relevant to the inquiry and to the persons who are accused of the offence. If he is not sensible enough to know that, then he does not deserve to be appointed to his post. He must be chucked out at once. If he can be credited with doing his duty properly, he should confine the record only to what is relevant to the case. As Sir Henry Stanyon said, we have great faith in the bona fides of the Government but we want to point out to them that their fears and apprehensions are greatly exaggerated, and that in fact they will not exist. Mr. Haigh said, Oh, Mr. Rangachariar's proposal to give instructions to police officers who are recording statements would be impracticable and would lead to the cooking up of statements by the police officers. Why? I do not see the force of that argument at all. Policemen already have instructions from higher authority as to how they are to record their statements. Is it not now the practice that the police have certain challans and other forms in which they receive instructions from their superior officers as to how to record evidence, statements and so on, and how to keep their diaries? Well, there is nothing wrong and improper in the policeman being instructed to confine the record entirely to statements that are relevant to the inquiry. Now, no speaker from the Government side has challenged the propriety of the argument that if the statements recorded by the police are confined to relevant matter, in justice the accused person is entitled to have a copy of those statements. The objection that has come from the side of the Government is to matters that go beyond the case coming to the notice of the accused to the prejudice of the State and to the prejudice of other persons. As I have said, that is a very small matter, and with due deference to the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, who says these things happen very frequently, I would say that his fears are imaginary, and such contingencies will not occur frequently. They would occur perhaps in one in a thousand cases. And you are not going to take account of exceptions; you are going to see what would lead to doing justice to the accused person as well as to the prosecution. As Sir Henry Stanyon has pointed out, in some cases the production of these statements might be very beneficial to the prosecution itself because it may appear that the witness whose statement is impeached by the defence pleader in the court, has said the same thing before the police, and the prosecution would receive help from that. They would point out that this man said the same thing before the police as he is saying now. So it is not in the interests of the accused person only but of the prosecution also to retain the clause. I said before that we should not conjure up visions of horror because of statements made by some speakers, but we should closely examine the merits and demerits and the facts of the situation. Therefore I submit, Sir, that there is not the slightest change of harm arising from the retention of this clause 33. I also said that the Government were perfectly justified in stating that they would adopt all the constitutional means in their power by going to the next Chamber. There was no threat in that; nothing improper in that, because they had to instruct their supporters that they should strongly vote on their side. But at the same time, I say that, whatever the Government may do constitutionally, so far as we Members of this Assembly are concerned, we find that the Government position in this particular matter is not sound but that our position is sound and that clause 33 should stand and should not be rejected.

Mr. B. C. Allen (Assam : Nominated Official): Sir, I am very reluctant to take up the time of the House even for two minutes in further discussing this much disputed clause. But Mr. Vishindas has asked a question to which I think an answer should be given. He has asked: Why do Government object to the clause as now amended? What objection is there to it? The answer is a very simple one. A police officer, when he goes into the interior to investigate a theft case, a dacoity case, a burglary case, records the evidence that is brought before him and frequently he finds that the statements of a witness give valuable evidence not only with regard to the case which he is investigating but also with regard to a number of cognate cases. For we all of us here know that in this country crime is frequently committed by gangs of criminals and that the detection of one crime leads to the detection of many. Now, if the clause as amended is passed into law, it would mean that the police officer, if he was compelled to prosecute the man he was originally pursuing before the detection of the other cases was completed, would be required, as soon as the accused was placed in the dock and as soon as he brought forward his witness, to make over to him a statement containing valuable information not only with regard to the case then under the consideration of the Magistrate but also the information culled to completely wreck his prospects of success in the various other linked and cognate cases. I hope, Sir, that the House will agree that this is so grave an objection that Government is justified in protesting against its being passed into law.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, much as I should have liked that some amicable settlement should have been arrived at with regard to this clause, I find that it is not possible. I suggested in the course of the discussion at an earlier stage that the word "may" might be used for "shall" so that the matter might be left to the discretion of the Court. Sir, my experience of Judges differs from the experience of some of my friends on my right who have a different experience of mofussil Magistrates. They say that Magistrates would interpret "may" absolutely arbitrarily. But, I believe, Judges with a judicial turn of mind would interpret "may" as almost "shall." Judges who have a keen sense of justice and responsibility interpret the discretion given to them as a discretion to be exercised in the interests of justice. That is the proper judicial temperament. But, as my friends say that Magistrates in the mofussil do not exercise their discretion in that way, of course, I cannot persuade them to accept what I suggested at that time. I do not, however, share the apprehensions that the Government Members do in this respect. Of course, I do not practise now, but from whatever limited practice I had in the courts, of old, I found that the police papers always came up with instructions. The defence got it somehow. So, what is now provided for in the section will only deprive the police of their illicit gain. But, in other respects, I wish to point out to the Government Benches that there are two diaries kept—one a general diary; in this the police Inspector, i.e., the Inspector in charge of the case, records the minutes of his visits to different places, his investigations and inquiries. Then there is another diary kept which is called the case diary or a special diary. In this he puts down the statements of persons he examines in that particular case. So I suggest that my Honourable friends in charge of the Bill need not go to the other Chamber to have this section amended and create any conflict with us—that would be very undesirable—when there is a more reasonable course open to them. What they need to do is that the executive should give instructions to the police officers to keep their diaries properly. That is, in the case diary they may enter the persons examined and in the general diary enter all miscellaneous matters with regard to their investigations, with regard to their suspicions, with regard to the persons suspected in this and other cognate cases. Thus if proper instructions are given, which it is the legitimate function of the Executive to give, to the police officers through the Inspectors General of Police in the provinces, they will avoid any failure of justice, or any prejudices so far as either the prosecution is concerned or the defence or third parties concerned. I, therefore, submit that there is no occasion for generating so much heat over this discussion, if the matter may be so easily settled by means of official and executive instructions to the police to keep their diaries properly.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): Sir, I am not a lawyer and I have not tried a case for the last ten years. I had nothing whatever to do with the framing of this Bill. And I confess that I had not taken much interest in the debates on this clause until this morning. But, Sir, I had a fairly large amount to do in the way of trying criminal cases during the first fifteen years of my service in districts which were considered fairly criminal and I have been very seriously impressed, after what I have listened to this morning, with the difficulties that Magistrates and the police in districts in the country will encounter if this clause as it has now been passed becomes law. My Honourable friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, has suggested that the difficulties will not be at all serious, that Government can give instructions to police officers to prepare their special diaries with special reference to this clause. I think, Sir, any such course would be fraught with the most serious dangers. My Honourable friend, Mr. Haigh, has already referred to these dangers. I do not know whether Honourable Members here have as much acquaintance with the ordinary sub-inspector of police as I have. As I have said, for fifteen years I was a Magistrate, either a District Magistrate or a subordinate Magistrate. For another five or six years I went about the villages in an entirely different capacity and I saw a good deal of the Magisterial and the police officers' work as an outsider. And I think, Sir, it would be most dangerous to give any instructions to the police to have these special diaries prepared in the way that the Honourable Mr. Chaudhuri and my friend, Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, have suggested. I think it would be extremely unfair to the accused themselves if the police prepare their special diaries according to definite instructions given by the superior officers so as to exclude all matters which are not connected in a direct manner with the case in question. I think, Sir, that the Magistrate then will be prevented from having a true perspective of the entire investigation.

1 P.M. I think the Magistrate will be placed in an extremely difficult position. He will not be able to arrive at a correct conclusion as to whether the investigation was conducted in a proper and bonâ fide manner. The whole investigation, the whole proceedings as they will come before the Magistrate, will really be in a cooked form. In the interests of the accused themselves, Sir, I deprecate the amendment that has already been passed. I hope, Sir, that this appeal that I am making to the Members of this House will have some effect. I am not doing so as a member of Government. I am doing so as one who has always been interested in protecting the interests of the accused and in seeing that justice is done.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (and some Honourable Members at the same time): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 33, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Title was added to the Bill.

The Preamble was added to the Bill.

THE INDIAN OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL.

Mr. L. Graham (Legislative Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I rise to move:

Sir, I have many reasons for craving the indulgence of this House, but I shall not trouble the House with many of those reasons. My first reason, Sir, is that I claim to be a new Member—may I say a very new Member—for I think it is unusual for a new Member to be entrusted with work of this importance in his first attendance in this House. The reason for this is, as you all know, the most regrettable illness of my Honourable Leader, Sir Malcolm Hailey.

Now, Sir, the Bill was, as you know, introduced some time ago in this House, and went, I may say, to a very representative Select Committee. That Select Committee performed its labours most conscientiously. I am in the happy position of testifying to the labours of the Select Committee because I was not a member of that Select Committee. The Report has been before the House for the last fourteen days or so, and certain amendments have been received. I do not propose to refer to those amendments in detail now. The Report I think is a full Report and there is no reason why I should make any lengthy speech now in moving that the Bill be taken into consideration.

Members probably would like to be reminded of the state of our law in this country at present. It is at present contained most inconveniently in the Indian Official Secrets Act, 1889, as subsequently amended by the Act of 1904. It is also contained in the English Official Secrets Act of 1911, and there is a provision in that Act which I think it would not be altogether superfluous if I should read it to the Members. That section runs as follows. (This was enacted in 1911, I may mention):

"If by any law made before or after the passing of this Act by the legislature of any British possession provisions are made which appear to His Majesty to be of the like effect as those contained in this Act, His Majesty may, by Order in Council, suspend the operation within that British possession of this Act, or of any part thereof, so long as that law continues in force there, and no longer."

Now, Sir, possibly Members of this House may desire to have some reason why an English enactment should apply to India, an enactment relating to a matter in which we ourselves have legislated. The reason is this. Our Act of 1889 followed very closely the English Act of the same year or a year before. That Act was found insufficient in England and it was replaced by the Official Secrets Act, 1911. The secrets with which we are concerned are not only secrets affecting India or part of India; they are imperial secrets to a very large extent, and that is the reason, Sir, why legislation on this subject should either be contained within the four corners of one Act applicable throughout the Empire, or that legislation very closely approximating to that legislation should be in force. The Act of 1911 gives the option, "You take this Act or you frame a similar Act." You may ask why we have not remained content with the English Act. With the substance of this Act of 1911 we are content, but certain practical difficulties have arisen in the interpretation—not of the substance of this Act but in applying it to the Courts of this country. Our Courts have different names, our police officers have different names, and it would be convenient if the whole of our law should be expressed in what I may call an Indian form. To be added to that is the fact that the Official Secrets Act, 1911, was amended by the Official Secrets Act of 1920 in England, but the amending Act of 1920 does not apply proprio vigore in this country. The need of applying those provisions has been examined very carefully. They were introduced into the law in England as the direct result of experience gained during the Great War. As I have said, the need for reproducing the provisions of that Act in this country was examined. It was found that some provisions were not necessary; on the other hand it was held that some other provisions were necessary. This Bill, then, represents a combination of the laws in force in this country and in England and it has been, as I have said, very carefully examined by the Select Committee and I now move that the Bill, as amended by the Select Committee, be taken into consideration.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): I have no doubt that the House will generally agree with me when I say that we all regret that the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey, the Leader of the House, is absent to-day and was therefore unable to move the motion which has fallen to the lot of the Honourable Mr. Graham to move before this House. As regards his motion, Sir, we all recognise the desirability of having an enactment of the kind contemplated in this country. But I think it was said by the Honourable Mr. Innes on another occasion with regard to one of his Bills that it was not a slavish imitation of the English statute. May I borrow those words in this connection and say, why is this enactment a slavish imitation of the English statute? I should have expected, Sir, that an enactment of this importance would be taken up by the Indian Legislature by dividing it into two parts, or indeed into two Acts. Honourable Members know that military secrets stand on a different footing from civil secrets and it would have been much more desirable if an Indian Act dealing purely with military secrets were enacted and another Act dealing with civil secrets were introduced. The admixture of military and civil offences in the same Act is apt to cause confusion. It has caused confusion in my mind and I have no doubt that that confusion will be shared by others.

Now, Sir, passing on to the specific provisions of this Act, Honourable Members will find that the real mischief which this enactment is intended to check is that no act should be done which might prove prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. When this clause was debated in Parliament, Honourable Members there questioned Government as to what the meaning of the words 'interests of the State' is and how that question is to be decided in each case. It may be that an act is perfectly innocent and not prejudicial to the interests of the State but became afterwards so prejudicial to it and who is to be the judge, whether the act was prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. Honourable Members will find that very loose expressions of the English statute have been reproduced in the Indian Act. It was a complaint judging from the debates in the two Houses of Parliament that these loose expressions were apt to be misunderstood. In England where all trials are held with the aid of the jury, the jurors as men of commonsense understand these sections as men in the street commonly do. They do not go into the technicalities of the question but decide from the broad standpoint of commonsense, but in this country where trials at present are held without the help of jurors, Magistrates and Judges are apt to examine too narrowly the provisions of the section and apply to them their legal mind, and say that if an offence comes within the purview of a section the accused cannot escape punishment. This is a point of view which I present to the House, especially in view of the fact that while all offences under the English statute are exclusively triable in a Court of Sessions, the offences not punishable with 14 years' imprisonment and mainly those punishable with two years' imprisonment are here made triable by a Magistrate of the first class. I understand, Sir, that in response to my amendment on the subject asking the Government that all offences under this Act should be triable by the Court of Sessions, at any rate in cases in which the accused so desires, members of the Treasury Benches are willing to accept the amendment and concede that offences under this Act might be tried by the Court of Sessions if the accused so desires. I congratulate the Government upon accepting this amendment which would effect a great improvement upon the Bill as presented to the House. There are two or three other matters upon which I invite the attention of the Honourable occupants of the Treasury Benches and ask them to examine the provisions of the Bill and see if improvements cannot be made. If Honourable Members will turn to section 3, they will find that while in clause 1 the offence of spying is generally defined, clause 2 of that section lays down a special rule of evidence at variance with the existing law. Those of my learned friends who have studied the Indian Evidence Act will bear me out that evidence about character is wholly inadmissible in a criminal case, and I therefore invite the attention of the House to the fact that section 3 provides that if on a prosecution for an offence under this section, it is proved from his known character that his purpose was prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State he will be deemed to have committed an offence under this section. I suggest, Sir, that the Government might re-classify these offences, sub-divide the Act into Part I—Military, and Part II—Civil, and re-define the offences in less vague and more popular terms so that the people may know what they are to avoid and for which they are liable to be made punishable. The very general and loose expressions of the Parliament statute which have been reproduced in this Bill are not likely to be understood by the public at large to whom this statute is addressed, and I suggest, Sir, that it would certainly be in keeping with the policy of the Indian Legislature if expressions commonly understood and popularly known are used in preference to the expressions common in Parliamentary statutes. The various improvements which Honourable Members of this House have suggested will no doubt come up for consideration seriatim and I therefore do not wish to anticipate the authors of the amendments. I rest content by saying that I am not enamoured either with the draft or with the arrangement of the Bill and I can only regret that this Bill is a slavish copy of the Parliamentary Statute.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Half Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

MESSAGES FROM THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

Mr. President: Secretary will read two Messages from the Council of State.

Secretary of the Assembly: The first Message runs as follows:

"I am directed to inform you that the Bill further to amend and to consolidate the law relating to the provision of house-accommodation for military officers in cantonments, which was passed by the Legislative Assembly at its meeting of the 30th January, 1923, was passed by the Council of State at its meeting of the 14th February, with the following amendment:

'In sub-clause (2) of clause 24 of the Bill, after the words 'District Magistrate', the words 'on requisition in writing signed by the Chairman of the Committee' were inserted.'

'The Council of State requests the concurrence of the Legislative Assembly in the amendment'."

The second Message runs as follows:

"I am directed to inform you that the Council of State has, at its meeting of the 14th February, 1923, agreed without any amendments to the Bill to provide for the restriction and control of the transport of cotton in certain circumstances, which was passed by the Legislative Assembly at its meeting held on the 30th January, 1923."

THE INDIAN OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to move that the Bill be re-committed to the Select Committee.

Sir, there is no one in the House who is not at one with the Government in their desire to suppress spying in this country. Spying even in its minor form is objected to even in private conversations between private individuals, and it is much more necessary that, where the interests of the State are concerned, where national defence is concerned, where spying would cause a real danger and disaster to the country, spying should be suppressed with a very strong hand; and I would have given my full support to the Bill if proper safeguards had been provided to save the innocent from being brought into the clutches of the law as laid down in this Bill. The language of the Bill is very wide and capable of much abuse in its interpretation. The phraseology is very peculiar and complex, so much so that, just as Dr. Gour observed a few minutes ago, in the House of Lords Lord Birkenhead had to say that he was not enamoured of the phraseology of the Bill. I will just give certain instances in the Bill which will show how dangerous and how capable of wide interpretation certain clauses in this Bill are. This Bill, as drafted, has a peculiar construction in this way, that it does not define at one place all the definitions that should have been defined at the beginning of the Code. Many definitions that are embodied in the Bill involve the definitions of the particular words used therein, and it would be very difficult for a lay man and a man of ordinary intelligence not versed in law, to interpret the terms properly. Sir, if I take you through the definition of spying, through the definition of a work of defence, you will find a word 'mine' used therein. I realize that the word 'mine' used in this connection is meant for the receptacle containing the explosives, etc., to protect the coasts from intrusion of foreign ships or men-of-war. But the word is also capable of interpretation in another way. Honourable Members who have read the papers of the last few days may have realized that even editors of papers have fallen into the common error of interpreting the word "mine" to mean excavations for digging out metals or minerals. I wish that the members of the Committee had cleared the meaning of the word as it was meant in this Bill. Going further ahead, Sir, Honourable Members will find 'spying' defined in section 3 as an offence. It is:

"Any person for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State approaches or enters—and so forth—any prohibited place;"

or

"Any person for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State makes any sketch, plan, model or note."

of what? It has been stated. This clause (b) is not governed by the words "prohibited place" which appear in clause (a). Clause (b) goes on further to say:

"makes any sketch, plan, model or note which is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be directly or indirectly useful to an enemy."

Now what does this come to—"any person who makes any note which might be indirectly useful to an enemy"—this does not say at what time it is likely to be useful. It may be useful 20 years later, who knows.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is arguing a question of detail which will necessarily arise when we come to discuss clause 3. He must offer more general and substantial reasons for a motion to re-commit. He will understand that clause 3 will be open for amendment in order to satisfy the criticisms which he is now bringing forward, but it is a violation of the spirit of the Standing Orders to use the motion for re-committal merely for matters of detail. If he brings forward arguments such as those adduced by Dr. Gour they will be valid.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I simply wanted to point out that there are certain matters in the Bill which are not capable of any improvement on the floor of the House, and with that object I am giving illustrations to show that they could not be improved on the floor of the House. I was simply showing how various expressions are capable of several interpretations in the hands of lay persons. That was my object, Sir.

As I have said, a note made by any person which might be such as to be useful to an enemy some years after might be regarded as spying. Consider the difficulties that will arise. There are census reports of places, there are Government statistics, historical records and maps of many places like Asoka's pillar, the Diwan-i-Khas, the Diwan-i-Am in Delhi and the Fort in Agra. Any person having these things in his possession or publishing these things might at some time or other when a foreign power was evilly-minded enough to make war against our Government be utilized by that foreign power for its own purposes. And if we allow such interpretations to be put on these phrases I think many innocent persons are likely to be hauled up under this Act. Similarly, Sir, what is meant by the safety or the interests of the State? It has not been defined anywhere as to what will be the interests of the State. If you take the dictionary meaning, that will come to anything that is beneficial to the State. Supposing a thing is done and it does not agree with the opinions, or say with the political opinions, of certain parties, that may be regarded as not being beneficial to the State. The question of taking away any political powers from the Government even though in a constitutional way may also be regarded at some time or other as not beneficial to the State. I do not mean to say that this would be the exact interpretation of this expression in the Bill, but I am simply pointing out the interpretation that might be put on this clause. This would lead to much difficulty and much abuse and harassment to innocent persons. I wish the authors of the Bill had given the definition of these clauses at the very beginning of the Bill in clause 2 just as they have done with respect to some expressions. Further they have introduced a novel procedure of presumptions. Any person if he is suspected, mind you suspected, of having a communication with a foreign agent, if he happens to give an impression of his dealing with a foreign agent even unknown, it will be considered as spying. How dangerous will that be, Sir? It is quite all right in theory and in the book. But if you were to take the interpretations that have been given to "communication with foreign agent," you will find that the provisions are very wide and dangerous. What is the communication to a foreign agent? Communication to a foreign agent as defined may be when any person has visited the place of a person suspected to be a foreign agent. Suspected by whom? Not by the man who visits him. His knowledge is made quite immaterial but suspected by the Court; so far it is quite all right; but how is a man to know that the address that he is visiting, is that of a foreign agent? Not only that, Sir. If this man happens to possess any paper or any address of an agent or of any person who is suspected to be a foreign agent, this man is done for. If he has got any historical records or historical statistics or any other railway map that might be of some use at some future time, that man is liable to be hauled up. He will be deemed to have communicated with that man. Now, Sir, even if a foreign agent or a suspected foreign agent has a place of business in British India and if any other man whose known character as proved may cause a suspicion, in the minds of the judges, even innocently happens to go to the place of business of the former to deal in business only such a man will also be presumed to have communicated with a foreign agent. Such are the provisions in this Bill. Further, there is also a provision in this Bill as it has come from the Select Committee that if any person were to publish any information relating to anything used or relating to anything in a place, which is declared to be a prohibited place, that man will be deemed to have committed an offence under this Act; and forts at Agra, Delhi and other places may be declared to be prohibited places and the Frontier Province may be. But, to be a prohibited place. If I were to draw the attention to more serious speaking in this Chamber, that it is not desirable to make the State. Sup-

Mr. President: The Honourable Member's argument about a sketch or communication for his arrest and for

[Mr. President.]

I must point out to the Assembly, however, that supposing this motion were passed, there would be no indication whatever to the Select Committee what this Assembly expected them to do. The words in Standing Order 43 are "that the Bill as reported by the Select Committee be re-committed either:

- (i) without limitation, or
- (ii) with respect to particular clauses," and so on.

The words "without limitation" must be held to presume that this House is dissatisfied with the manner in which the Select Committee has treated the measure which was referred to it. A proposal to re-commit without limitation must necessarily refer either to the work of the Select Committee as a whole, or to some matter of principle on which the Assembly desires an opinion from the Select Committee and on which the Committee did not pronounce. If the Honourable Member is dissatisfied with the proposals made by the Select Committee on particular points—provided they are points of real importance in the sense of raising a principle—then he ought to move a motion under Standing Order 44 (b) (ii) or (iii), and not move, as he has done, to re-commit without limitation. If we were to pass this motion, the Select Committee would meet again and say: "We are satisfied that we did give reasonable consideration to the proposals of the Bill and we are of opinion that no further consideration on our part would lead us to alter the report before the Assembly." We should then be no further on.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, it is exactly with this object that I am pointing out these things because I want the Select Committee to know what is the point we want them to clear up. We want them to know that the wording used in this Bill is not proper

Mr. President: That is not what the Honourable Member has done. The Honourable Member simply moves that the Bill be re-committed, and invites the Select Committee to re-examine the whole Bill without reference to any particular clause or any particular amendment. The Select Committee, with a mere general instruction before them, will sit down and they will say: "We are satisfied that we carried out the original intention of the Assembly; we examined the Bill in detail; the report we have submitted is a satisfactory report and represents our opinion."

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: All right, Sir, I bow to your ruling. I will simply say the wording used is very general and will cover even innocent dealings of innocent persons, and the substantive law and law of evidence have been jumbled up in the clauses and therefore it is necessary that the wordings be changed. It may be said, Sir, that the wording in this Act has been taken from the English Acts of 1911 and 1920, and been considerably improved by the Select Committee. My submission to that would be, Sir, that as they found that an improvement in certain directions on the part of the English Acts was necessary, it may further be regarded as showing how far to improve the wording of this Bill to include certain the hands of it might be said, just as it was said in the English Houses of

As I have said, the Act will not be used in ordinary cases; that it will be useful to an extraordinary circumstances of spying and when a gross Consider the difficulties committed. But one cannot be sure if it will be like there are Government statutes of 1818 was enacted for a different purpose like Asoka's pillar, the date, or rather to last year; it remained as a dead Act in the Statute Book but some of its provisions were used in 1906 or 1909. We do not want, therefore, that an Act should remain on the Statute Book and hang like a sword of Damocles over our heads to be utilised at any future time, and it is necessary that the Select Committee should change the wording, clear up the expressions and bring it to a line where it may be acceptable to all of us. The language should be simple and easily understood even by "the man in the street." With these words, Sir, I commend my motion to the House for the re-committal of this Bill to the Select Committee.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I oppose this motion. I shall for the present only answer very briefly the objection taken by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, and Mr. Agnihotri. Dr. Gour takes the objection that we have slavishly followed the English Act. We have done nothing of the kind. We have reduced the maximum sentence, which in the English Act ranges from minimum 3 to 14 years. For non-military offences we have fixed the maximum at 3, in some cases 2 years and fixed no limit to minimum and given the option of fine. We have classified offences into two classes—minor and major offences, what are called civil offences and offences of a military character. And we have introduced the nomenclature of the Criminal Procedure Code and described them as cognizable and non-cognizable and bailable and non-bailable offences. We have also introduced the nomenclature of our Evidence Act, such as relevant facts, presumption and provided for their rebuttal by evidence. So, as far as these go, I hope Dr. Gour will be satisfied that we have not slavishly followed the Parliamentary Statute but have recast that Statute on the lines of our law of Criminal Procedure and the Law of Evidence.

Now, something has been said about our using the words "safety and interest of the State." I do not wish to go into the details. We shall have every opportunity, when we discuss the clause, to go into the details, but I shall generally point out that we have classified offences into two classes—offences in the nature of spying military secrets and with regard to these we have used the words "safety or interest of the State." I suppose my friend would not contend that we should wait till the spy has done the mischief. It is when he is trying to pry into military secrets, is it not to the interests of the State to arrest him and put him on his trial before a Magistrate or a Judge? But here I shall just draw attention to where we use the word "safety" alone. We may refer to clause 5 (b) which reads: "Use the information in his possession for the benefit of any foreign power or any other manner prejudicial to the safety of the State." This in clause 5 relates to officers communicating information to foreign powers. If they so communicate it and if such communication endangers the safety of the State, then we proceed against him. The persons who are interested are the officers of the State who are in charge of these secrets. If they communicate to others and that endangers the safety of the State, no body will contend that they should not be found guilty of a breach of duty. Here the criterion we put down is rather high and that is that if this communication of the secrets is such as is likely to endanger the safety of the State, then they will be prosecuted and punished. But, with regard to military secrets and secrets palpably of a much more serious nature, we have used the words "safety or interest of the State." Supposing our military defences, mine-fields or mines are being noted or made sketches of by a spy. Before he has noted, obtained a sketch or communicated, ought not we to provide for his detection, for his arrest and for safeguarding the "interests of the State"? If he has taken these away, then he has completed the mischief. But it would, surely, be to the "interest of the State" that we should make provision for safeguarding its interests before it is too late. Even my friend Mr. Agnihotri used the word "interest" in his speech. He said that spies should be put down. He said that he is not in sympathy with them and that spies should be put down "in the interests of the State." So, when he was putting his own case before this House, he himself used the same expression and thus gave away his own case. I do not wish to detain the House any longer, but when we examine the amendments clause by clause, the House will be satisfied that we have made this Bill absolutely innocuous with regard to persons who may act bona fide. As regards the serious offences of persons who try to abstract military secrets or secrets relating to defence which are prejudicial to the "safety or interest of the State," nobody in this House will have the hardihood to say that they deserve any sympathy. For these reasons, Sir, I say that my friend Mr. Agnihotri has made out no case for re-commitment of this Bill to the Committee. We have done our best and as you have very rightly observed, Sir, if the Bill is re-committed to us without any definite directions, we shall not know what to do with it. We would prefer to wait and see if there is any substance in the amendments proposed. I therefore suggest that the discussion of the Bill be proceeded with.

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, I apologise for making what may seem a perfectly superfluous speech, but I think there are one or two points to be made yet. The first is that the Select Committee did examine all the material which was put before it. It may be in the recollection of Members that this Bill was circulated. We examined all the opinions we received. We also took the proceedings in this House. I say, Sir, that we examined very carefully all the material which was put before us. If Mr. Agnihotri wants to take a particular attitude towards the Bill, I fail to understand why he did not express himself at an earlier stage of the proceedings. It is therefore not necessary to take up the points of detail which Mr. Agnihotri has mentioned. One more point, Sir, as to what Dr. Gour has said. He has accused us of slavishly following British drafting. Well, my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, was in the Chair, and I do not think it is likely that he would slavishly follow anybody.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I am not ashamed of slavishly following the English of Englishmen.

Mr. L. Graham: That again is a point which I should like to take. The drafting of this Bill is important. Dr. Gour—whether he intended it or not—I trust he did intend it—paid a compliment to the work of the Legislative Department in saying that he would prefer this Bill drafted on the lines generally followed by the Legislative Department. He said it would have been clearer and more intelligible. Well, Sir, we acknowledge the compliment. But there is this difficulty. We intentionally followed the English form because of the provisions of section 11 of the Act of 1911. We felt that if we broke away from the form of the English Act and put up an Act which looked entirely different—and after all, the Act which Dr. Gour sketched for us would look entirely different—we should not be at all sure that His Majesty in Council would be prepared to suspend the English Act in favour of ours. Other points mentioned by Mr. Agnihotri, as you said, Sir, will be appropriately dealt with when he moves his amendments.

Mr. President: The original question was:

"That the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to assimilate the law in British India relating to official secrets to the law in force in the United Kingdom be taken into consideration."

Since which an amendment has been moved:

"That the Bill as reported by the Select Committee be re-committed to the Select Committee."

The question is that the Bill be so re-committed.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to assimilate the law in British India relating to official secrets to the law in force in the United Kingdom be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: It is suggested that it may be advisable to leave clause 1 for later consideration.

Mr. President: Clause 2.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, the amendment which I move is this:

"In clause 2 (7) after the word 'plate' insert the following:

'Provided these undeveloped plates on being developed are found to be the negatives of plates of prohibited places as defined under this Act.'"

Here photograph includes an undeveloped film or plate, and in (9) we have:

"'sketch' includes any photograph or other mode of representing any place or thing."

Under clause 3 the making of a sketch useful to an enemy is punishable. So, a man who has got photographs which include an undeveloped film can also be held up. Undeveloped films are plates in which the impression of the thing photographed is not visible. I am not a photographer, but I can say this much that unless an undeveloped plate is put in a solution the impression of that plate is not visible. For instance, take a man who stands in front of a place and takes a photograph and goes away. Then he is arrested, and found in possession of that undeveloped film. Unless that film corresponds with the negative, I do not think he should be held up at all. So, in order to make it clear I provide this safeguard. It would be very unsafe to catch hold of the man or make him responsible when he is in possession of undeveloped films. In these circumstances, I beg to move my amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I move:

"In sub-clause (8) (a) of clause 2, the word 'mine' be omitted."

I would not have moved this amendment if the meaning of the word 'mine' had been made clear in sub-clause (a). I am afraid that it is liable to misinterpretation and may be applied to the excavations wherefrom metals or minerals are taken out, though I think that "mine" means explosives used in time of war for defending the coast. If Honourable Members will see the last sentence of the sub-clause they will find the words "for the purpose of getting any metals or minerals". (A Voice: "In time of war".) I do not know whether the words "in time of war" govern all these sentences above. If they do, then the law would be perfect on that point. But if they do not, then it is liable to misinterpretation; and even taking for granted that it is to be prohibited in times of war, what will happen to the records, to the statistics and to the other papers and documents in the public libraries and other places in the bookstalls, and book-seller's places relating to a mine which be declared a prohibited place some years after the publication. If we go deep into the clauses we find that any person publishing any information relating to anything used in a prohibited place is liable to be brought under the clutches of this law and that would create difficulties and therefore I propose that the word "mine" should be deleted.

Mr. L. Graham: When this Act of 1920 was in the Bill stage before the House of Commons, a certain keen Parliamentary, Commander Kenworthy, moved that the word "mine" be omitted. His reason for doing so was that he was afraid that it might be misinterpreted. The Chairman of the Committee said "I really do not believe that anybody else besides the Honourable and Gallant Member would have understood that". Commander Kenworthy has his imitators. The Learned Attorney General was sympathetic and I should also like to be sympathetic to Mr. Agnihotri. What happened was this. The Attorney General said "there was no possibility of misunderstanding but, to meet your case, after the word 'mine' I propose to insert the word 'minefield'; with these words so associated there is no possibility of misunderstanding." The House accepted the Attorney General's view and inserted the word "minefield." In our Bill, we have the word "minefield" after the word "mine". I submit it is impossible that there should be any misunderstanding at all. I would object to the removal of the word "mine" because it might be argued in court that one mine does not make a minefield. I therefore oppose the amendment.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That in sub-clause (8) (a) of clause 2, the word 'mine' be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. C. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I beg to move:

"That for the words 'an enemy' wherever they occur in clauses 2, 3 and 4, the words 'a foreign power' be substituted."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Is every power an enemy?

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Every power is a potential enemy, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Bray, will bear me out when I say that. If Honourable Members will look into the provisions of clause 2, sub-clauses 8 (c) and (d), they will find that by the use of this expression it is intended to indicate the importance of the information which Government are anxious to safeguard. It will be seen that in sub-clause (c) of sub-clause (8) the information must be useful to an enemy, and a place may be declared to be a prohibited place when Government think that information with respect thereto will be useful to an enemy. So also in sub-clause (d). When we come to clause 3, we find that in sub-clause (b) likewise, any sketch, plan, model, etc., must be useful to an enemy. So also in sub-clause (c) any document, information, etc., must be useful to an enemy. The House ought to be quite clear on this point. We are not going to penalise the enemy, when we use this term in these clauses. We are merely setting a standard of importance of the secrets which Government must safeguard. That is the position. Now, it is well known that the expression 'enemy' in international law bears a particular significance; there is no room for any doubt as to what the word 'enemy' in international law would mean,—a State actually at war with the Crown. And we find that while the Act of 1911 was being considered in the House of Lords, a noble Lord raised the question as to whether when there was no war, that is to say, in times of peace, if a prosecution was sought to be launched under this Act, anybody could raise a defence saying that as there was no war, the State could have no enemy. Later on, we find that a case actually came up in 1913 in which this very point was taken. Honourable Members will find a reference to this case in Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, and there it was held that the term 'an enemy' as used in the Official Secrets Act was not confined to a State actually at war with the Crown. It does not say to what extent this term might be stretched for the purposes of this Act. So this leaves things rather in an uncertain state. Now, Sir, we find that the term 'enemy' has been variously used in certain special enactments where it has been given various meanings; for instance, take the Trading with the Enemy Act and other war enactments. Then again take the Army Act. In the Army Act this term is defined as including all armed mutineers, armed rebels, armed rioters and pirates. This matter is further complicated by reason of the use of this term 'enemy' in certain Treaties of the British Government with some Native States. I may remind the House that a reference to this particular question, namely, the terms of the treaties, was made not long ago in the Council of State in connection with the Princes' Protection Bill. I find that in at least 20 treaties which the British Government have entered into with the Native States

Mr. Denys Bray (Foreign Secretary): I rise to a point of order. Is the Honourable Member referring to Indian States?

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Yes, Sir, my intention was to refer to the possible difficulties that might arise. If the Honourable Members will turn to those Treaties, they will find that it is laid down, in at least twenty of them, that "the friends and enemies of one shall be the friends and enemies of both." Now, Sir, as is well known, the Indian States have no international relations at all. Therefore, it cannot be said that this expression in the Treaties can be given the same meaning as it bears in international law. Men like myself, who are uninitiated in the mysteries of diplomacy and diplomatic language, used to think that this clause of the Treaties constitute an offensive and defensive alliance between the British Government and the Native States for military purposes. But, Sir, in connection with the Princes' Protection Bill it was made clear that it was not so; and the Honourable Mr. Thompson read into this clause of the Treaties an obligation on the part of the Government of India to provide a measure for the purpose of protecting the Princes from hostile criticisms in the Press. And that interpretation has been accepted by the high legal authority of the present Governor General. Now, Sir, that being the case, I am apprehensive as to what interpretation this term may be given in the future. Will this term "enemy" include the enemies of the Native States, because it is said the enemies of the Native States will be considered the enemies of the British Government? But in that case enemies would include private individuals, and it would not be interpreted in the sense in which it is used in international law and in the sense in which it is used in the English law from which we have taken this term. Therefore, Sir, in order to be on the safe side I have proposed the substitution of the words "a foreign power" for the words "an enemy" in this clause. The reason why I have chosen the expression "foreign power" is that, though the expression used in the Act of 1911 was "enemy," in the Act of 1920 the expression used is "a foreign power." Honourable Members will find that in two places in clause 5 of the Bill the expression used is "any foreign power" and not "enemy." Therefore, Sir, I think that in every sense the Bill will be improved if we accept this amendment. That would give us a uniform phraseology, and the term will not be liable to misinterpretation in the way I have pointed out. I beg to move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved is:

"For the words 'an enemy' wherever they occur in clause 2 the words 'a foreign power' be substituted."

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, while admiring the erudition and labour which my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, has expended on this subject, I regret very much that I am unable to accept his amendment. I too have searched the Law Reports and have found a ruling as to the meaning of the word "enemy" as used in the Official Secrets Act of 1911. The word, Sir, means a potential enemy. Now, Sir, I think that, that on the whole helps to clear the ground. There can be no misunderstanding. An enemy of the State, when you come to examine the matter. . . . I take it, Sir, that we are dealing with clauses 3 and 4 as well as clause 2?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member actually moved his amendment to clauses 2, 3 and 4, but I have only been able to put the amendment to clause 2, because clauses 3 and 4 have not yet been reached. I do not object to the Honourable Member arguing his case with reference to all three clauses.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, I formally moved this amendment in regard to clause 2.

Mr. President: Yes. I put it in regard to clause 2 assuming that when we reach clauses 3 and 4, the Honourable Member's amendments will be treated as formal motions.

Mr. L. Graham: The reason why I asked that question, Sir, is because it is really impossible to separate the arguments and I had no wish to be pulled up in the middle of my stride.

With regard to clause 2 (8), sub-clauses (c) and (d), the position is that actually these notifications will not issue except in time of war. Works which are to be prohibited places at all times are those which are specified in sub-clause (a). Now war, Sir, is war whether it is civil war or war with a foreign power. In time of war it is equally necessary to protect the State from being spied upon, whether by a foreigner or by the enemy within our gates. If you accept the amendment proposed by Mr. Neogy its effect will be that an enemy of our own nationality will be able to enter into these prohibited places because to him they will not be prohibited. The only person who will be barred will be the foreigner. The consequence, I take it, will be that the foreigner will employ a traitor—I am afraid I must say a traitor—to enter the prohibited place because he will be able to do it with immunity. Now, Sir, as I say, it is really part of my argument, and I therefore gratefully accept your offer to allow me to speak and to show how the change in the words would affect clause 3. There are, as my friend, Mr. Neogy, said, foreign powers and foreign powers. There are foreign powers which are great and there are foreign powers which are small. May I mention one very small power, namely, the Principality of Monaco and another, the republic of San Marino. Again, there are various little States in South America. Would it not be placing an impossible burden on a Court of Justice to have to come to a conclusion whether certain information, certain sketches, are calculated to be directly or indirectly or might be or are intended to be useful to a foreign power when there is no common standard of foreign power? It might be said: "This will be of no real advantage to Monaco; you have got only half a dozen soldiers there." The position, therefore, is that the Courts would be placed in an impossible position and the operation of the Act would be paralysed. The same remark, Sir, applies to clause 4. I, therefore, in this connection, ask that the amendment to clause 2 be rejected.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"For the words 'an enemy' wherever they occur in clause 2, the words 'a foreign power' be substituted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 2 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"For the words 'an enemy' wherever they occur in clause 3, the words 'a foreign power' be substituted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move:

"In sub-clause (1) of clause 3 omit the words 'or interests'."

Sir, I admit it to be my misfortune that I could not be satisfied by the very illuminating arguments adduced by my friend from Bengal relating to the definition of the words "or interests". Sir, in this country the interests of the public cannot always be identical with the interests of the State in all matters. They may be identical in certain matters but they may not be identical in many matters. It may also happen, Sir, that even the interests of the public and the interests of the State may clash. There may be certain matters that may be prejudicial to the interests of the State, while they may be beneficial to the public. The meaning of the words 'the interests of the State' are vague. Take, for instance, the last Gaya Congress. It passed a Resolution, a very undesirable Resolution and I may call it a senseless Resolution to do away with their liabilities for international debts, or public debts that the Government of India might incur in future.

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

Now, this Resolution on the part of those people will certainly not be for the benefit of the State or in the interests of the State. If any person were to make a report of that proceedings and publish it, he might be liable under sub-clause (c) of clause 1. He may be liable for this, because other nations that may be inimically inclined towards our Government might infer that the Indian subjects are not satisfied with their Government, and have repudiated the public debts, that there is a dissension between the subjects themselves and probably the Government may be a weak one; and if they enter into a war on that inference it will certainly come within the definition of the interests of the State. I do not mean to say that the interests of the State really includes such a case as I have just given and it may not have been meant to include such cases, but there is nothing to prevent interpretation in that way. Then, for instance, social disorders, religious dissensions between different parties, they are surely always prejudicial to the interests of the State. If anybody were to publish this information, and if that information might be useful to some foreign powers at some unknown time, the person who gives or publishes such information would be covered by this definition in clause 3 (1); I do not think that the Select Committee meant that this clause should cover such cases. Therefore, Sir, I think, that it would be better that "the interests" should be defined, but as that is not possible now it is better that the words should be omitted. On going further into the Bill we find that in certain clauses the words "or interests" before "the State" have been deleted. I do not know what led the Honourable Members of the Select Committee to include those words "or interests" in these clauses while at the same time they deleted them in other clauses that referred to civil affairs. If the meaning of the words "or interests" was clear in the case of civil affairs, it should equally be clear in military matters. If you drop it in one place, there does not seem to be any necessity to keep it in another. It only creates ambiguity and vagueness. Therefore I submit that these words "or interests" be omitted.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is:

"That in sub clause (1) of clause 3, omit the words 'or interests'."

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, my learned friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, has referred to this question already. The point is this. These words were not included, as Mr. Agnihotri suggested, by the Select Committee in this clause. They were excluded in another clause, clause 6, for reasons which I will deal with later. Clause 3 deals with all the most important offences under the Act and it is not a new idea. It has been the law of this land since 1911, and you may possibly like to be told what occurred in Parliament when my Honourable friend's exemplar Commander Kenworthy moved a precisely similar amendment to omit the words "or interests." On that occasion Sir G. Hewart said:

"As to the objection raised to the words 'or interests', the answer is that they are taken from the Act of 1911, which says, 'purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State'. It is obvious that certain matters cannot be said without exaggeration to imperil the safety of the State, but they go sufficiently far in that direction to be prejudicial to the interests of the State. Therefore those who were responsible for the Act of 1911 put in 'safety or interests'. We did not invent that phrase. We are simply carrying on the vocabulary of the 1911 Act, and if we were to leave out the words 'or interests' in the amending Bill, it would make it possible to found a legal argument upon the fact that the phrase was in the principal Act but not in the amending Bill, and it might be said that while the mischief that was aimed at by the principal Act included purposes prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State, yet, in order to come within the amending Bill, you would have to find something prejudicial to the actual safety of the State."

Well, Sir, as I said, we are dealing with the very gravest offences in this clause. In the other clause, clause 6, with which I will deal later, we deal with comparatively minor offences many of which are already covered by the existing penal law. The position is this. If you restrict the words and only use the word "safety" it is a very difficult thing to say about any particular act that it imperils the safety of the State but, if you let pass a number of such acts, the aggregate of these acts, not each one of which imperils the safety of the State, will imperil the safety of the State, and I ask you, Sir, is it right that the Empire should crash before we can get a conviction under this Act?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I may perhaps explain to my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, why we retained the words "interest of the State" here and omitted them in clause 6 and elsewhere. If Congress volunteers wore uniform and went about, it might be argued that they were doing a thing against the interest of the State. That is the thing which I had in mind when I advocated the dropping of the words "interest of the State" there. Nobody can argue it is against the safety of the State that Congress volunteers should go about dressed like ordinary volunteers. It is to avoid such a case that we dropped the words "interest of the State" in this and other sections. But here, in section 3, we are concerned with spies. In the case of spies it will be very difficult to draw the line between safety of the State and interest of the State. And "interest of the State" is not such an unknown term that my Honourable friends should have any apprehension about the use of that term. Why, we are familiar with that term in the Indian Evidence Act. If you turn to section 125 and other sections, you find "public interest". A man may claim that he cannot disclose a secret, it is in the public interest that he should not disclose it. Has anybody ever felt any doubt as to what is meant by "public interest"? It is no doubt easy to conjure up doubts when you are here but you must credit the Court with some common sense and having regard to the facts of the case, there really will be no difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to what will be in the interest of the State and what will not be in the interest of the State. Therefore, in cases like these, where you have to deal with the real enemies of the country, I don't see any distinction between the enemies of the country and the enemies of the State, because if he is an enemy of the State, he is also an enemy of the people. (An Honourable Member! "Not necessarily.") Well, that is a point of view. I did not say enemy of the Bureaucracy, I said enemy of the Government. No people can exist without a Government. Government and the people make the State. So that, in such cases, where you have to deal with spies, I don't think we should show any leniency at all, for, if we are to get on at all in this country, we must safeguard our safety in the first place against foreign aggression or internal aggression which might overthrow the Government. I think we are all anxious to preserve a Government so that we may develop in it. I think, Sir, the words are necessary there.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, I do not know that I altogether followed the argument of the Honourable Mover of this amendment. He drew an illustration, or what I thought to be an illustration; then he passed a sponge over it and said it was not an illustration. So far, at all events, I am sure, that he contemplated some sort of difference between the interests of the State and the interests of the people who form that State, which he called the public interest. Apparently he read the word "State" as if it is synonymous with the word "Government". I do not think that in an enactment of this kind that would be a correct interpretation of the word "State". I think the word "State" here must be read to cover widely all the community—its Government, its institutions, its public and everybody concerned who go to make up what we call the State. It will be impossible for us to legislate upon any supposed antagonism between the State and the people constituting that State; and upon that ground alone I think that this amendment does not deserve the support of the House.

The amendment was negatived.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: Sir, the amendment which I move is as follows:

"In clause 3 (1) before the words 'imprisonment for' insert the word 'simple' and make consequential amendments in other clauses."

Sir, it is not that I wish to make a provision making rigorous imprisonment simple. My point is simply this. The real object of sending people to jail in these cases is to keep them out of the way and not to let them have any communication with the enemy, and in these cases simple imprisonment will be quite sufficient. There seems to be no reason why simple imprisonment should not be sufficient. The words used in the clause are "he shall be punishable with imprisonment". It does not say whether it is simple or rigorous imprisonment. My object is to make it simple imprisonment. This object is served by putting the man in jail and thereby not letting him have any communication with the outside world. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: There is another amendment. Sir, I put my view of the case. My amendment runs:

"In clause 3 (1) omit all words after the words 'to any secret official code, to' in the last but one line and in their place substitute the following:

'a maximum period of 14 years according to the gravity of the offence proved in the Court'."

The clause simply says "and in other cases to three years". I wish to simplify the whole matter and put it in black and white that the matter should be left to the discretion of the Magistrate trying the case and that the punishment should be according to the gravity of the offence.

The amendment was negatived.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the amendment I desire to move deals with clause (3). Honourable Members will find that this clause lays down a special rule of evidence taken from the English Statute. When this clause was under discussion in the Lords, Lord Alverstone, the late Lord Chief Justice of England, animadverted upon it in the following terms. He said:

"I would call his attention first to the words 'known character as proved' in sub-section (2) of clause (1). It is opening the door of criminal law for which some justification will be required. It is quite true that when people are found in certain circumstances, their previous record as actually proved can, under the Prevention of Offences Act, be given in evidence; but I have never known any Act to go so far as saying that a man's known character may be proved, and I am afraid that in the Bill this will create difficulties. I think the words will be found too

Honourable Members will observe these are weighty words, coming as they do from the occupant of the highest judicial bench in England barring only one. Now, if you read clause 3 as it is drafted and is proposed to be enacted—I leave out the unnecessary words—I shall only coin an illustration to show how it leads to a reductio ad absurdum. If Honourable Members will follow the words which I have underlined, they will at once come to the illustration which I am about to give them. The section says in clause (2) "any information relating to any prohibited place communicated by any person shall be presumed to have been made or communicated for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. Any information relating to a prohibited place, communicated, shall be presumed to have been communicated for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State." Let me translate this into a concrete illustration. A says to B, "Look at this. Avoid going to this place. It is a prohibited place." That is an information relating to a prohibited place. It shall be presumed under this Act to have been communicated "for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State". (A Voice: "No, no.") My illustration arouses the hilarity of the learned occupants of the Treasury Benches. That is my best vindication for the argument that I am addressing to this House. The whole thing, the whole language of section 3 is so diffuse, loose and verbose that it might include any act, however innocent, within the purview of that section. Now, Sir, I do not wish to weary this House by dealing with the general aspect of this question. I shall rest content if the House will support my short amendment which I am perfectly certain he who runs can understand. It is this. I wish to delete from the provisions of this section these most obnoxious words "or his known character as proved."

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): May I rise to a point of order? Is Dr. Gour moving the first part of his amendment or the second part?

Mr. President: I understand the Honourable Member is not moving the first part.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I think you understood me rightly and my Honourable friend, Mr. Chatterjee, understood me wrongly. What is the meaning of the words, "his known character as proved"? I pointed out that in England, the words "his known character as proved" were pronounced by the late Chief Justice of England to be a loose expression and too wide. This special rule of evidence provided in England has the least justification in this country. Honourable Members will observe that in England they have no codified law of evidence. Such rules of evidence as exist are culled out of decided cases, but in this country we have a codified law of evidence and it contains the definition of such a phrase—"when a fact may be deemed to have been proved"—and it lays down that a fact may be deemed to be proved when taking all circumstances into consideration the court regards it as proved and the ensuing sections of the Evidence Act lay down certain rules of relevancy and admission and other rules for the exclusion of evidence, and one of these is that in criminal cases the character of a man is not relevant. Now, this special provision made in a highly technical but nevertheless heinous offence of including a man's character as a piece of evidence upon which he might be convicted is, I submit, opposed to the law of evidence and is otherwise opposed to the ordinary principles of natural justice. What is a man's character? After all, if Honourable Members will pause for a moment and reflect, they will find that character means nothing more and nothing less than the opinion which one man has about another. Is a man to be convicted upon the opinions of people? And as this character is to be proved by the prosecutor I presume the evidence will be the evidence of the police and of a few witnesses whom they call for the purpose of establishing a man's character. Do Honourable Members in this House sanction such a procedure? I am perfectly certain they will do nothing of the kind. Prove your case by all means. The Evidence Act provides the mode and the manner of such proof. I am prepared also to allow the proof to be completed by the special rule of evidence which you propose to enact in this clause, but I certainly think that these words 'known character as proved' must be deleted from this clause. It is likely, I submit, to lead to miscarriage of justice. If there is evidence of a man's bad character, we have also to give evidence of a man's good character. There will be a conflict of opinions. A few witnesses come up and say "This man is a budmash". A few men come up on the other side and say "We have never known a man of a more saintly character". Apart from the proof which this section requires and for which, I submit, the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act are amply sufficient, if they are not sufficient you have enlarged those provisions in this clause to the extent which I am prepared to accept, but I submit the House will not accept if coupled with the phrase "known character as proved" and if they are not sufficient, you may enlarge those provisions in this clause to an extent which I am prepared to accept, but I submit the House should not accept if they are coupled with this phrase 'his known character as proved'. Sir, I move that these words be deleted from the clause.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause (2) of clause 3, the words 'or his known character as proved' wherever they occur be omitted."

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, my learned friend, Dr. Gour, took for his text in the first instance certain remarks of Lord Alverstone. Now before dealing with those remarks in particular, I would like to put it to the House that we have in the Select Committee very much reduced the scope of this clause. Previously that clause could have been used in the trial of any person for any offence under clause 3. We have, as has been noted before, re-drafted clause 3 so as to give a maximum penalty of 14 years for certain offences and a maximum penalty of 3 years for other offences. We only propose to rely on this special provision in the case of those very serious offences which are punishable with imprisonment for 14 years, that is to say, Sir, we shall be dealing with spies, an elusive and slippery race about whom the police have information, know a great deal, but that information would be summed up as information about pursuits and character generally. Now, Sir, what happens is this. I do not propose to be an expert in the ways of spying, and therefore I may be allowed, I trust, to quote the words of no less a jurist than Lord Haldane. Before I do so, however, I should like to remind the House that these words first appeared in the Act of 1911, that is to say, they were passed by a Liberal Government. Lord Haldane in introducing the Bill in the House of Lords, or rather in moving the second reading, stated as follows:

"The main change which the Bill makes is a change of procedure. In order to convict any one under the Official Secrets Act, 1899, it is necessary to prove the purpose of wrongfully obtaining information. If the man is found in the middle of fortifications, he may have strayed there by accident by night. You have to prove that he was there for the purpose of wrongfully obtaining information, and that has to be proved. This Bill adopts a method for which there is a precedent and which is much more effective."

That is, in certain cases persons are liable to conviction under that Act unless they can give a satisfactory account of themselves when they are found in certain places. Now to illustrate the difficulties with which we have to cope, let me again quote Lord Haldane:

"I will give one or two instances showing what the difficulties have been. Not many months ago we found in the middle of the fortifications of Dover an intelligent stranger who explained his presence by saying that he was there to hear the singing of birds. He gave the explanation rather hastily as it was midwinter. Then there was another case in which somebody was looking at the emplacement of guns in a battery at Lough Foyle and he declared that he was there for the purpose of calling on somebody."

There was another case in which a man was found sketching a fortification. The details are not worth reporting, but they could not get a conviction. Now, Sir, as I have said, we are dealing with people who are committing most serious offences, and in order to prove their purpose it is essential that we should be able to give evidence of their character. It has got to be a sort of badness that would make the man likely to do something which was prejudicial to the safety or interest of the State. It would not be enough to prove that he was a very unpleasant fellow or that he beat his wife or anything of that sort, but it must be proved that he is the sort of person likely to do something dangerous, something prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. He is not going to be tried or convicted unless he is found in extremely suspicious circumstances doing something which he ought not to be doing; and this Act provides that certain inferences may be drawn from the circumstances in which he was found and anything known about him before. I submit, Sir, that in these particular cases, where the necessity for the protection of the interests of the State arises and in which its safety is concerned, this is a justifiable provision. As I have said before, it was inserted by a Liberal Government and it was continued and applied to another set of offences by the Act of 1920 in England. I have quoted already no less an authority than Lord Haldane and I should like to conclude by quoting no less an authority than a late Attorney General, then Sir Rufus Isaacs, who said that it was a very difficult thing to administer the old Act and it is essential to have this provision, the whole provision.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, I will be very brief in referring to this amendment because Dr. Gour has said almost all that could possibly be said on this question. I would draw the attention of the House to the seriousness of the offence that clause 3 seeks to create. It will be seen that this offence is made punishable with imprisonment up to 14 years. What are the elements of this offence? A man does something. That is the first element, as enumerated in clauses (a), (b) and (c); and then his purpose in doing that particular thing must be prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. Now, Sir, let us look at sub-clause (a). What is the act that he commits? He approaches, inspects, passes over or is in the vicinity of or enters any prohibited place. And what is a prohibited place? A prohibited place includes not only works of defence but any dockyard, factory or ship belonging to His Majesty. So, it is quite obvious that it is possible for a man quite innocently to either approach or to be found in the vicinity of any such factory or dockyard belonging to the State. Therefore, the essence of the offence is his purpose, which must be found to be prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. This being the most important element of the offence, let us see what procedure is going to be adopted to prove it. It will be enough if you adduce evidence of his known character for the purpose of establishing this important element in the offence. That is a serious danger to which I draw the attention of the House. This danger was as a matter of fact admitted by the Select Committee in so far as it made a distinction between a military and a non-military offence. I must admit that that distinction has improved the Bill; but Sir, so long as Government is unable to justify this distinction in principle I am unable to be a party to the passing of sub-clause (2). It will be said that sub-clause (2) finds a place in the Act of 1911 which already applies to India.

That does not affect my opinion in the least. We are here to pass legislation which we consider to be in the best interests of the country. If Parliament has passed an obnoxious measure of legislation which we consider to be unsuited to the conditions in India, we must, while we are considering a measure seeking to re-enact that provision, establish by our vote here that we do not approve of such a provision. Now, Sir, my principal objection is that the chances of misinterpretation of this clause are much greater in India than in England. My Honourable friend, Mr. Graham, has said "Oh, there are circumstances in which people may be found in very suspicious surroundings and then you cannot really establish with reference to specific acts on his part that his purpose was really prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State." That is exactly the danger which I am very much afraid of. Who knows that this provision may not give temptation to the authorities at one time or other to run in political suspects, or those who are in the opinion of Government political suspects, or non-co-operators for the matter of that, who may be found in the vicinity of a prohibited place? (A Voice 'No.') . . . Who says no? Is my Honourable friend, Mr. Chaudhuri in a position to assure me that it will not be so? Is the Honourable gentleman in a position to give me that assurance on behalf of Government? Now, Sir, unless there is a specific guarantee that Government are not going to abuse this provision for the purpose of harassing their political opponents, I cannot be a party to this measure at all.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

" Clause 3. In sub-clause (2) omit the words ' or his known character as proved '."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 3 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 4. Amendment moved:

" For the words ' an enemy ' wherever they occur, the words ' a foreign power ' be substituted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

" That clause 4 be omitted."

Sir, my reason for the omission is this: We have just provided in clause 3, by throwing out the amendment of Dr. Gour that a man may be convicted notwithstanding that he may not have committed any act, if from his known character as proved it appears that his purpose was a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. Now, under this clause 4, you are providing that the fact of any person communicating or attempting to communicate with a foreign agent shall be a relevant evidence for conviction under clause 3. If we retain this clause, the result will be that this evidence, in addition to the evidence of a bad character as proved, will make a man liable to be convicted under the Act. Now, communication with a foreign agent certainly is a very serious thing. Communication with a foreign agent has been defined in this clause. What is it? " A person shall be deemed to have communicated with a foreign agent if he visited the address of the foreign agent or consorted or associated with the foreign agent." That is, if he visits a foreign agent, it shall be deemed that he had a communication with a foreign agent. Further, if he has been found in possession of any address of a foreign agent, whether it is in this country or outside this country, he shall be deemed to have communicated with a foreign agent. Now, it may just happen that the man visiting a place may not know that the place was the address of a foreign agent. If a man visits the address of a foreign agent he is deemed to have communicated with a foreign agent. Now, what is the meaning of address? " Address " in this clause has been defined to be " a place where he carries on business." A suspected foreign agent, if he carries on business at a particular place and any person who is a political internee or a non-co-operator, whose characters these days are believed to be prejudicial to the interests of the State, were to go to the place of business of a person suspected of being foreign agent, then this non-co-operator or political internee shall be liable to be convicted under clause 3, and this will be very dangerous, because that political internee or non-co-operator may himself be innocent. Unless we have any proof of any overt act on his part, it will be rather dangerous and unjustifiable to convict that man simply because he happened to be a non-co-operator or a political convict or internee, and visited a place which happens to be a place of business of any person who is suspected to be a foreign agent. He may be an innocent person and, as such, he will be put to unnecessary hardship. Therefore, Sir, I propose that the whole clause 4 which makes the evidence relevant for conviction, where it is coupled with the proof of bad character, of a man, should be deleted.

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, I am somewhat surprised at the attitude of Mr. Agnihotri. He agreed that to communicate with a foreign agent is a thoroughly bad thing to do, the sort of thing a spy would do, and yet he proposes to omit this clause altogether.

The fact, Sir, is that this clause was inserted in the Act of 1920 as a result of our experiences at Home during the war. It was found that England was, I might almost say, honeycombed with foreign agents. Possibly the position is not yet so bad in India, but it might become so, and in fact, I think there is reason to suppose that it is likely to become so from a certain quarter. Now, in a case like this, it is absolutely necessary to be fore-armed. The reasons which impelled the Home Government to put in this provision were expressed by the present Lord Chief Justice, then Attorney-General, as follows: "After first drawing attention to the fact that nobody is going to prosecute a person for going to have tea with a foreign agent or even for sending him a postcard, he says that if he is found doing any of the extremely dangerous things which constitute the offence for which he is to be tried, then these facts may be used in evidence against him." I think the House which passed the second sub-clause of clause (3) will agree with me that they should pass clause (4) which is really on the same lines and is intended to meet the same necessity. I do not wish to deal with the matter in detail, but I would only like to read what Sir Gordon Hewart said:

"I hoped that what I said when I last spoke with reference to the opening and governing words of the second Clause of this Bill would have met in advance any such criticism as that which has just fallen from my Honourable friend the Member for Consett. I am sure he sees that it is very important that this clause begins with words which limit its effect to proceedings in which a particular kind of offence is charged."

As I said, there is no prosecution under this section. It is simply an evidence section:

"In other words, the clause provides that where, for example, a man is found in Woolwich Arsenal and there is evidence to show that he is there for the purpose of spying, the further fact, if fact it be, that he has also been in communication with a German agent will be evidence that he has, for a purpose prejudicial to this country, obtained, or sought to obtain information calculated to be useful to an enemy."

Now, Sir, a foreign agent, it may be said, is to a spy what a jemmy is to a burglar; and as we have in our own criminal law a presumption about a man who is found in possession of house-breaking implements, so in respect of spies it is reasonable to expect that writing to foreign agents or communicating with them is a fact which he ought to be called on to explain and if he cannot explain it, it ought to count against him as proving that the act with which he has actually been charged was done with a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, I have got one question to put to the Honourable Member who has just sat down; and that is, whether this provision has been incorporated in any legislation that the Colonies may have undertaken. The House will remember that this clause is taken, not from the Act of 1911 which applies to all British Possessions, but from the Act of 1920 which does not apply either to Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Newfoundland or India. So far as I have been able to see, the Colonies have not brought in this provision by any legislation of their own. (If I am wrong, the Honourable Mr. Graham will correct me.) If that be so, what is the special urgency of this provision being incorporated in the Statute Book in India? I want to be satisfied on that point before I vote on this clause.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): May I ask another question, Sir, suppose there is a "Miladsharif" going on in the House of the Consul-General of Afghanistan or probably there is a general prayer, and as a Muhammadan, every Muhammadan must go there and say his prayers in the house of the Consular-General of Persia. Will that be a communication? Or suppose out of friendship the Consul-General pays a visit to a Member of the Legislative Assembly and he drops his visiting card and the Member of the Assembly returns the visit by dropping a visiting card of his, or probably in his diary he enters an entry that he dined with him on a certain day. Will that Member of this Assembly come under this section? If so, this would be an immoral law, it is a law which is illegal, I feel is an extraordinary thing that the people living in India will have to obey it, it is a law which is not only of a harsh nature but a law which a civilized nation should not have. Therefore, I expect my Honourable friend, Mr. Graham to satisfy the House how far its inclusion in sections 3 and 4 of this Bill is justified and how far it comes within the spirit of the law of this country.

Mr. L. Graham: May I say, Sir, that if a reply were permissible on an amendment, I would be able to satisfy Mr. Kabeer-ud-din.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: What about my question?

Mr. L. Graham: That will be dealt with in another quarter.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: There is a lot of misapprehension as regards the scope of the section. This section by itself does not create any offence. This section merely says what facts are relevant in a trial for an offence under section 3; it merely lays down the rules of evidence. Having regard to the peculiar nature of the case, the peculiar nature of the offence,—incidents which do not occur in ordinary human life do occur in such cases, insidious and underhand methods, and that is why a special legislation has to provide what special facts shall be relevant. If Honourable Members will notice, all that section 4 (1) says is, "shall be relevant" for the purpose of proving a particular fact; not that the Court is bound to draw the inference, not that it is conclusively proved, not even "shall be presumed"; it is merely relevant, it is a piece of evidence which the Court can admit in order to come to a conclusion whether the man has committed the crime or not. Honourable Members will remember that under section 3 it is essential for the prosecution to prove one or other of the three acts specified therein, that is, a person in order to be convicted, (a) must either have approached, inspected, etc., etc., any prohibited place; (b) he must have made a sketch, plan, model, etc., etc., which will be useful to an enemy; and (c) he must have obtained, collected, recorded, etc., etc., information which would be useful to an enemy (A Voice: "Might be"), might be, intended to be, or calculated to be (Mr. K. C. Neogy: "Directly or indirectly.") You have got to catch all sorts of cases so that the language should not be too narrow. Therefore these facts must be proved in the first place. In order to prove that fact, this will be one of the relevant facts taken into consideration. In order to find out whether this man has really communicated with an enemy, has really communicated an information to a foreign enemy, it would be relevant to know whether he is on visiting terms. If he is on visiting terms, that will be one of the facts proved. All that section 4 (1) says:

"In any proceedings against a person for an offence under section 3, the fact that he has been in communication with, or attempted to communicate with, a foreign agent whether within or without British India, shall be relevant for the purpose of proving" the commission of the offence. Therefore, it is merely a piece of evidence to which the Court may give such weight as it thinks fit taking into consideration the other circumstances which may be proved in the case. Then the latter portion is:

"For the purpose of this section, but without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provision,—

(a) a person shall be presumed to have been in communication with a foreign agent if—he has done all those things mentioned thereunder. That is, in order to prove that he has been in communication, the law lays down a presumption—a presumption which is rebuttable. That, my Honourable friend who has spoken against this section has forgotten. It is not a conclusive presumption. If you go merely and innocently for tea or if you merely go for the purpose of doing business in the business premises of a foreign agent, why it is the easiest thing to prove that you had a transaction to buy a horse or to buy some Persian carpet or do some other thing. It merely says 'shall be presumed.' In a case like this, in order to avoid difficulty, having regard to the delicate and serious nature of the offence, the law has to take care. It cannot be too careful and too cautious in such matters. Remember we are dealing with enemies of the State. When once you have that in mind, all these difficulties now help up which no doubt may appeal to unthinking people but to those of us who are here such argument is not convincing, it is very easy to catch popular or newspaper applause by holding forth and pointing out the dangers and pitfalls, but we as legislators have to be careful in dealing with legislation which deals with enemies of the State. You should not leave loopholes through which these fellows can escape. I have no mercy for them. I have no sympathy with them, however patriotic I may be and you must never be kind and leave a loophole for an enemy of the State to escape. Therefore you must catch them by all means even if you err. It does not matter if you err because prevention is better than cure in such a case. While I am at one with my Honourable friends that we should not encroach upon ordinary methods of proof, I recognize these are peculiar cases and peculiar cases have to be dealt with in a peculiar way and after all the Legislature is not committing any enormity. We are trying to follow the British people in all their political institutions and rights. If it is good for an Englishman, why should it not be good for us. True we have not got our own Government. That is the real secret of all this opposition. I quite admit that, but this is not the way to get rid of the foreign Government and establish our Government. In order to keep the State going you must have these measures in your armoury so as to deal with enemies of the State, not enemies of forms of Government. Now, I am an enemy of the present system of Government. I want to get rid of it and substitute Government by my countrymen. But this does not apply to me. It applies to the enemies of the State. My Honourable friend says he is not quite so sure, but I daresay that if he was on the Bench and I were appearing as Counsel for an accused person I would be able to satisfy him in no time that this is the intention of the Statute. After all, you must remember what the intention of the Statute is in a case like this. The courts are not there merely to go upon the literal meaning of the words. They will construe in a liberal spirit in favour of the accused and after all this is merely laying down what facts may be relevant and will carry weight, so that it is not conclusive proof at all and I therefore think that there is really no harm in retaining this section.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, my friend on the right has accused the House and the Members thereof from suffering from a lot of misapprehension. Whatever may be the case with other Members, I have not the slightest doubt that my learned friend on the right has taken a lion's share of that misapprehension. He opened his speech and wound it up by saying 'We want to deal with the enemies of the State.' But, Sir, this section is not dealing with the enemies of the State. It is dealing with a piece of evidence and we are yet to find the enemies of the State. The question my friend has assumed, that we are dealing with enemies of the State, is mere claptrap: the whole question is, who are the enemies of the State. My friend told us, and he has repeated that statement, that we are dealing here with the enemies of the State, by which I presume he means that we are here dealing with foreign subjects. Let me warn the House that this Bill, if passed into law, shall equally apply to all British subjects, Indians, Europeans or foreigners. It applies to everybody, and it is not the case, as my Honourable friend has assumed, that it is intended to lay the enemies of the State by the heels. Even if it were so, are not the enemies of the State entitled to justice? Are they not entitled to fair trial? Are they to be convicted without any judicial evidence, without any formulated pleas set out and proved against them? Are special chambers of horror to be devised for the purpose of impaling and pulverising foreign people? Surely, Sir, no Member in the House will endorse the pseudo-patriotic appeal which my Honourable friend on my right addressed to us. Let us, I say, be free from this cant, and address ourselves to the main question. Is the evidence, is the special rule of evidence which this section creates, is it warranted by the natural principles of equity and justice? That is a short question which I submit should engage the attention of this House. Let us be clear of those extremely vivid but at the same time misconceived notions of protection of the State and laying by the heel its enemies. We have neither the enemies of the State nor the protection of the State in view; in this section we have nothing but pure justice in view. Is it, I submit, consonant with the natural justice that with regard to a man who is found with a visiting card containing the address of a person or the person with whom he resided, that it should be a relevant factor? Turn to the section and you will find, Sir, another reductio ad absurdum: a person shall be presumed to have been in communication with a foreign agent—and I now leave out other words and select the words which suit my purpose, and it will show to you the absurdity of it, such a case is conceivable, and because the section lays down a large number of circumstances, and I am going to present you with one of them. If he has visited the address of a foreign agent, namely, any address—clause (c)—used for the receipt of communications,—(a person is charged with the offence under section 3); the evidence against him is given that he is presumed to have visited a foreign agent; the evidence given is that the foreign agent has an address. But 'address' is defined in clause (c) as a place where letters intended for that agent are received. Such a place might be a popular hotel or a large bank. As a matter of fact, Honourable Members know that when they tour about the country they generally have their letters addressed to a bank or a hotel. If therefore in such a place of common resort the foreign agent has left his address, a person shall be presumed to have been in communication—the accused shall be presumed to have been in communication with him if he has an address. If you have the address of that hotel or bank you shall be presumed to be in communication with a foreign agent. It is absolutely unnecessary to labour the point. These special rules of evidence were defended in the House of Commons by our present Viceroy, then the Attorney General . . . (A Voice: "No, you are mistaken.") . . . by Sir Gordon Hewart . . . (Mr. L. Graham: "I may say that you are again mistaken.") . . . Yes, by Lord Hewart—then the Attorney General, but not upon the grounds to which my learned friend has adverted to in this House. I say, Sir, look at the section: look at its extreme danger: address yourself to its complete artificiality and its divorce from the ordinary rules of the law of evidence to which this country is subject, and I have no hesitation that you will discard this clause as wholly unnecessary and as calculated to do injustice in the trial of offences. I wish to warn Honourable Members that this clause might be used against any one of them. It is not a clause which is reserved, as my Honourable friend from the right has pointed out, only for the enemies of the State. It may be used against the most loyal citizen; it may be used for manufacturing enemies, as my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, aptly points out. It is therefore, I submit, open to be used as an engine of oppression, and it is on that ground that I ask the House to support this amendment.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, with regard to the proposal to omit clause 4 of the Bill, in all humility I venture to support, with the strongest language at my command, the views put forward by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar; and, in the most friendly way, but again with the strongest language at my command, to refute the warning given to this House by my old friend, Dr. Gour. I would venture once more to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this is a legislation of a special kind. We are dealing in this legislation with an evil which is insidious beyond perhaps our imaginings: which works in the dark; and which can only be met with its own weapons. We are by this legislation giving powers to our judicial and executive authorities not to be misused, not to be abused, not to be applied as an engine of oppression, but to be kept in hand, just as we keep in hand all other defensive apparatus, to meet an evil which can only be met by special legislation of this kind. I do not suppose that any of us knows, or that we shall ever know, the extent to which the safety or the interests of the State were endangered and honeycombed with the evil of hostile spies and foreign agents during the last ten years. One argument raised against this clause is that it comes not from the Statute of 1911 but from the Statute of 1920. To my mind that is one of its strongest recommendations. It has behind it the experience gained during the late war—which broke out in 1914. As the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar has pointed out, this clause contains special rules of evidence. Take it away and you deprive this enactment of a very large part of its usefulness.

Dr. Gour is quite right in saying that it does not apply only to one set or class or race of people, but that it applies impartially to everybody; that is so. It applies to everybody; but it operates only against those who, be they English or be they Indian, guilty of the offence of spying, are enemies of the State. The whole of this clause rests upon the foundation given in sub-clause (b), namely, the definition of a foreign agent. That is the first thing you have to get. You must have a foreign agent. If he is not there, then it does not matter what is done by any gentleman, whatever his political opinions may be for the time being; but when you have got a foreign agent, then you have a snake: and if the poison of this snake is not to be disseminated, as it always is, secretly, clandestinely, with every ruse and stratagem that the brain of man can devise, you must have some provision like this to prevent it from spreading. We must trust our Courts. Later on we shall come to the question of the standard of Courts which are to try cases under this enactment, and it will be seen at once that as a Legislature we are not going to entrust these powers to irresponsible or inexperienced or weak or stupid Magistrates, but to Courts which can be trusted to use them only in those very special circumstances, to meet which this enactment is devised. I would like, speaking for myself, to see this House not divided against itself, but strong in laying down, for the information of all concerned, that spying in India,—spying that is in a way prejudicial to the interests and safety of the State,—is going to have a very poor chance of success in this country.

Mr. T. E. Moir (Madras: Nominated Official): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is to omit clause 4.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move part (b) of my amendment No. 12. I do not wish to move part (a):

"In clause 4, in sub-clause (2) (a) (i), after the words 'with a foreign agent,' insert the words 'having reasonable grounds for believing him to be a foreign agent'."

Sir, we have heard from the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar and the Honourable Sir Henry Stanyon that these laws are meant for offences of a special kind. Nobody ever doubted it and nobody ever questioned it. But the apprehensions and the fears we have are that the law as embodied in this Bill may be abused or misused and innocent persons may suffer, and it is with the object of safeguarding the innocent persons that this amendment is put forward. It was also said that the law to suppress spying should be as strict as possible. Nobody denies it. It was also said that the trial of such cases will not be entrusted to any weak or stupid Magistrates. Where is the guarantee for that? If the Government find that such and such a Magistrate is a weak Magistrate and such and such a Magistrate is a stupid Magistrate, they will not retain his services any longer. So long as the

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

Magistrates are occupying the Bench, we are to assure that they are intelligent and strong Magistrates,—though they might commit errors of judgment, which might give us cause to infer their weakness or stupidity at certain times. And, if they could be guilty of such an error of judgment at one time, they could be no guarantee that they will not indulge in similar error at some other time. Here we provide, Sir, that, if a man were to visit the address of a foreign agent and if that man happens to be a person whose character as proved is such as to lead to a presumption that the act which he committed is prejudicial to the interests of the State, then that man will be liable for conviction under this Act. What would be the case? Take the case of the political internee. What further evidence—for many of our Magistrates will there be necessary to prove that the man is not a bad character? If such a man were to visit a place which is suspected to be the address of a foreign agent and if such a person at the same time or thereafter goes or approaches any military station, or any military telegraph or telephone station that may be confined within a fort, he will surely be liable to be prosecuted under this Act. Take the case of Sitabardi Fort of Nagpur. The telephone or the wireless station in Sitabardi Fort of Nagpur may be considered to be a military station. If a political internee or convict or a non-co-operator or seditionist happens to go near that fort, which happens to be close to the railway station

Mr. L. Graham: On a point of order, Sir. Is not the Honourable Member speaking on clause 3?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: On clause 4, Sir, coupled with clause 3 and the definition of the 'prohibited place' as given in clause 2 (a), which combined, make a man liable for conviction under this Act. Now, Sir, if the place is a military station, or if it has a military telephone and telegraph, and if it happens to be near the railway station where passengers have to go and if it enters into the head of the Executive that a particularly undesirable man should be prosecuted, or should be locked up, then what is there to prevent such an executive from prosecuting that man and getting him punished under this Act? My Honourable friend said that these laws are special laws, they may not be abused, they are not capable of being abused. Have the Honourable Members of this House forgotten the instances given by my Honourable and learned friend, Mr. Rangachariar, himself, of the abuse of section 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code? Have my friends here forgotten the excesses committed by the police as given on the floor of this House? Have my friends forgotten the instances and the judicial experiences given by my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Stanyon

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: May I rise to a point of order, Sir? I understand that the Honourable Member is moving the amendment relating to sub-clause (b) under clause 4, and, so far, I have not heard the use of the word "foreign agent" in his speech. He is referring to the question of convictions which has already been dealt with in clause 3.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I was just pointing out that the visit of a man to a foreign agent's address by itself may not be sufficient for conviction but that when it is coupled with certain other facts, there will be sufficient evidence for his conviction. I am pointing out

Dr. H. S. Gour: What is relevant may be sufficient for conviction.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, what is relevant is often sufficient for conviction.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May be sufficient.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: But in practice we see that it is more than sufficient and we will find that it is quite sufficient. We know that in theory it may be only relevant. Sir, I was pointing out, that when the simple provisions of the criminal law have been abused in the past, there could be no guarantee that such a drastic provision as is provided in this Bill may not work harshly against innocent persons. If we were to allow this sub-clause 2 (a) (1) of clause 4 to stand as it is, we make innocent persons unnecessarily liable under this Act in certain circumstances. Therefore as it is likely that innocent persons might suffer, I beg to propose that some safeguard should be provided to protect innocent persons from being made liable under this Act. Only those persons who have knowledge or have reason to believe that the person is a foreign agent, and knowing this if they happen to go to his place, then only should they be made liable under this Act. Therefore, Sir, I move my amendment. At the same time I would also like to say, that often when an amendment is put forward,—and there be some mistake in the amendment or when it does not fit in properly, Honourable Members on the Government Benches get up and say that the amendment has not been properly drafted, and take exception to the wording of the amendment which I think is not justified

Mr. L. Graham: I might allay the apprehensions of the Honourable Member by saying that I think his amendment is admirably drafted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: It may be. But supposing there was any mistake, in that case I should certainly have been happy to accept "knowingly," or "intentionally" or any other words that the Government may like to put in, in order to safeguard the interests of innocent persons. That is my chief object. If a person were innocently to go and visit the place of a foreign agent, he should not be made liable, and that evidence should not be used as relevant evidence against him.

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause 2 (a) (i) after the words 'with a foreign agent' insert the words 'having reasonable grounds for believing him to be a foreign agent'."

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, it is rather difficult to reply to Mr. Agnihotri in defence of the clause as it stands now, because what he has done is not to attack the clause as it stands now but to attack clause 3 which has already been passed by this House. I do not propose to start defending clause 3 which the House has already passed, but what I wish to point out is this. If you accept this amendment you will make it practically impossible for the evidence which is contemplated by this clause to be led at all. I take the position to be as follows: The man who is accused of an offence not under this clause but under clause 3 as you will remember, has been associating with a foreign agent. If Mr. Agnihotri's amendment is accepted, you will not be able to adduce that evidence that he has been associating with a foreign agent unless you can first satisfy the Court that the accused ought to have known that the person with whom he has associated was a foreign agent. I put it, Sir, that this is an impossible burden to throw upon the prosecution. Foreign agents do not display name boards in front of their residences with the words "foreign agent" inscribed in golden letters on it, and there is really no possible chance of satisfying the Court, that a foreign agent, being an unobserved and somewhat obscure person working in serpentine manners, is a person whom the accused ought to have known to be a foreign agent. It might be reasonable to require the prosecution to prove that an accused should have known anything which a person of reasonable intelligence would have known, but it is not fair to put on the prosecution the burden which this amendment would put on it. Therefore, Sir, I oppose this amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I move:

"In sub-clause (2) omit sub-clause (a) (ii)."

I need not say anything in defence of the omission of this sub-clause. Much has been said by Dr. Gour while moving the amendment about the omission of the whole clause 4. This sub-clause (ii) makes a man liable if he were to have only the address of any person who in the words of Mr. Graham does not declare himself to be a foreign agent and who is not expected to proclaim himself as a foreign agent as Mr. Graham has been pleased to say—still you want that innocent person to be made liable for this offence. He may be equally unaware that the man is a foreign agent, but if he happens to have his address either in a foreign country or in this country you make him liable. Therefore I move this amendment for omission of that sub-clause.

Mr. L. Graham: I think this is a forlorn hope of Mr. Agnihotri's. The House without a division has accepted the whole clause, and the small portion that Mr. Agnihotri wishes to take out is really a vital portion of this clause. I submit that any one who has voted against the omission of this clause as a whole must vote for retaining this portion of it. I would therefore oppose the amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): May I interpose by suggesting that the House should adjourn now?

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I point out, Sir, that we have a very important Committee which is to meet immediately after the Assembly rises and of which I presume you are a Member. That Committee has been once adjourned and I do not think that it will be wise that that Committee should adjourn again. We have to transact a very important business and I would therefore request in view of the hour which is ten minutes past five, you might adjourn the House.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: Sir, you and the House are aware of the congestion of public business in the House. Government are quite prepared to go on with this Bill. If we do not finish the Bill to-day or do not make satisfactory progress, our business will be put out of order. As you know, Sir, there is a lot of important work, in which the Members of the House are interested during the next few days and Government are quite prepared to go on. But if there is any strong feeling on the part, generally, of all Members of the House, we do not wish to press the question. We are prepared to leave it entirely to you. We should like to finish clause 4 if possible. We leave the decision to you.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I point out to you, Sir, that we have been sitting during these two days until 6 o'clock and even after 6 o'clock, and it upsets a great many arrangements which we have already made. The hours fixed are between 11 and 4, and I think it is in consonance with the general practice in these matters that if it has to sit later it should be only in exceptional cases and that care should be taken to see that the Members of the House are not inconvenienced. If you say that you are going to sit till 6 o'clock, proclaim it once for all so that we may know where we are. The announcement is that we are expected to sit between 11 and 4 and if you are going to sit after 5, it necessarily upsets all arrangements which Members of this House may have entered into previously. To-day happens to be one of those occasions when we are required in some other place and I therefore suggest to you,—of course you have the right to adjourn or not and the matter is entirely in your hands,—that we do adjourn as soon as this amendment is disposed of. (Voices: "The amendment has been disposed of.") Then we had better adjourn now.

Mr. L. Graham: Do I understand Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar to refer to the amendments to clause 4?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: No.

Dr. H. S. Gour: We will require some time to consider it.

Mr. L. Graham: I should not like to say that Dr. Gour's amendments are not important. My point is this. We have defeated an amendment to omit the whole of clause 4 and we are now dealing with clause 4 piecemeal. I think it would be more satisfactory to finish clause 4.

Mr. Chairman: The only argument that has been advanced is Dr. Gour's—that there is important business for some Members which follows this sitting. I therefore adjourn the House till 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 15th February, 1923.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: May I ask a supplementary question. Is Government prepared to give out whether it is their intention to make the sale of Council Bills more frequent than once in a week, or do Government think that they will keep the rate of exchange steady?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Government will be prepared to give the matter consideration, though I am not sure that it will provide a remedy.

THE CANTONMENTS (HOUSE-ACCOMMODATION) BILL.

Secretary of the Assembly: Sir, I beg to lay on the table the Bill further to amend and to consolidate the law relating to the provision of house-accommodation for military officers in cantonments as passed by the Legislative Assembly and amended by the Council of State.

THE MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill further to amend the Married Women's Property Act, 1874, be taken into consideration."

On a former occasion, Sir, I explained the object of my Bill. For the information of some new Members I wish to recall what I said on the previous occasion. The object of this Bill is to remove certain doubts created by certain conflicting decisions of the three High Courts—Madras, Bombay and Calcutta. The Madras High Court has held that the Married Women's Property Act applies to Hindus, Muhammadans, Jains, etc. The other two High Courts, Bombay and Calcutta, have held that this Act does not apply to Hindus, Muhammadans, etc., with reference to policies of insurance taken out by husbands for the benefit of wives. My object is to remove this conflict of decisions with a view to give the benefit of section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act to the two communities which I have mentioned. Section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act says that a policy of insurance effected by any married man on his own life and expressed on the face of it to be for the benefit of his wife or of his wife and children or any of them shall enure and be deemed to be a trust for the benefit of his wife, or of his wife and children, or any of them, according to the interest so expressed, and shall not, so long as any object of the trust remains, be subject to the control of the husband or of his creditors or form part of his estate. If this section does not apply to Hindus, the disadvantage is that even in a case where the husband insures for the benefit of his wife, either his creditors or members of a joint Hindu family practically claim an interest in the insurance money, and the benefit of that insurance is taken away, so far as the wife is concerned. If, therefore, section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act is applied to insurance policies effected by Hindu husbands or Muhammadan husbands, I believe it would be to the benefit of the wife inasmuch as creditors or other members of a Hindu joint family will not be able to take away the benefit of the policy. That is the object I have in view. I am glad the Select Committee have reported in a way so as to support my object. The changes effected by the Select Committee are only two. As regards the first, I originally proposed to apply this section to Buddhists. The Select Committee has reported that it is not desirable in enacting this particular measure to include the Buddhists, as there are very few Buddhists in India, and, supposing the benefit of this is to be extended to Buddhists, the Government of Burma have said that they are willing in case of necessity to pass a measure of this kind in their local Council.

The second important change effected by the Select Committee is with reference to the question whether retrospective effect should be given by this Bill to policies of insurance already effected by certain people either in Madras or elsewhere. It was thought that it would not be desirable to give any retrospective effect inasmuch as people may have taken out policies on the understanding that they would be able to borrow money against the policies. Therefore the recommendation of the Select Committee now is that if at all this change in the law is to be made it should come into effect after April, 1923.

During the discussions of the Select Committee we have given careful consideration to the views and representations of Insurance Companies so far as the aspect of insurance is concerned. It was thought that the change in the law as proposed now might make certain classes of policies unpopular. After careful consideration the Select Committee came to the conclusion that if Insurance Companies properly explained the objects of this Bill to the proposers there would be no hardship and therefore there would be no disadvantage even from the insurance point of view in making the change. On the whole the Select Committee has supported this Bill; all the Local Governments are in favour of it; I believe that the Government of India are not against it, and I trust this House will support it. If it is carried I am sure it will be a great benefit and a great advantage so far as the Hindu, Muhammadan and Jain communities are concerned. I trust therefore that I shall get every support from this House for this Bill. Further, if it passes this House and if it passes also in another place, which I hope it will, I believe that this will be the first non-official Bill to go on the Statute Book under the new regime.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, under Standing Order 44, I beg to move that the Bill be re-committed to the Select Committee.

I am one, Sir, who is in agreement with the principle of the Bill, but to my mind there are certain very weighty considerations which seem to have been overlooked by the Select Committee. There is no doubt that the Married Women's Property Act, as appears from the Preamble and the opening sections of the Act itself, was intended for a certain class of persons who are not affected by the special doctrines of Hindu or Muhammadan law, or the general law, for the matter of that. The House will see that the Act now in force contemplates principally the persons in India who come under the operation of the Indian Succession Act. What the Married Women's

[Mr. J. N. Mukherjee.]

Property Act seems to secure for the benefit of a man's wife and children by way of insurance has been laid down by section 6 of the Act. It is to some extent something in lieu of a marriage settlement, a consideration as it were for the marriage, in many cases governed by the Indian Succession Act. Such cases have concern with the contractual forms of marriage, to a great extent. We are now trying by direct legislation to extend the principle of the existing Act to Hindus, Muhammadans and Jains. The intention of the Bill is no doubt a very good one, but at the same time we have to consider certain aspects of the matter which affect Hindus, Muhammadans and Jains in a special sense. Now, so far as Bengal is concerned, there may not be much difficulty; but as regards other parts of India very often the communities concerned are governed by the Mitakshara school of Hindu law. Under that school, very often the karta or manager of the joint family has dominion over the entire joint family property. Further, according to the Hindu law of the Mitakshara school, the sons are coparceners by birth with their fathers as well as with the other members of the joint family; they have a vested interest in the coparcenary property as soon as they are born and the property becomes the property not only of the father and the karta of the family, and of his sons, but of them and the other coparceners as well. So that any special provision for the sons by way of insurance, by the father will have to be effected with joint family property. That is to say, a karta or the head of Hindu coparcenary property can by heavily insuring his life in favour of his wife and children very often do away with or segregate a portion of the joint family property for the special benefit of his wife and children. That is an aspect of the case, Sir, which seems to have been overlooked by the Select Committee. The Honourable Mover of this Bill placed before the House the points which were really taken into consideration by the Select Committee and the report also refers to them. He did not mention, nor does the report itself mention, that these points were considered by the Select Committee. To my mind, Sir, they are questions of great importance. If a policy is effected by means of joint family property, the people affected have the right to know what the exact position should be of the benefits which are to arise out of that policy in relation to the claims of creditors and others. Then, Sir, it has been pointed out in some of the opinions elicited on the Bill that a Hindu—when insuring his life very often insures it with the idea that the policy is negotiable, so that during his life time he may have the benefit of the policy himself by being able to deposit it with the insurance office and raising money on it, and by otherwise assigning it. Whether upon the passing of the Bill the policy will still remain negotiable or it will have full effect as the Bill intends, that is to say, by imposing a sort of trust for the benefit of the wife and children is another question which requires careful consideration. At any rate, if the effect of this Bill, if passed into law, be that persons of this class will be deterred from insuring their lives for the benefit of wife and children and that they will thereby be deprived of their right of negotiating on the policy, it will perhaps have an effect opposite to what it aims at securing. That is to say, the object of the Bill being to benefit the wife and children of the person insuring his life, it will perhaps by that process have a deterrent effect, and the Bill will fail to achieve its own purpose. These are considerations, Sir, which lead me to think that more careful attention should be given to the Bill itself and these different aspects of the question should be considered in greater detail. The insurance companies have also raised certain objections and the House may also take into consideration whether we should insist upon a trustee being always named in such cases so far as Hindus, Muhammadans and Jains are concerned. I find, Sir, that Mr. Darcy Lindsay who represents the insurance interests in the question, has not signed the Select Committee's report and I regret I do not find him present here to-day. He would have been able to throw more light on this question, if he had been present here to-day, from the insurance point of view, that is to say, he could have stated, whether the Bill will have a discouraging effect on insurance business, if passed in the form in which it is now presented to the House. If greater facilities for insurance had been offered by the Bill and more detailed consideration been accorded to the subject, it would, instead of defeating its own purpose, perhaps help to secure the end it has in view. All these points, I submit, Sir, the House may be pleased to take into consideration, and to re-commit the Bill to the Select Committee, specially because there is no haste in the matter. The country has done without the Bill so long. It does often suffer to my mind from hasty legislation; and the House should stop and consider whether it should now pass this Bill in its present form, which is foreign to the social organization of the classes contemplated by it, without more detailed consideration of the points indicated. We should not take away the existing system simply by considerations of haste and speedy legislation. With these observations, Sir, I move that the Bill be re-committed to the Select Committee.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I cannot help saying, with all deference, that the Honourable Member who has just spoken has not understood the scope of this Bill. Sir, the object of this Bill is to place Hindu widows in the same position as widows belonging to the Christian community. Under the Married Women's Property Act, section 6, if an insurance is effected in favour of wife and children, a trust is created and the insurer is thereby debarred from dealing with the insurance as if it were his own property, and his creditors after his death cannot attach it as if there has been no trust. That is the object of section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act. That benefit has been secured to Christian women and we want to secure it for Hindu women. That is the object of this Bill. That would not affect the questions which my Honourable friend has raised in the debate just now. My friend Mr. Subrahmanayam, for example, has some doubts of an analogous character and those doubts also will not in any way be solved or made worse by the provisions of this Bill. For example, Sir, supposing an individual out of joint family property pays premia and at the same time declares that the amount of the policy should go to the wife and children. Undoubtedly, if this Bill becomes law a trust will be created in favour of the wife and children. He himself cannot deal with it; his creditors cannot deal with it. It would not defeat the rights of the joint family if the members of the joint family choose to claim it, because a man cannot be creating a trust of somebody else's property, defeat the rights of the true owner. Those rights will always remain intact. They will not in the least be affected by anything that he has done. Those rights will remain and continue to remain, notwithstanding anything that he may say or do. The object of this Act is to prevent the man himself from again borrowing a loan upon the insurance, to prevent his creditors after his death from attaching the property as if there has been no trust. These benefits are given to women of other communities and these benefits are intended to be secured by this Act to Hindu women. That is the only object of this Bill and I do not see how the considerations which have been put forward so elaborately by my Honourable friend arise at all in connection with this Bill. This is a simple Bill. I had intended, Sir, to bring in a Bill which was somewhat more ambitious, and if my Honourable friend had in mind the provisions of my Bill, probably he would be justified in making the remarks; but that Bill is not before the House. The short Bill before the House is to give Hindu women the same rights which are possessed by Christian women under the Married Women's Property Act. That is all, and without understanding that object of this Bill if criticism is directed towards showing that Hindu families will suffer, I think that would prolong the discussion and would result in no good whatsoever.

[Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar.]

There is one point which I want to put before you, Sir, and it is this. Undoubtedly the ruling would be from you, Sir, but I want to mention the point. Very often motions are made for re-committing a Bill to the Select Committee. If I may say so, it is only for acts of omission and commission by the Select Committee that you can ask that the Bill do go back to the Select Committee. If you object to the principle of the Bill, if you say that the Bill itself should be defeated, it must be on the floor of this House. All these points must be debated and you must vote against the Bill. What has the Select Committee done in this particular case? What are the acts of commission and omission which can be charged against the Select Committee and why should a motion for taking back the Bill to the Select Committee be made in the manner in which it has been made. Sir, I make these general observations, because very often we find that without adverting properly to the meaning of the motion of sending a Bill back to the Select Committee, these motions are made in this House; and my remarks, Sir, are intended generally for all motions of this kind. On this particular matter, Sir, my submission is, the remarks of the Honourable gentleman who spoke just now are beside the point altogether.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I would be very unwilling to say anything that would retard the progress of what Mr. Kamat has rightly called the first non-official Bill ready for the consideration of this House. At the same time I do feel the difficulties that Mr. Mukherjee has raised. I am afraid, like him, I shall be charged with not understanding the scope of the Bill. Well, if Mr. Mukherjee and I did not sufficiently appreciate the scope of the Bill, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has made the position quite clear. The Bill aims at placing the Hindu widow in the same position as her Muhammadan and Christian sister with regard to certain matters. So far it is undoubtedly a liberalising measure, and we should welcome all liberalising measures if they are a part of a well-considered organic whole. Fortunately or unfortunately it is difficult for us now to understand why the Hindu law-givers, with whom Dr. Gour, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and many more would have no patience at this long distance of time did not choose to put the Hindu widow under same schools of Hindu law in the same position as her more fortunate sisters under other systems. Times are undoubtedly changing. Insurance policies are a thing which have come from the West, like the Law of Trust.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Not known in Mr. Manu's time.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Not known in Mr. Manu's time as Mr. Chaudhuri informs me. Mr. Manu was not a longheaded man. Any way it is there and we must reckon with it. Anyhow intricate questions arise if the insurance has been at the expense of the family, as it may well be, and often is. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar would go so far as to say, better far, (Dr. Nand Lal will no doubt assert) better far pamper the already pampered profession of the law, augment the chance of family litigation; let the family fight out whether the trust is maintainable or not, let the creditor be kept at arm's length, but give the widow rights which according to some High Court she does not enjoy—Would this be right and desirable? Sir, in my early days, the Law of Trust used to be explained by some in a very short fashion as the Law of Distrust. It was supposed to be invented only to keep some people at arm's length. The King then was acting in a very untrustworthy fashion, and the lawyers of Great Britain evolved the Law of Trust. Supposing the creditor has to be kept at arm's length, which I understand from Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar is, not the sole, but one of the objects of the Bill, he would and could be so kept if the debt had not been incurred under terms sanctioned and contemplated by the particular school of law. If these terms were satisfied the property may be available for the satisfaction of that debt. There are complications which we cannot, however much we may desire, fail to take note of. The Hindu law of succession has its difficulties, judged by modern standards. We are not discussing that big question on its merits or demerits. And we cannot ignore these difficulties. There are sections of the community that think that what is proposed is a method of circumventing the wise or unwise provisions of the Hindu law that cannot appeal to the general body of people. It seems to me therefore that there is room for a little more careful consideration of the situation as a whole than has been bestowed on this Bill particularly when premia have been paid out of this Joint Estate. I for myself am not prepared to endorse the whole of Mr. Mukherjee's objections to the Bill because I do feel that in a proper manner and as a part of a well-considered organic whole, liberalising influences have to come into play. But whether we can take big questions piecemeal like this is what I am unable to understand. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has drawn your attention to the desirability or otherwise of moving for the Bill being sent back to the Select Committee as a blocking measure, if I may put it shortly for him. Well that is a constitutional method open to Members and I do not see, if necessity arises and if a case is made out why the method should not be resorted to. For my purposes however there is in Mr. Mukherjee's proposal more than that. I would not consent to the Buddhist being excluded from the purview of the Bill for any of the reasons that have been put forward in the Report of the Select Committee. One reason is that there is no Buddhist Member present in this House. Well, Sir, communal representation is in the air; but it is carrying matters a great deal too far to say that because for the time being there does not happen to be a representative of a particular community present in the Assembly, is a reason why what is otherwise right and proper should not be done. The Government must have consulted Buddhist representatives, and their opinion must be before the Government. That is not all; the Burma Government, we are told, is prepared to have local laws with regard to the matter, but Burma has by no means the monopoly of Buddhist subjects of His Britannic Majesty. I come from a Province where there is a large Buddhist population who could not get the benefit, if it is a benefit, of the Burma Act. And therefore, if the principle of the Bill is to be made applicable to Indians, I do not see why the Bengal Buddhists should be excluded. And there are Buddhists in other provinces, not to the same extent as in Bengal, that is one of the reasons why this matter should be reconsidered. I shall probably be told that, as was attempted in another matter not many days ago in this House, to effect a remedy in this direction by an amendment to bring the Buddhist within the purview of the law. Possibly that course was open; but the point of view that has been put forward by the Select Committee would be better considered even from the Burmese point of view, if the Bill went back to the Select Committee. For all these reasons, Sir, I think the motion for re-committal of the Bill is not as ill-conceived as Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar would suggest, and I support Mr. Mukherjee.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I support this Bill in its entirety. The position is simply this. There is a section of the Married Women's Property Act of 1897 which I shall read, for it is necessary to understand what it is because many a Member here may not have had the opportunity to know its contents:

"A policy of insurance effected by any married man on his own life and expressed on the face of it to be for the benefit of his wife or of his wife and children or any of them, shall endure and be deemed to be a trust for the benefit of his wife, or of his wife and children, or any of them, according to the interest so expressed, and shall not, so long as any object of the trust remains, be subject to the control of the husband, or to his creditors, or form part of his estate."

That is the law as laid down by the Legislature. The question arises whether Hindus could take the benefit of this section. The High Courts have differed in their opinions of the Act. The High Courts differed in their opinion. The cause of difference was this. Section 2 says: "Nothing herein contained applies to any married woman who at the time of her marriage professes the Hindu, Muhammadan, Buddhist, Sikh or Jaina religion, or whose husband at the time of such marriage professes any of those religions." This section has been the subject of controversy between the various and even among Judges of the same High Court. It is unnecessary for me to enter into the particulars of that controversy, but the result of this doubt has led to considerable hardship to widows and orphans, for whose benefit the husband or the father had effected an insurance. I will instance to you a case which came within my own professional experience. A schoolmaster on not a very large salary insured his life for a sum of Rs. 10,000 in one of the Indian companies. He died prematurely. His wife and children applied to the insurance company for the money. The brother of this schoolmaster, almost a scamp, if I may put it so shortly, put in a caveat and wrote a letter to the insurance company saying "Do not pay that money. My brother is a Hindu and I am a Hindu, and I have got some claim to the amount." What did the insurance company do? When two people claim the same amount, the company has to protect itself. It cannot hand over the money to one of them, even though it believes that person to be the rightful claimant. What it did was to say to the two parties "Go and settle your quarrel in Court, we will pay later on." The result was they had to go to Court and there was a delay of nearly two years before the widow and the sons, who were minors, could get that money. Now, that hardship is a hardship which, apart from being a Hindu, apart from being a member of any other community, I suppose Members of this House will recognize to be a hardship which ought to be removed. Now, Sir, it is that hardship which is sought to be removed by this Bill, namely, to make the insurance companies safe, to protect the insurance companies, and, at the same time, to protect the widows and orphans who require protection and who cannot, under the circumstances in which they live, carry on a war against adult male relations of the deceased. Well, I had another case in regard to a foreign insurance company. The companies were already dealing with the matter very correctly, but there were difficulties when claims of this sort, Hindu joint family claims, Hindu Mitakshara family claims, Hindu Dayabhaga family claims, and all kinds of family claims are put forward. Now, the Bill seeks to do away with, or, at least, to minimise, such troubles, and it is not a new provision. It is a provision which exists in an Act of the Legislature and, owing to this clause which is in the earlier section of this Act, and the difference between two High Courts, this Bill is introduced. After all, this Bill does not affect any vested interests of people in the property of the deceased. Now, what does this section say? It says that this policy shall not form part of his estate. Hindu lawyers may rest assured that, if there is a joint family estate, it will not affect that, that claim will subsist; if there are other claims, those claims will not be defeated.

Now, there is another aspect of this insurance business. A man insures his life immediately after marriage or before marriage, and that means a provision for his wife and children. That is a well-understood method at any rate among Europeans and those who have learnt that method of provision for their families from Europeans. Now, take the case of a Hindu who is in service and earning his living. He insures his life for the benefit of his wife. The man dies suddenly. The opponents of this measure say: "No, that money should not be given to his widow." The policy, as expressed on the face of it, is for the benefit of his wife, or his wife and children. If a man pays month after month a certain share of his earnings and has said in express terms that it is for the benefit of his wife and children, what injustice is there to prevent his wife and children receiving that money. It is a pure act of justice which this Bill wants to provide for, because, owing to the interpretation of Judges, some difficulty has been felt upon this matter. Therefore, Sir, I would say that, so far as this Bill is concerned, it is a very simple measure and it only touches one part of it; it does not affect any vested interests and any persons connected with the deceased. Therefore, it ought to receive the acceptance of the House.

Mr. P. P. Ginzwa (Burma: Non-European): Sir, I had not the slightest desire to intervene in this debate, because, I frankly confess, that this is a department of law in which I am very little interested under my peculiar circumstances in Burma and I am not at all concerned with what "Mr. Manu" and other legislators in India have said about the rights of married women; but certain remarks were made by my Honourable friend from Bengal (Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary) which I cannot allow to pass unchallenged. I am aware, that an all-powerful and an all-knowing Legislative Assembly is entitled to legislate for the whole of India, but there are conditions under which I think it would be perilous for this Assembly to meddle with the interests of a province about which it knows little or nothing. (Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: "Though it was well represented.") The two objections that have been taken to any legislation being passed by this Assembly are, I submit with great respect to this House, valid, first of all, that there is no Buddhist in this Assembly. There is no doubt there is no Buddhist in this Assembly though there are some Burmans—we like to call ourselves Burmans. I see an Honourable Member (Mr. H. Tonkinson) opposite me who is also a Burman. The Buddhist law is, I submit, a law about which the ablest practitioners in India are expected to have very little

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

knowledge because it is entirely different from the law that is prevalent in India. I do not think that we claim too much when we say "For Heaven's sake do not legislate for us because we do not wish to trouble you: you have got to make a special study of our law and it is quite possible that you may go wrong." I do not see any justification whatsoever for my Honourable friend from Bengal wishing to impose his law upon my province. Then he said that he objected to the Local Government saying that they wanted to legislate for Burma. What objection does he see to it? Why does not he ask the Government of Bengal to legislate for his province; we will not raise any objection whatsoever. It is an admitted fact, I think, it has been recorded in constitutional documents and elsewhere, that the conditions of Burma are so different from those of India that Burma ought to be allowed to work out its own salvation in its own way as far as possible. And I see every justification to the Local Government's claim that this legislation, if it is required in the Province, must be undertaken by the Local Council. But I may point out to the House generally that there is a gentleman corresponding to "Mr. Manu" in Burma whom we call Manugye.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I am sorry, Sir, to interrupt on a point of order, but I must protest against a name which is sacred and held in the utmost respect by Hindus being spoken of in this manner. I hope my Honourable friend will have some regard for the feelings of Hindus in this matter.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: I know, Sir, that my Honourable friend from Bombay has the utmost reverence for everybody, legislators and others, in the past, and I am very glad, Sir, he has drawn my attention to this merit of his. But this did not originate on this side of the House. However, I may point out that Manugye is one of those legislators for whom we have the highest respect and his writings are considered to be of the utmost authority in the Province of Burma at the present moment. And according to him,—he has devised a very simple form of law applicable to widows and husbands too,—whatever property is jointly acquired during the lifetime of the two partners to a marriage goes over to the survivor, subject to the rights of the eldest child; and therefore whatever difficulties you may have in the rest of India, we have no such difficulties in our Province. That is an additional reason why this Assembly should not try to impose its will upon a Province which has no desire to interfere with the affairs of India. And I beg Honourable Members, in this House not to misunderstand me. There is a very strong feeling in Burma that her affairs are not understood by India and that on other occasions, when the least interference is required, much interference is made by India in the affairs of Burma; I do not think that there is any occasion for allowing Burma to feel that that is the way in which her affairs are to be managed in India both by this Assembly and the Government of India. It is for these reasons that I thought it necessary to intervene in this debate. I do not wish that this Assembly should in any way be misunderstood by the people of Burma who have only recently embarked on their new and independent political career.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I should like very briefly to refer to the criticisms of my learned friends Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary and Mr. Mukherjee.

The whole trend of Sir Deva Prasad's argument, I submit, is too late at this time of the day. He objects to the principle of the Bill which was accepted by the House when it committed it to the Select Committee. It has now come out of the Select Committee and all my friend can object to now is not the principle but the details of the Bill. Sir Deva Prasad has appealed to the authority of Manu. My learned friend is aware that in the days of Manu not only wives but children had no property. They were all classed with slaves (Some Honourable Members: "No, no.") as chattels. Those of my learned friends who shout "No" have not read Manu. They were all classed with slaves as chattels. (Some Honourable Members: "No, no.") In course of time they emerged from that servile condition. Surely my friend does not want to relegate his wife and children to the status assigned to them in the Manu Smriti which was composed 3,000 years ago. I am perfectly certain that that is not my friend's object.

My friend, the Honourable Mr. Mukherjee, while directing no direct attack on Mr. Kamat's Bill

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: I did not object to the principle of the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour: He now assures me and the House that he does not object to the principle of the Bill. He nevertheless follows the Fabian policy of recommittal to the Select Committee. But surely yesterday you, Sir, indicated very clearly that if a Member desires that a Bill should be re-committed to the Select Committee he should indicate the lines upon which the Select Committee are to set to work. But my Honourable friend has not done so.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: I did. You were sleeping perhaps.

Dr. H. S. Gour: No, I was very much awake. What is the good of the Bill being re-committed to the Select Committee? The two grounds upon which my learned friend would like the Select Committee to re-cogitate on this Bill are that there are such husbands who are members of a joint family, and if they have used joint family funds for the purpose of insuring their lives for the benefit of their wives, it is the joint family under Hindu law that should participate in the benefit. And further my friend pointed out that if the husband happens to be the manager a further complicated question would arise under Hindu law. That, I venture to submit with due deference to the Honourable Mr. Mukherjee, again raises a question of principle and not one of detail. But I am prepared to answer his queries.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: In Bengal no such difficulties arise.

Dr. H. S. Gour: My friend interjects the remark that in Bengal no such difficulties arise. Now take the ordinary Mitakshara law. What is the position? Assume that the husband is a member of a joint family and assume, for the sake of argument, that he is its manager. Assume further that he has drawn upon the joint family funds for the purpose of insuring his own life for the benefit of his wife and children. So far as his sons are concerned, they are co-partners in the estate, and they present no difficulty under Hindu law. So far as his unmarried daughters are concerned, they are entitled to the daughters' portion. They present no difficulty. I am prepared for the sake of argument to assume that this manager has drawn upon joint funds for the purpose of insuring his own life for the benefit of his wife and children. Now what is the position under Hindu law? It is a well known principle that if a member of the coparcenary does an act inconsistent with its continuance, it causes a disruption. If the other members of the coparcenary feel aggrieved by the conduct of the manager in insuring his wife and children's lives at the family cost, they are entitled to call for a partnership. That is the first principle which the great law giver Manu has laid down. And by the way in one of his slokas he points out that partition is a very righteous thing to do and he strongly commends it, because the Brahmins profit by the partition. Two families are born out of one, and two independent sacred rites have to be performed and the Brahmins benefit thereby.

Consequently, partition is held commendable in law. My submission, therefore, is that my friend Mr. Mukherjee's objections do not in any way touch the point. They create no practical difficulties so far as a joint orthodox Mitakshara family is concerned. Under the Bengal school subject to the Dayabhaga law, there is no difficulty. Where is this difficulty? That, I submit, is the plain question. The Madras High Court in I. L. R. 37 Mad. 483 have laid down that a husband has a right of insuring his wife and children or his own life for the benefit of his wife and children so as to create a trust in their favour. My friend the Honourable Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary pointed out and referred to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's speech on the Bill and said "will it have the effect of keeping the creditors of the family out?" I venture to draw his attention to the proviso to section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act which lays down: "Nothing herein contained shall operate to destroy or impede the rights of any creditor to be paid out of the proceeds of any policy of assurance which may have been effected with intent to defraud the creditors." It is a well-known principle laid down in section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, and apart from the Transfer of Property Act, it is part of the general law that no policy in favour of a wife and children could be used to the detriment of the claims of creditors, and section 6 which Mr. Kamat's Bill is intended to extend by a legal expression to Hindus, Muhammadans and the rest safeguards the rights of creditors against any attempt at fraud upon them. So I submit that difficulty does not confront us. What is then the Select Committee to do? Surely, Sir, neither my friend, Mr. Mukherjee, nor Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary have indicated any lines upon which the Select Committee is to further examine the details of this Bill. I therefore submit that a recommittal would merely delay the further progress of this Bill and would not be conducive to its further progress.

Now, Sir, a few words on the merits of the Bill. I suggest that section 6 was intended, as has been laid down by the Madras High Court, to extend equally to Hindus and Muhammadans. The Bombay and Calcutta Courts have taken a different view. If this Bill is not passed into law, this conflict of authorities will still remain, but is it not the business of this House and of the Indian Legislature to set at rest conflicting decisions of the High Courts which would certainly lead to litigation and delay in the settlement of claims? On these grounds, Sir, I think that this Bill should now be passed by this House without its recommittal to Select Committee.

(Several Honourable Members: "I move that the question be now put.")

The motion was adopted.

The motion to recommit the Bill to Select Committee was negatived.

The motion to take the Bill into consideration was adopted.

Clauses 1 and 2 were added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Sir, I beg to move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE EXCLUSION FROM INHERITANCE BILL.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I move:

"That the Bill to amend the Hindu law relating to exclusion from inheritance of certain classes of heirs, and to remove certain doubts, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of Mr. J. Chaudhuri, Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju, Dr. H. S. Gour, Lala Girdharilal Agarwala, Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri, Rai Bahadur J. N. Mazumdar and myself."

Sir, the rumbling noise which the House heard just now is only the prelude to the thunder which is coming down upon my head in regard to this matter. They began, Sir, by referring to Hindu law and Hindu sacrament only for the purpose of showing that I am attempting something which is irreligious and which is opposed to the sacramental law of the country. At this time I do not propose to go very minutely into the details of the Bill. I have spoken about it on more than one occasion. On the last occasion when this matter came up in Simla for consideration I explained very fully the reasons which led me to bring this Bill before the House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, may I ask whether this is not an adjourned debate? I understand that my Honourable friend has already moved his motion for referring this Bill to a Select Committee; he made a speech on the Bill on that occasion and it was followed by another speech. As far as I know my Honourable friend only proposes to add two names to the Select Committee which he then proposed. Is that not so?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I am very willing, Sir, to be ruled out of order because I do not want to make a speech. As a matter of fact I was only prefacing my remarks with a view to lead up to this. It is unnecessary to make a speech now and if you agree with the objection taken I shall be very glad to be told that it is not necessary to make a speech. I do not want to repeat what I said on the last occasion, and if there are any remarks made by others I shall have time enough to consider the whole matter and give my reply later. On this particular occasion I ask, Sir, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member (the name is not in the printed list), Messrs. Chaudhuri, Subrahmanayam, Rangachariar, Venkatapatiraju, Dr. Gour, Lala Girdharilal Agarwala, Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri, and, instead of Rai Bahadur J. N. Mazumdar I would put in the name of Mr. Allen, and the Mover. As suggested by Mr. Tonkinson, for the reasons given in Simla I move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, it is rather with some regret, which is personal, that I rise to oppose this motion. The personal regret, Sir, is due to the fact that I have a great esteem for the author of this measure. He is one of those persons who has taken us into his confidence about the pilgrimage which he has made to Delhi at an early part of our career on this new Legislative Assembly. He told us, Sir, that he was yearning for improving the Hindu law, and that if his mission failed he thought that he was serving no useful purpose by being in this Assembly. Sir, we have lived two years after that statement made by my Honourable friend to my left and we have found him useful in many other directions. He took rather a modest view of his capacity. I venture to say his capacity in other directions has been more useful than his activities in this direction. Sir, as a student of law when in the eighties I began to learn Hindu law, I was struck with a famous passage in Mayne's Hindu Law,—the preface to his first edition which still rings in my ears and which I believe is still true. In the preface which he wrote to his famous book on Hindu Law this is what he said:

"A third class of opinion is that of the common-sense Englishman, whose views are very ably represented by Mr. Cunningham,—now Judge of the Bengal High Court—in the preface to his recent 'Digest of Hindu law.' He appears to look upon the entire law with a mixture of wonder and pity. He is amused at the absurdity of the rule which forbids an orphan to be adopted. He is shocked at finding that a man's great grand-son is his immediate heir, while the son of that great grand-son is a very remote heir, and his own sister is hardly an heir at all. He thinks that everything would be set right by a short and simple Code which would please everybody and upon the meaning of which the Judges are not expected to differ."

Proceeding he points out:

"The age of miracles has passed, and I hardly expect to see a Code of Hindu Law which shall satisfy the trader and the agriculturist, the Punjabee and the Bengalee, the Pundits of Benares and of Rameswaram, of Amritsar and of Poona, but I can easily imagine a Code very beautiful and specious Code which should produce much more dissatisfaction and expense than the law as at present administered."

Sir, when I read my learned friend's Bill, I was struck with the truth of that remark. Sir, it is not an easy matter to draft a Code. It is an art in itself. I was more forcibly struck with the difficulty of drawing up a Code even when the draftsman tore up to shreds small amendments to the Code of Criminal Procedure, and I truly felt that the draftsmen of the Legislative Department have developed it as an art, and it is true, Sir, it is not that every hand that can attempt successfully to draft a Code. Sir, my Honourable friend's Bill is based on wrong assumptions, hastily drawn up in his enthusiasm to modify the Hindu Law and which, if I may say so, is fraught with difficulties and traps which will benefit the lawyer. It is a simple Bill and consists of only one section. But still, Sir, when we compare it with the law as it is, I rather prefer the law as it is to his Bill. My Honourable friend's object, as he states in his Statement of Objects and Reasons, is to repeal the Hindu law or so much of the Hindu Law which excludes certain persons from inheritance. Sir, what is his title of the Bill? The title is: "This may be called the exclusion from the Inheritance Act," whereas he wants to repeal the law which excludes people from inheritance. He is enacting a law, he tells us, for the exclusion from inheritances of certain classes of heirs. Then, Sir, he wants to repeal a rule of Hindu law which he thinks or assumes exists. Where he gets that rule from I find it difficult to gather. I ransacked all the sources, but I cannot find the rule of Hindu law which he seeks to repeal. It is non-existent. What my Honourable friend says is, "Notwithstanding any rule of the Hindu law or custom to the contrary no person shall be excluded from inheritance or from a share in the joint family property by reason only of any disease." There is no such rule in the Hindu law that a person should be excluded by reason of any disease, or any physical or mental defect. It is not stated in any rule of Hindu law. The rule of Hindu law is contained in Manu and added to by Yajnavalkya which, if Honourable Members will permit me to read, will see how different it is from what my Honourable and learned friend has assumed it to be. Sir, this is the rule as stated by Manu. "Eunuchs," I omit the outcaste, "eunuchs,"—surely nobody ever contends that to be a eunuch is a disease,—"eunuchs, persons born blind and deaf"—that is not a disease, it is incapacity,—"the deaf and the dumb,"—that is not a disease, and "Nirindriya" such as the loss of the use of a limb are excluded from heredity. Sir, I fail to see where the rule is that a person afflicted with a disease is excluded from inheritance. Persons born deaf and dumb or blind, that is congenital, such as the loss of the use of a limb are excluded from inheritance, to which Yajnavalkya adds "and persons afflicted with an incurable disease" which is quite different from disease. Sir, if you want to state a rule of law and you want to repeal that rule of law, state it correctly. And then there is no rule of law which causes inclusion by reason of any physical or mental defect. It is exposing Hindu law to ridicule in the way in which my Honourable friend has stated it. Sir, the Hindu law is not so idiotic, as my Honourable friend would suppose it to be. It is based on reason, it is based on justice, it is based on well-conceived notions, so that if you want to repeal a rule of law, state it correctly, and repeal it. But do not mis-state it and try to ridicule a thing which does not exist. Sir, let us see what is it my Honourable friend has stated in his Statement of Objects and Reasons, and which he reiterated in his speech introducing the Bill. He says, certain persons, classes of persons, have been excluded from inheritance presumably on the ground that their present condition is due to sins in the former birth and are therefore not entitled to share in the family patrimony. Without questioning the soundness of this reason I am of opinion that in the times that we live in,—are we living in godless times, is that the idea? Does he mean that in these progressive times such grounds of exclusion should not be allowed to deprive a man of temporal rights? Why is it opposed to a sense of natural justice and equity? Is that my learned friend's contention? And is he right in assuming, in presuming rather, that the cause of exclusion is that the present condition is due to sins in the former birth? I do not know if my learned friend believes in a former birth. (An Honourable Member: "Very much.") I am glad to hear that he very much believes in it, so that, it is not intended to ridicule our faith in these matters. If it is intended to catch votes from other people who do not believe in it, I must take exception to such a thing. What is the object of making that statement? A gentleman who is I know thoroughly religious in these matters, who has strong faith in a previous birth and subsequent re-births, could use it as a reason here,—I do not understand that,—and what is the reference to present day times,—present day times, unless he means we are all living in godless times when we have no faith and no religion. I can understand that, but I do not see where the trouble comes in at all. In the first place, it is wrong to presume that it is founded on any such rule of law,—except in the case of incurable diseases which Yajnavalkya has added, the other cases are cases of exclusion from inheritance based on well known principles. One well known principle on which the Hindu law of inheritance is based is this,—the capacity to offer oblations. Does my Honourable friend believe in that or not? Will you kindly read it? Does my Honourable friend believe in the efficacy of oblations? Has he to-day performed his Amavasya Tarpana in honour of his ancestors, in memory of his ancestors? He says, yes. We believe in it, Sir. Our theory of the law of inheritance is based upon that. It is all very well for men like Dr. Gour who scorn at religious and orthodox persons, to indulge in such talk, but for my

Honourable friend to my left who believes in and acts up to it, he should know that the theory of inheritance is based upon the capacity to offer oblations, upon the capacity to take part in religious worship, upon the capacity to contribute to the spiritual welfare of the family, so that it is based on that, and by this measure you want to destroy the very foundation on which the law of inheritance is based according to the Hindu law. And these people are incapable of performing it,—what can deaf and dumb people do? (An Honourable Member: "They can offer prayers.") It is not a question of prayers, it is a question of performing the Shradhas. Well, at any rate the Hindu law believes they are incapable of doing it, at any rate they are disqualified, and if they do it, it is no good; we believe in it. It is all very well for persons who have no faith in religion, that is the real secret of it, who have no faith in religion, to proceed to criticise it. Once you have faith in religion, then you feel the efficacy of it. As Mayne points out, the theory of inheritance is that it descends upon the heir—talking on this very Chapter—to enable him to rescue his ancestor from eternal misery. Consequently one who is unable or unwilling to perform the necessary sacrifices is incapable of inheritance; that is the foundation of the rule, because they are incapable of performing the ceremonies that are ordained for a householder, that they are incapable of inheriting; and look at it also not exactly from the religious point of view, but look at it from the point of view of natural justice and equity. Is it opposed to natural justice and equity to exclude persons from inheritance when they are incapable, when they would be incapable, of taking charge of and managing the property? For whose benefit are they to take charge? The Hindu law is not oppressive in that respect; it is purely a personal disability; the children of the excluded person are let in; provided they are not disqualified, they are let in, and they take the place of the excluded persons in the family. It is a pure personal disability attaching to this unfortunate individual no doubt, but as he is unable to take care of the property, it will get into the hands of scheming people if persons who are born deaf and dumb, or who are idiots, if this property is entrusted to them, it will merely get into the hands of scheming people, agents and others; and, on the other hand, the law provides that they shall be provided with maintenance. They will not be thrown into the streets,—in the shape of maintenance they get their share; their children get the property in their places; and if, by God's grace, they are cured—of course in these cases it is very difficult to expect a cure—but if really they are cured, they are put back in their position. Once they have got the property, it is not liable to forfeiture. Property vested is not taken away, and if the disability is removed, they get back the property, they get back to their position, and it is only during the continuance of the disability that they are not given a share in the property, but they are maintained out of the family fund. Now, Sir, what is the injustice in that law? For whose benefit are you giving them a share in the family property? And coming to the needs of the family, what is the object in giving him a share in the property? Is it your object to give the property to his heirs? But his heirs get it; therefore, it is not a disability which applies for ever, therefore it is only a temporary disability, a personal disability attaching to the man who is unfortunately afflicted with this incapacity. I won't call it a disease. It is a pure incapacity, a disability which attaches to the man. Therefore, Sir, I do not think that this Bill is at all necessary in so far as it attempts to remove, or repeal the law as it exists.

Then, Sir, as regards this clause about "Nirindriya" persons who have lost the use of a limb, there has been some doubt. If my learned friend had attempted to remove the doubt created by a conflict of decisions in regard to whether insanity should be congenital in order to exclude a person from inheritance, he would have done some good; because on that matter there is some doubt though the consensus of opinion is that unless insanity is congenital it does not exclude from inheritance. The law has also settled it now that unless the man is from birth deprived of the use of essential limbs, that is a disability which make him a useless person, then also he is not excluded from inheritance. These points may be made certain.

Now, as regards leprosy, that is the only thing where this question of karma comes in, that is, the sins of a former birth, which my Honourable friend referred to and believes in. So far as this is concerned also, it has been settled that it is now limited to the worst possible form of leprosy. That is what Mayne says at page 870—the worst form of leprosy. If he has already inherited and subsequently becomes a leper, he is not deprived of the property. If at the time the inheritance opens he is suffering from the worst and incurable form of leprosy, what can be said in such a case? His children are not disinherited. If he has a son already that son takes his place. Therefore it is only the unfortunate individual himself who is excluded and he will be maintained out of the family funds. I do not see anything opposed to a sense of natural justice or equity in a case like that. What is it that these people who are thirsting to reform the Hindu law see in it? Do they know the principles on which these rules are based? It is a mere anxiety on their part to pose as codifiers of the law and to take the place of "Mr. Manu" as he was called this morning.

I really do not think, Sir, that we are doing any good by this piecemeal legislation. The Hindu law is not so inelastic. Customs have grown gradually; the enormities which at one time grew upon the Hindu law have been removed by judicial decisions and the growth of custom. We would have welcomed the removal of doubts on account of a conflict of decisions between various High Courts. And then there are only two points on which there is a conflict of decisions between Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, and the doubt on those two points my friend has not attempted to remove, although he calls his Bill a Bill to remove certain doubts. He has not said what the doubts are or how he proposes to remove those doubts. He simply wants, Sir, to remove root and branch this chapter on exclusion from inheritance. That is the object of this Bill. Are we going to endorse it? I will join hands with him if he seeks to remove any doubts on account of judicial decisions. But when he seeks to remove root and branch one portion of the law relating to inheritance, then I say he is doing a thing which is quite unnecessary, quite uncalled for and in utter disregard of the principle on which the Hindu law of inheritance is based.

One more word, Sir. My Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, has set a very vicious example to this House, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has followed that example. Directly one community takes up its cudgels against them they drop their own cudgels. Dr. Gour told the House when he was moving the Civil Marriage Bill: "the Muhammadans are opposed to it; very well, I will drop the Muhammadans. The Parsis are opposed to it; I will drop the Parsis also." What remains? There is only the one poor community whom he can go for, the disorganized, disintegrated and divided Hindu community which is an easy prey. Similarly my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, quietly gives up Bengal. Why so? That rule of exclusion, Sir, is opposed to natural justice, opposed to equity and good conscience. He wishes to repeal it. What is good for Madras must be good for my friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, and my friend, Mr. Mukherjee. But why does he drop Bengal? They are also governed by the same rule; but, Sir, he is afraid of their votes, of their opposition. Is that the way of dealing with root principles of Hindu law? Just as Dr. Gour was afraid of the Muhammadans and dropped them, so also my friend is afraid of Bengal opposition and he says so in his Objects and Reasons and he wants to drop Bengal. I can see through it. But I hope this House will not endorse any such view. I oppose this Bill.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban):

Sir, I do not know whether it is a happy or an unhappy position, but in this instance at any rate I am opposed to the motion made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. I do not for a moment wish to be misunderstood. I do not subscribe to all the views expressed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, that no Hindu reformer has a right to suggest modifications in the law of Manu. Nor do I agree with him that my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, has, as it were, done a disservice to the community by introducing his Civil Marriage Bill. I am one of the staunchest advocates of that reform introduced by Dr. Gour. But I want to say that in dealing with questions of Hindu law one has got to understand clearly the principle on which the whole of the Hindu law is based. Not being a lawyer I am not able to define in legal terms what I believe is the principle on which the whole of the Hindu law is based. But I can express it as I understand it from what I should call, if I may be pardoned for doing so, the common sense point of view. The whole of the Hindu law is based on the principle that it does not recognize an individual as the individual is recognized in the western civilization. Its definition of the individual consists not merely of an individual but along with him his family, his wife and child. And wherever questions of the holding of property or questions of a similar character are concerned, they are not looked at from the point of view of an individual as understood in the West but from the point of view of an individual as understood here, an individual consisting of himself, his wife and his child. Now, the other thing to be taken into consideration is that in certain instances this subordination of the individual has been carried too far to a point where it affects the fundamental rights of every individual. Wherever that takes place, I think you would be justified, as my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, has always attempted to introduce, you would be justified in introducing reform which might preserve the right of the individual against being merged too much in the rights of the family. But there is a danger of carrying this theory of the individual right so far as to subordinate altogether the fundamental principle on which the Hindu Law, I believe, is based; and it is because I believe that the proposal aims at the absolute subordination of the principle on which the Hindu Law is based that I venture most respectfully to oppose his motion. Now, why is a man, under the Hindu Law, entitled to inherit the property of his ancestor? Not because he wants to enjoy through the possession of that property. He has no right—in Hinduism—he has no right to inherit property in order only to have for himself all the worldly pleasures that are at his command which he can purchase by means of holding property. (A Voice: "Is that your view?"). My view of the Hindu Law is this, that a Hindu has a right to possess the property of his ancestor only if he has the capacity to perform the five sacrifices that he is called upon to perform because of his being a Hindu. Now, wherever you find an instance where the son of a Hindu is incapable of performing those sacrifices which is the only justification of his holding the property of his ancestor, you take away from him the right of holding that property. You withhold from him that right, but you do not take away that right from his children; and so far as that principle is concerned, it appears to me that it is a very wholesome principle. The difficulty would arise where this principle would be exploited by scheming members of a family, by hook or crook, to settle upon a person who is not insane nor otherwise has any deformity, insanity or some other incurable disease which deprives him of the right of holding property. At the same time one has to remember that there is a greater danger if this was removed from the Hindu Law of scheming persons, as was pointed out by my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar, of scheming persons, of lawyers, taking advantage of the deformity of a man by making him a puppet in their hands and enjoying the fruit of his possession of property. But I want again to emphasise this fact that the Hindu Law does not recognise the individual right of holding property unless the holder of such property is capable of efficiently performing the sacrifices which by the reason of his being a Hindu he is called upon to perform. And in so far as that is concerned, I am opposed to the motion of my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. I repeat that I do not think that the Laws of Manu should not be modified in accordance with the needs of the times. I believe that if the laws of Manu can be so modified as to bring about a reconciliation between the rights of the family which they insist on, and the right of the individual as understood in the West, if they can be modified so as to bring about that reconciliation, that modification ought to be welcome to everyone who loves this country and its civilization. But wherever there is a danger of either of the ideal being carried too far so as to bring about the subordination of the other ideal absolutely, there we should stand out to oppose such a modification. It is on these grounds, Sir, that I oppose the Resolution.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I have as high regard for Hindu Law as my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, but I have no blind faith in it. The history of the Hindu Law shows that it has changed and it has progressively changed and at the present moment when Hindu Law is being administered by European Judges this growth has been arrested. Now, with regard to what my learned friend Mr. Rangachariar said about the offering of oblations and succession, that is one of the things in which I do not believe. I myself offer oblations; I do that as moral duty to my ancestors. But I believe that the theory that succession depends on the offering of oblations, is a legal fiction which was introduced into Hindu Law and which is now discredited. I have got high authorities to support my view that this theory has done more harm than otherwise. I am not arguing a case before a Law Court and I need not cite those authorities. I only mention this to show that my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, is not right in his view. I say that not only Hindu Law, but Hindu civilisation, Hindu literature, have been very progressive and they have even a scientific foundation. For instance, I do not entirely sympathise with my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, with regard to his object, but I have agreed to act on this Select Committee, because I feel that in certain respects the law might be modified. For instance, these disqualifications are based on what some would call, in scientific language, rules of eugenics. It seems reasonable that a leper should not inherit and insane persons should not inherit. Modern science tells us and modern lawyers too are also trying to legislate that such persons should be excluded from inheritance in the interest of society and our Hindu Law anticipated that. But I see no reason why a man who became blind early or even late in life and was in possession of all his intellectual faculties should not inherit. He is disqualified under Manu's Code. But the judge-made-law that we have now has departed from that in many respects. Take the case of other incurable diseases, they have been held to be no bar to inheritance or succession. So, I say these matters are the subject-matters for inquiry in connection with this Bill.

Now, something has been said about excluding Bengal. But Bengal has been rightly excluded as she is not affected in any way. I maintain that we are more progressive in regard to Hindu Law than other parts of India. We can hold individual property and we can dispose of our property just like an Englishman or any other civilized and progressive people in the world. We can give it to anybody we like. That is the reason why my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has excluded us. If we find sons, heirs or other members of the family to be insane, we have the absolute right to settle or dispose of the property in any way we like. We would leave it to other persons, male or female, and we would not leave it to an insane person. It is not through any fear of our fighting or desperate character that the Mover has excluded us from the scope of this law. I do not wish to detain the House, but I will only say that, although I do not agree with the scope of the Bill in all its details, I have agreed to serve on the Committee because in certain cases I feel that some of these disqualifications might be inquired into, and if possible, modified, and conflicts of decision removed. So I do not think that either my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, or others who are opposing it have made out any case for not referring this Bill to a Select Committee.

Mr. S. O. Shahani (Sind Jagirdars and Zamindars: Landholders): Sir, I feel obliged to you for permitting me to give expression to my views on this question. I am a Hindu hailing from Sind, and I have listened therefore with interest to what has been said by previous speakers from other parts of India with regard to the question under consideration. I am going to say something with regard to myself. My uncle's family will probably come to an end so far as the male issue of that family goes, and according to the Hindu law, I will be entitled to inherit some of the property that belongs to my uncle. But it is a fact that it does not even enter my mind, or the mind of any member of my family, to seek to secure the property which is really due to the daughters of my uncle's line. Just now we have been told that the essential principle on which the devolution of Hindu property depends is capacity to offer oblations. No female can offer oblations to the manes of her ancestors under the Mitakshara law.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: May I rise to point of order? The point of order is this that we are at present not discussing that principle of the law which incapacitates females; it is only a question of deformed and otherwise incapacitated individuals.

Mr. President: I do not see the relevance of the Honourable Member's point of order.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I thought the point was not relevant to the issue before us.

Mr. S. O. Shahani: Sir, I want to point out that this doctrine that is being held out for acceptance by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, is an exploded doctrine with some of the Hindus at least. I am a Hindu. Of course Mr. Rangachariar is a very orthodox Hindu, and I have listened with very great interests to what he had to say with regard to this question. I have nothing but admiration to offer for the imaginative manner in which he has handled his untenable point, a point which cannot be maintained, according to me, by any reasonable Hindu in the present day. He has run down the present times and he thinks that those who hold contrary views are uncivilized; but I want to point out to him that I am as great, if not as orthodox, a Hindu as he imagines himself to be. . . . (An Honourable Member: "If not greater.") Yes, if not greater. I am not a slavish observer of ritual. I believe less in the credal part of religion, and more in the cultural part of it. Such a belief alone will enable me to unify myself to others who profess different world-religions here in India. It is therefore that I make bold to come forward and say that in my own family I think it would be unimaginable that anyone should on the ground of capacity to offer oblations seek to secure for himself the property which ought to devolve upon the daughters of his uncle's line. I have another instance to give, and that is this. Two brothers lived in a joint family. One brother died leaving an only daughter, who has lost her mind now. Are the surviving brother and his sons to be deemed entitled to the property that has been left by the father of this maniac girl who needs protection so badly? According to the Hindus of the class to which I belong the purposes of the property are quite different to the purposes which have been enumerated by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. I have got to point out that it was Mr. Rangachariar who had the courage on a former occasion here on the floor of this House to get up and justify the institution of deva dasis in the temples that exist in Madras. Of course he is true to his own faith, but such a faith to be recommended to others who belong to communities which can think rightly and consistently with regard to men and things in life, is, I think, at least a wrong procedure. That this sensible Bill which has been proposed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, should be run down on these grounds is a pity; and it will be indeed a greater pity if this Bill comes to be rejected on these grounds. One real defect in the Bill has however been referred to by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, namely, that our Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has omitted Bengal from the purview of his Bill. I really do not understand the reasons for this omission. I do not impute motives, and I do not think that it is the desire to capture votes that has led to this omission. The omission to my mind has yet to be accounted for. If the Bill is good for all, it must be good for the Bengalees too. Bengalees are said to be a progressive people who can help themselves in the matter of inheritance. Quite true. Precisely on that ground it would not matter if the Bengalees were deliberately included amongst those who would be affected by the new Bill.

The Bill under consideration is a wholesome Bill from every point of view. So far as I see, on grounds of truth, justice and expediency this Bill ought to find favour with all of us here in this House.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi (Law Member): On this Bill the Government have, after careful consideration of the opinions received from the various Provinces, decided to adopt a neutral attitude, leaving it to Honourable Members, including official Members, but excepting Members of the Executive Council who in accordance with past practice will not take part in the voting to vote on the motion as they like. (An Honourable Member: "Why not leave it to the Hindus?") That being the position of Government, it is hardly necessary for me to make a speech on this motion. But there is one point to which I think I might be permitted to invite the attention of the House. It has been said by more than one speaker that the real basis of the right of inheritance in Hindu law is the capacity to perform oblations. Well, until the passing of a certain enactment, apostasy or conversion to a religion other than Hinduism was a disqualification for inheritance, because the converted person, having ceased to be a Hindu, was thereafter incapacitated from performing oblations. Nevertheless, the Indian Legislature passed an Act (Dr. H. S. Gour: "The Lex Loci Act of 1850." Dr. Nand Lal: "Act XXI of 1850.") known as the Freedom of Religion Act, XXI of 1850, whereby apostasy or conversion from Hinduism to another religion no longer deprives a person from inheriting to his Hindu relations.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has made a gratuitous reference to me in connection with his very orthodox views on Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's Bill. I can only reciprocate the compliment by correcting a misstatement into which he has undoubtedly fallen in giving a historical basis for the rule enunciated by, not only by Manu, but also by the author of the Mitakshara, Vidyaneshwar, whom I shall presently cite, disqualifying from inheritance persons who are suffering from any disease. (A Voice: "Incurable disease.") Not incurable disease. Now, my friend's argument—and I hope the House will recall his argument—was that the whole doctrine of the Hindu law of inheritance is based upon the doctrine of spiritual efficacy. That, no doubt, is true, but it is a later doctrine. If you go far back into antiquity, you will find that the very same doctrine pervaded the archaic laws of Greece, Rome, Egypt and China, and the foundation for all these ancient laws was that in the nomadic life which our ancestors led the fighting man was the only man who was entitled to share the spoils of war and, consequently, a man who was impotent and devoid of sense or limb was incapable of fighting, and was therefore held to be incompetent to inherit. A spiritual form was in later days given to this extremely utilitarian doctrine which was the common doctrine of all ancient societies; but in later days when the disability survived the occasion which gave birth to it, it was said that, as the disabled people were incapable of performing sacrifices and of offering oblations to the deceased, they were incompetent to inherit. Unfortunately, the very narrow doctrine enunciated by the earliest law-givers was enlarged upon by the later Smritikars, Yajnavalkya, and his commentator Vidyaneshwar in his Mitakshara, expanded the doctrine beyond all reasonable limits. If Honourable Members will turn to the Mitakshara they will find two clauses. He first cites Yajnavalkya who says: "An impotent person, an outcast, and his issue, one lame, a mad man, an idiot, a blind man and a person afflicted with an incurable disease and others similarly disqualified must be maintained excluding them however from the participation," upon which the author of Mitakshara says: "those who have lost a sense." Any person who is deprived of an organ of sense or action by disease or other causes is said to have lost that sense. He expands the doctrine much beyond the original scope of the law of inheritance. Surely, Sir, the Mitakshara will disqualify from inheritance any of our Hindu brethren who went to France and lost their limbs fighting for their King and country. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "But not the law as it is.") That is the law of the Mitakshara, that is the orthodox law, that is the law to which my friend appeals. Surely my friend could never expand the doctrine to that extent. The fact is that, in spite of the rigid orthodoxy and unbending and stern conservatism of my friend, the law has been expanding from time to time, and, at the present moment, the original purpose for which the narrow restrictions placed by the doctrine of inheritance were enunciated have been practically swept away. Cases after cases have made an inroad upon this narrow doctrine and my friend himself admits that now nothing but the shell remains, the core has been eaten up by a series of decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council and of the Indian cases. What is the good of my friend now asking this House to re-iterate an old obsolete doctrine which is not the living law? What is the good of my friend appealing to the orthodox sentiments of my Hindu friends and saying "Please do not make any inroad upon your ancient law?" What is the good of my friend standing up here and saying that our law is based upon that transcendental fact that he who is incapable of performing a sacrifice is incompetent to inherit. My friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, while apologising for not being a lawyer, pointed out that the law we are now administering is the law of Manu. Will my friend be surprised to hear that, if he wishes to bring himself under the law of Manu, he had better vacate the rich possessions which he has inherited from his father, because Manu does not recognize the right of a son or wife to inherit; they are classed as chattels and have no rights of their own. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "That is not correct.") Read that flagged portion, you will find the statement there. But surely my friend must not labour that point. These are ancient doctrines. The moment you examine them you find they are like geological seams lying imbedded in ancient history, and, as you come up, you see tier after tier of fresh and new growth. Coming to modern times, you find that, while you have the deepest reverence for the ancient law, you follow not the ancient law to its letter, but you revere that ancient law to the extent which is consonant with custom. Manu himself says so. He says in the closing chapter that custom is transcendental law and he points out, and that is a maxim repeated by Gautama, that, whenever people wish to know what is the correct law, let five people, learned in the law, sit together and decide. Surely, Sir, that is an injunction to this House to decide what is right. I shall give to the Honourable Members the ipsissima verba of that very ancient and sacred inculcation:

"In cases for which no rule has been given that course must be followed of which at least ten Brahmins who are well instructed, skilled in reasoning and free from covetousness, approve."

Consequently, I submit, Sir, this is the ancient rendering of the modern Reforms Act and what is contained in the sacred law books themselves. There is justification for the doctrine that these matters must be all settled by the consensus of opinion of the wise. When he speaks of the Brahmins he speaks of the learned—he does not speak of people who are ignorant Brahmins. (Laughter.) I therefore submit that this House has not only the secular authority of the Government of India Act but the sacred authority of the best law books, for going into this question and deciding it in accordance with what is right and just.

[Dr. H. S. Gour.]

The Honourable the Law Member has pointed out, Sir, that as far back as 1850, the Indian Legislature enacted a rule adopting the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission appointed by the Parliament Act of 1832, sweeping away the restriction which existed under Hindu law by which the conversion to another faith was held to deprive a man of all rights to inheritance of property. Now, Sir, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's Bill surely does not make such a sweeping change. It is a Bill which is founded on the elementary principle of reason and justice. Two brothers are born, one of them is born blind and the other is born possessed of sight. Is there any reason, I ask, why the brother who is afflicted with blindness should be excluded from inheritance? I say, Sir, that if out of the two our sympathies should go out to any one it should be to that afflicted brother. (Hear, hear.) And yet my friend would perpetuate the cruel wrong excluding those people who suffer from the loss of sight or limb from inheriting their patrimony. What justification is there for such a course? I have already pointed out that there is absolutely no justification, if you examine the question in the light of reason. Sir, I do not wish to labour this point. I can only hope that my friends, my Hindu friends in particular, will rally to the support of a measure which is intended to place Hindu law alongside the other modern laws. As my friend Mr. Chaudhuri unwittingly remarked, under the Bengal law he can dispose of his property like any civilised man. I ask, Sir, shall not our law be in line with the laws of other civilized peoples?

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, this is a very useful measure which has been introduced by my friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. My learned friend, the advocate of orthodoxy, I mean the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar, has told us to look at the soundness of the Hindu law. The soundness which he has suggested is this—"that a man who is suffering from an incurable disease cannot look after himself; therefore he is deprived of the property, so that that property may not go to outsiders. There is a provision in the Hindu law that a man who is born blind, who is a leper, who is dumb, who is deaf—the other members of the family are bound to maintain him." That is the main ground which he has set forth in refuting the arguments which were advanced in favour of this Bill. While recognizing the sanctity and superiority of Hindu law in many respects, other than the aspect before us now, may I ask him, is he not aware of some cases in which maintenance to these unfortunate men was disputed by their litigious relations. Their brothers, their relations, will go to Court and they will say "Such a man is not entitled to maintenance on this ground and that." So my learned friend must admit that, though it stands, and very rightly, intact in some cases, the orthodox stands broken, to a certain extent, in some quarters. Customs have been introduced, and, at some places, even Hindus are not governed by the strict provisions of Hindu law which he has expounded on the floor of this House. Perhaps he is being guided by what happens in his own Presidency of Madras. The fact remains, however, as has been argued by a number of previous speakers, that some of these ancient principles of Hindu law are not adhered to strictly in some parts of India. We cannot deny that fact. After all we are not living 3,000 or 4,000 years back. We should not ignore the circumstances that should guide the Legislature of to-day. My learned friend wishes that these poor Hindus may not, even in some fit cases, be allowed to see the light of day. He wishes that they may be confined to all those old provisions which under the present conditions and in some cases, do not satisfy the present time. On these grounds, Sir, I support the measure which is, if I mistake not, a very wholesome one and should have the unanimous vote of the House.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (and other Honourable Members): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill to amend the Hindu Law relating to exclusion from inheritance of certain classes of heirs, and to remove certain doubts, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of Mr. Chaudhuri, Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju, Dr. H. S. Gour, Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala, Mr. Harchandrai Vishindis, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri, Mr. B. C. Allen and Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar."

The motion was adopted.

THE HINDU LAW OF INHERITANCE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I believe that the objections to this Bill were fully set forth by the previous speakers, and I also think the answers to those objections have been given by previous speakers. This Bill is absolutely necessary in order to enable certain female members to inherit before agnates to the seventh degree. This place would be earlier. I find that even my friend, Rao Bahadur Rangachariar, says this is a reasonable Bill, so there is no necessity for me to say any more on the subject. I move:

"That the Bill to amend the Hindu Law of inheritance in certain particulars and to remove certain doubts, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam, Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao, Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju, Munshi Iswar Saran, Rai Bahadur Nishi Kanta Sen, Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, Mr. B. N. Misra, Mr. K. G. Bagde, Mr. K. C. Neogy, Dr. Gour, Mr. T. P. Mukherjee and myself."

The motion was adopted.

THE MUSSALMAN WAQFS REGISTRATION BILL.

Maulvi Abul Kasem (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill to provide for the Registration of Waqf estates and the proper rendering of accounts by the Mutawallis of such estates in British India be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member, Mr. P. E. Percival, Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Ismail, Mr. Zahid Ali Subzposh, Mr. W. M. Hussanally, Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din, Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan, Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan, Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed, Mr. Abdur Rahim, Haji Wajihuddin, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed, Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah, Nawab Ibrahim Ali Khan, Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala, Maulvi Abdul Quadir, and myself."

Sir, this Bill was introduced some time back, and I had to wait taking any further action on it because the Government of India had asked for opinions from the Local Governments and they were awaiting the replies. This is a very simple measure though it might look rather a cumbrous one on the face of it. The object of this Bill and the principle which I want to press before this House is that there should be some sort of control over the administration of waqf estates. It is well known not only to my co-religionists in this country but to all my fellow-countrymen and also to members of the Government that trust properties in this country are very much mismanaged, and the mismanagement and misconduct in the administration of these trust properties has become an outstanding scandal in this country. Several attempts were made from time to time by various individuals and public bodies to get a remedy, but unfortunately they have always failed for one reason or another. I have purposely confined myself to Muhammadan trust properties because I wanted to proceed on the line of least resistance. I know for myself and I have been told that the case of the trustees of Hindu charitable endowments are not better than that of the Muhammadan institutions. But, Sir, I thought it better to confine it to the endowments affecting Mussalmans only. It is not intended in any way by this Bill to interfere with the rights, the privileges or the powers of the mutawallis or trustees of these waqf estates, nor is it intended to give anybody a right of interference with their work. The only thing which is wanted essentially is that every mutawalli of a waqf estate should get his waqf properties duly registered in a public office and that the mutawallis should be liable to render accounts of his receipts and expenditure. Unfortunately, Sir, we have found it the case that mutawallis of waqf estates generally and the majority of cases treat trust property as their own personal property. Cases are numerous where these mutawallis have not only used the usufruct of these properties as their own, but have borrowed money by mortgaging those properties and have sometimes even effected a sale of waqf properties. As long as they have some of these properties left they never admit that it is waqf property, but when every inch of land appertaining to that trust is sold and goes into the hands of non-Muhammadans the mutawalli appears before the members of the community in a plaintive mood and says "This is Muhammadan property which has gone into the hands of Hindus." But primarily the mutawalli himself is responsible. In fact a large portion of waqf trust properties in my province has gone into the hands of either non-Muhammadans or to Muhammadans as their personal property. In any case where litigation was started to recover these waqf properties, it was found that the interests of third parties and of bona fide purchasers were affected, and in equity and justice our claims could not be pressed further. Therefore, Sir, I want, and I have been asked by my constituents to demand it, that all these waqf properties should be duly registered in public offices so that if anybody advances money on these properties or if anybody wants to purchase those properties he has an opportunity of ascertaining whether it was the personal property of the mutawalli or whether it was trust property in his charge. He will do so with his eyes open and without any misapprehension.

The second point is that there should be some sort of control. This control is to be exercised by a committee consisting of Muhammadans only over the accounts and the work of the mutawallis. I am not a lawyer myself and I do not claim to be at all a good draftsman. I have drafted the Bill to the best of my ability; in fact I have copied the sections from various Bills presented either in the Viceroy's Legislative Council or elsewhere by distinguished lawyers and other people; and I admit that there is much to be improved. The best course to do that would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee and therefore I have taken particular care to include in the Select Committee distinguished lawyers so that we may have good legal opinion and draftsmanship and a large number of my Muhammadan friends so that all shades of opinion may be expressed and the matter thoroughly discussed in the Select Committee. I have been told, Sir, that the Local Governments in their opinions are unanimous in saying that this a measure which ought to be left to the provincial Legislatures and that this Assembly should not legislate for the whole country, this being one of the transferred subjects or subjects which should be dealt with provincially. I beg to submit, Sir, as I did when introducing this Bill, and as the then Leader of the House, Sir William Vincent, remarked, that although it may or may not be a question from a technical point of view to be decided by the provincial Governments and by the provincial Legislatures, I think that in such an important question as the administration of waqf estates there should be a uniform law for the whole country and not conflicting Acts, one for Bengal, a second for the Punjab, a third for Madras and a fourth for Bombay. Therefore, Sir, I hope this House will agree with me that the time is ripe now when we should do something about the proper management of trust estates and trust properties.

It does not, fortunately for me, interfere with any personal law, that is to say, Muhammadan law or with any religious institution, and therefore I have no apprehensions of treading on delicate corns. Certainly it will affect the vested interests of the Mutawallis, but here we have to consider not the interests of Mutawallis who are in charge of trust properties but of the beneficiaries who are to be benefited or who have to enjoy the trust properties. Waqf properties were created by pious men for the benefit of humanity and their co-religionists and it will be a great misfortune to the country if the money which was ear-marked for the benefit of humanity and certain classes of people, were to be misappropriated by other people which was never the intention of those who created these Waqf Estates. The Mutawalli of the biggest waqf properties in my province is the Government of Bengal, and even under their management carried by a subordinate I am afraid the waqf is not properly managed and controlled. Therefore, Sir, the necessity was felt, and felt keenly for a long time for such a Bill as this. Mr. Rangachariar said that when my friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar came to this Council he did it with the object of introducing certain reforms in the Hindu law. Sir, I came to this House not with that purpose, but with a distinct mandate to press this Bill before this House, because attempts were made previously by myself and my friends in the local Legislature to introduce a legislation of this kind, in fact this very draft was sent to the Bengal Government and they sent it to the Government of India. The Government of India then refused sanction for its introduction in the local Legislature, because at that time they said it was not a matter for the Provincial Council but for the Viceroy's Imperial Legislative Council. But now that my people in Bengal have sent me here with a distinct mandate to press this Bill, I have been told that I have brought it after the reforms and this is a subject which devolves upon the Provincial Governments and it is not for the Members of this House to consider. I submit, Sir, again, that in an important measure like this there should be uniformity of law for the whole country, and the law that prevails in the Punjab should prevail in Bengal and other parts of India as well. Therefore, Sir, I hope that the Government and the House as a whole will support this measure. Of course the Bill will have to be redrafted and reconsidered and minor defects will have to be removed in the Select Committee or when the Bill comes before this House at a later stage. I hope, Sir, that the House will accede to my request and commit this Bill to the Select Committee for its proper consideration.

Mr. President: The motion moved is:

"That the Bill to provide for the Registration of Waqf Estates and the proper rendering of accounts by the Mutawallis of such Estates in British India, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member, Mr. P. E. Percival, Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Ismail, Mr. Zahid Ali Subzposh, Mr. W. M. Hussanally, Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din, Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan, Khan Bahadur, Sarfaraz Hussain Khan, Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed, Mr. Abdur Rahim Khan, Haji Wajihuddin, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed, Maulvi Mian Asjad-ul-lah, Nawab Ibrahim Ali Khan, Lala Girdharilal Agarwala, Maulvi Abdul Quadir and the Mover."

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, there are certain difficulties which

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member raising a point of order?

Mr. K. Ahmed: Yes, Sir. You will see, that my friend, Maulvi Abul Kasem, has no justification at this stage to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, because it was first introduced in September, 1921. After that, we have had three Sessions of this Assembly, and my friend's Bill is suffering from that disease which is incurable. I would refer Honourable Members in this connection to page 29 of the Manual of Business and Procedure of this House. Paragraph 80A, page 29, of this Manual reads as follows: "On the termination of a Session, Bills which have been introduced shall be carried over to the pending list of business of the next Session: Provided that, if the Member in charge of a Bill makes no motion in regard to the same during two complete Sessions, the Bill shall lapse."—as it has lapsed, Sir, "unless the Assembly, on a motion by that Member in the next Session, makes a special order for the continuance of the Bill." Sir, my Honourable friend in his opening speech to-day said that he was not quite sure of his drafting. At the same time he said that we shall try again to sit together to re-draft the Bill. Sir, it is not a question of re-drafting only nor is it a question of putting additional Members on the Select Committee, but he is afraid, Sir, because I am sure he has been sleeping over this Bill not only at the last Session but at the Session previous to it also

Mr. President: I would like the Honourable Member to state his point of order.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, then I take the objection that my friend cannot refer his Bill to a Committee at this stage after the expiry of two Sessions, because it infringes the rules laid down in our Manual of Procedure and Business, and, I submit, Sir, that this Bill should be thrown out

Mr. President: I do not quite appreciate the Honourable Member's point.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, if you will kindly read section 80A, at page 29, of the Manual of Business, you will see

Mr. President: Quite so, I have referred to the section. Will the Honourable Member show me how that applies to the motion made by Maulvi Abul Kasem?

Mr. K. Ahmed: Maulvi Abul Kasem introduced the Bill on the 26th of September, 1921. That is clear, I suppose, Sir. If that is so, then after the September Session, 1921, at which he introduced this Bill, we had two Sessions last year and then again this year

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member suggest that Maulvi Abul Kasem has not made the necessary motion within these two Sessions?

Mr. K. Ahmed: Yes, Sir, he has not.

Mr. President: Then the Honourable Member is wrong, because he has made the motion

Mr. K. Ahmed: I do not find it, Sir. If he has, I shall be very thankful if that will be pointed out to me, Sir.

Mr. President: I would recommend the Honourable Member to exercise his intelligence in finding out why Maulvi Abul Kasem is in order.

Haji Wajihuddin (Cities of the United Provinces: Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I heartily support the motion brought forward by my Honourable friend, Mr. Abul Kasem. I only wish to say that the name of Sayad Rajan Baksh should be added to the Select Committee.

Mr. President: The amendment moved:

"That the name of Sayad Rajan Baksh be added to the Select Committee."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, I oppose the Bill, because it cannot be moved at such a late stage. I have shown you the rule. I do not understand how in the last three Sessions

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the Chair has given a ruling, and Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed is not right in again speaking on this question

Mr. President: The Honourable Member can leave the Chair to take care of itself. I recommended the Honourable Member (Mr. Ahmed) to exercise his intelligence in understanding the Standing Order, but apparently he does not propose to do so.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Is it right for Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed to speak again when the Chair has given a ruling once?

Mr. President: It was not a ruling—merely a recommendation to the Honourable Member from Bengal.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, now I shall have to oppose the Bill. The principle of this Bill stated by him in the Statement of Objects and Reasons is already contained in our existing law. We have got section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, and under this section we can file a suit for rendering a proper account or for a declaration invalidating candidature of certain Mutawallis if they have misappropriated any thing out of the waqf property. Besides this, Sir, my friend admitted that this Bill was pressed in the Bengal Council, and they said that it was the look-out of the Imperial Council and hence it was referred to this Assembly to move this Bill. Thereafter, Sir, in 1920, there was an enactment in regard to this; it is Act XIV of 1920, called the Charitable and Religious Trust Act, framed with the same object, Sir, with which probably my friend has been induced to bring in this Bill before this Assembly. Therefore, Sir, we have got sufficient protection under the present law, as it is,—it is Act XIV of 1920, which has simplified the whole matter with regard to charitable and religious trusts in this country, and section 8 of this Act applies also equally to waqf property and Mutawallis in this country.

[Mr. K. Ahmed.]

Therefore, Sir, it is not only unnecessary but it is really contrary to the principle and object for which Government has already provided enough law, sufficient safeguard, for the people of this country.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Is that a Provincial or a Government of India Act?

Mr. K. Ahmed: I cannot follow my friend.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Is the Act you are quoting a Provincial or a Government of India Act?

Mr. K. Ahmed: It is an Act called Act XIV of 1920, passed here only two years ago, Sir. I suppose my friend now will find that it is a Government of India Act. If that is so, he will find also that it was only a few months before this Bill was introduced into this Assembly that Government brought out safeguards for meeting my friend's difficulties and, therefore, this part of the Bill is unnecessary. Further, Sir, my friend has been saying in this Assembly this morning that the Government of Bengal now is afraid because the Bill has been introduced here and they do not like that this portion of the law should be passed everywhere, but every provincial Government has got a right to pass its own law. The Government of Bengal has given its opinion and it says this: "The proposed Bill, however, appears to be badly designed and proposes a scheme which will interfere with the legal rights of the Mutawallis and bring itself into conflict with the Muhammadan law. Having regard to the general trend of Muhammadan opinion which is opposed to the Bill, the Governor in Council is unable to lend its support to it. The times, too, are not propitious for this legislation." That being so, my friend's questions with regard to it probably will be swept away from the opinion that has been read. Then, Sir, we find other difficulties because in the Charitable Endowment Act, in respect of the Muhammadan religion the Government has always followed the policy of non-interference. The Mutawallis have to do certain acts, as far as their Mutwalliship is concerned, and then they will have to follow certain guidance or direction of the donor that has been set out in the trust deed: in the Waqfnama the Mutawallis are empowered to perform some functions set out there, as for instance to say their prayer, ask persons engaged or appoint persons to offer certain things in the prayer house, and so forth. And the proposed Committee under sections 2 and 3 of this Bill, I think, will have the power of appointing even agents or naib Mutawallis; which will be interference with the Mutwalli's power at least, and that sort of interference is not allowed by the Muhammadan Law. And since, the Muhammadan Law interferes with the principle of my friend's Bill the Muhammadans of India would not approve of it. There is something which has been mentioned in regard to legislation of these Waqf properties. My friend proposes to simplify matters, so that the money-lender may not be misled. Well, Sir, he may be the benefactor of the money-lenders who are very much fond of lending money to the Mutawallis and taking mortgage of their property. But for this purpose if they go to the Registrar in the Registration Office, they will find who the Mutawallis are and where the properties are situated; so the names of the Mutawallis and the description of the property are available there. In every district there is also a Collectorate where there is a Record Office which will furnish the required particulars.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I rise to a point of order. I believe my Honourable friend, Mr. K. Ahmed, is now criticising the details of the Bill, which I believe at the present moment he has no right to do. The question before us is whether the Bill should be committed to a Select Committee or not, and I think he ought to confine his speech to that.

Mr. K. Ahmed: If my Honourable friend will kindly confine his attention to follow the principle which is exactly against the points that I am describing, I suppose the whole matter will be simplified. We see, Sir, the principal object of my friend who introduces the Bill is that there must be a Registrar, and if there are already registers kept by the Government officers which will be of great benefit to the people who want to lend money, what is the necessity, Sir, for this Bill? What is the principle and object set out in the Statement of Objects and Reasons of the Bill? Their position is not in any way better off, but as it is stated therein that it is difficult under the present law to find out the names of Mutwallis and the description of the properties. If they are, Sir, already safeguarded by the present law, and since 1920 at least when Act XIV was passed in this House there is enough provision of law, what is the necessity for introducing this Bill? I say there is no necessity for bringing this Bill at all. Then, Sir, since the principal objects of this Bill is contrary to our tenets of the Muhammadan religion, because it interferes with the functions of the Mutwalli, and because it will interfere with the donors' intentions in settling a property and saying that the income should be spent for certain purposes and it should be managed by certain persons—as a matter of fact we find from generation to generation, from son to grandson, people of the family manage the property,—why should there be this law, Sir, to interfere with that poor Mutwalli and to establish a District Committee? Sir, the District Committee or the District Magistrate or the Collector has not got any money, he has not got the money to defray the expenditure that is necessary. Then section 3 of the Bill contemplates a Central Committee, that is to say, in every province there will be a Central Committee, whose duty will be to go to the district and supervise the activity of the branches of the District Committee over which the District Magistrate will sit, and preside. The District Magistrate will preside over it as ex-officio member. Therefore my friend in the way he has put it is not accurate. Here he has certain rules of law of the waqf estate, but how is that to be put in practice without sufficient money in hand. Government is not going to help in the matter unless they can show sufficient funds in hand. Where is that money coming from? Is there anything in the Bill to provide for the maintenance of those branch district committees and the central committee? The Chief Justice of the Bengal High Court and of the majority of the other Judges of the same Court have in fact opposed this Bill on this particular ground. The Calcutta High Court says:

"The Chief Justice and Judges do not think that a case has been made out for amending the procedure under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. The provision as to damages would, in their Lordships' opinion, probably encourage fraudulent claims."

So there will be multifarious cases instituted against the Mutwallis and the object for which the endowment has been made will be defeated. Any person having a grudge against a Mutwalli or his rival relatives will bring a suit against him and that will interfere greatly with the discharge of his duties and the donor's object will be frustrated. That being so, Sir, I vehemently object to the Bill. There is behind this Bill Sir, a sinister motive: A person bringing a false suit against a Mutwalli may have that suit dismissed with costs, but there is nothing in the whole Bill which provides for the recovery of that money from the person bringing the suit. With regard to the balance which may be outstanding in the hands of the Mutwalli, there is no provision as to how it is to be spent, and that point the central committee or the branch district committee will have to determine. I understand that Dr. Gour has the intention of supporting this Bill. I shall be glad if he will enlighten us as to the principle of the Bill and I shall wait to hear him with great pleasure.

But since, Sir, there are so many difficulties and my friend, who has introduced the Bill, has kindly selected me and others to sit together and to redraft the Bill, we will have to recast the whole thing. That duty must be undertaken by the Honourable Member who introduces the Bill. He must know what the Bill is. If there are mistakes and additional alterations are necessary here and there, it can be carried out, but I do not think there is any practice in this House for the Honourable Members to redraft the whole thing and recast it altogether. In that case matters will be simplified if my friend will withdraw his Bill to-day, and take our help and introduce another Bill probably before the expiry of the Session. With these few words I oppose the Bill.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Five Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Five Minutes to Three of the Clock. Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar was in the Chair.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I rise, Sir, to support my friend Mr. Abul Kasem in his proposal to refer this Bill to a Select Committee.

Mr. C. A. H. Townsend (Punjab: Nominated Official): On a point of order, may I ask if there is a quorum present?

Mr. Chairman: Yes.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, this Bill has now been before the public for a considerable length of time and opinions in almost every part of the country have been expressed in regard to it. The state of Muhammadan Waqfs all over the country, from one end to the other, has been such as to call for remedial measures urgently to protect them in almost every province, and the misappropriations that have been committed by Mutwallis have run into almost a proverb. In my own part of the country there have been several cases of that kind in which mutwallis have actually sold mosques or lands attached to mosques or graveyards. (Mr. K. Ahmed: "Please speak up.") I thought my friend Mr. Kabeer-ud-din Ahmed had better ears. At the present moment there is a case of the kind pending in the Judicial Commissioner's Court in Sind in which some Saiyids, who are mutwallis of a very important graveyard in Karachi, have sold large plots of land for a large amount of money. So far as enlightened Muhammadan opinion is concerned, Mr. Abul Kasem cannot be too much thanked for having brought this measure forward before this House. I am sorry, Sir, that I could not follow my friend Mr. Kabeer-ud-din Ahmed. (Mr. K. Ahmed: "Nor can I follow you.") I am sorry, Sir, I could not follow my friend Mr. Kabeer-ud-din Ahmed in his attack upon this Bill. No doubt he made a very coherent speech, but to me, unfortunately, it was almost Greek. So far as I remember, Sir, he quoted the opinion of the Bengal Government as being against this measure, but, if he had turned over the pages of the Blue-Book, which is now before me, he would have found that almost all intelligent and enlightened Muhammadan opinion in all provinces is in favour of this Bill, and several Local Governments have also pronounced their opinion in favour of the principle of the Bill, though some do not agree with the details.

I will begin, Sir, by quoting the Madras Government. Here is what 3 P.M. they say:

"The Honourable the Minister in charge of the Religious and Charitable Endowments has had the advantage of discussing the main principles of the Bill with the leading Muhammadan representatives in the Legislative Council, and the views expressed and the observations made in the following paragraphs have their full support.

Enlightened Muhammadan opinion in this, as in other Presidencies, is practically unanimous that a very large number of endowments made by pious Muhammadans in the past have been wasted or converted to the private benefit of individuals contrary to the wishes of the original founder, that their administration in many cases has come to rest in the hands of inefficient and unscrupulous mutwallis and that effective measures should be adopted at an early date for preventing waste and mismanagement of Muhammadan public trusts and to ensure that the endowments are appropriated to the purposes for which they were founded. The need for suitable legislation is therefore obvious.

The law governing Muhammadan religious endowments in this province is Act XX of 1863 and a few Muhammadan committees exist in certain districts. They have not been successful in preventing misappropriation and mismanagement."

Sir, I shall proceed further. Let us come to Bombay and see what the Bombay Government say. It is this:

"It will be observed that the Anjuman-i-Islam, Bombay, while approving the proposal for the registration of waqfs, is opposed to the complicated and detailed interference in their management which the provisions of the Bill would entail. * * *

There is, however, a very considerable body of opinion in favour of some measure for compulsory registration of waqf estates and for the maintenance and publication of accounts. If a practical measure of this nature can be devised, the Government of Bombay would favour it. It would be necessary to prescribe that all expenditure should be met from fees prescribed for the purpose or otherwise and that no part should fall on Provincial Revenues."

The Honourable Mr. Justice Aston says:

"I approve of the provisions of the Bill."

In Bengal, again, I find Maulvi Shams-ul-Rahman, Secretary, District Muhammadan Association, Khulna, says:

"I have the honour to inform you that the Registration of Waqf Estate Bill was discussed at a meeting of my Association and am of opinion that the Bill is a necessity in order to prevent misuse of waqf estates by their mutwallis, but with these following modifications in the Bill itself."

Then he goes on to suggest certain modifications with which for the time being we are not concerned.

[Mr. W. M. Hussanally.]

I could go on quoting, Sir, from several opinions, both of European and Muhammadan officers, as well as public men; but I do not wish to waste the time of the House. The United Provinces Government say:

"It will be observed that the majority of those consulted are emphatically of opinion that some machinery for improving the administration of waqfs is eminently desirable, since there are undoubtedly many cases of mal-administration, though possibly the case is stated somewhat too strongly in the preamble to the Bill."

The Punjab Government say:

"I am to point out that the opinions of none of the large holders of shrines, who in the Punjab are fairly numerous and very influential, have been received, but it is anticipated that these men's influence would be thrown against the Bill, as undermining their prestige and requiring a stricter system of accounts than most of them have been in the habit of keeping..... His Excellency in Council suggests that the Bill should confine itself to the compulsory registration of waqfs and the publication of accounts and these processes should be carried out not by the Collector, but (as with companies) by the Inspector-General of Registration."

Then, Sir, I would quote the opinion of the Honourable Khan Bahadur Mian Fazl-i-Husain, Minister for Education, Punjab:

"The Muhammadan public opinion is in favour of a Bill providing for registration of waqf estates and the proper rendering of accounts by the mutwallis of such estates."

The Burma Government say:

"So far as the Bill simplifies the procedure by which dishonest mutwallis may be brought to book, it seems to meet with general approval."

Bihar and Orissa say:

"Muhammadan opinion in Bihar and Orissa generally welcomes the Bill in principle, and the Governor in Council accepts the need for some better regulation of the administration of waqfs than the existing law provides."

Sir, it will thus be observed that perhaps with the exception of the Bengal Government almost all the other Governments are in favour of the principle of the Bill. My friend, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed referred us to Act XIV of 1920; in his opinion that Act is quite sufficient for the purpose for which this Bill is intended. But if he had read that Act a little more carefully he would have found that that Act does not affect the question that is in issue at the present moment. The Bill as brought forward by my friend, Mr. Abul Kasem, is a sort of preventive measure and has for its object the compelling of mutwallis to register their estates and keep regular accounts; whereas Act XIV of 1920 applies only when a breach has been committed by these mutwallis. Until a breach has been committed I do not think that that Act can apply. Moreover so far as that Act is concerned, only a man having an interest in the property can move the Court, and I am not sure whether any Muhammadan can move the Court, because the word 'interest' is a very wide one, and I do not know if Courts would hold that any Muhammadan has got sufficient interest to move them.

Then again, Sir, what is the eventual remedy under this Act XIV of 1920? We must go once more to section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, that is to say, we must go again and file a suit for the mismanagement of the estate. The only difference, if one proceeds under this Act XIV of 1920, would be that whereas under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, the sanction of the Advocate General is required, under this Act no such sanction would be necessary when a District Judge has decided that a breach has been committed. Therefore, I believe, that this Act XIV of 1920 has absolutely no application to cases which would be covered by this Bill if it passes into law. I wish, Sir, my friend Maulvi Abul Kasem had made his Bill more general so as to apply to all kinds of trusts, whether Hindu or Muhammadan. In that case, perhaps all my friends here would have helped him all the more readily. But all the same, I would beg of my Hindu friends to support this Bill, because if they do so and if this Bill is passed into law, their turn will come next, and so far as the Hindu endowments are concerned, I have not the slightest doubt that in every part of the country there are very large endowments, perhaps larger than even Muhammadan endowments, which require protection as much or perhaps more than what Muhammadan endowments require. So far as the Government in this matter are concerned, I am sorry to say that it is my impression that they are going to oppose the Bill, not because that they do not like the principle of the Bill, but because they consider that times are not propitious. That would be, I believe, their principal objection that they will take to the Bill. I am not sure, Sir, that times are not propitious for a Bill of this kind. On the contrary, I am strongly of opinion that times are more propitious now than what they would be any time hence. The feeling of the Muhammadans all over the country, more especially of enlightened Muhammadans, barring those who have got vested interests in these endowments, is generally in favour of a measure of this kind, and the feeling of the Muhammadan public generally is changing from day to day with regard to the management of these estates. I am not sure, Sir, if this Bill is thrown out, that we will not be having another Akali movement in India so far as the Muhammadans are concerned, because the Muhammadan public feel keenly that their endowments should be managed well and regular accounts should be kept and should not be misappropriated. I therefore warn the Government that if they do not allow this Bill to pass into law, they will have very considerable difficulty with the Muhammadans of the country in a very short time. Sir, I support the Bill and also the motion that it be referred to a Select Committee.

Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah (Bhagalpore Division: Muhammadan): (The Honourable Member spoke in the Vernacular*.)

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I rise to a point of order. The Honourable Member is commenting on the details of the Bill. Will the Honourable Chairman decide whether it is relevant?

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): The Honourable Member has long since dealt with the principle of the Bill. Now he is going on clause by clause analysing its purpose and commenting upon it and what it should contain. At this stage I submit this discussion is a little out of order.

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member is bringing his remarks to a close.

(Maulvi Mian Asjad-ul-lah intimated that he had finished.)

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I wish in the first place to express the sincere sympathy of Government with the object of the mover of the present motion. He desires to ensure that the religious endowments which have been made by pious Muhammadans in the past shall not be wasted. That, Sir, is an object which I think must commend itself to all Members of this House. The Bill, Sir, was introduced on the 26th September, 1921 and was circulated by order of Government. My Honourable friend Mr. Hussanally has referred to some of the opinions of Local Governments. I think that it is of the utmost importance in connection with this Bill that we should carefully consider those opinions, and accordingly I do not propose to apologize for again reading out some of the opinions. We will take the Government of Madras. My Honourable friend read paragraph 4 of their letter; he omitted paragraph 5. Paragraph 5 says:

* The original speech together with an English translation will be printed in a later issue of these Debates.

[Mr. H. Tonkinson.]

"I am however to point out that such legislation is more appropriately left to the local Legislatures, and though the latter may not, without the previous sanction of the Governor General, modify or repeal any of the provisions of the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act of 1920, they have still ample scope for legislation in this direction. The case for all-India legislation on a matter of this kind is therefore in the opinion of this Government extremely weak."

A deeper analysis of existing conditions, however, indicates that for many years to come it will be the part of wisdom to continue this policy. Muhammadan feeling is very sensitive to outside interference with their religion and particularly so under the present political conditions. This Government are therefore emphatically of opinion that it is from a political and administrative point of view unsafe to cast on the Collector of a District, as Mr. Abul Kasem's Bill proposes to do, duties which are bound to bring him into frequent and serious conflict with Muhammadan religious feelings of the orthodox type."

I submit, Sir, that the whole principle of this Bill is involved in the control given to the Collector. We will turn to the Government of Bombay. The Government of Bombay commence their remarks as follows:

"The Government of Bombay are of the opinion that the adoption of the Bill would involve a decided reversal of the long-established policy of non-interference in religious matters. The opinions elicited indicate a wide divergence of opinion both as to the principles of and as to the practical expedients proposed in the Bill. Though endeavours were made to ascertain the views of the Muhammadan community, very little interest has been evinced, and many of the local officers report that they have not succeeded in eliciting any reply from the Muhammadan Anjumans and Associations consulted."

Then follows the passage that was read by my Honourable friend:

"In addition to this,"

the Local Government go on to say:

"the burden of labour and responsibility which would be entailed on the executive officers of Government would be excessive. On these grounds, the Government of Bombay consider that the Bill should be opposed."

My Honourable friend read the next paragraph, which I submit is a paragraph not applying to the present Bill. He then referred to the remarks of Mr. Aston, the Additional Judicial Commissioner in Sind. He read the first six words or so which were to the effect "I approve of the provisions in the Bill", he omitted the following words "except those in Chapter III (which should in my opinion be omitted)"—those, Sir, are all the provisions in the Bill relating to Committees—"and the subsequent provisions relating to central and district committees". If all the machinery goes, Sir, then there is nothing left in this Bill.

I do not think my Honourable friend referred to the opinion of the Government of Bengal. They say:

"In reply, I am to say that there is a general consensus of opinion that something should be done in order to prevent the misappropriation of charitable and religious endowments by dishonest mutwallis, and to recover charitable funds which have fallen into the hands of private parties as there can be little doubt that there are many and valuable waqf estates throughout India, including Bengal which are grievously mismanaged and misapplied by their mutwallis or trustees. . . .

The Governor in Council would therefore welcome a well designed Bill to deal with such endowments."

"3. The proposed Bill however appears to be badly designed and proposes a scheme which will interfere with the legal rights of the mutwallis and bring itself into conflict with the Muhammadan Law. Having regard to the general trend of Muhammadan opinion which is opposed to this Bill, the Governor in Council is unable to lend his support to it. The times too are not propitious for such legislation."

We then go on to the United Provinces. The first sentence was read by my Honourable friend; the next sentence was not. It runs:

"On the other hand, those who have been consulted are almost unanimous in condemning the provision of the Bill which proposes to throw upon Collectors the onerous and invidious duty of improving the administration of waqfs," and so on, Sir. We can go through all the opinions of the Local Governments who have really summarised the opinions of the different authorities—official and Muhammadan—consulted by them. While it might be said that there is very general opinion that endowments made by pious Muhammadans in the past are being wasted, there is practically an unanimous opinion, Sir, from all the authorities consulted against the Bill. One of the great objections taken is to the work to be thrown upon the Collectors. My Honourable friend, Mr. Hussanally, objects to references to detail, but, Sir, under the Standing Orders of this House I think details must be referred to in so far as they are necessary to explain the principle of the Bill. Under section 4 of the Act the Mutwalli is bound to submit information to the Collector within whose jurisdiction the waqf property is. Under section 5 the Collector has to call for further information, and so on. Accounts have to be submitted to the Collector. Then the Collector is ex-officio President of the District Committee. This District Committee, presided over by the Collector, under clause 18, has to obtain full information from the public records or by inquiries respecting all waqfs, and so on. Sir, this Bill does not distinguish at all between waqfs of large value and waqfs of small value, and the labours which will be thrown upon the Collector by its provisions would be intolerable. Sir, I ask the Assembly to recognise that this Bill deals with a transferred subject, the subject of charitable and religious endowments. How, Sir, can we properly and rightly in this Central Legislature throw upon the Ministers who are responsible for the administration of that subject, the burden which it is proposed by this Bill to throw upon them notwithstanding their opinions, as expressed in these letters from the Local Governments. I do not wish, Sir, to refer to the long discussion which took place in the sixties of the last century which led to the Act of 1863 by which Government executive officers were dissociated from the exercise of authority over religious trusts. Nor do I wish to refer at length to the very lengthy discussion which eventually resulted in the Act of 1920, which in my opinion was very relevantly referred to by my Honourable friend, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed. The main principle of that Act I may say was that any general all-India enactment should not authorise or sanction any system of control over these endowments by the executive authority, but should recognise the agency of the civil court only and through them afford further facilities for obtaining information regarding the working of these endowments and controlling the action of dishonest trustees. The scope of this provision may in time be extended by local or general enactment, but this Bill is fundamentally opposed to the principle adopted in the Act of 1920. The Indian Legislature may pass this

[Mr. H. Tonkinson.]

Bill, but if the Bill is passed, I think there is little doubt that the Muhammadan public will not accept this as evidence that the Bill was really needed. I think there is no doubt that the conservative section of Muhammadans will undoubtedly be hostile to the operation of this Act. I believe I am merely stating a fact, and I do so with no intention to cast any discredit upon them, but is it not true that the Muhammadan masses are singularly ignorant, gullible and fanatical? Would not the persons entrusted now with religious endowments organise opposition to this Bill if it ever becomes law, and would they not quite easily be able to excite fanatical feeling in connection with this subject? The Executive Government of India is responsible for law and order, but we do not wish to have to meet all the odium which will arise from the administration of such an Act as this. That odium, Sir, will fall on the Executive Government and not on the Legislature. And is the Legislature prepared to accept responsibility for the manner in which this Bill will be administered? Government frankly admit the needs for effective control, but the present measure is, in our opinion, unsuitable. We are not opposed to the principle of better supervision over these religious endowments, but we think, that any legislation going widely beyond the lines of the Act of 1920 should generally be local legislation. Machinery for control must be machinery designed or accepted by the responsible Ministers. It must also not associate the executive authorities of Government with the detailed control. You, Sir, are well aware of the Bill now before the Madras Council. I believe that that Bill has met with a good deal of opposition. It possibly goes too far, but, so does the present Bill. I may add, Sir, that, if any Local Government desires to pass legislation dealing with the subject, and does pass such legislation in their local Councils, then the Government of India are prepared to take all steps required to supplement such legislation as may be necessary. We, Sir, cannot, however, accept the principle of this Bill, and, therefore, I must regretfully oppose it.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, after hearing my friend, Mr. Hussanally, I thought that the Bill was supported generally by Government, but I fear that his not having read lower down would mislead the House. I wish to be fair, and, after listening to these two gentlemen, Mr. Tonkinson and Mr. Hussanally, I thought that, unless I dealt with these two paragraphs, I would be misleading the House. The Madras Government says:

"I am, however, to point out that such legislation is more appropriately left to local Legislatures; and, though the latter may not, without the previous sanction of the Governor General, modify or repeal any of the provisions of the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act, 1920, they have still ample scope for legislation in this direction. I am to add that this should not be understood as a mere technical argument based on the letter of the Devolution Rules. The conditions of the different provinces vary considerably. Muhammadan public opinion in religious matters in this province, for instance, is far less advanced than in certain other provinces of India, and is not prepared to accept legislative inroads into custom and usage with the same readiness that those other provinces appear to be. The case for all-India legislation on a matter of this kind, is, therefore, in the opinion of this Government, extremely weak."

I have also seen the opinions of other Local Governments and, in my opinion, they are generally opposed to the Bill. Now, with regard to the opinion of Muhammadans, I have been trying to read these opinions. Baluchistan is a Muhammadan country and with regard to that province it is stated:

"The matter has been referred to the Anjuman-i-Islam at Quetta which represents the organised Muhammadan opinion of Baluchistan. That body has presented a unanimous opinion against the introduction of the measure in this province. Its members view with suspicion any official interference with the management of what is purely private religious property and would strongly resent any attempt to hamper the unfettered administration of these pious trusts by members of the community for whose use they were ordained. The ordinary law should in their opinion be able adequately to provide for differentiation between fraudulent dispensations and genuine charitable provisions."

After reading these opinions one cannot help saying that the Government generally are opposed to the Bill, not to speak of the people also. The organised opinion of the Muhammadans in Baluchistan is opposed to the Bill.

Mr. J. Ohaudhuri: Are the Indian Muhammadans opposed?

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: Yes.

Now you have to look to the condition of the country also. In paragraph 7 the Madras Government say:

"Proceeding to the principles of Mr. Abul Kasem's Bill, I am to refer first to the main point raised in your reference, viz., whether a departure should now be made from the principle which Government have followed since 1863 that the executive officers of Government should be entirely free from any connection with religious trusts. It is quite possible to argue that, with the introduction in the provinces of an executive responsible, though partially, to a representative Legislature based upon a wide electorate, this policy of non-interference need not continue to be sacrosanct. A deeper analysis of existing conditions, however, indicates that for many years to come it will be the part of wisdom to continue this policy. Muhammadan feeling is very sensitive to outside interference with religion and particularly so under the present political conditions."

Then I wish to place one more point before the House and it is this—We have got Ministers now and these Trusts are under those Ministers. Is this all-India Legislature entitled to pass this legislation and force it upon them unless they want it? That is a point for the whole House to consider. If they consider that this all-India Legislature is entitled to force legislation upon them without their consent and without having consulted them, then I have nothing more to say and will not oppose the measure. But I want to place these different points before the House: Firstly, that the Government, almost all the Governments are opposed to it; secondly, that Muhammadan opinion, though divided as I have said, yet reasonable and sound Muhammadan opinion is also opposed to it. This is a very important piece of legislation. It affects not merely the interests of one or two men, but the whole of India. Looking at the Khilafat movement, if you go deeply enough into the matter you will see there is something very deep in it. Please look at every side of the question. Do not merely think of the mismanagement of certain Waqfs, pass over such things, brush them aside. You must go more deeply into the matter and see what the effect of this legislation on Indian Muhammadan public opinion and especially on the religious minded section of it will be. I have placed all these facts before you and I do not think that an all-India legislation would be very desirable. It should be left to the Provincial Governments. But if the House considers that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, I shall do what I can for it there; only I must take exception with regard to this point, whether it is not a matter which should be left to the local Councils.

Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Khan (North-West Frontier Province: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I must first apologise to my friend, Mr. Abul Kasem. To tell you the truth, up to the last moment I agreed with him and promised to support the Bill; but after listening to the different speeches, I do not think I can keep my promise. It is in the interests of Muhammadans that I wish to appeal to him. I have got some observations to lay before him in particular and before this Honourable Assembly in general. The first thing is that we know that unfortunately the Muhammadans are not so much educated as other communities. I am coming to that point. That would mean open war with our religious heads and it will also be a great discouragement to our political propaganda, because the educated people who are few in number will go against the religious heads who are worshipped by the masses, and the masses will go against the educated classes. That would mean that there will be no co-operation between the educated and the uneducated masses, and so I think it is in the interests of the Muhammadans in particular that this Bill should be dropped at once.

I will now come to the other point; an Honourable Member said that this will lead to an Akali movement. If we were all educated it would not have mattered—I think in fact it would have been the best thing for us that could happen. But unfortunately we are not all educated. In the case of the Akalis they were all of one mind and one voice. But unfortunately there is a difference of voice and a difference of mind here. Moreover there is another point which I wish to make out. The Assembly will excuse me if I say it, but I do wish to say, what is the opinion of local Governments? I speak as a Muhammadan and I think that should have more weight than the opinion of the Government. Government has to look at it from its own point of view and we have to look at it from our point of view. I am certainly one with the Government in thinking that it will have a lot of troubles if it will interfere in this matter. I think that Government will be ungrateful to a good many religious heads who have been helping it in many ways. At such a time as this if the Government interferes I think it will create a lot of troubles of no end for itself. I think Government should not interfere on this point and I would appeal to my Honourable friend, Mr. Abul Kasem, that he should drop the Bill because he has gained his point; the Akali movement has awakened every religious head and they know how they stand; I do not think they will misuse the trust properties in their hands; if they do misuse I think they have had enough warning and in future we can take care against such misuse. At present I think they will be careful and will not give us an opportunity to move this Bill again. So I appeal to my friend to drop the Bill and I appeal to my Muhammadan friends to look at it from a broad point of view. I think we are few in number and the masses outnumber us and they are not educated; these religious heads, these Pirs have got great influence over them and I think we will be ruining our political propaganda if we go against them at such a time.

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din (East Central Punjab: Muhammadan): Sir, I make no apology either to the Mover of the Bill or to any other Member of this House for the remarks which I propose to make. The Honourable the Government Member began by an expression of sympathy with the principle of the Bill and ended in certain fears which he entertained about the actual operation of the Bill if it was passed into law. I have heard diverse opinions of Members from the farthest town in British India on the North-West Frontier and from the most southern town where Muhammadan voice appears yet to exist and I regret to find that they hold diametrically opposite views. I belong to a province which claims the largest percentage of Mussalman population. (Cries of 'No, no', Bengal.) Please listen. In the Punjab the Mussalmans are 55 per cent. and in the five districts of the Frontier they are 93 per cent. In Bengal the Mussalman population is not 55 per cent. I say this without any fear of contradiction. (A Voice: "You mean percentage.") Yes, that is what I said and meant. Therefore, I think, Sir, that so far as my own province is concerned, and so far as my capacity as a representative of the Muslim community allows, I am in a position to voice its views better than those gentlemen who come from provinces where the Mussalman population is only 2, 3 or 4 per cent. Sir, this is a very important question and has been exercising the minds of the Muslim public, at least in my province, for the last 25 years. One of our recognised leaders, the late lamented Mr. Justice Shahdin, took considerable interest in this question. He collected information and he even corresponded with all the leading Mussalmans of India, and he was determined to see the Muslim Waqfs managed properly, but circumstances did not permit him to do so. Sir, whatever may be the views of the Honourable Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi as a Member of this Government, I hope he will stand up as a member of his community to say whether I am right in saying that that is the feeling of the Mussalmans of the Punjab. Years ago they formed an association in the Punjab called the Anjuman Auqaf-al-Muslimin. They have been trying to protect certain Waqfs from being wasted or misused, but as there is no legal sanction to back them up they have not succeeded in their efforts. I think, Sir, it is the duty of the Government to put a stop to misappropriation of Waqf income or Mutwallis committing criminal breach of trust. That is what is needed. We do not want more. Can the Government say that it is not its duty to stop criminal breach of trust in the country? I think it is the first duty of a State to protect the Waqf property from being criminally misappropriated or criminal breach of trust being committed with regard to it. We do not want the Government to interfere with our religion, and by putting a stop to the criminal breach of trust by Mutwallis they will not be interfering with our religion in any way. If our religion allows the managers of endowments to commit criminal breach of trust, then, of course, the Government may refuse to interfere because they will not interfere with our religion. But I fail to see how interference with religion can come in. Our religion expressly enjoins that every Muslim should discharge his trust most faithfully and honestly. Therefore if the managers of religious endowments act dishonestly, they deviate from the path of rectitude, righteousness and honesty, and it is the duty of the Government to protect the public money from being wasted. If Government is afraid of doing that, I think they are afraid of performing a duty which is the first function of every Government to perform.

With regard to some of the dangers to which reference was made by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, I must say that I realise them. There are difficulties indeed and our path is not so smooth as some may imagine it to be. There are rocks and shoals, and we must take care that we steer clear of all difficulties. But that is not a reason for throwing out the Bill. Let us accept its principle; let it be committed to the Select Committee; let the Select Committee modify it, let its language be improved and embellished and let all objectionable clauses be omitted or modified. And then, if necessary, we can again send the Bill in its improved form to Local Governments for opinion. Section 74, clause (c) of our ~~Business~~ Bye-Laws says: "After the presentation of the final Report of the Select Committee of a Bill, the Member in charge may move that the Bill as reported by the Select Committee be re-circulated for the purpose of framing further opinion thereon". So if necessary, when the Bill comes up again before this House, it may be re-circulated. But there is reason to throw out the Bill at this stage while expressing sympathy with it. In the words of Sir Walter Scott "Should the path be a dangerous one"—"The danger's self is lure alone"—I think a strong Government, as the Government of India is, should not be afraid of doing its duty. It must do it and do it manfully. I must point out that unless the Government is prepared to catch the bull by its horns, it is possible, I don't say it is probable, that the Akali movement to which reference has been made by certain speakers, might be repeated in certain provinces; at any rate in certain districts of my province. I think in saying this I am doing my duty towards the Government as well as towards the community which I represent. We should gauge public opinion now and try to satisfy its legitimate demand so far as we can. As regards the opinions of Local Governments, we can very easily meet them by inserting in the Bill a little clause to the effect that a Local Government may when it deems expedient or necessary introduce the Act in the whole or part of its Province. That is to say, it may be provided in the Bill itself, that it may be introduced by a Local Government with the sanction of the Governor General in Council, when the Local Government deems it expedient or necessary to do so. But we should not shirk our duty and responsibility, we must do it, and do it well. No one can deny that the income of religious endowments is being wasted, misappropriated, and mis-spent, and yet no one can raise his voice. We must see that every trustee performs his duty as a trustee. Government is perhaps the biggest and strongest trustee, and I expect it to perform its own duty as a trustee. With these remarks, I support the principle of the Bill, and not, of course, its provisions, nor its language. The principle must be kept in view, and the whole Bill may be re-drafted by the Select Committee; and if necessary opinions will be re-invited by re-circulation of the improved Bill, I have to make one remark about the personnel of the Select Committee. I do not know what reasons actuated the Honourable the Mover in recommending the personnel of the Committee, but I think that the personnel is not what it ought to be: I would suggest, if the President will allow me to do so that the names of the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson and the Honourable Dr. Gour should be added on so that they might help us with their experience and knowledge.

[Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din.]

Maulvi Abul Kasem: Sir, in offering a few words of reply, I have in the first place to congratulate the opponents of the Bill for having secured the services of my distinguished friend, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed, to lead the opposition. He made an excellent speech, but from what I did understand of that speech, I could only gather that he said that the present law was quite sufficient to meet the occasion and to control the trustees of these religious endowments. I may remind him that in the province from which he and I come, there are various endowments, big and small, but in the course of the last fifty years of which I have got information, there were only two cases instituted in the Civil Courts under the provisions of the law as it stands, and one was by the Maharaja of Giddhaur against the Mahant of Deoghar, and the other by the Government of Bengal against the Mutwalli of a Waqf estate. But, Sir, where can we get wealthy territorial magnates to come forward to take upon themselves the responsibility, the expense and burden of carrying on litigation on behalf of poor people who are deprived of their rights in religious institutions? And where can we get a strong Muhammadan Member of Government to agitate and to convince the Government of the necessity in these hard days of spending Rs. 65,000 simply to remove a mutwalli? The provision lays down that any two Muhammadans or any two persons interested can go to a Court. But why should anybody go and take upon himself all the worries, the troubles of litigation in a Civil Court and bear the expense and risk chances of paying the expenses of the other side as well? We in this country have enough of litigation for our own private reasons: and we want to avoid litigation as far as possible. And sometimes peace is purchased at a sacrifice. Will anybody venture to come up and at least invite litigation, and invite it without any personal gain? I do not believe it.

Now, Sir, Mr. Tonkinson on behalf of the Government began by saying and the same thing was said by other members of the Government, that he was full of sympathy with the principle of the Bill. What I ask to-day, Sir

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I never said that I was full of sympathy with the principle of the Bill. I said that I wished to express the sincere sympathy of Government with the object of the Mover of the Bill, not with the principle of the Bill at all, Sir.

Mr. Abul Kasem: That was a technical mistake on my part. The sympathy was for the object I had in view. I am grateful for that. But they admit that Muhammadan waqf estates are mismanaged. They admit that the situation is such as to call for some remedy, for some action. What do they propose to do? We in this country, Sir, have been accused times out of number of being destructive critics; we are known only as hostile critics; we have no constructive programme to offer. I find, Sir, that in this instance the Government comes forward with sympathy with the object of a motion, recognizes the necessity for some action, but at the same time only offers the destructive motion that it should be thrown out; they have brought forward no constructive suggestion in this connection. This is not the first time that this question of Muhammadan endowments and all endowments has engaged the attention of the Government. Greater men than myself, distinguished men, have brought it to the notice of Government. Committees have been formed: meetings have been held: conferences have been held: but all have ended in smoke. Sir, my Honourable and gallant friend from the North-West Frontier Province and the Members of the Government have both made much of the masses who, they say, will rise in arms if a measure like this is brought forward. Unfortunately, Sir, the illiterate masses of India are made use of by everybody in this country for his own purposes. Whenever the Government has to defend or stick to a reactionary measure, or to oppose a liberal movement, they come forward on behalf of the masses of this country and they say that the illiterate masses do not want it, it is the infinitesimal minority of the educated classes who do. Whenever any public man, if you like to call him a public agitator, wants to throw his programme on the Government, he just gets up on the platform and says that the masses are behind him. But the masses never speak. Unfortunately they do not. I think if they could and did speak out, they would be emphatic in their support of the measure which is now engaging the attention of this House.

[Mr. Abul Kasem.]

Sir, a good deal of the opposition of the Local Governments is based upon the fact that the Collector of the District has been made responsible in many cases and because a good deal of the burden and responsibility will fall on his shoulders. And my Muhammadan friends Mian Asjad-ul-lah and Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan have also expressed apprehensions on that head. Sir, I have repeatedly said when introducing this Bill and when making this motion this morning that I am myself not enamoured of the provisions of this Bill, and I have admitted that, not being a lawyer and not being a qualified draftsman, I have only copied out the provisions from various Bills and proposals submitted before the public from time to time, and that the question whether the District Collector should be the Chairman of the Committee, or whether it should be elected by an electorate or appointed by Government is a matter purely of detail with which we are at the present moment certainly not concerned. Sir, the principle lays down that endowed properties are to be duly registered in a public office, naturally the revenue office. And the second point is that there should be committees supervising and controlling, at any rate supervising and exercising a sort of control over the trustees of these waqf estates both in the districts and at headquarters of the province. These are the two main principles. If you are opposed to these two principles, you are welcome to throw it out. As I said at the outset, so I say again that I have a mandate from my constituents, who unfortunately happen to be Muhammadans, to press this Bill before this House and my duty is finished. I will have to press it to the last and if it is thrown out, the responsibility for it will lie on the Members of the Government and the Members of this House and not on my shoulders.

Then, Sir, it has been said that it is a matter entirely for provincial legislation, because it is a transferred subject and that Government does not want to interfere with religious usages and religious institutions. Whoever asked the Government to interfere with these institutions or to control them? The only thing is that we want authority from the Legislature to constitute a body which could exercise some sort of control over these trustees, who are, as my distinguished friend Chaudhri Sahab-ud-Din said, criminally misappropriating public funds. What would have been the state of these trust properties if we had a Muhammadan Government in this country? There would have been a Department of Waqf in the Cabinet itself, a portfolio dealing with Waqf estates, such as there are in all Muhammadan countries. Do those Governments interfere with the religious institutions of those countries? Somebody has said, Sir, I believe Mr. K. Ahmed, that the intention of the waqif will be destroyed. He ought not to forget (Mr. K. Ahmed: 'I said intention of the donor.')—donor, well, you will find that waqif merely means donor. He ought to remember that the object of this Bill is that the waqfnama in which the intentions of the donor (if he understands it better) are detailed should be registered, so that people may find out what the intentions and instructions of the donor were. I have been told, Sir, that my sympathies are with the money-lender. However much I may admire the business capacity of these money-lenders, I am not one of them. My interest is for the protection of trust properties, and why I referred to these money-lenders was that Mutwallis have their names registered as owners in the Collector's register, with the result that they mortgage the property and sell them to money-lenders and others and after they are sold the Muhammadan community cannot regain them, because the Courts will not allow a third party and a bonâ fide purchaser to be cheated out of his money. To protect that I intended the registration of these properties. It will protect the estates and if any money-lender hereafter went and gave money to a Mutwalli on his waqf property, he will do so with his eyes open and will have no defence when he is called upon to give back that property. That was my object, and, Sir, I happen to be Mutwalli of a small waqf estate. I would challenge anybody to go to the Collector of Burdwan and find out anywhere that I am the Mutwalli, that I am not the real owner of the property. My name is registered as the owner of the property in the register. My father's name was similarly registered, and if I choose to call myself the owner, there is nobody who can prevent it. To give you one instance about the seriousness of the situation, a big waqf property was left by a pious Mussalman to another gentleman, not a member of his family, who became the Mutwalli. After his death, there was a dispute in the city of Burdwan among the various relatives of the dead Mutwalli as to who should be the Mutwalli and the members, and the leading members of the Muhammadan community, if I may so call them, by which I mean the Muhammadan pleaders, Muhammadan Mukhtears and one or two merchants, sat there to settle up this dispute among the family members of the Mutwalli and to make the award. And what decision did they come to?

They said the best course would be to divide the property according to the Mussalman law of inheritance and have their names registered separately, and it has been done, and it has been done after the introduction of this Bill. It is not a question of private trust for waqf is a charitable endowment unless it is waqf al il aulad. Therefore, Sir, I do not want to detain the House, but I extremely regret, and reciprocate the regret of my friend, Mr. Abdur Rahim Khan, that I cannot accede to his request and withdraw the motion, because I have a duty to discharge to the people who have sent me here, and I will feel I have done it if I press the motion, and if the House rejects it, the responsibility will rest with the House.

(An Honourable Member: "I move that the question be now put.")

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I wish to offer just a few remarks on the course which this debate has taken. I would like, first of all, to invite the attention of the House to the fact that this Bill is not in principle simply a Bill providing for the registration of waqfs and the waqf accounts. It goes far beyond that. The whole principle of the Bill is in the control, control in clause after clause, which is given to the Collector.

Maulvi Abul Kasem: Those clauses may be deleted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, we are asked to approve the principle of a Bill which gives this control in one clause after another to executive authorities, control over religious endowments, a thing, Sir, which the Government of India, so long ago as 1863, definitely decided that their executive officers should be disassociated from . . .

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): How did Government assent to its introduction?

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: Cannot those clauses be omitted if the Bill is put to the House?

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Mr. Tonkinson will proceed.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, much play has been made of the fact that we on the Government side have merely given destructive criticism to this Bill, but, Sir, under the present constitution the whole of this subject is a Provincial matter. What responsibility have we, I would like to ask my Honourable friend, Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din, over the control of charitable and religious endowments here? I have said, Sir, that Government are quite prepared to supplement, so far as may be necessary, any legislation which any Minister may introduce in any local Council. That, Sir, is, as I said, absolutely as much as we can undertake to do. To judge from the letters received from Local Governments, we have practically all the Ministers who will be responsible for the administration of this Bill opposed to it. I therefore, Sir, oppose the motion.

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: Sir, with your permission, may I just say a word?

Mr. Chairman: No, I cannot permit the Honourable Member to speak now.

The motion before the House is—

“That the Bill to provide for the registration of Waqf Estates and the proper rendering of accounts by the Mutwallis of such Estates in British India, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member, Mr. P. E. Percival, Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Ismail, Mr. Zahid Ali Subzposh, Mr. W. M. Hussanally, Mir Assad Ali, Khan Bahadur, Rao Bahadur T. Ahmed, Nawab Ibrahim Ali Khan, Lala Girdharilal Agarwala, Maulvi Abdul Quadir, Mukhdum Sayyid Rajan Buksh and the Mover.”

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: May I suggest, Sir, the addition of two names for the Select Committee, and, if the House commits the Bill to the Committee, those two names may be included. They are the names of Mr. H. Tonkinson and Dr. H. S. Gour.

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member can move that with the leave of the House. Has the Honourable Member the leave of the House? (Cries of “Yes, yes.”)

The names were added.

The Assembly then divided as follows:

THE LAND ACQUISITION (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I move:

“That the Bill further to amend the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of Mr. N. M. Samarth, Mr. J. N. Mukherjee, Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh, Mr. Hussanally, Mr. B. Venkatapattiraju, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarakadas, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Rai T. P. Mukherjee Bahadur, and myself.”

I find some difficulty in providing for the representation of the official Members on the Committee, since neither the Law Member nor the Revenue Member to whose department the subject matter of this Bill relates is a Member of this House. If the Government proposes to add any official Members to the Committee, Sir, I shall be quite agreeable to that. Now, Sir, the House will remember that I introduced this Bill in the Delhi Session last year. It was subsequently circulated for opinion and a large body of opinion, both official and non-official, has been collected. I proposed to move this Resolution last September, but the Government then said that they were contemplating the introduction of a larger and more comprehensive measure to amend the Land Acquisition Act and suggested that I might await the result of that. I find, Sir, that the Government has put forth no measure of their own so far, and I do not know whether they have got materials ready for framing a Bill even now. This House is coming very near to its close and I do not wish, therefore, to put off this matter any further and I therefore make this motion for referring this Bill to Select Committee.

Sir, the object of the Bill is threefold. One is to provide a statutory remedy against unlawful or vexatious acquisition of land. Another is to prevent the officer responsible for selecting the site and making the preliminary inquiry in regard to it, being appointed Collector for the purpose of making the award; and the third object is to prohibit the Collector from enforcing his own order. Of these three, the first is the most important and I shall devote the greater part of my remarks to that object.

In all civilised countries, Sir, the right of private property is recognised. Every individual has a right to hold and keep his property not only as against every other individual but also against the Government. But Government is in all civilised countries given power to compulsorily acquire private property when that course is necessary in the public interest, and therefore we see the Government in India also is empowered to compulsorily acquire land for public purposes. That power is conferred by Act I of 1894 on the Government. The power to acquire land compulsorily is given by an Act of the Legislature and therefore it follows, Sir, that the provisions of the Act should be strictly followed and it also follows that there must be some safeguard provided against excessive or improper use of the power given by the Legislature. There is no such safeguard provided now under Act I of 1894. Section 4 of the Act provides that "When it appears to a Local Government that land in any locality is needed for a public purpose a notification to that effect shall be published in the official Gazette, and the substance of that notification made known at convenient places in the said locality." Thereupon it shall be lawful for an officer authorised by Government to enter upon the land and take measurements, fix boundaries and do all necessary acts preliminary to the acquisition of the land. This is called the preliminary investigation. When this is over, and it is decided to acquire the land, section 6 of the Act provides that a declaration to the effect that the land is needed for a public purpose or for a company be published in the official Gazette, and "the said declaration shall be conclusive evidence that the land is needed for a public purpose or for a company, as the case may be, and after making such a declaration the Local Government may acquire the land in the manner hereinafter appearing." Section 11 which deals with inquiry and award by the Collector gives power to the landholder to raise objections only in regard to three matters, namely, in regard to the measurements of the land, the value thereof and the respective interests of the several persons claiming compensation. If the landholder does not accept the award of the Collector, he can, under section 18, ask the Collector to refer the matter to the Civil Court. It will thus be seen, Sir, that the landholder has no opportunity to object to the acquisition itself on the ground that the purpose for which it is proposed to acquire the land is not a public purpose or that the acquisition is improper. As soon as a notification stating that the land is required for a public purpose is published, the notification by its very publication becomes conclusive evidence that the land is required for a public purpose and the question cannot be re-opened. Thus you will see, Sir, that under the law as it is, the owner of the land which is proposed to be acquired has no opportunity to raise any objection to the acquisition itself. I do not mean to deny that in certain provinces there are some departmental rules requiring some sort of notice to be given to the landholder before the notification is published in the Gazette, but that is not a statutory remedy, and it can be changed at any time by the Local Government. Moreover, Sir, from my experience of the working of that rule in the Madras Presidency, it affords very little protection to the landholder against improper acquisition. He puts in a petition objecting to the acquisition, and does not know what has become of it. No inquiry is held. He is given no opportunity of showing how the acquisition would be improper. He knows in fact nothing about his petition, and the only thing he knows of the whole matter is when he gets a notice from the Collector informing him that he proposes to make an award. The Collector says to him in his notice "I am holding an inquiry as to the amount of compensation that is payable to you on such and such a day, so you can come and make your representation." That is the only notice the landholder gets about the matter. Till then he knows nothing, because no inquiry is held, and he is not given an opportunity to adduce any evidence to show how the acquisition will be improper. Therefore, I say, Sir, that although there are departmental rules in some provinces, they do not afford the protection to which the landholders are entitled. I shall now show, Sir, that there is ample ground for supposing that the existing law does not contain any effective remedy against improper acquisition of land. I shall first quote, Sir, some of the official opinions that have been received on the Bill itself. I shall take the Government of Bombay first. The Bombay Government admit, "That the present procedure for the acquisition of land causes occasional hardship and gives rise to complaints which are not always without foundation." I am quoting their opinion. "And it is in view of the compulsory nature of the action taken that it is desirable that opportunities should be given to the owner of the land which is sought to be acquired to state his objections to the acquisition." Here is the opinion of the Consulting Surveyor to the Government of Bombay. "I am thoroughly in sympathy with the proposal to allow persons interested in the land which it is proposed to acquire, the fullest opportunity of registering their objections before acquisition. Dealing with the acquisition of property all over the Presidency including Sind, as I have to, I have been impressed over and over again with the real grievances of the owners of properties who have never had the slightest opportunity of objecting to the acquisition of their properties. It must be definitely recognized that Government is to be the final arbiter to decide as to whether the land should be acquired or not, and if this statement is accepted, I strongly urge the desirability of the abandonment of the policy which has been in vogue hitherto of exercising over the owners of landed property such vast powers as are possessed by Government. It is of the utmost importance that the public should feel that they will be given every opportunity of a full and unbiassed hearing of the other side of the case. I am fully convinced that if the public were given such opportunity, many of the objections which come to my notice of compulsory acquisition of properties would be reduced to almost vanishing point." Sir, what can be more convincing than such an opinion coming from such a source? Then, Sir, this is what the Chairman of the Bombay Trust says on the subject: "The present procedure for the acquisition of land causes occasional hardship and gives rise to complaints for which there is considerable foundation. It is, in view of the compulsory nature of the action taken, desirable that an opportunity should be given to the owner of the land which is sought to be acquired to state his objections to the acquisition, but these objections should be limited to the grounds that the acquisition is not for bond fide public purposes, or that the land has been selected for some private reason." The Judges of the High Court of Bombay have "no doubt that considerable dissatisfaction has been caused in recent years by Government acquiring land under the Act for private Companies." The Government of the United Provinces says that, after consulting certain officers who have much experience of land acquisition work, it "is of opinion that there is some justification for allowing the owner of the land sought to be acquired the right of objecting on the ground that the land is not required for a public purpose, or that more is being acquired than is really necessary." The District Judge of Ahmedabad, in the Bombay Presidency, says that "there have been cases in which it has been argued with considerable force that the proposed acquisition was being made not because it was absolutely necessary for the purposes of the Company but because it was a cheaper alternative to another course which the Company was bound to take," and then he proceeds to give a concrete case which came before him, which illustrates the present method in a very striking manner. This is, Sir, what he says about a matter which came before him in Compensation case No. 10 of 1919:

"Four gunthas out of a plot of land belonging to one Manicklal Motilal by which stood a Bungalow, a well and several outhouses and abutting on the Kaira Trunk Road, which provided the most convenient passage to the bungalow and its surroundings were acquired for the Nadiad Kapadvanaj Railway; compensation was allowed for the same, the owner being assured at the same time that another passage would be provided. This passage was not promptly provided, and a long correspondence ensued between the owner on one side and the Collector of Kaira and the Railway authorities on the other. Subsequently a plan of the proposed road was sent to the owner and he was informed that arrangements were being made for providing him with an outlet. The Collector, however, refused to recommend the acquisition of a plot of land for the purpose of providing the outlet, and informed the claimant that since the Railway Company were arranging to acquire the bungalow and its compound there would be no necessity for constructing a road. He wrote again to the claimant informing him that the Railway Company had preferred acquiring his bungalow and outhouses to providing him with a metalled approach road. After this, a Government notification was published declaring that the claimant's plot, with the superstructure thereon was required for a public purpose, namely for the Railway Company. It was eventually acquired and on the case coming up before me, the claimant's pleader argued that this notification was illegal and ultra vires and that any acquisition of the claimant's bungalow and compound on the ground that it was more costly in the eye of the company to provide an access thereto in place of one removed by their own act was neither an honest nor a legal exercise of the powers conferred by the Land Acquisition Act. I had, with great regret, to disallow this argument, in view of the clear provisions of section 6 of the Act, though I felt no doubt after reading the correspondence between the claimant and the Railway Company that the acquisition of the bungalow was decided upon because it was considered preferable and cheaper to providing an access to which the Railway were bound under the terms of the first award."

This is what the officials themselves have to say upon the subject. Now I propose, Sir, to take you to the Madras Presidency and show you what is being done in certain parts of that Presidency in the matter of assigning house-sites. The power of acquiring land to be assigned as house-sites was introduced for the first time in the Act of 1894 after a good deal of opposition and discussion, and it was only by a narrow majority that that point was carried. Recently the Madras Government issued orders that land should, whenever necessary, be compulsorily acquired to be granted as house-sites to the members of the depressed classes who generally possess no houses of their own. The cost of the acquisition is to be borne by the Government in the first instance and to be recovered from the assignees in easy annual instalments—15 or 20 I suppose. This is done in pursuance of the policy of Government of ameliorating the condition of these unfortunate people. So far no objection can be properly taken to this policy. But see how it is worked in practice. I have got with me printed copies of memorials presented to the Government and the Legislative Council of Madras by Mr. T. Somasundaram Mudaliar—a landlord in the Tanjore district and a Member of the Madras Legislative Council, concerning the doings of the Labour Department in that district. The memorial states that the Assistant Labour Commissioner is overzealous and, contrary to the orders of Government, acquires land for assignment as house-sites to persons other than those of the labouring classes—i.e., to money-lenders, Government employees, mirasidars, merchants, persons who already own houses and even to persons who are not residents of the village in which the land is acquired. This allegation is supported by several annexures giving particulars of individual cases. One of these annexures states that one Maruthamuthu Naickar to whom a house-site is given in a certain village was not a resident of that village at all and that he owns a tiled house and wet and dry land in another village. The memorial further states that the principles laid down by Government that where Government land is available it should be utilized, and that the cheapest land available should be taken, are ignored. "Kandaswami Pillai of Ammanadapuram offered to give land at Re. 1 and this was not accepted and more costly lands the acquisition of which caused great hardship has been taken and the reason for such action is not apparent and the motive does not seem to be praiseworthy." I am quoting from the memorial. I know that some of the statements were controverted by the Labour Commissioner in the course of a debate in the Legislative Council, but the very fact that such a memorial is presented not by an irresponsible private person, but by a Member of the Legislative Council itself is very significant. Sir, the doings of the Labour Department in the Tanjore District have a family likeness to what they are doing in my own district of Godavari. Here also the Labour Department started with the idea of acquiring house-sites for the depressed classes only, but subsequently they extended it to other classes, chiefly to the community of toddy drawers locally known as Idigas. This class is by no means a depressed class. There are some very rich men among them in my own taluq of Amalapuram. My Honourable friend can support me in that respect.

Mr. T. E. Moir: (Madras: Nominated Official): I demur to being asked to support any of the Honourable Member's statements.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Several of them own lands of their own and very many of them cultivate others' lands as tenants. As a rule these people live in their own houses and are certainly able to buy more land if required. Nevertheless, the Labour Department (for which my Honourable friend was responsible for some time) compulsorily acquire lands to be given to these people on the same terms as to the Panchamas. I have got with me a list of not less than 65 cases in which lands were assigned to people who already own houses, in my own village and the bulk of these lands are covered with valuable cocoanut topes and are worth a thousand rupees or more per acre. I am sure that few or none of these people to whom houses are granted would have applied for those lands if they had to pay the value of the lands in lump sum. They applied for the sites because they thought or they knew that they would get them almost for the asking. It would occur to most people to inquire why these people who are able to buy their own house-sites should be given sites acquired by Government compulsorily. Well, it is difficult, Sir, to answer that question by anything that I can adduce to the satisfaction of the House.

There is another aspect of this question, which I must bring to the notice of this House, and that is one of the principles on which the Labour Department seems to be acting in my district. In that part of the country we have got field servants, and generally every landholder gets one or more of his field servants to live on his own land in huts erected by the landholders at their cost. It is for the purpose of watching those lands. It is especially so in the case of cocoanut topes which require to be watched and guarded. It is usual to build huts in those topes and get one or more servants to live in them. They live in the huts for a number of years. Now, under the system of acquiring house-sites for the depressed classes, the Labour Department has, it appears, made it a rule to acquire the very sites on which these people are living. See how much hardship this must cause to the landlords. This must be a source of friction between the landholder and the man. I do not object if all these people are given sites in one locality, if you are forming a new village where all the people could live. But you employ a man on your own land as your servant and the Government says "We will acquire that piece of land and give it to him." See how inconvenient that is to the landholder.

Mr. Chairman: Does the Honourable Member not think he is travelling too far into details and unless they bear upon the principle he may omit them?

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I want to say that the present law affords no safeguards, no relief to the landholder in the matter of acquiring land. That is my point. I believe I have said enough on the subject that the law as it stands does not afford a satisfactory remedy against the improper acquisition of land. I shall then proceed with what I propose should be done to remedy that evil. Before that I propose to refer to the law of England on the matter of land acquisition. According to Halsbury's Laws of England there are three ways of acquiring compulsory powers over land:

- (1) by the passing of a public general Act;
- (2) by promoting a private Bill which, when passed, becomes a local and personal Act; and
- (3) by proceeding under existing Acts to obtain an order which is commonly referred to as a Provisional Order.

The last method approximates most to our law and it has been described thus:

"In order to save the expense and trouble of proceeding by private Bill to obtain compulsory powers to acquire land, Parliament has, in a number of public general Acts, provided simple methods of procedure. This procedure varies somewhat in the different Acts, but its principal characteristic is that an order conferring the powers is made by some person or body mentioned in the particular statute, which order however, is not operative until it has been confirmed in a manner provided in the general Act. Until that has taken place it is said to be provisional only; hence this method of obtaining compulsory powers is known as procedure by Provisional Order. The main features are alike in the different statutes. The first requisite is that the person or the body seeking the power should give ample notice of their intentions. This is done by advertisement in the local newspapers, in which full particulars are given, and by the service of notices on every owner, lessee or occupier, or reputed owner, lessee or occupier of the lands proposed to be taken. The next step is to petition the authorities who have the power to make the orders. This authority is usually one of the Government departments. The petition must give full particulars and be supported with evidence to show compliance with the provisions of the Act. If the authority are satisfied with that evidence, they will consider the petition, and if, in their view the matter should proceed, they direct that a local inquiry shall be held, at which all persons affected have an opportunity of being heard. The making of the Provisional Order empowering the petitioner to acquire the land follows if the authority are satisfied on the report of the person making the inquiry. It has next to be confirmed, and in the majority of cases, confirmation is obtained by the passing by Parliament of a Confirming Act, the Bill for which is usually submitted by the department making the order. In its passage through Parliament it is treated as a private Bill and owners of the land proposed to be taken or injuriously affected may oppose its passage before the Select Committee of both Houses."

Thus, you will see, Sir, that, under the English law, the owners of land which is proposed to be compulsorily acquired, have got ample opportunities of making their objections and having their objections inquired into and disposed of, whereas under our law there is no opportunity given to them at all for making any objection. What we have to consider, Sir, is how this defect can be removed. The procedure that I have proposed is that the owner of the land should be allowed to raise this point along with any other objection before the Collector during the inquiry that he makes prior to the making of the award, and that, failing to get satisfaction there, he must, as in the case of other objections, be allowed to ask the Collector to refer the matter to the Civil Court. I am aware that there is a great difference of opinion on this point, but non-official opinion is, as a rule . . .

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member must bring his remarks to a close.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I find that non-official opinion is, as a rule, in favour of that procedure. I admit that official opinion is rather against it, and the opinion of the Judges, which I have carefully examined, is divided on that point; some of the Judges of the High Courts, who were consulted, are in favour of it and some are against it, but I admit, Sir, that the official opinion is against the making of any reference to the Civil Courts. This objection is based on three reasons. One is that the Government cannot possibly do anything wrong.

Mr. Chairman: I have allowed the Honourable Member sufficient latitude. I do not think he need go into so many details.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Very well, I will not go into details. I recognise, Sir, that there is a good deal of official opposition to the matter going before a Civil Court, but the chief ground on which that objection is based is that it causes delay. Well, on reading all these opinions and also by virtue of my experience as an executive officer. I do admit that there is some force, Sir, in the argument that, if every case in which an objection is made should go before a Civil Court, there might be much delay. So, I, personally, Sir, am inclined to reconsider that point. I will remove that, subject to some other method of inquiry, but this is a matter which could be considered by the Select Committee. I, for one, would not raise any objection to that provision being taken away and some more speedy procedure being adopted. That, however, is a matter of detail. The principle underlying my Bill is that the owner of the land must be given an opportunity to raise an objection. That is the principle underlying my Bill. If the Government admit that principle, as they ought to admit, because there is such a strong official opinion in support of it, they ought not to oppose my motion which is only to refer the Bill to the Select Committee where the agency by which the objection should be heard can be determined. I therefore move my motion.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma (Revenue and Agriculture Member): Sir, it is clear from the speech of the Honourable Mover of this Bill that, having gone carefully through all the opinions which have been received, he sees that the main principle for which he has been fighting, namely, that there should be a remedy to a Civil Court open to the aggrieved party, is one that cannot be accepted, and he is therefore prepared to drop it for himself.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Oh, no.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: To drop that portion of the Bill. Honourable Members have had these opinions circulated and it is clear that all the Local Governments who have been consulted are clearly of opinion that the Bill is neither necessary nor desirable. The Government, it is true, have stated, and do state even now, that they have under consideration the question of amending the Land Acquisition Act, especially with regard to the recommendations made by the Industrial Commission. As to whether the Land Acquisition Act has to be amended or not is a subject on which the Government of India has been in correspondence with the Local Governments, whose replies have been received and the whole matter is being considered by the Government. We recognise that it may be, as has been pointed out by some of the Local Governments, that an opportunity may by means of a Statutory provision be given to the landholders or other persons whose lands may be acquired, to state their objections which at present they can state under various departmental rules. Such rules have been formulated by Bengal, Madras and other Provinces so that the Local Governments may have them always before them and consider them before they come to any decision in the matter. But that is entirely different from accepting the various principles for which my Honourable friend has been contending. It is clear from his statement that he has been largely influenced by the unhappy controversy which has been raging in some parts of the Madras Presidency during the last 2 years. It may be that some landholders feel aggrieved by the proceedings which have been taken for the acquisition of land to better the condition of the depressed classes. It may be that in individual cases the procedure has not been correct. I am not for a moment saying that it has not been correct; but to argue from a position due to temporary causes, where the Government, according to the Honourable Member himself, have been striving their level best to improve the depressed classes, and to say that the whole Act has to be revised in view of the experience which has been his unhappy lot to notice during the last few years, I think, is going too far. The Local Governments emphatically say that it would be absolutely unsafe to prolong these inquiries in the manner suggested in this Bill. Honourable Members who are lawyers will also remember that the Privy Council, in their latest judgment on the subject, have approved quite clearly and emphatically of the procedure under which the Government decide as to whether land acquisition is desirable in any particular instance or not. It is absolutely impossible to lay down categorically what is a public purpose. Nor does this Bill lay down what is a public purpose. If it is impossible to define what is a public purpose, what is the criterion which the Civil Court would have before it in coming to a decision as to whether the proceedings which have been taken are legal or illegal? The problem bristles with difficulties. The Act has been working fairly smoothly for the last 30 or 40 years (Honourable Members: "No, no.") excepting in one or two recent cases which have come into prominence in Bombay.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Most glaring instances.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: It may be, and it is in respect of those acquisitions for public companies and for industrial concerns as I have said already that the Government has legislation in contemplation; and Honourable Members may rest assured that it is the desire of Government to set this matter at rest so that a satisfactory solution may be reached from the public as well as the governmental point of view. The Government have no desire to acquire land for public companies and industrial concerns which would act as a hardship to the public at all. Therefore they do mean to provide a remedy and the necessary procedure is being evolved. But the Honourable Mr. Ramayya Pantulu asks us to agree to a measure under which all acquisition for a railway company, for a local board, for a municipality or for a proper Government purpose has to be brought before a civil court or any other tribunal and that the whole matter should be adjudicated upon before the proceedings are concluded. It would be impossible, I think, and it would be extremely costly to undertake any such inquiry whatsoever or to refer these matters to a civil court, and I think the Local Governments are perfectly right in stating that the procedure is one which cannot be acceptable to any Member of this Legislature. I venture to suggest that the remedy that is sought to be provided by this Bill is one which would lead to infinite difficulties, delays and excess cost, and is one which has not been accepted even in the United Kingdom. Even in the United Kingdom it is not the civil courts that adjudicate as regards the purpose. Here as I have already said the Industrial Commission has made certain recommendations as to whether acquisition for private companies and for industrial concerns could not be placed on a more satisfactory footing and that is a matter which is being considered; but this Bill does not confine its operation to merely industrial companies, but extends its purview to every act of acquisition for any public purpose, whether it be governmental, municipal, local or otherwise. Take the case of a railway company. Land has to be acquired in several districts; thousands of pieces of land have to be acquired. Well, are we to be told that a detailed inquiry of the sort adumbrated in this Bill would be possible or that any railway project would be feasible if all persons who object to particular patches of land being acquired are going to be given the liberty of going before a tribunal and questioning the legality and the equity of land acquisition? If A says that the railway need not run through his land and points out to B's land as the more appropriate one, notice will have to be given to B; the whole alignment will have to be changed. It would be impossible to do anything whatsoever if questions of that description are to be left to the determination of any court whatsoever or any tribunal which may be constituted for the purpose. So far as I am aware the only objections that have been raised in the past are with regard to the acquisitions for these industrial companies. I am not aware that the Government have been abusing their power in arbitrarily acquiring land for railway companies or for legitimate public purposes or local and municipal purposes. The whole of the machinery would come to a standstill, no project would be possible of completion if the elaborate machinery that is sought to be provided by this Bill is going to be accepted by this House. It would be extremely difficult, and we shall not know where we shall be. I therefore would suggest, Sir, that it would be impossible for Government to agree to the principle of this measure in so far as it asks that every question of this description should be arbitrated by a tribunal before the acquisition proceedings are concluded. But that does not mean that the Government do not realise the difficulties that have been pointed out. As has been observed by the Honourable Mover, some of the Local Governments themselves have suggested a slight modification whereby opportunities ought to be given to the public who may be affected by the proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act to state their case before the Government determines as to what has to be done. I think it is but fair that the persons who are affected should be allowed to have their say and that the Government should have all the proceedings before them before they come to any final decision: but once the Government come to a decision, I submit to the House that that decision should be final. It is not likely that they would tolerate any vexatious or malicious proceedings or that they would acquire land unnecessarily especially in these days when every grievance can be ventilated in a Council. I may further point out, Sir, that every project has to be brought before the Councils for financial sanction, and therefore there is a definite amount of control now exercised both by the Central Government as well as by the Provincial Governments in the matter of acquisition. It is not that there is no remedy whatsoever. I have already said that the Government, when they bring in a Bill to modify the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act for the purpose of acquiring land for industrial concerns or for private companies, and not merely for governmental purposes, would certainly sympathetically view the position that has been placed before the House to provide a machinery whereby individuals who may feel aggrieved should be able to state their case fully and inquiries made before the Government comes to a decision. I would therefore suggest to the Honourable Mover that he has achieved his purpose in bringing this grievance to the notice of Government and that he might withdraw his motion. It is impossible to proceed with the Bill as it is. The wording is imperfect; it is impossible to define what "public purpose" is. If it is impossible to define what "public purpose" is, it is impossible also for a civil or judicial tribunal which cannot exercise its discretion arbitrarily but must proceed upon well defined lines, to come to a proper decision. I therefore think, Sir, that this Bill has been misconceived and that the motion should be withdrawn by the Honourable Mover. If he does not, I must oppose it.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I believe, Sir, that I shall not be doing justice to the wishes of my constituency if I do not speak on this question of the Land Acquisition Act while it is being discussed by this House. My Honourable friend, Mr. Sarma, has just pointed out that the Government themselves are considering the matter and probably in course of time they will themselves introduce a measure to amend the present Land Acquisition Act. I am very glad that the Government are going to do that, but I only hope that this desire on their part will soon materialise into action. If I am not mistaken, I think on one occasion, about a year ago it was perhaps, when a similar measure was introduced, the Government stated that they themselves desired to introduce legislation to amend this Act

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: May I make a personal explanation, Sir? I have already said that on a distinct reference, apart from this Bill, which has been made by Government, all the Local Governments have now replied, that the matter is being examined by the various departments and would be ripe for an early decision. We hope to be able, therefore, to proceed with such measures as may be ultimately decided upon by the Government at an early date.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, I wish to emphasise the urgency of taking measures to amend the Land Acquisition Act at a very early date. I emphasise this fact particularly because this House I think is soon going to launch upon a policy of rapid industrialization so far as this country is concerned, and however anxious I am—and there can hardly be anyone who is more anxious than myself—that this country should adopt a policy that will encourage rapid industrialization, no one is more anxious than myself to avoid the dangers that will come into existence with the adoption of that policy. One of the dangers will be that the necessity of acquiring land will come into the forefront. We have had an instance in Bombay where a good deal of agitation has been created, and a righteous indignation was caused at the acquisition of land under the present Land Acquisition Act. I want to point out to the Government that if they are going to introduce a Bill to amend the Land Acquisition Act, they must see to it that as far as possible the Land Acquisition Act that will be introduced now will be in conformity with the Act such as obtains in England. My Honourable friend, Mr. Sarma, pointed out the difficulty of determining as to what

Mr. Chairman: I can only allow the Honourable Member an opportunity, if he desires, to discuss the principle of the present Bill, not the details of an intended Bill about which he has already made ample reference.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I bow to your ruling, Sir. I am now discussing the principle. I only wish to say that there are safeguards in the English Act which do not exist under the present Land Acquisition Act here, and it is necessary that those safeguards should also be introduced into the Land Acquisition Act here, specially to determine the public purpose; the Legislatures of the country in the various provinces must be given a voice, a predominant voice in determining what is a public purpose and what is not a public purpose and the matter should not be left to the discretion of the executive. With regard to the other question as to who should determine the compensation and what should be the compensation, there, too, there are safeguards provided in the English Act which do not obtain here. Here, the man who notifies that a particular portion of land will be acquired, and the man who determines the amount of compensation, happens to be the same man. (Voices: "No, the Court.") Well, the Court comes in only when the matter is taken to the Court, but otherwise I think the Collector himself determines both. Well, my only point is this, that Government should try their best to bring the Act here in conformity with the English Act. That alone will be acceptable, I believe, to this country.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, as I have given some thought to this matter, I should like to detain the House with one or two observations with the object of removing certain impressions from the mind of the Government Benches. The first thing is that the Government is under the impression that it is only the industrial undertakings which necessitate some change in the view point of Government as regards acquisition. The case of the public is,—“No, when land is acquired by Government itself even for big undertakings, such as those for railway purposes, or canal purposes, as well as for other purposes, Government does so without taking into consideration the difficulties caused by its procedure as to compulsory acquisition, and often makes up its mind to acquire land even when it is not prepared with the money and means necessary for carrying out its project.” I would detain the House for a longer time than I thought it necessary to do, at this late hour, if I were to cite instances of large acquisitions which have been lying unquod for 10, 12 or even 15 years, without Government being able to put them to any use whatever. On top of that what Government does is this; if plots are acquired on which there are some machinery and structures, costing say about five lakhs of rupees, the Deputy Collector of his own accord goes into some sort of arrangement and says to the owner of the plot, "I will acquire some other land and give this land to you, so that Government will not have to pay compensation." That is what is in my mind. So that if the Government wishes to improve the Act the improvement cannot be effected within these narrow limits indicated by the Honourable Member for Revenue and Agriculture.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): I rise to a point of order. Is the promise of the Government under discussion by this House or the Bill moved by the Honourable Mr. Pantulu?

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: The Bill is, Sir. It is proposed that the whole Bill should be rejected because there are two principles involved: one is the determination of the necessity for the acquisition and the reality of the purpose, and the other is the mode in which that purpose of the acquisition is to be achieved. As regards the last point I think Honourable Members of the House will agree that the civil court is not the proper place for these questions to be discussed and determined, and some other speedy method is required. What the public think is that it should not be left in the hands of one individual. There should be a Board in which the public have confidence for determining these questions as speedily as possible. The executive members of the Board may be officials and non-officials. (A Voice: "Educationists?") No, not educationists. They can be selected and various other questions which are incidental may be considered when the Bill is being considered. There is therefore not one point but several, but I will not detain the House by saying anything more. With these observations, Sir, I will resume my seat.

Mr. T. E. Moir: Sir, I greatly regret that I should have been drawn into the discussion on this Bill at all; and, strictly speaking, I suppose that the remarks I am going to make are irrelevant and if it is the ruling of the Chair that they are irrelevant, I am quite ready to submit to that ruling. But whatever view the House may take of this Bill, of the principles it contains, I do wish to protest against the manner in which Mr. Ramayya has brought in the Labour Department of Madras. I wish to protest against that being taken as relevant to his Bill or supporting it. His speech was presumably directed, or should have been directed, to the principle of the Bill, not to making an attack on the Labour Department of the Madras Presidency. I should perhaps not have felt it necessary to intervene even on that score, but he further proceeded to point me out to the House as having been personally responsible for those enormities of which he stated that the Labour Department had been guilty. He not only did that, but he asked me to support him in bringing these charges against that Department of which after all the administration is the concern of the provincial Government; he asked me to support him in the allegations which he made against that Department. Now, the contributions of my Honourable friend to the debates in this House are generally marked by experience and knowledge and a freedom from prejudice. But I am afraid I cannot say that they have been marked by those attributes in this case, and I at any rate must refuse, in order to support his Bill, to blacken my own face and to sit on a stool of repentance.

I would turn now to what he has placed before the House as evidence in support of his Bill. He referred to the action which has been taken in respect of the depressed classes in Madras, and he said that that action had led to all sorts of irregularities, oppression and so on, which presumably his Bill, if it had been in existence, would have prevented. But he did not say why that policy to which he referred had been adopted by the Madras Government. Most Members of this House are aware that one of the greatest problems with which we are faced in the Madras Presidency is the position of the depressed classes, and may I say that it is not merely, as possibly members who come from the North of India may suppose, a social question. It is not a social stigma or social or religious disabilities. It is very largely an economic question—a question of economic disabilities. And the position in reference to the depressed classes in the districts to which my Honourable friend referred is that they are mainly agricultural labourers. Further, that for generations untold they have been practically bound to the soil.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I must rise to a point of order. This speech justifies the action of the Labour Commissioner of Madras, with which we have nothing to do. I am afraid my Honourable friend is not speaking on the Bill. Whatever the arguments of Mr. Pantulu may have been, the question before us is whether the Bill is to be referred to a Select Committee or not. We have nothing to do with the actions of the Madras Government or the Labour Commissioner.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I also think that a side remark made by the Honourable Mover of this Bill cannot be made the pivot for a long discourse on that subject.

Mr. Chairman: I allowed the Honourable Mr. Moir to make a short reference to it, and I think, having done it, he will confine his remarks to the Bill. Now, I think he has sufficiently refuted the charge against the Labour Department.

Mr. T. E. Moir: Sir, I would merely say that my remarks are strictly relevant possibly not to the principles of the Bill but to remarks which were allowed and to arguments which were allowed to be adduced by the Honourable Mover of the Bill. But I of course bow to your decision, Sir, and I say nothing more. I should have liked, if I had been permitted, to explain how entirely wrong an idea the Honourable Member . . .

Dr. H. S. Gour: I rise to a point of order. If one Honourable Member makes some irrelevant remarks, does it justify another member making an irrelevant reply?

Mr. T. E. Moir: If I might rise to a point of order, Sir; if a Member of this House, who happens to be an official Member, is attacked in respect of his administration of a department in this House, is he to be attacked without a right to defend himself?

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Moir will resume his seat. I have already permitted Mr. Moir, having reference to the remarks made by Mr. Pantulu, to travel outside the régime of strict relevancy in order to give him an opportunity to refute the remarks. Having done that, I must call upon him to speak on the Bill.

Mr. T. E. Moir: Sir, I only rose in order to point out to the House that the so-called evidence adduced by the Honourable Member was not relevant

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member is still repeating the same remarks. If he is not going to speak on the Bill, he must close his speech.

Mr. T. E. Moir: And I have no desire, under the circumstances, to say anything further.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: In the first place, Sir, I must say that I never meant to attack my Honourable friend, Mr. Moir. I never meant to ask him, Sir, to support all that I said. All that I wanted his support for was

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammādan): Is that relevant, Sir?

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member will proceed to reply to any remarks made on the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: The Honourable the Revenue Member said there was no necessity for this Bill, as the present Act was working smoothly. Well, Sir, it is not working at all smoothly. Several instances of hardship under the Act have recently come to the notice of the public, but the fact that more instances have not come to our notice is because of section 6 of the Act, which acts as a guillotine and does not allow these objections to be raised before the Court. If that was not the case there would be hundreds of cases of hardship brought before the Courts and reported in the newspapers and in the law reports. It is because this section acts as a closure that the world does not hear much more of these cases.

The Honourable the Revenue Member also said that the Government proposes to do something in regard to the acquisition of land for companies. But is it only in the case of the acquisition of land on behalf of companies that hardship is caused? You will find it is caused not only in connection with acquisition on behalf of companies, but also by Government. I have quoted the remarks of the Consulting Surveyor to the Government of Bombay, who says that wherever he travels he hears objections on all sides to the acquisition of land made by Government. If the remedy that Government is going to provide is to be confined to cases of acquisitions on behalf of companies, it will be a most inadequate provision. There ought to be provision made in regard to the acquisitions of land on behalf of the Government, the Local Board or the Municipality or companies.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: I have said that the question whether the public ought to be given an opportunity, when they are aggrieved, to state their case so that the Local Government may have all the materials before them, will not be confined to industrial companies but will include all acquisitions. With that assurance, I ask the Honourable Member to withdraw.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: The Honourable the Revenue Member said that the Legislative Councils have even now control in the matter of acquisition. What control have they? They may have control in regard to sanctioning a certain sum of money for a certain object, that is all they have. They have absolutely no control in regard to the acquisition of land.

That does not come before the Councils, it is all done by the officers of Government.

The bulk of the Honourable the Revenue Member's speech was devoted to showing that, if every one of the cases where there was an objection were referred to a civil court, there would be an enormous delay. I quite understand that references to court are likely to cause delay, but that is a point which can be remedied. It is quite open to the Select Committee to remove that portion of the Bill and substitute a less costly and more expeditious method of hearing and disposing of petitions. That is a matter which I think can be gone into by the Select Committee. Therefore there is no merit in dwelling too much upon a point of detail which could be remedied in the Select Committee. I, therefore, think that the Bill ought to go to the Select Committee where it can be altered into a form which will be suitable for all purposes.

Mr. Chairman: The question is:

"That the Bill further to amend the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of Mr. N. M. Samarth, Mr. J. N. Mukherjee, Mr. W. M. Hussanally, Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh, Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Rai T. P. Mukherjee Bahadur, Mr. J. Hullah and the Mover."

The motion was negatived.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Friday, the 16th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Friday, 16th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

MEMBER SWORN:

Mr. A. V. V. Aiyar, C.I.E., M.L.A. (Finance Department: Nominated Official).

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

PETROL CHARGES.

852. Mr. R. A. Spence: Are Government aware that there is widespread discontent at the high charge for petrol levied by the Companies controlling the oil fields of India and Burma and that India is not receiving any benefit as she ought to do from what may be termed a local industry of her own products?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The attention of Government has been drawn to statements to this effect in the public press.

BURMA OIL COMPANIES' CHARGES FOR PETROL.

853. Mr. R. A. Spence: Are Government aware that the retail sale price of Burma petrol in England is only two shillings per gallon, equal to 24 annas currency, whereas in Bombay the price is 32 annas and in Calcutta 30 annas per gallon and that, even allowing for the special War tax of six annas, the Oil Companies in Burma obtain more for their petrol from the India public than from foreign export in spite of heavy freight charges to Europe?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The prices are believed to be as stated.

Sir Montagu Webb: Arising out of that answer, Sir, may I ask if Government contemplate taking any steps to secure to consumers in India the full benefits which may be expected reasonably to arise from the existence of local oil-fields?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: May I ask what steps the Honourable Member contemplates?

RETAIL PRICE OF PETROL.

854. Mr. R. A. Spence: Will Government state the approximate retail price of petrol to the public in India and Burma for each year from 1916 to 1922, and what reduction, if any, has been allowed on Government purchases?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The present retail price of petrol is 1-14 per gallon in Calcutta and from 1-10 to 1-12 in Rangoon. Information as to prices in preceding years is not available. Petrol supplied direct to the military authorities is exempt from the usual excise duty, but no reduction in price is allowed by oil companies on such purchases.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I ask the Honourable Member what is the cost price of petrol in India?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I have no information on that point.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: What is the price of petrol per gallon in Delhi?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I do not know, Sir.

IMPORT OF BURMA PETROL INTO INDIA.

355. Mr. R. A. Spence: What has been the import in gallons of Burma petrol into India during the first 9 months of the fiscal year 1922-23, and the export to other countries over a like period?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Returns of coastal trade are not published monthly and therefore figures showing the quantity of petrol imported from Burma into India during the first 9 months of the current fiscal year are not readily available. The export from Burma to other countries during the same period amounted to 12,872 thousand gallons.

PETROL IMPORTATION.

356. Mr. R. A. Spence: Is any petrol other than from Burma imported into British India and if so, what was the quantity in gallons for the year 1921-22?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Small quantities of petrol are imported into British India from foreign countries such as the United Kingdom, Ceylon, Straits Settlements and the United States of America. Such imports amounted to 1,348 gallons in 1921-22.

Sir Montagu Webb: Does Government recognise, in view of this reply, that there obviously exists a combination to maintain prices in India at an artificially high level?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: No, Sir.

WAR TAX ON PETROL.

357. Mr. R. A. Spence: (1) What was the amount of revenue realized from the War tax of six annas per gallon on petrol during the fiscal year 1921-22 and the quantity in gallons exported to other countries?

(2) Now that the War has been officially declared to have ended, has Government considered the expediency of removing this special War tax and in place thereof levying a reduced excise duty on all petrol produced in India and Burma both for export and local consumption which, while not necessarily reducing the revenue, should have the effect of reducing the sale price in India and Burma and thereby assisting the expansion of motor transport?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (1) The excise duty levied on petrol during the fiscal year 1921-22, amounted to Rs. 69½ lakhs. The quantity of petrol exported to other countries during the same period amounted to a little over 20 million gallons.

(2) The Government of India thank the Honourable Member for his suggestion but he will realise that it is quite impossible for me to anticipate in any way the Budget speech of my Honourable colleague, the Finance Member.

Sir Montagu Webb: May I take it from the Honourable Member's replies that Government feel that there are no means at their disposal by which these artificially high prices can be controlled?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Honourable Member must give me notice of questions of that kind.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

SALARIES PAID ON RAILWAYS.

173. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government be pleased to state the total amount paid as salaries to the staff (superior and inferior) of the Indian Railways as below:

- (1) Amount paid to Europeans and Anglo-Indians and Indian Christians.
- (2) Amount paid to Mohammadans, Hindus, Sikhs and others respectively?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The information in the detail asked for is not available. It can be collected only by special compilations by the different railways and the Government are reluctant to put Railway Administrations to this trouble.

EXPENDITURE ON PERSONS UNABLE TO EARN THEIR LIVELIHOOD.

174. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: (a) According to the last census of India what is the total number of persons in each province who on account of being blind, lame, dumb and crippled are unable to earn their livelihood?

(b) Whether such persons are given any aid from Imperial Revenue and if so, what is the total amount spent on this account. The information may please be given separately for Christians and non-Christians and under non-Christians, figures for Hindus and Mohammadans and Sikhs should be given separately?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (a) The number of persons returned at the last census of India as blind or deaf-mute is given in the attached statement. No statistics regarding lame or crippled persons are available.

(b) No special contribution is made by the Government of India to Local Governments but the latter no doubt make provision themselves.

In the case of areas directly under the administrative control of the Government of India allotments are made annually, but it is left entirely to the discretion of the heads of minor administrations to spend the money in the most suitable and useful manner. The budget provision on this account for the current financial year amounts to Rs. 28,380 in all. It is impossible to give information separately for Christians and non-Christians or for Hindus, Muhammadans and Sikhs.

EXPENDITURE ON RELIGIOUS BUILDINGS.

175. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government please state whether:

- (i) Government grants are given for building of churches of all Christian sects (Roman Catholic, Protestant and others) and their Bishops are paid anything as a stipend from Government, if so, please state what is the total amount spent on this account;
- (ii) Whether any similar building grants are paid for erection of mosques, temples and Gurdwaras and whether the Imams of mosques and Pandits and Mahants of Gurdwaras are paid some stipends from Government, if so, what is the total amount spent on this account?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (i) Under certain conditions Government provides for or makes contributions towards the construction of Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches. The Anglican Bishops of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay alone receive full stipends from Government while the Anglican Bishops of Lucknow, Lahore, Rangoon and Nagpur receive from Government revenues the pay of senior chaplains. The total amount spent on Ecclesiastical buildings including churches, cemeteries and parsonages during 1920-21 (the latest year for which figures are available) was Rs. 2,50,769. About Rs. 1,22,371 are at present expended by Government on the salaries of the Bishops of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Lucknow, Lahore, Rangoon and Nagpur.

(ii) The Honourable Member is referred to the reply given to his question on the same subject No. 330 on the 5th September 1921. As then stated non-Christian places of worship have been and are financially assisted by the State through grants of land and alienations of land revenue made for religious purposes and to some extent through expenditure for archaeological purposes. The amount so spent cannot be stated but is undoubtedly very large.

EXPENDITURE ON FAMILIES OF SOLDIERS KILLED DURING THE WAR.

176. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: What was the total number of Indian soldiers and others who were killed during the last great war? The information may please be given separately for Hindus, Mohammdans, Sikhs and Christians and it may be stated how much is spent annually from Imperial Revenues towards the maintenance of the bereaved families of deceased persons of each class?

Mr. E. Burdon: The total number of Indian soldiers and other military ranks who lost their lives during the Great War, from all causes, is 58,946. The Government of India regret it is not possible to state how many of this number were Hindus, Mohammadans, etc.

To collect the information desired by the Honourable Member in the second half of his question, it would be necessary to require all Controllers of Military Accounts to undertake a special and most laborious compilation which, in the opinion of Government, would not be justified by the result. The information cannot for this reason be furnished.

DEATHS OF BRITISH AND INDIAN SOLDIERS IN GERMAN EAST AFRICA.

177. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government be pleased to state what was the total number in British forces who conquered

German East Africa from Germans during the Great War, and how many of them were Indians; what was the total number of men who were killed in the German East Africa war and how many of them were Indians?

Mr. E. Burdon: The total strength of the British forces which were engaged in German East Africa during the Great War is not known to Government. A statement giving the number of Indian personnel, combatant and non-combatant, despatched to East Africa during the years 1914-1918 is laid on the table.

To the second part of the question, the answer is that the total number of men killed amongst the troops sent from India was 1,654, of whom 1,497 were Indians. The Government of India have no information as to the total number killed amongst all the troops that were engaged in East Africa.

Statement showing the number of Indian personnel, combatant and non-combatant despatched to East Africa during the years 1914-1918.

Indian other ranks	38,638

LEGAL RIGHTS OF INDIANS IN KENYA.

178. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government please say whether in connection with the present disputes in Kenya (East Africa), the Government has had some correspondence with Nairobi and the Imperial Government, about the legal rights of the Indians? If so, will the Government kindly lay that correspondence on the table?

Mr. J. Hullah: The reply to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. Government do not think it advisable to lay the correspondence on the table.

The Honourable Member is, however, referred to the answers given by me on the 15th and 20th January 1923 to questions asked by Messrs. Jamnadas Dwarkadas and Seshagiri Ayyar, and also to the announcement made by me on the 30th January 1923 relating to the postponement of the general election in Kenya.

HAJ PILGRIMAGE.

179. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table the following information:

- (a) Number of Haj pilgrims who left India for Haj during the years 1910 to 1918 and 1919 to 1922.
- (b) In case of fall in the number of such pilgrims during the years 1919 to 1922, the reasons for the decrease may please be stated?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (a) The numbers were 78,378 and 57,614, respectively.

(b) The number of pilgrims has always been liable to marked fluctuations. Government have no special information as to the reasons for the decrease.

INDIANS IN MARINE AND AIR FORCES.

180. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government please say whether efforts are being made to recruit Indians in the commissioned ranks of the Marine and Air forces, so that the Indians should have opportunity to qualify themselves for the marine and air militia similarly as fixed number of commissioned posts have been reserved in the inland military forces?

Mr. E. Burdon: The question of rendering Indians eligible for commissions in the Royal Air Force is under consideration. Indians are not eligible for such commissions at present.

Indians are already eligible for commissions in the Royal Indian Marine. A committee to examine, amongst other things, the question of recruiting Indians as officers in the Royal Indian Marine has been appointed under the Resolution moved on the 12th January 1922 by Sir P. S. Sivaswamy Aiyer in the Legislative Assembly and accepted by Government, and the Committee is about to commence its inquiries.

INDIAN MILITARY COLLEGES.

181. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government please quote the number and localities of colleges for military training in British India worked on the lines of such colleges in England, and state how many Indian students are reading in these colleges?

Mr. E. Burdon: The only college of the kind at present in existence in India is the Prince of Wales's Royal Indian Military College, Dehra Dun. The number of students now at this College is 50.

MOSQUES IN DELHI.

182. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: (a) Has the letter published on page 7 of the Muslim Outlook, Lahore, dated 28th January 1923, describing the pitiable condition of the mosques at Delhi, been brought to the notice of the Government?

(b) If so, whether any action has been taken to redress the Muslim grievances; if not,

(c) Will the Government kindly take necessary steps to secure that the mosques mentioned in the letter receive the same attention as the places of worship of other communities referred to therein?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Yes.

(b) and (c) The Honourable Member's attention is invited to the statement I made in the House on 6th instant in reply to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar.

ARMS RULE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

183. Mr. Ahmad Baksh: (a) When is the Government going to give effect to the report of the Arms Rule Committee?

(b) Has the Government agreed on any point of the minute of dissent to the Report? If so, on what points?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I hope very shortly to be in a position to make a statement on the subject.

SALARY AND PENSION OF HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR INDIA.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: May I take this opportunity, Sir, of correcting a misstatement which I inadvertently made in replying to a question by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar the other day. Mr. Ayyar asked me whether Sir William Meyer, the late High Commissioner, drew his pension in addition to his salary as High Commissioner. Acting on the information supplied to me, I replied in the negative; but being not quite satisfied I cabled Home to the High Commissioner for information and I find Sir William Meyer did draw his pension in addition to his pay as High Commissioner.

MESSAGE FROM THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

Secretary of the Assembly: Sir, a Message has been received from the Secretary of the Council of State, which runs as follows:

"I am directed to inform you that the Council of State has, at its meeting held on the 15th February, agreed without any amendment to the following Bills which have been passed by the Legislative Assembly:

1. A Bill to supplement the Malabar Completion of Trials Act, 1922.
2. A Bill to amend and consolidate the law relating to the regulation and inspection of Mines.
3. A Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to steam boilers."

RESOLUTION RE ADOPTION OF A POLICY OF PROTECTION.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I rise to move the Resolution that stands in my name on the agenda paper. It runs thus:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that a policy of Protection be adopted as the one best suited to the interests of India, its application being regulated from time to time by such discrimination as may be considered necessary by the Government of India with the consent and approval of the Indian Legislature."

I need scarcely say, Sir, that this is one of the most momentous questions that have come before this House for obtaining the decision of the House upon. The decision that the House will give on this most vital question will, I need scarcely say, affect the future of India. This question has been before the Indian public ever since the advent of British rule in India and the House is also aware that respected Indian publicists, most of whom have now passed away and some of whom are still with us, have spoken in clear and unmistakable terms as to the policy that India should adopt on this question. Unfortunately, situated as we were in those days, neither the opinion of Indian leaders or the Indian public, nor the opinion of the Government of India, even as it was then constituted, were paid attention to by those who were in authority in England. The fiscal policy for this country was dictated not by the Government of India in this country nor by the people of this country as represented in the Legislatures of this country but by the Secretary of State, and that, not even in the interests of this country but in other interests. Ever since the inception of British rule in this country leader after leader has spoken unmistakably on the question of India having the right to decide its own fiscal policy and most of the Indian leaders have condemned the policy of free trade forced on this country, a policy which was dictated by interests other than our own. You find, for instance, Mr. Gokhale calling the fiscal policy that was forced on this country "the darkest spot in the administration of India." You find men like Romesh Chunder Dutt condemning the policy which was largely in the interests of other countries than India. You find men like Ranade condemning the policy of forcing free trade on this country which brought about the economic poverty and the misery of the masses of this country. Time after time, not only outside the Legislatures, but even in the Legislatures the question was brought forward by Indian Members of the Councils asking for a voice on the part of the Government of India and the Indian Legislature in the determination of the policy that was best suited to this country. Unfortunately for this country the cry of the Indian leaders—and if I may add also, of the Government of India—was a cry in the wilderness. You will remember, Sir, and I am sure this House will remember that even in the earlier periods when the struggle between this country and Lancashire was going on in the Legislature itself, Members of the Government of India openly declared that the policy which was being forced on this country was not at all in the interests of this country and we were unfortunate enough to be compelled to continue a policy which was not of our seeking, which was not in our interest, but which was forced on us by other interests. Finally the cry of the Indian Legislatures and of the people of India culminated in the appointment of the Industrial Commission to find out whether or not there were possibilities in the country for industrial development. Even then, as the power to dictate the policy was in the hands of the Secretary of State and not with the Government of India, the question of the fiscal policy best suited to this country was precluded from the deliberations of the Industrial Commission. Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford then instituted an inquiry into the political problem in India and we find in their Report that it is clearly stated that they believed that one of the greatest grievances of India was that they had no voice in determining their fiscal policy and that they were forced to adopt a policy which was not in their interests. As a result of the inquiry instituted by the late Secretary of State and Lord Chelmsford and as a result of their deliberations the Joint Parliamentary Committee made a recommendation in which it clearly stated that in future, after the introduction of the Reform Act of 1919, all questions of fiscal policy should be determined by the Government of India in consultation with the Indian Legislature; and in cases where the Government of India and the Indian Legislature were in agreement the Secretary should cease to interfere. It was in accordance with this recommendation that the demand for an inquiry into the best policy suitable for this country was renewed here and ultimately a Commission was appointed to conduct that inquiry. We are here to-day to discuss the recommendations made by that Commission and to decide as to whether we should adopt the recommendations made unanimously by the Commission or whether we should continue to bless the policy which has brought about serious consequences in this country, which has brought about a state of economic dependence incomparable in the annals of the history of the world. India had once the reputation of being one of the richest countries in the world. To-day, as the House knows, it has the reputation of being one of the poorest countries in the world. Its dependence to-day is almost entirely on land, and in years of famine especially, one feels in the words of Lord Curzon

"the resisting power of the people is practically nil." The Fiscal Commission has made recommendations. I do not want to go for the moment into the differences that exist between the Report that is signed by all the members of the Commission and the views laid down in the note of dissent that has been recorded by the minority. Because, although one feels that there are some points on which a difference exists it cannot be denied and I am sure my Honourable colleagues on the Fiscal Commission here will bear me out when I say that so far as the fundamental question is concerned the Commission has come to a unanimous conclusion. I may also be permitted to say that in my opinion a few of my colleagues started with a bias in favour of a policy of free trade and after the examination of witnesses, after a perusal of the written evidence that was submitted to us, and after the deliberations that were carried on in our meetings, they came to the conclusion that, all said and done, the policy of protection was best suited to the interests of this country. It is to the credit, I think, of the Members of this House that even on this Commission, where members of both the Indian community and the European community worked together, not much difficulty was felt in deliberating this question of vital importance, round which so many controversies have raged in the past and that so far as the fundamental conclusion is concerned we were practically unanimous. The Commission has recommended that the policy of protection is best suited for this country and that this policy of protection should be applied with discrimination. The Commission examined the economic situation that exists in this country. The Commission found that the dependence of the mass of the people was too much on land. The Commission found also that the argument that if India went in for industrial development, it would be at the cost of agriculture, had no force in it, because the population that could be drawn for the purpose of industrial development assuming even that industrialisation went on at a very rapid pace, would not be so large as to affect the work of the agricultural population in any way, that considering that more men were now engaged in agriculture than it was necessary or wise for them to do, it would be a help to the agricultural population if members of their families devoted themselves to the work of industrial development in this country. Not only that. But the Commission also found that if a policy of protection were adopted, and if as a result of it the wealth that is now drawn away from the country would remain in the country, the country would be the richer for that, the country would then have better resources at its disposal to be used towards the furtherance of the irrigation policy which would ultimately go to increase the prosperity of the agricultural population. Incidentally the Commission found also that, apart from being a hindrance to the agricultural population, a policy of industrialisation would go a great way in placing at the disposal of the country resources which could be used for the furtherance of the agricultural policy of this country; for, the object of the policy of protection and thereby encouraging industries in this country is mainly to keep the wealth of the country in the country itself. The wealth that is now being drawn away from the country by the necessity of importing from foreign countries manufactured articles and exporting from here raw materials which could be very well used for producing manufactured articles at much cheaper rates if a policy of industrialisation was adopted will remain in the country which would be the richer for that. At present what happens is that most of our manufactured articles are imported from foreign countries. Many of these articles are produced out of the raw materials that are exported from this country. The raw materials are the real wealth of the country, but the use of this real wealth of the country is made not by this country but by other countries, for these raw materials are sent back to this country in another shape; only the country has to pay a much larger price for these articles than the price the country received for the raw materials out of which these articles were manufactured and sent here. If we could by adopting a policy of reasoned protection encourage the industrial development of this country, we could make use of these raw materials here so as to save us all extra cost that we pay for the manufactured articles that are imported. We found that the only remedy for solving the economic problem of this country was to go in for a bold policy of industrialisation so as to keep the wealth of the country in the country itself and not to allow foreign countries to take the benefit of the abundance of raw materials and other conditions that are favourable to industrialisation which exist in this country. It is a fact, Sir, that India possesses a natural genius for industrial development, for, all those who have studied the ancient history of this country know full well that this country had never depended entirely on agriculture, that there were times when the industries of this country prospered, that there were times when the articles manufactured in this country were not only used by this country itself but were even exported outside this country. I admit that the invention of machinery was probably the first reason that hurt our trade outside this country, but to say that this country does not possess an industrial genius, which is the sine qua non of industrial development, is to show a complete ignorance of the facts of history. That this country possesses a natural industrial genius, and that it is rich in raw materials and other natural resources cannot be denied by any one who has studied even the Report of the Industrial Commission. That the country has also a large labour supply is a fact which is beyond question. As a matter of fact, I feel that it contains such a large labour supply that even if the attention of a fraction of our population was diverted by a policy of industrialisation to work in factories, it would bring about very good results indeed.

Another argument that has very often been used is that the capital of this country is shy. Now I admit that to a certain extent that argument does hold water. But why has the capital of this country been shy? Honourable Members will realise that the capital of this country has been shy not because that the people were not willing to invest in industrial enterprises, but because they had no confidence in the policy of the powers that be, because the policy that they dictated was not in the best interests of this country but it was in the interests of other countries. Just consider for a moment what the situation was when a natural protection was afforded during the war. Was the capital of the country then shy? Has it not been the experience of all of us that in those days when an opportunity was offered by a natural protection given to this country by the war that capital could easily flow wherever there was need for starting industrial concerns? And if a stable policy and a more steady policy in the interests of this country were decided upon by the Government of this country, then I have not the slightest doubt in my mind, and I am sure Honourable Members will have no doubt whatsoever, that it will not be a difficult proposition to induce the people of this country to allow their capital to flow for the purpose of promoting industrial concerns. But apart from that, I am not one of those who shut out the possibilities of allowing foreign capital in this country for the purpose of helping the industries of this country. Under certain limitations imposed as a consequence of concessions made in their favour by a tariff protection and other protection, I should certainly welcome foreign capital to flow into this country for the purpose of building up the industries of this country. But I repeat that I would allow it only under certain limitations imposed by Government. So far as the question of concessions, licences, monopolies, contracts is concerned, the Government themselves have declared the policy of imposing certain limitations on foreign capital. I shall go a step further and impose those limitations even in the case of industries which are started and which are given tariff protection. But that is a matter of detail. My point is that every possible advantage that a country can possess for the purpose of industrial development exists in this country. All that is needed is to give an impetus by means of a policy of protection which will stimulate the people of this country to go in more and more for industry to the ultimate advantage of this country itself. Now, we have, therefore, recommended a policy of protection to be adopted by this country. But we were not blind to the dangers that necessarily accompany the adoption of such a policy. We had the opportunity to see that no country that can boast to-day of having industrially advanced has reached its present stage without at one time or another of its industrial development adopting a policy of protection. Look at Germany, look at America. We do not want to copy the example of the United States of America. The tariffs are too high there, I admit. But look at Germany. Look at England itself, which has risen from a policy of protection to be a free trade country when it was able to stand on its own legs and hold its own against other countries. But, even to-day, those of us that have read the discussions in the House of Commons on the safeguarding of Industries Act and the debate on the dye-stuff question, know full well that the policy of protection is still being resorted to by England where its interests conflict with the interests of other nations. Take the example of Japan. Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford pointed out in their report that India always holds up the example of Japan, which, in our own times and having started on its industrial development long after we established our factories here, has reached a stage of industrial development by which it holds its own against other nations of the world. What is that due to? A policy of protection. A policy in which the Government and the people combine for the furtherance of the interests of their country. We have then the example of other countries none of which has reached its present stage of industrial development without having resorted to the policy of protection at one time or another of its industrial development. But, as I said, we were alive to the dangers that would naturally accompany the adoption of such a policy and therefore we have provided safeguards in our recommendations which would minimise those dangers. For one has got to remember this, that, if this country after a period of continuance of the policy of free trade which has rendered it helpless and incomparably poor and miserable, if it adopted a policy of protection with a view to rapid industrialisation, although the ultimate gain to the country would be certain, the period of transition would be fraught with great dangers to this country, if proper safeguards were not provided in the recommendations of the Fiscal Commission. What would be the danger? The danger would be that it would unnecessarily raise the prices of articles of the necessities of life which ought to be made available to our poor countrymen at as cheap a rate as possible. Now, I admit that there is great force in this argument, and it is because I admit that, that I think the Fiscal Commission has provided safeguards against it. Take our present revenue tariff. No one who knows anything about the present revenue tariff can deny that the tariff rates are not quite low, that the necessity of larger revenues for meeting the heavy military expenditure of the country has forced the hands of the Government to resort to high revenue tariffs which do tell, I admit, on the pockets of the poor people of the country. But what an unscientific and arbitrary system of revenue tariff you have at the present moment. If you can adopt a policy of protection and replace this present arbitrary unscientific system by a scientific tariff system which would bring into the coffers of Government the revenues that they require for their legitimate purposes and at the same time go a great way in helping the industries of this country, then, it seems to me that it would be futile to deny that that policy should be acceptable to the Government and the people of this country. I hold that, if proper discrimination in the selection of industries were exercised, if proper discrimination was exercised in considering the claims of each industry by means of establishing a Tariff Board, as recommended unanimously by the Fiscal Commission, it would not be difficult to evolve a policy of protection with discrimination which would bring about prosperous results for this country, reducing to the minimum the burden that in the transitional period the people might have to bear as a result of the adoption of that policy. No one denies that in order to rise from the position of helpless dependence on other countries for manufactured articles to a position of self-containedness, one must pay a price. We do wish that that price should be as small as possible, that it should be reduced to the minimum that it is possible for us to reduce it to, and it is for that purpose that we have recommended that that policy should be applied with discrimination. There is a small difference here between the majority and the minority. Both recommend that the policy should be applied with discrimination. Both recommend that a Tariff Board should be constituted with a view to investigating the claims of various industries as they come before us. Both say that due regard should be paid to the conditions that are indicated in paragraph 97 of the Fiscal Commission's Report. But, while the majority in my opinion, insists that those conditions should be rigidly and for all time applied, the minority dissents there and says while these conditions may go on for the moment, it is not wise nor right to tie down the hands of the Tariff Board or of the Indian Legislature and the Government of India to a rigid and permanent application of these conditions. In the light of experience that we might gain in the course of a few years, it might be possible for us to say whether those conditions should be made more stringent; or as the minority think that the conditions should be less stringent when the people are prepared to bear a greater burden than they are at the present moment in a position to bear. It is no use, therefore, says the minority, to tie down the hands of the Government of India, the Tariff Board and the Indian Legislature to a rigid and permanent application of these conditions. But that is a matter of detail again. But so far as the policy of protection with discrimination is concerned, the Commission is unanimous on the point that that policy should be adopted by this country. There were other differences also between the majority and the minority. For instance, on the question of foreign capital, about which I have already spoken. The minority is anxious that the object with which protection is being adopted in this country should not be frustrated.

As a result of the recommendation made by the Joint Committee the Secretary of State has no longer that power, but the Government of India and the Indian Legislature now enjoy that power. The House remember that in those old days Mr. Gokhale pointed out that he would have no hesitation in recommending a bold policy of protection if the application of that policy was in the hands of the Government of India itself. But, he said, as the situation stood then, it was entirely within the purview of the Secretary of State to direct the application of a policy of protection. In that case, he said, the danger would be that influential interests in the foreign countries would persuade the Secretary of State to give them all the benefit of the adoption of a policy of protection, thus perpetuating the grievance that we have, that the wealth of the country is driven in one form or other from this country to other countries. That danger no longer exists. As a result of the recommendation made by the Joint Committee the Secretary of State has no longer that power, but the Government of India and the Indian Legislature now enjoy that power.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Not yet entirely so.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: It was established by convention by the late Secretary of State when he refused to interfere at the request of the Manchester deputation with a conclusion that was reached by the Government of India and the Indian Legislature. I am sure the present Secretary of State will also respect that convention and respect the recommendation made by the Joint Committee. If it is not done, then I am afraid the policy laid down in the reforms will be futile and will create a good deal of suspicion in this country. I am not prepared for a moment to doubt the bona fides of the Secretary of State or of the Government of India so far as that policy is concerned. Now, the Government of India and the Indian Legislature will direct the application of that policy, and the danger that Mr. Gokhale thought existed then, no longer exists. But even then, if without imposing any limitations or any conditions we gave the benefit of a policy of protection to foreign capital, we might probably be running into some danger of the wealth of this country being driven away into other countries as a result of the adoption of that policy. That is why on this question the minority would like to extend the application of those conditions which are accepted by the Government in certain instances also in the case of industries which are under tariff protection. Then there is another question dealt with by the Commission with which, for the present at any rate, we are not concerned, and that is the question of Imperial Preference. I am informed that a discussion on this subject, if at all it is raised, will be raised on a subsequent date. I am not concerned with that question for the moment at any rate. Then there is the question of excise. I don't think I need go into the question now.

Mr. President: No, I cannot allow the Honourable Member to go into that question.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I am sorry, Sir, if I have exceeded the time limit. I shall try to bring my remarks to a close. With regard to export duties the Commission has laid down that export duties should not be encouraged and that the policy of having any export duties should not be adopted by Government and the Indian Legislature, for that policy hurts the interests of the growers. We were anxious to see if we could get further benefit of a policy of protection by imposing export duties but we have unanimously come to the conclusion after deliberation that that policy cannot but hurt the interests of the growers in this country and therefore, except in the case of a monopoly like jute, we have excluded from our recommendations the question of export duty, altogether. I have in the brief space of half an hour tried to place the case for protection

(An Honourable Member: "Three-quarters of an hour".)

Mr. President: Order, order.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I do not think so. I have tried to place the case for protection before the Honourable Members of this House. I have tried to be as fair as I possibly could. I have avoided all references to controversial questions because no useful purpose can be served by raking up memoirs of the past. I have only dealt with what the future is concerned and I believe that if we bury the dead past and decide to launch to-day upon a policy of reasoned protection which will help rapid industrialisation in this country, we shall have done a great service to the permanent interests of this country. Not only that. But having launched upon a policy of encouraging the growth of those industries which are considered the key and basic industries of this country as recommended by the Fiscal Commission, we shall have established in this country itself those resources which will be our real wealth for all time to come, and not only our wealth, but they will be of the greatest advantage to the Commonwealth in times of emergency. In the time of war the resources that exist will be of the greatest advantage to the Empire. So, a policy of reasoned protection applied with discrimination will not only further the interests of this country but will enable India to be a tower of strength to the British Commonwealth in times of difficulty. It is for the House to choose which policy it will adopt. The country has for years past demanded that a policy of protection alone could give rise to industrial concerns in this country and would help the establishment of industries in this country. It is for the House, as I say, now to decide. I should only like to remind the Government of India that the fear that the Secretary of State is likely to interfere must be allayed by them unmistakably and in clear language. Whatever be the policy, let that policy be decided not by any one who is not in this country but by those who are competent to decide it, namely, the Government of India and the Indian Legislature. I am convinced that this policy is in the interests of the masses of the country. I am not here to plead for the interests of a particular class or of a particular province. I am here to plead for the interests of the country as a whole and I want Honourable Members to remember that nothing should be more dear to them than the interests of the country, that the country is greater than the classes or the masses, and that every policy that is in the interests of the country should be resorted to without any reference to any class. Let me concentrate on one result that will be achieved by the adoption of a policy of protection. The result is that your country as a whole will be enriched, that the wealth of is now drawn away from your country will ever remain in this who that your people will be prosperous, that your people will be happy, your people will be happy and they will be more serviceable not only to the country but to the rest of the world by attaining to that position. I will now bring it to the House again as I say to adopt any policy that they as a Commission never wanted industrialisation to be built on the shoulders of the poverty of the poor and the tremendous wealth of the rich. The Commission wanted that industries in this country should be built on the solid foundation of the simultaneous growth of the prosperous classes as well as of the mass of the agricultural population and the labour population. It is because of that that the Commission has provided all those safeguards that are necessary in the adoption of the policy of protection. I commend this Resolution to your vote. If the House decides that the policy of protection should be accepted, then I think it will be a red letter day in the history of this House; it will be a red letter day in the history of this country for, from a period of helpless poverty, we shall have taken a step which will ultimately enable us to reach a position of equality with other nations, of prosperity and happiness within our own country. Sir, I move the Resolution.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member):

Sir, I beg to move that for the original Resolution the following be substituted:

"That this Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council:

- (a) that he accepts in principle the proposition that the fiscal policy of the Government of India may legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India;
- (b) that in the application of the above principle of protection, regard must be had to the financial needs of the country and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue;
- (c) that the principle should be applied with discrimination, with due regard to the well being of the community and subject to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission;
- (d) that in order that effect may be given to these recommendations, a Tariff Board should be constituted for a period not exceeding one year in the first instance, that such Tariff Board should be purely an investigating and advising body and should consist of not more than three members, one of whom should be a Government official, but with power, subject to the approval of the Government of India, to co-opt other members for particular inquiries."

Sir, may I begin with one preliminary remark? I do not propose to follow the example of Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas in his speech on the original Resolution. I do not propose in any way to go into the controversial history of the past. If this amendment means anything at all, I am sure that the House will see that it means the wiping of the slate, that it rests for us to decide what the new writing on that slate should be. I entirely agree with the remarks of Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas made at the end of his speech that instead of occupying ourselves with the dead past we should concentrate on the future. And let me add one more remark. I do not propose again to follow Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas's example and I do not propose in any way to range at large over the field of the Fiscal Commission's recommendations. My purpose here is to put two practical questions to the Assembly. I want first to get a principle accepted, and secondly, to concert with the House measures to make that principle effective, and that, Sir, is the whole purpose of my amendment.

ving that amendment, the Government feel, as I am sure this realises, a heavy sense of responsibility. I will discuss later the implications of the terms in which my amendment is couched. For the point I wish to emphasise is that this amendment is an epoch in the fiscal history of India. Hitherto, traditionally, our policy has been a revenue tariff. I am free to admit that in recent years the policy of the tariff has undergone a change. In the last year or two, under the stress of our financial needs we have travelled far from our old policy of a light uniform duty on almost every class of import. Our general rate of duty is no longer light, and there have been breaches in the principle of uniformity. The general rate of duty is 15 per cent. ad-valorem. On some classes of import the rate of duty is as high as 30 per cent. On other classes it is as low as 2½ per cent., and yet on other classes, there is no import duty at all. It is perfectly true that, as the Fiscal Commission has pointed out, in the framing of a tariff which contains such high rates of duty and such a wide variety of rates considerations other than those of pure revenue must have entered and I do not deny that they have entered, but the fact remains that the Government of India have never yet consciously adhered to the principle of protection as an integral part of its tariff policy. That is why I say that this amendment of mine marks a fundamental change of policy. For the first time, the Government of India ask the Legislature to agree to the proposition that their tariff policy may legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India. Some people in this House may think that we have hedged round the principle with too many reservations and too many safeguards. I will come to that point later. But what I say now is that in a matter of this kind, the all important thing is the admission of the principle. It is the first step that counts. As I said, the Government feel a very heavy sense of responsibility in asking the Legislature to take this step. We owe it to ourselves and to the country that I should give a brief explanation of the main considerations which have weighed with us in coming to so momentous a conclusion. But it is not my purpose to enter into any elaborate, any lengthy or any abstruse economic argument. That part of the case has been fully dealt with in the Fiscal Commission's report and I am content to leave it at that. My feeling is that this debate in the Assembly to-day will lose half its value if we attempt to deal with this vast and complex subject except on the broadest and most general lines.

Now, Sir, let me be quite frank. Some of us, Members of Government, have not come to the conclusion embodied in this amendment without deep searchings of heart and without forebodings. However authoritative the report of the Fiscal Commission may be, that report cannot and does not relieve the Government of its responsibility in the matter, and some of us cannot help feeling that there is cause for anxiety. If the result of our policy is that development of industries which we all have so much at heart, that is all to the good. But let us look at the other side of the shield. I am not concerned at present with the more obscure dangers which seem to be inherent in a policy of protection. I refer to the danger of political corruption and the danger of the formation of trusts. Nor am I concerned with the danger that the only result of our policy may be the fostering up in India of inefficient industries. But what I am concerned with is this. Whatever may be the merits of a policy of protection, I do not think that there is any one in this Assembly who can stand up and say that the moment is entirely propitious for the inception of that policy. It is no use blinking facts. We have to take into account the state of affairs as it exists in the world around us and outside us. Half that world has tumbled into ruin. It no longer exists as a customer, and that means that the remaining countries, especially those countries whose prosperity is bound up with their export trade, must fight more desperately than ever for the markets which still remain open to them. Moreover, in these countries, the potential productive industrial capacity has increased enormously owing to intensive reorganisation and extension during the War. Now those countries are faced with the spectre of unemployment. The manufacturers are fighting with their backs to the wall merely to keep their works open and their men employed. The workmen are accepting reductions in wages. Owners are foregoing profits. Shareholders are going without dividends, and vast reserves of inherited skill, aptitude and efficiency are being mobilised all to one end, namely, the bringing down of the cost of production. That is one side of the picture. It shows the sort of competition that India has got to meet,—better directed, more intense, more efficient,—economically than ever before. On the other side there is India. India has still to organise most of her industries; she is in most of her industries confronted with that most difficult and most protracted of all tasks, the training up of a force of skilled efficient operatives. While that task is in progress the cost of production must be high, and that means that however carefully we may discriminate, the measure of protection necessary to ensure the end in view cannot be small. And that again means that pro tanto our

12 Noon. policy of protection must increase the level of prices for the consumer generally and particularly for the agricultural and middle classes. There is no getting away from this fact. By discrimination we may mitigate the rise. But the fact remains, and it is so certain that I do not propose to argue it, that a policy of protection must mean an increase in prices in India. Now, I am well aware that many countries, most countries in fact, have gone in boldly for a policy of protection in spite of this disadvantage. But we are not considering the case of other countries. We are considering the case of India. We are not considering the case of countries with rich natural resources, with sparse or comparatively sparse populations and with a high standard of living like the United States of America and like Dominions such as Canada and Australia. People of countries like that can no doubt pay the inevitable price that protection demands. They can no doubt stand up to a high level of prices and a high level of taxation. But in India we have a country of 300 millions. Two-thirds of that population are agriculturists. Most of them are poor and the standard of comfort is low. One thing, I think, is certain. If the agricultural classes which form the bulk of the population in India were able fully to grasp the issues involved in this question of free trade versus protection, and if they were able fully to bring their influence to bear upon this Assembly, I doubt very much whether this Assembly to-day would accept my amendment. I doubt indeed whether I should be putting that amendment forward. The agricultural classes in every country in the world, I think I may say this with confidence, stand to gain the least and lose the most by a policy of protection. But even if we leave the agricultural classes out of consideration is there anyone in this House who can view without alarm, having regard to the conditions of India, the prospect of a substantial rise of prices following upon the development of a policy of protection. It is easy to speak of measuring prospective gain against immediate loss. It is easy to say that India must be prepared for a sacrifice. But surely the experience of the last few years has demonstrated even to the most unobservant the effect of high prices not only upon the public finances of India but also upon political, social and economic conditions throughout the country. Let this House remember that high prices have added to the wages bill for the Public Services in the last few years, 9 crores of rupees. Let this House remember that high prices created a period of industrial unrest with all the vast economic loss that a period of industrial unrest involves, from which period we are only just emerging. I am aware that Chapter V of the Fiscal Commission's Report deals with this point, but naturally it weighs with peculiar gravity upon us, who are responsible for the Government of India.

Nevertheless we are prepared to accept the considered conclusion of the Fiscal Commission that on the whole the right policy to adopt is a policy of discriminating protection. The first point I have to make is this. I do not suppose that there is any country in the world where this question of free trade or protection has been decided on purely economic grounds. Some of you may have read Mr. Percy Ashley's book "Modern Tariff History." In that book he points out that even Lists' great work in which he developed the theory of infant industries and argued the need for protection to enable a country to pass from a purely agricultural state to a mixed agricultural and industrial state owed the widespread approval it received in Germany less to its economic argument than to the great political appeal it made to the necessity of maintaining, completing and strengthening German nationality. There is the same sentiment at work in India. On the one hand India aspires to Dominion status, that is to say, she aspires to political independence within the Empire. On the other hand she aspires to economic independence. She hopes that within the Empire she may be economically independent. And behind this national feeling there is the pressure of a real economic grievance. Every impartial observer views with sympathy, I think, the difficulty which confronts every middle class parent in India in finding a career for his son. The Indian parent hopes that industrial development will increase the avenues of employment open to the educated Indian boy, and will open up more and more avenues which will bring that boy into contact with the hard practical realities of business life. Again the Government of India in the last few years has been doing its best to encourage industrial development, and we have long recognised that the introduction of the Reforms would mean a change in the fiscal policy of India. Lord Curzon gave public expression to this feeling in his speech in the debate in the House of Lords on the Government of India Bill, and it was with full knowledge of the trend of feeling in India that in 1921 we appointed the Indian Fiscal Commission. That Commission contained not only distinguished Indians but also distinguished Europeans. It contained three Presidents or past Presidents of important European Chambers of Commerce. It is quite true that there was a difference of opinion. There was a minority report as well as a majority report. But I am not concerned at present with the differences in the Commission. What I am concerned with is the fact that the Commission was unanimous in recommending that a policy of protection was the right policy for India. That, Sir, is a very remarkable fact and naturally it is a fact which has weighed very greatly with the Government of India. And finally as Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas has pointed out the issue to-day is not a clear cut issue between a policy of protection and a policy of free trade. The stress of events has forced our revenue tariff to a point where it is no longer a pure revenue tariff, and the choice that lies before us to-day is the choice between a tariff with arbitrary protective effects, irregular in its action and with no certainty of continuity, and an attempt to regularise the position by remodelling that tariff, in part at any rate, on frankly protectionist lines. That is to say the logic of events has reinforced the pressure of public opinion, and that is why we have acquiesced in the policy which this amendment seeks to get accepted to-day.

I come now to my amendment. I am free to admit that it differs little in form from Mr. Jamnadas' Resolution. But I have thought it only right and only honest that I should explain clearly what is in the minds of the Government of India. Briefly our position is this. We agree in principle to protection. We make it clear that the principle must be applied cautiously and with discrimination, and we accept the unanimous recommendation of the Commission that before the principle is applied in concrete cases there must be a previous preliminary investigation by an authoritative impartial advisory board.

I will now take the clauses of the amendment in detail. Clause (a) needs no remark on my part. It accepts the principle of protection. Clause (b) makes it clear that in the application of this principle of protection regard must be had to the financial needs of the country and to our present dependence on import, export and excise duties for a large part of our revenue. Partly this clause is intended to make it clear that we must take our financial situation into account in considering certain specific recommendations of the Fiscal Commission in regard to export duties, certain classes of import duties, cotton excise and the like. The House will remember that the Fiscal Commission has recommended that two export duties, the export duties on hides and tea, should be taken off altogether; it has recommended that the cotton excise duty should go and it has recommended also that no import duty at all should be collected on machinery and on certain classes of imports, such as raw materials for Indian industries, copra and sulphur being cases in point. And it has recommended also that in certain classes of industries the most suitable form of assistance is bounties. These recommendations involve either a direct sacrifice of revenue or direct expenditure on the part of the Government of India, and I think that it will be clear to every one that, in considering recommendations of this kind, we must take careful note of the state of our finances. Partly again, the clause is intended to mark the need for caution in whatever advances we make. The House knows the importance of customs receipts in our Central revenues. Certain figures have been given in paragraph 25 of the Fiscal Commission's report; they are not quite correct, but I will give only the salient figures. In 1913-14 Customs revenues accounted for 13.7 of the total receipts of the Government of India; in the current year we have budgeted for a net Customs revenue of 45.41 crores of rupees, that is, 34 per cent. of our total revenues. Moreover, our basis of taxation is narrow, and I think that most people here will agree that we are perilously near the limit. It is true that retrenchment may enable us to reduce our expenditure at a price; on the other hand, we have over 9 crores of provincial contributions which we are pledged to reduce and ultimately to abolish. I do not wish to make too much of this point. After all, one of the main advantages claimed for a policy of protection is that industrial development will add ultimately to the wealth, and, therefore, to the taxable capacity, of the people. My point is that the transition period must be difficult, and that we must always keep in view the danger of disorganising the public finances by too rapid and too violent action. Sir, it would have been easy for me to omit all reference to the financial situation. After all, we are concerned to-day only with the principle of protection, and it would have been easy for me to omit all reference to the fact that the financial situation may operate as a brake on the application of that policy. But, Sir, the fact stares us in the face, and would it be honest for a responsible Government and for a responsible Legislature to shut its eyes to that fact?

I now come to the third clause, Sir, and, here again, I do not propose to say much. After what I have said, every one in the House will, I think, agree in the unanimous recommendation of the Commission that the principle of protection must be applied with discrimination, and, if we admit that discrimination must be exercised, I cannot think of any better criterion than a criterion based upon the well-known economic doctrine of comparative advantage. After all, what does it mean? It merely means this that we should concentrate our efforts on those directions where effort is most likely to prove fruitful of good to India.

In some ways the last clause of my amendment is the most important of all. The House will have noticed that I have made little mention of the difference between the majority and the minority reports. I have done so deliberately. I have not occupied myself with the question, as it was put to me, whether our protection should be protection with a big P or protection with a little p. The point to fasten on is that the Commission unanimously agreed in the recommendation that a policy of protection should be adopted and, whether we agree with the majority or whether we agree with the minority, it must be clear to all of us that the operative part of both reports is the Tariff Board. From the nature of the case both the reports deal mainly with generalities, and the one main, concrete, proposal made is that a Tariff Board should be appointed. Now, if I have carried the House with me so far, I think they will agree with me that, having accepted the principle of protection, the next step must be to decide what industries need and deserve protection and what kind or measure of protection they should get. There is, of course, a third question. There is the question whether we can afford to give the measure of protection recommended. That will ultimately need the decision of the Government and the Assembly, though even in the preliminary investigation it must be borne in mind. For the investigation of these first two questions, we agree with the Commission that what it calls a Tariff Board must be appointed. We feel that in questions of this kind a more detailed investigation is necessary than a Government Department can undertake, and, moreover, an investigation of a different kind. In many cases the interests of more than one industry will be affected; in many cases again there will be what the Fiscal Commission calls a conflict of interests. Each and every industry affected must be given a hearing, and that is why we think some kind of Board is necessary. It is quite clear, I think, that the duties of this Board must be purely of an investigating and advisory nature, as indeed the Fiscal Commission recommends. So far the matter seems clear enough, but there are many difficulties. The first question is whether the Board should be a permanent Board or a temporary Board. Now, I am quite prepared to admit that, if our policy is successful, we may require, if not a permanent Board, at any rate a Board for a long period of years. For industries tend to beget industries; but there are obvious dangers in a permanent Board. It may become an incubus rather than a help. Even in the United States of America the Tariff Commission at one time tended to become merely a sort of glorified Commercial Intelligence Department, very useful no doubt, but entirely beyond the resources of the Legislature. We think that the wisest course is to create a Board for one year in the first instance on an experimental basis. At the end of that year we can take stock of the position. We can see how the Board has worked; whether it needs alteration; we can decide whether to expand it or modify it, or whether to abolish it altogether and try some other expedient. That is to say, we follow the Australian precedent rather than the American precedent. Australia began by appointing its Board for two years in the first instance. We are in favour of this course for another reason. It assists in the solution of two other difficult questions, one the constitution of the Board and the other the exact relationship of the Board vis-à-vis the Government of India. I take the constitution first. I am aware that the minority report recommends that of the three Members of the Board two should be elected by the Indian Legislature, but I hope the House will agree with me that it is quite impossible for the Government to accept this suggestion. If we accept responsibility for a policy of protection, and, if we appoint a Tariff Board in order to help us in working out that policy, we must also accept responsibility for the constitution of the Board. What is the main essential of the Board which shall play such an important part in the working out of our policy? It is this. We must be able to rely on the Board for a perfectly impartial investigation of all relevant facts before it makes its recommendations. That is the first essential. The Board must be entirely impartial. No extraneous considerations of any kind must enter into its composition; and that is why I hope the House will not think that I am casting any reflection upon the Indian Legislature if I say that the Government feel that they must retain in their own hands the duty, or rather the responsibility, of appointing this Board. They cannot delegate that duty to anyone. They cannot trust to election even by the Indian Legislature.

Then again we have had some difficulty as regards the exact relationship of the Board to Government. If the House agrees that we should adhere to a policy of protection, then I am sure that it will also agree that we should take steps at once to make that policy effective and make it effective as rapidly as we can. That is to say—and I have particular reasons for this—I should like to set up the Tariff Board at once, and I should like to make such arrangements as will enable us to get quick decisions upon the recommendations of the Board. That is why, again following the Australian precedent, we have proposed that one member of the Board should be an official of Government. He is not intended to represent the interests of Government as if those interests were in any way divergent from the interests of the country. I hope I have made it clear to-day, in this speech of mine, that in this matter our interests and the interests of the country are, we hope, entirely identical. (Hear, hear.) The Board will be empowered to investigate the question which industries deserve protection, and what measure and kind of protection is needed. In framing its recommendations it will of course have to bear practical considerations in mind. It will have to try to frame such recommendations as can be accepted and as are practicable. Now that is why we think it advisable to have one of the members an officer of Government. He will act as a Liaison Officer between the Board and the Government. He will assist not only in keeping in touch with the officers of Government but he will assist in formulating recommendations. If we have a Board which is entirely independent of Government, what will be the result? We shall get its recommendations. There will be three departments of the Government of India which will be concerned—the Department of Commerce, the Department of Industries and the Department of Finance. The usual lengthy noting, which is a feature of the Government of India system, will go on. There may be disputes. The cases will then have to go to Council, and there will be inevitable delay. That is the reason for our proposal. We hope that in this way, by this device, we shall be able to get a quicker and an earlier decision upon the recommendations of the Board.

Sir, I am afraid that I have detained the House for a very long time; and even so I fear that I have been able to touch only the fringe of a very big and a very difficult subject. In our view the first essential in dealing with the recommendations of this very important Report is to get a decision on the question whether the policy of protection should be accepted, and if so, whether or not immediate steps should be taken to get that policy made effective. It is for these reasons that I have concentrated on these two main points. I quite admit that there are other important recommendations in the Fiscal Committee's Report and those recommendations will receive full consideration in due course. But it seemed to us to be useless to proceed to the consideration of those recommendations until we had got a decision on the main question of principle. Some people in this House may think that even on the main question of policy we have made only a grudging advance in the direction in which the House wants us to go. But I am sure on reflection the House will not endorse that opinion. We are dealing with a matter of vital importance. Our decision must have the most momentous consequences for the people of this country. In deference to what we know to be the strong feeling in this country, and for other reasons which I have explained, we are prepared to adopt a policy of protection. We accept the unanimous view of the Fiscal Commission that the principle must be applied with discrimination, and we are ready at once to set up the machinery which is necessary for the application of the principle. I hope the House will realise that we have done our best to identify ourselves with the aspirations which we know to be common in this country. (Hear, hear.) But I am also confident that the House will recognise that a Government, placed as we are, are entitled, in dealing with this important question, to lay it down that the only safe and prudent course is to proceed with a proper measure of caution.

Sir, I commend my amendment to the House. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, there is only one difficulty with regard to (c). I thought the Honourable Mr. Innes read: "with due regard to the well-being of the community and to the safeguards suggested," not "subject to the safeguards suggested" as printed on the paper.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member accept that?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Yes, Sir, I am prepared to accept that in clause (c) of my amendment the words "subject" be omitted.

The proposed amendment was adopted.

Mr. J. P. Gotingam (Nominated: Indian Christians): Sir, with your permission I would ask the Honourable Member if he would accept a slight amendment also in clause (d), namely, the omission of the word 'may'.

Mr. President: No, I cannot permit it. That is a substantial amendment which ought to be on the paper.

Sir Campbell Rhodes (Bengal: European): Sir, as representing what may be called the other wing of the Fiscal Commission, I have very much pleasure in supporting the general conclusions at which my Honourable friend and colleague, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, has arrived in his Resolution. It is quite true we arrived by different paths. He chose the pleasant field path of national idealism which lies, I am afraid, sometimes very close to the quagmires of political and racial hatred. (Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (and other Honourable Members): "No, no.") Whilst I travelled along the hard, dusty high road of plain economic truth, and therefore, Sir, I must be forgiven if perhaps I raise a little dust. I think one thing can be said of our Report, that it was an honest report; that we started with no preconceived ideas. We did not try to make out a case. Whenever we found a difficulty, whenever we found an argument against the conclusions at which we eventually arrived, we frankly put it down and therefore in our report, I think, are contained all the pros and cons of the question. I am in a little difficulty, Sir, as to whether I should support the proposal of my Honourable friend, or the amendment which has been put forward. At their annual meeting in January, the Associated Chambers of Commerce in Calcutta, over which I had the honour to preside, passed a Resolution, which has not yet been published, by an overwhelming majority—I think one Chamber only dissenting—very much on the lines of the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Innes, and therefore it is best perhaps that I should incline to the amendment. Well, Sir, what are the reasons which caused this wonderful unanimity in our general conclusions? We have been criticised both here and in other countries; but one criticism has never been directed against us, that we were a happy family playing at follow-my-leader. Mr. Jamnadas has referred to the cloud of witnesses. Well, some of those witnesses, Sir, were not helpful. National aspirations for self-determination and for self-development are admirable; but many of our witnesses seemed to think that because a thing was right for England it must therefore be wrong for India, and some of them seemed to think that in order to benefit India you must injure England. I do not think those arguments impressed us. A somewhat similar class of argument exists in England also. England has always laboured honestly under the impression that if a thing was right for England it must therefore be right for India; and in that, I think, lies a great fallacy. Mr. Innes has put his finger on the spot in this matter of unanimity. We did not find a clean slate. Had we done so, those who had preconceived notions of free trade might have tried to elaborate a free trade policy for India. We have not got that at the present time. We have a haphazard protection masquerading in the form of free trade. In all the criticisms by what I may call the whole-hog free trader since that report was published, I have seen no constructive criticism as to how we should have proceeded to produce a real free trade system for India as it exists, and I think rightly exists, for England. England depends for its revenue chiefly on direct taxation. Direct taxation in India can take two forms, one from the limited number of the wealthy from which sufficient revenue could not possibly be got; and the other by an increase in some of the existing direct taxation; for, obviously you cannot collect direct taxation of four annas or eight annas per head from the masses of the people. That means land taxes, and I think the Commission were convinced, whatever the rights or wrongs of increasing land taxation might be, that it was a physical impossibility to do so. In regard to import duties England is careful to keep her import duties confined to a few commodities which not only are not produced in England but cannot be. If we look through the import list of goods coming into India, I think we could claim that, theoretically at least, practically everything that comes in could be manufactured in this country and therefore a logical free trader would have to put excise duties not only on all local manufactures but threaten to put excise duties equivalent to our import duties on everything that came into the country so as to warn local manufacturers that they must not start industries under the protection of these revenue duties. We have thus not had the advantage of free trade to which I shall refer in one moment. We have not had the advantages of protection. As was pointed out by two very able witnesses, Mr. Shakespeare of Cawnpore and our Honourable friend, Captain Sassoon of Bombay, these high revenue duties were of no advantage as long as there was no security. They were sufficiently high to protect but there was no security and therefore the whole of the advantage that might be derived from these duties was lost. I consider these duties at present are high enough for the class of protection with which India should experiment. Mr. Jamnadas advocates a self-contained India. I know it is a popular ideal. He says it would be a great stand-by in time of famine. Has Mr. Jamnadas ever heard of that happy island in the Pacific where the people gain a precarious living by taking in each other's washing? What will happen in a famine year if we are self-contained? The food supplies will fall off; you have a big industrial population to feed; the industrial population depend for their custom on the agriculturists and so by the process of taking in each other's washing Mr. Jamnadas hopes the country will thrive. I must warn Mr. Jamnadas' colleagues from Bombay that if that is the vision before you your mills will immediately stop working, for the demand for clothing will be satisfied not by Bombay but by Bengal. The country will then need to clothe itself only in sack cloth and ashes. I am not one of those who are so very pessimistic of the progress so far made. Industrial progress hitherto, in large factories at least, has been confined mainly to the temperate zones; we call them temperate but the real fact is that the rigours of the climate drive people to choose indoor occupations. Now, India stands alone; it is not only the foremost industrial country in the tropics, but is the only industrial country in the tropics. I admit the pace has not been fast enough, but I think it is wrong to overstate our case and say that there has been no progress whatsoever. I think that would be a reflection not only on the Scotchmen in Calcutta but on my Indian friends in Bombay and elsewhere. The Honourable Mr. Innes has drawn attention to the fact that this is an inopportune time to start a protectionist policy. I agree in a certain measure, but every business man knows that it is in times of dull trade that you put your house in order so as to be ready when good trade comes; and in that sense I think this is the most opportune time to make a start. Mr. Jamnadas has mentioned the controversy between India and Lancashire or, as I would rather say, between Bombay and Lancashire, because the Punjab, Bihar and Bengal have never had any quarrel with Lancashire. (A Voice: "They are beginning to have.") I do hope that after this debate to-day one fact will emerge, that we agree to bury, and that our Resolution will bury, this old animosity. (Hear, hear.) (A Voice: "Let Lancashire follow suit.") I have put my signature in this Report to that Chapter which recounts that regrettable history, let us be frank of the interference of Lancashire with India's self-determination. But we must also remember that Lancashire has always been in the forefront of all political efforts of nations all over the world, including India, to develop self-government and it is pathetic that, owing to the fact that she supported the Reform

[Sir Campbell Rhodes.]

Scheme in India, she is the first in a measure to suffer. At the same time, I am not prepared to believe that there is any real conflict between the two. Bengal requires double the amount of cloth than she uses now. She has a limited amount of money to spend on cloth, and as has been pointed out in the Dissenting Minute, in a quotation from a speech which I made in this House, 10 yards per annum per body is not sufficient. We therefore require all that Bombay and Lancashire can give us, and we also, I think, have a right of speaking for the people of Bengal, to buy what clothes suit us best. Therefore, when we get that Tariff Board at work, we shall find the conflict is not between Bombay and Lancashire, for I would draw Honourable Member's attention to that very illuminating sentence in our Report which says that "if we get rid of this conflict between Bombay and Lancashire, the Tariff Board will then be in a position to decide the real point at issue, and it will no longer be a matter between Bombay and Lancashire but between the Indian producer and the Indian consumer". There will, therefore, be conflict. There will be, if we establish protection, a desire on the part of the manufacturer to consider his interests perhaps before those of the consumer. That has been so in all countries, and it will be no greater in this country; it may even be less. My Honourable friend, Mr. Townsend, will remember when he and I some years ago went down to Bombay to arrange standard cloth for the poor of Punjab, Bihar and Bengal, that we met with a most sympathetic response from the Bombay Millowners, and I am still grateful for what happened in the budget debate last year when they supported my amendment for the reduction of the import duty. I do not know what secrets are locked up in the breast of the Honourable the Finance Member, but I can let out one secret that, if he proposes to put up the duty this year, there will be at least one vote in the lobby against him. It is this possible conflict of interest between province and province, between industry and agriculture, between industry and industry, which has caused us to recommend in the best interests of India that the adoption of a policy of protection should be applied with discrimination along the lines of our Report. We do not recommend a rash and reckless plan of protection, for we believe that that way leads to disaster. We do not recommend the present haphazard system of protection masquerading under the guise of free trade. We do not recommend that our policy should be settled for us by any one outside this country. (Hear, hear.) We recommend protection not only of the interests of our industries but of the interests of the agriculturist. We recommend protection, by the exercise of wise discrimination, of the consumer. If I may misquote in conclusion a famous democrat, I would say that we have recommended protection of the interests of the people in this land, by the people in this land, and for the people in this land.

Mr. C. A. H. Townsend (Punjab: Nominated Official): I regret, Sir, to have to turn this debate to a provincial aspect, despite what the Honourable Mr. Innes said, but I come from the Punjab and the views which I am about to put forward represent, I think, not only the views of a great number of people in that province but perhaps also those of other agriculturists in other parts of India. Now, Sir, the Punjab is and must continue for very many years, so far as I can see, even under protection, to be an agricultural and not an industrial province, and to put it briefly, many of us think that under a policy of even discriminating protection, however much you may discriminate it, we will certainly suffer, at any rate, for very many years to come. The great majority of our Punjab people are agriculturists, pure and simple. We have but few minerals, no cheap waterways to help our transport, and practically no coal: practically all the coal we use has to be brought many hundreds of miles by rail from the Bengal coal-fields, and costs at least Rs. 5 per ton more in Lahore than in Cawnpore owing to the longer railway journey.

The Punjab generally exports raw materials and imports manufactured articles. On the average of the last five years I find that no less than 84 per cent. of Punjab exports—not all to foreign countries—consisted of raw materials, and 66 per cent. of our imports was manufactured articles. Of the balance much was food for our cattle. And, Sir, despite what the Honourable Mover said on the subject, labour in the province, both skilled and unskilled, is both scarce and dear, and costs more than in the neighbouring United Provinces, thereby placing us at an additional disadvantage compared with it from the industrial point of view. Nor will our difficulties in this matter get less, when the large tracts of the country which will be irrigated by the Sutlej Canals, now under construction, come under cultivation. Whatever degree of protection, Sir, may be introduced, I can never visualise the sandy tracts of Mianwali or Multan or the arid country lying to the south of the Sutlej as industrialised. Again, Sir, as Mr. Calvert, the Registrar of Co-operative Societies in the Punjab, points out in his book "The Wealth and Welfare of the Punjab," to which I am indebted for much of what I say this morning,—we are handicapped in this matter by our geographical position. Assume industries to become successfully established in the province, where are we to find a market for our manufactures? The Punjab is bounded on three sides by countries which offer no market for its products. Kashmir, Ladakh and Tibet lie on the north, on the west Afghanistan and Baluchistan, on the south Rajputana, sparsely populated and undeveloped. None of these regions have sufficient population to make them satisfactory markets for our manufactured goods. It is often said that an ounce of fact is worth a ton of theory. Well, here is an ounce of fact. During the war, one of the few Cotton Weaving and Spinning Mills in the Punjab came into the market. It was purchased dock, stock and barrel, by a firm in Bombay. Instead of using the factory, as it was, in the Punjab, the purchasers found it to their advantage to remove all the machinery of the mill at very considerable expense to Bombay, where it was, I understand, used in a new mill, and the shell of the building is still standing, a sad monument to Punjab industries, decaying and unused. Briefly, Sir, many people in the Punjab fear that a policy of protection for India will only impoverish the agriculturists who form the great majority of our people at the expense of those parts of India which are already manufacturing centres, as Bombay and Calcutta. During the war, Sir, the industries situated at those places had in effect, as Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas said, protection. I hold in my hand a well-known commercial paper and, glancing down the dividends paid by the Bombay Cotton Mills for the years 1918—1921, I see the figures of 50, 60 and even 100 per cent. Now, in the Punjab, Sir, during those years, cotton cloth and yarn, much of which came from Bombay, went up nearly 100 per cent. in price. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas did not mention, I notice, this point when he discussed the effect of the war on Indian industries.

In this connection, I might criticise incidentally the personnel of the Fiscal Commission. I do not know if I am in order in doing so. It was composed of eminent men, but the eminence of, at any rate, the majority of them was that of either successful business men or of economics. No one of them, I think, had attained any great eminence as a "consumer," though I readily admit it is not easy to find a "consumer" such as I would like to find in this connection. Punjab agriculture, and agriculture generally in India, asks for free trade, whatever industries ask for. The great majority of our people wish to import what they require free of duty and also they ask that no restrictions should be placed on the export of their products, which are, as I have said, generally raw materials, though of course we would not object to a very small cess designed to help our agriculture as the proposed cotton cess. It is true, Sir, that the Commission decisively pronounced itself against any policy of export duties on food grains. For this relief much thanks. But experience in all protected countries of the world shows that a policy of high protection on imported goods eventually has the effect of reducing the prices that other countries are willing to pay for the exports of protected countries, and it is possible that in the long run our Punjab exports of raw materials may suffer in this way.

Before I conclude, Sir, I wish to say a few words on the question of protection for India as a whole. The example of America as a country which has successfully adopted protection is often quoted in India. Well, Sir, let us see what Professor Taussig, an American Professor of Economics, whom the Commission itself calls distinguished, has to say on the subject. After discussing in detail the pros and cons of the relative advantages and disadvantages of protection to the United States, he comes to the considered conclusion—I quote his own words—"that there probably remains a heavy debit balance against protection."

Mr. Jamnadas has quoted, approvingly, the example of Japan in this matter and has urged India to follow the example of that country. Well, Sir, let me give him an extract from Mr. Calvert's book to show how Japanese industries have been faring recently:

"The expansion of industries in Japan in recent years was abnormal and unhealthy. In 1919, for example, there were erected 2,700 factories, involving a capital of 522 million yen, but depression set in and a great slump in business followed, and many failures ensued. The unbridled speculation and wild company promotion led inevitably to severe reaction. In the single month of June 1920 no less than 134 Joint Stock Companies went into liquidation."

There is, Sir, all through India a wide belief that the mere introduction of protection in India will, ipso facto, cause industries to spring up, on a large scale all over the country: that there is in the mere word a charm, as in Abracadabra. Believe me, Sir, never was a greater mistake made, so far at any rate as the agricultural provinces of India are concerned. Of the three tests laid down by the Tariff Commission which industries claiming protection must face, the third test is infinitely the most important. It is that the industry to be protected must be one which will eventually be able to face world competition without protection. The last few words are all important. The intention is that the protection given should in no case last for ever. Professor Taussig calls this test the decisive test. Well, Sir, experience all over the world shows how difficult it is, once protected duties are imposed, to take them off; each protected industry, when a proposal is made to remove protection from it, sets up a howl. Professor Taussig says:

Particularly from this point of view, but indeed generally, I do not envy the proposed Tariff Board in the discharge of its duties. What is said on the subject by another distinguished American Economist is in point. He says:

"Protection involves political corruption on a gigantic scale. One has but to witness the scenes in and about the Committee room when a tariff is being framed in the United States to realise that there exists no more potent engine of political demoralisation: section is pitted against section, interest against interest, and business against business; and the final decisions arrived at are only the results of log-rolling and a series of unholy alliances."

I direct these remarks to the attention of the House. I am only too well aware, Sir, that vocal Indian public opinion and sentiment is very strongly in favour of protection, and sentiment will largely influence the decision which will be come to in this matter by the House to-day. I would ask it, however, not to let sentiment in this matter be entirely separated from economic considerations, and also to remember that the decision they will arrive at, as was well said by Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, as to the future fiscal policy of India is a matter of the very greatest importance to the welfare of the people of every part of India and that that decision may have effects in future years which are not now anticipated or even considered. Still, Sir, we must realise that the Punjab cannot cut itself off from the rest of India, much though we might like to do so, not only on this matter but also perhaps on another matter that is coming under discussion in this House next week. Nor, of course, can the financial difficulties of the Government of India, which are brought out in Mr. Innes's amendment, be overlooked. So, Sir, I am unwillingly forced to support this amendment, lest a worse thing befall us.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, as I propose to maintain a critical attitude towards both the original Resolution as well as the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mr. Innes, I think it is my duty at the outset to make my position clear on one fundamental principle. Sir, I am not against the development of industry. I fully appreciate the difficulty of the country dependent for its livelihood upon mere agriculture. I am fully alive also to the dangers of famine, but, Sir, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas has not proved how famine would be averted by industrial development. But, although famines cannot be averted, I admit this much, that it is necessary to give varied occupations to the people of this country in order that the pressure on the land should be relieved at least to some extent. Sir, I also want to make my position on another question clear. As long as the nations of the world have not ceased fighting with each other, I admit it is necessary that every nation should try, as far as possible, to be self-contained. There are disadvantages of this attempt, and those were pointed out by my Honourable friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes.

[Mr. N. M. Joshi.]

method of protecting and developing industry and that is by the State undertaking to manage the industry. (Some Honourable Members: "No, no.") Some people say "No, no." I am not much concerned with them. Let me first refer to the advantages and disadvantages of the first method of protecting the industry, namely, a high tariff wall. The reason why this method is preferred is, in the first place, that the burden which is thrown on the people is indirect. The poor people, especially the illiterate people, cannot see that they are contributing towards the building up of the industry. The Industrial Commission knew very well that if they had proposed that the industries in this country should be developed not by indirect taxation but by direct taxation, the Legislative Assembly would not have accepted that principle. The industrialists want that the people on whom the burden falls should not know that they are bearing the burden.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas : Has the Commission claimed that?

Mr. N. M. Joshi : Sir, I am asked whether the Commission has claimed that or not. I am explaining what people, when they advocate protection, have in their minds, and I feel that this is in their minds whenever they advocate high import duties instead of advocating direct contribution to the industry. Sir, there is a second advantage to the industrialist in having protection by means of a high tariff wall, and that is that he is free of all Government intervention. If an industry wants protection or is given protection by direct method, Government will insist upon intervening in its affairs. Take the case of Railways. Government guaranteed interest to the Railway Companies, but then when Government guaranteed interest, they kept to themselves the right of intervening in the affairs of the Companies. Therefore the industrialists do not generally like that the assistance to be given to them should be direct. They generally prefer assistance which takes an indirect form, which leaves them free to do what they like. The third argument that may be urged in favour of a tariff wall instead of direct assistance to the industry is that the collection charges of indirect taxes are not so large as the collection charges of direct taxes. Sir, this is a matter of proof. My Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, will tell the House how we stand in the matter. But even admitting that the collection charges of direct taxes are a little higher, is it right that we should throw away all the advantages of direct taxation and accept a method of assisting industries which contains several dangers which have been admitted by every speaker who has spoken up to this time? We have seen the advantages. They are not many. But there are great disadvantages in the method of protecting industries by means of a high tariff wall. Let us suppose for the sake of argument that a high tariff wall is necessary. A large amount of money will be thrown into the pockets of the industrialists by a high tariff wall. But what is the guarantee that the money thrown into the pockets of the industrialists by that means will be spent for the development of the industries? Sir, it will not be very uncharitable if I say that at least some part of that money will be spent on the luxuries of the industrialists themselves. Will they not spend part of the money for their motor cars, for hiring half a dozen palaces and for purchasing race horses? Sir, the money for all their luxuries will come out of the money which will be placed in their hands by means of protection. Therefore, let the House be sure that when you put money into the pockets of the industrialists with the intention that the industries should be developed, at least all that money will not be spent for the development of the industries, but a great part of it will be spent for the luxuries of the industrialists. There is another disadvantage in giving protection to the industry by means of a high tariff wall, and it is this. If you give help to an industry by means of a high tariff wall, you cannot discriminate between a good industrialist and a bad industrialist. A good industrialist may spend all the money that he gets in developing the industry but a bad industrialist will not so spend that money. This is a great disadvantage. But we can discriminate between a deserving industrialist and an undeserving one by giving direct help to the industries. But, Sir, the main disadvantage of a high tariff wall, which has been mentioned both by the Honourable Mr. Innes and the Honourable Mr. Rhodes is high prices. Sir, the high prices have to be borne by the poor people in larger proportion to their income than the richer classes. Nobody will say here that if you have got a tariff wall on articles such as cloth, the poor man will not suffer more in proportion to his income than the rich man. The poor man pays on cloth more in proportion to his income than the rich man pays. This fact is absolutely clear. Therefore, a high tariff wall on necessities of life can never be just. It falls unjustly on the poor man. I am not saying that the poor man should not pay at all. But nobody will also say that the poor man should pay more in proportion to his capacity to pay than the rich man. This is the greatest disadvantage of the method of protecting an industry by means of a high tariff wall. Sir, I know there are people—I do not know whether they are here or not, but I have met them several times—who say "where is the harm? Is it not the duty of the people of this country to support the industry? Is it not our duty to support Bombay as against Lancashire?" Sir, I can appreciate the sentiment of patriotism, and I also know that the poor people of this country have got some patriotism. But should your patriotism be only confined to the poorer class? If industry is to be developed at the cost of the poor people, can it not be developed at the cost of the wealthy? Sir, I have read through the report (of the Fiscal Commission). I have read through the majority's recommendations as well as every line of the recommendations of the minority—the patriotic minority. But I have not found one sentence there appealing to the wealthier class to spend their wealth not in luxury but in developing industries. Sir, I have not seen one appeal to the richer class there asking them to develop the industries, even if it were necessary for them to suffer loss for the developing of industries. On the contrary, it has been said that our capital is shy, capital requires encouragement. It is, therefore, clear that the Indian capitalist is not sufficiently patriotic. If the Indian capitalist is patriotic he will not be shy to invest his capital in a national industry, the capital will come forth even if there are losses. Therefore, when people talk of patriotism, what they mean is that that patriotism should be shown by the poorer classes and not by the richer classes. The richer classes require temptation, encouragement in order that they should put their money into industries. But, Sir, some people say "Do you not want industries?" Suppose we cannot develop industries without putting even an unjustifiable burden upon the poorer people. Sir, I do not wish to answer that question. I only say that these are not the only two alternatives. If these are the only two alternatives, namely, either not to develop industries at all, or to develop industries by putting a burden, an unjustifiable burden upon the poorer classes, then I do not know what would be my answer. I shall think then. But I believe there is a third alternative. You can protect your industries without putting an unjustifiable burden, at least without putting a disproportionately high burden upon the poorer classes, and that method is to assist the industries by means of direct assistance. Give any kind of direct assistance, I shall not object. If there is direct assistance, naturally in the first place, that assistance could be given only to those industries that are deserving. It will be given only to those industrialists who deserve, who do not spend their money in luxuries and whose industries do not suffer losses on account of mismanagement. Sir, it may be said, "If you give direct assistance to the industries, how are the taxes to be collected, how is the money to come? That money will be collected by indirect taxation." Sir, it is true that the amount of direct contribution may have been obtained by indirect taxation. I do not approve of indirect taxation, but even if the taxation is indirect if you give direct help there is the pressure of public opinion. The public will know what person is being helped with the public money, and the public will exact that that industrialist is careful in managing the industry. That is the great advantage. The whole industry will be under the criticism of the public of this country who pay towards that industry.

Then, Sir, as regards the State management of industry, this is one of the methods which has been recommended not by me alone but by the Industrial Commission itself. The Industrial Commission has said that under certain circumstances it is necessary for Government to pioneer a new industry.

Mr. President: Order, order. That is not strictly in order under this Resolution.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I do not wish to speak on this subject alone. As a matter of fact, it is not necessary for me to dilate on the advantages of State management.

Mr. President: Not necessary! It is not possible.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I only content myself by saying that a high tariff wall is not the only method of protecting an industry. An industry can be protected by the State managing the industry. This has been done not only in this country but outside, and as a matter of fact the advantages of that method will be explained to this House not by a theoretical man like myself, but by experienced industrialists like my Honourable friends Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, and Mr. Kamat, when the question of the management of State railways comes before this House. Therefore, I do not propose to speak about the advantages of that method.

But, Sir, there is one more point on which I should like to speak and it is this. My Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, said that there are dangers in protection. He admitted that. Unfortunately he did not mention them, but I propose to mention them only in a few words. Those people who want to know the dangers of industrialism should visit the slums of Bombay. That beautiful island given by Nature to this country has been turned into a hell by the industrialists. (A Voice: "Are you against industrialism?") Is it not necessary if we want to develop our industries to take precautions that more such hells are not created in this country? Then again take the question of people who leave their villages and go into cities. People in villages have got the joint family system. If any one of them is ill, he is looked after by his relatives, by his neighbours. If he is old, his son, his grandson . . .

Mr. President: That does not arise on this Resolution.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I am only pointing out the dangers of protection.

Mr. President: That danger may happen even where there is no protection. It is not relevant to the subject under consideration.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: It is true that these dangers may take place where there is no protection, but here we are advocating protection in order that industries should develop very fast, and there is the greater danger of these evils arising when you are developing industries very fast. As a matter of fact, all the slums in Bombay are due to the fact that the industries developed very fast without giving sufficient time for people to build houses.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must address his remarks to the policy of protection. I may point out to him that the clock tells me that he has already spoken for more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I wish to refer to only one other evil of protection, and it is a direct evil of protection. When a country undertakes a policy of protection, it means high prices. High prices mean discontent and when poor working classes become discontented the only method possible for them of getting redress is to organise themselves and getting their grievances redressed by means of strikes. But at this stage what happens? The industrialist who wants to develop his industries very quickly by means of protection wants to restrain those organisations as much as possible. That has been the experience of the world.

Mr. President: I cannot allow the Honourable Member to discuss trade union legislation on a motion asking for the establishment of protection.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I have felt that if a policy of protection is followed there will necessarily be discontent among the working classes, and if there will be discontent among the working classes they will have to organise themselves, and in order that the organisation should grow strong it is necessary that freedom of organisation and freedom of strike should be allowed.

Mr. President: If I had not been in the Chair I would have been very glad to discuss this matter with the Honourable Member. But I have to tell him that his argument is entirely out of order.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I shall content myself now by making an appeal to the Honourable Members of the Assembly. My Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, has already referred to the fact that the masses on whom the burden of protection will fall are not represented here. After all, whom does this Legislative Assembly represent? It represents the electors whose number is a very small fraction of the population. It may be one per cent. I assure the House that it is after all a very small percentage of the population. I do not mention this point to belittle the importance and dignity of this House. As a matter of fact, I admit that for practical purposes we could not have got a more representative Legislative Assembly than this. But, Sir, that should not blind us to the fact that the masses of the people are not represented here and when we are considering the question of putting a burden on the masses more in proportion to their income than the burden falling upon the richer classes, it is our duty to put greater restraint upon ourselves, to be more cautious in pressing burdens upon the poor people than it was necessary for us if the burden had to fall more upon us and more upon our electors. With these words I move the amendment which stands in my name to the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Innes.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member will realise that during the conversation which I had with him I informed him that the last half of his amendment is out of order, seeing that it attempts to bring in the question of trade union legislation before adopting a policy of protection. That is not within the scope of the Resolution.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: If the second part is out of order, I propose the first part:

"Provided that measures adopted with that end in view be so framed that the financial burden resulting therefrom will fall upon the people in proportion to their capacity to bear it."

I hope the House will accept my amendment.

Mr. President: If I had known that the Honourable Member was moving his amendment, I should probably have called somebody else, because I think it is desirable to have the proposition put by the Government debated against the proposition put forward by Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas. At the same time, the first part of the Honourable Member's amendment is in order.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I shall move my amendment later on.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadian): Does the Honourable Member move his amendment as an additional amendment to the original Resolution or as an amendment to Mr. Innes' amendment.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: As a matter of fact it can be made an amendment to anyone of the two.

Mr. President: I must inform the Honourable Member that his amendment was originally put down as an amendment to Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas' Resolution. He did not know then that Mr. Innes' Resolution is going to contain the words "with due regard to the well being of the community." I should imagine that these words would have satisfied the point raised by the Honourable Member, though, as I have told him, he is perfectly in order in moving it.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I do not know what will suit the House. If it suits the House that my amendment should be an amendment to the original Resolution, I do not object. If it suits the House, I have no objection to its being treated as an amendment to the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment.

Dr. H. S. Gour: On a point of order. It is for the Honourable Mover of the amendment to say as to whether it is an amendment to the original motion or any particular amendment. It is not left to the decision of the House to accept that amendment as either an amendment to the motion or an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. President: I think it will simplify the position if I treat this as an amendment to Mr. Innes' amendment.

The question is:

"That at the end of the amendment as proposed by Mr. Innes, add the following:

'Provided that measures adopted with that end in view be so framed that the financial burden resulting therefrom will fall upon the people in proportion to their capacity to bear it.'"

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): I believe what is germane and also important to the discussion of this morning is a criticism of the amendment standing in the name of my friend, the Honourable Mr. Innes, and not a general discussion ranging over a wide field over the advantages and disadvantages of free trade or protection, a discussion like the one indulged in by my friend, Mr. Joshi, or even by Mr. Townsend, from the Punjab; because it is only half an hour ago that the Government announced and committed themselves to the principle that they are prepared to accept protection. All that concerns us therefore this morning is to discuss whether the amendment standing in the name of Mr. Innes requires any criticism at all. I shall direct my remarks only to this aspect of the question. In the first place let me congratulate the Government on coming to a satisfactory decision on such a momentous issue. The question was hanging fire for decades, for almost half a century and I believe the Government have done well in coming to a favourable decision, however tardily it might be, on so important a point; further, it is indeed a matter of gratification, Sir, for the country that Government are prepared to accept protection with discrimination as unanimously recommended by the Fiscal Commission. Having said that and offered my congratulations to Government on this decision, it remains for me to meet certain criticisms and remarks made by Mr. Innes in his opening speech. Mr. Innes pointed out that although Government are accepting this policy of protection they are accepting it with a great deal of anxiety and a great deal of caution. I realise the anxiety of the Government at the present moment. I also realise that a certain amount of caution in the application of this policy is necessary but I venture to think, Sir, that Government are in one or two respects at any rate labouring under an excess of caution as I shall presently show. I agree that there is a certain amount of anxiety involved in undertaking this policy at the present moment when we are passing through financial depression and deficits in the Budget. On the other hand, Sir, it is precisely at this particular period of transition in India when existing industries are threatened that this question has to be boldly tackled by Government, especially owing to the world facts to which Mr. Innes has referred; it is precisely at this moment that protection is necessary, either to keep alive certain industries which are struggling in the country or to withstand the low prices which foreign manufacturers are announcing in order to keep their own industries alive. Therefore if there was any time which was urgent for protection, it was, I believe, this time. Government, I say, need not, therefore, be very much uneasy that the time is inauspicious. Now with reference to certain observations of Mr. Innes regarding factors within India relating to the internal situation which compelled caution, he mentioned two or three things. He referred to the effect of this policy on the agricultural classes. He referred also to what the effect of this policy would be on the middle classes. He also referred to the effect of this policy on the finances of the Government, that is to say, the sources of revenue. With reference to the effect of this policy on the agricultural conditions in India, those who have studied economics, those also who have read the Report of the Fiscal Commission will be able to see that after all it is a question of balance of advantages. It is perfectly true that the rise of prices has a certain adverse effect on the agricultural community but, on the other hand, take a long view of the whole thing and just see the effect of this policy of protection, say at the end of 15 or 30 years. Take the example of other countries like Germany and America which were at one time agricultural countries. The policy of protection has made those countries now more or less manufacturing countries with the result that the wealth of those countries is immensely better than what it would have been if they had remained agricultural countries. The question is, do you want wealth for agriculturists or not? Now we know there are 72 per cent. of agriculturists in the country out of the total population, but out of those 72 the real workers in the field are, let me point out, 46 per cent. only. The rest are workers of a casual character either in industries or even in agricultural labour. The point therefore is, if owing to a system of industrialism the wages go up, will it not profit those workers who come to factories or those workers who are also in agricultural industries. There, therefore, remains only a residue of 46 per cent. of the population who are directly concerned with the sowing and ploughing of their own fields who will be no doubt for some time adversely hit. The other agricultural workers who are more or less labourers will profit to some degree by the automatic rise in the prices and also in wages. Then again, even if there is a little bit of temporary evil in this policy of protection for the agriculturist, I think Government has provided safeguards to minimise the burden. We know that the Tariff Board will see that the burden will not be too heavy for the agriculturist. The machinery provided to fix the rate of protection is a very sound safeguard; I therefore think judging by the analogy of the other countries and considering the proportion of burden that will fall upon the agriculturist population and also the safeguards, namely, the creation of an impartial and thoroughly investigating body, namely, the Tariff Board, we can, in spite of some disadvantages which I have dilated upon, go ahead and accept protection. I need not refer to what fell from Mr. Joshi about the capitalist and his luxuries. I believe that luxuries do give a benefit to the capitalist no doubt, but the benefit is not confined to the capitalist. If a capitalist buys a motor car, he has to employ a chauffeur and a portion of the money of the capitalist goes into the pocket of the chauffeur, also into the pocket of the man who sells petrol and also into the pocket of the cleaner. And, perhaps, if there is a manufacturing industry of motor cars in India some day or other in accordance with this policy of protection, possibly that factory will be able to employ hundreds of labourers into whose pockets also the money of the capitalist will go. We need not therefore fear that a manufacturing country will benefit only the capitalist. England was at one time an agriculturist country. At the present moment 56 per cent. of the population of England is a manufacturing population and every man who goes into some factory draws more wages and leads a better life, has a higher standard of living, has far better clothes to wear and far better houses to live in than perhaps the agriculturist in India who merely because he remains an agriculturist, lives in a wretched hut and draws only the bare means of subsistence. I know that the agriculturist could be a richer man and live a better life if he goes into a manufacturing factory. That is, so far as the aspect of the agriculturists' disadvantages is concerned. Now about the amendment, there is one aspect of what fell from the Honourable Mr. Innes to-day to which I wish to address my remarks, that is, with reference to this Tariff Board. If you read clauses (a), (b), (c) and (d) of the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment, in clauses (a) and (b) probably we shall find nothing very seriously objectionable. He has admitted the word "protection" in clause (b). He has put in a safeguard that regard must be had to the financial needs of the country. We admit that that must be our policy as well and a Tariff Board which will fix the rate of protection will see to it that the financial needs and the financial exigencies of Government are not sacrificed to the hobby of protection. But, Sir, let us discuss the safeguards introduced in paragraph 97 of the Fiscal Commission's Report on which the whole of the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes is based. I had hoped that Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, while making his speech, would refer to the points of difference between the majority and minority on this specific question. The position is this, Government accept protection; Government accept discrimination, but Government say they are willing to accept discrimination as laid down and subject to the three conditions in paragraph 97. The only question which is very important is, do we, on the non-official side, subscribe to these three conditions which Government are prepared to accept? That is the question at issue. Now, the first condition is that the industry to be protected must have certain natural advantages. I admit this is a condition which is not very seriously objectionable. The second condition is that the industry must be one which without the help of some protection is not likely to develop or will develop only at a very slow speed. That, again, probably may be a condition which is unobjectionable from a certain point of view. But, Sir, look at the third condition to which Mr. Townsend referred, namely, that the industry must be able eventually to face world competition. If that is the condition to which Mr. Innes refers in accepting the policy of protection with discrimination I have my own misgivings. In a country, situated as India is at the present moment, with immense handicaps owing to poverty, untrained men and inexperienced capital, with world competition from all the different countries to face with I am afraid, if you rigidly follow this condition and this safeguard, as the majority of the Fiscal Commission recommend, it will be difficult for any Tariff Board to give protection, subject to this condition, if rigidly followed. My criticisms, therefore, against Mr. Innes' amendment is that, even supposing they accept discrimination and refer the question to the Tariff Board, the instructions to the Tariff Board should not be to stand upon each and every letter of the third test laid down in paragraph 97. I contend that if, really speaking, the Tariff Board is to do good to India, and at an early date, a certain amount of latitude must be given to that Tariff Board. That is so far as clause (c) of Mr. Innes' amendment is concerned.

for any corporate body is too small a period for a trial. It is an experiment, as I have said, made with an excess of caution and is not likely to benefit India. If you accept protection, if there is no escape from protection, there is no escape from a permanent Tariff Board. I do not like that Government should show this suspicion and a certain amount of hesitation in stating to this House that we should subscribe to the view that the Tariff Board should be appointed only for twelve months. I submit that it will take twelve months for the Tariff Board simply to think out its ideas to fix their preliminaries and to know where they are before they investigate a single industry. I therefore think that this should be a permanent Tariff Board, or at least one constituted for a longer period, say five years.

And now I come to the composition of this Tariff Board. Government want that the Chairman of this Tariff Board should be a Government official on the analogy of Australia where the Controller of Customs is the Chairman of the Tariff Board. I do not object to that, namely, that one member out of the three should be a Government official. The other two are to be members not necessarily chosen by the Legislature according to the amendment of Mr. Innes. The minority report of the Fiscal Commission suggested that the two members, if there are to be three in all, should be elected by the Legislature. Now, between these two methods of appointment we have to compare where the greater advantage lies. After giving my close consideration to this matter, I am inclined to think that the amendment of Mr. Innes is reasonable and right. It would be difficult I believe at the present time for the two Houses of the Indian Legislature to elect persons of the right type we want to serve on the Tariff Board. In the first place, the conflict of interests either between capitalist and agriculturist, or between industry and industry, or between Bengal and Bombay, would be so great, that it would be far better that the Tariff Board should be above any sort of suspicion by the public at large. Even, speaking from the point of view of the Members of this House, I think it would be far better for the Members of this House to be away from the Tariff Board and, therefore, to be away from the criticisms and the suspicion that they have succumbed to any kind of political corruption, as my friend, Mr. Townsend, put it. Sir, at the present stage of India, we want to be above any reproach that what we do in that Tariff Board is one way or other against the agriculturist or in the interests of the capitalist. From this point of view, I certainly think that it would be far better that the two other members of the Tariff Board should be outsiders chosen by Government but confirmed on the Tariff Board with the approval and with the consent of this House, that is to say, that the two other members of the Board selected or suggested by Government should have their names placed for approval or consent before this House, so that we should also have a means of knowing that the selection of Government was right and proper. Our approval also should be given to the appointment either of the co-opted members, or the two permanent members forming the Tariff Board. This would be in the spirit of the recommendations of the minority who have cited the example of the Senate of the American Tariff Board. These are the few criticisms which I had to make. I do not think I shall enter into the merits of the long speech of my friend, Mr. Joshi, although he went for capitalists and made certain remarks which were not quite relevant to the question at issue. We can discuss those questions on some other occasion. What is now necessary is to discuss, as I said, the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment and I have ventured to offer these suggestions and these criticisms in the hope that when the Tariff Board comes to be appointed Government will see that the Board will enjoy the confidence of this Legislature and of the country at large and will be a properly constituted body.

Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh (Punjab: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I rise to address this Honourable House in the interests of agriculture. There is not a single Member of this House who, I venture to think, is not anxious to see the development of the industries of the soil, but at the same time it should be borne in mind that in making provision for the development of our future industries we are not damaging our existing industries. As is well known, agriculture is the industry of the largest number of people in India. As has been pointed out by the Honourable Mr. Innes, more than 66 per cent. live upon it; they make their living out of it. Now it is admitted on behalf of Government as well as on behalf of my friend on the right that the imposition of protection is likely—in fact, not only likely but certain—to be more harmful in so far as agriculturists, or those who are busy in agriculture, will have to pay high prices for the things which they require for their industry. Now, Sir, as we all know, agriculturists are very very poor. My province is mainly a province of small holdings. This, I think, is also true to some extent or perhaps to a greater extent of the United Provinces, Bihar and Orissa, and in fact all other Provinces with the exception perhaps of Bengal, and the United Provinces in so far as they have very big taluqdars. At present their position is very deplorable. They cannot make both ends meet and their produce as we all know is from time to time subjected to various unnatural restrictions in the way of restrictions on the export of wheat and so on. So if that will be the result on agriculture of protection, then I am afraid I must warn the Government against the introduction of this policy. At any rate, they have to be more cautious. There should be more discrimination—of course, we are assured there will be,—so that the interests of agriculturists and of the middle-classes may not suffer. As has been pointed out by my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, some other means may be adopted for the development of industries in India other than protection, and if that cannot be done I am afraid we must go without it, because it is not advisable—it will, in fact, be unwise for us to injure the present agricultural industry which, of course, is the life and soul of India. Other industries will manufacture things which perhaps may be necessary or may not be necessary and in certain cases probably will be luxuries, but agriculture gives us our food; the agriculturists are the food givers of India. If by protection, which, of course, obviously means that the local markets of India are meant for local manufacturers, we are at the mercy of these industrialists and we have to pay high prices, then agriculture in this country is sure to suffer. On account of high prices cultivation might go low; perhaps it may not be worth while to cultivate land and produce the necessary food for the consumption of the consumer. I am afraid therefore I cannot give my support to the Resolution of my Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas. I think those who have studied the question may perhaps be able to throw more light on it, but my apprehension is that if there is a protective tariff against the import of articles from other countries, as for instance, piece-goods and cloth, the agriculturist will get a very low price for his produce. Take cotton for instance. It is no doubt a raw material and every one should wish that it should be manufactured and then sent abroad; but as long as those conditions do not exist in India the producer will surely look forward to getting a higher price for his cotton. If the men in Bombay, Calcutta or Madras will pay say Rs. 10 a maund only, we shall indeed be very sorry and we shall be very glad if Japan or Lancashire comes into the field and gives Rs. 25 or Rs. 35 per maund. I mean to say that as long as the industries of India are not in a position to offer the same prices as the foreign consumer, agriculture will be hit very hard. The same can be said about other forms of produce. Possibly it will have a very prejudicial and injurious effect upon the export from India of other agricultural produce. To start with, it will only benefit a very few capitalists situated in suitable localities such as Bombay, Calcutta and Madras. Therefore I submit, Sir, that it will be unwise to make a move which will benefit only a very very small number of people and will be harmful to a very large majority of the people. My friend, Mr. Kamat, has pointed out, I think quite inadvertently—that 56 per cent. of the people of India live upon industry

Mr. B. S. Kamat: I never said 56 per cent. in India; I said in England.

Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh: Here as far as is known from the Fiscal Commission's Report 1 per cent. live by industries; the rest of the labour lives by agriculture. So judging from that point of view I think Government will not be well advised in launching this policy of protection. It is admitted on behalf of the Government that the people, especially the middle class people, will have to pay high prices and that the cost of living will be high. India is a poor country, and for that reason I am afraid she will not be able to pay high prices. There is no evidence to show that industries in India have suffered to any very great extent as a result of foreign competition. Indian industries are doing very well indeed, and especially during the war, as was pointed out by the Honourable Mover himself, they have a natural protection, and the profit derived by the industrialists was cent per cent. or perhaps even more. Therefore, I think, Sir, that in the interests of Indian industries, which are doing very well indeed, it is not desirable that another industry, which is already poor and which I am afraid, Government have chosen to neglect, I mean agriculture, another blow should be given to it by the introduction of this policy. Therefore, Sir, I associate with all the remarks that fell from my Honourable friend, Mr. Townsend. I also submit a note of warning to all my Honourable colleagues in this House, that by voting in their zeal in favour of this Resolution, they will be doing incalculable harm to the only industry which is the mainstay of our population, I mean the agricultural industry. Sir, while maintaining on the one hand that industries should be developed, I am not at all in favour of agriculture being in any way prejudicially affected by the introduction of this policy. One thing I should like to make clear before I resume my seat. I should submit a suggestion for the consideration of my friends who live in towns. They must remember that all their trade, all their welfare and all their wealth depends upon agriculture. If they do anything which will go against the interests of agriculture, they will be doing considerable harm to themselves and to the country as a whole. This is a point to which, I am afraid, men of the towns are very seldom alive. (A Voice: "With so much agriculture, the country is still poor.") You cannot help it. You make the country poor by your own action, for instance, in September last, by refusing to remove the embargo on wheat. Of course, there was the stringency of the money market, but that scarcity was simply due to the fact that we could not get that money from foreign pockets. Punjab alone got 9 crores of rupees, and so you neglected all these things. As my friend, Mr. Jamnadas, said, the wealth of the country will increase as a whole. Possibly the wealth of Bombay will increase, no doubt, perhaps a hundred times or a thousand times by the introduction of this policy, but the Punjab will starve. In the United Provinces also probably agriculturists will starve, and poor people will die. Therefore, on these grounds, Sir, I think the Government of India will be well advised in not adopting the policy of protection, at least for a great number of years to come. It is unfortunate, but I must bring it to the notice of the Government of India, that they care more for the Press, they care more for those who speak loudly, and they neglect the interests of those whose interests are really at stake, those who cannot speak loudly and who have not such able representatives as other interests have. I therefore strongly oppose the Resolution of my Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas, and I have great hesitation in supporting the amendment.

STATEMENT OF BUSINESS.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, I just want to make a statement about the business of the House. We propose to have a rather large order paper for Monday. We propose to keep on the order paper on Monday the Racial Distinctions Bill and we propose to take that up, if the Honourable the Home Member is able to attend to his duties in the House that day. If he is not able to attend to his duties in the House that day, we propose to take up the following business:

- (1) To introduce a small Bill to amend the Post Office Savings Banks Act, 1873, and any other small Bill which may be ready.
- (2) To dispose of a Message from the Council of State regarding the Cantonments House-Accommodation (Amendment) Bill.
- (3) To consider and, if the Assembly agrees, to pass the Repealing and Amending Bill and the Currency Consolidation Bill.
- (4) To complete the consideration of the Official Secrets Bill, and, if possible, pass it.
- (5) To take into consideration and pass, if the Assembly agrees, the Bill to amend the Indian Penal Code, commonly known as the White Slave Traffic Bill, the Report of the Select Committee on which was presented to the Assembly on the 8th.
- (6) To take into consideration the Report of the Joint Committee on the Cotton Cess Bill which was presented to the Assembly the other day and to pass the Bill, if the Assembly agrees.

If the Honourable the Home Member is able to attend on Monday, we shall proceed, as I have said, with the Racial Distinctions Bill. We shall again take it up on Wednesday and also on Saturday next week. On Saturday also next week we shall take up the Official Secrets Bill and we hope to be able to finish it, and in that event the other business which I have read out as coming on on Monday will be taken up probably on the following Monday—Monday the 26th.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Five Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Five Minutes to Three of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

RESOLUTION RE ADOPTION OF A POLICY OF PROTECTION.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, before I speak on the Resolution and the amendment, I should like to say how cordially we worked with the European Members of the Fiscal Commission, and how willingly they sacrificed some of their scruples in order that there might be unanimity on the major points, on which we were asked to give our decision; and I want to tender to them my cordial acknowledgments for the way in which they treated us during the discussions in the Fiscal Commission. I wish also to express our satisfaction in that the Government on this occasion have shown their appreciation of the desire of the people that there should be a change in the fiscal policy; Sir, the speech which was delivered by the Honourable Mr. Innes shows that,—his Resolution is not half as good as his speech,—his heart is with the people on this question. Sir, on behalf of the Assembly I think I may congratulate the Honourable Mr. Innes on the exceedingly able speech which he has delivered and on the very conciliatory language he has used in his Resolution, although I am of opinion it leaves a great many things unsaid which I should like it to have said. I may point out that the manner in which this Resolution has been brought forward is not very satisfactory. A costly Commission was appointed, it toured round the country and examined a large number of witnesses. A number of issues were submitted for its consideration and it gave its decision on them. The country expects that the Government should make a pronouncement upon all those issues. Instead of that, although my Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, gave notice of a number of Resolutions dealing with every one of the subjects which were submitted for our consideration, the Government has chosen to take up only one of these Resolutions. The result is that we are not in a position to discuss the other problems, problems intimately connected with, problems absolutely necessary for carrying out, the policy which has been recommended by the majority and the minority members of the Fiscal Commission. Sir, I must express my regret that the Government has not seen its way to bring forward a Resolution which would have covered all the issues submitted to us.

Sir, before dealing with the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes 3 P.M. I should like to say a word about one of the bogeys which has been raised in this House, namely, that relating to agriculture. I do not know whether my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi or Sardar Gajjan Singh, know, that I was appointed to represent agriculture. I am not an agricultural labourer. (A Voice: "That makes all the difference.") My friend behind me says that it makes all the difference. But I should like to know whether any agricultural labourer would have been able to follow the evidence—I am speaking of a labourer—whether any agricultural labourer would have been able to follow the discussions and give an impartial decision upon the evidence placed before the Commission.

I tried my best as representing agriculture,—although as I said I am only an employer of labour and not a labourer myself,—to take up the cause of the agriculturist; and I do say that the decision come to by the Fiscal Commission is in no way injurious to the interests of agriculture. I think there is a great deal of misapprehension as regards the position of agriculture. If my Honourable friends had studied the Fiscal Commission's Report they would have found that about 96 millions are actual workers in the field, whereas in industry the number of labourers employed is 13,67,000. Even if there is very extensive industrialisation, ten times as much as we have to-day, the number of people who would be absorbed in industrial pursuits would be about a million or so. Still there will be for agricultural pursuits about 95 millions of people. Do my friends seriously believe that 95 millions of people in this country are not enough for working in the fields? The Honourable Mr. Innes remarked that if the agricultural labourer had been fully represented in this House, it is doubtful whether he would have accepted even the very modest and watered down Resolution which he has put before the House. I demur to what he says on this point. I do not think that the agriculturists, if they have a voice, would in the least object to the report of either the majority or the minority of the Fiscal Commission, and they would certainly not object to the Honourable Mr. Innes' Resolution. On the other hand they would be delighted to find that he has shown such great sympathy and great concern for the welfare of the agriculturists. As I pointed out, there are enough people in this country who can be taken away from agricultural pursuits to be employed in industries; and agricultural pursuits would in no way suffer by these people leaving that class of work. There is another consideration which people do not take note of; and that is this. There have been frequent famines in this country. When the rain fails and the crops fail, the agriculturists find themselves out of employment. If there are a large number of industries, what would be the result? Some member of a working family would find employment in these industrial pursuits, and his earnings would be able to supply the other members with their daily livelihood, whereas if all of them entirely depended upon agriculture and there is a famine, they will find that they will have to look to famine camps for their livelihood. And therefore if there are a number of industries and some members of the family find employment in industries and some members in agricultural pursuits, when there is a failure of crops, the person who is employed in the industries will be able to supply the means of livelihood for the persons who have been thrown out of employment; therefore starting industries would be a help to agriculturists and would not be a hindrance. I said before there are enough people, some of them can well be spared for industrial pursuits. On these grounds I consider people are unnecessarily worrying themselves about agriculture being jeopardised. Upon that point I wish my Honourable friends had the whole of the evidence before them and they would then have seen that even agriculturists gave evidence to the effect that by persons being employed in industries agriculture would not suffer in the least.

I turn to the amendment of which the Honourable Mr. Innes has given notice. I must at the outset say that I am very much dissatisfied with the propositions which he, on behalf of the Government, has put forward. Take for example the first of these. He says that he accepts in principle the proposition that the fiscal policy of the Government of India may legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India, when he, in the next clause says that in the application of the above principle, of protection, regard must be had, etc., the Honourable the Commerce Member apparently believes that the first clause enunciates the principle of protection. I say with respect that there is a mistake in this. Because according to certain economists, industries can be fostered and developed even under free trade, industries can be fostered by State aid, and industries can be developed by Government pioneering; therefore clause (a) does not necessarily imply that the Government has given its adhesion to the policy of protection. It would have been better and more graceful on the part of Government if they had stated in the forefront of their Resolution that they are whole-heartedly in favour of protection, instead of in a left-handed manner and in a grudging spirit bringing in the word "protection" in the second clause.

Sir, if I am in order I should like to move in the first clause the deletion of certain words and the insertion of certain other words. I would suggest that the words "may legitimately" coming after the words "Government of India" be deleted, and after the words "Government of India" these words be inserted: "should be based on protection." The whole clause would then read thus:

I have no doubt after listening to the speech of the Honourable Mr. Innes that that is really his idea, and I do not see why clear expression should not be given to that idea, why this idea should not be placed in the forefront of the Resolution. If he accepts my amendment there will be no difficulty in carrying out this proposition, and I think the whole House will be with him so far as the first clause is concerned.

Sir, as regards the second clause; here again I find there is some defect. (Clause (b) reads:

"That in the application of the above principle, regard must be had to the financial needs of the country" and then it goes on to say:

"and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue."

Sir, both Sir Campbell Rhodes and the Honourable Mr. Innes have very rightly drawn attention to the need that the past should be buried in oblivion, and that we should not rake it up for the purpose of showing up the differences between Lancashire and India. At the same time, if we allow this clause about excise to remain, what will be the inference? The inference will be that the Government of India's revenue is dependent upon excise, that they can never think of a time when the excise duties can be abolished. If that is the idea, and I think the idea is likely to be generated by the Resolution standing in the terms in which it has been worded, it would lead to considerable heart-burning. I take it, Sir, that everybody is agreed that this chapter in the financial history of this country should be closed; that the excise duty which has been forced on us at the dictate of Lancashire should go. It may be, Sir, that under the present circumstances, having regard to the financial condition of the Government, it is not possible to abolish it. Nonetheless if you allow this clause to remain, it would indicate that the Government for all time to come is dependent upon excise duties and that they do not contemplate that the day will come when the excise duty can be removed.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: What about the word "present" — "to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, etc."

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: But you do not say that there will ever be a time when the excise duty can go. I think therefore, Sir, that the introduction of the word "excise" in this clause is likely to lead the people of this country into the belief that the Government do not contemplate its removal. At any rate, I did not in listening to the speech of the Honourable Mr. Innes, find any passage in which he foreshadowed a time when the excise duty can be removed.

Then, Sir, I come to the third clause:

"that the principle should be applied with discrimination, with due regard to the well-being of the community and to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission."

Sir, my point is that this clause which relates to paragraph 97 should not be allowed to remain in this Resolution. Those of my Honourable friends who have read paragraph 97 will remember that certain conditions are mentioned there. Then, in paragraph 101, in elaborating the reasons which have led to the mentioning of the various conditions, the majority point out that in the case of new industries there should be no protection. Therefore, Sir, if you leave paragraph 97 in the third clause it would lead to the inference that the Government accept the further elaboration by the majority of that paragraph, namely, in paragraph 101 where they hint at the impossibility at any time of protection being given to new industries. If they omit this clause it would still carry out the intention which the Honourable Mr. Innes has in view. It would read that the principle should be applied with discrimination, with due regard to the well-being of the community. Why spoil this Resolution by a reference to paragraph 97, which when read with paragraph 101 suggests that there should be no protection for new industries. Therefore, Sir, I object to those words:

"and to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission;"

and I hope that the Honourable Mr. Innes will agree to their deletion. Sir, although I think that the words I have objected to are likely to be misunderstood and will be regarded as showing a very grudging spirit on the part of the Government towards the legitimate aspirations of the people of this country who want that their industries should be developed, I must say that a great advance has been made by the Government in assuring us, through their spokesman in this Assembly, that they are prepared to accept a policy of protection for this country. That is a great advance. But I say, Sir, that in order that that pronouncement may be regarded as fully satisfactory and as meeting the wishes of the people, it is desirable that the objections that I have taken to the Resolution should be considered by the Honourable Mr. Innes, and that he should give his consent to the deletion of the words which I have suggested should be deleted. If he agrees to that, he will carry the whole House with him, and that would be a great advantage. Instead of having half-hearted support for his Resolution he will find that the entire House is with him. (An Honourable Member: "It is not enough.") My friend says it is not enough; but from my point of view I would advise my friend to accept the Resolution of the Honourable Mr. Innes, if he would be good enough to accept the various suggestions I have made with regard to this matter. If he does not, he is likely to find the House divided. But having regard to the fact that we are getting from the Government as much as the Government think they can give us,—I would suggest to all my Honourable friends on this side of the House that they should, even though it is found that the Honourable Mr. Innes is not willing to go as far as I want him to go, give their support to his Resolution.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"In the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment, in clause (a), omit the words 'may legitimately' in order to insert the words 'should be based on protection and should'."

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): Sir, I should like to ask whether in dealing with this amendment one must confine oneself strictly to the matter of this particular amendment or whether one could traverse rather wider ground.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has actually moved three separate amendments, but, for the convenience of the House I will put all three together.

Further amendment moved:

"In sub-section (b) of the amendment to omit the words 'and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue.'"

Further amendment moved:

"In sub-section (c) to omit the words 'and subject to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission.'"

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Sir, I very much hope that the Honourable Member will not find it necessary to press these particular amendments. The Government has, in the words of the last speaker, made a very considerable advance, and it will be a pity to cloud the issue by getting into a discussion of the details of the particular phraseology in which that advance is made. I would draw the attention of Honourable Members in the first instance to the word 'present' which already finds a place in clause (b)—that in the application of the above principle regard must be had to the financial needs of the country and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue." The fact that the Government at present depends on import, export and excise duties does not in the least mean that the Government will necessarily depend so, shall we say, three years hence. Do it now, an Honourable Member says; but if that is impossible, there is nothing whatever in the phraseology of that clause which implies that any of those particular duties are perpetuated. Now, with regard to the next clause, clause (c), Government has already agreed to eliminate the words 'subject to' and that really makes a very considerable difference. The words 'subject to' made it an instruction to the Tariff Board that it was to introduce a new policy of protection with discrimination subject to those safeguards. Now, it is required to have due regard to those safeguards and I ask any reasonable person who reads clause 97 to say whether any Tariff Board would be so foolish as to start introducing a policy of protection without due regard to those safeguards. I really feel that in the position which we have reached there is nothing in these small amendments which have been suggested.

I would like now with the permission of the House to turn to more general points and continue the debate as a whole. It has been an unexpected debate to one coming from England where the subject of protection and free trade has for some time raised an almost mystical enthusiasm in the adherents of one side or another, an enthusiasm only comparable to the zeal with which people in the Greco-Roman world used to quarrel about the exact nature of the persons of the Trinity. To-day we have had no such discussion. It has been simply a question of the extent and methods of a policy of protection, on which, subject to due regard being had to the interests of agriculture, we all seem to be agreed.

I may perhaps be allowed to make a personal observation at this point. A Member of the Government of India when he speaks on behalf of the Government of India has only a very limited power of expressing personal views. He is an eighth part, or rather less than an eighth part, of a unity known as the Governor General in Council, and he is expressing the views of the Government of India subject to the general instructions of the Secretary of State. There is not much room for very personal views. Some of us, as Mr. Innes has said, have felt considerable doubt as to whether or not the present is a wise moment to introduce protection. I am not one of those who believe that one must be either a protectionist or a free trader; I can never understand why one should be either an Arian or an Athanasian on the question. It has always seemed to me to be a question of time, place and opportunity. I have been able to agree with the free trader that if there were no differences of race, religion, language, nationality, climate or geography between the peoples of the world free trade would be undoubtedly the right policy. But I have never been able quite to subscribe to the doctrine as I saw it stated only yesterday that free trade is the only policy which is consistent with true international morality. At the same time I have never been able to agree with the protectionist when he tells me that it is necessary that everything that comes into the country should be taxed highly, or that it is very bad for a country that it should take payment for its exports by taking imports in return. There is a famous picture in Addison's Spectator of a Tory squire who waxes violently indignant over the new fangled importations that are coming in from every part of the world, and drinks death and damnation to them in a glass of cognac from France!! The question is really one of time, place and opportunity, and I think the House must have been much struck with some observations that fell from the Honourable Mr. Innes about the difficulties of introducing protection into India in the present state of world commerce and industry. I do not want to be ruled out of order by you, Mr. President, by getting lost in questions of exchange and currency, but they really have a considerable connection with the question. It has happened more than once in the history of the world that a nation has gone in for protective duties and has found in quite a short time that somehow or other in some curious way the exchanges have nullified the effects of protection. At a time when all the exchanges of the world are in a state of chaos, at any rate some consideration ought, I think, to be paid to that matter. There is a paragraph, I think it is paragraph 92, in the Commission's Report which makes a passing reference to that, but if I may be permitted to say so, not a very satisfactory reference. However, as I said, a Member of the Government of India has only a limited right to speak his personal views and my object in expressing a doubt as to whether the present is altogether an opportune moment for introducing protection into India was merely to draw attention to the need for caution. I accept whole-heartedly the doctrine that it is India's right to decide what fiscal policy she shall have, and so long as I remain a Member of the Government of India I shall whole-heartedly attempt to assist in the introduction of the policy which India has chosen. That being the position, the House has, I think, the duty to remember that the Government of India must have the responsibility of doing the administrative work of introduction and must be content to go perhaps a little slower than the fastest sailing vessels of the fleet might wish. After all, we are embarking upon a sea, which is known to be subject to cyclones and which has many sunken reefs. May it not be wise to steer slowly at first and set a course among the islands near the coast? Of these we have already some knowledge in our existing revenue tariff which it will be foolish to pretend was not already a protective tariff without being either consistently or discriminately protective. I suggest, therefore, that it is clearly right that the House and the Government working together should proceed cautiously in this matter.

Now, Sir, some criticism has been made as to the constitution of the Tariff Board. I think it was Mr. Kamat who suggested that he would prefer to see on the Tariff Board two Members elected by this Assembly, but he was willing . . . (A Voice: "No, it was the other way.") If everybody is agreed on that matter, I need not further defend the view that Government has taken about the nature of the Tariff Board. It is, of course, quite natural, it is a natural function of every Parliament to be critical of its executive. It is quite right that it should be so. An executive that is not really responsible and responsive to the will of the people constitutionally expressed is a bad executive. It is even more natural that the Assembly should be jealous in the present state of affairs of this executive, which is only in part responsible to the present Assembly. I do not wish to enter into its constitution at this stage, but it is at any rate responsive to the views expressed in this Assembly. I would suggest that the House, in considering this question of a Tariff Board, should throw its mind forward to the day when the executive will not only be responsive but will be responsible to this House. Let us keep faith with the future. It will be a great mistake if at the present moment, during the present transition period we should allow accidents belonging entirely to the transition period to lead us astray. My strong personal belief is that the two main desiderata in a constitution with an executive responsible to a Parliament are that the executive should be thoroughly responsible to Parliament, and that Parliament should not usurp any of the functions of the executive. I would suggest, therefore, that in dealing with the question of a Tariff Board, we should throw our minds forward and consider whether, supposing we had an executive which was entirely responsible to this Parliament, we should not be making a mistake by trying to usurp their function of appointing a Tariff Board which would take from them the responsibility, which after all they cannot shift from themselves, of bringing this policy into execution.

Mr. S. C. Shahani (Sind Jagirdars and Zemindars: Landholders): Sir, I rise to point out that it will be a very great mistake on the part of the House to accept the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes in the form in which it stands at present. It has been pointed out by my Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar that the first clause of this amendment is not properly worded, and he has accordingly suggested some amendment to it. I would read the clause and consider the amendment that has been suggested. Mr. Seshagiri accepts the principle that the fiscal policy of the Government shall legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India. But his suggestion is that it should be based on protection and directed towards fostering the development of industries in India. I thought the industries of a country were fostered either directly or indirectly. They were fostered indirectly by tariffs, and directly by bounties, cash credits, railway rates and in the great variety of other ways indicated in the Report of the Industrial Commission. I therefore suggest that the first clause should be worded thus: "That the fiscal policy of the Government of India shall legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India by protection and by direct aids". That would be more exact, and that would convey the idea which is intended to be embodied in the first clause.

In the second clause as my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has rightly pointed out, the existence of the word 'excise' will no doubt lead to considerable misunderstanding in the country. Misunderstandings on vital questions should be avoided with special care. So far as I see, if the intention of the Government is to give up excise duty at any future time, it is best not to indicate in this clause that regard must be had to the finances of India depending largely on the collections from imports, exports and excise. Cotton excise duty ought to be done away with at once. It has been said by some that it exists in other countries. I have to point out that such a tax exists in very few countries, and that wherever it exists it exists only for revenue purposes. Japan has been often instanced, but we have to remember that Japan not only refunds the excise duty but also pays freight to destination on her manufactured goods which are sent abroad.

Then, Sir, I come to the third part of the amendment, which is really the most important part. With all deference to the Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and to my Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, I must point out that, while they have felt that there is something wrong about the recommendations of the Fiscal Commission, they have never been able to localise it. The chief defect in the Report of the Fiscal Commission consists in this, that while they recommend a policy of protection, they try to render that policy as ineffectual as possible by loading it with unworkable conditions. They do come forward rightly to answer all the objections that have been raised to the policy of protection being adopted in India—and on this point I feel greatly disposed to congratulate the members of the Commission, particularly the European members, on their having risen above petty considerations—and to give it as their deliberate opinion that the policy best suited to the interests of India is a policy of protection. But while they have done that, we have got to remember that they have sought to neutralise the effect of this policy which they have recommended for adoption to the Government of India. Now how have they neutralised it? I would refer Honourable Members to paragraph 97 on page 54 of the Fiscal Commission's Report that has been read out but by no means duly pondered. Now what is the main recommendation of the Fiscal Commission's Report? Their main recommendation is this. Adopt the policy of protection because it is best suited to the interests of India. But since this will involve sacrifice on the part of the consumer and the interests of the consumer should be protected you must be discriminating, and in order that you should exercise discrimination with regard to industries that may apply for protection, what should you do? You should appoint a Tariff Board which is undoubtedly a very good step suggested by the Fiscal Commission. Probably this recommendation of the Fiscal Commission's Report may be usefully followed elsewhere too, say, in settling the question of State versus Company management. State management finds favour with the people, and I have no doubt that for that the appointment of Boards should be insisted on in order that the State management may be efficiently conducted. A Tariff Board is undoubtedly necessary, but what further do the Fiscal Commissioners do? They lay down that the Tariff Board in fixing the rate of protection must necessarily respect three conditions. And what are these three conditions? I shall read the three conditions. The first is "That the industry must be one possessing natural advantages such as an abundant supply of raw material, cheap power, a sufficient supply of labour or a large home market." That is a valuable condition, though here too I feel disposed to omit the consideration of "labour" and "market" as well. It is a mistaken idea that India suffers from insufficiency of labour. We have plenty of labour, but it is unorganised. And it is for that reason that the foreign capitalist is able to exploit Indian labour. I entered into conversation in regard to this new fiscal policy with the Honourable Member from Champaran only last night, and he told me that the foreigners who have established their plantations there allowed sometimes no more than two pias a day to the labourers that they employed. The question of labour may not therefore be worried about. I would also omit the word "market" because India is a continent and it has, I think, wrongly depended upon a vagarious foreign market disturbed by fluctuating exchanges. It can be self-contained and it is no exaggeration to say that India can find a secure home market quite sufficient for the purposes of all its important industries. I would retain the words "raw material" and "power" only. But yet comparatively that is a small thing and, if my other friends in the House do not go with me, I would be prepared to drop it. Then, I come to the second condition which says: "That the Tariff Board shall afford aid only when an industry claiming protection is able to show that it is not likely to develop at all or not likely to develop so rapidly as is desirable." Now this is a hard condition. I at once state that what is given with one hand is sought to be taken away with the other. Alien interests could easily put up experts to swear that an industry cannot develop at all or so rapidly as is desirable. According to me all that an industry should be required to show is that, although it has possessed natural advantages, it cannot carry on without protection. And this should be quite enough for the Tariff Board. No other consideration should intervene. The third condition is absurd. And that is that an industry should be able to show that eventually it will be able to face world competition without protection. I have known magical results produced in these days. Some time ago it was deemed impossible for a man to fly—he can fly now. But, if we have scientifically developed so far, if to-day our Chemistry can become alchemy in certain respects, I am very doubtful if in the domain of free will we should be able to secure the same results, if we should be able to say beforehand as to what the conditions of world competition will be after thirty or forty years. But even if we are able to divine, do the Fiscal Commission propose that an astrologer or a theosophical clairvoyant should be put on their Tariff Board? It is no use providing these stringent and unworkable conditions, and I draw the attention of my friends here in the House to these three conditions and ask them to carefully consider them. They are represented by Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas as being a detail but with all respect I beg to point out that the dissenting Commissioners have not taken into consideration the import of these three conditions and have missed the meaning that underlies them, and I therefore beg to propose that here we should adopt the amendment that I have suggested, namely:

1. (a) That for the purpose of rapid intensive industrialization of the country the Government of India adopt a policy of protection to be applied with discrimination along the following general lines:

- (i) Every industry to which protection is given must possess natural advantages in abundant supply of raw material and adequate sources of power.
- (ii) The fact that, although there exist natural advantages for an industry, it has not been started or has not made rapid progress under the existing regime, should be considered sufficient proof that protection is needed in its case to inspire capital with confidence and to make the progress of the industry rapid."

It is said that my amendment is a long one, furnishes the basis for a Bill, is a speech or an essay. My reply is that those who raise that objection have not studied the subject. (Laughter.) I would not mind stimulating laughter by being so positive here. It is true that very probably the force of the amendment that I have proposed will not be realised by my friends and the amendment that has been proposed by the Honourable Mr. Innes will be carried, but let it be remembered that there is at any rate one man to point out that this amendment in its unmodified form is dangerous and that the House would be committing a serious mistake in adopting it. I am not concerned with the issue at all. It is not given to man to command success; he can do more, he can deserve it. I must point the great flaw which I notice in the amendment that has been put forward by the Honourable Mr. Innes. The whole forenoon I have been getting up, and I thank my stars that I have at last had an opportunity of saying my say now. I want also to point out that there is a very great omission in the proposed amendment in that no reference has been made to the employment of foreign capital. Now, kindly consider the context. To restrict the consumer's sacrifice to the necessary minimum a policy of protection should be applied with discrimination; and foreign capital is to be freely employed, say the Fiscal Commission. Discriminating protection on the one hand and what is more free employment of foreign capital: what will these two things do? They will minimise the burden that is to fall on the consumer. And therefore you should be very particular about the employment of foreign capital. I wish to point out that the employment of foreign capital is altogether undesirable, that that has caused the economic enslavement of the country, that places like Champaran and Assam have become plantations in consequence of the free employment of foreign capital.

Mr. President: I would point out to the Honourable Member that the discussion of foreign capital is not in order.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: Sir, if it is not in order, I desist, and hope there will be some other opportunity of discussing it. I would also give up on this occasion the consideration of one other question, namely, the question of Imperial preferences. It has been probably deferred for consideration to some other time, and I willingly abide by the arrangement that seems to have been made. I therefore consider one other point, namely, the point of the Tariff Board. If any part of the dissenting Minute is most satisfactory it is that which is devoted to the appointment of a Tariff Board. The dissenting Commissioners have in general rightly pointed out that the Tariff Board should consist of three members of general attainments and two assessors representing the different interests of trade, commerce, and industry. (An Honourable Member: "Not agriculture.") Yes, agriculture too. I say that the minority Commissioners have rightly suggested that the Tariff Board should consist of three members—one Chairman and two ordinary members, and that, whenever further investigation becomes necessary, the Board should call in the aid of two assessors elected by the different Chambers and mercantile associations in the country and that their help should be requisitioned for the purpose of investigating the claims that are advanced by different industries to protection. I say this is an improvement upon the position that has been assumed by the Fiscal Commission and by the Honourable Mr. Innes in this House. I am suggesting a further improvement. The Chairman as suggested by the minority Commissioners should be a lawyer of the status of a High Court Judge for impartial judicial decisions amongst conflicting interests. It is also right that two members of broad views should be elected by the non-official Members of the Assembly who should have a voice in the constitution of the Board. But the representatives of the different mercantile associations should be regular members and not mere assessors. Those who are specialists, businessmen conversant with special industries, will not on that account be necessarily disposed to protect the interests of the industries which are very near to their heart. I would suggest that all the four members should be appointed by the non-official Members of the Indian Legislature. I therefore slightly modify the useful suggestion made by the dissenting Fiscal Commissioners and propose that the amendment which has been proposed in clause (d) by the Honourable Mr. Innes be superseded by the amendment which I have proposed. The amendment which I have proposed is:

"That a permanent Tariff Board, consisting of a trained Indian lawyer of the status of a High Court Judge for its Chairman, two members elected by the Non-Official members of the Central Legislature and two members representing trade, commerce and industry elected by recognised chambers and mercantile associations in India, be created whose duties will be, inter alia, to recommend the rate of protective duty or any alternative measures of assistance, to watch the operation of the Tariff, and generally to advise Government and the Legislature in carrying out the policy indicated above."

I have only one other remark to make, and it is this. The Honourable Sir Campbell Rhodes has emphasised the conflict that would arise between the interests of the consumer and the producer, if the policy recommended by the Fiscal Commission be adopted. He went the length of saying that there was really no conflict of interest between Lancashire and India, but that in India there will be a conflict between the consumer and the producer. I have heard this point made by some others also. I take this opportunity of stating what has been conceived by my own mind as being an answer to such an objection. The consumer must naturally make some sort of sacrifice in order to gain culture, skill and powers of united production. My Honourable friend Mr. Gajjan Singh came forward to say that agriculture would suffer from protective policy. My Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has given a reply to that. If time were allowed me, I would read a paragraph from the Fiscal Commission's report; but as it may not be allowed me, I merely refer to what has been said by the Fiscal Commission's report on this point. Agriculture, say they, will not suffer. Agriculture will gain, and distinctly too, by the adoption of the policy of protection. I am an agriculturist, and do agricultural labour. You may look at my dress and imagine that I cannot handle a plough, but that is not so. Few cultivators can distinguish between one kind of soil and another better than I do, or select seasons for different cultivations or settle different rotations or

Mr. President: I must ask the Honourable Member to bring his remarks to a close. He is getting irrelevant.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: Sir, if that is not allowable, I make no further reference to it. I only say that I feel convinced that agriculture will gain by the adoption of the policy of protection. Most of the agriculturists are mere middlemen and it is only few that participate in agricultural labour. Agricultural labourers are not employed throughout the year on agriculture. It is only in very few places that you have perennial canals and it is therefore most common in India that for nearly six months the cultivator has got to do nothing. If industries are created, the agriculturists would benefit, and very largely too. The cultivator is starving. It is a fact that he does not get even the two meals a day to which he is entitled. And if that is so, the sooner India came to be industrialised, the better would it be for the country. It has been said—I do not recollect by whom, I think it was by my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, I am not sure, it may have been by Sir Campbell Rhodes; so I won't say by whom—that India suffers from famines. Famines never affect all parts of India at once.

Mr. President: I must ask the Honourable Member to resume his seat. I gave him a warning three minutes ago and he did not bring his remarks to a close.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I would only take a minute or two more, Sir.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is perhaps not aware that I have already given him 9 minutes over his time.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: There are others who were given more time.

Mr. President: What did the Honourable Member say?

Mr. S. C. Shahani: Sir,

Mr. President: I ask the Honourable Member to repeat his remarks.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I thought that others had got more than 20 minutes.

Mr. President: May I ask the Honourable Member what he implies by that?

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I imply nothing. I only refer to the fact.

Mr. President: May I ask the Honourable Member why he refers to that fact?

Mr. S. C. Shahani: In order that my request for further time may be considered.

Mr. President: I pointed out to the Honourable Member that I had already given him 9 minutes over his time, and I warn him now that I shall not again pass over in silence remarks which imply any reflection on the conduct of the Chair.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I will be as brief as I can, Sir. I will take only a minute or two more.

Mr. President: I ask the Honourable Member to resume his seat. I understand the Honourable Member desired to move his amendment as an amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment. If he will show where the amendment should come in the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment I should be prepared to accept it.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: Sir, I am omitting that part of my amendment which relates to Imperial Preference, that is to say, part (3). I am also omitting that which relates to the Sea Customs Act, that is, part (5).

Mr. President: I am not asking what the Honourable Member is omitting. I am asking where the amendment comes in the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I seek then to suggest that clauses (a) and (c) of the amendments of the Honourable Mr. Innes be replaced by my clause (a). Then

Mr. President: I will allow the discussion to proceed on the amendment moved by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar in that case.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, in the first instance, I think the House would like to express its appreciation of the handsome manner in which the Honourable the Finance Member has recognized—as a matter of agreeable surprise—that in this House at all events we are not all irresponsible fire-eaters but are occasionally prepared to take a reasonable view of things. I hope others outside this House whether in the press or elsewhere will share those opinions. Government is prepared to go as far as it may in the present circumstances and we in both the parts of the House, I believe, are agreed that no obstructive tactics should be adopted by which what the Government is prepared to concede may be nullified. At the same time one does feel and one is bound to press that the amendments, more than verbal, that have been moved by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar are necessary in the interests of the situation. Recognizing that Government cannot afford to be more than general in its acceptance of the principle of protection and following up that desire, I think these amendments are more than necessary. Reading the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment, one thought that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and his friends in the minority of the Fiscal Commission had scored a point, because when Government accepted the principle of "protection with discrimination" and omitted the words "along the lines of the Report" about which there was a great deal of understandable dispute between the majority and the minority—I say, one thought that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and his friends had scored so far. The moment, however, any details are gone into, even in the way that Mr. Innes' amendment attempts the Government's object is, to some extent, nullified. As Mr. Shahani has pointed out, by accepting the principles laid down (they are more than principles, for they are details) in paragraph 97 of the Report, you will be really handicapping the Tariff Board that is to come and not giving them the free hand which they should have if they are to direct our deliberations in the way that they ought to. For these reasons, and without going further into details and confusing issues that have been gratuitously imported into the consideration of this circumscribed Resolution and the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes, I should press the Government to reconsider the position and agree to the suggestions of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar.

Sir, the issues have been confused. One of them is the so-called agricultural issue which is looming somewhat large in our deliberations. I come from an essentially agricultural province, more agricultural I believe than any other in India. Bengal has its own problems. Bengal is however fairly "protected" in economic and industrial matters or shall I say a great deal of "free trade" is there. Its interests on the Fiscal Commission were entrusted to the care of an European merchant, no doubt a prince among them, a Marwari merchant, a very successful merchant, and also a Parsi Professor of Economics. Whoever was responsible for the framing of the personnel of the Fiscal Commission never thought that Bengal might have its own point of view to be put forward by its own representatives. Be that as it may, Bengal has its point of view essentially agricultural as it is. The lower middle classes of Bengal have been and are largely agricultural in the villages. I am one of them, sometimes a labourer of the stamp of my friend, Mr. Shahani. But agriculture has not solved her problems and Bengal wants to be and must be increasingly industrial. It has no other salvation in the near future. Whatever the reasons may be, the lower middle class in Bengal will not take with that zeal to agriculture that will ensure anything like success in life. Unlike in the past it is taking gradually more, however, to industrial and mechanical life. We have more than a promise of that in my Province in the same way as I think they have in the Punjab in spite of what Sardar Sahib Gajjan Singh and Mr. Townshend have told us. I had been recently to the Punjab and I found quite appreciable industrial awakening there along with commendable educational progress all round. Industrial consciousness is coming over the whole of that province which will soon enable its inhabitants to take their place in the industrial life. With its Hydro-electric and other schemes and promising water power the Punjab will take care of itself. I believe that there can be no gainsaying the fact that even in the Punjab the agricultural interests will not be inconsistent with industrial interests. Certainly, in Bengal that is not going to be the case, and that is not the case. Even with regard to agriculture itself, if what is called scientific agriculture is to come, is not that another form of industry. How can agriculture and industry be dissociated like that? We want cheap clothes no doubt—to talk of one only of the many narrow issues raised. We want here protection not only against Lancashire and

[Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary.]

Bombay and Nagpur, but I am afraid sometimes against Clive Street also. We have a representative of it in the House—he is not here, but he is listening to me quietly from a distance in the corridor. We want protection against some of our own so-called swadeshi workers who are piling up the prices of cloth above their intrinsic value. We want protection against all these, and who knows that the Tariff Board is going to give the cloth industry any protection of the kind that cloth dealers are hoping to have? It may give protection to yarn, or to some other branch of the cloth industry, but the finished cloth industry is not likely to have much consideration. Therefore, by raising these false issues let us not get away from the real point. An important advance has been made. We have to be thankful for the smallest of small mercies, and if a man from Mars came to-day and found that we were congratulating ourselves and the Government upon the fact that after near upon two centuries of British rule here we are in a very patronising way told that the fiscal policy of Government “may legitimately be directed towards the fostering and the development of industries in India”, he would be more than astonished. Why, that is a common-place, that is, obvious in any country. But we have to accept that small mercy and be thankful. I am not therefore prepared to risk that mercy by moving amendments that may not be acceptable to the Government. For fifty years, certainly for 37 years since the Indian National Congress came into existence, the better mind of India has been asking for protection in some shape or other. Are we now going back upon that? Government is prepared to concede it in some shape, and to concede, in Sir Basil Blackett’s language, that we are now to be masters in our own house so far as fiscal policy is concerned. This is another reason for thankfulness. And there is a third. The Honourable Mr. Innes made a statement which must not be lost sight of, namely, that we are perilously near to taxation limits, we have been urging this long and anything that will get rid of further direct taxation is welcome. The way in which Mr. Innes’ amendment has been framed, even when amended by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, will not bar those other aids to industrial development that many of my friends have referred to. But protection should be placed in the forefront of our programme, and that is why I believe Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar is wanting to move the amendment in a pointed manner and that is why I believe the Government ought to accept it. I do not want to labour points that have already been dilated upon, but I want to make it quite clear that whatever class versus class differences may be, whatever province versus province differences may be, whatever other differences may be, the country is fairly united that some protection of the kind that has been indicated is necessary, not alone in the interests of industry but also in the interests of agriculture which must go hand in hand together. If protection is really bad for agriculture I should not have it at any price. These considerations commend the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes, subject to the further amendment of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, to most of us. If Government saw its way to accept Mr. Jamnadas’s original motion and added clause (d) of the Honourable Mr. Innes’s amendment to it, the object of the Government and ourselves would have been better attained. Mr. Jamnadas’s Resolution is fairly general. It covers nearly all the ground covered by clauses (a), (b) and (c) of the Honourable Mr. Innes’s amendment. If it is permissible to do so, I should recommend that Mr. Jamnadas’s Resolution shall stand and be amended by addition of the Honourable Mr. Innes’s amendment, clause (d).

so that the whole object aimed at by Mr. Jamnadas and the Honourable Mr. Innes which is also our object, so far, may be achieved.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: It will be convenient if at this stage I explain the view of the Government in regard to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar’s amendment. I do not propose to refer to Mr. Shahani’s speech except to say that that speech illustrated a danger which I think is a real one. If every one here to-night worded the Resolution so as to embody his own particular brand of protection, every one of us in this Assembly would have his own Resolution, and we should never come to a finish at all. In this very difficult matter I say that there must be a reasonable spirit of give and take and that being so I hope Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar will withdraw his amendments. I must confess that I listened to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar’s speech with a certain amount of disappointment. He said that the Government had made only a grudging advance. He said that we had so worded our Resolution that it was open to misconstruction and misunderstanding. Sir, on my part, I may say that I do not think that any reasonable man reading my Resolution can misunderstand it at all and I say that if there is any misunderstanding it must be a wilful misunderstanding. The first clause of my Resolution has been attacked on the ground that it does not bring in the word protection. It has been suggested by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar that under cover of this clause I am probably referring only to other methods of giving assistance. Sir, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, when he made those remarks, entirely overlooked the word ‘fiscal.’ I say that the fiscal policy of the Government of India may legitimately be directed towards the development of industries in India. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary accuses that as being a patronising reference to India. It is nothing of the sort. What is the point of that clause. Surely this House will give us credit for the fact that every line of this Resolution has been most carefully thought out and the reason why clause (a) of the Resolution has been worded like that is to mark the transition, the profound transition from a purely revenue tariff to a tariff which is directed to other objects and that is why the Resolution has been worded in that way. I come to clause (b). Here again Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar says that clause (b) has been so worded so as to give people the idea that we propose for ever to keep on the cotton excise duty. Nothing of the sort. I explained at the very greatest length in my last speech why we had put in this reference to the financial position. I explained that it would not be honest for us to pretend that in the present state of our finances we could pledge ourselves to take off the duties referred to by the Fiscal Commission and that is why I put in particularly the words ‘the present dependence.’ We are not discussing the question of cotton excise duties at all in this Resolution. It has nothing to do with this Resolution. All we are discussing is whether or not this House is to admit the principle of protection. That is the whole point. Again we come to clause (d). Mr. Shahani has found all sorts of dangers, all sorts of dishonesties on the part of the Government of India in this reference to the safeguards in paragraph 97 of the Indian Fiscal Commission’s Report. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar suggested that because I made a reference to paragraph 97 I must have had in my mind a reference to paragraph 101. I had no idea of the sort. Any one will see, as Sir Basil Blackett has pointed out, that this suggestion that the Tariff Board must have regard to these safeguards is a perfectly reasonable suggestion. No Tariff Board considering questions of this kind could avoid paying regard to the considerations mentioned in paragraph 97 of the Fiscal Commission’s Report. As I pointed out in my last speech, all that paragraph refers to is the doctrine of comparative advantage. Can Mr. Shahani or any one in this House suggest any better criterion than that? I do not think I need say more. We have on this side made a fair and even generous advance in order to meet the wishes of this House and the wishes of the people of India. I do not think that it is generous on the part of the House that it should make small and niggling amendments in the wording of my Resolution. As I have said, every line of this Resolution has been most carefully thought out and I must ask the House to accept that Resolution as it stands. I am afraid that if Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar presses his amendments then I must oppose them and the responsibility will not be mine. Sir, I oppose the amendments.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I move that the question be now put.

Mr. President: The question is that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That in the amendment moved by Mr. Innes in clause (a) the words 'may legitimately' be omitted and that the words 'should be based on protection and should' be inserted in their place."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That the words in clause (b):

'and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue' be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Having regard to the fate of these amendments I do not press the other amendment.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That in clause (c) the words 'and to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission' be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala (Burma: Non-European): Sir, somehow to-day I do not feel the least enthusiasm over the subject which is being debated, for by what I can see there is very little ground on which there is really much controversy. The points that are under debate are really two as the Honourable Mr. Innes has more than once pointed out. Is India committing itself to the principle of protection? That is one point; and the second point is—if it is going to commit itself to the principle of protection—does she wish that part of the machinery to give effect to that principle shall be the constitution of a Tariff Board?

Now it was said this morning,—and I think it is believed by most Honourable Members,—that to-day we are burying the policy of free trade, and that we are giving it a decent burial with the Honourable Mr. Innes as one of the principal pall bearers. But the question that I should like answered is this. If free trade is dead to-day, and it is going to be buried in a few minutes, has protection really come to stay? Now I am not very sure that the way we are proceeding about it to-day leads me to think that protection, even if a Resolution approving of it is passed by this august Assembly, is going to stay for ever. I see no indication of any element of permanence in the proposition that has been made either by my friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, or the amendment moved by the Honourable the Member for Commerce and Industries. For what does it amount to? We pass a Resolution that the future fiscal policy of India shall be on the lines of protection. We then say that we should constitute a Tariff Board to give effect to it. But what is there which gives any sanction either to the first Resolution or to the second Resolution? What is there to prevent this policy being set aside by a subsequent Resolution of this House, and what is there to prevent this Board being also wiped out by a subsequent Resolution of this House? Now, Sir, the point that concerns me most is this,—if we are going to embark upon a policy which is going to break with the past wholly and which is going to inaugurate a new era, the House must safeguard itself against fluctuations of political views in this Assembly and outside. I am not in a position to suggest how this House is going to accomplish that; but I venture to think that the mere passing of these two Resolutions will not ensure that permanence which is essential to the growth of this fiscal policy on which this House is about to embark. It is also necessary that some legislative provision be made by this House by which this House pledges itself, so far as itself is concerned, to adhere to this policy. Unless this is done I do not consider that we should be wise in venturing upon this policy, for there are no precautions taken against its reversal at any time. I put the question in this way. Take the Tariff Board. The Honourable Mr. Innes says, the Board shall come into existence and shall remain in existence for a year.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: In the first instance.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: Of course in the first instance for a year. But we do not know what is going to happen to that Board at the end of the year. Many of us may not be here at all to hear the fate of that Tariff Board. It is not merely a bogey I am raising; it is a real fact that you have got to reckon with. If our friends outside the Council who have kept out of it change their minds, as they are about to change, we hope, you may be certain that this would be one of the election cries—and it must be an election cry—as to whether the Honourable Mr. Innes with his Tariff Board and we with our support should be allowed to come back to this House or not. I venture to submit, Sir, that before any violent changes are made in the policy of the country, sufficient provision must be made to ensure its permanence, and I submit, that this is not the way to do it. I have said before in this House, and I have not changed my opinion since, that I am a protectionist to the core; but I do not wish to be a protectionist to-day and be changed into a free-trader by the sheer brutal force of votes next year. That is the thing we have got to guard against. (An Honourable Member: "There is no danger of that.") There are gentlemen here who are so sanguine as to suppose that there is no danger of that. Well, I foresee the danger myself, though it is not that I wish that the House should not embark upon this policy of protection. That is not my wish. My wish is that something more tangible than a mere Resolution should come from the Government, so that at least for a reasonable period we are committed to this policy of protection.

Then, Sir, with regard to the constitution of the Board. Now I am not a great believer in any bureaucratic form of Government.

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee (Education Member): Nor do you believe in a democratic form of Government.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: My Honourable friend says, that I am not sufficiently a democrat. But there is this to distinguish real bureaucracy from real democracy, that the bureaucracy will not improve nor is willing to improve upon somebody else's ideas. Democracy has this affliction about it, that it wants to improve everybody and it wants to improve upon everybody else's ideas. This being so, let us consider whom we should prefer. What would happen if democracy prevails and this principle of election is adopted in the constitution of the Board? Those Members who are elected by the House will be subject to the influence of the House. We cannot get away from that fact; we need not disguise it. They must come under the influence of the House. Again the House itself, in its turn is bound to come under the influence of the outside world. This will not be so in the case of the bureaucracy and I submit, that in the conflict between these two principles and under the peculiar circumstances of this case, I would prefer the bureaucracy and confer on it the power of determining the constitution of the Board. But, Sir, I would go further. I am not impressed by the fact that the mere passing of a Resolution constituting this Tariff Board is sufficient. If this Board is to be constituted it should be a statutory body, constituted by an Act of this Legislature, and that its duties as far as possible should be defined. I object to treating the Board merely as an advisory body. For in the end it may come to this, that it may advise as much as it likes the protection or otherwise of a particular industry, but if its advice is to be submitted to the opinion of the whole House, I venture to submit, without meaning any offence to this House, that that advice will not more often than not be examined on its own merits. There are always political forces at play, under whose influence the advice is bound to come. If their advice is to be subjected to the scrutiny of the House on each occasion, it would be better that the advice had better not be tendered. We have seen, and it is a legitimate exercise of our powers—we have seen on many occasions how much we have got a tendency to doubt to scrutinize and amend the reports of all Select Committees. That I say is legitimate in legislation, but when one comes to the examination of an important department of business, the examination should be from a business, and not from a political point of view as would be the case, if it was undertaken by this Assembly. I maintain that is a thing to be avoided, and if the Honourable Member for Commerce is desirous that this Tariff Board should be a really live Board with possibilities in itself of doing good, it should be a statutory Board exercising statutory authority, by which this House and the outside world may be bound for a reasonable period of time. There is another point. In the elements of permanence to which I referred there is the attitude of one gentleman, the gentleman who sits in Whitehall with a big stick in his hand over the heads of my Honourable friends on the Treasury Benches; we have heard nothing at all as to what his ideas and intentions are and what he means to do. (Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: "He has no voice.") We think he has got no voice, but I should like to have an official statement made that he is going to give up this big stick in his hand so far as this aspect of administration is concerned. I have heard nothing about it. I should like to hear from the Honourable the Commerce Member what is the position of this gentleman going to be with regard to any Resolution that this Assembly may pass to-day. We have been just told by the Honourable the Finance Member, that Members of the Government have got very little scope for the expression of personal opinion; we know it and we feel it pretty often; but we want really to know what is the official information on this question. Is this gentleman going to take his legitimate position in the machinery of the Government of the country, or is he going still to persist in interfering with our affairs when his interference is not required? I put a plain question to the Honourable Member for Commerce and I shall expect a plain answer.

Sir, these are some of the few matters which have rather made me feel some anxiety about the future fate of the policy we are adopting by the Resolution which is before the House. It may be that I do not understand economics in the way in which my Honourable friend to my right (Mr. S. C. Shahani) claims to do, but I think I am entitled as much as anyone else to know from the commonsense point of view what our position is going to be hereafter; whether if free trade is dead protection has come to stay?

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, we have now before the House my own Resolution and as against that the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes. We have heard speeches from many Honourable Members, some supporting the Resolution, others supporting the amendment, and others criticising both; and I am called upon now to exercise my right of replying to the debate that has followed my moving this Resolution. I shall try and take my Honourable friends one by one. I shall deal with Government last. I shall first take my Honourable friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, one of my esteemed colleagues on the Fiscal Commission. I must at once say that with the exception of one point that it seemed to me he made, my Honourable friend, in spite of differences of opinion—and I still maintain that they are small differences—has treated me more or less fairly; but I must insist on telling him something about one point that it seemed to me he made, and that was to the effect that considerations of racial hatred had shown themselves in the conclusions at which we arrived. Now I at once deny the charge. I deny it

Sir Campbell Rhodes: On a point of explanation, Sir, may I assure the Honourable Member that those were not my remarks? I referred to evidence given before us, but to any action in the Commission itself.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I am glad, Sir, that my Honourable friend has explained his position. But even on behalf of the witnesses themselves I am not prepared to admit the fact that they were moved by racial considerations in dealing with this question on which the voice of India had spoken long, long before this House ever ventured to take the matter into consideration. It is a question that has been discussed on its own merits by every one who has discussed it, and I refuse to believe that any one of all the witnesses that came to give evidence before the Commission introduced the element of race in putting forward his views before the Commission. Then my Honourable friend made another point and said that I maintained the position that when India became self-contained famines would disappear. I was surprised to hear that from my Honourable friend. I never for a moment maintained that. In a limited sense, so far as the necessities of life are concerned, I do believe that India can reach a position of being self-contained, and it will reach that stage if proper encouragement is given to industrial development in this country. So far as famines are concerned, I maintain that if pressure on land is diminished by a portion of the people who now belong to the agricultural class diverting their energies to industrial labour, then it is likely that the resisting power of the people will increase and they will be able to bear famines more than they have hitherto done. With regard to the other points referred to by my Honourable friend, I have nothing to say. He has presented his own point of view, but fundamentally I find that there is an agreement between us so far as the general conclusion with regard to protection is concerned. Now, I must come to my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi. Believe me, Sir, I never expected that my friend, Mr. Joshi, who is supposed here to represent the interests of labour of the poorer classes of the community, not by election but by nomination of the Government, would ever put forward views that would be most detrimental to the interests of the poor classes. I was wondering what it was that had influenced Mr. Joshi's views so as to enable him to present a case, pretending of course that it was a case for the poorer classes, but which was most detrimental to the interests of the poorer classes. I was wondering what it was that had influenced him. (Mr. N. M. Joshi: "Have you found out?") And it then dawned on me that perhaps his going to Washington and Geneva nominated as he was by the Government of India to represent the cause of labour had perhaps removed him to a large extent from touch with the poorer population here and had brought him in the midst of the surroundings of those pleasant labour gentlemen of other foreign countries whose views on the question as to whether India should have a policy of protection or free trade would not be acceptable to any portion, to any class of people belonging to this country. We know that the people who would most resent the adoption of a policy of protection would be perhaps the class which seems to have influenced my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi's views. I want to assure Mr. Joshi this, that if I had not known him I would have for a moment thought that he was here representing the views either of Lancashire labour or of Lancashire merchants and that he was not in any way advocating the cause of our country. (A Voice: "No, no.") I am entitled to my view. I find fault with his judgment, not with his motives; but believe me, Sir, that it has really pained me to feel that Mr. Joshi's prejudice against capitalists goes so far as to make him use this momentous occasion for emptying himself of the hatred that, it seems to me, he has generated in his breast against these "wretched classes". I hope Mr. Joshi will realise that the country is much greater than any of the classes that constitute this country. I hope Mr. Joshi will take a leaf from the book of his own late leader Mr. Gokhale, and make up his mind to study the speeches and writings of that great respected leader and try to give something of his views both to the people and to the Government which of course will be to the advantage of this country.

Then, Sir, I come to my Honourable friends from the Punjab. Both my friends from the Punjab, Messrs. Townsend and Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh seem to imagine that an adoption of the policy of protection will hurt the interests of the agriculturists. Now I do not want to go into the details of their arguments, but it seemed to me when my Honourable friend, Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh was arguing, that he was arguing against himself. He maintained that if industries were set up in this country and if a demand for raw materials increased in this country, then the agricultural interests would suffer. I could understand my Honourable friend bringing that argument forward if the Fiscal Commission had recommended that an embargo should be placed on export or even that an export duty should be resorted to, but the Fiscal Commission, as I pointed out in my opening remarks, has deliberately excluded export duties from their recommendations. Now what will be the result of the establishment of industries here? The demand for raw materials would increase in this country. Not only that, but a competition would be set up for securing those raw materials between this country and the foreign countries. I ask my Honourable friend whether the agriculturists are going to gain or lose by the existence of that competition? When the demand is greater and the supply remains the same, do the prices go up or do they go down? Will it stimulate the agriculturists to pay greater attention to their crops and increase their production or will it dishearten them and compel them to give up growing their crops? I personally believe that the policy of protection, if adopted will not compel the agriculturists to suffer in any way, but it will bring greater prosperity to them. But apart from that, even to-day we realise that the pressure on land is so great and so many more men than necessary are engaged in agriculture that there is an insistent demand to provide for them in their spare moments facilities for resorting to cottage industries like handloom, and so on. If we draw a certain number of people, a very small fraction of the population for industrial labour, even then, I submit, there will be a large number of people left who will be required to pay attention to the carrying on of cottage industries in the villages.

Then lastly, I come to my Honourable friend, Mr. Shahani. Mr. Shahani, I think, has attempted to give views which he thinks are beneficial to the interests of this country. He referred to the question of the constitution of a Tariff Board and said that the constitution of a Tariff Board, as suggested by my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, would not be desirable and is opposed to the recommendation made by the Minority Report. I admit that that is so, but I will, when dealing with the speeches of my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes and my Honourable friend, Sir Basil Blackett, deal with this aspect of the question of the constitution of a Tariff Board. Let me now come to the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes. I agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, that the Government have shown a great deal of wisdom in approaching this question in the spirit in which they have done. I agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. Ginwala, that in addition to the remarks made in his personal capacity by the Honourable the Finance Member, a more definite statement ought to have been made by the Government to the effect that hereafter the Secretary of State will never interfere in the fiscal policy of the country when the Government of India and the Indian Legislature are in agreement. I hope my Honourable friend will take the opportunity of making that statement before this debate is closed to-day. Then, I said that my Honourable friend had approached the subject in a good spirit. I maintain that, because I believe, and I think Honourable Members will do well to keep this in mind, that the present transitional constitution of the Government of India provides that in all matters in which there is an agreement between the Government of India and the Indian Legislature, in those matters alone, so far as the fiscal policy is concerned, the Secretary of State will not interfere. An obstructive attitude on the part of my Honourable friend, the Commerce Member would have perhaps made it difficult for us to get the policy of protection in some form or another adopted in this House. He has made our course easier, and I have reason to believe that the Government have been able to do so, perhaps because the present Secretary of State has respected the convention established by the late Secretary of State and not interfered with the decision of the Government of India. Now, I wish my Honourable friend on behalf of

[Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas.]

Government had gone far enough as suggested by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. I believe, for instance, he should not have shirked to introduce a more definite language in his Resolution boldly proclaiming the adoption of a policy of protection for this country. I know that he has done so in spirit. I know that in his Resolution,—whoever reads it—he cannot conceal that,—he accepts the policy of protection as recommended by the Fiscal Commission. I know also that in the speech that he has made he has given expression fully to the view that Government to all intents and purposes have accepted the policy of protection. But I wish that nothing should have persuaded him to keep back that boldness which ought to be the characteristic of every Resolution, either when it is framed by Government or by any Member of this House. However, as I look more to the substance than to the shadow, I have no hesitation, as a practical man, in accepting the wording as suggested by him, especially because he has accepted certain changes which were suggested to him. Now, coming to clause (b), I labour under the same difficulty under which my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, laboured. His amendment is lost and I have no right to refer to it. But I want to make it clear that by accepting the clause—"the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duty for a large part of its revenue," we should not be taken to mean that we have for all time to come blessed the present method of taxation which is resorted to by Government. With that reservation, I have no hesitation in accepting that clause. With regard to the third clause, the omission of the words "subject to" alters the character of that clause and I feel that the Tariff Board will be called upon only to pay due regard to those conditions and it will not be insisted that they should rigidly apply those conditions for all time and in all cases. If this is the meaning, I have no hesitation in accepting that. And now, lastly, I come to the question of the constitution of the Board. I must explain the reasons which led the minority to make the recommendation which we made. We again were faced with the difficulty of making some arrangement for the transitional period. Until we reached self-Government, so long as we have an Executive which is not responsible to the people, it is very difficult for us to accept a Board which is nominated by a Government not responsible to the Legislature. We were faced with that difficulty. We know that there is no constitutional precedent for such a Board being elected by Members of Parliament or the Members of a popular House. But no other country is faced with the difficulty of going through a transitional period, as we are faced. We have here an irresponsible Executive controlled, as it were, obnoxiously very often, by the Secretary of State and we have an elected majority in the House. How are we going to compel the hands of Government to make an appointment which is acceptable to us? Well, it is that which led us to make a recommendation that the Board should be elected. However, I think we should not insist on that being carried out, especially after the remarks that have been made by my Honourable friend, Sir Basil Blackett. For I am free to admit that, in cases where that gentleman from Whitehall, of whom my Honourable friend, Mr. Ginwala, has so eloquently spoken, in cases where he has not continuously interfered with Honourable Members of the Government, may have behaved much better with us. And, as I believe in the dictum that "trust begets trust," I feel that we shall be acting wisely in showing our trust and confidence in the Members of the Government and hope that they will use this trust well and see to it that the appointment that they make on this Tariff Board would be such as would be acceptable to the Members of this House. And in doing so, I beg of them not to allow "foreign" influence to bear upon them. (An Honourable Member: "Outside influence.") By "foreign" I mean the influence of the gentleman from Whitehall who does not know much about India and who continuously thrusts his finger in everything that is being done by the Government of India. We had a very sad experience in the appointment of the Royal Commission. I wish I were free to admit, like my Honourable friend, Sir Basil Blackett, that Government has always been responsive, if not responsible, to the wishes of the Legislature. Our experience in the case of the Royal Commission has been too recent and too sad 5 P.M. to cheer us up with that kind of statement. But we hope, at any rate, so far as fiscal matters are concerned, we shall have no interference from that gentleman from Whitehall and that we shall be masters in our own house and that we shall be left to decide matters as we like ourselves. But I may also warn the Government that, if they do not use the trust well in this matter, they will find it difficult to deal with this House in other matters, because they have got to deal with this House on every question and, once it is shown that the trust is misplaced, which I hope it will never be, then this House knows how to deal with the Government in questions that will come up to us for discussion in future. So, to all intents and purposes, I am prepared to accept the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes.

And, last but not the least, I want to touch one of the arguments that has been advanced.

Mr. President: I cannot let the Honourable Member advance a new proposition.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: This is not a new proposition. I will bring my remarks to a close, Sir. Mr. Ginwala complained that, while we were busy burying free trade, he did not know whether the new House would not bury protection. I do not think that the new House will do that. I do not think that any new House is going to bury protection for a long time to come. But, if it does so, none of us is bureaucratic enough to question the power of the Legislature in this country to bury any policy that this House is launching upon.

Sir, before I sit down, I want again to express my gratitude to the Government that, although not quite fully, at least in spirit they have largely met in this instance the desire of the Legislature. I feel as if I could say to my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, that the long-lost brother has after all come back to the fold, that the policy which India has insisted on for a long number of years in the interests of this country, to which Government at the dictation of Whitehall turned a deaf ear, is accepted by Government, and I agree with Mr. Innes that it is an epoch-making proposition and that we are starting a new era in this country. I repeat that it seems to me that, if this Resolution is accepted, it will be a red letter day in the history of this country and I may take, if I may be permitted to do so, legitimate pride in the fact that I had the honour to initiate this discussion.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I think that Mr. Jamnadas has exhausted my time as well as his own and therefore I will not detain the House for more than a moment. Mr. Ginwala appeared before the House in his usual impersonation of a doubting Thomas. He wanted to know what is the good of our passing a Resolution of this kind? He pointed but that that policy, even though we approved it to-day, might be upset by the Assembly of this time next year. Well, Sir, I can give him one answer to his question. The use of passing this Resolution which I have put to the House is this, that it pins down at any rate the Government of India to that policy. Mr. Ginwala also stated that he was a democrat. I must confess that, when I heard his views about the Tariff Board I felt very much inclined to doubt that statement. He apparently contemplates a Tariff Board with Statutory powers over and above the Indian Legislature, a Tariff Board which is empowered to fix rates, a Tariff Board which is beyond criticism by this Assembly. Well, Sir, that may be a very efficient Board but it is not democracy, nor, Sir, is it the sort of Board that I should agree to appoint. One more point and I have done with the Honourable Member from Burma. He challenged me to say what action His Majesty's Secretary of State for India would take in regard to my Resolution, if it is passed by the House to-day. Sir, the only answer that I can give to that question is this, to refer the Honourable Member from Burma and other Members of this House to paragraph 33 of the Joint Select Committee's Report, and to the Despatch of the 30th June 1921, in which Mr. Montagu, on behalf of His Majesty's Government at Home, accepted the principle recommended by the Joint Committee. Sir, Mr. Jamnadas's speech ended in a note of harmony. Mr. Jamnadas ended up his speech by saying that he was prepared to accept my amendment. I hope, Sir, that the whole House will adopt the same attitude in regard to this amendment. Only time can show, Sir, whether we are wise or not in the decision we are taking to-day, but I have one thing to say. We have adopted this policy and, as far as the Government of India are concerned, we are determined to carry it out in earnest.

Mr. President: The original question was that:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that a policy of protection be adopted as the one best suited to the interests of India, its application being regulated from time to time by such discrimination as may be considered necessary by the Government of India with the consent and approval of the Indian Legislature."

Since which an amendment has been moved to substitute the following after the words "Governor General in Council":

"(a) that he accepts in principle the proposition that the fiscal policy of the Government of India may legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India;

(b) that in the application of the above principle of protection regard must be had to the financial needs of the country and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue;

(c) that the principle should be applied with discrimination, with due regard to the well-being of the community and to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission;

(d) that in order that effect may be given to these recommendations, a Tariff Board should be constituted for a period not exceeding one year in the first instance, that such Tariff Board should be purely an investigating and advisory body and should consist of not more than three members, one of whom should be a Government official, but with power, subject to the approval of the Government of India, to co-opt other members for particular inquiries."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

ADOPTION OF A POLICY OF PROTECTION.

Mr. President: The question is that the Resolution, as amended, be adopted.

Sir Montagu Webb: May I, at this stage, make a slight verbal amplification, namely, the addition of the word "Indian" before the words "Fiscal Commission?" The Report of the Fiscal Commission, I have been told, is going to mark an epoch in the great Free Trade controversy, and I should like the name of India to be associated with it.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I have no objection, Sir.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That before the words 'Fiscal Commission' in sub-section (c), the word 'Indian' be inserted."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that the Resolution, as amended, be adopted.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Saturday, the 17th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

The Assembly met at the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

STATEMENT OF "NEW INDIA" ON RESOLUTION RELATING TO INDIAN AUTONOMY.

358. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: (1) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the following paragraph headed "Which is true" in New India of the 29th January?

"Sir Malcolm Hailey told the Legislative Assembly that no despatch was sent by the Government of India to the Secretary of State along with the Resolution of the Assembly demanding the curtailment of the ten-year limit. But the Bengalee's Special Correspondent at Delhi is responsible for the statement that the wishes of the Government of India, and particularly of Lord Reading, have been overridden by Lord Peel not only in connection with the appointment of the Services Commission, but also in the matter of the proposed revision of the Reforms Act. The Bengalee understands that the Viceroy submitted "a reasoned despatch" to the Secretary of State "urging a further extension of the Reforms," and our contemporary is disposed to accept this statement as likely to be accurate. If it is a fact that Lord Reading's Government was in favour of an extension of the Reforms Act, it would only place the Government right with the people of India, and we are entitled to know who is our enemy and whom we have to attack. The people of India would like to know whether the statement of the Bengalee correspondent is accurate."

(2) Is the statement made by the Special Correspondent of the Bengalee true? If not, will the Government of India be pleased to state the true facts?

Mr. H. Tonkinson: The statement of the special correspondent of the Bengalee is not correct. The Resolution was sent to the Secretary of State with a forwarding letter only.

INCHOAPE COMMITTEE.

359. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will Government be pleased to state the probable date of the termination of the work of the Inchoape Committee?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I understand that the Committee hope to finish their inquiry by the end of this month.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Is it a fact that a part of the Report has been accepted by Government?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Yes, Sir.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: When is it going to be published?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: About the time of the Budget it is hoped to publish it.

WITNESSES EXAMINED BY INCHCAPE COMMITTEE.

360. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the names of witnesses examined by the Inchcape Committee?

(b) Was there any non-official among the witnesses?

(c) Will Government publish the evidence given by these witnesses?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I am informed that no record has been kept of the witnesses. In some cases when the reports given by departments to the Committee required to be supplemented, the Heads of departments were informally examined.

The answer to the second and third parts of the question is in the negative. No complete record has been kept of the informal discussions above mentioned.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Is it a fact that it was first given out that the Committee would not examine any witnesses, but would receive only written statements of those who desire to give evidence?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that question; I do not know.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Were the witnesses who were examined named by the Government of India specifically or was the matter referred to the Local Governments to send in witnesses to be examined by this Committee?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I do not think the Local Governments had anything to do with the question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: The Honourable Member did not understand the first part of my question, Sir. Did the Government of India name those persons who were examined, and if so what was the principle that was adopted in selecting persons to be examined in camera?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative, and the second part, therefore, does not arise.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Then, how did these people come here and how were they examined? Did any unknown person whisper in the ears of those persons who were examined as witnesses to come and give evidence here?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Honourable Member has asked so many questions that I do not know which one to answer. But the Inchcape Committee examined such witnesses as it desired to examine.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Who decided the point? Was it the Committee which selected the witnesses or was it the Government? If it was done by the Committee, under what principle, and if it was done by the Government, how did Government select the persons?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Inchcape Committee, on the principle of examining those people who they thought would be useful, examined those people.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Do I understand that Government was not a party and that the Chairman and the Members of the Committee selected the persons?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Government gave the Committee free scope to make such inquiries as the Committee thought desirable.

Mr. K. Ahmed: That is not the answer. The Government should have given the names.

STAFF OF INCHCAPE COMMITTEE.

361. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) How many Secretaries, and Assistant Secretaries have the Inchcape Committee got?

(b) Is there any Indian in any responsible position in connection with the Inchcape Committee, excepting as Members thereof?

(c) What are the positions of Messrs. Mant and Brayne respectively in connection with the Inchcape Committee, and what are their respective salaries?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) There is one Secretary (Mr. Howard) and an attached officer (Mr. Milne).

(b) No Indian officer has been formally attached to the Committee, but amongst other Indian officers who have been connected with the investigations I may specially mention Mr. Mitra, Financial Adviser, Military Finance, who has been closely associated with the Committee in their enquiry into military expenditure.

(c) Mr. Mant was Secretary to Government in the Retrenchment Office during the preliminary enquiry and since the Committee has been sitting, he has discharged the duties of liaison officer between the Departments of Government and the Committee. His pay is Rs. 4,000 a month, as Secretary to Government. Mr. Brayne is an officer of the Finance Department deputed to afford the Committee such assistance as they may require. His pay is that of his regular appointment as Deputy Secretary, i.e., Rs. 2,350 a month.

CALCUTTA PORT TRUST.

362. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Have Government received any proposal from the Government of Bengal for the amendment of the constitution of the Calcutta Port Trust, specially with a view to increase Indian representation thereon?

(b) If so, are Government in a position to make any statement indicating the views of Government in this matter?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Yes.

(b) No. The legislation necessary to give effect to any changes in the constitution of the Calcutta Port Trust is a matter for the Government of Bengal.

MOTOR HAULAGE AND ALLOWANCE IN DELHI.

363. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Is it a fact that Members living in Lystoeffe House are allowed motor haulage and motor allowances of Rs. 75 per mensem? Is it a fact that Members living in Delhi city are allowed no conveyance allowance of any kind? On what ground is the discrimination justified? Who made the rule, and when was it made?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Members living in Metcalfe House are entitled to draw motor haulage but not the conveyance allowance of Rs. 75 per mensem. If the Honourable Member will refer to Legislative Department Circular No. LXV, dated the 18th May, 1921, he will notice that the conveyance allowance of Rs. 75 per mensem is admissible to those who live at Raisina. It is a fact that Members living in Delhi City are not entitled to conveyance allowance. As Members living in Metcalfe House are not entitled to conveyance allowance there is no discrimination.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is there any allowance given for haulage, Sir, to people living in Delhi but neither at Raisina nor at Metcalfe House?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I must ask for notice of that question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: If that is so, is there any sense, Sir, in not paying conveyance allowance to people living anywhere in the town?

Mr. President: That is a matter for argument.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I should like to know, Sir, the reason why people living in Metcalfe House should be given motor haulage, if it is not a conveyance allowance. I should also like to know from Government whether they remember that during the last Budget discussion, the Honourable the Law Member at that time promised to inquire into the question as to why a Delhi Member should not get conveyance allowance.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The Honourable Member's question seems to mix up two separate things. Motor haulage is given to a Member to enable the Member to bring his motor to Delhi. The conveyance allowance is given to a Member to enable him to run his motor about Delhi. With regard to the Delhi Member, I have not got the papers, and I should like to have notice of that question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it the principle followed here that Members coming here and living in Metcalfe House will get motor haulage and not the people living in the town?

Mr. S. O. Shahan: Will a Member coming from the mofussil to Delhi and residing in the city of Delhi be entitled to motor haulage?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Certainly.

CANCELLATION OF MANGALORE MAIL.

364. Mr. K. Muppil Nayar: 1. Is the Government aware that by cancelling the Mangalore Mail, the South Indian Railway has done a great disservice to the travelling public of the West Coast of India.

2. In view of the great trouble and worry to and consequent dissatisfaction of the public, do the Government propose to advise the restoration of the Mangalore Mail as soon as possible?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: 1 and 2. The attention of Government has been drawn to a letter in a newspaper indicating that the changes in the time table have not met with public approval but beyond this they have no information. The matter is one which is within the competence of the South Indian Railway Administration, but has been taken up with the Agent.

Mr. K. Muppil Nayar: Do I understand, Sir, that we have no control in the matter? Has the Assembly no jurisdiction in the matter?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I have already stated that this is a matter which is within the competence of the South Indian Railway Administration.

SIND MOHAMMADAN CONSTITUENCY FOR COUNCIL OF STATE.

365. Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Will the Government be pleased to state the following:

- (a) The date on which the nomination papers for the Sind Mohammadan Constituency for the Council of State were put in during the last bye-election;
- (b) The date of scrutiny and polling;
- (c) The date on which the result was announced;
- (d) The date on which Mr. Ali Buksh Mohammed Husain, M.L.A., put in his resignation and also the date on which it was accepted;
- (e) Is it fact that under the Council of State Electoral Rule 5 (c) a person is not eligible for election if he is a Member of any legislative body; if the answer is in the affirmative will the Government be pleased to state how Mr. Ali Buksh Mohammed Husain was elected to the Council of State?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) 21st November, 1922.

(b) 23rd November, 1922, and 20th December, 1922.

(c) 21st December, 1922.

(d) 25th December, 1922, and 10th January, 1923.

(e) Yes. The Bombay Electoral Regulations do not allow the returning officer to reject a nomination on the ground that the candidate is barred under rule 5 (1) of the Electoral Rules.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is not that, Sir, a violation of the rule under which, if a candidate stands for election, his seat should be left vacant?

Mr. President: If the Honourable Member expects an answer, he must make his question intelligible.

Mr. K. Ahmed: A violation of the rules under which a candidate is to be returned to this Assembly; that is that, unless he vacates his seat in the Legislative Assembly, he cannot be a candidate for the Council of State.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: What is not a violation of what rule?

Mr. K. Ahmed: A violation of the electoral rules of the Council of State.

Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Does this rule apply only to Bombay or to other Provinces as well?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I believe the position is the same under all the electoral regulations. I may as well admit that this recent case has revealed a defect in the rules, and the matter is receiving attention.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact that the Commissioner of Sind referred this matter by a telegraphic message to the Government of India asking whether nominations cannot stand according to the rules of the election of the Council of State.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: So far as I am aware, Sir, that is not a fact.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: What will be the position of the present Member who has been elected to the Council of State? Will it be considered to be a valid election or not?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: If no election petition has been presented against his return within the period allowed his election is presumably valid.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: What will the Government consider it without an election petition? Will the Government consider it to be valid or not?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The Government is not concerned in the matter; it is the electors of the constituency who are concerned.

Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Under the electoral rules a person who is already a member of another body cannot stand for election, also a female cannot. Supposing a female has been elected, if there is no election petition what would be the situation then?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: As regards the female it would be a matter of opinion. As regards the case of a Member who is already a member of a Legislative body, I have already said there is a defect. In fact the electoral rule which says that a Member who is already a Member of a Legislative body shall not be eligible for election to another Legislative body is possibly inconsistent with a section of the Government of India Act which distinctly contemplates that a sitting Member of one House of the Indian Legislature may stand for election for the other House. That is section 69E (2).

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

ARMY MARRIAGE ALLOWANCES.

184. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: (a) In the Army Budget what are marriage allowances to families in England, of British personnel serving in India? Since when have these allowances been granted, and why?

(b) Will Government kindly furnish a statement showing the marriage allowances paid to families of British personnel during the past 10 years?

(c) Are any such allowances paid to Indians? If not, why not?

(d) Are amounts paid as marriage allowances recoverable?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) and (b). Marriage allowance forms part of the remuneration of the married British soldier, wherever serving. The allowance was introduced from the 4th October, 1920, and has its origin in certain allowances which had to be paid to the British soldier during the Great War in order to secure the personnel required. The conditions on which marriage allowance is granted are stated in an Army Order a copy of which I will give to the Honourable Member separately.

A statement showing the rates of marriage allowance paid to the families of British troops serving in India when the families are respectively (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in India, is laid on the table.

(c) No. Marriage allowance is merely a part of remuneration and the terms of service at present in force for the Indian soldier are sufficient to secure efficient recruits in adequate numbers.

(d) No. It is only the family allotments which are recoverable, i.e., the amount which the soldier himself is required to contribute in order to qualify for marriage allowance.

Statement showing the rates of marriage allowance paid to the families of British troops serving in India when the families are respectively (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in India.

RAISINA HOSTELS.

185. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Is it true that both Eastern and Western Hostels are proposed to be given over to the Postal and Telegraph Departments? If the answer is in the affirmative, will Government kindly state the reasons for the decision?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: The Honourable Member is referred to paragraph 22 of the Report of the New Capital Enquiry Committee, 1922, copies of which have been placed in the library for the information of Members. The recommendations of the Committee are under consideration.

LONGWOOD HOTEL, SIMLA.

186. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Is it a fact that the Longwood Hotel at Simla was originally purchased for accommodation of the Members? If the answer is in the affirmative, will Government kindly state how many rooms there are in the Hotel, and how many of them were given to the Members and how many to outsiders during the past two Simla Sessions?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: "Longwood" was originally purchased for the accommodation of Members of the Indian Legislature. There are 54 quarters in all, 3 of which are reserved for management and superintendence. Of the remaining quarters in 1921 the whole were placed at the disposal of the Members, but only 31 were occupied. In order to reduce the annual loss to Government on these quarters, 15 have been made available for occupation by Government officials throughout the year and certain other quarters during non-session periods. Of the 36 quarters available for Members of the Legislature, 31 quarters were in occupation during the autumn of 1922.

LOSSES ON ASSAM-BENGAL RAILWAY.

187. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: (a) Is it a fact that the Assam-Bengal Railway has been working at a loss since it was opened in 1895 to date, and under terms of contract with the Company, the Government have been bearing the losses which amounted to Rs. 30 to 40 lakhs annually in addition to paying interest in sterling at 3 to 3½ per cent. on the Company's share-capital of £1,500,000? If the figures are incorrect, will Government kindly state what the correct figures are?

(b) Will Government kindly state what was the amount paid in interests and losses separately to this Company during the past 5 years, and under what head of budget the payment appears?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The Assam-Bengal Railway has been working at a loss since it was opened in 1895, the annual losses being in respect of interest charges; except that in 1895 there was a small loss in working. Attention is invited to the figures given in the History of Indian Railways, copies of which are available in the Library of the Legislature.

(b) The amount paid to the Company annually for interest is £45,000 being the guaranteed interest at 3 per cent. on the Company's share capital of £1,500,000. There have been no losses payable to the Company during the last five years. The payment of guaranteed interest appears under the head "Interest on Capital contributed by Companies" and is included in the figure for interest charges shown in the Demand Statement presented to the Assembly.

IMPORT OF MOTOR CARS, BICYCLES AND TRICYCLES.

188. Mr. Darcy Lindsay: 1. Will Government state if it is a fact that during the first 9 months of the present fiscal year whilst the number has increased the value of imports of motor cars has considerably decreased in comparison with the same period of 1921-22 and is nearly four crores less than in 1920-21 and that the import of the British car has become reduced to only 10 per cent. of the total.

2. Is it a fact that during the same period the value of imports of bicycles and tricycles is in round figures 12,57,000 as against 3,89,000 in 1921-22 and 25 per cent. of the 1920-21 imports.

3. Do Government propose to re-examine the position with a view to re-adjusting the import duty on motor cars on a more equitable basis.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: 1 and 2. The figures given by the Honourable Member are substantially correct.

3. The effect of the present rates of customs duties has been fully considered by the Government of India in connection with the forthcoming budget, but the Honourable Member will not, I am sure, expect me to anticipate my Honourable colleague, the Finance Member's budget speech.

RESOLUTION RE KING'S COMMISSIONS FOR INDIANS AND INDIANISATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now resume the discussion of the Resolution moved by Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan, which is as follows:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commissions for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such number that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

To which an amendment has been moved:

"That for the word 'and' the word 'or' be substituted, and that the word 'all' before 'vacancies' be omitted, the word 'only' after the words 'Indian Officers' be omitted, and the word 'wholly' before the word 'Indianised' be omitted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief: Sir, with your permission I desire to make a statement to the House. Speaking in this Assembly on the 24th of January last, I expressed the hope that it would be possible to announce at no very distant date what measures are to be adopted in regard to the Indianisation of the Indian Army. In the short interval that has elapsed the correspondence which I then said was proceeding has been concluded, and I am able to announce to the House the following decision. The Government consider that a start should be made at once so as to give Indians a fair opportunity of proving that units officered by Indians will be efficient in every way. Accordingly it has been decided that eight units of cavalry or infantry be selected to be officered by Indians. This scheme will be put into force immediately. The eight units to be wholly Indianised will be mainly infantry units, but there will be a proportion of cavalry. They will be chosen judiciously so as to include as many representative types as possible of Indian battalions and cavalry regiments of the Indian Army. Indian Officers holding commissions in the Indian Army will be gradually transferred to Indianising units so as to fill up the appointments for which they are qualified by their rank and by their length of service, and the process of Indianising these units will then continue uninterruptedly as the officers gain seniority and fitness in other respects, which will qualify them for the senior posts. I have given the House these few details because I think they will be of interest as revealing some of the practical aspects of the change. There is one other point, however, which it is necessary for me to explain. It is that, simultaneously with the Indianisation of these selected eight units, Indians who qualify for the King's Commission will continue as at present to be posted to the other units of the Indian Army. The number of Indian cadets now sent to Sandhurst each year, if all pass out successfully, is more than sufficient to replace the normal wastage in the eight units alone. I draw attention to this matter as it is of significance which the House I am sure will not fail to appreciate. Once more, before sitting down, I wish to express my gratification that this great step forward has been made. I hope that the people of India will appreciate the importance of this step and will realise also that it now rests with them to justify the decision of the Government. I hope that no effort will be spared to make the measure which has been approved a solid and a conspicuous success. The responsibility which lies before these young men who will officer the Indianised regiments, is no light one. They will have in their hands not only the lives of their men, but also the task of maintaining untarnished the high and ancient traditions of the regiments to which they are appointed. I can assure them that in the new and in the wider career which will now lie open to them, they will have the active and the generous support of the Government of India and of their British comrades in the Army. Their success or their failure will mean much to India. The initiation of this scheme constitutes an entirely new departure which, though limited in its scope, is one which may have far-reaching results. I trust that the Members of this Legislature and that the people of India as a whole will support the Indian officers of these Indianised regiments with living and with practical encouragement, for by this means only can Indianisation hope to deserve and to command success.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (Meerut Division: Muhammadan Rural): May I ask His Excellency one question? How many units are there out of which these eight units are to be Indianised?

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief: I thought I made it clear that there would be eight units.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: I wish to know how many units there are in the Indian Army out of which these eight units are to be Indianised?

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief: The total number of units in the Indian Army are 120 infantry and pioneers and 21 cavalry.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, the information which His Excellency has given this morning and the speech which he delivered on the last occasion render it absolutely necessary that I should press the amendment of which I have given notice. Sir, His Excellency has just now told us that the correspondence between the Government of India and the Secretary of State on this subject has been concluded; and, therefore, there ought to be no difficulty in placing that correspondence on the table of this House. Sir, more than a year ago I asked a question in this Assembly of the Government as to whether they would be prepared to publish the correspondence relating to this subject.

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member moving his amendment?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Yes.

Mr. President: I think I must dispose of Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary's amendments before we come to that. I understood he was rising to meet the new situation which has been created by the statement of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

The question is that for the word "and" in the second line of the Resolution the word "or" be substituted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the word "all" before the word "vacancies" be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the word "only" after the words "Indian Officers" be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the word "wholly" before the word "Indianised" be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

(Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar rose to continue his speech.)

Mr. S. C. Shahani (Sind Jagirdars and Zamindars: Landholders): Sir, I have been authorised by Munshi Iswar Saran . . .

Mr. President: Order, order. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I will resume my remarks. Sir, as I said, the information given this morning renders it necessary that this House should have before it all the correspondence that passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State. His Excellency has told us that out of 141 units in the Indian Army the Government of India have selected 8 units for being officered by Indians. That gives a proportion of 1 to 17. Sir, it is not doles of this kind that this House and the country would value. What we want to know is what is Government's definite programme which they and the Secretary of State have agreed upon, and whether that programme should not be laid on the table of this House for our criticisms and our suggestions. Unless they give us the details of the scheme sent by them to the Home Government, and, unless they tell us what their considered opinions were, and how far they have been either accepted or rejected by, what Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas would have called "the gentleman at Whitehall," until we know something of the nature of the correspondence that was carried on between the two departments of the same Government, we will not be in a position to give our adhesion to the scheme that may be outlined. Sir, this is a matter of great constitutional importance. I take it, Sir, that this Legislature, the Government of India and the Secretary of State are the three component parts of a united administration. If that is so, I do not see what necessity there is for one branch of the administration being kept in ignorance of what is going on between the other two branches of the administration. The Government will recognise in what a false position they are placing this Assembly by not placing before it all that passes between themselves and the Secretary of State. We have often been told by those who are not friends of the Government, by others who consider that we are not being treated properly, that we are not really representing the people and that the Government has no confidence in us. That accusation receives strength from the fact that the Government do not take us into their confidence. We have been asking times without number to be informed of what is passing between them and the Secretary of State. Every time they return the answer that it is in the correspondence stage and that they are not prepared to publish the correspondence. Why should not the correspondence which passes between the Secretary of State and the Government be laid on the table of the House, so that we may be in a position to know whether they represent the wishes of the people, whether they voice the considered opinion of the people; we want to be in a position to offer them such suggestions as may enable them to make further representations to the Secretary of State. If they do not do that, what is the position? We are considered as of no value by a certain section of our countrymen and the Government are regarded as irresponsible; it is believed that it is the Secretary of State who is ruling the whole country and that it is he and he alone can determine what our fate should be. Sir, the other day the Leader of the House made a statement which has enabled many a newspaper to have it as the headline of an article, namely, that this House is often not proceeding on facts but on suspicions. I wish, Sir, that the Leader of the House may soon be here and that his illness may soon be cured, because nobody feels his absence more than Members on this side of the House. Sir, who is responsible for the Assembly and the country basing their conclusions upon suspicions and not upon facts? Do the Government give us any facts? Do they ever place before us any data? Do they ever admit us into their confidence? Naturally, the result is that we are groping in the dark. We get some information from newspapers occasionally. The newspapers seem to have their confidence more than the Members of this House. We take our facts from these newspapers and we begin to spin out a theory which we believe is the one which has commended itself to Government. Under these circumstances, is it any use twitting us with proceeding upon suspicions and not upon facts, when we are not enabled to have the facts before us? I say this is a matter of grave constitutional importance and I ask Government how long are they going to keep the Assembly in ignorance, and how long are they going to keep everything that passes between them and the Secretary of State from us? If they continue in this mood, we shall regard it that they have no faith or trust in us; that feeling will be reciprocated; we cannot trust them if they do not trust us. Sir, that is the reason why I have added to the Resolution which was moved by my Honourable friend an amendment in these terms. There is, by the way, a printer's error in it. Instead of the word "substituted" the word should be "added."

That for the Resolution as it stands the following be added:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to lay on the table of the House the scheme, if any, for the Indianisation of the Indian Army and the correspondence, if any, that has passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India on the subject."

Sir, it is no news to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, nor is it news to the Government of India, that the whole of Asia is waking up. You will find in Japan, in China and everywhere there are National Armies officered by men belonging to the nation. It is only in India that we do not find the same thing; and unless Government enable us to officer our Army, unless they Indianise the Army itself, it will be impossible for us to be able to resist any invasion that may come to India from those quarters; and I think it is in the best interests of the Government that they should take the people of India into their confidence and enable us to assist them in giving our own views as to the best means of Indianising the Army. Until they do that, there will be no feeling of trust or confidence in them. Sir, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief on the last occasion said that he was exceedingly pleased with the conduct of the Indian Army, exceedingly pleased with their discipline; and he paid a glowing tribute to their general conduct. May I add to the testimony borne by His Excellency the testimony of one of his predecessors, Sir Charles Monro, in regard to the Indian soldier? There is no doubt there is good material in this country which can be developed and from which officers can be drawn who will be able to command the various units. This is what Sir Charles Monro stated in one of his despatches:

"The character of the terrain combined with arduous and trying climatic conditions alone presented difficulties before which the most hardened troops might well have desisted. The resistance of the enemy has been broken and the difficulties successfully overcome by a force composed almost entirely of Indian troops. No British troops, except for the Royal Air Force and a British Battery of Mountain Artillery was employed."

This fact has without doubt considerably raised the prestige of the Indian Army on the Frontier and increased the esprit de corps of the troops engaged. Sir, as I said, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has paid a similar tribute to the Indian Army.

Now if you find that the rank and file of the Army are so well equipped and so well able to withstand the enemy and in a position to render a good account of themselves, what is the difficulty in finding men from the ranks, what is the difficulty in promoting men from the ranks, to be officers in the Indian Army? His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief seems to think that it is almost impossible. We used to hear the saying in our schooldays that in France every soldier carries with him the possibility of becoming a Marshal, and if it was possible in France to get superior officers from the ranks, it should be equally possible in India to promote men of acknowledged ability from the ranks to be officers. I read sometime ago that in England there is a scheme for promoting from the ranks persons to the position of Captains and so on. If that is to be done in England, why should you not make the same attempt in India? The answer is "It is an uncertain factor and we do not know whether it will prove successful or not." My reply to that is this: If you do not try, if you never make the attempt, you will always be labouring under this difficulty. You must make an attempt, you must honestly endeavour to give Indians a chance of proving their mettle, a chance of showing that they can be not only good fighting men, but also good leaders of men. Government have not given them the least chance of doing that, hitherto, and that is the reason we do not find them holding important positions. I ask Government, Sir, to remove these suspicions from their mind and by their confidence in our soldiers, and by promoting them to responsible positions take the country with them. Sir, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief on the last occasion used this language, namely:

"Do not try to run before you have begun to walk."

Sir, I agree with that maxim; but I would say: "Please give us an opportunity of standing up." If you do not help us to stand up, how can we walk at all? Government do not give us any chance, any opportunity of showing that we can stand up and walk a foot or two. If they do not enable us to do that, there is no use in telling us that we are trying to run before we can walk. When you give us the chance, if you find us stumbling in walking, you can then say "Do not walk so fast." But when you do not enable us even to get up, then you have no right to say that we are trying to run before we can walk.

Sir, I will conclude as I began. There is no use in giving us a few dribblets as was promised this morning. What we want to know is, what is Government's considered scheme? What is it they are going to do with the Army, and in what period of time do they expect that the whole Army will be Indianised? What is the suggestion, the advice, given by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief? How has it been received by the whole Council of the Government of India, including the Indian Members who have been in the Executive Council? What has been the advice that they have given? Has that advice been accepted by the Secretary of State or has it been turned down? That is what we want to know. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief just now turned his pencil towards my friend the Honourable Mr. Sarma, and I think he might as well point to the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee. They are no doubt there in the Executive Council. But, Sir, you will find that when Indians are in such responsible positions, it is almost impossible to get the slightest information from them. I can get some information from you, from His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. I can occasionally go to the Honourable the Finance Member, and also to the Honourable the Commerce Member for some information. But if I go to Mr. Chatterjee or Mr. Sarma, all that they tell me is "Don't jeopardise the position of Government, don't embarrass the Government." Those are pet expressions of theirs. You cannot get any thing out of them. Under these circumstances, I say it is impossible to ask any of my countrymen in the Council of the Government of India to give us any information as to what has happened. They will not; and if the Government of India come to the conclusion that no correspondence is to be placed on the table, the whole country will be in the dark, and nothing about the steps which have been taken will ever come out from the Indian Members of the Council. I ask Government seriously and in all earnestness to place the whole correspondence on the table so that they may not allow us to remain in this unfortunate position of being told by our countrymen that we are not in the confidence of Government. Sir, it is necessary to enable us to win Dominion Self-Government in future that we should have all the information available to the Government and the Secretary of State. Sir, I move the amendment which is standing in my name.

Mr. President: Before I put the motion, I must draw the Honourable Member's attention to the fact that his motion is in the form of a Resolution which he himself sent in and which is, so to speak, meant to stand on its own feet. Now as an addition to the Honourable Member's Resolution it does not fit very well. I do not rule it out, but I think it will require some change to make it a reasonable amendment. I do not think the Honourable Member has quite taken into account the fact that it is not a good practice to use a substantive Resolution as an amendment to another Resolution.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I say, Sir, that the only word which it will be necessary to add is the word "further"?—That this Assembly further recommends, etc., etc.—If you would allow me to add that word there, it will make matters clear.

Mr. President: Even with the addition of that word, what the Honourable Member appears to contemplate is the laying on the table of the scheme and subsequent discussion of that scheme, whereas the Resolution asks, not for laying on the table or for discussion, but for instant action. If one is really an amendment of the other, I would assume that the word "substituted" was the correct word.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I explain, Sir, even before the original Resolution came up for discussion I informed the Secretary of the House that I did not want to substitute mine for the original Resolution, but that I wanted it to be an addendum to the original Resolution. I gave that information long ago; it was not yesterday or the day before yesterday; I did this about a fortnight ago. My object in putting this amendment forward is this: it is not only the Indianisation of the Army we want; we also want to know the exact programme, the scheme of Indianisation which the Government of India and the Secretary of State have resolved upon. It is for that purpose that I want that the correspondence should be placed on the table, so that we may be in a position to know not only how far Indianisation has proceeded, but also what were the concrete proposals made by the Government of India which were either accepted or rejected by the Secretary of State. That is why I wanted to have the correspondence laid on the table. Under these circumstances I think, Sir, that my Resolution may be regarded as an amendment in the sense that it is an addition to the existing Resolution. And it does not contravene the main Resolution; it only adds to the requisition contained in the original Resolution.

Mr. President: Then it is the Honourable Member's intention that the scheme should be laid on the table for discussion and that at the same time, the Governor General should be recommended to take instant action in the direction recommended in Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Yes, Sir. The language is perhaps not quite clear, but that is my idea.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That to the Resolution the following be added:

"This Assembly further recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to lay on the table of the House the scheme, if any, for the Indianisation of the Indian Army and the correspondence, if any, that has passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India on the subject."

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: May I ask, Sir, if the Honourable Member, who has moved the amendment in addition to my Resolution, is willing to number my Resolution as (a) and his amendment as (b)?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, expressed his regret at the absence of the Leader of the House to-day. I can assure him and this House that his regret is nothing as compared to mine. If Sir Malcolm Hailey were here, I should be sitting in my seat and watching Sir Malcolm Hailey intervening in this debate with that debonair unconcern which marks all his interventions. As for me, I feel just like a man who is about to stick his head into the proverbial hornet's nest. Fortunately, Sir, my amendment, though it may not be a very palatable one to this House, is not a very unpalatable one to me. I propose to confine myself entirely to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar asks that all the correspondence relating to this subject may be placed on the table of the House. He has complained that unless we do this, the constitution under which we are working is bound to breed only suspicion in the Members of the House. Sir, it is not my purpose to discuss that constitution. I see no useful purpose in discussing that constitution. Whatever the defects of that constitution may be, the constitution is there, and we have to work it and we have to make the best of it. There is only one answer to this amendment of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. Even if the Government of India wished and were prepared to meet Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and to lay this correspondence on the table, we could not do so. We cannot lay that correspondence on the table without the express and previous concurrence of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India. We have not got that concurrence and that is the only answer I can give to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. If the House passes this amendment, naturally it will be communicated to the Secretary of State, but I can give no indication of any sort or kind as to what the Secretary of State's answer may be. I am afraid, Sir, I can give no other answer to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I shall venture to offer a few remarks with reference to the action which Government have been good enough to announce that they are prepared to take, and I shall also venture to indicate the lines on which the aspirations of the people are at present running. In the first place it is my duty, I think, to thank His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief for the announcement he has made and for the small mercies which Government have decided to show to this country. I do not wish to go into general propositions, but shall go into a few details, chiefly with a view to elicit more information from His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. In order to do so I think I shall have to take stock of what this House decided two years ago, what Government did during the interval and whether what Government are prepared to do at the present moment meets with our satisfaction. This House two years ago in 1921 on a Resolution of Sir Sivaswamy Aiyer decided, and Government also accepted, that His Majesty's Government should admit Indians to all the different arms of His Majesty's forces. Now that means that Indians should be admitted to the Air Force and to the artillery among other branches. In the announcement which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has been pleased to make this morning, I find he has not told us whether, as a result of the correspondence which Government had with His Majesty's Government, they have come to any decision on those two points. If I understand Indianisation of the Army aright, Indians must be trained to defend the country in all its branches. They must be trained to use their intelligence in the Air Force and in the artillery and to command in these arms. I wish to know whether any decision has been arrived at on these two points. During the last two years I recognise that Government have done something; a Military college has been opened at Dehra Dun; a few military schools in connection with that college are contemplated and Government have also framed certain regulations for admission to the Dehra Dun college which is a preparatory and preliminary college for cadets being sent up to the Sandhurst College at Home. Now, when the Proposer of the Resolution and the Mover of the amendment opened up the principle that the vacancies in the Indian Army should be all filled up by Indian officers, I do not know whether they threw any light, or sufficient light, on what we wanted, or what they meant by Indianisation on the principle of filling up vacancies.

KING'S COMMISSIONS FOR INDIANS AND INDIANISATION OF THE ARMY.

As far as I can find out the figures, Sir, the present British officers in the Indian Army are as follows: In the cavalry they are 548, and in the infantry they are 2,688, making a total of something like 3,200 British officers in the Indian Army. So far as the artillery is concerned the whole of that arm of the forces is officered by British service men. It is not open to officers of the Indian Army, if I am correct. Taking therefore this figure 3,200 as the total of officers which eventually according to the goal we have in view we have to replace by Indians, I am not quite able to follow His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief when he announces that 8 units will be thrown open to Indians. I want to know in terms of so many officers what proportion it bears, not to the total number of units or regiments but to the total number of posts of British officers, because after all what we want to do is to replace eventually all these British officers in the Indian regiments by Indians; what we are more anxious to know, therefore, is how soon this total of 3,200 officers, or at what reasonable date this total number of 3,200 officers will be capable of being replaced by Indians according to the present process of intake at the Sandhurst College, or the intake and the flow at the Dehra Dun College. That is precisely the position. Now, in order to understand that and in order to find out whether our process of Indianisation by training at Sandhurst is adequate, whether the pace is rapid or slow, we must know how many cadets have been turned out, how many have passed out of the Sandhurst College during recent years. Now, I do not know whether it would be perfectly relevant to go into the figures before the year 1919. But I believe for the purpose of comparison it is germane and pertinent to know how many cadets are being turned out from the Sandhurst College and whether the flow is adequate enough to replace the 3,200 officers in a reasonably short period of time. Now, the number who passed out of the Sandhurst College in 1919 were 2 in the spring term and 4 in the autumn term, in all 6. Those who passed out in 1920 were only 2. Those who passed out in 1921 nil. And I believe in the spring of 1922, 2 people were under training there. So that at the present moment only 18, or to take the most up-to-date figures perhaps 23 people are under training in Sandhurst. Now, if my figures are correct, I should like to know whether you can replace 3,200 people, by the process of filling vacancies occurring amongst them; I doubt if this process will Indianise the Army at a reasonably early period. Now, I do not know what the percentage of vacancies per annum is to the total number of officers. I am not aware whether it is taken on the actuarial basis or on some other basis, but, even taking the ordinary actuarial basis of the percentage of vacancies to be say 8 or 4 per cent, the vacancies after all will be very few; I think it is no use attempting to Indianise the Army by filling in only the vacancies as and when they occur. In other words, the process of Indianisation by filling in vacancies is rather a very very slow process indeed. What, therefore, is necessary is to withdraw British officers from the Indian regiments and replace them, irrespective of vacancies, if you really want to Indianise the Army very quick. Now I am glad to hear this morning that a principle like this, namely, to replace, irrespective of vacancies occurring, some British officers by Indian officers, has been accepted and that 8 units will be replaced by this process of entirely withdrawing British officers and putting in Indians in their place. Sir, grateful as I am for these small mercies, even so I think that the process will be a very slow one indeed, taking into consideration the fact that you have to replace sooner or later no less than 3,200 officers. Now, having shown that the percentage of passes and people admitted into Sandhurst College is very small and therefore the intake would be very small, I would now like to deal with the second question, namely, whether the regulations which are framed by Government with reference to admission to the Dehra Dun College are likely to satisfy the requirements of the country. Because, the Dehra Dun College is after all a College for preliminary training for the ultimate training to be given to Indians at Sandhurst. Now, I fully recognise, Sir, that the education for a military career ought to be very sound; it ought not only to look to educational attainments of the candidate; a man destined for a military career must have character, an instinct for leadership and other qualities as well, and, if possible, must be trained in the environment of Sandhurst where he can rub shoulders with his British comrades. But, taking all these facts into consideration, there still remains the question whether the present rules are in the circumstances of India fair enough to attract a large number of people. Now, looking into these regulations, I find that the age of the boys who will be admitted under the regulations in the first year class in Dehra Dun College is 12 to 13. Boys over 13 are not to be admitted. Now, I consider, Sir, that, considering the habits and customs of the people of this country, this is rather too tender an age for Government to lay down. I recognise that the military career, if it is to be successful, ought to be begun at a very early age. But to imitate the public school regulations in England and to transplant them here and to lay down that boys in so vast a country as India should be admitted to a place like Dehra Dun at the tender age of 12 or 12½ years is I think a very hard condition. Now, I want to say a word about the allotments in the admissions. The total number of people to be admitted into the Dehra Dun College is at present about 40 and eventually, finances permitting, Government hope that it may be raised to 70. I want the House to realise whether the present number 40 is adequate for the needs of the country. If we have to Indianise the Army very quick, the total minimum number of 40 laid down or even 70 for next year or the year after, that is, I believe, a very small number to fix, if at all we are to go on with the process of Indianisation fairly quick. Now, even with this number of 40, which is the utmost number allotted for admission at the Dehra Dun College, we have to remember the sources over which this number of 40 is distributed. The sources are three. These 40 students to be admitted into the Dehra Dun College are distributed firstly between the different provinces of British India, (2) the Indian States, and (3) the sons of Indian officers of good service in the Indian Army. Now, my point is that, if 40 is to be distributed over these three sources, the number that will eventually be allotted for the sons of the middle classes or the other classes in the different provinces of British India, the share that will go to them will be very small indeed and, therefore, in order that the 9 different provinces in British India should get an opportunity to send a larger number of boys for a military career, I think the number to be admitted into the Dehra Dun College and to be eventually sent up to Sandhurst ought to be increased, whether the finances at the present moment strictly allow it or not; for the simple reason that we are spending on the military side of our Budget no less than 82 crores of rupees and I think it is but just and fair that, if the country is spending so vast an amount, the Military Department ought to spend for the training of cadets much more than the Dehra Dun College is doing at present.

To sum up, then, Sir, in the first place, I want to know whether Government have arrived at any decision whether Indians will be admitted and

Since which an amendment has been moved:

"To add to the Resolution the following:

"This Assembly further recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to lay on the table of the House the scheme, if any, for the Indianisation of the Indian Army and the correspondence, if any, that has passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India on the subject."

The question I have to put is that those words be there added.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

[17TH FEB. 1928.]

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank (Public Works Department Secretary): Sir, it seems to me, if I have the indulgence of the House to say so, that this debate has so far proceeded on what I would term somewhat ragged lines, and the amendments which I see tabled to this Resolution also indicate that the question which we have before us is very likely to become further involved. Now, Sir, there is considerable weight in the valuable remarks which fell from my Honourable friend from Madras. At the same time I think many Members of this Honourable Assembly will probably agree with me in considering that we do not want to approach this question from the melodramatic side. Proceeding to the remarks which have fallen from my Honourable friend from Burma, I can only say I regret I cannot subscribe to those remarks in so far as they apply to the education of Indians to take their place in the ranks of the Indian Army. However, that may be a matter of opinion, but I base my opinion largely on the fact that circumstances from the military point of view have changed very extensively of late, and that the enemies we are on the Frontier are now well trained and organized, and very well equipped, and they are no longer just ordinary hordes of invaders. I would note that it seems to me that he also transgressed what I might call the first canon of military propriety in not respecting that discipline which is exacted from all ranks of the Army, a discipline of exact obedience to the authority which requires them to carry out the orders which are given to them whether they agree with them or whether they do not. This question of training Indians for service as officers in the Indian Army is one which depends very largely on social and economic conditions. When I refer to climatic conditions what I mean is that the climatic conditions of India, down in the plains during the summer months, are not such as to retain the vitality of the youth who enter the Dehra Dun, say, the age of about 35 to the standard which is required in military service, and the advantage which the British officer in this respect is that he takes leave to European climatic conditions and returns in vigour, and possibly thereby retains his physical youth longer than would his brother officer who happens to be an Indian who stays in India without having those advantages. However, I do not dwell on that particular point. The House will no doubt agree with me that the points I have mentioned have a considerable bearing on the question we have to deal with.

Sir, I venture to speak on this subject because it may be that I am the only member of this Honourable Assembly who has been on service on the Frontier and in France with British units and with Indian units and under fire with them as comrades in arms. I have been with British units and Indian units in action, in advancing, in holding a position, and also in falling back from one, but I am not going to dwell on that fact in order to analyse the qualities of British officers and Indian officers. Both have their merits and probably also in certain respects their demerits, but I have only mentioned the fact in order to put it to the House that I speak from a practical point of view; I do not merely speak from a theoretical point of view. As such, it seems to me that the pronouncement which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief gave to this House this morning should have given an assurance to this Assembly that the Government proposed to set about the problem of the Indianisation of the Indian Army in regular ordered steps and to base its further Indianisation in the course of time entirely on the results so attained. His Excellency has announced that 8 units will be officered by Indian officers. Well, that itself goes a very great distance. On that basis, he, in his highly responsible position as the military adviser of the Government of India and responsible military expert before this Assembly, would be in a position to judge what further stages of Indianisation of units could be effected and when. I therefore think, Sir, that this House, instead of proceeding to go into the details of all the amendments which now stand tabled on the agenda, which may confuse the issue before us, would perhaps do well to consider the advance which has already been made, and to let these further stages of the development of the Indianisation of the Indian units of the Army be considered in due course, from time to time, according to the results which are seen from this measure of Indianisation of 8 units to make a start with. With that to go on, it seems to me that the field is perfectly clear, and it may be left to the military authorities to advise the Government of India as to what further can be done. I do not think I need detain this House any more in the matter, because we have here an accomplished fact that 8 units are going to be Indianised, and also that an Indian Military College for the training of Indian cadets for the officering of the Army has been established at Dehra Dun. The progress will be watched, and no doubt the House will be advised from time to time. In the meanwhile, it will perhaps, suffice to abide by the assurance, which His Excellency has given us, and in the future, when the opportunity arises, to consider what are the further stages of Indianisation that the circumstances may permit.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, moving my amendment, I should like to make a few formal changes. The House has no doubt received with feelings of gratitude the announcement made this morning by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief promising the immediate Indianisation of 8 units of the Indian Army. That, I submit, is a distinct step in advance, and for that the House should tender its gratitude and thanks to His Majesty's Government. I wish therefore, Sir, to prelude my amendment with the following words:

"That, while gratefully acknowledging the announcement made for the Indianisation of 8 Indian units, this Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to be so pleased as to formulate a scheme for the Indianisation of Indians in the commissioned ranks of the army with a view to ensuring the efficiency of all Indian regiments by Indian Officers with a minimum of British Officers as at present be necessary to ensure their efficiency."

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, I suggest the addition of the words "within a reasonable time".

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank (Public Works Department Secretary): Sir, it seems to me, if I have the indulgence of the House to say so, that this debate has so far proceeded on what I would term somewhat ragged lines, and the amendments which I see tabled to this Resolution also indicate that the question which we have before us is very likely to become further involved. Now, Sir, there is considerable weight in the valuable remarks which fell from my Honourable friend from Madras. At the same time I think many Members of this Honourable Assembly will probably agree with me in considering that we do not want to approach this question from the melodramatic side. Proceeding to the remarks which have fallen from my Honourable friend from Burma, I can only say I regret I cannot subscribe to those remarks in so far as they apply to the education of Indians to take their place in the ranks of the Indian Army. However, that may be a matter of opinion, but I base my opinion largely on the fact that circumstances from the military point of view have changed very extensively of late, and that the enemies we have on the Frontier are now well trained and organized, and very well equipped, and they are no longer just ordinary hordes of invaders. I would note that it seems to me that he also transgressed what I might call the canon of military propriety in not respecting that discipline which is required from all ranks of the Army, a discipline of exact obedience to the authority which requires them to carry out the orders which are given, whether they agree with them or whether they do not.

That is a question of training Indians for service as officers in the Indian Army, and my opinion is one which depends very largely on social and economic conditions. When I refer to climatic conditions what I mean is that the climatic conditions of India, down in the plains during the hot months, are not such as to retain the vitality of the youth of the Dehra Dun, say, the age of about 35 to the standard which is required in military service, and the advantage which the British officer in this respect is that he takes leave to European climatic conditions and returns in vigour, and possibly thereby retains his physical youth longer than would his brother officer who happens to be an Indian, who stays in India without having those advantages. However, I will not dwell on that particular point. The House will no doubt agree with me that the points I have mentioned have a considerable bearing on the question we have to deal with.

Sir, I venture to speak on this subject because it may be that I am the only member of this Honourable Assembly who has been on service on the Frontier and in France with British units and with Indian units and under fire with them as comrades in arms. I have been with British units and Indian units in action, in advancing, in holding a position, and also in falling back from one, but I am not going to dwell on that fact in order to analyse the qualities of British officers and Indian officers. Both have their merits and probably also in certain respects their demerits, but I have only mentioned the fact in order to put it to the House that I speak from a practical point of view; I do not merely theorise, and as such, it seems to me that the pronouncement which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief gave to this House this morning should have given an assurance to the Assembly that the Government proposed to set about the problem of the Indianisation of the Indian Army in regular ordered steps and to base its further Indianisation in the course of time entirely on the results so attained. His Excellency has announced that 8 units will be officered by Indian officers. Well, that itself goes a very great distance. On that basis, he, in his highly responsible position as the military adviser of the Government of India and responsible military expert before this Assembly, would be in a position to judge what further stages of Indianisation of units could be effected and when. I therefore think, Sir, that this House, instead of proceeding to go into the details of all the amendments which now stand tabled on the agenda, which may confuse the issue before us, would perhaps do well to consider the advance which has already been made, and to let these further stages of the development of the Indianisation of the Indian units of the Army be considered in due course, from time to time, according to the results which are seen from this measure of Indianisation of 8 units to make a start with. With that to go on, it seems to me that the field is perfectly clear, and it may be left to the military authorities to advise the Government of India as to what further can be done. I do not think I need detain this House any more in the matter, because we have here an accomplished fact that 8 units are going to be Indianised, and also that an Indian Military College for the training of Indian cadets for the officering of the Army has been established at Dehra Dun. The progress will be watched, and no doubt the House will be advised from time to time. In the meanwhile, it perhaps, suffice to abide by the assurance, which His Excellency has given us, and in the future, when the opportunity arises, to consider what are the further stages of Indianisation that the circumstances may permit.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammedan): Sir, moving my amendment, I should like to make a few formal changes. The House has no doubt received with feelings of gratitude the announcement made this morning by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief promising the immediate Indianisation of 8 units of the Indian Army. That, I submit, is a distinct step in advance, and for the House should tender its gratitude and thanks to His Majesty's Government. I wish therefore, Sir, to prelude my amendment with the following words:

"That, while gratefully acknowledging the announcement made for the Indianisation of 8 Indian units, this Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to be so pleased as to formulate a scheme for the steady increase of Indians in the commissioned ranks of the army with a view to ensuring the officering of all Indian regiments by Indian Officers with a minimum of British Officers as may at present be necessary to ensure their efficiency."

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, I suggest the addition of the words "within a reasonable time".

the educated middle classes, subject to the prescribed standards of fitness, to enter the commissioned ranks of the army, and that in nominating candidates for the entrance examination unofficial Indians should be associated with the nominating authority and that not less than 25 per cent. of the King's Commissions granted every year should be given to His Majesty's Indian subjects to start with."

Two years have since elapsed and we have been pressing upon the Government the desirability of taking a practical step in the direction of Indianizing the military forces of this country. Only the other day when my Honourable friend the Mover of this Resolution spoke on the subject, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief in his speech did not anticipate the immediate possibility of Indianizing any unit of the Indian Army. His speech was a speech of caution; his speech was a speech in which I am perfectly certain His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has infused his confidence in the Indian Army with the necessary caution born of a practised British Commander. This morning the situation has completely changed and I am afraid very few of us have realized the great change which that announcement foreshadows. It is the very suddenness of the announcement that has taken this House by surprise. But at the same time, Sir, if the House realises that 8 units of the Indian Army are to be immediately Indianized and on the result of that experiment further progress would be dependent, I am afraid this House will say that that is a contingency which it cannot accept. And so far as this House is concerned, it should ask the Government of formulate a policy, namely, that the minimum of British officers, subject only to one condition, namely, that the minimum of British officers as may at present be necessary be laid down to continue to ensure its efficiency. I submit, Sir, the only difference between my amendment and the announcement made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief and the explanation given by the Honourable and gallant Colonel Sir Sydney Brookshank is that, while they are prepared to Indianize 8 units, they are not prepared to formulate a scheme or to promise further Indianization in the steady manner which I suggest. That is the only difference between my amendment and their pronouncement and our demand; and, I submit, Sir, so far as this part of the House is concerned, it is unanimous in its desire that a policy should be enunciated and a scheme formulated for the steady Indianization of the Indian Army. That will not only satisfy the growing rational aspirations of the people of this country but will be an incentive to the very Indian officers who are to be employed in the first eight units. They will feel that they are not the first and the last to Indianize the Indian units and that upon the success, further steady progress has been promised and will be made; and this, I submit, would be for the greater efficiency of the Indian Army and the contentment of the people of this country.

Now, Sir, I turn for a moment to my friend, Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution and I shall give my reasons why I am not prepared to endorse it. My friend says:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commission for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such manner that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

Now, Sir, as patriots and politicians, this Resolution commends itself to us. But as men of practical commonsense, as men who have to face hard facts, I am afraid we are not in a position to say that all future vacancies in the Indian Army be filled by the employment of Indian Officers. Honourable Members need not be reminded that the first duty—indeed the only duty—for which the Indian, or indeed any Army, is kept is its efficiency. The object of the Army is to secure peace. The object of the Army is to ward off foreign aggression. How can that be ensured if we were to Indianise the Indian Army per saltum? Up to now there is no doubt that the Commissions that have been given to the Indian Army have justified themselves, fulfilled the hopes that the Military Officers and Commanders felt in them and in their efficiency. But how can we ask the Government that all future entrants to the commissioned ranks of the Indian Army shall be Indians regardless of other considerations. That is a proposition which I fear I am not in a position to subscribe to, and I do not think my friends on this side of the House are prepared to subscribe to that sweeping doctrine. I therefore suggest, Sir, that we should deal with this question as practical men. We should not forget the primary, and as I have said the only, object of maintaining an army, and that purpose can only be served if we gradually but steadily advance in the direction of Indianisation. Some of my friends have asked for the recognition of communal rights. Amongst them I class my friend the Honourable Colonel Gidney. May I point out to him that he and members of all communities will have their place in the Indian Army subject only to one condition, that its efficiency is not impaired. The Army, Sir, is not a representative institution: it is kept for a definite purpose, and that purpose, I submit, cannot be lost sight of in recruiting people merely because they belong to certain communities and not because they possess the necessary grit, strength, stamina, power of endurance, valour for which, I submit, the Indian Army, as indeed all national armies, exist. But as I have said before, Sir, these are questions of detail which need not detain us. We are at present concerned here with the initiation of a good principle. That principle has been conceded by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, and all that we can do now is to thank His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief for his announcement and ask him to accept my amendment in which I want that a scheme for the steady growth of the Indian element in the Indian Army be formulated. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"Substitute the following for the Resolution:

"While gratefully acknowledging the announcement made for the Indianization of the Indian units, this Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to formulate a scheme for the steady increase of Indians in the commissioned ranks of the Army with a view to ensure the officering of all Indian regiments by Indian officers with the minimum of British officers as may at present be necessary to ensure their efficiency."

Mr. E. Burdon (Army Secretary): Sir, the essential purpose of the debate initiated by my friend, Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution was, if I may be permitted to say so, very well put in the words used by my Honourable friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary. Speaking on the 24th of January in this House, he said, "We are anxious to place before the Government and before the public some substantive and substantial form in which we make our demand for Indianization." This is the real and the central object of the discussion while the Resolution itself and the amendments on the paper represent different conceptions of what that substantive and substantial form can be, or it might be said attempts to define the claim which this House should now combine in making. Well,

[Mr. E. Burdon.]

Sir, it must be clear to the House that of these conceptions that which has been framed by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, must commend itself most to the Government. It obviously approximates most nearly to the course of action in regard to the Indianization of the Army which the Government, for the reasons which have been stated very fully by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, consider to be wise, and consider to be in the best interests of India. It therefore appears, I am afraid, a little ungracious if I have to say that Government cannot accept even Dr. Gour's proposal. I think the reason—and it is very largely a formal reason—is one which will appeal to this House. The amendment, apart from the initial words which have been added to-day, was framed in circumstances which, as my Honourable friend has said, have been entirely changed. The situation in which this debate commenced has been altered wholly by the announcement which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has made to-day. Indianization of the Indian Army was asked for and Indianisation in some measure has been conceded. Now, in the face of this accomplished fact, it seems to me that the amendment must necessarily fall to the ground. It is, at any rate, impossible for Government to accept the amendment, although what has transpired in the course of the debate shows that the real desire of the House is in harmony more or less with the intentions of Government as now declared. But even so, I feel sure that the House would not expect Government to accept a proposal even of the kind which has been made by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, immediately after the Government have announced their decision to adopt a particular programme of Indianisation. To do so would be incongruous and would only render Government liable to misinterpretation. It would be believed that Government intend to take some further step at once, either in advance of, or varying from, the measure which has been adopted, at which has yet to be put into operation and has yet to prove its success.

There is only one other point—I propose to confine myself strictly to the amendment—to which I should like to draw attention; it is another in which the intentions of Government square very largely with the intention of which is inherent in my Honourable friend's proposal. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, speaking this morning, said:

"There is one other point which it is necessary for me to explain. It is that simultaneously with the Indianisation of these selected eight units, Indians who qualify for the King's Commission will continue, as at present, to be posted to other units of the Indian Army," where, of course, they will, for the time being, serve side by side with the British officers who remain. The point of this fact, to which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief drew special attention, is that the scheme of Indianisation which has been announced to-day contains in itself the germ of growth, that is to say, there is inherent in it the possibility of increase, because the Indian officers, with the King's Commission who join other units of the Indian Army, apart from those which are being specifically Indianised, will be available if and when a further stage is decided upon as a result of success having been achieved in the first stage.

Sir, I hope that my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, and the rest of the House will appreciate the position of Government in this matter. It is, I think, largely based on the formal reason that, having announced one scheme, they cannot ten minutes later appear to commit themselves to something else.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, it is with some hesitation that I rise to speak on a subject to deal with which I feel myself very imperfectly equipped. I give way to no one in my desire for the advance of India towards responsible self-government in every branch. India is the land of my birth, and it is the land in which most of my life has been spent; and those conditions produce an attachment to the country which must necessarily guide my opinion with regard to its future. I have a good deal of sympathy for the moderate wording of this amendment or proposal put forward by my friend, Dr. Gour, but I seek to deal with the subject in that detached and open-minded way towards which a certain amount of judicial experience helps me. I think I need hardly assure this House that there is not one scrap of racial prejudice animating the remarks which I am now making. I speak from the point of view of the citizen of India whose interest in the Indian Army lies in having at hand a force which protects him from external aggression and from internal disorder; and the main force which guides my opinion on this point is a desire for efficiency and nothing else that is worth mentioning. An Army is a fighting machine. Dr. Gour has rightly described it as something quite different from a representative body, a political body, a civil or administrative body. It is a machine kept for a particular purpose, and its first requisite is efficiency. Sir, if I were convinced that the Indian Army, wholly officered and led by Indians only, would be more efficient than the Indian Army as constituted to-day, I should vote that to-morrow the whole of the 3,000 odd European officers should be sent away and that Indians should replace them. But I am not to be convinced by optimism or by hopes or even by that great regard and admiration which I have for Indians—sincere, honest, hopeful regard and admiration. We have at present an Indian Army that has justified itself on a hundred fields of honour and glory, and proved absolutely to the conviction of every mind that is not overborne by prejudice that the Indian non-commissioned ranks led by Europeans are as good a fighting machine as can be found in the world. But India is advancing, and I have the greatest sympathy for, and regard as most natural the desire of Indians generally to be allowed to try their hand in this field of leading their own men. Speaking for myself I have every reason to believe that if the ranks of Indians are put in as officers they will lead those men with the same success that their European predecessors and comrades and some of them have done. But, Sir, when we want to substitute a new machine for an old and well tried machine which is still working effectively, we should something like an experimental test before making the change. I propose now before the House Government is asked to accept the amendment. My understanding is that the Government have announced a scheme. They have started the process of training Indians to possess those remarkable characteristics, those peculiar characteristics, with which alone they can succeed as officers in Indian regiments. They have introduced by the grant of King's Commissions Indians into regiments where, side by side with British officers, they can learn those habits of life and thought and leadership which are essential to success. And now we have this greatest part of that scheme of gradual Indianisation, namely, an actual trial of no less than 8 regiments under completely Indian control. Sir, let the House think what this means. To begin with you have to have 8 Colonels, 8 Seconds-in-Command and 8 Adjutants. I do not profess to know very much about regimental organisation, though I have had the privilege to command Volunteers for 15 years; but I do know this much that upon the character of the Commandant, and upon—what shall

[Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon.]

I call it?—the tact and adaptability of the Adjutant, a great deal of regimental administrative success must depend. The European officer in an Indian regiment has a much easier position than an Indian officer will have. The difference will be understood by European officers if they will try and imagine what their position would be; suppose in the four double companies constituting a regiment one company—or even half a company—consisted of European Christians. They are at present in a detached position, able to act with complete impartiality among all the different people who go to constitute an Indian regimental unit. The Indian officers' position will be very much more difficult for reasons upon which I need not enlarge, but which, I am sure, will be obvious to every Member of this House. We have two amendments proposed on this paper to-day which themselves point to these difficulties. These are all difficulties that we have to consider. Dr. Gour's proposal is: "Don't wait and see what is the result of the experiment. Let that go on as best it may, but, despite that, without opening your eyes by the experience gained in connection with these 8 units, formulate a scheme—formulate a scheme." I submit that this Resolution is premature for that reason, and that this House must possess its soul in patience. It has achieved a tremendous amount of success in pushing forward this matter—success which perhaps a very short time ago even the most sanguine of the Members of the House would scarcely have hoped to realise. Now let us wait. If these 8 units prove, as I have every hope myself they will prove, to maintain their efficiency under Indian command at the same level which they have attained under European command, then our position will be a very strong one, and we may be able to ask that, in place of 8, we should have 80 units of that kind.

Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, before I move my amendments, and before I go on to speak on the merit or demerit of this Resolution, I respectfully ask the Honourable Non-Official Members of this House, in whose hands the Honourable Mover is, to ask him to withdraw this Resolution. I will give my reasons for this novel request. The reply given to the Resolution by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Rawlinson, is very sympathetic and very very hopeful and I am certain that His Excellency will give us as much indulgence as possible, as he has already commenced to help us, compatible with the efficiency of the army, for the furtherance of the desires of our rising hopes. By forcing this Resolution on His Excellency we will simply convert a friend into a foe, as in the interest of the Army he cannot but oppose it. I say we should know better. I must frankly confess that the Resolution as worded cannot be accepted as it is. When I first read in the Resolution that all vacancies (I lay stress on the word "all") in the Indian regiments in future be filled by the Indian officers, etc., I thought my Honourable young friend wanted to be amusing and humorous. A certain Persian saying which I reproduce here came to my mind at once:

"Gorba miskin gur pur dastai tumkh kunjush aj jahan bur dastai"

"Had the innocent cat got wings, there would have been no sparrow left on the face of the earth."

But, when I found that His Excellency, a grim soldier and a far-sighted statesman—two very distinct qualities very seldom found in one man—has taken it seriously, I immediately changed my views and came to the conclusion that I was not right.

If this rash and embarrassing Resolution is accepted by this Honourable House as it is (I lay stress on the words "as it is"), it will simply alarm those from whom we expect more help, more reforms and more good. It will meet the same fate as the immediate Swaraj Resolution of Simla. No Military Board worth its name can accept such a drastic change and that too within 24 hours. Hence, when we are certain of failure, why should we do it? We are a responsible body and not a schoolboys' association, why should we do a thing which will damage our cause?

"Agar akeli ek eshara bus ast".

"If you have any sense in you, one nod, one sign, is enough."

Such an impudent Resolution is sure to be rejected by the authorities at Home as they cannot accept a thing which will be so derimental to the efficiency of the Army and hence to the interests of the country as a whole, and then some of my Honourable friends will commence to whimper and whine that such a well cut, well dried, well groomed and well lobbied motion failed to act. I say it is better to remove the face before the slap has fallen on it. If we get slapped none but we, the Honourable ourselves, shall have to be thanked for it. No use to be wise after the event. No use to advance the face to be slapped. "Chera Kare Kunad Akel ke bar arak pashemani." Why should a wise man do a thing which will bring remorse afterwards? I admit we wanted a long sword but we have been given a pen knife. If we make well use of this pen knife, a better and a longer one will follow. It looks to me that we have commenced to use knife at the throat of the giver thereby creating our own obstinate my own way. What we did before is already known, now we are determined to drive away all the British officers in the Indian Regiments in India. A creeping conviction is coming on me that we are here voicing the of the outside non-co-operators and the extremists. It looks to the outside, the Honourable non-co-operators, and the inside the able non-officials are one and the same or at least they are "Brothers", brothers by contracted relationship which, when translated into common Hindustani means "Salas" and "Buhnois."

Sir, we have heard from His Excellency that in the list of the Vacancies Commissioned Officers there are no fit persons to be given immediately King's Commission. Such officers are not in existence but shall have to be given birth to. My young friends may be up and doing but till then will all the vacancies remain unfilled up? In the meantime they can be filled up by the young non-official Members of this Honourable House. I am giving this piece of advice to His Excellency.

I asked the opinion of one of my constituents who had some military experience in Mesopotamia and he replied as follows: "Kare bojina nist rajjari" meaning surgery is not the business of the monkey. If any of my Honourable friends will argue that the surgeon is simply to hand over his knife to the monkey and the monkey will at once turn out to be a good expert surgeon, I must say that the argument is very forceful and to that I have no reply. There is a vast difference between civil and military matters. A civil officer may commit a mistake which can be easily rectified by his superior without much harm being done. Such is not the case with the military officer. A mistake made by a military officer in the battle-field may end in a great catastrophe, may end even in losing a battle. It has been known in history that the loss of a battle ended the existence of Empires. This nation is in its infancy and I am not prepared to experiment with its life and death by this unworkable, absurd Resolution.

I say there is no magical force in adopting a Resolution. If my Honourable friends the non-officials do believe that a magical virtue is imparted to a Resolution by its acceptance by this Honourable House, I may point out with hundred and one apologies, that such magic will not appeal to the British nation, the British public, the British rate-payers and the British Parliaments. Then what will appeal to them? I submit, it is logic or logical force. Has my Honourable friend the Mover any logic to his side? If he has, I failed to see any. If any of my Honourable friends here will tell me if he has found any, I shall then be delighted.

In the first part of his speech he spoke volumes in praise about the present British officers. He fully admits that they are doing their duties admirably well. He agrees also that they never failed on any occasion. People want a change when the existing order of things is not working well. The Mover admits that the present system is working excellently well. Still he wants a change. He says the change may be equally suitable. But where is the proof?

"Seeing an eagle soar on the high,

The baby in the cradle wishes to fly"

Members wait. The baby which is still in the care of wet nurses. That I prove, to can fly I can see and I must have proof that the baby will be which fly equally well before I will hoist up the baby high in the air. will be my Honourable friends told me if I were to support this Resolution we should get the "Bah", "Bah" of the revolutionary irreconcilables of my country, my countrymen of that class will say excellent, 1) Sir, Revolution in political matters is very risky. The roads of the are full of zig-zags, full of ups and downs like hilly roads. No he merits should ride on such roads at break neck speed. The riders ble Non-Officials not only break the necks of their horses but will break their own necks in the bargain. I say the revolution in the Army is still more dangerous, dangerous and I am not prepared to support such a drastic revolution simply to win the applause of the outside extremists and non-officials. I have a conscience which I cannot sacrifice. I ask the Honourable non-official friends in this House to let us be true patriots, not discard genuine gold for an alloy, though the outside of it may shine. One must not pretend to know a thing of which one knows nothing. Pretended knowledge is very, very dangerous. I ask again from the Honourable non-officials what is their military knowledge. I will answer the question for them.

My Honourable young friend expresses a pious hope that the newcomers will turn out to be as good as old experienced officers whom he wants to replace. He does not instance a single regiment where it was tried and found successful; on the contrary, he says that a similar thing was tried in Company Bahadur's time and it brought about the Mutiny in 1857, which every one deploras. Here my Honourable friend falsifies his own assertion and again he is impudent enough to suggest the same thing which ended in a great catastrophe. I only wish to say, once cheated, twice shy and no more.

I asked a man belonging to the rank and file of the Indian army about these British officers whom my Honourable young friend wants to hang. The Indian soldier replied that these officers are feared by some, liked by others but respected by all and hated by none. I asked him how it will work if they are replaced at once by Indian officers. He said the Indian officers in their place will lean on their remaining British subordinates which will be detrimental to the discipline of the army. He further said discipline in the army is most essential. This want of discipline or the slackening of it under Indian officers brought about the Mutiny in 1857 about which the less said the better. The Indian soldier furthermore said raw levies can be trusted to an experienced officer but a regiment of war veterans cannot be put under the charge of raw officers as in the latter case it will be suicidal. We should try to carry the whole thing to its logical conclusion. I must say in conclusion that my Honourable young friend should now see his way to withdraw the Resolution as it is not on a mature but unworkable. To the Resolution as it is I can offer my sympathetic neutrality but not full support. As to my two amendments after what I have heard from His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief this morning, I do not desire to move them.

(Cries of "Let the question be now put.")

Mr. President: The question is that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The original Resolution was:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commission for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such number that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

Since which an amendment has been moved to substitute the following for the Resolution moved:

"That while gratefully acknowledging the announcement made for the Indianisation of 8 Indian units, this Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be so pleased as to formulate a scheme for the steady increase of Indians in the commissioned ranks of the Army with a view to ensure the officering of all Indian regiments by Indian officers with the minimum of British officers as may at present be necessary to ensure their efficiency."

The question is that that amendment be made.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Monday, 19th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock
Mr. President was in the Chair.

MEMBER SWORN:

Mr. George Sampson Clark, M.L.A. (Burma: European).

STATEMENT LAID ON THE TABLE.

Mr. A. H. Ley (Industries Secretary): I beg to lay on the table a statement furnished by the High Commissioner for India in the United Kingdom of cases in which tenders other than the lowest in respect of stores purchased for India have been accepted by him during the half year ending 31st December, 1922.

ABSTRACT OF CASES in which Tenders, not the lowest complying with the requirements of the Stores Department of the Indenting Officer, were accepted on the grounds of superior quality, superior trustworthiness of the firm tendering, greater facility of inspection, quicker delivery, etc.

HALF YEAR ENDING 31st DECEMBER 1922.

PART A.—Cases in which lower foreign tenders, including British tenders for foreign made goods, have been set aside wholly or partially in favour of British tenders.

Stores ordered.	Contract Number.	Name of Contractor.	Amount of Contract.	Lowest Tender not accepted.	Reason for acceptance.
Insulators	B. 2608-1602, 10th July 1922.	Jas. MacInyre & Coy., Ltd.	£ s. d. 545 10 0	£ s. d. 479 10 0 (German Manufacture).	Better delivery. The difference in cost would be further reduced by extra cost of inspection in Germany.
Wire Insulated	B. 2640-2602, 12th July 1922.	Hackbridge Cable Coy., Ltd.	485 5 9 (Item 7)	430 15 0 (Item 7) (Belgium manufacturer).	Quicker delivery. The small difference in cost would probably be absorbed by the extra expense of inspection abroad.
Ferro-Silicon.	B. 2608-2630, 2nd August 1922.	J. Hinkley & Son	348 15 0 P. O. B. (Llanningham).	341 5 0 (P. O. B. Porsgrund, Norway).	Lowest suitable having regard to shipping facilities.
Cable	B. 3163-3153, 16th August 1922. B. 3164 B. 3165 B. 3166	Western Electric Coy. W. T. Hinkley's Telegraph Works. Johnson & Phillips, Ltd. Callender's Cable Coy.	3,574 3 8 3,104 12 8 3,318 6 11 3,112 9 4 13,109 12 7	12,949 6 3 (Austrian manufacturer). Extra cost of inspection say £100.	The order was shared between the British firms on account of their greater reliability, the conditions prevailing in Austria being uncertain. The additional cost, after allowing for the extra cost of inspection abroad, is inconsiderable.

PART A.—Cases in which lower foreign tenders, including British tenders for foreign made goods, have been set aside wholly or partially in favour of British tenders—contd.

Stores ordered.	Contract Number.	Name of Contractor.	Amount of Contract.	Lowest Tender not accepted.	Reason for acceptance.
Wires, Armled	B. 3307-3358, 2nd September 1922.	T. Bolton and Sons, Ltd.	£ s. d. 280 14 10	£ s. d. 224 0 6 (German Manufacture).	Quicker delivery. The small difference in price would be further reduced by extra cost of inspection in Germany.
Dog Spikes	B. 3307-3377, 28th September 1922.	W. Kelway Bamber	265 2 6	249 2 4 (made in Belgium).	Quicker delivery offered. There was also much delay in shipping from Antwerp.
Iron Wire	B. 4035-4062, 2nd October 1922.	Dorman Long & Coy.	1,968 15 0	1,959 7 6 (German).	Small difference in cost and the extra expense that would be incurred by inspection in Germany. The British firm also offered much better delivery.
Cement	B. 4074-4064, 4th October 1922.	Ship Canal Portland Cement Manufacturers, Ltd.	811 5 0 (11s. 1d. a Cask). (1,500 Casks)	637 10 0 (8s. 6d. a Cask). (Belgian Cement).	Quicker delivery. It was also not considered advisable to accept the Belgian Cement offered by the lowest tender until a report has been obtained on supplies being made on a Contract now running with this firm.
Copper Plates	B. 4000-4274, 24th November 1922.	Linky & Coy.	13,163 16 0	12,123 0 0	Superior trustworthiness. The lowest tender was from an English firm of locomotive makers for foreign plates flanged by themselves. This is not considered nearly so satisfactory as obtaining plates flanged by the copper makers.
Tyres for Locomotives	B. 5166-5352, 15th December 1922.	Steel Coy. of Scotland, Ltd.	3,837 13 3	2,898 12 6 (German).	The correct supply of Locomotive Tyres is of the utmost importance and it was not considered advisable to place a further order with the German firm until they have established their reliability by completion of two other contracts which they already hold. The delivery offered by the English firm was also much quicker.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

IMPORT DUTY ON PAPER.

366. *Sir Montagu Webb: (1) Are Government aware:

(a) That under the Finance Act, 1922, passed by the Legislature in March last, an import duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem was imposed on paper? (Item 94 in Schedule II, Import Tariff); yet

(b) That by a Notification "Customs Duties, No. 6705 of 23rd December, 1922, new items have been introduced into Schedule II, of the Import Tariff under the heading Paper, namely, news printing paper, printing paper flints, real art, imitation art, etc., to which Tariff Valuations have been given in some cases more than twice the current market values of the papers mentioned, with the result that the present Import Duty on paper instead of being fifteen per cent. as laid down by the Finance Act, 1922, is now twenty to thirty-seven per cent.?

(2) Will Government be pleased to say what steps they propose to take to correct this deviation from the scale of duties authorised by the Legislature, so as to ensure that the duty on paper shall not be suddenly doubled or more by mere executive order?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (1) (a) Yes.

(1) (b) and (2). These valuations were based on the prices of the various years and were fixed in consultation with the principal Chambers of Commerce, and were not criticised at the time as being excessive. The Government of India have, however, further examined the matter in light of information subsequently supplied and have ascertained that valuations then fixed are somewhat above actual market prices, partly account of the considerable fall which has taken place in the prices of paper during the last 4½ months, i.e., since the collection of the quotations on which the valuations were based. They have therefore revised the tariff valuations for this article, and a notification to this effect appeared in the Gazette of India of the 17th instant.

Sir Montagu Webb: Having regard to the fact that prices generally are now falling, will Government undertake from time to time to re-examine other tariff valuations so that the scale of duties authorised by the Legislature shall not be greatly exceeded?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: That, Sir, raises a big question. In exceptional cases we do reduce the valuations but not often. It would be against the whole object of tariff valuation to do so as a matter of course and the Honourable Member will see that if we reduce the valuation when prices fall we must also increase it when prices rise.

ARMS RULES COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

367. *Baba Ujagar Singh Bedi: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if they have accepted the recommendations of the Arms Rules Committee?

(2474)

(b) What points of the Report they have accepted?
(c) Have the Government given any legal shape to those recommendations yet, if not, when are they going to be enforced as Law?
(d) Have they given any consideration to the Notes of Dissent, on the said Report, and if so, to what points?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We hope very shortly to be in a position to make a statement on the subject.

WORKING OF CHIT ASSOCIATIONS AND NIDHIS IN MADRAS.

368. *Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state whether they will call for a report from the Government of Madras as to whether in view of the inapplicability of several of the fundamental provisions of the Indian Companies Act, to Chit Associations and Nidhis, it is desirable to modify the Act to suit the constitution and working of these institutions?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: A letter on this subject has just been received within the last few days from the Southern Indian Chamber of Commerce and is under examination. This covers also the next question, No. 369.

WITHDRAWALS AND LOANS IN CONNECTION WITH NIDHIS AND CHIT ASSOCIATIONS.

369. *Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state whether in the case of Nidhis and Chit Associations, withdrawal from, and loans on share capital are allowed against the provisions of the Indian Companies Act?

AUDITORS IN MADRAS.

370. *Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state the number of Auditors certified as qualified to audit accounts for purposes of Income-tax in the Madras Presidency?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member. This answer I am afraid I must ask him to accept to all the questions up to No. 375 inclusive.

INCOME-TAX ASSESSEES, MADRAS.

371. *Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state the number of assesseees to Income-tax in the Madras Presidency on 31st March, 1922?

INCOME-TAX AUDITORS.

372. *Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state whether it is a fact that since the passing of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1922, no additions to the list of qualified Auditors for Income-tax purposes have been made?

COMMITTEE ON INCOME-TAX AUDITORS.

373. *Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state under what provision of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1922, or the rules thereunder, the Commissioner of Income-tax for the Madras Presidency has constituted a Committee for the selection of Auditors for Income-tax purposes?

(b) Will the Government be pleased to state whether Commissioners of Income-tax in other Presidencies have constituted similar committees for the selection of Auditors for Income-tax purposes?

ENLISTMENT OF INCOME-TAX AUDITORS.

874. *Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state whether any rules have been framed by the Commissioner of Income-tax for the Madras Presidency to regulate the enlistment of Auditors for Income-tax purposes? If so, will the Government be pleased to lay a copy on the table?

INCOME-TAX ASSESSEES.

875. *Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement of the number of Income-tax assesses in each of the major Provinces on the last day of the last official year, and also the latest number of qualified Auditors for Income-tax purposes in each of those major Provinces?

RAILWAY ADVISORY COUNCILS.

876. *Mr. B. S. Kamat: (i) Will Government be pleased to state in which of the Railway Administrations Local Advisory Councils have been established so far in terms of the recommendation of the Railway Committee, 1920-21?

(ii) In this connection, will Government also be pleased to give the constitution, the method of selection of the Members, the scope of duties, remuneration, if any, to Members, and the nature of proceedings of these Advisory Councils as fixed at present?

(iii) If Local Advisory Councils have been appointed for the G. I. P. and the B. B. C. I. Administrations, will Government be pleased to give the names of the Members?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (i) and (iii) Apart from the two committees on Eastern Bengal and East Indian Railways which have been for some years in existence no new Local Advisory Committees have yet been established in accordance with the revised principles referred to. Orders have however been issued for the formation of committees on the three State lines, and these will very shortly be constituted. The principles which are being followed on State-worked railways have been recommended to all Companies for adoption, and in most cases preliminary measures are believed to be now well advanced for the formation of similar committees on all the principal lines.

(ii) Government have confined themselves to formulating certain general principles in consultation with the Central Advisory Council, and detailed arrangements such as those referred to will necessarily be settled on each individual line to suit local circumstances. A copy of the memorandum of general principles prescribed is laid on the table.

Memorandum regarding Local Railway Advisory Committees.

I. Title.—The new bodies to be known on each line as "Railway Advisory Committee".

II. Constitution.—A separate main Committee to be constituted for each administration, the number of members being decided by circumstances subject to a maximum of 12. The Agent to be ex-officio Chairman. The remaining members to consist of:

two Local Government members nominated by the Local Government in whose jurisdiction the headquarters of the railway in question is situated;

three representatives of the Legislative Council of the Government in whose jurisdiction the headquarters of the railway in question is situated. These members should be selected to represent rural interests and the travelling public;

one member from the local municipality or corporation at the railway headquarters;

five members representing industries, commerce and trade.

The heads of departments of railways may be called in merely to advise on subjects under discussion which may affect their department and on which their technical expert advice would be useful to the committee.

The method of selection of the non-official members to be left largely to local discretion. The representatives of the Legislative Council need not necessarily be members of the Council. Members of the Central Advisory Council are not debarred from membership of Local Advisory Committees. The five members representing industries, commerce and trade would ordinarily be drawn from important local bodies representing predominant trade interests; the actual selection of such bodies should be made in consultation with the Local Government, and the committee is made it should be left to them to nominate or elect their representatives. The tenure of office of the members to be left to the electing or nominating body to decide.

Agents will consider whether it is desirable to form separate branch local committees at large centres, and in case of doubt they may consult their main committee in this matter.

III. Scope of duties.—The functions of the committee to be purely advisory. The sort of subjects which might suitably be placed before the Committees are:

- alterations in time tables and passenger services;
- alterations of rates and fares and changes of goods classifications;
- proposals in regard to new projects and extensions;
- proposal in regard to new rolling stock;
- any matters affecting the general public interest or convenience.

Questions of personnel, discipline and appointments will not be brought before the committee; subject to this condition any member may suggest a subject for discussion, but the Agent may rule out any subject for reasons which should be explained at the first meeting after the ruling has been given.

IV. Remuneration.—Non-railway members may be paid Rs. 32 for each meeting attended.

V. Proceedings.—The committee to meet once a month if there are matters to be discussed. A copy of the minutes of meetings to be furnished to each member and to the Railway Board. If in any case the Agent decides that he is unable to follow the advice given by the majority of the committee, he must bring the matter to the notice of the Railway Board in forwarding the minutes of the meeting for their perusal.

Sir Datta Prasad Sarvadhiary: Would the Honourable Member please state how Members of this House can obtain information regarding the proceedings of these Committees?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am afraid I must ask for notice of that question.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF DECK PASSENGER COMMITTEE.

377. *Mr. B. S. Kamat: (i) Will Government be pleased to state what action has been taken in the matter of the recommendations of the Deck Passenger Committee, 1921, so far as any amending legislation to amend the Indian Passenger Ships Act is concerned to improve space allowance?

(ii) Will Government also please state what steps, if any, have been taken to improve existing conditions in general and particularly in respect of the following recommendations of the said Committee, viz.:

- (a) Paragraph 68A, (iv) Shelter accommodation at ports;
- (b) Paragraph 68A, (v) better arrangements for Surf boats;
- (c) Paragraph 68A, (vi) embarking and disembarking;
- (d) Paragraph 68A, (viii) telegraphic communications between ports;
- (e) Paragraph 68A, (ix) night signalling between shore and adjacent villages;
- (f) Paragraph 68A, (xxiii) non-official visitors at important ports.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Government of India informed Maritime Local Governments in November, 1921, of the provisional conclusions of the Deck Passengers Committee's Report and asked them to consult Steamship Companies and public bodies on these questions and to furnish the Government of India with their views. A reply is still due from one important Local Government who have been asked to expedite the matter. Until this reply is received, it is impossible for Government to formulate final conclusions.

QUARTERS AT WINDSOR PLACE, RAISINA.

378. *Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state—(a) How many quarters are still lying unoccupied at Windsor Place?

(b) Whether the rent of those quarters will be charged from the Honourable Members, for the whole Season, to whom they have been allotted or from the date of their occupation?

(c) If from the date of occupation, then who will be liable for rent of those unoccupied quarters, either for the unoccupied period or for the rest of the Session—in case the Members to whom they have been allotted do not owing to certain reasons come to Delhi or occupy them?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) Four quarters at Windsor Place were until a few days ago unoccupied.

(b) and (c) Quarters at Windsor Place have all been allotted on the basis of seasonal rents, and rent will be charged for the whole season whether the quarters are occupied or not unless the quarter is definitely relinquished. Where a Member relinquishes his quarter he is liable for the rent till a new tenant has been found.

ALLOTMENT OF QUARTERS AT RAISINA.

379. *Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state if it will be possible for them to re-allot the Windsor Place quarters after allowing a certain reasonable period from the date of commencement of the Session for their occupation instead of keeping them vacant?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Hitherto the practice has been that when a quarter at Windsor Place has been allotted to a member it is kept at that member's disposal even though he may not be occupying it until he definitely relinquishes it. Government will consider the Honourable Member's suggestion that a re-allotment of the vacant quarters should be made after the lapse of a reasonable period.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Having regard to the popularity of these quarters, will the Government be pleased to build more such quarters?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: We have taken out estimates for the construction of 10 additional quarters of this particular design and when the Finance Department are in a position to provide the funds and they Legislative Assembly vote the funds, the construction of these quarters will be put in hand.

WINDSOR PLACE QUARTERS UNOCCUPIED.

380. *Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state as to how many Windsor Place quarters were unoccupied during the whole of the last Delhi Session?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: None of the quarters at Windsor Place was unoccupied for the whole of the last Delhi Session.

TRAINING OF INDIANS IN ARTILLERY, ENGINEERING, ETC.

381. *Mr. Ahmad Baksh: Will the Government be pleased to state what definite steps have been taken in the matter of training of Indians for Commissions in Artillery, Engineering, Air Force and Royal Air Force in pursuance of the promise given in His Excellency the Viceroy's speech of the 3rd of September 1921 when opening the second session of the Indian Legislature at Simla printed on page 14, Volume II of the Legislative Assembly Debates?

Mr. E. Burdon: The question of the admission of Indians to the commissioned ranks of the Artillery and Engineer services in India, as well as the Royal Air Force in India, is still under consideration.

As regards the Royal Indian Marine, I invite the attention of the Honourable Member to the reply given on the 18th instant to unstarred question No. 180.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: May I ask what has been the decision about the training of Indians for the Air Force?

Mr. E. Burdon: I have stated this in the reply which I have just given. The matter is still under consideration.

MAINTENANCE OF STANDING ARMY IN INDIA.

382. *Mr. P. P. Ginwala: With reference to the answer to my question No. 3, dated the 15th January 1923 (re the Statutory or other authority under which the Governor General in Council maintained a Standing Army in India), will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) Whether it is not the fact that all the three Statutes therein cited have been repealed by the Government of India Act?
- (b) If the answer to (a) is in the affirmative, whether it is not the fact that there is no express statutory authority for the maintenance of a Standing Army in India?
- (c) If the answer to (b) is in the affirmative, under what other authority is the Standing Army in India maintained?

Mr. E. Burdon: I wish in the first instance to express my regret that the reply which I gave to the question on the same subject asked by my Honourable friend on the 15th January last was incorrect. This was due, I need hardly say, to inadvertence, and the Honourable Member's present question gives me an opportunity of setting the matter right. The answer to his question is as follows:

- (a) Of the three Statutes referred to, the East India Mutiny Act, 1754, was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1867, while the Government of India Act, 1833, and the Government of India Act, 1858, were repealed by the Government of India Act, 1915.

(b) Yes.

(c) Under the inherent power of the Crown.

amicable decision on the grave issues at stake, but, after a few days, I could see that it was possible; and the ultimate decision, a compromise which we agreed upon was the outcome of a mutual feeling of friendship and a development of trust between both the communities—to such an extent that in a very little while a compromising spirit of give and take pervaded the whole of the atmosphere of our deliberations. Although I subscribed myself to a very minor minute of dissent, yet, Sir, after hearing what other Members, both European and Indian, have said here to-day and the eloquent speech of the Honourable the Leader of the House, Sir Malcolm Hailey, I, for one, representing as I do the domiciled community, am sure, nay, I am convinced, that I have every reason to re-echo what Sir Henry Stanyon has just said, namely, that the time is not far distant when there will be no more need for the existence of a Racial Distinctions Bill,—that both Indians and Europeans and the other communities in this country will work hand in hand as equals,—that justice will be administered and will be accepted in its administration,—as Sir Henry Stanyon put it, irrespective of caste, creed and colour. Sir, the pitfalls and difficulties which confronted us at this Racial Distinctions Committee were multanimous. At times we found that we had come to an impasse, but it was the skilful leadership of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and the tact and strategy of Sir William Vincent that turned this position to one of mutual understanding with the result that we have brought before this House this Bill,—a compromise—which I feel sure every community in India will accept with pleasure and satisfaction as a decided advance in equality of status. I compliment the Government on the production of this Bill, I compliment the House on the statesmanlike way in which it is accepting it and I am sure the House will pass it without any dissentient voice whatever. As my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, said the other day "After all it is the first step that counts" and I am sure we will take this first step with such confidence, that our succeeding steps will guide us towards a better understanding—towards a better and truer realisation of that reciprocal feeling of trust between the various communities which India needs and must possess in her endeavours to develop a nation out of the heterogeneous classes that inhabit this country. With these few remarks, Sir, I associate myself wholeheartedly with all that my friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, has said.

the basis of the compromise arrived at between the representatives of the different communities in this country. We now find that this is a clause which goes even beyond that. In this definition, His Majesty's Government have not accepted that very compromise on which we are asked to accept this Bill. This is the definition on which there has been a sort of veiled threat of disallowance of the whole Bill if the Indian Legislature insisted on doing away with the privilege that is being accorded to the Colonials in this Bill. Sir, I do not know how we should act on that veiled threat. I thought that the moment the rights of legislation had been given to us and along with it the rights of vetoing had been reserved for the higher authorities, there was no need of giving approval or disapproval or any sort of veiled threat before the Bill had been passed by us. As Sir Malcolm Hailey has found from the attitude of this House, they are prepared to accept the compromise, and it was a needless fear on the part of His Majesty's Government to have thought that the Legislature would not act on the compromise, or that the whole Bill would be dangerous or capable of mischief without the inclusion of Colonials in this definition. I think the Secretary of State or His Majesty's Government should have left it to the good sense and as is always apparent the sweet reasonableness of the Indian Legislature to accept the compromise and to allow any definition that may have been put in the Bill. If His Majesty's Government or the Secretary of State thought that there was any danger or that any provision in the Bill was capable of mischief, they were perfectly at liberty under the powers vested in them to disallow subsequently that portion which they thought to be improper. Sir, apart from that, let us see what will be the effect of the inclusion of the Colonials in this definition of European British subject. We are giving certain rights and privileges to this special body of persons and which rights and privileges we disallow to other Europeans and other Members of the civilised nations. We are giving certain rights and privileges to a certain class of Colonials while we deprive other Colonials of those rights and privileges which they had enjoyed before. Sir, we are giving certain rights and privileges to Colonials which will be resented not only by the Members of this House but also by the whole of the Indian community at large, because of the treatment that has been accorded to our fellow brethren living in those Colonies. I do concede, Sir, that so far as rights and privileges and concessions in criminal trials in those countries are concerned, we have the same rights and privileges in their country as they have got in ours, and we are prepared to give the same rights and privileges which we have ourselves got to those gentlemen who come from those Colonies to this country. But I am not prepared to give those gentlemen any rights or privileges superior to those which we ourselves enjoy in this country. For instance, the Indians in this country are subject to the jurisdiction of even second and third class Magistrates. Why should the Colonials be taken away from that jurisdiction? Why should they not submit themselves to the same jurisdiction which we Indians submit ourselves to? Here, if they have to submit to the jurisdiction of second and third class Magistrates, they will be on terms of equality with us, but the moment we put ourselves under the jurisdiction of those Magistrates and take out these Colonials out of this jurisdiction, we give them something more which we ourselves do not enjoy.

I do not believe, Sir, that it would be a reprisal if we give them the same rights which we ourselves enjoy. We give them the same rights that the highest in our country enjoys. We are prepared to give them the same rights which Americans and other European nations enjoy, and I do not think why we should give them superior rights. Sir, as for reprisal, I do not believe that any such will be the case; moreover if we are afraid of any reprisals from the Colonies owing to our taking away certain rights which we give to the European British subjects in this country, we should then also be afraid of reprisals from nations or countries other than the Colonials. For instance, America, or any other country. Further, Sir, it was said when the Bill was introduced and was moved for consideration that there were certain privileges which should not be withdrawn. I do not know why this definition of European British subject is to-day being put on the Statute Book. Under the old definition there were certain other people in the Colonies who enjoyed these rights. Why should they not enjoy it now? For instance, we may give a right to a Ceylonese to-day. But if the Ceylonese were to migrate to any other Colony, say South Africa, then two or three generations afterwards, his issue may not have the same rights which we may extend to him under the present definition in this Bill. For instance, his children or his grandsons or great grandsons or people of his descent in the male line will not have the same privilege as the present day European brother Colonials' issues will enjoy. It is quite incomprehensible to me on what ground this differentiation has been made. Moreover, there is another danger by giving this superior right to Colonials. The Colonials who do not like to give us equal rights in their own country will say "in your own country, by your own legislation, you recognise our superiority. How do you then claim equality in our country in other matters?" That will be giving them a weapon, an excuse, for putting us further down and heaping indignities and humiliations on the shoulders of our fellow-brethren. Sir, I could very well understand that those Colonials who have come to this country under the orders of His Majesty's Government or as servants of the Army and Navy may be given the same rights as the European British subjects and I would have conceded so far because they do not come to this country of their own choice. But why should those persons who have submitted themselves to our jurisdiction of their own choice, who have become permanent residents of this country of their own choice, have these privileges extended to them? With these words, Sir, I move that the words "or any Colony" be deleted from the definition of "European British subject."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, I was at first inclined myself to quarrel with the view taken by the Secretary of State in respect of this position, given to the Colonials but on reflection I thought it would be better that this country, uncivilised as it may be considered to be by these barbarians elsewhere might at least teach them a lesson, teach them a lesson in magnanimity, teach them a lesson that we can rise above passions and prejudices and if not thereby correct those people, at least enlist the sympathy and support of our European friends in this country and in Britain in all our legitimate fights which we are putting up in other directions in the colonies. Sir, if it were for the first time that an attempt was being made in this Legislature to include in the definition of European British subject the Colonial, we should have hesitated twice and thrice before we accepted such an inclusion.

what we are creating for the first time. That is one of the circumstances which weighed with me in this connection.

In the next place, as I have pointed out in my separate minute, if there is any reason at all for maintaining a distinction in favour of any class of people, that reason applies to the case of all people who are aliens in this country. I should advocate a distinction in favour of the Afghan, in favour of the Chinese, in favour of the Japanese, because there is as much justice in maintaining a distinction in favour of these people as there is in favour of European British subjects, because after all the whole thing turns upon whether they get fair justice or not in our courts, and these people are in a strange land and it must be admitted that as regards us, Indians, we do not distinguish an Englishman from a Colonial. I mean they are all alike to us. They do not associate with us as freely as they ought to do, and I do not know that we are able to make out the nationality of many of the members of the Civil Service present in this Hall itself. It is only for the first time I learn that the first Member of Council in Madras is a Colonial. It was for the first time I learnt on reading the report of the Local Government that the Governor in one of the provinces is a Colonial. I mean that that idea never crosses our minds. They are all whites to us: just as we are blacks to them, they are whites to us. But I daresay we are making a move to-day to abolish this colour distinction and I hope this will be a successful move. (Hear, hear.) Sir, it is quite true that very many people advocate that these strokes of retaliation should take place, but let us remember that our nature and our religion in this country forbid retaliation. We are always required to forgive, and in fact even in the case of the extremist politician in this country, the non-co-operator—what is his weapon? It is not anger, it is love (Laughter); and I have no doubt they will appreciate magnanimity on our part; the non-co-operators in this country, I am sure will appreciate the magnanimous spirit in which we are doing our work to-day, because, as I stated already, it is our main object to teach these people a lesson. Again, there are Colonies which misbehave. There also we have to remember. It is not all Colonies which misbehave. There are some Colonies like Mauritius, where equal rights are accorded. There is no distinction at all either in the political franchise, or the municipal franchise; no disabilities in acquiring land, no disabilities in owning property. But there are Colonies which impose the poll tax. I was pained to hear the other day that Indian labourers in Fiji have to pay a poll tax. Of course they say they do it to all alike, but the Indians come in for the largest share; and I hope, Sir, that when such treatment is brought to the notice of our European colleagues, our European fellow subjects in this country, they will agitate more strongly than we can do in these matters. Their agitation will be more effective. An appeal from our European fellow subjects in this land to their brethren in those Colonies will have a greater effect. Sir, in order to attain that end, with great reluctance I oppose this motion made by my friend, Mr. Agnihotri. I think he will on the whole be acting wisely in accepting this suggestion which has been made by Government. Let us not mar the passage of this measure by insisting upon this matter. I appeal to my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, to follow the example of the great man of this country, Mr. Gandhi, and exercise forbearance for his part.

Statute Law. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "I did not say that I said the Colonial was there already.") He said that the word "Colonial" was there already and that consequently we are not giving them anything more than what exists in the present enactment. That is wrong. Under section 85 of the Government of India Act to which reference was made by the Honourable the Home Member European British subject is defined as any subject of His Majesty born in Europe or the children of such subjects; that is the sole definition which occurs in the Government of India Act. Now, let us turn to the definition in the Indian Code of Criminal Procedure. There we find, not as my friend Mr. Rangachariar has pointed out, a person of European descent or extraction born in any of the colonies. The definition is "any subject of Her Majesty born, naturalised or domiciled in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or in any of the European, American or Australian colonies or possessions of Her Majesty or in the colony of New Zealand or in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope or Natal." The colonies are enumerated and as Honourable Members will see these are all self-governing colonies where people of the English race have settled down permanently. The definition now proposed by Government is a wide extension over the definitions contained in the Government of India Act and also in the Code of Criminal Procedure. I shall presently illustrate my meaning. The definition says, "domiciled in the British islands or in any colony." Honourable Members know there is such a thing as a Crown Colony, Ceylon and Kenya for instance. Under the present definition any person of British descent being a subject of His Majesty, born in Ceylon or Kenya would become ipso facto a European British subject which he would not have been under the definition in the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Government of India Act. In that sense and to that extent the definition is not a reproduction of the old definition contained in the two Statutes I have mentioned; and as my friend, Mr. Samarth pointed out the law at present is that a person of European descent or of British descent born in Ceylon is amenable to the general law applicable in Ceylon. In passing I may point out that the criminal law of Ceylon is almost a verbatim reproduction of the Indian Penal Code, and the Criminal Procedure Code there more or less follows the lines of the Criminal Procedure Code here. In the trial of cases in that country no distinction is made between a native born subject of Ceylon and a person of British extraction born in Ceylon. Consequently, we introduce this anomaly, that if a person of British origin is born or domiciled in Ceylon he will be tried under the general law in Ceylon itself, whereas if he crosses the Straits and is tried anywhere on the Continent of India he will immediately claim exemption under the proposed definition on the ground that he was born in a colony of England. That is the distinction. As I have said the distinction is a vital one. We are extending the definition of a European British subject. Let us make no mistake about it.

minimum which the British Cabinet or the Home Government insists and upon which the Government are prepared to proceed with this measure of legislation. If we whittle it down, if we alter it or suggest any alterations upon this vital principle, the progress of the Bill will be delayed and possibly the Bill itself defeated. Honourable Members know that we are now almost at the end of our term. Any further delay in the progress of this measure might jeopardise its final enactment during our life. Therefore I suggest that although we do not accept the principle and protest as have protested before against a decision which we consider to be an undue and unnecessary enlargement of the definition which exists at present on the Statute Book. But we have no alternative. We have to bow to the inevitable and say—“If this is all you can give us, we are prepared to take it, but I wish you will recognise that we are doing so under an emphatic protest. We are doing so because we fear that owing to some misapprehension on your part or those who have given you instructions, you have unduly and unnecessarily enlarged the definition of European British subject and brought within its compass people who never could have been brought under the existing definition.” This is the position, Sir, and in view of what I have said I think the House must now decide whether it is in favour of threshing out this question upon its merits or accept what has been offered to us and say “let us hope at least that in the near future wisdom will dawn upon those who are responsible for the introduction of this measure and that they will rectify the errors into which we are being led by force of circumstances.”

It is upon these grounds, Sir, that I have decided not to move the amendment worded in the same terms as those of the Honourable Mover of this amendment, and I request him to do what I have decided to do, namely, to withdraw the amendment.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, there is no counter-arguing with a downright sine qua non argument. At the same time, one must be quite clear with regard to what one is doing and can do in future. Dr. Gour has referred to section 65 (3) as containing a definition of European British subject. Well, my reading of that sub-section is not Dr. Gour's reading. Let us see what section 65 (3) of the Government of India says:

“The Indian Legislature has not power, without the previous approval of the Secretary of State in Council, to make any law empowering any Court, other than a High Court, to sentence to the punishment of death any of His Majesty's subjects born in Europe or the children of such subjects, of abolishing any High Court.”

I would not have taken up the time of the Assembly by reading that clause merely to combat Dr. Gour's point of view if I had not another object in view. In the Statement of Objects and Reasons, we have this sentence:

“His Majesty's Government are particularly interested in the Imperial aspect of the proposal, and they consider that the proposal of the Committee would raise an invidious and controversial question throughout the Empire. The Secretary of State for India in Council whose specific approval was required under section 65 (3) of the Government of India Act for certain provisions of the Bill has accordingly only accorded his sanction on the understanding that the definition proposed in the Bill will be accepted. On the other hand, it is recognised that the Committee have indicated clear grounds comes in so far as the question of Colonials on its merits goes. Is the position this, that, under section 65(3) of the Act, the Secretary of State has certain powers of withholding sanction because of the question as to whether a Sessions Judge should have the right of sentencing a European British subject to death or not? That is the whip hand; availing himself of that, he imposes other conditions. We ought to clearly understand the situation, and, if the condition he imposes is a sine qua non, we are, as Dr. Gour says, helpless and have to submit. If the condition is on any other ground, matters would stand on a different footing altogether. We are pleased and thankful to learn that His Majesty's Government is particularly interested in the Imperial aspect of the proposal and that they consider that the proposal of the Committee would raise an invidious and controversial question throughout the Empire. When we appeal to the Imperial Government in regard to other matters in the colonies in respect of their Imperial aspect and object to invidious distinction, they say: “The colonies have their own laws: how can the Imperial Government interfere with them?” That is the point where the difficulty comes in. I recognise, Sir, that it is absolutely no good now at all events, going into the matter in the way the Mover of the amendment proposes but we want to have the matter quite cleared up when Sir Malcolm Hailey is replying so that we may know how far this Assembly or its successor would be prepared to go in deleting the word in question or corroborating them later on after the colonies show responsiveness. Now is not the time.

THE CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

Majesty's Government supporting us in our demand for according better treatment to our own countrymen and countrywomen in the Colonies. As Sir Malcolm Hailey has pointed out, an obstinate attitude on this question might satisfy our pride to a certain extent that we have dealt a blow at the Colonies by retaliating. But it would be a childish and false pride indeed. That blow is bound to be ineffective. The Colonies are not likely to feel that blow, and we might be able perhaps to create more bad blood in the Colonies. If instead of that, if, instead of making an obstinate effort at rendering an ineffective blow on a matter which is not really pertinent to our political position in the Colonies, if we at this moment supported His Majesty's Government, we should then have the right of claiming the support of His Majesty's Government in getting better treatment accorded to our own countrymen and countrywomen in the Colonies. It is because I think our attitude on this question would be a capital, would be an investment for the future, that I support the attitude taken up by His Majesty's Government.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The amendment under discussion involves questions both of detail and of principle; and I may be pardoned if I deal first with the questions of detail that have been raised, for it is necessary to do so, since some of the suggestions made to the House were to my mind misleading. Mr. Agnihotri told us that he saw no reason why when this Legislature had been given its powers, the Secretary of State or the Home Government should not be content to rely on their powers of veto. He suggested that if any clause of the Bill as passed by us was unsatisfactory to the Home Government, they could veto that clause. But as has appeared from the discussions this afternoon, we have to reckon with section 65 of the Government of India Act under which the specific approval of the Secretary of State to certain sections of this Bill would in any case be necessary. It would not therefore have been possible for the Home Government to rely purely on the power of veto. Nor indeed would it have been possible for His Majesty's Government to veto, as Mr. Agnihotri suggested, a single section of the Bill. If the Bill contained sections which they could not accept, they would have been obliged to disallow the whole. Mr. Agnihotri, again, compared his own position in moving this amendment to that of the Committee, which, he said, recommended that the status at present enjoyed by Dominion subjects should be taken away from them. But here he is wrong; his position is not that of the Committee, for it will be realized that while the Committee, both the majority and the minority, considered that some protection should be given to Colonial Members of His Majesty's forces serving in India, Mr. Agnihotri's amendment would withdraw even that amount of protection. Again, he drew a comparison between Colonials and Americans; he suggested that we should give the Colonials the same rights as Americans. Now of course his amendment would not do that. It will be admitted everywhere, I think, that when we have certain Treaties which force us to give to certain nations, six in number, the rights at present enjoyed under section 460, we cannot deny those rights to Americans generally.

[Bhai Man Singh.]

any Court other than the High Court to sentence to the punishment of death any of His Majesty's subjects born in Europe

Mr. President: Order, order. I cannot allow a repetition of the discussion on that point. The Honourable Member must confine himself to the terms of his amendment.

Bhai Man Singh: The point to which I wish to draw the attention of this House is that we should not take the position imposed upon us out of sheer helplessness. The utmost that the Secretary of State can do in the matter is to say, "All right. I do not allow this law to be passed to the extent that the Sessions Judge or any other Court below the status of a High Court can pass the sentence (of death)." I personally, Sir, would prefer not to give a superior status to a Colonial gentleman whose country does not give to our countrymen equal status, and I would prefer to have a law in the country that every European British subject should only be tried for offences

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member is getting a long way from the subject.

Bhai Man Singh: I am submitting, Sir, that even if the Secretary of State uses his powers under section 65 of the Government of India Act, still it should not mind it and we should carry this amendment. There are two alternatives before us. One is that the Secretary of State would disallow the law we pass to the extent that no Sessions Judge or no Court other than a High Court can pass any sentence of death. I would allow that discrimination in favour of the European British subject to remain to that extent, rather than give a Colonial, whose Government does not give equal status to the Indian, a superior status in my own country. That is my very clear position, Sir.

I think I am perfectly in order when I request the House to accept this alternative that is proposed in section 65 rather than accept this position which is highly incompatible with the self-respect of my countrymen. My Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar in his speech said that there are colonies and colonies

Mr. President: The Honourable Member from Madras has not spoken on this amendment.

Honourable Dr. Sir Chimanlal Setalvad, Kt., LL.B., LL.D., Members of the Executive Council of the Governor of Bombay, on the proposals to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, based on the recommendations made by the Racial Distinctions Committee."

"We are of opinion that the subjects of those British Dominions and Colonies in which Indians are denied the rights of British citizens and equality of treatment should not have any privilege accorded to them in India. We desire that our view should be communicated to the Government of India."

Not only that, we have got another opinion of another eminent lawyer, the Additional Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, who says:

"I agree to the proposed change. I note that members of the overseas dominions are deprived of the right of European British subjects. But I consider this is quite fair in view of the attitude assumed towards Indians by these Governments. The question can be settled hereafter by negotiation between the Government of India and the Governments of the dominions."

Sir, it really pained me when I heard my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar preach to me this sermon of magnanimity and tells me that it is religion that makes it a duty of mine to be magnanimous. I do know that religion enjoins magnanimity, but at the same time, if Mr. Rangachariar wants to join issue with me, I will tell him from the Scriptures of nearly every religion from his own Gita, from the exact words of Shri Krishna that there are times when we have to retaliate. I really wonder that in the name of magnanimity we should do this. I say in the name of sheer self-respect, we should say "No, my dear Sirs, if the Colonies are not going to give us the status of citizens, for God's sake let us give them a superior status in India." Sir, the great point that has been made at by these Colonials is the Imperial question. My Honourable friend Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas very vehemently and strongly laid stress on the point that if we submit to the wishes of the Imperial Government . . .

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas : Not 'submit'; 'support'.

Bhai Man Singh : I think it is 'submit'; you think it is 'support'—if we support the views of the Home Government, we shall have a claim on them to help us in getting equal rights in those Colonies. I would request Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas to consider whether we have not already got more than enough claims on the Home Government to support our claims in the Colonies. We have been crying out for years together to the Home Government to support us. What more is needed?

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas : Why not have one more weapon in our armoury?

Bhai Man Singh : I take the other side of the question. The Colonies have been treating us as they have for a long time but they find the Imperial Government still helping them and trying to give them a higher status in India than what the Indians even are given.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"After clause 6 add the following clause:

'6A. In section 188 of the said Code for the words 'Native Indian subject' substitute the words 'British Indian subject'."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I do not raise the point whether this amendment was out of order, but it will be sufficient to say that it is exactly one of the points that can be dealt with in consolidation. It is a matter of verbiage. The same words are used, of course, in the Government of India Act, but if necessary they can be put right when we prepare our consolidating Bill.

The amendment was negatived.

Clauses 7, 8 and 9 were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 10. The Honourable Member (Mr. Agnihotri) proposes to raise in amendment No. 22, a question which appears to me to be outside the scope of the Bill. That question ought to be raised on some other measure dealing with general legal procedure and not in a measure of this kind where we are dealing with racial distinctions alone.

Clause 10 was added to the Bill.

Clauses 11 and 12 were added to the Bill.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: I move:

"For clause 13 substitute the following clause:

'13. Section 275 of the said Code shall be omitted'."

Section 275 is as follows:

"In a trial by jury before the Court of Session of a person not being an European or an American, a majority of the jury shall, if he so desires, consist of persons who are neither Europeans nor Americans."

What I want is that there should be no differentiation in trials as regards British Indian subjects and European British subjects. I submit that we ought to have juries chosen by lot and this section is unnecessary. Clause 13 runs as follows:

"(1) In a trial by jury before the High Court or Court of Session of a person who has been found under the provisions of this Code to be an European or Indian British subject, a majority of the jury shall, if such person before the first juror is called and accepted so requires, consist, in the case of an European British subject, of persons who are Europeans or Americans, and in the case of an Indian British subject, of Indians.

(2) In any such trial by jury of a person who has been found under the provisions of this Code to be an European (other than an European British subject) or an American, a majority of the jury shall, if practicable and if such European or American before the first juror is called and accepted so requires, consist of persons who are Europeans or Americans."

I beg to submit that no such distinction ought to be made and I do not think that mixed juries would do any good except perpetuating the racial differences between the two communities. If there is a mixed jury, the Indian jurors will return a verdict in favour of the Indian accused and the European jurors will return a verdict in favour of the European accused. So, the better thing will be to select the jurors or assessors by lot as is provided in other provisions of the Code.

advice of that Committee and the advice of the Committee was that the Bill should be opposed. The main reason, I think, for that attitude of the Committee was that every step should be taken to raise the standard of legal practitioner in this country and they thought that, if the principle of this Bill were adopted and given effect to, the reverse might possibly be the result. Sir, to come back to the opinions of the Local Governments on which, as I say, Government's attitude must be largely based. In the first place, I think we found that to a large extent the favourable opinions, or those opinions which merely indicated no objection to the Bill, emanated from those areas where, admittedly, there are no Mukhtars. For the most part in the areas where Mukhtars do practise doubts have been expressed as to the wisdom and expediency of this measure. The reasons which have been urged against the measure are all quite simple. I listened very carefully for some definite and positive advantage that Maulvi Abul Kasem expected from the passing of his measure. The one positive advantage was that it would remove a sentimental objection. All his other arguments in favour of his Bill were, I think, of a negative character, that this objection that had been raised in one quarter was over-estimated, that another objection really was not sound, and so on. The real point that the main objectors to the Bill bring out is that the legal profession is already over-stocked, that the public of this country can get their legal advice readily and cheaply, and that the Bill, if it were passed in this form, would have the result of very largely increasing the number of unqualified legal practitioners. There are, it is quite true, many very competent and very excellent Mukhtars. Possibly the majority of the Mukhtars are quite competent to appear in the Magistrate's Court, but it is another thing to say that you should, therefore, give the whole class of Mukhtars the absolute right to appear before a Magistrate and also before a Sessions Court. If, Sir, we remember that the real reason for which the legal profession exists, namely, to assist the courts in this country in the administration of justice, I would put it to the House whether that reason, that object, will be achieved, will be furthered by a measure which will tend to increase the number of practitioners who have not got the best and fullest qualifications. (Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: "What about the Honorary Magistrates?") (Mr. Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: "What about the Barristers?") I think, Sir, that those are the main objections to the Bill. The standard of legal attainments among the Mukhtars, as a class, is somewhat low, and if you bring them in with an absolute right to appear before the criminal courts, will it not tend to lower the standard of the legal profession as a whole? Some critics have even suggested, I do not put it forward as my own criticism at all, but it has been suggested, that the inclusion of Mukhtars as a regularly recognised branch of the legal profession might even tend to a deterioration of the very high standard of professional morality which does exist in the Bar in India.

Sir, I have nothing more to say on the subject. Government was rather anxious to hear the views of the House on this subject. Those who have spoken against the measure have taken objections on technical grounds. Sir, I have not followed them into that field of criticism at all, because some of those technical objections might possibly be removed if this Bill were referred to a Select Committee, though I would point out to the House that the Select Committee might find it somewhat difficult, if those objections are valid, to remove them within the ordinary terms of reference to the Select Committee.

On the merits, Sir, as I say, the opinions which guide Government in this matter seem to be slightly weighted against the Bill.

case, Lord Shaw, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, pointed out that that was not the definition of an antecedent debt and that the term 'antecedent debt' in the case of a Hindu son meant a debt which was wholly unconnected with the security of the family property. This gave rise to a very large conflict between the various High Courts and the Madras High Court in a Full Bench sought to distinguish the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council, and pointed out that the Privy Council could not have intended to change the law which they had themselves enunciated in a series of cases ranging for over fifty or sixty years. This Full Bench case of the Madras High Court was followed by another Full Bench case of the Patna High Court. In the United Provinces, however, there has been a great conflict. In some cases the old view of the Privy Council has been reiterated and followed, while in other cases the narrower view understood to have been enunciated by the Privy Council in Sahu Ram's case has been given effect to, and the Lahore High Court has followed also the narrower view of their Lordships of the Privy Council. I wish to point out to the House that there has been a great confusion in all the High Courts because of these cases decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council, and I think it is the accepted policy of the Legislature that whenever the courts are not agreed and there is a conflict of decisions between the various High Courts on a vital point of law, the Legislature should interfere and define and remove the conflict. My Bill is intended to serve that purpose. It will be for the Select Committee to decide as to whether they wish to accept the previous view of their Lordships of the Privy Council or whether they wish to stereotype the narrower view enunciated in Sahu Ram's case; whether in fact they wish to follow the Full Bench decisions of the Madras and Patna High Courts or whether they wish to follow the later decisions of the Patna and Lahore High Courts. Honourable Members will find that this question about the liability of a Hindu coparcener to pay a debt incurred by the father or by any other manager is a question which has been agitating the courts in this country for a very long time past; and the question of what is the burden of proof in a case of mortgage and what is the burden of proof in a case where the alienation is complete and the property has passed out of the family, are questions very closely connected with the question I have just now referred to. This and allied questions are therefore questions which I ask the leave of the House to refer to this Select Committee consisting of the Members I have named. I shall be very glad indeed to add the names of any other Member who may desire to serve on the Select Committee. I feel, Sir, that so far as the opinions are concerned a body of opinion is in favour of the Bill; the Calcutta High Court for instance says that this is a question which is generally concerned with the question of the codification of the Hindu law; and their Lordships point out that this question has the same underlying principle as Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's Bill. I think that Bill has gone to the Select Committee, and I think it is therefore also necessary that this Bill should go before the Select Committee. I move, Sir, that the Bill be referred to the Select Committee consisting of the Members I have already named, with Sir Henry Stanyon and Mr. Pyari Lal in addition.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanyan (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I oppose this motion. The question of the liability of a Hindu coparcener is a question which if I may say so, of some doubt fifty years ago, but during the last years the cases have settled the matter and no practitioner of any consequence has any doubt about the liability of a coparcener in a joint Hindu family. An attempt at legislation like this would be justified if there was a demand from the public or from those concerned in the administration of law and justice. Well, there is absolutely no demand. Is there any pressing evil existing which requires removal? Is there any particular hardship which ought to be relieved? Those are the questions which arise when a new piece of legislation is put before the Legislature. There is none. Well, the litigation that has centred round this matter is like other kinds of litigation which arise in certain relationships. Take the case of an agent. The question was whether the acts of an agent bind the principal, and to what extent they bind him. In spite of the fact that there is an Act defining the liability of the agent, in spite of the existence of an Act, such questions do come up before the Courts, because in the variety of transactions which arise in the course of business, there must be disputes and such disputes must necessarily come up before the Courts if the parties do not agree. So also in the case of partnership. What are the particular acts of one partner which will bind the other partners or the firm? There again we have a codified law, and yet we find on record a large number of cases in regard to disputes arising between parties. Therefore, a legislation like the one proposed by the Honourable Mover is not going to cut down litigation or stop disputes between parties in disagreement, and therefore it is unnecessary on these two grounds to undertake the present legislation.

Sir, there is another wider aspect of this matter. Members seem to think that legislation is a game at which they could all play. Legislation has nothing to do with mere legal knowledge or ability to advocate causes in Court. Legislation, I am afraid, seems to be a sphere of activity which, unless the Assembly takes it into its head to put down at an early stage, will grow to inordinate dimensions. It may also be said by an unkind critic that it advertises a particular name all over the country. But I would not charge my friend Dr. Gour with any such desire because by his works he is well known all over the country, and therefore let him not take that remark as applicable to him. But yet it will create in this matter that impression; whatever Dr. Gour's eminence may be as an author or compiler of books, as an advocate and as a legislator, people competent to speak on such matters have not been good enough to approve of this piece of legislation. Well, Mr. Justice Wallace of the Madras High Court says that the drafting seems to be crude and amateurish. Well, that is some thing like what Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar said some time ago 'every one trying to practise his prentice hand at legislation.' Mr. Justice Coutts-Trotter, another Judge of the Madras High Court, who has recently edited a Hindu law work, which is a classical work in India, says "The Bill has a comprehensive title to define the liability of a Hindu coparcener" which is not justified by its contents." Well, its contents I could find in any well known book on Hindu law. It is an analysis of the various circumstances, of the various heads which are generally noted down by every practitioner of standing and by every diligent student when he studies this portion of the Hindu law; that is, he analyses for his purpose the various heads, and the various conditions under which the subject is brought. Now legislation is something different from a text-book, from an analytical statement of the law, and therefore Mr. Justice Coutts-Trotter's commentary about the title of the Bill is quite justified.

Now coming back for a moment to Mr. Justice Wallace's criticism, he says "The definition of 'antecedent debt' is faulty. The phrase

[Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam.]

'unconnected therewith' is too vague. In a sense a mortgage executed to discharge a prior debt is 'connected' with it" and so on. Now, Sir, the answer to all these criticisms has often been, "I will put it before the Select Committee; the Select Committee will set the defects right." That is, it seems as if the practice is growing to throw a rubble stone at us, and we are to polish it, give it shape and see whether it has got anything inside it. That seems to be the practice in putting forward Bills before this Legislature. Another Judge of the Madras High Court, Mr. Justice Kumaraswami Sastri, is dead against the Bill. He says "It is not necessary."

Now as to the conflict arising from Sahu Ram's case, well, there is no conflict in any one particular High Court. There is a difference of opinion between one High Court and another. Such differences of opinion have always occurred and do exist, especially in regard to Hindu law. If on that basis you were to legislate on every occasion when there is a difference of opinion between one High Court and another, I think the Legislature would have nothing else to do but go on examining these decisions on Hindu law. Well, as to the particular case on which my Honourable and learned friend has based his legislation, no sooner that case was reported than a number of suits on the basis of that or on the supposed authority of that suit were filed in Madras and they were set at rest by the decision of the Madras High Court, which said that it would prefer to follow its own long course of decisions. Therefore, there is no trouble in Madras where probably the largest number of cases arising out of these joint family liabilities are to be found.

From Bengal the same opinion has come. "The Governor in Council feels very doubtful as to the wisdom of undertaking piece-meal codification of Hindu law with a view to bringing about uniformity of interpretation between the different High Courts." Now in regard to this matter our late Law Member, Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, was strongly of opinion that piece-meal legislation in the Hindu Law would be a very dangerous attempt, for it is silly, it is almost inconceivable to think that the Hindu law which we have in regard to our personal rights is a piece of law which any one of us can at once say is wrong, and that it is not founded on justice, equity and good conscience, and that any one of us, because in our individual conceptions we think that something ought to be different, can try and rectify it. I think, Sir, it is too much of a presumption to think that we can really improve upon a piece of law which exists and which has reached its present stage, not by any process of tinkering but by a process of evolution, which evolution has always had regard to the changing circumstances of environment and civilization in life. Now, that an attempt should be made to break off such legislation from the process of evolution it has attained is, I think, an attempt which requires a good deal of hardihood, if not a great deal of juristic and legal knowledge.

As I think on this occasion only the principles of the Bill ought to be discussed, this attempt to legislate on this matter is an attempt which ought not to be encouraged: on the contrary it ought to be discouraged.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, with reference to a Bill of this sweeping character, I feel, Sir, that I should join in the debate as a representative from Bengal. No doubt, cases occurring under the Mitakshara law in Bengal are not so numerous as in other parts of India, but still Mitakshara law is administered in Bengal as well. I should like, therefore, to place certain points of view before this House with reference to the operation of the Bill. The prima facie object, if I may say so, of the Bill is to clear up disputed matter and that is the view point with which we are principally concerned. The next point is the question of piece-meal legislation with reference to Hindu law as detached from the entire system of Hindu law. Now, Sir, as regards the first point, I will at once submit to the House that, so far as I have been able to understand the opinions of the different Judges and other eminent persons who are qualified to speak on the subject, the conclusion, in a remarkable degree seems to be that the Bill itself will add to the difficulties, rather than take away anything from the difficulties. In this connection, Sir, I may place one or two observations before the House coming from the Honourable Sir B. C. Mitter, who was Advocate General in Bengal for some time. He says in his opinion given on the subject:

"If I were convinced that the Bill would serve the purpose which the private Member introducing it has in view, namely, really to remove doubts and difficulties, I would welcome it. The fundamental position of those governed by Mitakshara law is that property is held by the family and not by the individual as in the case of Hindus governed by the Dayabhaga law, Muhammadans or Christians. The property being held by the family, it seems to me that it is not right that the manager should have increased powers of dealing with it."

Then, Sir, analysing the different provisions of the Bill, he comes to the conclusion—"If the plaintiff has to prove that the manager has incurred liability within the scope of his authority, I believe, he will get his decree binding the family property under the present law and from that point of view, clause 9 is not only unnecessary but positively mischievous."

Then he goes on to say:

"What justification is there for a statutory provision that the decree will be enforceable even though the other members who may be adults have not been made parties to the suit."

Then again:

"The whole difficulty at the present moment is to prove that the manager has incurred liability within the scope of his authority and clause 9 as drafted begs the question by making it incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that fact."

Now, Sir, if some time was devoted to the consideration of the question now before the House, it would be evident at once that it is not only the opinion of eminent lawyers who were consulted and who are entitled to speak on the subject that the Bill instead of diminishing them adds to the difficulties of the present situation, but the question in the end will resolve itself into one of fact. That is to say, the fundamental principles of the Mitakshara school being admitted and there being no attempt in Sahu Ram Chandra's case to change the fundamental principles of that school, the thing that will give trouble will generally be a question of fact and not so much of law. Therefore, Sir, apart from the second question, to which I shall presently draw the attention of the House, the main question about the removal of the difficulties relating to the liabilities of a son to pay his father's debts will not only remain, it seems, unsolved by the Bill, but in certain respects, it will add to the difficulties of the situation. If we go to the Madras Judges, the House will find that a similar opinion has been expressed, and, in some cases, in a very pointed form. I will not detain the House with any further discussion of the question of the expected removal of the difficulties by the present Bill, because anybody who has taken any trouble to go through the opinions which have been expressed on the subject from different parts of India will find that a large body of the opinions expressed, and in fact the major portion of it, tends that way, and I propose to leave the matter there.

The second point is the question of piecemeal legislation. Honourable Members will remember that in the very first year of its existence, the House had to face that question of codification of Hindu Law at the instance of my Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. That question of codification of Hindu law has engaged the attention of the Government of India, I do not know for how long—it may be quite forty years now. (Mr. T. V. Sheshagiri Ayyar: I never asked for codification.) I beg to correct an error—it was Dr. Gour. (Dr. H. S. Gour: Error No. 2. I never asked for codification either.) It was Mr. Bagde, then. Some Member, Sir, initiated the debate. I am speaking from memory, and the House will forgive me if I have made a mistake. But ultimately the Resolution asking for codification was withdrawn. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru—Honourable Mr. Sapru as he then was,—went very fully into the question and placed the pros and cons of the subject before the House. The difficulty seems to be this,—in all codification we give a fresh starting point, as it were, to the proposition that is to be enunciated as codified law. This codified form in the present instance is enunciated irrespectively of the context of the Hindu law which may have any bearing or relation to the point under codification. In other words, if the proposition is formulated in a particular way in a Code, we have to refer to the formulation itself and according to the primary laws of interpretation we have to consider the words of the Code itself and not the previous literature on the subject, unless of course, there is some doubt on any point. But, where the wording is clear and the proposition of law is clearly enunciated, we cannot introduce any such mode of interpretation. Now, Sir, I will just refer the House to one or

1 P.M. two observations made by one of the Honourable Judges of the Madras High Court. Mr. Justice Deva Das says in his note on the subject:

“I am not in favour of piecemeal legislation. If the whole of the Hindu law is to be codified it will be a tremendous task and unless the large majority of Hindus are in favour of it, it will be unwise to attempt legislation as regards the personal law of a large community which is supposed to be intimately connected with their religion.”

He then goes on to consider the particular merits of the case of Sahu Ram Chandra:

“In a recent case Mr. Justice Spencer and I had to consider Sahu Ram's case and the two cases decided by the Privy Council following Sahu Ram's case.”

Then he says:

“One of the points decided in Sahu Ram's case was: a mortgage was not an antecedent debt. In the three Privy Council cases, the personal remedy was not outstanding. We were inclined to the view that if the personal remedy against the father was outstanding at the date of the subsequent mortgage, the previous mortgage would be an antecedent debt. The present Bill if passed into law will create more difficulties than those it is intended to remove.” etc.

And then he goes on to consider in detail the provisions of the various sections of the Act.

Now, Sir, as has been pointed out by some of the Honourable Members who have spoken on the subject already, the Hindus as a community have not come forward to have their law on the subject formulated or added to or altered in any particular manner, and specially in the manner in which it is proposed to be formulated by the Bill. And the House will see that in the opinions which have been obtained on the subject it has been pointed out that the formulation of the rights and liabilities in question in the Bill itself is not in accordance with the statement of the law as it is found in the Mitakshara school, and various instances have been given in these opinions of such divergences. So that, the Bill, in the garb of codifying the law, is modifying the law in certain respects. The Bill will really create a new law on the subject to some extent. That is one point which emerges very clearly from the Bill as at present drafted. There is a conflict of rulings if I may say so, on various other points of Hindu law and the courts subordinate to any particular High Court follow the interpretation of the law given by that particular High Court, unless that interpretation is overruled by the Privy Council. Therefore, Sir, the case in point, Sahu Ram Chandra's case so far as this particular point of a coparcener's liability is concerned, will be the law for any particular court which has to follow the interpretation which has been put upon it by its own High Court. (Dr. H. S. Gour: “There is a conflict of the High Courts themselves.”) Yes, but there is separate machinery in the Charter of the High Courts for setting that right. I mean, that in case of conflict between two decisions of the same High Court on any point, there is the full Court, and directly there is a conflict of judicial decisions in any single High Court, it is for the full Bench of that Court, or the Full Court, to set the conflict at rest, and to lay down any particular proposition of law which may be taken by it to be the correct interpretation of law. I have already said that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has the power to set aside any incorrect interpretation of the law by any High Court in India. Sir, here I may remind the House of a well-known dictum of Lord Halsbury's which I may say has been reiterated and re-affirmed over and over again—that a case is only authority for what it actually decides, that the ratio decidendi in any particular case cannot be extended even by a logical process to other correlated cases, even where you think that you can so extend its operation, by a process of natural inference. Even there you will not be justified in extending its operation in that way as a matter of law. There lies the danger of a sweeping generalization, of codification from the particular to the general. Therefore I submit the House will consider the question now before it with great care, and if the House is satisfied in its innermost heart that the difficulties which are supposed to have been created by a certain Privy Council ruling will be really removed by the provisions of the Bill now before it, then and then only can the House think of committing a Bill of this kind to a Select Committee upon an acceptance of its principles. Now we are getting more and more familiar with the activities of the House in reference to various intended alterations of the Hindu law. I for one, Sir, have never made a secret of the fact that I always look with suspicion upon any such attempt to alter the Hindu law. Yes, it is suspicion because some times it is found that where we want to codify Hindu law, in reality the intention is to modify it. And if my suspicion has been justified whenever I have taken the pains to analyse the propositions as to codification which have been placed before the House now and again, I think, Sir, the fact will afford some justification for the opposition to the Bill, I am now placing before the House. Therefore, Sir, I request the House in all fairness to go through the opinions of eminent judges and eminent lawyers whose opinions have been elicited on the Bill, and I feel sure the House will think it prudent not to commit a Bill of this kind to a Select Committee and allow it to become law at a later stage.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): It is no doubt, Sir, a very difficult matter to legislate in regard to Hindu Law. Say what you will, Sir, the fact remains that in the country the Hindu law as it is administered, is according to the decisions of the various High Courts and of the Privy Council. Now, Sir, in the matter of the liability of sons for the antecedent debts of the father, I know as a matter of fact that in districts this question is always in dispute, and a very difficult question it is always for courts to decide because the various High Courts have decided this point differently, and in some case our High Court in one case has decided in one particular manner and at another time in another manner. It is I think fit and proper that the Legislature should come to the assistance of those persons who are governed by the Mitakshara law and put all these points at rest.

As regards the different provisions of the Bill, it may be that they are not very happily drafted. That matter might be considered in the Select Committee. But on principle I think the Select Committee will be only doing its duty if it succeeds in however small a degree in removing the doubts on most important parts of Hindu law which exist at present because of the decisions of the various High Courts. Now, Sir, on this very subject as to the liability of Hindu sons for the antecedent debts of their father I have in my hand the opinions received here, and among them is the opinion of the Marwari Association in Calcutta. The letter of the Secretary of the Association says:

"My Association is of opinion that in view of doubts and difficulties at present existing as to the state of the law on the subject and considering all the circumstances, it is expedient that the Legislature should intervene and lay down clear provisions. My Association represents a class of persons who are subject to the Mitakshara Law and who are vitally concerned in the subject-matter of the proposed legislation."

Sir, it is not quite correct to say that this is a matter, as decided by the various High Courts, which does not cause any difficulties or any troubles on the parties. People in the United Provinces are governed mostly, with the exception of a few Bengalee gentlemen who may be there, by the Mitakshara law and I know how frequently the Courts are used by the parties for the purpose of deciding questions bearing on this branch of the Hindu Law.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, Honourable Members will remember that when this Bill was before the Assembly on the last occasion, my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, had proposed that it should be referred to a Select Committee. The Assembly then agreed that the Bill should be circulated for the purpose of eliciting opinion. Well, Sir, those opinions are not yet complete. Government were waiting until they were complete to decide the attitude they should adopt as regards the principle of this Bill. When the opinions are complete, they would normally be referred to the Standing Committee of this House attached to the Home Department, and then we should be able to come to some conclusion as to whether the principle of this Bill is sound or otherwise. We are not therefore prepared to say that the principle of this Bill is sound if, on the other hand, the Assembly considers that the principle is unsound, Government are not prepared to contest that view. But, Sir, we do not think that if, on the other hand, the Assembly are rather inclined to take the view that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, before they do that, they should see the complete opinions, and that therefore, instead of accepting the present motion, it should rather be postponed. I think, however, Sir, that out of courtesy to the House, I should cite the opinions of the Bombay Government. They were included in a letter from that Government dated the 17th of February, which was received in the Legislative Department yesterday and was given to me after the Assembly adjourned last night. I propose, therefore, to cite the opinions in that letter and its enclosures somewhat at length, so that Honourable Members may be aware of them. The Bombay Government state:

"In the opinion of the Governor in Council the main arguments against the Bill are that:

- (1) it is piece-meal legislation;
- (2) it strengthens the idea of a son's pious duty to pay his father's debt;
- (3) it unduly favours the creditor;
- (4) it will break up the coparcenary system;
- (5) it is unnecessary; and
- (6) it attaches liability to non-contracting parties. Moreover, the Mitakshara law has been interpreted differently in different provinces and an attempt at All-India legislation will merely create confusion."

The Bombay High Court state:

"I am directed by the Honourable the Chief Justice and Judges to state that they are not in favour of the Bill and some of the Honourable Judges object strongly to such piece-meal legislation relating to Hindu Law."

The Honourable Mr. Justice Fawcett said:

"I am against weakening the safeguards which the Privy Council have laid down as to the doctrine of 'antecedent debt.' A recent case heard by Marten J. and myself has well exemplified the necessity of those safeguards. Otherwise a money-lender will be easily able to avoid the onus of proof, that ordinarily lies upon him of showing 'legal necessity' or family benefit for his loans to a Hindu father, who is a member of a joint family."

The Judicial Commissioner of Sind writes at length against the Bill. (Mr. J. Chaudhuri: 'Is anybody in favour of it?') Practically, I believe, no one from Bombay. That is practically the main line of the Bombay opinion. The opinions of various High Court Judges have been referred to by Mr. Subrahmanayam and Mr. Mukherjee. I would like to cite definitely the opinion of the Madras Government, because I believe the Mitakshara Law is the main law in force in that Presidency. They state:

"His Excellency the Governor in Council does not consider that this measure is likely to be useful unless its intention is to break up the Hindu joint family system and make what hitherto has been understood to be joint family property as between a father and his sons to be the absolute property of the father."

Then, the Honourable the Chief Justice of Madras notes:

"If it is desired to codify Hindu Law this does not seem to be the way to do it. I should imagine that every line of this Bill would result in litigations and conflicting decisions of the court."

Well, Sir, as I have said, if this House is not prepared to endorse the principle of this Bill, then we also are not prepared to contest that view. If, on the other hand, they wish to refer it to a Select Committee, we would suggest rather that the motion should be postponed than that such a decision should be arrived at now when the opinions are not complete. The opinion of the United Provinces Government, I would point out, has not yet been received. The leading case, Sahu Ram's case, which, it may be suggested, led up to this Bill, and the later case, Chet Ram's case, which, it may be suggested, rightly or wrongly, has already settled the alleged conflict of opinion, were both cases from the United Provinces, and as I have observed, that Government's opinion has not yet been received.

Dr. H. S. Gour: In view of what has fallen from the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, I would ask leave of the House to withdraw my motion for reference to the Select Committee. I would particularly point out that the three Governments vitally concerned with this branch of the law are the Governments of the United Provinces, Bihar and Orissa and the Central Provinces (A Voice: 'And Madras'), and Madras. Of these, the Central Provinces and the Bihar Governments are unequivocally in favour of the Bill, but at the same time I should like to have the opinion—and very valuable opinion it would be—both of the Government and of the High Court at Allahabad. I ask, Sir, for leave to withdraw this motion. I shall renew it later on.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I think the sense of the House is to throw out the motion altogether. Therefore, I am against withdrawing it. Dr. Gour first of all gave us . . .

Mr. President: The Honourable Member objects to leave being given?

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Yes, Dr. Gour in his opening remarks gave us to understand that the balance of opinion received was in favour of the Bill. But from the passages that have been read out to us I think there is not a single favourable opinion quoted anywhere, perhaps except what Mr. Pyari Lal has quoted. In view of that fact, I think it will be in the interests of saving time that we should not trouble any Select Committee with this Bill or trouble other people about it. Sending this Bill to any Committee is pure waste of time. I think if the House is consulting their best interests, they should throw out this Bill straight off.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I also oppose the motion for giving leave to withdraw this motion. We have considered it at length. We have to see whether really this Bill is needed at all. There was . . .

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member speaking on the motion for withdrawing the Bill? The only question before the House is that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. No question has been put from the Chair regarding withdrawal. If a Member asks for leave to withdraw and the Chair says 'Is it your pleasure that leave be given to withdraw the motion?' then, if objection is taken, the debate proceeds. There is no question of leave being given to withdraw before the House now.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I speak on the merits of the Bill itself. The only justification urged in support of this measure is the conflict of decisions between the various High Courts following Sahu Ram's case, but it is rather curious that the author of this measure, who introduced it in November 1921 has not taken note, has not cared, to inform the House that subsequent to his Bill in March 1922, after he introduced the Bill, Sahu Ram's case was re-considered by the Privy Council in the light of the conflict of decisions of the various High Courts. They re-affirmed the decision in Sahu Ram's case, in Chet Ram's case reported in XLIX Indian Appeals, and reported also in 44 Allahabad. So that the only ground urged for this measure to set at rest the alleged conflict of views disappears altogether. So the Privy Council has once for all decided and re-affirmed what they have decided in XXXIX Allahabad. Now there may be another ground. If the Privy Council go wrong, if they affirm a proposition which is opposed to Hindu notions, no doubt the Legislature will intervene and ought to intervene. Now what are the propositions laid down in Sahu Ram's case? Two propositions are affirmed by the Privy Council as regards the definition of antecedent debt, that the debt in respect of which the liability is sought to be imposed on the son must be one incurred independently of the security offered by the joint family property. The second proposition laid down in Sahu Ram's case is that the pious obligation to pay the father's debt does not arise till the father's death. Can it be said that either of these propositions is inconsistent with ancient Hindu law, or Hindu law as understood by the people? If either view is opposed to the Hindu law, or prevailing Hindu notions as regards enforcement of the son's liability, I can understand legislation intervening and legislating in order to set right where the Privy Council have gone wrong. So it is not a case of setting at rest a doubt or conflict between decisions; what my Honourable friend wants to do is to set right the Privy Council . . .

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: And create a new law.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: And create a new law. Now the question is, do the circumstances call for it? Is the decision so opposed to Hindu law that the Legislature should intervene? Now, Sir, what is the obligation? Why should the joint family property be taken away by an extravagant father? You know the liability of a son to pay the father's debt. Unless the debt is illegal or immoral, the son is liable to pay the debt according to Hindu law. Now in enforcement of that pious obligation oftentimes especially minor children are deprived of their property because the father happened to be extravagant, and the protection for the children is taken away by the enforcement of this liability. Therefore, as has been truly pointed out, my Honourable friend is now trying to favour unduly creditors.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Money-lenders.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Money-lenders, and deprive poor people of their interest in ancestral property. Therefore, I say he wants to unsettle what the Privy Council have settled. Nowhere do the Privy Council in their decision say this is a new law; they say this is according to the Hindu texts. In the decision in XXXIX Allahabad the learned Judges took care to say: "We have examined the Hindu texts on the subject and we find the view we take is in accordance with the Hindu texts." And there when the Privy Council have taken the trouble, twice over, to settle what should be the law on the subject, unless we are satisfied that that law is unsound, that that law is opposed to Hindu notions, that that law is opposed by the Hindu community, why should the Legislature intervene? Where is the demand by the Hindu community for legislation of this sort? Where has Dr. Gour allowed time to elapse in order to enable the Hindu community to express dissatisfaction with the decision of the Privy Council in March, 1922? My Honourable friend was himself apparently unaware of that decision, for otherwise I could not justify his not referring to it in his opening remarks to-day. He still called on this House to legislate in order to set at rest conflicting decisions of the High Court which took place before the decision in March, 1922. Either he did not properly lead the House, either he was ignorant of the decision, or he purposely omitted to refer to it. Therefore, Sir, I take it in a case like this where you want to tinker with the existing law, a strong case has to be made out. Honourable Members will agree that when you want to legislate on a matter like this which has been settled by a long course of decisions from Indian appeals, when you want to unsettle it, you must make out a strong case. My Honourable friend has not made out any such case. That is so far as the son's liability is concerned. The Bill deals with another aspect, that is to define the Coparcener's liability. What is the difficulty which has been felt either in the case of a debt contracted by the managing member of a family either for necessity or for the family benefit? The manager can alienate property, he can borrow for either of those purposes, what is the necessity for stating the law? There is no conflict of decisions. No practitioner has felt any difficulty in applying the Hindu law in that respect. Sir, further this Bill is open to another objection. It combines substantive law with adjective law. Sections 2 to 4 of the Bill deal with substantive Hindu law. Sections 5 to 9 deal with questions of evidence and procedure. Even so, Sir, if Honourable Members will take the pains to look at the Bill—I think very few have taken the pains to do that—Honourable Members will realize, for instance, the great difficulty which must exist in this matter of codification. I can sympathise with Dr. Gour. It is not easy to codify Hindu law. Look at the language of clause 9, sub-clause (3): "Where a decree directs sale of the rights, title and interest of the defendant in any property, the question whether the sale so made suffices to pass the entire estate of which the defendant was the manager or only his own interest, is one of construction and intention to be gathered from the proceedings and other circumstances of the case." Do you want a section for that? Is this the way to enact laws? And again take section 3—"Notwithstanding anything otherwise held to the contrary." What is the meaning of that? What does it mean? I do not think I can do any better, but I feel here really is the apprentice hand, and it is not right that we should allow a law like this in a matter already settled by judicial decisions. There are other things. For instance we have family property. My Honourable friend uses three terms to connote the same thing. For instance in clauses 3 and 4 he uses the expressions "family property," "estate" and "coparcenary estate." He uses three terms in the Bill to denote the same thing. Of course these are matters which can be set right in the Select Committee; but I only wish to show what difficulties there are in the way of codifying a matter like this. And has he at least tried to codify completely any particular department of Hindu Law? Now, in Hindu Law, Joint Family is perhaps the longest and largest chapter; it comprises so many things. You have to deal with alienation, alienation of moveables and immoveables, debts, joint family, self-acquisition, partition, survivorship and so many other heads under which you would have to codify the law, if any attempt is made at all for codifying Hindu law. This is an unnecessary measure, an uncalled for measure, and it is open to serious objection; the language is very loose and it does not correctly describe the law, and it attempts to unsettle a decision of the Privy Council without any ground for the same. Therefore, Sir, I oppose this measure.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, it has been very refreshing

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member going to reply to the whole debate now?

Dr. H. S. Gour: Yes, Sir.

Mr. President: I presume he will take some time.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Yes, Sir.

Mr. President: In that case I think we had better adjourn till Half Past Two.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Half Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. Abul Kasem was in the Chair.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I shall very briefly now reply to the various arguments advanced against the committal of my Bill to the Select Committee. Before doing so, I shall certainly be failing in my duty, Sir, if I did not point out that some of the Honourable Members who have criticised my Bill have not paid me the compliment of even reading it, while others like Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, who got up and made an emphatic statement that not a single person was in favour of the Bill, unfortunately could not have turned the pages of the compilation of opinions which the Government supplies free and gratis to the Honourable Members of the Legislative Assembly. For if he has only casually glanced at that compilation, he would have found that it was not a case where not a single person supported the Bill: but on the other hand a large body of opinion of persons who count in the Provinces affected by my Bill were not only in favour of my Bill but unequivocally and whole-heartedly supported it. I am astounded to hear the statement repeated by Member after Member that this is a Bill which need not even go to the Select Committee; and Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, whose interest in the Bill is evidenced by his conspicuous absence from his place, was even not prepared to give me the leave which I wanted in response to a suggestion made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Tonkinson, for a further postponement in order to complete the opinions particularly of the Allahabad High Court and of His Excellency the Governor of the United Provinces.

Now, Sir, I will very briefly refer to a volume of opinion of the persons and Judges who are in favour of my Bill. I am under the painful necessity of having to do so, because my friends, Mr. Rangachariar and Mr. Subrahmanayam, seem to have suddenly developed some short-sightedness, for while they quoted from the opinions of Puisne Judges of the High Court of their own Province they forgot the opinion of the Chief Justice.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: May I say, Sir, I never relied on any opinion. I relied upon my own opinion.

Dr. H. S. Gour: They forgot the opinion of the Chief Justice of Madras who says:

"I have no objection to the object of the Bill or the principle embodied in it."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I do not think that is an opinion of the Honourable the Chief Justice of Madras.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I am sorry, Sir. It ought to be Mr. Justice Oldfield. Now, Sir, I shall deal with the most important Provinces affected by this Bill. As I have said, the Provinces primarily interested in this Bill are the orthodox Mitakshara Provinces, Bihar and Orissa, the United Provinces, the Central Provinces, and partially Madras. Now, Sir, look at the Bihar and Orissa Province:

"The Governor in Council considers that the principle underlying the Bill is a question that should be left to be decided by non-official opinion in the central Legislature. I am to add that in the opinion of the Local Government a decision of this much discussed question by means of legislation would be beneficial to the Hindu community by reducing long and expensive litigation. The creditors of the Mitakshara joint family and the debtor family itself would be in a position to know where they stand and the time of the Courts would be saved."

That is an emphatic opinion from the Province of Bihar and Orissa, which is directly affected by my Bill, in its favour.

I turn now to the Central Provinces and Berar, another orthodox Mitakshara country. His Excellency the Governor, writing through the Legal Secretary to the Government, says:

"Though the law, however, is clear, there is a great majority amongst those consulted by the Governor in Council in favour of altering it on the lines of Dr. Gour's Bill, and the Governor in Council agrees with the majority on the ground that the Privy Council decisions are contrary to the current of previous decisions in India, a tendency unduly to restrict the powers of a Hindu father who is manager of a Mitakshara joint family. The Governor in Council therefore approves of the first four clauses. He thinks it advisable that it should be made explicit in the Bill that the change in the law which it is proposed to make will only have prospective effect."

Then, Sir, we have the North-West Frontier Province, Burma, and Delhi supporting my Bill. Last but not least the Marwari Association of Calcutta,—a very important body of orthodox money-lenders as my friend says,—merchants represented here by my friend there, strongly support my Bill, not in the interests of any particular class or community or interest but in the interests of the general administration of justice. My friend, Mr. Pyari Lal, has already read out to the House the opinion of this important body, the Marwari Association of Calcutta. Let me quote one sentence from their communication. "My association is of opinion that in view of the doubts and difficulties at present existing as to that state of law on the subject and considering all the circumstances it is expedient that the Legislature should intervene and lay down clear provisions."

In the face of this phalanx of opinion collected and presented to the Honourable Members of this House I am surprised that a remark should have escaped my friend, who has just now strolled into the House, that nobody was in favour of this Bill and that leave should not be granted to collect further opinions from persons vitally affected and directly interested in it. Sir, I now turn to the individual criticisms hurled against me and my Bill by Honourable Members of this House. First and foremost there is my friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, who says "What do you want this law for?" In a curiously cynical way he says "The law is quite clear; the Judges do not want any alteration of the law" and then finding that the principle was too strong for him he descended into the details and tore me to pieces clause by clause. Well, Sir, my dismembered remains still remain to reply to him; and I feel that even in my mangled condition I shall be able to give a good account of myself to my friend's destructive criticisms. I have always understood that detailed criticism of the drafting of a Bill was not the subject of proper discussion at this stage when what we are concerned with here is the central principle, the basic principle. If this House is of opinion that that principle should be accepted, the details are relegated to the Select Committee. My friend gave the go-by to the main principle and attacked the details, the wording of the several clauses in my Bill. I do not think I shall waste the time of this House by defending myself, for the simple reason that if I had any idea that the draft of my Bill was above criticism I should not have come here to ask for leave to refer it to the Select Committee; I should have asked this House then to pass it without amendment and without further consideration. Therefore, I submit that the very fact that I ask this House to allow me to take my Bill to Select Committee shows that I am perfectly prepared that the whole draft should be examined clause by clause and improved upon in the light of the opinions of Members of that Committee and that the official draftsman should improve upon my draft in the way acceptable to him.

Then, Sir, we have the opinion of my friend, Mr. Rangachariar. I have always a very great respect for Mr. Rangachariar when he is not infused by religious enthusiasm, but when a question comes up in which a statement of Hindu law is concerned, Mr. Rangachariar deteriorates into language and thoughts which do not admit of any serious criticism. He asks me, Sir, if I have heard of Chet Ram's case, and if I have done so why did I not inform the House about it? Now, Mr. Rangachariar, if he had turned to the very first page of the opinions given by the Madras Government, would have found reference to Chet Ram's case given in clear black print, which could not have escaped the Argus eye of my learned friend opposite. They have pointed out what Chet Ram's case and what Sahu Ram's case decide. Therefore I submit the observations which my Honourable friend made that Chet Ram's case overruled the Madras High Court Full Bench case and has reiterated and re-affirmed the previous decision in Sahu Ram's case are entirely wide of the mark. If Chet Ram's case has done so, if it has overruled the Madras Full Bench case, then it is all the more reason why this Bill should come before the Select Committee and we should decide once for all whether the Madras Full Bench case was right or wrong or whether Chet Ram's case was right or wrong, because there is a conflict between the Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court and the view of their Lordships of the Privy Council. I submit, therefore, it behoves this House to settle this long thorny question of Hindu Law by either deciding in the manner decided by the Madras High Court or by their Lordships of the Privy Council. Instead of being an argument for making short shrift of my Bill it is an argument for its committal to Select Committee. Then, Sir, finding my position invulnerable on the main ground upon which I have asked this House to give me leave to take my Bill to Select Committee, my friend followed the example of his colleague, Mr. Subrahmanayam, by descending into the petty details of the Bill. He said that these details of the Bill have not been well drafted and that they are very amateurish. Whoever in this House, Sir, ever accused me of being anything more than an amateur draftsman? And I cannot understand why my friend should have wasted his words by criticising the draft of a measure of which the principle, and the principle alone, should have been the subject of discussion. But, Sir, the cat was let out of the bag not by Mr. Rangachariar, but by my friend Mr. Mukherjee. He, at any rate, was more frank and candid in his confessions than my friend, Mr. Rangachariar. He used no language masked in legal jargon. He said 'I do not like this Bill, because I do not like any encroachment upon Hindu law', and that is perfectly intelligible. I can quite understand and respect my friend Mr. Mukherjee when he meets me face to face and says that being an orthodox Brahmin he does not want any interference with his ancient laws, but I cannot understand my friend Mr. Rangachariar, who masquerades in the guise of the critic and gives his reasons, suppressing and obliterating his real undying prejudice to any reform in Hindu law or Hindu religion. That, I submit, Sir, is a position which is not intelligible to me and it does not do him any credit. Why does he not come straightforwardly and say 'I don't want any reforms. I revolt against all innovations, and I shall not have any reforms of our laws'? That, I submit, is a position which is perfectly intelligible to me and would be intelligible to the House.

Now, Sir, I have shown that this is a measure which has met with a large body of support from the provinces which I have quoted, and they are provinces which count. I have shown, Sir, that the criticisms directed against my Bills do not and should not affect the judgment of this House at this stage. I therefore, Sir, feel confident that the House will give me permission to take this Bill to the Select Committee.

THE LEGAL PRACTITIONERS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill further to amend the Legal Practitioners Act, 1879, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, Mr. P. P. Ginwala, Munshi Iswar Saran, Sir Montagu Webb, Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao, Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (in place of Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy, who is not here), Sir Campbell Rhodes, Mr. Pyari Lal and the Mover."

Sir, while introducing this Bill, I briefly stated its genesis. This Bill is intended to legalise the enrolment of women duly qualified to practise at the Bar. Honourable Members will find that in a recent full Bench judgment given by the Patna High Court, a lady graduate, who was otherwise qualified to practise at the Bar, was refused permission on the ground of her sex, though I am informed that permission has been given to a lady law graduate by the Allahabad High Court. The decision of the Patna High Court proceeded mainly upon the interpretation of the word "person." Their Lordships' view was that, when the Legal Practitioners' Act was enacted, the word "person" meant a person of the male sex and that, therefore, it could not mean and include a person of the female sex. My short Bill is intended to make this clear, what I deferentially submit, was already clear in view of the provisions of the General Clauses Act which lays down that the word "person" means a person of either sex. But in order to remove the difficulty created by the decision of the Patna High Court, I crave leave of this House to take this Bill to the Select Committee. I think, Sir, that there could be no two opinions about the propriety of my Bill. In England, by the removal of the Sex Disqualifications Act, the disqualification which previously attached to members of the female sex has been swept away, and I submit that the disqualification which has been held to exist in this country should also be removed by an Act of the Legislature. I do not apprehend that there will be any opposition on the part of the Government. It might, however, be said that the Legal Practitioners Act does not at present extend to the Presidency of Bombay and that, therefore, it would be better to frame an independent Bill on the lines of the English Statute. But, Sir, persons who are qualified to practise at the Bar are daily growing in numbers. Only the other day, we received a message from England that about 10 ladies were called to the Bar and there are a few Indian lady graduates in law. And I, therefore, submit that the amendment I ask this House to make would sufficiently meet our immediate requirements; and, if hereafter the Government think of passing an independent Act removing generally the disqualifications attaching to the female sex, they would be at liberty to do so. And, if in the Select Committee they convince that body that an independent Act would be preferable to an Act ad hoc such as my Bill is, I should be quite prepared to allow them to substitute their Bill for mine. I ask, Sir, that the principle of this Bill should be decided here and now and in favour of the female sex.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, my Honourable friend by the Bill before the House proposes to insert a definition in section 3 of the Legal Practitioners' Act to the effect that a person includes a woman. Now, Sir, what will be the effect of this definition? And in this connection I must refer to the details not of the Bill but of the Legal Practitioners' Act. Let us refer to section 4. Section 4, Sir, lays down that a person entered as an advocate or a vakil on the roll of any High Court shall be entitled to practise in all Courts subordinate to the Court and so on. Now, Sir, if the word "person," the second word in that section, includes a woman, that will not mean that a woman, because of this Bill will be able to be enrolled as an advocate or a vakil. Advocates or vakils are enrolled, Sir, under the rules made by the High Court under the Letters Patent. And in order to make sure that a woman who fulfils other requirements shall be enrolled as an advocate or a vakil, it would be necessary to amend the Letters Patent. (Cries of "No, no.") I think, Sir, that there is little doubt that that is correct. We go on to section 6. Section 6 deals with pleaders and mukhtears. Here I agree that the question is different. The insertion of the definition proposed by my Honourable friend in the Legal Practitioners' Act will secure that for the area to which the Legal Practitioners' Act extends that women may be enrolled as pleaders and mukhtears. But it will only secure this for the areas to which the Legal Practitioners' Act extends. There are several areas in India to which the Legal Practitioners' Act does not extend, and I will merely cite the case of the Presidency of Bombay as being the most important. I presume, Sir, that the purpose of my Honourable friend is to secure that women shall be as eligible as men for enrolment in all the various grades of legal practitioners. This is not done by this Bill, and I submit, Sir, that the Select Committee appointed on the motion before the House could scarcely amend the Bill so as to secure the object which my Honourable friend has in view. It could not, I think, be amended, in particular, because of the fact that an amendment of the Bombay Act will require the sanction of His Excellency the Governor General under the Government of India Act, and that sanction has not been obtained. Honourable Members will remember the discussion on the Resolution moved, I think by Mr. Joshi, if I remember aright, when Dr. Gour moved as an amendment to the Resolution about the disqualification of women from being electors to the Indian Legislative Assembly to the effect that the sex disqualification as regards legal practitioners should be removed. Sir, we consulted Local Governments upon that question and the opinions have been placed in the Library. I hope that they have been seen by Honourable Members. If I may summarise those opinions, the general opinion is that whilst there is no substantial objection to making women as eligible as men to enter upon a career as a legal practitioner, the question is one which in the present condition of India should be decided by Indian opinion and Government should not attempt to guide that opinion. We referred the question to the Standing Committee attached to the Home Department and they advised that when the next stage of the Bill is reached, Government should point out the defects of the Bill and endeavour to obtain the view of the House as set out above. They advised that Government Members should not vote on this question, but if the House does accept the principle, Government should undertake to bring in a Bill which will secure that the principle is accepted. The Government of India, Sir, have accepted the advice of the Standing Committee. They would like, therefore, to obtain the opinion of this Assembly on the general question, on the general principle. If this Assembly accepts the principle that women should be as eligible as men for enrolment in all grades of legal practitioners, then Government is prepared to draft a Bill, which will really give effect to this Bill. Sir, I suggest that, if my Honourable friend will agree, such an opinion could be obtained upon the motion now before the House. If it is decided on this motion to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, that Select Committee need not meet, and the acceptance of the motion now before the House could be regarded merely as an acceptance of the principle to which I have referred. Government would then draft a Bill and would introduce it in the Legislature as early as possible. Of course, the fact that Government is neutral means, I need hardly say, that Members of Council will not vote, but that all other official Members may vote as they please.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I, Sir, interpose at this stage of the debate to explain my position with reference to what has fallen from the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson? The motion before this House is for reference of my Bill to a Select Committee, and under the ruling of you, Sir, this House, if it adopts my motion, will only commit itself to the principle of the Bill, namely, that women should be eligible to practise at the Bar as men. The Bill will then go to the Select Committee. If acting upon that principle, the Government introduce a measure giving effect to the principle accepted by this House, I shall not convene a meeting of the Select Committee, and in that case the Government measure will replace my measure. That was my intention, and it is with that object in view that I made it clear in my opening speech that if the Government feel that the object my Bill has in view can be better served by a larger measure introduced by the Government, I shall not make further progress with the Bill. With these reservations, Sir, I move that my motion that the Bill should go to the Select Committee should be voted on by the House.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I desire to give the principles of this Bill my hearty support. It has been long overdue. We have had Indian lady doctors—and very capable Indian lady doctors for the matter of that—for many years. Before any other University thought about it, my University—it is nearly 40 years now—admitted a lady graduate and she graduated in Medicine later. Women law practitioners are not rare in this country. In solicitors' offices and elsewhere they are doing good work, and the latest report from England really takes away all the conservative objections that were so long held in England, which has been behind hand of Calcutta in admitting ladies as graduates. The particular lady Bachelor of Law, to whom reference has been made by Dr. Gour, is one of the most distinguished graduates that the Calcutta University has turned out. There was another before her whom the Calcutta High Court did not see its way of admitting. We are changing opinions faster in these matters than in the West and I think this Assembly should give its sanction and blessings to the principles of this Bill, and I think also that what Mr. Tonkinson has indicated would be the best way of proceeding, because that would be a comprehensive all-India measure.

Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-ulah (Bhagalpur Division: Muhammadan): (The Honourable Member spoke in the *Vernacular.)

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, I did not mean to speak on this simple question, but as a Behari Muhammadan friend of mine has spoken in this House, I am compelled to rise to say that the view he has taken cannot be the view of any cultured Muhammadan or of any sensible man, from our part of the country. The view he has expressed is opposed to common sense, humanity, civilization, and everything sensible. Simply because a woman appears before the Court is it possible and reasonable to suppose that the judge would pass an opinion in her favour? That is silly. I need only say this much that a Muhammadan cannot possibly tolerate such an expression of opinion in the House openly as has been put forward by my Honourable colleague and I oppose it, and support Dr. Gour.

Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Khan (North-West Frontier Province: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I have much pleasure in supporting Dr. Gour. My Honourable friend who has just spoken in Urdu, was prompted to oppose this Bill from a chivalrous spirit because he does not desire that our fair sex should have the duty of appearing before the Court. He did not mean it in another sense. I have much pleasure in supporting this Bill on the following grounds. We know that a good many ladies, especially purtlah nashin ladies are very badly handicapped. When they want legal advice, on account of the purdah system, they cannot consult any barrister or pleader, so if we have lady barristers or pleaders, or even Mukhtars, I think we will be doing justice to the fair sex. Moreover, Sir, India is now advancing. The old days are gone and our women must come into the field, and even those women who are married. I think they will be a great help by working at the Bar. Though I come from a very backward Province, I must say in regard to the remarks which have fallen from the lips of my Honourable friend to the effect that the courts will be prejudiced, that there is some truth in that, but still I think it will be a great trial for our judges to exercise their impartiality. Another thing which has not been brought to the notice of this Honourable House is that the presence of ladies as barristers in court will make the judges and the barristers behave themselves.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Official): I rise to say a few words in regard to this question as there has been considerable stir about it in Bihar and Orissa. In that Province of Bihar and Orissa, a lady qualified herself for the legal profession after passing the necessary examinations, but when she applied for permission to practise at the Bar, she was told that, as the law stands, she could not obtain that permission. The Patna High Court also took the same view. Now, Sir, we all know that there are ladies in other parts of the world who have qualified themselves for the legal profession, and have been practising at the Bar, and there is no reason why the same treatment should not be accorded to our ladies in India. There is, Sir, a keen feeling in regard to this matter, especially as there is no restriction on ladies qualifying themselves for the legal profession, but it is strange that as soon as they qualify themselves for the legal profession, they should be told that they cannot practise at the Bar. As we all know, there are hundreds and thousands of female litigants in all parts of India, and as things stand at present, they can communicate with their male lawyers only through some men, some of whom are illiterate, and the result is that in so many cases, the cause of justice suffers. For these reasons, Sir, I think the principle of the Bill should be accepted.

(An Honourable Member: "The question may now be put.")

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir as a Member of the European Bar in this country I give my support to the principle contained in this Bill. I agree with what the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson has pointed out that the Bill itself, which proposes that the word "person" in the Legal Practitioners' Act should include a woman, will not carry out the purpose which is desired and may lead to embarrassment. I do not at all indorse the apprehensions which were advanced by my Honourable friend who spoke in Urdu. Our Judges and Magistrates are to be subjected to a good deal of trial by legislation which is going to alter the law; and many things have been said about them; but I do not for a moment apprehend that susceptibility to female charms will take them away from justice. My friend was alarmed lest a young female advocate should carry away by her charms the judge, the witness, and even the pleader on the other side. I do not apprehend that. He said that the remedy which the public would find for that state of affairs would be to have ladies on both sides, and that would take away practice from the male practitioners. I do not know what would be the result of having ladies on both sides; I would rather not attempt to speculate; but I think the time has gone by when we can claim disqualification on the ground of sex. Women have proved themselves qualified in every department, particularly in the medical department, as pointed out by my friend Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary; and there is no doubt whatever that in this country women lawyers of ability, experience and trustworthiness will be a great help in dealing with clients who are unable to emerge from the pardah to consult male advisers.

For all these reasons, I support the principle of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

THE CASTE DISABILITIES REMOVAL (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. K. Muppli Nayar (West Coast and Nilgiris: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Mr. President, in asking leave of the House to introduce my Bill to amend the Caste Disabilities Removal Act of 1850, I wish to express my regret for my inability to bring up this matter earlier because of certain personal disabilities and because of the trouble in Malabar—I have very little to add to what is stated in the Statement of Objects and Reasons and I wish only to explain a few points so that Honourable Members may clearly understand the difficulties which it is sought to redress. Act XXI of 1850 provides that any law or usage which inflicts on any person forfeiture of rights or property by reason of his renouncing his religion or being deprived of caste shall cease to be enforced as law. Let me mention at the very outset that the present Bill is necessitated by the peculiarities of the law which govern certain communities that exist in certain portions of two districts on the Malabar Coast. The Marumakathayam and Aliasantana Laws are peculiar to the West Coast and I think nothing like them exist anywhere else in the world. The Aliasantana Law agrees in the main with the Malabar Marumakathayam Law. Under Marumakathayam Law all rights of male members to the tharawad or joint family and the property dies with them, their wives and children having no share as each of them belongs to the tharawad from which the wife comes. The tharawad or family is perpetuated through the female members such as all the sisters and nieces and their daughters and so on. One basic principle on which the law stands is that no partition is allowed except with the consent of every member of the family, and in practice, generally partition is an exception. To take a concrete example a tharawad is composed of X, Y, Z, three sisters and A, and B, two brothers and all the children of X, Y, Z, and all the children of the daughters of X, Y, Z and so on, with the eldest member as Karanavan or head man who manages the family property. From this we see that membership of a tharawad runs up even to hundreds. It is therefore not difficult to discern the troubles that will arise when one of the members of such a large family becomes a convert or is deprived of caste, but still insists on his or her civil rights. To say that such a convert is entitled to joint residence, joint mess, participation in the performance of religious ceremonies and in the guardianship over the minor members of the family, etc., is simply outrageous. That a person who becomes a convert or has lost caste can occupy the office of Karanavan and discharge secular and religious duties appertaining to that office is inconceivable. I submit that in my opinion the right to be a Karanavan with powers of management cannot be a right to property which is saved by Act XXI of 1850. I further submit that I consider a right to joint mess or living, and participation in the family ceremonies cannot be such rights. A convert therefore forfeits these and similar rights by his change of religion under the general law and usage, and the Act XXI of 1850 ought not in my opinion to operate to prevent the forfeiture of these rights. But, on the other hand, suppose it is contended that Karanavastanam is a right protected by the Act. This is not merely a hypothetical case, for, before the rebellion—though as a consequence of which I know of no case—I say, before the rebellion, there was a suit pending in a District Munsiff's Court where a Nayar convert was claiming his right to be the Karanavan of the tharawad. Even if it be contended that Karanavastanam is a right protected by the Act, the interests of the family I think require that a convert Karanavan must not be allowed to exercise his sway against the will of the rest of the family. A Karanavan, representing the family, interests himself and participates in several functions all or most of which have their foundation in religion. By change of religion, he is effectually prevented from representing the family in those concerns. He becomes incompetent to participate in the family ceremonies and he cannot organise or supervise them. He cannot enter the family house without polluting. He cannot direct the family discipline. He cannot join the family mess. He is disallowed from being the guardian of the minor members. He becomes disqualified in several other ways. His continuing to deal with the family property, unconnected with the matters noted above, as a manager by birth-right which he cannot fully discharge owing to his change of religion, would result in the curious spectacle of the family having two representatives, one to officiate at functions which the convert cannot attend to, and the other to exercise the residuary powers of management. Such a state of affairs would lead to confusion and complete dislocation of the family management. One example of the absurdity of the existing law, if literally interpreted, may be that it may not be possible to sue to forbid an apostate Hindu from entering the holy precincts of the family temple. The tharawad has no need for a convert who is for all intents and purposes nothing more than a dead branch of it. I may here mention that in some castes all the formalities and ceremonies on death are performed when a member becomes a convert or loses his caste. I am sure the Legislature when it passed Act XXI of 1850 had not considered the peculiarities of the Malabar Law which has not the safety valve of partition. It could hardly have been the intention of the Legislature to cause disruption or to offend the religious feelings and susceptibilities of the other members of the family by continuing in a convert rights, such as already mentioned, which from the very nature of things could only be exercised by one who continued to be a member of the corporate body.

The Madras High Court has found a difficulty in harmonising the principles of Act XXI of 1850 with the essential characteristics of the law on the West Coast. The recent Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court (Pathumma versus Raman Nambiar reported in I. L. R. 44 Madras at page 891) makes extremely desirable that a convert member's rights in a Hindu Marumakathayam or Aliyasantana family ought to be made clear. It was decided by a Division Bench of the Madras High Court in a case (Kunhichekku versus Sydia Aruncaden reported in 1912 Madras Weekly Notes, page 286) which went up from Malabar that conversion of a member effected a dissolution of the joint tenancy and created a tenancy-in-common as amongst the coparceners of the family.

This decision enlarged the rights of a convert by giving him a right to partition, though it, at the same time, prevented the anomaly of a convert Karanavan managing the Hindu Marumakathayam family or of a convert member insisting on his right of joint residence, etc. This interpretation of the rights of a convert was not, however, accepted as correct by the Full Bench referred to above who held that change of religion of a member did not work any change in the impartible nature of the coparcenary. Giving the convert a right to partition will adversely affect the interests of the family. I would put a premium on conversion—a result which would be undesirable from the Hindu point of view. It would enlarge the rights of the convert—a result not intended by the Statute. There would be still another danger. The proper method of partition having been held by the Madras High Court to be per stirpes (and not per capita), a convert member could get a pretty large slice of the family property by his conversion. For example, in a family of one brother, one sister and her half a dozen children, the brother becoming a convert might claim half the family property. In ordinary cases, this kind of thing is rendered impossible as partition can take place only with the consent of all the members, who can therefore arrange their respective shares as they choose. It may also be noted that one of the Judges who constituted the Full Bench, Kumaraswami Sastri, J. observes: "I am of opinion that all that the convert is entitled to is to continue to reside in the house and be maintained as before if the other members are willing or to get separate residence and maintenance allotted to him if the other members refuse". This is however only an obiter dictum. The Full Bench further reserves its opinion whether a Karanavan after change of religion could continue to be the Karanavan. Chief Justice Wallis observes in this connection: "The question of the plaintiff's right to succeed to the office of Karanavan is not before us and I express no opinion about it as it may involve other considerations". It is not, however, difficult to foresee the troubles and complications which may arise from a bad precedent due to mis-construction of existing provisions and, therefore, I claim the Legislature must now intervene and make the law clear and unambiguous. I do not wish to go into the law in Indian States, but if we are to judge in a matter of this sort from what exists in Cochin and Travancore, where Marumakathayam prevails, then also an amendment in the present Act here to make it at least clear is necessary. I may add I have made provision for the convert's enjoyment of the individual rights capable of separate enjoyment. What is aimed at is to prevent injury to the family without at the same time jeopardising the rights of the convert. The Courts have very often held that the most important right of the member of a Marumakathayam or Aliyasantana family consists in the right of being maintained out of the family property. By the present amendment the convert's interests regarding this would be preserved, while at the same time the family would be saved from any danger of disruption and of interference from the convert. It is hardly necessary to add that where a member is readmitted into caste no question at all arises, or where the convert is the sole surviving member his right to the whole property remains uncontested, or that nothing in my Bill prevents any private arrangement that may be arrived at with the consent of all the members of the family. The Legislature owes an amendment of the present Act to the invariably large number of other members of the family who will all become social outcasts if, due to the existing law, they are forced to mix up with the convert. I therefore consider an amendment, in the form suggested in my Bill, is both necessary and expedient. In spite of the discouraging remarks from my Honourable friend Mr. Subrahmanayam, against attempts at legislation, I now beg to move for leave to introduce the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. Muppil Nayar: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

THE MONEY LENDERS BILL.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (Meerut Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg leave of this Honourable House to introduce the Bill which is standing in my name, called a Bill to license and regulate money-lending transactions and to limit the interest charged on loans of various kinds in British India.

I may say, Sir, at the very beginning that some section of my Bill may not be liked by some of my Honourable friends here, and they may be supposed to be impracticable. But that question can be dealt with later on. I would not mind even expunging those sections which might be repugnant or which might not be practicable from any point of view later on. That matter will be considered when I come to the next motion of this Bill, but so long as two main points which I really aim at from the point of view of the constituency which I have the honour to represent—that is, the zamindars and tenants class are provided for, I would not mind if all the sections of my Bill are taken away. But I will try to show, Sir, that each section which I have put down in this Bill has got a certain bearing on the uplift of eighty per cent. of the population of this country.

Primarily, Sir, I deal with the question of granting receipts. What we see, Sir, here is that illiterate people, when they borrow some money from a money-lender and they go to make a payment towards the satisfaction of their old debt, the payment is written at the back of the bond, which is sometimes a registered bond. I think and I hope that those of my Honourable friends here who belong to the legal profession might have come across certain cases, as I have come across them, of hardship caused to these people. I found, Sir, in several cases (in one of them I was myself a little bit concerned) that the stipulation was, as it invariably is, that whatever money is paid towards the satisfaction of the bond, would be entered at the back of the bond. Without that, no excuse will be listened to. A man borrows Rs. 5,000 and goes and makes a payment of Rs. 4,000, which is entered at the back of the bond. Later on the money-lender if he wants to be dishonest, what does he do? He makes a report at the police-station—"I have lost my bond; such and such a paper, and other valuables have been lost"

Mr. President: Order, order. I must point out to the Honourable Member that he is going into too great detail. This will be appropriate when we come to clauses 8 and 9, but at this stage I cannot allow him to go into the question in such elaborate detail.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: I was saying, Sir, that this was the principle underlying the Bill; I was not dealing with the clauses. As I was saying, Sir, he puts up an advertisement and offers a reward and then naturally he can prove that his bond is lost; then, later on, he applies for a copy from the Registry Office and he gets it and sues in the civil court for Rs. 5,000 plus interest although Rs. 4,000 has been paid up. The debtor may say that he has paid Rs. 4,000, but the court will not listen in the absence of a receipt

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is still discussing the details of the Bill. If he will consider what he has been doing he will see that his speech is an appropriate speech only to the motion that such and such a clause do stand part of the Bill. He is entitled to say now briefly that certain practices prevail and that this Bill is necessary in order to remedy grievances arising out of those practices; but I cannot allow him to use this stage to discuss the details of those grievances or of the remedies which he has embodied in his Bill.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: Very well, Sir, this is an argument which I have set down in the Statement of Objects and Reasons.

Mr. President: That justifies him even less in making remarks of this nature at this stage.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: I shall be very brief, Sir. Another practice prevalent is this, that these *bhai khata*s which are used by these money-lenders are not properly bound. I do not know what happens in other provinces, but in my province in the United Provinces generally this bhai khata is a heap of papers tied together with a string and any leaf can be taken out or inserted in at any time; and suits are filed on the basis of these *bhai khata*s. I want to remedy this defect by providing that when a suit is brought on the basis of such a bhai khata that bhai khata should have been produced before the income-tax officer, or that he can bring a suit on other properly kept account books, as provided in the Indian Evidence Act.

There is another object in my bringing this Bill forward. When a money-lender lends money, he takes all kinds of security. He gets either a registered bond or a simple bond that is witnessed by different people; but when he has received the money he does not grant a receipt, and an illiterate person has to depend upon the good faith of this money-lender. I wish to provide that it should be incumbent on the money-lender to grant a receipt in every case and that it should be made penal if he does not give a receipt. If a money-lender does not keep a proper account book, the only result will be that he cannot sue on the basis of that account book; nothing more than that.

[Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan.]

But these are secondary sections. The only two sections on which I want to lay stress upon and for the purpose of which I have brought this Bill forward are those relating to the granting of receipts, and providing that the interest should not accumulate to more than the principal sum. That is the old Hindu law, the Damdupat rule. Before 1855 the law as it stood in India was that Muhammadans did not recognise any kind of interest; the Hindus recognised it only to the extent that the interest could not accumulate to more than the principal sum lent. But in 1855 an Act was passed—Act XXVIII of 1855—which gave power to courts to grant a decree for the interest that has been agreed upon; and this has been misinterpreted by certain High Courts to mean that the old Hindu law of Damdupat had been superseded. But certain High Courts like Bombay, Madras and as I have heard from my Honourable friend, Sir Sarvadhikary, the Calcutta High Court also still hold that the Damdupat rule prevails in spite of the Act. In Bombay, I have heard that the Damdupat rule holds good only when both the parties are Hindus but that it is not recognised when the creditor is a Hindu and the debtor belongs to any other caste. My friend, Mr. Samarth, is not here; but my other friends from Bombay can bear testimony to what I say. What I want is that this Damdupat rule should prevail not only as between Hindus and Hindus, but as between Hindus and Muhammadans as well and between any class of the community. In some presidency towns, in the Allahabad High Court and other High Courts this Damdupat rule is not recognised and the court grants decrees for the sums agreed upon and to the extent it accumulates. A recent case that happened only three or four days ago bears testimony to what I say. The whole House will be shocked to hear such a kind of agreement as is reported in the Pioneer of the 15th February. A case was decided on the 18th of February and in that case for a principal of Rs. 400 a decree was granted by the Honourable the High Court of Allahabad for Rs. 66,98,731-2-0. Another case in Calcutta which was reported in the Leader of the 26th May 1922 was one in which a son-in-law sued his father-in-law for Rs. 7,16,800 while the sum which had been lent originally was Rs. 350 only. It is this kind of case that I want to remedy by providing that the interest shall not exceed the amount lent. That is the chief object. I represent the zemindar and tenant classes and it is a great hardship to them. We find every day in every civil court there is a huge list of properties which are sold by auction, simply because of the accumulation of interest. Several of my friends who belong to the United Provinces might be aware that a big family, a leading family, the premier family in fact in Moradabad was ruined in one day because of the accumulation of interest on an old bond which was originally for a very small sum. That went up accumulating and they were absolutely ruined. It is for the protection of this class of people that I have brought forward this Bill. It is of course in no way disadvantageous to the money-lender. What I am asking in this Bill is that the money-lender should come forward and claim his money as soon as his money is doubled, and he should not sit quiet to take away the property of the zemindar. He should come forward and take the assistance of the Court, as soon as it doubles. This will afford an opportunity to a zemindar to think twice as to whether he should part with his property now and not be under any false shame so as to lose the whole property ultimately. I want that a protection of this nature should be given to persons whom I have the honour to represent. If there is any clause in my Bill which does not affect people of the other provinces, they need not accept this Bill. That is why I have put down in my Bill "It shall apply to the whole of British India unless any part thereof is exempted by the operation of the Act by the Governor General in Council". So if people from other provinces find that it is not suitable to their province, they can ask the Local Government not to make my Bill applicable to their province. But if the views of the Local Governments are invited, you will find, Sir, that they will admit that the remedy which I have suggested is really needed. I therefore ask this Honourable House to lend their support to my Bill and give me leave simply to introduce this Bill. Of course, at later stage if they find that it is unworkable or that it is not wanted by the country, they may throw it away or take away any of the sections from the Bill, and I won't mind it. But I can assure this House that it is very badly needed for my province. A Bill to remedy this evil was moved, I might inform this House, in the United Provinces Council and there it was rejected on the ground that it was beyond their jurisdiction to consider it. That is the reason why I have brought this Bill here. The whole matter was very ably dealt with by the late Khawajah Ghulam-us-Saqalain in the United Provinces Council, and as I have already pointed out, that Council considered that it was beyond their jurisdiction to consider such a Bill, and so this time several Members have written to me to push this Bill in this Assembly. My request to the Members from other provinces is that, if they do not like this Bill to be made applicable to their province, they should not deprive my province, where this is very badly needed of having such a useful measure. Therefore, I beg that this House may kindly grant me leave to simply introduce this Bill. I also request at the same time that the Government also may be good enough to take a magnanimous attitude towards this Bill, and that they should not oppose it.

Mr. P. B. Haigh (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I fear that, in spite of the pathetic appeal contained in the closing words of my Honourable friend, the Mover of this motion, I must nevertheless ask the House to refuse leave to introduce this Bill.

Before, Sir, I proceed to deal with the provisions of the Bill as it stands on the paper, I wish to make two preliminary remarks. The first is this. My Honourable friend has quite omitted to call the attention of the House to the fact that this question of usury and dishonest transactions on the part of money-lenders has formed the matter of consideration by the Government. The matter has been considered by the Government of India at great length, and as a result, they passed Act X of 1918, an Act to give additional powers to Courts to deal in certain cases with usurious loans of money or in kind, and it is the contention of Government that the measures proposed in this Act provide a far more effective remedy than those that have been suggested by the Honourable Member. I think my Honourable friend might have referred to the existing previous legislation while making his motion.

The second point I desire to press upon the House is this. The Honourable Member on two or three occasions in the course of his speech expressed his willingness, even his eagerness, to throw away practically every clause in the Bill if it did not meet with the approval of the House. Now, Sir, I submit that this is not the first time that this thing has happened in the course of this Session. Only a few days ago another Honourable Member brought forward a Bill to provide a specific remedy for certain grievances, and in the course of his speech he suggested that that remedy should be cut out altogether and that the Select Committee should provide another. I submit, Sir, when an Honourable Member wants to bring forward a Bill, he ought to give due consideration to the provisions of it, and not invite the House to cut them out at their leisure provided only the Bill is introduced.

Now, Sir, I shall turn to the actual provisions of the Bill. I shall of course bear in mind your warning and I shall not deal with them in detail. The Bill contains three main provisions. First of all, the definition and of registration of money-lenders and the imposition of certain restrictions on their methods of keeping accounts. Secondly, a provision for the restriction of the amount of money that may be advanced to certain persons, and thirdly the clauses that refer to Damdapat.

Now, Sir, as regards the first question, the definition of registration of money-lenders. I have no doubt that all Honourable Members have studied the proposed definition in the Bill. I confess, Sir, that it seems to me that we are no nearer the definition than before this Bill was introduced. The question of registration of money-lenders was one of the questions specifically considered by the Government of India prior to the legislation that attended the Bill of 1918. All Local Governments were then consulted on the matter, and with your permission, Sir, I shall read the replies of some of the Local Governments on this subject. They were all unanimous that the definitions of the terms 'money-lender' and the registration of money-lenders were practically unworkable. The Government of Madras reported:

"The registration of money-lenders would be a formidable and almost impossible undertaking and would be so far from complete as to be useless. Nor does the Governor in Council consider that any useful results would be produced by compelling money-lenders to keep accounts or give receipts from counterfoil receipts books."

The Government of Bombay said:

"The problem of dealing with money-lenders in England is totally different from that of dealing with them in this Presidency, and arguments from the success of the Money-lenders Act in England are in the view of the Governor in Council full of danger. In England a small and fairly well defined class of professional lenders catering for a comparatively small class of borrowers has been taken under control without difficulty and without interfering with or unsettling the whole of the credit system of the country. In India practically every one with a little money in hand lends it out, and the agriculturist who has saved a few rupees is often quite as rapacious as any savkar. Registration of money-lenders would represent enormous difficulties in India and in fact may be said at once to be impracticable. Even to arrive at a satisfactory definition of 'money-lender' would be a hopeless task."

The Burma Government,—but I will not read, Sir, any more of the opinions in detail,—was of the same opinion. The Central Provinces Government was of the same opinion. The Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces thought that "all ideas of registering money-lenders insisting on their keeping books and the like are quite out of the question."

Well, Sir, with this consensus of opinion I would ask the Assembly whether it is possible for the Government of India to take any other course than to ask the House to reject this Bill. It is impossible for us to suggest that legislation should be carried through which all the Local Governments find practically unworkable.

But, leaving that aside for the moment, suppose that these money-lenders were registered. What would be the immediate effect? It would mean immediately the imposition of great restrictions on the number of persons who could lend money. Two results would follow. First of all, the rate of interest would immediately be raised by those who could lend money, and secondly all sorts of subterfuges would be adopted by those who are prevented from lending money in order to do it clandestinely. Moreover, the Bill provides, as will be seen, for the punishment of those who lend money without registration. Now, imagine the amount of corruption

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: The Bill provides punishment for not giving receipts, not for not registering.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: I beg the Honourable Member's pardon. The Bill provides penalties for those money-lenders who, having registered themselves, fail to comply with the numerous restrictions which are imposed upon them by this Bill. Now, I ask the House to consider the amount of oppression and extortion that sort of thing might lead to. The whole result would be to interfere to a very great extent with the money-lending system of the country, and I would ask Honourable Members to remember, as no doubt they will remember, that, whatever hard things may be said against money-lenders as a class or individuals in particular, the fact remains that the money-lender is one of the most useful members of society in this country. The Honourable Member says: "Question"! But how is a vast agricultural country, especially in those tracts where the ryotwari system is prevalent, how is it to be carried on at all if money is not available for agriculturists? Agriculture cannot be carried on without borrowed capital. The Honourable Member says: "Co-operative Societies"! How many co-operative societies are there as yet in this country? Does he not realise that co-operative money-lending, in spite of the great strides that it has made, is still in its infancy, and that, if we were to strike a blow at the common system of lending money in this country, the result would be disastrous? Then, Sir, there is another startling section in the Bill as it stands, No. 12. I do not know if this is one of the sections that the Honourable Member proposes to throw out.

"No Court shall take notice of, or pass a decree on a promote or a simple bond which purports to have been executed by an illiterate person for a sum of more than fifty rupees."

Well, now imagine what that means. It would strike a blow immediately at the credit of millions of rayats.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: May I, Sir, rise to a point of order? My friend is reading section by section, while I was not allowed to deal with the Bill in that way. I would have explained the section.

Mr. President: I must ask the Honourable Member to refrain from these interruptions and to resume his seat.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: Sir, perhaps I may be permitted to point out that I am endeavouring if possible to deal with the principles of the Bill and I pointed out that it contained three main provisions and this is one of the provisions. That is as near as we can get to any principles in the Bill. However, we may take it that that section, which I submit condemns itself, is one of those which the Honourable Member is willing to jettison. And, so, finally, we come to No. 13.

"No person shall be entitled to claim as interest 'an amount exceeding in the aggregate the principal sum originally lent.'"

In other words, he wishes to introduce universally the rule which is known as Damdapat. Well, now, Sir, last January, I think, the House considered a separate Bill brought forward by an Honourable Member, whose name stands on the paper also to-day, dealing simply and solely with this question of Damdupat. He moved a Bill to amend the Interest Act of 1889, and the House on that occasion refused permission for the Bill to be introduced. A speech was made

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: May I, Sir, point out that that was the amendment of Mr. President: The Honourable Member was given great latitude in dealing with this subject and it is impertinence on his part to interrupt in this way.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: On a point of order, Sir. My Honourable friend is referring to a totally different Act which was rejected on different grounds, Sir.

Mr. President: Order, order. If the Honourable Member who is replying (Mr. Haigh) is out of order, the Chair will deal with him. The Honourable Member was given great latitude, and I advise him to remain in his seat.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: Sir, my Honourable friend is quite right in saying that I am referring to a different Bill but the provisions in that Bill amounted to exactly the same thing as that laid down in section 13 of the Bill which we are now considering. It dealt with the question of Damdupat. Now, I have no doubt that most of the Honourable Members present heard the speech of the Honourable the then Home Member on that occasion, and I do not propose, in the very brief time at my disposal, to go through all the arguments at length. The point I wish to make is that Damdupat, though in itself a very well meant rule, is really a very primitive expedient. It lays down no period within which interest may be allowed to accumulate up to an amount equal to the capital. For instance, the rule is this, that the amount of interest claimed at any one time must not exceed an amount equal to the capital. It takes no count of previous payments of interest and if a suit is brought at the end of three years, there is nothing to prevent, as far as the rule goes, the person bringing the suit from recovering interest which amounts to 33 per cent. per annum. On the other hand, if a suit is brought at the end of fifty or 30 years, the rate of interest is enormously reduced. It is in fact a clumsy way of regulating the rate of interest. The question of regulating rates of interest has been gone into frequently. It was investigated by a Parliamentary Committee in England and I think it has been universally condemned by all those experts who are competent to deal with it. Moreover there are several positive dangers about this rule of Damdupat. The first is this. If you have a rule of that sort in force, all payments which are made are immediately credited as interest, never anything against the principal. Secondly, it is a direct temptation to the money-lender at the time when the bond is first made, to cause the debtor to agree to have a much larger sum entered as principal than that actually given to him, in order to enable the creditor to recover a larger sum when he goes into Court. Thirdly, it leads to the practice of nominally winding up a transaction and beginning a new one so that the initial amount shown in the new bond is very much greater than that originally lent. Fourthly, it compels the money-lender to bring his suit at the earliest possible moment, which, with all due respect to my Honourable friend's opinion, is not an unmixed blessing—even to the debtor. I do not wish to keep the House further on this question of Damdupat, as the matter has already been gone into and as we shall possibly have to go into it at greater length a few minutes later. But I submit, in view of the willingness of my Honourable friend to throw away the greater part of the Bill, and as he lays stress upon the question of Damdupat which has been definitely rejected by the House only a year ago, that leave to introduce this Bill should be refused.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That leave be given to introduce a Bill to license and regulate money-lending transactions, and to limit the interest charged on loans of various kinds in British India."

(A Division was challenged but it appeared to Mr. President that the call of the "Ayes" did not justify it.)

Mr. President: I think I must ask those in favour of the Bill to rise in their places.

Nine Members rose in their places, and according to Mr. President ordered the bells to be rung and the division proceeded:

had to consider the question of emigration to Ceylon and the Federated Malay States, and Honourable Members who were supplied with some papers on that question, must have found that the Government of India insisted on the Governments of Ceylon, and the Malay States, to abolish all the penal provisions in their labour laws as a condition of allowing emigration of Indian labour to those places, and upon those representations the penal clauses of the labour laws have, as a matter of fact, been abrogated in Ceylon, the Malay States, Mauritius, and in Fiji. I have it on the authority of my Honourable friend, Mr. Venkatapatiraju, who was a member of the Commission sent by the Government of India to Fiji, that when he was there he was actually twitted by the authorities of Fiji on this Act being on the Statute Book of India, when he had a discussion with them about the penal provisions of the labour laws in that Island. Sir, for all these reasons, I consider this Act to be an anachronism and an anomaly, and if we are not to be charged with inconsistency, I think we must repeal this Act, and that without delay.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): Sir, this Act has been on the Statute Book of India for 64 years and my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, wishes it to be repealed with effect from the 1st April, 1923, that is to say in less than six weeks from to-day

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Extend it if you like.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: Well, Sir, that is the main provision of his Bill, and I feel bound, on behalf of Government, to oppose the introduction of the Bill. My Honourable friend has given the previous history of the discussions relating to this Act, and I do not wish to traverse the same ground. He has mentioned that my Honourable friend behind (Mr. N. M. Joshi) had moved a Resolution in this House in September 1921 (and not 1920 as he said) on which occasion the then Honourable Home Member had given an undertaking on behalf of Government to sound public opinion in the country on the question of the repeal of this measure. That promise, Sir, has been fully implemented. The Government of India addressed all Local Governments to find out what the present views of the Governments as well as of the people interested in this measure are with regard to the question of repeal or modification of the present law. We have received replies from the Local Governments, but the last reply came only about six weeks ago, and it has not therefore been possible for Government to take any action in this matter as yet. But my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, has already asked for the introduction of this Bill which provides for the repeal of the present Act in less than six weeks from to-day, as I have already said. Mr. Neogy stated that Sir William Vincent promised to bring in a Bill in 18 months' time. There was no such definite promise. (Mr. K. C. Neogy: "If so advised; it was not a definite promise.") What he said was that, if there was a consensus of opinion in the country for repeal, Government would probably, within 18 months from the time that he spoke, undertake legislation for repeal. I may remind the Honourable Member that 18 months have not yet expired.

Well, Sir, the general tenour of the replies is against repeal. It is true that the Government of Bengal have suggested that repeal will do no great harm and the Government of Madras have not objected to repeal, but practically every other Local Government have advised the Government of India against repeal. At the same time, the Government of India

Army	A copy of the Resolution was communicated to the Secretary of State. Every effort is being made to equip and organise the Indian Army, as far as is practicable, in the same manner as the British Army, but complete assimilation will not take place owing to financial and other reasons. Resolution was communicated to the Secretary of State. Except in the cases of Aden and the Persian Gulf, all Indian troops stationed overseas are paid for by the Imperial Government. The cost of the garrisons at Aden and in the Persian Gulf is defrayed partly by the Imperial and partly by the Indian Government and questions regarding the strength and maintenance of both these garrisons are at present the subject of correspondence between the two Governments. The matter has been referred to the Secretary of State. No further action has been taken in this matter.

4. The appointment of Commander-in-Chief and Senior Staff Officers in India.	Army	The conditions regulating the appointment of these officers have been approved by the Secretary of State for India.
5. Commander-in-Chief's right to correspond with the Chief of the Imperial General Staff.	Army	This has been approved by the Secretary of State.
6. The admission of Indian subjects to all arms of His Majesty's Military, Naval and Air Forces in India.	Army	The matter is still under reference to the Secretary of State.
7. The establishment of a military college in India.	Army	The Secretary of State has sanctioned the establishment of a military college at Dehra Dun which will be shortly opened. The Prince of Wales' Royal Indian Military College, Dehra Dun, for the preliminary training of Indians to fit them to enter the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, was formally opened by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales on the 13th March 1922. The number of cadets at present in residence is 37. Further entries will take place in the terms commencing in January and April, 1923, bringing the total number of cadets up to the present authorised establishment of 70. An ad interim report by the Commandant of the College on the first term's work has already been published and circulated to the Members of the Legislature.
8. The fixation of pay of all commissioned ranks in all branches of the Army with an overseas allowance.	Army	The rates of rank pay of British officers of the Indian Army have been revised and brought into line with those for British officers of the British Army but no overseas allowance has been sanctioned.
9. Formation of a territorial force, etc.	Army	The Resolution has been given effect to by Government. The Territorial Force is in process of development and recruitment has made good progress.
10. Grant of the rank of Second-Lieutenant, Lieutenant or higher rank to the officers of the Indian Territorial Force.	Army	The matter is under consideration by the Government of India and the Secretary of State. Officers of the Indian Territorial Force now hold a commission which confers British rank.

14B	23rd February 1922.	Mr. N. M. Samarth.	Provision for technical education in India to enable Indians to enter the technical services: 1. Geological Survey of India and Indian Mines Department. 2. Railways.	Industries	The question of making provision for technical education in India to enable Indians to enter the Geological Survey of India and the Indian Mines Department has been considered. With a view to provide facilities in India for high grade instruction in mining and geology and their accessory sciences, the Government of India have already decided with the approval of the Secretary of State for India, to establish a school of Mining and Geology at Dhanbad as a Central institution. A sum of Rs. 1,00,000 was voted by the Legislative Assembly last March for this purpose and this sum is being spent during the current year mainly on the collection of bricks for the building of the school. It is proposed to make a provision of Rs. 3,50,000 exclusive of departmental charges to meet further expenditure on the construction of the school, and the Standing Finance Committee has agreed to this demand being placed before the Assembly. It is not possible to say at present whether this provision will be allowed to stand. Technical schools exist at stations where railway workshops are located, e.g., Lilloah, Jamalpur, Kanchnarpara, Gorakhpur, Lucknow, Lahore, Ajmer, Bombay, etc. At Jamalpur, Lucknow, Lahore and Kanchnarpara, schemes for the erection of new and larger technical schools, at which a higher class of training will be possible, are now being introduced, the Local Government in each case co-operating with the Railway Administration.

STATEMENT LAID ON THE TABLE.

In this connection attention is invited to the reply given by the Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes to question No. 34 put by Mr. P. L. Misra in the Legislative Assembly on the 6th September 1922, in which it was stated that an officer had been placed on special duty to examine and report on the whole question of training of Indians for both superior and subordinate grades of all Departments of Railways. The report referred to has been received and is now in the hands of the printers and will shortly be considered by Government.

So far as the Survey of India and the Indian Forest Service are concerned, the question of providing technical education in India is under consideration. As regards the Indian Agricultural Service, educational facilities have been included in the general scheme for the reorganization of the Agricultural Research Institute and College which was sanctioned by the Secretary of State for India in December, 1921, and is being given effect to as financial conditions admit. In the Indian Civil Veterinary Service six Provincial Service Officers are undergoing post-graduate training at the Muktesar Laboratory, and it is hoped that the Laboratory will, in the very near future, develop into a central training institution not only for Provincial Service Officers desirous of promotion to the Indian Civil Veterinary Service but also for young students desirous of taking up a career in that Service.

Indian Officers and other ranks of the Indian Army continually receive instruction in gunnery and the handling of modern weapons of warfare in schools that have been established for that express purpose. It is not

The cost would be out of all proportion to any possible increase in efficiency. In addition, a scheme for the training of apprentices in Ordnance factories has also been worked out, but its further consideration has been held up pending the report of the Incheape Committee.
			5. Engineering and Wireless Telegraphy.	Industries	For imparting engineering education in India there are already 4 Engineering colleges in the country and, in addition, the Government of Burma intend instituting shortly a course of such education in the Rangoon University. The Government of India have also had under consideration the question of specialised engineering training and post-graduate courses, but have decided to defer the further consideration of these questions until financial conditions improve. A departmental school of wireless telegraphy has recently been opened at Karachi in which it is proposed to give a preliminary training in that subject to suitably qualified Indian Electrical Engineers. In due course it is hoped to select some of the most promising candidates and to send them to England for further courses of training in practical and theoretical wireless telegraphy. A sum of Rs. 2,42,000 has been allotted during the current financial year for the construction of a building for the wireless Research and Training Centre at Karachi.

MESSAGE FROM THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

Secretary of the Assembly: Sir, the following Message has been received from the Secretary of the Council of State:

"I am directed to inform you that the Council of State has, at its meeting held on the 20th February, 1923, agreed without any amendments to the Bill to give effect in British India to the Treaty for the Limitation of Naval Armament, which was passed by the Legislative Assembly at its meeting of the 31st January, 1923."

THE CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. President: The House will now resume consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, the European Vagrancy Act, 1874, the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, and the Central Provinces Courts Act, 1917, in order to provide for the removal of certain existing discriminations between European British subjects and Indians in criminal trials and proceedings.

Clauses 16 and 17 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, my amendment runs as follows:

"(ii) In clause 18 (2) in the proviso to the proposed sub-section (3) of section 326 for the words 'any person excluded from the list on the ground of his being exempted under section 320' substitute the words 'the required number of persons from any other district but chosen in the manner prescribed by or under this section'."

Under this proviso it has been laid down that, if the proper number of Europeans or Americans cannot otherwise be obtained for serving as jurymen, then the Court may, in its discretion for the purpose of constituting the jury, summon any person excluded from the list under section 320. Now, under section 320 of the Criminal Procedure Code, there are certain classes of persons who have been exempted from being summoned to serve as jurymen in trials. And here they provide by this proviso that, if the number of Europeans is not sufficient, in that case even such persons could be summoned at the discretion of the Magistrate. I beg to move, Sir, that that exemption be made to subsist and in the case of the difficulties that might arise, European jurors or assessors be summoned from any other district where there be a sufficient number and wherefrom they may be selected in the same way as has been provided here for the selection of jurors. It is desirable that persons already exempted from serving as jurymen should not be made to serve as such because they are the persons who are either in Government employ as Magistrates or Judges or Revenue Officers or Collectors or they are persons connected with the Courts of Law as pleaders or advocates or legal practitioners or persons who are employed in the Posts and Telegraphs or in the Army and Navy. It would be in the interests of justice and rather essential that such persons should be exempted in trials in which European subjects are concerned and the necessary jurors be selected from the neighbouring district where the number is sufficient. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): I would point out to the House that the proviso to which Mr. Agnihotri has objected to is nothing new. In section 462 of the existing Code precisely the same proviso finds a place. The effect of this is that if you cannot obtain in your own district a sufficient number of jurors, you can go to the exempted list. Mr. Agnihotri, in spite of that, would have us go to jurors in another district, thereby of course adding to the difficulty and to the expense attending the calling of jurors. Of the two alternatives, I put it to the House that it is preferable to go to the exempted list. Those exemptions have been made largely on the ground of convenience. If one turns to 220 one sees that there is nothing improper or unreasonable in itself in summoning exempted persons, as for instance persons in civil employ, persons officiating as priests or ministers of their respective religions, surgeons and others constantly practising the medical profession or legal practitioners or persons employed in the Post Office and Telegraph Departments. The only reason why they are exempted is on that of public convenience, and I maintain that, on the whole, grounds of public convenience will better be met by drawing on the exempted list than by calling jurors from another district. That is the sole ground on which I oppose Mr. Agnihotri. There is no great question of principle involved. It is purely one of convenience.

The amendment was negatived.

Clauses 18, 19 and 20 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move that:

"In clause 21, after the words 'Magistrate of the first class' where they occur for the first time insert the words 'or of whipping only'."

Clause 21 refers to section 413 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Section 413 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides:

"Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, there shall be no appeal by a convicted person in cases in which a Court of Session or the District Magistrate or other Magistrate of the first class passes a sentence of imprisonment not exceeding one month only, or of fine not exceeding fifty rupees only or of whipping only."

In this new clause 21 we now provide for appeals against convictions by the District Magistrates or Magistrates of the first class where they pass a sentence of imprisonment even for a period of one month or less but we do not provide any appeal against a sentence of whipping. My object in moving this amendment is to provide such appeal and to lay down that where a sentence of whipping be passed by the Sessions Judge or the District Magistrate or the Magistrate of the first class, the accused shall have a right of appeal against that sentence. It is very hard that such a right to appeal should be left unprovided for in the revised Criminal Procedure Code. It was not made in the past and there is no reason why we should not make it now. Though under the Whipping Act there are provisions that the sentence of whipping could be given only under certain conditions, still there is a likelihood, nay it sometimes happens that the sentence of whipping is given in undesirable cases. Moreover, the sentence of whipping may wrongly be passed or may have been rightly passed, but on appeal the whole order may subsequently be upset! In such cases there is no remedy, because the whipping may have already been administered. Therefore, it is necessary that an appeal should be provided in the case of whipping also, in which case the sentence of whipping would necessarily be postponed till the appeal is decided. In the appeal if the appellate court finds that the lower court was wrong in passing a sentence of whipping or in convicting the accused, that man will escape punishment which would otherwise have been wrongly inflicted on him. I submit that such a provision should be made in this clause providing an appeal against the sentence of whipping also. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 21, after the words 'Magistrate of the first class' where they occur for the first time insert the words 'and the words 'or of whipping only' '."

There is a mistake in drafting. It is necessary to add those three words to the amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: All right, Sir.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I heartily support this amendment. So long as the sentence of whipping is to remain on the Statute Book I think it is a case where an appeal ought to be allowed, because you inflict disgrace upon a man. As the Legislature has now provided for appeals in all cases of imprisonment, however short it may be, I think it is but right in a case like this, where serious disgrace is involved, in a sentence of whipping, that we should provide for an appeal. Sir, I heartily support the amendment and I hope the House will approve of this amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: As Mr. Agnihotri has recognised, we are of course not now dealing with a case arising out of racial discrimination. This is an amendment tending to effect what he deems to be an improvement in the general criminal law of the country. He has also himself recognised in addressing the House that his amendment in itself would not effect all that he desires. Under section 390 of the Code it is provided that whipping "shall be executed at such place and time as the Court may direct." That is naturally taken by the Courts as authorising as a matter of practice that whipping should take place as soon as possible. If an appeal is to be allowed, then it is obvious that we must also amend section 390 of the Code; otherwise the appeal provision would be entirely inoperative. That is to say, the person sentenced would only be able to appeal after the sentence of whipping had been carried out, because the Code does not make any provision for the necessary detention of the offender during the period pending an appeal.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Will the Honourable Member read 391? That will provide for it.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: That only provides for the case in which a sentence of whipping is given in addition to one of imprisonment. We are considering the case here of whipping only. Cases where whipping is given in addition to imprisonment are of course provided for, but not sentences of whipping only. Now when the Committee considered the question of whipping, as we noticed yesterday, some of the Members thought that whipping as a punishment should be abolished. They decided however on the whole not to recommend that as an immediate step. They considered that public opinion should be invited as regards the punishment of whipping:

"in particular on the question whether the punishment should not be confined to persons convicted of any of the offences mentioned in section 4 of the Whipping Act, and also in the way of school discipline to juvenile offenders."

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

[21ST FEB. 1923.]

and they went on to say:

".....if.....the punishment of whipping is retained, it should apply to Europeans and Indians alike; that it should be provided for the same offences; and that the same classes of officers should have power to sentence to the punishment Europeans and Indians alike, subject always to the provisions of a right of appeal, even where the sentence is one of whipping only, and to the further provision that the execution of the sentence should be suspended pending the disposal of the appeal."

Now, I recognise the sentiments that have been put forward by Mr. Rangachariar in this respect, but I put it to the House, as I did yesterday, that it is better that we should deal with this question as a whole. It will need consideration in the light of the views of Local Governments, the High Courts and indeed of the public, and I think it should be treated as a whole, particularly as I have pointed out that other consequential amendments to the existing Code will be necessary if we grant a right of appeal.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, may I just confirm the statement of the Honourable the Home Member, and point out that the existing law goes, if I may say so, even further than he mentioned, because it is laid down in the rulings under section 390 of the Code of Criminal Procedure that a postponement of the execution of the sentence of whipping to a future date is illegal. So that not merely the Magistrate may direct a sentence of whipping should take place at once, but it has been ruled that it is illegal for him to postpone the sentence, when there is a sentence of whipping only and no sentence of imprisonment. Thus, if this amendment is carried, the result would be nugatory; the Magistrate would order the sentence of whipping to take place at once, and the appeal would be nominal only. Consequently an amendment would be absolutely necessary in section 390, and there is no such amendment in our agenda to-day.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): The Honourable the Home Member is not quite right when he says that the question as to whether a sentence of whipping should be appealable does not involve any racial distinction. He read an extract from the report of the Joint Committee on Racial Distinctions and pointed out a passage in which we strongly recommended that a sentence of whipping should be made appealable, and further pointed out that the sentence of whipping should be abolished and that public opinion should be invited to that end. Honourable Members will remember that in the case of European convicts there can be no sentence of whipping except by a Presidency Magistrate as now. I submit that it would certainly not remove the racial distinction but it will minimise the racial distinction if a person sentenced to whipping is given the right of appeal.

Then comes the question raised by the Honourable Mr. Percival and also raised by the Honourable the Home Member, what provision is there in the existing Code of Criminal Procedure to postpone the sentence of whipping pending the disposal of appeal. I venture to submit that there is a general provision embodied in section 344 of the Code which enables the Magistrate to adjourn the case from time to time for a sufficient cause shown, and if the accused intimates that he is going to appeal against the finding of the Magistrate inflicting upon him the sentence of whipping, then I submit it would be a good cause for the adjournment of the case for the execution of the sentence. It is perfectly true that the Court may record a finding and abstain from carrying out the sentence. I am asked how. By inditing the order, staying proceedings till the order of the appellate Court is obtained. My Honourable friend Mr. Percival pointed out the rulings under section 390 which preclude the Court from postponing a sentence of whipping. But he forgets that those are rulings under the existing law which does not allow an appeal against a sentence of whipping, and if we once admit the principle that whipping should be appealable, then I submit those rulings would no longer be good. I submit that this is a question which is integrally connected with the Bill we are considering here and that it will certainly ameliorate the condition of the Indian convict as compared with the European convict if we allow the former at least a right of appeal. The Honourable the Home Member says that the question of whipping must be considered as a whole. That of course raises the question as to whether a sentence of whipping should not be abolished altogether from the Statute Book, and if it is not abolished, whether it should not be limited to certain specific cases mentioned in section 4 of the Whipping Act. My submission is that that is a large question for which we cannot wait. We have now here a Racial Distinctions Bill and my submission is that while we are considering that Bill we should try and equalise the status of the British and Indian convicts as far as we possibly can, and it is in that view that I support this amendment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): I merely wish to refer very briefly to the rather astonishing reference made by my Honourable and learned friend, Dr. Gour, to the provisions of section 344. The provisions of section 344 permit of the postponement or adjournment of an inquiry or trial. I do not know whether my Honourable friend desired to suggest that if the Court was about to sentence a person to whipping it should write the order and not sign it and therefore in that case the provisions of section 344 will apply. But in that case there would be no appeal. An appeal only lies from a conviction and there would be no conviction if the judgment was not signed. So soon as the judgment is signed section 344 has no application.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatam: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I have given notice of a similar amendment. The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey stated that there is no racial question involved. With all due deference to him I may state it is adding insult to injury. He has not only allowed whipping to Indians, but he has removed it in the case of Europeans when the Joint Committee reported that they should be dealt with equally. Moreover, they have stated with reference to this very portion which was read out by the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey, "subject always"—they have not given any exceptions—"to the provisions of a right of appeal" even where the sentence is one of whipping only. We are reminded more than once that we must not go back on the compromise entered into by both sides and to which my Honourable European colleagues are a party. The unanimous report of the Committee is, "subject always . . . there should be a right of appeal." The only excuse suggested is how to provide for drafting and other matters. Is it a difficult matter to provide for drafting that a Magistrate who passes a sentence of whipping should postpone it till the appeal is disposed of? In section 390 we have:

"When the accused is sentenced to whipping only, the sentence shall be executed at such place and time as the Court may direct."

[Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju.]

Section 391 deals with the execution of a sentence of whipping in addition to imprisonment. Perhaps I may remind the House that when we were considering the Criminal Procedure Bill we have provided section 435 as amended by the Government wherein they say that whenever a petition is put in in the Sessions Court the execution of every sentence might be directed to be stopped till it is disposed of by that authority. I will refer the House to section 435 which we passed only a few days back. Therefore, I urge that if you have to give any weight to the joint recommendations and if the Government wish to stick to the compromise entered into by the Europeans and Indians, they should be more magnanimous as to allow at least an appeal even though they may not remove whipping altogether till the matter is inquired into and what is the danger in allowing a person to prefer an appeal before he receives this degrading punishment. The matter will be judged on its merits by the higher authorities. If the Government has not lost all its confidence in the higher authorities there is absolutely no reason why the whipping should not be delayed for a few days and why the amendment should not be accepted by the Government. Therefore every Indian who feels strongly in this matter should unanimously vote in favour of the amendment even though the Government oppose it.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I wish to say a few words by way of personal explanation. I did not wish to interrupt Mr. Raju, nor Dr. Gour, when they were speaking, but it would almost seem from what Mr. Raju and Dr. Gour have said that they thought that I had given the House an incomplete or distorted view of what the Committee had recommended on this subject. Dr. Gour said that their recommendation was absolute. Mr. Raju said that I had departed from the recommendations of the Committee. Now, it is a charge to which I should be unwilling to plead guilty, that I have attempted to mislead the House in any way as to the purport of its recommendations; and it is therefore purely on a personal matter I rise to remove that impression. The clear and explicit words of the report are these. That citation will cover perfectly both what Dr. Gour and Mr. Raju have said:

"The majority of the Committee consider that if after the proposed inquiry the punishment of whipping is retained it should apply to Europeans and Indians alike, that it should be provided for the same offences, that the same classes of officers should have power to sentence to the punishment Europeans and Indians alike, subject always to the provisions of a right of appeal even where the sentence is one of whipping only, and to the further provision that the execution of the sentence should be suspended pending the disposal of the appeal."

I am sorry to have to read this extract a second time to the House; but it will see that it is a condition of the recommendations of the committee that the public should first be consulted. If after that consultation it is decided that the punishment of whipping should be retained, then their recommendations in regard to appeal and the like would come into force. We are proposing to make that inquiry. The matter will again come before the Legislature and again I say let us deal with the question as a whole and not piecemeal.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): I rise to say a few words in connection with this subject. I think there is nothing lost in giving the right of appeal from a sentence of whipping and the difficulties pointed out by the Honourable the Home Member are by no means insuperable. It seems to me that so far as the second line of defence is concerned the Magistrates should have power to fix the place and time. I take it, it appears from the rulings quoted by the Honourable Mr. Percival, that there is no difficulty in postponing the execution of a sentence of whipping until the appeal is heard, and it must be remembered that even without an appeal by an accused person from a sentence of whipping the Magistrate has of necessity to postpone the execution of the sentence until the appeal is disposed of. Therefore if the principle is accepted by this House, that is, granting the right of appeal, I do not think as pointed out by Dr. Gour, the rulings quoted by Mr. Percival will affect the case at all but if there be any doubt in regard to the matter, whether the Magistrate can postpone the execution of the sentence or not, I would, with the permission of the House, add to the amendment proposed by Mr. Agnihotri the words "In the meantime the execution of the sentence should be postponed." If the House does not object and if the Chair permits, I would add those words.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): I venture to offer a few words on the point before the House as far as possible from the point of view of the convict. My remarks will not be very valuable because they depend rather on induction than upon any personal experience but I am guided by such experience as I had at the Bar and on the Bench of the manner in which our magistracy exercise their discretion to award sentences of whipping only and my experience is very much in favour of the magistracy for the good sense with which that discretion has been exercised. When therefore I put forward a word on behalf of the convict, I refer to that particular class of convict to which such sentences are generally awarded. If I have the misfortune to be caught in stealing a pair of shoes or some other valueless article and I belong to a class who have not any very high traditions or feelings of caste and I am put before a Magistrate and sentenced to ten lashes, speaking from the point of view of the convict, I would much sooner have my ten lashes and go home and be done with it than sit in custody for perhaps a month or six weeks or even longer while the Sessions Judge is considering whether or not those ten lashes are to be inflicted upon me. It will quadruple, I say it without hesitation, the punishment from anticipation of what the result of the appeal may be and the detention pending that appeal will quadruple the severity of the punishment which after a brief moment of pain and shame is forgotten and therefore I doubt very much whether we shall be really doing good to the people on whose behalf this amendment is put forward if we support it and carry it. I entirely understand and appreciate the desire of Members of this House to appeal against a sentence which nothing can undo once it is executed but that is the way with most sentences. Fine is the only sentence which you can entirely undo by reversal of the conviction on appeal. It is one of the disadvantages and disabilities of our human institutions. But I think, choosing between the two and having regard to the way in which the discretion of Magistrates is exercised in inflicting sentences of whipping only, the present law is really better for the convict than any right of appeal would be.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 21, after the words 'Magistrate of the first class' where they occur for the first time insert the words 'and the words 'or of whipping only' '." The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 21, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move that:

"In clause 22, after the words 'three months only or' insert the words 'and or of whipping only'."

Sir, the House has just decided to provide an appeal from the sentence of whipping in cases of ordinary trials. Now this clause refers to summary trials and here also I beg the indulgence of the House to accept the amendment and allow me to provide for an appeal from a sentence of whipping in summary trials as well. I need say nothing further, as the House has already given an indication of its attitude in that respect.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, it may perhaps appear surprising that after the last vote of this House, one should be speaking in opposition to this amendment, but, Sir, I think it is more surprising that that vote was given, for it is not only one amendment but many amendments of the Code which will be required if an appeal is to be permissible from sentences of whipping only. My Honourable friend, Mr. Hussanally, suggested, 'why not let the man out on bail.' Under what provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure can a man who has been convicted and sentenced to a sentence of whipping be let out on bail? Again, who is going to give bail in such a case?

Dr. H. S. Gour: I rise to a point of order. Is the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson in order in addressing this House upon an amendment which has already been carried?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member will have observed that the reason why Mr. Agnihotri made no speech was because he said that the arguments were the same as on the previous amendment. Mr. Tonkinson is in order.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the recommendation of the Committee, as has been pointed out by the Honourable Leader of this House, was subject to the proposed full inquiry into the question of whipping. Now, what, if I may venture to prophesy, is the probable result of that inquiry? It is, Sir, that there will be no cases in which sentences of whipping only will be inflicted. The probable result will, I think, be that the cases in which sentences of whipping may be imposed will be cases that come under section 4 of the Whipping Act, or cases of juvenile offenders, and so far as section 4 of the Whipping Act is concerned, those are cases in which usually whipping is inflicted in addition to sentences of imprisonment, and for those cases we have of course the present provision of section 391 of the Code. I submit that it is impossible reasonably to give effect to the amendment proposed by the Honourable Member without making many other amendments in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I am surprised, Sir, at the statement made by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson that a man who has been sentenced to whipping cannot be bailed out. In almost every case when an appeal is lodged in an appellate court an application for bail is made, and very often the appellate court lets out the man on bail pending the decision of his appeal. If that be so, I see no difficulty in an application being lodged for bail in the case of a man sentenced to whipping along with his appeal. And if that is done the appellate court has the power to let him out on bail. Further, Sir, I believe that after the last vote the House will only be stultifying itself if it does not vote for this amendment as well.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I am surprised at the attitude taken up by the Government on this subject. There are only two sections which we are concerned with at present. As regards one of the sections we have provided that in the case of whipping there shall be an appeal. What Mr. Tonkinson now wants us to do is to say that in the other case of whipping there should be no appeal. Is it possible for the House to countenance such an argument? He says we will have to make other amendments in the Code. That we will have to do, and fortunately for us the Criminal Procedure Code amendment Bill has not yet been passed into law and the Government will have time to consider the amendments consequential on this change and to make the Code consistent with what we have done to-day. There are only two sections in this Bill on the subject; as regards one of those sections, we have decided that there shall be an appeal against whipping; and are we going to commit this House to the position that as regards the other section there should not be an appeal? I am astonished at the way the Government has been dealing with this question of whipping. They do not seem to have realized the deep and abiding nature of Indian feeling in regard to this matter. I hope that the House as a whole will accept this amendment.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I desire to say a very few words in reply to Mr. Tonkinson. Honourable Members will remember that when we were discussing the Code of Criminal Procedure several amendments dealing with questions relating to racial distinctions were withdrawn on the ground that they would more appropriately come up under the Racial Distinctions Bill. I therefore submit that when an amendment like the one which has just been passed has been passed by the vote of this House, it is up to the Government to make consequential changes in the Code of Criminal Procedure to give effect to that amendment. I cannot understand the attitude of my friend, the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, that this amendment should not be passed because, forsooth, some other amendment has been passed and certain consequential changes in the Code of Criminal Procedure would be necessary. Sir, this passage in our report has been read by the Honourable the Home Member and has been referred to by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, and if either of those Honourable gentlemen ever suggested that the Joint Committee on Racial Distinctions left the matter in doubt, let them quell that doubt by referring to the last few lines of their recommendation in which they pointed out that whatever may be the public opinion, one fact is clear and upon that they categorically recorded their recommendation in the following words:

"Subject always to the provision of a right of appeal, even when the sentence is one of whipping only, and with the further provision that the execution of the sentence should be suspended pending the disposal of the appeal."

I ask the Honourable the Home Member whether he is prepared to give effect to this part of the recommendation of the Racial Distinctions Committee. If he is then I submit he has to accept the amendment which is before this House.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It is a pity that we should have to return again to the controversy as to the exact meaning of the words of the recommendation of the Racial Distinctions Committee. It is not, I think, of any avail to Dr. Gour to read the last part of the sentence and omit the first. I read the whole to the House. I am quite content that the House should judge on it as a whole; whether in short I am right in maintaining that the whole of the recommendation in that sentence is subject to the condition which finds a place in the beginning of the sentence, namely, that an inquiry should be made and if after the proposed inquiry whipping should be retained then the consequences referred to should follow. I was of the opinion that we were giving effect to the intentions of the Committee when we stated that we would make the proposed inquiry and that the matter would again be laid before the Legislature after that inquiry had taken place. I am afraid I cannot admit that I have in any way offended against the recommendations of the Committee.

The House however has voted on the previous amendment, and I recognize that it would be of little avail for us to take a division on this second amendment. If Mr. Tonkinson pointed out certain defects in the law, it was only to supply a lacuna in the previous discussion. It was necessary to make it clear to the House that the amendment which they had passed would not in itself effect what was desired. I have no desire to waste the time of the House in taking a division on clauses which I might describe as of a consequential nature. I quite realize that if in the other class of sentences you are to have an appeal, then, in spite of the obvious difficulty of arguing an appeal from a summary decision, you must in logic have an appeal there also. I confess I would have preferred infinitely that the House should have exercised a mature judgment on this question, that it should have had, before it came to a decision, that full inquiry which the Committee desiderated. I regret that it has sought to settle this question piecemeal, for I do not think myself that that is the wisest form of legislation. The House would have been well advised if it had given itself the opportunity of taking into consideration what the High Courts, the Local Governments, and the public had to say on the subject.

However, it has not taken this course, and since it has taken a vote on the previous amendment I do not propose to take a division on the present clause.

Mr. P. E. Percival: I do not wish to go into the merits of the case, Sir, but I desire to answer Dr. Gour's remarks. If he will refer to paragraph 34 of the Report, he will find that the unanimous opinion of the Committee was that the existing arrangement should continue pending the result of the proposed inquiry; so that here again the Government have acted exactly in accordance with the opinion of the Committee.

The amendment was adopted.

Clause 22, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clause 23 was added to the Bill.

Sir Campbell Rhodes (Bengal: European): Sir, the amendment I desire to move is a very small one and I trust that both the Government and the House will regard it as non-controversial. If Honourable Members will turn to page 9 of the Bill, section 30, Chapter XLIVA, they will see laid down in the first paragraph the words "and such Magistrate shall inquire into the truth of such statement and allow the person making it a reasonable time within which to prove that it is true." I wish to insert, by my amendment, in clause 24 in the proposed section 44B (1) after the words "thinks necessary" the words "and after allowing the accused person reasonable time within which to adduce evidence in support of his claim."

In other words, I wish to bring the wording of these two sections into the same form. I think we all desire that there should be as few appeals as possible from the Magistrate and that therefore we should give instructions to the Magistrate to give an accused person time to prove his claim before he comes to a decision as to whether the case is to come on before him or before a higher court. I therefore commend my amendment for the approval of the House.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: I do not know, Sir, whether I should omit the words 'political or.' If those words are omitted I do not think there is any necessity for moving this amendment.* May I with your permission explain, Sir, why I have retained these words?

Mr. President: I have already ruled the words "political or" out of order. If the amendment hangs on that peg, then it falls.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment:

"In clause 24, omit the proposed section 445."

Now, the proposed section 445 in this clause provides that in the case of a summons trial where the accused happens to be a European British subject or where there are racial considerations and the accused happens to be an Indian British subject, the case should be tried by a bench of two Magistrates one of whom shall be a European. I wish to put before the House the definition of summons cases and warrant cases. Under the Criminal Procedure Code summons cases have been defined to be cases relating to offences punishable with a sentence of six months and less, while cases relating to offences punishable with any other sentence, say with death or transportation for life or for a period exceeding six months are known as warrant cases. I leave out sentences of fine or whipping; they are not included in the definition of these two classes of cases. Here we provide that such offences where the maximum punishment is only six months or less than six months and such cases involving racial considerations should be tried by a bench of two Magistrates of the first class of whom one shall be a European. Sir, apart from the compromise and apart from the Report of the Committee submitted to us, I have to point out that the offences specified in summons cases are not of a serious nature; they are very light and petty offences and it looks rather a travesty of justice that such cases should be entrusted to a bench of whom one shall be a European Magistrate. What will it come to in practice? In the provincial services which form the main part of the magistracy in the provinces, hardly 1 per cent. or 2 per cent. will be European first class Magistrates. The result would be that even such light cases will have to be transferred under this section 445 for trial to the courts of sessions. Therefore, Sir, I propose that it is desirable that such petty cases should not be sent to the courts of session for trial and I do not therefore find the necessity for inclusion of the proposed section 445 in its present form in this amendment of the Code. With these words I move that proposed section 445 be deleted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: If in the last case there was some doubt in the minds of certain Honourable Members whether we were or were not giving full effect to the recommendations of the Committee, there can be no doubt at all events on this point. I think I am correct in saying that perhaps no question was more fully debated in the Committee, and perhaps no item was a more essential part of the compromise than this. Throughout our discussion Mr. Agnihotri's attitude has of course been that the compromise counts nothing; but the House has hitherto held that, having arrived at a settlement by agreement, it is proper to stand

* "In clause 24 in proposed section 443 (1) omit clauses (a) and (b) and in their place substitute the following:

'that there are political or racial considerations and it is expedient for the ends of justice that the case should be tried under the provisions of this Chapter'."

by that agreement. That is my sole argument against the amendment; but I think it is decisive.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, when I yielded to this recommendation, I may mention what passed in my mind when I supported it. We have often heard of cases not of European accused but of Indian accused who are taken to European Magistrates, especially in the planting area. The planter complains against an Indian labourer and near at hand is a European Magistrate whom he meets every day in the Club and oftentimes I have heard that European Magistrates have not rendered justice to the Indian accused. It may be summons cases, but summons cases involving imprisonment up to six months. It may be the man who is accused is the agent of a neighbouring zamindar. We have heard of disputes between planters and neighbouring zamindars—land disputes, boundary disputes, criminal trespass and such other complaints. In such cases I feel that there should be a remedy for the Indian accused and that he should have an opportunity to take his case to a tribunal which may not be so partial. Such cases are not of infrequent occurrence and therefore I think my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, has looked at it only from one point of view, from the point of view of European accused, but I look at it from the point of view of Indian accused in such cases and that is why I supported this recommendation. It gave us a lot of trouble. In fact, at one stage—the Honourable Member can look into my draft minute—I was quite against referring summons cases at all. I thought we could trust first-class Magistrates. But it was this fact which weighed with me that there was a lot of complaint, in planting areas especially, that Indian accused could not get justice at the hands of even first class Magistrates. Therefore, I support this recommendation but, let us hope these things will cease to be in existence some years hence.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I move, Sir:

"In clause 24, in the proposed section 445 (1) omit the words 'of whom one shall be an European and the other an Indian.'"

I pointed out, a minute ago, that in the mofussil it is not practicable or probable that we shall find another European first class Magistrate excepting the district Magistrate. I think that the purpose would be equally served if we were to submit summons cases for trial to a Bench consisting of two first class Magistrates, irrespective of the consideration that one of them may be European or Indian. Therefore, Sir, I move to omit the words "of whom one shall be a European and the other an Indian."

The motion was negatived.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, whatever may be the differences of opinion as regards the construction of other parts of the Racial Distinctions Committee's Report, there cannot be two opinions upon the matter which is the subject of my amendment:

"In clause 24, in the proposed section 445 in line 6 after the words 'summons case' insert the words 'punishable with imprisonment'."

The Committee in paragraph 28 pointed out that in summons cases where the offence is punishable with imprisonment the accused and the complainant shall each have the right to apply to the trying Magistrate that the accused be sent to a Bench of two Magistrates of the first class, and so on.

[Dr. H. S. Gour.]

In the Summary, in paragraph 34, sub-clause 6, printed on page 11 of our Report, Honourable Members will find that it is laid down that:

"in a summons case, where racial considerations are involved and where a sentence of imprisonment can be passed, the accused and the complainant will each be entitled to claim that the case shall be tried by a Bench."

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the recommendation of the Racial Distinctions Committee was that in summons cases punishable with imprisonment and in no other case, where racial considerations were involved, the accused should be tried by a Bench. It was never the intention of the Racial Distinctions Committee that in all summons cases whether punishable with imprisonment or not, this special procedure should be made applicable. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "Doesn't 443 cover it?") Now, section 443 deals with a warrant case where in the course of trial outside a presidency town of an offence punishable with imprisonment, if the accused at any time before he is committed for trial under section 213, or is asked to show cause under section 242, or enters on his defence under section 256, as the case may be, claims that the accused may be tried under the provisions of this Chapter, the Magistrate shall do certain things. I am not dealing with that section. I am dealing with section 445 where a Magistrate or Sessions Judge decides under section 443 that the case ought to be tried under the provision of this Chapter and the case is a summons case. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "That is, under section 443.") The Magistrate trying the same shall direct that the case be referred to a Bench. Section 443 provides for a case punishable with imprisonment. Section 445 provides for a case which is a summons case not necessarily punishable with imprisonment. If the intention of section 445 and section 443 is the same and section 445 was intended to deal only with summons cases punishable with imprisonment, I am perfectly prepared to have an assurance from the Government Benches that section 445 was never intended to deal with summons cases not punishable with imprisonment. If that is the intention, I shall be quite glad to have an assurance from the Treasury Benches. But the section, as it reads, leaves me in doubt, and therefore, Sir, I have tabled this amendment.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay (Bengal: European): The question may now be put.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: My friend opposite has, I think, anticipated my reply,—a very obvious one,—that the beginning of section 443 (1) regulates the whole procedure of the Chapter. It specifically applies to summons cases, among others; it makes a definite reference to section 242. The words used at the beginning of the section are "where in the course of a trial outside a presidency town of any offence punishable with imprisonment". We hold that those words govern the whole course of the Chapter, and there can be no doubt whatever that section 445 only refers to summons cases which are punishable with imprisonment.

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): I move, Sir:

"In the proposed new section 449, omit the words 'under the provisions of this Chapter or' from the proposed sub-clause (a) and sub-section (3) and omit the next following proposed sub-clauses (b) and (c)."

The object of my amendment, Sir, is to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee as they were understood. If the Honourable Members will look at section 449, they will see that it lays down that:

"(1) Where:

(a) a case is tried by jury in a High Court or Court of Sessions under the provisions of this Chapter, or

(b) a case which would otherwise have been tried under the provisions of this Chapter is under this Code committed to or transferred to the High Court and is tried by jury in the High Court, etc., etc."

Under those circumstances only a right of appeal has been provided for. This means that if the accused claims that the special provision of this Chapter should be made applicable to his case and that his case should be treated as one in which the racial questions do arise, then and then only shall there be a right of appeal against the judgment of the jury on a matter of fact. The report of the Committee, Sir, on page 6 says:

"We recommend that in all jury trials in which the jury are not unanimous or, in which the jury are unanimous but the Judge does not agree with the verdict of the jury both in the High Court and in Sessions Courts, an appeal should lie on facts as well as on law, both in the case of conviction and of acquittal (the appeal in the case of acquittal being by the Local Government) in respect both of Europeans and Indians. This right should be specially laid down in the Code and should be as free and unrestricted as in the case of any other appeal. The appeal should be heard by three judges in the case of an appeal from a decision in a High Court and by two Judges in the case of an appeal from a decision in a Sessions Court. Sections 418 and 423 too should be amended accordingly."

So, Honourable Members will find that the present Bill, as it stands, does not amend sections 418 and 423. It simply provides for a right of appeal to a limited extent, when a claim has been made under this Chapter. Therefore, it leaves out certain sorts of cases where the trial has been by a mixed jury, when no claim has been preferred under this Chapter. We have passed clause 13 of the Bill and have introduced a new clause 275 providing for a mixed jury in every case where there is a trial by jury. Further, there shall be no appeal against the judgments of the mixed jury in cases where no claim has been made under this Chapter XXXIII, while the real essence of the report of the Committee was that there should be an appeal against every order of a mixed jury, on points of law as well as on points of fact. This was a very important and integral part of the report and of the compromise. I cannot understand why we should not now give full effect to those terms of the compromise. The Committee agreed to the system of mixed jury only on the condition that in all cases and on all points of law as well as of fact, whether there is an order of acquittal or of conviction, there shall be a free right of appeal. That right has not been given and my object in requesting the House to omit the words "under the provisions of this Chapter" is that a free right of appeal may be given to either party whenever there is a trial by a mixed jury. With these remarks, Sir, I recommend this amendment of mine to the House.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, the effect of Bhai Man Singh's amendment of course will be not only that an appeal on fact as well as on law will be given in cases where there is a mixed jury, but in all cases; that is perfectly clear. The Committee's recommendations have been stated by him. When these recommendations were put before Local Governments and High Courts, they represented to us their apprehensions that great additional cost would be involved in this measure. Some of them at all events did not object to the principle. We ourselves were prepared to carry out the principle had it been feasible to do so. But the nature of the increase in the judicial establishments which would have followed from giving full effect to the Committee's recommendations will be shown by some of the opinions which we have received. I would refer, for instance, to the minutes reported by Mr. Justice Marten and Mr. Justice Mulla. They said:

"It is the three or four original side judges who have to take Sessions. If therefore there was an appeal to three judges from the trial judge, it would practically involve all the Original Side judges being taken away four times a year from their civil work. And this with nearly 2,600 suits already in arrear is impracticable, unless the staff of judges is increased."

I may remark that that opinion referred of course only to appeals from the High Court itself. The Bengal High Court opinion deals with the question of appeals generally.

The High Court says:

"It will probably be necessary to maintain permanently at least two benches of two Judges—instead of one such bench as at present—for the purpose of dealing with criminal appellate and revisional work from the mufassal. In times of pressure a third bench of two Judges would be necessary, for criminal work cannot wait. The increased work will, therefore, necessitate a large number of Judges to deal with it with a corresponding increase of the clerical staff of the Court. Not only so but it will also be necessary to find additional Courts."

Then the Calcutta High Court went on to point out that if the new rights of appeal were limited to racial cases, the increase of work would of course be very much less. That is precisely the reason why we accepted the suggestion of the Bengal High Court and propose to limit the scope of the Bill to racial cases, namely, cases coming under our new Chapter. On a calculation we made at headquarters we considered that the general right of appeal recommended by the Committee would involve an expenditure of possibly some six lakhs extra. We were not sure whether it would not exceed that sum, but we placed it at what we believed to be the minimum. As I have said, we have not questioned the principle. But it does not seem reasonable at present to place this extra expense on the country in spite of the protests of Local Governments against having to meet the cost. It is of course necessary to maintain the appeal in regard to fact as well as law in these racial consideration cases; because it is by that method that we can make full use of the Government's power of appeal in doubtful cases.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The amendment* which I am moving is quite in the reverse direction to my Honourable friend, Bhai Man Singh's motion. I will just briefly state what the law is as to appeals now and what the proposal now made by Government involves. I took a strong line in this direction. If Honourable Members will refer to page 19 of my Minute in the Racial Distinctions Committee's Report they will see what line I took. The Committee's recommendation recommending appeals in all jury trials, I am sorry to say, did not meet with my approval.

* "In clause 24, in the proposed section 449 (1) between the words 'lie' and 'to' in the last but one line insert the words 'against an order of acquittal'."

As the law now stands, in jury cases there will be a trial in the Sessions Court, you can appeal to the High Court only on a matter of law, whether it be by Government against an acquittal or by the accused against a verdict of guilty. Also in the High Court where persons are tried in the Sessions trials there is no appeal at all against the verdict of the jury. In both cases the Sessions Judge, if he disagrees with the verdict of the jury, can refer the case for the orders of the High Court, and in the High Court, if the trying Judge certifies or if the Advocate General certifies, the case can be taken before a full Bench. There is no appeal really, but there is a re-trial or re-hearing before a full Bench of the High Court. That is in consonance with the prevailing idea as to trial by jury. The man is tried by his peers and he is found guilty or not guilty and there is an end of it. That is the law as always understood here relating to jury verdicts. But, Sir, what is the proposal now? The proposal now is we are going to maintain an existing evil, the existing evil having given an accused person the privilege of choosing his own Judges. That is what we are perpetuating in maintaining the mixed jury system. (A Voice: "Not perpetuating.") Yes, we are perpetuating the existing system which is an evil in itself as all of us recognise, which we hope will disappear in course of time. But out of respect for the strongly expressed views of our European fellow subjects in this country we propose to retain it, namely, giving a privilege to the accused person to choose his own Judges in order to try him and not merely take the risk of the ballot. We all know what a jury trial means. The jurors are summoned from a list and each name is called, you are given a particular right of challenge up to a certain number, uncontrolled challenge and subject to the control of the Judge, a further right of challenge. Then you take the chances of the jury trial. You do not know who they are; 9 or 12 people as the case may be—your peers—sit in judgment, hear the evidence and give the verdict. That of course is not the case in the case of a mixed jury system. The accused person whether he be an Indian or an European now says "I want five out of 9 to be my countrymen." That is what he says. He does not take the chance of the trial by a court provided for him by Government, he does not use the usual ordinary machinery, but he wants to improvise a new machinery of his choice, namely, this mixed jury system. Therefore, one should expect where a person claims to be so tried that he has more confidence in that tribunal than in the ordinary tribunals, or ordinary ballot. That is why I take it he claims a mixed jury, he has more confidence in that. I think it is but right that as in the case of jury verdicts there should be no appeal, also in this case, that is the ordinary rule should apply. We have also the second ground. Here is a Court or tribunal of his own choice, and therefore when he has taken that choice, when he has taken the choice of a trial by his own tribunal, why should we allow him a right of appeal against a verdict of conviction? I can understand your imposing a penalty or condition when you give him a privilege. This is a privilege outside the ordinary criminal procedure which an accused person gets under the law. By all means attach a condition to that privilege, namely, you prefer a particular tribunal in order to try you because you have more confidence in that tribunal. Therefore it follows that you repose more confidence in the verdict, you are going to be satisfied with the verdict given by that tribunal. But the cry has been in the country, namely, where an accused person is so tried by his own countrymen, there had been miscarriages of justice, miscarriages of justice not in the shape of unjust convictions, but in the shape of unjust acquittals. I have yet to see a case where the Press or any person has complained that because a person was tried by a mixed jury of his own countrymen there has been an unjust conviction. The cry has been the other way, namely, unjust acquittals on account of various factors, because when once it is a racial case people take sides whether it be Indian or European, it gets talked about in clubs. Newspapers give flaring headlines such as "Soldier in trouble." In this country it is the newspapers who are to blame in magnifying these cases. It is they who are responsible and create all this racial bitterness and racial animosity in this country. But for them these cases would not acquire that notoriety which they often acquire. Newspapers give headlines "Soldier in trouble," and in that way the sympathy of the people is raised, the case is talked about in clubs, ladies begin to talk about it and gentlemen sympathise with ladies, and in that way a great deal of sympathy is created in favour of the accused, and that is why people complain there are unjust acquittals in case of trials by this mixed jury system. The whole gravamen of the charge against the mixed jury system is this complaint against perverse verdicts of acquittal by jury and not verdicts of conviction. Therefore, Sir, when you are going to maintain the system, I say, if you are going to continue this privilege, impose a condition upon it, "Beware. If you are acquitted the Government will appeal against the acquittal." If you are going to abide by the ordinary privilege, leave it to the chance of the ballot, by all means have a trial by jury, take the chance of the ballot, then if you happen to be acquitted there will be no appeal against acquittal. But if you insist upon this majority, you take the risk of an appeal against acquittal, and by such means you will be discouraging such claims. Sir, we have been told to-day and also the other day that this system is going to cease to exist. If it is going to cease to exist, this is surely a method to discourage such claims being put forward by the Indian or by the European. I am sure in the case of trials in the High Court Sessions, especially in cases like the Tilak's case, the Indian accused are sure to claim this privilege of having a majority of their own countrymen. In fact, hitherto the complaint has been that in trials before the High Court, in sedition cases oftentimes the majority are composed, because of the special jury system—and there is a provision by which only a certain number are included in the special jury list—often-times the majority in a special jury is composed of Europeans and on account of political considerations the Indian accused, it is said, does not get a fair trial before such juries. Therefore hereafter we are increasing the chances of such claims being put forward. Hitherto the European was claiming it. Now by the proposed measure we are now going to pass, we are now going to encourage Indians to make similar claims in the High Court which hitherto they were not doing and they were not entitled to do. Therefore we are increasing the field of evil and when we are increasing the field of evil, let us impose some restriction upon it, let us impose a condition upon the privilege which a man claims. Now, what does he get? He not only gets his own court in which he says he has confidence but he gets a further right of appeal. Now take the case of the verdict of a jury in a case in the High Court tried by an eminent Judge. Unless the Judge certifies there is no further reference at all. Now what do you do. By this section you give him a right of appeal and the High Court is going to be saddled with extra work because in every conviction by a jury in a case like that he has got a right of appeal. Therefore you encourage him in making the claim. Instead of discouraging him, you are encouraging him to make a claim. Not only he gets his own jury but he gets a further right of appeal. I say that is not a right thing to do. The right thing to do will be to discourage persons putting forward such claims and my amendment only provides a right of appeal against acquittals and that only by Government and not by private parties. Government alone will have the right of appeal in jury verdicts and the complaint hitherto has been against unjust and perverse acquittals by juries. There is no use of extending this right of appeal further unless you want to maintain this evil for all time to come. I will jump at it if I were an accused person and choose my own Judges and have a further right of appeal, whereas if I did not take the benefit I would have no right of appeal. If I take the ordinary trial I have no right to claim this privilege of a right of appeal against a conviction, but if I claim a mixed jury I get a right of appeal as well. Therefore you are encouraging every man to make this claim. Therefore let us hesitate. Let us not run away with the idea that I provide an appeal against acquittal but not against conviction. The obvious answer to that is "They are Judges of your own choice. You had confidence in them. Why should you have a right of appeal against the sentence of judges of your own choice." Therefore, I ask you in all seriousness to consider this matter. It is a very serious matter in my view. If these racial distinctions are to die, this is the surest method of getting it to die. Otherwise you are encouraging it. You will make it continue for all time. You will perpetuate it and therefore I move the amendment which stands in my name.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, the whole argument of my friend, the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar, would be a very strong argument if it was not based upon one very material fallacy. The fallacy upon which it is based is that an accused person in a case under this chapter gets his own court. I say it deliberately, Sir, he does not. He gets a court, the constitution of which is the result of a compromise. I do not care which side you take, the European or the Indian, the result is the same. I take the case of the European because perhaps I am better qualified to speak on that point of view. If the European got his own court, he would get a court in which he would be tried by his peers but he does not ask for 5 out of 9. He would ask for 9 out of 9 Europeans and he would insist upon a unanimous verdict before he would feel that he had been found guilty justly by his peers. That is the European claim but by way of compromise under this Bill the European will get in a case under this chapter 5 out of 9 members of the jury who are of his own race. The race of the Judge who has to direct the jury and whose summing up must influence the verdict and who has a right to disagree with its verdict may be his own, may not be his own. He takes the chance of that again as the result of this compromise. Now, I myself am very much in sympathy with the feeling that the right of appeal should be done away with as far as possible in cases tried by jury and I would have been content to accept a law that in every case under this chapter the verdict of the majority shall be final, but that is not a point upon which I consider myself to be at liberty to push forward my own opinion. This chapter is the result of a compromise which we have all decided to accept and in view of that if there is to be any appeal at all, and Mr. Rangachariar would allow the right of appeal in acquittals, then I say the appeal should be equal for both parties and the recommendations of the Committee are absolutely sound and just upon that point. It is only where the jury are divided in opinion or where a Judge differs from the jury that this right of appeal is allowed and a moment's consideration of the matter will, I think, convince the House that as matters stand at present this appeal is very necessary. The European is tried for a serious offence, 5 European members of the jury hold him not guilty and four Indian members of the jury of equal intelligence and standing hold him to be guilty. Surely Indian public opinion would expect that some strong dominating opinion should come to a final decision upon a difference of that kind where the majority in favour of acquittal is one only. I think that this clause as we have it now proposed in this Bill is in the present condition of things absolutely necessary and I would suggest to the House which by an overwhelming majority has insisted upon a right of appeal in cases of whipping only not to interfere with the right of appeal in the serious cases with which juries will have to deal.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, I have been in the habit of yielding to my learned friend on my right (Mr. Rangachariar) generally on questions of criminal law, because he has had more experience as a criminal lawyer, though I have had longer experience in the bar, but on this particular occasion I cannot in the least support the contention put forward by him. After all the Legislature that passes a law must have regard to the first principles of criminal jurisprudence and must not offend against received notions of criminal law. The right of appeal is everywhere given against a conviction and rightly too. Whoever the accused may be, whether he is an European or Indian, he is entitled to seek the assistance of an appellate court to establish his innocence. That is the first principle of criminal law, and it is that principle of law that we are insisting on all through. To give a right of appeal against an acquittal and to deny a right of appeal against a conviction would be a travesty of criminal law which I, who have had some experience of courts, cannot in the least countenance; and I ask the House not to be led away by passionate eloquence in a matter like this; it is, after all, a question of our law being sound and of our bringing our law into conformity with what is regarded as justice, and in conformity with legal notions everywhere. It may be, Sir, that by providing an appeal against an acquittal certain miscarriages of justice may be remedied. But if a man who has been convicted is not given a right of appeal, and even if one man is improperly convicted, and he has lost a chance of setting the matter right in appeal, I think Government will be charged by the most serious imputation of not giving the man his chance of establishing his innocence: and therefore, Sir, when we give a right of appeal against an acquittal, it follows as a matter of course, as a matter of consequence, that we must give a right of appeal against a conviction as well; and I do not think that anything that has been said in the course of the argument of my Honourable friend would induce the House to turn down a well recognized principle of law and to say that there should be no right of appeal against a conviction.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, after the very able and eloquent speech of my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, hardly anything remains for me to say, but although I am a layman, I have just risen to answer some of the arguments that have been advanced in such eloquent terms by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. Mr. Rangachariar in the course of his remarks suggested, 'what right have you to say that a man ought to appeal when he is tried by the men whom he himself has chosen?' I want to give one instance at any rate of which I know where a person was concerned, of course in a different country, by people whom technically he or she had the right to choose, and yet the verdict was such as to surprise the Judge himself,—and I do not know whether there was any appeal against it, but it was a case of glaring injustice resulting probably from the ignorance of the jury; I refer to the case of Mrs. Besant in Great Britain which occurred only in 1921 when in a Scottish Court her case was before a jury, I mean the case was tried by a jury, and the Judge summed up, and you had persons like the late Viceroy, Lord Chelmsford and the Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastri and Lady Emily Lutyens who were called upon to give evidence and they gave evidence which, after all, said that, whatever be the political propaganda of Mrs. Besant, it was certain that she was not opposed to the British connection, and the Judge led in his summing up to that, and yet you find the ignorance of the jury was such that they gave a verdict against Mrs. Besant. Now you might come across many instances in this country where a man, where a poor Indian in South Africa, for instance, may have to be tried in an Indian Court by his own countrymen and yet the ignorance of our own countrymen may be responsible for forcing on him an absolutely wrong conviction. Well, in such cases to deny to him the right of appeal to eminent Judges who know more how to deal with matters like this than laymen, would, I think, be to take a great risk and probably it would be tantamount to perpetrating an act of injustice. I therefore feel that there is ample justification for providing for appeal against a conviction by a jury, and that therefore Mr. Rangachariar's amendment should be negatived.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I should like to present to the House a few considerations in connection with my friend Mr. Rangachariar's amendment. He opened his speech by remarking that it is an elementary principle that in all cases of trial by a man's peers the verdict is final and is not open to appeal. Well, I must respectfully differ from him. Has he forgotten the provision of the English law relating to appeals against the verdict of the jury, which now allows appeals against the verdict of the jury? Then my friend's next argument was that the accused in this case has empanelled a special tribunal, a tribunal of his choice. Why not give him this alternative, that if he is to be tried by the ordinary jury, he will have the ordinary right of appeal, but if he claims and obtains a special treatment regarding the nationality of the jurors, then he will have no right of appeal? My friend made no secret of the fact that he used this as an argument for the ultimate disappearance of all racial distinctions. But for the time being he will acknowledge it that it amounts to penalising the accused by telling him that if you have this special jury, then you have no right of appeal. Now, I submit, is it fair to the accused in the dock to say that, if you wish a jury of a particular nationality, then you will have no right of appeal? Lastly, Sir, my friend has forgotten that in this country there are such things as castes and communities. It may be that the jurors are Indians, but it may also be that their verdict is perverse and inspired by considerations other than those justifiable by the evidence on record. If in a case of this kind, they perversely convicted the accused, should the accused be deprived of the right of appeal? These are the considerations which I submit weighed with the Committee, and in spite of the able advocacy of my friend, the Committee decided otherwise. I have no doubt that the House will support the Committee.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 24, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, I am moving amendment No. 57.

"After clause 24 insert the following clause:

'24A. In section 456 of the said Code the word 'European' wherever it occurs shall be omitted.'

I may premise my remarks by stating that I am only placing before the House

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: May I interrupt the Honourable Member, Sir? I do not wish to let him remain ignorant of the fact that by clause 24 of the Bill we do away with section 456, there will be no section 456.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: That may be, but that does not prevent my moving it, because that was a matter which was taken into consideration by the Committee. It was discussed there, and I am moving the amendment in order to bring out what I wanted and what was recommended by the Select Committee. But if it is repealed, I have no right to move. Its repeal is exactly what I want.

Mr. President: The point of order taken by the Home Member is quite correct. Clause 24 which we have just added to the Bill reads as follows:

"For Chapter XXXIII including sections 443 to 463 of the said Code the following Chapter and sections shall be substituted."

Therefore the amendment in the Code which the Honourable Member proposes to make, namely, to omit the word 'European' in section 456 falls to the ground, because the new Chapter XXXIII runs from section 443 to section 449 and the old sections drop out.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: I do not understand the Government saying that section 456 is omitted altogether from the Code of Criminal Procedure. If it were the case I have no amendment. But as the sections from 456 to 491 were recommended to the Select Committee and the Select Committee recommended how to modify 456 and 491, I am moving what modification is necessary in 456. I therefore appeal to the Chair, Sir, to reconsider the question whether I am not entitled to move on a matter which was submitted to the Committee and on which the Committee made a recommendation.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member should have thought of that when I put the question that clause 24 stand part of the Bill. His point of order is not strictly relevant, because I was proceeding to put clause 25. But to explain the matter to him once more and in case it is not clear to other Members, I would point out that an entirely new Chapter XXXIII has now been inserted consisting of sections 443 to 449 inclusive. The old Chapter XXXIII consisted of sections 443 to 463 and those all drop out by the decision just made by the House. Since 456 comes between 443 and 463, it drops out as well.

Clauses 25, 26 and 27 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"that clause 28 be omitted."

Sir, under clause 27 we have extended the powers of the High Courts other than the chartered High Courts beyond what they were under the old Criminal Procedure Code, i.e., under this clause we have extended that power to those High Courts, Chief Courts or Judicial Commissioner's Courts which are not established under the Charter. Under clause 28 we extend the power of the chartered High Courts over certain territories which are beyond British India. Sir, I have not been able to find out what these territories are, whether they are the territories of Indian Princes or Feudatory Chiefs beyond British India, or the ceded territories under British administration. If the reference is to the ceded territories, then I do not understand why this right has been confined only to the chartered High Courts; if, on the other hand they are the territories of Princes and Feudatory Chiefs, then I do not understand the necessity of extending this power over their territories. I am therefore moving my amendment more with a view to find out the exact meaning of the word 'territories' and the reasons for extending the powers of chartered High Courts only to such territories beyond British India. I think that that might lead to a conflict of jurisdictions between the courts in British India and those in the Indian States. I therefore move that this clause 28 be omitted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member asks for information. I would ask my Honourable friend, Mr. Tonkinson, to supply it. He has the papers here.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I would remark in the first place about this clause that it gives effect to the definite recommendation of the Committee. If Honourable Members will refer to paragraph 29 of their report they will see on page 10 that they say:

"In this and other matters we would not interfere with the existing procedure in respect of Indian States."

And now, Sir, in this proposed section 491A we are not introducing any new provision, we are practically repeating the provisions of section 458 of the Criminal Procedure Code as they stand at present, though we have transferred those provisions to the Chapter dealing with the habeas corpus provisions. The habeas corpus provisions in section 491 will be extended to the whole of British India for all subjects of His Majesty. But as regards European British subjects we have treaty provisions with Indian States which enable us to exercise foreign jurisdiction rights in those Indian States, and those are the rights which we will be able to exercise under section 491A. We have no treaty rights which would enable us to accept an amendment of this provision omitting the word "European".

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Sir, may I ask the Honourable the Home Member for some information with regard to section 491? The Repressive Laws Committee of which I was a Member, recommended that the Bengal States Regulation, III of 1818, Madras Regulation 2 of 1819, the Bombay and other similar Regulations should be withdrawn. Nothing has been said with regard to them. Section 491, clause 3 of the Code now applies to European and Indian British subjects alike. In the interests of both European and Indian British subjects may I ask whether any definite step has been taken by the Secretary of State with regard to the recommendations of the Repressive Laws Committee which recommended that these Regulations should be repealed. For instance, in the frontier provinces or elsewhere British subjects may be taken into custody detained or deported, but in that case 491 as now amended will apply to European British subjects alike. So in the interests of all, I beg to inquire what action has been taken by Government with regard to our recommendation.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We have, I think, already finished this clause. The Honourable Member is asking for information about a subject somewhat outside the clause. If he will put that question to me afterwards either in the House or privately I shall be glad to answer him.

The amendment was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, I move that in clause 28 in the proposed new section 491A before the word "European" insert the word "Indian."

My position with regard to this matter is this, that Indian subjects of His Majesty are as much entitled to the protection of the British Government or by the High Courts of the Crown as European British subjects. Surely, Sir, if a necessity has been felt to make a special provision in the Criminal Procedure Code for the protection of European British subjects . . .

Mr. President: I would like to know what the Honourable Member seeks to effect by his amendment. The amendment makes the section run " . . . Indian European British subjects . . . "

Bhai Man Singh: I mean Indian or European subject. I do not propose to substitute 'Indian' for 'European.' If the Government of India has thought it fit to extend this protection to European British subjects in the Indian States, there is no reason why the same protection should not be given to the Indian subjects of His Majesty, at least to the extent that the treaties with the Indian States allow. Treaties being a sealed book to me I cannot, of course, say how far this is feasible or not. If treaty rights stand in the way, then it is quite a different thing. Honourable Members will see that the section as now framed runs as follows:

"Any High Court established by letters patent may exercise the powers conferred by section 491 in the case of any European British subject within such territories, other than those within the limits of its appellate criminal jurisdiction, as the Governor General in Council may direct."

The section, therefore, is sufficiently elastic to extend the right given under it to any territories that the Governor General in Council thinks proper; and if in the case of any other subjects such protection under treaty rights cannot be afforded to Indians, the Governor General need not direct under this section. But in the case of treaties under which that protection can be given to Indian subjects, there is absolutely no reason why it should not be so extended and if the House adopts this amendment the power will remain with the Governor General in Council not to direct such protection to be given where treaty rights do not permit it.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Mr. Bhai Man Singh has foreseen our difficulty in this respect; we could not make this further extension in view of the nature of our treaties with Indian States. It would be of little avail to confer on the High Courts a power under the Criminal Procedure Code which we could not implement under our treaties.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Is it a universal clause in all the treaties, and if so, what are its terms?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: There are a very large number of different treaties; if I am correct, the terms differ in almost every case.

Bhai Man Singh: Do not the treaties of any States allow protection to be given?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I should like time to examine the question, but my impression is—and I give it only as an impression—that they do not give us these powers.

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 28 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 29, the proposed sub-section 526A be omitted."

By this clause we provide that where any person subject to the Naval Discipline Act or to the Army Act or to the Air Force Act is accused of any offence such as is referred to in proviso (a) to section 41 of the Army Act, the Advocate General shall, if so instructed by the competent authority, apply to the High Court for the committal or transfer of the case to that High Court and thereupon the High Court shall order that the case be committed for trial to or to be transferred to itself and shall thereafter proceed to try the case by jury. Sir, here we provide that in the case of trials involving members of the navy or army if the competent authority so desires, it shall direct the Advocate General who shall apply to the High Court and the High Court shall transfer that case to its own file. Under this section we compel a High Court without giving it any discretion to allow or disallow an application for transfer of that case to itself. I think it is against the principles of justice that the highest court of law in the country should be compelled to do a thing in this way and should not have a discretion to do what it thinks proper. The best course would have been to provide that the Advocate General shall apply on the application of competent authority, and the High Court, if it thinks it is in the interests of justice to have such a case transferred to itself, may do it. Here we make it obligatory and compulsory, which I think goes against the spirit of justice and law. I therefore propose, Sir, that this special provision for the benefit of soldiers and sailors should not be allowed to exist in this Bill and that they should be treated on the same level as any other European British subject in this country. With these words, Sir, I commend my amendment for the consideration of the House.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, luckily it is not one of the provisions which has been the subject of compromise between the gentlemen who constituted that committee, because anything that has been touched by their sacred hands cannot be touched by the profane hands of the Members of this Assembly. But luckily, Sir, this is a point about which a mere Member of this Assembly can muster up courage to make a few remarks. I wish to make it clear that I do not propose to deny this right either to a soldier or anybody else in whose favour this provision has been inserted, but I do submit with great confidence that this is a provision which offends against the jurisprudential conceptions of a lawyer. What you have in this provision is this. There is to be constituted a competent authority by the Governor General in Council. That competent authority has to decide that a particular case of a soldier is not to be tried by a particular Court. That being his opinion, he instructs the Advocate General and on that instruction the Advocate General moves the High Court and what is the result? The High Court then orders that that case be either transferred or be committed to its own file. I submit, Sir, that the provision which is contained in this clause really makes the High Court a body which will register the opinion of the competent authority because the Advocate General, Sir, is only a kind of a post office. He receives the impulse from the competent authority, he transmits that impulse to the High Court, and the High Court like an automaton has to pass the desired order, whether it wills or no. Sir, in the note which has been prepared by the Department it is very naively stated "It is an extension of section 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure". I submit, Sir, and I say so without the least fear of contradiction that this provision is a negation of section 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Now, if the House will refer to section 526, what it finds is this:

"Whenever it is made to appear to the High Court:

- (a) that a fair and impartial inquiry or trial cannot be had in any Criminal Court subordinate thereto, or
- (b) that some question of law of unusual difficulty is likely to arise, or
- (c) that a view of the place in or near which any offence has been committed may be required for the satisfactory inquiry or trial of the same, or
- (d) that an order under this section will tend to the general convenience of the parties or witnesses, or
- (e) that such an order is expedient for the ends of justice or is required by any provision of this Code, it may order"

Under section 526 of the Criminal Procedure Code the High Court retains the power of going into the question, examining the pros and cons, then coming to a decision whether or not the High Court will make an order about the transfer of a particular case. But according to the provision which you have got in front of you what have you got?

"Where any person subject to the Naval Discipline Act or to the Army Act or to the Air Force Act is accused of any offence such as is referred to in proviso (a) to section 41 of the Army Act, the Advocate General shall, if so instructed by the competent authority, apply to the High Court for the committal or transfer of the case to that High Court and thereupon the High Court shall order that the case be committed for trial to or be transferred to itself and shall therefore proceed to try the case by jury."

I submit, Sir, in the face of this provision, the High Court has no option left in the matter. It is deprived of its right of determining the question before it, whether or not it should order the transfer of a particular case. According to this section, it is really the competent authority which will decide it and the competent authority, having decided it, instructs the Advocate General and the Advocate General moves the High Court and the High Court, as a matter of necessity, without any choice or discretion being left to it, is bound to pass the order that the Advocate General wishes it to pass. I ask, Sir, is this a sound provision? I appeal to the Members of Government not to have a provision which will really disfigure the Statute Book. The High Court in the land is being reduced—I shall not use a stronger word—to a position where it is deprived of its power of determining the question of transfer that comes before it but has simply to carry out the behests of the competent authority. I submit, Sir, regard being had to these considerations, the House will do well in pausing before it accepts this clause. And, Sir, there is that perennial and perpetual argument in my favour that this is not a clause which has been agreed to by those distinguished and all-wise men in regard to whose judgment no one dare say a word.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am sorry that on Munshi Iswar Saran's first re-appearance in this Assembly, where we are all glad to welcome him back, he should have felt obliged to oppose this section.

I do not quarrel with his description of the clause. It is perfectly true, that the effect of this clause is that, if a transfer is applied for, the transfer must be made. But I do not follow him in saying that is a slight on the High Courts. That it deprives the High Court of option, I admit. But I do not think that the High Courts themselves, considering that the Executive has already a power of transferring from one High Court to another, and that here all we seek is to effect a transfer to the High Court's own files, would feel it as a slight on them. Now, Mr. Iswar Saran is aware, as the House is aware, that this is one of the two recommendations of the Committee which we have modified under instructions from His Majesty's Government. (Munshi Iswar Saran: "Is it binding on us?") The fact I have stated is perfectly clear; I stated it in my introductory speech; it has been canvassed in the newspapers; it was alluded to here when we had our motion for consideration, and I heard from the side opposite that it was not a matter of such importance that they need take exception to it.

No, Sir, it is binding on us. We are not obliged to register the instructions of the Home Government. But it is a condition on which the approval of the Home Government has been given. And let us again be perfectly clear about it. I do not think that the Home Government would allow this Bill unless it contained this clause. That is my belief, and that being so, I think it is right that I should put it to the House. But Mr. Iswar Saran has attacked this as an unusual measure and as disparaging to the High Court. He has not in any way gone into the merits of the question. At the risk of taking up some little time of the House, may I do so? The clause, of course, applies to a particular class of persons, those who come under the Army Act or the Air Force Act; in other words, British soldiers or members of the Air Force serving in this country.

I have already made a point of it to the House that these men come out here not of their own option, as I do, for instance, or those who are engaged in commerce. They come out here because they are part of the British Army and are drafted out here in the ordinary course of their duties. Now, compare their status in point of trial procedure in England and in India. In England, there is a perfect concurrent jurisdiction between Courts-martial and civil courts except for what are known as the five major offences classified in section 41 of the Army Act, murder, rape and the like. In spite of this concurrent jurisdiction, in practice, of course, the greater part of minor offences committed by men in the Army are tried in the civil courts, these five major offences must in any case be tried in the civil courts. Now, in England the British soldier, if he comes under trial by Civil Courts, can claim trial by a jury if he is accused of an offence the punishment for which exceeds six months. Therefore, in England, if he is to receive a sentence of above six months, he can claim a trial by jury. That would apply, of course, to all the minor offences. Then take the major offences which the courts-martial cannot try and which must come before the Civil Courts—cases of murder, rape and the like. Where is he tried there? He is tried at the Court of Assize before a Judge of the King's Bench. That is his judicial status in England. If he comes out here, what does he find? In respect of the Army Act his status is this. He is liable to the concurrent jurisdiction of courts-martial except in respect of these five major offences; if one of these major offences is committed within 100 miles of a competent court, (at present, a High Court), then the court-martial has no jurisdiction, and he is to be tried before the said High Court. For minor offences tried before Civil Courts he will find then, that as the law will stand in future, he may be sentenced to two years' imprisonment by a Magistrate; that is, in cases in which racial considerations do not arise. In other words, he can receive—and this is the aspect of the question which will appeal to him—he can receive, in cases in which racial considerations do not arise, two years' imprisonment from a Magistrate without the benefit of a jury. Then we will take the case as it will arise under our new criminal procedure in respect of the major offences—the five excepted offences under section 41 of the Army Act. What will he find here? He will find first that he is triable by a Court of Session, instead of a High Court, as before, and in non-racial cases, the Sessions Court may only have Assessors, not a Jury. But more; he will find another change; for when as under the present procedure he is triable by a Civil Court, and not by a Court-martial, only if the offence is committed within 100 miles of a competent court, namely, a High Court, now he becomes triable by a Civil Court if the offence is committed within 100 miles of a Court of Session, that is, in far more numerous cases. Therefore, not only will it appear to him that his status in regard to minor offences is inferior to what he enjoys in England because he does not get a jury for such offences if non-racial but also because by our new legislation we propose to extend very greatly the sphere of the Civil Court jurisdiction and to lower the class of Court before which he may be tried. You must, in justice, put yourself in the mind as far as possible of the person affected, and I say there is little doubt that the British soldier coming out here will feel that he is, in regard to trial procedure, in a position greatly inferior to that which he would enjoy in England. Once again, I point out that he does not come here of his own free will. But, there is a further aspect of the case. I would like to point out that section 41 of the Indian Army Act under which certain offences are taken away from the cognisance of courts-martial is in itself an exceptional measure. It probably arises out of the history which underlies the maintenance of a Standing Army in England. Thus in India, under the Indian Army Act, there are no such exceptions in regard to persons either European or Indian serving in the Indian Army. That is to say courts-martial and Civil Courts have a perfect concurrent jurisdiction in their case. So, you have this anomaly, that whereas persons under the Indian Army Act find themselves under a perfect concurrent jurisdiction of courts-martial and Civil Courts yet by the chance that British soldiers come under the British Army Act, for certain offences they cannot be tried by courts-martial and must be tried by Civil Courts. That again is another aspect of the question which will seem undoubtedly an anomaly to the British soldier. Finally, of course, we are going to render a verdict of acquittal by a jury appealable on fact as well as law, on the part of Government, in cases involving racial considerations. This will seem to men of this class a new and strange provision. Now, in view of these facts, namely, that in regard to minor offences, and also to some extent in regard to major offences, his status in point of trial will appear to him to be already lower in India than it is in England in view also of the fact that our new procedure greatly extends the scope of civil jurisdiction over persons serving under the Army Act, because the competent court is now the Sessions Court and not the High Court, considering these two facts is it unreasonable that His Majesty's Government should have introduced this proviso in favour of the British soldier? It simply amounts to this, that the Army Commander, and no lower authority than an Army Commander, may in certain cases exercise the right of requiring transfer from a Sessions Court to a High Court. Remember that this amounts only to a demand for transfer from a lower Civil Court to a higher; whereas under the Indian Army Act, executive authority has power to keep cases from the Civil Court altogether and retain them for Court-martial. Under section 526, if the Civil Magistrate thinks that a man should be tried by a Civil Court, instead of the court-martial, then the military authority refers the matter to the orders of the Governor General and the latter can decide that he should be tried by court-martial. As I say, all that we seek to do in order to overcome any discontent that may be caused among the members of the British Army, owing to the new procedure which we are now introducing, is to give a very high military authority, namely, the Army Commander, the right of moving for the transfer from the Sessions Court to the High Court. That application will be made only in exceptional cases. That is the sole extent of our provision, and I do not feel that in the circumstances the House will regard it as an unreasonable one.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, after what the Honourable Member has said, I do not wish to press this amendment, but all the same I feel and say on behalf of every Member on this side of the House that we should not assent to this without a protest. We have agreed to the definition of "European British subject" because the Secretary of State gave sanction to this Bill and to the recommendations of the Committee subject to our acceptance of that definition. The Honourable the Home Member has also said that this is the second condition with which the sanction of the Secretary of State was given. But I find His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief present here and I feel that I should take this opportunity of making known to him the feeling of the country with regard to this question. This amendment of the Code places the soldiers in an altogether different position from civilians, be he an Englishman or be he a native of this country. Now with regard to the Englishmen or the European British subjects who pursue civil occupation, we have nothing much to fear from them. They, many of them, carry on business or trade in the mofussil, in Narayan-ganj, Dacca, the Doonars in Bengal and other places and cases of oppression or assault or other graver offences are not common amongst them. But I must draw His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief's attention to the fact that the people of this country have serious grievances against the soldiers. They come out to this country for a short time. They do not understand the customs and habits of the people of this country and they do not share the same fellow-feeling as the Europeans in civil occupation do, and sometimes they do rash, negligent, and reckless things. Some of the gravest cases that I have known in the Calcutta High Court from my earliest days, for instance, the O'Hara case, the Barrackpore murder case, the shooting down of a master tailor in the Fort William and in fact the gravest cases of this type were offences committed by the soldiers. There was only a recent case in Meerut.

I shall take this occasion to protest against the remarks that have been made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, with regard to newspapers. But for the newspapers these offences which are committed inland, in the mofussil, would not have come to light. The newspapers in this country do a distinct service in bringing to the notice of the public and to the notice of the authorities, military and civil, all the offences committed by these newcomers into our country.

[Mr. J. Chaudhuri.]

But, to return to my subject, what was the position of soldiers up to now? The position was this that British soldiers or other British-born subjects were absolutely in the same position; they could apply to the High Court to be tried there. (A Voice: "Court-martialled.") I am not concerned with court-martial. With regard to civilians, in a way—whether we regard it as satisfactory or not—they have been put on an equal footing with His Majesty's Indian subjects. But this Bill places the soldiers in a different category altogether. Their status remains what has hitherto been provided for, for Europeans, by the Criminal Procedure Code, that is, they can apply to the High Court and have their cases transferred there. I do not look at it from the point of view that my Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, does, that it is a slur on the High Court. That is a minor question. If they are tried in the High Court, I have the fullest confidence in the High Court that so far as judges are concerned justice will be done there. But I should draw the attention of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to the fact that there is another party to the question. Supposing a soldier, inland, in the mofussil, commits some grave offence against an ordinary poor subject of His Majesty, if these cases are transferred to the High Court, the poor man has to bring the witnesses before the High Court and it means expense and serious inconvenience to him. I have said that I am not going to be obstructive and I am not saying this to support the amendment, but merely to record our protest for the time being. I would not press this House to a division over this question. But at the same time I wish to draw the attention of His Excellency that, since this provision places the practical authority in His Excellency's hands, it enhances his responsibility and those of the commanding officers under him, and, I am sure, he will exercise his judgment and see that the poor people of this country get justice in such cases and that this procedure is not needlessly used against them where it is likely to be oppressive or expensive to them or where by reason of distance or expense they may not be able to stay away from home or to take their witnesses with them to prove their case in a distant Presidency town. We have great regard for His Excellency who is a leader of men and who has risen to this high position because he has always been so kind and courteous, brave and courageous and has treated his men justly and fairly. A General cannot command his army unless he is strict and absolutely fair and just. I would appeal to his soldierly instincts that when he issues instructions to the officers concerned, that he may direct them that whenever a soldier does any wrong to the humblest of His Majesty's subjects, they should exercise their discretion in the interests of justice and see that the man is adequately punished. With these observations I would ask my Honourable friend not to press this amendment. I record this protest, hoping that later on a time may come when these invidious distinctions will be withdrawn. I resume my seat without any further comment.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief: I should like to reply to my Honourable friend at once. I think he may have, the House may have, every confidence not only in my own sense of justice, but also in that of what is described in this Bill as the competent military authority. That competent military authority we have restricted to the four Army Commanders who control the various sections of the Army in India, and I might perhaps call the Honourable Member's attention to a paragraph in the Statement of Objects and Reasons of this Bill at the bottom of page 2, that it will be restricted to those officers "who are already entrusted with very high responsibilities and they are confident that it will be only in exceptional cases that these officers will use the power which it is proposed to vest in them." I can assure the House that I will see that this is carried out.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: My friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, this morning, in that expansive mood of his, of praise and protest, his included me in the category under protest and my friend, Dr. Gour, with his innate sympathy for such protests directed against me cried 'Hear, hear.' What did I say this morning? I objected to the flaring head lines in the papers about soldiers in trouble and thereby creating prejudice in the minds of the Jury. I do not object to newspapers bringing to light grave cases of assault. On the other hand I welcome it. My friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, has entirely misunderstood my remarks and has directed his protest in a wrong direction.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I suggest one short amendment which while keeping and preserving the sense of the amendment proposed by the Government will perhaps spare the High Courts their dignity in this matter. That is that the word "may" be substituted for the word "shall". Then the section will read "the High Court may order that the case be committed for trial to or be transferred to itself", etc. The Honourable the Home Member will perceive that he has already pointed out that only very few and exceptional cases are likely to come under the provisions of this clause and I think he will also admit that the supreme court for the trial of such cases and for the decision on matters of this kind is the High Court. We have no doubt that His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief and his Army Commanders will use wise discretion in selecting such cases but the final order must, I submit, rest with the High Court and I think if this small amendment is accepted it will be highly appreciated by the House and I have no doubt that the Honourable Mover of the amendment will then withdraw his amendment. I shall also withdraw mine, which is worded exactly in the same terms.

Mr. President: I cannot put the amendment to substitute the word "may" for the word "shall" as long as the proposal is made to omit the whole clause. I must dispose of the one before I can take up the other.

Dr. H. S. Gour: With the permission of the Mover of the amendment I should like this small change to be made and withdraw the rest, both his amendment and mine.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: If this is done, I will withdraw.

Mr. President: I cannot satisfy that condition. It is for the Government to say.

Mr. Agnihotri's amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am afraid I shall be under some imputation of misleading the Honourable Member if I do not object at this stage. The Honourable Member must not withdraw his amendment under any impression that I shall be able to accept Dr. Gour's amendment. I regret that I am not able to do so.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"To substitute the word 'may' for the word 'shall' in the third last line of new section 526A."

[Mr. President.]

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: Clause 29 was added to the Bill.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Three of the Clock. Mr. Deputy President was in the Chair.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I move that:

"In clause 30 omit the proposed section 528D, sub-section (2)."

Sir, I confess my inability to comprehend the necessity of retaining this sub-section (2) to clause 528D. We have already provided in the body of the Bill that no Magistrate shall give punishment for more than what he is authorised to sentence under this Bill. We have also provided in the body of the Bill, and specifically provided, that second and third class Magistrates shall not have jurisdiction over European British subjects for the trial of offences punishable with fine exceeding Rs. 50. Over and above that, we now further provide here that nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorise any Court to exceed the limits prescribed by the Code as to the amount of punishment which may be inflicted on an European British subject or to confer jurisdiction on any Magistrate of the second or third class for the trial of European British subjects. This clause becomes superfluous. But this clause has reference to clause (1) above. Clause (1) above puts the European British subjects under the jurisdiction of Magistrates under other enactments made by the Governor General in Council although such persons are not expressly referred to therein. It may be said—and that is the point which also strikes me—that the above clause refers to the punishments that may be prescribed under any other enactments that may be made by the Governor General in Council. If it refers to the punishment that is provided there, then probably this clause may after all be necessary, otherwise when we have already laid down a specific provision in this Bill for a particular class of people, it does not seem necessary that there should be any express provision like clause (2) of this section 528D. Moreover, Sir, some confusion is likely to arise by the insertion of this clause, and that would be by way of contradistinction. We have provided in a previous part of the Bill that under certain circumstances Indian British subjects and European British subjects shall have equal rights but here we specify only one of these classes of people and by this contradistinction it may lead to a supposition that in the case of an Indian British subject a sentence could be passed for a period exceeding the period allowed under this law. These two doubts occur to my mind, so I think it better to put the point before the House and to have it cleared by the Government. With these words, Sir, I move the amendment which stands in my name.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 30 omit the proposed section 528D, sub-section (2)."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I wish to draw the attention of the Government to the latter portion of this clause (2). It seems to me to go beyond the agreement arrived at between us. It was not the intention of the Committee at all to deprive second and third class Magistrates of jurisdiction over European British subjects. On the other hand it retained the jurisdiction of second and third class Magistrates, but it only gives the option to the accused person, in case he wants a trial elsewhere, that he may take it to any other tribunal. The jurisdiction is there; it is only an option given to the accused person under certain circumstances. As the clause now stands, in clause (2), if Honourable Members will follow the language of clause (2):

"nothing in this section shall be deemed to confer jurisdiction on any Magistrate of the second or third Class for the trial of such subjects"— and it is going beyond the object of the provision. Here you deliberately take away the jurisdiction of second and third class Magistrates for the trial of such subjects, whereas we retained it under the law as we proposed, we retained it,—I mean, in this Code, as we proposed to enact it, but this section assumes that we confer no jurisdiction at all, that is to say, we will have to modify the clause by adding some such clause except as provided herein. Some such qualifying phrase is necessary, otherwise it may mean that "under any other law"; that is to say, section 528D, clause (1), refers to other laws by which offences may be created. Second and third class Magistrates will have no jurisdiction at all. That is how I read it.

"Unless there is something repugnant in the context, all enactments made by the Governor General in Council or the Indian Legislature which confer on Magistrates or on the Court of Session jurisdiction over offences shall be deemed to apply to European British subjects, although such persons are not expressly referred to therein."

Then, the second clause runs:

"Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorise any Court to exceed the limits prescribed by this Code as to the amount of punishment which it may inflict on an European British subject or to confer jurisdiction on any Magistrate of the second or third class for the trial of such subjects."

You take away entirely the jurisdiction from second and third class Magistrates even if the accused do not object. I do not think it is the intention of the Legislature, certainly not the intention underlying the compromise arrived at, and I think some saving phrase is necessary,—"save in the circumstances aforesaid" or something of that kind. Without that, it is absolutely taking away the jurisdiction from such Magistrates,—I want the Government to consider that.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, it will be seen of course that this clause 528D reproduces, in effect, the existing section 459 of the Criminal Procedure Code. I may say at once, that it was not the intention of Government to take any new powers under this clause, or in any way to insert provisions repugnant to what has gone before in the Bill, or to the agreement effected by the Committee. I wish to make this perfectly clear. Indeed I think that if you read the second part of this clause, sub-clause (2), the words, "or to confer jurisdiction on any Magistrate of the second or third class" have not in themselves the effect of depriving Magistrates of the second or third class of any jurisdiction that has previously been conferred on them in this Bill. All they convey is that sub-clause (1) shall not, in itself confer any jurisdiction on such Magistrates. I appreciate, however, the difficulty which my Honourable friends have felt. I do not think that they themselves are striving, certainly not Mr. Rangachariar, for the complete exclusion of this clause,—what they want is that it should be elucidated, so that it shall be made clear beyond any possibility of doubt that we are not seeking fresh powers here or doing anything repugnant to the agreement of the Committee. That clause will be very carefully examined. It is indeed possible that in the process of consolidation the whole of it may have to go out. For the present I would ask that it may be allowed to stand. We shall scrutinise it carefully, and if further elucidation is required in order to effect the purpose we have in mind, we shall certainly do so, and I am sure we shall receive the agreement of the House in any necessary drafting amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, on the assurance given by the Honourable the Home Member, I beg to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I feel I am leading a forlorn hope in asking this House to accept the amendment* which stands against my name. I have already said two days back what I consider to be my view regarding the conferment of jurisdiction over non-British Europeans and Americans. I can only express a hope that the Honourable the Home Member will remember what I said, and when the process of consolidation is in progress he may see the force and the strength of the conviction, at any rate, of the non-official Members of this House, and remove from the Code of Criminal Procedure the exceptional provisions relating to non-British Europeans and Americans. As regards the Americans I should like to present to the House the latest cable which runs as follows:

"Washington. In case relating to Bhagat Singh who obtained certificate of citizenship in Oregon several years ago the Supreme Court to-day (that is the 19th of this month) ruled that high-caste Hindu of full Indian blood was ineligible for American citizenship on ground that he was not free white person within the meaning of the law."

I am afraid, Sir, some such sub-conscious mental attitude has dictated to the Legislatures of the earlier days in introducing the preferential clauses relating to non-British Europeans and Americans. I have protested before and I do so once more in the name of the House. I do not wish to press my amendment but I only ask the Honourable the Home Member that if he will consult the opinions of non-official Members of this House, he will be well advised in reconsidering those provisions relating to non-British Europeans and Americans.

Clauses 30 to 40 were added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I move that the Bill, as amended, be now passed.

I would ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes. A few days ago when I moved for consideration, immersed as we seemed likely to be at short notice in details arising out of the amendments, I did not take the opportunity of thanking the House for some very kindly references to myself. I do so now, and from a very full heart. We frequently hear it said that this is the last year of this Assembly and perhaps its last session; and whenever we hear that, we on these Benches have I am sure a feeling of regret. My colleagues here have in the last two and a half years made many friends; and certainly I can say myself that I have been treated with a forbearance and with a kindness which is altogether characteristic of India, and which to many of us makes service for India not a duty but a devotion.

And now, as regards our Bill—I use that word advisedly, for I have never regarded it purely as a Government measure; I have regarded it simply as a measure intended to register the agreement between two great communities on a vital subject. If there is any credit due for the passing of it, it is due to those who came to that agreement. I have already paid my tribute to the services of Dr. Sapru. I hope I may be allowed to add here an equal tribute to one who endeared himself to this Assembly, my predecessor the Honourable Sir William Vincent. (Hear, hear.) I should like also, if I may, mention—as they say at the University honoris causa—those Members of the Assembly who contributed to that happy result.

I think that the discussions on the amendments have shown that our draftsman and Mr. Tonkinson, the custodian of the inner counsels of the Committee, have well and truly given effect to the intentions of that Committee. We have had but one small difference of opinion on the amendment relating to whipping. The House has taken its own decision on that point, and if, as I fear, the inevitable result will be that persons sentenced to whipping will for the future have a considerable period of anticipation of the pains of whipping before, as well as subsequent experience of those pains, of whipping behind, I will not for the moment cavil at what the House has done. For the rest the Bill does, I think, give effect and give good effect to what the Committee decided.

I do not wish to repeat myself nor to say anything again of the great importance which I have attached and which I know the country has attached to this measure. A short time ago I was writing to one who has been honoured here above all others as promoting the cause of Indian reform, and was trying to sum up what we had achieved so far since the Government of India Bill was passed. I said that I could not do so yet. After all the mere enactments of a Legislature or the concrete instances in which the Legislature forces its will on the executive are not of importance. What is important is the atmosphere in which the Legislature does its work; the spirit which actuates it, the ideals and the objective which it has in view. I said that I could not yet sum up the results, but that an occasion was coming which I hoped would enable me to do so; for if the course of the discussions on this question India showed that she had the temper of true statesmanship, that she was willing to make concessions in order to gain the good will and co-operation of Europeans in the common task of promoting India's political progress, rather than to satisfy her own immediate feelings based on resentment for the past, and if on the other hand Europeans were willing to make sacrifices in order to prove to India that they were prepared not only to recognize the strength of Indian sentiment on this question, but to assist in the solution of India's own difficulties, then there could be no doubt that we shall be able between us to make the reforms a success. For, whatever belief one may have in the future of India, whatever confidence one may have in her future, I have one cardinal article of faith. India may march onwards, but she cannot march alone. If she is to gain responsible Government

* "In clause 30, in the proposed sections 528A, 528B, 528C and 528D, omit the words 'or an American' and 'or American' wherever they occur."

from Parliament, then she will have no stronger argument than this, that the Europeans resident in India also desire it and are willing to co-operate in its development. If she is anxious to gain an equal position in the Empire, an Empire which is not an agglomeration of States, but is the very embodiment of the British spirit, then all the more will she need the goodwill and assistance of the Europeans resident in India, for if she has their co-operation, then the other component States of the Empire will know that whatever outward form the Government may take, there will be a guarantee that in everything she does, in the spirit of all her enactments and all her actions there will be nothing inconsistent with British standards and ideals. I think, Sir, that by this measure we have gone far to prove that we can gain that consummation. I think that we have shown that Indians on their part realise that they must take Europeans with them in the development of their country in the future—I am not speaking of the past—I am not speaking of what the European services have done for India or what European commerce or industry or engineering or science has done for India in the past—there are abundant proofs of that—I am speaking only of the future. I honestly believe that we can now prove that Indians value the assistance of the Europeans resident in India as partners in the development of their administrative and political problems; that we can equally prove—and this perhaps is equally important—that Europeans on their part realise that it is necessary for them to assure India that they are prepared to take a real interest in the development of purely Indian questions. I think we can prove that; and if we can do so, we are all the happier in the occasion and the time. For it was only one brief year ago when a section of Indian politicians, numerous if mistaken, and persistent if pernicious, were preaching as the cardinal article of their faith racial animosity and racial hatred. We can show to the world that the better India, the India which will count in the future will have none of that, that such feelings do not represent in any sense the real characteristics of the better Indian mind; we can show that the course of India's political progress is not going to be blighted and marred by a persistence of racial animosity.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, it is with a sigh of relief that we on this side of the House contemplate the close of this discussion. I do not want to disguise from the House that there have been considerable searchings of heart in regard to this matter. The atmosphere in the country has been tense and some of the Members of the Assembly felt that they have been giving away too much and have been receiving too little. Still, Sir, from the moment that the Bill was introduced there was a feeling that we should go more than half-way, and that we should as far as possible see that the compromise which was contributed to so ably by the Indian and European members should not in the least be jeopardised. With that feeling we have approached this question. We felt, Sir, that the Secretary of State's interference on one or two matters had put an extra strain upon our loyalty to the pact which had been entered into by Europeans and Indians on this matter; and unfortunate also it was that his interference should have been on a matter on which the country feels very deeply and very bitterly. Sir, in response to the appeal made by the Honourable the Home Member we were prepared to overlook even those objectionable features, and we resolved that we shall do nothing which would have the effect of wrecking this Bill. I hope, Sir, that the colonials will recognise that in giving way in the manner we have done we have shown the true instincts of a race which has a long and glorious civilisation behind it, and which has shown itself to be capable of showing forbearance, tolerance and dignity, and I hope that the colonials will recognise that a race which has shown such tolerance and dignity on the floor of this House should be treated far better than they are treating it in their homes. Sir, before I sit down there is only one matter I should like to refer to. If there has been such smoothness in the steering of this Bill, it is due to the able captain at the helm of affairs. There have been troubled waters and but for the Honourable the Home Member and his conciliatory spirit and the way in which he treated the House, the passage of the Bill would not have been so easy as it has been. Therefore, Sir, every one of us on this side of the House want to pay a tribute to his ability and to his conciliatory spirit and to the tact with which he has steered this Bill through the House. There is another matter also which I should like to mention and that is this: having regard to everything that has been said outside this House and having regard to the feelings of our members, I hope that it will be recognised that the Members who have given notice of amendments have shown rare self-restraint, rare tact and a rare spirit to economise time—a disposition which they have not shown in regard to any other measure to the same extent. I hope the House will recognise how dignified the Members have been and how anxious they have been to see that this Bill becomes law, although they felt that some of the features were objectionable. I hope that spirit of the members will be recognised by everybody in this House and outside.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I rise, Sir, to further support the motion that the Bill as amended be passed, and, in doing so, I wish to make only a few observations. My Honourable friend, the Home Member, has pointed out that this country, if it wants to make an onward march to the goal of responsible Government, which has been set out for it, cannot do so without the co-operation of the European community in this country. I agree entirely with the remarks that have been made by my Honourable friend, the Home Member. But I wish also to say this that, if the members of the European community in this country had any misgiving about the treatment that they might have at the hands of Indians if political freedom was secured to this country, to them the treatment that the House has given to this measure will, I am sure, be a sufficient indication of the spirit in which Indians will always treat them in future.

One more thing has also emerged from the discussions that we have had on this Bill. While this House has been very careful in seeing that its rights are not trampled upon by any outsider, while this House has always been eager to protest against the interference of His Majesty's Government and the Secretary of State in matters which are entirely our own concern, this House has not been slow to appreciate the difficulties of His Majesty's Government and have given their support to the wishes of His Majesty's Government expressed through their Secretary of State in order that the Colonials may be included in the definition of European British subjects. That is a sufficient indication of the sense of responsibility that this country will always have of its obligation to the Empire and to His Majesty's Government. A happy result has undoubtedly come out of the measure that has been introduced, and one may expect after this that both Europeans and Indians in this country will work together hand in hand for the political and other advancement of this country. Sir, I support the motion.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, it may seem a work of supererogation that I should speak at all after my Leader has spoken. But I have heard some whispers from my Indian friends that the Bill is not all it should have been. Sir, in the concluding portion of my minute on this subject, there is one sentence which I wish to emphasise and that is that the Indian has also gained substantially by this measure. I wish to emphasise that. It is not purely a one-sided bargain, as some friends of mine are inclined to think. Sir, what has been the cause of all this resentment against Chapter XXXIII of the Criminal Procedure Code? It was the ban of distrust of the Indians which was imposed by our Codes, by our own Codes, on our countrymen. Sir, that ban has been completely removed. Do my Honourable friends realise that? Sir, whether he be a Magistrate of the second or third class or of the first class, the ground of exclusion is not on account of his nationality. The Indian has as much right to object to a European Magistrate as the European has to object to an Indian Magistrate. Hitherto, in fact the very worst part of the compromise of 1884 was that simply because Indians should happen to be District Magistrates, you provided a system by which the European could escape the Indian Magistrate by imposing a jury at his will. If the accused so desired, if he had an Indian District Magistrate before whom he had to appear, he could have a jury of his own. Sir, that also has been removed. Now not only the District Magistrate but Magistrates are empowered to try Europeans. So that it was that inferiority which was stamped on my countrymen which we all felt, and I congratulate myself and the House and my countrymen that that ban, that legislative ban, has been removed.

Another thing, Sir, which is of substance to the Indian should not be overlooked. That is the right of appeal,—against every sentence of imprisonment. We know of the degradation it brings,—a sentence of imprisonment. Hitherto, first class Magistrates and District Magistrates could have imposed unappealable sentences of imprisonment. Sir, even an hour's imprisonment you are now entitled to appeal against and thereby remove this great slur which attaches to a sentence of imprisonment. The whole of the Hindu and Muhammadan community look with horror on an unjust sentence of imprisonment and therefore, Sir, they always demanded that there should be a right of appeal. Whereas the European could have an appeal against any sentence of imprisonment, my countrymen had not that right of appeal, and that has now been arranged for the benefit of my countrymen. To that extent, the Europeans co-operated with us on that Committee, and I am glad that that has been given to us. Therefore, while I admit that still the germ of disease has not been killed, it has been considerably weakened. Its propensities for spreading has been cut short. We have cut this poisonous tree root and branch, but not all the roots. Sir, it depends upon the co-operation of both the communities whether this disease can be killed altogether. Sir, we have given a privilege to the accused person to claim a mixed jury. I do not mean merely the European accused. Both the Indian accused and the European accused are now given the privilege of claiming a mixed jury. Sir, I appeal to them and I appeal to those responsible leaders of both communities to see that this privilege is not often invoked. By inaction alone that should die out. Let there be mutual trust and confidence in each other. Let the Indian consider that he will have justice at the hands of 9 European fellow subjects of his and let the European consider that he will have justice at the hands of 9 Indian fellow subjects of his. Let him not look at the nationality of the Judge or Jury who is sent to try him. For he must appeal to that Greater Justice which must be in the breast of every man who dares to judge his fellow beings. Put him in that position of responsibility. Sir, whether he be a European or an Indian, I am sure he will not be guided by the passions and prejudices of the moment. Therefore, Sir, I appeal to both the communities that these privileges, though they exist in law, let them exist only in name. Let the aid of those sections not be invoked too often so as to bring to the public eye those distinctions that exist between race and race. I may appeal also to the press not to magnify these incidents which occur now and then and to the politicians also the same. Here, Sir, I do not think I can express it in better words than the Home Member has done to-day about the co-operation that is needed between the two communities hereafter, and that all those who inhabit India should consider India their home, not merely a place of residence as hitherto some people have done. Let it be their home. Let India rank first in their minds, in their desires, and every other country afterwards. Then, in that spirit alone we can bring that good which we all desire should crown our efforts.

There are two matters, as I have already stated in the course of my remarks which require to be removed. The European cannot be whipped whereas the Indian can be whipped. I appeal to my European friends that they will put forth all their efforts in the direction of having that inequality removed. That should be done soon, and as regards also the tribunals which can inflict a heavier sentence. I refer to sections 30 to 34. These sections also should be modified so as to prevent Magistrates having the power in certain areas of inflicting those longer terms of punishment which Sessions Judges and Jury alone should be empowered to inflict. In those two matters we had behaved magnanimously to the European because when we were insisting on equality, we could have insisted also on equality in that respect and imposed this on the European. But we dared not do it, for we felt that would be asking for equality in injustice. When a thing is unjust in itself, let not all suffer from that injustice. Even if we have to suffer, we thought that we should not include others in the category, and therefore, having regard to the spirit which we have displayed, I hope the whole of the European community will join hands with us and see that that blot is removed. Sir, I do not look upon your presence in the Chair to-day at this hour as a mere accident. I, Sir, look upon your presence in the Chair to-day as the guiding hand of Divine Providence, that a House with an Indian majority and with an Indian Chairman has been able to pass this Bill into law.

Mr. P. P. Giwala (Burma: Non-European): Sir, in giving my support to this Bill I am influenced somewhat by different considerations from those which have apparently weighed with many of my Honourable colleagues. In not insisting upon the exclusion of the colonials I am not influenced by such a high and ethical motive as that of magnanimity, for I do not consider that though magnanimity is a very pretty and a very amiable domestic virtue, it ought to be extended to politics. I do not believe that in politics a man is expected to give his right cheek to the man who smites him on the left. In politics the best way to reply to such a man is to smite him on both his cheeks if you can and give an extra one on the chest if possible. If you cannot do that, the less you say about the first slap you received on the face the better. But I admit, Sir, that there are occasions on which expediency is a very good reason for submitting to a state of affairs for which there is no remedy, and speaking for myself, I put my acquiescence merely on the ground of expediency. Retaliation is useful only if it can be effective, and we cannot offer any effective retaliation on this point. It is merely therefore on the ground of expediency that so far as the colonials are concerned, we have not insisted upon their exclusion from the Bill. We would go a long way to conciliate the good-will and the regard of our fellow-European citizens in this country and we are proud to feel, that they have joined hands with us in removing after 40 years of controversy an issue which has disturbed the tranquillity of the country. But that argument we are not prepared to apply to the Colonies. They stand on a different footing. But, as I say, there is no way out of it and we submit to their inclusion. There are other considerations which have emerged from the history of this Bill some of which are in the nature of lessons which we have learnt, and some of them I intend to utilise in future. The most important of them is the attitude of the Secretary of State himself in connection with this clause about the Colonials. Last year we were told by the Honourable the Home Member, who was then Finance Member, when we said that if military expenditure was not made votable we shall refuse him supplies, that he thought we were extending a threat to him which was not proper. Now, what has the Secretary of State himself done in this case? Not only did he give out a threat but he put it into execution. He said that his sanction was necessary to certain clauses of the Bill under section 65 of the Government of India Act and that that sanction was not to be given unless we submitted ourselves to terms which we could not otherwise have imposed upon us. That is the effect of the conditions subject to which he has given his sanction, and I would like the Honourable the Home Member to tell us whether we should not be justified in following such a high example set by no smaller a person than His Majesty's Secretary of State—that if there are certain constitutional powers vested in us, whether we should not be justified in making proper use of them in order to wrest from him or from the Secretary of State something else to which within the letter of the law we would not be entitled? Sir, it has been a splendid precedent for us and for my part I intend to use it and I am going to ask the House to use all its constitutional powers in order to get something from the Government which according to the view of Government we are not ordinarily entitled to. The second lesson that we have learnt is this. What is our position in the eyes of His Majesty's Government if our interests comes into conflict with those of the Colonies? We have on this occasion the very great advantage of having the European section of opinion entirely with us. We have got the Government of India with us on this point. We had the unanimous recommendation of a very representative committee on that point. With all these things at our back we approached His Majesty's Government, and His Majesty's Government said, "You may be agreed as much as you like. It does not suit us to agree where the Colonies are concerned." Now, I venture to ask, is that a good impression to create upon the people of this country that even when everybody in this country is agreed upon a certain position, His Majesty's Government should disregard their opinion and their wishes in order that the Secretary of State for the Colonies may be placated by the Secretary of State for India? Would the Secretary of State for the Colonies have taken a view like the view of the Secretary of State for India if the position had been reversed? I say emphatically, "No". And what is more, His Majesty's Government are afraid more of the Colonies than their own people. I will give you a concrete instance. Take the case of our fiscal policy. It is a well known fact, that the Manchester school of politics have been free traders for many generations—I would say at least for 3 or 4 generations. They have had that tremendous influence on the policy of England, for their interests were large. They have been able to impose their will practically upon His Majesty's Government. But when the Government of India and this Assembly have agreed on protection, His Majesty's Government throws overboard, so to say, the Manchester interest. On the other hand, where the Colonies are concerned, even before the Colonies have made any complaint they are afraid of displeasing the Colonies, and therefore it is we who have got to surrender in order that the position of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India may not be jeopardised with reference to His Majesty's Government. Another lesson that we have learnt is this. As the Honourable the Home Member has pointed out and we are all agreed, it is to the interests of the Indians to work along with their British fellow subjects in this country and that working together alone they would reach their goal which we have in view and to which the Europeans themselves have committed already and in which we have received at every turn their sympathy and their attention. Again, one thing we have made abundantly clear and that is this, that this House can be depended upon for giving effect to compromises which have been made by representatives of both communities even if the personnel of the particular committee may contain persons who are not Members of this House. I look upon it as a happy augury for the future that compromises arrived at outside should be given effect to by this House if they are in accordance with national views and national ideas. Lastly I will say this, that this House also has distinguished itself. There has been no lack of debating power in the House for it has been proved that the House is capable of debating for two days a hundred and one points about which there is no controversy, and of coming to the very point with which it had started the debate. I am glad to say that after all in only a short space of two days we have been able to get through a measure for which the Government itself had allowed us three days. With these remarks I give my support to this measure which, as I have said before, brings to a happy termination a controversy which has raged for nearly two generations in this country.

The motion that the Bill, as amended, be passed was adopted.

THE CANTONMENTS (HOUSE-ACCOMMODATION) BILL.

Mr. E. Burdon (Army Secretary): I move:

"That the amendment made by the Council of State in the Bill further to amend and to consolidate the law relating to the provision of house-accommodation for military officers in cantonments, be taken into consideration."

Sir, the amendment is of an entirely unimportant character. It provides explicitly for what would necessarily take place in practice. The communication to the District Magistrate would, of course, be made in writing.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That the following amendment made by the Council of State in the Bill further to amend and to consolidate the law relating to the provision of house-accommodation for military officers in cantonments, be taken into consideration:

'In sub-clause (2) of clause 24 of the Bill, after the words 'District Magistrate' the words 'on requisition in writing signed by the Chairman of the Committee' be inserted.'

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That this Assembly do agree with the Council of State in the following amendment:

'In sub-clause (2) of clause 24 of the Bill, after the words 'District Magistrate', the words 'on requisition in writing signed by the Chairman of the Committee' be inserted.'

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN COTTON CESS BILL.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): I move, Sir:

"That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to provide for the creation of a fund for the improvement and development of the growing, marketing and manufacture of cotton in India, be taken into consideration."

Our Report reminds me rather of a very little dog wagging a very long tail. I hope the Assembly will not let the tail wag the dog. I allude, of course, to the Minutes of Dissent

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I must take exception to such expressions as wagging the tail with reference to the Minute of Dissent. I do not think it is right or parliamentary.

Mr. J. Hullah: I am sure I never meant any offence. I am sorry if I have given any offence and am willing to withdraw the words.

The only point of importance that came before the Select Committee was the amount of the cess and whether the cess should be imposed on exports. There was some discussion as to whether the tax on exports would fall on the producer. For my own part I do not believe that it will, and even if a part of it does, I hold that there is nothing objectionable in asking the cultivator to pay a tiny cess which in the aggregate will amount to, at most, 9 lakhs of rupees on a crop worth, at a moderate estimate, 90 crores of rupees and covering an area of 20 million acres. It will be seen that we have proposed half the rate of cess that was provided in the Bill, but we have provided that for three years the rate of cess shall be doubled, that is to say, it will be the same as we originally provided in the Bill. Our reason for doing so is that in the beginning a good deal of money will have to be spent on capital expenditure, the chief part of which is for a technological laboratory. One of the Minutes of Dissent says that the writer fails to see the necessity of this laboratory. Its purpose up to the present has not been explained to the Assembly. On the first occasion when I introduced the Bill I confined myself only to a few remarks on the subject, and when I proposed that the Bill be taken into consideration, this particular item was not mentioned in the debate. But I wish now to explain what is the purpose of this technological laboratory, and to show that it is proposed in the interests of the producer and not in the interests of the milling industry. As I said before, the real problem in India has always been to get for the cultivator an adequate price for his cotton, and the Agricultural Department knows by bitter experience how useless are trade valuations of cottons which are tried for the first time. From the cotton producer's point of view nothing but an actual spinning trial will give the information required, and in order that the results of the trial may be of real value it is necessary that they shall be thorough and detailed. It is quite impossible to expect any commercial spinning mill to carry out all the detailed tests. This would not only necessitate much larger quantities of cotton than can be furnished in the early stages of plant breeding, but the actual cost to the mill of a considerable number of experiments would be quite prohibitive. The plant which the Central Cotton Committee propose to instal will be capable of dealing with small samples of cotton and will afford to the plant breeder an early opportunity of having his new varieties tested. I need hardly point out the great amount of time that will thus be saved. Another function proposed for the Central Cotton Committee was that it should take up the trade classification of cottons with a view to establishing something more reasonable than the system of station names which is at present followed. In the United States of America the final universal standards have been arrived at largely as a result of technological research, and in that country technological work is done by a branch of the bureau of markets which works directly under the Department of Agriculture. Our Directors of Agriculture have placed the establishment of this laboratory in the forefront of their proposals and have insisted upon its necessity, and this request has been confirmed by the Board of Agriculture. This capital expenditure, then, on technology is directly in the interests of the producer and, as I said before the Central Cotton Committee themselves rejected a proposal that part of the work of this branch should be the testing of yarn and cloth for the mills.

In the same Minute of Dissent it is suggested that if the Legislature do decide that money should be raised for the technological laboratory it will be sufficient to put a cess of two annas a bale on cotton consumed in the mills only, putting no cess on exports, and a calculation is made that a two anna cess will just about cover the amount necessary for the technological institute. This, I may point out, leaves nothing whatever for agriculture, the improvement of which, as I have said throughout, is the primary object of this Bill. We need a great deal of money for agriculture. Excluding the cost of the Central Cotton Committee and the technological laboratory, the programme which has been submitted to the Central Cotton Committee and has received their general approval involves in all an expenditure of 29½ lakhs of rupees in the next five years. We have now made an attempt to adjust this programme to the amount of money that we shall have under the cess if the Legislature passes the Bill in the form recommended by the Joint Committee and we find that we shall have only 23½ lakhs. It is rather late and I do not propose to take up time by describing in detail the agricultural schemes that are proposed, but I think I can satisfy the House that we have schemes which would absorb almost as much money as we should have even if the original proposal of a four anna cess on mill consumption and exports were levied. To begin with, the Central Cotton Committee itself is going to cost one lakh a year. The technological laboratory will cost 2½ lakhs to establish and a lakh a year to run. Then we have a long list of agricultural proposals. In the first place, as I mentioned before, we propose to have research studentships which will cost us, we estimate, 15,000 rupees in the first year and 30,000 rupees in each successive year. In the Punjab we have the serious problem of trying to arrest the deterioration of the valuable American crop in that province, which we estimate will cost Rs. 85,000 in the first year and Rs. 40,000 in subsequent years. Investigation of wilt and plant breeding work in Bombay will cost Rs. 25,000 a year. Work in Gujerat will cost us another Rs. 25,000 a year. Plant breeding work on herbaceous cottons in Madras will cost us, we think, Rs. 39,000 in the first year and Rs. 12,000 in succeeding years. The biological investigation of disease resistance in Madras will cost us, we believe, Rs. 1,25,000 in the first year in which it is started and Rs. 25,000 in succeeding years. In the Central Provinces, we estimate, we can spend Rs. 60,000 a year on plant breeding work on long staple cotton. There is no end to the amount of money that might be spent in attempting to restore the valuable long staple cotton of Berar. We propose and we hope to institute a Central Agricultural Research Institute for work on cottons and plant physiology under the black soil conditions under which cotton is so generally grown. The most suitable location for such an institute will probably be in the central parts of the country. Now, with the amount of money which we shall have under the Joint Committee's proposals we believe that we can carry on this work for no more than five years. At the end of five years we shall have actually to curtail work because the cess will produce only 4½ lakhs of which a lakh will go to the Central Cotton Committee, a lakh to run the technological institute and only 2½ lakhs will be left for agricultural development. We have left out from our programme a good deal that might be done. In the Punjab and the United Provinces research is needed to test the water requirements of cotton grown under irrigation. Another very important matter for which we ought to find money if we can is a stabilising fund to guarantee the cultivator against loss when at our instance he begins to grow some new kind of cotton. New cottons cannot be sold unless they are produced in reasonable quantities. Nobody is going to buy only one or two bales of new cotton, and the cultivator takes a considerable risk if he begins to grow this new cotton without knowing whether he can sell his produce. It may therefore be necessary to guarantee to the cultivator that we shall pay any losses which up to a certain point he may incur. The Empire Cotton Growing Corporation is giving assistance of this kind in Australia, where they have guaranteed to cotton growers a certain and definite price for their cotton and have agreed to stand a loss, if necessary of £10,000 a year. These are the kinds of work we have to do, and I have given some indication of their volume. There is any amount of agricultural work to do. The Bill is for the purpose of aiding agriculture, and we do not think that we shall have sufficient money unless the cess is imposed not only on mill consumption but also on exports.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, I rise not to oppose the Bill being taken into consideration, but to make a few remarks regarding the observations made by the last speaker about the Minutes of Dissent appended to this Bill. All this morning, Sir, we had an atmosphere created by a person who knows how to play upon the feelings of the House and who knows how to lead the House and who had conducted a very controversial measure through the House with good grace, and here is, Sir, a very unimportant measure, not a measure of very great importance, and before we begin to consider it, an atmosphere was created which would certainly re-act upon the Government Benches, and it is not desirable that such a thing as this should happen. After all, we are as anxious as the Government Benches in a matter like this that the Government should be armed with funds which would enable them to conduct the inquiries; and therefore, if we venture to differ upon one or two matters, we should not be dealt with as if we were school-children led by school-masters of a very superior kind.

Mr. J. Hullah: May I rise to a point of explanation? I have already explained that I did not mean in any way to offend the Honourable Member. If I present the Report of the Joint Committee, I surely am permitted to make remarks upon the Report itself and also upon any Minute of Dissent, especially if, as I have attempted to explain, one important point dealt with in one Minute of Dissent has never previously been explained or discussed in the House.

Mr. Deputy President: After the explanation from the Honourable Mr. Hullah, this incident might be regarded as closed, and we might proceed with the consideration of the Report.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Thank you very much. If not in response to the observations made by the Honourable Member who has just spoken, in response to your wish I shall not pursue the matter any further. I think, Sir, it is desirable that this Bill should be passed into law, so that it will provide funds which will enable the Government to institute scholarships to enable them to carry on investigations on an elaborate scale. Of course I will speak on the amendments later on, but I do think that it is desirable that we should have this measure passed as early as possible. Therefore, I support the motion for the consideration of the Bill.

Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh (Punjab: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, as I have given expression to my feelings on occasions previous to this, I again beg to place before this Honourable House that, generally, the same amount of money is not spent in matters pertaining to agriculture as the importance of the industry requires. Now, for instance, take the case of this measure. I think some measure of this kind was due, I should think overdue, several years ago; and then, Sir, were not the poor agriculturists entitled to assistance to carry out these investigations from the Central funds of the Government of India? In my humble opinion, they were and a contribution should have been made available for these investigations long ago from the Central funds. Anyhow it is our misfortune that our point of view was rarely pressed on the Government of India. If anything in the way of agricultural research is to be done, we, the poor people, have to be taxed again. It is not in any hostile spirit to this measure that I make these remarks, but I have simply made these remarks with a view to impress the necessity of more attention being paid to the most important industry of India. I support the motion.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to provide for the creation of a fund for the improvement and development of the growing, marketing and manufacture of cotton in India be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, will you permit me to move this amendment* after the next because, if my next amendment is passed, then it will be consequential, and if my next amendment is not passed, there is no use in pressing it so far as clause 2 is concerned. The fate of clause 2 will depend upon how far the House is with me on the next amendment; therefore, I ask your permission to allow me to move that amendment after item No. 3 on the Agenda.

* "Omit clause 2(d)."

Mr. J. Hullah: I agree, Sir, that that would be a far more preferable course.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, my amendment to clause 3 runs:

"In clause 3 omit all the words beginning with 'produced' and ending with 'British India or'; and make consequential amendments in other clauses."

Those of my friends, those of the Members of the House who have read this Bill and the minute will see with what object this amendment has been put forward. If the omission is made, the clause will read thus:

"There shall be levied and collected on all cotton consumed in any mill in British India a cess at the rate of 2 annas per standard bale of four hundred pounds avoirdupois, or, in the case of unbaled cotton, of six pies per hundred pounds avoirdupois."

The words omitted would render it unnecessary to levy the cess upon cotton which is exported. Sir, I have given my reasons very fully in the minute of dissent which I appended to this Report. My reasons, very shortly, are these. If you allow a universal cess to be levied upon cotton, the result of it will be that the producer of cotton will be affected thereby, whereas if you allow a cess to be levied only upon mill consumption in India, and give the producer liberty to sell his cotton to exporters without paying the cess, the producer would be able to insist upon the mill purchaser paying the same price which he secures from the exporter. The result is the producer of cotton would not in the first instance be in the least affected, and as I pointed out in my minute, it would not sit heavily upon the mill-owner. Some Members of the Committee refer to the fact that if we tax the mill-owner and leave the exporter alone, it would be regarded as an excise duty; that was the objection raised. I do say that to a certain extent there is justification in that, but after all, we have to see which of the two alternatives would be best in the interests of the producer. It was said that if the producer is asked to pay the cess, it would be the purchaser that would pay and not the producer. Sir, those of us who are agriculturists know very well that that is an argument which cannot hold water. Yesterday I might have been paid a particular price; to-day the purchaser would come to me and tell me that the Government has levied a cess upon it and therefore he cannot pay the price; and as I have pointed out, the ordinary producer is an illiterate man and if he hears that a Government cess has been levied, he will think that some misfortune has impelled the Government to levy the cess on his crop and that therefore he must get a price less by the amount of the cess levied. That would be the position which would be forced upon him; persons who are acquainted with the illiterate raiyats of this country would realize how easily they can be imposed upon. Under these circumstances, Sir, I ask that the provision which relates to the imposition of the cess upon cotton to be exported should be deleted. After all the Government should not be anxious to get all the money at once. They must make an experiment; and if they are going to make an experiment they should not tax the producer too much. I was reading only this morning a telegram, and I believe the Honorable Revenue Member must have read it too, regarding a Bill passed in the House of Commons yesterday or the day before. It says that the House of Commons has resolved upon compelling the spinner to pay a particular cess to the Cotton Growers Association. It is the mill-owner, the spinner, that is to be compelled to pay a particular cess in order that improvement in cotton growing, improvements as regards research, may be effected. There is not very much cotton grown in England, but apparently the Association deals with cotton to be grown elsewhere and not only the cotton grown in England. It has for its object the exploitation of other fields for the purpose of cotton growing, and apparently the millowners are to be compelled to pay a fund to this Association, so that that Association may be enabled to go to foreign countries and select fields for the growing of cotton. That example ought to be followed in India, namely, it must be the spinners and the cotton millowners who should be compelled to pay a cess if we really want to improve cotton growing in this country, if we want more research work; I make a gift of that instance from England to my friend the Honourable the Revenue Member. I say, Sir, that if you allow the exported cotton also to be taxed, the cess must necessarily fall upon the producer, and the producer of this country is already too heavily taxed in the matter of land tax. I hope my Punjab friends, who said when the Fiscal Commission's Report was being discussed that they are likely to suffer, will realize the difficulty in which they would be placed if the Bill as introduced by the Government is passed without my amendment.

Captain E. V. Sassoon (Bombay Millowners' Association: Indian Commerce): Sir, in rising to oppose the amendment I would like in the first place to emphasise the fact that the funds which will be produced by this cess will be entirely spent for the benefit of the cotton grower. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has informed us that the House of Commons is proposing to put a tax on the spinners in Lancashire for the encouragement of cotton growing. The reason for that, Sir, is because England itself does not grow any cotton and therefore she is trying to encourage countries like India to grow cotton suitable for her needs. One of the points made by the Central Cotton Committee is that the type of cotton that is exported from India is not of a class which gets the highest price. If India could produce a larger amount of what is known as staple cotton, in other words, cotton suitable for the mills in Lancashire, exports from India would be perhaps diverted more to those countries which are spinning American cotton; and at any rate those exports would secure a larger price and therefore benefit the grower more than is the case to-day with the cotton now exported. Therefore, Sir, the benefit derived from the improvement of our cotton is not for the mills in India to any great extent, because we do produce to-day enough cotton, or at least in ordinary times enough cotton, for our needs of staple. Therefore the benefit by the improvement of our cotton is going to be for the grower and for the Lancashire and foreign mills. For that reason, Sir, I do not think that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has made out a case for making the mills in India pay for the development and improvement of cotton in order to allow better export cotton to be grown. It is true that the prosperity of the cotton grower benefits the internal trade of the country, and to that extent the mills would benefit; but that is only an indirect benefit and I quite agree with Sardar Gajjan Singh who has suggested, in fact stated, that this sum should have been provided by the Central Government. But we are not here to discuss that, and I would like to point out to the House that when it was stated that neither the Central nor the Provincial Governments could provide this amount for the advantage of the cotton grower, and it was put up to various Chambers of Commerce and also the body whom I represent, the mill-owners and the Chambers of Commerce voluntarily agreed that this cess should be laid on them, the millowners at the mill where the cess is added in with other costs of production and the exporter at the port where the cess is included in handling mucedumage and other charges. Now, I would like to refer to the point Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has raised as to the tax being paid by the grower if an export duty is charged as well as a cess on the mills. I would like to point out that when the original question came up to the Chambers of Commerce it was stated or suggested that an export tax should be placed on cotton and the question was asked whether it was considered feasible for this to be also placed on mills. The question seems to have been reversed here. I would like to draw the attention of the House to a similar case in jute. My Calcutta friends will no doubt bear me out that at one time it was suggested that an export duty should be placed on jute and a cess on the mills in order to pay for some amelioration, I think, of port facilities. The jute mills protested against this and said that there was no reason why an excise duty should be placed on them, although I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that that raw material is a monopoly of this country and grows at their doors; but because the industry objected the tax was eventually only paid on jute exported from this country. Sir, we have not protested; we have voluntarily said that we are prepared to share part of this burden and that appears to be the only reason that I can see why it has been suggested that we should bear it all. Now, Sir, the point is made that it is the producer who will bear this cost. I would like to go into some detail as to how cotton is marketed to see whether there is any justification for this contention. The proposal is that a cess of two annas per bale of ginned cotton should be levied. Now, Sir, one bale of ginned cotton is produced by sixteen maunds of unginned cotton called kapas. This cotton is bought up-country. On the Joint Committee we had the advantage of the presence and experience of the Honourable Nawab Mahomed Muzammilullah Khan, who is not only a distinguished Member of another place but is also a practical cotton grower. This gentleman informed us that in selling his kapas at prices which would range, depending on the quality of the cotton, from Rs. 13 to Rs. 20 a maund, the fluctuations were in steps of 4 annas per maund of kapas or unginned cotton, or Rs. 4 per bale. Now does this House seriously consider that a cess of 2 annas per bale is going to have any effect on the price to the grower when his fluctuations vary Rs. 4 per bale? It is perfectly obvious that no merchant or buyer up-country can say to the grower "because we have to pay, or rather because the mill or the exporter has to pay 2 annas per bale you must therefore give us your cotton for Rs. 4 per bale less." Yes, Sir, it is maintained that two annas a bale or for the first three years, four annas a bale would affect the quotation. The Honourable Member on the Joint Committee, to whom I have referred, made another very illuminating remark. He said that even if he as a grower had to pay this two annas a bale—which works out to 3 pies per maund for the first three years and 1½ pies per maund afterwards—he would still welcome this Bill as he hoped that the work of the Institute would improve his cotton by two or three rupees a maund. He finds it good business to invest a couple of pies a maund and receive a couple of rupees as dividend. Sir, even the mill profits during the boom pale before. When as I have pointed out that owing to the insignificance of the amount the quotation of the kapas is not affected the cotton grower will be getting this extra advantage, this extra two or three rupees a maund for nothing.

In clause 7 of the Honourable Mr. Purshotamdas Thakurdas' Minority Minute he says that all such imposition should be looked at from the point of view of the legislator, viz., the underlying principle. I entirely agree with Mr. Purshotamdas Thakurdas' views in this respect; I go further; I say that the alteration suggested by the Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar should also be looked at from the point of view of the underlying principle. Now, what does Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar ask for? He says that the cess should be paid by the mills only. I submit that two most important principles are affected if his views are adopted. A cess paid by the mills and not one paid by the exporters would mean in principle the encouragement of the export of a raw material to a foreign country, say Japan, to be manufactured into yarn and then with the additional help of shipping bounties, to be re-shipped to this country to compete with Indian spun yarn. Sir, we are to-day feeling the competition of Japanese 20s yarn spun out of Indian cotton, and this competition will be accentuated, even if only to a slight extent, if Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's views are adopted by this House. Now, Sir, we are talking of principles; and in principle, therefore, you will be running contrary to that principle which was passed unanimously in this House only a few days ago, that is, that the fiscal policy of the Government may be legitimately directed towards fostering the industries in India. The House will notice that it is the industries in India that are to be fostered, not in Japan or elsewhere.

Let me now take the point of the principle of an export duty. I am one of those who view such duties with great suspicion. But as Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas said on the introduction of the Bill, the fact that the results of this small duty do not go to the general revenues but are definitely allocated to the technical assistance of the cotton-growing industry removes the objection. Further it should not be forgotten that while there is no resolution of the House against export duties of any kind, there is one favouring the fostering and not the hindering of home industries.

The second principle that would be affected by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment would be this; the House would be inaugurating the principle of taxing one specific industry for the direct benefit of another industry against its wishes. Sir, I do not think that this House will agree to alter the procedure which it has always taken in this respect, and particularly tax one industry for the benefit of another, except when as in this case the industry has agreed to accept the charge.

Another point, Sir, is this. The three classes directly concerned by this Bill are the cotton grower, the millowner and the exporter. The cotton-grower, as I have said, welcomes it. The millowner is prepared to bear his share of the burden. The exporter is, I think it will be found, also in agreement. I happen to be also an exporter, but I would prefer that the views of an exporter of this House whose operations are very large as an exporter and also as a buyer of kapas up-country should be listened to, as in my opinion his views would be more authoritative than anything I may say; I refer to my Honourable friend, Sir Montagu Webb, who I hope will address the House from that angle of view. But, Sir, I do suggest in conclusion that the millowners shall not be asked to bear the whole tax because in this case they have voluntarily agreed to take on a burden as it would not be a very large burden, though we are sure, for the reasons I have given, that we shall pay it all as the amount is too small to affect the producer and is too small for us to get it from the consumer of our cloth. It will simply have to come in as an extra charge.

[Captain E. V. Sassoon.]

I think, Sir, we show that we have vision in doing this. I think, Sir, we have shown it in the past in our ideas, in our views as in the reports we put in on the Workmen's Compensation Bill, where I think it has been admitted by the Members on the Treasury Benches that they were surprised at the liberality of such views, even when we came before the Fiscal Commission—and I was one of the millowners' delegates—although supporting protection for the country we definitely said that, as matters now stood to-day, we were satisfied with the protection we got from the revenue tariff and asked for no more protection—I think, Sir, that would show that we are not narrow-minded and we are not entirely the selfish purse-proud class that some people would like to pretend that we are. I think, therefore, that, although this matter is only a small matter when it comes down to money, although the burden which we will be bearing is an infinitesimal one and I am not going to pretend that it is anything else, I think it would appear rather ungracious if, because we said: "We will take some of it," people here should say "Oh, you should bear it all." I feel I have felt, Sir, in my short presence in this House, that the millowner certainly those of Bombay,—was not exactly the blue-eyed boy of the Assembly. I did not feel that there was—I do not say we need it—that there was a well of sympathy gushing out to us from every side. But, Sir, may I suggest that, as we do our best to be fair in all matters for the benefit of this country as a country, the Members of this House should not take advantage of us for the one big crime that we have, I admit, committed, and that is to have shown that an Indian industry can be prosperous.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma (Revenue and Agriculture Member): Sir, I may assure the Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar that Government fully appreciate the spirit in which he has tabled this amendment before the House. He is anxious to protect the interest of the agriculturist and he thinks that his amendment, if carried, would effectuate that object. I hope that, before I close, I shall have convinced him that, far from effectuating the object he has at heart, he would be jeopardising to a great extent that object, namely, the promotion of the prosperity of the cotton producer. I think a few words are necessary as to the position of the Government in this matter. The Cotton Committee recommended a cess of 8 annas on all commercial cotton for the purpose of improving the growth of cotton in this country, growth of long-staple cotton, increase in yield, bettering of the market conditions and the general placing of the Indian industry on a wholesome and satisfactory basis. The Government hesitated and at first declined to impose any cess whatsoever, especially having regard to the reforms. The Central Cotton Committee was appointed by the Government in pursuance of the recommendations of the Commission, on which the interest of the agriculturist, of the manufacturers, and of the exporters, were all represented. It was a large body and they unanimously recommended to the Government the imposition of a small cess for the purpose of placing the Indian industry on a proper basis. And the Government of India in the Revenue and Agriculture Department has undertaken this measure because they have felt that they would be promoting the industry of the cotton grower; it was not their business to promote the interests of the manufacturer or the exporter. It was primarily their interest to safeguard, protect and promote the prosperity of the cotton grower and it was with this object that they have undertaken this legislation. In undertaking this legislation, the Government, of course, had the interests of the consumer as well as of the manufacturer at heart. If, as a result of the expenditure of the money that we hoped to be able to collect, if this Bill be passed into law, the cotton manufacturing industry be placed on a more satisfactory footing, then no one would grudge it and we should welcome it. And we hoped also that the consumer would also be equally benefited, as I shall show later on how. But I shall proceed to the question as to whether this is likely to promote the interests of the cotton producers and as to whether Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment, if carried, would not jeopardise that interest. The Government, after the recommendations were received, consulted the provincial Governments who in their turn consulted all the bodies concerned and there was an almost unanimous consensus of opinion that the cess should be imposed on all commercial cotton and not merely on mill-consumed cotton. One or two even suggested that this should be confined only to exports. Bombay, Bengal, Madras, Burma, the Punjab, the Central Provinces and the Agent to the Governor General in Rajputana suggested that the cess should be imposed on all commercial cotton. The United Provinces, with their Ministers, were of opinion that it might be confined to exports alone. The Assam Government recommended that it should be confined to exports only. The Bengal National Chamber of Commerce and the Indian Merchants' Association of Chittagong were in favour of the duty being confined to exports only. On the other hand, the Indian Merchants' Chamber, Bombay, were of opinion that this should be confined to mills only. Bihar and Orissa, which does not grow much cotton and is not very much interested either way, expressed a preference that it should be confined to mill consumption. So that Honourable Members will see the Bombay Millowners' Association, the Upper India Chamber of Commerce, the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, and I believe the Karachi Chamber of Commerce, and a number of Chambers of Commerce who are interested in the matter, upheld the view that it should be imposed on all commercial cotton. Therefore, I may say that the Government were fully justified in thinking and in acting upon the assumption that the Local Governments who may be naturally presumed to protect the interests of the agriculturists, the Directors of Agriculture, the Deputy Director of Agriculture and all the agricultural officers who are more interested in the cotton grower than in the cotton exporter and various other persons who have been consulted thought that this would not hit or hit hard the agricultural producer. And, Sir, I would ask the House to consider as to whether when measures are adopted for the purpose of improving cotton growing they should not be of such a character as are likely to effectuate the object which we all have at heart. It has already been pointed out to the House that this money is going to be expended upon research in cotton growing. And the technological research which is going to be undertaken is only for the purpose of helping the cotton grower to know as to whether and how far the possibilities of the cotton that he actually grows extend, in order that it may enable him to secure a better price. Therefore, when everything that is undertaken for his benefit, when there is a vast field for exploration, I think the House will agree with me that we should not indulge in half-hearted measures and that we should try, if possible, to expend as much as we can, and too much cannot be expended, upon this desirable object. The Government, therefore, have, I think, rightly come to the conclusion that the cotton grower would not be hard hit. A number of reasons have already been advanced for the purpose of showing that in the cotton trade the variations in price so occur as to eliminate the possibility of this small cess of 2 annas making any difference whatsoever in the price which the cotton grower would get for his commodity, and I need not expatiate upon that aspect of the question. Well, Sir, after all what is it that we propose to do? In deference to the wishes of my Honourable friend and to others who have expressed a doubt as to whether we are not taking too much, the Government have reluctantly agreed to reduce the cess from 4 annas to 2 annas, and we shall be soon finding ourselves in the position of having very inadequate resources for the purpose of carrying out this great object we have before us, and as has been pointed out, the industry that requires improvement is worth at least Rs. 100 crores a year. Is it too much to ask persons interested directly in industry valued at about Rs. 100 crores a year to agree to a cess of Rs. 5 lakhs—Rs. 2½ lakhs would be paid in any way because of the duty on the mill consumption—Rs. 2½ lakhs more in order to improve their condition and their prospects? I submit that it would not be really any hardship at all. The question was raised as to whether the Central Government ought not to have undertaken this themselves. The Central Government has undertaken a large expenditure on research in general and do not mean to absolve themselves from the responsibility of undertaking further research in all the important industries when and as their finances permit. But the question which faced the Government was, is the Government to veto a proposition which was placed before them by all the persons interested in the industry and say, “No” to the imposition of a cess and do nothing themselves because they found themselves in the hopeless position of having no funds with which they can advance the industry? The Government, I think, will have the sympathy of the House in that they have come to the correct conclusion that they should not veto a proposal—a unanimous proposal that was placed before them by all the interests concerned. I think, therefore, Sir, in the interests of the agriculturists whose interests my learned friend has at heart, he would not further press an amendment which will weaken the Central Cotton Committee—because it is they that will have to expend this fund—which will weaken their hands in promoting the cotton industry. A large number of the provinces which are at the present moment looking forward for help from the Central Research Institute, will, I submit, be deprived of the little help that it may be possible to extend to them if this Bill which has been already reduced in its usefulness by the Committee agreeing to a reduction from 4 annas to 2 annas is still further whittled down in the manner suggested by the Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. I hope, therefore, that the proposal would be allowed to stand and my Honourable friend would withdraw his opposition, having regard to the remarks I have made.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): Sir, I oppose this amendment. I do so because I think the reasons which have influenced my Honourable friend in putting it forward, are unsound, or are based on conjecture or misunderstanding. I see from his Note of Dissent and also from the remarks of my Honourable friend that his reason is that he takes it that this cess will fall upon the producer. He goes so far as to use in his Note of Dissent such expressions as “the producer will be hit,” “the producer will have to shoulder the burden,” and “the injury must be minimised.” Well, Sir, what is the injury? This injury amounts to about one-twentieth of a pie per lb., or less than half an anna a maund. Now, Sir, if I thought that the producer of this country was going to be asked to bear any tax which would be injurious to him, I should be the first to oppose such a tax. I entirely sympathise with the view which has been expressed by my friend Sardar Gajjan Singh that Government themselves ought long ago to have found very much more money than they have done for the encouragement of agriculture, and I think the Central funds should produce money for the investigations and improvement of cotton. But still, we all know the present financial position; and if there is a way by which the money can be produced by means of a cess, then, Sir, let us take that way. Now, Sir, as a practical exporter of cotton, I have no hesitation in saying that in my belief this cess will not fall upon the producer. I cannot imagine myself as a seller of cotton outside India or as a buyer of cotton up-country, cancelling my orders, or asking an extra 4 annas a maund for the cotton because, as Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar suggested, Government have put through a law which imposes a cess of less than half an anna a maund. That is to say, I should not ask for my buyer to pay more or the seller to accept 4 annas a maund less—and four annas is the minimum margin upon which prices ordinarily move in this country,—because Government are going to levy a cess of less than half an anna a maund. Why, Sir, speaking as an exporter, I would myself gladly pay the half an anna a maund and say nothing about it. I may say that anybody who is engaged in the practical handling of cotton would very gladly, on every transaction that he puts through, contribute half an anna a maund. I think, Sir, in practice, the charge will very likely fall on the middleman. At any rate, I defy anybody to prove that it will fall on the producer. I notice in the Report of the Indian Fiscal Commission, a document to which I am sure my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, will attach the highest respect—that in the case of the export duty on rice, it said that 3 annas a maund “is not felt by the cultivator.” If 3 annas is not felt, how much less will half an anna, or less than half an anna a maund be felt? I think, Sir, therefore, that we need not have any fear that this tax will fall upon the producer. I received yesterday from England an official Report on the Industrial and Economic Situation in China and I notice in that Report that mention is made of “the efforts now being made by the Chinese . . . to promote the growing of cotton in China according to modern methods from specially selected acclimatized seeds, efforts that are being ably supported by valuable experiments at the University of Nankin.” It says that the “progress already made augurs well for the success of the work and cannot but have a marked effect on the future of the industry in that country.” That is in China. Well, Sir, India cannot be behind China in a matter of this kind. I entirely agree with the Honourable Mr. Sarma that we must not be half-hearted in this matter, but that we should collect by way of cess all the money that we require. The cess will not fall upon the producer. It will give us the money we want. It will be easy to collect. It will be collected at the ports from the exporters, or at the baling presses from the exporters and also at the mills. Therefore, I favour the cess being levied on all cotton, and I oppose my Honourable friend’s amendment which I would ask him to withdraw.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that the following amendment be made:

“In clause 3 omit all the words beginning with ‘produced’ and ending with ‘British India or’; and make consequential amendments in other clauses.”

The motion was negatived.

Clauses 2 and 3 were added to the Bill.

[21ST FEB. 1923.]

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Clause 4 is rather an important matter. May I suggest to you that you should now adjourn the House?

Mr. Deputy President: I should like to know the views of the Government.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: We are entirely in the hands of the House.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 22nd February, 1923.

(b) Does the number of Upper Air observations compare favourably with similar data from the European countries, and have they been published?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) Six original papers have been published on upper-air conditions, two are in the Press, and five more are nearly complete for the Press. One paper, also, on upper-air conditions in Mesopotamia has been published.

(b) Having regard to the size and interests of the country the reply is "No" but in relation to financial resources, "Yes". The question of publication is answered under (a).

NAMES AND QUALIFICATIONS OF METEOROLOGICAL STAFF.

392. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will the Government be pleased to state—

- the name,
- the academic and other qualifications,
- previous experience in modern Meteorology of each of the persons appointed to the Indian Meteorological Service since Dr. G. C. Simpson, late of the Indian Meteorological Service, left the service of Government?
- whether these persons have had any European training?

Mr. J. Hullah: I lay on the table a statement giving the names, qualifications and previous experience of the four officers appointed. Two of the four have previous experience of modern meteorological research; a third after receiving a Government of India Scholarship from the Allahabad University, was a research student at Cambridge in England.

Name.	Academic and other qualifications.	Previous experience in modern Meteorology.
1. G. Chatterjee	M.Sc. and a Research Scholar; has exceptional qualifications in experimental Physics.	Held a temporary post of Scientific Assistant at the Agra Aerological Observatory for about a year.
2. S. K. Banerji	M.Sc. in Applied Mathematics and D. Sc. of Calcutta; was Professor in the University College of Science, Calcutta.	Research work in Tidal Theory and Hydrodynamics, Seismology and Aerial Movements.
3. V. V. Sohoni	B.A., B.Sc. and a Research student in the Wilson College, Bombay.
4. B. N. Banerji	M. Sc., held a Government of India Scholarship from the Allahabad University.	Research student, Cavendish Laboratory, Cambridge.

MR. S. N. SEN AND METEOROLOGICAL SERVICE.

393. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a Reuter's cable dated London, January 29, stating that the University of London have conferred the degree of M.Sc. on Mr. S. N. Sen, who is the only Indian Officer in the Meteorological Office, South Kensington, and that the degree is in recognition of his researches in connection with the upper air?

(b) Is it a fact that the said Mr. S. N. Sen applied for an appointment in the Indian Meteorological Service? If so, with what result?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) Yes.

(b) Yes. The application was considered along with others but the appointment was offered to and accepted by another Indian Candidate.

EXTRA ASSISTANT COMMISSIONERS AS INCOME-TAX OFFICERS.

394. Rai Bahadur D. O. Barua: (a) Whether it is a fact that Extra Assistant Commissioners in Assam did Income-Tax work as Income-Tax Officers last year?

(b) If so, did they get any allowance on that account?

(c) Is it likely that they will do the same in 1923 as well?

(d) Whether in Assam Government has considered the possibility of managing the Income-Tax Department, without making new appointments, with Extra Assistant Commissioners who will be given an allowance for the additional work and by making only two appointments for the two valleys, of Assistant Commissioners of Income-Tax?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The income-tax work in Assam has, hitherto, been done by the Provincial revenue staff with the exception of one Sub-Deputy Collector who is on special income-tax work. No allowance has been given to the revenue staff on account of any income-tax work done by them.

It is proposed to make an assignment to the Assam Government for the income-tax work in Assam and it is understood that the Assam Government will appoint one Deputy Collector to be trained in income-tax work and to do the more important assessments in the province. Further additions to any special income-tax staff will be made by the local Government at their discretion and paid for out of the assignment. It is proposed to review this arrangement after a period of three years.

RENT OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS.

395. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: With reference to answers to questions Nos. 260 and 272 will the Government please state—

- What is the percentage of rent on their salaries paid by Senior Officers drawing more than Rs. 1,999 per month?
- Why are officers drawing up to Rs. 1,349 paying more than those above them?
- What percentage of salary is paid as rent by employes drawing less than Rs. 900 a month?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) In the case of officers drawing more than Rs. 1,999 a month, the percentage of rent in respect of buildings on the minimum salary of each class of official works out to:—

Class.	Minimum salary.	Percentage of rent on salary.
	Rs.	Rs.
A	4,000	7.06
B	2,750	8.22
C	2,000	5.10

(b) Officers drawing up to Rs. 1,349 are not paying more than those above them.

(c) The percentage of salary paid as rent in respect of buildings by employees drawing less than Rs. 900 a month works out to 10 per cent. on the minimum salary of each class.

2. I may explain for the Honourable Member's information that the method of assessment of rent and percentages adopted for purposes of calculating rent are the same for all classes. The maximum rent, excluding rent in respect of special services and furniture, which may, under the Fundamental Rules, be recovered from a Government servant occupying a Government residence, is, however, limited to 10 per cent. of the salary of the occupant. The percentage of rent on salary must vary, for the reason that as the salary of the prospective tenant decreases it becomes increasingly difficult to provide a building the rent of which, assessed in accordance with the rules, will work out to less than 10 per cent. of salary.

“ POOLED ” RENTS AT RAISINA..

396. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Do pooled rates of rent for Raisina bungalows cover:

- (i) The interest charges of capital borrowed;
- (ii) The maintenance charges of houses, electric installation, water works, construction and maintenance of roads and road lighting;
- (iii) Drainage and maintenance thereof;
- (iv) Any other services;
- (v) Cost of furniture and repairs;
- (vi) Estate offices including superintendence;
- (vii) Horticultural and Arboricultural Departments?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (i) to (v) Yes, except that furniture is charged for separately.

It is assumed that the charges referred to under (ii) relate only to installations, etc., within the boundaries of each residence.

(vi) and (vii) No.

GARDENS AT RAISINA.

397. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Is it a fact that the gardens and green plots attached to bungalows and quarters occupied at Raisina are maintained at State expense?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: Compounds are laid out, that is to say, shrubs, trees and grass are planted and maintained until properly established. The question of maintenance after establishment is now under consideration.

PROFIT OR LOSS ON RAISINA RENTS.

398. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Do the rents recovered for bungalows at Raisina leave any margin of profit? Or do they leave a net loss? If the latter, how much?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: Rents are calculated on an annual basis on which Government neither gains nor loses. In practice, however, full recovery of rent is not always possible because:

- (a) a house may not be occupied throughout the year,
- (b) ordinarily more than 10 per cent. of the occupant's pay cannot be recovered as rent.

The loss incurred thereby varies according to the circumstances, and no exact figure can, therefore, be given showing what the net loss is per month or for any other given period.

RENTS AT RAISINA AND SIMLA.

399. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: How do rents paid for Government bungalows in Raisina and at Simla compare with rents in the city and Civil lines?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: As it is not possible to give a verbal reply which will clearly show how rents at Raisina compare with those in Simla, Delhi City and Civil Lines, I have had a statement prepared which is laid on the table which gives a comparison as far as possible for officers drawing over Rs. 1,350 per month. Similar information for lower paid officers, clerks, and menials cannot be prepared, as it is not possible to compare in any fair manner the accommodation and the conditions in one place with those in another.

Classification of officers.	AVERAGE MONTHLY RENTS OF HOUSES.				Delhi City.
	Raisina.	Simla.	CIVIL LINES, DELHI.
			Paid to landlords by Government.	Recovered from tenants.
1	2	3	4 (a)	4 (b)	5
Class A— Pay Rs. 4,000—5,000	Rs. 282	Rs. 219	Rs. 227	Rs. 282	No information available.
Class B— Pay Rs. 2,750—3,999	226	205	278	226
Class C— Pay Rs. 2,000—2,749	162	108	220	162
Class D— Pay Rs. 1,350—1,999	135	123	144	135

Note.—It is not possible for various reasons to carry the comparison below class D.

Note.—The figures given in both the columns above are average figures. The rents paid by Government to landlords shown in column 4 (a) depend very largely on the date on which the lease was entered into. Bungalows leased a few years ago were obtained on much more favourable terms than those which are now being leased. As it will be unfair to charge occupants in each case the same rent as is paid to the landlord, rents have been pooled and tenants are charged the figures shown in column 4 (b). These are arrived at after taking into consideration (1) the total sum that is paid to landlords, and (2) the accommodation afforded by different classes of bungalows.

ELECTRICITY RATES AT RAISINA.

400. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Is it a fact that the rates for electric energy consumed in Raisina from Government installation is only a small fraction of the rates charged by the Electric Company in the city? If so, what are the comparative rates?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: The rate charged by the Electric Company in the City is 8 annas a unit of current for lights and fans less 10 per cent. discount for payment within 7 days. The rates charged by Government for electricity supplied from their installation are 3 annas a unit to Government servants and 6 annas a unit to others. The Government's installation is, however, run primarily for constructional purposes.

SUPPLY OF GOVERNMENT FURNITURE.

401. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Why has Government undertaken upon itself to supply furniture in Government bungalows? Could that be not done by private firms?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: For the convenience of Government officials and the Members of the Indian Legislature who are short term tenants. Not without causing considerable hardship and discomfort to tenants.

LEASE OF BUNGALOWS IN CIVIL LINES, DELHI.

402. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that Government have leased some bungalows in Civil lines and rented them to its officers at rates lower than they pay for them?

(b) If so, (i) how many are they, (ii) what do Government pay for them, (iii) what do Government recover upon them, (iv) to what officers are they rented?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: A limited number of bungalows in the Civil lines have been leased by Government to provide accommodation for certain officers whose duties require their residence in Old Delhi. These bungalows have been classified according to the accommodation they afford, into the same categories adopted in the case of the bungalows in New Delhi, and the rents have been assimilated also, class for class. In the aggregate the monthly rents charged by Government cover the amount paid to the landlords together with maintenance expenses, and Government incurs no loss on these houses during the period they are occupied.

INCOME OF DELHI MUNICIPALITY.

403. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) With reference to answer to my question No. 273, what is the income of the Imperial New Delhi Municipality from all sources? What is the amount of the grant made by the Government or the Chief Commissioner?

(b) What are the names of the members of the Committee?

(c) Do residents of Raisina pay any wheel, or animal tax, or motor wheel tax?

(d) Is there any arrangement with the Delhi City Municipality whereby they should contribute to the funds of the Imperial Municipal Committee in lieu of octroi and other taxes collected by them directly or indirectly from residents of Raisina?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) The total estimated income of the Imperial Delhi Municipality, for 1922-23, is Rs. 15,795 and the amount of the Government grant Rs. 13,770.

(b) The names of the members of the Committee are—

MR. A. M. ROUSE, C.I.E.,	} President.
MR. H. T. KEELING, C.S.I.,
MR. J. L. SALE,	} Members.
MAJOR STANGER LEATHES, I.M.S.,
Health Officer and Secretary.

The answers to parts (c) and (d) of the question are in the negative.

HOUSING OF MEMBERS AT METCALFE HOUSE AND WINDSOR PLACE.

404. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: With reference to answer to my question No. 276, is it a fact that because there was not sufficient accommodation for Members of the Council of State at Metcalfe House, they were given preference in regard to quarters at Windsor Place, although these latter quarters were not sufficient to accommodate all Members of the Assembly who had applied for them? Is that so? If it is, why? Why did they not share in the ballot and why were such of them as did not draw in the ballot, not accommodated in the Hostels?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The quarters at Windsor Place are intended for Members of both Houses and on the basis of the number of Indian Members in both Houses it was roughly estimated that Members of the Council of State were entitled to 6 out of the 20 quarters there. Six Members were therefore allotted six quarters without a ballot; the remainder were accommodated in the hostels and elsewhere.

TREATMENT BY CANTONMENT MAGISTRATE, AMBALA, OF A PLEADER.

405. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) With reference to answer to my question No. 278, is the Cantonment Magistrate at Ambala a military officer and as such subordinate to the Army Department?

(b) Do the Government propose to make an enquiry to ascertain the true facts of the case?

(c) Do Government propose to take any action to prevent a repetition of such lapses?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) The Cantonment Magistrate is a military officer in civil employ. In his purely magisterial capacity he is subordinate to the Local Government, not to the Government of India.

(b) No.

(c) The Government of India have no doubt that the Local Government will take suitable action in the matter.

ALLEGATIONS OF CORRUPTION AGAINST CANTONMENT SUBORDINATES, AMBALA.

406. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: With reference to answer to my question No. 279:

(a) Did the Cantonment Committee assign any reasons for not paying the expenses of the proposed lawyer member?

(b) Will the Government enquire from the local military authorities if it is a fact that the All-India Cantonment Association offered to pay such expenses? And if so, why was not the matter reported to the Government of India for orders?

(c) Is it a fact that the demand for the co-option of a lawyer member, proceeded from the Cantonment Association and was acceded to by Government?

(d) If so, was it left to the option of the investigating officer to have the lawyer member associated with him? If so, why?

(e) Was the Association consulted before the idea of co-option was dropped?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) No.

(b) and (c) The inquiry is unnecessary. The matter came before the Government on the representation of the local military authorities, and the Government were prepared to agree to the appointment and to bear the cost of it themselves.

(d) Yes, the reason being that the investigating officer was in the best position to judge whether legal assistance was necessary or not.

(e) The Government of India have no information on the point.

. PURCHASE OF MOTOR CARS BY SLOUGH SYNDICATE.

407. Captain E. V. Sassoon: 1. Is the Government aware that the Slough Syndicate (India) has bought a number of motor cars and lorries that were surplus to Government requirements in Iraq?

2. Is it a fact that these motor vehicles are being imported into India and that the import duty being paid on them is based on an all round valuation covering good, bad and indifferent vehicles?

3. If so, will the Government be good enough to state on what basis was this valuation made?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The facts are as follows. The Slough Trading Company, Limited, purchased the whole of the surplus mechanical transport from the Disposals and Liquidation Commission in Mesopotamia. All this material was little more than scrap; but the Government of India were faced with two difficulties in the matter of finding a satisfactory method of assessment under the ordinary tariff. In the first place, it was impossible to determine whether any particular item was assessable as scrap or otherwise until sale had taken place, and secondly it was not possible to ascertain the real value for the purpose of assessment, as there was no regular market rate to go upon and the material was to be sold for what it was worth. It was therefore decided to assess all scrap vehicles imported into India by the Company at the rate leviable on commercial vehicles, on an all round valuation of £15 per deadweight ton, provided that they were covered by certificates from the Deputy Commissioner of Disposals, Mesopotamia, to the effect that they were surplus mechanical transport, and provided also that the Collector of Customs at the port of import was satisfied that they were scrap vehicles. This valuation was fixed on the basis of the information available as to the actual value of the articles in question, as ascertained by the Disposals Commissioner after taking into consideration the results of previous sales of such material.

COUNCIL BILLS.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, have I your permission to put a question to the Honourable the Finance Member of which I have given him private notice? The question is this: Has the amount of Council Bills offered for tender last week and this been reduced from Rs. 75 lakhs to Rs. 50 lakhs? If so, what is the principle underlying these fluctuations in the application of the policy of the sale of Council Bills by Government?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The principle underlying the fixing of the amount of Council Bills put up for tender each week is that an endeavour is made to follow the course of the market and to put up such an amount as is likely to be sold at satisfactory rates.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: One more supplementary question. Why should the business of remitting money to London not be done in India by the Government of India,—why should the Secretary of State and the Bank of England do the business, as they do at present?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I think the obvious reason is that it has always been done so; on the spur of the moment I have not any other reason to give.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: One more supplementary question. Does the Honourable the Finance Member think that that is a good reason that it has been done so? Could he not do the business better himself in India instead of it being done for him in London?

Mr. President: That is a matter of debate, not for question and answer.

UNSTARRED QUESTION AND ANSWER.

N.-W. RAILWAY—EXTENSION OF SERVICES AFTER 55 YEARS OF AGE.

195. Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: (a) Will Government be pleased to say whether Government servants employed on the North-Western Railway, who have attained the age of fifty-five years and are given annual extensions of service up to the age of sixty, are compelled in the last year of service to retire at the close of the official year, i.e., on 31st March, although they may not attain the age of sixty until a later date in the year?

(b) If the reply is in the affirmative, is it a fact that only such Government servants as are born in the first three months of the year enjoy full pay and emoluments throughout the last year of their service? Will Government therefore be pleased to state why those who are born in the remaining nine months of the year are not allowed to enjoy a similar privilege?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) Extensions of service beyond the age of 55 years are the exception rather than the rule; but when such extensions are granted it has been found to be of administrative convenience to grant them by periods not exceeding one year from the beginning of each official year, so long as it is still desired to retain the services of the employee concerned. The first extension of service is accordingly granted for the period intervening between the 55th birthday of the employee and the 31st March following. An extension for any period beyond the age of 55 carries no pledge that extensions until the age of 60 is reached will automatically follow, nor even that any further extensions will be granted; but so long as it is desired to retain the services of an employee the extensions usually terminate at the end of the official year.

(b) The period of extensions of service is determined by the desire of the administration to retain the services of the employee, and not with reference to his date of birth.

STATEMENT OF BUSINESS.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): May I ask the Honourable the Home Member to make a statement in the course of the day as to the state of business during the next few days?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I hope to make a statement immediately after the luncheon interval.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON ARMS ACT RULES.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): May I ask the Leader of the House to make a statement regarding the rules under the Arms Act?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I stated in answer to a question a few days ago that I hoped shortly to be able to make a statement regarding the manner in which Government proposed to treat the Report of the Committee which discussed the rules under the Arms Act. It will be realized of course that the administration of these rules lies with Local Governments, and they are, naturally, closely concerned in the detailed manner in which we give effect to the Report. But subject to consulting Local Governments, the Government of India see no reason why the main recommendations of the Committee should not be given effect to. As I say, we shall discuss with Local Governments certain questions of detail, but we hope, in the main, to give effect to the chief recommendations of the Committee.

Dr. H. S. Gour: (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): May I, Sir, in this connection point out that there is a strong feeling in this House that Members of the Assembly and of the Council of State might be exempted for life, as were their predecessors, the Members of the Imperial Legislative Council?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We shall take note of that fact.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Is it not a fact that Members of the Local Councils and of the Imperial Council were formerly exempt before the Arms Act Rules came into operation? I was one of the persons exempted, and now I have to take out a license.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member may be assured that if Members of the Local Councils feel deeply on the subject, they will not fail to let us know. I recall to his recollection the fact that the Members of the Committee thought that it was unnecessary to make special provision for Members of the local Legislatures.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: But they were exempted as a matter of fact. I can say that from personal knowledge.

N.-W. FRONTIER COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

Dr. Nand Lal: May I ask the Honourable the Home Member as to when the Report of the North-West Frontier Committee will be published?

Mr. President: Has the Honourable Member given him notice of that question?

DISCUSSION OF RESOLUTIONS RAISING THE SAME QUESTION.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Before the Resolution is moved, I rise to a point of order. I refer, Sir, to section 121 of the Manual of Business which says that when a Resolution has been moved, no Resolution or amendment raising substantially the same question shall be moved within one year. What I wish to know, Sir, is whether the Resolution to be moved now is not, in substance, the same Resolution as was moved in Simla regarding the Provincial Contributions. This Resolution runs:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that steps be taken immediately to set apart some revenues for the purpose of wiping out all contributions from the Provinces in the course of six years."

The question therefore is whether this Resolution is not in substance the same. If, and if so, why should it be allowed to be moved.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I wish to supplement the remarks of the last speaker and raise the same point of order regarding the admissibility of this Resolution with reference to provincial contributions. Under Standing Order 70, sub-clause (1) I wish to know whether a Member can raise substantially the same question within 12 months. The House will remember that in September last we dealt with the question of provincial contributions. The point at issue then was that a sum of two crores of rupees should be reduced from the provincial contributions. The point underlying this Resolution is that the provincial contributions should be wiped out within a certain time, that is to say the question we discussed in September related to a reduction of two crores while the question we are to discuss now relates to a reduction of 9 crores and 83 lakhs. I contend that practically it is the same question and I ask, Sir, whether my contention is correct and whether this Resolution is admissible for discussion?

Mr. President: When the Resolution came before me originally for admission I considered the question carefully. In view of the fact that it invites the Governor General in Council to approach the subject by the raising of new taxation it appeared to me to be reasonable to allow the Resolution to be moved; and therefore I called upon Mr. Reddi to move the Resolution standing in Mr. Zahid Ali Subzposh's name.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: One more point, Sir, and that is as to whether my Honourable friend, Mr. Reddi, has got from Mr. Subzposh his authority in writing as required by Standing Order 61?

Mr. President: I think the Honourable Member might have assumed that I had taken care that he did get that.

RESOLUTION RE HYPOTHECATION OF REVENUES.

EXEMPTION OF PROVINCIAL CONTRIBUTIONS FOR SIX YEARS.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Before, Sir, you call upon Mr. Reddi to move the Resolution that stands here in the name of Mr. Subzposh, I wonder if it is open to me at this stage to move that this debate be postponed till after the Budget has been presented?

Mr. President: It is obvious that the Honourable gentleman cannot move to postpone a debate which has not yet begun.

Dr. H. S. Gour: (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to inquire whether this Resolution implies that there should be any addition to the Imperial taxation for the purpose of wiping out all contributions. The Resolution as it is worded merely says that a portion of the revenues be set apart for the wiping out of contributions, if possible under the existing revenue. If the ruling, Sir, that you have given relating to this Resolution implies the raising of additional taxation, I understand that it will be open to Members to raise points with reference to additional taxation for the purpose of meeting the provincial contributions and the contributions now levied from them.

Mr. President: The Resolution asks the Imperial Government to forfeit a large sum in revenue, and I assume that the underlying meaning of it is that the Imperial Government is held to be better able to raise the revenue to meet the lacuna created by the remission of provincial contributions than the provinces are.

Mr. M. K. Reddi (South Arcot cum Chingleput: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I move, Sir:

"That this Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that steps be taken immediately to set apart some revenue for the purpose of wiping out all contribution from the Provinces in the course of six years."

Sir, it is with a due sense of responsibility and with a full knowledge of the extent and scope of the subject that I rise to move this Resolution which stands in the name of my Honourable friend, Mr. Zahid Ali Subzposh.

One of the most pressing problems of the day is the problem of finance, both in the Central and Provincial Legislatures; and while critics are not wanting who will belittle the scope of the reforms or the achievements of these Councils, few have bestowed any serious thought on the causes leading to such poor results, or the remedies which ought to be adopted. It is one of the sorest trials of the Provincial Legislatures, that while they practise retrenchment and economy to the fullest extent and even vote fresh taxation, thus bearing the opprobrium and the misrepresentation and calumny of their electorate, those who are not responsible in the full sense of the term, have the right to appropriate to themselves the hard-earned savings of these Provincial Governments. The Provincial Legislatures feel that while they are called upon to cater to the ravenous appetite of the Central Government, they have not the privilege of applying suitable remedies to this diseased appetite, to effect retrenchment and economise expenditure; and with a knowledge of something of the inner working of the administrative machinery of their own Government they not unnaturally feel that unless the Government is directly responsible and responsive to the people, ideas of true economy and real retrenchment are not likely to materialise. They feel that if the Central Government had to bear the odium of fresh taxation and the responsibility of finding ways and means for additional expenditure, instead of the present method of sponging on a few unhappy and uninfluential Provinces, then the angle of vision would change and a more sober aspect of the question would present itself. Then would Members not stand aghast or raise the whites of their eyes in holy horror when any whisper of a curtailment in the Military expenditure was given utterance to; then would they not be shocked at the height of ingratitude when any remark is made about the high salaries of the Imperial Services; then would they not be depressed with a sense of impending calamity when any demand were made for a speedier process of the Indianisation of the Services with a view to retrenchment.

I am aware, Sir, that there is a Retrenchment Committee at work whose report we all await with anxious care. It may not be possible to effect retrenchment to the extent to which we would like it in a single year. Retrenchment also can be carried out progressively; and naturally the Government of India are not likely to let go their hold on the Provinces as long as an easy way of filling their coffers is open to them. It is for that very reason I suggest that the Provincial Contributions should be wiped out and that it should be done at least in the course of six years with their growing revenue.

Sir, I would earnestly appeal to the Government to face facts as they are. It would be more in the fitness of things that they should face the music and brave the unpalatable features resulting from the abolition of these contributions than let the Provinces rankle with a sense of injustice, breeding bitterness and just resentment against the Central Legislature. The revolt of the Provinces, if such should occur as the result of this blind policy, will be a graver danger for national solidarity and national welfare than a measure of this description. Sir, filial ingratitude was not reserved to King Lear's daughters alone. The mutual jealousies, the not unreasonable suspicions and the introduction of a Provincial caste system are really graver dangers which responsible legislators should take into more serious consideration than the narrow selfish view at times exhibited by this House.

Sir, in my own presidency, for the last year the agitation regarding what has been termed the "impost" has been growing in pace and even Honourable Members of this Council situated as they are, so far from Madras, must have had an idea both as regards its volume and its intensity. I do not wish to refer to the decisions of this House on previous occasions, but I trust I shall not be altogether out of order if I were to refer to the petitions which I had the honour to present to this Assembly signed by thousands of voters of my Presidency, requesting this Government and this House to alleviate the hardship that is created by the levy of a large sum from provincial revenues by the Central Government. On that debate I don't want to offer any criticism at present. Sir, this Resolution raises a very important and a general question. As I understand it, it means an obligation on the Government of India to reduce the provincial contributions and in course of time—6 years—to altogether wipe them out. The method by which this should be done is one more in the cognizance of an administrative body like the Government of India than of a non-official Member of this Council. It is therefore not as an exhaustive method nor as the best method under the circumstances that the suggestion in this Resolution is conveyed to set apart some revenues for the purpose. It is more important to my mind that it should be distinctly understood that these contributions should be wiped out gradually and in any case should not exist after six years. Sir, we are all aware of the award of Lord Meston and we are also aware how several of the presidencies protested against that award. We are in this very happy, or rather unhappy, position that the modification of the award of Lord Meston by the devolution rules has made our position much worse. If I were to refer for a moment to the devolution rules you would see, Sir, that whereas under the Meston award the contributions for 1923 ought to have been less than in 1921, under the devolution rules the contribution continued to be the same. I should like to emphasise that this was a situation which was not at all contemplated by the Joint Committee. It was not to make the position worse that the Joint Committee intervened, but rather, as I understand from a reading of that Report, to make our position surely better. But we are now in the position of those frogs in the fable that protested against the award of Jupiter for sending them the King Log.

I trust I shall be pardoned if I were to quote from the Committee's Report:

"The proposals made by Lord Meston's Committee and embodied in these rules have met with a varied reception. They are endorsed by the Government of India, and some Local Governments are content with the contributions proposed for them, while others dislike the ultimate standards; but certain provinces, particularly the three presidencies, are dissatisfied with the treatment of their own claims, and the Government of Bombay contest not only the amount of their contribution but also the allocation of the heads of revenue on which the whole scheme is based. The Committee see no reason to differ from the fundamental features of the proposals, and they are definitely opposed to provincialising taxation of income.....The Committee would be glad, on grounds of policy, to alleviate the disappointment caused by the restraints, which the system of contribution lays on the employment by the provinces of their revenues. The Committee are of opinion that in no case should the initial contribution payable by any province be increased, but that the gradual reduction of the aggregate contribution should be the sole means of attaining the theoretical standards recommended by the Financial Relations Committee. The acceptance of this latter proposal emphasises the intention that the contribution from the provinces to the Central Government should cease at the earliest possible moment. The Committee attach great importance to the fulfilment of this intention and they are convinced that the opposition, which the proposals of the Financial Relations Committee have evoked, would be much diminished if it becomes possible for the Government of India to take steps to ensure the abolition of the contributions within a reasonably short period. They trust that the Government of India and the Secretary of State in Council will, in regard to their financial policy, make it their constant endeavour to render the Central Government independent of provincial assistance at the earliest possible date."

Sir, this is a very clear statement of the intention of the Joint Committee. It was not to prejudice provinces like mine, to make their position worse than what it was under the Meston Award, to keep on the heavy contributions that they have been called to make in the first instance, that that award was modified. The Joint Committee repeatedly say that the alleviation should be by means of wiping out this contribution altogether and they emphasise more than once that this should be done as soon as possible, at the earliest date, and so forth. The next paragraph of the Joint Committee's Report simply says that the Committee desire to add their recognition of the difficulties of Bengal and commend for the consideration of the Government of India that difficulty. The Government of India has been ready enough to recognise this. I do not desire to say anything of the relief granted to that fortunate province; but I should like to point out that the primary consideration of the Joint Committee was to wipe the contribution altogether and that only a casual mention is made of Bengal's difficulties. But yet the Government of India was ready to come to the relief of Bengal.

Now, I ask, Sir, what it has done to respect the wishes of the Joint Committee with regard to the early part of its Report? Two years have now passed since the Reforms have been instituted and three years since the Report of the Joint Committee. What has the Government of India done to carry out the intentions of the Joint Committee? Repeatedly in the course of that Report they implore the Government to so adjust their finances as to reduce the contributions and wipe them out at the earliest possible stage. When is that earliest stage to come? Has the Government of India any idea of it? Has the Finance Member bestowed any thought on the problem or are we to say that the Government of India is so involved that these questions cannot arise. We know that unless the Government of India, just like any other debtor, is forced to pay up a certain debt, it will be in the complacent attitude of keeping the debt alive as long as possible. That is what we don't want to happen. We want to force the Government to take up these questions seriously and in earnest and we want the Government to wipe out this contribution at the earliest stage possible. The Joint Committee emphasises that for the very successful working of the Reforms this contribution must go. I therefore plead in the interests of provinces which have suffered seriously in the past, that there must be a determined effort made by the Central Government to wipe the contributions out. I therefore heartily commend the Resolution to this House and trust that from the coming financial year some amount at least will be reduced from the contribution of over 9 crores and that within the next 6 years a progressive rate of reduction will find the entire contribution wiped out.

Sir, I move the Resolution.

Sir Gordon Fraser (Madras: European): Sir, I rise to support this Resolution. It would take a very much better speaker than I am to convey adequately to this House the very strong feelings of indignation and resentment in Madras against the very heavy financial burden imposed on Madras. These feelings of injustice are not peculiar to any particular class. They are shared alike by all communities from the highest to the lowest, officials and non-officials, Hindus, Muhammadans and Europeans. It is not a racial question; it is not a party question. It is a question on which all in Madras joined forces. What particularly intensifies the feeling of resentment in Madras is the fact that the main cause leading up to the heavy burden imposed on Madras is the strict economy exercised by the Madras Government in the past,—economy extending over many years. When referring to the United Provinces and the Madras Governments, the Meston Committee Report states:

"Economy has been strictly practised and considerable arrears of administrative progress are now due."

Well, Sir, I think that that is a very mild statement of the case. The administrative progress is not now due; it is many many years overdue. Unfortunately, the economy and the high local taxation of the Madras Government during past years has now resulted in the fact that one-third of the whole of the total contributions payable to the Central Government is called for and demanded from Madras, instead of the standard of 17 per cent. laid down by the Meston Committee as a fair and equitable share to be paid by Madras towards making up the deficit of the Central Government. Sir, this injustice to Madras is not a new one; it is a very old one; it goes back many years; it is not due to Reforms at all. The present arrangement simply perpetuates an old injustice. I have not a record of the many protests that have been put up by Madras, but I would like to refer to two protests that were made by the Madras Chamber of Commerce. The protests really were put up by the constituency which I represent and they were voiced by the Madras Chamber of Commerce. The first of these was on the occasion—it was as far back as 1900—of the visit of the Right Honourable Lord Curzon, the then Viceroy, to Madras. The words used on that occasion by the Madras Chamber of Commerce with slight modifications to meet the present changes apply equally well to the position as it is to-day.

The words were:

“The Chamber would beg to be allowed to represent to Your Excellency the urgent need for readjustment of these contracts and for a more liberal treatment being extended to this Presidency as regards the proportion of revenue which it is allowed to retain for provincial or local expenditure. The people of the Presidency cheerfully recognise that it is incumbent upon them to contribute their full quota to Imperial expenditure, but the Chamber would respectfully represent that a very strong and general feeling exists throughout the Presidency that this quota is at present unduly high, and that in consequence of this the progress and prosperity of the Presidency are to a serious extent checked through lack of funds to be expended upon local works of great public importance, and in some cases of urgent necessity.”

This fact was recognised in the Financial Relations Committee as I have just shown.

Then again the next protest was 20 years later. The words used in the next protest were practically the same as those used 20 years before. No change had taken place in the meantime and the words of the second protest apply equally well to-day. The extract is a short one and I will just read it:

“The contribution paid by the Madras Presidency is out of all proportion to the contributions of other Presidencies and the Provinces, and the Chamber trusts that Your Excellency's Government will take early action to remove what we regard as a serious injustice to this Presidency.”

You will see, Sir, that the Chamber of Commerce, over the past 20 odd years, has protested against this injustice. The House, Sir, will realise it is not a new complaint. It is an old complaint reiterated by Madras, and it is not as though the inequalities of which we complain were not admitted. They were admitted in the Financial Relations Committee. I will read the extract I refer to:

“We anticipate that the Government of India will construct its financial policy towards reducing these contributions with reasonable rapidity and their ultimate cessation.”

The next extract is:

“The scheme of contribution that we recommend above complies, we believe, with the essential conditions that any immediate dislocation in Provincial budgets must be avoided, and that the admitted inequalities of the proportions in which, in the past, the Provinces have contributed to the purse of the Government of India must be rectified within a reasonable time.”

I contend, Sir, that these extracts fully justify the position taken up, not only by the Government of Madras or the representatives of Madras, but by the people of Madras. Then, Sir, I would point out to the House that unfortunately this question of the provincial contributions has certainly led to a serious loss of confidence between the Central Government and the Provincial Governments. The only way to restore confidence between the Central Government and the Provincial Governments and to restore harmony between the various provinces is for the Government of India to lay down immediately a definite policy and to give the Provinces a definite assurance that steps will be taken at the earliest date possible to bring the provincial contributions down to the standard fixed by the Meston Committee. And, Sir, to do this, it goes without saying, that the Government of India must first balance its own budget. But it also must go further and it must take steps to provide funds at least to make an immediate start towards the reduction of these contributions. If we refer to the Report of the Financial Relations Committee, we find that the words used in the recommendation to the Government of India are: “reducing these contributions with reasonable rapidity.” It is not a case of reasonable time. They go further and use the extreme word “rapidity.” We all know, Sir, that the Honourable Finance Minister does not exactly repose upon a bed of roses at present. He has a very thorny and difficult time before him, and I think he has the sympathy of all Honourable Members of this House, and speaking for Madras I hope that all representatives from my Province will lend him their very hearty support in any steps that he finds it necessary to take to enable him to overcome those difficulties and balance his receipts and expenditure. He has a very difficult job in front of him and we all recognise it. Sir, in pressing for this Resolution, I want the House to quite realise that we from Madras do not come to this House begging for favours in this case. We come to this House asking for a just demand that has been pressed by Madras for more than 20 years to be acceded to.

I would like to refer to one point in the recent discussion on the fiscal question the other day. It has a slight bearing on the matter before us, or rather I should say it has an important bearing on it. The Resolution passed was recommending that a law should be passed for the protection of Indian industries. Now, Sir, the Indian industries exist almost entirely in Bombay and Bengal, particularly the latter Province, where they have the benefit of the coal-fields. Madras on the other hand and several other Provinces are essentially agricultural. The Honourable Member for Commerce and Industry in introducing the amendment to the Resolution the other day, referred to this point. His remarks were to the effect that the cost of production in India must therefore be high following protection, which means that the measure of protection would not be small and must increase the level of prices for consumers generally, and particularly for the middle classes and agriculturists. Also he said he was sure that if the agriculturists, who form the bulk of the population, could understand the implication of the policy of protection, and if they were able fully to bring their influence to bear on this Assembly, he doubted whether his motion would be accepted. He also added that the agriculturists had the least to gain and the most to lose by a policy of protection. Well, Sir, this means that Madras and the other agricultural Provinces, those Provinces essentially agricultural, will again be called upon to pay the piper without having the option of calling the tune. May I suggest, Sir, that any extra revenue accruing from these duties, duties protecting industries of particular Provinces and enriching those Provinces but paid for by the poorer agricultural Provinces, may I suggest that any revenue accruing should be earmarked if possible—it is impossible perhaps to earmark Imperial receipts, but I ask that the Government of India should bear the position in mind, and that these extra receipts should be utilised for the reduction of the contributions from the various Provinces until such contributions reached the standard which the Financial Relations Committee thought was fair for all the Provinces concerned.

Mr. P. B. Haigh (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, the matter that the House is about to debate this morning has formed the subject of long and bitter controversy. It was only in the last Session at Simla that a Resolution of a very similar nature was moved in which the whole question of the relations between the provinces and the Central Government in financial matters was raised, and the representatives of various provinces put forward their own views with a good deal of heat and in some cases almost acrimony. And now, Sir, we have another Resolution before the House of a very much the same nature. But, Sir, I propose to try, if possible, to keep clear of inter-provincial recriminations and to confine what I have to say to the actual Resolution on the paper. I fear the two Honourable Members who have already spoken have gone a little too far beyond the Resolution. If I may say so, there has been some danger of their trailing the Madras coat in front of the industrial provinces. Well, Sir, I do not propose to be drawn. It is true, Sir, that we in Bombay have our own position just as Members from Madras have their position. We do not pretend to be content with the present state of things; we have never accepted it and we do not accept it now. We do not think it is fair that we should be deprived for ever of any share in the one important expanding source of revenue that might be at our disposal. We think, Sir, that if a province is to have true provincial autonomy, it ought to have access to all its real assets, and we, in Bombay, consider that the enterprise and resource of our citizens is just as much a provincial asset as the produce of our fields. It is a temptation, Sir, to be drawn into a discussion on the arguments that were put forward by the Honourable the Home Member, who was then Finance Member, in the debate in Simla. He has had the last word and it is a temptation to answer him, to reply to, I cannot say the arguments but to the atmosphere he created. But I do not propose, Sir, to go into that question now. An occasion will arise when we shall press our views again on the Government of India, but I do not think that that general question properly arises out of the Resolution on the paper.

Now, Sir, I would ask Honourable Members to examine that Resolution very carefully. It reads:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that steps be taken immediately to set apart some revenues for the purpose of wiping out all contributions from the Provinces in the course of six years."

The Honourable Member who moved the Resolution was delightfully vague. He did not explain what revenues were going to be set apart or, if revenues were set apart, what was to take their place. I take it, Sir, that the only thing that the Resolution can mean is that the Government of India is to begin at once, when it is framing its Budget, to put down as the first item to be provided a sum of so many crores for remitting contributions from the provinces. The period given is six years, the amount is more than 9 crores, but we will take it as 9 crores. We see, therefore, that the Government of India is asked to begin at once to set apart, say one and a half crores of rupees this year, three the next, $4\frac{1}{2}$ the next, and so on. That means, of course, either that the Government of India is to increase its deficit by one and a half crores or to impose additional taxation, and with that taxation is to make good the amount remitted to the provinces who are contributing.

Now, Sir, I have no doubt that every Member of this House has engraven on his mind the figures contained in the Devolution Rules and particularly those in paragraph 18. Now Rule 18 contains what is generally referred to as the ideal contributions expressed in terms of ninetieths. In paragraph 17 we find the actual figures of contributions that are being paid at the present moment. Well, I have worked out those actual contributions that are now being paid. I have worked them out in terms of ninetieths and some of the provinces are paying more ninetieths than their ideal contributions; other are not. Now Rule 18 says:

"When for any year the Governor General in Council determines as the total amount of the contribution a smaller sum than that payable for the preceding year, a reduction shall be made in the contributions of those Local Governments only whose last previous annual contribution exceeds the proportion specified, and any reduction so made shall be proportionate to such excess."

Well, if you examine the figures, you will find that the provinces which would be benefited by the first remission of contributions would be Madras, the United Provinces and the Punjab, and, to a smaller extent and a long way behind, the Central Provinces. The other provinces would not be benefited by any initial remission. Now, Sir, I submit that when the Resolution is looked at in that light, it becomes alarmingly like the Resolution to remit two crores of provincial contributions, which this House rejected last September. That is the real meaning of the Resolution. Instead of calling it two crores this time, it has provided for a period of six years; but it 12 Noon. practically means the same thing. At all events, says the Honourable Mover, let us make a beginning; let us get at least $1\frac{1}{2}$ crores, if we cannot get 2 crores. And Honourable Members who do not belong to those fortunate provinces which are going to get the remission under this scheme during the first or second year, those Honourable Members will doubtless bear that fact in mind when the Resolution is put to the vote.

Well, Sir, now why should the House reject this motion? In the first place, it is entirely inopportune. How do we stand at present? We are just on the eve of the Budget announcement. This is not an ordinary budget. We have been passing through a period of great financial stress. An immense effort is being made by enlisting the assistance of the greatest experts we can find—an immense effort is being made to improve our position, and we have in charge of the portfolio a new Finance Member. In a few days we shall hear the result of those investigations and the Honourable the Finance Member will let us know what he is intending to do. And this is the moment that the Honourable Member from Madras selects to come and ask the House to pass a Resolution about the financial policy of the Government of India for the next six years. Well, I submit, Sir, he could not have chosen a more inopportune moment. The Honourable Member might at least have waited until the Budget was over. Is it fair, Sir, to the Honourable the Finance Member to expect him to disclose the arrangements that he is about to make? For all we know, Sir, his actual decision may not have been taken up to the last moment; the matter might still be in debate. It is not fair when the burden of reducing the Budget in these difficult circumstances is imposed on the Honourable the Finance Member that the House should hustle and try to extract some hint from him of what he is going to do before he is actually prepared to tell us what it is.

Leaving aside the question of fairness, I ask the House if they think they are going to draw the Honourable the Finance Member. The Finance Member, Sir, if I may say so, is up to the present somewhat of a dark horse. We have heard him speak on more than one occasion somewhat cryptically. Speaking for myself personally, the chief impression I have obtained from his speeches is that he has pursued researches into the debates which took place in the Græco-Roman world on the nature of the Trinity. That is the matter that impressed me most in the last speech made by the Honourable the Finance Member and I do not think the House is going to get anything much out of him. In vain, Sir, is the net spread in the sight of any bird; and when the net is so clumsy and the bird so wary as the Finance Member, I do not think I see him walking into it.

However, leaving aside these considerations—leaving aside the question of fairness, leaving aside the question of whether we are likely to draw him—is the proposition possible or feasible at this moment? Last year we had an enormous deficit. There is no getting away from it. That is the fact that governs the whole position. There was an enormous deficit; and we are asking the Finance Member after he has cut down expenditure in all directions to the minimum, after imposing additional taxation to meet the deficit we are asking him on top of that to provide still more taxation in order to assist certain of the Provinces. Can such a proposition be entertained for a moment? Are the Honourable Members who support this Resolution prepared to vote for that additional taxation, unless they are sure it is not going to fall on them? I seem to remember that not long ago there was a proposal to impose a salt tax, a tax which fell equally on everyone in India. Did Honourable Members from Madras support that salt tax? Sir, I fancy that the Honourable Members who are supporting this motion have a shrewd idea that if taxation is to be imposed somebody else is going to pay. Sir, I would ask this House to approach this question as it stands on the paper in a severely practical spirit. We are not here to discuss from top to bottom the financial relations of the Provinces with the Central Government. We are not here to encourage disputes between Provinces. We are asked to make a definite recommendation to Government that they should take a particular course. We are asked to make that recommendation at a time which is inopportune, and to recommend a course that we know is not practical. Now, I submit, Sir, that the House should not allow its time to be wasted by debating Resolutions of that character, and that it should without delay throw out this inopportune, this futile and this impracticable Resolution. Sir, I trust the House will immediately reject the motion.

Mr. K. Muppli Nayyar (West Coast and Nilgiris: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Mr. President, much has already been said, in the past on this subject. What we really want is some material result. Certainly, we are on no begging mission. How long can the present injustice last? How long are the hungry provinces with watery mouths to allow what is largely and legitimately theirs to let slip through their hands into other mouths? Can the present starvation of the Provinces continue without disastrous effects? Speaking last year in this Assembly the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey said, "We, my colleagues on Lord Reading's Government, have stood, are standing and will continue to stand for the steady progress of Reforms . . ." But how can the reforms progress and succeed if we leave the Provinces, especially the transferred subjects in them, without sufficient funds? Can my Honourable friend, the Finance Member, fresh from just and democratic England, be hard-hearted enough to choke the voice of those thousands who signed that monster petition—please don't mistake this one for one of those not uncommon bunkums in some dingy pigeon hole in the Government of India Secretariat? Lastly, I give a warning that if some happy change in the present system is not urgently introduced we will be driving all our sane newspapers in the Provinces stark mad. I am whole-heartedly for the Resolution.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I had expected the Honourable Mover of this Resolution, who, I see, is only the godfather of this Resolution to have dilated upon the methods as to how to set aside certain revenues for wiping out these contributions. I confess, Sir, his speech has totally disappointed me inasmuch as he has not furnished concrete proposals of how he expects us to vote in favour of setting aside revenues. He leaves the whole of that question and the solution of that question to the Government of India. A man who comes before this House with certain proposals ought to give us concrete ideas. I believe he has failed to place before the House any concrete ideas and my difficulty, therefore, in criticising him is all the greater. However, there were some observations in his speech which I think it is necessary for me to show to be untenable, and also to explode certain fallacies contained in his speech as well as in the remarks which fell from another Honourable Member from Madras, namely, Sir Gordon Fraser. The Honourable Mover pathetically complained that according to the Meston award his Presidency had a heavy contribution to pay and that the effect of that was that many of the Departments in that Presidency were starved and that they were in an extremely tragic and pitiable condition. Now, Sir, I have great sympathy for my Honourable friends from Madras. If they can place their finances in a satisfactory position I should be very glad indeed. My sympathy for them is on the ground that they are an agricultural province and we all wish that they should come into line with the other prosperous provinces if they can possibly do so. But when they wish to readjust the financial relations and the question of contributions, I also expect that they should extend to me, not sympathy, but justice and fairness for other provinces. Now, what is necessary for the present issue to discuss is not whether Madras is in a bad plight, but whether Madras is worse than all the other provinces or any other province in India; the Honourable Mover of the Resolution has failed to demonstrate that Madras is in an exceptionally bad condition. Member after Member during the previous controversy and even this morning have harped upon the fact that according to the Meston award the contribution from them in relation to other provinces is very high; in other words that Madras has to pay Rs. 348 lakhs as compared with, say, Rs. 60 or 63 or 67 lakhs whatever it may be from certain other provinces. That was probably the burden of the song of the Honourable Sir Gordon Fraser. But, Sir, the question has to be judged not in relation to what one province has to pay as compared with some other province, but we have to look into the history of the whole award and see what were the gains and the losses of each Presidency. Judged by this standard, all those who have read the Financial Relations Committee's Report, will see that Lord Meston while making his award gave to Madras in the shape of land revenue no less than Rs. 576 lakhs. That was a windfall which they got from the Government of India owing to the clean cut of the sources of revenue. The whole of their land revenue was given to them and in return for that they were expected to make a certain contribution to the Central Exchequer. The result of this was that, although it is the fact they have to pay Rs. 348 lakhs as their contribution to the Government of India, they are gainers by no less than Rs. 228 lakhs. Therefore, I fail to see how Madras is hit the hardest. No Member has proved that Madras is in a worse plight than any other Presidency. Only recently, Sir, in November last the whole of this question was sent up by the Government of India to the Secretary of State and the reply which the Secretary of State has sent back over this question sums up and gives a review of the position of all the provinces in India. I find from that review and the tables given there that Madras in 1922-23 has a deficit of 42 lakhs, but Madras is not the only province in that singular position at all. Bombay at the time of this despatch had also a deficit and that deficit was larger than the deficit of Madras. The deficit of Bombay was Rs. 50 lakhs and so also with the other provinces in India. The only two favourable provinces which had no deficit were Burma and Bengal. The Honourable Mover referred in a tone of derision to Bengal. The fact of the matter is that certain provinces like Bengal and Bombay have seriously considered how to set their houses in order. They have not hesitated to impose fresh taxation. By strictest retrenchment on the one hand and new taxation on the other they are making a valiant effort to improve their finances, and have put their houses in order.

Mr. President: Order, order. It may be reasonable for the Honourable Member to use that as an illustration to his argument, but I cannot allow the debate to turn upon the respective performances of the provinces in this respect. The Resolution asks for action by the Central Government and not for criticism of the provinces.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: I wish to show that Madras has failed to take the necessary steps to set her own house in order, and if she had done so or rather if she had sufficiently done so, probably she would not have come before this House for remission of contribution.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must see that if I allow the debate to proceed on these lines, it will turn entirely upon the taxation in the provinces. As I have pointed out, the matter is relevant, but only in a minor degree.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Now, taking the proposal of the Honourable Mover with reference to the setting aside of revenues, let us see what will be the effect of that proposal if we materialise that proposal by taking up definite concrete sources of revenue, let us see what is the effect. Does he mean that we should set aside income-tax? Does he mean that we should set aside some portion of the customs revenue? Whatever may be the proposition at the back of his mind, Sir, I contend it must mean greater deficit and therefore greater taxation. Has he taken into consideration the effect of his proposals on all the different provinces of India. Some of the other provinces are, as we all know, industrial provinces. We have to take into account in their case what they pay both in the shape of direct taxes and in the shape of indirect taxation. The Presidency of Bombay, for instance, has to pay to the Central Exchequer no less than 8 crores of rupees at the present moment. Similarly, the Presidency of Bengal must be also paying a very large amount in the shape of income-tax to the Central Exchequer. I have in my own hands a statement regarding the calculations of the total contributions from the principal major provinces to the Central Exchequer including income-tax. I quote the figures from a recent speech of the Member for Finance of the Bombay Government.

If you include income-tax in all the other contributions to the Central Exchequer the Bombay Presidency is paying 9 crores of rupees to the Government of India. Bengal is paying 7½ crores and Madras is paying only 6 crores. If therefore the proposal to set aside certain Central revenues were to be accepted I contend that the result would be that it would tell very heavily on Bombay and on Bengal. My Honourable friend, Mr. Reddi, has referred to customs. In the case of customs, let us compare the position of the three different Presidencies. I have not got the latest figures with me, but taking the figures of 2 or 3 years back, of say 1919, let us examine what each port paid to the Central Exchequer. Calcutta in the year 1919 gave to the Government of India in the shape of customs revenue in the shape of import duty £300 millions; Bombay gave £300 millions nearly. But Madras gave only half a million. Take again the export duty which Madras has contributed. Calcutta contributed in that year to the Central Exchequer not less than £1,600,000, Bombay contributed as export duty £700,000, whereas Madras has contributed a miserable pittance of £1,300 only in the shape of export duty. That will roughly illustrate, Sir, how if the proposal of my Honourable friend were carried out to its logical conclusion he would be sharing in the good fortune due to the contributions by other Presidencies. My friend comes from the Madras Presidency where the joint Hindu family system is perhaps greatly liked. This proposal sounds to me like the proposal of three sons in a joint family to put together in a common pool their earnings, one brother getting a salary of say Rs. 1,000, another brother getting a salary of something like Rs. 500 and the third brother from Madras getting a salary of Rs. 60 as a school master. It is proposed that all these three salaries should be pooled together and out of that the provincial contribution should be wiped out. I think, Sir, it is not a fair proposal to make. Madras is going to profit by the wealth of other Presidencies. These are the grounds on which I think this proposal ought to be opposed. My friend, Mr. Haigh, has also objected that this proposal is exceedingly inopportune at the present moment. We are unable to see how the budget will stand and unless I know the budget, I think, to support this proposal would be a leap in the dark.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, the inference which I draw from this debate is that perhaps Bombay is fighting against Madras and vice versa. I may invite the attention of both the provinces to the terms of the Resolution. The terms of the Resolution are not in favour of one province and against the other. The attempt of the Resolution is to see that all these provinces may be relieved of the burden, which is, unduly, thrown upon them and if we shall fight with each other, like this, I am sorry the fate of this Resolution will be very unhappy. Now, the Resolution says that: "This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that steps be taken immediately to set apart some revenues for the purpose of wiping out all contributions from the provinces in the course of six years." The Honourable Mr. Haigh says, "We shall, after some days, discuss the Budget and therefore we should not try to embarrass the Honourable the Finance Member." There is no point in it. This is a simple Resolution. We shall see about it when the budget comes and we wish some reduction may be shown in the Budget. This is simply a recommendation that is going to be made to the Governor General in Council and this may be appreciated now, and if not now, then afterwards. Now, Sir, if I may invite the attention of the House to the debates and discourses which were before the Punjab Legislative Council, then this House, I am sure, will be convinced of the difficulties of that province. That overburdened province has to pay so much. It is impossible for that Government to spare so much. I am not going to say that this province is paying more and that province is paying less. I join the common cry saying that this burden is too much and the Government of India may very kindly find their way to see that we are relieved of it. With these few remarks I whole-heartedly support this Resolution.

Dr. H. S. Gour: As lawyers will say this Resolution is res judicata. It comes here masked in a different garb but the Resolution is the Resolution of September of last year and this House has pronounced its verdict upon that Resolution from which I think it could not appropriately recede. My second submission is that this Resolution is premature. We are on the threshold, as has been pointed out by the Honourable Mr. Haigh, of a new financial budget. The Incheape Committee have formulated certain recommendations. We do not know what they are and to what extent they will modify the receipts and expenditure of the Central Government. We had a staggering budget last year and we can only hope that with the changed effect of the financial conditions of the Central Government and the retrenchment advocated by the Committee appointed for that purpose, we shall get some measure of relief, but till that time comes we have no revenue to set aside. The Resolution says you shall immediately set apart some revenue but my friend, the Mover, of the Resolution has not indicated where the revenue is to come from.

Dr. Nand Lal: It rests with the Central Government to see. (A Voice: "Curtail expenditure.")

Dr. H. S. Gour: Then, Sir, we are told by different friends from different parts of the House 'Curtail expenditure.' It is for the Central Government to see. But whether it is for the Central Government to see or whether expenditure is curtailed or not, we shall have our pound of flesh. Is that a rational attitude to adopt. It is for this House to see as to how its revenue is allocated. If the House commits itself to this Resolution it commits itself irrevocably to additional taxation: let there be no mistake about it. If during the next budget we find that the revenue and expenditure are not balanced or are balanced upon last year's figures, the additional taxation which we sanction from year to year will not be abated but will continue. It is the same thing, whether you continue old taxation or have additional taxation but the question whether we shall tax the country at large for the purpose of benefitting several provinces or retain the very high level of taxation already reached in the country is a question which cannot be examined piecemeal and in connection with this Resolution. Then, Sir, when I heard the Honourable Members speak, I almost thought that this Resolution dealing directly with the Madras contribution and reinforced with the same argument, is an old Resolution which comes here in a new garb but whether it is a Resolution directly dealing with the relief of Madras, or the United Provinces or the Punjab, I hope Honourable Members will realise their responsibility and see that they may be voting upon this Resolution in a way which after the budget is introduced they may not be in a position to endorse. Honourable Members will further remember that frequent references have been made to Lord Meston's award. If Honourable Members will turn to the pages of Lord Meston's report they will find one very significant fact which was the basis of the entire award and that was that the military expenditure was taken at 42 crores of rupees. But what has been the actual expenditure? We have been told that it runs to Rs. 70 crores if not more. What is the difference between Rs. 70 crores and Rs. 42 crores? Rs. 28 crores. Now, Sir, I ask Honourable Members a simple question. If Lord Meston's award is to be revised, who is to pay for this additional burden thrown upon the Central Government, namely, 28 crores of rupees,—and I have no doubt that if the provinces have to contribute, or had to contribute, upon this new basis, their contribution would be larger and certainly not less. The fact is, Sir, that the subsequent events have completely falsified the calculations made at the time of Lord Meston's award. The whole award has to be scrapped, it has to be re-examined, and if that, I submit, was the Resolution to be moved, for the purpose of re-examining the whole question, not of one Provincial contribution or of another Provincial contribution but of the financial relations of the Central Government with the various provinces, then I submit this House would support such a Resolution. But to ask that Madras should get relief, or the United Provinces should get relief, or, in a smaller measure, my own Province should get relief, is to ask for relief oblivious of the fact that we cannot dissociate Provincial revenue from Central revenue. During the course of the last debate in Simla the fact was borne in upon the Members of this Honourable House that one-third of the Army of India is kept for the preservation of internal peace and order, and it was pointed out by some of us that in maintaining one-third of the Army in this country, it is maintained for the purpose of doing what is primarily the function of the police. Now, Sir, if one-third of the Army is kept for the preservation of peace and order in the provinces, can it be denied that it is primarily a provincial charge? And if you were to saddle the provinces with one-third of the cost of the army of India, what would be the result? Would the provincial contribution be greater or less than one-third under Lord Meston's award? I submit, Sir, that these are questions which cannot be ignored in considering the Resolution upon which this House is called upon to vote. Lastly, Sir, I turn to the very terms of the Resolution. It says that 'steps be taken immediately to set apart some revenues.' In what way, Sir, are the steps to be taken? Are they to be taken by retrenchment or the levy of additional taxation (An Honourable Member: "The Government of India will look into it.") And if the Honourable Finance Member has no revenue at all, what support is this House prepared to give to a proposal, let us assume, for the enhancement of a cotton excise duty, or the levying of a salt tax, or the taxation of kerosene, or the enhancement of a duty upon matches? Will this House be prepared to support the Government upon proposals for additional taxation of this character? (Voices: "No, no.") I submit, not. My friends have rightly said 'No, no.' Now, Sir, unless you are prepared to find the money, you cannot ask the Central Government to allocate any portion of money for the relief of the provinces. On these grounds, Sir, I feel constrained to oppose the Resolution, though I should be inclined to support it if my friend, the Honourable Mover of this Resolution, makes it subject to two conditions. The first is that the words 'immediately' and 'six years' should be removed, and in their place the words 'as soon as possible' or 'as far as practicable' be substituted; and the last condition, and a very important condition, is that this readjustment should not involve the Central Government in any additional taxation. If the Honourable Mover of the Resolution is prepared to accept these terms, I have no doubt the House will support him. But unless these qualifications are added to the Resolution, I feel,

[Dr. H. S. Gour.]

Sir, that the House would not be justified in lending its support to the Resolution. The Resolution, as it stands, is, as I have said, unworkable, premature, inexpedient and improper, and I hope the House will throw it out.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala (Burma: Non-European): Sir, I rise to move the amendment which stands against my name; it runs as follows:

"That for the original Resolution the following be substituted:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that with effect from the financial year 1923-24 a commencement be made in the reduction of provincial contributions and that the financial policy of the Government of India be directed to secure their total abolition within a period not exceeding seven years.

This Assembly further recommends to the Governor General in Council that with a view further to give effect to this policy a complete examination be made of all possible sources of Central revenue in order to determine how far, with due regard to the taxable capacity of the people, they admit of being improved and expanded."

The amendment which I am moving meets some of the difficulties which have been raised by some of the Honourable Members who have preceded me. For a moment I shall remind the House of the implications of the Meston award. It is not my purpose to go into its fairness or otherwise, but the Meston award contemplates two things which are obvious to anybody who reads the Report,—first that these Provincial contributions are to continue for a certain number of years, and secondly, it pre-supposes that before the Government of India can do away with these contributions, its own finances must have improved. It contemplates a time when the Government of India will be able to manage its Budget without levying any contributions from the provinces. Now, therefore, it means this, that sometime or other the Government of India will have to look about itself to see whether its budget has balanced, and if the budget has not balanced, it will have to look to see how it can best be balanced. When it has balanced, it will be in a position to give up the Provincial contributions that it takes from the various provinces.

Mr. President: I must draw the Honourable Member's attention to the fact that the question of an enquiry into all possible sources of Central revenue is outside the scope of the Resolution. Therefore, the second part of his amendment necessarily falls to the ground. He can move the first part.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: May I explain how I may move the second part also? My contention is this: it has been argued first of all that the Meston award cannot be set aside just now or at any rate within a certain period,—secondly, that the Government of India cannot be expected to give up the Provincial contributions until its own finances have improved, and my submission is, that the whole system of taxation is just now such that, unless an examination is made of that, it will never be in a position to give up the contributions.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is not drawing the necessary distinction between the merits of his own proposal and the technical question of order. The proposal made in the Resolution is to invite the Government of India to set apart some of the revenues for the definite purpose of wiping out Provincial contributions. No doubt the Government will have, as far as the merits of the question are concerned, to inquire into all sources of revenue, but as far as the purpose of this debate is concerned, the Honourable Member must stick to the specific question raised by the Resolution. The first part of his amendment is in order; the second part is out of order.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: Well, Sir, in any case I submit that the Government of India is now called upon by this House, if this amendment or the Resolution is accepted, to make a beginning in the abolition of provincial contributions. And my contention is that the Government of India's resources, if full use is made of them, will permit the Government to do so. I maintain that it has not made the best possible use of the resources at its disposal. I shall draw attention for a little while to the present sources of revenue to make my point clear. They have three or four important sources of revenue, the most important being customs, from which according to the Budget it expects to realize 45 crores of rupees. I do not know how far those anticipations are going to be realized, but we shall assume that they will very nearly be realized. And if you look at the manner in which these customs taxes are levied, it will be seen that no principle is followed by the Government in levying them.

Mr. President: I cannot allow the Honourable Member to enter upon an argument as to the manner in which duties are levied.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: I am not talking of a protected tariff. I am talking about their sources of revenue.

Mr. President: The Honourable gentleman was proceeding to discuss the manner in which those taxes were levied. That has nothing to do with this Resolution.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: Well, Sir, I am sorry there is this difference of opinion between the Chair and myself but I have no hesitation in accepting the decision given. I shall therefore confine myself more or less to the first part of the amendment and refer incidentally to the second part—(Dr. H. S. Gour: "That has been ruled out of order.")—in so far as it may be necessary to make the first part clear.

The first part of my amendment suggests that a beginning should be made from the next financial year and that the process should continue for a further period of seven years. That is what was contemplated by the Meston Committee's award when it was first made, subject, of course, in the meanwhile to the financial position of the Government of India itself. It has been suggested just now that if the question before the Assembly was the total abolition or the setting aside of the Meston award, my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, and other Honourable Members from Bombay would have supported this Resolution. But as it is a question of merely giving up these contributions they will not be satisfied. I fail to understand the logic of that argument. They make a certain contribution to the revenues of the Government of India; we propose that those contributions should be discontinued; to that extent, therefore, they must admit that they will be the gainers, whatever contribution they may make to the Central revenues. I cannot understand their reasoning at all specially in the case of my Honourable friends from Bombay. Last year they made a plaintive wail in this House. My Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, was very eloquent about the miseries of Bombay owing to its resources being curtailed in this way by the Meston award. This year I read that the Bombay Government is budgetting for a surplus; therefore the outlook of my Honourable friends from Bombay has 'totally changed. They despise even the suggestion that they should be relieved of any contribution whatsoever, because they have been able to budget for a surplus. That is what their present position comes to. But I want to know from my Honourable friends from Bombay how they would be prejudiced if the Government of India found it possible to give up all the provincial contributions? To that there has been no reply. Whatever the contribution may be, why should they consider themselves above receiving that benefit from the Government of India if it is in a position to give up the contributions? Because they cannot have the Meston award set aside altogether, they will not have anything whatsoever from the Government of India. My Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, also said, "Oh, if it does not involve any additional taxation, I will be prepared to vote for it." Now there is no question of any additional taxation at all. It is a mere adjustment. (Voices: "No, no.") It is a mere adjustment, I maintain, of the taxation of the Central Government; an adjustment on a more equitable basis, a basis which would compel everybody who ought to pay to pay. It will have regard to the fact that those people who are in a position to pay the most must be made to pay the most, and those who can afford to pay the least will pay the least. I contend that if that system is followed, it is a question not of increasing taxation, but merely of readjusting it according to the capacity of the people. My Honourable friend conjures up before himself some danger that if we embark upon this there is the danger of the taxation being increased. He has not said why it should be increased, nor have my Honourable friends from Bombay suggested that taxation must be increased if the Government of India is to be placed in a position to give up these contributions. No doubt, Sir, if the Government of India persists in taxing the people as they are doing without any reference whatsoever to the taxable capacity of the people, it would mean additional taxation, but not otherwise. I say with some confidence that there has never been any principle in the manner in which the Government of India have levied taxation. That is why my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, is so nervous about giving his consent to this Resolution. He anticipates that the Government of India will always muddle through their taxation and that this must lead to an increase in taxation instead of a mere adjustment of the existing taxation. If he looks at the whole system he will find that a reasonable and careful examination in their own offices will suggest to the Government of India methods by which, without imposing an iota of additional taxation, they could increase their revenues. Though perhaps it is not necessary for this House to make suggestions to the Government of India, who are expected and claim to know everything about taxation, it may perhaps be suggested that there should be no apprehensions entertained on the score that the acceptance of this amendment would necessarily lead to an increase in taxation. Neither Dr. Gour nor the Government have at any time attempted to explore the possibilities of Indian taxation with a view to relieving the poor tax-payer whilst increasing the total revenues of the Government of India. In a period of 6 or 7 years, if the Government of India really looked into their own finances, it will be in a position without a penny of additional taxation to meet this demand. Another thing that has been suggested is that it should reduce their expenditure. A very great Committee is now examining this question, but I do not think that even a powerful Committee such as that would be able to abolish all expenditure; if it is able to do so, the millenium would come and there would be no taxation. But in case it is not able to make such a sweeping proposal, but if its proposals merely enable the Government of India, by curtailing expenditure, to get rid of the deficit, then a time must come when the Government of India must look into possible sources of revenue and to see how they can be so expanded as to meet the legitimate demand of the provinces.

I will make one observation before I sit down, namely, that I am not in any way interested, as representing Burma, in the abolition of the provincial contributions, except that if it is abolished we should appreciate it. We make a contribution of about Rs. 64 lakhs a year for which we get a very good return. We are allowed, we have the right to be here in this Assembly and we are sometimes permitted to lend some of our most efficient Secretaries to the Government of India. We think that that is a reasonable return; we make no complaint. But if in addition to these advantages we are relieved also of Rs. 64 lakhs a year, we shall not despise the gift like my Honourable friends from Bombay who are despising the sum of 56 lakhs which is their provincial contribution and of which we are suggesting they should be relieved.

(Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas here rose to speak.)

Mr. President: I suggest to the Honourable Member that he ought to finish. It is time.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: I am very sorry to make my Honourable friend wait for a couple or more minutes, because I know, Sir, that he has come prepared with a very violent speech on the disadvantages of setting aside the Meston award. I think that is the case which he will present, because Bombay does not require the abolition of the contribution by the Government of India. I will make one last observation before I sit down. Though I have said in my amendment that it should be done within a period of not more than seven years, it is unnecessary that a period should be fixed in the amendment at all. The period of seven years is put in because it is more or less in accordance with what the Meston award itself contemplates; but if there is any amendment moved to that effect there I should be perfectly willing to omit it. There is nothing controversial whatsoever in this amendment of mine. It merely lays down a principle upon which, I have no doubt, the Government of India are acting. Though the principle may be good, yet my Honourable friends from Bombay are nervous lest they should be compelled to accept from the Government of India this gift of Rs. 56 lakhs a year, and that, I submit, is no ground whatsoever why this House should reject this amendment. I trust the House will accept my amendment.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, I am afraid I am going to disappoint my Honourable friend, Mr. Ginwala. I am not going to make any violent speech at all. Violence, in the first place, as my Honourable friend ought to know, is not in my nature, nor, so far as dealing with this question is concerned, do I think it is necessary. As a matter of fact, I wanted to rise at an early stage to move that the question should be postponed to a subsequent date, but I feel, Sir, that it is better that it should be discussed, because although I am neither an astrologer nor a prophet, I have no difficulty in seeing the fate of this Resolution. However, Sir, I am glad that this Resolution should have been brought up for discussion for one additional reason. You know, Sir, that I always value the opinions of my Honourable friend Dr. Gour and I should rather have him with me on any question than against me. Now, my Honourable friend bringing this Resolution here has, I think, brought about a welcome change in the attitude of my Honourable friend Dr. Gour. I was wondering whether it was Dr. Gour who said that if a Resolution asking for a re-examination of the whole basis of the Meston award were brought forward, he would support it. I was wondering whether it was Dr. Gour who said that, because when I moved an amendment to that effect when we were discussing the matter in Simla, I found to my surprise and to my dismay my Honourable friend Dr. Gour levelling his attacks at me and opposing the amendment with all the force that he could possibly command. He even went so far as to say that this suggestion of mine was a death-trap and warned the House not to fall into it. Well, Sir, everyone learns wisdom as days pass by and even at this age in spite of his learning, I am glad to realise that my Honourable friend does not shut out the opportunity of learning; and I am glad, Sir, that to-day my Honourable friend has really supported the view that I placed before the Assembly in Simla.

Now, Sir, coming to the amendment of my Honourable friend Mr. Ginwala, I do not see that there is any difference between the Resolution as moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Reddi, and the amendment as moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Ginwala. So far as those of us who are opposing the Resolution of Mr. Reddi are concerned, we need scarcely say that our attitude towards Mr. Ginwala's amendment will be the same. We cannot accept it. But what I cannot understand is the argument that has been advanced by Mr. Ginwala in support of his amendment. He says even if you give back these contributions why will you be dragged to the necessity of having additional taxation. I cannot understand it. It is simple arithmetic; simple common sense. You have here a large sum of money. Madras contributes say 3½ crores to that sum. If you give a portion of that money back to Madras, that money has got to be realised from other provinces in some manner or other. If you have got to bring in that money somehow, how are you going to bring it in except by additional taxation? Suppose, for instance, as is natural in these cases, the Customs duty was raised. Who is going to pay that Customs duty? My Honourable friend Mr. Kamat has just given you figures which are most eloquent. Bombay and Bengal are the two provinces which pay the largest contribution to the Customs. Sir, the immediate effect of giving back to the provinces any portion of their contribution would be that if Customs were raised, Bombay and Bengal at any rate would be the provinces that would suffer most; Bengal more than Bombay. I admit. But if you look at the figures that my Honourable friend, Mr. Kamat, has quoted, you will find that the port of Bombay and the port of Calcutta are paying the largest contributions to the Customs Revenue. Therefore, I cannot understand the argument of my Honourable friend, Mr. Ginwala, that you are going to pay back these contributions from somewhere (I know not where) without resorting to additional taxation or without, as my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, rightly put, taking away anything from the additional burden that has been placed on the shoulders of the people of this country during the last two years. If the Government of India can afford to give any money back and if they do not need so much money for the central expenditure, then the first duty that devolves upon them is to remove some of the burden of additional taxation that they have placed on the shoulders of this country, rather than think of paying back the contributions of some of the Provinces at the expense of other provinces. Therefore I am entirely at a loss to understand the force of my Honourable friend Mr. Ginwala's argument on which, although he talked of different things, it seems to me he based his whole amendment. Now I need say nothing more in regard to the Resolution moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Ginwala. It is now known to us all that although a claim is being made that many Provinces will get relief, the whole case, as presented, is for the benefit of Madras. I do not for a moment want to say anything against the desire of Madras to get back a portion of its 3½ crores. I think Madras wants money for expenses for various departments, and I think Madras is entitled to claim that some more money should be given back to it, but I do feel this, that even Madras has no right to make that claim if the money that they would get back would be at the expense of other Provinces. You have got to give due consideration to the financial situation of the Government of India before you make an arbitrary demand like that, which might do good to you, but which may mean a lot of harm to other Provinces. But my Honourable friend, Mr. Ginwala, says, "Oh Bombay has just managed to start with a surplus budget." Well, that is so. I hope Madras will follow suit. Bombay—if I may say so without assuming any unnecessary pride on behalf of Bombay—will always try to get its grievances redressed, as it did at Simla. It did go into the whole question of the basis of Lord Meston's allocation, but when it found that neither the Government of India nor my Honourable friends themselves who were dissatisfied with Lord Meston's award, were prepared to support the claim of Bombay, which was not made exclusively for itself, but which was made for the benefit of all the Provinces, Bombay could not sit with folded arms and do nothing. Bombay is in the habit, if I may say so, of trying to get its grievances redressed by all kinds of measures, but if it cannot, Bombay does know how to stand on its own feet. Bombay can find out methods by which it can rely on itself and make its two ends meet. Is that, Sir, a reason why other Provinces, who ought to follow the good example of Bombay, and who ought to learn the art of standing on their own feet, is that a good reason why other Provinces should claim more from Bombay and should claim more for themselves when they are not prepared to take the situation of their own Provinces in hand and make an effort to see that their budget is balanced? I am sure if my Honourable friends from Madras devoted half their energies to the improvement of the financial situation in Madras instead of throwing all their force into getting something out of the Government of India, which I do not think they are likely to get, if they devoted half their energies to that problem, they would soon find, within a year or two, that they would also have succeeded in imitating the example of Bombay, and will probably be standing on their own feet, and that will be to their credit. Sir, I do not think I need any further arguments for opposing the Resolution.

Baba Ujagar Singh Bedi (Punjab : Landholders): Sir, I rise to associate myself with the Mover of the Resolution. I have heard some of the magnificent speeches both for and against the Resolution, and more especially the cogent and argumentative speeches of my friend, Dr. Gour, prinked with his eloquence and that of the Honourable Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas. The former has pointed out, Sir, that there is a great danger if we resort to the recommendations made in this Resolution. The first danger is that we will have to raise fresh taxation, and if we propose fresh taxation it will fall on the consumers

Dr. H. S. Gour: On the people.

Baba Ujagar Singh Bedi: On the people. Well, Sir, I think it only reminds me of the same story which I mentioned at the last Session of the Assembly at Simla. I think it is not justice that one Province should bear the burden of another Province. Let everybody and anybody who lives in India share and pay to the Central Government, whether by fresh taxation or in any other form in which the demand comes. We are all equally citizens of this country and are equally responsible for subscribing to the central exchequer. It is not fair that one Province should pay for another. Then, Sir, my friend, Mr. Jamnadas, has said that, as Bombay is paying a high port duty, therefore Bombay is much ahead in that respect. But, Sir, I must just point out that all these commodities come from different Provinces and they are exported through these ports. It is not only Bombay that pays these duties. To elucidate my meaning may I point out, Sir, that we have just proposed a new assessment on cotton of four annas on each bale. I will just put the question to my Honourable friend. If all these bales are exported from Bombay, would it mean that it is paid from the pocket of Bombay? Certainly not, it is paid from the pockets of the agriculturists. It is not Bombay that is going to pay for it. Then, Sir, I will refer to some of the speeches from the Punjab, which felt this Provincial contribution so heavily. In his speech in the Punjab Council on the 21st February, 1922, Sir John Maynard said:

"The Committee, having taken into account the indirect contribution of each Province, and in particular the incidence of customs duties and income-tax, and having inquired into the taxable capacity with reference to probable developments, concluded that the standard contribution for the Punjab was 9 per cent. of the total, or Rs. 87½ lakhs per annum. But practical considerations made it impossible to levy an even standard contribution at once from each Province and the Committee proposed an intermediate contribution from the Punjab of double the standard."

Then there is another gentleman, Muhammad Hussain, who says as regards the provincial contributions:

"The first is to cut and control the expenditure as much as we can possibly do, to equalise income and expenditure, and the second to ask or approach the Government of India once more to forego or to reduce the contribution which they have imposed upon us."

So, my submission is, Sir, that my province, a poor province, is paying very heavily for the other provinces. For this reason, Sir, I give my whole-hearted support to the Resolution.

Mr. T. E. Moir (Madras: Nominated Official): Sir, it is with some reluctance that I again take part in a debate on this vexed question of the contributions, but there are several points which have been raised by speakers who have taken part in the debate to which I think some answer is necessary on behalf both of those who moved the Resolution and the amendment and of the province from which I come. My Honourable friend, Mr. Haigh, rather twitted those who have supported this Resolution with the fact that it is inopportune and might better have been moved on another occasion. I would point out that those who have interested themselves in this question are not their own masters in this matter of dates; they are subject to the public business of this House and the luck of the ballot. We certainly would have preferred to have an earlier opportunity for once more pressing this matter on the attention of the Government of India, and it is not our fault if it happens that the debate should take place a week before the presentation of the Budget. My Honourable friend, Mr. Haigh, further attacked us on the ground that we were attempting, in anticipation of that date, to elicit from the Honourable the Finance Member some indication of his intentions. Now nothing was further from our minds and I do not think that he can point to any statement in any of the speeches which have been made on behalf of this Resolution or the amendment which showed any attempt to elicit from the Honourable the Finance Member any such information. If I may say so, it was Mr. Haigh himself who was guilty of such an attempt. His remarks reminded me very much of that form of leading question which generally is referred to as asking some one whether he has left off beating his wife. What he really asked the Honourable the Finance Member was "Have you left off having a deficit," and he apparently expected the Honourable the Finance Member to give some answer to that leading question. I quite agree

Mr. P. B. Haigh: Shall I be in order, Sir, in saying that I never expected the Honourable the Finance Member to say anything at all.

Mr. T. E. Moir: I quite agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. Haigh, in that remark, because I also agree with him that the bird is much too wary.

Now, Sir, Mr. Haigh and several of his colleagues have shown an attitude in this matter which was what we expected. We anticipated opposition from Bombay and we certainly have got it. Now, we in Madras have the greatest admiration for Bombay and in that I feel sure that every Member of this House shares our feelings. We are proud of Bombay, that fair sea queen, who sits by the sea watching her argosies go to and fro. But, regal city as Bombay is, enterprising as its citizens are, they do, I think, display certain qualities which are generally associated with an aquatic animal of a somewhat lower order. In the first place, Bombay is absorbent. It drags into its capacious maw wealth from all quarters of the globe and from all quarters of India. It is also retentive. Else how comes it that, in spite of the protests of every other province in India, in spite of the continued protests from my own province, as my Honourable friend, Sir Gordon Fraser, has pointed out, when the reforms came into being and the new financial relations were introduced, it was found that Bombay had been retaining out of its vast wealth Rs. 2 per head of its population for every rupee that every other province in India could boast of. Further, there is another characteristic which is common, it seems to me, to some of our Bombay friends and that lower organism to which I have referred. Bombay is convinced that all it contains has been its own creation; that those supplies which swell its pores and its fibres are all entirely due to its own efforts. "Alone we did it is their motto." Now, I would ask my Honourable friend from Bombay if its hinterland were limited by the borders of its own province, if its hinterland were confined to that strip which runs east of the Western Ghats to the borders of Hyderabad and Northern India, would the city of Bombay be the proud city it is. No, of course not, and I must protest most strongly against this perpetual and recurring assumption on the part of Bombay that its wealth is entirely due to its own efforts, to its own enterprise, and that the rest of India has had no share in creating that wealth.

Mr. President: I must point out to the Honourable Member that, having allowed a certain amount of latitude to the spokesman from Bombay, I have allowed him a similar latitude, but I must now invite him to confine himself to the Resolution.

Mr. T. E. Moir: Sir, I have done with that aspect of the question. I will now turn to a remark of my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour. Now, I wish I could debate two sides of the question with the same fervour as Dr. Gour, but there is at least one remark for which on this occasion I have to thank him. He informed us as an eminent lawyer that this matter is res judicata. I agree entirely with him that it is res judicata. Our claim is based on the law of the land; it is enshrined in statutory rules, and what we are complaining of is not that it is res judicata but that it is impossible for us to get execution of our claims. Sir, I have no desire to go once more over the real issues which underlie this Resolution. The Government of India have been informed more than once of the manner in which the political and the administrative life of the Madras Presidency and of other Provinces, which are hampered under the same disabilities, suffers owing to this question of the contributions. I would to-day urge it more specially on another ground. We have an opportunity to-day of welcoming to this arena a new Finance Member, and I trust that you will realise from what has been stated in debate to-day that this is a serious question, that it is warping the relations between Province and Province and between the Provinces and the Government of India, and that it is most essential in the interests of all concerned that this recurring source of controversy and friction should be removed. I entirely agree that if it had been open to us we would have sought another occasion for pressing this matter upon the Government of India; but, if I may say so, the fact that we have done so now is entirely justified by the speech of my Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas. What he has really told us is that as far as he and his Province are concerned, they will not under any circumstances consent to these Devolution Rules being put into effect so long as they can oppose it and thereby further their own ends. Now, Sir, we in Madras must protest strongly against that attitude. We stand by our rights and we do insist that it is the duty of the Government of India at the earliest possible opportunity to give effect to these Rules, which are Statutory Rules. What we do ask is a further declaration from the Government of India that they do not share the attitude of the Bombay representatives, that they recognise our claims and that they intend to give effect to them. I sincerely trust that the Honourable the Finance Member will find himself in a position to give these assurances to which we are legitimately entitled, and I can assure him that in that case we have no intention of further pressing this question. We shall rest secure in the assurances which we hope he will be in a position to give us and we shall trust that he will give effect to them and direct his financial policy by all possible means towards that end.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): This subject, Sir, seems to be one which lends itself to metaphors. I understand that Madras is the milch-cow of India. I myself have been compared to so many kinds of animals to-day that I find difficulty in keeping pace with them. Mr. Haigh, I think, said I was a dark horse. I hope that if he is in the habit of betting he will not judge by my form to-day as to what I am going to say next week.

Obviously, as the House is well aware, this is not the most convenient moment for the Government of India to express its views on the subject of the provincial contributions. The Budget is after all only a week ahead. I make no complaint at all that this Resolution has been moved to-day. On the contrary, I had not the honour of being present at Simla last year; so the debate has been extremely interesting and valuable to me and has brought me much knowledge. There has been such a multiplicity of counsellors that I do not know that it has brought me all the wisdom that I should have desired. But none the less I have no complaint to make and I am very glad to have been able to listen to the real grievances and the fancied grievances of the tax-payers of India.

Now it is natural and proper that representatives coming from individual Provinces should voice the views of their Governments in regard to those provincial contributions. But after all, we here to-day represent—we are the Legislative Assembly for India as a whole, and our first duty is to the Budget of the Central Government. Every Federal Government of which I know comes up against this sort of difficulty. Mr. Haigh has an idea of provincial autonomy and the right of a Province to use its own resources which seems to me to imply as a corollary that the Federal Government have no rights at all in Bombay.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: May I say, Sir, that I never made any such suggestion. I deliberately refrained from arguing at length what I called the case of Bombay.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I apologise to Mr. Haigh if I overstated anything. What I think he said was that Bombay claimed its right to all its resources. I think if Bombay claims its right to all its resources, there is very little room for the Central Government. However, if my inference was incorrect, I apologise at once. We here represent India as a whole. Next week I am going to have the honour of laying before this House an account of the stewardship of the Government of India for the year 1922-23 and of its proposed action during 1923-24. I submit, Sir, that to debate to-day the question whether additional taxation or existing taxation should be set aside for the purpose of an immediate reduction in provincial contributions is an impossibility in the absence of all the material facts which will not be before us till next week. I recognise that every one of the Provinces takes a very deep interest in its contribution. Except perhaps Bombay which desires to manage the matter in its own way, all of them are looking to the Government of India at an early date to reduce their contributions. Now the Government of India is under a very definite pledge in this matter which has been repeated again and again. It is, as one member—Dr. Gour—said, res judicata. The Government of India has promised—the exact words I think are:

“That they will shape their financial policy towards the reduction and eventual extinction of the provincial contributions.”

That is not merely a promise; it is a statement of fact. The Government of India is and has been steadfastly shaping its policy towards the reduction and eventual extinction of the provincial contributions. I have too much sympathy with my own position in trying to balance the Budget not to have sympathy with the Finance Members in the Provincial Governments. But charity begins at home. Our first duty is to balance our own Budget, and I submit that it is the duty of all of us here as representatives of India in an All-India Assembly to direct our attention first and foremost to what is our primary duty in this matter, which is the balancing of our own Budget, being quite sure that that is essentially the first step towards that reduction and eventual extinction of the provincial contributions to which we are all looking forward. Obviously I cannot say very much that is to the comfort of Bombay to-day. Lord Meston's award, whether it is the best possible or not, is res judicata. It obviously holds the field for the time being and for the time being that award must surely be regarded as a closed issue. If you reopen that award it would merely add new elements of uncertainty to the central Budget and to all of the provincial Budgets. A time may come when the contributions have been extinguished when it may be desirable to reopen the question but the time surely is not yet. For those who are in favour, unlike Bombay, of the Government of India keeping its promise and steadfastly directing its policy towards the reduction and eventual extinction of the provincial contributions I do not think I can say more than I have already said. The Government is and has been directing its policy to that end. If I were to say more I should be anticipating what will have to be said next week. There is really a very large measure of agreement I think in this House on this Resolution. The original Resolution recommended that steps be taken immediately to set apart some revenues for the purpose of wiping out all contributions from the Provinces in the course of six years. The amendment dots the i's and substitutes for the word “immediately” the words “with effect from the financial year 1923-24” and it also seeks to do the needful within seven years. Until the Honourable Mover got up I was in doubt as to whether the words “to set apart some revenues” meant to impose additional taxation or whether they meant simply to set apart some of the existing taxation. I am still in a certain amount of doubt on that point, but quite clearly the word “immediately” means in the year 1923-24, and 6 or 7 years fixes a definite time limit. Now, I would like the House to consider this possibility. It does not necessarily follow if there is no reduction in 1923-24 in the provincial contributions that the whole of them may not be wiped out in less than six years. It is not necessary that we should proceed by arithmetically proportionate steps, and I think also Government would quite clearly be mistaken if it were to accept willingly a time limit when it is subject to all the contingencies which in this wicked world of to-day Governments are faced with. But there is a general measure of agreement and it does seem to me a pity that we should go into different lobbies to vote for and against this Resolution or this amendment. Sir, if I may be permitted I should like to suggest that after the very interesting and instructive debate that we have had we should now adjourn the discussion. I should like to move if I may that the discussion be now adjourned.

Mr. President: The question is that this debate be now adjourned.

STATEMENT OF BUSINESS.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): The following is the list of business. It is being circulated now.

Saturday, the 24th.—1. A Bill to amend the Indian Income-tax Act is to be introduced with the leave of the Assembly.

2. The Cotton Cess Bill is to be disposed of, and

3. The Official Secrets Bill is to be disposed of.

[Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag.]

They also had the advantage of the evidence of official witnesses connected with Kenya, and of Sir Benjamin Robertson, who visited the colony on behalf of the Government of India. The Under-Secretaries of State for the Colonies and for India also attended the Committee and explained the present attitude of their respective Departments. Having got all these materials before them, the Committee proceeded to review the proposals made by the Government of India in their Despatch of the 21st October 1920. Now having all these materials before them, having done all this, they simply recommended the acceptance of the general principle which the Government of India had already laid down, namely, that there was no justification in Kenya for assigning to British Indians a status in any way inferior to that of any other class of His Majesty's subjects. But it was only a principle; and nothing but a principle that was affirmed here. Their recommendations did not go beyond this. They said that, sitting in London, they could not estimate with accuracy the depth of feeling which ranged itself behind the widely-divergent views held in the Colony on the several points at issue. They urged that some impartial body should visit Kenya and formulate detailed proposals as regards those points. It was now the turn of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to take the matter up and come to a final decision. He, however, set his foot upon the proposal of sending any Royal Commission to Kenya. A Royal Commission would only accentuate racial ill-feeling and serve no useful purpose. That was probably his view. I may say here in passing that it

3 P.M. was for this identical reason that the appointment of a Royal Commission on the Public Services of India at this juncture is objected to by us. The Secretary of State for the Colonies having vetoed the recommendation regarding sending a Royal Commission thought of bringing about a settlement of the questions at issue by agreement. As a stage in that process on the 16th June 1921, the Government of India issued a Press Communiqué for the information of the public:

"It is announced for general information that intimation has now been received from the Secretary of State for India that His Majesty's Government has decided that, pending its decision on the general question of policy raised in the above despatch, the Kenya Government should adopt in controversial matters a policy of marking time. In order, therefore, that there may be no appearance of pre-judging, while it is under consideration, the question of segregation, it has been decided to re-commit the Public Health Ordinance recently passed by the Kenya Legislative Council with the omission of the segregation clauses to which objection has been taken. In pursuance of the same policy, the notice of the 12th October last creating a European Reservation in Mombasa has been withdrawn, and it has been decided that no other reservations should be proclaimed and that no sales of township plots should be held in Kenya at which Asiatics are excluded from bidding."

And four months later we are told in another Press note issued by the Government of India that the Governor of Kenya had been advised to make an interim announcement on 17th October in the following words:

"No hasty action will be taken and in any event no radical changes of the existing constitution will be made until the end of the period of three years when the existing Legislative Council will normally be dissolved. Further, I am prepared to nominate one Indian Member to my Executive Council, and after consulting with the local Indian Association, to nominate four Indians to the Legislative Council in lieu of the two at present provided for; this only as an interim measure pending settlement of the main policy."

I would invite the attention of Honourable Members to this significant announcement. If they would read what is transpiring now in Kenya in the light of this announcement, they would at once see that His Majesty's Government, instead of springing upon the parties concerned with the terms of settlement they had decided upon, thought it expedient to let them trickle down bit by bit. This was in October 1921. There was then a lull in the atmosphere for some little time. It would seem that the Colonial Secretary wanted to see the effect of the interim announcement upon the minds of the parties concerned, and to create an atmosphere of calm for announcement of his final decision on the other points at issue. We come then to January 1922,—the date of the East African dinner, at which Mr. Winston Churchill, the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, delivered his ever-memorial speech, and announced that the reservation of the highlands for Europeans was a settled fact, that further immigration of Indians should be limited, and that nothing should be done to prevent the development of Kenya as a "characteristically British Colony." He also laid down that the application of the equal rights theory, emphasised by the Imperial Conference of 1921, should depend upon local circumstances, in other words, a doctrine which was essentially immoral but which the strong ever urge against the weak. The Honourable Members need only recall the pain and indignation caused in India by that speech of the ex-Secretary of State for the Colonies. By a strange coincidence, this Kenya question is coming to be a question of perennial concern to us in this House. It was on the 9th February 1922, that the House discussed the situation in Kenya created by that speech of the ex-Secretary of State for the Colonies, and adopted a Resolution conveying its protest against his pronouncement,—a Resolution which was accepted by the Honourable Mr. Sarma on behalf of the Government of India. Let me acknowledge here this fresh proof of the Government of India's readiness ever to champion the cause of our countrymen overseas, and of their endeavour to do all that the political self-respect of this country demands.

To continue the thread of my narrative, the period of three years from the election of the existing Legislative Council lapsed on the 20th of this month. His Majesty's Government had, therefore, to announce their decision regarding the status of the Indians in the Colony on the franchise question, and that immediately. Accordingly a Despatch was sent to the Colony early in January last, and it was the announcement conveyed in that Despatch of the terms of settlement which has brought about the present ferment in the Colony. We were told in one of the earliest messages received in this country of the uncontrollable anger of the white planters at the reported satisfaction of the majority of the Indian demands. I shall tell you presently what these demands were, and how far they have been satisfied. In another message we were told that the Governor had met the representatives of both sides behind closed doors (mark these words) when he informed them of the proposed terms of the Indian settlement. These terms were—common voters' roll that would include 10 per cent. of the Indian population. Constituencies were so arranged as to allow for seven or eight Europeans, and four Asiatics. Indians were to get some form of municipal franchise. There was to be no embargo on immigration at present. Highlands were to be reserved for Europeans. This was all. I would remind the House that so far back as January 1922, the ex-Secretary of State for the Colonies had already declared that the Highlands were to be reserved for the Europeans, while so far as seats on the Legislative Council go, there too the Indians were allowed nothing new. There were already four Indians as members by nomination, the only change being that what they had got by nomination was now proposed to be secured to them by election. There was, therefore, no net gain at all. The seats likely to be available to Indians under the proposed scheme of franchise appear to be only half of the seats enjoyed by the Europeans. As for municipal franchise, nothing is known to us beyond that they are to 'get some form of it.' Thus so far as the actual terms of the proposals under discussion go, they are, judging from the report received, a poor fulfilment of the Imperial Conference Resolution of 1921. It is further reported that Sir Robert Corydon, the Governor of Kenya, has notified the Secretary of State for the Colonies of his "disinclination to give effect to the proposals while the settlers are threatening Indians with violence and blood-shed if the policy of equality is enforced." One message dated the 25th January read as follows:

"The position in the country districts as regards Indian questions is extremely acute. A number of meetings of settlers in various centres have been held at which strongly worded Resolutions were passed to the effect that the granting of the Indian claims would be resisted by any methods which were considered desirable."

There were other messages on similar lines. But I would not dilate upon this sickening story. To borrow an apt expression from the "Leader," the whites are rattling their sabres to exterminate the Indian community root and branch. We are told that the Indian community in marked contrast with the haughty attitude of the Europeans is keeping its head cool, and has been maintaining an attitude of non-violence in the face of this grave provocation. They have abandoned all measures which they intended to launch as a protest to create an atmosphere of calm. This news gave us great relief, although it gave us an insight into the character of the white settlers, who appear to be so unscrupulous as to be prepared to shed innocent blood in order to prevent an act of justice being done. We are further told that they have agreed to accept the terms offered by His Majesty's Government as a compromise. It would appear that in doing so they are making a great sacrifice of their just and reasonable claims for the sake of facilitating an amicable settlement. To show the House what this sacrifice amounts to, I shall read two extracts from the reports to which I have already referred. This is what the Government of India say in paragraph 9 of their Despatch:

"We have no exact figures to show the relative positions of the different communities, but we are informed that the population and the incidence of municipal taxation are roughly as follows:

	Population.	Municipal taxation.
		Rs.
Europeans	2,000	70,000
Indians	5,000	1,20,000

Again, this is what the Joint Committee's report says.

What the Indians ask for is the adoption of a common electoral roll and a common franchise on a property basis with an educational test:

"But it (the claim) was strongly objected to by some of the witnesses on the ground that, as the Indians outnumber the Europeans by more than three to one (about 30,000 to 8,000 or 9,000), a Common Roll, even with a restricted Franchise, would, if not immediately, before long, give a majority to the Indians and create a situation which the Europeans could not accept."

It would appear from the figures quoted that the representation to be given to the Indian Community under the proposed scheme falls far short of their just claims. Yet, it is these terms which have brought about the present critical situation in Kenya. We are told that the Governor of Kenya has turned a non-co-operator and refused to carry into effect the terms of settlement arrived at by the Colonial Office, and the latest report is that the election which was to take place this month has been postponed sine die. It is even suggested that there is a possibility of the Colonial Office being brought to substitute "more moderate proposals." Sir, I cannot vouch for this report. Let us believe that there is no prospect of such a breach of faith so long as Mr. Ormsby Gore is Under-Secretary. But if there was any truth in this report, I need hardly point out the disastrous effect upon Indian opinion which looks upon the case of Kenya as the crucial test of the sincerity of the British Government in matters affecting the welfare and status of Indians overseas, if, under pressure from a Governor amenable to local influences, and European settlers who threaten violence and who are so blinded by selfishness and racial prejudice as to be unable to understand the very elements of Imperial obligations, the Resolution of the Imperial Conference should not be given effect to. Sir, when Indians going to self-governing Colonies are ill-treated and are denied the rights of equality, it is pointed out to us that the British Government are ever anxious to secure for Indians over-seas the same treatment to which other subjects of His Majesty are entitled, but the difficulty is that the people of a self-governing Dominion cannot be coerced into granting equality to Indians and that they are powerless to exert any influence other than moral persuasion in attaining their object. It is a very plausible argument, no doubt, there. But has it any force in the case of a Crown Colony like Kenya? Here His Majesty's Government are not powerless to enforce their will; yet, what do we find them doing at the present juncture? Sir, during the last debate on Kenya in February 1922, two non-official European Members of this House (I regret the absence of Sir Frank Carter, and Mr. Spence from this House to-day) solemnly assured us that the chief obstacle in the way of Indians not getting a status of equality in East Africa was the non-co-operation movement in India. Sir, at the time when this opinion was given expression to, even then it seemed to many of us to be far too fanciful to require any serious refutation. Can any of them honestly say to-day whether the present attitude of their countrymen in Kenya is due to the political troubles in India?

Sir, one word more and I have done. We were told the other day while the Racial Distinctions Bill was being introduced that His Majesty's Government insisted on Colonials being included in the definition of "European British subject" in that Bill, because they believed that thereby they would be in a better position than now to obtain for Indians overseas an equality of treatment. This argument, plausible enough, never appealed to us with any force in view of the present attitude of the Europeans against Indian settlers in Kenya. Nevertheless we have yielded to the persuasion and placed the Colonials upon a privileged position in the matter of criminal trials in India. May we not ask His Majesty's Government now to carry out the pledge given to us in this connection and admit the Indians to the privilege for which they have been fighting in Kenya? If, instead of this, they incline to a settlement in the spirit of Mr. Churchill, such a decision would be considered as a dishonourable repudiation of the solemn pledges made to India and would further complicate the political situation in this country. I am sure it is not too much to say that the civilised world has been watching with close attention the action of the British Government in Kenya as to how far they are prepared to carry out and make effective the pledges subscribed to in the Imperial Conference. However, there the matter stands for the moment. We in this House have a duty to perform at this juncture and that duty is to give expression to our feelings in the matter; and when we have given expression to them in no uncertain terms, our duty is done. Sir, I commend my Resolution to the House.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, I need not further dilate on the matter after what has been said by the Honourable Mover of the Resolution. I will simply place this fact before the House, namely, that in January 1920, Lord Chelmsford's Government took a stand upon the constitutional principle that in a Crown Colony British Indian subjects should have the same status as any British settler. That is what Lord Chelmsford's Government thought. In September 1920, His Excellency again announced that the Government had strongly pressed the justice of the Indian claim upon the Home Government. Now, I on my part take my stand upon this announcement of the Government of India. The facts have already been as stated by me placed before the House by the Honourable Mover of the Resolution. What I want is that the claims of the Indian settlers in Kenya should not be allowed to be ignored by European settlers there. My amendment is the same in substance. I simply make some changes in the Resolution. The Resolution says that this Assembly "views with indignation the reported threats of violence on the part of the latter." My amendment runs thus:

"That between the word 'convey' and the words 'to His Majesty's Government' the words 'by telegraphic message' be inserted; and for the words 'equality of status' the words 'full and equal rights of citizenship' be substituted."

I consider that the insertion of 'telegraphic message' and the substitution of 'full and equal rights of citizenship' for 'equality of status' will better express our meaning and I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That after the word 'convey' the words 'by telegraphic message' be inserted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"For the words 'equality of status' the words 'full and equal rights of citizenship' be substituted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, we shall be doing much less than our duty if we fail to carry this resolution unanimously, if possible. After the very unedifying inter-provincial recriminations this morning, it comes as a welcome change that all provinces and all sections of the Indian community should combine in expressing their indignation with regard to what has been done and is being done to their countrymen in one of the Colonies nearest to India. There is a fitness of things almost in this Resolution coming on soon after our determination at the instance of Members of the Government to be conciliatory to the Colonies. To a certain extent Indian feeling and opinion is being reconciled—I hope not merely temporarily, and irresponsible misdoings are at a discount.

We have been told that if we refrain from retaliation and reprisal, the chances of better understanding between the Colonies and India will be furthered and Government will have a stronger hand in handling the situation. We agree. And here, Sir, our obligations are due and ought to be expressed fully and freely that so far as the Government of India are concerned, all that it can possibly do, has been done and is being done in order to get our Indian fellow subjects abroad a measure of justice. That it has not yet come is as much our misfortune as that of the Government of India, but if it is further delayed, the Indian people will, with confidence, appeal to the Government of India to stand by them when they propose to take their own measures in the matter. Mr. Nag has described the Kenya question as crucial. So it is in certain matters. Sir, colonization from Europe is of somewhat recent date. In the Asiatic seas, at all events, navigation from India is not a matter of quite recent growth, Indians have been long colonizing islands and continents not far from her coasts. Till only recently the difficulties had not arisen. When a Washington Court declares that none but a free white person, whatever that may mean, and none who happens to be of full Indian blood can enjoy citizenship and when it goes the length of depriving an Indian of such rights after many years of enjoyment, possibly, we cannot ask Government to take steps against what the United States courts or the United States Legislature may be doing though we may expect a representation. With reference to the bigger self-governing dominions and Colonies when measures of justice are demanded on our behalf we shall be told, as we have been told in the past, that Government can do little, for they have their own laws and regulations and Government is powerless. Shall the same thing be said with regard to Kenya, one of the very recent growths, —a Crown Colony—where there are not the same vested interests and long usage claimed by the bigger Dominions and Colonies? We are all waiting, not with impatience, but with great patience, the outcome of the mission of the Right Honourable Mr. Srinivasa Sastri abroad. We are hoping for the best of results; but in Kenya which is differently situated, there is an opportunity for some of the corresponding results being anticipated and some consequences of the semblance of those emanating from the Sastri mission ought to emanate. It does not matter whether the Right Honourable Mr. Srinivasa Sastri was able to visit Kenya or not; the position there is stronger, the principles are the same and the objects of the mission would be applicable to Kenya. It is impossible to shut our eyes with regard to what is going on in Crown Colonies like this. It is not merely agitators and fire-eaters and various other persons who are accustomed to be grouped under nomenclature of a disagreeable kind, like that who are feeling in this manner. Staid, sober bodies have begun to resent—bodies like the Indian Merchants Chamber in Bombay and the Municipal Corporation of Calcutta,—I mean Madras (I wish Calcutta would join soon, the slip of my tongue is almost a sort of prophecy; I am not sure that it will not join). These business people, staid business bodies are being supremely exercised over what is happening, and the people cannot and will not give themselves rest till justice is secured. We cannot appeal to the Government here. It is doing as much as it can. I am sure it will go on doing much more, but we must strengthen the hands of the Government and make it absolutely clear to those in authority abroad that, until this matter of justice is vouchsafed to us, there will be no rest in India, so far. Sir, if for a moment one may go back to what is now becoming ancient history, what was the origin of the feelings of Mr. Gandhi which is now being visualised in untoward results? Let us recall for a moment the treatment to which our fellow countrymen were subjected in South Africa, the results of which we are reaping. Shall we go on reaping results like that, or will statesmanship prevail and put an end to this state of things? Mr. Winston [Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary.] Churchill has been referred to. He had forgotten his own previous utterances and belied them. Now none so poor as to excite worse commiseration. In Mr. Ormsby Gore our faith is large. He knows India, from a distance no doubt, as a Member of the Joint Parliamentary Committee, he has had knowledge of Indian feeling in regard to the matter. But I am very much afraid, Sir, like the Government of India the Colonial Secretary by himself is more or less powerless. A united demand and a united effort between the Government here and the India Office, as well as His Majesty's Government is necessary to put these things right. It shall not be, it should not be said that in His Majesty's Empire differentiation of a galling kind like this goes on perpetually. Those who are anxious to be within the Empire ought to have their hands strengthened, not the least by measures like those we advocate in this connection. This Resolution wants the sense of our indignation and our protest to be conveyed. That is the least this Assembly can do, and we shall be doing less than our duty if we do not unite in sending, in a constitutional manner, to His Majesty's Government an expression of our feeling in the matter. We have a clear duty and we ought to do it manfully.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, if there is one part of the British Commonwealth where the Indian has an equal right of treatment with the British settlers, it is Kenya. This is a Colony which was legally and formally constituted only in 1920. Honourable Members know, that, so far as the self-governing Colonies are concerned, we have been told, and it is a fact, that they have been granted a Parliamentary constitution under which they are entitled to make their own laws regarding emigration. But so far as Kenya is concerned, it is the youngest of British Colonies, and what is more important, it is a Crown Colony. These two words may not symbolize much to an ordinary man in the street, but any one who is conversant with the elementary principles of constitutional law will recognise what these words imply and import. They mean that the Colony is under the direct rule of the Crown, and the Crown can take no sides nor be guilty of racial or political partiality. The position, therefore, so far as the Indians are concerned, is this. In this Crown Colony is His Majesty and for him His Majesty's Government administering the Colony in the name of the Sovereign and the Crown, entitled to make differential laws regulating one class of the British subjects in contradistinction to the other class of His Majesty's subjects. This is a grave constitutional question which does not affect merely the Indians in Kenya but will shake to its very foundations those fundamental principles upon which the entire fabric of the British Commonwealth is based. Sir, this is a question which cannot be lost sight of. It should be a point of honour with the British Government that the Crown Colony of Kenya shall not be the Achilles heel of the British Commonwealth, that it shall not be the festering sore which will be used by the enemies of the British Commonwealth to impair and destroy it. What will the people at large say? They will say: "Here is a Crown Colony in which the Sovereign administers the laws and regulates the affairs of the people, where he has allowed the people of India the humiliating position of helots of the Empire and as a subject people." That, I submit, is the situation which would be created by giving the Indians the inferior status proposed by the Governor of Kenya.

But, Sir, I do not put the position of Indians in Kenya upon this broad question of constitutional law. I appeal to another sentiment, that of Imperial policy and international justice. We have been told that India has been admitted into the comity of nations and has been assigned a place in the League of Nations as a partner in the British Empire. Would it be in consonance with the honour of the people of this country and the dignity of this vast Empire, if its people are assigned a position of marked inferiority in this youngest of British Colonies? As I have said, Sir, the question is not merely a question of law or of international justice; it is a question of broad British policy, which, I submit, must be regulated in connection with Kenya on the intrinsic and basic principle of justice. But, Sir, when I shall show to the House that in this case it is easy to combine justice with expediency, I think we shall have made out an unanswerable case. Now, Honourable Members know that on the last occasion when we debated this question we were told that the population of European settlers in Kenya was about 9,000 as compared with 36,000 Indians. But that is not the sole point. As Mr. Winston Churchill in his book "My South African Journey" pointed out, Indians were the pioneers and, in fact, the makers of modern Kenya. In his book he wrote:

"It was the Sikh soldier who bore an honourable part in the conquest and pacification of these East African countries. It is the Indian trader who, penetrating and maintaining himself in all sorts of places to which no white man would go or in which no white man would earn a living, has more than any one else developed the early beginnings of trade and opened up the first slender means of communication. It was by Indian labour that the one vital railway on which everything else depends was constructed. It is the Indian banker who supplies perhaps the largest part of the capital yet available for business and enterprise and to whom the white settlers have not hesitated to have recourse for financial aid. The Indian was here long before the first British officer. He may point to as many generations of useful industry on the coast and island as the white settlers, especially the most recently arrived contingents from South Africa, the loudest against him of all, can count years of residence. Is it possible for any Government with a scrap of respect for honest dealing between man and man to embark on a policy of deliberately squeezing out that native of India from regions in which he has established himself under every security of public faith."

(Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: "He forgot all that.") Well, Sir, this is a clear announcement of the position and case of Indians in Kenya. We, the people of India, cannot put their case in clearer or stronger terms; and these words were written by the late Colonial Secretary, Mr. Winston Churchill, whose sympathies for India are by no means marked.

Now, Sir, another point in connection with Kenya which is often forgotten is this. Kenya is a vast territory on which certain European settlers had pegged out their claims for future development, immediately after the war, with the war money. A very large number of military officers and men were told that Kenya was a very fine Colony to settle down in, and they went to Kenya and there purchased large pieces of land in the hope that they would be able to colonise it. They very soon discovered that labour was scarce and that the conditions were not such as were favourable to European settlement, and many of them then applied to the Government for the sale of their lands and begged that they should be allowed to clear out of the country by selling their holdings to Indians and other Asiatics. Sir Robert Buchanan, M.P., who visited South Africa, on his return wrote a small brochure in which he faithfully described the condition of Kenya and of its white and brown settlers. There he pointed out that it is a country which was quite suitable for Indian settlement and where European settlers, deprived of the ordinary amenities of life, are not likely to settle down in large numbers in the way in which it was suggested that they should settle down in that colony. I therefore submit that the question of Kenya is one upon which the Imperial Government must exhibit some degree of firmness. It is a question not merely of political justice but of economic equity. It is a question which does not depend so much upon the placating of old settlers in a self-governing Colony, but of a few straggling exploiters who went to that Colony and would be very happy to get out of it as soon as they can. Now, Sir, what is the position? We are told that a certain English nobleman who is imbued and inspired by Imperial sentiments, or rather Imperialistic sentiments, is anxious to preserve this vast highland of Kenya for the benefit of white settlers, still unborn, and that he is therefore anxious to commit the Colonial Office to the policy which obtains in other self-governing Colonies of the British Empire. The question therefore is, Sir, not of Indians versus the present white settlers of Kenya, but a question of Indians versus the future would-be settlers in that Colony from England and other white countries: the certainty of Indian settlers who have got vested interests, who have acquired property and who have thriven well on the product of their industry, on the one hand, and on the other a remote, phantom possibility of developing this country as a white colonial settlement: these are the questions and I have no doubt that the British Government should have no hesitation in deciding that Indians shall not be squeezed out of this Colony where they have established an indubitable right to stay and acquire all the rights of a British citizen. Sir, I have great pleasure in supporting this Resolution.

Sardar Gulab Singh (West Punjab: Sikh): Sir, the amendment that stands in my name runs as follows:

"For the words 'it views with indignation' substitute the words 'this Assembly records its indignant protest at'."

Sir, from what I have heard on the subject of the Resolution before the Honourable House both on the platform and in the press I find that there is a strong feeling in the country against the present situation in Kenya, and the wording of my amendment would signify the sense better and improve the expression in question in point of force. I move my amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): So far as I understand the Resolution, it aims at three specific things. The first is that it re-asserts the right of equality of citizenship of the Indian settler in Kenya. Now, I do not think this Assembly wants anything new to be done in re-asserting that claim. That claim has been re-asserted once in this Assembly and this right of equal citizenship has been recognised by the Imperial Conference of 1921, by a Resolution that was passed at that Conference. Any encouragement to the effort of going back on that Resolution would, I think, be detrimental to the interests of the Empire. As a matter of fact the carrying out of that Resolution is the acid test, as it is said, of the being of the Empire and this Assembly does not want anything which already Indians do not possess by right or which has not been recognised by the Imperial Conference in re-asserting this right of equality of citizenship.

The second thing that this Resolution wants is that it wants to protest against—it wants to show its indignation and it wants to protest against the threats of violence of the white settlers in Kenya. Now it is to this point that I wish to confine my remarks. The effort of the Colonial Secretary to give to the Indian settlers their due, namely, the right of equality of citizenship has met with a protest from the white settlers. It is likely that that threat might have some effect on the Colonial Secretary. Ought it to have any effect? What would be the result if this threat succeeds in having an effect on the Colonial Secretary so as to affect the decision that the Colonial Secretary was going to take with regard to giving the right of equality to Indian settlers? The effect would be the same perhaps as it would have been if the threat of civil disobedience in this country had compelled the hands of Government to give all kinds of reasonable and unreasonable demands to the Indians in this country. Now you will admit, Sir, that even in the claim made by the most extreme section of Indians in this country there was some justice. That claim arose from a natural desire on the part of Indians to manage the affairs of their own country, and the indignation that we saw existed in India was due to the injustice, supposed or really existing, that was done to Indians in certain matters. But even where the claim was just to a certain extent, as soon as the question of a threat came up before the Assembly, and as soon as an attempt was made to bring about the carrying out of that claim by means of a resort to methods that were not constitutional—well, this Assembly stood by the Government of India and said "No." Wherever there is an attempt to resort to unconstitutional measures, there the Assembly will help the Government in putting down those who in season and out of season hold out threats against the Government. A worse situation has arisen in Kenya. There is injustice in the claim that is made by the white settlers. There it is a threat which if carried out would disturb the peace and tranquillity of the whole Colony of Kenya. Not only that, but if the Government yielded to that threat and refrained from doing justice to the claims of the Indian settlers, then the Government would justify the disloyalty to the idea of Empire that ought not to be allowed to grow within the nations that form the Empire. Therefore, although in India there was to a certain extent a justifiable claim, in Kenya there is no justice in the claim that is made by the white settlers and the effect of yielding to the threat held out by the white settlers would be the same as the effect of yielding to the threat of those who wanted to resort to civil disobedience would have been in India. The position here is better inasmuch as the claim was just, the position there is worse inasmuch as the claim of the white settler is not just. I claim therefore that His Majesty's Government will show the strength that is necessary for putting down the white settlers if they resort to violence and for giving them a clear understanding of the fact that no such threat will avail with His Majesty's Government. With these words I support the Resolution.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): The genesis and outline of the whole question, that is being debated upon now, has been given by the Honourable Mover and I do not propose to go into those things. I will offer a few observations so far as the question before the House goes. Now, Sir, there are a number of bonds of affection and love between two peoples, and I think one of them is this that they are subjects of one and the same Sovereign. It is regrettable to see that the European settlers in Kenya did not realise the force of this bond of affection. So far as we the Indians are concerned, whenever a fit occasion arises we, so far as we can do so, welcome them to the status of equality. But when we ask for something from the Colonies I am sorry to say that they do not give us a proper response. We are very greatly indebted to the Government of India for what they have been doing for us. But I may tell them that we have not attained that object which we endeavoured to attain to and the treatment which has been meted out to our Indian brethren in Kenya, compels us to move this Resolution before this House. Sir, one of the most important things which has to be seen and appreciated by the Sovereign is this that there should be peace and contentment amongst his various subjects. Now, this threat, which has been given to our Indian brethren in Kenya recently, goes to show that that peace and contentment can never be maintained and therefore it is one of the most important duties of the Crown to see that the Indian's desires and the Indian's wants are attended to adequately. When we are given the status of Membership of the League of Nations, we ask the Empire to give us that status practically and not theoretically. It should not remain on paper, but it should be given a practical shape. That is our desire, and in pursuit of that desire we raise our voice, and I hope that our European friends here, whose speeches were characterised by fairness, on some occasions, will appreciate the soundness of the position taken up in this Resolution and I trust that this House including the Treasury Benches will give their support to this Resolution as I do, wholeheartedly.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma (Revenue and Agriculture Member): There is very little that the Government have to say with regard to the merits of this Resolution except that they reiterate that their policy with regard to the Indian question in Kenya is the same as has been explained to the House on more than one occasion. They have stood up for the full rights of citizenship and they do stand for the same position now. Negotiations had been in progress between the Colonial and the India Offices on this question and we hope that the agreement which has been reached would be satisfactory to all parties concerned. The Government have noted the indignation which has been roused throughout India by the reported threats of violence on the part of the wilder elements amongst those who are dissatisfied with the settlement which was communicated or which was stated to have been communicated to the Colonials in Kenya. But I hope that this House will not act upon these reported threats or take serious notice of any temporary excitement which might have been caused when hopes which had been entertained in any particular quarter were disappointed. Honourable Members would have noted that it was in the early part of January that we heard so much about these reported acts of violence. We are now towards the end of February and barring one or two telegraphic messages which Reuter has cabled here, we see nothing to justify any real apprehensions being entertained by any reasonable person on this subject of the attitude of the Europeans towards their Indian fellow subjects. It cannot be denied that unfortunately, racial passions run high in certain parts of Africa. But His Majesty's Government's policy has been steadily to set their face against the encouragement of any such differences between the various communities which have settled down in the different parts of His Majesty's Empire. We must recognise that the Europeans who have settled in Kenya rightly or wrongly feel that certain privileges or certain rights were conferred upon them in the matter of settlement in the Highlands at the time those Highlands were assigned to them. I am not now arguing the question on the merits, but we must recognise that when a race which is characterised by vigour, by adherence to what it conceives to be right, feels disappointed in any particular with regard to those rights, it is likely to be upset slightly, and hence those reports that have reached India. No responsible Britisher, no responsible Association could ever have contemplated any acts of violence at all against the Indian community and we have reason to believe that no Europeans ever entertained any thought of injury to any of his Indian fellow-subjects because he was disappointed or he thought he would be disappointed by any policy that was being pursued by His Majesty's Government. It may be that in the violence of passion a few individuals here and

4 P.M. there expressed themselves in language which was calculated to convey the impression that they would not stand by any decision that might have been reached by His Majesty's Government but we who have been noticing in India the violence of political passions can readily recognise the attitude of some of the elements which might have felt themselves to have been injured or wronged by His Majesty's Government's policy. I therefore suggest to the House that we should treat with contempt any of these alarming reports that may reach here as to the attitude of a few individuals or the threats that may have been impliedly conveyed by a few individuals in the matter, but I may assure the House that from all we hear from East Africa no responsible Europeans ever contemplated or can ever contemplate an act so detrimental to their own interests and to the interests of the Empire and so inconsistent with the traditions of a proud and just race. On the main and essential question the Government of India have been fighting for the assertion of equality of status and full rights of citizenship. I have already said that our attitude is what it has been always—fully sympathetic with the claims of the Indians settled in Kenya. We have not been idle in communicating to His Majesty's Government the feeling of dismay and indignation which has been roused in all quarters in India by Reuter's messages. The Honourable Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan proposed that we should telegraph this Resolution of the Assembly. He need not have cautioned us in that manner to do our duty, because I may assure the House that we have been spending the tax-payer's money freely in the past in conveying speedily the views of this Assembly and of the Government on matters vitally affecting the interests of our fellow-subjects in Kenya. Dr. Gour has alluded to a supposed statement of the Governor of Kenya that as a matter of compromise Indians might be satisfied with an inferior status, if I have heard him correctly. We have no reason to suppose that His Majesty's Governor in Kenya made any such suggestion and I shall leave it at that. He has also informed the House

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I point out to the Honourable Member, it was in the Reuter's telegrams a few days back that the terms of the settlement were that the Highlands will be reserved for Europeans and that Indians had accepted that position.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: The Resolution deals with the question of full rights of citizenship and I was alluding to that particular aspect. On the question of the Highlands the Government of India hold the same views that they held and I may say that no one in this House would deprecate any reasonable compromise that may be arrived at between the different sections of the community settled in Kenya. I think we should all rejoice if the Governor be successful in his persuading both the British and the Indian settlers to come to a reasonable compromise without any sacrifice of principle on the part of the Indian community on the essential questions on which they unhappily differ at the present moment. Therefore, Sir, without abandoning the vital principle of equality and full rights of citizenship I think this House should support the Government in trying to effect a compromise between the various sections settled in Kenya and we are looking forward with hope that as a result of the patient policy which has been followed by the Government of India and His Majesty's Government such a desirable result would be achieved in the not distant future. I hope that the information which Dr. Gour has received as to the attitude of the white settlers in being desirous of selling their lands in the Highlands to Indians is accurate. I think nothing would please those who wish to promote peace in that country if that be the real attitude of those who have been occupying the Highlands. But we have no reason to think that the vast majority of the settlers in the Highlands at present entertain the idea of selling their lands to Indians or anybody else or quitting that land and therefore I cannot hold out any encouragement on that particular subject. It is unnecessary for me to allude to the varying claims which have been put forward on behalf of Indians and Europeans. The Government of India have always supported Indian claims and have always pressed upon His Majesty's Government how much of the prosperity of Kenya is due to the Indians who have been pioneers there and who have been struggling amidst difficulties, hardships and privations to better that country but it is unnecessary to deprecate in any manner whatsoever the achievements of the Europeans in that part of the country. It is the capital which has been employed by them also, their achievements in the past, their energy which has helped in making that land what it is. It is unnecessary in these discussions to dwell too prominently upon the achievements of Indians or of Europeans. We must give credit to both the communities for having loyally co-operated in the past in bringing about the desired result and we hope to look forward to equal unanimity and the same brotherly feeling which has characterised them in the past in promoting the prosperity of that country as an integral portion of the British Empire. We, who have watched with some interest the heat of the controversy which raged in India at or about the time when the reforms were about to be inaugurated, have a lesson which we might well apply to the conditions obtaining in Kenya at the present moment. It is the genius of the British race to fight hard, to fight insistently, to fight vigorously for what they conceive to be their rights. It is their genius to accept loyally the decisions which the Central Government may come to after hearing both sides of the question; and I feel quite sure that when the passions of the moment die down the love of justice, love of fair play, disciplined obedience to the central authority which has always characterised our European fellow British subjects, would enable them to rise to the occasion and loyally co-operate with His Majesty's Government in Kenya and the Indian subjects there in promoting the prosperity of the Colony; and I also feel sure that the statesmanship, the tact, the firmness, and the nerve, which have enabled this Empire to be built up and to be maintained at its present level will be equal to suppressing any disorders from any quarters in defiance of the authority of the Central Government. We can afford to despise the troublesome elements, whether such troublesome elements arise in Kenya, India or elsewhere, which are calculated to destroy the integrity and the solidarity of the Empire. We need have no apprehensions on the subject, and I think the House may well omit from the Resolution, if I may suggest so, the latter portion which refers to the feeling of indignation. But if it is the pleasure of the House that their indignation or indignant protest should be conveyed to His Majesty's Government, the Government of India have no objection whatsoever to do so.

Mr. President: The proposal has been made, but no amendment has been moved.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: I only suggest to the Mover that he might leave out the latter portion, but I do not propose to move any amendment if the Mover is not agreeable to drop the words.

Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: I want to let the Resolution go as a whole.

Mr. President: The question is:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council to be so pleased as to convey by telegraphic message to His Majesty's Government the view of the Assembly that no settlement regarding the political rights and status of the Indian settlers in the Crown Colony of Kenya would satisfy the people of India unless the Indians in Kenya are granted full and equal rights of citizenship with European settlers; and that this Assembly records its indignant protest at the reported threats of violence on the part of the latter; and it fully trusts that His Majesty's Government will take effective steps to prevent any such outbreak and to afford them the necessary protection."

The motion was adopted.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I take it, Sir, that this will be recorded in the proceedings as being carried unanimously?

Mr. President: There will be no record of a division in the proceedings, and therefore it will be seen that no one voted against the proposal.

Dr. H. S. Gour: There was an instance, Sir, in connection with Mr. Mohammed Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali's case. You will remember, Sir, that when Sir William Vincent asked that it might be recorded that it was carried unanimously, I believe you promised to put it down that it was carried unanimously?

Mr. President: There is no objection to that being done in this case too.

The motion was adopted unanimously.

RESOLUTION RE SECRETARY OF STATE'S DESPATCH ON INDIAN AUTONOMY.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I beg to move the following Resolution which stands in my name:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that he will be pleased to convey to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India the Assembly's feeling of extreme dissatisfaction at his despatch, dated the 2nd November 1922, regarding the Assembly's Resolution dated the 29th September 1921."

Sir, the Right Honourable the Secretary of State apparently expected this Assembly to take some action on his famous Despatch of the 2nd November 1922, for in the concluding paragraph of that despatch he says: "I shall be glad if Your Excellency's Government will cause copies of this Despatch to be laid on the table of both the Chambers of the Indian Legislature." Sir, he may rest satisfied that not only the Despatch, copies of the despatch, have been laid on the table of the House, they have also been included in the proceedings of the Legislature and printed very prominently in the proceedings of the 24th January 1923. If that is any satisfaction to His Lordship, let him have it. But, if he wants to know how the Assembly views it, it is not a feeling of disappointment, for we never expected anything better from His Lordship; it is one of extreme dissatisfaction, to put it mildly, with which we view his Despatch. Sir,

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

I have no doubt that His Lordship thought he was sending us a nice fruit for consumption. Though, Sir, the Government of India have taken some time to deliver that fruit to us, it requires not a large amount of peeling to expose the rotten nature of the fruit which has been placed before us. That rottenness is not due to the delay in the presentation, but it is due to the inner contents of the fruit itself. Sir, let me examine the Despatch somewhat carefully and with that respect which is due to His Majesty's Secretary of State. On reading it carefully, it appears to me that His Lordship has not even paid us the compliment of reading the debates which took place in the Assembly in connection with this matter. He has merely re-echoed sentiments which Mr. Montagu had to deliver himself of when he was on his defence in the House of Commons on the 14th February 1922. When that celebrated motion of censure on Mr. Montagu was moved in the House of Commons, he had to adopt the line, in order to get out of the scrape, of abusing both sides. That is a trick which most of us adopt in getting out of a situation, and that is the trick he adopted; and His Lordship, the present Secretary of State, has merely taken the trouble to embody those sentiments with which Mr. Montagu made his defence in another place. Sir, His Lordship says: "In the first place, they assume that progress is impossible under the existing constitution". Where did His Lordship get it,—that this Assembly assumed that progress was impossible under the existing constitution? On the other hand, Sir, if he had read the opening paragraph of the debates, he would have seen that in the Resolution as presented to this Assembly by my esteemed and revered friend, Mr. Jadu Nath Mazumdar—whose absence we regret to-day—he opened the first portion of his Resolution with a recommendation that the existing constitution, the full measure under the existing constitution, should be used and availed of for extending the constitution. The Resolution as finally adopted with the consent of the Treasury Bench (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "No.")—I beg your pardon; it was unanimously adopted; no division on it was taken; there were no cries of "No" and it was adopted in accordance with the suggestion of the Honourable the Home Member. I think, Sir, the debate will bear witness to that statement. I do not think I need assert it. It is there in black and white, and no pen and no tongue can erase it. Sir, the Resolution as finally adopted by this Assembly recorded the impressions which were left on both of us who had to work this new constitution, both of us who had to wear the new constitution's costume presented to us from London. Some people refused to don that costume. But, Sir, we who wanted to co-operate with the Government put on this costume made by the London tailor in order to see whether his fame for making good-fitting clothes could be taken at its full value. Both the Executive and the Legislature put on the garment and it did not require much trial to find out whether the clothes fitted us or not. It does not require many trials to find out whether clothes fit us or not. One trial is enough. There is a vulgar saying, Sir, in the South of India among the agriculturists and the labouring classes, to the effect that one grain of rice from the pot is sufficient for the purpose of finding out whether the rice is boiled or not. One test was enough for us to find out that the new costume did not suit. That is how, after the first session, after trying honestly and earnestly to work the constitution, both the parties who had to wear it, the Executive and the Legislature—and I emphasise this aspect of the case—came to the conclusion, no doubt early enough, in September 1921, that it was not a costume that fitted us. I say, Sir, that the rules and the regulations contained in the Act and the rules framed under the Government of India Act were not sufficiently broad enough for successfully working the reforms in this country, and that was the opinion we recorded; so His Lordship is in the first place wrong in assuming that we assumed that progress was impossible under the existing constitution. Then His Lordship is generous enough to say that the outstanding feature of the change made by the Act of 1919 was that it provided British India with a progressive constitution in place of an inelastic system of Government, and that consequently there is room within the structure of that constitution for the Legislature to develop for themselves a position in conformity with the spirit of the Act. Nobody denied that; only His Lordship has not cared to go into details as to the respects in which the existing constitution can be developed and as to where the elasticity comes in; and has he with his own hands helped in making it more expansive, more useful? Has His Lordship examined his own position in the matter? If he had looked at certain sections of the Act he could have verified for himself that in his own hands he has powers under which he can act by which he can improve the constitution. Sir, what is the situation of the Central Government? Here is an Assembly with a non-official majority which at times at least can and does defeat Government on various matters; although on account of various considerations which I need not detail here, the majority does not assert itself as often as it ought to do. But at the same time, here is an Executive Government which is responsible to—whom? Responsible to a gentleman who is about 7,000 miles away, who does not come and see the life of this Assembly, who has no real actual vision of the actualities of the situation here, who does not move with the people, who does not see them even, who does not see the conflicting thoughts and conflicting currents which are in operation here, and he has the main string in his hands. He is responsible to—whom? He is responsible to Parliament. I do not know exactly what the exact strength of the House of Commons is since the Irish separation; it used to be about 670. How many of them really know anything about India? How many of them really know anything about the present changed conditions of India? I am sure that the Executive Government here feel it, and feel it every moment of their life, every moment as they transact their great business and great functions which are entrusted to them for the Government of this vast country. I am sure they feel the difficulties of the situation here. They have to face the music of the popular view, the moderate views in this Assembly, outside it is more immoderate; and even in facing the moderate voice of the country in this Assembly they realize the difficulties of the grave and responsible position which they occupy. And does the gentleman in London ever loosen the main string which he holds in his hands? If report is true, he tries to draw it as tight as he can, and latterly he has not allowed that freedom and liberty of movement to the Government of India which is theirs by right. The Central Government of this country ought to be here. I mean that it is impossible to govern this country under modern conditions from London, however eminent the Statesman in charge may be. The real powers ought to be in the hands of the Central Government established in this country. That is the difficulty we feel when we deal with the budget. In the very first year of our existence we realized the impotence of the Government and our own impotence in dealing with it. The voted and the non-voted heads, the touchables and the untouchables, stared us in the face. We can really do no honest work with the budget,

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

Sir, if really we are intent upon doing good to the country. We are here for that purpose and nothing else. We are not here for personal aggrandisement. We are here to act and advise to the best of our lights to see what good can be done to this country. And when I say that, I include the Executive and the Legislature in the same category. Here then, Sir, we have a gentleman who gives the orders for all the fat appointments, all the fat allowances which accompany them, whether they are needed here or not, and we have to find the funds to pay them. They are put aside as untouchables, and here we are to play with a Budget. It is a mere plaything; it is not a serious matter. We do not take any interest. We cannot put our heart into it, and such a state of things could have been rectified by His Lordship the Secretary of State, but, on the other hand, when the question was really raised, what did His Lordship do? Instead of giving a free hand to the Viceroy he took the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, and took refuge behind that advice and would not allow His Excellency the Viceroy to place the whole Budget before this Assembly. Now, Sir, that is a matter in which His Lordship could well have begun what he suggests should have been done, namely, the outstanding feature of the change made by the Act was its elasticity. Why did he not take advantage of it? Why has he not taken advantage of it even to-day? Therefore, Sir, when he says that we were unaware of it, I am rather led to think that he is himself unaware of his own powers. He could have delegated those powers under section 19 of the Government of India Act which he possesses to the Central Government here instead of trying to keep all the powers in his hands. What are the rules which he has made, under that section in order to part with the powers which he and his Council possess in regard to the Government of this country? Why could he not have parted with those powers to the Government of India, or again in the matter of this Budget, as I have said?

Passing on, "In the second place" His Lordship says "however great the merits shown by the Legislature as a whole and by individual Members—(and I am far from wishing to under-rate them)",—I rather fear that he really wished to under-rate them but that is by the way, we do not care whether he compliments us or not; it is not a question of compliment at all in a case like this—he says "the fact remains that the merits and capabilities of the electorate have not yet been tested by time and experience". Well, who is going to test? When is the time going to come to test? Was this country tested when this constitution was given to us? Who made that test before this constitution was given? The Electors to be tested! I am afraid you will have to wait till doomsday in a continent like this if you are going to test the capacity of electors. Well, Sir, you have to come to some conclusion on a matter like this. Probably His Lordship was unaware of the great difficulty under which we began the work of these Reforms in the year 1921. Those of us who dared to come here and work the Reforms under the new Reform Act had to face a very unpleasant music from our countrymen. Sir, the country was boiling with wrath and indignation. The shadow of Amritsar had spread as His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught told us. Sir, the country was then clamouring for a new constitution. We tried to put down that clamour by showing that by honest work we can do something with the constitution as it was. Sir, this Assembly collectively showed its responsibility, and not only this Assembly but the country showed its sense of responsibility when it came to the rescue of Government in putting down disorder which might have shown its ugly head in the year 1921. Sir, everything was ready to burst as my Honourable friend Mr. Jadunath Mazumdar told us in September 1921. It was very nearly on the brink of revolution. Sir, did we hesitate to help the Government on a crisis like this? Was not the voice of this Assembly heard in that connection in putting down this tendency to disorder? Sir, His Lordship of course is not aware of these things. His Lordship is not aware of the difficulties which the Central Government had to face in a situation like that. The Central Government realised it; it saw how the country really was, and when they joined us in September 1921 in sending this message to the Secretary of State they knew full well the situation. Writing 13 months after that date, when the country had quieted down, when this country had accorded, notwithstanding some most objectionable exceptions in places, when the country had accorded a right royal welcome to the heir to the throne of England, His Lordship has penned this Despatch. That was the time for His Lordship to pen this Despatch in November 1921. It was a cruel act on his part. We cannot forgive him. Sir, this country has shown considerable patience and it will continue to show considerable patience with British Statesmen at Home, because they are ignorant really of the true situation in this country. It is in that sense we tried to wait and wait, because we are sure things will right themselves in the end. Therefore, as regards this second fact that the merits and capabilities of the electorate have yet to be decided, if that promised Commission at the end of the 10th year—is it 9th year or 10th year? (A Voice: "10th year")—at the end of the 10th year, I do not think that Commission is going to find the country fit. Even if it comes when my grandson is alive and when probably he is a Member of this Assembly, even then they will say that the merits and capabilities of the electors and the country have to be tested by time and experience. Sir, you have to take these things as they are. Was England fit? Was it decided in the same way when the Reform Act was passed? Was any country tested like that? Is it really a thing which any person who has any knowledge of history, any knowledge of the development of institutions, could easily consume? That is why I say, Sir, the rottenness is exposed by its own innate contents and not by the delay which has taken place. "Thirdly, the new constitutional machinery has to be tested in its working as a whole" and His Lordship naively adds the executive Government have not shown themselves fit. That is what His Lordship says in paragraph 5. Is it really true that the executive Governments of these provinces have not shown their fitness under the new constitution? I never heard that charge laid at the executive Governments. It is a charge which the Government of India, I daresay, and the Local Governments will successfully meet, if they have not already met it. I am sure the delay in the publication of this Despatch from November 1921 to January 1923 is due perhaps to this struggle between the Government of India and the Secretary of State whether His Lordship would not have been pleased to remove that paragraph from the Despatch. His Lordship says that. I do not think I need labour the point. I will leave it to the Government of India and the Local Governments to defend themselves against that charge. (A Voice: "What paragraph is that"?) It is paragraph 5:

"Thirdly, the new constitutional machinery has to be tested in its working as a whole. Changes have been made as the results of the Act of 1919 in the composition, powers and responsibilities not only of the Legislatures but of the executive Governments."

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

Now, the executive Governments have to justify themselves. Leaving it there, I will pass on to the next paragraph:

"I would add that even were these reasons for patience less cogent an opinion based upon six months' experience of its working that a new constitution, in the elaboration of which over 2 years were occupied, stands in need of revision, is hardly likely to commend itself to Parliament since it is clear that sufficient time has not elapsed to enable the new machinery to be adequately tested."

That was quite true at the time when the Assembly passed the Resolution in September 1921, but that was not quite true when His Lordship penned that despatch in November 1922. More than a year had elapsed since then and I do not think, as I have stated already, that it needs much trial in order to find out the defects which exist in the different constitutions. In the Central Government, as I have already pointed out, the main defects are two. Here is an Executive not responsible to the Legislature, here you have a budget which comprises items which you cannot touch. Those are the two main defects which we have to remedy and as regards the local Legislatures let the Ministers speak for themselves. This morning's debate has shown some of the ugly features of the present dyarchical Government which prevails. And I do not think I need repeat here what is well known. The whole question is one for examination, and that is all that we asked for in that Resolution. What is the gross sin we have committed? We ask that the question be examined, that the time has come for examination. We need not wait for the 10 years period which the Act provides. Let the question be examined, let us have an honest, efficient thing to work with. The present system, which you have asked us to work with is not a thing which we can go on with. We can go on trying this thing to all eternity. I promise you if you were to work the present constitution for a hundred years you would never evolve anything. There would be the same struggle, the same conflict. Here every day we pass Resolutions, recommending that His Excellency the Governor General in Council be pleased to take steps, this, that and the other, and His Excellency's pleasure does not rest even with him, but with somebody else. What is the good of this pleasure to us? Let us not have it, let us have something real. It is no use mincing matters in a question like this; the peace and prosperity of millions rests upon good Government; let us devise a system. That is all we ask, let the thing be re-examined. This ten years period is not a statutory bar. Mr. Montagu recognised it in answer to a question on the 14th February 1922. There is no statutory bar to an examination of this question before even the 10 years are out. Therefore we recommend that examination before that. And then, Sir, Mr. Lloyd George, speaking in the House of Commons on the 14th February, following Mr. Montagu's speech, said that democratic institutions are new to Europe and as regards Asiatic countries, they never had any instinct for democracy, and this is a new thing we are trying; we are trying an experiment there, and therefore it must take time before you can give them any further advance. Of course in regard to Mr. Lloyd George we can excuse his ignorance of this country; he was never here. I don't suppose he has read our history. I don't suppose he has heard of a panchayat. We had our caste panchayat, we had our village panchayat, as he would have found if he had cared to investigate the matter. It may be quite true that in uncivilized Europe democratic Government was never known, but in civilized India, with its ancient civilization, democracy had its origin in village Government. Sir, we never had anything else so far as the actual Government of the country was concerned, so far as the real affairs of the people were concerned. We had the Border Chieftains who merely took something for guarding the frontier, but so far as the internal affairs were concerned, the village panchayat held its sway. They collected taxes and they looked after things connected with the village. I wish we could go back to those conditions; they were very happy. But, Sir, Mr. Lloyd George's conclusion that democracy was a new thing in Europe is no argument for denying it. It is only restoring to us what we had for long long years. Therefore we possess that experience, especially in Dravidian South India—I do not know much of Northern India I am sorry to say. But in my own Province, among the Dravidian races, democracy was the rule, and therefore it is nothing new to us. It was born in our blood. It is bone with our bone, and therefore let there be no fear that the thing will be a failure in our country. Sir, in our Resolution we want something which will really be useful to the country. It is not that we are extravagant in our demand, we want only an examination of the existing constitution, and His Lordship has denied it to us. But we are not asking him to reconsider that question; we carefully refrained in framing this Resolution from asking that His Excellency the Governor General in Council be pleased to convey to His Lordship the Secretary of State for India that he be pleased to reconsider. We think it is a hopeless task; we merely express dissatisfaction, extreme dissatisfaction with what he has done. Let him do what he likes. It is not our concern. It is the peoples' concern no doubt, but we cannot help it, as we have to bow to mighty forces. We bow also to the Secretary of State. Sir, in asking for this examination we want to insure liberty, not license, freedom, not anarchy, progress, not stampede, peace and prosperity. I commend this Resolution to the acceptance of the Assembly.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, a friend of mine happened to be in England and he was asked by a young lady, very educated and very cultured, whether Indians built houses in India. This friend of mine, who had a little sense of humour, said "No, we do not build houses, we have some kind of hammocks where we take rest at night." And the only comment she could make was, "Oh, how interesting." The Honourable the Secretary of State for India belongs to a similar category. (An Honourable Member: "Right Honourable.") Right Honourable, I beg pardon. It is a mere matter of chance that His Lordship finds himself installed on the gadhi at Whitehall. Political exigencies might have relegated him to some other position in some other office. I do not see why my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar should be so gloomy about this Despatch. We very well remember Lord Morley's dictum that the fur coat would never suit a tropical climate like India, but Lord Morley, I am happy to say, lived to see the day when these fur coats were made, though not very beautiful and very artistic, but fur coats all the same, not only for the Provincial Governments, but also for the Government of India. I do feel that all that His Lordship the Secretary of State for India has been pleased to say about the future of India will be as true, or as untrue, as the dictum of Lord Morley about the fur coat being unsuitable for a tropical climate, because I believe, Sir, that any nation which wins liberty, wins it by its own exertions, by its own sacrifice, by its own capacity, and by its own devotion. Sir, I am afraid His Lordship, like so many others, makes the mistake of regarding the whole movement in India as a political movement

[Munshi Iswar Saran.]

There lies the great mistake, Sir. It ought to be looked upon as really a psychological movement and it is only when you will look at it from that point of view that you will be able to appreciate the various bearings of this question which, to-day, is agitating India from the highest to the lowest. This talk of our being in too great a hurry, this appeal to us to be patient, this appeal to us to undergo these periodical examinations, the first after a period of ten years—the rest is unknown, the rest is dark—are based on ignorance of the real living forces that you find at work in India to-day; and I say, Sir, with a full sense of my responsibility that the longer the delay in our reaching the goal, the greater is the danger not only for this country but for the connection between India and England. Those of us, Sir, who advocate the retention of the connection between India and the British Commonwealth, and those of us who feel that it is in the interests of India, of England and of humanity as a whole, that these two countries should live together and work together, not as masters and slaves, not as rulers and ruled but as equals and comrades, are distressed at the delay which some people advocate, daresay with the best of motives. What do you find, Sir, in India to-day? It is imagined as if we are solely basing our claim for further reforms on the excellent work that has been admittedly done in the Indian Legislature as well as in the various Legislative Councils all over the country. I submit with great respect that that is a wrong view to take. You can only appreciate the inwardness of our demand if you do not forget the reception with which these reforms met at the time of their initiation. The vast majority of the people in the country were distinctly, emphatically, of opinion that these reforms were insufficient and there were many who went the length of saying that they would have nothing to do with them. Those who consented to work the reforms for what they were worth did so in the hope that they would not be subjected to these successive examinations, but that they would be regarded as men who were reasonable and were prepared to make a beginning with the reforms as they found them. The attitude of His Lordship the Secretary of State for India towards this most important and vital question has, as my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar has said, created a feeling of extreme dissatisfaction throughout the country and that, Sir, is only to put the case very mildly. Perhaps it is impossible for His Lordship, sitting at a distance of thousands of miles from this country, separated from this country by big oceans, knowing little or next to nothing about the past history, the traditions, and what is more, about the actual living forces at work in India to-day, to gauge the depth of feeling that has been aroused by his circular; but, let me tell him with all the respect that is due to His Lordship as the Secretary of State for India that he is very greatly mistaken if he thinks that India is going to accept this despatch as the last word on the subject.

Sir, talking about electorates, to which my Honourable friend has referred, let us think what these electorates were like when full responsible Government was given to these Dominions. Look at English history itself and you will find that the electorates were not in the condition in which you find them to-day. They were in the early stages defective. There were thoughtful politicians who at the time had very serious defects to find with the electorates as they existed then; but that was not held to be any valid reason for withholding from them the reforms for which they were fit.

Sir, let me pause here and say this. It is imagined as if India to-day is emerging out of darkness into light. It is imagined as if there is a clean slate in India on which His Lordship the Secretary of State for India and his colleagues have made some figures for the first time. It is imagined, I am afraid, as if all these reforms have been given to a people who were immersed in darkness and barbarism only a few years ago, and that it was with great effort that they were struggling from darkness into light. But, if His Lordship the Secretary of State and others of his way of thinking will pause and study the history of India, they will find the mistake that they commit in making this assumption. Sir, in one word, the position is this. There is this strong, growing desire amongst the people of India to obtain full responsible Government as an equal member of the British Commonwealth within the shortest possible period and I submit, Sir,—I am offering no threat, I am saying so with all respect—that any unreasonable delay in bringing about that goal will mean disaster to India as well as to England. Wisdom and statesmanship lie in making this period as short as possible, so that England and India united together may march on in the service of humanity as a whole.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban):

Sir, when one is obliged to express dissatisfaction with regard to anything, extreme or otherwise, it is not good form to say much or to say that over-vigorously. I therefore congratulate my friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, and the Mover of this Resolution on the marked restraint that has been observed by them. I hope that example will be followed. Munshi Iswar Saran's restraint may also be due to another reason. He has been ill of late; we are glad to have him back here. I am rather suspicious, that his illness had a deeper root than ordinary mortal causes. He had a taste of the fruit of which Mr. Rangachariar has spoken. He had given notice of his intention to move for adjournment of the House on this question. (Munshi Iswar Saran: "That did not make me ill.") Not being allowed to move it, may have affected him. Time has since elapsed; I would not have answered for the restraint if Mr. Rangachariar, one of the Panel of Chairmen, who presided on the occasion, had allowed him that liberty when he was wanting to move for the adjournment. I shall not say that Nemesis has been at work, but there is a fitness of things, Sir, in Mr. Rangachariar, among many who had given notice of a similar motion, bringing this motion forward and giving us an opportunity of expressing in a restrained fashion the dissatisfaction that we should have voiced much more vigorously on that day. This changed order of things has another moral. I congratulate you and Mr. Rangachariar on his appointment as a Panel Chairman. The question is not without its bearing on what we are doing to-day. The Legislature is on its trial; we have been told the electorate is on its trial, and the poor Executive Government is also on its trial. The Legislature was on its trial on the day in question, in the person of Mr. Rangachariar. He exercised restraint and as Panel Chairman he did not allow that notice for adjournment to succeed. He however brings the matter up to-day in another capacity. People who can differentiate like that in their different capacities give more than good promise as to how they are going to behave when they have more responsible powers.

Sir, I do not wish to traverse the ground that Mr. Rangachariar has taken. That could be amplified almost ad nauseam if one was inclined to do so. But the one thing I wish to say in connection with this motion is that it was quite on the cards that the ten years' limit that was imposed was not the minimum; it was the maximum. We need not go into the question as to how that information or impression was obtained let any one who can, gainsay it—the limit was intended as the maximum and not the minimum, and the only real reason why it was not put down as the maximum in so many words was that some Members of the Joint Committee did not want that there should be any loophole for constant agitation if the limit was provided as a maximum. Has agitation been any the less because of the lack of that provision? Is agitation going to be any less? Sir, when the constitution came we were passing through troublous times. There were many who would have nothing to do with it either in the way of advising or working the constitution, and those who did agree to come forward either with advice or assistance later on were in a very difficult position. The War was on then and there was a natural and very laudable desire not to press for any hard bargain. We all thought that when peace came and some trial had been made the matter would be examined a little more dispassionately and a little more without an eye on the main chance. Well, it has been pointed out that much more than six months elapsed while this despatch was drafted, and the mature consideration for which the Secretary of State pleaded was given. Sir, we are told that the new constitution took 2 years to evolve; if at the end of 10 years a Committee is appointed and that Committee takes another 2 years or less or more to evolve another constitution, what would be the position of affairs? Shall we have another State versus Company management debate on the eve of the appointment of that Committee, and is there to be an interregnum; or is it not better to be forewarned and begin the examination, the results of which need not be given effect to immediately if there is not good ground?

In justice to the Secretary of State we must recognise that he was not a free agent in the matter. He had to deal with Parliament and the Cabinet. He had to reckon with the state of things in Parliament at the time that he came into power and he had also to bargain for the state of feeling in England with regard to India both in and out of Parliament. If matters were put like that by the Secretary of State it would have been intelligent; but when one talks of electorates not being fit, the other side naturally turns round and asks, what steps are being taken to educate the electorate? Is it for private Members who come here as representatives of those electorates to go back to their constituencies and to do what they can in the way of educating the electorates? That has been suggested. I do recognise that that may be a part of the duty and functions of those who represent those electorates. But it is not enough; what has the Government done? What has the Secretary of State done in the way of help for educating that electorate or the Legislature by expanding convention? When it was urged by some that literacy test should be applied to the electorate, the authorities turned round and said: "We don't want to set up an educated oligarchy." And when the electorate makes mistakes—all electorates make mistakes in all countries—the same authorities turn round and say "The electorates have not proved themselves worthy of the trust." The Legislature and the electorate are not the only ones on their trial. So is the Executive Government. One is not quite sure from the Despatch whether by the Executive Government the Members or the Ministers in the Local Governments is meant. So far as the Government of India are concerned, there can be no doubt that the whole of the front Bench here is on its trial for there are no Ministers; but in the Provinces one would like to know whether it is the Minister section or the Member section of the Government that is on its trial. And the failure of which section will count?

I began by saying that in expressing one's dissatisfaction one must not say too much, and I do not wish to say more. This expression of dissatisfaction may or may not do good, but it is up to us to give unequivocal expression to it.

Mr. T. E. Moir (Madras: Nominated Official): Sir, when I examined this Resolution moved by the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar, I wondered what purpose it was that he conceived it would serve. I was convinced that it was not merely to give this House an opportunity of recording its dissatisfaction with the particular course of action taken by the Secretary of State. We seem to be getting into the habit of recording our dissatisfaction with the Secretary of State, but I was perfectly certain that that was not his sole object in moving this Resolution, and I took it that his real object was that he considered it would further the object which the original Resolution, which forms the basis of our discussion—the Resolution of September 1921—had in view; that is to say, that in some way this Resolution, if carried, would forward political and constitutional reforms in this country. I was rather surprised when I heard Mr. Rangachariar say that he had not expected any better results from the original Resolution. Now surely that was merely a form of rhetoric. Surely he did not wish to imply that he and the other Members of this House who supported that Resolution in 1921, had voted for it merely in order to try a fall with the Secretary of State.—that they expected that the answer of the Secretary of State would be exactly what it was. I cannot believe that either Mr. Rangachariar or his supporters on that occasion did, as he would suggest, deliberately try to place this House in antagonism to the Secretary of State.

I was also rather disappointed to find how uncomfortable Mr. Rangachariar seemed to be in his new clothes. Another thing which disappointed me in Mr. Rangachariar's speech was his attitude towards the Reforms. It seemed to me in many ways one of the most reactionary speeches I have ever listened to. For, what was he looking for? He is not looking forward to the future. He is looking back on it, to the past history of India, to the days when the Raja was the Raja, when the priest was the priest, and the ryots held the plough. It was not with any confidence in the future that he spoke. It was a regret with the past and I should say that if his supporters of constitutional reform and political advance in this country have no more robust constitution than the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar there would be grave doubt as regards the future of that progress and the possibilities of advance.

Now, Sir, I turn to what I suppose was the real object of Mr. Rangachariar in moving this Resolution. He is dealing with the question of further political advance in this country. What is the object that he, this House, we all have in view? What is it to which we look forward? It is to the raising of India to the position of an equal partner in the British Empire governed by representative democratic institutions. Now, Sir, I think at times we are all apt to take the question of the admission or the retention of India within the British Empire for granted. We assume that that does not involve any postulate. It does involve a postulate and a very big one, and that is that India accepts and works democratic and representative institutions and the people of my country who, after all, are a free people, are entitled to demand assurances that their future partner does accept democratic and representative institutions. Now, Sir, we are rather apt I think to attack the Secretary of State as an obstructionist, we talk of him as the "gentleman at Whitehall." Possibly we think that by saying so we are belittling him. Is it not possible that we are belittling ourselves? We may regard him as a mere obstructionist, as a mere malignant focus of all that is reactionary. But look to the other side. What is his position in England? He is one of His Majesty's Ministers, he is a Member of the British Cabinet, and he holds a very peculiar position in that Cabinet in that he is entrusted on behalf of the people of Great Britain with the task of watching the most important and possibly the most perilous political, may I use the word, experiment that has ever been undertaken. That is the position which he occupies with reference to the British people. Now, Sir, surely if our desire is to foster, to secure a more rapid advance in the constitutional position of India, surely the last thing we ought to do is in any way to antagonise either the Parliament or the people of Great Britain. And is it not possible that when we complain of the action of the Secretary of State the people of Great Britain may take an entirely different view? They may look upon his action as merely the carrying out of those responsibilities and those functions which were imposed upon him under the constitution which had been granted to this country,—responsibilities and functions which he dare not deny or fail to execute. I am not in the best position to speak as to the opinion of people at Home, but may I say,—I may judge wrongly—from all I hear what their opinion is? They were perfectly prepared for such a Resolution as was proposed in September 1921, that they regard it as an exhibition, perfectly natural, of the enthusiasm of the young Assembly. But I am afraid that the step we are asked to take to-day, the steps that we have occasionally taken since that Resolution strike them in a different line, that it really evinces a desire on the part of this Assembly to deny to the Minister who has been entrusted with the task of watching and guiding the reforms on their behalf the right to do so.

Now, I will turn to the real issue of this original Resolution. It was not a question, as Mr. Rangachariar seems to suggest, merely of whether the Secretary of State or the Government of India within the four corners of the existing Act could extend powers and privileges of this sort. It was a demand for a re-examination and revision of the constitution at an early date. That was what the demand was, not a mere question of what could be done within the scope of the existing constitution. As I suggested at that time, this Assembly was filled with enthusiasm for the new scheme, for the new conditions which would come into being. But are we perfectly certain that, if we are summoned at the present moment before Parliament,—we are perfectly certain in our hearts that we can give them such assurances as they may hold would justify them in granting now a further measure of constitutional advance? Could we assure the House of Commons that our communal differences and difficulties have disappeared? Could we assure the House of Commons that the people of this country as a whole have unreservedly accepted the constitutional powers upon which they have invited us to enter? Could we assure the House of Commons that the electorate of this country and the future electorate is so wedded to democratic and constitutional ideas that it will hold to them steadfastly through good and evil? I give no answer to those questions, but they are questions which this House would have to consider very deeply if it wished to press for a further advance. Now, Sir, surely we recognise that the next stage of constitutional development must follow the same lines as the last stage and all other previous stages did, that is to say, it must be by Parliamentary action and ratified by the consent of the British people. Now, Sir, I am not in the secret of those who I agree at the present moment are deliberating as to how the demand for a further step in advance should be formulated or put forward. I may make one suggestion here and that is that both the nature of the demands and the time when they are put forward should be so chosen that they may feel confident that they will receive a favourable reception at the hands of the British Parliament and it is because of these considerations I consider that the Secretary of State with his knowledge of the state of public opinion and of Parliamentary opinion at Home did a service to the constitutional progress of this country by refusing to consider a demand which he must have been certain would have been refused. It is because of that I do believe he did the greatest possible service to constitutional advance in this country in refusing to accept the invitation of this Assembly to re-open the question of the constitution and I would entreat the House not to give its assent to this Resolution. I believe that if they do so it will again be a step which would be detrimental to constitutional progress, that it will not help to improve relations between this Assembly and the British Parliament and that it will not help further to link together the people of this country and the people of Great Britain.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): I am afraid the Honourable Mr. Moir has misconstrued the speech of my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. He says that the speech meant to belittle His Lordship the Secretary of State. He is wrong altogether. We have the most sincere respect for the Secretary of State. The speech which has been made by the Honourable Mover is nothing but, more or less, an echo of the voice of the country. At the same time the Honourable Mr. Moir says that people in England will not appreciate it and will not take it in good spirit. I may tell him that he is wrong there too. My opinion of the soundness of the views of people in England induces me to think that they are more broadminded than the Honourable Mr. Moir thinks. I think they will take it in the right spirit, in the spirit in which this Resolution has been moved. They are always in favour of hearing what is the truth, namely, what is the view of the people who England is governing and I think to mince matters is not a proper thing. This Resolution contains a clear statement of the opinion of a large section of Indians here. The facts are that Indians are not quite new to democracy, that at any rate, the ancestors of the present Indians knew of the principles of democracy which are subsisting in other parts of the world. Nine or ten centuries ago, India knew of these principles and they obtained in India. You cannot deny that. If you study Sir Henry Maine you will learn that all these principles of democracy obtained in India. Then the Honourable Mr. Moir says that at the time this Resolution was moved, some of the Members of this Assembly might have anticipated a disappointing answer. I think he is wrong. This Assembly was not idling during that time. We were quite serious when this Resolution was moved and we expected that we would have an encouraging answer; and what was our demand? The character of the demand was modest, very simple—that investigation may be made. That was the real gist which was put forward in the form of a Resolution then. Let me assure you, Sir, that this Despatch has really aroused some sort of sensation in this country and I think the Honourable

[Dr. Nand Lal.]

Mr. Rangachariar has rendered a service both to this country and to England in voicing the opinions held. The Resolution, to my mind, commends itself and I need not go into details or into the history of whole question. I most heartily support it.

Mr. K. Muppil Nayar (West Coast and Nilgiris: Non-Muhammadan Rural): In practical politics of to-day in India, there are some things it is impossible to understand, when one sits to ponder over them calmly—A constant cry of Indianisation and a constant cry for a further instalment of reforms are two of them—To my mind they are all so closely connected and with one idea, that of self-Government. The first important question that therefore arises is, can we in India, for a long time to come, afford to lose the presence of a strong British element? That is the crux of the whole question. It is impossible to expect that element to be present unless the Britishers are given proper facilities, and we in India are prepared to accept their terms. But if it is argued we can do without them, then may I ask what is the cohesive force that we will have in their stead? Was not India, whenever she had not one among her own people to control all the rest, always a prey to some great force from outside? What about our private quarrels? What about the Brahmin and the Non-Brahmin, the Hindu and the Muhammadan, the orthodox and liberal, the clash among the different sects and communities and all such, to say nothing of inter-provincial troubles? Suppose we manage to make up all these, then what about our present British India and a great slice of India which is in the hands of Indian Princes? Will these Princes like or agree to be bossed over by us? If they will not, are we then prepared to conquer and subjugate them all? Is it not more likely that it may be the other way round, for one of them to subjugate the rest of India which will without the cohesive force be like a loose mixture of stone and paddy? It strikes me that this is one of the most important aspects of the matter that has hardly received its due consideration. Personally I was never charmed with the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. My attempt to do my best for a satisfactory working of them does not at all mean I approve of them, for, I should have done just the same on the grant of any other kind of reforms, tied as my family and I are to our lands. The reforms are, however, in my opinion a great step forward and if we are prepared to accept them as more or less an end in themselves, then things may go on all right. But as a means to something greater, as some people are never tired of making them out to be, they are in my opinion simply hopeless—For, what is the next step? Whatever we do, it is a question of whether we want the British in India or not. We cannot ask them to be here, do any dirty work if occasion arises, and take the responsibilities and at the same time give them no voice in the choice of their action, nor let them have enough of their own men to support it. I cannot really see any via media. So, thus we come back to where we started from and the whole difficulty is there again. I view the reforms as a raised place from which we are shown by clever politicians and impatient idealists what appears a beautiful lake on the horizon which they call self-Government. Well, I doubt if there is that lake and if it is not all a mirage. Next, we are told there is a path to it. If there is, then I say that path cannot but have at present uncrossable gaps and unless we think out means of getting over those gaps there is no good leaving our safe position on the hill. I should certainly entreat for patience from my friends whom I ask to wait and watch how we get on.

Maulvi Abul Kasem (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I was not one of those who were very enthusiastic about the original Resolution as moved by my distinguished friend, Rai Bahadur Jadu Nath Mazumdar, on that memorable occasion, but I was certainly, Sir, a party to the amended Resolution which was passed by this House, and to me and I believe to the other Members of this House I take it as an insult that our united voice should have been so summarily brushed aside. Sir, we have been told times out of number by the British Cabinet and by the Secretary of State that the man on the spot is to be trusted and respected. But unfortunately, Sir, I have found it my experience that when the man on the spot, I mean the Government of India and His Excellency the Viceroy, move in the right path, their opinion is not respected; it is only when they advocate retrograde measures that their experience counts at Whitehall. Sir, here was a Resolution adopted and accepted by the Legislature and the Executive, and the Secretary of State thinks so lightly of it that he does not even consider or consent to examine the merits of it, and that is, Sir, a situation which cannot be accepted by this House. The Honourable Member does neither ask for any examination or for any consideration of it; he only asks the Government to express to the Secretary of State the deep dissatisfaction of this House. Is there anybody in this House, or if I may say so anybody in the country, who would venture to say that the House is not dissatisfied with the action taken by the Right Honourable the Secretary of State? If that is so, I say that there is absolutely no reason why that feeling should not be communicated to the gentleman about whom it is entertained by the Members of this House. I do not like, Sir, to go into the merits or the demerits of the Resolution at large or into constitutional history. This is neither the occasion nor the time for the discussion of that. We are here rather concerned with the action taken by the Secretary of State, and we express our feelings about it, and I think we do it strongly and emphatically and without equivocation. The advocacy of the Honourable Member from Madras to the effect that the Right Honourable the Secretary of State has done the greatest service to India I am sorry I can neither appreciate nor accept. I believe, Sir, with due respect and deference to the Noble Lord, that his action has been a great disservice to the cause of reforms and constitutional agitation in this country. They have in a large measure strengthened the hands of those who I am afraid are not working in the right way, and whom we may fairly call revolutionaries, and therefore the position which we occupy both in this House and in the country is to a very large extent weakened: and to weaken our hands means to strengthen the hands of our enemies. This was a step which was unwise and unstatesmanlike, and we wish and desire that our feelings in this respect should be communicated to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for India by His Excellency the Governor General in Council.

Mr. B. C. Allen (Assam: Nominated Official): I hope, Sir, that even at this stage of the debate there is room for the still small voice of conciliation. I was greatly moved by what I heard from my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, when he referred to the sacrifices that he and those who have come with him made when they joined the party of constitutional reform and entered this House. But I was not surprised that he did so. In the first place, if he will allow me to say so, if there is one thing which impresses us about our Honourable friend, it is the transparent honesty of his character and the fact that he would never prefer what is expedient to what is right. But it is not only a personal question. I have, during the many years that I have lived in this country, been enormously impressed by the way in which Indians in the service of Government, and Indians who thought that Government was in the right, had the courage of adhering to their opinions in the face of the bitterest hostility, the bitterest opposition, from their fellow-countrymen.

And now, Sir, I should like to refer to what I imagine to have been the underlying idea, the idea in the Secretary of State's mind when he penned that Despatch. As I visualize these reforms, they are, to use that objectionable word, a great experiment; they are a great trial. There was one system of Government in force in this country, and that system has been radically changed. There are of course opponents outside who have stigmatized these reforms as worthless, and of no account. Those of us who are in Government service know what vast powers are already wielded by these Assemblies which have been constituted, and know how greatly these powers could have been strengthened and enhanced had those who have remained outside of them thought fit to enter. But the future, I submit, Sir, is still obscure. We have been told that the people are clamouring for a reform of the constitution. Now it is difficult for any country to ascertain what the temper and the will of the people really is. We know what the newspapers say, but the newspapers by no means invariably represent the real wishes, the real desires of the population. I understand that in England in many cases elections are swayed by the silent vote, by the great body of steady opinion which takes no particular action, raises no loud cries, but forms its own conclusions and goes to the poll to give effect to them. Now I think that all of us who have carefully watched the proceedings of this House must have realized how difficult it is to know the will even of this House, of this small body of men amongst whom we sit from day to day. We, all of us, even on the Government Benches and those on the opposite Benches, know how difficult it is to tell how a division will go. Occasionally, the result is foreseen. But, continually, one is surprised to find gentlemen in the Government lobby who were only expected to be seen elsewhere, and people in the opposite lobby who might naturally be expected to vote with Government, or rather not to have voted with Government because, apart from Government servants, Members here do not vote either for or against the Government but for or against the particular motion. I would refer to a recent debate. I think that most people who sat in the House were very surprised at the attitude adopted there towards the question of protection and free trade. I came down to the House imagining that the House was wholly Protectionist,—and what did we really find?—that there was a very strong free trade element. So, Sir, I think that we should be very careful before we say that there is a strong popular demand, that the country as a whole has demanded anything. I am perfectly aware that a short time ago the country as a whole did demand something. It demanded that Mr. Gandhi should become the Emperor of India. There was no doubt whatever, so far as I could ascertain, that that was its genuine desire (Voices: "Never, never.") and in my own province that demand was based upon two things. It was based upon the statement made without any authority or any responsibility of the person chiefly concerned that Mr. Gandhi was God. Now we all know that if there is one thing which Indians are, it is that they are religious, and that once they have reason to suppose that any person is endowed with divine attributes, they will follow him blindly to the death. The other cause which swayed the people was the fact that they were told that not only was Mr. Gandhi king, but that as a result of that, he being a Sanyasi required no revenue, that land revenue would be either entirely abolished or would be suspended for a term of years, that the forests would be free and that practically no taxation would be imposed. Is it cause for wonder that an illiterate population welcomed such a new-comer with joy? We cannot safely attach much weight to such an expression of the popular will.

I submit, Sir, that the future at the present moment is extraordinarily obscure. We had these reforms introduced; then we had the O'Donnell Circular: I frankly admit that in my opinion the stoppage of recruitment was the logical sequence of the reforms. I come up here; I express that opinion to an esteemed friend sitting in the House, and he tells me that he does not at all like to hear such views from my lips. I feel myself once more at a loss. Take again the whole constitution of India. Is India a country? Is India a nation? India is a continent and a congeries of nations. What have we been seeing only to-day? Has not province been rising up against province? What did we hear only a few short days ago? Did not a Member on the opposite benches get up and warn the House that Burma was likely to secede from the Indian comity of nations? Surely, Sir, we must all feel that when there are such real and genuine risks, such real and genuine dangers ahead of us, it is only right to proceed slowly and cautiously. Speaking for myself, so long as there is a reasonably steady, stable Government in India, I care not a whit whether Mr. Rangachariar or Sir Malcolm Hailey sits on the Treasury Bench. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "Nor do I.") But the one thing we all of us ask, and I am perfectly certain that the people of England are with us in that, is that there should be a solid stable Government in India: a Government that can protect its frontiers and that can ensure to every section of the population a reasonable administration of the law, the maintenance of order and the continuance to the people of their inherent right to follow their ordinary avocations in peace and quiet. And to me, Sir, it seems that the Secretary of State in declining to be rushed out of the policy of proceeding slowly has been showing true statesmanship. We are not dealing with machines. We are dealing with living human beings. Our institutions cannot be cast in a factory; they have got to grow. We grow and our institutions must grow with us. That seems to me to be the essence of real statesmanship in dealing with a question of this kind. What did Bismarck say after the first Franco-Prussian war? "We have planted the acorn. It is now for us to watch its growth." And what happened when Bismarck and the Bismarckian policy was thrown aside? The cast-iron German Empire was built up; the fleet was created, not as the British fleet is created working from year to year in accordance with our requirements, but created in accordance with the mandate of a stern and inflexible law. And where does the German fleet lie now? Is India to grow to majesty and dignity, or are we to hurriedly put together a jerrybuilt house which will share the fate that always befalls such buildings?

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I should like the Honourable Members to remember what we are really discussing this afternoon. We are not discussing here the personality of the Secretary of State or the question of the castes and communities in this country, but a very short and narrow Resolution, namely, the Despatch of the Secretary of State on the unanimous Resolution of this House moved and passed at the instance of the then Home Member. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "Most certainly not.") I am told, Sir, by the present occupant of that seat that this Resolution was most certainly not passed at the instance of the then Home Member. Let me refresh his memory. I find, Sir, at page 1285 of the Indian Hansard, the following discussion:

"The Honourable Sir William Vincent: I gave a certain assurance to the House and on that understanding I understood that the Honourable Rai Bahadur Majumdar had withdrawn his Resolution.

Rai Jadunath Majumdar Bahadur: I withdrew my Resolution because I accepted the amendment of the Honourable the Home Member.

The Honourable Sir William Vincent: I have no objection.

Mr. President: I regret that misunderstandings have arisen in regard to this matter. An amendment was handed up to me on the table in the form written out and now the question is that the amended Resolution be adopted. It reads thus—(not read)."

And the Resolution was adopted. Sir William Vincent drafted an amendment, Rai Bahadur Jadunath Majumdar thereupon withdrew his Resolution and the amendment, without objection by Sir William Vincent, was moved and unanimously passed by this House. This is the position. The Government cannot repudiate their responsibility for having endorsed this amendment and having made it virtually their own. And when they sent it on with their imprimatur to the Secretary of State. . . . (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "What imprimatur?") Their own. The amendment was sent on to the Secretary of State, it must be presumed to be, Sir, with the recommendation of the Government of India, though they may not have recommended it in so many words. But let it pass. When that recommendation was sent to the Secretary of State, what is the reply of the Secretary of State? He tells us that the present constitution is sufficiently elastic and it has not been exploited. That the present constitution is sufficiently expansive admits of no doubt. But has the Secretary of State given his sanction to the expansion possible under the present constitution? I say, Sir, that if the Secretary of State was so inclined, if he was favourably considering the Resolution of this House and was inclined to give, without the intervention of Parliament, what the present constitution allows, he could easily have said, "look at section 19 A: look at the other sections of the Government of India Act: look at section 45 of the Government of India Act which allows of the transfer of all subjects to the Minister; look at section 19A of the Government of India Act which allows of the relaxation of the Secretary of State's control by rules framed thereunder. I am prepared to frame these rules and I authorize you to transfer further subjects to the provinces." That would have been the reply of the Secretary of State. But what does the Secretary of State do? Beyond merely alluding to the possibility of expansion, he takes no further action, nor, for the matter of that, do I find any desire on the part of the Government of India to exploit the present Government of India Act. Now, Sir, I believe this section 19A of the Government of India Act was the subject of some interpellation in this House. Now, under this section, I would like to point out to the Honourable Members of this House, the Secretary of State is entitled to make rules for the purpose of transferring his power of superintendence, direction and control to the Government of India. I have no doubt that if by the rules framed under this section the Secretary of State had transferred his powers to the Government of India we should have a more autonomous Government of India than we find it to-day. Well, Sir, in this connection my friend Mr. Neogy asked a question whether any rules had been framed under section 19A and a reply was given that some rules had been framed by a notification dated the 14th of December 1920. It seems to me, Sir, that this reply must have been given under some misapprehension. These rules are merely framed in regard to transferred subjects and not for the purpose of relaxing the power of superintendence and control vested in the Secretary of State in favour of the Government of India. Now, Sir, that is the first point. The second point in connection with this Despatch is that it says that sufficient time has not elapsed for a further advance. It was perfectly true that when the Resolution was passed, only six odd months had passed since the inauguration of the Reforms. But when this Despatch was indicted nearly 18 months had elapsed, and what would have been the procedure if the Secretary of State had accepted the recommendation of this House? Surely, Sir, a statutory Commission would have come out to this country and would have made investigation into the question as to whether further reforms should or should not be granted. I ask, Sir, the Home Member how long would such a statutory Committee take to complete its inquiry? I suggest, not less than 2 or 3 years. Then, Sir, assume for the sake of argument that on completion of their inquiry the matter was reported to Parliament and a new draft prepared for submission to Parliament. How long would that take and what time would be necessary for the passage of a Reformed Constitution Bill through both Houses of Parliament? Surely, Sir, two years or three years is none too short for the passage of such a Bill. Consequently, if the Secretary of State starts to-day to make inquiries as directed by the Government of India Act, it will take five, six, or perhaps seven years before we are granted a new constitution, and I submit seven or eight years for the revision of a new constitution is surely as long a time (A Voice: "Too long")—we are told it is too long—as would be necessary under ordinary circumstances if the statutory commission were to visit this country on the motion of this House. But assume for the sake of argument that a statutory committee was not to visit for 10 years. I ask you, Sir, is this country to improve in education or are our communal differences, so picturesquely described in the fancy portrait of my Honourable friend Mr. Allen from Assam, to be changed within a period of 18 months or two years? And what is after all ten years in the life of a nation? Surely, Sir, once committed to responsible Government in this country, the English people should be generous enough to see that if it is delayed for 10 years it will make certainly no difference, no substantial difference in any case, either in the education of the electorate or in the improvement of the social conditions which were laid down as the sine qua non for further advance. Now, Sir, these are facts which cannot be lost sight of. A few months or a few years will make no difference in the life of a nation. I have turned, Sir, with some grief to the speeches made to-day by two members of the Indian Civil Service. You will remember that on the last occasion when this House had to listen to a Civil Service debate, I read extracts from a Memorandum prepared by their Central Association which contained words of wisdom in which it was pointed out that the transitional stage of this country must be abridged and shortened both in the interest of India and of England, and the Civil Service pointed out that so far as India is concerned no Government will be popular in this country unless that transitional period is put an end to. That is the view, the collected view, of the Civil Service in this country. Then, Sir, we have been told that if we press this Resolution to the vote,

we shall antagonise the Secretary of State. I am sure neither my friend Mr. Rangachariar nor anybody in this House has the remotest idea of antagonising the Secretary of State. What we desire, what we emphasize is the necessity of a further advance in the direction of Reforms in the Central Government, and whatever the Home Member may say, I feel confident that the Home Member would be the first person to congratulate this House and himself if the Government of India was made more independent of the Secretary of State and the British Cabinet. Surely, Sir, when the Honourable the Home Member said he did not mind if Mr. Rangachariar took his place, he spoke the truth. His bed is not a bed of roses. From the front he has to withstand the attack of the Assembly and from behind he has to bear the brunt of the Secretary of State. He is, Sir, between the devil and the deep sea . . .

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): Which is the devil?

Dr. H. S. Gour: The Honourable the Home Member puts to me a query. I would ask him to answer that query for himself. Now I submit Sir, this is the real situation. We on this side of the House want that the Government of India should be masters in their own home, and that is possible under the present Government of India Act. That is possible under the rules which the Secretary of State can frame, and if the effect of this Resolution would be to compel the framing of rules making the Government of India more autonomous, more independent from extraneous control, our immediate purpose will be served. So far as the main purpose of the Resolution is concerned, we have already indicated that this House merely desires to record its emphatic protest, its respectful but emphatic protest, and the disappointment caused by the Secretary of State's despatch, and records its view that the time has come for a further advance in the constitution of this country. I submit there is nothing to antagonise the Secretary of State or anybody else. Lastly, Sir, it is necessary for me to refer to the ante-deluvian views of my friend, Mr. Allen. He tells us that India is not a country but a continent. We have been hearing this for the last numerous years. We have been told that India is a vast congerie of nations; but I ask my friend, the Honourable Mr. Allen, will India cease to be a continent in 10 years? Will it cease to be a congerie of nations in 10 years? Will the communal differences die a natural death in 10 years? And it is in 10 years time that the constitution of this country has been promised to be revised. All those criticisms of my learned friends on the other side, I submit, are entirely wide of the mark. If they mean anything at all, they mean that there should have been no reform and not that there should be no further advance. But with the Government of India Act on the Statute Book a further reform is inevitable. It is irresistible, and the whole question is whether a forward step should be taken now or after 10 years. My friend, Mr. Iswar Saran, Sir, has rightly felt the pulse of the country. The country is chafing under the present regime and wants a further reform, and I think it will be a wise step if the Government of India strongly advised the authorities at Home that further delay is dangerous. Sir, my friend, Mr. Moir, made some reference to the golden past depicted by my friend Mr. Rangachariar. He wants to recall the past. He refers to the panchayat and to the happy days in ancient India which everybody enjoyed. Well, Sir, I must join with Mr. Moir in protesting against the description of that mythical past. I recognise that the democracy of India is the creation of the British and I appeal to the British nation to advance the cause of that democracy by granting us further reforms.

Sir Campbell Rhodes (Bengal: European): Sir, as it is now six o'clock I beg to suggest to you that we are all tired and that we might adjourn.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, before you accept the suggestion made by my Honourable friend Sir Campbell Rhodes, I would request you out of fairness, to give some time to non-official Members to enable them to answer the arguments which have been advanced by Mr. Moir and others, otherwise the impression will be created that there was no answer to them.

Mr. President: Honourable Members must be aware that the case in favour of the Resolution has been presented by eight or nine speakers and the case against by two.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I have no objection to the adjournment if that is the right solution of this question. Sir, I expected the Secretary of State would expect the courtesy of the expression of the opinion of this House on his despatch and that is why we tabled this motion. I think he will have plenty of opportunity to see how we view his despatch, and really it is not my object that we should convey any censure or create any antagonism between the Secretary of State and ourselves. But he must know the truth so far as this country is concerned, that the despatch is viewed with dissatisfaction. The whole point, Sir, is, my critics may be divided into two classes. There are some people who will never improve; who will never improve themselves and who think too that others will not improve. They will always be down with the cry, "India is not fit for anything." My Honourable friend, Mr. Muppil Nayar comes under that category. He cried out against the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, he cried against the Morley-Minto Reforms, and he will cry to time's end against any reforms. I do not think such people deserve any serious consideration, but I quite appreciate the friendly spirit which actuates my friends, Mr. Allen and Mr. Moir. I am glad, Sir, for one reason, that my Resolution has been the cause of provoking eloquence from my usually silent friends. We listened to their speeches with great pleasure, and to some portion with amusement. When Mr. Allen said that this country wanted Mr. Gandhi as an Emperor of India, he made a huge mistake, and if all the Indian Civil Service people are such judges of Indians, then I am afraid they are poor judges. They do not know the country then even with all this experience which they have. We know the country much better. We know that such a thing was never the wish of the country really. Of course it is very difficult to postulate what is the will of the people in any country. I do not suppose Mr. Lloyd George knew the will of the country when he was dethroned, but he still spoke in the name of the country to all the nations of the world. But we know what the intelligentsia of the country wants, and that is what counts in every country, not the ignorant masses, but the educated people who can think as to what is good for the country. So far as that goes, I do not think we make a mistake when we say (all sections I am now speaking of) that some further examination is necessary in order to see whether a step forward should not be taken. That is all we want to emphasize in this Resolution.

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

Sir, I do not want to withdraw this Resolution and I am not anxious either it should go to a division, and if it should end in the way my Honourable friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, suggests, I will not object to that course, because I am sure the Right Honourable the Secretary of State will peruse these proceedings and see really that the country is not satisfied with his despatch on this very grave issue.

Mr. President: The question is that the debate be adjourned sine die.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I myself have no objection to the adjournment of the debate; though I should like to keep the House for another hour while I explain my own points of view on the subject. If it is adjourned, I must remark that it has been adjourned without my reply on the subject. I wish to keep my right of reply, if it comes up again.

(Voices: "We should like to hear your reply.")

Dr. H. S. Gour: I thought it was Mr. Rangachariar's intention to adjourn the debate sine die after hearing Sir Malcolm Hailey.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member from Madras is well able to express his intentions himself.

The question is that the debate be adjourned sine die.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Saturday, the 24th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

LATRINES IN AGRA.

408. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Will the Government be pleased to state if the construction of latrines in private houses is prohibited in Agra Cantonment?

2. If so, will the Government kindly state the reasons for the prohibition?

3. If not, on what grounds has the cantonment authorities of Agra rejected the application of Mr. G. P. Dube, Head Clerk, Sarda Canal, Pilibhit, and a resident of Agra Cantonment, for the construction of such a latrine in his house in that cantonment?

4. Is it a fact that Mr. Dube's appeal against this prohibition has been rejected by the District Commander?

5. In view of the above, will the Government be pleased to direct that permission be given to Mr. Dube, to construct a latrine of an approved design, as may be required under the Cantonment rules?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: As the Army Secretary is unable to be in his place to-day, I have been asked to give the reply to this and a few other questions.

1—5. The Government of India have no information on the matters referred to in the Honourable Member's question. If Mr. Dube is dissatisfied with any orders passed by the Cantonment authorities or the District Commander, it is open to him to represent his case to higher authority in the usual way.

CONTRACT FOR CARRIAGE OF COAL.

409. Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: 1. Whether it is a fact that a contract for the carriage of coal from Calcutta to Rangoon required by the Burma Railways has been entered into with the British India Steam Navigation Company for a period of ten years?

2. Whether it is a fact that the said contract was negotiated and completed through the Mining Engineer to the Railway Board?

3. What is the exact date when the negotiation with the British India Steam Navigation Company began and when was the contract finally settled?

4. Did the Mining Engineer act on his own responsibility in the matter or under the instructions of the Railway Board?

5. Were any tenders called for either in India or elsewhere by open advertisement or otherwise in reference thereto?

6. Whether the Mining Engineer and the Railway Board have instructions to adhere to the declared policy of the Government of India that when the rates of the Indian and Foreign Companies were the same—the Indian Companies should be given preference?

7. What steps did the Mining Engineer take to ascertain the rates of Indian Companies before fixing up the contract and if he took no steps, will the Government be pleased to ascertain and state why he did not do so?

8. Whether it is a fact that from August 1921, the Scindia Steam Navigation Company were asking the Mining Engineer and the Agent, Burma Railways, to give them an opportunity to quote for the said contract?

9. Whether the rate accepted from the British India Steam Navigation Company is lower than that quoted by the Scindia Company?

10. What are the rates originally proposed by the British India Steam Navigation Company and finally accepted or settled?

11. What was the necessity for entering into such long term contracts and will the Government be pleased to define their policy as regards long term contracts?

Mr. A. H. Ley: 1. Yes.

2. The contract was approved by the Board of Directors of the Burma Railways on the recommendation of the Mining Engineer to the Railway Board.

3. The exact date is not known. But the information on record shows that the negotiations were well advanced in March, 1921. The exact date when the contract was settled is not known. It was either at the end of 1921 or in the beginning of 1922.

4. The Mining Engineer acted as adviser to the Board of Directors of the Railway Company. He did not act under the instructions of the Railway Board.

5. Tenders were not called for.

6. The Railway Board were informed that the Government of India had accepted the Resolution adopted by the Council of State on 15th March, 1922, subject to the strict observance of the principle that the lowest satisfactory tender must be accepted and these orders were passed on to the Mining Engineer.

7. No steps. There were special reasons why, with the approval of the Directors of the Company, the Mining Engineer preferred to negotiate a contract with the British India Steam Navigation Company instead of calling for tenders in the open market. One reason was that the coal position was very difficult in 1920-21 and at one time the Burma Railways were reduced to only 10 days' supply. In placing the freight contract, therefore, the primary consideration was proved ability to supply enough tonnage to deal with heavy rushes at uncertain intervals. The Indian Company referred to in the Honourable Member's question did not fulfil this condition since its total fleet comprised 6 steamers.

8. According to the information on record the Company asked to be allowed to quote in August and September, 1921.

9, 10 and 11. The contract was a contract concluded by the Directors of the Burma Railway Company and the Government of India have no information on these points. Government's policy does not arise. The Company no doubt regarded the matter simply as a business proposition.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: May I ask whether the Government of India do not control the policy of the Railway Companies in this matter?

Mr. A. H. Ley: I think the matter is entirely within the competence of the Railway Company and the Government of India are not concerned.

RAILWAY CLAIMS.

410. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- The number of claims put forward during the years 1920-21 and 1921-22 by consignees or consignors of goods, parcels and luggage despatched either at owner's risk or Railway risk against the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Companies and the North-Western Railway?
- The number of such cases in which compensations have been granted either in part or in full for the same period?
- The sums in each of the cases for which claims were made and the amount of compensations awarded in each of such cases?
- The total sum for which claims were put forward but no compensation granted by the Companies during the years 1920-21 and 1921-22?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a) The number of claims preferred against each of the railways named was in 1920: East Indian Railway 86,073, Great Indian Peninsula Railway 31,222 and North-Western Railway, 55,608 and in 1921, 113,684, 32,103 and 42,371 respectively. Information regarding 1922 has not yet been received by Government.

(b), (c) and (d). This information is not available and in view of the time and labour that would be involved in its collection Government do not propose to call for it.

REGISTERS OF RAILWAY CLAIMS.

411. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- Whether the claims office of the Railway Companies maintain a register showing all claims made against them for losses of goods, parcels and luggages?
- If so, for what period are Registers available?
- If not, will the Government be pleased to state the reasons?

Mr. A. H. Ley: Government understand that such registers are maintained by railways, but Government are not aware for how long they are preserved.

Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Does Government propose to take steps to publish them in the form of statements?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The suggestion will be considered.

SETTLEMENT OF RAILWAY CLAIMS.

412. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether any statement of such claims made by consignees or consignors and compensations awarded to them against such claims are prepared by the Companies and submitted periodically to the Railway Board?

(b) If so, for what period are they available?

(c) If not, will the Government be pleased to state whether the Companies have unrestricted powers to deal with and refuse such claims from the public?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a) and (b). The reply is in the negative.

(c) The Agents of the railways have full power to deal with claims preferred against their administrations.

I. M. S. OFFICERS IN N.-W. FRONTIER PROVINCE.

413. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will Government be pleased to state the number of I. M. S. officers in military employ—permanent and temporary—who served in the North-West Frontier Province during the years 1921 and 1922; and how many of them were Indians?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: A statement giving the information asked for by the Honourable Member in this and in the next question No. 414 is laid on the table.

Statement showing the number of I.M.S. officers, permanent and temporary, who served or are still serving, in the N.-W. Frontier and with the Razmak Force.

I. M. S. OFFICERS WITH RAZMAK FIELD FORCE.

414. Mr. K. C. Neogy: What is the total number of I. M. S. officers who served with the Razmak Field Force, and how many of them were Indians?

MILITARY MEDICAL SERVICES.

415. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) What is the number of Staff appointments in the Military Medical Services in India; and how many of them are held by Indians?

(b) What steps have been taken upto now to train and appoint Indians to Staff appointments?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) There are altogether 56 administrative appointments in the Medical Services in India. Of these appointments, 20 are at present held by officers of the Indian Medical Service, one of whom is an Indian holding the appointment of Assistant Director, Medical Services.

(b) Indian officers of the Indian Medical Service receive exactly the same training as British officers of that Service and are equally eligible, subject to their possessing the necessary seniority and qualifications for appointment to administrative posts.

NEWSPAPERS SUBSCRIBED FOR BY GOVERNMENT.

416. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Will the Government be pleased to place in the Assembly Library a statement showing the names and number of copies of newspapers and periodicals—Indian and foreign—subscribed for by the different departments of Government, and the annual expenditure entailed thereby?

(b) Is it a fact that the Central Bureau of Information supplies to the different departments cuttings from Indian newspapers on subjects concerning the respective departments? If so, what is the justification for the departments to subscribe for the Indian newspapers independently?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information asked for is being collected and will be placed in the Assembly library when ready.

STATE OWNED RAILWAYS—FUTURE MANAGEMENT.

417. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state what recommendation has been made by the Central Railway Advisory Council on the question of the future management of State-owned railways now managed by private companies?

(b) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of any resolutions or minutes recorded by the said Council in this matter?

(c) Is it a fact that Local Governments and commercial bodies were invited to express their opinion on this question? If so, will Government be pleased to circulate their opinions among members of this House?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The Central Advisory Council by a majority advised in favour of State management. It is regretted that a copy of the minutes cannot be placed on the table. A collection of opinions received from Local Governments and commercial bodies has been placed in the Library.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I ask why it has not been considered advisable to place a copy of the minutes of the Central Advisory Committee appointed by this House on the table?

Mr. A. H. Ley: I should like notice of that question.

Dr. H. S. Gour: What was the majority in the Advisory Committee who favoured State management?

Mr. A. H. Ley: I have no information but will inquire.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Will the Honourable Member indicate how the Members of the Assembly are to have the information contained in the proceedings of the Advisory Committee if they want to use it?

Mr. A. H. Ley: I will have the suggestion considered.

VOTING AT LANDHOLDERS' CONSTITUENCIES.

418. Baba Ujagar Singh Bedi: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether they have given effect to my resolution regarding removing of the restrictions for the voters of the landholders' constituencies to appear in person at the polling stations for the ballot, which was accepted by the Honourable the Law Member on behalf of the Government (vide Legislative Assembly Debates, Volume 3, for September, 1922, page 200) and will it be enforced for the ensuing election?

(b) If not, why not?

(c) If it is not to be enforced in the next election, when will it be enforced?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The recommendation in the Resolution referred to was accepted by the Government of India, so far as they were concerned, but as the Honourable Member is aware, it requires an amendment of the electoral rules which cannot be effected by a mere stroke of the pen. Government at present are unable to say more than that they hope that the change in question will have been made before the next General Elections.

TENDERS FOR IMPERIAL DELHI WORKS.

419. Mr. Muhammad Faiyaz Khan: (a) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a brief statement showing the rates of various tenders called for from the 1st April, 1922, up to date for execution of works in the 6th and 8th Divisions of the Imperial Delhi Works, respectively, together with the name of each tenderer and with an indication of the names of successful tenderers?

(b) Is it a fact that the lowest tenders are not generally accepted in these two Divisions? If so, on what basis is the acceptance of tenders decided upon?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) The 6th Division of the Imperial Delhi Works deals with Government House, and a certain number of small works; the 8th Division comprises the residential quarters in Raisina, and the number of works large and small, including repairs estimates, for which tenders have to be called during the course of a year is very considerable. The information asked for could not therefore be compressed into a brief statement. Nor is it usual to make public the names of tenderers for contracts, and the rates at which they tender. Such a disclosure would be much resented by the contractors themselves and Government does not therefore propose to lay any such statement on the table.

(b) Government has no reason to suppose that in the two Divisions mentioned the general principle followed in giving out contracts is not observed. This general principle is that, subject to the sanctioned estimate not being exceeded, the contract is given to the lowest tenderers considered capable of properly carrying out each particular work.

MOSQUES IN DELHI.

420. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: With reference to the answer given by the Honourable the Home Member to the question by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar on the subject of mosques in Raisina, will Government be pleased to state:

(a) How many mosques are there in the New Imperial town; and how many in Pahargunj?

(b) How many of each are frequented by Muhammadans; and how many of each are in ruins and consequently not frequented?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It would take a considerable time to collect the information in detail asked for, as the number of mosques now in use and of the ruins which may at one time have been mosques in the areas specified is probably very large. Incidentally the greater part of Paharganj is not affected at all by the New Delhi Project. Government does not consider that the expenditure of time and labour in collecting this information would be justified, nor would it be reliable, for many cases have arisen in which mosques or mosque ruins which appeared to be entirely abandoned, are subsequently frequented for a time, and then again abandoned.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it a fact that many of the mosques are not mentioned in the Imperial Delhi map available in the Eastern and Western Hostels at Raisina, and that they were left outside that map?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member can state from his own study of the map whether that is a fact or not.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it a fact that all the buildings, including mosques and temples are given in the Imperial map?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: For the information of the Honourable Member I may say that the best map to go to for information on this subject is, of course, the Survey map. Any map prepared by our Public Works Department and placed in the hostels for the information of Honourable Members as a guide to Raisina and the surroundings is not, of course, prepared primarily with the object of showing every topographical detail in that area. Such a map would show only the protected monuments, as being of chief interest.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Then, Sir, do I understand that the survey map will not contain the buildings that are still standing?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am afraid, Sir, I do not understand the question. You will find in the Survey Map, which is very complete, a very large number of religious buildings mentioned, both those which are in use and those which are abandoned. If the Honourable Member desires any further information regarding our maps, I shall be quite glad to supply it to him.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Were the mosques and their location surveyed at all? Was the position of any of these buildings surveyed before these maps were prepared?

Mr. President: Order, order.

CUSTODY OF RAISINA MOSQUES.

421. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: 1. Is Government aware in whose custody or trusteeship, are the frequented mosques in Raisina?

2. How many of them have been repaired at the cost of Muhammadans themselves and how many at the cost of Government, if any?

3. Are the Muhammadans required to have permission of Government to enable them to repair these mosques? If so, under what law?

4. (a) Has permission been asked for in any case?

(b) If so, in how many cases has the permission been granted; and in how many cases refused? If the permission has been refused in any case, why?

(c) Will Government place on the table any such applications refused?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The answer to (1) is in the negative.

(2) Government are not aware how many mosques have been repaired by private individuals, but as will be seen from the reply to question No. 426, Government carries out repairs on 9 mosques in the New Delhi area.

(3) The mosques in the New Capital area having been acquired by Government during the land acquisition proceedings in that area, permission to carry out repairs by private individuals is required to be obtained in order that the repairs may conform to the architectural features of the surroundings of the buildings.

(4) (a) Yes, in several cases.

(b) Permission to repair according to sanctioned plans is not refused to persons able to show that they are entitled to exercise rights of user in the buildings.

(c) Does not arise.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact that the Khadims of those mosques and some of the priests asked that those mosques and shrines should be repaired at their cost and that the Government did not allow them to do so? There were petitions to the Chief Commissioner of Delhi regarding that matter.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I can inquire whether any such applications have been made and have been refused. The general rule, as I have already explained to the Honourable Member, is that, where a person shows that he has any right of user in a mosque, he is allowed to repair it.

ACQUISITION OF LAND ATTACHED TO MOSQUES, DELHI.

422. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) While acquiring land for the new town in Raisina, was any land belonging to any mosque also acquired? If so, in how many cases?

(b) From whom was such land acquired?

(c) Was any compensation paid? If so, to whom; and what amount? (Names and addresses may kindly be given.)

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: No separate record was kept of the acquisition of land surrounding mosques and tombs, or of the payees to whom the compensation awarded by the Land Acquisition Officer was paid. These proceedings were amicably concluded in the years 1913-14, and Government do not consider that any useful purpose would be served by re-opening such proceedings at this time of day. Suitable plots of public land are being attached to some of the existing mosques where the general lay out permits of this being done.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact that a public notice was issued by the Khadims of the mosques in Delhi saying that they are not allowed to repair the mosques, nor are they allowed to say their prayers

Mr. President: Order, order.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I have not finished yet, Sir, completing the sentence even.

Mr. President: Order, order. The question of the repair of mosques does not arise out of this question.

LAND ATTACHED TO MOSQUES, DELHI.

423. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Will Government place on the table a statement showing how much land belonged to each mosque in Raisina before the new town was built and how much now?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: For the reasons given in answer to the previous question it is doubtful whether any accurate statement of this nature could be prepared. It might be added that most, if not all, of these buildings were small village mosques situated in bazars and narrow lanes and had therefore no land attached to them.

" BUNDARYA WALI " MOSQUE.

424. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that the yard of " Bundarya Wali " Mosque in Paharganj or any part of it was thrown into a road or thoroughfare?

(b) If so, when was that done and under what circumstances?

(This question to be answered on reference to settlement and survey maps and registers.)

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) and (b). Neither the yard nor any part of the yard of the " Bundarya Wali " mosque in Paharganj has been thrown into a road or thoroughfare.

Mr. K. Ahmed: May I, Sir, hand over to the Honourable the Home Member a printed circular inviting the attention of the public to this matter? He will find from it that his answer is quite the other way. May I have the honour to hand it over to be placed on the table?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I shall be very glad to receive the statement and make any further investigation that is required.

" CHAHAR BUNJ " MOSQUE.

425. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state in whose possession is the mosque known as " Chahar Bunj " Mosque?

(b) Are Mahomedans allowed to say prayers therein? If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) There are several four-domed mosques round Delhi, and it is not quite clear to which of these the question refers. If the Honourable Member will be more explicit the information required will be obtained.

REPAIRS OF PLACES OF WORSHIP, RAISINA.

426. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table correspondence if any relating to the repairs of all places of worship in Raisina, such as mosques, temples, Gurdwaras and the like?

(b) Have any mosques in Raisina been taken up as archæological monuments and repaired at the cost of Government? If so, which?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Government are not prepared to lay the correspondence referred to on the table.

(b) The following mosques in the New Capital are archæological monuments and are repaired at the cost of Government:

1. Khair-ul-Manzil.
2. Masjid Kila Kohna, that is the mosque in Purana Killa.
3. Mosque near tomb of Sikandar Shah Lodi.
4. Mosque near tomb of Safdarjang.
5. Mosque near tomb of Isa Khan.
6. Afsarwali mosque near Humayun's tomb.
7. Mosque of Mahabat Khan.
8. Mosque of Abdul Nabi.
9. The mosque in Ferozshah Kotla.

MOSQUES IN RAILWAY AREAS.

427. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: 1. (a) How many mosques come within the area of the Imperial Railway; and how many more within the area of the new railway station?

(b) Have any areas attached to these mosques been appropriated? If so, why?

2. (a) Are such mosques allowed to be frequented by Mahomedans? If so, will that permission be continued for always?

(b) Is any part of any such mosque being demolished?

3. Has any passage been left for Mussalmans to use such mosques; and do Government propose to leave such passage?

Mr. A. H. Ley: Inquiries are being made and information will be furnished shortly.

MOSQUES NEAR KOTHI No. 27.

428. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that a part of a mosque has been appropriated for Kothi No. 27, near the Police Station? If so, under what circumstances and with whose permission?

(b) If it be a fact, do Government propose to consider the question of restoring the same?

Mr. A. H. Ley: Inquiries are being made and information will be furnished shortly.

MILITARY SCHOOLS FOR SONS OF OFFICERS.

429. Mr. B. S. Kamat: (i) Will Government be pleased to state at what places in the Provinces it is contemplated to start Military Schools for giving educational facilities to the sons of Indian Officers and soldiers?

(ii) Are these schools intended to be feeders to H. R. H. the Prince of Wales' Military College at Dehra Dun?

(iii) Have Government considered the desirability of establishing such a Military School in the Cantonment of Poona?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (1) Three schools of the kind are contemplated, viz., the Kitchener College, and the King George's Royal Indian Military Schools, Jullundur and Aurangabad Serai.

(2) Some if not all of the Schools are intended to be feeders to the Dehra Dun College.

(3) Poona was considered but was not finally selected.

Mr. Sambanda Mudaliar: Will the Government be pleased to consider the advisability of starting one in any of the conspicuous places in Southern India?

Mr. President: I think the Honourable Member had better wait, till the Army Secretary is in his place, to ask that question.

THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

Secretary of the Assembly: Sir, I lay on the table the Bill to provide for payment by certain classes of employers to their workmen of compensation for injury by accident as passed by the Legislative Assembly and amended by the Council of State.

THE INDIAN INCOME-TAX (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): Sir, I ask for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922.

This is a very short Bill the object of which is to give effect to the intention of the Legislature as intended to be expressed in the Income-tax Act of last year but unfortunately not quite so expressed. There are two clauses and there is no doubt in either case what the intention of the Legislature was. But it has been found that the words of the new Act do not quite convey that intention. I do not think it is necessary for me to enter into the details of the two clauses which I can explain when the Bill comes up for discussion. I confine myself to-day therefore to the request for leave to introduce the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

THE INDIAN COTTON CESS BILL.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now resume consideration of the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to provide for the creation of a fund for the improvement and development of the growing, marketing and manufacture of cotton in India.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I move that:

"For clause 4 substitute the following:

'4. (a) As soon as may be after the commencement of this Act, the Governor General in Council shall cause to be constituted a Committee consisting of twelve members, to be selected by the Government of India in consultation with the Local Governments.

(b) The said Committee shall have power to co-opt members of Local Committees which may be appointed by the Local Governments in this behalf.

(c) In the selection of the said Committees regard shall be had to commercial, agricultural and other interests affected by the cess to be imposed under this Act."

On the last occasion when this matter came up I think Mr. Hullah rightly complained that the matter of which I had given notice was not discussed in the Committee. The Committee sat, Sir, for a very short time, and I had not given as much attention to the Bill as I have since given it. But immediately afterwards, the day following, I intimated to the Honourable the Agricultural Member that I thought the Committee was too unwieldy and that something should be done to make the Committee smaller. And I also in my minute of dissent informed the Member that I should like to have this matter again discussed, but I was told that as the report had been sent in already, it was too late to summon another meeting of the Committee. That is my explanation for not having fully discussed this matter when the Select Committee was sitting.

Sir, under the constitution as now framed, section 4 would necessitate the appointment of a Committee consisting of about 36 people. The cess to be levied, as I pointed out the other day, is a very objectionable one, but if the whole of the cess is to be utilised for some useful purpose one might feel reconciled to the position created by the Bill. What happens now is this—that these 36 people, who will have to come to Delhi at least twice in a year, will consume a large portion of the fund collected from those cotton growers. It has been said the money will be collected from cotton growers and millowners. It does not matter from whom you collect the money. There can be no doubt—I take it that to the extent of at least Rs. 50,000, the fund will be spent in defraying the travelling and subsistence allowance of the members. The position which I ask the House to consider is this. Is it right to collect money from the cotton-growers or the millowners and spend it in the way in which this Bill suggests, namely, in paying the travelling and the subsistence allowance of members? No doubt there will be enough left for the purpose of carrying on the investigations indicated in the Bill, but I submit, Sir, this Committee should not consume so much. A Committee of 36 can never be a satisfactory Committee; and why is it necessary to bring in such a large number as 36 from various parts of India to Delhi for the consideration of any matter? My suggestion is this. If you have a small Committee, say of 12 members—I for one would be satisfied with a smaller number; however, I have put it at 12—if you have a small Committee, that Committee can go down to Calcutta if it is a question of lightening the cess in Calcutta, or to Bombay or Madras, and there co-opt members on the Committee who might be appointed locally; and in that way a great deal of expense to the tax-payer and to the Government will be spared. I do not see the necessity for having such a huge, unwieldy Committee consisting of 36 members.

Sir, if the House will look into section 4, they will find who are the persons who are to be thus invited as the guests of Government to Delhi. You will find the Agricultural Adviser to the Government of India, six persons representing the Agricultural Departments of Madras, Bombay and so on; the Director General of Commercial Intelligence; 9 persons nominated by various departments, 4 persons representing the Cotton ginning industry, one person nominated by the Local Government of Bengal; one person having knowledge of co-operative banking; 10 persons representing the cotton growing industry in Madras, Bombay and so on; 3 persons nominated by His Exalted Highness the Nizam, the Durbar of Gwalior and of Baroda; one gentleman to represent the other Indian States. As if we have not had already enough, there are to be such additional persons as the Governor General in Council may, by notification in the Gazette of India, appoint. I say, Sir, that this is altogether an unnecessary number and it is sure to involve the Government in large expenditure, which is unnecessary for the purpose for which this cess has been created. As I said, it is desirable to have a small committee, and there should be local committees appointed by the Local Governments; they would not cost any money by way of travelling allowances and subsistence allowances. Under these circumstances, Sir, I move that instead of the present clause 4 the one which I have already read be substituted.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): Sir, I may assure my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, that I have not complained against any amendment on the ground that it was not discussed in the Joint Committee, or that it is brought forward by a member of that committee.

I wish to emphasise that in framing our provisions regarding the Central Cotton Committee we are not writing on a new slate. We have already a Central Cotton Committee which has been in existence for two years, and has not been found to be too large or too unwieldy. The size of the Committee up to the present has been 32; the Joint Committee has raised it to 37 in a way that I shall explain afterwards. But the amendment asks us to substitute for a very useful Committee of which we have already two years' experience a much smaller Committee constituted in a way of which we have no experience at all.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): What has been the cost of this Committee?

Mr. J. Hullah: I shall come to that later. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar is also under a misapprehension when he speaks of the Committee coming to Delhi for its meetings. The Committee sits only at Bombay and will continue to do so. Owing to the importance of the Bombay Presidency in regard to the cotton industry a very fair number of the members of the Committee belong to that Presidency and therefore, the travelling and subsistence allowances are considerably smaller than they would be if the Committee met at Delhi. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar estimates that the cost of these travelling and subsistence allowances will be Rs. 50,000. We have experience to go upon; we know almost exactly what the cost will be. The cost on this account for a Committee of 32 members is Rs. 9,000 a year, not a very large sum to take out of a total income of Rs. 9 lakhs in the first three years and Rs. 4½ lakhs in subsequent years.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: How many times did that Committee meet in a year?

Mr. J. Hullah: Ordinarily they have met twice a year. We estimate that the cost of the enlarged Committee will be at the most Rs. 13,000 a year.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Are they to meet only twice a year?

Mr. J. Hullah: There is no statutory obligation to that effect, but we expect that ordinarily they will meet twice a year as they do at present.

The Committee is a large one, but it is representative of a very big industry and wide trade representation is required for the complexity of the commercial questions which the Government of India put to the Committee. It has already given us most valuable advice on important questions, such as the Cotton Transport Bill which the House recently passed and on the vexed question of the licensing of gins and presses. At the cost of taking up a little time, I may explain the various parts of its personnel. It is obvious that the Agricultural Adviser to the Government of India should be a member and it is convenient that he should be President. It is equally obvious, I think, that the Directors of Agriculture of the six major cotton-growing provinces should be members. The Director General of Commercial Intelligence is responsible for all Indian statistics and the importance of cotton statistics is a matter on which the trade has laid very great emphasis. The East India Cotton Association is a body which controls the marketing of cotton in Bombay, and Bombay handles three-fourths of the total crop in India. The Bombay Millowners Association and the Ahmedabad Millowners Association together represent practically 70 per cent. of the cotton spinning in India. The Bombay Chamber of Commerce represents the cotton export interests. The Indian Merchants Chamber is largely representative of the merchants concerned with the handling of cotton as middlemen between upcountry markets and the mills or exporters. The Karachi Chamber of Commerce represents the firms concerned with the exports not only of Sind cotton but also of the very valuable cotton crop of the Punjab. The Tuticorin Chamber of Commerce represents the mills in the extreme south of India and exporters and merchants handling what is probably the most valuable long staple crop in India. The Upper India Chamber of Commerce represents the mills of northern India. The Committee also includes a representative of the Empire Cotton Growing Corporation. That is a reciprocal arrangement. India has on the Council of the Empire Cotton Growing Corporation four members and one member on the Executive Committee of that body. Next we have two representatives nominated by the Central Provinces Government, one being a Central Provinces spinner and the other a representative of the ginning industry in Berar. There is a representative of Bengal; for although very little cotton and still less of any value is grown in that province, the local Department of Agriculture has recently taken up the matter and hopes to restore the old cottons of Bengal. It is but fair, we think, that Bengal should have a representative.

Now, Sir, on the different occasions on which I have spoken on this Bill I have laid emphasis almost, I am afraid, to the extent of being wearisome, on the fact that we in framing the Bill have had all along in the forefront of our proposals the interests of the agriculturist, the interests of the grower. The Standing Finance Committee some time ago, when I happened to bring up a proposal for a small item of expenditure, asked that the Central Cotton Committee might have more agricultural representation. We then put on four agricultural representatives. The Joint Committee on the Bill has gone further and said that agricultural representation must be even greater. They have added six new members. That would have brought the number of the Committee from 32 to 38, but by striking out one official representative we have brought the size of the Committee to 37. It is a large Committee, we admit, but we do not think it is too large for the greatness of the industry which it is intended to represent and to foster. It works largely in Sub-Committees. Lastly, I would suggest that a Committee nominated by the Governor General in Council is not as satisfactory as the present Committee or the Committee which we propose, which is drawn, as Honourable Members will see, from a very wide field of representation. I have, therefore, to oppose this amendment.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): May I appeal, Sir, to my Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, in view of the information that has now been placed before the House, to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I don't think it will affect the Honourable Member much whether I withdraw the amendment or not. I had all the information before.

Sir Montagu Webb: The ground upon which the amendment has been put forward was the heavy expense which would be involved in the maintenance of this admittedly somewhat large Committee. But inasmuch as this argument is now found to have very little foundation, that is to say, that the additional cost involved is only about Rs. 4,000 and not Rs. 50,000 as Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar anticipated. In these circumstances, and looking to the fact that the existing Committee of 32 is working quite satisfactorily, I would appeal to him to withdraw his amendment.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I beg to oppose the amendment for another reason. Mr. Hullah has been good enough to concede that Bengal, which is trying to have its old cotton industry and cotton-growing capacity, restored, has been allowed a modicum of representation, namely, one. I am informed by my Honourable friend behind me, Mr. Mukherjee, that it was pressed by him in the Select Committee that Bengal should have at least two representatives, one of whom

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: There is no cotton at all there.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: My Honourable friend says that there is no cotton at all there. There is not much when compared to Bombay, but that is not the question.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: You have no idea.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: The Statement of Objects and Reasons as well as the Preamble make it appear that this Committee is not only to regulate the cess but also to spend money for the improvement, and development of the growing—the most important from the point of view of Bengal—and marketing and manufacture of cotton. The last sub-clause, sub-clause (xi) of clause 4, gives the Governor General in Council authority to add some persons. From the Bengal point of view I say this is of importance, because, when Bengal can show better results, it will want more representation.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma (Revenue and Agriculture Member): There is one consideration which I shall place before Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar to see whether he need press his amendment any further. The Government have proceeded substantially on the lines which have been recommended to them by the Indian Cotton Committee. They have recommended that the Central Cotton Committee should be a large representative Committee consisting of officials as well as non-officials and representatives of Indian States. The Indian States ordinarily produce nearly one-third of the cotton grown in India. The amendment which the Honourable Member has tabled does not make any provision for the representation of Indian States. At present there are 3 or 4 representatives of Indian States and it may be that on further representation being made to us, we shall have to increase that number. One other observation I would like to make and that is this. Throughout the discussion doubts have been impliedly cast on the adequacy of representation of agriculturists as to whether we can accept the recommendation of the Central Cotton Committee inasmuch as the elements composing it were largely official and commercial and that the cotton-growing interests were not so largely represented as might be desirable. In deference to the wishes, therefore, that have been expressed from time to time, both inside the House and outside, we have agreed to an increase in the number of agricultural representatives, and it would be therefore absolutely impossible to reduce the Committee to the size or anything approximating the size which has been suggested by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. The Local Governments do at present pay the travelling charges of the official Members and the Government of India pays the travelling charges of their officers and it is only the Non-official Members that are paid for and many of them live in and about Bombay, the Central Provinces, and so on at no considerable distance from Bombay. They meet only twice a year and I think, therefore, that in order that any representations which may be made by this Committee may carry weight with the Government as well as with the people at large, it is absolutely necessary that it should be a large one.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I say a word, Sir? In view of the discussion, I do not think it necessary to press the amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 4 stand part of the Bill.

Lala Girdharilal Agarwala (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, may I be permitted to move a very small amendment to clause 4, sub-clause (v)? After my amendment, it will read thus:

"Four persons representing the cotton manufacturing or cotton ginning industry, of whom one shall be nominated by each of the Local Governments of Madras, the Punjab, the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh and the Central Provinces."

Sir, the only change I have made is that instead of two representatives from the Central Provinces, I have divided it into one for the United Provinces and one for the Central Provinces. Now, Sir, this Honourable House is aware that the United Provinces produces cotton in large quantities. There is a large number of . . .

Mr. J. Hullah: Sir, I think I may fairly object to the moving of this amendment, of which we have had no notice. I know that amendments are sometimes allowed to be moved at short notice or even without notice, but this Bill has been in the hands of Honourable Members for a long time, and I therefore object, Sir, to the moving of this amendment.

Mr. President: The objection is reasonable, especially in view of the fact that the Honourable Member proposes to disturb the equilibrium of the Committee as appointed by the Joint Committee. If the Honourable Member's amendment was the fruit of mature thought, no doubt he would have given due notice.

Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: The objection is quite right but I simply appeal to you to allow me to move it, as the amendment is very small, although the Government are within their rights in objecting.

Mr. President: If the amendment had been very small I should have over-ridden the objection raised by Mr. Hullah.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): May I, with your permission, make one suggestion? Throughout this long constitution I see that Bihar and Orissa has been altogether neglected. It is not represented at all either by the Local Government or through anybody else. May I make a suggestion that the Central Government be pleased to take at least two Members from the Province of Bihar and Orissa on the Committee? The Province of Bihar and Orissa is altogether neglected whereas even States like Baroda and other small States are represented on this Committee. The Province of Bihar and Orissa grows cotton and I do not know why she has been altogether neglected.

Mr. President: If that is intended to be an amendment I cannot accept it. I may suggest to the Honourable Member that he should use his influence with the Governor General in Council (Laughter) to get him to use sub-clause (xi) in the interests of his own province.

Clauses 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 were added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Hullah: Sir, I move:

"After clause 9 (1) insert the following, and re-number sub-clause (2) of clause 9 as sub-clause (3) :

"(2) Any owner of a mill who is aggrieved by an assessment made under section 7 may, within three months of service of the notice referred to in sub-section (1) of that section, apply to the Local Government for the cancellation or modification of the assessment and, on such application, the Local Government may cancel or modify the assessment and order the refund to such owner of the whole or part, as the case may be, of any amount paid thereunder."

The reason for this amendment is that the Bill provides no kind of appeal for a mill-owner against an assessment. By virtue of the terms of clause 8 the exporter will have the same right of appeal as he has under the Sea-Customs Act. We do not anticipate that in actual practice there will be any appeals of mill-owners against the assessments made by the Collectors. I believe the usual practice under the Cotton Duties Act is for the Collector to accept without question the returns which they submit. But we think that there should be a right of appeal and we have therefore borrowed from the provision which exists in section 33 of the Cotton Duties Act. I move my amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 9, as amended, and clauses 10 to 17, were added to the Bill.

The Title and the Preamble to the Bill were added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Hullah: I move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now proceed to the further consideration of the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to assimilate the law in British India relating to official secrets to the law in force in the United Kingdom.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I move:

"In clause 4 add the following at the end of sub-clause (a) (ii):

'and it appears that the person in possession of such address or information had reasonable grounds to believe that the address was of, or the information related to, a foreign agent'."

Sir, I need not adduce any further arguments in support of my amendment as this point was more or less discussed on the last occasion and the arguments were very well advanced by Dr. Gour and certain other speakers on that occasion. When I had moved an amendment for the deletion of clause 4, the Honourable Mr. Graham was pleased to say in reply:

"It might be reasonable to require the prosecution to prove that an accused should have known anything which a person of reasonable intelligence would have known, but it is not fair to put on the prosecution the burden which this amendment would put on it."

Sir, I would rather like to quote Mr. Graham's arguments in support of my this amendment. I submit that the man should not be presumed to have communicated with a foreign agent if he is in mere possession of an address or information relating to a foreign agent without knowing or without suspecting or without himself having any reasonable belief that such person was a foreign agent. I can very well understand that where a man knows, suspects or has reason to believe any other person to be a foreign agent and if such man is proved to be in possession of such address or information, there could be a presumption that he may have had communication with a foreign agent, but in the case of a man who has no knowledge about it, or who has no reasons to believe that a particular person was suspected to be a foreign agent by the Government or by any other person, such a man should not be deemed to be guilty simply because he happens to have in his possession the address of a foreign agent. I need not in support recapitulate to the House the arguments that were advanced in this connection in the House of Commons by Commander Kenworthy that there may be some unscrupulous man who might for some motive of his own send the address of a foreign agent or a suspected foreign agent to any other person, and that other person might easily be deemed to have communication with a foreign agent. There may be cases in this country where such a thing might be possible and innocent men might suffer. But apart from all this, it does not stand to reason that a man who happens innocently to go to the place of business of any other person who may have been suspected by the Government or by some other higher authority to be a foreign agent or that a man who visits be absolutely ignorant of the antecedents of such person should still be treated to have had communication with a foreign agent. It will be safeguarding the interests of the poor and innocent people if they could be made liable only in cases where they have reasonable grounds to believe that such a person was a foreign agent. It may be said that a particular man may not believe it, while another having reasonable intelligence would so believe; but what I mean to refer to is a man having reasonable intelligence. If such a man has known him or has believed him to be a foreign agent, it would be quite sufficient. Therefore, it will not be in any way against the interests of justice and it would not afford the spies any loophole to escape in any way. My amendment is only meant to safeguard the interests of poor and innocent people. It is no use glossing over the pitfalls and dangers that actually exist in the wide and elastic wording of the clause, but it is our duty that we as good legislators should also look to the probable effect of the clause in ordinary every day practice and to see that it may so far as possible be not liable to be abused by the executive. With these few words I suggest that a person who merely is in possession of the address of a suspected foreign agent may not be presumed to have had communication with him unless he has reason to believe or reason to suspect that person to be a foreign agent. I therefore move this amendment.

Mr. L. Graham (Legislative Department: Nominated Official): Sir, had this debate been continued on Wednesday, the 14th instant, I do honestly think that my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, would not have pressed this amendment; in fact he would not have risen to move it. The words which he now proposes to add at the end of clause 4 (a) (ii) are precisely of the same nature as the words which he proposed to add at the end of clause 4 (a) (i). Now, the House will agree with me that had those words been added to clause 4 (a) (i) an impossible burden would have been placed upon the prosecution. This new amendment which has been moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, is precisely the same as the amendment which the House rejected on that occasion. Therefore I hardly think it necessary to deal with this amendment at any length and really but for the fact that some days have intervened I should certainly have said nothing at all and left the House to exercise its discretion. Now I only wish to remind the House that under this section which according to my friend is going to work such damage on poor and innocent people no offence is constituted at all. There is no prosecution under this section. It must be remembered that before this section can be used a prosecution must be in operation under section 3 of the Act and section 3 of the Act covers some of the gravest offences imaginable against the State. The prosecution is required, in order to get conviction under that section to prove that extremely difficult and abstract thing, a purpose prejudicial to the interests or safety of the State and this section provides that extremely suspicious circumstances may be referred to and may be used in evidence and one of those is that the accused has been in communication with a foreign agent and it is also laid down that in certain circumstances, those circumstances of course must be proved, that he shall be presumed to have been in communication with a foreign agent, that is to say, the burden will be placed upon him to prove that he was not in communication with a foreign agent. That provision my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, considers to be a poisonous provision and he proposes to sterilise it. The House agreed last week that this was not a poisonous provision. It declined to allow that provision to be omitted. I suggest, Sir, that the House will agree with me that to make that provision absolutely inoperative and to render it quite impossible for the prosecution to use it will have precisely the same effect as taking it out altogether and therefore as the House refused to take it out, I think the House will agree that these words should not be added.

Mr. K. C. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): When on the last occasion we discussed another amendment to this clause, Mr. Rangachariar took the unnecessary trouble of reminding the House that this clause did not create any offence but merely laid down a mode of proof. He on that occasion defended the vague and sweeping character of the provisions on the ground that but for these provisions there was no guarantee that the Act would be successfully administered. In his new born statesmanship and sobriety, Mr. Rangachariar also sneered at those who happened to differ with him, and he even went to the length of hinting that they were merely trying to catch popular applause. In reply to Mr. Rangachariar and Mr. Graham I am going to cite to this House the opinion of the highest judicial officer in a province in India on this particular point, an officer belonging to the I. C. S., who is an Englishman to boot. I do not think Mr. Rangachariar will sneer at him or his authority to speak on this matter, because if he has read his papers carefully he must have seen that he is perhaps the only official in India consulted by Government who has any practical experience of the administration of the laws of espionage in England and France. His name is Mr. Pison, Judicial Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province. He says as follows:

"The presumption arising from the presence in an accused person's note book of the name and address of a person believed to be a spy is one which, if pressed, might result in the conviction of innocent persons, and it seems doubtful whether there is sufficient justification for retaining it in a Statute which applies to peace conditions."

I hope, Sir, that Mr. Rangachariar will revise his judgment in view of this expression of opinion on the part of a High Judicial Authority.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Both my Honourable friends Mr. Neogy and Mr. Agnihotri are lawyers by profession, and as such they ought to know what is exactly meant by the particular provision to which they took exception. The possession of an address does not per se constitute an offence. It is merely treated as a relevant fact when all other circumstances in the case are against a man. This fact may be taken into consideration, only when other things are against him.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: On a point of personal explanation. If my friend has taken the trouble to read clause 8 . . .

Mr. President: That is not a point of personal explanation.

Mr. Pyari Lal: My friend must know that by this law which this House is trying to enact they are going to take note of certain exceptional circumstances and its object is to provide not for the safety or protection of one life or of one man or of one man's life or one man's property only but of the whole country and therefore to meet exceptional cases exceptional laws have to be provided. If my friend will take the trouble to go through the various provisions of this Act, he will find that the Legislature is very scrupulously anxious that no possible loophole for escape should be allowed to a man who is really guilty, and under those circumstances I strongly deprecate any such petty amendments to the provisions of this Act, as proposed by the Mover of this amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, as an appeal has been made to me by my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, I have reconsidered the position. I had the honour of sitting with him on the Select Committee when we discussed the provisions of this Bill. The eagle eye of my Honourable friend did not notice the great enormity which this section contains. He had not then a word to say in the Select Committee against any portion of this clause, nor in the long Minute of Dissent which he has appended. My Honourable friend has not said a word in his minute about amending section 4. If he will refer me to any particular portion of his minute relating to section 4 I shall gladly be corrected. I have read it carefully and I do not find any reference to amendments to section 4 at all. That is the clause we are now concerned with. I do not really know whether he has discovered anything later. He uses section 4 to condemn section 3. In his minute he says:

"Lt.-Commander Kenworthy, while criticising in the House of Commons the corresponding provision in the Statute of 1920 said 'What is to prevent some unscrupulous secret service officer,' etc."

This is all in reference to section 3. We are now concerned only with clause 4. It is a minor matter whether my Honourable friend wished to amend it or not. But I am sure he did not draw the attention of the Committee when we were sitting there to any enormity in this respect . . .

Mr. President: I must remind the Honourable Member that, as we are not seized of what happened in the Committee, we cannot judge of the matter. It is not proper to refer to the proceedings of the Select Committee except in so far as they are referred to in the Report itself.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I only refer to the fact that there is no reference to it,—but that is a matter which is beside the question as he is perfectly entitled to raise it now. What is it that exception is taken to in clause 4? The first part of clause 4 says that a certain fact shall be relevant for the purpose of proving a particular fact which is to be proved: it does not prove it one way or the other, it only says that a particular fact shall be relevant, because it may not come exactly under the definition of relevancy in the Evidence Act; so, on account of the experience gained in England, Statutes X and XI, George the 5th, enacted this clause, and that is reproduced here; here we use the language of the Evidence Act—"shall be relevant for the purpose of proving a particular fact,—not that it is proof of that fact, not that it is conclusive proof, not even presumptive proof, but merely 'shall be relevant.'" Now if something is shown it says that the fact shall be relevant that he has been in communication. In order to prove that he has been in communication with a foreign agent, clause (2) enacts that, in order to be relevant, in order to prove that fact, if a connection is shown that he had either within or without British India visited the address of a foreign agent, then it is proof, or it shall be presumptive proof, that he has been in communication with a foreign agent. Does my learned friend object to that? The question to be proved is 'having been in communication with a foreign agent.' You are shown that you visited the address of a foreign agent or consorted or associated with a foreign agent. From that, let us ask, is it wrong to draw the inference that he has been in communication with a foreign agent, in order to make it merely evidence, not to convict him of the offence. Then the second portion is that he has either within or without British India the name or address or that any other information regarding a foreign agent has been found in his possession,—then, it shall be presumptive proof that he has been in communication with a foreign agent. The only difficulty which my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, pointed out is that the address might have been foisted on him. Well, that is rather an exception, isn't it? My Honourable friend will admit that it will be an exceptional case where an address of another is foisted on him,—and it is an ordinary rule of evidence that the person who relies on an exception has to prove it. Ordinarily, we are in possession of the name or address of another person simply because either we desire to be in communication with him or we are in communication with him already. Ordinarily, does it not follow, if we have the address of someone else in our pocket, that it must be for a purpose,—isn't that so, ordinarily? It is human nature. If I had the address of my friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, in my pocket, I should have it for some purpose,—unless Mr. Neogy puts it into my pocket; then, of course, it will have come there without my knowing it; but that is an exceptional case. Therefore, being an exceptional case, the law makes here this presumption. I do not think there is any enormity in this; if there is, I should be glad to be corrected. What does it say? All that it says is that the person shall be 'presumed.' It means, 'unless the contrary is proved.' What is there to prevent my proving the contrary if I am honestly in possession of the address of a foreign agent? Now take the definition of 'foreign agent.' A 'foreign agent' is a person who does something inimical to the State, and includes any person who is or has been or in respect of whom it appears that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting him of being or having been employed by a foreign power either directly or indirectly, for the purpose of committing an act, either within or without British India, prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State, or who has or is reasonably suspected of having, either within or without British India, committed, or attempted to commit, such an act in the interests of a foreign power.' Therefore, that is a person who is inimical to the State. Now you have his address in your pocket. Now, Sir, are we guilty of any enormity in saying that we will draw the inference that you have been in communication with him? Not to convict you at once, but, if you are in communication with him, it is relevant for the purpose of proving that you had a sinister purpose, merely relevant under clause (1). If Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar will carefully read it, under clause (1), being in communication with a foreign agent is relevant merely for the purpose of proving the intention: not that it is conclusive proof, no, it shall be presumed. What is the objection to that? Do you want to shut it out? Is it not a relevant fact? Is it not a reasonable circumstance to take into consideration in order to come to a conclusion on the question of the innocence or guilt of the accused? Therefore, for the purpose of proving that he has done something for a purpose prejudicial to the safety of the State, it is relevant,—and would any lawyer or would any ordinary human being deny the relevancy of the fact? A person shall be presumed to have been in communication with a foreign agent if he has his address in his pocket. All that I am saying is that there is really nothing wrong in it. It is not so bad as it is painted; that is all I say. Don't paint it darker than it need be painted. Let us see it as it is, and see whether it is necessary that we should enact that law or not. Let us appeal to reason, not to passion or prejudice, and it is only a rebuttable presumption; it is presumed from a certain fact. You can prove the contrary. Therefore, I do not see why all this fuss is made; and why my Honourable friend Dr. Gour should wax so eloquent, I fail to see. I have dealt with the merits of this question at some length and I hope the House sees, and I hope the public outside will also see and not be led away by such sort of comments as have been made here to think that really this section contains anything unusual or anything that should not be accepted by this Legislature. (Some Honourable Members: "I move that the question be now put.") (Other Honourable Members: "No, no.")

Mr. President: The question is that the question be put.

The motion was adopted:

Mr. President: The question is:

"At the end of sub-clause (2)(a)(ii) of clause 4, add the following:

'and it appears that the person in possession of such address or information had reasonable grounds to believe that the address was of or the information related to a foreign agent'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I move, Sir:

"That in sub-clause (2)(b) of clause 4, for the words 'is reasonably suspected of' substitute the words 'where there is reason to believe of his'."

The last amendment that I moved related to "address;" the amendment which I now put before the House relates to "suspecting a foreign agent." I would not have taken the time of the House by moving this amendment if I had thought that the last amendment was properly discussed. Some of my Honourable friends wanted to give a reply to Mr. Rangachariar but did not get an opportunity to do so, and I have therefore to move this amendment. My Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, did not take the trouble of replying to Mr. Neogy's argument with reference to the opinion of the Judicial Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province who had had some experience of the working of such laws during the war. My Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, was also pleased to point out that the evidence under this section was only a relevant piece of evidence and that the presumption that might arise is likely to be rebutted. May I ask him how a man who is suspected or accused of having associated with a person who was suspected to be a foreign agent would be able to rebut the presumption which will arise under this clause, particularly when he himself had no knowledge about it or had no reason to believe that man to be a foreign agent. On this point also my friend had not the courage to reply. I think that the clause as it stands is a very hard one. Under the existing law of criminal procedure and of evidence, we do not allow the accused to come forward into the witness-box as a witness to give evidence on oath. How can then the man accused of the offences enumerated in clause 3 come forward in the Courts of Law and prove his innocence? It may be that he had only gone to purchase tea from a tea grocer's shop. He may not have suspected that the tea grocer was suspected of being a foreign agent; he may not have had all the information which the Government had in regard to that person who was known to them as a foreign agent; he would look upon such a man as a grocer and nothing else and for that reason he may have had the address of such a man or go to that man's shop to purchase tea. In such circumstances the executive officers of the Government may think that this is a man who is dangerous to the safety of the State, and if he happens to possess some information or some statistics that might be of some use even indirectly, at some future time to a foreign power this man is likely to be hauled up for being in communication with a foreign agent. How can that man go before a Court of Law and say in his defence that he never knew that the grocer was a foreign agent and it was simply to purchase some tea that he went to him. The omission to provide a suitable safeguard against such probabilities will be terrible in cases where it enters into the head of the executive to abuse the powers given to them or to use them against innocent persons who may not hold the same opinion as Government officials in regard to political matters. Therefore, Sir, I move this amendment of mine which does not provide any loophole to any spy or foreign agent, but which simply puts a safeguard for the innocent persons against the high-handed and oppressive acts of the executive. I put my amendment before this House for consideration and I hope the House will accept it.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 4, sub-clause (2) (b) for the words 'is reasonably suspected of' substitute the words 'where there is reason to believe of his'."

In spite of the slightly disorderly remarks made by the Mover of the amendment at the beginning, I must draw his attention to the fact that this matter has been debated already more than once and the discussion must now be strictly confined to the terms of this amendment.

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, I understand from my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, that his primary object in moving his amendment is to enable his friends to make an attack on my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, may I be permitted to interrupt on a point of personal explanation? The Chair has been pleased to say "in spite of the disorderly remarks made by the Mover." May I know what remarks of mine were disorderly, so that I may be more careful in future.

Mr. L. Graham: I would not object to this amendment on this account as my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, is perfectly able to look after himself. But I have certain grounds for objecting to this amendment and they are as follows. In the first place, this amendment No. (iii), on my reading of the clause, is a consequential amendment, which Mr. Agnihotri would move if he had succeeded in persuading the House to accept his first amendment, viz., the proposal to substitute the word "believing" for the word "suspecting" earlier in the same sub-clause. This sub-clause is the definition which runs as follows:

"The expression 'foreign agent' includes any person who is or has been or in respect of whom it appears that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting him of being or having been employed by a foreign power"

My Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, is quite willing to leave the word "suspecting" there, but he wishes to substitute the words "where there is reason to believe of his" for the words "is reasonably suspected of" later on. I object to that, in the first place, because it does not make any sense at all, and in the second place, I say you have retained the word "suspecting" occurring earlier in the sub-clause and that is the place where it matters.

Lala Girdharilal Agarwala (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Is it proposed, Sir, to print the names of foreign agents in any publication for the guidance of the public?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I am sorry the Honourable Member should think that we are so deficient in humour that we should even answer that question.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"Omit sub-clause (c) in sub-clause (2)."

Sub-clause (c) gives the definition of the word "address" used in clause (4). I should not ordinarily move this amendment also, but I again attempt to convince the House of the elasticity of the words used in this clause. I attempted to re-draft the sub-clause but regret to say that I could not find proper words to amend it and as the Bill is not re-committed to the Select Committee I have no other alternative but to propose the omission of this clause, so that the Government may, subsequently, bring in a properly worded sub-clause defining the word "address". Every argument that I have used in connection with the other amendments of clause 4 will be equally applicable in the case of this amendment; but, I should draw particular attention of the House at least to one sentence in this clause (c), the 5th line from the bottom, "or at which he carries on any business", and to the fact that no safeguard has been provided against the possible harassment of innocent persons. I therefore suggest to the House to please re-consider this sub-clause.

Sir, I very much regret to have to say that I have not been able to know the remarks that the Chair was pleased to remark as disorderly. If, therefore, any of my remarks on this amendment also be disorderly, I would rather claim indulgence from the Chair and would hope to be excused. I am not aware what remarks of mine were disorderly.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, as I happen to be also the author of a similar amendment, I may be allowed to explain my own amendment as well as that of the Honourable Mr. Agnihotri. Honourable Members will see that clause 4 which is sought to be inserted in this Bill was for the first time enacted in England in 1920. Consequently, it is not one of those clauses which have been tested by the experience of time. In the second place, it is one of those clauses which has not been extended so far as we know by any of the British Colonies. A question was put the other day I believe to the Honourable Mr. Graham as to whether this clause had been incorporated by any of the Colonial Legislatures in the measures which they introduced for their own Colonies, and we were told that information on that point was not available. If any of the Colonies have extended the drastic provisions of this clause we shall have at any rate the precedent of one Colony to go upon. Now, Sir, so much for the previous history of this clause and of the friend Mr. Rangachariar who is a foster-father of this clause and of the Bill resents any intrusion on the part of a Member to make any improvement upon that Bill. He will not possess his soul in patience, but up he jumps and defends every clause of this Bill as a clause calculated . . .

Mr. President: Order, order. Which clause is the Honourable Member discussing?

Dr. H. S. Gour: I am afraid I cannot discuss the clause without Mr. Rangachariar.

Mr. President: I asked the Honourable Member to say which clause he is discussing.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Clause 4 (c).

Mr. President: Clause 4 (c) is merely concerned with the question of what an address is. I would remind the Honourable Member that the matter has already been raised in a speech on the question that clause 4 be omitted. He must confine his remarks to the substance of sub-section (c).

Dr. H. S. Gour: Now, Sir, we are therefore concerned here with a particularly novel clause, and I would ask the Honourable Members of this House to canvass it carefully and see whether that clause is necessary for the administration of criminal justice in this country. That is clause (c). There are three expressions of any importance in the whole of this section. One is "an address", the second is "a foreign agent" and the third is "communications with a foreign agent." Now Honourable Members will see that clause (c) does not deal with the exclusive address of a foreign agent. It may be an address which is the address of a hundred or two hundred or a thousand people. As I pointed out the other day, the suspected foreign agent may have taken up his lodgings in a hotel in which there are five hundred or a thousand residents. That address will be treated as the address of the foreign agent. It is not necessary that it should be the sole and exclusive address of that foreign agent. Now that is a point which I hope the Honourable Members will realise when voting upon this clause. The whole of clause 4 deals with evidence, and it says, if a person has the address of a foreign agent, he shall be presumed to be in communication with him. Now reduce this clause to a concrete case. A person is in possession of the address of a hotel called A. It is suspected that a man B lives in that address and that is also his address. You shall be presumed to have been in communication with a foreign agent. A presumption shall be made that the person who had a common address of a particular hotel was in communication with a foreign agent. What is the meaning of the words "shall be presumed?" The Evidence Act, section 4, defines what is the meaning of the words "shall be presumed." It says, whenever it is directed by this Act that the Court shall presume a fact, it shall regard such fact as proved unless and until it is disproved. The meaning of the words "shall be presumed" then comes to this, that the man is liable to be convicted from the mere fact of his being found in possession of that address unless he is able to disprove that fact.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Unless it is disproved.

Dr. H. S. Gour: My friend says, unless it is disproved. How is he going to disprove it? What disproof has he got? The other day when I said that the accused should have a chance of going into the witness box to disprove a fact exclusively in his possession, this House said: 'Oh, no, we shall not place the accused in that unfortunate predicament' and my amendment was rejected. Suppose now, for the sake of argument, that the only person who is able to disprove that fact, as it invariably would be, is the suspected foreign agent himself, how is he to disprove it? On the one hand you would not allow him to go into the witness box to disprove a fact. On the other hand you place upon him the burden of disproving a fact which you have presumed against him. This is the situation in which you place the suspected foreign agent. It is in all conscience a very unenviable position, and, if it happens that my friends who were so ready to vote with the Government with all the haste and hurry they command, if they were one of these days to be laid by their heels under this clause, they will cut a very sorry figure in the dock. Everything will be presumed against them and they will have a forlorn hope by way of defence to go upon. I suggested, Sir, that the least that the Government might do in connection with this clause is to alter, at any rate, one word, which will make the clause a little more acceptable to this House, if not entirely acceptable to it. For the purpose of improving this clause, if the Government will substitute the word "may" for the word "shall", I submit this clause will become more acceptable to all parts of this House. The clause will then read thus:

"A person may be presumed to have been in communication with a foreign agent if he does."

Mr. President: That amendment is not before the House.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I know that, Sir, I am only suggesting it as a peace-offering to the Government. If they do not accept it, then we shall of course move our amendments of which my friend, Mr. Agnihotri and myself have given notice. (Mr. J. Chaudhuri: "Mark the words 'reasonable grounds'".) I am simply pointing out how easy it is for the Government to accept the suggestion I have made, whereupon we shall all withdraw the amendments of which we have given notice.

Now, Sir, if this is accepted, it will make really no difference in the sense except in one particular. Honourable Members will observe that there are two degrees of presumption. Section 4 of the Evidence Act lays down:

"Whenever it is provided by this Act that the Court may presume a fact, it may either regard such fact as proved, unless and until it is disproved, or may call for proof of it."

Now, Sir, by altering the word "shall" into "may" you vest the Court with a certain degree of judicial discretion, and the Court may then regard the fact as proved or may call for proof of it. That is the degree of elasticity that you introduce into this clause, and I submit the court will in that case have to consider all the circumstances of the case and then exercise its judicial discretion. That, I submit, Sir, would considerably improve the clause, it will not neutralise its effect, and the whole clause, as it stands, would then be acceptable to all parts of this House. Otherwise, we shall be under the necessity of having to fight all the amendments including the one moved by my Honourable friend Mr. Agnihotri.

I have pointed out, Sir, the great danger of the very wide terms in which this clause has been couched. I have pointed out that it is practically unworkable. It places the accused entirely at the mercy of the prosecution. Once a prosecution is launched, I think a conviction is certain. Is this a situation in which you should place a man of whom you know nothing, of whom you are not able to believe anything but whom you merely suspect, upon little or no grounds, of being a foreign agent? Further, remember, Sir, who is to be the judge of the reasonable grounds. My friend who interrupts me has not even read the sentences which lie before him. Who is to be the judge of the reasonable grounds for suspecting? I presume the prosecutor. It is the prosecutor who has reasonable grounds for suspecting that this man is a foreign agent; and that closes the doors of justice and the doors of mercy upon the accused. I submit this is a clause which is likely to be used to the detriment of the accused. It is a clause which is an exception to the general law of the land. It is a clause which is too widely worded. It is a clause, which I submit, this House must reject. But if the Government accept my suggestion, I have pointed out that they stand to lose very little, they place the whole matter in the discretion of the Court and I have no doubt that the Court will exercise its discretion wisely. I submit, Sir, if this is acceptable to the occupants of the Treasury Benches we are prepared to make peace with them by allowing the whole of this clause to pass without further amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I must be forgiven if I begin by deprecating certain suggestions made in connection with this debate. The Bill was submitted to a Select Committee. That Select Committee gave very careful consideration to its clauses. They satisfied themselves that these clauses, as amended by them, contained nothing dangerous to the liberty of the subject. Their report was submitted to this House; but in what position do the members of that Select Committee now find themselves after having done their conscientious duty to the House? They are told that they themselves were the foster-fathers of the Bill, which they certainly were not. They are told that in season and out of season they rise to support the Government. I ask that we should treat this question purely on its merits, and regret that the loyal support given, not to Government, but to the Report of the Committee by certain of its members should have brought on them what are little short of personal attacks.

Now the first advocate of the amendment was unfortunately able to say very little indeed in support of his motion. He merely desired that this sub-clause should be cut out in order that we might put a better one in. But the Select Committee has already done its best with the clause. Taking the original clause as we found it in the English Act, we improved the wording in order to make sure that no one should fall into the particular fallacy which has just been committed by Dr. Gour. He asks "Who is the person who is to be held to have suspected the foreign agent of being such?" He suggests that it is the prosecution. But it was just in order that no mistake of this kind should be committed that we altered the words as follows:

"In respect of which it appears there are reasonable grounds for suspecting" which of course make it obvious that the suspicion must be in the mind of the Court itself. And if Dr. Gour desires higher authority for that statement, I quote to him the late Chief Justice of England. Precisely that question was raised when the Act was being passed, and precisely that answer was given by that authority. But, what are Dr. Gour's criticisms of this clause? For I may say that though he also proposes to omit the clause, he has not committed himself to any such re-draft as Mr. Agnihotri desired. He says "This has not stood the experience of time." No, it has not. But it was produced as a result of the experience of the war. He says it has not been reproduced by any colony; he states that as a fact; but we are only able to state so far that we have not as yet received the statutes of the colonies. But sometime ago when a question arose as to whether the Act of 1920 was to be extended to the colonies, we were told that it was not being extended to them because they themselves were legislating in a still more rigorous sense. If, however, he attaches that importance to the opinions of the colonies which he has frequently denied in the past, I can only ask him to wait until we do receive the statutes of the colonies.

His main criticism, however, is one of substance. He condemns this sub-clause because it raises a presumption against a man who is found in possession of an address, and the address does not have to be specially and solely the address of a foreign agent. It enables, he says, a post office or hotel to be treated as the address of a foreign agent; and if you are found with that address on you, then all these dangerous presumptions arise against you. I quote his actual words. He goes on to argue that the Bill lays down that the Court shall presume that if you have this perfectly general address on you, you are in communication with a foreign agent, and you are, therefore, liable to be convicted unless you can prove the contrary. He asks "How can you prove the contrary?" I answer by the very simplest method. "You do not need to go into the witness box. If the prosecution is so entirely lacking in common sense as to attempt to prove that a man is in communication with a foreign agent merely because he has in his pocket an address of a large hotel in which such foreign agent lives, or of a post office at which he receives his letters, it is merely necessary to point out to the Court the entire absurdity of any such attempt to raise a presumption against the accused. No proof, in other words, is necessary. Indeed, no prosecution would be so foolish as to lead evidence of that kind; but if it did, it would be absolutely unnecessary to bring any proof against it. In truth, you cannot hope to persuade people of the unwisdom of a particular clause or a provision of law by assuming such absurd uses of it as that. You can, if you choose, make equal ridicule of a very large number of clauses of our Indian Penal Code. Take for instance the possession of house-breaking implements. You can, if you choose, say that a spade is a house-breaking implement; it undoubtedly can be used as such. But who would be so foolish as to attempt to get a conviction on the ground that a man is in possession of a spade, and a spade can be used for house-breaking? You can multiply such ridiculous charges against the drafting of our Acts in a dozen ways. Really the only question is, whether this sub-clause is actually required as an additional link in our chain of presumptions or not. I know that it is unnecessary to point out to the House again that the possession of such an address is no kind of offence in itself. The accused must have been found in those highly suspicious circumstances described

1 P.M. in clause 3, and these circumstances will have to be amply proved against him. But in order to get a conviction the prosecution has not only to prove that he has been found in those highly suspicious circumstances described in clause 3, but it has also to prove that he is found there for a purpose prejudicial to the State. No one now questions that if he has been in communication with foreign agents, that ought to be admitted against him as evidence relevant to proving his motive; the House has agreed to that proposition on an earlier clause. But how are we to make it possible to show to the Court that he can reasonably be suspected of having been in communication with a foreign agent? Unless we can prove against him either that he has visited a presumed foreign agent, or that (as in this sub-clause) he was in possession of a presumed address of a foreign agent, then our chain of proof obviously will be incomplete. Nor is it unreasonable in any way that we should seek to establish that as a presumption against him. That point was narrowly examined when the Act was being argued. I have heard it quoted as against us on a previous clause that the Judicial Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province thought that this part of our presumptive evidence might be misused. But even a higher authority than the Judicial Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province, I mean the present Lord Chief Justice of England, argued that although this extra presumption that we attempt to set up here was drastic and unusual, yet the experience of the war had shown that it was in itself essential, and the House of Commons recognised that it was in consequence reasonable to legislate in that sense. Dr. Gour, unable to suggest anything better for our clause, finally suggests to us a compromise. I would note that this compromise of course does not refer to this sub-clause at all but to an earlier part, namely, to the beginning of sub-clause (2).

Dr. H. S. Gour: It affects this clause also.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I agree that it affects this clause also. His compromise is that we should substitute the word "may" for the word "shall," thereby, he says, giving the Court discretion as if the Court already had no discretion in this matter. Of course, the Court has discretion. The mere fact that the man has the address in his pocket does not, as he would almost seem to agree, secure conviction. The Court has to see first of all that the circumstances referred to in clause 3 and which constitute the substance of the complaint, are established. It has, after giving due weight to the evidence for the substantive complaint, to judge whether there is proof that his motive in being found in highly suspicious circumstances was for reasons prejudicial to the State. In judging of this it is allowed to make certain presumptions, of which this is one, but before making the presumption, it has to be satisfied that the address found on the accused was one which could be reasonably suspected of being that of a foreign agent. It is wrong to suggest that the Court has not any discretion in the estimation of the value of those presumptions, and it seems to me unnecessary to legislate to give the Court further discretion in the matter.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, to my mind, there is a real difficulty, if not downright danger, in the closing lines of sub-clause (c) which is the immediate object of the amendment, and I would ask the attention of the House as well as of the Government Benches to this. The closing lines of that sub-clause are to the following effect:

"that an address shall be presumed to be the address of a foreign agent"

There need be no quarrel with regard to that. But it goes on:

"and communications addressed to such an address to be communications with a foreign agent."

Communications to and for whom? It will be said no doubt that the intention is clear—communications for and to the foreign agent no doubt. When questions like this do arise in a trial wording of this kind is a real difficulty, and therefore, even if Government was not prepared to agree to the insertion of the word "may" for the word "shall" in (2) (a) covering the whole of the clause, it is worth while considering whether the language of the last 2 lines of clause (c) should not be changed to make it quite clear that a communication not overtly intended but a communication for or to a foreign agent is intended to be covered by this clause—unless something like that is done, the difficulty will continue. A man wanting to avoid suspicion would necessarily try to have his residence in a place where there are others with whom he may freely mix so that he may successfully avoid suspicion. It has often been the case that an address is given and to that address is addressed a letter not by name to the person for whom it is intended but in some way indicating that it is really intended for him (although the name does not appear on the cover of the communication). That class of cases undoubtedly may have to be dealt with. But if you have an absolute blank card as in the terms of the last 2 lines of sub-clause (c) the difficulties to which I referred will continue. On the general question, Sir, I have not heard the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey yet as to whether he is prepared to assent to the suggestion of Dr. Gour that the word "may" shall take the place of "shall" in sub-clause (2) (a). He has generally indicated that the Court in these matters does not require any discretion. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "any further discretion.") I am afraid that that is not quite meeting the situation. The direction that is suggested here and demanded is not discretion with regard to his finding an accused guilty or not because that would be preposterous. Conviction will depend upon a variety of circumstances, one of which circumstances and factors—and a very important factor and link—is dealt with in clause 4. There can be no doubt about that and I do not think that Dr. Gour seriously suggests that discretion should be given to the Court to convict or not to convict merely upon what is provided in this clause, apart from other ancillary circumstances. Sir, the authors of the Act of 1872 of the Indian Legislature were given a very high compliment. There is hardly a piece of legislation in any country that can touch the Evidence Act of 1872. The author of that Act was invited by England to place its law of evidence on a satisfactory footing which certainly it had not been when our Act of 1872 was passed. Therefore, when we are for passing purposes, for temporary purposes, trying to go back upon what the Indian Evidence Act deliberately did,—and it did a piece of very good work,—we ought to be very careful. When a man is taking his trial under circumstances of grave suspicion all the safeguards that can be provided for him should be there without being positively detrimental to the State. I quite appreciate what the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey and others have said in this regard. I do not think there is the slightest sympathy here for enemies of the State or desire to support espionage to the detriment of the Government or the country. Those who feel it their duty to suggest amendments securing some more protection for the accused must not for a moment be thought as having sympathy of that kind or having any desire prejudicial to the State or to the Government. Sir Malcolm Hailey has complained with regard to members who are adversely criticising Members of the Select Committee who had the courage of their convictions both in the Select Committee and here. I do not see that there is much differentiation between either class of criticism. Those who think it their duty to bring to the notice of the Assembly points which may without detriment to the State be provided for in the interest of the accused have not deserved any reflections cast upon them. I desire to associate myself with Dr. Gour in his suggestion for substitution of the word may for shall. The trial will in no way suffer, the State will in no way be prejudiced if the court is given the discretion, the tendency now-a-days is to take it away. Even the High Court does not sometimes escape the 'shalls' of the Legislature where the High Court ought to be the supreme arbiter in the matter. We have a very elaborate definition clause in this Bill. The "foreign agent" is not defined, "his address" is not defined and these two matters are brought in as an essential and integral part of this substantive clause, thereby differentiating as it were from what might and should have been done in the definition section of the clause. That makes it all the more necessary to examine the matter as closely as possible, and from that point of view I submit again that unless there is some change at all events in the last two lines and a half of clause (c) the matter will be open to serious objection. Apart from that I do suggest that it will be an improvement on the clause to substitute the word 'may' for the word 'shall'; if Government are prepared to do it, it will be a real improvement and it will in no way jeopardise the interests of the State or the prosecution.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Can the Honourable Member suggest a definite alteration in the last two lines for us to consider?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: The words I would suggest would be "communications to or intended for a foreign agent" or words to that effect. It ought not to be left blank like that. Any communication addressed to that address must not raise the presumption that this clause seeks to raise.

Dr. H. S. Gour: The word 'may' may be substituted for the word 'shall' both in clause (a) and clause (c). That will give the court a certain amount of discretion for which we are struggling here.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): There is a real difficulty in regard to this clause, and I want the Honourable the Home Member once more to explain it fully. As has been pointed out by Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary the position is this. Take clause (c):

"Any address whether within or without British India, in respect of which it appears that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting it of being an address used for the receipt of communications intended for a foreign agent."

That is No. 1. The second is:

"or any address at which a foreign agent resides."

That is No. 2. No. 3 is:

"or any address to which he resorts for the purpose of giving or receiving communications," and the 4th is:

"any address at which he carries on business shall be presumed to be the address of the foreign agent."

This is what follows:

"and communications addressed to such an address to be communications with a foreign agent, and in the case of a man carrying on business at a particular place if any communications are addressed to him, they shall be deemed to have been addressed to a foreign agent."

You will find in the earlier portion of clause 4 these words:

"In any proceedings against a person for an offence under section 3, the fact that he has been in communication with or attempted to be communicated with, a foreign agent whether within or without British India, shall be relevant for the purpose of proving that he has, for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State, obtained or attempted to obtain information."

First of all, you address a letter to an agent to a place where he carries on business, and from that you come to the conclusion that the foreign agent has been addressed, and this fact becomes relevant for the purpose of proving that he has, for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State, obtained or attempted to obtain information. Now, Sir, if you go back to section 3, clause (2), you will find:

"On a prosecution for an offence punishable under this section with imprisonment for a term which may extend to fourteen years, it shall not be necessary to show that the accused person was guilty of any particular act tending to show a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State."

[Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar.]

So, there is no necessity for proving anything to show a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. That you establish by the presumption in clause 4; by the communication being sent to a particular person at a particular place,—you presume that it was addressed to a foreign agent,—and it becomes a relevant fact for the purpose of proving that some act has been done prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State; and when you go back to section 3, it says 'nothing more need be proved'. That is the position so far as I can see; and unless there is some more explanation, I think this is a dangerous provision to put before the country, I tried to work it, but so far as I can see, unless there are some more safeguards introduced, it would be a very dangerous provision.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I quite recognize, having regard to the two long sections we are dealing with, sections 3 and 4, my Honourable friends, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary and Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, feel the difficulty which they have pointed out. If I try to point out that really they have mistaken the question, I hope they will excuse me. The first question is, what is likely to be the charge against the prisoner or the accused person? The charge, so far as section 4 is concerned, will come under 3 (1) (c), not under 3 (1) (a) or (b). The charge against him will be: 'you have obtained, collected, recorded, published or communicated to a person a secret official code or pass word, or any sketch, plan, model, article or note, etc., etc.' The evidence against him will be that he did a particular act; therefore, that will be first proved against him. Section 4 says what shall be the evidence in order to prove the necessary facts. Now let us confine our attention only to (c), because (a) and (b) won't come in at all—(a) and (b) refer to approaching or entering, etc., a prohibited place or making a sketch, etc.—so (a) and (b) won't apply to section 4 at all. Section 4 would apply to 'communication',—communicating a secret official code or pass word, etc. Now section 4 says that if you are in communication with a foreign agent, it is a relevant fact, in order to show that you have communicated, that is to say, in order to show that you have communicated with a purpose. 'Your intention was to communicate',—it is a relevant fact to prove the purpose you have had, namely, a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. But still the prosecution has to prove that you communicated any secret official code, any sketch, plan or model. That has to be proved. My learned friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, is under a mistake in supposing that that fact need not be proved. The fact to be proved is that he communicated a code or pass word, etc., or a sketch or plan—something of that sort has to be proved.

Dr. H. S. Gour: No, no. Information.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Or any information. That is to say, they will have to prove that he communicated "any information". That communication of information is not in itself enough; it must be done with a particular purpose. "If any person for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State communicates some information". Those are the words. It is very difficult to argue a point like this in a court of law, and much more difficult to argue in a Legislative body a pure question of law like this. It is still more difficult to argue with gentlemen who can build fairly castles in the air. But in this matter two things are necessary to be proved, first of all the intention and then the Act. The intention is in 3 (1)—

"If any person for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State . . ."

That is the intention; with that intention he does a particular act. These two things are essential. He must do the act and he must have the intention. Now section 4 (1) says that in order to prove the intention alone something is relevant:

"In any proceedings against a person for an offence under section 3, . . . shall be relevant for the purpose of proving that he has for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State . . . etc."

So, Honourable Members will see if they read that carefully that it refers to proof of the intention, not proof of the act; the act is a separate thing; he must have done something under clause 3. It is not that without any proof whatever the whole case is presumed against him. The section says "it shall be relevant for the purpose of proving".

Now my Honourable friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, finds some difficulty in the matters of communications addressed to such an address being deemed to be communications with a foreign agent. But what does that mean? It means that if you are in communication with a foreign agent that fact can be proved in the case; it is not conclusive evidence of your guilt; it is a relevant fact to be taken into consideration along with the rest of the evidence in arriving at a conclusion as to whether a man has committed an offence or not. Suppose I write a letter to a foreign agent, is it wrong to assume that I am in communication with him, and is not that a relevant fact to be proved? Would my Honourable friend object to that fact being proved in the case in order to find out whether I have done something prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State? The whole thing comes back to 4 (1). It is a relevant fact which has to be taken into consideration. It is not as Dr. Gour put it because he has the address, say "Maiden's Hotel" in his pocket and because a foreign agent resides there that he will be convicted of an offence. That is not the section at all. I do not think, unless Dr. Gour was sitting on the Bench, that any other Judge would give such a conviction and hold that because a fact is relevant, therefore the man has committed a crime. If any court was likely to come to such a conclusion perhaps it would be necessary for us to legislate accordingly. But do Honourable Members really believe that the most stupid Magistrate or the most stupid Sessions Judge is going to come to such a conclusion simply because I may have the written address "Maiden's Hotel" in my pocket book? But if, of course, I have "Maiden's Hotel, Room No. 38" in which Dr. Gour, a foreign agent, is living, then that I say would be a relevant fact; but even that is not enough for conviction. That is where Honourable Members who have spoken, make the mistake; it is not enough for conviction; it is merely a relevant fact from which it shall be presumed that I have been in communication with a foreign agent. The whole presumption is he shall be presumed to have been in communication. And that fact is a relevant fact. The whole difference between me and Dr. Gour lies in this. Afterwards I will show the hollowness of the objection which he has taken. In fact from his own mouth I am going to convict him what a shadow it is he has been pursuing. I will come to that later on. It is not "shall be convicted". It is merely a relevant fact. That is a piece of evidence to be taken along with the rest of the evidence. "Shall be presumed " is only in order to make it a relevant fact. It does not say 'presumed to have been guilty'. Let us remember that. Now, Sir, my Honourable friend concedes that there is a presumption which may be raised. He says it is a right presumption to draw. It may be naturally presumed. He says the whole injustice, the whole enormity will be removed if you put in the word " may " for " shall ". Therefore he is willing to grant that a presumption may be drawn. He is willing to grant so far, and all that he complains is the difference between the word "shall" and the word " may ". But that is not the amendment. Let us look, Sir, at the Evidence Act. If a Court is to be so stupid as he assumes it to be, namely, to convict me because I have got the address ' Maiden's Hotel ' in my pocket, then he wishes to leave that discretion to that stupid Court; he is willing to trust that stupid Court with that discretion. If we look at the Evidence Act, we find:

" Whenever it is provided by this Act that the Court may presume a fact, it may, either regard such fact as proved unless and until it is disproved," that is the very language applying to " shall presume " and it goes on

" or may call for proof of it ".

He is going to entrust this discretion to this stupid Court which is going to convict me on the mere piece of a card in my pocket containing the name of Maiden's Hotel. That shows the hollowness of his contention. I do not think it will make much difference if that change is made. I am also appealing to the Treasury Benches to substitute the word " may " because it will satisfy my Honourable friends and I do not think the law will in any way suffer by substituting the word " may " for the word " shall ".

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, the amendment actually before the House is the elimination of sub-clause (2) (c) of clause 4, but the discussion has gone on in connection with the whole of clause 4. Sir, it may be a surprising view that I put forward, but I put it forward in all deliberation, that the whole of this clause 4 will introduce practically no change in the law of evidence. Sub-clause (1) declares something to be relevant that would most certainly be relevant under the existing law. In a trial under clause (3) the fact that the accused had been in communication with a spy (the accused being, say, a person who was seen taking a photograph of a prohibited place in the Delhi Fort) is one of the most relevant facts that could possibly be proved under the existing law. Therefore this clause which declares relevancy introduces nothing new. We next come to sub-clause (2) which lays down a rule of presumption, i.e., onus of proof. Sub-clause (a) deals with the onus of proof, not of an offence, but in connection with one relevant fact in the trial. Now, Sir, have the Honourable Members who support these amendments with regard to the words " shall presume," forgotten section 106 of the Indian Evidence Act, which lays down that " when any fact is specially within the knowledge of any person, the burden of proving that fact is upon him " ? That section embodies a principle of the Law of Evidence, which we find in Best on Evidence in these words: " A person will not be forced to show a thing which lies not in his knowledge." The illustration given under section 106 is this: " When a person does an act with some intention other than that which the character and circumstances of the act suggest, the burden of proving that intention is upon him." A short illustration will make the matter clear. We are, I will suppose (God forbid it), at war with Germany. Mr. Johnson, an American citizen, is found taking a photograph of a prohibited place. He is proceeded against under section 3. In his pocket is found a card with an address, " Herr Von Goldstein, care of the Post Master, Bombay." Thereupon he is presumed to have some communication with the foreign agent. The Honourable Mr. Agnihotri said, ' Why that may be the address of a man from whom he bought some groceries in Bombay.' Well, if it is, the accused has only got to say so, and prove it,—to rebut the presumption—and the matter is over. But who knows how that card came into his pocket so well as he knows? Are the police to go and find out how that card came into his pocket, and prove that Von Goldstein, a German by name, is a foreign agent? Is the Court not to make any presumption from the circumstances above stated? If Dr. Gour were on the Bench trying that case, he would immediately presume that Mr. Johnson was in communication with a foreign agent, until that gentleman disclosed how that card came into his pocket, and who Herr Von Goldstein was. This is what would happen under the present law. The Government seek to make the matter stronger and clearer in the clause under debate. The clause would compel the Court to do what the Court would certainly do under the present law of evidence. It will introduce no novelty; it will introduce no danger. I have said, in a former speech on this Bill, that only particular courts are to be allowed to try these cases; and such courts can be depended upon to use these extensive powers with discretion. I submit that no hardship is cast upon any person proceeded against for committing one of the acts which may be an offence under section 3, if he is asked to prove his connection with an address found in his pocket. If he is innocent, he has no difficulty whatever in proving it; and nobody but he has that special knowledge which will enable him to prove it. Therefore all this fear of the word " shall," and the supposed necessity for substituting the word " may " are absolutely, I submit, without any reasonable foundation. There is no hardship whatever in asking a person found doing an act of which the character and circumstances are such as to suggest a particular intention, to show that there was no such intention. There need be no hardship on the accused and no difficulty whatever. I have no doubt that the case in my illustration would never go beyond an investigation if the accused was able to show that the address found on him was an address which was there for the purpose of having his piano tuned, or of buying a violin or a pound of tea, or anything equally innocent. Therefore I submit that clause 4 (c) as it now stands inflicts no hardship on anybody, that it is a very proper provision as to a rule relating to the onus of proof, and that it should be adopted by the House.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatam: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I must at the outset state that the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey is perfectly right when he says that we should not bring in any personal attacks into the discussion. I endorse every word of that and think also, if every unbecoming word is avoided in this Assembly, it would add to the dignity of the House. Unfortunately, this mistake arose on account of what Mr. Rangachariar said on the last occasion; but let us drop that matter. Sir Henry Stanyon really made a surprising statement when he said that this does not introduce any change in the law. (Sir Henry Stanyon: " Any practical change.") Even the Lord Chief Justice of England, quoted by the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey, stated that this unusual procedure was admitted into England during the war and that no unforeseen consequences would be forthcoming on account of that introduction there. Perhaps it is known to all criminal lawyers and Judges that, ordinarily, a criminal is not asked to open his mouth. It is for the prosecution to establish his guilt. He stays there and sees what evidence is adduced against him; till the guilt is established against him he need not open his mouth. Perhaps that was what Sir Henry Stanyon thinks is unnecessary, because in all criminal cases it may be said to the accused "there are suspicious circumstances against you and, therefore, you are guilty unless you establish your innocence." It is to avoid that that English jurisprudence and the jurisprudence of the world says it is far better that one hundred guilty men should escape than that one innocent person should be convicted.

Well, Mr. Neogy has referred to the Judicial Commissioner's dictum as a high authority; the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey has pointed out that the Lord Chief Justice of England has said so and so. Perhaps the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey will admit that England is not India. There, in the matter of trials the executive is under responsive control and the judiciary are afraid of public opinion. In India we have not yet got such an organised public opinion to compel both the judicial officer and the executive officer to hear the voice of justice and reason. Till we secure that position, perhaps the dictum of the Lord Chief Justice of England cannot be applicable to India. There is one other circumstance. Not only does the Judicial Commissioner of Sind say so but also the Chief Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province, in endorsing the statement of the Judicial Commissioner of that province, has stated that it is . . . (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "Read the whole sentence.") I will read the whole sentence. He says:

"I agree, in principle, as to the desirability of replacing the existing Acts by a single consolidated Act applicable to Indian conditions. In regard to the specific provisions of the Bill under reference the opinions that have been consulted in this Province are generally favourable. A minority of those consulted, however, are of the opinion that, while the Bill might have been fully justified under war conditions, it is unduly wide and drastic for the ordinary conditions of peace."

(The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "Go on.")

"and that it contains clauses which may easily become an instrument of oppression in the hands of unscrupulous officers. There is no doubt that such a provision as section 4 (2) (ii) of the Bill, if not carefully and justly treated, might be so utilised. The Judicial Commissioner, who had special experience of the English and French laws on the subject of espionage during the war, has pointed out that the presumption arising from the presence in an accused person's note book of the name and address of a person believed to be a spy is one which, if pressed, might result in the conviction of innocent persons, and it seems doubtful whether there is sufficient justification for retaining it in a Statute which applies to peace conditions. To this extent the fears of the minority are perhaps not entirely unjustified."

This is what the Commissioner states. What Sir Malcolm Hailey wants is that in view of the fact that prosecutions cannot be instituted without reference to the Governor General in Council and Local Governments it may perhaps be considered that the public is sufficiently protected. Now with reference to the last observation which Sir Malcolm Hailey invited the attention of the House to, I may mention, Sir, that generally the Governor General in Council or the Governor in Council . . .

Mr. President: I cannot allow the discussion of the authority which is to institute the proceedings. We are considering the question of what is, or what should be presumed to be, the address of a foreign agent.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, I am only just doing what Sir Malcolm Hailey wanted me to do; otherwise I should not have entered into that discussion.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I should like to explain, as the Honourable Member says he has yielded to a request of mine, that as he was irrelevant at the beginning he might as well continue to be irrelevant to the end.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, my irrelevancy only follows on the observations made by Sir Malcolm Hailey, which are equally irrelevant. What is wanted is that instead of leaving it to Executive officers an opportunity may be given to Judicial officers to exercise their discretion by changing 'shall' into 'may.' If the Government think that Judicial officers' discretion cannot be trusted and they prefer to trust the discretion of Executive officers, that is a different matter. It will have this effect. Instead of blindly following in every case, instead of compelling the Judge always to hold that it must be presumed to be correct unless it is proved to the contrary, they have discretion to apply. I think the suggestion made by my friend is most reasonable and the Government should think twice before they reject such advice coming as it does from the Judicial Commissioner himself.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, of course the 'address' relates to the question of evidence. It has nothing to do with the actual commission of the offence, and my view is that in the interests of the safety of the State the law must be stringent. But at the same time I feel bound to say that it should not be too stringent. Fairness of the trial should never be ignored by the Legislature. And the other point which should be always before the mind of the Legislature is "in what way the provisions will be construed, in what way the statutory law will be executed and carried out?" My construction of the provision, under debate now, is that it is very very harsh and hard, and my fear is that the Magistrate, in some cases, will not properly act up to the expectations of the Honourable the Home Member. I am not prepared to say that all Magistrates are stupid. Some of them are very intelligent, and learned men, no doubt. But the Honourable the Home Member cannot deny the fact that there are some who could be branded with this unenviable epithet 'stupid.' On account of there being some such Magistrates this Legislative Assembly entertains a fear; and in order to remove that fear it would be better that the word 'shall' may be substituted by the word 'may.' Now, the Honourable Mr. Stanyon went to the length of saying that it did not make any difference whether the word was "may" or "shall;" at any rate, he said there was no practical difference. I say there is a great difference. If you will be pleased to see the definition in regard to the expression "may presume" given in section 4 of the Evidence Act, you will find that that provision says "Whenever it is provided by this Act that the Court may presume a fact, it may either regard such facts as proved, unless and until it is disproved, or may call for proof of it." Now here, it depends on the Court's discretion. But where the word is "shall," then that Court is bound to presume; there is no other alternative. Whenever an address is found in the possession of an accused, then the Magistrate or the Court has got no other alternative; he shall have to presume it as a relevant fact within the contemplation of clause 4 of this Bill. Then the other difference is that the Court may call for proof of it; namely, the Court may call for the proof itself, that is, the Magistrate himself may call for the proof; though the accused may not be able to disprove it, it rests with the Court or Magistrate to send for the record or send for some sort of proof in order to satisfy itself or himself as the case may be. But when we come to the expression 'shall presume' the definition given is "Whenever it is directed by this Act that the Court shall presume a fact, it shall regard such fact as proved unless and until it is disproved." It is incumbent upon him to hold that that fact is proved. Of course it is rebuttable, I agree with the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar; it is not conclusive, it is rebuttable no doubt; but the Court is bound to take it as proved unless and until it is disproved. It cannot be denied that this provision which is embodied in sub-clause (c) of clause 4, is harder, without doubt.

Reference has been made to section 106 of the Evidence Act; and after citing that section it has been argued that practically there is no difference. The argument is based on the ground that since the address will be found in the pocket or possession of the accused, therefore it rests with him to prove with what intention he has got that address in his pocket. I think this argument is fallacious altogether. Section 106 of the Evidence Act, to my mind, does not seem to be applicable to the case which is being debated upon before this Assembly. Section 106 says "When any fact is specially within the knowledge of any person, the burden of proving that fact is upon him." As for instance a person is found travelling without a ticket in a first class carriage. Then he is confronted by the railway official who asks him "where is your ticket"? He says "I have got it with me." The railway official says "Show it to me." Unless and until that ticket is shown or it is proved that he has purchased that ticket, he will be considered a passenger travelling without a ticket since the possession or purchase of that ticket is within the special knowledge of that passenger, onus of proving that fact is on him. Section 106 governs cases of that type. It has got no bearing on the question which we are debating now. Therefore, I submit that the present provision, as is incorporated in sub-clause (c), is harder and it will not do great harm if for the word "shall" the word "may" is substituted and I recommend that substitution, namely, the word "may" may be put in instead of the word "shall."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: May I be permitted to interrupt the Honourable Member? There are some dangers to the State which must be avoided at all costs. I am prepared to put in the word "may" instead of the word "shall."

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member wish to withdraw his amendment in order to do that?

(Cries of "Yes.")

The amendment* was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

That in sub-clause (c)

Dr. H. S. Gour: In clauses (a) and (c) substitute the word "may" for the word "shall."

* "Omit sub-clause (c) in sub-clause (2)."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We are dealing at present, I understand, with the amendment relating to (c).

Mr. President: The amendment relating to sub-clause (c) has been withdrawn.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Then dealing with the clause as a whole, I am prepared to substitute the word "may" for the word "shall" in sub-clauses (2) (a) and (2) (c).

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"In clause 4, sub-clause 2 (a), the word 'shall' be omitted in order to insert the word 'may'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"In clause 4, sub-clause 2 (c), to substitute the word 'may' for the word 'shall' in the fourth line from the bottom."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 4, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in sub-clause (3) of clause (5), omit the words 'or interests'."

Sir, my object in moving this amendment is to show the vagueness of the clause and the elasticity and the likely wide interpretation of the words used therein. Sub-clause (3) of clause 5 says:

"If any person having in his possession or control any sketch, plan, model, article, note, document information, which relates to munitions of war, communicates it, directly or indirectly, to any foreign power or in any other manner prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State, he shall be guilty of an offence under this section."

Sir, in the clauses relating to military affairs the House has decided that the words "or interests" should remain and should not be dropped. Now, clause 5 deals with offences relating to civil affairs. This clause

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: On a point of order, this is the same question which the House has already decided.

Mr. President: I was waiting to see how the Honourable Member differentiated between the two. I can see no difference whatsoever between the words "or interests" in this clause and in the other clauses. The question of the principle involved in the words, in so far as any principle is involved, has already been decided by the vote of the House. I am prepared to hear the Honourable Member on the subject.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: During the debate on the definitions the Honourable Members who constituted the Select Committee and even the Members on the Government Benches said that the words "or interests" have been dropped in certain clauses which refer to civil affairs, and these words are used in this clause, Sir.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Surely you will find the word "interest" all right in clause 5.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: As I am much pressed by friends, I beg to withdraw the amendment, Sir.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 5 stand part of the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: May I point out that there is a printing mistake in the third line of clause 5. The word should be "code" instead of "word" where it occurs for the first time in line 3 of clause 5.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That for the word 'word' where it occurs for the first time in line 3 of clause 5 substitute the word 'code'."

The motion was adopted.

Clause 5, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I move:

"In sub-clause (1) (c) of clause 6 insert the word 'knowingly' between the words 'or' and 'uses'."

Clause 6

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We are prepared to accept the amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 6, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clauses 7, 8, 9 and 10 were added to the Bill.

(Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag rose to move amendment No. 24.)

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I accept that amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause (3) of clause 11, after the words 'town to' where they occur for the second time the words 'the District or' be inserted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 11, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clause 12 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: I understand that Government are prepared to accept an amendment which stands in the name of Dr. Gour in regard to this clause 13. If that be so, I do not propose to move my amendment.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I beg to move with the consent of the Government:

"That in clause 13, sub-clauses (2) and (3) shall be re-numbered (3) and (4), respectively, and after sub-clause (1) the following sub-clause be inserted:

"(2) If any person under trial before a Magistrate for an offence under this Act at any time before a charge is framed claims to be tried by the Court of Session, the Magistrate shall, if he does not discharge the accused, commit the case for trial by that Court, notwithstanding that it is not a case exclusively triable by that Court."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: In agreeing to this amendment I should like to make it clear that we do so not because we have any desire to underrate or depreciate the capacity of first class Magistrates to try these cases adequately and with justice. We simply admit this provision because we realise that the Bill itself does introduce new presumptions and a law of evidence which may require to be somewhat carefully administered. I myself believe that our first class Magistrates could do so with absolute fairness and justice, but since apprehensions have been expressed on the subject in many parts of the House and since the cases are likely to be few, we are prepared to accept that if necessary the accused should have the option of demanding committal to the Court of Sessions.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag (Surma Valley cum Shillong: Non-Muham-madan): I beg to substitute the following for the amendment I have got on the paper:

"In sub-clause (2) of clause 13, insert after the words 'Governor General in Council' where they occur for the first time the word 'or' and in the last two lines of sub-section (2) omit the words 'or some officer empowered by the Governor General in Council in this behalf'."

This amendment is intended to provide that the Governor General in Council or the Local Government should have the sole authority to sanction prosecutions for offences under this Act. The words which we want to be omitted have been put in here for the first time. These words are not in the amended Act of 1904 and if these words are there and if the Governor General in Council has power to delegate authority to any officer it thinks fit to sanction prosecutions under this Act, then the safeguard provided in the earlier part of the clause would be reduced to a nullity, because in that case the Governor General in Council may not have any objection to sanction prosecutions and these words were not in the Act of 1904. So I think these words may be omitted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I think my Honourable friend was under some misapprehension in believing that Mr. Graham agreed to this amendment. All that Mr. Graham did, I think, was to agree to correct the wording of the amendment, because as worded it appeared to have the consequence of cancelling the proviso, which I understand my Honourable friend did not himself desire. The reason why we have inserted the words which it is now proposed to omit is that they occur in section 196 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Obviously the powers sought herein would be employed in very rare instances. There might be cases where an officer is not exercising the powers of a Local Government should yet be empowered by the Governor General in Council to make a complaint; I take, for instance, the case of a Political Officer; his function would not, of course, be to try the case but to make a complaint. But before he can do so, he will have to be empowered under this section by the Governor General in Council. Such cases will be few.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, I am perfectly aware that this particular sub-section has been taken bodily from section 196 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But I draw the attention of the Honourable the Home Member to the fact that this section 196 was in exactly the same terms in the Code of 1882, and the Honourable the Home Member will remember that when the Indian Official Secrets Act, 1889, came to be enacted, they purposely departed from that language, and this is what they laid down in section 7 of the Act—"No Court shall proceed to the trial of any person for an offence against this Act except with the consent of the Local Government or the Governor General in Council." Therefore, Sir, the justification which has been made of this particular sub-section by the Honourable the Home Member on the ground that it merely re-enacts section 196, was in existence in 1889 also, but the Legislature deliberately departed from that language, because they did not intend that any officer should have any general authority delegated to him by either the Local Government or the Governor General in Council for the purpose of instituting any prosecution under this very special measure. Sir, if the Honourable the Home Member will refresh his memory, he will find that when the Amending Act of 1904 was under discussion in the Indian Legislative Council, a good deal was made by Government of the fact that no single prosecution under that Act could be undertaken except with the express authority of either the Local Government or the Governor General in Council. I am not very much concerned with the language of the section; what I want to know is whether each particular case will have to be looked into by the Governor General in Council and the Local Government, or not,—or will anybody have the authority, by virtue of any general delegation of powers, to undertake prosecutions under this Act? If that be so, then I think we should all press for the acceptance not of Mr. Nag's amendment but of the amendment which stands in the name of my Honourable friend, Mr. Bagde.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.
The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. G. Bagde (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, Mr. Neogy has made a speech in support of my amendment, and it is unnecessary for me to make a further speech. I therefore formally move my amendment, which runs as follows:

"In clause 13 (2), omit all the words after the word 'Act' in the second line and in their place substitute the following:

'except with the consent of the Local Government or the Governor General in Council'."

Sir, I recommend the amendment for the acceptance of the House.

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, there is no difference at all in substance; it is the same as that which has just now been rejected.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The Title and the Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, I move that the Bill, as amended, be now passed.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I am afraid there has been a great deal of misapprehension created as regards this Bill outside this Chamber and also inside this Chamber. It has been mentioned in a telegram sent to Madras from here that it was a matter of surprise that Mr. Rangachariar gave support to this engine of oppression, to this retrograde measure, notwithstanding the heroic efforts made by Dr. Gour, Mr. Agnihotri and Mr. Neogy. It is forgotten that this measure is not a new measure at all. It is the existing law. If anything, we have liberalised the existing provisions. There is the English Act of 1911, which is the law here and which apparently the public are not aware of, which cannot be got rid of. Section 11 of that Act says:

"If by any law made before or after the passing of this Act by the Legislature of any British Possession provisions are made which appear to His Majesty to be of the like effect as those contained in this Act, His Majesty may, by Order in Council, suspend the operation within that British Possession of this Act, or of any part thereof, so long as that law continues in force there, and no longer, and the Order shall have effect as if it were enacted in this Act."

We have not got a clean slate to write on. We had not a new legislation to commence here. Unless we substantially follow the English Act our labours will be in vain. Our law was contained in the English Act and also in the Indian Act. The two measures had to be brought together so that the Magistracy and the Judges and the Government and the public may have guidance in one self-contained Act. Honourable Members will notice we are dealing with an extraordinary piece of human conduct on the part of the persons who are likely to come within the scope of this Act, spies with reference to military matters and spies with reference to civil matters. The Bill as it came to us made no distinction between the two classes of spies.

But in the Select Committee we were able to make that distinction between military and non-military matters. My Honourable friend Mr. Neogy asked what about the Act of 1920? The English Act of 1920 is the result of experience in the working of the Act of 1911, the result of that experience in time of war. After all this Act is intended to be applied to enemies, and mostly in times of war which may arise at any time. We do not know when it will arise. You are not going to pass an enactment then for the time being. You are here putting in your armoury of legislation a piece of legislation to cope with that situation which may arise. Certain portions of the Act of 1920 have been embodied in this Act, that is section 4, the rules relating to evidence about which we have had so much discussion. And as regards the offences which are referred to, I do not think any objection has been taken to those offences by any Honourable Member here, or by the public outside. Section 3 deals with spying, section 5 with the communication of secret entrusted in various ways. Then as regards the other offences, namely, interfering with officers of the police or Members of His Majesty's forces, attempts and incitements, they are already there, and I do not see any new or novel offences which have been created by this Act. Any way Honourable Members will recognise that it is a necessary piece of legislation if any Government is to get on. As I have said already, I do not think we should have sympathy with insidious foes. I think Honourable Members will agree to that proposition, and insidious foes have to be rigorously dealt with. I am not ashamed to confess that I have absolutely no sympathy with such insidious foes

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar : No one has.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar : I am glad to hear that. And therefore to say that this is an unnecessary piece of legislation, an oppressive and retrogressive measure to which the Legislature is laying its hand is to exaggerate, is to raise a false cry, is to really catch applause which is undeserved. It is asked who raises the cry? I do not know who it is. Whoever incites it, whoever advocates it, whoever sympathises with it, whoever wants it, it is to him and to them I am addressing these remarks. I am convinced, Sir, it is a necessary piece of legislation and I am glad, by the vote of this Assembly, on the amendments, they have shown that this is a measure which the Legislature considers is not harmful. And as I have pointed out already, you want a stable Government and a steady Government and unless you have this measure, it is very difficult to deal with these people who adopt underhand methods. In order to deal with underhand people you must have a piece of legislation which will be wide enough to cover all cases. It is not a case in which the oft-quoted maxim applies—Let rather a hundred guilty people escape than one innocent man be convicted. When you have to deal with enemies, can you say, let one hundred enemies escape? Can you take such a risk? That is a proposition which I do not think any sensible person can subscribe to. It will be taking an undue risk. If Honourable Members who quote the maxim will reflect, they will see the total inapplicability of such a maxim in a case like this. Where you are dealing with the enemies of the State the law should be wide and not too strict, and I do not think that the Legislature or any of us have committed any sin in putting this on the Statute Book. I congratulate the Legislature on passing this Bill. Let us hope there will be no occasion for using it.

Mr. President: If Honourable Members wish to continue the discussion, I think I must adjourn the House.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): The question may now be put.

Mr. President: I cannot accept a motion for closure. If there is a general agreement that the debate may come to an end now, that is a different matter.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: We want to end it.

Mr. President: Honourable Members are aware that there has only been one speech on the motion that the Bill, as amended, be passed. The matter is one of great importance, and I cannot stifle discussion, even though the House is ready to carry the closure by an enormous majority. At the same time, I would appeal to the House to shorten discussion as much as possible because, as has been already pointed out, the principles of the measure have been very largely and generously discussed on almost every clause which has come under discussion to-day. If Honourable Members can give me some reasonable undertaking that they will keep their comments on the passage of the Bill within reasonable limits, we can proceed now without an adjournment.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I do not think, Sir, this House is inclined to inflict too many speeches at this late hour. Speaking for myself, I hope I shall be voicing the sentiments of a great many of my friends who think with me and have stood by me during the progress of this Bill, if I indignantly repudiate, both on my own behalf and on their behalf, the charge that there was any intention to oppose the central principles of this measure. What we have opposed and what we should have continued to oppose are the details, which the occupants of the Treasury Benches have themselves confessed are of an exceptional and drastic character. We, as the representatives of the people, had to see that these provisions were not unduly enlarged so as to let in through their wide meshes accused persons against whom justice and the evidence adduced would not admit of conviction. Mr. Rangachariar, as the unaccredited spokesman, I suppose, of my friends on the other side of the House, pointed out that this is a measure intended only in case of a sudden outbreak of war. Sir, a greater misconception than that was never indulged in by my esteemed and learned friend. This is not a measure which is intended only to be used in the case of an outbreak of hostilities; it is a standing Statute which will be used both at the time of war and during peace, and, what is more, it intermingles within its 16 sections offences of a most heinous character, such as military offences, and of a comparatively trifling character, these being offences of a civil character. I should have expected, Sir, that there would have been some classification of these two classes of offences, and the public at large, who have to deal with this Act and to receive their caution from its provisions, would then have been in a better position to understand as to what they could do and what they were to avoid. Therefore, Sir, let us hope that on a future occasion the Government will be better advised in sorting out the civil and the military provisions of this Act, in relegating them to two independent Acts and providing the necessary punishments as will suit the gravity or lightness of the offences.

Frequent references have been made by the occupants of the Treasury Benches to the precedents furnished by English law. I am not surprised when the Members of Government refer to the English law as their authority for extending similar principles to this country. But I am surprised that my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, should have referred to the authority of English law as justifying the enactment of this measure in this country. Surely, Sir, he who runs can see the radical difference between English society and Indian society. The judiciary in England is vastly better trained, the public is better organised, the jurors are the final judges of fact; and on top of the jurors you have the Court of Appeal. Have you got the same high standard of judicial efficiency? Have you got the same strength and volume of public opinion? Have you got the same salutary check which trial with the help of a jury affords to an English accused? These are facts which cannot be forgotten, but these are facts which have been forgotten by the champion of this Bill.

Then, Sir, we have been told in the language equally loose and equally obscure that no provision of law can be sufficiently drastic to hunt down spies and to stop espionage. There is not the slightest intention on the part of anybody in this part of the House to decry the provisions relating to spies and espionage. I submit it was a deliberate red-herring intended to divert the attention of this House from the weak provisions of this enactment. What are its weak provisions? Well, Sir, if you read the Bill as it emerged from the Select Committee and the Bill as you see it to-day, you will find therein ample vindication of the opposition rendered by the Members of this House to its drastic provisions; and if we have not been able to do more it is not because our cause was not just but it was because being a highly technical provision bristling with questions of law and obscure expression, Members of this House took it for granted that the Government draft was sufficiently good to admit of no opposition. Well, Sir, there are two provisions, however, to which my friend on this side of the House wants to draw the special attention of the Government. One is the provision relating to sanction. You have the provision that the Local Government or any other officer empowered by the Local Government in this behalf . . .

Mr. L. Graham: No, no; the Governor General in Council.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I beg your pardon;—empowered by the Governor General in Council in this behalf may sanction a prosecution. I hope, Sir, that you will not generally delegate your power to any officer, but examine each case and as far as possible sanction prosecution after you are satisfied as to the guilt of the accused.

There is another fact, Sir, upon which I invite the attention of the Government relating to civil offences. Your provisions are so wide that you will have no difficulty whatever in running in anybody who peeps into an office for the purpose of making some, it may be entirely innocent, enquiry as to when there is going to be the next meeting of the Assembly, or whether a certain report on the Census of India has come out and what is the population of India recorded in that report. I hope, Sir, that you will work the civil side of it in a spirit of charity and that you will not use these provisions in a manner calculated to abridge and thwart popular liberties.

With these observations, Sir, I also concur in the motion made from the Treasury Bench that this Bill be now passed.

The motion, that the Bill as amended be passed, was adopted.

THE EXCLUSION FROM INHERITANCE BILL AND THE HINDU LAW OF INHERITANCE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I, with your permission, Sir, make a motion? I move that Sir Campbell Rhodes and Maulvi Abul Kasem be added as Members of the Select Committees on the Hindu Exclusion from Inheritance Bill and the Hindu Law of Inheritance Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Monday, the 26th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Monday, 26th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

MEMBER SWORN:

Mr. A. V. V. Aiyar, C.I.E., M.L.A. (Finance Department: Nominated Official).

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

ELLAHAYA, SHEDMAN, N.-W. RAILWAY.

430. Dr. H. S. Gour: (a) Will Government be pleased to state whether it is a fact that while the late Ellahaya, Shedman of the Locomotive shed at Kundian, North-Western Railway, who put in 38 years' service, was given a bonus on his Provident Fund, the gratuity due to him was withheld on the report of the District Locomotive Officer, Kundian, who personally vouched for the bad and disloyal conduct of Ellahaya towards the Railway administration during the Punjab disturbances in 1919?

(b) If the reply is in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state why the ex parte report of a District Officer was allowed to over-rule the decision of a special tribunal composed of Judicial Officers of ripe experience who honourably acquitted Ellahaya of his alleged complicity in the disturbance that took place at the Kundian Railway station in April 1919?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) and (b) It is a fact that the late Ellahaya, Shedman, Locomotive Shed, Kundian, North-Western Railway, was allowed Provident Fund bonus, but not gratuity. The rules governing the grant of Provident Fund bonus and gratuity are different. One of the conditions for the grant of a gratuity is faithful service, and it was found that the late Ellahaya's service to the Railway Administration could not be held to have fulfilled this condition.

PURCHASE OF STORES.

431. Mr. J. P. Ootelingam: Will the Government be pleased to state:

(a) What action has been taken on the recommendations of the Stores Purchase Committee?

(b) To what extent has the creation of the Central Stores Department enabled purchases, which were formerly made in England, to be made in India on behalf of indenting departments of the Central and Provincial Governments?

- (c) What reduction, if any, in the establishment (permanent and temporary) of the Stores Department under the High Commissioner has been made possible thereby?
- (d) Whether the operations of the Indian Central Stores Department have resulted in economic purchase and, if so, the approximate amount of savings effected?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the reply given by Mr. Chatterjee on the 6th September, 1922, to a similar question asked by Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary. The report of the Railway Industries Committee, which also considered the revision of the Stores Purchase Rules, is now being published. Apart from this no further developments have taken place pending the report of the Retrenchment Committee.

(b) Owing to financial stringency the development of the Indian Stores Department has been retarded, and the Department has not yet been permitted to recruit the staff necessary to enable it to undertake any purchasing beyond that of Textile stores for the Army. Since the Stores Department came into being, it has made contracts for the purchase in India of a number of items of textile stores which were previously imported from England, notably khaki drill and pugri cloth. Orders have been placed in India for approximately 4½ million yards of these two items at a cost of 28 lakhs of rupees, the price paid being more favourable than the lowest quotation from England. In addition to the above items of textiles, stores to the value of about 65 lakhs of rupees have been bought in India since 1st of April 1922, which, before the war, were imported from England. In some cases the specifications have been modified at the instance of the Textiles Purchase Branch to enable Indian mills to supply.

(c) No reduction in the establishment of the London Store Department has yet been possible pending determination of the policy to be pursued in the matter of the Indian Stores Department.

(d) Government are satisfied that the operations of the Textiles Purchasing Branch, which, as explained in the answer to (b), is the only purchasing branch of the Indian Stores Department at present in existence, have resulted in substantial savings. The Honourable Member will appreciate the difficulty of suggesting even an approximate figure, since it is obviously impossible to gauge what prices would have been paid had the purchases been made under the system previously in force, while owing to the widely fluctuating values which have obtained over the past few years, it is impossible to arrive at an accurate basis for comparison. There is no doubt, however, that the savings effected have been considerable.

Mr. J. P. Cotelingam: In view of the answer given to question (d), I would like to know what proposals Government have with regard to the further expansion of the Indian Stores Department as recommended by the Stores Purchase Committee.

Mr. A. H. Ley: That will have to be considered when the Retrenchment Committee's Report comes under consideration.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Is it a fact that the Stores Department has now attached to it some inspecting agencies of certain class of articles, purchases in respect of which are not made by the Purchase Department? If so, would the Government consider the desirability of either abolishing those inspecting departments or of arranging that stores with which they are connected should be purchased through the Stores Department?

Mr. A. H. Ley: I think the only inspecting departments at present attached to the Stores Department are the Metallurgical Inspectorate and the Government Test House, Alipur, which do some inspecting work. Stores inspected by them are not always purchased by the Stores Department, as far as I am aware. I do not think the Government have any idea of abolishing either the Metallurgical Inspectorate or the Government Test House.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Or that in the alternative, the purchases should be made through the Stores Purchase Department?

Mr. A. H. Ley: That also is a matter which will be considered when the Retrenchment Committee's Report is considered.

HINDU TEMPLES AT RAISINA.

432. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that some Hindu temples have been dismantled in Raisina or are to be dismantled in Raisina in the area now being appropriated for the new railway station?

(b) If so, has the permission of the Hindu Community or of any one on their behalf been obtained?

(c) If so, on what terms and from whom?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) No. Apart from consultations with those immediately interested in the temples nothing has been done nor is it proposed to do anything at present.

(b) and (c) Do not arise.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Was there any permission taken in regard to any mosque being dismantled in Raisina from the community of Muhammadans?

Mr. President: This question refers to Hindu temples.

SECOND QUTAB ROAD.

433. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that a new road is under construction parallel to the Qutab Road, within the area of the new railway premises?

(b) If so, does a part of the road pass through a Mohammadan burial ground?

(c) If so, how has that Wakf estate been encroached upon?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) Yes.

(b) No, the road just skirts the graveyard.

(c) Does not arise.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it a fact that some mosque land has been enclosed for the building of a compound at Raisina?

Mr. President: This question refers to the making of a road, not to the building of a compound.

Mr. K. Ahmed: In constructing a building or a compound for a building, Sir, which belongs to Government—a new one—there should be a road or path to it.

Is there no answer to my question?

VOTING IN LANDHOLDERS' CONSTITUENCIES.

434. Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: 1. Will Government be pleased to state if they have given any effect to the Resolution (accepted by Government) of Baba Ujagar Singh Bedi given on page 196 of the Legislative Assembly Debates, Volume III, Part I of 1922, regarding the removal of restrictions for the Landholders' constituencies as to their personal attendance at the Polling station?

2. Will Government be pleased to state whether this change in the election rules will be enforced in the ensuing election to be held in the end of this year?

3. If not, why?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member is referred to my reply to Baba Ujagar Singh Bedi's question No. 418, dated the 24th February 1923.

LEASES IN CANTONMENTS.

435. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is the Government aware that the Cantonment Reform Committee has declared the enforcing of a lease for a whole site when it is extended by a House-owner in a cantonment to be illegal?

2. Is it a fact that the Committee has recommended that in such cases "lease" be taken only for the extended portion?

3. Is it a fact that in spite of the Reform Committee's recommendation the practice of demanding and enforcing a new lease for the whole site is still prevalent in cantonments?

4. If so, will the Government be pleased to issue orders in the spirit of the recommendation of the Reform Committee?

Mr. E. Burdon: 1, 2 and 4. The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the reply given on the 11th September last to question No. 285, asked by another Honourable Member of this Assembly. I will furnish him with a copy of the orders therein mentioned, if he so desires.

3. No, not so far as the Government of India are aware. But if the Honourable Member can give me particulars of any case in which he considers an irregularity has taken place, I shall be glad to have it inquired into.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State and amended by the Legislative Assembly, be passed."

As Honourable Members will see there are certain formal amendments to be taken into consideration and I make this motion therefore in the terms of Standing Order 49. The amendments which have been tabled are formal and consequential, consequential partly to the passing of various amendments on the Code of Criminal Procedure itself and consequential also on action taken by us in regard to the Racial Distinctions Bill. As they are of a formal and consequential nature only, I do not propose to speak further on this particular motion in order that with the permission of the House these amendments may now be put.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I beg to move that for clause 5 the following be substituted, namely:

"5. In sub-section (2) of section 29 of the said Code, after the words 'High Court or' the words 'subject as aforesaid' shall be inserted."

Sir, this proposal is due to the passing of the Racial Distinctions Bill. It is doubtful as to when the present Bill and the Racial Distinctions Bill will come into operation; but we have thought it desirable that all amendments which are consequential on the Racial Distinctions Bill should be included in that Bill. It will be seen of course that the effect of this motion is to restrict the operation of clause 5 of the Bill before Honourable Members to the final portion beginning with the words 'in sub-section (2) of the same section.'

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I move, Sir:

"That in clause 6:

(a) for the words and figures 'after section 29' the words and figures 'before section 30' be substituted;

(b) for the figures and letter, '29A' the figures and letter '29B' be substituted;

(c) in the proposed new section 29B, as so renumbered, the words 'notwithstanding anything in the last two preceding sections' be omitted."

This amendment, again, is consequential upon the passing of the Racial Distinctions Bill. Honourable Members will remember that by clause 5 of that Bill we have inserted a section 29A in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Clause 6 of the Bill before Honourable Members includes another section 29A. We think that that section should come after the section 29A in the Racial Distinctions Bill; that is the reason for the first two parts of the amendment. As regards the third part it will be seen of course that the words "notwithstanding anything in the last two preceding sections" in the proposed section 29A, when we took this clause into consideration, referred to sections 28 and 29 of the Code. When 29A is inserted in the Code by the Racial Distinctions Bill, sections 28 and 29 will of course not be the last two preceding sections. Further, these words will now no longer be necessary, because both sections 28 and 29 will begin with the words "subject to the other provisions of this Code."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I move that in sub-clause (2) of clause 16 as re-numbered, for the words and figures "section 107 of the said Code" the words "the same section" be substituted. This is a formal amendment, proposed in order to please the draftsman. If Honourable Members will refer to sub-clause (2) of clause 16 it will be seen that in it the words 'of section 107 of the said Code' are repeated, notwithstanding the fact that they are already cited at length in sub-clause (1). In other clauses of the Bill it will be seen that when in the first sub-clause a section of the Code is quoted at length, in the second sub-clause we only say "the same section."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I move:

"That in clause 29 (2), as renumbered, for the words 'subject-matter in dispute' in both places where they occur, the words 'subject of dispute' be substituted."

This again, Sir, is a formal amendment. Honourable Members may remember that on the 26th of January on the motion of my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, we inserted certain words in sub-section (2) of section 146 of the Code. Those words were "and if no receiver of the property, the subject-matter in dispute, has been appointed by any Civil Court." An examination of those words has indicated what we consider to be a drafting defect in the proviso which Sir George Lowndes' Committee proposed to add to sub-section (2) of section 146. If Honourable Members will look at section 145 of the Code, they will find that throughout the words used are "subject of dispute," and the same applies to section 146, sub-section (1). We therefore wish to bring the words in sub-section (2), as it will be amended, into conformity with the words in the corresponding provisions in sections 145 and 146.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I move:

"That in clause 50, as renumbered, in sub-clause (ii) the words 'for the word "Government" the word "authority" shall be substituted and ' be omitted."

This amendment is consequential upon the amendment moved by my friend, Mr. Agnihotri, to this clause (then clause 49) on the 1st of February. By that amendment of Mr. Agnihotri the words "the Local Government" were substituted in sub-section (1) of section 197 for the words "the authority having power to order or, as the case may be, to sanction the removal from his office of such Judge, Magistrate or public servant." This being so, it is now no longer necessary to substitute the word 'authority' for the word 'Government' in sub-section (2) of section 197. The correct word is Government.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I move:

"That clause 84, as renumbered, be omitted and the subsequent clauses be renumbered accordingly."

This amendment is due again to the passing of the Racial Distinctions Bill. It will be remembered that clause 17 of that Bill proposes to substitute another section for section 312 of the Code. That section follows exactly the words of the section inserted by this clause with the exception that it also includes a proviso "Provided that no definite number of Europeans or of Americans or of Indians shall be so prescribed." In these circumstances, Sir, it is clearly desirable that this clause should be omitted from this Bill.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I move:

"That in clause 90, as renumbered, for the words and figures 'under section 107' the words and figures 'under section 107 or under' be substituted."

Of course, in the amendment I have moved I have referred to clause 90 as in the Bill before Honourable Members and not to clause 89 as it will be after effect has been given to the amendment last accepted. I do not think, Sir, it is necessary for me to explain further as it is merely a drafting amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I move:

"That in clause 113, as renumbered, for the word 'sentenced' the word 'convicted' be substituted."

The clause 113 will be 112 when effect has been given to the last part of the amendment dealing with clause 84. This is a formal amendment intended to give effect to the intention of sub-clause (2) of clause 113. Honourable Members are no doubt aware that, generally speaking, the right of appeal is given to persons convicted and not to persons sentenced. The only case in section 408 in which a right of appeal is given to persons sentenced is in the case of persons sentenced under section 349 which cannot apply to proviso (b) to section 408. Well, the intention of the words which we propose to insert in proviso (b) is to secure that in cases where several persons are tried together the Appellate Court should be the same for all persons. If we do not change the word from 'sentenced' to 'convicted,' there are one or two cases,—for example, a case under section 562 where a person is convicted but not sentenced,—in which the intention of the sub-clause would not be given effect to.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I move:

"That in clause 120, as renumbered, for the words 'To sub-section (2) of the same section the following shall be added, namely: 'And the accused person shall be entitled to establish his innocence and ask for acquittal in showing cause against enhancement,' the following be substituted, namely:

'and after sub-section (5) of the same section the following sub-section shall be added namely:

'(6) Notwithstanding anything contained in this section, any convicted person to whom an opportunity has been given under sub-section (2) of showing cause why his sentence should not be enhanced shall, in showing cause, be entitled also to show cause against his conviction'."

The clause will be 119 of course when effect is given to the latter part of the amendment dealing with clause 84. It is clause 120 in the Bill before Honourable Members. This is really a re-draft of the amendment moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, and I hope that he will agree that it gives effect to the intention of his amendment, namely, that a convicted person who has been given an opportunity of being heard under sub-section (2) against the enhancement of his sentence shall be able to adduce arguments to show that he should never have been convicted.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, may I draw the attention of Mr. Tonkinson to the phraseology of the concluding portion of the amendment 'also to show cause against his conviction.' I understand, Sir, that in such cases a rule is issued calling upon the person convicted to show cause why his sentence should not be enhanced, and in response to that rule he appears and shews cause. If I understand the object of the amendment rightly, it means that while he is showing cause, he can draw the attention of the Judge concerned to the fact that he is entitled to an acquittal, that is to say, he can show cause against his conviction. But the amendment as worded might go to show that another rule has to be issued, that is to say, there is only one rule against the man and he shows cause why his sentence should not be enhanced. If the wording is allowed to remain however as it is, it may necessitate the issue of another rule upon him. Evidently that is not what is intended. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "It is not required.") To show cause against his conviction. (Dr. Nand Lal: "One rule will cover them both.") (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "A rule to show cause against a sentence implies both against the sentence and against the conviction.") (Dr. H. S. Gour: "It is obvious.") Well, if that is the sense I have nothing to say.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I rise to support the motion that the Criminal Procedure Code as amended be passed. I am sure, Sir, the House will realise that, having regard to the magnitude of the task which lay before it, the number of provisions which had to be amended and accepted, the time taken by the Members cannot be regarded as unnecessarily long. A great deal of learning and a great deal of scrutiny have been brought to bear upon the examination of the Bill, and the Bill, as it emerges, is certainly a far more satisfactory one than the one presented to us. Sir, if I may be permitted to do so, I should like to pay a word of tribute to my friends on this side of the House for the great care and energy displayed by them in making the law conformable to the wishes of the people. It is not possible to mention all the names, and it would be rather impertinent on my part to say much about the two veterans on this side of the House, namely, Mr. Rangachariar and Dr. Gour, who have shown such a remarkable aptitude for looking into this question so ably and so fully. Sir, I may mention, however, some younger friends who have shown great capacity in the matter. I must specially refer to my friend, Mr. Agnihotri, and to Bhai Man Singh, who tabled a large number of amendments and who have shown that they can be trusted to withdraw some of them which they knew would be unacceptable and to press only such amendments as they considered involved a great principle of law. Sir, I may also say that the two official Members who have been assisting the Leader of the House, namely, the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith and Mr. Tonkinson, have shown considerable ability; they have shown towards us great consideration in discussing these provisions. Sir, as I said, there has not been too much time taken in considering the Bill. At times, Sir, it looked as if there would be a breeze in the Chamber, at times it looked as if there would be a break-down. It seems to me that these occasional differences were due to not recognising the two standpoints from which this Code was viewed by the Government Bench on the one hand and by the non-official Members on the other. Sir, the point of view of myself and my friends was that we should enlarge the liberties of the people; I hope it will be conceded that it is a natural desire on our part who represent the people, that we should see that the law that is passed does not curtail the liberties of the subjects; naturally we were therefore anxious that our liberties should be enlarged without endangering the safety of Government. From the point of view of the Government, they were most concerned with seeing that the enforcement of law and order was in no way jeopardised. These were the two ordinary standards, one on behalf of the Government and the other on behalf of the non-official Members. It is not possible, Sir, to have in the same persons these two considerations in an equal degree. If that ever existed, there would be no necessity for a Legislative Assembly, there would be no necessity for law. Naturally one side would look at the question from the point of view of law and order and the other side from the point of view of the liberty of the subject. If this had been recognised, a great many apparent divergencies of opinion could have been tolerated; I believe, ultimately these considerations were recognised and that was the reason why we have in this measure a more liberal Bill than the one we had before—one which will be regarded as satisfactory by the people. Before leaving this part of the subject, I may refer to the assistance which has been very willingly given by a gentleman who has had considerable judicial experience, who has, as he himself said, 37 years' experience in judicial matters—I am referring to Sir Henry Stanyon. His contribution to the discussion of the Criminal Procedure Code has been most valuable both from the point of view of the Government and also from the point of view of our side. As for myself, Sir, I think the Government found me the most vulnerable of all the persons who sent in amendments. They found it very easy to throw out my amendments, they found me so pliable that they easily got me to withdraw any amendment which they did not want me to press, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not think I added much to the discussion. Sir, as I said, this Bill has emerged from the discussion in a form which would be regarded as more satisfactory to the people, and in every way a more liberalised measure than the Criminal Procedure Code which we had before. Sir, when I said that the Government Benches considered the question from the point of view of law and order, I was thinking of what I read only two or three days back, namely the life of Mr. Parnell by Mrs. Parnell. She there points out that Parnell was of opinion if there is anything which is worshipped in England, it is law and order. They regard the worship of law and order as greater than that of religion even; some one else has pointed out that a Scotchman worships his county before his religion; Parnell is reported to have said that it is only an Irishman that really worships God. Sir, in this country, whether he be a Scotchman or an Irishman or an Englishman, when he crosses the seas and comes over here, he gives up his peculiarities and is for crying out—"Order, order order"! That is the position, Sir, in India, and, when we find that such an idol has been set up, before a people who have got a large number of other idols, when we find that this idol is likely to overshadow all the other idols, we begin our little attempts to pull it down. Still, Sir, I think it will be recognised by the House that we have done something to make this Bill acceptable to the country and to advance justice. I must point out one thing. It is not the perfection of the law which comes out of this Assembly that will really matter. It is the spirit in which the Magistracy and those interested in the administration of this law work it that would really matter, and I hope Magistrates all over the country and Judges may recognise the desire on the part of both the Government and the people is that they should work the law in a fair-minded and impartial spirit and solely with a view to mete out justice. And I hope that when this movement for the separation of judicial and executive functions bears fruit a further attempt may be made to make the law more easily accessible to the people and to make justice better administered than it is at present. For at present the law is very costly in consequence of the combination of judicial and executive functions in the same persons. Sir, there is one word more I would like to say and then I will sit down. This child of ours which is emerging from this House is going to what one may call the rich aunt's house, and in that rich aunt's house attempts will be made to clothe it with a great deal of finery; I wish to sound a note of warning. If on the pretext of clothing this child with finery, any attempt is made to mutilate it, we would regard it with very great disfavour. We would disown it, if I may say so. You may do anything as regards grammar, as regards language here and there, but if you are going to mutilate this Bill in the other House, you may take it that we shall not have anything to do with it afterwards. Sir, in this connection I may ask what the Honourable the Home Member means to do with regard to clause 162. It has given the House a deal of trouble. It has taken a great deal of time, and I am inclined to think that the Government is not satisfied with it; I should like to have some indication of the intentions of the Government in regard to that clause. There is one other section also to which I might refer and that is section 526. An amendment to that section was carried at the instance of my friend Mr. Jayanti Ramayya Pantulu Garu when a large number of non-official Members were away taking part in some other matter. Sir, it was not properly discussed. It is a section in which we are much interested and unless the section is restored to what it was when it came out of the Council of State, it would be wholly unacceptable to us; and I should like to ask the Leader of the House what his intentions are regarding it. Subject to these two reservations I give my hearty support to the passing of this Bill. As I said, it has become a more liberal measure, and the country will regard it as fairly satisfactory. With these words, Sir, I support the motion that the Bill be passed.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, when during the last days of Sir William Vincent's association with the Government we felt it our duty to press for postponement of the consideration of this large and important measure we were more than tacitly told that after his departure and that of Dr. (as he was then) Tej Bahadur Sapru, there will be great difficulty in piloting this measure through the Assembly. It does not come upon me as a surprise, agreeable or otherwise, that that apprehension has been falsified and that there are in the Government the makings of good lawyers, though they take all possible and impossible opportunity of disowning anything like association with that reprehensible body. That a lawyer is nothing more than a gentleman with common sense has been amply demonstrated by some Members of the Government Bench and they have given as good fight to the professional lawyer as any professional lawyer might have done. That is an outstanding feature of the way in which the work of this Bill has been done in the Assembly. When the Bill came out of the other House—the more reasonable House as I am told it was described to be during my day's absence from the Assembly—it was supposed to be absolutely the last word and this House was considered to be extremely unreasonable for wanting to look into it more in detail and to try to tinker it, if not to tamper with it. Well, experience has shown otherwise.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Is the Honourable Member quoting from any speech on this Bill?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: I am giving what was left as a matter of general impression upon very impressionable minds like mine.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am afraid that the Honourable Member is too impressionable.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Well, I accept that, and without demur. Experience has shown otherwise, and we tremble to think what would have happened if the Act had gone forth to the country without the tinkering that this Assembly has attempted. We were not satisfied with it. One great complaint was that the Racial Distinctions Bill had not yet come. Its appearance was insistently demanded and it came. I should like to express my appreciation, if I may, of the way in which the Racial Distinctions Bill was brought in while this other Bill was in its progress. If some Members had not failed to do their duty, according to some newspapers, and gone away to attend a meeting where they were supposed to have no business to be, the passage of the Bill would probably have been slower, the Racial Distinctions Bill and the Criminal Procedure Code (Amendment) Bill would have been a good tandem to drive. Where that would have been better or not I do not propose to examine. But the Racial Distinctions Bill has come and has been passed and the Criminal Procedure Code (Amendment) Bill in the original shape that was given to it has also come and passed and the two will find a place now in the criminal statute of the country. The work of consolidation will soon have to be taken up after large amendments like those that have been made. This morning we had an illustration of what may have been unavoidably overlooked and what may have to be put right. Probably in the course of the working of the twin measures that will now find a place on the Statute Book, difficulties will be found and a consolidating measure may soon be necessary. Sir, I quite agree with those that have voiced that sentiment that it is a mistake to weaken the Magistracy, and it is a mistake to unduly restrict the police. Because some Magistrates are bad and some policemen are worse, that is no reason why we should legislate down to their level. We must try and bring them up to the level of that which is ideal law having regard to existing exigencies. Separation of judicial and executive functions of the Magistracy will certainly be a step forward in that achievement. But that is not yet wholly to be. Financial or other difficulties will stand in the way and so long as the present system continues, work of administration will have to be made acceptable to the people and helpful to the Government. Sir, often enough have we heard it pleaded in this House in favour of retention of a particular section that it has been in existence for over half a century and that the Select Committee had examined it. Neither acid test has however in many cases prevailed and it shows that the test of time is not always the best. We are progressing. We are marching forward, and liberalising influences in criminal as also in civil law have to be put in operation, slowly it may be, but surely. That has been demonstrated in this case and improvements were possible here though the Bill had been examined and improved elsewhere. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has referred to the achievements of many on his side of the House. I, Sir, should like to mention not the achievements, but the silent doings of our friend, Mr. Samarth, who is not here unfortunately owing to domestic reasons. He has been a great staying power throughout, the brake power, which is no less necessary than the motive power. Oftener than not his wise counsel has prevailed and in conjunction with him it was my privilege to appeal to this House as well as privately to Members for concentration of our attention upon the things that matter and to give the go-by to things about which a great deal might be said by one or half a dozen but which would not find acceptance with the House. I think I may fairly congratulate those who are responsible for the amendments that wise counsels ultimately prevailed; and Sir, if I may do so, I should like to thank the Chair for the assistance that it gave in the matter of making a conference possible between those who were responsible for the amendments and those who were fighting them. Round table conferences, or square table for the matter of that, are at times apt to be very helpful and it was helpful in this case in cutting down the length of debate and also to a certain extent its acrimony. Nothing like coming face to face with one another across a table and talking things over and that is how your differences ought to be brought to a minimum. That is a lesson that you ought not to forget in the new system of Government that is now coming on. Mutual understanding will often help in removing difficulties that at times may have appeared colossal. I join with my friend in hoping that when the Bill makes its second (or I do not know whether it will be the third) appearance in this House, the threat about the "reasonable Chamber" will not influence it to any appreciable extent, at least to an extent that will make this Assembly stand out for its right. Sir, I give this measure my support and congratulate both the House and the Government on its easy and satisfactory passage.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, this Bill which has just now emerged from this Assembly is a piece of legislation of considerable importance to the country. The one point on which I should like to congratulate ourselves and the country on its passing is not a point connected with individuals who had given time and bestowed their labour on the shape and form which it has now attained, but it is a point of great constitutional importance. It is now nearly 50 years roughly since Sir James Fitz James Stephen said that the Criminal Procedure Code and the Indian Penal Code were two grim presents from one nation to another. He said it with considerable pride—legitimate pride; but I say now to-day that this Bill as passed by this Assembly is not a present in the sense in which Sir James Fitz James Stephen wrote then, but it is a measure which the representatives of the people assembled in this Hall have shaped and given to the country at large. That is the point of view from which I would congratulate everyone here and the country. As for the details which have been modified in this Assembly, I for my part do not consider them to be of any great importance, and I do not think that a Procedure Code like this, technical and to be worked under the safeguards provided by the law by several branches of law, is one which could really and usefully be altered in a large Assembly like this. It must always be the work of experts, men who are acquainted with the theory and practice of law. As for the general ideas people may have in regard to particular aspects of Criminal Law, no doubt that will be taken note of by experts and I may say that certain changes made in the verbiage of some of the sections of the Code remain to be tested in the Courts when they are worked in future. Well, there are three or four points on which there has been a substantial advance or substantial liberalisation of the stringent provisions of the Code as it stands to-day. First is the question of bail. The present provisions work a great deal of hardship. The division of bailable and non-bailable offences is not based as far as I can judge on any logical ground. It is not on the ground that if an offence is heinous it is non-bailable. Some ground which it is difficult to understand has been at the bottom of the distinction. Now, under the changes which we have introduced in this Code, we have made it possible to lessen the hardship which the present law has worked. Another point on which we have altered this Bill is what is called the sanction to prosecute, that is the prosecution of a perjurer and the forger or a man who had put in false evidence in a Court of Justice. The present procedure is the Court that tries the case gives the permission, which is called the sanction, and then with the sanction on hand the person goes about threatening the other or sometimes levying even blackmail; especially in civil litigation when some Judges grant sanctions more readily these sanctions have been used to blackmail, to coerce the opponent. That has been obliterated and I believe the present law is in line with the English law. The Court itself has to take action in regard to a man who has put before it false evidence. That will minimise the blackmailing and coercing by private individuals. The third point is the much debated one and the point about which reference has already been made, that is about the copies of police diaries. I do not think that there was really any threat, nor is it likely that the alteration which the Assembly has made is so dangerous to the investigations by the police that any unnecessary trouble need be taken about it. In regard to the security sections a few slight changes have been made, but after all the security sections are worked more or less on the executive side of the administration and it is a matter of considerable doubt whether executive action should be really hampered by unnecessary restrictions. The whole trouble has arisen owing to some Magistrates having used these powers under these executive sections in a manner not contemplated by the ordinary man. Except for that, I personally cannot say that that executive action should be very much controlled, because the object is to prevent a sudden disturbance, and there any amount of restriction will not have the desired effect. There is one word, Sir, with which I would conclude. After all in whatever form we may put a law, especially a processual law, it must always depend for its due administration on the character, intelligence and the sense of justice of the men who administer it.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I did not intend to enter into the discussion on this subject to-day, but as my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has mentioned my name in connection with an amendment which has been made in this Bill, to which he takes objection, I think a word or two is necessary from me. He refers to the amendment which I proposed to section 5 of the Code. One would suppose from what he said that this amendment was carried in a more or less surreptitious way

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: No, I did not say it was carried in a surreptitious way, all I said was there was no opportunity for discussing it, as the amendment was passed when we were all away.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: This amendment was sent up by me so far back as September last, and my friends might have taken objection to it when it came up for consideration. Probably they would have vetoed it. Then, Sir, coming to the merits of the amendment. What is the amendment? The clause of the Bill, before it was amended at my instance, gave to the accused power to ask the Magistrate to adjourn the case at any time during the trial on the ground that he was going to move the High Court for a transfer of the case. It gives the accused power to compel the court to adjourn the case at any stage before the accused is actually convicted. My amendment was to the effect that this power should be given only up to the moment the accused enters upon his defence. Even as it is, it is a great improvement upon the old law. According to the old law, that is the Code that is now in force, an accused person is entitled to make his application for an adjournment only before the commencement of the hearing and even then, the Court is not bound to stop the proceedings. It can go on with the inquiry, only it must not frame a charge until the accused's application for transfer has been disposed of, or the time given for making the application has expired. According to the section as amended, the Magistrate is bound to stop all proceedings until the application for transfer is disposed of, provided the application is made at any time before the accused enters upon his defence

Mr. President: Order, order, I cannot allow the Honourable Member to go into details of that kind, for the very reason that other Honourable Members may wish to do the same, and we should be here as long as we have taken to discuss the Code already.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: All I can say in regard to what Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar said so far as this amendment was concerned, is that he views the matter from the point of view of the accused, and I have tried to view it from the point of view of the Court and the administration of justice.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): To-day, Sir, is the day of great rejoicing, since 1916 when the amendment of the criminal law was started. Thereafter, Sir, for the last six years before this Bill was brought to this Assembly, there has been amendment after amendment and they had to change the original Bill of 1916. After that, opinion was invited by the Government of India from the Local Governments and the High Courts of the Provinces in India, and there have been additional alterations. Sir, we congratulated the Government of India from the first day when these amendments were placed before this Assembly. I think it was in 1916, when this crowded Assembly had no existence, but the Reforms were contemplated and the Secretary of State was about to start from England to investigate the matter and to introduce the Reforms. After that, the Government of India placed before the Council of State the amendments which we were considering from the 15th of January this year, as it is stated on the Bill "as passed by the Council of State." The Council of State made very little, or no amendments in the Bill which was presented to them. Those elder politicians did not take any trouble to change or amend the Bill. However the Bill was brought in here for our consideration on the 15th of January. On that day, Sir, I think I was the first to put forward the objection that this Bill could not be considered because the Report of the Racial Distinctions Committee had not been placed before us. In my own Province they were considering how to give effect to the separation of the judicial and executive functions, and I can assure this House that my own Province is still contemplating this separation, and the question of how to give effect to it. Sir, therefore the baby of our Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, which now is going to become a Member of the big family, has got to be dismantled. A new tailor will have to cut its cloth to fit its body. It has got to be altered and it has got to be changed.

The second point on which I wish to touch relates to my friend Mr. Pantulu's amendment under section 526 with regard to the transfer of a case from one Magistrate's Court to another Magistrate's Court. I suppose, Sir, it was a very thin House on the afternoon of the 12th or 13th February last when Dr. Annie Besant's Conference of moderate sections was held at the Eastern Hostel at Raisina. Many of our able and energetic Members of this Assembly including my Honourable friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Cries of "He was not here then.") He was not here nor was he in the House—Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and many other friends, whose names have been so eloquently mentioned by himself the President of the Democratic Party, were not in the House at the time and Mr. Pantulu's amendment was brought in and agreed to. Great dissatisfaction was felt on this side of the House that the non-official Benches were all empty. Sir, the transfer of a case from a Magistrate's Court at this stage, that is to say, after the charge has been framed, when the Magistrate comes to the conclusion that a prima facie case has been established against a particular accused whom he is going to convict shows the true intention of the Magistrate and his attitude is felt by the accused who does not expect to get fair justice at the hands of the Magistrate.

Mr. President: Order, order. I told the Honourable Member on my left that he had better not go into detail, and I must give the same warning to the Honourable Member himself.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, I quite realise that position. That being so, the poor accused gets no justice and the poor country appreciates very little the baby that is now crawling in the courtyard of India.

Now, Sir, as I have already said, the Criminal Law Amendment Bill has got to come again after a short time before this Assembly, and I do not think the time is far off when the Honourable the Home Member with the great assistance of the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson and the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, the Secretary of the Legislative Department, who piloted the Bill will have to labour under the same old thing, and I am afraid the public, the foster parents and the many uncles, who have assisted in lifting up the baby and introducing it to the country, will find there are many difficulties in it. At all events, Sir, when the birth of a baby takes place, it is really a source of great pleasure to many, and I congratulate from the bottom of my heart the Honourable the Home Member and his lieutenant, the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, who have taken so much trouble to bring in this Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I see some signs of, I will not say of impatience, but of a desire on the part of the House to see this discussion brought to an end. And I know that there are many Members in the House who feel that, to use a term which I have heard to-day, a series of complimentary speeches occupies unduly the time of a House which has other and urgent business before it. If, therefore, I make a few remarks, they shall be as brief as possible. I should regret if we on the Government Benches had ever really given Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary reason for his impression that we resented any attempt "to tinker or to tamper" with this Bill. In some years to come, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary will be almost as old as I am and, when he reaches that mature age, he will rejoice to find that he has put behind him the tendency to yield too quickly to impressions. But when we put this Bill forward, we felt that it had a long history of careful and conscientious work behind it. The original framing of the Bill occupied many years of investigation and discussion; then followed the long and pious labour of the Lowndes Committee, succeeded again by long noting in the Secretariat, and finally it must not be forgotten that many important amendments were also made by the Joint Select Committee of this and the other House. We put the Bill before the House on the basis of all that previous work. Many of us foresaw that this was exactly the type of measure in which the House was likely to take great interest, not only because the Assembly contained so large an amount of legal talent, but because there is possibly no one measure which is of more general interest throughout the length and breadth of the country. I have been told to-day that in England we make a fetish of law and order. If so, there are good reasons for it; for we know that no State can be stable, we know that it can make no steady progress, political, material, or moral save in an atmosphere of law and order. Those who reflect on the state of India a short hundred years ago, will realize that India should have cause to congratulate itself that it was brought into association with a people which had as its ideal the establishment of order under the sanction of law; and if we have attached great importance to this development in the past, it is because it constituted a primary necessity for the ordered advance of India. I do not say that the people of India are, as compared with other people, of a criminal tendency or nature; but there is no doubt that the spirit of law and order as we understand it does not prevail over very large parts and among very many classes of India; and the consequence is that large classes of people are brought into continual contact with the Criminal Courts. It is essential therefore that our Procedure Code should be in a form which will at once secure justice to the accused person and the preservation of the ordinary standards of order in the community. It is easy to recognize the great importance that this Bill presents to the House, and I do not think that we have ever shown impatience at the time occupied in discussing it or can have given any impression that in our opinion the time devoted to it has been wasted. That the time has been long, the House itself recognises; but whatever one may have thought when sitting here in the course of debate and controversy on the subject, when that controversy is over, we must all admit that the Bill constitutes a measure on which the House was justified in spending long and anxious days. (Hear, hear).

My friends have stated, and with some pride, that the House effected many important amendments. I will not for a minute depreciate the value of the work done by the House, nor the care and industry of those whose names were mentioned by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar; but I must in justice once again recall to the House that much of the improvement effected in the law has been the work of those who laboured on the Bill before it came to the House. Let me take, for instance, such items as the extension of bail provision; the substitution—I refer to an item which Mr. Subrahmanayam also mentioned—the substitution of complaint for sanction; the enhanced power to release on probation, or again the provisions regarding juvenile courts. If the House finds reason to congratulate itself in regard to its own efforts, I say these are substantive improvements in the Act for which the House must also thank others.

And now I come to the substance of what I have to say. I have been warned that if I attempt to have this Bill mutilated in another House—I did not quite catch the somewhat ornate alias which Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar applied to that House, but Sir Deva Prasad spoke of a more reasonable House, or as Mr. Kabeer-ud-din Ahmed said, drawing on a still richer fount of metaphor, if I attempt to dismember . . . (Mr. J. P. Colelingam: "Dismantle.") dismantle this baby, then this House will resent it. I wish to deal with that question with that candour which I have always tried to exhibit in approaching this House. There are clauses in this Bill—few in number but still important—which we feel to be unsound. Let me take the most important of those—I mean the amendment to section 162. That has been referred to to-day both by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and by others. We are not, I think, alone in holding that the clause cannot stand as the House has left it. Indeed I have been shown amendments drafted in the last few days from more than one quarter of the House which demonstrate clearly that there are others besides ourselves who think that some further amendment of the clause as left by the House will be necessary. Let me say at once that if we had not put forward our Criminal Procedure Amendment Bill, and if a Bill had been put forward and passed by this House giving to that section the form in which it has now emerged from this Chamber, I myself should have felt it my duty to advise the Governor General not to assent to that Bill. The reason is simple. Government can be no enemy to placing in the hands of the accused every material which will secure justice; but equally the Executive Government has a primary duty to see that the course of investigation and detection of crime is not impaired. Great as our obligation may be in respect of securing justice to the accused person, one cannot at the same time forget the necessity of protecting the ordinary public from criminal attack on person, life or property. Now we hold, and hold strongly, that in its present form this clause would impair the detection of crime, and to that extent would be a source of real injury to the ordinary public. We hold further that in its present form it will have further undesirable result, in that it might drive the police to adopt methods in recording statements which would in the end make those statements less useful for the Courts and therefore impair the course of justice. Holding those views, I do not think that any Executive Government would be acting within its duty if it recommended to the Governor General that he should assent to a Bill containing the provisions as they have emerged from this Assembly. We must therefore attempt to get some amendment of this clause, for if we do not, and if my representations to the Governor General in regard to the Bill are approved by him, then the whole of the labour which the various Committees have lavished on this Bill, and the time that the House itself has spent on it, the whole of that labour will be wasted, for the Bill will not come into operation at all.

There are other clauses of somewhat less importance. They will be found in clause 47 and clause 110 of this Bill as renumbered in the copy now before the House. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has referred to clause 146 (8) of the Bill—I mean Mr. Pantulu's amendment in regard to transfers. Did I hear from Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar or was it from some other Member of the House, that it might perhaps be advisable to amend that section in another place?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Yes, I suggested that to the House.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member has suggested it. He will remember, I hope, when I take action in regard to another section that it is possible to improve the wording of the Bill as it leaves this House without in any way impinging on the dignity, or the privileges or the prestige of this House.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Without impairing the substance.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Well, Sir, as regards the transfer clause, 146 (8), I have only to say this that if Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's friends in another place do propose an amendment, we shall deal with that amendment with all the delicacy and circumspection that the case requires.

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

I have little more to say. I believe that as the joint result of much labour and much care this Code is a substantial improvement on its predecessor. Our Code is a matter of primary interest to the people of India; I might indeed say it is of primary interest to a large number of people in the Far East, for this present of ours to India (as it has been described to-day) has been copied largely in many other countries, a fact of which I think we may be not a little proud. I can only hope that the final fate of this Bill, when all our discussions on it have closed, will be such as will be equally satisfactory to Government and to this House. Let me repeat that we do not wish to make over much of a fetish of law and order; we must, however, preserve our responsibilities in regard to the maintenance of proper safeguards for the protection of people against crime. The sense of law and order is not created or indeed maintained only by legislation, it is fostered by a growing sense of the necessity of civilised and social methods among the population itself; but if your legislation is satisfactory, then it is a powerful adjunct to the growth of such feelings. Their growth is thwarted unless the population at large has confidence in the power of the administration to protect them from crime: if it has no such confidence, it has a contempt for the law and seeks its own methods to protect its property, its life or its honour. All that we can hope to do here is to hand on as perfect an instrument as possible to our courts and to our investigating agency.

My final word is this. I have heard in the course of these debates much criticism both of our courts and of our investigating and prosecuting agency. I wonder if it is really necessary after all for me to speak a word on their behalf. I wonder if it is really necessary for me to repeat here the tale of the great work that is done by the police, their loyalty to the State and to the public, a loyalty so great that even if you can occasionally point to some untoward incidents, yet the benefit on the whole far outweighs any defect that has brought them under criticism. (Hear, hear.) Again, is it not really necessary to speak here on behalf of our Magistrates? They are no importation into India; nine-tenths of our Magistrates are Indians themselves, officers of our provincial services, men whom we look upon not only as the backbone of our administration, but as the backbone of justice itself. I think it should be far from any of us to speak any word which will go out from here and convey to them the impression that we mistrust either their capacity or their integrity, or that we do not value the enormous work which they do for the country. That is my final word, and in that word, whatever differences we may have about any detail of legislation, I am confident that the House will agree.

The motion, that the Bill, as amended, be passed, was adopted.

THE INDIAN PENAL CODE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

(AMENDMENT OF SECTIONS 362 AND 366.)

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): Sir, I beg to move that the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to amend sections 362 and 366 of the Indian Penal Code be taken into consideration.

I need not perhaps remind the House of the circumstances in which this piece of legislation came to be placed before it. It was of course necessary in order to implement the Resolution of the House by which it agreed to adhere to the Convention on what is known (inaccurately though I retain the term for the present) as the White Slave traffic. We accepted an obligation to legislate on two points, first, to make it penal to procure a minor girl for illicit intercourse by any means whatever and not only by force or compulsion or otherwise; and secondly, to make it penal to procure for illicit intercourse a woman of any age by force, compulsion, intimidation or abuse of authority. When the Select Committee came to examine the Bill, it thought that it was capable of amendment in two respects. They considered firstly that one of the clauses went somewhat further than was required, and secondly, that it was possible to comply somewhat more nearly to the terms of the Convention than the original draft had done. We have explained clearly in the Report of the Select Committee the exact points, to which I am referring. We therefore re-drafted the Bill, but the re-draft in itself has made no change in substance. I see from the amendments which we have before us that the only one point of principle in the Bill (which it has been previously debated in the House) will again come for discussion on the floor of the House. I therefore do not refer to it at this stage; we shall have ample opportunity of discussing it subsequently. At this stage I only move that the report of the Select Committee be taken into consideration.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I move that in clause 2 the words "or of abuse of authority" be omitted.

These words are rather vague. There may be authority of many kinds, such as natural authority, official authority and other kinds of authority; natural authority would mean the authority of the parents, of the father or mother or other natural guardian; and if that kind of authority is meant I think it will be very difficult to ascertain where the abuse lies. Take the case of a girl who is reading in a particular school and the school mistress sends the girl to attend some meeting or a tennis party or to some church to attend prayers, and there she meets some young men and somehow or other gets into bad company and is seduced for the purpose mentioned in the Bill. There is this difficulty. It may be said that the girl went to such a place, and having gone to such a place, was seduced. It may be wrongly construed against the school mistress for abuse of authority. Probably it may be said that no body accompanied the girl, and the girl having gone alone, such an occasion arose. It will be very difficult to put a proper interpretation on the words "or abuse of authority". It is liable to be abused in other ways as well. If you put a strict interpretation on these words, you may say that the natural authority did not exercise proper care or caution and so there is an abuse of authority. We know that in some societies girls are allowed to go out, there may be abuse, there may not be abuse of such a system. But it will be very difficult to fix the guilt of a person in authority. I suggest the omission of the words 'or of abuse of authority' in clause 2.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I would explain very briefly why the words 'or abuse of authority' were placed in the Bill. They are necessary in order to meet our obligations under the Convention. Its Article II runs as follows:

"Whoever in order to gratify the passions of another person attempts by fraud, by means of violence, threat, abuse of authority or any other method of compulsion, to procure, entice, etc."

I cannot agree with my Honourable friend that these words constitute any sort of danger. I do not indeed think that the cases put by him are in any way relevant to the section as drafted. Abuse of authority could not be argued against any person who had merely been guilty of carelessness or omission to provide proper precautions, for this possibility was evidently at the back of Mr. Misra's apprehension. He will see that it is necessary not only that a person should be guilty of abuse of authority, but that by so doing he should induce any woman to go from any place with intent that she may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced or seduced, etc.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, I have only a very few words to say. I have considered this amendment carefully, and I do not think it can be supported. 'Abuse of authority' might be necessary in this country to cover a case which could not easily be covered by anything else in this section. One illustration is,—I am sorry to take it after all that has been said here about the police,—that a police constable might abuse his authority to induce a woman to go for some such purposes. The only word on which I wish to say anything in connection with this clause is the word 'induces'. When you cause a person to move by force or by criminal intimidation you do not induce that person to go; because, to my mind, the word 'induces' involves some form of persuasion, and therefore it seems inconsistent with criminal intimidation and compulsion. When you compel a person, it seems to me that you do not induce. But so far as the amendment before the House goes, I think my friend will be well advised to drop it.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I venture to add a word or two to what has fallen from my Honourable friend on my left (Sir Henry Stanyon). The word 'induces' to which attention has been drawn by him is qualified by what follows 'with intent that she may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be forced or seduced' etc. Now what was intended to be suppressed by the Convention was that any body should exercise his or her will on the mind of the girl concerned in order that she might be seduced or forced to have illicit intercourse; the words "abuse of authority or any other method of compulsion" supply another qualification to the words "forced or reduced to illicit intercourse, it may be, with another person". Such compulsion when brought about by the abuse of authority, official authority or parental authority or any other kind of authority is within the meaning of the Convention, and has been made punishable by the section, that is to say, if he or she acts in the particular way contemplated by the section. Clause (2) of the Bill suggests a form of criminality which ought to be suppressed, and which it is the intention of the Convention to suppress. My submission to the House is that the word 'induces' when it is coupled with what follows does not imply any innocent act of inducement on the part of the person who induces. As a member of the Select Committee, I venture to say that these words were carefully considered, and from the point of view I now place before the House, there does not seem to be any cause for apprehension with regard to the drafting of this section.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, with your permission, I beg to withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, I move that in clause 2, in the proposed paragraph of section 366 after the words "method of compulsion" insert the words "direct or indirect".

So the section will read in this way if my amendment is accepted, namely: "And, whoever by means of criminal intimidation as defined in this Code or of abuse of authority or any other method of compulsion, direct or indirect, induces any woman", etc. To meet certain cases I have proposed the addition of these words 'direct or indirect'. For instance, in a house there is a girl, and a man outside takes a fancy to her. Somehow or other he gets her dismissed from that house by some other man. Then she goes to another place, and there too he does something else of the kind till that girl comes into his clutches out of sheer helplessness. So, to avoid all these things, I think it is necessary that the words 'direct or indirect' should be added.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: These words "or any other method of compulsion" seem sufficiently wide, and if they are not in themselves sufficiently wide, we think such cases as Mr. Sarfaraz Hussain Khan has in view could be sufficiently met under the definition of 'abatement'.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 2 was added to the Bill.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, I beg to move the following amendment which stands in my name:

"In clause 3, in the proposed section 366A, for the word 'sixteen' substitute the word 'eighteen'."

Sir, as the Honourable the Home Member has said in his speech, the principle of the amendment which I have moved was discussed in this House last year. The Members will remember that, in the Conventions of the League of Nations on this subject, there are two important articles. The first article is intended to prevent traffic in minor girls even though the girl may have consented to sell herself. The second article is intended to prevent traffic in women when there is fraudulent means or violence employed in order to seduce the woman. Now, the difference between the two articles is this. In the case of the first article, even when the girl gives her consent, it is an offence to traffic in such a girl if she is a minor. Therefore, the chief point of importance between the two sections is the consent of the girl. It clearly shows that, in order that the girl should be able to give her consent to sell her body, it is necessary not only that her body or physical functions should have been developed or matured, but it is necessary that her judgment should be also matured in order that she should be able to give her consent for selling her body. Not only that, but it is also necessary that her character is fully developed before she is given the right to consent to sell her body. It is on this ground that I want the House to support my amendment. Now, Sir, when this question was discussed last year, several arguments were brought forward in favour of retaining the age of 16 instead of the 18, or 21 which I proposed at that time and which is also accepted by European countries. The first argument used is that in India girls attain to maturity early. Sir, that may be true or it may not be true as regards physical maturity. It may be true in the case of physical maturity, but what we are considering in this section is not physical maturity, we are considering maturity of judgment and development of character. We are considering here whether a girl of 16 will be able to defend herself against fraudulent attempts of other people or not. Whether she is in a position to give her consent to sell her body or not. Therefore, the chief point of importance is not physical maturity at all. The point of importance is maturity of judgment and development of character, and I do not think anyone here will say that in India girls attain maturity of judgment and maturity of character earlier than in Europe. Therefore, I do not know why we should make that difference. Sir, the second argument used was that our social customs differ. Sir, as regards this argument, I know that in India girls and boys marry early. But we have to remember that in this section we are not touching the marital relations between girls and their husbands at all. We are here dealing with the relations of a girl who is being seduced by a person in order that her body may be sold to a third man. Therefore, social customs are not touched here at all. I do not know of any customs here in this country where any people will allow or tolerate the selling of girls on account of social usages. Therefore we need not take into consideration the argument about social customs. We are not violating any social customs even if we increase the age from 16 to 18. Sir, the third argument used at that time by the then Home Member was that in India public opinion may not be in favour of raising that age from 16 to 18. Sir, Government since that time has collected the public opinion in different provinces as expressed by different bodies interested in this question. And, if Government and the Select Committee had given effect to the opinion expressed by the people consulted, Government and the Select Committee would have accepted the amendment which I am proposing. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "No, no.") The Honourable the Home Member says "No, no!" I am prepared to prove that I am quite accurate in my statement. Sir, out of the Governments consulted, the North-West Frontier Province, the Punjab, Bihar and Orissa, Assam, Bombay and the Central Provinces have either proposed the age of 18 or 21. All of these 6 Governments have found that the age of 16 is not the proper age and either the age of 18 or even 21 is the proper age. (Dr. Nand Lal: "Not the Punjab.") Even the Punjab. The only major provinces that have consented to retaining the age at 16 are Bengal, Madras and the United Provinces. Sir, in order to convince the House, the House will excuse me if I read to them a few quotations:

North-West Frontier Province.—"The majority of Indian opinion consulted in this Province would appear to favour an age-limit of 18 years, but in most cases the suggestion is offered with diffidence and I am satisfied that a higher age-limit would receive wide support. I consider that in this matter conformity with the practice of other countries is desirable for many reasons and I recommend therefore that the limit be fixed at 21 years."

Burma.—"Subject to anything which other Local Governments may have to urge, the Lieutenant-Governor would be disposed to support Dr. Gour's proposal to compromise by fixing the age at 18—as a first step, if the Government of India are not prepared to sign the Convention as it stands."

Bihar and Orissa.—"The Governor in Council considers that the age of 18 years is the most suitable limit for India to adopt, in view of the fact that puberty is attained in this country at an earlier age than in Europe or America. Under the India Majority Act, 1875, 18 years is the age of majority, except when a guardian has been appointed by the Court."

Assam.—"His Excellency the Governor in Council feels that the matter is one on which Indian opinion should prevail, and the Indian Members of this Government including the Honourable Minister, consider that the Convention of 1921 may be accepted as it stands and the age fixed at 21."

Central Provinces.—"For these purposes the Judicial Commissioner considers that there is no possibility of objection to the raising of the 'age of consent' to 21 years."

Punjab.—"On the whole, the Governor in Council considers an age-limit of 18 years a reasonable compromise, since it has the advantage of conforming with the age of majority as fixed by the Indian Majority Act, 1875 (Act IX of 1875)."

(The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "Do they refer to this section?" Mr. N. M. Joshi: "Yes".)

Bombay.—"Opinions elicited indicate strong preponderance in favour of accepting for India age twenty-one adopted by European parties to Convention. Governor in Council concurs and recommends adhesion to Convention without reservation as to a special age-limit for India."

So, these 6 Governments are in favour of the amendment proposed by me and there are only 3 major provinces who are against it. Therefore, on the whole public opinion in India is in favour of raising that age from 16 to 18 and in some cases there is public opinion in favour of raising the age-limit even to 21. Sir, there is moreover an advantage in this. By putting the age at 16 we are only reducing the age of majority by 2. The Act of Majority in India, which is really an Act setting down the age at which the consent of a party becomes valid, lays down the age of 18 and I do not know why in this case we should reduce that age from 18 to 16. I, therefore, hope that, as there is great support for the amendment which I have moved and strong reasons in its favour, the House will accept my amendment.

Mr. J. P. Cotelingam (Nominated: Indian Christians): Sir, I am strongly in favour of the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Joshi. It is in conformity with the law as regards the age of majority. As Honourable Members know, at the age of 16, a girl's mind is not mature enough to enable her to form an independent judgment especially in the critical position in which she may find herself. If the age cannot be raised to 21 according to the International Convention I trust that the compromise arrived at by the amendment of Mr. Joshi will be accepted and that instead of 16 being the age-limit the House will agree to its being raised to 18.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, this clause gave considerable trouble to the Select Committee. This question was very carefully considered. There are certain aspects of the question which weighed with the Committee in keeping the age at 16. Honourable Members will notice that this clause runs:

"Whoever, by any means whatsoever, induces any minor girl under the age of sixteen years to go from any place (for the purpose).....shall be guilty of the offence."

It would apply even to the parent making an arrangement for the future happiness of his or her daughter. (Laughter.) Honourable Members may laugh, but they do not realise the unfortunate difficulties which a certain class of people in this country labour under. I mean the Devadasis. Daughters of those unfortunate people cannot find suitable marriage. That is, people in caste would not marry those girls. I know, Sir, many a case where suitable alliances have been effected in the case of these unfortunate people in the Southern Presidency, and I am sure it is also common in other parts of the country. (Honourable Members: "No, no.") If it is not, I will confine myself to the case of the South. What happens is, as these girls cannot find wedlock, the mothers of these girls arrange with a certain class of Zemindars—big landlords—that they should be taken into alliance with the Zemindar, and they often lead honourable lives. That is to say, they are husband and wife and the issues of such an alliance have been recognised to have heritable rights in property.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Are they non-Brahmans?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I said that this is among a large class of landowners in the South. There are reported cases—Ramamani case is one such—where the issues of such an alliance have been given rights of inheritance to property. Although this is not strictly called marriage, it is still a low form of marriage which is recognised in that community and by increasing the age to 18, you will be preventing these alliances taking place. Honourable Members will remember that under the Hindu Law and under the Muhammadan Law, the age of majority is not 18. The age of majority as 18 has been introduced by the Age of Majority Act only for certain purposes. Act IX of 1875 says:

"Whereas, in the case of persons domiciled in British India, it is expedient to prolong the period of non-age"

The period of non-age under the Hindu law is 16. Honourable Members apparently have forgotten their Hindu law. They have forgotten that under their own system of law under which they are living, but for the Majority Act the age of majority would be 16, and therefore, the Legislature thought fit for certain purposes to extend the period of non-age. So the period of non-age is 16 and it is extended by the Age of Majority Act only for certain purposes. That Act also says:

"Nothing herein contained shall affect the capacity of any person to act in the following matters (namely), Marriage, Dower, Divorce, and Adoption."

So that, for purposes of marriage, the age of consent is 16 under the law as it stands, and under the Muhammadan law it is even less. Under the Muhammadan law, as soon as a girl attains puberty, she is considered an adult. (Mr. Mahmood Schamnad Sahib Bahadur: "Their age of puberty may be even 18.") That is absolutely rare. The period of non-age is still less. (An Honourable Member: "For marriage, not traffic.") For the purpose of marriage, for the purpose of dower, for the purpose of adoption, even now the age of majority is 16. Does my Honourable friend contend that if in the case of adoption you attribute sound judgment to a person of the age of 16, and for the purpose of marriage you attribute sound judgment to a person of 16, and for the purpose of divorce also you attribute sound judgment to a person of 16; that in a case like this, a girl of 16 should not be presumed to be able to take care of herself? I know modern ideas no doubt. But you have to take circumstances as they are in this country. Can you deny that girls of 16 in this country are able to take care of themselves and that they have got judgment? In fact, does not the law as it stands now trust them with judgment?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: For marriage.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Very well. Also for divorce. Please remember that. And also for the purpose of adoption.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Not for "alliance."

(An Honourable Member: "Not for mis-alliance.")

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The Act further says:

"Nothing herein contained shall affect the religion or religious rites and usages of any class of Her Majesty's subjects in India, or the capacity of any person who before this Act came into force has attained majority under the law applicable to him."

Therefore, it certainly applies to certain cases. Why should my Honourable friend stick to 18? He might as well have proposed 21. Does he think that there is such a difference between a girl of 16 and a girl of 18 in this matter?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Oh, yes.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, on the other hand, the danger will be, as we all know in this country, that whereas a girl of 16 or after she has attained the age of 16 may be able to find an honourable alliance, she loses all chance of finding that alliance after she has passed a certain age. I need not mention the details here. It is well-known that girls in this country at the age of 16 are mothers oftentimes of two babies. It is a very common factor to be taken into account; and, on the other hand, if you enact the section with the age 18 there, even parents cannot (Mr. N. M. Joshi: "Sell.") You are not going to provide their livelihood. You may rest perfectly assured that you are not going to improve society by these ideals. It will all look very well on paper. As a matter of fact, you know the impossibility, the difficulties, the practical difficulties, which poor mothers will experience in keeping their girls in their houses. It will all very well no doubt look nice to the outside world. But it will be a dead letter. If you make it impossible for persons to abide by the law, there is no use in creating a law, which must be disobeyed, which will be disobeyed, human nature being what it is. Joshis will not be available in every household to guard the household. Let us remember that. You have to recognise practical difficulties as they exist; and if you raise the age from 16 to 18, you will be violating your Hindu Law and the Muhammadan Law as to the age of majority. (Voices: "No, no.") You may cry "No," "no." I have said what I had to say. If it does not commend itself, by all means do as you please. This is the difficulty which I felt when I yielded not to raising the age from 16 to 18; but if that is your will, you can impose your will on the law and you cannot impose your will on the household. But that is the danger which you have to guard yourself against.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, I was waiting for Mr. Rangachariar to bring out what, I am told, was in the Select Committee a legal difficulty, and that is the fact that the age of 16 appears in other portions of our penal law and that there would be difficulty in introducing the somewhat unfamiliar figure of 18 only in this particular place. But here again I say, we are attempting to level up things. When Mr. Joshi's amendment is carried—as I sincerely trust it will be—the next time we take up the amendment of our penal law, the same figure 18 will find place where the figure 16 now obtains. Sir, amiable landlords in some parts of the country, I am told, would probably prefer a lower age than 16. Criminal jurisprudence is replete with cases where such desires have been borne eloquent testimony to, and I do not know whether because of that there should not be a movement towards lowering the age. If what Mr. Rangachariar has referred to amounts to marriage, let it be declared to be so, and marriage is protected. We are having liberalising influences all along the line and if these "honourable" alliances . . . (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "Not honourable, but alliance.") I am glad my friend has drawn the distinction now, for I was listening to his speech with care and the word "honourable" does find place there, as the official report will no doubt show. Sir, reference has been made to the Bengal opinion. I am sorry if I cannot support the Government of Bengal there. Without that opinion in my hand, I was almost becoming a little nervous about my Government. But having looked at it again, what do I find there? The Bengal Government says that six bodies were consulted; four never cared to reply and two, I believe, including the Indian Association, with which I happen to be connected, plead for raising the age to 18. I miss my friend, Colonel Gidney, here; he would be interested to know that the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Association in supporting the Resolution adopted by the Legislative Assembly on the 7th of February, 1922, suggests the limit of 16 years. What can the Government of Bengal under those circumstances do? They had only to voice public opinion as it appeared to them to be on the papers before them, and that is why "the Government of Bengal consider it important that the Government of India should not appear to be forcing the pace or insisting on a standard age in advance of general opinion; and accordingly they advise that in the legislation the age of sixteen should be taken, and that it should be left to the Legislative Assembly to consider the raising of that age." That is exactly what we are doing now. Therefore, Sir, I am no longer nervous about my Government. As a good Government, it has simply placed before the Government of India what appeared to be the case on the nathi. Reference has been made by Mr. Rangachariar to the question of violating the Hindu Law. Not many years ago I heard a Maharaja Kumar in Bengal, taking some interest in public affairs and a very loyal gentleman, saying that it is absolutely disloyal for Hindus not to marry widows. What was the basis for that assertion? He said, "Why, the Widow Re-marriage Act has been passed. Widow marriage is legal and it is illegal not to do that which is legal." In the same way Mr. Rangachariar says the Hindu Law would be violated if we enact 18 as the age for the purposes we are considering because for certain purposes Hindu law declares 16 to be the age of majority. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "It does not do that.") Anyway, British Law for lesser purposes has declared 18 to be the age, for purposes of bartering away property. Does my Honourable friend say that for purposes of bartering away virtues, the Hindu Law declares the legitimate age to be 16 and that we would be violating the Hindu Law by raising the age for these purposes from 16 to 18? I am sure he will not go as far as that. Then, Sir, with regard to age in the case of marriage, that is and has always been a moot point. Hindu society is interested in that question and we have recently agreed to say nothing further about it here for the present. But in the matter of marriage, there are protections which do not exist in the present case; is it not common knowledge all over the country that although people are married young, marital functions are suspended to as late in life as possible? There are cases of abuse. There are infant mothers; and there are other abuses. But anyone who knows society, as we know Bengal society, knows that the Bengal mother and the Bengal grandmother take care that abuses shall be as few as possible. Well, Sir, where is the mother, the grandmother and the father and the others who form our marital bureau to take care of the daughter whose virtue is being bartered away at a tender age for the purpose of happiness, as Mr. Rangachariar has called it, for the purpose of establishing an alliance that may be too late after sixteen? I am sorry, Sir, the question of Devadasis has been at all introduced here. It has been claimed that the Devadasi system is a religious institution which shall not be interfered with and if abuses have grown there, those abuses must be got rid of with a ruthless hand. If what we have heard to-day is the concomitant of the Devadasi system, I am afraid Dr. Gour will find more support when he moves in the matter again. The Devadasi system is there and if alliances of the kind suggested have to be formed, they will have to be formed at 18 and not at 16 unless marital appearance can be given to that sort of alliance. It has been pointed out by Mr. Joshi that when we are dealing with section 366B, the age is 21. For this purpose, I say what is good enough for outside India is good enough for India also. The present motion however is not for raising the age to 21, it is a compromise at 18, and I think we ought to accept that amendment, if possible unanimously, or at any rate by a majority.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: As I am not a malign Madras landlord, and as I do not think I have ever in my life seen a Devadasi, and am certainly not in any way interested in the class, I hope I may be permitted to give my opinion on this amendment without incurring a charge of interest or partiality. I wish to explain to the House why I, as a member of the Select Committee, thought that we should retain the age of 16 years instead of raising it to 18. I do not wish to use any arguments based on what I may call a high moral plane; I merely wish to put certain common-sense views before the Assembly. The exact offence which is hereby created is procurement. Now, procurement is not necessarily a continuing offence, nor does it necessarily refer to a trade. I call the attention of the House to the fact that one single act is sufficient to bring a man within the scope of this section. That is to say, if a servant, at the request of a master, calls in a woman to a man's house, for illicit intercourse, then if that prostitute turns out to be under 16 or under 18, as the case may be according as you decide the law, he is guilty under this Act. Now it seemed to me, as I think to some others, that where you are giving so wide an extension to your law, you should proceed with some caution. You are creating a new crime. You are bringing thereby a large number of people not only under the criminal law, but under police action, and prudence dictates that when you do this you should exercise the greatest care. You have to deal again, not necessarily with a cultivated society, but with a law which is to apply all over India, to backward people, even to aborigines. That is to say, if I may frame concrete instances, if a man were to act as a go-between between a Bhil girl and a man who wanted her to go and live with him, and if he was successful in persuading that girl to go and live with that man, then, according to Mr. Joshi, if the girl was under 18, he would fall within the clutches of this law.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Quite right.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: That girl if under 18 might be a mother, might be a widow, and could by no means be described as not having arrived at years of discretion; nevertheless the go-between, it might be the village barber, following the practice in the Punjab, or it might be a woman who was acting as go-between following the practice elsewhere, could be prosecuted under this section if the girl or the widow were under 18 years of age. Then again I was very much influenced by what was said by Burma. Now the Judicial Commissioner of Burma very rightly pointed out that what we were proposing to punish here was not the man who engaged in illicit intercourse with the girl, but the go-between.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Not if he is innocent.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: My Honourable friend may judge between the innocent parties as he likes; I am putting the practical and common-sense view. There are many cases in which a go-between is employed to induce a girl to go away and live with a man whom she may subsequently marry. The immediate purpose, however, is not marriage, and yet that go-between, if the girl is under 18 years of age, will become a criminal and subject to 10 years' imprisonment. This is an immense extension of the possible scope of prosecution and even blackmail. Those instances struck one as indicating a great need of caution in this legislation. Again, when we look at the Indian Penal Code, we find that our law for what seem to be very much graver offences, indicates the age of 16 years as the age of judgment for penal purposes. Take section 372:

"Whoever sells, lets to hire, or otherwise disposes of any minor under the age of sixteen years with intent that such minor shall be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or for any unlawful and immoral purpose, or knowing it to be likely that such minor will be employed or used for any such purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine."

Now that is a very much graver offence than what is contemplated here; in this case a man is actually selling a minor for purposes of prostitution. In the case contemplated by our Bill all that the man does is to act as a go-between between a girl of 16 or 18 as the case may be, and the man she is going to live with. Or again, take section 373. There again it is a question of buying a minor for the purposes of prostitution, or for any unlawful or immoral purpose. In all these cases the age of 16 years is laid down as the period at which a girl is assumed to arrive at years of discretion. I say that in view of the existing proscriptions of our Penal Code, it seemed to me illogical for the purpose of this offence only to raise the age to 18 years, and particularly when this offence in itself was being created for the first time with the result that we should be bringing a very large number of persons for the first time under the criminal law and under police action. We in the Select Committee referred, as Mr. Joshi has done, to the opinions of Local Governments in the matter. Now I was rude enough to put to Mr. Joshi a question whether the opinions of Local Governments which he was quoting referred to this section as drafted or not. He thought they did. I think they do not. What we put to the Local Governments was the question of complying with the Convention generally; and I think that the opinions will show that they viewed the Convention generally as intended to prevent a traffic in girls between different countries. Here we are considering a specific offence, namely, acting as a go-between or procurer between a girl and a man. I firmly believe myself that if this section were put to the Local Governments and they were asked whether, for the purpose not of preventing a general traffic in girls, but of penalising isolated acts of procuring, whether for that purpose the age of 16 or 18 might be taken, then I think their opinion would not be so enthusiastic for the age of 18 or 21 as Mr. Joshi would have us believe. Even as it is, I may point out that in numerous cases, and, particularly I may note in regard to judicial officers, a note of caution has been struck. They obviously felt that the country is not yet ripe for an advance so great as that, and that is my own opinion. I put it that in all social legislation you must make your beginning, but your beginning should be a modest one, because, if legislation is to be effective, you must carry the common feeling of the country with you. Your legislature is nugatory unless you can do so. Your social laws must always be a little in advance of retrograde or uninformed opinion, but do not go so far in advance of it that public opinion generally will not follow you in giving effect to your Code. If you do that you are legislating in vain. Make your beginning; when you have established that beginning, build upon it as the public conscience increases and the public demand grows. That is the true path of social legislation, the one we have followed in Europe, and the one which I commend to this House.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I was rather surprised that the Honourable the Home Member should have uttered a word of caution and warning, because, if we accepted Mr. Joshi's amendment, we would be bringing in a lot of people not only under the criminal law of the land but would also be making them liable to police action. When I found this distrust or mistrust of the police, I wondered to myself if it was the Honourable the Home Member who was making that remark or whether it was some fire-brand who, as usual according to some of my Honourable friends was repeating his attack on the police. Sir, the Honourable the Home Member has been very frank. He has told us that he is looking at the question not from the point of view of high morality but from the point of view of common-sense. May I say, Sir, at once with equal frankness that I shall try to look at it more from the point of view of morality than of common-sense, if there be any conflict between morality and common sense as the Honourable the Home Member implied that there was. Now, the Honourable the Home Member says: "you have to be careful, the country is not ripe." Ripe for what? Where is the evidence that the country is not ripe? Is not the country ripe for the law that a procurer, a go-between, who tries to induce a girl under 18, should be prosecuted and should be severely dealt with? I would like to know the evidence on which this statement is based. The Honourable the Home Member or some other Honourable speaker said, there might be "a widow or a mother" under 18 years of age. Yes, there may be a widow of 15; there may be a mother of 15. Why not reduce the age from 18 to 15? There is no logic, I submit, in support of this view. Then, we are told that in some sections of the Penal Code the age is 16 and it would be illogical to make it 18 here. Might I repeat the observation made by my Honourable friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, that if we introduce 18 here, it will lead to a change in the other provisions of the Penal Code. Sir, we have been told in very pathetic language, far too pathetic than the occasion demanded, of the unhappiness, of the calamity, that would overtake a particular section in the south of India. Sir, we are not legislating only for that section in the south of India; we have to remember that we are legislating for the whole of India. We are told of alliances that are formed in that particular section of the community. It is, Sir, nothing but concubinage shameful and bare-faced. Are we going to have any sympathy with this so-called alliance? It is said you are violating Hindu law and you are violating Muhammadan law. Sir, the Honourable gentleman is a distinguished lawyer and to that he adds the very unique qualification of being a Brahmin Pandit. I dare not contradict him on a point of Hindu law, but I shall only complain that he has not enlightened an unenlightened lawyer like myself as to how you would be violating the Hindu law by making procurers and go-betweens liable to be prosecuted if they induced a girl under 18 to cruelties of this kind. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "Cruelty?") I call it cruelty advisedly and I hope the House will agree with me when I say that a girl who, either by force or fraud or inducement, is made to live a life of shame, is subjected to cruelty unspeakable and horrible.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: As the Honourable Member is referring to an interruption of mine, I may remind him that there is no question of fraud or force in the matter; the clause refers to inducing by any means. The Honourable Member is referring to the wrong clause.

Munshi Iswar Saran: That strengthens my case, Sir. So, I submit, Sir, that taking all these facts into consideration, it is very necessary that the age should be raised from 16 to 18. Anybody who tries to trifle with the virtue and chastity of girls under that age should clearly understand that that person, be he a man or a woman, is making himself or herself liable to be prosecuted under the provisions of this Bill which we are considering. I submit, Sir, that, in spite of my friend's dictum, there is nothing in the Hindu law which will be violated by the acceptance of the amendment which has been moved by my friend Mr. Joshi.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I shall very briefly answer my Honourable friends, Sir Malcolm Hailey and Mr. Rangachariar, and in doing so I shall not appeal to morality or common sense, though I have a very high opinion of both. I shall merely point out the error they have fallen into, from a legal point of view. The case that the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey cited before us is that of prostitution. Such cases do not come in under this clause. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "Why not?") Because here it is said "a person knowing that she will be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse." When a prostitute is procured she knows for what purpose she is going; therefore, prostitutes are excluded. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "Why?") Because a prostitute knows that is her occupation, she is not forced or seduced. Whom are we going to punish? We are going to punish the procurer. With regard to these fallen women, it is their ordinary occupation. With regard to that, the man who procures, no Court will punish him if the prostitute is taken for immoral purposes.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Why not?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Not, because, she goes over of her own will and is not forced or seduced to illicit intercourse. That is why clause 3 does not apply to such cases. Here it is where common sense comes in, and I suppose our Judges are not devoid of common sense. Now a woman who has lost all sense of shame and plies that infamous trade, with regard to her no Court will hold that taking such a woman for intercourse will be punishable under this law. With regard to Devadasis, the Hindu law recognizes the custom, at least in Southern India—a class who may take to licensed concubinage and who may live with men. Now I need not remind my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, that the Hindu law is considerate in that respect. He himself admits that the offspring of concubines are also entitled to maintenance, and that it is not for purposes of common prostitution that these girls are taken. Hindu law, as I have often said is in many respects the most rational law on the face of the earth. Under English law polygamy is prohibited, but some people break that law. Hindu law on the other hand recognizes facts as they are, that people though they have wives sometimes keep concubines, and if a woman has lived with a man then Hindu law recognizes that and provides for the maintenance of their children. It is quite reasonable also that if these cases come under concubinage and if that is the custom in any part of the country, the Devadasis should not come under this particular section.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Why not?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Because that is the custom. There is a custom connected with the temples that exists in Southern India, though so far as Bengal and other parts are concerned there is no such institution. Of course in the neighbouring province of Orissa there is something of the kind. But that Presidency and that Province have that institution peculiar to themselves. We need not be apprehensive with regard to them. But for them the helpless women-kind of the rest of India cannot be left unprotected. The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey mentioned the case of widows. It is particularly widows and poor women we wish to protect, and we wish to protect them in this way. We want to punish the procurer. Of course a person who seduces a woman, the Penal Code punishes that. Seduction also the Penal Code punishes, the Penal Code are not considering the provisions of that Act. Such individual acts are punishable under the Penal Code. Adultery is punishable. If a married woman is taken and taken for the purpose of illicit intercourse, then the law will punish the person who breaks the law, who commits the offence. We must keep here in view the fact that these specific acts are punished under the Penal Code irrespective of age; adultery is punishable irrespective of age; these acts are made punishable by the Penal Code. What we want to do by this legislation is only this, that the man who seduces an innocent woman from her house and leads her into a life of prostitution, a life of shame, we want to punish him and in this way we want to give protection to ignorant, indigent, uneducated and helpless women. That is the object of the Bill. We want to discourage the nefarious trade of prostitution. This section provides that and it is in the highest degree to the interests of the State that those men who want to take advantage of poverty, of helplessness, should be punished under this Act. We know there are numerous widows in this country who cannot marry. We would prefer the State to make some provision for them in a home, to provide for their general, industrial or vocational education, by which they can earn an honest living; and when the State is not doing that I think we should adopt by every means the suggestion of Mr. Joshi that up to the age of eighteen we should give them protection in this way against procurers. We should punish the procurer and thereby make the homes of many a poor people safe against these human harpies. I have nothing more to say and I ask the Members of the Assembly to support the amendment.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Ten Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Ten Minutes to Three of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I must confess that Sir Malcolm Hailey's observations have made me a complete convert to his views. The point, Sir, for our consideration is whether the age of the girl ought to be 16 or 18 when the offence is committed. The material point in this connection is her consent—that is, in one case her consent, that is, the consent of the girl, is immaterial, and in the other case her consent after 18 years of age is material. Now, Sir, I appeal to my Honourable friends who belong to this country and who are conversant with the climatic conditions of this country to tell me whether after 13 or 14 years a girl can or cannot consider as to what is right and what is wrong for her. What girl is there in this country who at the age of 14 or 15 is not able to say that she is straying from the path of rectitude when she goes wrong? That being so, it is perfectly immaterial whether the age is 16 or 18. As Sir Malcolm Hailey observed, we are taking our stand here on a very high moral ground, especially those friends of mine who suggest the age of 18. Surely, Sir, nobody in the world has yet succeeded in improving the morals of a society by a stroke of the pen or by a Statute of Parliament. These changes will, of course, come in their due time; but let us not force the pace. Let us face facts as we find them; the personal experience of Honourable Members of this Council may not be enough on this point, but let us see things as we find them in all the big cities in India, as well as all over the world. I have travelled all round the world, and I have seen that, no matter what you will, this immorality is impossible to be stopped as long as human nature is what it is. That being so, Sir, as far as we Indians are concerned, let us take note of the facts as they exist at the present day in the city of Bombay, in the city of Benares, in the city of Calcutta, in the city of Delhi and in all important places. How many of our young men who are rich and in well-to-do circumstances go wrong? Or even men of 30 and 40 years of age? They are in a position to procure girls, and the poor servants or dependants of theirs who have to act as procurers are to suffer, if we are to pass this legislation. What is the reason? It is the established practice that servants everywhere have to obey their masters, and they do not consider it as an offence. This vice will exist as long as people are not educated enough. Under the proposed section you are going to punish the procurers; but the persons for whom the girls are procured will be the abettors. Are you going to punish them also? They are a very large body. Then again the police comes in for a lot of abuse. They are said to be corrupt but by raising the age to 18 we will be throwing temptations in their way. What policeman in the lower grades is there who will not succumb to a bribe of Rs. 100 or Rs. 200 when a big man is involved in the case? And the number of such wealthy men is very large, who will be committing this offence. That will be an additional temptation in the way of the police. It has been observed that this is a piece of social legislation. Let us be very careful that we do not go far in advance of the requirements of the country. Otherwise we will be impractical politicians, impractical legislators; we will make laws only to be evaded. What has happened in America? They went dry and enacted total prohibition. Have they stopped drink in that country? No, Sir. Just read the number of prosecutions that are launched there and the amount of consumption of liquor. In this way you will simply be increasing the amount of crime and nothing more. Therefore, Sir, I entirely oppose the amendment moved by my friend, Mr. Joshi.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, my Honourable friend, Sir Malcolm Hailey, expressed a doubt that if this question was put directly to the Local Governments, probably none of them would be prepared to express the opinion which they have expressed on the general question of traffic in girls. With all due deference to my Honourable friend, I beg leave to differ from him. I feel certain that if the matter was referred to the Bombay Government, at any rate that Government's opinion would be in favour of Mr. Joshi's amendment. For I do not know whether the House is aware that only recently in Bombay, at the instance of a Member of the Bombay Council, who happens to be my own brother, a committee was appointed, with our Honourable colleague, Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy as Chairman, to go into the whole question of prostitution and other similar questions in Bombay, and that committee has submitted a report which I commend for reading not only to the Honourable Members of this House but also to the Treasury Benches. One thing seems to have prominently come out in that report and it is this. That the people most responsible for these heinous offences are that class of people who are known as procurers or go-betweens, for whom we have heard so much sympathy expressed. If it was sympathy expressed for this reason, that you have among human beings men who do not know what it is to be men and who believe in going wrong and who believe in treading the downward path, if it is sympathy of that kind, then certainly we have our sympathy with the class; but if it is sympathy of the kind which aims at giving protection of one kind or another to that class of beings, then I dare say that that sympathy is misplaced. It is this class that has no claim for sympathy whatsoever from any decent society of human beings. But,

3 P.M.

Sir, I was emphasising the fact that even in the opinion of that Committee, the class of procurers is the class who are the most to blame. One of the Members of the Committee, I know, took upon himself the duty of investigating with the help of the police the question, and he came across many girls of 18, 19 or 20 who complained to him that at the immature age of 16 all kinds of temptations were placed in their way by those who are called procurers, and once having gone into that line, they could not see any way whatever to extricate themselves from the position in which they were placed. If therefore you could raise the age to 18 years you would be saving a large number of girls from falling victims to the devices of those who live on playing up to the vices of that class of zemindars, landlords and wealthy people for whom also we have unfortunately heard sympathy expressed in this House. Well, Sir, this class of procurers deserves absolutely no sympathy at our hands. If the whole purport of my Honourable friend, Sir Malcolm Hailey's arguments was that, after all, the procurer does not do anything wrong, he only does what he is asked to do, then I think I have made out a case against that argument, because here we have the opinion of a Committee which went into the whole question which found that it is this class of procurers which is the most to blame and which ought to be dealt with most severely

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I do not wish to interrupt my Honourable friend, but could he quote anything in which either I expressed sympathy with the procurer or suggested that he should be protected because he did only what he was asked to do? I have taxed my memory, and I cannot remember having said anything expressing sympathy with the procurer.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I hope my Honourable friend will not misunderstand me

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I don't think I said anything showing the slightest sympathy with the procurer.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Being a young man, I was prepared to hear from my own countrymen who are advanced in age in this House what they said, I was not at all surprised to hear what my Honourable friends, Mr. Rangachariar or Mr. Pyari Lal said, but believe me, Sir, what fell from my Honourable friend, Sir Malcolm Hailey, caused a good deal of surprise to me, because he said that we are going too far and we are taking jumps so far as social legislation is concerned before the country is ready for it. That is an argument which I am not prepared to accept, nor do I hope for the very self-respect of Indians this House will be prepared to accept. Are we taking a jump in the matter of social reform when we are doing a thing which is being effected none too soon? This reform is overdue. That in this country girls below the age of 18 should be seduced for immoral purposes by that hated class of procurers and that we should connive at it, is a thing which seems to me to be absolutely indescribable; I mean we are not legislating too soon in this matter, and we shall be doing only that which is right if we carry Mr. Joshi's amendment. Now though the arguments of Mr. Pyari Lal have not surprised me, they have caused me pain; so also have the arguments of my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. They said that we shall be placing an obstacle in the way of these zemindars. What an argument to use in a House like this, that by trying to prevent girls of tender age from being seduced by people who live on that kind of thing, you are placing an obstacle in the way of the zemindars. Well, if you are going to place an obstacle by this amendment in the way of zemindars^e, I wish we could have done much more than that, and if the effect of passing this amendment was that some day or other,—I hope it will be very soon indeed,—we shall pass further legislation which would also deal severely with those who are guilty of having intercourse with girls of tender age, I think we shall have taken a great step forward of which the House should feel very proud indeed. But to use the argument that we have not done anything to provide against illicit intercourse and only now we are trying to deal severely with procurers, to use that argument for putting off this legislation seems to me to be an absurd argument. I hope therefore that this House will accept the amendment of Mr. Joshi.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I intended to record my silent vote on this question which is agitating the House, but my friends would not let me do so and they press upon me the necessity of stating my own views on this subject. On the last occasion when this question came up before this House, the question was as to whether we should, in endorsing the International Convention, adhere to the age of 16 or go to 21, as was suggested by my Honourable friend Mr. Joshi. On that occasion I suggested a compromise, and I pointed out that it would be a fairly good compromise if we adopted the age of majority, the age of 18, as a fair working basis for this International Convention. I find that reference has been made by one Local Government, the Government of Burma, to this compromise. Now, Sir, what was passing in my mind on the last occasion when I addressed this House on this subject was this. I then pointed out that the Indian law of majority fixes the age of nonage up to 18, and on the completion of the 18th year, a boy or a girl was assumed to have reached the age of discretion. Consequently, I pointed out that that should be the age for all purposes including the purpose we have in view at the present moment. I quite appreciate the very weighty objections which the Honourable the Home Member has pointed out to adopting such a course, but, on the other hand, the Honourable the Home Member could not be oblivious of the fact that in embarking upon this piece of legislation we are not merely protecting the girl but also her guardian and parents. In a celebrated English case Earl, Chief Justice, referring to a Statute on which our sections under discussion were modelled, pointed out as follows. He said: "The statute was passed for the protection of parents and for preventing unmarried girls from being taken out of the possession of their parents against their will, and it is clear that no deception or forwardness on the part of the girl in such cases can prevent the person taking her away from being guilty of the offence created by this section-". Consequently, as the Chief Justice of England pointed out, it is not merely the girl herself that we have to protect but we have also to protect the parents who have the lawful custody and guardianship of the girl concerned. Now let me illustrate by way of example a situation that might be created by the case pointed out by the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar. I will not deal with the light side of the picture he has drawn that zemindars in Southern India are in the habit of taking girls into their custody before they are 16 and it will be a very great hardship to the parents if they are not able to dispose of their girls before they attain that age. That is an argument to which I do not wish to invite the serious attention of this House for a single moment. But I will assume for the sake of argument that in Southern India such a practice exists. [A Voice (from some of the Madras Members): 'No.'] Well, I am glad to hear that it is not a universal practice. But assume for the sake of argument that in isolated cases parents and guardians are tempted to dispose of their minor girls to rich zemindars with whom they contract alliances. Now, take a very simple example. A girl of 17 is taken out of the lawful guardianship of her father or her mother and is sold to a rich zemindar. He either has illicit intercourse with her or keeps her for the purpose of having such illicit intercourse. Reference has been made to the action of the police and the possible abuse of power of a member thereof. Assume, for the sake of argument, that the parents prosecute the zemindar for wrongful restraint and wrongful confinement, offences both punishable under the Indian Penal Code. The case goes before the Court and the girl is examined and she says she was a consenting party to her own abduction. Now, the age of majority being 18, no person is said to be sui juris or capable of giving her consent before she attains that age. Therefore, her consent goes for nothing. A girl of 17, if she is found in possession of a zemindar, would therefore expose the zemindar to the punishment of either wrongful restraint or wrongful confinement, her consent being regarded as absolutely immaterial. Now, then, Sir, if she was considered unable to contract for legal or illegal purposes—the law takes no note of the illegality of the purpose—if she was unable to contract under the statutory law, which is the law of the land, before she attains the age of 18, the zemindar stands to be convicted of either wrongful restraint or wrongful confinement despite her consent, despite the fact that she was sold or disposed of by her guardian. That is the position. Now, my submission therefore was and it still is that we cannot fix arbitrary ages for one purpose when the law of majority in this country has fixed the age at 18. The Honourable the Home Member has pertinently pointed out that in these cases we must not go in advance of the times. That is perfectly true. Under the present statutory law or at any rate under the law which existed when the case I have referred to was decided, the age of consent for the purpose of illicit intercourse under the English statute was 16 years and the framers of the Indian Penal Code copied the English statute and fixed the age at 16 which is the age beyond which the woman was free to contract. But the International Convention to which reference has been made has fixed the age of minority as the age requiring protection and, in consequence of the English age of majority being 21, it follows that England, as a signatory to this Convention, would very soon raise the age from 16 to 21. Now, so far as we are concerned, we have taken upon ourselves the liberty of modifying that Convention by fixing any age between 16 and 21. On the last occasion, when this question was debated in this House, I refer to the discussions in Council, Sir William Vincent pointed out that, whether it is to be 16 or 18 or any other age must largely depend upon the opinions collected from the Local Governments. These opinions have been collected and the Honourable Mr. Joshi has pointed out that these opinions largely subscribe to the amendment which he has moved before this House. Consequently, the one condition which was laid down on the last occasion when this question was discussed by this House has been fulfilled. All the opinions of Local Governments have been collected. The Calcutta High Court—a very important body—have stated that they abstain from making any comments on the question of age. It is a question of public policy. The other High Courts have more or less expressed themselves on the same lines. The question being then one of public policy we have to consider as to what is in consonance with public policy in fixing the age for consent and inferentially in fixing the age for the protection of minor girls. I think we must not forget the fact that in cases where immorality is concerned, and immorality after all is a thing which we have to guard against, a girl of 16 is too immature to form an independent judgment as to what would be her ultimate fate if she is disposed of, it may be, to a gilded zemindar. When she attains the age of discretion and acquires maturer judgment, she may regret the life of infamy and shame to which she has been consigned by her guardian in a moment of distress or in a moment perhaps of cupidity. I therefore suggest that this House would not be going wrong and would not be unduly forcing the pace of social legislation if it fixed the age at 18. I have no doubt that there are objections to fixing the age at 18 and some of them have been stated very cogently by the Honourable the Home Member in opposing this amendment. I shall very briefly advert to his arguments. The first point was that we must go with a certain degree of caution. But I ask, Sir, what is the measure of caution required for fixing the age at 18 as against 16? After all, it is a matter of 2 years and a girl would not gain very much in judgment and discretion within those 2 years, though there can be no doubt that there would be a material gain if we fixed the age at 18. Then, it has been said that there are certain backward people and an example was given of the Bhils in certain parts of India—who would be very prejudicially affected by it. But we know as a matter of fact that, when the Penal Code prescribes a certain age, it rapidly filters down not merely to the common populace but even to the backward classes. One such case presented in the Courts will immediately set the Bhils and the Gonds to think for themselves that the age of majority which is the age of 18 is the age below which it would not be right to tamper with either the girl or the girl's parents. Then, it has been said that the police in a case of this kind would be exposed to the additional temptation of prosecuting cases which might lead to failure of justice, and which might also lead in some cases to false prosecutions. Now, Sir, I was not impressed by that argument. If the police are to prosecute cases there is as much danger of their prosecuting cases when we fix the age at 16 as when we fix it at 18. After all, it is a matter, as I have said before, of 2 years and that certainly should not make much difference. We must not forget also in this connection that what was fixed by the Conventions is the age of minority, and it was distinctly then pointed out that the age of majority in all countries differs. My first point therefore is, how can we go back upon the Statute law which has been in existence for a long number of years which fixes the age of majority as 18 and how can we make a distinction between the age of majority in the case of civil consent and reduce that age of majority in the case of consent to do what after all would be a criminal act? Then it has been said by certain speakers including my friend, Mr. Pyari Lal, that we cannot stamp out immorality by legislation. That is perfectly true. We cannot also stamp out crime by legislation. But is that any reason why we should not legislate against immorality any more than we should not legislate against thieves and robbers, dacoits and murderers? The fact that crime will persist in spite of legislation is no reason why we should not legislate against it. All we can hope for is that there will be a reduction in crime and it will be a warning to would-be criminals that if they offend against the majesty of law they stand to be prosecuted and convicted. That is all that this House is called upon to look at. We may in some cases defeat the very purpose we have in view. How often do not criminals escape? How often would not procurers escape under our legislation? But all human institutions are imperfect. The legislation that we propose in this House is not professedly perfect. All we can hope for is that if we fix the standard of age which is proposed in this amendment, we shall be able to purge society of a large number of people who profit by the act of immorality of immature girls and it will tend to social purity and to the levelling up of a condition of things against which Members of this House should certainly raise their voice. Well, Sir, I am not an optimist in this matter. I do not suggest, and let no one ever feel that any Member of this House suggests, that we shall be stamping out prostitution from this land by merely legislating against the procurers. Those who have read ancient history will remember what drastic provisions were then made against the growing immorality of that day and yet immorality has survived all legislation. That it will survive our legislation is a matter upon which I entertain no doubt. All we can hope for is that we shall reduce the chances of seduction of the character we are providing against and that should be our sole reward if we push through this amendment and place it upon the Statute Book. On these grounds, Sir, I support the amendment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I wish to refer briefly to some of the arguments that have been used by several Honourable Members during the course of this debate. In the first place my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, suggested that because the age of majority under the Indian law was 18, so if a girl of 17 even with her consent was taken away by a Zemindar, the question of her consent was immaterial. I think, Sir, that my Honourable friend is mistaken in that respect. The offence which he described to us would have come within the provisions of section 366 read with section 361 of the Code, and the age in that case under which the consent of the girl would be immaterial is under the present law 16. Further, my Honourable friend suggested that the age of majority for civil purposes was 18 and he asked how can we reduce this for criminal purposes? Sir, 16 is the age throughout all these sections of the Code. It is the age in section 361, it is the age in section 372 and it is also the age in section 373. As was pointed out by the Honourable the Home Member, the offence which we constitute by this proposed section 366A is really, if I may say so, not such a serious offence as these other offences. Take the case of section 372—selling for prostitution and so on. The present section in fact does not refer merely to cases of procuring for becoming a prostitute. It refers to cases of single acts of sexual intercourse. Then my Honourable friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, suggested that in this section we were punishing a man who induces a girl to go to a place where she may be seduced to illicit intercourse with another person, and he went on to say that the person who seduces her can be punished under another section of the Code. I should like to know what that section is.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I did not say that.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: That is what I took down.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: The object of this Bill is to punish the procurer. For the act itself, for seduction, the Penal Code provides punishment. I should like my Honourable friend to note the difference. It is the procurer who induces such crime, whom it is contemplated to punish.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: My Honourable friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, has now supported my impression of what he said. Section 366 does not deal with seduction nor with the seducer. That section deals with the abduction of a woman. Of course, the case of kidnapping from lawful guardianship with these intentions will also come within section 366. But, Sir, there is no section of the Indian Penal Code at present dealing with the simple offence of seduction. (An Honourable Member: "There is in the case of married women.") Of course, if it is a married woman, that is a different matter. Further, references have been made to the suggestion of the Leader of the House as regards the undesirability of increasing the scope of police action. Now, Sir, in making his remarks, I do not think there was ever any intention of suggesting that Government distrusted the police. What was meant was that they would prefer not to place them in positions where they would be subject to increased criticism. That would be the case by such an amendment of this clause as is now under consideration. There is one thing which I should like to read to the House and that is an extract from the report of the delegates of India to the Second Assembly of the League of Nations. The Indian representative at the Second Assembly of the League of Nations was the Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastri. In dealing with the discussion upon the particular Convention in connection with which we are now proposing legislation it is said in the report: "In the course of the discussion Mr. Sastri made it clear that India could not accept the age limit of 21 now proposed for the protection of girls. India's internal legislation fixed this age at 16, and having regard to early maturity in tropical countries, that age could not be expediently exceeded, while it would obviously be undesirable to have a special higher limit for the benefit of a very limited number of non-Indians." We are following in the Bill the suggestion which was made in the Assembly of the League of Nations by the Representative of India. My Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, suggests that we must not have any sympathy at all with the procurer. I hope no one assumes that the occupants of these Benches have any sympathy with the procurer. (Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: "I never assumed that.") This section, Sir, goes a long way beyond procuring for prostitution and that is the main reason why we think that it is undesirable to increase the age from 16 to 18. My Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, said that we cannot stamp out crime by legislation, but, Sir, we can in this House manufacture criminals and that is what we will be doing (Voices: 'No,' 'no.') to an extent which, in view of the conditions in India, gives cause, I think, for very grave concern if we increase the age from 16 to 18 for all the acts which are covered by this proposed section.

Mr. K. Muppil Nayar (West Coast and Nilgiris: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Mr. President, it is highly immaterial to me whether the age is fixed as 16 or 18. Even if the House prefers to have it raised to the modest age of 120, that is a matter for the Honourable Members and I do not care. But what I wish to say is to offer a word of protest against the attack on zamindars and landlords. I do not see any reason why they should be singled out to bear this calumny. I admit there may be black sheep in this class, but we find them in all classes, including lawyers.

Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Khan (North-West Frontier Province: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I had no idea of speaking on this question, but when I heard some of the speakers here and spoke to many of them in the library, I made up my mind to speak on this question. I was surprised to hear learned men like Dr. Gour and other gentlemen say that they have not got protection for the minor boys. All these things are going on. We have got protection for minor girls. We know very well that unscrupulous elderly ladies also stoop to that. The same offence is committed by them as by men. I agree with Dr. Gour that the age should be raised to 18. It is strange that as far as property is concerned the law is very strict in stipulating the age as 18, while as far as her virtue is concerned, as far as her future is concerned, her age should be fixed at 16. Some gentlemen have said that girls in this country attain maturity earlier. I do not agree with them. Though girls become major, what about their education, their surroundings and other things? I think it will be a great slur and a standing blot on our administration if we do not raise the age to 18. We must sympathise with them. On them depends our future. They will be the future mothers of this country, and I deplore that the age is not raised from the political point of view and also from the point of view of the constitution of the future citizens. We know how far people have suffered from that. I do not know for certain what is the real condition in Bombay, but I have read in some paper that the death-rate of infants is very deplorable, and I think it must be due to this, namely, that girls get married very early. As administrators, as representatives of the people, I think it is the sacred duty of everybody to support this amendment that the age should be raised to 18, both from the point of view of politics and morality. As regards the remarks of some of my Honourable friends passed against zamindars, I think they did not mean those remarks against zamindars only; but if they did mean them, I say that the zamindars are not so bad. There are bad people all over the world. Zamindars are not so bad, because they have got much work to do. You will find a good many bad people among wealthy men who have no exercise for themselves. With these remarks, I strongly support Mr. Joshi's amendment that the age should be raised to 18 and I hope that even the official Members will agree to that.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 3 in the proposed section 366A, for the word 'sixteen' substitute the word 'eighteen'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I have got a very difficult task now before me. The amendment I have proposed is:

"In clause 3 in proposed section 366A for the words 'to do' substitute the word 'does' and in the same clause omit the words 'or seduced' wherever they occur in proposed sections 366A and 367B."

I do not move the first part to substitute "does" for "to do." I shall deal with the other part of my amendment, namely, to omit the words

"or seduced." I wish to make it clear to the Honourable House that I do not yield to anybody in this House in my desire to see that the procurer is punished. I do not wish to support such a heinous crime if it really is committed. Well, Sir, we are a body here sitting as legislators, and we should do what is practicable and what is workable, and this must be a reasonable and workable thing. Sir, it is laid down that whoever induces any minor girl to be seduced to illicit intercourse with another person shall be punished, it is also said that the procurer alone is to be punished and not others. Sir, the original object of this Bill was for the suppression of the white slave traffic, which meant that it wanted to stop trafficking in white slaves, i.e., Europeans or white girls from a foreign country. The section as it appears in Penal Code has really lost that object and it applies now to India and becomes a part of the Indian Penal Code. I submit, Sir, if this is allowed, it will be really a hardship in India for reasons that I am going to place before the Honourable House. Sir, if it is taken that seduction is to be punished, or the procurer is to be punished, he is punishable under section 366 of the Indian Penal Code and I think there will be absolutely no necessity for having this amendment. Section 366 says:

"Whoever kidnaps or abducts any woman with intent that she may be compelled, or knowing it to be likely that she will be compelled, to marry any person against her will, or in order that she may be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse . . ."

If that be the object, such person is convicted under section 366. We have got other sections, regarding enticing away married women and so on. Sir, the object is to punish a procurer so that he may not carry on his nefarious trade and it is for this purpose that this amendment is proposed. I submit really this does not affect India. I do not think in a country like India such actual trafficking in girls exists because Indian society, whether Hindu or Muhammadan, is such that it always takes care to get its girls married. Under the Hindu law it is a religious injunction that the girls must be given in marriage, and you will find in the higher societies such as Kshatrias, Brahmins and others that they get their girls married at a very early age, at an age which would be surprising to Europeans. The ninth year is described by Manu to be the best year when a girl should be given in marriage. Practically before 12, before a girl attains puberty, she must be given in marriage. That is the Hindu idea of marriage. Also we find among our Muhammadan friends, although some of them marry after the girls attain puberty, most of them marry their girls at an earlier age. I am speaking of the picked society of Muhammadans, where the marriage law is so much in vogue that there would be no such fear of any girl being seduced, and there would be no such traffic in girls as to be supplied for immoral purposes. But even assuming that there are societies and people of lower orders living in India, where seduction of girls is possible, I submit, Sir, that really if you do not punish the seduction or the illicit intercourse with a girl, I see no reason why the procurer should be so vehemently condemned in this House. Sir, I would point out that you, Sir, want meat, Honourable Members want meat and the country wants meat. That is why the butcher keeps a stall and sells meat. Sir, we all want meat to buy, we relish it and we never condemn ourselves for eating it. Because the butcher supplies it for our convenience and for our requirements, we want him to be punished, why? Is it not the same in this country with these women, whether you call them dancing girls, or devadassies or ordinary dassies or prostitutes. It is not an unknown thing. I think all Honourable Members have seen everywhere this kind of women. (Cries of "No, no.") You pass through any street and you will find them, you find them existing in very large numbers. They have existed from time immemorial; they have not come into existence under British rule or under Moghul rule; they have existed perhaps from the times spoken of in the Puranas. They are regarded as a necessity for religious sacrament, they are regarded as a necessity even for marriage and other parties and for singing songs in invocation of God. Perhaps every Member of this House might have heard of ceremonies in temples of . . .

Mr. President: The Honourable Member will discuss his amendment now.

Mr. B. N. Misra: I am only pointing out, Sir, that girls have been necessary for the purpose of certain religious ceremonies. (Cries of "Withdraw, withdraw.") I come, now, Sir, to (Cries of "Withdraw, withdraw.") Mr. Kinney the eminent English lawyer who in his Book on Criminal Law at page 143, says:

"Hence, a voluntary illicit intercourse of the sexes, even though it may take the form of mercenary prostitution or of an adulterous violation of marital legal rights, furnishes no ground for criminal indictment."

That is the state of things in England. Even in cases of divorce, we find that the seducer is not punished; he appears as the co-respondent and is liable civilly and not criminally. Much has been said about girls being disposed of to Zemindars and Rajas. I submit, Sir, it is not a fact. Neither Dr. Gour nor anybody else has really represented the true state of things.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I rise to a point of order. I never made any statement that girls were disposed of either to Zemindars or to Rajas.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Zemindars never get any girls from procurers, as has been said. What happens is this. When Zemindars or Rajas marry, their wives or Ranis bring with them some girls as maid servants; that is how they come to live in Raja's palaces. Such a thing as procuring of girls does not exist and no gentleman, whether he be a Zemindar or a Raja or any ordinary man, would ever adopt such a nefarious means to procure girls. (Cries of "Withdraw, withdraw.") I am sorry, Sir, my friends who have been staying in towns do not know what happens in the mufassil and in the country. I will just tell you, Sir. This Penal Code will apply all over India, and, as the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey pointed out to you, to many advanced tracts occupied by Bhils and Gonds, etc. I was Public Prosecutor in the Agency Tracts and I know among the Khonds they have a system whereby the grown-up men and women live in their houses and all the grown-up boys and girls from the same village or from three or four villages go to a particular house called Dhangar house. The unmarried boys are called dhangars and the unmarried girls are called dhangris. Supposing a dhangari says to a girl friend of hers "Let us go to a certain place and sing songs." Suppose she spends a night there and does what she likes, are you going to punish her because she called her friend to have a dance or sing a song? (Cries of "Shame, shame.") Surely you will not say that such a girl who has asked her girl friend to go to a dhangar house should be punished for illicit intercourse. Why should we think so much about these people who are able to take care of themselves? Surely this House is not going to maintain all the people in the street or is not going to make provision for them. (A Voice: "You wait and see" and cries of "Withdraw, withdraw.")

Then, Sir, we find another point. Under section 366B the age is fixed at 21. I do not think really that girls from foreign countries are so dull or so low in intellect that they do not know what they are about. Why should the seducer be punished in such cases, and where is the element of seduction? The girl is quite intelligent and understands where she is going. Perhaps she goes for her best interests. So why should you protect and why should you punish the seducer of a girl who is, say, 20 years of age? Do you really think that the man has committed any offence when a girl of 20, with full deliberation, comes with him to any place? (Loud cries of "Withdraw, withdraw.") (Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy: "Now you have made your speech, withdraw.") Sir, this House has not really realised where the shoe pinches. With these words I move my amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: Sir, the amendment which I move is that in clause 3 in the proposed section 366A for the words "and shall also be liable to fine" substitute the words "or with fine or with both."

It is simply giving an option to the Magistrate. I will give an example, say, of a rich man. He has a young son and, somehow or other, under the influence of some passion or through an act of indiscretion, he commits the act. Now if no option is given to the Magistrate in the case, this young man will be sent to jail. In that case simply for an indiscreet action of his, his whole life will be ruined. That is why I suggest that the punishment should be imprisonment or fine. We all know what India thinks about going to jail. For example, an educated man goes to England and when he comes back he does some indiscreet act of the kind and you send him to jail, his whole career will be ruined. If, on the other hand, you give the option to the Magistrate he may be let off by paying a fine. His father or somebody can pay that for him. So I move that this option may be given to the Magistrate so that one's career may not be ruined simply for an impulsive act of his. Sir, I move my amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The reason why we have adopted this form of words, namely, "and shall also be liable to fine" is because we desired to bring this section into line with all the parallel sections in the Indian Penal Code. If you take all the sections from 363 up to 376, you will find that a similar form of words is used. I think the only exception is section 374. For this reason we thought that the proper punishment for this offence was imprisonment and that the Magistrate should, in addition, have discretion to impose a fine.

As regards Mr. Sarfaraz Hussain's particular case, I would remark that under our revised Code of Criminal Procedure, if there is a young man under twenty-one years of age who falls into an error of this description, he could be placed on probation instead of being sent to prison.

The motion was negatived.

[Sir Campbell Rhodes.]

from making this change. It is not desirable, I think, that we should have Statutes on the book which can be so easily evaded, and therefore I should like to move that the Bill be circulated for public opinion.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, these lights into the discussions of the Associated Chambers of Commerce are very interesting, but I do not think that the debate in the Associated Chambers of Commerce on one particular item in this Bill affords this House any reason why we should circulate this Bill. I may point out that in 1922 we circulated very full papers about this proposal to increase the duty on these instruments. We circulated to all Local Governments a letter we had received from the Bengal Government and attached to that letter was a report of the Committee appointed by the Bengal Government to consider the question of revising the duty on these instruments. All Local Governments were specially asked to consult Chambers of Commerce; they were asked to consult them on two points, one, whether the duty on these instruments should be raised, and, two, if so, to what extent. Now practically all Chambers of Commerce said "Oh, no; on general grounds we do not approve of the duty on these instruments being raised." Local Governments reported that they recognised that it was not altogether to the liking of the business community that the duty on these instruments should be raised; yet they pointed out that the financial needs and exigencies were very great and thought this was one of the least objectionable forms of getting the revenue which they required. Now, Sir, the Chambers of Commerce have already had an opportunity of expressing their opinions on these proposals, not in the exact form they are now, but on the proposals generally; and I submit at this stage the Chambers of Commerce have no right to demand that we should again circulate the Bill. Circulation means that the Bill will lapse, because there will not be time for replies to be received in time for the Bill to be passed into law during the life time of this Assembly.

The next point I have to make is that in practically all these proposals with the exception of that relating to demand promissory notes, we have followed the proposals of the Bengal Committee, and I would like to point out that a member of that committee was a very distinguished member of the Bengal business community, namely, Sir Campbell Rhodes' own predecessor in the Presidentship of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce.

The third thing I want to point out is that this Bill is a very small Bill indeed; it consists of only two clauses; it has been before the House for a week or ten days; every Chamber of Commerce has had ample opportunity to send up to its representatives here its criticisms on the Bill, and this is the proper place for considering them; it is proper that this Assembly should decide here and now whether our proposals are proper or not. I submit that there is no reason at all why we should delay the passing of the Bill for a further very unnecessary piece of circulation.

One more point and I have done. I think I am correct in saying that this debate which took place in the Associated Chambers of Commerce was merely a debate whether the duty on demand promissory notes should be raised. I do not think it was a debate on whether the duty should be raised on all the instruments dealt with in this Bill. Sir Campbell himself has given notice of an amendment in regard to demand promissory notes and I think that that is the main point which he has put to the House. Sir, I oppose this motion.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I support the amendment moved by Sir Campbell Rhodes. It is not a question between the Bengal Chamber of Commerce and this House, or between the Bengal Government and this Assembly. It is a question of altering a piece of law which has been familiar to the people at large and every one even in the remotest corners of the country has come to associate the one anna stamp duty with promissory notes to any amount. Now, if you are going to alter the law without giving the country an opportunity of knowing it, without spreading this idea about the country and making it familiar with the idea that it is going to be raised to two annas, there will be very great danger. Men, who till now believed that one anna was quite enough for affixing on a document which covers the value of thousands of rupees, would not know the alteration; it is not as if every one in this country reads newspapers or knows the progress of the legislature from day to day. Therefore, on that point, without entering into the merits of the case, without entering into the question whether any substantial amount would be secured to the State in the way of additional revenue by virtue of this alteration, I think it is a very fair proposal, which is contained in the amendment, that the Bill should be circulated and by that means the country will come to know of it. I know, if it is sent out for circulation, it may not be possible to get this passed during the life time of this Assembly. It is possible it may not be passed. But if you are prompt and if you want to pass it before the end of the year, I think it can be done; I do not suppose this Assembly is going to die before the end of this year. But whether you are able to pass this during the life of this Assembly or not is not the question. The question is that this is a very substantial change in the every day life of the people, and I deprecate any haste in this matter. I would ask all Honourable Members to think what the villagers in the villages outside, who have relied on this one anna stamp as being able to secure a document of legal validity for thousands of rupees, would think of this suggested alteration.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): I also rise, Sir, to support the amendment moved by Sir Campbell Rhodes. Everywhere in the country it is becoming a growing practice to have promissory notes executed instead of bonds. Under the law as it exists to-day, if the promissory note is not properly stamped, it cannot be validated in future, with the result that people being ignorant of the passing of this law in this House will suffer a lot and there will be much discontent among the commercial communities and the trading people in the country. The Honourable Mr. Innes has pointed out that the Bill has been lying in the House for about ten days and that there has been no condemnation of this Bill or any suggestions to this effect by any Chamber of Commerce.

We are not concerned, as my Honourable friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, said, with the Chambers of Commerce, but we have also to look to the other people, to the various trading communities in the provinces which have no Chambers of Commerce. For instance, in the Central Provinces there is a vast trading community, but unfortunately they are not represented in any Chamber. Moreover, the period of 10 days cannot be regarded as sufficient for people all over the country to know about the nature of such a Bill as this and therefore there will be no harm whatsoever if this Bill were circulated for public opinion.

Now as regards the other argument of the Honourable Mr. Innes that if this Bill were postponed it would not be possible to have it passed in the current Session or during the lifetime of this Assembly, I have not much to say about it, but I do not think it desirable that a Bill of such importance should be passed by this House before the public and the country have had an opportunity to know about it or to criticise it or to offer suggestions on it. With these few words, I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment of my Honourable friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, with regard to the argument that if this Bill is not taken into consideration here and now it runs the risk of lapsing and it is not likely to be passed during the lifetime of this Assembly, I do not feel much impressed. I do not see why the Honourable Mr. Innes is so enamoured of this Assembly. Our successors will be in office next year, and the Assembly will then be in Session and it does not matter what the personnel of the Assembly is. His Bill will be passed by the Assembly if he convinces the Assembly for the time being that it is a measure which must be placed on the Statute Book. Consequently, the question that it should be passed during the lifetime of the present Assembly and that its passage should not be postponed because this Assembly will come to an end is not an argument against its postponement.

The second argument which the Honourable Member for Commerce raised was that the Bill had been before this House for 10 days. Now, Sir, the Honourable Member will sympathise with the labours of the Members of this House which have of late been very arduous. He will at any rate feel that the Members of this House have not been idle during the last 10 days. The arduous work that the Members have been doing from day to day is the best argument why Members could not examine the details of the Bill of which the Honourable Mover now asks this House to go into consideration.

Then it has been said that the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, and the Karachi Chamber of Commerce of which my distinguished friend, Sir Montagu Webb, is a Member, have opposed this measure. I think there is a good deal of argument on the other side of the question. The Honourable Mr. Subrahmanayam, speaking for the public at large, and not for those associated with the various Chambers of Commerce has pointed out that the promissory note is associated with the stamp duty of one anna, and for a very long time past the public have come to regard this instrument as an extremely convenient mode of transacting commercial business. The graduated duty that the Bill seeks to introduce instead of the fixed duty of one anna is one upon which the public at large, as distinguished from the commercial community of Bengal, Bombay and elsewhere, are entitled to be consulted. The Honourable Mover has not vouchsafed any information as to how far the public at large, as distinguished from the various Chambers of Commerce, have been consulted upon this matter, and what is their view on the subject.

Lastly, I am also curious to know as to what would be the net gain by the proposed duty. I do know if it will run into many millions of pounds; it may perhaps be such as the country may be able to suffer for a few months, and after that if the Honourable Mover moves that the Bill should be passed and has the support of the public at large, I have no doubt that the Assembly will endorse his motion. But as at present circumstanced, the Honourable Sir Campbell Rhodes appears to have made out a particularly strong case for the elucidation of further public opinion thereon, and so I support his motion.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): I hope the House will not allow itself to be seduced by Dr. Gour's spacious pleadings. Dr. Gour got up to support a motion that the discussion of this Bill should be transferred from its natural place in which we ought to discuss it, namely, this House, in order that it might be referred to the Chambers of Commerce who have already been consulted. He very sensibly proceeded to discuss the merits of the Bill in the proper place. The whole matter was last year referred to the Chambers of Commerce and also to the Provincial Governments. As the Honourable Member for Commerce has said, the Chambers of Commerce were not on the whole in favour of it. I am not accustomed to hear that Chambers of Commerce are usually in favour of taxation which is going to fall upon their Members. The Provincial Governments who are the proper bodies to consult in regard to this matter are on the whole strongly in favour of it, if only because it is going to help them in a matter which they rightly regard as important, namely, to balance their budgets. They were consulted and I submit, Sir, that quite apart from the merits of the Bill, this House is the proper place in which a proposal supported by the Provincial Governments for imposing taxation for the benefit of the Provincial Governments as a whole should be discussed. Full opportunity has already been given to the commercial community to express its views, and they are known. I submit, therefore, that the amendment should be rejected and we should proceed to discuss the Bill on its merits.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, the measure which is now before the House is of far-reaching importance. It does not affect the interests of the Chambers of Commerce only, but it affects the men living in a village also, and I also feel strongly that this Bill has not been circulated adequately. In defence it has been urged "that the Chambers of Commerce are very much interested that the duty may not be raised, and, therefore, naturally if this Bill is placed before those Chambers they will be against it. But Local Governments have been addressed and their answer is that the duty should be enhanced." Well, may I tell the Honourable the Finance Member that the Local Governments are as much interested in enhancing the duty as the Chambers of Commerce in not enhancing the duty. Therefore, the opinions of the Local Governments can be neutralized by the opinions of the Chambers of Commerce. Now what about the public? This Bill is not of such a nature that this House may content itself with the opinions expressed by only the Local Governments. Supposing a number of men have got promissory notes in their possession, and all of them must have been stamped with one anna stamps, and when those promissory notes are adduced in the Court they will not be considered as admissible in evidence, unless it is clearly provided in the Bill that it will not have retrospective effect. The people at large are required to know that a Bill is going to be introduced which will affect them so materially. On those grounds I very strongly support this amendment which speaks for itself.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, seduction is so much in the "atmosphere" to-day that one does not know whether to allow oneself to be seduced by the arguments of Sir Basil Blackett or Dr. Gour. I think we should be striking a middle note by consenting to the circulation of the measure. We have been told that the Governments have been consulted. Dr. Nand Lal has given the reply that Governments naturally want more money and we know what their reply is bound to be. And the Chambers of Commerce we are further told have been consulted. I have a great estimation for Chambers of Commerce, but they do not represent all the trade and commerce and business in the country. There are other people who are entitled to be consulted and have not been. As has been pointed out, the Bill has not been long enough before the public and they do not realise its possibilities. Dr. Nand Lal was referring to these documents not being admissible in evidence if the Act was passed. But the Government will have a little pile in the shape of penalties. I do not know that this is a reason in favour of the Bill. Sir, the Government of Bengal tried a measure like this in the province and that is the Court Fees Enhancement Act. Has not that recoiled on the situation? Has not the expectation of the Government of Bengal been belied. We are warned by those who understand, by four Chambers of Commerce, that the enhanced payments will be evaded. Probably, we shall have this piece of legislation and yet not know how to enforce it. In a matter like this one always is inclined to support greater publicity. As regards the life of this Assembly, Sir, we are in the position of the condemned in a cell and should know how exactly we stand. Sir Malcolm Hailey, the Leader of the House, told us the other day that this is probably the last Session of the Assembly. Mr. Innes told us to-day that there may not be any time for this Bill being taken up during the life of this Assembly, if the Bill be circulated. Supposing there is a Simla Session I do not see why the Bill can not be taken up there and passed after proper publication.

Mr. Manmohandas Ramji (Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau: Indian Commerce): Sir, I rise to support Sir Campbell Rhodes' amendment and to say that the opinions which were asked for from the different Chambers of Commerce were in respect of the Report of a Committee which was appointed in Bengal to go into this question. But there was no definite proposal from Government to raise stamp duty. That Government proposed a certain measure for the increase of revenue and therefore it is but right that those who have expressed their opinion should know in definite form what the enhanced proposals are which this Government are making. Another point which is raised by several of my Honourable friends here in this House is that we have only the opinion of the Chambers of Commerce, but it is the public generally that borrows very largely. Of course, the traders have their own transactions but in this country there is money lending transaction going on everywhere, whether there is a Chamber of Commerce or not. Therefore, it is but right that the public should have some opportunity of expressing their views on this important question.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay (Bengal: European): Sir, having listened to the arguments for and against, it appears to me the whole issue rests on this question of promissory notes. On the other clauses of the Bill there seems to be no dispute. And I would suggest to the Honourable Mr. Innes the possibility of withdrawing for the present this proposed alteration as regards promissory notes and allowing the other items to stand.

The alteration No. 2 is to increase the stamp duty on share certificates, letters of allotment of shares, letters of credit and proxies, from one anna to two annas, and I am perfectly certain that the country at large would be with this measure. Nobody has the slightest objection to paying this extra anna. Then the proposed alteration in Article 47 which deals with insurance I can most heartily support. The present position, Sir, is that there is a duty fixed for fire insurance policies.

Mr. Deputy President: I would draw the Honourable Member's attention to the fact that we are at present discussing whether the Bill should be circulated for the purpose of eliciting opinion thereon and ask him to confine his remarks to that.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay: Sir, I was opposing the amendment for circulation, and I was suggesting to the Honourable Mr. Innes to, if possible, withdraw the promissory note section so that the Bill might be gone on with and I was pointing out what were to my mind the advantages of the Bill. That is why I referred to this question of insurance. If I may be permitted to continue, I said the Act provides for fire insurance policies, accident policies and life policies. Now, there are many other forms of insurance that are not covered by fire insurance or life or accident insurance and the Bill makes provision for these other forms of insurance. I can only tell you, Sir, that Insurance Companies in Calcutta, where I come from, are in great difficulty to know what stamp duty they should pay on particular policies and I may say that the stamp office is unable frequently to give us information on the point. Now this Bill that is before us makes it perfectly clear and on these grounds I certainly give it my wholehearted support. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "Your half-hearted support: you don't approve of the promissory note section.") I therefore put it, Sir, to the Honourable Mr. Innes as to whether it would be possible for the present to omit this section dealing with promissory notes and allow the rest of the Bill to be taken up.

Mr. A. V. V. Aiyar (Finance Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I just wish to make a few remarks, which may be of assistance to the House in deciding whether the Bill should now be circulated for opinion. As the House knows, all the Local Governments are now presenting their Budgets to the Legislative Councils and we know for certain that most of them are counting on some increase from these stamp duties for the purposes of their Budget. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "How much? You don't know.") If the Bill is now circulated, and several months elapse before it is taken up for consideration, they will all be put to very serious inconvenience. As regards the question of promissory notes, I suppose the proper time for discussing that will be when we are considering that particular clause.

Munshi Mahadeo Prasad (Benares and Gorakhpur Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I associate myself entirely with what has fallen from Sir Campbell Rhodes. When I look to the Stamp Act of 1899, I find that in clause (1) it is said "It shall come into force on the 1st day of July 1899." The present Bill which is being to-day discussed by us, does not make any provision on this point. If we pass it as it is, it will affect all the existing promissory notes and if any person who may be a money-lender wants to sue upon those promissory notes, he will have to pay a penalty of Rupees five and one anna under section 35 of the Stamp

[Munshi Mahadeo Prasad.]

Act of 1899. Still, these are points to be considered in coming to a conclusion. Further, the public ought to know the effect of this amending Bill. Apart from the Chambers of Commerce and the money-lending centres, the whole country will be affected. There are some money-lenders in villages who lend money on promissory notes. It will take months and months to bring to their knowledge the amendments which we are going to pass to-day. It has been said that the Local Governments are busy with their Budgets and they are counting on the income which will be derived from this amendment of the Stamp Act. But, Sir, we do not know what will be the amount of income that will be derived from this. I submit that we should not be hasty in passing this law and that we should circulate the Bill for getting the opinion of all the persons interested and of all the money-lending centres in the country.

Mr. Jaminadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City; Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I just want to remind the House that my Honourable friend, Mr. Darcy Lindsay, has made a very good and important suggestion, which if we carry out, I think we shall be doing what is convenient from the practical point of view of the Government and we shall also be serving the purpose that we have in view. Mr. Aiyar, I think, has rightly pointed out that we may take the Bill into consideration. So far as the clauses relating to promissory notes are concerned, we may either postpone consideration of this or say that it will not be taken into consideration now when the stage of discussion comes. But so far as the other clauses are concerned on which there seems to be no disagreement and about which there seems to be no protest in the House, why should we allow ourselves not to give our consent to those clauses about which there does not seem to be any controversy? Mr. Aiyar has pointed out a difficulty which seems to me to be a very real difficulty. All Local Governments have based their Budgets on the assumption that the Stamp duty will be enhanced. Supposing you don't do it, the whole of the finances of the Local Governments will, I think to a certain extent, be upset and the only advantage that we shall have will be that we shall meet after a number of months to discuss and give our consent to those clauses about which at present even there is not the slightest controversy. Why not, therefore, either take Mr. Darcy Lindsay's suggestion of taking the whole Bill into consideration minus the clauses relating to the promissory notes or carry out Mr. Aiyar's suggestion of taking the whole Bill into consideration and drop out the clauses relating to the promissory notes? To me it seems that this is the best course to adopt and I appeal to the House to adopt that course.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I stand in support of inviting the opinion of the majority of the people of India on this Bill. They, Sir, are the people affected and they have a right to know what law is going to be passed by the Government of India particularly in this Assembly. Ninetyseven persons of India, Sir, out of a 100 do not understand how to read this Bill. They are not persons who can read even newspapers in the English language and realise the situation of the Bill in this Assembly to-day. It is therefore absolutely necessary that the Government of India should take proper steps to see that this Bill is translated word for word in the vernacular and distributed not only through the Provincial Governments and the District Officers but it should also be forwarded to each and every village through the Panchayats themselves. The Panchayats, Sir, should circulate it to the villagers. Otherwise, this is no law. People are not going to remain as hewers of wood and drawers of water. The Bill concerns them. It touches their pockets. It is not merely a question of the stamp on promissory notes being one anna or two annas. It touches also the question of the purchase of land. The agriculturists also have got a right to know about it. They must know the stamp which is necessary for purchasing lands, and if they have insured their lives, as my friend says, I think that my friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, has made out a strong case that this Bill should be forwarded again for opinion and people must know and give their opinion on it. What is the use of hurrying an important Bill like this and finishing it in 10 days' time? My friend read an extract from the Court Fees Act and the Stamp Act, 1899. There is a date, Sir, put on the top of the Bill that it should come into operation next year. Here, Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, is going to jump in an aeroplane, and get home in the twinkling of an eye. It is therefore necessary that the Bill should be translated into all the vernaculars of the country and distributed. I daresay in Madras there are many languages spoken and there are also many languages spoken in the other parts of India, but that does not matter. Anyhow, the Bill must be further circulated for obtaining the opinion of the country and then probably we shall be in a position to take it up and see how far it can be carried.

Mr. K. G. Bagde (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"That the Bill be circulated for the purpose of eliciting opinion thereon."

The question is that that amendment be made.

THE GOVERNMENT SAVINGS BANKS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank (Secretary, Public Works Department):

5 P.M. Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill further to amend the Government Savings Banks Act, 1873, be taken into consideration."

I have nothing further, in asking the House to take this small Bill into consideration, to add to the remarks which I made when I commended the Bill for introduction. As I pointed out then, the Bill is purely a beneficial measure which aims at expediting the payment of deposits of deceased depositors to persons entitled who may be in distressed and destitute circumstances. Moreover, it aims at facilitating departmental business in order to simplify the procedure which is followed, and it does this without taking any undue risk in so far as Government is concerned. I therefore commend this Bill to this House for consideration.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I desire to give this Bill my entire support. I appreciate the further facility that is going to be accorded to the small investor. If I could, on this occasion, I should plead for more facilities for withdrawal of deposits and for a little more interest being added that would make Post Office deposits very popular with the small investor; but as it is not permitted for me to do so I leave the matters for future consideration. I welcome the facility that is being given now in the small measure.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is:

"That the Bill further to amend the Government Savings Banks Act, 1873, be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: Sir, before I move that the Bill be passed. May I be permitted to move the following amendment:

"That in clause 2 in the proposed definition of 'Secretary' in section 3 for the word 'province' substitute the word 'area'."

Sir, I have to point out to Honourable Members that the word "province" used in the drafting of this clause does not correctly satisfy the position. The administrative charge of a Postmaster-General is not confined to a province, but is really, for departmental purposes, a circle, but for general purposes it will better be known as an area, since in certain cases the Postmasters-General administer areas which extend over more than one province.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 2 in the proposed definition of 'Secretary' in section 3 for the word 'province' substitute the word 'area'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

The motion that clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill was adopted.

Mr. J. P. Cotelingam (Nominated: Indian Christian): I move that:

"In clause 3, proposed section 4(b) for the words 'one hundred' substitute the words 'five hundred'."

Under the Act in force the Secretary, who is the Postmaster General, is empowered to pay the amount standing to the credit of a deceased depositor to any person appearing to him to be entitled to receive it, or to administer the estate of the deceased. The amending Bill provides for persons other than the Postmaster General to make similar payments. The persons other than the Postmaster General empowered to make payments will do so in this behalf by a general or special order of the Governor General in Council, subject also to any general or special orders of the Secretary. While the Postmaster General will make payments up to Rs. 3,000, those others are to make payments to the extent of Rs. 100 only as proposed. I presume, Sir, that those who will be empowered to make payments will be first class Postmasters and Superintendents of Post Offices. They are responsible officers, they have a large amount of administrative work to do, and as they have a good deal of local knowledge, I think they may safely be entrusted to make payments up to Rs. 500. This will, I think, result in a great deal of convenience to the public. It would result also in economy being effected, and as mentioned by Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank, it will expedite business a great deal and undoubtedly save the time of the Postmaster General, for I think that cases coming within Rs. 500 will be somewhere about 80 per cent. I do not think that by increasing the powers of these first class Postmasters and Superintendents of Post Offices, the Department will undergo any serious risks, for these officers have or are expected to have a great deal of local knowledge. Further the men who are appointed to discharge these onerous duties, as Honourable Members will see in the proposed clause 4 (b), will be empowered in this behalf by a general or special order of the Governor General in Council. Then there are other conditions laid down for their guidance. They will be subject to any general or special orders of the Secretary, that is the Postmaster General. These officers under the existing rules go into the cases that come up before them and send up their recommendations to the Postmaster General. I am sure they will guard against any losses, will take the necessary precautions, including an indemnity bond if necessary, and see to it that their payments are made duly to the party entitled to the amount that stands to the credit of a deceased depositor. I therefore think that, while there will be a great deal of time saved for the Postmaster General and while

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

[26TH FEB. 1923.]

[Mr. J. P. Cotelingam.]

he will be set free to attend to larger administrative work, the public will gain largely by such powers being entrusted to first class Postmasters and Superintendents of Post Offices. In the Statement of Objects and Reasons on page 3 of the Bill, Honourable Members will find that, by virtue of section 3 of the Post Office Cash Certificate Act, 1917, the provisions of the Bill will be applicable also in the case of payments due on 5 year Cash Certificates forming part of the estate of a deceased person. In the Gazette of India for February, 24, 1923, a revised scheme of Cash Certificates has been promulgated. Cash Certificates can be negotiated not only at the issuing post office as heretofore, but in any post office, and if the applicant satisfies the Postmaster or is identified by any clerk in the post office, payment of the money can be made to the applicant. There are two classes specified. Cash Certificates of the value of Rs. 100 and under will be encashable at any post office doing savings bank business, other than the one where they stand registered, up to an aggregate limit of Rs. 250 in each case on the satisfactory identification of the payee either by a member of the clerical staff of the post office of the locality, or by a responsible resident of the locality. The responsibility of payment in this case is taken by the Postmaster on satisfactory guarantee being obtained through any member of the post office clerical staff. So also in the case of Cash Certificates of the value of Rs. 500

Mr. H. A. Sams (Director-General, Posts and Telegraphs): I rise to a point of order. We are discussing the question of deceased's deposits and not of Cash Certificates.

Mr. J. P. Cotelingam: I am mentioning cases of amounts standing to the credit of deceased depositors who may also be holders of Cash Certificates. In the case of these Cash Certificates any person who is entitled to the amount may make a claim according to the conditions laid down, and the Postmaster may make payment on sufficient safeguards being obtained. For these reasons I propose that Rs. 500 be substituted for Rs. 100 in the proposed clause 4 (b).

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras, ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I oppose this amendment for this reason. Postmasters of the first class and Superintendents of Post Offices are, I know, very capable and very efficient men at their work; but questions connected with the succession to the estate of a deceased person, especially in this country, are not governed by one uniform law. There are Muhammadans; there are Hindus of various divisions and there are other communities. Oftentimes it occurs that on the death of a person, there are rival claimants and it is not easy for one who is not trained as a lawyer and is not familiar with the law to decide prima facie who is the best claimant, and such questions you cannot leave to Postmasters and Superintendents of Post Offices. I must once more repeat that I know they are very able and efficient men but to expect of them also to be legal men capable of deciding complicated questions as to who is to succeed to the amount standing to the credit of a deceased is more than we can do. It is also risky and dangerous and it will lead to an unnecessary amount of litigation. The parties would not be satisfied and would resort to the Courts. It is better that a matter like this is taken over and dealt with in the Central Office, because at the Central Office, which is situated in a large city, there will always be an assistant in the office who is familiar with disposing of such cases and there will also be legal advice available to the officers of Government. Therefore, it will minimise disputes and it will work for greater efficiency. Now, I know that in several cases very strange ideas prevail as to the Hindu law of succession. I know of a case where a man thought that the daughter-in-law of a deceased person should be given the money at his credit. The money was given and a lengthy correspondence took place. The danger is greater in these small cases. These small sums are ordinarily the property of poor people and apparently a wrong decision, though an entirely bona fide one, would drive these people to the Courts and would be the means of whittling away what little there is left. It is therefore very essential to put this matter in the hands of one competent authority, who would be above local knowledge, for, as it was said, local knowledge is also local influence, a dangerous thing in most cases. The best thing is to deal with these matters on the legal basis, calling upon the claimants to substantiate their claims, and that can only be done at the Central Office. I have thought over this matter and I have also talked it over with one or two of my friends, and, whether they agree with me or not, I think in these matters this Rs. 100 is quite enough. As for other matters, I quite sympathise with the feelings of my friend, Mr. Cotelingam, who thinks that by spreading all over the country a number of judges as it were to decide in cases of this sort, would help poor people and would put down litigation and disputes. Every such attempt has always failed and our experience is that attempts to mitigate litigation and to lessen troubles and disputes have always ended in increasing them. Therefore, I think the amendment proposed to increase the amount from Rs. 100 to Rs. 500 is not sound.

There is one other point. I would without in any way minimising the sincerity or the bona fides of my friend's amendment say that the clause is put before us by the Department, which it may be presumed, in this case at any rate, knows its own business. It is not a penal law about which we can condemn the Government. This is a matter entirely of a special kind and, when the Department itself introduces this Bill and says "Rs. 100 is enough for our officers," it is not for us to say "raise it to Rs. 500" or a larger figure. Therefore, I would request my friend, Mr. Cotelingam, to leave it as it is, and trust the Department in this matter.

Sir Sydney Crookshank: Sir, while fully appreciating the good intentions which underlie the amendment which has been put forward by my Honourable friend, Mr. Cotelingam, I regret that on behalf of Government I must oppose this proposal. As my Honourable friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, has just now so rightly pointed out, the measure which we have brought forward is really guided by administrative considerations, and we feel that in fixing the limit at Rs. 100 we are able to extend this concession widely and, therefore, to make it more beneficial to the community at large without taking any undue risks which Government would otherwise possibly feel not altogether justified in taking if we were to raise the amount to as much as Rs. 500, as proposed by Mr. Cotelingam.

There is one point in my Honourable friend, Mr. Cotelingam's remarks to which I should like to draw attention, and that is the one in which he referred to the decentralisation being extended to first class Postmasters only. That is not the intention at all. The idea is to extend it far afield to a large number of offices, so that the public should get the greatest possible value out of the concession. If, after the measure has been in the experimental stage for some time, it is found to work satisfactorily and is also found not to lead to any loss to Government, it will then be time enough for the administrative department concerned to put forward proposals to raise the amount.

Mr. Deputy President: Amendment moved:

"That in clause 3, proposed section 4(b), for the words 'one hundred' substitute the words 'five hundred'."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 3 was added to the Bill.

Clause 4 was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

Clause 1, containing the Short Title, was added to the Bill.

Sir Sydney Crookshank: Sir, I move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Tuesday, the 27th February, 1923.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

AMBALA CORRUPTION INQUIRY.

436. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is it a fact that Khan Bahadur Qazi Sirajuddin Ahmad, Bar-at-law of Rawalpindi, was selected by the Government for legal assistance to Colonel Lawrenson?

2. Is it a fact that the Government asked the Cantonment Committee, Ambala, to meet the travelling and other expenses of Qazi Sirajuddin Ahmad and that the Cantonment Committee refused to do so?

3. Is the Government aware that the Ambala Corruption inquiry was the result of the repeated demands of Ambala public made in three successive public meetings?

4. Will the Government be pleased to state the reasons that led the Ambala Cantonment Committee to refuse the expenses, in face of this repeated public demand?

5. Will the Government be pleased to state why the expenses of the inquiry were not met from the Government Fund?

6. Is it a fact that the All-India Cantonments Association offered to bear these expenses?

7. If so, how did the Government treat this offer?

8. If the offer was rejected, will the Government kindly state the reasons for such rejection?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: 1. The local military authorities recommended the appointment of the barrister mentioned in order to assist Colonel Lawrenson in his inquiry and Government were prepared to agree to his being employed if it was really necessary.

2. Yes.

3. The inquiry was instituted as the result of a number of representations, chiefly local, which reached Government.

4—8. The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the replies given on the 26th January and the 22nd February to questions Nos. 279 and 406 respectively.

"AMBALA MALPRACTICES." QUESTION OF AMNESTY.

437. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is it a fact that Colonel Lawrenson, after consulting the representatives of the All-India Cantonments Association, Ambala, applied to the Government for a general amnesty?

2. Is it a fact that this general amnesty was not granted by the Government and as a result thereof no one came forward to give oral or written evidence about Ambala malpractices and the Association did not associate with the inquiry?

3. Will the Government be pleased to state the reasons for not granting general amnesty?

4. Will the Government be pleased to state how Colonel Lawrenson conducted the inquiry under the circumstances?

5. Is it a fact that he summoned no witnesses, consulted no non-official?

6. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the article headed "Ambala Malpractices? The Hollowness of Recent Enquiry", published in the Cantonment Advocate of 25th December, 1922?

7. Is it a fact that in the absence of general amnesty, a lot of documentary evidence regarding corruption at Ambala could not come to the notice of Colonel Lawrenson?

8. Will the Government direct general amnesty to be given now to know all this evidence?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: 1 and 2. The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the reply given on the 26th January, 1923, to question No. 279. The Government of India do not know whether, on the amnesty being refused, the All-India Cantonments Association did or did not associate itself with the inquiry.

3. The Government of India do not know the specific reasons which influenced the Local Government in arriving at their decision.

4. Government understand that the inquiry consisted mainly of an examination of such documentary evidence as was available.

5. Government have no precise information as to what witnesses, if any, were summoned or examined.

6. Yes.

7. Government naturally are not in a position to make any statement as regards documentary evidence which, as appears from the question, did not come to the notice even of the officer conducting the inquiry.

8. The question is one for the Local Government to decide, and the Government of India do not propose to interfere in the matter.

GARHI AND DAKRA VILLAGES IN DEHRA DUN CANTONMENT.

438. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is it a fact that the villages of Garhi and Dakra were included in the Dehra Dun Cantonment area in 1919, without any compensation being paid for the land of the villages?

2. Will the Government be pleased to state the law and procedure under which the inclusion of this area was effected?

3. Will the Government be pleased to state for what military needs this extension was made?

4. Is it a fact that assurances were given by the then military authorities to the people of these villages that no taxes will be levied upon them in consequence of their villages being included in the cantonment area?

5. Is it a fact that several new taxes have been imposed on the people, since the amalgamation of their villages into the cantonment?

6. Is it a fact that in pursuance of the assurances, the people refused to pay taxes and that there was a wholesale attachment of their property in 1914 for a forced realisation of the taxes?

7. Is it a fact that among the people of these villages there are many retired Gurkhas and widows of retired Gurkha soldiers?

8. Is the Government aware that the taxes are weighing heavily upon these retired Gurkha families?

9. Will the Government be pleased to inquire into the matter?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (1) Garhi and Dakra were included within the limits of the Dehra Dun Cantonment in 1913. No compensation was given.

(2) The inclusion was effected by the application to the area of the provisions of section 3 of the Cantonments Act, 1910.

(3) The area in question was situated between the old cantonment and the newly acquired military areas of Birpur and Gangora, and its insanitary condition was considered to be a grave menace to the health of the troops.

(4) No such assurance was given.

(5) The following taxes were imposed in 1914:

Conservancy tax; trades and professional tax; and hackney carriage tax.

(6) As I have already stated, no assurance was given that the people of these villages would not be taxed. Government are informed that they did refuse to pay taxes and that orders to recover sums due were issued. Recovery was effected in many cases by attachment of property.

(7) Yes.

(8) Petitions have been received from many persons complaining of the heaviness of the taxes. All these petitions were considered by the Cantonment authority who either enforced, reduced, or wholly remitted the tax according to the circumstances of each case.

(9) Government do not consider it necessary to institute any further inquiry into the matter.

LETTER IN CANTONMENT ADVOCATE RE "OFFICIAL AUTOCRACY."

439. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to a letter headed "Official Autocracy" published in the Cantonment Advocate of 25th November, 1922?

2. Is it a fact that cantonment latrines have been erected on the land belonging to the people of these villages?

3. Is the Government aware that this has been done without any compensation being paid for the land so occupied?

4. Will Government be pleased to state the reasons why compensation has not been made in this case?

5. Will the Government be pleased to do so now?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (1) Government have seen the article in question.

(2) Yes.

(3) Government are informed that compensation was paid for some time in two cases

(4) and (5). Government understand that no demand for compensation was made, and, owing possibly to changes of Magistrates, the matter was not brought to notice. The question has, however, now been represented by three persons and their claims are being investigated in consultation with the local civil authorities.

INCOME OF NULLAH NEAR GARHI AND DAKRA.

440. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is it a fact that the income derived from the Nullah near Garhi and Dakra is now credited to the Cantonment Fund?

2. Is the Government aware that this income was formerly shared by the people of Garhi and Dakra?

3. Will the Government be pleased to state its rights to this income when the Government has not taken over the villages of Garhi and Dakra?

4. If the reply to the above question be in the negative, will the Government be pleased to refund the entire receipts of the Nullah since the inclusion of the villages in the cantonment to those who are entitled to them?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (1) Yes.

(2) and (3). Government have no information on the subject but are making inquiries.

(4) Government are prepared to consider any claims for a refund that may be made.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

MEDICAL RESEARCH BY INDIANS.

196. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: 1. What encouragement, if any, have the Government given to Indians in the line of medical research in India during the last 3 years?

2. Has the attention of the Government been invited to a note entitled "Disease and Death—New Theory of Prevention"—printed in the Englishman, dated Monday, December 18th, 1922, page 11, column 3 (local edition)?

3. Is it a fact that Mr. Gupta's research in the medical line was put to test at Bhowali Sanatorium, United Provinces, as reported in the Englishman, dated 18th December 1922? Has any inquiry been made on the subject from Colonel Cochrane, Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals, United Provinces, on the subject?

4. Have the Government given any opportunity or encouragement to Mr. R. D. Gupta of Rasulabad, Allahabad, to put his researches into practical test in the treatment of leprosy, consumption, and cancer or other so-called incurable diseases before medical experts? If so, with what results? If not, do the Government propose to do anything in the matter?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: 1. Government have employed an increasingly large number of Indians on medical research work during the last three years. I shall be glad to give the Honourable Member full details if he will call at my office.

2. Government have seen the note referred to.

3. The Government of India have no information on the matter. The answer to the second part is in the negative.

4. So far as I am aware, Mr. Gupta has placed no proposals before Government. The matter is one primarily for the provincial Government.

STATISTICS RELATING TO TELEGRAPHS.

197. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will Government be pleased to state:

(a) the number of Departmental Telegraph Offices and the number of combined offices at the close of the last official year;

(b) the number of signallers engaged to work the Combined offices, and the number of Telegraphists working in Departmental Telegraph offices;

(c) the number and value of telegrams, both inland and foreign, booked for despatch in combined offices for the year 1921-22 and the number and value of telegrams booked in Departmental Telegraph offices; and

(d) the number of telegrams received for delivery in combined offices and the number of telegrams received for delivery in Departmental Telegraph offices during the year 1921-22?

VALUE OF TELEGRAMS ISSUED.

198. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Is any return submitted by combined offices showing the number and value of telegrams booked for despatch?

(b) Is a similar return prepared by Departmental Telegraph offices?

(c) If answer to (a) and (b) be in the affirmative, why is the calculation of Telegraph revenue made a guess work based on the traffic and revenue for two particular weeks of the year?

(d) If answer to (a) and (b) be in the negative, will Government be pleased to consider the desirability of prescribing such returns for correctly calculating the Telegraph revenue?

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE OF TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

199. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will Government place on the table a statement showing the revenue and expenditure of the Telegraph Department from 1911 to 1920?

200. Mr. K. C. Neogy: From what year has the cost of working combined offices ceased to be charged to Telegraph revenue and come to be debited to Post Office revenue?

POSTAL EXPENDITURE.

201. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will Government be pleased to state:

(a) if the total expenditure on account of the Post Office establishment, the revision of which was sanctioned on the recommendation of the Postal Committee, amounted to about 368 lakhs of rupees in 1920-21 and to about 265 lakhs in 1919-20?

- (b) Is it not a fact that there was an increase of about 2 per cent. in the working staff in 1920-21 due to increase of work, for which an increased expenditure of about 8 lakhs of rupees was necessary?
- (c) Is it not a fact that in 1920-21, were paid arrears of increment for four months of the year 1919-20, calculated at the revised scales of pay sanctioned on the Postal Committee's recommendations?
- (d) Did not this arrear payment amount to about 24 lakhs of rupees?
- (e) If so, does not the net increase for 1920-21 on account of the Revision sanctioned on the Postal Committee's recommendations amount to about 71 lakhs of rupees?

TELEGRAPHISTS AND POSTAL CLERKS.

202. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Is the more skilled nature of work, claimed for telegraphists, recognised in England so as to entitle them to a higher scale of pay than in the case of the Postal Clerk?

(b) If not, why is this difference maintained in India?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: The necessary information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member as soon as possible.

HEAD POST OFFICES IN DACCA.

203. Mr. K. C. Neogy: 1. Will Government be pleased to state how many Head Post Offices were there in the Dacca District before the year 1898?

2. Is it not a fact:

- (a) that in 1898 only one Head Post Office was retained at Dacca, the other Head Offices being reduced to the status of Sub-Offices;
- (b) that in 1900 Munshiganj was again converted into a Head Post Office, and two Head Post Offices were thus created in the District;
- (c) that in 1910 Munshiganj was again converted into a Sub-Post Office, one Head Office being thereby retained in the Dacca District;
- (d) that in September 1922 Narayanganj Sub-Post Office was raised to a Head Post Office, having now two Head Offices in the District?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: 1. There were 3 head offices in the Dacca District in 1898, viz., Dacca, Narayanganj and Manikganj.

(2) (a). With effect from the 1st January, 1899, only the Dacca head office was retained in the District of Dacca, the other two head offices being reduced to the status of sub-offices. The change involved a net decrease of Rs. 140 a month in establishment charges.

(b) Munshiganj sub-office was converted into a head office in 1900, involving an increase of Rs. 178 a month in fixed establishment charge. A departure from the general rule that there should be one head office only for a district, was made as a necessary measure of administrative convenience.

(c) Munshiganj was again converted into a sub-office in 1910, involving a net average decrease of Rs. 165-5-4 a month in fixed establishment charges.

(d) Narayanganj sub-office was converted into a head office in 1922, owing to the proposed partition of the Dacca Division into two, viz., Dacca and Narayanganj. The question of partitioning the Civil District of Dacca into two is still under the consideration of the Bengal Government and it is expected that the scheme will take some time to materialise.

The change involved a net increase of Rs. 134 a month in fixed establishment charges.

ABOLITION OF PLURALITY OF HEAD POST OFFICES.

204. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the reasons that determined the abolition of plurality of Head Post Offices in one District in the year 1898?

(b) Why was a departure made from this policy in 1900 by the creation of a Head Post Office at Munshiganj in that year, and why was Munshiganj again converted into a Sub-Post Office in 1910, and why was Narayanganj raised to the position of a Head Post Office in September 1922?

(c) Is it not a fact that such repeated alteration of the status of a Sub-Office into a Head Office and vice versa entails a good deal of expenditure?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state the amount of expenditure incurred for such conversions on each occasion?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) The reasons that led to the abolition of plurality of head offices in one district in 1898 were:

- "(1) The Comptroller (now Accountant-General, Posts and Telegraphs) would deal with one instead of with 3 head offices.
- (2) In the local audit branch the 1st class head office of the District (Dacca), would deal direct with all sub-offices instead of through the 2nd class head offices which only tends to complicate check and defer the detection of mistakes.
- (3) A cheaper, better and safer method of supplying funds to a large number of sub-offices would be rendered practicable.
- (4) There would be two head offices less for the Superintendent and Inspectors to verify. The monthly verification by Inspectors interrupted their tours and interfered seriously with their sub-divisional work."

(b) Vide (b) and (d) of paragraph 2 of question No. 203.

(c) Not always. In some cases the changes effected savings.

(d) Vide (a), (b), (c) and (d) of paragraph 2 of question No. 203.

NARAYANGANJ SUB-OFFICE.

205. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) What is the estimated additional expenditure that will be necessary in connection with the conversion of the Narayanganj Sub-Office into a Head Office?

(b) What have been the initial expenses for the measure and what further expenditure is expected to be necessary in the near future?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) and (b). Vide (d) of paragraph 2 of question No. 203.

HEAD OFFICES—ABOLITION OF.

206. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Is it not a fact that the difficulty of getting prompt and adequate supply of cash from Sub-Treasuries which occasioned delay in the payment of money orders and in meeting the public demand for withdrawal of money from the Savings Bank, was one of the chief reasons why in 1898 the abolition of the plurality of Head Offices in a district and the retention of only one Head Office at the Treasury Station, were determined upon?

(b) Do not the same reasons that operated in 1898 against the plurality of Head Offices in one district, still exist?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) Yes—vide (a) of question No. 204.

(b) As stated at (d) of paragraph 2 of question No. 203, the Dacca Civil District will sooner or later be divided into Dacca and Narayanganj districts. When this is done, there will be one head office for each district.

INSPECTION OF POST OFFICES.

207. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) How many Post Offices are now required under the rules to be inspected in one year by the Superintendent of (1) Dacca Division, and (2) Narayanganj Division, and how often?

(b) How many offices and how often were the Superintendents in the Dacca district required to inspect in a year prior to the reduction of the Superintendents' inspection work?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) Dacca Division 130; Narayanganj 126.

Superintendents are now required to inspect their larger offices ordinarily once a year, and a certain number of the smaller sub-offices and branch offices at their discretion.

(b) Number of offices as in (a).

Before the introduction of the new rule Superintendents were required to inspect head offices and sub-offices with Postmasters on pay above 40 twice a year, sub-offices on 40 once a year, sub-offices on 30 once in 2 years and 10 per cent. of branch offices once a year.

NARAYANGANJ POST OFFICE.

208. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the letter written to the Director General, Posts and Telegraphs, on the 29th July 1922, by the General Secretary, Provincial Postal and Railway Mail Service Association, Bengal and Assam Circle, published in Labour for September 1922, giving reasons why Narayanganj should not be raised to the status of a Head Post Office, and why the post of one Superintendent should be abolished?

(b) Will Government be pleased to state what action was taken on it?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) and (b). The letter referred to was received by the Director-General, Posts and Telegraphs. The Provincial Postal and Railway Mail Service Association, Bengal, was not officially recognised on that date: no reply therefore was given to the Association. Even if it had been recognised, such a proposal should have been addressed to the Postmaster-General, Bengal and Assam, not to the Director-General. Proposals to modify the postal organisation of a district are made by the Postmaster-General to the Director-General and not vice versa.

RAILWAY BOARD EXPENDITURE.

209. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Would the Government please lay on the table a statement showing the expenditure on Headquarters establishment of the Railway Board for the last five years, year by year?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: A statement giving the information asked for is placed on the table.

RAILWAY COMMISSION EXPENDITURE.

210. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: (a) Would the Government please lay on the table a statement of the expenditure proposed to be incurred in connection with the newly organised Railway Commission and also a statement of the expenditure already incurred in such connection?

(b) Would the Government please state before what Committees such expenditure, whether proposed or incurred, were laid for consideration or sanction?

(c) Would the Government please state before what Committee new items of Railway expenditure are laid for consideration or sanction?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) and (b). The proposals of the Chief Commissioner have only recently been submitted and are now under consideration of Government. No information on the subject can therefore be given at present.

(c) Railway expenditure is incurred in accordance with a programme approved by the Legislature, and the individual items are not laid before any Committee except important items of establishment not within sanctioned grants which are examined by the Standing Finance Committee.

RAILWAY AUDIT SYSTEM.

211. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: 1. Would the Government please state what system of audit obtains in the case of:

- (a) State-managed Railways,
- (b) Company-managed Railways?

2. What is the difference between the two systems and what are the reasons for such differentiation?

3. Is it contemplated to change the system of audit in either case?

4. If so, in what direction is such change to be effected, for what reasons and under what authority?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: 1 and 2. The audit work on the railways worked by the State is conducted entirely by officers of the Indian Audit and Accounts Service. On the lines worked by Companies the audit is carried out by the Companies' officers but an officer of the Indian Audit and Accounts Service with a small office is attached to each Railway to check the audit in certain respects.

The general system of audit is what is technically known as "Pre-audit" i.e., audit before payment is made.

3 and 4. The recommendations contained in paragraphs 129 to 131 of the report of Sir William Acworth's Committee are under consideration.

INDIAN STORES DEPARTMENT.

212. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Would the Government please state:

- (a) the number of Gazetted officers appointed in the Indian Stores Department since its creation?
- (b) the number and qualifications of Indians to whom such appointments have been given?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a) Six gazetted officers have been appointed in the Indian Stores Department since its creation.

(b) Of these, two are Indians, one of whom is a Bachelor of Arts of the Madras University, a Bachelor of Technical Science of the University of Manchester and an Associate of the Manchester College of Technology. Prior to his appointment in the Indian Stores Department, he served in positions of responsibility in various mills and educational institutions and in a provincial Industries Department and by this means acquired a practical experience extending over a period of about 9 years of the Textile Industry in India. The other is a Bachelor of Science of the Glasgow University, who has had 2½ years practical experience in large engineering works in the United Kingdom and had served, previous to his appointment in the Indian Stores Department, for a period of about 16 months as Superintendent of a large water works pumping station in India.

THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member):

Sir, I beg to move that the amendments made by the Council of State in the Bill to provide for the payment by certain classes of employers to their workmen of compensation for injury by accident, be taken into consideration. I do not think I need say anything about this motion. If there are any Honourable Members who want further information on any particular amendment I shall be happy to give it.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Amendment made by the Council of State:

"That in part (d) of sub-clause (1) of clause 2 of the Bill, after the words 'minor son', the word 'unmarried' was substituted for the word 'minor', and between the word 'daughter' and the words 'minor brother' the words 'married daughter who is a minor' were inserted."

The question is that this Assembly do agree with the Council of State in that amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Further amendment made by the Council of State:

"In part (f) of sub-clause (1) of clause 2 of the Bill, the words 'or body of persons whether incorporated or not' were omitted."

The question is that this Assembly do agree with the Council of State in that amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Further amendment made by the Council of State:

"In sub-clause (3) of clause 11 of the Bill, after the word 'leaves' the words 'without having been so examined' were inserted."

The question I have to put is that this Assembly do agree with the Council of State in that amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Further amendment made by the Council of State:

"Sub-clauses (4) and (5) of clause 11 of the Bill were renumbered (5) and (6), respectively, and after sub-clause (3) the following sub-clause was inserted, namely:

"(4) Where a workman, whose right to compensation has been suspended under sub-section (2) or sub-section (3), dies without having submitted himself for medical examination as required by either of those sub-sections, the Commissioner may, if he thinks fit, direct the payment of compensation to the dependants of the deceased workman."

The question I have to put is that this Assembly do agree with the Council of State in that amendment.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay (Bengal: European): Sir, there is a strong feeling in some quarters that this amendment is undesirable in the best interests of all concerned. The Regulation regarding departure from the vicinity should be more adhered to and brought into conformity with another regulation we adopted in this House that no compensation should be given where there was disobedience to orders. If, Sir, a workman leaves the vicinity of his employment without examination it is disobedience, and it does not seem to be logical that compensation should be granted in all such cases where death occurs. I do not wish to oppose this amendment, because I do not want in any way to block the Bill, but I should be very glad of the assurance of the Honourable Member that Provincial Governments will be asked to direct the particular attention of the Commissioners to careful investigation being made before allowing compensation under the powers granted by this sub-section. I can see many possible dangers if very careful investigation is not made. I can point to the possibility of fraud being committed. In ordinary cases, if a workman is so seriously injured that death is likely to occur within a short period, he cannot very well go to his country, but there are other cases which may occur where a man with fraudulent intent gives notice of an accident which may never have happened. In his notice he says 'I have had a fall, and am internally injured'. He can bring forward one or other witnesses, possibly confederates in the same employment, he goes to his country, and in a short time a notification arrives of his death, and from my experiences of life insurance, I can assure the House, and I think many of my lawyer friends will bear with me in this—that evidence, and fairly strong evidence, is on occasions obtainable which would substantiate not only the death of the man but that the death was brought about by the injury he had suffered in his employment. On those grounds, Sir, I think, the utmost caution should be exercised. I quite recognise that the Commissioner would take precautions, but the amendment is somewhat loosely worded. It says 'If he thinks fit' he may grant compensation. It seems to me, Sir, that if the Bill allows of compensation being paid, it should be distinctly stated whether the Commissioner has to grant such compensation or not. If the Bill does not allow of such a compensation being paid on the death of a man who has not carried out one of the requirements of the Bill, then I say that it should not be left to the Commissioner as an act of charity to use other peoples' money to grant such compensation. I ask my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, if he can give me the assurance that the Provincial Governments will be asked to direct the attention of the Commissioners to take the utmost precaution in every case.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I believe the form in which this amendment has come from the Council of State ought to be acceptable to this House, and I think the apprehensions of my Honourable friend, Mr. Darcy Lindsay, are far-fetched if not entirely misplaced. What this amendment seeks to do is to give a sort of discretion to the Commissioner to give compensation in case of death without medical examination in certain cases, and I do think this sort of discretion to the Commissioner is necessary to cover certain cases of workmen leaving the vicinity of their employment for bonâ fide reasons. My friend, Mr. Darcy Lindsay, wanted an assurance from Government that certain instructions to the Commissioners to take certain precautions would be given by the Provincial Governments. I do not see what the difference of that would be from the giving of discretion under the Statute itself to the Commissioners. Mr. Darcy Lindsay wants that the Provincial Governments should write to the Commissioners to exercise certain precautions. What the Bill proposes now to do is also to entrust them with a certain amount of discretion, to make proper investigations and to pay compensation in certain cases bonâ fide of death without medical examination. Mr. Darcy Lindsay further pointed out that the Commissioner is apt to use out of pure charity employers' money. Now we are entrusting the Commissioner with vast powers, and we postulate that the Commissioner will be a man who can use his discretion properly. I do not see why, therefore, in this particular case the Commissioner will not be equally careful in his discretion. I do not think he will give away the money purely out of humanitarian feelings or feelings of charity as Mr. Darcy Lindsay apprehends. I think this amendment ought to be acceptable in its present form, namely, that the Commissioner may, if he thinks fit, give compensation in certain well-deserved cases. I support the amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I am glad that this apprehension which I had when this Bill left the Assembly that, in a case where a man, after leaving the precincts or the vicinity of the scene of the accident, dies, his rights would be altogether lost, the right of his dependents to compensation would be altogether lost, has been removed by the Council of State. Sir, I strongly resent any suggestion that the Local Executive Government should control the judicial discretion which is vested in an officer who is going to be entrusted with the performance of the very duties which this Act confers upon him. Sir, I am surprised to hear my Honourable friend, Mr. Darcy Lindsay, making such a suggestion that the Executive Government must control the discretion of the judicial officer. The law leaving the discretion to a judicial officer like this, I don't think anybody should interfere with this discretion. The apprehensions which my Honourable friend has will be met by the Commissioner when the facts of the case are brought to his notice. The case of fraud which he is afraid of—a man fraudulently proceeding to his home in order to die there, would be very exceptional and persons conspiring with him in order to make him die would equally be a very exceptional case, and in such a case, if the employer is able to make out such a case, he will not award compensation to his dependents. This fear is unfounded. We have hitherto congratulated the employers on the magnanimous spirit which they have displayed in bringing this legislation into effect and I am afraid any such suggestion now made on the employer's side will not be looked upon with favour by the public.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I am aware that this amendment carried in the Council of State has excited some alarm among the employers and I regret that fact very much, for all through this Bill we have managed to carry the employers with us to a very great extent and I regret that at the end there should be any element of discord. At the same time, I do not think myself that there is so much cause for these apprehensions, as has been suggested by the Honourable Mr. Lindsay. We are providing for the case of a man who has been badly injured. It has been put to us very strongly by members on the other side of the House that in that case, the instinct of the Indian is to go to his home, and it was put to us strongly that, owing to that instinct, very hard cases might arise and we endeavoured to provide for these hard cases by giving this kind of discretion to the Commissioner. It has been suggested that this clause will open the door to fraud, that workmen will send in notices of imaginary accidents or very trivial accidents, then will go off home, that a few months later dependents will turn up, will allege that this man has died and that compensation is due. I should like to point out to the House that in that case the onus of proof will be entirely upon the dependents. The dependents will have to prove that the accident took place, that it was an accident arising out of or in the course of employment, and the dependents will also have to show cause why the alleged injured workman voluntarily left the place of employment. On every point, the onus will be on the dependents, and I do not think that in practice this clause will be found to lead to fraud. But, Sir, as the clause has caused suspicion and alarm among the employers I am quite willing to repeat in this House the assurance that I gave in another place. I am not prepared to ask Local Governments to give the instructions to Commissioners suggested by Mr. Darcy Lindsay, but I am quite prepared to give an assurance that we shall address Local Governments on the subject of this Bill and draw their attention to the fact that these suspicions and apprehensions have been felt in regard to this class. We shall ask them to watch the working of the clause very carefully, and we shall ask them in any annual reports in the working of the Act that may be submitted to let us know whether the clause has in fact given rise to fraud or evasion, and, if we do find that the clause is a loophole for fraud, then I am quite prepared to give an assurance that we shall come before this House with the necessary amending legislation. I hope, Sir, that my friend will accept that assurance.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay: I thank the Honourable Member, Sir, for the assurance that he has given me.

Mr. President: The question is that this Assembly agree to this amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Further amendment made by the Council of State:

"To sub-clause (2) of clause 19 of the Bill, the words 'or to enforce any liability incurred under this Act' were added."

The question I have to put is that this Assembly agree with the Council of State in that amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I beg to move:

"In sub-clause (2) of clause 28:

(a) Insert the word 'not' between the word 'shall' and the words 'be enforceable'.

(b) For the word 'notwithstanding' substitute the words 'if the agreement be in contravention of or repugnant to'."

After the amendment which I propose, Sir, the clause will read thus:

"(2) An agreement for the payment of compensation which has been registered under sub-section (1) shall not be enforceable under this Act if the agreement be in contravention of or repugnant to anything contained in the Indian Contract Act, 1872, or in any other law for the time being in force."

Sir, under this Bill we have provided that the agreement for compensation between the employer and the employee shall be registered before the Commissioner and after the registration of such agreement the employer will be liable, only to the extent of the amount agreed between the parties. We have also provided under section 29 that in default of such registration, the employer will not be entitled to get the benefit of any agreements that be entered into by him with his employees. Now, the amendment which has been made by the Council of State is good in so far as it gives the finality to the agreements entered into between the employers and employees. But it also gives a loophole which I wish to have amended if possible by drawing the attention of the House to it. Under clause 2, we have defined that a minor is a person who is below 15 years of age. Now, if a person below 15 years of age were to enter into an agreement with his employer for compensation for injury that he may sustain in the employment, such an agreement under the ordinary laws of contracts will be void and will not be enforceable in any courts of law. Now, if we allow this sub-clause to be retained as has been done by the Council of State in this section, the effect will be that, even an agreement entered into by a minor below 15 years of age with his employer will be valid if registered before the Commissioner under section 28. No doubt, there is a safeguard provided in sub-clause (d) of clause 28, that the Commissioner shall inquire into and find out about the genuineness of the agreement and see that it has not been entered into under any fraud or any influence, but the intervention of the guardian in such agreements between the minor and the employer has not been provided for in clause 28 as it stands. The result would be that the minor's guardian will have no voice in the agreement for compensation that may be entered into between a boy below 18 and the employer. The minor may be induced to accept the terms of the employer that may not after all be suitable or being under his influence he may accept, in which case it will be very difficult for the Commissioner, even though he be a judicial officer, to find out for himself whether the boy was really pleased with the agreement that has been entered into between him and the employer or whether it was under any inducement or temptation that he entered into that agreement or whether or not it was acceptable to guardians. If we allow the provisions of the Contract Act to remain, we shall make it compulsory for the employer to enter into such agreement with the guardian of the minor and over and above that we shall have a further safeguard in its registration before the Commissioner. So, instead of one safeguard that is provided in clause 28, my amendment will give two safeguards in the case of minors in respect of such agreement. I think it desirable to provide further safeguards in such cases. I realise, Sir, that the amendment which I propose is of a sweeping nature in a way—in such a way that even if the agreement is registered before the Commissioner, it will still be possible that the agreement may be declared invalid in the courts of law, but I beg to suggest that such agreements could not be enforceable in the courts of law under the provisions of this very Act. Therefore, even though the agreement be valid otherwise than under this Act, the man would have no right to go to the courts of law and there will be no fear on that score. With these words, Sir, I commend my amendment for the consideration of the House.

Mr. President: Amendment moved in the amendment made by the Council of State:

"In sub-clause (2) of clause 28, as amended:

(a) Insert the word 'not' between the word 'shall' and the words 'be enforceable'.

(b) For the word 'notwithstanding' substitute the words 'if the agreement be in contravention of or repugnant to'."

Sir Henry Moxcraff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, Mr. Agnihotri has explained to the House that his desire is to provide another safeguard. He admits that there is a safeguard already in clause 28 in the proviso, but he thinks that if he makes the provisions of the Contract Act strictly applicable to these agreements, he will provide another safeguard. Now, I would suggest to the House that a provision of this kind proposed by Mr. Agnihotri would render clause 28 to a very large extent useless and inoperative. These agreements will not be entered into. Why should an employer take the trouble to negotiate for an agreement when he knows—he has no acquaintance with the Contract Act and he cannot take advice in every case—when he knows that there is a very good chance of that agreement being set aside by Civil Courts subsequently as being in contravention of some or other provision of the Contract Act? Therefore, Sir, the agreement will fail and the two parties will be just where they were to start with. The injured workman or the minor will then start with his claim for compensation under the provisions of this Bill. The answer to Mr. Agnihotri's amendment has, I think, already been given by Mr. Rangachariar this morning. In speaking in reply to Mr. Darcy Lindsay, Mr. Rangachariar emphasised the fact which has been emphasised in the House already that the Commissioner is going to be an officer of ripe judicial experience and the whole basis of the Act is, Sir, that we must trust the judicial officer who will be the Commissioner under this Act to exercise his discretion wisely and well. If, Sir, the Commissioner has regard to the provisos in sub-clause (1) of clause 28 I do not think there is the slightest risk that any agreement entered into by a minor or on behalf of a minor which is not a fair agreement will be registered by the Commissioner. You must trust the Commissioner, and I think that if my friend, Mr. Agnihotri, will accede to that proposition, he will agree that there is no necessity for him to press his amendment.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, to my mind there is a sufficient safeguard embodied in clause (d) of this very section. There it is clearly provided that if there is inadequacy of the lump sum which has been accepted, then the Commissioner will interfere and will not register that agreement. Again it is mentioned there that if there is a fraud then the Commissioner will step in and will not accept registration of that agreement. I think in the face of this very good safeguard, which is incorporated in section 28, clause (d), there is no necessity for any other safeguard which is contemplated by this amendment. If this amendment were accepted, I am afraid, it will give rise to a number of impediments in the way of deciding this sort of questions between employers and employees.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: How?

Dr. Nand Lal: Will the Commissioner call upon the employer to show who is the guardian of the minor workman? Supposing that guardian is living in a place which is far away, then it will take time to call him. That guardian may be tempted by some other means not to make an agreement. Then all these agreements will be practically blocked and no agreement will come to be entered into and the consequence would be that this measure which is of a very useful character, will lose its object. On these grounds, Sir, I oppose this amendment.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, not being a lawyer, I am unable to see exactly the effect of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment or the new clause added by the Council of State. But I should like to get some explanation from the Honourable Mr. Innes or from Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith how an agreement entered into by an employer with quite a young child of 9 or 10, engaged in, let us say, a house-building industry, suffering a small injury, for which there will be not a lump-sum but half-monthly payments, will be registered or will be covered by the proviso to section 28. I do not think that is a desirable state of things. I am told it must be registered. I want to know under what provision there is any necessity to register an agreement with a child of 9 for a small injury for which there will not be a lump-sum payment but there will be half-monthly payments. Sir, if I am satisfied on this point, I have nothing more to say.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, Mr. Agnihotri's amendment, I may explain, does not bear in any way on the point raised by Mr. Joshi. We have tried to provide for Mr. Joshi's point by making it clear by the amendment in sections 31 and 19 of the Bill that any agreement can be and is enforceable by the Commissioner. We have made it clear in section 31 that the Commissioner may recover any amount payable by any person under this Act, whether under an agreement for the payment of compensation or otherwise. So, we are giving the Commissioner power to enforce an agreement whether for a half-monthly payment or not, whether registered or not, by the amendment in clause 31.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made in the amendment made by the Council of State.

The motion was negatived.

The Assembly agreed also to the following amendments made by the Council of State in the Workmen's Compensation Bill:

"6. Clause 28 of the Bill was renumbered as sub-clause (1) of clause 28, and to the said clause the following sub-clause was added, namely:—

'(2) An agreement for the payment of compensation which has been registered under sub-section (1) shall be enforceable under this Act notwithstanding anything contained in the Indian Contract Act, 1872, or in any other law for the time being in force.'

7. In clause 31 of the Bill after the words 'under this Act' the words 'whether under an agreement for the payment of compensation or otherwise' were inserted.

8. For clause (iii) of Schedule II to the Bill, the following was substituted, namely:—

'(iii) employed within the meaning of clause (d) of section 3 of the Indian Mines Act, 1923, in any mine which is subject to the operation of that Act; or'

9. In part (b) of clause (vi) of Schedule II to the Bill, after the words 'and is' the words 'has been' were inserted.

10. For part (c) of clause (vi) of Schedule II to the Bill, the following was substituted, namely:—

'(c) a bridge which is, has been, or is designed to be more than fifty feet in length; or'

THE INDIAN INCOME-TAX (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): I move that the Bill to amend the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, be taken into consideration.

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 1 and 2 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): I gave notice of an amendment to this clause 3, but that draft having not been approved by the Legislative Department, I have been handed over a draft which has my approval and I beg to move my amendment in the form as drafted by the Legislative Department:

"That for sub-clause (1) of clause 3 the following be substituted, namely:—

'(1) In section 68 of the said Act in the second proviso:

(a) for the words and figures 'to all assessments made under that Act in the year ending on the 31st day of March 1922' the following shall be substituted, namely:—

'to income-tax leviable under that Act in respect of the year beginning on the first day of April 1921 and to Super-tax chargeable under the Super-tax Act, 1920, in that year'; and

(b) for the words and figures 'section 19 of the said Act' the words 'that section' shall be substituted."

Sir, under section 68 of the Income-tax Act which we passed last year we have provided for adjustments of the amounts paid under the old Act. There we have provided that if the assessment had been made in the year ending on the 31st March 1922, all those persons whose assessments had been so made shall be entitled to have their adjustments of amounts made in the same manner as used to be done under the old Act of 1918. But, Sir, difficulties have arisen by the wording of the section, and in my division of the Central Provinces they have been specially very great, because though the proceedings of assessment had been started during the year 1921-22, somehow or other be it due to the negligence of the parties, or the cases being contentious, or through the slackness of the assessing officers, the assessment orders in far too many cases were not passed before the 31st day of March 1922. Some were passed on the 1st or 2nd of April 1922, and some even so late as latter part of the year 1922 with the result that the persons to whom we wanted to extend this concession could not get that concession by the peculiar wording of this proviso. It purports to lay down that only such persons can be allowed such adjustments in whose cases the orders of assessment had been passed before the midnight of 31st March 1922, but if my amendment be agreed to, such cases of hardship will disappear and the benefit of the concession will equally be extended to persons who had been assessed for that year, but after 31st of March 1922, they had no control over delayed assessment. There have also been cases in which orders were to be passed by the Assistant Commissioners or the Commissioner of Income-tax and those orders could not be passed even though the assessment reports were made by the Collectors of Income-tax before the 31st March and the same were subsequently sanctioned. Even such persons could not be allowed the adjustment under section 68 of the present Act. By this amendment we shall do away with all such hardships. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. A. V. V. Aiyar (Finance Department: Nominated Official): Sir, we recognise that it is reasonable in certain cases to extend the concession in regard to adjustments allowed by section 68 of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1922 to assessments made after the 31st day of March 1922, especially in cases in which for no fault of the assessee or for reasons beyond his control there has been delay in assessment. I accept the amendment on behalf of Government.

The motion that that amendment be made was adopted.

Clause 3, as amended, was added to the Bill.

The Title and the Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

RESOLUTION RE STATE MANAGEMENT OF RAILWAYS IN INDIA.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now resume consideration of the Resolution moved by Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah on the 7th September, 1922:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that the Indian Railways Act of 1890 be so revised as to give India the full benefit of State ownership of Indian Railways as is done in other countries where the Railways are owned and managed by the State."

In view of the number of amendments on the paper, I think it may assist the discussion if I give the Assembly some indication of the course which I propose to pursue in regard to them. I shall, in the first place, call upon Mr. Neogy to move the amendment standing in his name. I shall then call upon Dr. Gour to move the amendment standing in his name as an amendment to Mr. Neogy's. Then without putting Mr. Neogy's amendment to the vote I shall call upon Sir Campbell Rhodes to move his amendment as a further amendment to Mr. Neogy's. These will place before the Assembly the principal alternatives and the discussion therefore can proceed on wide lines.

Mr. K. C. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I beg to move:

"That in the Resolution the following be substituted for the words beginning with 'the Indian Railways Act' and up to the end of the Resolution:

'he may be pleased to accept and give effect to the recommendation of the Chairman and four other members of the Indian Railway Committee, 1920-21, that the undertakings of guaranteed Railway Companies, as and when the contracts fall in, should be entrusted to the direct management of the State."

I have heard it said that my amendment merely seeks to raise an academic discussion. I maintain that it does nothing of the kind. Looking through the list of amendments I find that some of my Honourable friends are anxious to shirk the real question that is at issue to-day. They are more in favour of temporising with the question instead of solving it in the way in which we should. Sir, this question came up, I think, about half a dozen times in the old Imperial Legislative Council during the last 10 or 12 years. The question did not come up in connection with the future management of the Great Indian Peninsula and East Indian Railways, but Indian opinion has been insistent during all these years that the future policy of management of all State owned railways should be in accordance with Indian opinion which of course favoured State management. Now, Sir, leaving aside those past discussions, what do we find even when we come to the year 1920-21? We find that the Acworth Committee was appointed not for the purpose of advising the Government of India as to what system of management should be accepted in regard to these two lines, but generally to advise the Government of India on the question of the future policy of management of railways as a whole. A reference to the Acworth Committee's terms of reference will bear me out in this particular. Then, Sir, when the Acworth Committee proceeded about their business they took care to collect all shades of opinion in regard to this general question. They did not confine their attention to the question of Great Indian Peninsula and East Indian Railways alone. And when the report of the Acworth Committee was published, Honourable Members will remember that several of my Honourable friends in this House in interpellations insisted on an opportunity, and an opportunity being given for the discussion of the whole Report of the Acworth Committee, and not merely the question of the management of the Great Indian Peninsula or the East Indian Railway. Again, Sir, the Government of India in June 1922 addressed Local Governments and the Chambers of Commerce in the various provinces, inviting their opinions on this question. They specifically raised the question of the management of these two lines, but incidentally they referred to this general question as well. They say this in one of the paragraphs of their letter: "Not all Local Governments and Chambers of Commerce are immediately interested in these two lines, but the general question involved is so important that they will no doubt wish to express their views", so that even in June 1922, Government was considering the whole question of the future policy of railway management. After that the Central Advisory Council was asked to pronounce their views, not merely with regard to the management of these two lines, but on the question of the policy of future management of railways as a whole. Therefore, Sir, I maintain that it is not only open to us, but it is incumbent on us, to discuss this broad question of principle to-day. We will be shirking our duty if we confine our attention to these two lines without deciding the question of principle involved. Shall it be said that the Legislative Assembly with an elected majority was afraid to decide the question in the year 1923, while its predecessor in days gone by insisted on the acceptance of this general principle in regard to all State-owned railways?

Now, Sir, I come to the subject-matter of the Resolution. A well-known English writer on British railways, whose sympathies are not at all in favour of nationalisation, says that the question of State or private management is not a general one. It is not possible to say that all private companies are bad and all State Railways are good or vice versa. State system and private system may be good, bad or indifferent according to the varying circumstances of different countries. I, therefore, maintain that the analogies of other countries are quite out of place in the discussion on this question, either in favour of State management or in favour of company management in India. Sir, we are all aware that there is no stronger protagonist of company management among the railway experts of the world than Sir William Acworth himself. We find he says in the Report of the Acworth Committee that he and some of those members of his Committee who agreed with him in recommending State management approached this question with a distinct bias in favour of company management. That is a fact which should be borne in mind, because it endows the recommendation of the majority of the Acworth Committee with a special importance of its own. Sir, what are the considerations that led the majority of the Acworth Committee to come to this decision? The majority of the Committee said that the system of company management in India has not been successful. They maintain that company management properly so called does not exist in India, that the companies have no real initiative, nor has the Government who owns a very large proportion of the railway lines. Later on they say that freedom of private enterprise is non-existent and the establishment of companies with real independence is impossible and it is in fact not even proposed. Then they refer to the Indian demand for State management. They say that Indian public opinion is practically unanimous in demanding that the owner shall manage directly. They then come to the conclusion that no scheme for the establishment of Indian domiciled railway companies is acceptable and that not until they are relieved from all reasonable loss will shareholders subscribe at all. Even when so relieved they will only subscribe relatively small amounts. Such small amounts would not justify entrusting them with substantially independent management; and unless the management is substantially independent, the justification for the existence of a company disappears. And, therefore, approaching the question not as one of national sentiment but purely from the practical point of view the Committee find themselves in agreement with the almost unanimous opinion of Indian witnesses, and recommend that the undertakings of guaranteed companies, as and when the contracts fall in, be entrusted to the direct management of the State.

Sir, the Acworth Committee referred to the remarkable unanimity of Indian public opinion in this matter. We are glad to find that this unanimous public opinion has been supported by the various Local Governments. As I have already said, the Government of India consulted the Local Governments in regard to this question; and I find that in reply the Madras Government say that they are strongly in favour of the system of State management generally. The Government of Bombay say that they want the management of the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsular Railway to be taken over by the State. Then the Government of Bihar and Orissa point out that the right and proper solution is to be found in the assumption of direct control by the State. The Government of the Central Provinces are in favour of State management. The Government of the United Provinces are divided on this question, His Excellency the Governor and the European Member of the Executive Council being in favour of Company management, and the Indian Member of the Executive Council, the Honourable the Raja of Mahmudabad, and the two Ministers being in favour of State management. I do not find the opinion of the Government of Bengal or of the Punjab in the collection of opinions that was placed on the Library table in response to a request of mine; but I find that in a written statement which was placed before the Acworth Committee the Government of Bengal pledged themselves in support of State management. When we come to Assam, we find that the Government of Assam recommend Company management for these two lines, and I very gladly make a present of the Assam opinion to my Honourable friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary. (Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: "I thank the Honourable gentleman for the present.") Sir, a good deal of misapprehension seems to prevail in regard to the question as to whether or not State management of railways is quite as efficient and as economical as Company management. In regard to this matter, I think we have got only expert opinion that we could possibly expect in the circumstances, namely, the opinion of the Railway Board in favour of, or at least not against, State management. We find that in their written statement before the Acworth Committee and in their oral evidence before that Committee, the Railway Board maintained that there was absolutely no distinction between State management and Company management so far as efficiency and economy were concerned. We find further that in a Despatch to the Secretary of State in 1917 the Government of India unanimously held this view. I hope that they are not going to resile from that position to-day. Sir, efficiency and economy are very good things indeed, but they must be judged with reference to the immediate aim that we have in view. We must not make a fetish of efficiency and economy. Sir, the main purpose of railways, I maintain, is to develop the resources of the country and to promote the economic well-being of the people. Have the railways, in following the policy that has hitherto been followed, been successful in fulfilling this main condition? (Mr. J. Chaudhuri: "To a great extent.") I do not think I am in the wrong when I say that the railway policy in India has so far been directed not so much in the interests of Indian industries, not so much towards the promotion of the well-being of Indians, as in the interests of British manufacturers and British interests generally. (Sir Montagu Webb and other Honourable Members: "No, no, no, no!") Sir, in the discussions, to which I made reference, which the old Imperial Council had on this subject, our late lamented friend, Sir Vithaldas Thackersay, and another equally great authority on this question, Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola, referred to many instances in which the railway policy has been instrumental in handicapping Indian industries. And those who care to go through the voluminous evidence before the Indian Industrial Commission that was presided over by Sir Thomas Holland, will find that there is ample evidence in that showing how the railway policy has been directed towards the handicapping, if not killing actually, of certain industries in India; how the rates have been manipulated with a view to give foreign imports preference over indigenous industries; how the rates have been manipulated to favour the export of raw materials from India. Now, Sir, these charges, the Acworth Committee admit, Indian opinion takes to be absolutely established.

Sir, what is the alternative scheme of management that has been suggested? The alternative is, management by Companies domiciled in India. The other alternative systems advocated by different sections of opinion, I think, were rejected by the Acworth Committee and are not before the Government, so far as I know. Now it is useful to remember that so far as the management of Indian railways by Companies domiciled in India is concerned, the Boards of the Companies, the Home Boards, I mean, are unanimously against such a scheme. They say that such a scheme of management in India by Companies domiciled in India combines the disadvantages of both State management and Company management without the advantages of either system. Sir Walter Lawrence, who is a Director of the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway and of the Assam Bengal Railway, said that if the present policy were to be changed, he would prefer State management. The question was 'would you give preference to the State management?' The answer was, 'In Indian interests, it would be better to do that, because we do not hold enough capital and the predominant partner can always check us.' Then the Chairman put another question: "are we to take it that the development of Indian national sentiment has caused you to change your view expressed 12 years ago?" The answer was: "Yes, my view is this; if you want to switch Indians from politics, you have to give them something to do and here is this spectacle which you see going through these many thousands of miles of railway. There is not a single Indian who has any direct interest in the railway." Then Mr. Rendell and Colonel Huddleston who are connected with certain Companies as Directors said that the third proposed alternative, that is to say, management through the agency of an Indian Board, appears to combine the faults of both and the merits of neither system. Mr. Rendell says, "I should undoubtedly transfer the management of railways to the State. I should have an honest State railway. You must run railways in India on bureaucratic lines, to my mind, and if the thing is done in India, we had better leave it in the hands of Government." Then Colonel Constable and Sir Donald Robertson, who are also associated with certain Company-managed Lines, said:

"if there is to be a change, the railways should be handed over not to companies in India, but to the State direct. That is what we think. I think all the companies practically think that."

And then it was pointed out that all the companies had discussed this question together and come to the same conclusion.

Sir, reference has been made to the drawbacks of the State system of management by no less an authority than Sir George Godfrey, Agent of the Bengal Nagpur Railway. He thinks that it is only theorists and political socialists who favour State management. Practical men whether in politics or in business favour company management. I would ask the Honourable Members of this House not to be classed among Sir George Godfrey's practical men for this purpose to-day. I suppose that Sir William Acworth and the Directors of the Indian Railway Companies whom I have quoted just now are not political theorists or socialists. Sir, one of the objections against State management which has been magnified beyond all proportion by Sir George Godfrey is that a system of State management will import politics into the administration of the railways. Sir, if we go through the evidence that was given before the Acworth Committee, and also the evidence that was given before the Indian Industrial Commission, we come across numerous instances in which considerations other than of pure business principles determined the policy of the railways. You will find that an Indian gentleman giving evidence before the Acworth Committee referred to certain cases in which it was impossible for Indian owners of collieries to get sidings, because they were Indians; and in one instance particularly it was pointed out that half the share of a colliery had to be sold by an Indian proprietor to an European at a nominal price in order to enable him to obtain a siding. Reference is also made to the fact that it is racial considerations that determine the distribution of wagons among the collieries, and while every European colliery could expect a due supply of wagons the Indians could not. These are certainly not questions of politics! If you ask for redress of these grievances, it is only then that it becomes a question of politics. Now Sir, when the railways pursued a policy that had the result of handicapping Indian Industries to the benefit of the English commercial interests, that is not to be classed as political! If you ask that the Indian interests should be safeguarded in this matter, if you ask that the railway policy should be so directed in future as to assist in the development of Indian industries even at the sacrifice, if necessary, of British interests, then it becomes politics! Sir, if you ask for the redress of grievances of Indian travellers who are often subjected to humiliating treatment at the hands of European and Anglo-Indian officials of the railways, then it becomes a question of politics! So long as you do not complain, it is not politics. Sir, I am convinced that Sir George Godfrey's objection to State management really springs from a guilty conscience, from knowledge that the railway policy in the past has been inimical, deliberately inimical, to Indian interests and that they have done deliberate injustice to India. (Sir Montagu Webb "Nonsense.") It is an unpleasant truth. The real secret of the opposition is, that you are afraid that Indian public opinion, as represented in this House, might assert itself and put an end to the policy, the iniquitous policy, followed so long. That is really the secret of this opposition. Sir, I beg to commend my amendment.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, in moving my amendment I shall not be understood to oppose the basic principle which has moved my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, in tabling his own amendment. I am entirely at one with him on the abstract question of State versus Company management, but I shall presently disclose certain facts and ask the House to decide between his amendment and mine. The Honourable Mover of this amendment has castigated all his opponents as temporizers. He has wound up his speech by saying, "let us not be practical men". Well, Sir, if I have to temporize because I am a practical man, I am not ashamed of temporizing. In dealing with this railway question we must not be pure sentimentalists. We must deal with this question as men of commonsense and as men of business. It is from that point of view that I shall present my amendment for the acceptance of this House. I have said that, generally speaking, I am in entire sympathy with the Mover of the amendment. I entirely agree with him that where the railways are entirely or almost entirely the property of the State, it is the State who should manage its own property. The position of other countries which has often been presented to us by way of illustration affords no parallel. In England we have company management because all the railways are owned by the companies themselves. In Germany and in Japan we have State management because all the railways are capitalized and owned by the State. Consequently the success of Germany or the failure of company management elsewhere affords no parallel to the railway management in this country. The railways in India are almost exclusively the property of the State and yet it happens that these railways are leased out to English domiciled companies who have very little stake in the capital of the company concerned for the purpose of management and upon terms which I cannot but describe as unjust and inequitable, because, while they are entitled to participate in the profits, they are not liable for the resultant losses which are thrown on the tax-payer. That is a position which has given rise to a volume of opinion in this country against company management, and I submit the very strong expression of opinion adverted to in the Acworth Committee's Report and on the platform and in the press is due to this fact, as also to the fact referred to by my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, that these railways have become the monopoly of a certain class, of a certain race who are employed in all the highly paid appointments, and the Indians who ought to be employed in the superior service of the railways are relegated to positions of subordination and servility. While a large number of the travelling public are Indians, the guards, drivers, station-masters and ticket collectors and everybody constituting the controlling staff of the stations is either a European or an Anglo-Indian. (Mr. R. A. Spence: "What about the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway?") Now, these are things which have impressed themselves upon the people and they have decided that as the railways belong to them, they and they alone shall manage them in the interests of the people and of the State. When I hear my friend, the Mover of this amendment, speaking eloquently on the subject of State management I have no doubt that the sentiments which have prompted him to advocate State ownership and State management are partially, if not entirely, due to the feeling I have described. I have said at the outset that I am in entire sympathy with his feelings. But if we descend from the general to the particular, what are the facts? We have in this country eight State-owned railways. They are all for the present leased out to companies for the purpose of management. Of these eight railways the contract with the East Indian Railway expired in 1919, and it was extended for a period of five years, which will expire on the 31st December 1924. The contract with the Great Indian Peninsula Railway given in 1900 for 25 years will expire in 1925. These are the two railways covering about 6,000 miles, whose contracts will expire next year and the year after the next.

I now give the periods when the contracts of the other six railways will expire. The next that will fall in will be the Burma Railways in 1928; the contract with the Assam-Bengal Railway will terminate in 1931, with the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway in 1937, with the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway in 1941, with the South Indian Railway in 1945, and lastly with the Bengal-Nagpur Railway in 1950. Therefore of all these State railways, the two trunk lines, the most important lines of which the contract will terminate next year and the year after the next are the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway; and it is with reference to these two railways that I have given notice of my amendment in which I ask as follows:

"That all the words from the words 'the Indian Railways Act' to the end of the Resolution be deleted, and the following be substituted in their place:

'on expiry of their leases, both the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway be taken over for management by the State'."

I have already pointed out, Sir, that there is very little difference in principle between my friend, Mr. Neogy's amendment and mine. The only difference is that I do not want this House to decide upon a question which will arise for practical consideration in certain cases as late as 1950 and in the majority of cases in the years which I have mentioned. Those are questions which, I submit, must be decided in the light of the experience gained during the interval of State management of the Great Indian Peninsula and East Indian Railway Companies. On this point there cannot be any difference of opinion. The majority, at any rate, five members including the Chairman, of the Acworth Committee, speaking of State management of railways point out that so far as State management of railways is concerned, it is at the present moment and as regards these two railways a matter which admits of no choice. But at the same time the Chairman and his colleagues point out that if it were possible to start a genuine indigenous company to take over not merely the management but also the capital of these two companies this question would assume a different aspect; and with reference to this suggestion the Minority Report says: "We should not decide the question of State management as regards these few railways because it is impossible to foretell what may be the opinion on these matters 15 or 20 years hence in India, Europe, or the world generally," and they say it would be unwise at the present juncture to commit the Government of India to a permanent policy of State operation. Honourable Members will see that the financial position of the country at the present moment is not favourable to the flotation of a company that will take over the capital of the Great Indian Peninsula and East Indian Railways. But in the case of the other railways, the Burma Railways and the other railways I have mentioned, years after it may be possible to raise capital in this country and to form independent and indigenous companies not only merely to own but also to take over the management of these railways, and it is upon this ground that I think it would be premature to commit this House to the policy of State management without adverting to the facts which may hereafter induce us to change our views. It is on this ground, Sir, that I have ventured to differ from my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy. As I have said before, and I repeat it, that if the question was an urgent one, as urgent as it is in the case of the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, I should unhesitatingly vote with my friend in favour of State management. It is a well known fact, a fact which Honourable Members will find stated by witnesses after witnesses and summarised in this Report, that State management would lead to the unification of railways, to the centralisation of control, to the elimination of conflict of interests, to the placing of favourable contracts, and last but not least, to the removal of colour bar. These are all considerations which weigh with me, and I have no doubt that they will weigh also with the House. But the only point upon which I venture to differ from my Honourable friend is that we should not lay down a policy for 25 or more years in advance, when we shall be in a position to examine the situation as it may then present itself, and if the financial condition of the country then permits of the flotation of a company, we might be advised to entrust the management to a company. I understood my friend Mr. Neogy to suggest that State management is always to be preferred to company management. It is a notorious fact, and a fact which could not be denied, that State management can only be had in the last resort. State management is uneconomical, it cannot compete with a properly organized company. But when we advocate State management, it is not because we are enamoured of the State, but because we think that Company management has led to abuses which cannot be prevented, and that out of the two evils we prefer the lesser evil of State management. It is on these grounds, Sir, that I advocate the resumption of management by the State of the Great Indian Peninsula and East Indian Railway Companies. At the same time, I would ask this House to reserve its judgment as to the future management of the other railways when the proper time comes for it. As I have said before, and I repeat it, that other things being equal, Company management would be far more preferable to State management. (Cries of "No, no" from different parts of the House.) We all know my friend, Mr. Neogy, has said so; we know, as a matter of fact, that if the capital of the railways in this country had been subscribed by the people of this country, they would have felt a far greater personal interest in the administration of the railways than they do at the present moment, and let us hope that in the near future such a time may come when the people of this country will start their own companies and take over not only the management but the ownership of their lines. But can any one say what will be the situation 5 years hence, or 10 years hence, or 20 years hence or 25 years hence? And unless Members of this House are prepared to dogmatise and assert that the people of this country will never be able to subscribe to the capital necessary for the purpose of owning these companies on the termination of their leases and to provide for their management, unless Members of this House are prepared to prophesy that such a state of things is not likely to come during the next quarter of a century, they cannot ask this House to commit itself to an unalterable decision that all railways hereafter shall be managed by the State. (A Voice: 'Yes, in India'.) I was only speaking about India and of no other country. I submit, Sir, that this is the sole point of difference between my friend, Mr. Neogy, and myself, and I leave the decision in the hands of the Honourable Members of this House. Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. President: In order to make the Honourable Member's amendment more clear, is he prepared to move his amendment as an amendment to Mr. Neogy's?

Dr. H. S. Gour: Yes.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That all words after the word 'pleased' be omitted, and the following be inserted in their place:

'On expiry of their leases to take over both the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway for management by the State'."

Sir Campbell Rhodes (Bengal: European): Sir, I beg to move:

"That for the words from 'the Indian Railways Act' to the end of the Resolution the following be substituted:

'before coming to a definite decision as to the best railway policy for India, it is desirable to continue for a further period of five years the principles both of State and Company-management, in order that:

(1) Experience may be gained as to the effect on the working of the existing State-managed lines of the Reform Scheme and of the present re-organisation of the Railway Board.

(2) The Company-managed railways may appoint immediately strong local boards in India consisting of an equal number of Indians and Europeans, such boards to have definite and growing powers on the understanding that within the five years they should abrogate to themselves the functions of the home boards.

(3) It may be ascertained which method of management is calculated to produce the best results in regard to:

- (a) Economical working;
- (b) The comfort of passengers;
- (c) The industrial development of the country;
- (d) The greater association of Indians and Anglo-Indians in the higher administration of the Railways."

Sir, I cannot congratulate the advocates of State management on the speech which has fallen from my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy. This House has high traditions, and I hardly think it is in accordance with those traditions to use it as a sanctuary for charges against people, with those traditions of criminal misappropriation for which he has given no data and charges of criminal misappropriation for which he has given no data and where he has mentioned no names. I can, however, congratulate the advocates of State management on the advocacy of my friend, Dr. Gour. When there is nothing to be said for a subject, I know of no better advocate for he says it with so much zeal, so much eloquence and convinces us so readily. Mr. Neogy says that the analogies of other countries are out of place. Sir, I am going to bore Mr. Neogy. In the Acworth Committee's Report, reference is made to the experiences of other countries:

"268. We will now allude briefly to the conditions in a few important countries where State management exists. The Swiss Federal railways in seven years (1914-20) have shown a loss of 200 million francs, say 8 to 10 million sterling. Before the war they were earning a small profit. Passenger fares have been increased by 40 to 60 per cent. Prior to 1914 and subsequent to the date of nationalisation there was a steady and often large increase in the cost of the staff and in the operating ratio. The Northern Railway of Austria, before it was taken over by the Government in 1906, paid a dividend averaging for the previous five years 12 per cent.; the Government succeeded in turning that profit into a loss. In Italy for a period of eight years from 1905, when Government took over the working of the railways, there has been a steady yearly increase in the operating costs and the return on the capital has declined. The South African railways show a loss of 2,000,000 £, on the last two years' working. The American railways are in such a bad way consequent on the period of Government control, that President Harding in a recent address to Congress, after referring to the 'heedlessness of cost of Government operations', emphatically asserted that there would be a foundation for rebuilding after the past disaster, if it was clearly understood that there would be no State ownership, and that the people would not be taxed to cover railway deficits. This shows the trend of opinion in a democratic country."

Sir, in addressing the Government, the Bengal Chamber of Commerce quoted some other instances of State railway mismanagement:

"The examples of other countries show equally startling results. Probably no more striking indictment of State management has ever been written than that prepared by Mr. E. A. Pratt, the well-known railway economist, in discussing an exhaustive study of the State Railways of Belgium, a system often pointed to by those who favour nationalisation. Amongst the primary evils he emphasises that of excessive centralisation, the higher cost of staff, and the absence of the elements of competition and initiative. He tells how amendments to the railway budget of 1905 would have augmented the payments for salaries and wages by 40 per cent., and of how the Belgian Chamber discussed the railway budget for five weeks. . . . In Germany one of the chief conditions laid down by the German industrial magnates for advancing securities to the German Government is that, as far as possible, State-managed enterprises (including the German State Railways) should revert to private management. But most striking of all, perhaps, is the case of France, where a commission has recently been inquiring into the future management of the railways. The Chamber understand that this Commission have reported in favour of handing over the Western or State Railway system to a company, this proposal being preferred to an alternative proposal that the system should be put under a Board of Management with no direct financial interest in the working results."

And now I come to New Zealand and I should like to quote here a short passage from Lord Bryce's book which probably few of you have read:

"Two questions remain to be considered: the financial position of the Government railways and the service they render. The former is not easy to ascertain, because the form in which accounts are presented, with the habit of sometimes charging to capital what ought to come out of revenue, does not tell the whole story. It seems clear, however, that the lines have been, and are being, worked at a loss, i.e., the receipts do not cover interests on the cost of construction as well as all working expenses, so there is a loss to the general taxpayer. The explanation usually given, besides, of course, an admission of the errors which made the original cost greater than it ought to have been, and which also saddled the Department with unremunerative lines, is that the rates are kept low with a view to the 'development' of the country and the benefit of the travelling public. As regards 'development', this is a term wide enough to cover expenditure on unprofitable lines, and one of the results of 'political' and otherwise extravagant railway construction and management has been to reduce those very railway receipts which might have been used for the building of new lines where they were really wanted. It is alleged that the higher branches of the railway service suffer because it is hard to promote the most capable men without incurring the reproach of favouritism, and it is further asserted that in the lower departments less work is got out of railway employees of all kinds than private employers obtain."

In the face of these extracts, I do not wonder that Mr. Neogy says that analogies of other countries are out of place. The Acworth Committee has given us no lead. Mr. Neogy's arithmetic is as bad as his logic. There was no majority report. The objections to State management mentioned by the five were as follows:

- "(1) constant transfers of senior officials, resulting in lack of continuity of policy;
- (2) the tendency to give promotion on the grounds of seniority alone without sufficient regard to efficiency or local knowledge;
- (3) disregard of public opinion; and
- (4) lack of initiative and flexibility. Further, as regards the co-existence of company-managed railways and State railways, it is urged that improvements in the administration of State railways which have been effected during past years are mainly due to the emulation inspired by company management; in other words, that the initiative lies with the company-managed railways, and that emulation and comparison provide healthy results in the case of State-worked lines."

Well, Sir, now let me take the arguments of the Acworth Committee in favour of State management. They say in paragraph 223:

"Even if we were to assume that State management would not be better, we are quite sure that its failures would be judged more leniently by the Indian public."

This, Sir, is putting in another way what Mr. Neogy has put much more eloquently when he says: "let us not make a fetish of efficiency." I suggest, Sir, that such a sentence in a serious report is to condemn the whole report for prompt consignment to the waste paper basket.

Well, Sir, we now turn to the unanimous conclusions. These are primarily in Nos. 2 and 3:

"2. We recommend that, on the one hand, the reconstituted Railway Department should delegate considerably increased power of day-to-day management to the local railway administrations, and on the other hand should be relieved from control by the India Office and by the Government of India except on large questions of finance and general policy.

3. We recommend that the Finance Department should cease to control the internal finance of the railways"

Sir William Acworth's section of the Committee recommended State management, but they were careful to say, in paragraph 228:

"It is not State management as it has hitherto existed in India, whose functions we recommend to be so greatly extended."

Then, what is it? The Honourable Mr. Innes has put down a Resolution for to-morrow's debate the meaning of which, I understand, is that the financial recommendations of the Acworth Committee are not to be carried out. We have therefore not got the State management which Sir William Acworth recommended. What again, Sir, is the position of the new Chief Commissioner of Railways? Though this is a controversial subject I think the whole House will agree with me that in the selection of Mr. Hindley as Chief Commissioner the Government have found the very best man they could find in India or possibly in any other country. (Hear, hear.) I am glad to hear the House approves of that. But I want to go one step further. I want to go into Mr. Hindley's antecedents. Where did Mr. Hindley come from? Mr. Hindley got his training in one of those inefficient company lines.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): What about the seniority argument then?

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Seniority was not insisted on in this case. What became of Colonel Waghorn?

Sir Campbell Rhodes: What are Mr. Hindley's duties? I understand in front of him he has the Assembly wanting to know—if Dr. Gour will excuse the reference—why a certain shed foreman on the North-Western Railway was not paid his gratuity and also wanting to know why certain trains have been taken off in Southern India, and behind him he has the Government and the Secretary of State. Well, Sir, I do not share Dr. Gour's childlike faith in the Government and His Majesty's Secretary of State. And what is the Assembly's position? It has been admitted by one of the chief advocates of State management that it will cost more money. Mr. Neogy, I gather from his remarks, is of the same opinion.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: No.

Sir Campbell Rhodes: In that case, we shall have to find the money, and we shall have to put up more money and stop the development of the country for this new toy of State management like New Zealand, South Africa and the other places I have mentioned. (An Honourable Member: "Is it a new toy?" Another Honourable Member: "Is it not old?") Mr. Neogy has made a charge that the lines of the present companies are being run to help the import trade from other countries. Well, Sir, I submit that he wants to go a step further and help them a little more. Sea freights are falling every day. If railway freights go up, obviously the advantage will be in favour, for instance, of Belgium or German steel against Tatanagar, and therefore, if, as so many of us think and as Dr. Gour fears, State management is going to cost us more, we are going to increase those very evils of which Mr. Neogy speaks so eloquently. His advocacy of State management is to find employment for more Indians. The humdrum of employment in State service, promotion by seniority, no promotion by merit, no weeding out of bad men . . .

Mr. K. C. Neogy: What about the official Members of the Executive Council? They are not senior men.

Mr. President: I have allowed the Honourable Member to interrupt several times because a certain measure of interruption is perfectly in order. But I ask him now to desist from further doing so.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Are we not entitled to correct, Sir?

Mr. President: When the Honourable Member is called on to speak he can correct what he likes or dislikes.

Sir Campbell Rhodes: Now, Sir, I turn to State management. I have pointed out that we have not yet had the State management which the Acworth Committee suggested. We have not even got it to-day, and therefore, my amendment is to the effect that we should not transfer all our Railways to State management until we see what that State management is. We have not had the Company management which I visualize in my amendment. We are all agreed that we do not want Home Boards. We want our Boards out here as fast as we can train our Directors and it does take time to train Directors to the efficient management of a Railway Company. We want to harness our business men and in the five years I suggest it ought to be possible to train up our new Directors to their new responsibilities. I would go further than that. If I had my way, I would immediately send Home to the London Board a liaison officer in the shape of some Indian expert in Railway affairs.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Where are they?

Sir Campbell Rhodes: My amendment, therefore, Sir, is to run both side by side until more experience has been gained. This is not, as Mr. Neogy suggests, a racial question. The Resolution passed in January by the Associated Chambers of Commerce was proposed by his very distinguished fellow-countryman, Sir Rajendra Nath Mookerjee and it read as follows:

"This Association re-affirms the Resolution in this connection passed at the annual meeting of the Association in January 1922; and, in view of the proved disadvantages in almost all countries where it has been adopted, of the system of State Railway Management, and the growing tendency to revert to a company-managed basis, the Association strongly recommends that those railways in India which are now managed by companies should continue to be under Company Management with Boards domiciled in India and should not be transferred to the direct management of the State."

I believe, Sir, that this demand for nationalisation is on altogether false premises. It is based entirely on the idea that nationalisation and nationalism are synonymous terms. I suggest to the House that they are nothing of the sort. One spells bureaucracy and the other democracy, and I will leave it at that.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"Before coming to a definite decision as to the best railway policy for India, it is desirable to continue for a further period of five years the principles both of State and Company management, in order that:

(1) Experience may be gained as to the effect on the working of the existing State-managed lines of the Reforms Scheme and of the present re-organisation of the Railway Board.

(2) The Company-managed railways may appoint immediately strong local boards in India consisting of an equal number of Indians and Europeans, such boards to have definite and growing powers on the understanding that within the five years they should abrogate to themselves the functions of the Home boards.

(3) It may be ascertained which method of management is calculated to produce the best results in regard to:

- (a) Economical working;
- (b) The comfort of passengers;
- (c) The industrial development of the country;
- (d) The greater association of Indians and Anglo-Indians in the higher administration of the Railways."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, there are now three amendments before the House and I think it will be convenient if at this stage I define the attitude which Government desire the House to take up. I do not propose to deal at any length with the amendment proposed by Mr. Neogy. I entirely agree with Dr. Gour that at this stage it is unwise and unnecessary indeed for this Assembly to attempt to lay down for ever what should be our right policy in regard to Railway management. As Dr. Gour has pointed out, some of our existing contracts with some of our existing Companies do not expire till 1941, 1945 and 1950. Is it any use for us to-day to try to dictate to our successors what view they ought to take when those contracts expire? No responsible man, Mr. Neogy least of all, would suggest that in pursuance of the policy which Mr. Neogy desires to see adopted we should terminate, before their termination is due, the existing contracts. (Mr. K. C. Neogy: "I did not say that.") I am sure Mr. Neogy would not say that, and that being so, is it not wiser to leave it to our successors to decide that question for themselves? They will not pay the slightest attention to anything that we may say to-day. What they will look at will be the experience they have gained in the period which will intervene before the contracts expire. That being so, I suggest to the House that we should confine ourselves to-day to discussing the real practical issue, namely, the issue raised by Dr. Gour's amendment. That amendment raises the question of what is to be the future management of the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway when their contracts expire in 1924 and 1925. It puts in a more concrete form the general question of policy. When we are discussing this concrete question we can discuss also the general question of policy.

Before I go on, I think that I should clear the ground in one material respect. We will all agree I think with the unanimous recommendation of the Ackworth Committee that as the existing contracts of the guaranteed companies expire the management and control of those companies should be transferred to India. Even though Sir Campbell Rhodes' amendment asks that the transference should be gradual, it does not derogate in any way from the principle which I have enunciated, and I am perfectly sure that that principle will secure general acceptance. Before I pass on, I should like to say one thing. Though we arrive at the conclusion that the system of guaranteed companies with Boards located in London are no longer suited to modern conditions in India, let us not forget that these guaranteed companies with their Home Boards have played a very great part in the development of the Indian railway system, and I should be very sorry indeed if anything that I have said to-day might be thought to belittle that part or in any way to belittle the services which have been rendered and are being rendered to-day by the servants of those companies in India. Those services are very often criticised, often I am afraid maligned, and I am glad to be able to take this opportunity of saying that in my opinion there is no more hard-working body of public servants and no body of public servants which deserves better of the State.

As I have said, Sir, this amendment of Dr. Gour's raises in substance, if not in form, the whole question of the State versus Company management. There is no question on which public opinion is more sharply divided and there is no question on which feeling runs higher. If we may judge by Mr. Neogy's speech, if we may judge by the evidence tendered before the Ackworth Committee, and if we may judge by the replies which we received to our circular of July last, I think we may take it that Indian opinion generally has ranged itself in favour of State management. European opinion, or at any rate, European business opinion has ranged itself in favour of Company management. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "Not entirely. Karachi does not.") I will leave Sir Montagu Webb to answer for Karachi. It seems to me essential that the two schools of thought should try and understand one another's point of view and I have been at considerable pains both in the Central Advisory Council and elsewhere to try and ascertain the reasons which each school has for the faith that is in it. I take the Indian view first.

In the first place, I think most Indians and I am prepared to agree that it is the theoretically correct view,—many Indians think that railways perform public services of such immense importance to the public that they ought to be managed by the State in public interest. They ought not to be managed by companies for the benefit of their shareholders. There is the sort of feeling that Company management connotes exploitation of the public for the benefit of the shareholders and this feeling, as Mr. Neogy's speech has shown, is accentuated in India by the fact that the companies are directed from London. It is believed that the Indian public is exploited for the benefit of the British shareholder. Then it is hoped that by bringing these railways under State management they would be brought more under the influence of public opinion in India as expressed in this Assembly, and that the pressure of this public opinion and the pressure of the Assembly will tend to the removal of certain grievances which the Indian public generally has against the railways. It is believed, as Dr. Gour has said, that the railway services, especially the upper grades and the upper subordinate grades of those services, are the close preserves of the Europeans and the Anglo-Indians and that Indians do not get a fair share of the appointments in those grades. It is also believed that popular control will ensure that railway rates are not manipulated directly against Indian industries—I am merely stating the belief. I do not for a moment admit that railway rates are in any way manipulated either for imported goods or against Indian industries. That is the belief, and it is believed that popular control will prevent the Indian railway rates from being manipulated so as definitely to handicap Indian industries. Again, national sentiment comes into play. It is felt that the Indian railways are essentially India's own concern and the demand is made that India should be allowed to run her railways in her own way. It is believed that a great majority of educated Indians are in favour of State management, and that is in my opinion one reason why the demand for State management is so strong. Finally, of course, those who hold the view in favour of State management have derived great support from the report of the Acworth Committee.

The European business opinion takes a more detached, and I think I may say, a more practical view of this very vexed question. They regard the railway as essentially a method of transport and an instrument of commerce. The watchwords of the management of a railway should be efficiency and economy, that is, in other words, the railways must be so run as to render the best possible services to the public at the lowest possible rates. Now, Sir, there is not a vaster or a bigger commercial undertaking than a railway, flung like the East Indian Railway or the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, across half a continent, carrying millions of tons of goods and millions of passengers a year and coming into contact at every turn with the public. The European business community believes that only a company can successfully run a commercial undertaking of this magnitude. The Directors are themselves financially interested in the concern. The pressure of the shareholders makes for economy. The pressure of public opinion,—and mind you, public opinion is making itself more and more felt in India now,—makes for efficiency. Bureaucratic management, it is said, can never be real business management. It cannot dismiss or promote servants with ease. It is not elastic enough. It is bound by red tape and by meticulous rules. As Sir Campbell Rhodes has pointed out, this view is supported by the experience of practically every democratic country in the world. In practically every democratic country where State management has been tried, it has resulted in inefficient service and multiplication of staff and in the railway becoming a burden upon the tax-payer. Now, Sir, I think what I have said is a fair summary of the views of the two schools of thought. Partly it is a difference of outlook and temperament. Every Englishman has a lurking distrust of his own Government.

[Mr. C. A. Innes.]

He regards Government as a necessary evil to be kept in its place and he regards with the utmost suspicion the intrusion of Government into the domains of commerce and industry. Possibly for historical reasons the Indian does not seem to have the same distrust of the Government.

I feel that I have skated very superficially over a very difficult and a very big subject. But the point I have to make now is that the issue to-day is not a clear cut issue between State management and real Company management. Had that been the issue we know perfectly well on which side Sir William Acworth would have come down. As Mr. Neogy put it, Sir William Acworth is the great protagonist against State management. He has written a book upon the subject and a more damning indictment of State management was never penned. Yet so far as India is concerned, Sir William Acworth came down in favour of State management. That is a very remarkable fact but the reason is not far to seek. The main burden of that part of Chapter VII of the Acworth Committee's report which was written by the Acworth half of the committee is that guaranteed companies in India are not real companies and that they do not give India the benefits of real Company management. This disability is inherent in the system. Government owns the railways, Government finances the railways, Government cannot divest itself of its responsibility for the railways and therefore Government can and must exercise control—control not only in matters of policy but in matters of details such as scales of pay. The result is that we fall between two stools according to Sir William Acworth. Government ownership, Government finance and Government control deprive the companies of all real initiative. On the other hand by reason of the interposition of the Companies, Government themselves do not feel bound, to take the initiative. If they did, they might be hampered by the measure of power which the companies enjoy. Hence Sir William Acworth arrived at the conclusion that the present system is logically indefensible and that it is unsatisfactory in practice. He and his colleagues saw no prospect of being able to replace that system by real companies and therefore by the logic of his own argument he was driven to come down in favour of State management as on the whole the right form of management for India. His conclusion was that since it was a choice between whole-hearted State management and Company management so controlled, so hampered, and so diluted as hardly to be worth the name of Company management, his conclusion was that he would prefer State management. Well, in the form in which his argument has been put, I do not think that there is any gainsaying it. I am prepared to admit that logically it is difficult to defend the existing system of Company management in India. Whether that system has been so unsatisfactory in practice is a very much more arguable point. In fact the Acworth half of the committee contradict themselves on this point. In paragraph 212 of their Report, they find that Company management has been unsatisfactory in practice. In paragraph 230, they devote themselves to proving that there is no reason to believe that State management in India has proved itself less efficient and less enterprising than Company management. In fact the argument may be stated thus. Logically the Company management cannot be defended in India. In practice it is no more efficient than State management. Indians are hotly in favour of State management. Therefore let us go in for State management. I think it is a fair summary of the argument of the Acworth half of the Committee. But, Sir, I think there is an obvious flaw in that argument. Personally I am prepared to admit that as things are at present there is not much to choose between State-managed railways and Company-managed railways, and if things were to go on in India in the future as they have gone on in the past I do not think that it would matter so very much whether we embark on a policy of State management or continue the existing guaranteed companies. In that case the main objection to universal State management would be the enormous, I may say, the intolerable burden it would throw upon the railway commission at headquarters. I should like this House to realise that I do not believe that there is any officer in the whole of India on whom a greater burden of responsibility lies even at present than my friend, the Chief Commissioner for Railways and you must always remember that as you extend the system of State-managed railways pro tanto you add to that burden. Where you have a Company railway, you have at any rate a Board of Directors and to that extent you take away some of the burden from the Chief Commissioner. But, Sir, though I am prepared to admit that as things are at present there is not much to choose between Company railways and State railways, yet we have to look to the future. India is changing. Her constitution is bound to become more and more democratised. This Assembly is bound to become more and more a popular Assembly and the Railway Commission is bound to become more and more subject to pressure from this Assembly. Now, Sir, Sir Campbell Rhodes has given many instances of the experience gained of State management in other democratic countries. I will content myself with giving only one. As I have said I do not think there is any democratic country in the world where State management has proved anything but a gross failure. Let me read the conclusion of Sir William Acworth himself in his book 'State Railway Ownership.' He writes as follows: 'Professor Hertzell has summed up the conclusions of the Italian Railway Commission based on the railway experience of the world as it existed 45 years ago.'—I hope Mr. Neogy will listen very carefully—'(1) Most of the pleas for State management are based upon the idea that the State would perform services much cheaper than they are performed by private Companies. This is a mistake. The tendency is decidedly the other way. The State is much more likely to attempt to tax industry than to foster it. (2) State management is more costly than private management. (3) The political dangers would be very great. Politics would corrupt Railway management and Railway management would corrupt politics.' Sir William Acworth goes on: 'and the conclusions of the Italian Commission still seem to stand firm. The essential lesson of history may be said to be this. It is impossible to obtain satisfactory results from Government railways in a democratic State unless the management is cut loose from direct political control.' I am aware, Sir, that the Acworth Committee make a passing reference in paragraph 233 of their Report to the experience of other countries. It is said that that experience is irrelevant, that we are concerned now with the future policy of Railway management in India, in India's own conditions. That may be so, Sir, but I cannot see myself any reason why India can afford to neglect or to shut her eyes to the experience of other countries. I have shown that India must become more and more democratized. Sir William Acworth himself has stated that it is impossible to obtain satisfactory results from Government-managed railways in a democratic State unless the management of those railways is entirely divorced from political control. Now, Sir, is this Assembly, unlike any other democratic Assembly in the world, is this Assembly likely to relax its control over the railways? If so, what becomes of those aims and objects on which Mr. Neogy has laid such stress: the Indianization of the services, arrangements for rates so as to favour Indian industries, and so on? I ask this House, Sir, is there any reason why the universal experience of State management in other democratic countries should not be repeated in India? The Acworth Committee was on stronger ground when it laid stress on the logical position. It is perfectly true that the State in India does own in whole or part the railway lines. It is perfectly true that our guaranteed Companies are not real Companies: they are rather anæmic Companies. It might well be argued that the whole of our policy in regard to these guaranteed Companies in the past has been definitely directed to one logical conclusion, namely, State management, and it is also perfectly true that it is easy enough to argue against State management; but the real difficulty begins when you try to find an immediate satisfactory alternative to State management.

That, Sir, brings me to the problem which we are discussing to-day,—the problem of the form of management we are to introduce when the existing contract of the East Indian Railway expires in 1924 and when the contract of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway expires in 1925. Are we to take these two railways under direct State management, or are we to entrust them to a Company, and if so, to what type of Company? Sir Campbell Rhodes, Sir, if I may say so, has practically given up the problem in despair. His amendment is merely a plea for delay. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "For only five years' delay!") And perhaps, Sir, it will be convenient if I just state very briefly my objections to this amendment at this stage. Personally, I doubt very much whether clause (2) of the amendment could be carried out in practice. As I understand the amendment, the existing contracts are to be extended for five years. During the course of those five years the Home Boards are, so to speak, to transfer their functions to India; they are gradually to transfer their functions to Subsidiary Boards in India. Well, Sir, these Directors are after all responsible to their shareholders for the proper management of the Company, and I doubt very much myself whether any Board of Directors would be content in this way to transfer their functions to any other Board in India. Again, Sir, personally, I do not like these short-term contracts. Especially in the case of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, where the shareholders own some £2,575,000 worth of shares. If we are going to have a short-term contract of that kind, obviously the interests of your shareholders are not the interests of the Government; there must be a conflict of interests. In railway management you have to take long views, and if you have a contract extending only for five years, the interest of the shareholders is to get as much revenue as possible. Dr. Gour, Sir, arrived at the conclusion that he had come to favour State management merely because there was no other course open to him. He regards State management as the lesser of two evils; and I see, Sir, from the number of amendments of which notice has been given to-day that the minds of very many Honourable Members of this House have been exercised over this very difficult problem of the alternatives to State management, just as our own minds have been exercised. Government have done their best to find an alternative to State management, and I may as well admit at once that we have failed. The House will no doubt recollect that when we addressed Local Governments in July last on this question, we attached to our letter two tentative schemes of Company management. Scheme No. 2 was, in effect, an attempt merely to transfer to India the same type of Company as we have now with an English domicile. Nobody could pretend that a scheme of that kind would give us real Company management, and as a matter of fact the Chambers of Commerce throughout the country practically passed over the scheme in silence. The other scheme is a more promising scheme. It suffers from certain disadvantages, but it does represent a real measure of real Company management. But I do not think that even the representatives of the European business community in this House present here to-day would seriously contend that in the present conditions of the finances of India and the money market generally there would be any chance of floating a company on those lines successfully in India now. Accepting, therefore, as we do, the unanimous recommendation of the Acworth Committee that our policy should be, as the existing contracts come to an end, to transfer the domicile of these companies to India, we must admit that we have failed to devise any satisfactory alternative scheme to State management which we can introduce within the period of time which is still left to us. To this extent, therefore, State management seems to be inevitable. There is another reason why Government do not object it—I will not put it higher than that. For some months past, in fact ever since Mr. Bell, then President of the Railway Board, wrote a very valuable note on the subject in June last, our thoughts have been tending in the direction of grouping. We want to group our railways, so far as may be, into larger systems. We think it essential to bring down the cost of the administration, and, generally speaking, the larger the system the less the cost of administration and supervision will be in relation to the work done and the traffic carried. Therefore we have no doubt that we must make grouping a definite part of our policy and that we should take the opportunity offered by the lapse of these two contracts to initiate this policy of grouping. I do not deny that grouping between company railway and company railway is not impossible. At the same time it is obvious that grouping of this kind will be carried out ever so much more easily if you have the railways concerned under direct State management. I do not propose to go fully into detail, but I may say that our idea is that, when we take over the East Indian Railway, we shall probably amalgamate it with the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, and we shall probably give the Great Indian Peninsula direct access to Allahabad by transferring to it the Jubbulpore-Naini section of the existing East Indian Railway. Those ideas of course are merely provisional. We have therefore decided that when the contracts of these two railways expire next year we must take them under direct State management. But I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not making a statement of policy. I do not wish it to be implied that we are adopting this course because we are convinced that State management is the best form of management for India. On the contrary, many of us view the prospect that all our railways should be brought under direct State management with the grave concern. Let me repeat what I have already said before, namely, that experience does show that the State does not and cannot manage railways more efficiently, more economically or with greater comfort to passengers or with quicker despatch of freight than company railways. And though we do not propose that all State railways should immediately be handed over to companies, we think that it will be necessary to maintain a substantial portion of our railway system under company management. We desire to adopt the course I have indicated in regard to the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railways solely for practical reasons. Let me repeat my syllogism. In the first place we are agreed that we have got to transfer the railways to Indian control as the contracts expire; secondly, we have failed to devise a satisfactory alternative to State management which alternative could be introduced within the time which is left to us before these two contracts expire; and thirdly, we believe that by a period of direct State management we shall be able to carry out a really useful measure of grouping. But the Government are opposed to banging and locking the door, so to speak, against a return to company management. In respect of these two railways the moment, it is true, is not propitious for floating a company, which must necessarily be a large company. But market conditions may improve, and I am not without hope that for the East Indian Railway at any rate we may be able to devise a scheme which will give India the benefits of real company management. I am less hopeful about the Great Indian Peninsula. But some of you may have seen the speech delivered by Sir Thomas Catto at the meeting of the Bengal Coal Company in December last. In that speech Sir Thomas Catto suggested that after various measures of grouping had been carried out means could be found whereby a real company might quite conceivably be formed to take over one or other of these groups. We intend to explore that possibility, and there may be other possibilities. I am quite sure that this House will agree with me that all possibilities of this kind must be explored. Let me appeal to the House to clear its mind to-day of all prejudice and preconceived ideas. Let me appeal to the House to clear its mind of those racial animosities of which Mr. Neogy, I was sorry to see, made some use in his speech. We have got to remember that the question we are discussing to-day is a question of vital importance to India. I hope that the House will consider dispassionately the bearing on India of the lessons which other democratic countries have learnt in respect of State management. Let not the House lay the flattering unction to its soul that by some peculiar virtue inherent in India India will be able to escape the common fate. Let me assure the House that as India becomes more and more democratised she will find State management more and more expensive, more and more inefficient, as every other democratic country in the world has found it. Let me remind the House of the experience of France in regard to that Western Railway to which Sir Campbell Rhodes referred. There we have an almost exact parallel. When, in 1909 I think it was, the question of that railway and State management was considered, the argument used was that, the company management was not proper company management; the company had never yet earned its guaranteed dividend and therefore it was a mere caretaker. And so the French Parliament decided to take over that railway. Within a few years the Minister of Public Works stated publicly that the experience of taking over that railway had proved that State management was nothing but "a frightful fraud". Again, not long ago, a Commission had to be appointed to consider the future of this very railway. It rejected all schemes for keeping the railway under State management and entrusting its management to Commissions like Port Trusts. It decided and it recommended to the French Parliament that there was only one way of restoring that railway to efficiency and solvency and that was by leasing it or transferring it in some way to a company. Lessons of this kind stare India in the face. Is India going to shut its eyes to these lessons? I do not ask for very much. All I ask is that the House should not, as I have said, bang the door against any well-considered scheme for company management. It will be a company domiciled in India, an indigenous company. All the ideas, all the hopes and all the aspirations of India in regard to Indianization of the Railway Services will be fulfilled just as adequately by a company of that kind, an indigenous company, as by the State, and with, I am sure, very much less cost to the country. What I suggest and what I propose to the House and what I would ask Dr. Gour to accept—and mind you I am merely carrying out Dr. Gour's idea which he developed in the course of his speech that real company management would be very much better than any form of State management—Dr. Gour said that State management was merely the lesser of two evils—I suggest that at the end of Dr. Gour's amendment we add the following words:

"but that efforts should be continued to concert measures with the object of handing over one or other of the two railways after such grouping as may be necessary to an indigenous company calculated to give India the benefits of real company management."

The effect of that is that we take over the two railways in the first instance, but that we continue our efforts with the object of handing over one or other of them to a real private indigenous company.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Fifteen Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Fifteen Minutes to Three of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

Secretary of the Assembly: Sir, the following Message has been received from the Council of State:

"I am directed to inform you that the Council of State has at its meeting held on the 27th February, 1923, agreed without any amendments to the following Bill which were passed by the Legislative Assembly:

A Bill to consolidate the law relating to the Government Paper Currency.

A Bill to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments.

RESOLUTION RE STATE MANAGEMENT OF RAILWAYS IN INDIA.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I should like to explain my position with reference to the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment to my amendment. I should like, Sir, clearly to state as to what is my view with reference to the rider which the Honourable Mr. Innes proposes to add to my amendment. For the reasons I have given against Mr. Neogy's amendment, I submit the same reasons apply with equal if not greater force to Mr. Innes' rider to my amendment. I submit that his proposal is as premature as the proposal of my friend, Mr. Neogy. He wants this House to stand committed to a policy which he has but faintly adumbrated in his amendment. Honourable Members have got the exact words of his amendment. They are these: "But that efforts should be continued to concert measures with the object of handing over one or other of the two railways after such grouping as may be necessary to an indigenous company calculated to give India the benefit of real company management". Now, in the first place, if this rider is accepted by the House, the management by the State would be a mere stop-gap management, and the Government will not feel the same responsibility in regard to the management of these two companies by the State which they would feel if this House was to decide that the State was to manage without any limitations or conditions these two Indian Railways. If the efforts are to be continued and an indigenous railway company comes into existence, which we ourselves approve of, it will then be time for the Honourable Mr. Innes to formulate his concrete proposal and bring it before this House and ask its concurrence to a company thus formed. But to ask this House to consent to the formation of a company and ask Government to make efforts in that direction would be giving the Government power to negotiate about a future company about which we at present know nothing. I therefore suggest that the House should not accept the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mr. Innes and adhere to the amendment I have moved.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban):

Sir, it is with some hesitation but no misgivings that I venture to offer considerations not fully in accord with the views of many of my colleagues here and many of my countrymen outside. I do so because I strongly feel that the "other point of view" should have full and deliberate consideration. Mr. Hutchinson's new creation "Mr. Sabre" was not singular in his misfortune and in the world of success nothing is more fatal than the weakness of seeing the "other point of view." I am, however, by no means singular in the views that I am going to urge, for they are in some shape or other shared by many of my distinguished countrymen in Bengal and elsewhere, including 9 out of 19 Indian witnesses before the Railway Committee, and by leading and representative journals like the "Bengalee." It has found unexpected and strong support in principle, both from Dr. Gour and the Honourable Mr. Innes. I am really not in serious disagreement with the general opinion that has been voiced either by Dr. Gour or Mr. Neogy. It is from my friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, that I materially differ, but if he has given up his scheme in despair, I am afraid the scheme of the Honourable Mr. Innes in its halting condition is also a counsel of despair. We start with a notable admission in the Acworth Report. It says: "A Report on Indian Railways is not the place to discuss the general question of State versus Company management." It proceeds: "Unless it is fully discussed, isolated details are valueless; for its adequate discussion a volume would hardly suffice." This is no dictum of the dissenting half, but of the other half—it may be the better half or even the greater half—but certainly not the majority, for a majority with a casting vote of the Chairman is in some sense worse than the minority. Sir William's own views, as has been explained here to-day, and as set forth in his monumental volume before he came out to India, are in favour of non-State management, if I can give it a non-committal name. The Honourable Mr. Innes has read out portions from his writings. He was converted to the other view in India, I am afraid, somewhat on the fur-coat line of argument. If there is no company management in the correct sense of the term in India, there is no State management either. Colonel Minshall, Consulting Editor of the "Railway Gazette" in London, states: "State-worked lines in India are not State-worked lines in the same sense as those under democratic Government directly influenced by the Legislature." This cuts both ways, and shows the fallacy of Shibboleth analogy which Mr. Neogy has rightly discounted; and if this is really the case there is reason to pause and ponder, and the Honourable Mr. Innes has been obliged to do so. But I would urge graver reasons against the present or near future management by the State with its present arrangements. Dr. Gour has already anticipated me. I would remind the House of the dead wall up against which it has always found itself in connection with the development, improvement and Indianization of the staff of our Railways. What was there so long, at least, after the Reforms, to prevent the Government, at least in the State Railways, from taking up the matter in right earnest? Nearly the uniform answer has been that local management is to be left alone even in matters of more than detail. There may be good sense and good reason in this, for proper decentralization sufficiently controlled, if I may so put it, is the essence of success in these affairs. And, Sir, in passing one cannot help noticing that in the recent constitution of the Railway Commission to which, together with Sir Campbell Rhodes—I am glad to welcome an old Bengal friend—the Assembly had no voice or share whatsoever. I do not know what happened in the Blue Beard Chamber of the Railway Advisory Committee. Few know what happened. The other day, there was an attempt in the House to ascertain whether opportunity would be given for the consideration of the question of the reconstitution of railway administration. I tried to get the proceedings of the Railway Advisory Committee,—by no violation of official secrets,—and the Department informed me—and I hold the letter in my hand—that such proceedings as are there are recorded and are not available to those outside the office. And, when I asked Mr. Innes, here, how one could have them, Mr. Innes insisted upon notice of the question. Mr. Ley the other day in answer to a supplementary question said that the suggestion would receive consideration, whatever that may mean. It is through machinery like this that our friends expect to influence the railway administration when State management is further extended. The new-found love for Government, which Mr. Neogy has been cultivating, somewhat like the new-found statesmanship of Mr. Rangachariar which Mr. Neogy derided the other day, makes him accountably enthusiastic about a machinery like this. Mr. S. C. Ghosh, commenting on the extensive powers given, or shall I say permitted, by the Government to Managers of State Railways, said that these powers were the real reason for greater powers being given by Government to companies and by companies to their agents. It may be the old, old story of the blanket not letting one go, but establishes the point that the State, through its railway administration, has been largely giving away powers to State as well as company managers, that cannot be wholly for the good of the interests concerned. Possibly, company managers, finding it easy to slide into State berths and vice versa, may be answerable for such a vicious circle, the circle may sometimes lead to stray good results like the transfer of the Chief Commissioner from a sphere of activities elsewhere. But this does not augment or strengthen the case for State management so called. The Acworth majority has not been helpful. Its own deliberate dictum is that so important a question cannot be exhaustively discussed in the Railway Report. It proceeds all the same to lay down the law for our governance. And I say an ipse dixit emanating even from the highest quarters regarding even the most ancient and threadbare of questions, can hardly be accepted, particularly when there is a strong, balanced and reasoned "another point of view." Mr. Innes has told us that State management can succeed only if the Assembly will not interfere and if politics is not introduced. That, in effect, as I understood it, was what was stated. Well, political, racial and communal considerations, however strong and tempting, ought certainly not to be allowed to cloud business and economic issues, but, in the changed order of things the Assembly must control what the Government controls. For these reasons and in quite an allied concern, I wholly differ from and strongly deprecate suggestions about the likelihood of corruption and jobbery in the wake of the extension of State management, as shown in some democratic countries. This is a species of red-herring that can be trailed across the path of any progressive movement. I shall assume, nay confidently claim, that high standards of efficiency and purity will be attained and maintained when the Assembly is directly and really influencing the State Railway administration. This, however, will not be, till there is nearly responsible Government and better machinery. Let us examine the machinery at the Executive end, suggested by the Acworth Committee in the formidable genealogical sort of tree in the Acworth report, with which the Assembly must by now be familiar. They suggest a Member for Communication, a Chief Commissioner, four other Commissioners, six Directors and a General Secretary and Statistical Officer and staff, both ordinary and extraordinary. Other experts have since spoken and they would like to see this list added to, though they think it will not permit of any appreciable reduction in the decentralized local bodies. Let us look at the question of cost that remains to be budgetted for. Where, physically speaking, I ask, are the staff and organization to come from that will ensure complete and effective State management of two of the most important lines, even on the terms suggested by Mr. Innes? Philip sober to Philip drunk will not solve the question.

3 P.M.

Then there is the financial question. Some of our friends here insist that the question of a separate Railway Budget should stand over till the question of policy is settled. I say that unless and until you settle the question of a separate Railway Budget the question of State management, pure and simple, cannot be adequately dealt with. Nor do I agree with the recommendations of the Mackay Committee, though endorsed by the Dissenters of the Railway Committee, that it should borrow in favourable years and keep up a fairly unemployed railway reserve, against a rainy day. That is not a business proposition, at least now. But I do say that the question of railway finance, particularly in view of the contingencies ahead, has not been adequately considered. I cannot anticipate to-morrow's debate on Mr. Innes' Resolution of which we have just received notice.

Sir, the Railway Committee's estimate of the efficiency of management by the State and by Companies is equipoised. I shall not seek to condemn either for both have done good work. For my purposes, it is not necessary to decry one against the other. There are good and bad points in both and both are capable of improvement, and, in such a process, both are bound to be mutually helpful. About State management, however, it is impossible not to remark upon the notable indecision and want of settled policy on the part of Government and incapacity to provide sufficient capital. In this state of things outside aid and counsel are of great moment, so long as they are not ultimately and really inconsistent with State interests. Nor can it be overlooked that decentralised control is of the essence of administrative success in these days. Efficiency and cheap transport must not be overtaxed. And nowhere is such an arrangement well managed by the bureaucracy. And, Sir, as a training ground for industrial development, which this country badly needs, it cannot be wholly a Government Department. I do not propose continuance of the present unsatisfactory state of things, even with the improvements foreshadowed by Sir Campbell Rhodes. My amendment, if it came up, of which there seems to be little likelihood, would show that I am in favour of modified and better State management and Mr. Neogy's gratuitous gift of his hobby horse to me might go behind. Frankly speaking, I do not understand Sir Campbell Rhodes' amendment. Even if the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula management was to be taken over by the State entirely, Company and State management would continue side by side for many years and Sir Campbell Rhodes would have abundant opportunities for the researches that loom so large in his amendment. I want something more. We must recognize that non-State management cannot for a long time to come be barred out, and so long as company management so called does continue and side by side with it State management, also so called, does continue, we might as well see whether a tertium quid cannot be evolved which will be an object lesson to both and by which both might profit. It is up to Government and this Assembly to devise such a compromise and that is what I believe Mr. Innes' amendment suggests by not banging and locking up the door. If it fails, one need not shriek about screwing one's courage to the sticking place for what is proposed on the other side is not ideal. It is a case, at the worst, of 6 on one side and half a dozen on the other. The dissenting half of the Committee could not give a definite scheme, for there is no definite policy yet. Some shadowy policy has been adumbrated to-day, to borrow Dr. Gour's language. It was not the dissenters' fault that the cart could not be placed before the horse, and what Sir Rajendra Nath Mookerjee and his colleagues could not do, it would be foolhardy to attempt here, except in a general way, as a basis for further consideration. That is why I venture to indicate in the amendment standing in my name some general outlines which could be adopted. Sir, the question of absolute nationalisation of railways is always difficult. It is receiving a set-back in Europe and America particularly after the war. In England and America non-State management is being welcomed back, not because of deficits that are a legacy of the war times, but for other and graver reasons. President Harding has declared that the people cannot be taxed to cover railway deficits. What is going to happen here? This morning's papers show that our own State Railway earnings for the year up to 3 weeks ago, was 77.84 crores against a Budget estimate of 99.5 crores and there is already a declared deficit of more than 7 crores. Well, Sir, more than a set-back has begun in France, Italy, Switzerland, Canada, South Africa, New Zealand, and in fact everywhere in Europe and America. Those matters need not be gone into in detail. Our own experience about the Post and Telegraph, and shall I add our recollections of the recent Munitions Board's activities, are not of the cheeriest kind and I would not lay further burdens of direct business management on the Government till the Government is nearly responsible and till the needful machinery is more in order and more amenable to popular control in spite of what the Honourable Mr. Innes says. Mr. Neogy never read my amendment. If he had he would not have insisted that I am against State management proper, good and right. While the dual system of State and Company management obtains in India, as it must obtain for some time, let a third something be evolved [Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary.] if possible, by which wholesome private enterprise, which, God willing, may soon be largely Indian, may have a chance of development. Railway enterprise and industrial activities cannot be divorced from one another, and revenues out of people's necessities like Post, Railways, Telegraphs and even canals, the so-called productive Public works, can never be the ideal and ought not to be the goal. They should pay their way no doubt, and they should not be a drag on the revenues.

India is advancing and will advance politically, industrially and educationally. Companies may and should come which will undertake much larger railway undertakings than the State can undertake. The State has done much to set the pace. The people also should have their opportunities and chances. If the third something, that I think of, succeeds, it will be a notable object lesson and even on the failure of that we can build. If this finds acceptance in some shape or other, a brighter chapter in industrial development will commence. Even the most politically minded of people should not permit industry, politics and education to be mixed up and confused. It will not be helpful to any.

Sir, finally I say the question cannot be dismissed in the cynical fashion, inexplicably indulged in by the Acworth "majority." Extracts have already been read out by Sir Campbell Rhodes which will bear repetition:

"We do not think that in this fallible world company management can be so good as to escape fierce, often unfair, criticism from Indian opinion. Even if we were to assume that State management would not be better, we are quite sure that its failures would be judged more leniently by the Indian public."

Will it be? I think not, particularly if it means having to pay more, I ask, Sir, in all seriousness, is this the way in which Indian public opinion is to be reconciled in vital nation-building matters. I shall not insult my Colleagues by asking if they assent.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): May I know your ruling, Sir, as regards the other amendments on the paper, as to whether you will allow Members to move their amendments or whether they should speak on the amendments before the House.

Mr. President: The amendment now under discussion were chosen in view of the fact that they raised separate definite issues and covered practically all the other amendments on the paper. Though in point of phrasing the amendment in the Honourable Member's name, as also that in Mr. Samarth's, are slightly different from Dr. Gour's, Dr. Gour's raised it in a more definite form and therefore I thought it desirable to put the issue as raised by him against the issue raised by Mr. Neogy's original amendment. I think we have reached a point when we might dispose of one or more of the amendments before the House and I therefore now propose to put the amendment moved by Sir Campbell Rhodes against the amendment as originally moved by Dr. Gour.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Yes, Sir.

Mr. President: The question is that for the amendment moved by Dr. Gour the following be substituted, namely:

"That before coming to a definite decision as to the best railway policy for India, it is desirable to continue for a further period of five years the principles both of State and Company management, in order that:

(1) Experience may be gained as to the effect on the working of the existing State-managed lines of the Reforms Scheme and of the present re-organisation of the Railway Board.

(2) The Company-managed railways may appoint immediately strong local boards in India consisting of an equal number of Indians and Europeans, such boards to have definite and growing powers on the understanding that within the five years they should abrogate to themselves the functions of the Home boards.

(3) It may be ascertained which method of management is calculated to produce the best results in regard to:

- (a) Economical working;
- (b) The comfort of passengers;
- (c) The industrial development of the country;
- (d) The greater association of Indians and Anglo-Indians in the higher administration of the Railways."

The amendment was negatived.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): Sir, I should like to speak in support of the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment. First, I must heartily congratulate the Honourable the Commerce Member, on the very great ability with which he put forward the problem which is now engaging the attention of this House. He stated very fully, and I think impartially, the arguments of those who are in favour of State management. Then he detailed the reasons, supplemented with hard facts, against State management; and in the end he was forced to the conclusion that Dr. Gour's amendment was perhaps the most acceptable to Government, because, as he was very careful to explain, no better scheme, no definite, practical, acceptable scheme of Company management, had so far been put forward. He accordingly on behalf of Government accepted Dr. Gour's amendment but with a few words added thereto advocating that efforts should still continue to be made in the direction of Company management. Now, Sir, a reference was made, I think by Mr. Neogy, or by some other speaker, to the Karachi Chamber of Commerce. I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Karachi Chamber of Commerce gave evidence before the Acworth Committee in the form of a letter dated 31st March, 1921, in which they stated quite clearly and explicitly that whilst they were of opinion that the main lines of railway in this country should be owned by Government, they strongly urged management of those railways by private enterprise on a profit-sharing basis by a company with headquarters,—headquarters be it noted,—and a Directorate in India. It is quite true that on a subsequent date when a proposal was put before the Karachi Chamber of Commerce by the Railway Board setting forth two definite schemes of Company management, the Chamber looking at those two definite schemes and weighing those against the advantages of State management,—the Chamber pronounced against those schemes and in favour of State management. In other words, they did not think that those particular schemes that were put forward, were acceptable. But I can assure this House that on the several matter of principle, I feel certain that a majority of the Members of the Karachi Chamber are still in favour of private enterprise to manage the railways of India rather than the State,—I mean real Company management,—private enterprise backed by rupee capital raised in this country, and managed in this country, by a directorate working in this country. Now, Sir, I should like to say that I am myself strongly opposed to State management and for the reasons which have been very fully and carefully set forth by the Honourable Mr. Innes. In the book on State Railway Ownership by Sir William Acworth from which an extract was read, we find, to use the words I think employed by the Honourable Mr. Innes, the most damning condemnation of State management ever written. I think, however, that further evidence has accumulated since that book was published. If we are to believe the news which has come through by cable from Italy, the present Italian Government are about to dispense with the services of some 45,000 superfluous employees of the State railways of Italy; and further, the Italian Government are now contemplating handing the whole of those railways, or at any rate, some portions of those railways, back to private Company management. There we see the very latest action of a Government who have had experience of State management and condemned it. I think if we have any doubt as to the direction in which State management will develop in this country we can derive some information from Mr. Neogy's remarks that he wants our railways managed for the benefit of India's industries, for the development of the resources and industries in this country—a very admirable idea,—but, of course, if the railways are to be developed not on business principles as Mr. Neogy suggested,—I think he said he did not wish us to be classed as practical men,—he implored us not to make a "fetish of efficiency,"—if the railways are managed on that principle, it is absolutely certain that the results will be in India precisely and exactly the same as they have been in every other country which has endeavoured to control the railways democratically, that is to say, very shortly they will show heavy losses. The cost of staff and of management will increase; the operating ratio, that is, the ratio of expenses to total income will increase; efficiency in the work generally will be very much lower; inconvenience and loss to the public will occur; and in the end, our railways will become a heavy burden on the State. That is the invariable history of State railway management in every other country. And I would ask Honourable Members of this House not to imagine for a single moment that in this country where the problem of State railway management will be far greater and far more intricate than in any other country, (because our railway mileages are so great and the local conditions so very complicated here), we shall not incur heavier losses by State management than would have been incurred in other countries.

Now, Sir, I have been studying for a long time the arguments of those who condemn Company management. I have collected hundreds of cuttings from the newspapers. I have read I suppose nearly everything that has been written on the subject. What are the complaints that are made of the Company management? As far as I can make out, lack of attention,—lack of facilities for third class passengers comes very much to the fore. Inadequate waiting rooms, no refreshment rooms, insufficient latrines, not sufficient trains, especially at times of fairs,—these things are no doubt deplorable and every effort should be made to remedy them. But I would ask Honourable Members, can they point out in the case of the North-Western State railway or the Oudh and Rohilkhand State Railway, that these conveniences are any better? Is there better accommodation on those railways for third class passengers? Are there better waiting rooms, better refreshment rooms and more trains on these railways? If you lived where I do (in Karachi) you would hear more about the defects of State-managed railways than you would about the Company-managed railways. I can assure the House I have at this minute telegrams in front of me, shouts from Karachi about the inadequacy of the rolling stock ("Steamers undergoing detention in Karachi harbour," and no produce to put into them). I have before me telegrams which show that the Karachi Chamber of Commerce at this particular time is certainly far from pleased with State management. I think we may take it, Sir, that there is little or no difference between State management and Company management so far as conveniences for third class passengers and adequate supplies of rolling stock are concerned. And if there is no very great difference between the efficiency of the management of the State-managed lines and the Company-managed lines, I would suggest, Sir, the reason is that at the present moment we are happy in India in enjoying the competition of Company-managed lines which prevents our State railways from dropping behind in the general quality of their work. But if all India's railways were managed by the State, I have no doubt that we should not be in the happy condition in which we now find ourselves.

I have endeavoured to summarise the defects which the Indian community consider should be attended to first and foremost in connection with our railways. What is required is an amelioration of the facilities and accommodation afforded to third class passengers; a re-investigation of the problem of goods rates with the object of giving more encouragement to the development of Indian industries and Indian trade; and thirdly, the employment of Indians,—of more Indians that is,—in the higher branches of the rail-services. Now, Sir, these are most admirable aims and there is nobody who has a greater sympathy for those aims than myself. But I would appeal to Honourable Members as business men, that the way to get these things carried out is not to ask Government to take over the direct management of our railways, but to take over the railways yourselves; in other words, I urge that what we ought to do is to encourage in every possible way the creation of companies in this country with rupee capital, Indian shareholders, Indian Directors, and Indian Managers, in order that the changes in the railway administration that we require, can be carried out by them. It is surely a strange paradox that whilst on one hand we see in every direction continuous attacks against the bureaucracy,—whilst we are constantly hearing of the terrible things that the bureaucracy do in India, on the other hand it is now suggested that the best way to get out of our present railway difficulties is to create one million more bureaucrats, and turn our railway administration into a huge State machine, when we should get everything all right! Surely this is entirely unbusinesslike, improbable and impracticable. Surely the way to get the improvements which we all desire,—improved facilities, modifications of the rates so as to encourage the development of Indian industries, and a management of the railways more acceptable to the Indian community, is not to create more officials,—tens of thousands of officials, perhaps millions of officials, (so that we cannot go from one place to another without salaaming to some bureaucrat,—it may be only a porter who carries our luggage), but to form our own Indian companies to manage our properties in a businesslike way. If we are to choose between the amendments which have been put before us, I would appeal to this House to support Dr. Gour's amendment with the additional words proposed by the Honourable Mr. Innes on behalf of Government. It gives us everything that we require. In this way both the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway will be taken over by the State. That is precisely what you want. And then we utilise the experience of the whole world by recognising that we shall get the best, the most efficient and the most satisfactory management through Company management, and we shall direct our attention, and the attention of the public to devise some Indian company with Indian capital, Indian managers and Indian directors to carry on this work of ours. No Company can come into existence and nothing can be done in the direction of Company management without the sanction of this House.

[Sir Montagu Webb.]

I therefore submit there is not the slightest danger in taking advantage of the experience which has been gained in all parts of the world, and in giving our approval to the amendment now before the House with the additional words suggested by the Honourable Mr. Innes.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: A great deal has been said about the failure of State management in other countries and it has been argued that the fate of State management in India would be the same; and that consequently we must turn our back upon the suggestion made in that behalf. The instances given do not relate to State management in countries where it has been successful. I have before me an extract from the Commercial Gazette of Calcutta which shows that between the years 1906 to 1910, in Germany, the number of new miles of railway was 2,191; whereas in England in the same period the mileage was 94; and also so far as Germany is concerned the gross passenger receipts increased by 55 per cent., whereas in England it was only 13 per cent. Germany reduced the rate as regards passengers by 14 per cent., and no reduction was made in England. That shows that there is another side to the picture which has been painted by Members like Sir Montagu Webb. There are instances in other countries where State railways have been more economically managed and more efficiently managed. I shall now refer to railway management in India itself, take the case of the Eastern Bengal Railway about which some figures will be given by Mr. Chaudhuri and take the case of the North Western Railway. Have they suffered in comparison with company managed railways? It has been pointed out that so far as company management is concerned, during the last two years, the cost of management has risen from 51 per cent. to 76 per cent. As regards the North Western Railway and the Eastern Bengal Railway there has been no corresponding increase in the managing expenses. That shows that economy is not on the side of company management. It is on the side of State management. Therefore, Government cannot by reference to State railways in other countries say that because they have not been economical in those countries, the same thing would happen in India. On the other hand our experience in India has been that company management is worse than State management. It is more ruinous to the people than State management. In comparing India with other countries sufficient attention has not been paid to what the Acworth Committee's report says on the impossibility of making any real comparison. For example, it has been pointed out that whereas the State in India owns railways to the value of 428 crores, companies have interest only to the extent of 75 crores; and is it right, as has been asked by the Acworth Committee that one-sixth of the shareholders should be entrusted with the management of the other five-sixths. Is it a right thing to do? Can you say that this is a businesslike arrangement? I submit to the House that it will be regarded as a gross abuse of the business management, if we allow persons who have got only one-sixth right in the concern to manage the whole concern.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay: European): What about mill agents?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I do not know anything about mill agents. I have no figures before me. But if the mill agents who have got only a small share manage the other shares, then they are not acting fairly. One mistake does not justify another mistake. Therefore, Sir, the fact that in this country the Government owns five-sixths of the railways is a good argument for not accepting the suggestion that we should allow those who hold only one-sixth of the railway to manage the concern. It has been pointed out that in England, Italy and other countries there has been some failure by the management of the railways by the State. As has been pointed out in a well-written communication addressed by the Bombay Merchants Association, it is because of conditions of war the management has not been as efficient as before, but during the time when there was no war State management has been very beneficial; therefore no valid reason has been shown for saying that State management under all circumstances would be a failure. It has been admitted by Mr. Innes that Company management has not been more economical than State management in India. If that is correct why continue management by Company? If Company management has not been more economical, it is desirable that when an opportunity occurs for the people to take up the management, they should do so. Sir, the contracts as regards the two railways will come to an end in 1924 and 1925, and an opportunity should be given to the State to manage these railways, as they have managed other railways well. Now, Sir, as regards the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes to the proposition I believe the arguments which he advanced as against Mr. Neogy's amendment stand good as against him also. Why pledge this House to something which should be done in case the Government is able to float a good Company, and indigenous Company with shares subscribed in India? Why commit this House to anything which may be done later on? Why not leave that matter to be decided when you are able to announce the successful formation of a Company? Why not ask them, that as we have got a good Company which would be equal to managing the concern, that permission should be granted to entrust the management to that Company? As a matter of fact if you care to read what the Acworth Committee says, you will find,—the majority report points out,—that if once the State takes up the management, it will be easy for it to divest itself of its powers and to hand over the Railways to a Company for management. All, therefore, that we ask is that the State should take up the lines when the contracts fall in and continue to manage them unless and until it finds that some other arrangement would be more beneficial. If it finds that a Company can manage it, and is able to show that it would manage better than the State, then Government can hand over the management; but why ask at this moment for a message from this House, why ask this House to commit itself to the proposition, that, if Government is able to find a Company, it should be entrusted with the management? It is premature, and for that reason alone the amendment of Mr. Innes should be voted against. Sir, it is not necessary for me, having regard to the fact that my amendment is in exactly the same terms as the amendment of Dr. Gour, to move it. But I may say, Sir, that I support Dr. Gour's amendment not for the reason given by him, namely, that it is a choice of two evils, but for the reason that the people should have an opportunity of managing their own affairs especially, as admitted, it has not been shown that management by the State has proved a failure.

Mr. W. S. J. Willson (Bengal: European): Sir, I am afraid I am not entirely convinced by the amendment of Mr. Innes—the words of which I have not got but the substance of which we know—for the simple reason that, after you have adopted State management, with the “fine” results pictured to-day by Sir Montagu Webb, it will be a far more difficult business to find a decent Company to take it over in a decent manner, and their terms will be a great deal more expensive than we might be able to arrange during the 18 months before us before the first of these contracts expires. I, Sir, have travelled round the world, on the railways of England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France, Holland, Belgium, Italy, Egypt, India, Burma, Japan, America, and Canada and I have no hesitation in telling the House that my general experience of the lot of them is that whether you have State management or Company management, the difference to the passenger is not very enormous. But, Sir, I have also spent 25 years of my life in this country connected with transport, in that experience, very largely as a carrier by sea but largely as a consignor of goods on Government and other railways. I should like this House to consider very carefully what the difference between the two railways is. I personally am dead against State management. I would have liked an opportunity to have discussed Sir Campbell Rhodes' amendment further and made one or two points in connection therewith, but that opportunity is now deprived. You have, however, the knowledge that Sir William Ackworth was in 1920 very dead against State management. The Honourable Mr. Innes described Sir William Ackworth's arguments as some of the strongest that had ever been written against State management, but there was actually a book published in England some years ago entitled 'The case against the Nationalization of Railways'. Now railway nationalization seems to me to start principally from the point of view of the employee. Nationalization has been for some years a political cry in many countries who have not got it and it is very largely political with a view to more wages for the employee. My own experience is that you cannot get out of a State railway, the same treatment for development that you can get out of a private Company. Now, Sir, I know there are some people who will say that this is not so, but I can tell you as a carrier, and anybody else who has any experience as carriers will bear me out, that the whole essence of a carrier is to earn good-will. He must have the good-will of his constituents and his clients; he must be out to develop his trade, he must throw the sprats to catch the mackerel; he has business sense, but he also has business scents, by which he scents out the different lines where new traffic may be developed,—and he is not, as Mr. Neogy suggested, out to handicap anybody's trade, whether on racial grounds or whatever else it may be. Mr. Neogy said that the Railway Boards at Home exist for the purpose of benefitting certain manufacturers. Now I do not want to develop that point, I am convinced it is not so, but I would like to ask Mr. Neogy three questions:—Has he ever heard of some of the opposing shipping Companies bringing goods to India? Has he ever heard of the Den line, the Well line? Has he ever heard of the firm of Gorman and Smith? I merely mention those three. Well, he has not: yet those three concerns all built up a business directly encouraged by the India Office, London, in shipping out cargoes by steamers opposed to what Mr. Neogy would call the "vested interests."

If we had State management, I am convinced we should also find a great deal more of unprincipled competition against private interests. Now I know that private commercial interests are not very strongly represented in this House. But I do know this, that the Assam-Bengal Railway is a State railway; I do know that their action in carrying goods below cost, at a loss, has provoked an enormous amount of objection on the part of Bengal land-owners—Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary will bear me out.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: The Assam-Bengal Railway is company-managed.

Mr. W. S. J. Willson: But it is run for strategical reasons, and is not a paying proposition at all. The consequence is that these State railways in many cases practically oppose private interests; far more they do so in a more unprincipled and less fair-minded manner than any Company-managed are really likely to do. Business ideas do not permeate the Government offices, for a simple reason—it is not the fault of Government officers themselves, where would you find more amiable gentlemen than the Honourable Members on some of those front Benches? Would you like the railways to be managed by them? But they are too amiable and the consequence would be that you would lose your profits. Now there is an extraordinary feeling against any Government department ever making a profit. If a Government department ever makes a profit, there is immediately an outcry, either that they are over-charging the public, or that they are under-paying their staff, and the public won't have it. However, in the reference I made to London I did not for a minute want this House to think that I am in favour of continuing the London Boards—the sense of this House is, and I agree with it that the London Boards must absolutely go, that we are absolutely able to manage the railways in India and I want it now under what I would call a decentralised scheme. I want the Bengal railways managed in Calcutta; I want the Bombay railways managed in Bombay; I want the Madras railways managed in Madras, and so on. (A Voice: "By the State?") No, not by the State. I do not want even so charming a gentleman as Mr. Hindley, about whom Sir Campbell Rhodes made such nice remarks this morning, or any one man at the head of such an enormous system as are the railways in India.

All the advantages which Mr. Innes pointed out were to be obtained, can be obtained by company management. Take, for example, his reference to Mr. Bell's report as to grouping. Now, surely to goodness, a scheme of grouping could be easily thought out within the next 18 months. That is in no sense a reason why Government should first take over the railways while that is being leisurely thought out; not at all.

I am also afraid, Sir, that if we go to State management we shall aggravate that horrible system of buying of stores abroad, or principally in England. As it is at present, so I am afraid it would go on, but I do think that local Boards would be far more inclined to encourage local enterprise.

Then again, on the question of the separation of railway finances, which is one of the biggest factors in the whole problem of railway management

Mr. President: I cannot allow the Honourable Member to discuss that in anticipation of to-morrow's Resolution.

Mr. W. S. J. Willson: Then that rather disposes of the rest of my remarks.

Captain E. V. Sassoon (Bombay Millowners' Association: Indian Commerce): Sir, I will not detain the House very long. I think, however, that my point of view is probably different to any that has been heard up to the present time. As far as I can see there are three methods in which we can look at this problem. One is management as at present by companies domiciled in England and which I think we are all agreed should not continue. The only two points therefore which we have now to consider are whether we should have State management neat, as proposed by the Mover of the amendment, or State management diluted, as suggested by the Honourable Mr. Innes. When I read, as I have been reading here, this work of Sir William Acworth's, the more I look at State management the less I like it. I find, in spite of what Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has said, that the rates of freight in the United States are half as much as in France and Germany. I find that they are the same as those in India, which apparently seems to be the lowest with the United States; and this will interest Mr. Joshi: in America the workman earns a sovereign whereas in India he earns a shilling. So that shows that the existing system of management from England has not been entirely successful from the point of view of efficiency. But then Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar says, why should we agree with the Honourable Mr. Innes and pledge ourselves or pledge this House to Company management in the future? I ask myself in this House, why should we pledge ourselves to State management. I see that France by State management increased the yearly deficit from £580,000 to £3,000,000. I see that the trains were slowed down in that period, accidents increased, compensation for accidents rose from £80,000 to £400,000, and I ask myself, can this House, which is on the last lap of its existence, pledge the country to State management with these possibilities—I only call them possibilities—in view? It may be that we cannot get what some of us would like to have management by indigenous companies. It may be that the Government have attempted to get such a management, but I for one have not heard of it. I wonder whether the Government has explored that avenue right to its depths. I personally would like this debate to be postponed till the new Assembly. (Voices: "No, no.") I do not know whether every Member of this House is confident of being returned in the next House. I for one have hopes but am not sure, and I therefore would prefer not to pledge the country to a possibility of a very large deficit lasting for several years. Because, if the Honourable Member for Commerce is right, it may not be so easy to find an indigenous company to take on this burden, and I would therefore prefer the new House with fresh support from its constituencies to come and pledge this Government to what is a liability rather than that it should be done by this House. It is very easy for people who may not return here to pledge the Government to a policy which may lead to very heavy losses and then let their successors find the money to pay for those losses. Because, Sir, one thing is certain, if there is a deficit it will not be paid by shareholders, it will be paid by the tax-payer. The very gentlemen who vote for something which may lead to a deficit may not be here to find the money to pay for that deficit. Therefore, with the greatest deference, Sir, I submit that the whole of this question is one that should be decided not by those of us here who have only one budget to consider, a budget which I understand is already in the course of being printed, but by those who will have future budgets to consider, because they are the people who will have to find the money to pay the piper.

Mr. Manmohandas Ramji (Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau: Indian Commerce): Sir, as my amendment is not coming before the House, I will not take up very much of the time of the House in dealing with the points raised in my amendment. Sir, as the question is confined between these two railways whose contracts are falling due within a very short time and Mr. Innes' rider, I think that the best course for this House to adopt is to accept Dr. Gour's amendment as it is without the rider proposed by the Honourable Mr. Innes. I might ask the Honourable Mr. Innes, if his rider is accepted by the House, whether the Secretary of State may not arrange with some company for taking over the management of any of these railways, without this House having an opportunity to intervene. Therefore there is some risk in accepting the principle on which the rider is based and I want the House to reject it. Of course, I quite agree that, instead of accepting the Honourable Mr. Neogy's amendment, we should first of all give a trial to these two trunk lines connecting Bombay with Calcutta and other business centres and see what the result is. On that we can base our future policy after gaining experience in these two lines. Of course, the Honourable Mr. Innes pointed out that there are no schemes forthcoming. But I had 4 P.M. supplied him with a scheme; I do not know whether he has studied it. I was going to put it before this House, but as there is no opportunity of putting it I refrain from doing so. I am not going to put it before the House to-day; but when occasion arises I shall do so; and although that scheme advocates State management, pure and simple, I say it will be much better than Company management which is now out of question. With these few remarks I support Dr. Gour's amendment.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, I am not an expert in railway administration; in fact I know nothing about it; I have made no particular study of the subject before the House; I do not even own a share in any railway in the world; but I am a British-Indian tax-payer, I am a British-Indian traveller on the railways in this country, and so are my constituents; I have a little commonsense, and I have had some experience in drawing inferences from evidence. Therefore, I think the House will bear with me while I trouble it with remarks from, as it were, the man in the street. My vision of this subject is that of the on-looker who not infrequently sees most of the game. What are the facts, either admitted or beyond reasonable dispute? First of all, State management has failed wherever it has been tried (Rao Bahadur T. Ranga-chariar: "Not in India.")—wherever it has been tried, during the war or during peace; and this House, I think, would be wanting in the sagacity for which it is noted if it cast aside as irrelevant evidence which is almost conclusive. We have had some experience of State management in India. I am surprised to hear some Members suggest—they have not actually said so—that State management has been successful. Fares have gone up, freights have risen, complaints of discomfort from passengers increase daily and hourly, and we have had unpunctual trains, a bureaucratic staff down to the very ticket collector, and hopeless centralisation. That is one fact. The next fact is that India is in a state of transition; her very constitution is at present in the melting pot; we are carrying on towards a very much larger and more responsible state of self-government; and I submit to this House that we ought not to stumble over the rocks and pitfalls at our feet while we stare at a roseate horizon and build dreams of the future.

The third undoubted fact is the awakening of the country to industrial development. Industrial development is one of our immediate problems. In my humble opinion, there is no greater barrier in the way of industrial development than State interference with private enterprise. There was a time when this country looked to Government for everything that it wanted, the old policy of "Sircar, Ma-Bap." That day has not entirely gone yet, but its sun is setting. We are learning to make things for ourselves; we are learning to do things for ourselves. Private enterprise does a good deal now that used to be done by the Public Works Department. Jail manufactures and Government workshops are also retiring before private enterprise. It is not consistent, I submit, with the advance of democracy, with our claim to govern ourselves, and with our efforts towards industrial development, to ask that our railways, like our roads, canals, public buildings and forests, should be wholly and permanently given over to State control.

But now comes a fourth fact which also we must take into consideration. We have no proper Company management available at present. We have companies which are not British-Indian companies, managing railways in which they only have fractional interests in partnership with Government. Government uses its control primarily for revenue. The companies in London use their control primarily for their dividends. So the Indian tax-payer and the Indian traveller and trader are, as it were,—I say it with all respect,—between the devil and the deep sea. This state of things is worse than State management. At any rate the State management for which we are all asking to-day will be wholly British-Indian.

Well, from these facts, to my mind, two commonsense inferences arise. First, in the immediate present, we have no alternative except State control to replace Government control cum London Board control. State management is an immediate necessity. The second inference is that State management is a constantly growing evil which must be eradicated as soon as possible. Here we have reached the present limit of our vision. As a House it is for us to deal with actualities and not with dreams. Therefore, it seems to me that as a House we are in a position to resolve (a) that the present management of the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, having become obsolete and unsuited to the country, must be changed as soon as possible; (b) that the only alternative which presents itself at the present time is State management; (c) that on the evidence before us, there is reason to apprehend that that change will mean going from the frying pan into the fire; and (d) that we owe it to the country not to commit it irretrievably to stay in that fire. Government,—I say it with all respect again,—has a way of holding on to what it once lays its hands upon. The cases of roads, buildings and forests afford ample evidence in support of that charge. We can foresee the Railways being taken over for the benefit of the travelling and trading public; but soon that public will cease to be the chief beneficiary and revenue will become the first consideration. We do not want Railways to be run chiefly and primarily for Government revenue. We want the public, ourselves, to be the principal beneficiaries. Therefore, it is up to us to let Government understand that though we ask them, for want of any better alternative, to take over these two Railways as soon as the present contracts fall in, we only make them over to Government until we can find some better and more satisfactory management for them. That is all that the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes would commit us to. It really commits Government to this that they join with us in a Resolution which binds them to give State control until something better can be found, while it binds us only to whatever we may think best hereafter. Its heads we win and tails they lose. Sir, I put it to the House, that the acceptance of this amendment will place this House in an extremely strong position, because we will have the Government with us. If we reject the amendment put forward by the Honourable Mr. Innes, the only amendment which will remain, even though it may be supported by a majority, is that of Dr. Gour; but it will be, after all, the opinion of a majority only and not the combined voice of the whole House. I therefore support the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Sir, I shall attempt to draw inferences unlike my friend, Sir Henry Stanyon, not as a lawyer, but purely as a practical layman. I shall confine myself to the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes. It is true, Sir, that while summarising the views of the two schools of thought in the Railway Report the Honourable Mr. Innes was exceedingly fair. But in his concluding portion he described to us the evils of State management of railways in Italy, France and other countries. He also told us about the possible inelasticity and bureaucratic management in State-managed Railways. In fact, the effect of his speech this morning, so far as the question of holding the balance even between the two views is concerned, at any rate, the effect left on my mind was, I must say with considerable disappointment, that he as the spokesman of the Government of India condemned State management and that he was in favour of Company management. As a layman, Sir, the inference I should draw from his amendment is this. Either the Government of India should commit itself one way or the other between these two schools of thought, or they should leave the question of Company versus State management absolutely alone without showing their bias or their prejudice one way or the other. This amendment does not do anything of that sort. In the first place, the Honourable Mr. Innes in his speech said that he was prepared to accept the taking over of these two railways for State management as a sheer matter of necessity because there was no other solution which was acceptable to him. But he does not stop there; he proceeds to say in his amendment "that efforts should be made continually to concert measures of handing over one or other of the two railways to an indigenous company calculated to give India the benefits of real Company management". Now the wording of this amendment postulates that there are certain benefits of real Company management. I am not prepared to postulate or beg any such question. If Government want to hold themselves aloof from either school of thought and to declare a non-committal policy on the ground that the Government of India should not bind itself and its successors to any policy at all, I think they should not insert in this amendment any wording regarding the benefits of real Company management. On general grounds, therefore, we must have one of the two courses; either decide only about the two railways we are talking about leaving the question of State versus Company management alone, or let an open debate take place and let the House decide whether it wants State or Company management, pure and simple, one of the two. That is my general objection to acceptance of the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes.

Now I will come to the merits of this amendment. It goes forth to the country with a sort of imprimatur on behalf of the Government of India that their leanings are towards Company management. That is not desirable, if the Government of India want to hold a non-committal policy. In the second place, this amendment says that one of the two railways will be handed over to some company. Even there, Sir, if you accept the principle of grouping, I do not think we should accept the idea of handing over either of these railways, because it conflicts with the principle of grouping and I am for grouping. It is one of the greatest advantages for State management. If you go in for State management, one of the advantages is that you can amalgamate a number of railways in the country. If you now record this amendment, it only means that you must hand over one or other of these two railways to some other company thereby militating against the principle of grouping or amalgamation. Therefore, it implies that you are prepared to drop, as it were, from your mouth a hot potato as soon as the first opportunity offers itself. I do not think we should commend this amendment. We should not bind this House to that particular policy. These are my remarks with specific reference to this amendment and its merits.

Now coming to the other part of the debate, the Honourable Mr. Innes tried to throw as much cold water as possible on the question of State management. He quoted Sir William Acworth from his book and said that he was inherently in favour of State management. Well, if that is so, I contend it is the greater reason in favour of our argument that a man who was wedded all his life to a view against the State management was specifically with special reference to India in favour of State management. My friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, tried to speak something about emulation. I am not going to emulate him, at any rate, in one particular respect when he said that from his point of view the Acworth group and their views were worthy of being thrown in the waste paper basket. To me, Sir, the Acworth view is far more valuable for the simple reason that Sir William Acworth, although he was committed to certain views in other countries, still on merits came to the view that in India State management was unworkable, and not only Sir William Acworth but his colleagues also who had an impartial mind and who had no vested interests whatsoever unlike the other group came to the same conclusion. I am not prepared to say that Sir William Acworth's view and the views of his colleagues are worthy of being thrown into the waste paper basket. Neither can I say that the views of those who talk about State management of railways are something like a toy. On the other hand, I am inclined to think, Sir, that the companies existing in India are nothing but toys, companies which own not more than one-tenth of the capital and are exploiting all the properties of the tax-payers of the State.

A great deal, Sir, has been made of the fact that more economy can be effected under Company management. I do not think that anybody during this debate has proved that Company management is necessarily more economical. If we go into figures, I can show—I have got the whole thing on my table, but there is no time to go into those things,—if we go into figures I can show that Company management is not as economical as it is made out to be. You must not compare unlikes but compare only likes. Well, the comparison is vitiated by the fact that in the case of a particular railway it may be nearer the coal mines or coal fields or in the case of another it may have tunnels to negotiate thereby adding to working expenses. Thus, any inferences drawn regarding the economic working of Company railways merely from statistics are likely to be vitiated by the special features of each railway concerned. But I can contend, Sir, that in favour of State management there are two distinct advantages which nobody so far has tried to controvert. When you talk about the economic working of Company management, people forget the fact that in the case of Company management they have to take into account the profits which we pay to the Companies as share of surplus profits under their contract. Now, if you go into the statistics, here again it will be seen that we as the tax-payers are losing every year under the contracts with these companies crores of rupees. Now, the last year, for instance, for which I have statistics, shows that the Government of India paid under their contracts over a crore of rupees to certain companies as share of surplus profits. In the previous years also the Government of India had to pay large surplus profits according to the terms of contract. Why are the tax-payers to lose all this money as surplus profits when as a matter of fact the whole of the property and the capital belongs to the taxpayer? You talk of economy about Company-managed railways but you do not take into account the fact that all this is taken from the exchequer of the Government of India.

Mr. President: I really must call upon the Honourable Member not to pursue that further. It is much too near to-morrow's subject.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: The Honourable Mr. Innes also mentioned something about the principles of seniority and transfers, if the whole of the management were given to the State. And I think it was my friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, who cited the case of Mr. Hindley, an extremely efficient officer borrowed from a Company-managed line. I can give him just as many instances of Government officials borrowed by Company-managed lines, men like Major Hepper, Mr. McLean and various others. Therefore, it is no use drawing an inference either way about efficiency of Railway officials. Then again, Sir, the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment speaks about an indigenous company. I fail to see, Sir, the exact meaning of that word. If by indigenous he means only a company whose habitat is Calcutta, whose domicile is here, I don't think I would recognise that as an indigenous company. When you ask us to commit ourselves to this amendment, when you want us to agree to the principle of transferring the management to indigenous companies, you must define what an indigenous company is. I am not in favour of transferring either of these railways in any case at all, because all the money that has been sunk in these two railways is our property. We have paid practically every penny for the capital of these two railways and there is absolutely no reason whatever why they should be transferred to any company now. But assuming we should seek a company what is the sort of company that Mr. Innes wants. Is it a company which has the whole of its capital raised in India? If the capital were to come here from some syndicate in London and if that is to be the meaning of an indigenous company, certainly I don't want the transference of any of these railways to any indigenous company at all. My own definition of an indigenous company, a real company is that the company must be started in India wholly with Indian capital. Now, is there any possibility in the next few decades that any company can be able to raise capital and take over either of these railways from the hands of Government? I do not see any chance, Sir. The whole question is "Why should we commit ourselves to-day to a policy which, so far as we can see in the distant future is not likely to materialise, when we know definitely that, in view of the financial position of the money market no Indian company can be able to raise 80 crores of rupees to buy the East Indian Railway, or 120 crores to buy up the Great Indian Peninsula Railway. The possibility is so remote.

Sir, I oppose the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment and I think we should not commit ourselves to either view. The only thing we can do is to determine that these two railways should be taken over for State management for the time being, leaving the question of transference to any company absolutely alone.

(Some Honourable Members: I move, Sir, that the question be now put.)

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): Watching the course of the debate in this House, I think, I may say that since lunch time it has taken only one turn, for the House has discussed simply the alternatives between Dr. Gour's amendment and Dr. Gour's amendment plus Mr. Innes' rider. In other words, if I am correct, the larger question of the principle of State versus Company management has dropped out, and what we are now considering is a choice of two somewhat narrow alternatives, which I would define as follows. If I say I am right in believing that Mr. Neogy's original proposition has dropped out of the minds of the House . . . (Honourable Members: "No, no.") There seem to be five murmurs in favour of Mr. Neogy; I see I was right, and Mr. Neogy's proposition has dropped out. Then what are we considering? Dr. Gour's amendment is that the Governor General in Council be advised to take over the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railways, that is exactly what the Governor General in Council has announced his intention of doing. That proposition then does not carry us very far. As to Mr. Innes' rider, the reason for putting forward this proposition is simply this, in the words that he used himself, that Government does not desire to be debarred from entering into the negotiations which would be necessary if a true Indian company were to be started to take over either of these Railways at a subsequent date, the only real issue is whether you desire definitely to force Government to the conclusion that any action taken on its part to negotiate for an Indian company would be subsequently disowned by this House. I ask the House to consider what substantial grounds it has for objecting to such a proposal. I am not going again into the larger question of State versus Company management. One might draw some amazing inference and some amusing conclusions if one did so. For a long time it has been part of my duty to defend the action of Government officials. It is now apparently the firm conviction of this House that the Government official is the only true business man, but I refrain from dwelling on the point. I lay however the greatest stress on this fact, that neither Mr. Kamat, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, or other Members who have spoken of the comparative attractions of State and Company management as applied to India—and I speak only of India—have so far been able to prove by any form of fact or figure that there is any advantage in State over Company management. The whole of the arguments used are a priori and based purely on theory. Now, there is in the minds of many of us, as in the minds of many speakers this afternoon a profound conviction that Company management offers many attractions. Let me take the first. It should relieve—this is a question which is of peculiar interest to me—it should relieve greatly your difficulty in financing your capital programme. That is to say, that, if you succeed in raising Indian capital for an Indian company, you will thereby relieve your own capital programme for other works such as Irrigation. In the second place, there is no doubt that it does offer the advantage of providing that incentive which is derived from competition with State working. Thirdly, it prevents the delays and other disadvantages likely to follow from excessive centralization at headquarters. On these grounds alone—and I am going no further than that—it would be unreasonable absolutely to close the door to negotiation for an Indian company. I am asked what we mean by an Indian Company. I think it is only necessary to quote the words of Sir Montagu Webb. An Indian company means obviously a company of which the capital is rupee capital, of which a proportion of the Directors are Indian Directors; if capital comes from Home towards that company, it must come in the form of rupees; you cannot bar the entry of capital from outside India, because when once it is in India in the form of rupees, you cannot identify its origin. As to the constitution of the Directorate, that can either be provided for by the conditions of the lease or left to be decided by the shareholders; but it must be managed in India. We are asked by Captain Sassoon whether we have ever made any attempts to negotiate with such a company. It is one of the objects of Mr. Innes' amendment that we should be in a position to enter into these negotiations which we have hitherto not been able to undertake. Mr. Manmohandas Ramji suggested that the only object of introducing this amendment (which indeed he opposed on his ground) was to enable the Secretary of State to negotiate with some company for taking over these Railways. But this is to be an Indian company, and the negotiations must be undertaken by the Indian Government, which will have to arrange to attract Indian capital in India itself. Mr. Ramji may well relieve his mind of that apprehension. As to the possibilities of finding such a company, Mr. Kamat suggested that it will be quite impossible to look forward to a time when India can provide 80 crores for taking over one of these Railways. But it is not necessary that India should at once provide 80 crores for taking over a Railway of this type. All we need look to is that a company should be started on a sufficient financial basis to enable it to take over such portion of the capital represented as to ensure it the true character of company management. That we should wait until we can find a company which can provide sufficient capital to purchase the full assets of these Railways is quite unnecessary. We are told by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar that the argument which Mr. Innes applied against Mr. Neogy tells also against Mr. Innes, namely, that Mr. Innes is seeking to tie the Assembly to a definite line of action with regard to the Indian company. And another speaker said that if you pass this amendment, then you are bound to give one of our Railways over to a company. Neither argument is correct. If you pass this amendment, all that follows is that Government would be in a position to undertake the inquiries and negotiations necessary to forming an indigenous company on lines which would be accepted as suitable in India. Nor is it in any way true that the argument which Mr. Innes has applied against Mr. Neogy applies also against Mr. Innes for the reason that it does not bind either Government or the Legislature to any future action.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Then why have a legislation?

Dr. H. S. Gour: Show us your company first and we will discuss it afterwards.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Unless, Sir, it is possible to enter into these negotiations, it would not be possible to show you the company, to use Dr. Gour's words. No financial body would enter into negotiations if they thought that the whole of their time would be wasted owing to the inability of Government to implement or complete these negotiations. I repeat that this rider of Mr. Innes does not in any way compel us to any future action; all it does is to leave open the door to Government to negotiate with some effect, since responsible people will not negotiate unless they are convinced that Government can implement any negotiations into which it enters.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Nothing prevents them.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: That, Sir, is the simple proposition and I put it to the House that it will be by no means well advised to attempt to close to Government an avenue of negotiation which would be open to it under Mr. Innes' amendment.

(Several Honourable Members: "I move that the question be now put.")

Mr. President: The question is that the question be put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

To Dr. Gour's amendment to add the following words at the end:

"but that efforts should be continued to concert measures with the object of handing over one or other of the two Railways after such grouping as may be necessary to an indigenous Company calculated to give India the benefits of real company management."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

STATEMENT LAID ON THE TABLE.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, I lay on the table the information promised in reply to a question by Mr. B. N. Misra, asked on the 15th January, 1923, regarding the passed and unpassed candidates of the Staff Selection Board.

Information promised by the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey on the 15th January 1923, in reply to Mr. B. N. Misra's starred question No. 14 regarding passed and unpassed candidates of the Staff Selection Board.

(a) No promise was made in the answer to question No. 350 on the 28th March 1922.

(b) A statement giving the required information is being placed in the library.

(c) and (d). The information will be found in the answers given to questions Nos. 86 and 148 on the 7th September 1922.

(e) and (f). Indication of the action taken will be found in the statement mentioned above. Departments are taking action to replace unpassed men by passed men, but the process of elimination will inevitably be gradual so as not to disturb the work and organisation of the Departments.

RESOLUTION RE SEPARATION OF THE RAILWAY FROM GENERAL FINANCE.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I am sorry I have to make this application. I ask that this motion standing in the name of the Honourable Mr. Innes be not taken up to-day. The reasons are these. It is true that the papers have been in the hands of the Members for a long time. Still in consequence of the other more important matter which came up yesterday, this has not been attended to as fully as it ought to have been. Moreover we want to know what the Budget for the coming year will be. We also want to know what the Inchcape Committee has to say with regard to the working expenses of the railway. Before we make up our mind as to whether the Standing Finance Committee's report should be adhered to or whether the Acworth Committee's report should be given effect to, it is desirable that we should have a little more information than we have at present. Therefore it is the general desire of Members on this side of the House that the matter should not be hurried through, especially having regard to the fact that the motion which is standing in the name of the Honourable the Commerce Member, only wants the status quo ante to be maintained and if the motion is not discussed still the status quo ante will be maintained. If we want to make any change then it would be desirable to bring the matter before the House and take the decision of the House and as the motion is only for continuing the existing state of things there is no hurry about it. Under these circumstances I am very reluctantly obliged to ask the House to consent to the matter not being discussed to-day.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): As Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar says, this matter has been before the House and before the public for a very long time, I think since January, 1922. It is true that we desire no more than to obtain the assent of this House to the conclusions of the Railway Finance Committee on which this and the other House were largely represented; but we should have been glad of a discussion of this question in view of the fact that the matter has been widely discussed in the Press and has been referred to on different occasions since it first arose in this Assembly both in the course of the Budget debates and otherwise. I would remind the House that we were pressed to give a date for the discussion before the Budget and did so at the expense of other Government business. It is only at this moment that a suggestion is made that the discussion could be deferred. If it is now deferred, I cannot undertake to give any other date this Session. That, I think, must be clearly understood. If on that understanding the House generally desires that the matter should be adjourned, then we are not in a position to contest its wish in that respect.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): I oppose the proposal to adjourn the discussion of this subject. The Resolution put forward by Government involves a very important matter of principle upon which I think, this House should give its opinion. The Acworth Committee made certain recommendations which on the financial side met with the approval, I think, of the whole country. A Joint Committee of both Houses met together a year ago and in effect threw one of the most important of those recommendations into the waste paper basket and suggested that instead of the Railway finances being separated from the general finances they should be all lumped together as hitherto. This recommendation of that Committee was disapproved of by, I believe, all the leading commercial bodies in the country. I think, therefore, that now that this subject has come before this House, it should be thoroughly discussed and the House should give its decision as to whether the recommendations of the Acworth Committee should be accepted, or whether the recommendations of the Joint Committee who considered one or two paragraphs of the Acworth Committee's report should be accepted. I urge therefore that this Resolution should be taken to-day.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): As a Member of the Railway Finance Committee I wish to bring to the notice of this House a few points which might have otherwise escaped its notice. As the Honourable Sir Montagu Webb has pointed out, the Acworth Committee have taken a definite line of action as regards the separation of the Railway budget from the general budget of the country. That question was referred to the Railway Finance Committee and the Railway Finance Committee have embodied their recommendations, which Honourable Members will find on pages 3 and 4 of the Indian Railways Administration Report, Volume I. The Railway Finance Committee have modified the recommendations of the Acworth Committee and they have recommended a different line of action to that recommended in the Acworth report. These are the two questions therefore which must be debated in this House. I should have been very willing to accede to the request of my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, if there was any possibility of discussing this matter some time during the present Session but the matter cannot wait and if no other date is possible, as has been very clearly indicated by the Honourable the Home Member, we shall be losing time and whichever way this House decides, whether in favour of the proposals embodied in the Acworth report or in favour of the recommendations made by the Railway Finance Committee, I do not see how we can profitably postpone this discussion. As regards the Budget and the report of the Inchcape Committee, I do not think that they would vitally trench upon the discussion upon which we are to embark to-day. Honourable Members have got the definite instructions or recommendations of the Acworth report. They have also got the definite recommendations of the Railway Finance Committee and it is for the Members to choose either the one or the other or part of one and part of the other. I think that the discussion should proceed and if hereafter a case is made out for the postponement of this discussion in view of the coming Budget, then I think it will be time for my Honourable friend to renew his request, but as at present advised I think we shall be throwing away a day allotted to us for the discussion of this very important question if we do not allow the Honourable Mr. Innes to make his statement and to initiate the discussion.

Captain E. V. Sassoon (Bombay Millowners' Association: Indian Commerce): Sir, the vote on yesterday's debate has made the question of the separation of the Railway from the ordinary Budget an absolute necessity. By that vote this House has swept away any doubts that may have been felt by the Government as to its fitness to run the railways of this country with success. After that vote, this House has given as its considered opinion, its conviction, that the bureaucracy of this country will make a success of what no other bureaucracy in the world has been able to make, and it need not even make any attempt to foster the development of any other system of railway management. I hope that the optimism of this House will be justified. It may be that Members perhaps have private knowledge of the capabilities of the Railway Commissioner which will justify them

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member is not discussing the point before the House, namely, whether this debate should be taken up or not. He is entering into the merits of the question which are not in issue at the moment.

Captain E. V. Sassoon: I am giving my reasons, Sir. Sir, with all deference, I submit that I am entitled to give reasons for submitting that this question is an urgent one and should be decided to-day if possible. I repeat, Sir, that if Honourable Members are correct—and I still have the honour of being a Member of this House—I will be the first publicly to admit the error of my views, but if my pessimism is justified, and if State management proves an increased burden on the people of this country, and it is found necessary to increase the taxes of this country, which it has been said by those very same advocates of State management has reached the limit of taxation, then, Sir, I think this is a proper moment to discuss whether the Government should not be in a position, at least the Honourable the Finance Member in particular should be able, to say,—this increase is due to the policy which was pressed on Government by the Legislative Assembly, a moribund Assembly it is true, but an Assembly the Members of whom, being about to meet their own constituents, could be counted on to express views which in their opinion would find favour in the eyes of their constituents, and the responsibility of any deficit, after the warning words of the Honourable Mr. Innes, will have to be borne by this House, which will then have to agree to the unpleasant necessity of increased taxation; and so, Sir, I think I am right in saying that we should discuss to-day as to whether the question of separating the Budget will enable the Government to say how the deficit has been caused.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I am afraid my Honourable friend, Captain Sassoon, wants to test the soundness of the principle adopted by the Assembly yesterday, rather too soon. It is not even a few hours old, and how the capability of the Honourable Finance Member is going to enable him to give his opinion on the result of the principle adopted yesterday evening by 11 o'clock next morning, I fail to see. I am glad that he has had his opportunity to have a fling on the Resolution that was decided on the vote of the Assembly last night, and having succeeded in that, I hope we will agree in saying that he has not given any reason whatever why this debate should not be adjourned. Really, there is no hurry about this. Our finances are in a fluctuating condition. We are passing through a crisis, and I hope we are going through that crisis successfully. Let us see where we are, let us see whether we are really standing on our feet or not, at least next year. In fact, after all the Railway Finance Committee did not throw the substance of the recommendations of the Acworth Committee into the waste paper basket, as Sir Montagu Webb would have it. We have adopted the substance; we have put aside the form, and we have put aside the form for a temporary period of three years. Therefore, it is not at all right to say that the Railway Finance Committee did not agree with the Acworth Committee. The Railway Finance Committee did agree with the Acworth Committee and have provided for a very steady programme for five years; and they also recommended the taking of steps to ensure revenue expenditure also, so that all the defects which the Acworth Committee found in the railway finance administration have been removed. (Sir Montagu Webb: "No, no.") The only thing is that the form remains,—whether the Budget should be separated or not. This is not the time to do it,—that is what we felt, and I am sure the House would endorse that view when it has the materials placed before it, as they were placed before the Railway Finance Committee; and I do not see why my Honourable friends are so anxious—I see that the Honourable Members who oppose State management are the persons who oppose the adjournment, except for my friend, Dr. Gour—I do not know why he is very anxious to oppose it, I know he also opposed it, but unfortunately the Leader of my party had not the time to speak to him beforehand, in which case he would have been able to convince him that there is a desirability in postponing the consideration of this question. There is really nothing lost by this; and after all, our time will be very well spent elsewhere in studying and preparing for the Budget which is coming on to-morrow,—of which we know nothing but still we can guess beforehand and look up what we did last year and the year before, where the shoe pinched last year, and prepare ourselves for the onslaught which will be coming on from Monday next, and therefore the time will not be wasted. I do think, Sir, that there is a great deal in the motion made by the Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, and I support it.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, Mr. Rangachariar is looking for his type of consistency,—and he thinks that those who found it their duty to oppose State management in some shape or other, are bound to oppose the motion for adjournment to-day. I disagree on this point, for I support the motion for adjournment, for reasons other than those that have been adduced. I was unfortunately a little late in coming, but I gather that the Honourable Mr. Innes has not yet made the Government mind quite clear about the matter, and, what could be gathered from the Honourable the Leader of the House is that he cannot give another day. Sir, we are in the position of one of those unfortunate Hindu families who have a strong brother, sometimes strong in rage and, who, without reason, imposes a partition; and that partition was imposed last night in regard to Railway Finance; and to-day we are wanting the weakling who confesses a state of helplessness, almost abject, so that we may arrange for the security of the strong party. Yesterday morning we practically said that we are going to do something definite in the way of a separate Railway account, in the afternoon we imposed something that had not been bargained for, and to-day we want you to start that separate account. (Mr. J. Chaudhuri: "No, No.") Sir, some people want it,—unless there was a difference of opinion, this motion for adjournment would not have come and the motion of the Honourable Mr. Innes would have been accepted as a matter of course. Sir, I do not want to take the line that Captain Sassoon has taken. I have the loyalty to accept settled facts so far as this House goes, and we must give whatever the House decides on a fair chance. Having regard to what the House decided, is the Government prepared or not that separation of accounts shall take place? What the effect of that financially will be, we do not know. The figures I quoted indicated yesterday what the railway deficit is likely to be this year; whether, as in the case of the Prodigal Son, we shall have to provide for the deficit or not or whether we merely participate in the profits, if and when they come, we do not know yet. All: these are considerations that must be carefully looked into and Government will have to decide, having regard to what the vote of the House was yesterday, what line it is going to take. Of course, Government never fails in capacity, and probably if Mr. Innes does move the motion he will tell us that Government has quite made up its mind in spite of what Mr. Rangachariar said, and that he is prepared to take a definite line of action. We are, however, not so very clear in our minds with regard to what ought to be done. There is a distinct cleavage of opinion between the Acworth Committee and the Railway Finance Committee. As has been pointed out a temporary three years programme has been indicated by the latter. But that is not enough for purposes of permanent decision regarding the accounts at all events in outlines. For this reason it strikes me that nothing will be gained by rushing this Resolution and it ought to have more deliberate consideration than less than 24 hours has enabled Members to bestow on it.

[Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary.]

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I am afraid Members who ask for the adjournment of to-day's Resolution are labouring under some delusion. The Resolution of which notice has been given by the Honourable Mr. Innes recommends to the Governor General in Council that the proposals of the Railway Finance Committee in regard to the separation of the railway from general finance be accepted. Now, what are those proposals? Those proposals are given at page 3 of the Administration Report, on Indian Railways for 1921-22, where we find the following:

"After full discussion the Committee came to the conclusion that the question of separating railway finance on the lines laid down by the Acworth Committee was outside the domain of practical politics in the existing state of Indian finance. They recommended, however, that the question should be re-examined three years hence when it might be hoped conditions would be more normal and financial equilibrium would be re-established."

(A Voice: "What is the hurry about it now?") The question is whether you are willing or not willing to accept this recommendation of the Railway Finance Committee, namely, that at present the separation is out of the question and that for three years the matter should remain without separation of the railway budget from the general budget? If that is the recommendation which the Railway Finance Committee made and if that is the recommendation which the Government and you are going to accept, I really do not see why you should object to the proposal being brought forward to-day by the Government. If you now adjourn and there is no date forthcoming, what is the result? The result is that next year, it may be, the Government might bring forward a Resolution in direct opposition to the recommendation of the Railway Finance Committee and ask for the separation of the railway budget from the general budget. If you now accept the Government position that these proposals of the Railway Finance Committee be accepted, Government are committed to a policy of not separating for the present the railway budget from the general budget. It is a desirable thing from my point of view and I take it from the point of view of those who have thought over the subject. If, however, you do not accept the Government proposal, you can vote against it. Those who want it will vote for it. I really do not see what is gained by adjourning.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay: European): Sir, yesterday we dealt with the question of railways according to what some of us thought was not a very commonsense point of view. But that is a matter for debate. But I do, Sir, ask this House to-day to deal with this question on commonsense lines. The Honourable the Leader of the House has told us that if we do not discuss this question to-day we cannot discuss it on any other day this Session. I therefore, Sir, consider that there is no further need of argument and that we should consider this question to-day.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I support the motion for adjournment. With reference to the remarks which fell from my friend, Mr. Samarth, I shall give my own reasons why I want to adjourn. This Resolution asks us to confirm or ratify the conclusions to which the Railway Finance Committee came. Our impression is that, whatever the conclusions of the Members of the Railway Finance Committee may be, they were chiefly influenced by the fact that our general finances do not balance, that we are in a state of deficit and not in equilibrium. Now, we are to-day on the eve of the budget presentation and we hope, Sir, owing to Lord Inchcape's Committee having gone into the question of Railway Finance, to see a better state of things in our Budget. This Resolution asks us to vote for the separation of Railway Finance from general finance in a blind way. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "It does not.") Whereas, if we wait and see what Lord Inchcape's Committee has been able to suggest with reference to the securing of equilibrium in our Budget, we shall be able to see whether the conclusions of the Railway Finance Committee are sound or unsound. We want to see first of all the budget, before we ratify the conclusions of the Railway Finance Committee. Nothing will be lost if this adjournment is given. On the other hand, if we get a day later on in March, as is possible, I think we shall be able to see precisely where we stand so far as our general and the railway budget are concerned. I therefore think it would be more advantageous to have the adjournment.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, although at one time I was in favour of the adjournment; after hearing some of the speeches I feel there is no necessity for adjournment at all. After all the proposals about separation are to come into existence after three years. (The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "December, 1924.") What we are asked to do to-day is to accept the principle, and if we accept the principle naturally then the separation may come into existence after some time, and certainly not in this budget. This budget is not going to affect the separation, at all.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I am afraid I am in the same position as my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi. Mr. Kamat's argument would be forcible if another date was forthcoming. But we have here a statement made by the Honourable the Leader of the House in which he says that he cannot guarantee any date during this Session. Well, if he cannot guarantee any other date during this Session, are you going to postpone sine die the discussion of a most important question like this. If another date is not forthcoming then let us discuss the matter to-day and decide one way or the other.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I desire to say a word or two in support of the motion for adjournment. The question stands thus. So far as the view that the present state of things should continue is concerned, it contemplates that there should be no disturbance in the existing arrangement for three years for the present, that is to say, the railway finance should remain amalgamated with the general finance of the country for that period. But the opposite view suggests that we should at once decide upon the question whether railway finance should be permanently separated from the ordinary general finance of the country, as a separate entity, and that such procedure should introduce the consideration of the larger question whether, in case of good years, the profits derived from the railways should be completely detached from the general exchequer and be devoted entirely to the needs of the railways and to their improvement. It suggests that in case, after meeting all the needs of the railways, there is found to be a surplus that surplus should not be utilized for the purposes of the general administration of the country, and to relieve pro tanto, the general exchequer. That is the larger question, Sir, which is involved in this matter, and if in the absence of the necessary facts and figures, if in the absence of the results of the examination made by the Retrenchment Committee, and without due regard to any proposal which may be brought forward, by that Committee a conclusion is arrived at, such a conclusion is likely to prove immature and ill-considered. When introducing this matter in this House on the 27th of March, 1922, the Honourable Mr. Innes, said:

"Lord Meston's Committee proceeded on the assumption that the Central Government would derive a net revenue of Rs. 10½ crores from railways. For the reasons, which I have already explained the whole of this revenue could not possibly be surrendered, but it was considered whether a portion of the loss to general revenues involved by the separation could not be avoided on the basis of a composition with the railways; that is to say, whether a sum could not be arrived at which the railways might fairly be expected to contribute to the general exchequer, whether in the form of a surtax or otherwise."

Then he went on to say:

"This suggestion was examined, but we were at once met by the difficulty that it was not possible to calculate a figure on which any reliance could be placed as a basis of a contribution or a surtax."

I need not detain the House with further observations. He went on to calculate the possible benefits that were to be gained from this source of revenue. Then, Sir, in the end, this is how the debate ended. There were two parts to this question. The first part related to the sum of 150 crores of rupees which was to be spread over 5 years at 30 crores a year, on account of capital expenditure for the railways.

Mr. President: This quotation is relevant to the debate on the Resolution, not to this motion. I must ask the Honourable Member to address himself to the motion.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: The debate closed thus. For the reason that the question at issue could not be determined at the time, the first part only was passed in this House and the second part, which is the part now before the House relating to the separation of the railway finance from the general finance, was postponed till September last. But the matter was not put up in September. If it had been put up then, perhaps some result could have been achieved upon the figures then available. Now, we are nearing the completion of an inquiry, the inquiry by the Retrenchment Committee, and also nearing the Budget proposals. We are met at this juncture with the serious question as to how this subject is to be decided. If the present state of things continues there will be no harm if the matter be discussed later on. But if an opposite decision is come to, that decision will have to be arrived at upon imperfect materials and without full and adequate consideration of the whole question. That is what concerns the House for the present, not the question of the funds remaining united, but the question of one being completely separated from the other and necessarily involving the larger and broader question whether the general exchequer should receive any benefits from any surplus from the railways and whether from that source some benefit should go to the general tax-payer. That is the broader question, Sir, with which the House is now faced. I submit, Sir, the better course would be for the House to take the whole question into consideration, and after having got all the necessary facts, to come to a conclusion instead of deciding the question in the dark.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, the Honourable Mr. Spence has rightly recommended to this House that it should view this proposal to adjourn from the point of commonsense. On the one side, the House is asked not to take a leap in the dark, but to await the light which will be shed by the Budget now impending. The case for the other side is, as I understand it, that a leap in the dark is better than no leap at all. I submit, Sir, it is my humble view that commonsense is on the side of those who say that no leap at all is better than a leap in the dark. I therefore support the motion for adjournment.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I rise to oppose the view that the Resolution be moved and taken into consideration to-day. I emphatically support the adjournment motion, because of the reason stated by my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Stanyon, that we should not take a jump in the dark. Exactly, Sir, that is the point to be considered. Unfortunately, Sir, some Honourable gentlemen have taken the view, that it is better for this House to jump into the dark. To jump into the dark, Sir, is sometimes very reasonable from the point of view of those who cannot distinguish this side of the House from the other, and the consequence is that the Judges of the Court trying offender of the kind have no sympathy for the accused persons who take a leap in the dark and commit offence

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member will very soon be in the position of an accused person himself if he does not speak on the question before the House.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, there are two parties and that is the position of those who do not want an adjournment but who want to take a leap in the dark. Sir, a very strong case has been made out from this side of the House. This Resolution was not balloted because it is a Government Resolution. It is a Resolution, the particulars of which is not known to this side of the House at all, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, wants us to take a leap in the dark. Without knowing, Sir, all the facts and figures, are we here to give our opinion with regard to the Resolution which is to be considered to-day? It is not at all advisable, Sir, that in an important Resolution like this, the Government should ask us to remain in the dark and say "look here, you have got some important points for the Resolution to be moved to-day and just now and although you may get the full particulars and all the materials for the Resolution later on, you better decide the question on the spur of the moment and accept our views that we have got in support of our Resolution." You want to fetter, you want to tie our hands and compel us to accept your views without giving us an opportunity to understand you. Are you not going to allow us to have our right and liberty? You have got all the materials before you it is true. I daresay you have got everything in your possession. You have been making this preparation in support of your Resolution to defeat us and contradict our views and arguments. But, certainly, Sir, in all fairness to us, we must be given an opportunity to follow you. You must give us time to study the question. You must give us sufficient notice of the Resolution. I understand, Sir, that the Railway Department is a department that follows the time table properly, and no train starts from any station unless there is some indication at least two or three months previously; and this is, Sir, the principle of the rules that are always followed in the Railway Department. The Railway Department, as far as this morning is concerned, is not acting in accordance with that principle. I hope, Sir, that my Honourable friend, the Home Member, will see his way to allot a day for discussing this question soon after the budget is over. We are not going to disperse before the 26th or 27th March, I understand. Before and after the consideration of the Budget is over, Sir, there will be more than a week's time from now and after the budget and I daresay we will be able to find enough time for a discussion, and I beg to suggest that the proposal for adjournment should be accepted. The other point is that there is no reason why this Resolution should be hurried over and why it should be discussed to-day. I suppose I am quite right in saying that a fair chance should be given to this side of the House to consider a Government Resolution. It is not a Non-Official Resolution for which notice is given and which is admitted by the President within certain time and thereafter there is a ballot, and after that there is sufficient time within which the Governor General or the Viceroy can disallow the Resolution. Sir, you take enough time for a Non-Official Resolution before it comes on for discussion why should not this side of the House get sufficient time to follow a Government Resolution? With these few words I strongly support the motion for adjournment.

Mr. R. A. Spence: The question may now be put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that the Resolution be not considered to-day.

CONFERENCE RE REGULATIONS UNDER THE ELECTORAL RULES.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): Sir, with your permission I have a short statement to make for the information of Honourable Members, namely, that a conference of Provincial representatives has been summoned by the Government of India to consider the regulations made under the electoral rules. The Conference will begin its meetings on the 7th of March. As Honourable Members are aware, the power to make regulations under the rules is vested in Local Governments. Some Honourable Members may, however, be interested in the subject and they may wish to make suggestions for the amendment of the regulations. Any such suggestions may be preferably made in writing and addressed to Mr. Hammond, c/o the Home Department.

MEETINGS OF LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): May I ask, Sir, if the Honourable the Leader of the House is able to give us any information as to when this Legislative Assembly is to be dissolved?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): No, Sir, I have no definite information on the point.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): May I, Sir, in this connection ask, is there going to be a Simla Session of the Central Legislature, and, if so, when?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I have no information on that point either.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 1st March, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, 1st March, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

QUESTION AND ANSWER.

PUBLICITY BUREAU.

441. Mr. K. G. Bagde: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) Whether the present Director and Assistant Director of the Publicity Bureau were in employment of the Government of India or any Provincial Government before, and if so, in what capacity, and what were their salaries?
- (b) What is the cost of the establishment of the Publicity Bureau?
- (c) What is the amount spent annually on publications including postage and other charges?
- (d) Have the Government any intention of continuing the establishment beyond May, 1923, and if so, whether any proposal for extension has been placed before the Standing Finance Committee? and
- (e) Will an inquiry be instituted into the working of the Department before a further step is taken to extend its life?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: (a) The Director and Assistant Director of the Central Bureau of Information were not in Government service when they were appointed to their present posts under the Government of India.

(b) The Honourable Member is referred to page 38 of the "Detailed Estimates and Demands for Grants for 1922-23."

(c) The charges of printing, publication, postage and distribution of the publications of the Central Bureau of Information fall, like those for the publications of other offices, upon the Superintendent, Government Printing, India. They are not a part of the expenditure of the Bureau, nor is the Bureau credited with the proceeds of the sale of its publications.

(d) The matter is under the consideration of the Government of India.

(e) This is unnecessary as there is already an Advisory Publicity Committee comprising among its number members of the Legislature.

BUDGET FOR 1923-24.

INTRODUCTORY.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): Mr. President, in rising to-day to present the budget statement for 1923-24, I claim, and I know I shall receive, the privileges of a new-comer and a new Member. It is a great privilege for me thus to be able to fulfil an old dream of returning to the land of my birth to serve India as so many of my ancestors have done. But two months is a very insufficient time for the task of preparing to present a budget to this House. I am, however, in many ways fortunate. First and foremost, I have the devoted services of the Finance Department under the Honourable Mr. Cook. Without their help there would have been no budget. I am the inheritor of the fruits of three years of hard labour of my friend Sir Malcolm Hailey. If there is a gleam of light in the budget which I am about to present, it is his doing. The fruit is the fruit of seed which he had sown, and I am reaping where he has ploughed. I am afraid that he had to put up with much inclement weather, with storms and rumours of storms, but if there is promise of harvest to-day, the credit is to him. For nothing perhaps am I more indebted to him than for his share in the credit of securing the appointment of the strong and able Retrenchment Committee, which has been so well presided over by Lord Inchcape. Possibly the most interesting part of the papers which I am laying on the table to-day and in the next few days in connection with the budget will be the report of the Inchcape Committee. Lord Inchcape shocked my modesty a few days ago by describing himself as my forerunner. He and his colleagues can perhaps be more aptly compared to the burly forwards in the American game of football on whom falls the duty of charging ahead of the man with the ball and beating down, with all permissible violence, any opponent who threatens to check his progress. Whatever views individual Members may take of this or that recommendation for retrenchment made by the Committee,—and I never heard any recommendation for retrenchment anywhere, except the stopping of the salary of the Finance Member, which was really popular,—I know the whole House will be unanimous in joining with me in expressing our heartfelt gratitude to the Committee for their devoted work, and, as I think I may promise, for their remarkable success in what is the most ungrateful of all ungrateful tasks.

2. Mr. President, my first duty to-day is to lay before this House the figures of the outturn, or rather the probable outturn, of the year 1922-23. Since I came to India, I have much envied the position of the British Chancellor of the Exchequer who, in presenting his budget, is always able to give accurate figures for the year which, under the British system, has just closed and not, as under the Indian system, is about to close. He is not confronted, as I am, with the necessity of making what is after all only a second guess on the basis of the first nine or ten months' experience of what the real figures are for the year preceding the year to which the budget which he is presenting relates. When I have laid before the House the figures for 1922-23, I hope to make a short review of the general financial position of India at the close of 1922-23, that is, the position as it presented itself to a new-comer as I am. It will then be my task to proceed with my proper function to-day—the presentation of the budget for 1923-24.

II.—REVIEW OF THE YEAR 1922-23.

3. The budget estimates of the current year as finally passed provided for a deficit of 9·16 crores, the estimated revenue (including new taxation and increased postage and railway rates expected to yield 18½ crores), being 133·23 crores, and the expenditure 142·39 crores. There is a saving of 4·14 crores on expenditure, but revenue will be 12·48 crores less than the estimate, so that as now revised the estimates point to a deficit this year of 17½ crores.

Revenue.

4. Our revenue estimates were not based on a hope of any marked or striking revival in trade, although we certainly expected some slight improvement on the general trade conditions of the previous year. On the whole, this anticipation has been justified. There was considerable stagnation during the earlier part of the summer, but, except perhaps in the cotton mill industry in Bombay, the general feeling prevailing in the business community has for some months been one of mild optimism. Considering the impoverishment of many of our former customers, our exports have undoubtedly shown a promising recovery, and, so far as merchandise alone is concerned, the balance of trade in favour of India during the first ten months of the financial year has been 62 crores which contrasts with an adverse balance of 29½ crores in the corresponding ten months of the preceding year. As against this, there has been a substantial net import of bullion in the current year, but after including the bullion figures there still remains a net balance of 20 crores in favour of India instead of an adverse balance of 33 crores in the first ten months of last year.

5. Under Customs we budgeted for a total net revenue of 45½ crores, of which 9 crores was expected to accrue from the enhancement of duties imposed in the Finance Act of March last. We now expect a Customs revenue which will be some 3 crores short of the figure budgeted for. The most uncertain, and at the same time one of the most important factors affecting our revenue is the import of sugar, which in the previous year had yielded us the unprecedentedly large figure of 6½ crores at the old rate of duty of 15 per cent. For the current year we did not anticipate the continuance of such abnormally large imports, but expected, on the increased duty of 25 per cent., to realise about 6½ crores. The figures of imports vary in a very erratic way from month to month which makes estimating difficult; recently, owing to a large drop in prices, imports were held up in order to get the benefit of the revised tariff valuation which came into force from the 1st January. We expect, therefore, large imports in the last 3 months of the year though the effect of this will be counterbalanced by the duty being calculated on a lower valuation. On the whole, we expect that the revenue from sugar will be less by 1½ crores than the budget figure. The excise duty on cotton manufactures will also bring us in substantially less than we expected; owing to the high price of cotton and a fall in the price of cotton cloth in the internal markets, there has recently been a reduced output from the mills, and we expect to be about 60 lakhs down under this head. As regards the other tariff heads, it is probable that there will be some deficiency in the revenue from liquors, matches, machinery, cutlery and other manufactured articles, but any losses here should be nearly counterbalanced by increased revenue from import duties on cotton piece-goods (which may give us 96 lakhs more than our estimated revenue of 5.60 lakhs), iron and steel and other metals, while the new excise duty on kerosene is likely to bring us in 89 lakhs as against 40 lakhs budgeted for.

6. Before leaving the subject of Customs, I must refer briefly to a matter which has attracted some public attention during the year, namely, our revenue from the so-called "luxury" articles, which are assessed to duty at 30 per cent. Honourable Members will have seen from time to time various articles in the press, the object of which was to show that this high rate of duty has very seriously affected the trades concerned, and it was implied, if it was not asserted, that a lower rate of duty would have brought in more revenue. These contentions are scarcely borne out by the facts. In the current year we budgeted for a return of 2.84 lakhs from the 30 per cent. duty; we actually expect to receive only 11 lakhs less in spite of a considerable fall in prices. The principal articles included in the 30 per cent. schedule are motor cars, silk manufactures, glass bangles and beads, and tyres and tubes. Except in the case of silk manufactures, the quantities imported during the first nine months of the current year have been in excess of those imported in the corresponding period of the preceding year. Nearly twice as many motor cars have been imported; and if the value of the cars imported has fallen considerably, this is due partly to the general fall in world prices and partly to the fact that people have been importing the cheaper American car in preference to the more expensive English car. I doubt very much if the duty has had much to do with this substitution. The conclusion is that there is certainly no case at present for any alteration of the schedule.

7. As Honourable Members will have seen from the published returns, our traffic receipts from railways have been disappointing. The increase in passenger fares was expected to add some 6 crores to the receipts. Traffic, both passenger and goods, especially the latter, has, however, fallen off, and as against the estimated gross traffic receipts of 99½ crores, we do not expect to get more than 92, the small improvement over the gross earnings of last year being mainly due to the increased passenger fares. On the other hand, we expect a saving of 2½ crores on that portion of the expenditure on replacements and renewals which is debitable to revenue, counterbalanced by an excess of about 1 crore in ordinary working expenses. Altogether our net railway revenue is likely to be down by 5½ crores. Taking into account interest charges, I am sorry to say that the final result for the general tax-payer will be that there will again be no profit from railways, but a loss of about a crore.

8. The effect of the new postal rates, during the first few months of the financial year, was to reduce correspondence, but there have since been signs of recovery, and the public are now gradually getting used to the higher postal charges. For the present, however, I think we must anticipate a diminution of 1.06 lakhs in our anticipated receipts in 1922-23. There is a small saving in working expenses, and after debiting interest, the department will probably prove to have been running at a profit of about 24 lakhs.

9. We expected large arrear income-tax collections, but after the beginning of the year it became evident, not only that the allowances that we should have to make for bad debts, etc., would be large, but also that our revenue was to be seriously affected by heavy refunds which have had to be made in Calcutta as a result of the adjustment system in force under the former Act; fortunately this will, under the new Act, not disturb our estimates again. I understand that in Calcutta companies have in many cases actually received a cheque from the income-tax authorities instead of paying any tax to Government, and the net receipts in Bengal are not expected to be more than 3½ crores. The collections have been good in the other provinces, particularly in Bombay, though the lower profits which the cotton mills have recently been making will, I fear, affect our revenue from that city in 1923-24. Altogether, we expect a total deterioration of 3½ crores.

10. As regards other heads, I need only say that we expect to get 89 lakhs more from opium than we anticipated, and there will probably be some slight improvement—7 lakhs or so—under salt.

Expenditure.

11. On the expenditure side, there will be a substantial saving of about 1.86 lakhs in our budget provision for interest on debt. Our rupee and sterling borrowings have been larger than we budgeted for, but a full half year's interest in respect of the greater part of these does not fall due till next year; the success of our borrowings has, moreover, enabled us to fund a substantial portion of our floating debt, and the payment of interest made for short periods this year on our new loans is less than that which would have been payable for the replacement of the treasury bills discharged.

The House will recollect that a special provision of 60 lakhs was entered in the Civil estimates as part of the expenditure in Waziristan (under the head "Political"). We now anticipate that there will be a saving of nearly 35 lakhs therein, owing to a part of the expenditure being thrown forward to next year. There will also be a saving of ½ crore in other civil expenditure, mainly as the result of retrenchments carried out during the year.

The average rate of Exchange for which we budgeted was 1s. 4d. We expect no appreciable deviation from the budget under this head.

12. Before dealing with military expenditure, I must explain briefly a change which has been made in the method of showing the figures; it affects all the non-commercial heads but is most marked in the case of the military portion of the accounts. Our practice in the last two years in distributing exchange adjustments has been to show them against the individual heads of account in so far as the commercial services were concerned, and to lump the entries under one head "Exchange" in respect of the remaining heads. This method would answer well enough if the difference between the statutory rate (2 shillings to the rupee) and the actual rate was fairly small; but it gives our figures a misleading appearance when the difference between the two rates is as large as has been the case during the past two years. It was not at all surprising, therefore, that serious objection was taken to this procedure in the course of the discussion of the budget in both Houses last year, on the ground that it had the effect, on the surface, of largely understating the actual expenditure incurred on military services. It has now been decided to distribute the exchange adjustments between the individual heads in all future accounts and estimates. The figures of military expenditure which I shall give this morning have accordingly been arrived at after converting sterling into rupees at the rate of 1s. 4d.

13. The Budget provided 65.10 crores for the established charges of the Army, 2.13 crores for Waziristan expenditure and 52 lakhs for demobilisation charges, making a total of 67.75 crores. In regard to the Waziristan expenditure my predecessor stated that the figure could be regarded as tentative only, since it is always difficult to forecast the exact effect of military operations of this nature. His apprehension has unhappily proved correct and Waziristan expenditure in 1922-23 is now estimated at 3.85 crores. Demobilisation charges will amount to 2.8 crores owing to unexpected progress with the discharge of surplus officers and to a claim from the War Office for the cost of demobilisation of British troops which had become surplus on the reduction of Indian establishments. On the other hand, the established charges will now amount to only 60½ crores, owing to a continued shortage of British troops, fall in prices and a variety of other causes. A careful control has been maintained over these charges; and savings in Budget grants have not been allowed to be re-appropriated for new measures involving a permanent liability of any considerable magnitude, though a small portion had to be made available to meet initial expenditure on equipment the purchase of which could not be further postponed. In spite therefore of the excess expenditure of 1.72 lakhs in Waziristan, we have been able to effect a saving of 46 lakhs in the budget grant for Military expenditure.

III.—POSITION OF INDIAN FINANCES AT THE CLOSE OF 1922-23.

15. Before I proceed to present the budget for 1923-24, I should like, with the permission of the House, to make a short survey of the financial position of India at the present time, and to attempt to give the House a new-comer's first impressions, or as Mr. Punch would say, first depressions. I am afraid that much of what I say may sound rather superficial, and that I shall be open to the charge of doing what has been done before by more than one globe trotter who, after spending a few weeks in the country, sets to and writes a book about India. One of the many books about India which I brought with me to read on boardship on my way out was a volume entitled "The Moral and Material Progress Report". I was rather shocked by the odd assumption in the title that there had necessarily been progress. When I came to look into the finances of India for the last few years, I was tempted to wonder whether it was not rather a rake's progress. For five years in succession, India has had a deficit. The accumulated total of these deficits amounts to no less than 100 crores, and this in spite of the fact that in the last two budgets additional taxation has been imposed estimated to bring in about 28 crores during the year 1922-23. Even this is not the whole story. Apart from our revenue deficits, we have spent many crores on unproductive purposes, the expenditure on which is classed as capital expenditure. New Delhi is the most obvious example. I can see no justification, other than sheer necessity, for not treating this expenditure as chargeable against revenue, and in any case it ought to be repaid out of revenue at an early date. Moreover, besides the deficit of the Central Government, the recurring deficits of the provincial Governments and of many local bodies throughout India must not be forgotten.

16. I ask the House to pause a moment and consider what these deficits mean. Unfortunately, we are accustomed in these days all over the world to budget deficits, and familiarity breeds contempt in spite of the fact that more than one awful example is before us among the nations of Europe of the chaos which continued budget deficits inevitably induce. The individual who lives beyond his income year by year does not escape the penalty and the same is true of a State. The individual who makes this mistake quickly finds himself compelled to consent to a ruthless cutting down of his expenditure or is driven either to sell or to mortgage a part or the whole of his possessions; or, in the worst event, to cheat his creditors. A State is in the same position, but the position is frequently obscured by the fact that the State's creditors are in another capacity the citizens of the State and its taxpayers. And the State which is driven to cheat its creditors does not always realise what it is doing although its unsound methods are adopted at the expense not only of the wealth and happiness of its own citizens, but also at considerable risk to social order within its borders. Much of the present unrest in the world is due to the way in which States in all parts of the world have cheated their creditors by unsound currency manipulation and the creation of paper money with no real assets behind it.

17. India has not entirely escaped the evils of taxation through inflation, but as compared with many other countries she has come off well. Out of the total deficit of 100 crores during the last five years, it is estimated that 31 crores have been covered by the creation of paper money, representing nothing but the I. O. U.'s of the Government of India. The remainder amounting to 69 crores has been raised by borrowing. Moreover to the extent of 22 crores the borrowing has thus far taken the form of issues of Treasury Bills to the public. It is true that, owing to special conditions during 1922-23, we were able to reduce our Treasury Bills by 32 crores, in spite of the deficit, out of the proceeds of long term loans. Still, 22 crores of Treasury Bills in a country like India is far too large an amount to have outstanding. A large volume of Treasury Bills is an evil even in England, where the condition of the money market is such that it is always possible to renew maturing bills by offering a competitive rate, but in India conditions might easily arise under which even an impossibly high rate would be insufficient, and in that case the Government of India would be driven back to replacing the Treasury Bills by paper currency, i.e., would be driven to taxation by inflation.

18. In this connection, a word may be said about our early maturing debt. We have to find the means of meeting bonds during the next three or four years to the extent of 5½ crores in 1923, 8½ crores in 1925, and nearly 88 crores in 1926. These amounts, too, have to be competed for against other demands on the market, and may be said, in part at any rate, to be one of the outcomes of the deficits for the last few years.

19. But the deficits of 100 crores can be looked at from another point of view, when again their evil effects are prominent. In the budget for 1923-24, the charge for interest would be at least 5½ crores less had it not been for these accumulated deficits. This extra 5½ crores has to be met either by reducing expenditure, possibly by reducing desirable expenditure, or by raising new taxation, or at best by maintaining existing taxes which could otherwise be reduced.

20. Moreover the continued deficits are threatening to impair India's credit in the market both at home and abroad, and increasing the cost of borrowing whether for covering the deficits or for new capital expenditure. India is a country where, as it seems to me, there is an almost unlimited field for new capital expenditure on new development. At the last Assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva, India established her claim to be one of the eight premier industrial States of the world. Every one admits, however, that India is only at the beginning of her industrial development, and it is out of her capital resources, i.e., out of her accumulated savings and her new savings, that the capital to develop India industrially must be found. We have borrowed all that we could borrow in India and in England during the last few years for capital expenditure purposes, and we have undertaken a minimum programme of 30 crores a year for capital expenditure on Railways. I wish it could be more. So far as I can judge at the present time, the amount which might usefully be spent on profitable development of transportation in India is limited mainly by the possibilities of finding capital resources. Yet we have spent 100 crores out of capital in the last five years in financing deficits, thereby diminishing to a corresponding extent the resources available for developing India. Let us make no mistake about it. If recourse to inflation is ruled out, if it is agreed that the concealed method of taxation by inflation is the worst of all methods, the money to meet the annual expenditure of India, whether on capital or on revenue account, must come out of the savings of the country. The only exception, which is not a real exception, to this statement is that some of the capital may be borrowed abroad, and it has of course been a commonplace of the history of the last century that capital has been found by the older industrial countries of the world for the development of new-comers in the field, to the great advantage both of the borrower and of the lender. But the amount that India can borrow abroad is limited both by the amount available abroad, which in the present condition of the world may prove a comparatively small amount for some time to come, and by the capacity of the borrower to meet the annual charges for interest. These annual charges for interest are in effect a claim on the future resources of India and ultimately come out of the same pocket as the money required to meet the rest of India's expenditure, i.e., out of the savings of the people. To sum up, the deficits of the last few years have brought in their train a certain amount of taxation by inflation, a heavy annual charge on the present and future budgets of India, a deterioration in India's credit, an increase in the cost of borrowing, and a depletion of the resources available for desirable capital development.

21. Perhaps I may be allowed to digress at this moment to touch on a subject in which I have always taken very great interest. Every one who has studied the subject agrees that a wonderful era of prosperity would be ahead of India if the habit of investment could be stimulated, if investment in India became anything like as general a practice as it is in such countries as England and France. It is true that much has been done in recent years. The rupee loans of the last few years have been unprecedented in amount. But much remains to be done if the Indian people are to form the habit of investing their talents in reproductive enterprises rather than wrapping them up in a napkin, and perhaps I should also add, if some of them could learn to be content with sound and steady returns on the money they invest instead of looking for impossibly high dividends.

22. I have been making some inquiries as to the progress of the Post Office Cash Certificates. I was an original member of the National Savings Committee appointed in England at the beginning of 1916 largely through the efforts of Mr. Montagu and was privileged to take a part in what is widely regarded in England as a most extraordinarily successful movement. The change from thriftlessness to thrifty habits which has taken place among many sections of the English people has been described as a revolution. National Savings Certificates to the value of nearly £360 millions are now held by the small investor in the United Kingdom. When I contrast the sales of the Post Office Cash Certificates, which were not inconsiderable during the war when they were first started but have since declined, I cannot help thinking that there must be great possibilities of development in this system. What a great improvement in our financial outlook would result if by development of the Post Office Cash Certificate system a considerable part, if not the whole, of the money required for provincial capital expenditure could be found out of the proceeds of Cash Certificates! It is my earnest hope that before long means may be found for taking up this subject in earnest. It is a subject in which above all others, if we are to succeed, non-official effort must be enlisted to second governmental action.

23. As the results of the deficits of the last few years and of the war, India's debt has grown from a total of 4.11 crores on the 31st March 1914 to an estimated total of 7.81 crores on the 31st March 1923. This figure includes the floating debt and the early maturing debt of which I have already spoken, but it excludes no less than 63 crores of obligations which it is I find the practice to treat separately from the debt of India, though as far as I can see these obligations are just as much a part of India's debt as the rest. Taking, however, the figure of 7.81 crores which I have given of the total debt of India on the 31st March 1923, we find that 5.57 crores is classed as productive and 2.24 crores as ordinary or unproductive debt. The proportion of productive to unproductive debt is one which naturally looks strikingly good to any one who thinks of Great Britain's figure of £7,500 millions of debt, all of which has gone in powder and shot. But this comparison must not blind us to the fact that since the 31st March 1914 the total debt has increased by 3.70 crores and the unproductive debt by 2.27 crores, and we must not forget that the yield on that part of our productive debt which is invested in railways has not been sufficient in the last two years to meet the interest charges.

24. The debt, again, has to be divided between rupee debt and sterling debt. The rupee debt has risen since the 31st March 1914 from 1.46 crores to 4.21 crores and the sterling debt has risen from £177 millions to £240 millions in the same period. The sterling debt of £240 millions represents a claim on India's production of goods and services in the future up to the value of the principal together with a further claim on those goods and services for interest during the interval until the principal is paid off.

25. This question of the sterling debt brings me by a natural transition to a new subject, which is certainly not the last one to be brought to the attention of an incoming Finance Member—I mean the question of currency and exchange. Now, it is no good crying over spilt milk, and I do not think the House will expect me to delve deeply into the history of Indian currency during recent years. It is easy to be wise after the event. There were some wise men, however, even in 1919-20, who held that the right course at that time would have been to adopt a waiting policy, and I am convinced that, for the moment at any rate, a waiting policy is still the right policy. What was it that upset the equilibrium of the rupee-sterling exchange which had been so painfully stabilised at 1s. 4d. at about the end of the 19th century? Primarily of course it was the Great War and the adoption of inflationary methods by all the belligerent countries. Whatever system of currency had been in force in India during the Great War, it would have been profoundly disturbed by the events of 1914-18. In so far as India had a choice and was not swept along in the maelstrom of world events, India's choice was necessarily between an attempt to keep the exchange value of the rupee more or less stable and an attempt to keep rupee prices more or less stable. As a matter of fact, India's first choice was the former, and for some time the rupee remained at or about 1s. 4d., but then the rise in the price of silver, which occurred as the natural consequence of the fall in the purchasing power of gold, introduced a new complication. It is impossible over a long period to keep a coin in circulation which is worth more as bullion than it is as current coin. Once the traditional figure of 1s. 4d. for the rupee was departed from nothing remained stable, though in comparison with the rest of the world Indian prices up till 1920 remained relatively stable in terms of gold. Thus, it was essentially the rise in the price of silver which upset the Indian currency system. I need say no more of the attempt that was made to stabilise the rupee at a new, or rather at the old, fixed rate of 2 shillings gold in 1920 except that it failed. Looking back, we are able to say that the attempt was an almost impossible one with all the exchanges of the world out of gear, with world prices moving up and then down with unexampled rapidity, and with relative prices as between one commodity and another fluctuating in an unheard-of manner. Can we say that the position to-day is such that an attempt to give the rupee a fixed value, whether at 1s. 4d. or any other rate, in terms of gold, or in terms of some other currency, is much more likely to succeed than it was in 1920? I think not. The French are in the Ruhr; the whole of Continental Europe is faced with the threat of impending chaos; throughout the world prices are unstable; sterling has approached close to par with gold but it is not yet at par; and even if it were at par, it is too soon to say whether political and monetary conditions in the United States may not lead to a fresh cycle of rising prices in terms of dollars which would almost necessarily have to be followed by a rise in sterling prices. For the moment, therefore, I repeat that the time has not yet come for a new attempt to fix the rupee, whether at 1s. 4d., 1s. 6d., or any other figure.

26. Subject, however, to one essential condition, namely, that the era of unbalanced budgets, central, provincial and local, in India, is succeeded by an era of balanced budgets, there is, I think, reason to regard the currency position of India with some satisfaction. We had a good monsoon last year and India's export trade has taken a turn for the better. For internal purposes the metallic reserve of silver seems to be fully ample to maintain the convertibility of the paper currency. In addition to the reserve of silver rupees, there is in the Paper Currency Reserve a sum of £24 millions in gold, and in sterling securities, easily convertible into foreign exchange, a total of £5,800,000 sterling. Over and above and outside these Reserves, we have £40 millions in the Gold Standard Reserve. In spite of the separation between the two Reserves, if we are looking at the resources available for maintaining the rate of exchange of the rupee, the sterling securities in the Paper Currency Reserve and the Gold Standard Reserve all serve the same purpose.

27. The movements of the rupee-sterling exchange during the past year reflect a clear improvement in the position of the rupee. A year ago, in February 1922, the telegraphic transfer rate in Calcutta on London had fallen as low as 1s. 2¹⁵/₁₆d., and it was not till the end of December that it reached 1s. 4d. Since then, after a rather rapid rise to over 1s. 5d., followed by a sharp re-action, it is for the moment fairly steady at between 1s. 4d. and 1s. 4¹/₂d. This improvement in terms of sterling reflects an even greater improvement in terms of gold owing to the rise which has taken place during the year in the value of sterling in terms of gold, and the improvement is reflected also in prices. The Bombay Labour Office figure for Indian wholesale prices for December 1921 was 190. For December 1922 the corresponding figure was 173. There has been a still more striking fall in retail prices of food grains. This fall in Indian prices has been taking place during a period in which there has been an actual rise in dollar prices and sterling prices have remained approximately stationary.

28. I have said that I do not think the time has come for fixing on a new policy in regard to exchange. I do, however, want to make one or two general observations. There is no sanctity in this era of instability about any particular rate of exchange, whether 1s. 4d. or 2s. or anything else; it is simply a question of what rate of exchange best suits India's needs. Ultimately India's payments outside India are, and must be, made in the form of exports of Indian goods and services. But, if we look at the matter from the narrow point of view of the budget, the following statistical data are of interest. The Government of India's sterling debt of £240 millions sterling at 1s. 4d. amounts to 360 crores, at 1s. 5d. it amounts to 339 crores, at 1s. 6d. it amounts to 320 crores while at 2s. it amounts to 240 crores. Of the deficit for 1922-23, 5½ crores would have been saved had exchange been at 1s. 6d. and 9½ crores if it had been at 1s. 8d. Statistics proverbially can be made to prove anything. Nevertheless, these figures are striking and it must be remembered that, apart from the sterling indebtedness of the Government of India, there are large sterling debts owed by municipalities, port trusts, and many other Indian borrowers, who would all be individually benefited by a higher exchange so far as their sterling indebtedness is concerned. Then, again, although since 1920 the tendency of rupee prices to remain relatively more stable than world prices, or rather to follow changes in world prices rather slowly, has to a large extent ceased to operate, it is very doubtful, I think, whether internal prices in India have yet adjusted themselves to a level corresponding to a 1s. 4d. exchange, so that were exchange stabilised now at 1s. 4d., internal prices would have to go up, and certainly there are various kinds of Government expenditure which would have to go up considerably in terms of rupees. Finally, we do not want ever again to find the rupee more valuable as bullion than as currency. That is one side of the picture. There is, of course, another side. An attempt to force up exchange violently would at once cause stringency. Severe stringency in the money market is never desirable for its own sake, is always bad for trade for the time being, and is most inconvenient from the point of view of a government which is engaged on a programme of capital expenditure, involving considerable capital borrowings. Any policy which threatened seriously to restrict India's exports is also to be deprecated, and trade above all desires stability of exchange, perhaps even more than stability of prices. I myself had some part in the International Conference at Genoa last April and May, and the first recommendation of that Conference was that "an essential requisite of the economic reconstruction of Europe is the achievement by each country of stability in the value of its currency." If, therefore, the time has not yet come for an attempt finally to stabilise the currency of India, stability is our goal and we mean to achieve it at the first opportunity.

IV.—BUDGET FOR 1923-24.

Expenditure.

29. While drawing attention to the above recommendation of the Genoa Conference, I am naturally led to quote another of its most important recommendations, which reads:

"In each country, the first step towards re-establishing a gold standard would be the balancing of the annual expenditure of the State without the creation of fresh credit unrepresented by new assets. The balancing of the budget is the first consideration."

What then about the budget for 1923-24? Is it going to be balanced? The Members of the Legislature are not the only people in India who are taking an interest in this question. Only a few days ago, I received the following postcard:

"Sir, kindly let us know by wire at our expense whether the customs duty will be decreased or increased on foreign imported wines and spirits. Awaiting your favourable reply by wire."

30. At the outset of my statement of the figures for 1923-24, I must explain what action the Government of India Retrenchment Committee propose to adopt in order to be able to show the results of the report of the Retrenchment Committee in the budget figures. The first part of the report of the Inchcape Committee came into the hands of the Government little more than a fortnight ago, while the second part of the report reached us only on Saturday last and the third part yesterday. The complete and final report has not yet been signed. It has been a difficult problem to decide how to fit the proposals of the Retrenchment Committee into the budget. A report of this importance obviously requires careful and detailed examination by the Government of India in consultation with the Secretary of State, and the House will naturally desire an opportunity of studying the proposals on their merits. There has not been time, therefore, for final conclusions to be arrived at in regard to a great many of the Committee's recommendations. On the other hand, it was obviously necessary to frame a budget in which allowance would be made for the reductions in expenditure which we all expect to result from the Committee's work. In any circumstances, it would, of course, have been impossible, and it is clearly recognised by the Retrenchment Committee itself that it would be impossible, to obtain the full value of the cuts which are to be made in the first year of operation. Some of the retrenchments proposed can only be introduced gradually so that allowance has to be made for what I may call the "lag", while in many cases allowance has to be made for extra expenditure on what I may call the "terminal charges", i.e., special charges which have to be incurred in closing down establishments and getting rid of the staff. Throughout its report, the Committee's recommendations are given in the form of reductions on the budget figures for 1922-23, which are, of course, quite different from the budget figures for 1923-24 as they appear before allowance is made for special cuts based on the Committee's recommendations. A fair proportion of the total reductions recommended by the Committee are either automatic reductions on the 1922-23 figures or actual retrenchments which we ourselves have been able to effect in the budget for 1923-24 in advance of the receipt of the Committee's recommendations. The activities of the Committee cast their shadow before, and estimates prepared in the atmosphere of economy which they created naturally reflected part of that atmosphere.

31. In the Military budget, we have been able to take credit for the reductions, which, subject to final agreement with the authorities in London, we propose to effect as the outcome of the Retrenchment Committee's recommendations. This we were able to do because we had advance knowledge of the reductions which were going to be proposed, and His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, working in close co-operation with the Retrenchment Committee and with his Colleagues in the Government, had arrived at a general agreement in regard to the total. In the case of the Posts and Telegraphs budget, we have been able to present figures showing the effect for 1923-24 of some though not all of the reductions which we propose to effect in consequence of the recommendations of the Retrenchment Committee. Our preparations could not be so far advanced in regard to the other Civil Departments. It was necessary to prepare, for the purpose of presentation to this House, the estimates for the Demands for Grants before we had sufficient knowledge of the proposals which were going to be made by the Retrenchment Committee. The estimates for the Demands for Grants, which are about to be presented, accordingly show the figures of civil expenditure before allowance is made for

[Sir Basil Blackett.]

38. As regards Income Tax, we shall not again have to make the heavy refunds to which I have already referred; on the other hand, there is fairly certain to be a falling off of revenue in Bombay, while the collection of arrears will also be less; these may be expected to balance each other, and we have entered a revenue of 19 crores, which is roughly the same as we expect to raise this year.

39. I come now to the Railway budget. There is no doubt that as soon as any marked revival in internal trade takes place, Railway earnings ought to show a considerable rise; the autumn harvest has been so good and the promises for the spring crop are so favourable that it is not unreasonable to expect a revival before long. The difficulty is to say how soon this revival will occur. Traffic receipts suffered a check in 1922-23, and on the whole I do not think it is safe to budget on the assumption that there will be a very rapid revival in 1923-24. Our estimate for gross traffic receipts is accordingly put at 95½ crores. It is 3½ crores higher than the revised estimate for 1922-23. Two factors account in the main for this increase of 3½ crores. The first is that in the earlier months of 1922-23 there was a considerable loss of revenue due to the strike on the East Indian Railway and the second is that the present increased rates did not come fully into effect on all Railways until about the 1st of July 1922.

Working expenses and interest and other charges, without allowing for the share attributable to this head of the Inchcape Committee's cuts, amount to nearly the same figure, leaving a net profit for the year of 35 lakhs which compares with the net loss on the current year's budget as now revised of ₹92,60,000.

40. In the case of Posts and Telegraphs, we are able to estimate for a net receipt of 147 lakhs as compared with the net receipt of 24 lakhs in the 1922-23 budget as revised. This improvement is due in part to expected recovery in revenue and in part to reductions in working expenses made in anticipation of, or in consequence of, the recommendations of the Retrenchment Committee.

41. We thus arrive at the following budget position on the basis of existing taxation. As against an expenditure of 2,04.37 crores, we have an expected revenue of 1,98.52 crores, leaving a deficit of 5.85 crores. Before I proceed to explain to the House what we propose to do in regard to this deficit, I must turn for a moment to our ways and means position.

V.—WAYS AND MEANS.
