12. Without exaggerating the objections that can be brought against the project, the Chamber has endeavoured to show that these are material, and that due consideration has apparently not been given to them. The Chamber feels that a very large sum of public money is being risked in a scheme which is certainly not one of urgency, and which can show even the smallest return only if it succeeds in attracting traffic already adequately provided for by the inland steamer companies. It is instructive to note in this connection that the Indian Jute Mills Association, which might have been expected to welcome the possibility of competition with the steamer companies, is strongly opposed to the project and deprecates the expenditure of public money on an undertaking that is, comparatively speaking, so little needed. It is a matter of regret to the Chamber that a fuller opportunity was not given to the public to express their views on the scheme before it received sanction, and they hold very decidedly that all further proceedings in connection with the project should be suspended forthwith, and a public enquiry instituted. At such an inquiry the trading interests represented in the area should be given the fullest opportunity of expressing their views on the scheme, and details should be furnished showing how the various estimates have been arrived at, in particular the estimates of earnings. The Committee hope that they may be informed at an early date that it has been decided to withhold any further action in regard to the scheme until an inquiry such as they have asked for has taken place.

Letter No. 412-P., dated 4th February, 1930, from Mr. J. F. Blackwood, Secretary, Railway Board, to the Secretary, Bengal Chamber of Commerce.

"I am directed to reply to your letter No. 1938/129, dated the 4th June 1929, in which the Committee of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce protest against the construction of the Dacca-Aricha Railway.

2. I am to refer at the outset to the contention of your Committee that the construction of the line cannot be justified, unless it can be shown that it is urgently needed in the interests of the area to be served, and to the view they express that the road and river facilities in this part of the Bengal Presidency are adequate for the public needs. The original project for a railway in this tract was mooted more than 50 years ago, and it has been revived on several occasions since then. For many years past indeed the demand for railway facilities by the inhabitants of the western part of the Dacca district has been strong and persistent. In 1920 the Government of Bengal appointed a committee to make a special investigation into the feasibility of railway construction in that area, and though at the time the Railway Board were not prepared to proceed with the project, it was very speedily revived. In 1924 the Government of Bengal again impressed on the Railway Board the desirability of constructing the Dacca-Aricha Railway, offered to bear the cost of a survey, and asked to be informed of the amount of the guarantee that would be required in case objection was raised to the project on the ground that it would be unremunerative. Since then the Local Government have consistently placed the Dacca-Aricha Railway high in order of importance among the projected railways in the Presidency. It will be evident therefore that neither the Government of Bengal nor the inhabitants of the Dacca district share your Committee's view as to the adequacy of existing road and river communications, and it seems to the Railway Board that the need for a railway to improve the district communications has been established.

3. It is not, however, as a local feeder line only that the Dacca-Aricha Railway must be considered, but also as an essential link in a trunk system of communication. This new aspect of the case was clearly brought out as a result of the inquiry undertaken at the instance of the Government of Bengal after 1924, and this was the principal reason which led the Railway Board to modify their earlier view (formed after considering the report of the Committee which sat in 1921) that it was doubtful whether the construction of a railway could be justified on ordinary commercial grounds. The Dacca-Aricha Railway is closely linked with two other projects, viz., (1) the establishment of a through railway connection between the Eastern Bengal and Assam Bengal Railways by bridging the Megna river at Bhairab, and (2) the opening out of a direct route from the coal-fields to Eastern Bengal and Assam by means of the Sainthia-Halsaling. It is this development, actual and prospective, which has given a new importance to the Dacca-Aricha Railway.

4. I am now to turn to the doubt expressed by your Committee whether the line is likely to be remunerative and whether a fair return on the money to be invested in its construction can be expected. I am to say that the investigations made were such as to satisfy the Railway Board that, if account was taken, not only of the local traffic but of the through traffic which was likely to develop in the future, there were good grounds for believing that the line would more than pay its way. In reaching this conclusion they were influenced by the remarkable growth of traffic of the railways operating in Eastern Bengal and Assam, a growth which must be ascribed in part to the substantial additions which have been made to these railways in recent years. During the period from 1922-23 to 1928-29, the earnings of these railways have increased by about 44 per cent., and there can be little doubt that, with further extensions in contemplation when money can be found for them, the traffic will continue to grow. It is not proposed to discuss the estimate of earnings in any detail at this stage, but since your Committee evidently attach some importance to the point, I am to explain that the traffic estimate of the new line assumes that only a small proportion of the jute traffic will be transferred from the inland steam vessels to the railway.

5. The Railway Board, as a result of all the investigations made, came clearly to the conclusion that the Dacca-Aricha Railway would meet a real local need, that it was an eventual link in a trunk system of communication, and that the project was likely to be remunerative. It was on this basis that the construction of the line was sanctioned. A consideration of the arguments advanced in your letter has not led the Railway Board to modify their views, and the Government of Bengal, to whom a copy of your letter was forwarded, have stated that their support of the project is not affected by the representation of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. In the ordinary course, therefore, the construction of the line would have proceeded. But, owing to financial circumstances, it is impossible to allot funds in 1930-31 for the commencement of the actual work of construction, and opportunity has thus presented itself to make sure—and, as your Committee suggest, in a project of such magnitude this was in any case desirable—that the construction and traffic estimates are as accurate as they can be made. The detailed estimates of the work are at present under preparation and the only expenditure to be incurred in 1929-30 and 1930-31 is in connection with the final location and the acquisition of land. The Agent of the Eastern Bengal Railway has been instructed that, in preparing the detailed estimates, no pains must be spared in ascertaining the probable cost of the line, and he has also been asked to review carefully the traffic estimate, including the jute and coal traffic, about which your Committee are specially concerned. His special attention has been directed to the difficulties your Committee anticipate in the working of the Padma wagon ferry, and the doubts they express regarding the bridge over the Dhaleshwari River. I am, however, to add that the information at the disposal of the Railway Board as regards the working of other wagon ferries does not lead them to endorse the views of your Committee on the former point.

6. Another matter to which your Committee have referred is the effect which the construction of the line may have on river conservancy and the public health. Both these matters closely concern the Government of Bengal, and the Government of India cannot doubt that they were taken into account by that Government before they gave their support to the project. Both of them, however, will be examined again while the detailed estimate is under preparation, by the Agent of the Eastern Bengal Railway, who has been directed to work in the closest consultation with the Government of Bengal and their expert advisers. The actual construction of the line will not be commenced until the Railway Board have received and considered fully the report of the Agent on the detailed estimate.

7. Finally, I am to refer to the suggestion of your Committee that the facilities on the Eastern Bengal Railway may not be adequate for dealing with the increased traffic which the new line is likely to bring into Calcutta. I am to say, for the information of your Committee, that the programme of development of the Eastern Bengal Railway makes provision for handling the increased traffic which may arise not only from the construction of the Dacca-Aricha Railway, but also from other new lines, also under construction or projected.

8. In view of the public interest which is taken in this matter, the Government of India propose to publish this letter."

RAILWAY BUDGET FOR 1930-31.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): It is my duty today to present to the House the Railway Budget for the year 1930-31. No change of importance has been made in the form of the statements submitted, and I do not think it is necessary that I should refer to certain minor alterations, especially as they are rather technical in character. The Railway Board's Memorandum contains detailed explanations of the various figures, and in what I say I shall attempt to survey the position on somewhat broader lines. The main burden of the preparation of the Budget has, of course, fallen on the Financial Commissioner, as usual, and I should like to take this opportunity to thank him, the Chief Commissioner and the Members of the Railway Board for the assistance which they have given. While Mr. Parsons was on leave in summer, the post of Financial Commissioner was held by Mr. Rau, and I know the House will pardon me if I acknowledge in a word the competence and energy displayed by the first Indian who has held the office of Financial Commissioner. (Applause.) I should like also to pay my tribute to the Standing Finance Committee who have, as we are accustomed to expect, never failed throughout the year to render valuable assistance in the control of railway finance.

2. May I express the hope that, as in previous years, Honourable Members who give notices of motions for reductions in the Demands will indicate briefly in their notices the questions they wish to raise? It must obviously lighten the task of the Government Members, if they know in advance on what points they will be expected to reply.

[Sir George Rainy.]

Financial results of 1928-29.

3. When I presented the current year's Budget to the House, we expected that the surplus for the year 1928-29 on all lines would be nearly Rs. 9 crores. Both receipts and expenditure fell short of the estimate, but the shortage on the receipt side was the more serious, and the year closed with a net gain from the Railways of less than Rs. 8 crores. The result was that we were able to add Rs. 2½ crores to the reserve after paying the fixed contribution.

Revised estimates for 1929-30.

4. The falling off in traffic receipts in February and March 1929, was unfortunately symptomatic of what was to come, and the financial results of the current year can only be described as disappointing. We budgeted for a total revenue of about 1,06½ crores and a total expenditure of 95½ crores, and had this result been achieved, we should have closed the year with a surplus of Rs. 11¼ crores on the commercial lines. We now expect that the actuals will be more than Rs. 4 crores worse than the estimate so that the final surplus is likely to be little more than Rs. 7 crores. There has been a serious decline in the loadings of grain and pulses; oilseeds did well in the first half of the year and badly in the second, and with two exceptions all classes of traffic have been lower than in the previous year. The two exceptions are cotton and coal. The increase in the cotton traffic appears to be due not to a larger crop, but to the fact that it has moved unusually early, and we must expect a decline in the coming months. The increased traffic in coal, on the other hand, is, I am glad to say, the visible sign of improved conditions in the coal industry and the lifting of the depression which has so long overshadowed it. The increase in the number of coal wagons loaded up to date is 5 per cent. or if the coal carried by the East Indian and Bengal Nagpur Railways is included, 6 per cent. Conditions are now totally different from those prevailing three or four years ago. The large stocks which had accumulated at the coalfields have disappeared, and since May last the railways have been moving the coal as fast as it could be raised to meet an insistent public demand. An important feature of the improved trade conditions is the recovery of India's export trade in coal, and this recovery is unquestionably due in large measure to the admirable work of the Coal Grading Board, of which the Railway Board's Chief Mining Engineer is the Chairman. In November and December last, owing to an abundant rice harvest, there was a serious shortage of labour in the coalfields, and the pressure on supplies became acute. Indeed the maintenance of adequate stocks of coal on the railways became difficult, and had it not been for the existence of the State Railway collieries, it would have been necessary to take steps which might have endangered the export trade. Firms with contracts to supply coal to the railways found themselves unable to supply both the railways and the export market, and as the railways clearly could not be allowed to go short, it would have been necessary to insist on supplies in accordance with the contracts. Actually we were able to avoid any action of that kind by increasing the output of the railway collieries.

5. I do not propose to analyse in detail the causes to which the reduction in earnings should be ascribed. The heavy falling off in grain traffic is clearly due to the unsatisfactory harvests of recent years in Northern India, but under other heads it is not so much that traffic has fallen off heavily as that it has failed to expand to the extent we hoped. India, like other countries, is passing through a period of trade depression due to falling prices, when buyers naturally adopt a cautious policy and goods move slowly. Conditions such as these must inevitably be reflected in the railway traffic returns, and the falling off in traffic might easily have been worse than it is. It must not be forgotten that the reductions in rates and fares made in the last five years were estimated to involve a loss of revenue exceeding Rs. 5 crores in a full year, a loss which we hoped to make good from the expansion of traffic. For the present our hopes have not been realised, for when traffic is inelastic, reductions in rates and fares must inevitably bring down receipts. But there is no ground for despondency, and I do not doubt that when trade conditions improve, our expectations will prove to have been well founded. Our reduced rates for long distance coal announced last year have certainly acted as a stimulus to the coal trade and the lower fares for third class passengers have been accompanied by a growth in traffic. The passenger mile figure has gone up by 5½ per cent. and the passenger earnings this year are likely to exceed those of the previous year by about two-thirds of a crore.

6. On the expenditure side, we budgeted for total working expenses of Rs. 64½ crores, but actually they are likely to be 2¼ crores of rupees higher. Detailed explanations have been given under the various heads in the Railway Board's Memorandum, and I will not attempt to do more than notice the salient points. As the mileage of the Indian Railways increases—and we expect to open 600 miles of line this year—expenses inevitably go up, for the new lines have to be staffed and more train miles are run. Again, we have begun to spend money on the improvement of service conditions of our lower paid staff, and I shall have more to say on this subject at a later stage. Flood damages have been unusually severe and have helped to swell our repairs and maintenance bill. The stocks of coal on the railways had fallen to a low level in March last, and the raising of them to an adequate figure has increased the expenditure on fuel. Finally, the taking over of the Southern Punjab line from the 1st of January means an apparent increase in working expenses of about a quarter of a crore. I say an apparent increase, for the expenditure on that line was formerly recovered from the Company and the recoveries shown as a 'deduct' entry under working expenses, while from now onwards there will be no recoveries and both receipts and expenses will be increased proportionately.

7. I have mentioned the principal factors which have tended to raise our working expenses, but during the last two years the growth of expenditure has been rapid, and I recognise the obligation resting on those who administer the railways to take all possible measures to keep down expenses and enforce economy in every branch of the administration. This is necessary at all times, but when trade is poor and revenue is inelastic, there is particular need to apply to every proposal, which means higher working expenses, the test whether it ought to be put in force at once, or whether it can be postponed with advantage. It may be, for example, that a workshop could undertake a larger programme of repairs, and that, if it did so, it might in some respects be advantageous to the railway to put the work through quicker, but it may be wholly inadvisable to assent to such a scheme during a year when railway receipts show a downwards tendency. I am far from advocating that false species of economy which postpones necessary expenditure only to be faced by higher costs at a later date. But in present circumstances I feel that working expenses must be watched with a specially vigilant eye, and the Railway Board some months ago drew the attention of Agents to the matter and impressed on them the importance of keeping the financial aspect constantly in mind. Their attention will again be directed to the matter when they meet at Delhi in March. The repair of rolling stock is a branch of railway work in which much may be done to reduce expenditure by constant care and attention, and I am glad to be able to inform the House that both the average cost of standard repairs and the period during which an engine, wagon or carriage is detained in the shops continues to fall. In this region the results achieved by the East Indian Railway are particularly good and deserve special notice.

8. On the expenditure other than working expenses I need not dwell. As compared with 1928-29, interest and depreciation charges are up by Rs. 1,09 lakhs and Rs. 58 lakhs respectively, and the expenditure under surplus profits paid to Indian States and Railway Companies has been swollen by an unexpected throw forward into the current year of the surplus profits payable to the Burma Railways Company for the last nine months of 1928. On the basis of the revised estimates, we expect that at the close of the current year the figures will stand as follow. The total receipts from commercial lines we put at nearly Rs. 1,05 crores, which is Rs. $1\frac{1}{4}$ crores above the receipts for last year. The expenditure is estimated to be nearly Rs. 98 crores—an increase of Rs. $3\frac{3}{4}$ crores. The net gain from the commercial lines will then be Rs. 7 crores, out of which the loss on the strategic railways amounting to Rs. 1,81 lakhs has to be met. The balance of Rs. 5,26 lakhs is insufficient to meet the contribution of Rs. 6,12 lakhs to General Revenues, and we shall have to draw on our reserves to the extent of Rs. 86 lakhs.

Budget estimates for 1930-31.

9. The Budget figures for the coming year do not disclose any startling differences from the revised estimates. Our total receipts will, we estimate, amount to nearly Rs. 1,08 crores, a figure which is nearly Rs. 3 crores more than the revised estimates for the current year. The total expenditure we put at nearly Rs. 1,00 crores, an increase of slightly over Rs. 2 crores on the revised estimates. The final result is a net gain to the Railways of nearly Rs. 8 crores, which is about three-quarters of a crore better than the revised estimates of the current year. Out of the surplus, we shall have to meet the net loss on the strategic railways amounting to Rs. 1,80 lakhs and the contribution to general revenues amounting to Rs. 5,74 lakhs. Only a small balance of Rs. 34 lakhs will then remain to be added to the Reserve Fund.

10. One important change, which affects the figures both of receipts and expenditure, deserves special mention, I mean the purchase of the Southern Punjab Railway. Had we not taken advantage of the opportunity to purchase this year, our receipts in 1930-31 would be lower by about Rs. 1,44 lakhs and our working expenses by about Rs. 88 lakhs. It will be seen therefore, that our net receipts will be 56 lakhs higher owing to the completion of the purchase; and, since our charges for interest on the purchase price are only 37 lakhs, we make a clear profit of 19 lakhs from the transaction. I have thought it worth while to mention the matter in order to make it clear that though the purchase of the line in the current year has meant a heavy drain on our capital resources, it is in itself a most profitable transaction resulting in a substantial increase in our railway revenues.

11. If we eliminate the increase in our traffic receipts ascribable to the purchase of the Southern Punjab Railway (making due allowance for the fact that the purchase affected also the last three months of 1929-30), it will be found that we are budgeting for an increase in gross traffic receipts of only about 2 crores. This, I think, is a reasonable estimate, for while we may fairly hope for a normal year, we are unfortunately not justified at present in anticipating any marked improvement in trade conditions. On the expenditure side, we anticipate an increase of Rs. 1 crore in the charge for interest and two-thirds of a crore under depreciation. Both these charges of course follow automatically from the increase in the capital at charge. For the rest, we expect an increase of three-quarters of a crore under working expenses (excluding depreciation). But here I must remind the House that not only revenue, but expenditure also is increased by the purchase of the Southern Punjab Railway, and if that factor is eliminated, the increase is only a quarter of a crore. That increase I can most conveniently discuss at a later stage. For the moment I will only say that, while we expect fairly substantial increases under Administration and Operation, we believe that these will to some extent be counter-balanced by a reduction under Repairs and Maintenance.

Capital Expenditure.

12. I turn now to the Capital Programme. We expected to spend during the current year Rs. $26\frac{1}{2}$ crores on works the cost of which is debitable to capital, and we now estimate that the actual expenditure will be a little more than Rs. 24 crores. Next year the capital expenditure is placed at Rs. $16\frac{1}{2}$ crores. These figures show clearly how greatly the position has changed since 1927, when it still seemed possible that funds would be forthcoming to meet all reasonable requirements for railway development. It has now become evident that the most drastic reduction in the capital programme is inevitable, and that in present circumstances there is nothing for it but to cut our coat according to our cloth. I need hardly say how deeply the Railway Board, and I personally, regret that it should be necessary to call a halt and to postpone the initiation of new projects urgently required to meet the need for improved traffic facilities, knowing as we do how great that need is. But financial exigencies have made retrenchment imperative.

13. How the Railway Board propose to deal with the situation is best explained in their own words, and I make no apology for quoting what is said in paragraph 25 of the Railway Board's Memorandum:

"It has become apparent that owing to existing conditions, not only in India but outside India as well, we are unlikely to obtain funds for capital expenditure on railways in the near future except at rates of interest substantially higher than those at which they have been procurable in the last three or four years. A rise in the rate of interest not only makes some projects either for extensions to the railway system or for improvements to the existing system unremunerative; it also makes it necessary to consider whether it is not wiser to postpone the inception of other projects which, even with a higher rate of borrowing, may still be remunerative, rather than to burden the railways of India with a large volume of indebtedness for money raised at a period of high interest rates. Consequently we have this year, and propose next year, to concentrate almost entirely on pushing schemes already in hand through to completion, so that we may obtain an early return on the money spent on them, and have avoided adding to our commitments at a time when the future is so uncertain by undertaking new schemes."

The Railway Board in the words quoted accurately express the policy laid down by the Government of India, but in one respect I am in a position to supplement what they say. When the scale of development expenditure is for any reason subjected to sudden and drastic curtailment, the danger always is that works in progress may have to be abandoned or postponed for an indefinite period when they are half way to completion, and if that happens, the inevitable consequence is that the money already spent is largely wasted because it cannot come to fruition until long after the due date. I am glad to be able to say that this result will not occur on the Indian railways to-day. In order to bring about the necessary reduction in capital expenditure, it has not been necessary to bring to a standstill important works in progress, and it has sufficed to refrain from the commencement of new projects which would have involved the railways in heavy commitments for future years. That this danger should have been averted is a satisfactory element in a difficult situation, and much credit is due to the Railway Board, and in particular to the Financial Commissioner, Mr. Parsons. But for the fact that, during the last four or five years, constant attention has been given to restricting the magnitude of our future commitments, it would have been impossible to avoid very serious dislocation in our plans.

14. Compulsory abstention from the initiation of new projects provides an opportunity for taking stock of the railway construction programme as a whole and for laying down the broad lines of policy which for the next three or four years we ought to try to follow. It is intended to take full advantage of this opportunity and to consider deliberately the best use which can be made of such funds as are likely to be available during that period. It is in connection with the Capital programme that the operations of the Railway Department chiefly affect the general finances of the Government of India, and in any review of policy the Finance Department must take its full share. The Government of India have decided that, in order that the position may be kept under control and that the best use may be made of all sums available for capital expenditure, the general questions of railway policy in their financial aspect should be brought under review at half-yearly intervals by the Finance and Railway Members of the Government in consultation—once at the beginning of the Simla season and once at the time of the Agents' Conference in the autumn. I believe that very real advantages will result from this new arrangement and I am sure it will go far to relieve any anxiety felt by Members of this House that the Railway Department is a law unto itself and not amenable to salutary financial control. I ought perhaps to add that, while probably it will be matters connected with the capital programme which will most frequently come under review, that does not by any means exclude from consideration all proposed expenditure on the revenue side which is likely to affect substantially the financial results of the railways.

15. In a year like the present when we are rigidly restricting our capital expenditure, it is natural that there should not be much to say as regards particular projects. Of the works now in progress I need only mention the electrification of the ghat sections of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway and of the suburban railways at Madras, the new Perambur workshops of the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway, and the further prosecution of the Raipur Vizianagram Railway, which will ultimately provide the Central Provinces with a new outlet to the sea at Vizagapatam. The only new work of any magnitude which it is proposed to initiate is the doubling of the East Indian Railway line between Cawnpore and Tundla, which has become a matter of some urgency. A sum of Rs. 20 lakhs has been provided in the next year's Budget for doubling the most congested section between Shikohabad and Tundla. Of the works which we should like to have commenced but are unable to do so, I might perhaps mention the Dacca-Aricha Railway in Eastern Bengal (Shame) and the branch lines intended to serve the cotton growing tracts north and south of Akola in Berar.

16. Having dealt with the Capital programme, I have in one sense completed my review of the railway finances for the year, but there are one or two matters about which I have hitherto said little or nothing, and to these I must refer before I close. One of them may be dismissed briefly in a sentence or two. In two successive years I was so fortunate as to be able to announce, at the time of the presentation of the Budget, substantial reductions in railway rates and fares. From the figures already given it must have been evident to Members of this House that on this occasion I shall not be able to make any similar announcement. At a time when we are compelled to draw upon the Reserve Fund in order to pay our contribution to General Revenues, it is obvious that we cannot contemplate any further reduction in rates and fares. Our first duty is to ensure the solvency of the railways and reductions which we should like to make in order to facilitate the movement of traffic must await the coming of better times. But apart from that, at the present juncture there is a prior claim upon such surpluses and this brings me to the second subject to which I wish to allude.

17. When I presented the Railway Budget last year, I promised that we would set on foot a systematic examination of the service conditions of our lower paid employees in order to ascertain what were the measures most urgently called for in order to bring about an improvement, and I mentioned, amongst matters which required to be examined, not only the rates of pay and wages but also reductions of working hours, the extension of provident fund benefits to classes who do not at present enjoy them, and improvement in housing conditions and so on. In order to make this examination possible, the Assembly agreed, on the recommendation of the Government of India, to the creation of a new appointment of Member of the Railway Board who would be specially charged with responsibility for all matters connected with the welfare of the enormous staff employed by the railways of India. It is right that I should attempt, however imperfectly, to convey to the House what has been done in order to carry out that promise.

18. Mr. Hayman assumed charge of his duties at the beginning of April last, and since then he must have been, I suppose, the busiest man at the headquarters of the Government of India. His work may be said to have fallen under five principal heads relating to :

- (1) improvement in the service conditions of the staff generally, and in particular of the lowest paid employees ;
- (2) the Indianisation of the railway services and the elimination of racial discrimination ;
- (3) the revision of the cadres of the superior services and of the methods of recruitment ;
- (4) the relations of the railway management with the organisations of workmen, and
- (5) the preparation of material, so far as the railways of India are concerned, for the Royal Commission on Labour.

[Sir George Rainy.]

It would take me much too long to attempt to enumerate in detail all the matters which have come up for review under the various heads. That would require a speech to itself, and some of the subjects can only be briefly referred to.

19. Under the head of Indianisation, I should like to mention the special efforts which have been made to bring the Transportation (Power) and the Mechanical Engineering Branches into line with the Civil Engineering and Transportation (Traffic) and Commercial Branches in the matter of Indianisation. A scheme for the training of apprentices has been in force since 1926, but the period of training being six years, it could not provide fully qualified officers until the end of 1932. In order to accelerate progress in this direction, when it became necessary to fill eight vacancies in the Transportation (Power) and Mechanical Engineering branches, it was decided to invite applications both in India and in the United Kingdom specifying the qualifications which represented the minimum which could be considered, in the hope that Indian candidates might be forthcoming who would be likely to develop into efficient officers. The age limit was also relaxed, so that the field of selection might not be limited. The result has been that four Indians have been appointed to the Transportation (Power) Department and three to the Mechanical Engineering Department. Although there were only two vacancies in the latter branch, a third Indian has been appointed as a special probationer in anticipation of the occurrence of a vacancy. It is proposed to continue similar arrangements until 1933 when the scheme for the training of apprentices will bear fruit and provide the requisite number of Indians for these Departments.

20. Under this head I must also refer to the elimination of racial discrimination, but I can only do so briefly. The whole question has been systematically considered and we have now reached a stage when the material has been digested and consultation with the Central Advisory Council is likely to be both helpful and fruitful.

21. I must now turn to the most important head of all, namely, the improvement of the service conditions of the lowest paid railway servants, and here there are several questions which demand more detailed notice. In May last, I received a deputation of the All-India Railwaymen's Federation when a number of important subjects were fully and frankly discussed and our examination of service conditions has proceeded largely on the basis of the representations then made. First, I may mention the matter in which we have been able to make the most rapid progress, I mean what is sometimes called security of tenure and which arises out of the complaints of alleged wrongful dismissal or discharge from railway service. This was a matter to which the Federation attached great importance, and a new set of rules has been issued which it is believed will go far to meet the complaints made on this subject. I cannot enter into details now, but copies of the rules have been placed in the Library, and it is my intention also that copies should be supplied to all members of the Central Advisory Council.

22. Next comes the revision of the leave rules. That is a question which has been under consideration since 1924, but it proved impossible, owing to the defective organisation of the Railway Board, to bring the matter to a head until the new Member was appointed. The rules hitherto in force have been defective in two vital particulars. In the first place, the rules applicable to staff taken over with the East Indian, Great Indian Peninsula and Burma Railways when they were acquired by the State were manifestly open to the charge of racial discrimination, and, in the second place, the existing rules in force on the old State Railways are liberal enough in theory but operated in practice to the prejudice of employees in inferior service, owing to the condition that the grant of leave must impose no extra cost on the State. The new leave rules have now been settled and are on the eve of publication.

All new recruits will come under the new rules and those at present in service will be given the option of electing to be brought under them. These rules eliminate the objectionable features involving racial considerations of the existing leave rules on the East Indian, Great Indian Peninsula and Burma Railways.

So far as the inferior servants are concerned, the no extra cost condition is abandoned and the effect will be that a number of daily-rated employees, particularly in the workshops, will be admitted to privileges which they had not previously enjoyed. I may add that instructions will be issued to Agents that where necessary in order to enable inferior servants and other subordinate staff to take the leave admissible under the new rules, additional staff must be recruited in order to form a leave reserve. Here again as soon as the new rules are issued, I shall be glad to place copies in the Library and to furnish copies to members of the Central Advisory Council.

23. Next I would refer to the question of hours of employment and periods of rest, and here my reference must be brief, for the Bill which is intended to secure the application to railway servants in India of the 60 hour week and the weekly rest day provided for in the Washington and Geneva Conventions will come before the Assembly at an early date. Before the details of the scheme could be worked out, an immense amount of spade work has been necessary, the whole burden of which has fallen upon the Labour Member of the Board. The recurring expenditure which the scheme will involve will certainly be not less than Rs. 50 lakhs per annum and may amount to as much as Rs. 60 lakhs. It also necessitates the expenditure of something like Rs. 50 lakhs on the capital side, in order to provide quarters for the additional staff.

24. There are other matters which have come under review under these heads such as improvement in the service conditions of workshop employees, the acceleration of the payment of monthly wages, and welfare subjects such as education, co-operative credit societies and the staff benefit fund, but the only one upon which I can attempt to enlarge is the revision of the wages of the lower paid staff. This is obviously a question of great importance, but if unnecessary expenditure is to be avoided it also requires the closest and most systematic examination. Mr. Hayman, rightly I think, commenced his investigation on the Calcutta railways, and the principal question which he discussed with the Agents was the wage which should be paid to the lowest unskilled class of labour comprising gangmen, porters, bhistis, watermen, sweepers, etc. After the discussions with the Agents, a detailed scheme was prepared in the first instance for the Eastern Bengal Railway, and in broad outline this has now been approved by the Railway Board, though certain details have still to be worked out. It has taken time to settle, because it was all important in the first case which came under consideration, to lay down the general principles which ought to regulate such matters, for if schemes are adopted without sufficient consideration, there is a very real danger that public money may be wasted. Now that the first scheme has been passed and the general principles laid down, progress should be much more rapid upon other railways.

25. I have attempted, very imperfectly I fear, to give the Assembly some idea of the magnitude and complexity of the problems with which the Labour Member of the Railway Board has had to deal. I wish it had been possible, before the discussion of the Railway Budget, to lay on the table of the House a memorandum giving a full account of all that has been done. It is my intention in any case to submit such a memorandum for the information of the Central Advisory Council, but it was impossible to get it into shape before the presentation of the Railway Budget, since the inevitable result must have been to delay progress in the schemes under consideration, and that had to be avoided at all costs. In winding up this part of my speech, I will only say this, that it is open to any Member of the Legislature to blame the Government of India because these matters were not taken in hand in earnest at an earlier date, and if that charge were made, I should not be too much concerned to reply to it. But if the accusation be that since the new Member of the Railway Board was appointed to deal with all the staff questions there has been any avoidable delay in subjecting them to a scrutiny at once sympathetic and systematic and taking all possible steps to bring about the earliest possible solution, then I would only say that that charge is without foundation and could only be made by those who are unacquainted with the facts. During the last eleven months Mr. Hayman has thrown himself whole-heartedly into the discharge of the important duties which have fallen to his lot. He has given his whole energies unsparingly to their successful accomplishment. I should like to take this opportunity of making clearly known the high value which the Government of India place on the services he has rendered.

26. I turn now to the question of the expenditure involved in giving effect to the various schemes of improvement. In the first place, there is the cost of the additional staff required in order to secure compliance with the Washington and Geneva Conventions and the capital cost of the quarters for that staff. In the second place, there are the schemes for the revision of pay of the lowest paid employees of the railways which must obviously involve extra expenditure, and in the third place, there is the extra staff which will be needed if the new leave rules are to effect a real as distinct from a nominal improvement in service conditions. Very naturally and properly Members of the Assembly may ask what provision has been made in the Budget to cover this expenditure. It will be seen from the Railway Board's Explanatory Memorandum that of a provision of Rs. 28 lakhs under Revenue in the current year's Budget it is not expected that much more than Rs. 18 lakhs will be spent before the 31st of March next and in the Budget for the next year there is provision for Rs. 25 lakhs in all under Revenue and a similar sum under Capital for the construction of quarters. Are these sufficient, it may be asked, to meet the expenditure likely to be incurred?

27. I may say at once that quite possibly these sums will prove to be insufficient, and I should like to explain to the House the reasons why Government have not included in the estimates a larger provision. One reason is that at the present stage of our inquiries it is not possible to estimate with any accuracy the magnitude of the sums involved. Take for example, the introduction of the new leave rules and the recruitment of additional staff to provide the leave reserve. These rules will apply automatically only to new recruits, and officers already in service will not come under them, unless they elect to do so. We do not know what number of officers may choose the new rules, nor can we tell whether in all cases recruitment of additional staff will be necessary. If, for example, in a workshop the existing staff is redundant having regard to the volume of work to be done, it may be quite possible to introduce the new rules without any increase in expenditure. In the second place, experience has almost invariably shown that when new schemes are being introduced the money is never spent so fast as was originally anticipated, and allowance must be made for that factor. Finally, I must mention the need for economy in the working expenses of the railways to which I alluded at an earlier part in my speech. It would have been quite possible to make larger provisions in the Budget and thereby swell the total working expenses, but this we did not consider advisable. I am anxious to make plain to the Railway Administrations the importance which Government attach to keeping revenue expenditure within bounds. I am inclined to think that an effective means of securing this is to keep the estimate of working expenses on the low side. One point, however, I desire to make clear. If and when we are satisfied that the introduction of well-considered schemes involving expenditure are necessary in order to secure the welfare and contentment of our staff, and if we find that the cost of these schemes cannot be met without raising our working expenses to a higher figure than is set down in the Budget, we shall not hesitate to place supplementary estimates before the Assembly and ask the House to sanction the additional expenditure. I am anxious to make this clear, because when our review of service conditions discloses the fact that there are legitimate grievances, then it is the desire of the Government of India and of the Railway Board that they should be redressed with as little delay as possible.

28. I will not apologise, Mr. President, for dwelling at some length on these matters which so deeply concern the interests of the great body of railway servants in India. It is impossible for me, however, to dilate upon them longer to-day. I desire only, before bringing my speech to a conclusion, to thank the House for the patience with which they have heard me, and if I may, to acknowledge the friendliness and courtesy with which the Members of this House have always listened to what I could tell them about the affairs of our railways.

PANEL OF CHAIRMEN.

Mr. President: Order, order: Under rule 3 of the rules for the conduct of business of this House, I nominate Pandit Malaviya, Mr. M. A. Jinnah, Sir Darcy Lindsay and Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan on the panel of Chairmen for the ensuing Sessions.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Tuesday, the 18th February, 1930.

[Sir George Schuster.]

I had already decided that these objections raised to the earlier proposal were reasonable, and I thought it was reasonable to allow as a business expense all payments of bonus or commission, whether contractual or otherwise, provided that they satisfied certain conditions, that is to say, provided that the person remunerated was really an employee, and that the bonus or commission was really paid for services rendered and was of a reasonable amount, both with reference to pay of the employee, the conditions of his employment and the profits of the business of the year in question, and having regard to the general practice in similar businesses. We proposed to give effect to this by means of a notification under section 60 of the Indian Income-tax Act, but the Legislative Department held that such a notification would not fall within the scope of the section and that the exemption could only be granted by legislation. It is therefore proposed to secure the object in view by amending section 10 of the Indian Income-tax Act by an appropriate addition relating to the expenditure in question and embodying the safeguards which I have mentioned. Sir, I move.

(Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya rose in his place.)

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member wish to oppose? This is only the introduction stage.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya (Madras: Indian Commerce): I wish to obtain some information.

Mr. President: There are other stages to the Bill when the Honourable Member will have full opportunity.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

THE INSOLVENCY LAW (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter (Law Member): Sir, I move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the law relating to insolvency for certain purposes. I shall shortly state the purposes of the Bill. They are three. First, we are providing for the appointment of Deputy Official Assignees in the High Courts in view of increased work, particularly in Calcutta and Bombay. Secondly, we are proposing to empower the High Courts to stay or annul insolvency proceedings in subordinate courts. This power wanted by the Calcutta High Court and all the other High Courts support the claim. The third purpose is the settlement of a conflict as to the terminus a quo for the calculation of the period of two years in case of avoidance of voluntary transfers. The better opinion is that the terminus a quo should be the date of the presentation of the petition and not the date of the order of adjudication. We are proposing to give effect to that opinion. These are the purposes of the Bill. Sir, I move.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

THE INDIAN TARIFF (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I move that the Bill further to amend the Indian Tariff Act, 1894, for certain purposes, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Law Member, Mr. K. C. Neogy, Mr. B. Das, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim, Mr. W. Alexander, Mr. H. P. Mody, Mr. G. W. Chambers and the Mover, with instructions to report on or before the 27th February, 1930, and that the number of members whose presence shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Committee shall be four.

Sir, I explained when I introduced this Bill that it dealt with a number of comparatively minor changes in the tariff schedule. One of these changes, which I singled out for special notice on that occasion, was the proposal to remove the duty on barks for tanning. That is a proposal which is of some importance and it gives effect to the expressed desire of the tanning industry which has been pressed upon Government on more than one occasion. For the rest, it is hardly possible to attempt at this stage to give an account of the various changes which are proposed, because some of them at any rate are so minute or so technical that they hardly admit of detailed exposition in a speech. I might however mention three or four of the proposals covered by this Bill. One of them relates to the duty on saccharine. Our attention was drawn to the fact that it might be possible to evade the duty on saccharine by importing substances from which saccharine could be made with comparative ease after importation into India, and we have taken the opportunity to make these substances subject to the higher rate of duty. In doing so, we are following the practice which has already been introduced in the United Kingdom.

There are also two or three proposals in the Bill to remove the duty from agricultural appliances and dairy and poultry farming appliances. These merely give effect to what has for long been the established policy of the Government of India as regards such matters.

Finally, I would refer to the proposal to make all domestic refrigerators subject to the 15 per cent. duty. As the law stands at present, some domestic refrigerators pay duty and some are exempt from duty, because they come under the definition of machinery. Now, the object of allowing the free importation of machinery into India was to encourage the importation of articles representing fixed capital employed in production industries. Quite clearly, domestic refrigerators do not fall within that class, and, since some of them already have to pay duty, it was thought reasonable and equitable that all should be subjected to the same rate of duty.

I do not think that I need enlarge further upon the provisions of this Bill, but naturally all the specific proposals made in it will be subjected to close examination by the Select Committee.

Sir, I move.

The motion was adopted.

THE STEEL INDUSTRY (PROTECTION) BILL.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I move that the Bill to amend the law relating to the fostering and development of the steel industry in British India, for certain purposes, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Law Member, Mr. K. C. Neogy, Mr. B. Das, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim, Mr. H. P. Mody, Mr. W. Alexander, Mr. G. W. Chambers and the Mover with instructions to report on or before the 27th February 1930, and that the number of members whose presence shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Committee shall be four.

[Sir George Rainy.]

As I explained, when I introduced the Bill, it is intended to put right two defects which have come to notice in the law relating to the protection of the steel industry in British India. In the first place, there is the question of tie-bars. The function of the tie-bar in every case is to maintain the distance between the two rails on a railway line. It is for that purpose that it exists. The commonest case is when cast-iron sleepers are used. These consist of two pots or plates on which the rail rests and these two pots or plates are connected by a steel tie-bar. Again, wherever there are points on the railway, where trains can be moved from one line to the other, there is a moveable rail which is known as a "switch" and these switches are invariably connected together in pans by steel tie-bars. Finally, it is not a regular thing but it happens occasionally, where there are stiff curves to be negotiated, the rails themselves are directly connected up by tie-bars, so that they may be kept in alignment. Now, the intention of the Legislature—I do not think there is any doubt about that—when the Act of 1927 was passed was that all these tie-bars should be subject to the protective duty. That was so under the Act of 1924, and it is quite clear from the Report of the Tariff Board that they did not intend to propose any change in that respect. Unfortunately, as the entry in the Schedule was actually worded in the Act of 1927, full effect was not given to that intention, and it has been held by the revenue authorities that, whereas the tie-bars which connect up a pair of switches or a pair of rails directly are subject to the duty, tie-bars which connect up the two plates of a cast-iron sleeper are not subject to the duty. It seems to the Government of India necessary that that mistake should be corrected and therefore provision is made accordingly in the Bill.

The second question is the duty on steel bars. As the law now stands, round bars less than half an inch in diameter and square bars the side of which is less than half an inch are exempt from the protective duty. This decision was deliberately taken on the ground that the half inch bar was the smallest size of a bar made in India, and that it would serve no purpose to impose a protective duty on the classes of materials which were not made in India and where consequently there was nothing to protect. Now, in October last, the Tata Iron and Steel Company approached the Government of India on this question. What they said was this that, whereas the next standard size below half an inch was 7/16ths of an inch, it had come to notice that during the last two years there had been substantial and increasing imports of bars which were described as 15/32nds of an inch or 31/64ths of an inch. They explained that these bars could be used for the same purposes as the half inch bars which they made and that owing to the fact that the imported bars of these intermediate sizes were not subject to the protective duty, they were finding it very difficult to sell their half inch bars. Before that, the attention of Government had already been drawn to the matter by the Collector of Customs at Karachi, and for some time past continuous records had been maintained of the importation of these particular sizes. I find that, whereas in July and August, 1928, the imports of these sizes in all the ports came to something less than 400 tons a month, in November and December, 1928, and January, 1929, we got over 1,000 tons a month and in August and September of last year the imports amounted to over 2,000 tons a month. It became evident that here was a loophole in the law through which steel bars, which definitely competed with the Indian product, were entering India at the ordinary revenue duty of 10 per cent. and not subject to the protective duty. Naturally, the merchants were perfectly entitled—no one has any right to complain of their conduct so long as they complied with the law—to import these bars. But it seemed to the Government of India that here was a case, where a defect in the law, required to be corrected, and that these bars of 15/32nds of an inch or 31/64ths of an inch diameter should be made subject to the protective duty so that the protection which the Legislature intended to give to the steel industry should be fully effective. These are the only two objects of the Bill, and it is unnecessary, I think, that I should enlarge upon them further.

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I welcome the protective duty levied on the tie-bars. I would only ask the Honourable Member to see that people importing large quantities of similar sections of steel tie-bars, for other purposes do not come under the protective tariff. Of course, I know there are two firms in Jamshedpur, the Tatas and the Tatanagar Foundry Company, who manufacture large quantities of cast-iron sleepers, and it is necessary that they should also get tie-bars under this protective tariff, so that they can compete with the imported cast-iron sleepers. That would avoid competition, and I do hope the Railways in future will buy all cast-iron sleepers of Indian origin.

Sir, I will make a few observations regarding the second part of the protective duty on iron rods. I do not know, and the Honourable the Commerce Member has not told us, whether the Tatas manufacture in large quantities half-inch iron bars so as to meet the demand of the Indian market. If Continental and British manufacturers are manufacturing just the size smaller than half-inch rods, i.e., 15/32nds inch and 31/64ths inch sizes to meet the demands of the large numbers of consumers in India. I think such sections ought not to be subject to this protective duty. I have received wires from the Bombay Iron Merchants' Association, which strongly protests against this further encroachment on the trade. From what I know, I can say of these small sections that they are used all over the country for domestic purposes, for windows, doors and for other purposes in private dwelling houses. If the Government and the Public Works Department require half-inch iron rods, they can always buy them from the Tatas and use them for their purposes according to standard specifications. But from what I know of the Tatas, they have very little surplus of half-inch rods which they can supply all over the country. Taking my own town, I have very seldom seen half-inch rods of the Tatas in my town of Cuttack. When such is the case, why are the Tatas coming to the Government for further protection when they themselves cannot supply the total requirements of the market? I know that the imports of 15/32 and 31/64 of an inch iron rods have increased, but they may have increased owing to the larger requirements of the ordinary users, who are now using these rods in their buildings instead of the costly half-inch rods. So my submission is that this protective duty is sought to be levied, not to benefit the public, but to fill the coffers of my Honourable friend Sir George

[Mr. B. Das.]

Schuster, the Finance Member. The protection which is being given does not help in any way the steel manufacturers, that is the Tatas, because they have done very little to capture the Indian market in this section or in other sections which they manufacture. I do not know if the Honourable Member has received any telegrams from the Calcutta Iron Merchants' Association, but I believe they will have the same tale to tell as the Bombay Iron Merchants' Association have. I received a letter from the Secretary of the Bombay Iron Merchants' Association last evening where he says that they are willing to send a representative to appear before the Select Committee if the Honourable the Commerce Member will be so inclined to hear the other side of the question. I submit that, before any protective tariff duty is levied, the Government will have to inquire whether it in any way affects the large requirements of the Government, in the Railways and the Public Works Department, and if it does not, and if the total manufacture of the Tatas does not meet the requirements of the Indian markets, then I submit these two sections should not be brought under the protective tariff. It tells hardly on private users who usually do not stick to standard sections, and at the same time it gives no protection to the steel manufacturer—the Tatas.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I have only one or two words to say in reply to what has fallen from my Honourable friend, Mr. B. Das. I should like to make it plain that it is not a question of giving additional protection, but merely taking steps to make effective the protection which the Legislature intended to give in 1927. Mr. Das suggested that the Tatas might be unable to meet the needs of the Indian markets in respect of these small size bars, and he said that he very seldom saw, in his own town, iron rods—I think he meant steel bars—manufactured by the Tata Iron and Steel Company, on sale. I have got two things to say about that. In the first place, the imports of these intermediate size bars between 7/16 inch and half-inch is now approaching the figure of 20,000 tons a year, and they are not subject to protective duty. That, of itself, will serve to explain why the half-inch bars of the Tatas are not on sale.

The second thing I should like to point out is that the output of steel by the Tatas is steadily increasing, and it becomes more and more important that they should have a full outlet for all the steel they can make. At earlier stages, they might be able to sell their full output within a limited range of products, but as their output increases, it becomes more and more necessary for them to find an outlet for all the different sections which they are in a position to roll. If this were a proposal to extend the protection which was intended to be given in 1927, then I think there might be something in what the Honourable Member urged, but that is not so. We are merely making effective what was actually sanctioned by the Legislature in 1927. I do not think, Sir, I need enlarge upon the matter any further.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill to amend the law relating to the fostering and development of the steel industry in British India, for certain purposes, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Law Member, Mr. K. C. Neogy, Mr. B. Das, Sir Parshotamdas Thakurdas, Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim, Mr. W. Alexander, Mr. H. P. Mody, Mr. G. W. Chambers and the Mover, with instructions to report on or before the 27th February, 1930, and that the number of members whose presence shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Committee shall be four."

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN LAC CESS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I beg to move that the Bill to provide for the creation of a fund for the improvement and development of the cultivation, manufacture and marketing of Indian lac, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Law Member, Dr. B. S. Moonje, Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh, Mr. A. Q. Siddiqi, Mr. Yamin Khan, Sir Darcy Lindsay, Mr. H. P. Mody, Mr. G. W. Chambers and the Mover, and that the number of members whose presence shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Committee shall be four.

The present Lac Cess Act, Mr. President, was passed by the Legislature in the year 1921. It imposed a small cess on exports of lac, and the proceeds of that cess were to be spent on measures to promote improved methods of cultivation and manufacture. The administration of the cess was entrusted to the Lac Association, a registered society with its headquarters in Calcutta, for the membership of which any firm or individual directly connected with the lac trade was eligible. That would cover cultivators, manufacturers, shippers, dealers or brokers. The constitution of the Committee of the Association which actually controlled the expenditure of the cess was as follows: two Indian manufacturers, two Indian brokers, two Calcutta shippers, one European manufacturer and one European broker. That Act was originally to remain in force for a period of five years up to 1926, but power was given to the Government of India to extend its application for further periods of five years on the recommendation of the Association. It was actually extended in 1926, and the question of its further continuance would, in the ordinary course, have come up in 1931. What has actually been done by the Association in order to carry out the objects of the Act is to establish at Nankum near Ranchi a Research Institute, and at that Institute a great deal of valuable work has already been done under the very able direction of Mrs. Norris, the Director, and especially in the way of the discovery of suitable host trees for the lac insect, the cultivation of the best types of lac and the prevention of parasites that destroy the lac. Up till now, I think it would be true to say that it is the cultivation of lac which has received most attention, but improved methods of manufacture have also received attention and I think there is a growing sense on the part of those connected with the trade that that is becoming increasingly important. The proceeds of the cess amount to about two lakhs a year.

Now, during the course of its tours in India the question of the Lac Research Institute attracted the attention of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, and in a paragraph of their Report they drew attention to the fact that in the Indian Central Cotton Committee, which is in some respects an analogous body, there was a much wider representation of interests, and they recommended that the Lac Committee should be reconstituted and strengthened by the addition of nominees of the Government of India, the Government of Bihar and Orissa and an official to represent the cultivators. I think the actual officials they suggested were the Imperial Entomologist, the Conservator of Forests in Bihar and Orissa and the Commissioner of Chota Nagpur. These proposals of the Royal Commission did not at once find acceptance, and there was a good deal of correspondence between the Government of India and the Government of Bihar and

[Sir George Rainy.]

Orissa and the Lac Association on the subject, because this is obviously a matter in which it is hardly possible to move at all unless we can move with general approval and consent. However, in August last the matter was brought to a head by a letter which we received from the Indian Lac Association, and I should like to quote certain passages from that letter. They said:

"The Committee have felt for some time past that they are not in a position to control effectually and to the best advantage to future conduct of research in the lac industry. The Association has now reached a stage beyond which the trade is unable without assistance to guide it. The Committee find that they have neither the knowledge nor the practical experience on which to criticise effectively the various schemes of research submitted to them; nor have they at their disposal the time which the work of the Association demands. Particularly do the Committee feel their inability to carry the results of the research home to the cultivator, and on this point they are bound to say that they realise that, until the methods of the cultivator are improved, it is not possible to speak of actual progress. This is also the point of view of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, whose opinion the trade largely shares. The Association must be reconstituted and strengthened if it is to attain the objects for which it was formed."

They then went on to say that there were certain difficulties about re-constituting the Association and they finally said that they feel:

"that it is only proper to indicate to the Government of India that the industry is unlikely to recommend a continuance of the Act in its present form after 1931."

On the other hand the trade would not, they thought, be averse to the continuance of the cess with effect from 1932, on the understanding that the funds thereby made available were utilised as effectively as possible to attain the objects in view, namely, the improvement of the quality of lac at present produced and the extension of cultivation for the ryot. They therefore urged the Government of India to take early steps for the re-organisation of the whole system. That made it clear to the Government of India that it was necessary to take steps to put things on a more permanent and a more satisfactory footing. We are all indebted to the Committee of the Lac Association for the very valuable work it has already done, but when that Association expressed the view that things had reached a stage when they were no longer able to carry on the work effectually, then clearly the obligation rested on the Government of India to endeavour to provide for it otherwise.

This question of research in the lac industry is becoming of vital importance, because the competition of synthetic substitutes for lac is becoming keener and keener every year, and if the Indian lac is to maintain the position it has held in the past, then undoubtedly there will have to be improvements and in particular the question will have to be considered whether arrangements cannot be made for the standardisation of lac. One of the complaints of the manufacturers abroad about Indian lac is that it is unequal in quality, whereas the synthetic product, which in other respects is not so good has this advantage that the manufacturers know exactly what they are getting. It is for that reason that it is important that the Committee should be remodelled on a satisfactory basis, so that research work can be carried on effectively. What we did was that we drafted a Bill which was in all essentials identical with the Bill now before the House. We circulated it to the Local Governments concerned, and obtained their opinions, and in principle it was accepted by all, the only suggestions for amendments made being on matters of detail.

I hope the House will accept the principle of the Bill. Its provisions are very largely modelled on those of the Cotton Cess Act, and although there are a good many clauses in the Bill, I do not think there is anything of great novelty in them. The only important change of importance is this, that among the objects on which the cess may be spent, in addition to cultivation and manufacture, the Bill now includes also improvements in the methods of marketing. That may be an important matter to the interests of the industry.

I hope that what I have said, Mr. President, will serve to explain to the House what the object of the Bill is and I hope that it will be a Bill which will be generally accepted and passed with general approval.

The motion was adopted.

ELECTION TO THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE INDIAN RESEARCH FUND ASSOCIATION.

Sir Frank Noyce (Secretary, Department of Education, Health and Lands): Sir, I move that this Assembly do proceed to elect, in such manner as the Honourable the President may direct, two Members to sit on the Governing Body of the Indian Research Fund Association.

Sir, in bringing forward this motion, I do not think, I need do more than repeat to the House the assurance I gave it on the 8th February that the motion does not in any way prejudice the question of the ultimate constitution of the Governing Body of the Indian Research Fund Association. As I explained on that occasion, it is the intention of the Government to refer that with two other important questions to the Conference which they will summon in due course. In the meantime, they wish to take this, which is the earliest opportunity they have had since they decided to reconstitute and very considerably enlarge the Governing Body, of associating this House with its activities. Sir, I move.

The motion was adopted.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS FOR THE STANDING FINANCE COMMITTEE FOR RAILWAYS.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I move that this Assembly do proceed to elect in such manner as may be approved by the Honourable the President, eleven Members from the Assembly who shall be required to serve on the Standing Finance Committee for Railways, as provided for in clause 6 of the Resolution adopted by the Legislative Assembly on the 20th September, 1924, on the subject of the separation of Railway Finance.

The motion was adopted.

ELECTION OF A PANEL FOR THE CENTRAL ADVISORY COUNCIL FOR RAILWAYS.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I move that this Assembly do proceed to elect in such manner as may be approved by the Honourable the President, a panel consisting of eight Members, from which six shall be selected to serve on the Central Advisory Council for Railways, as provided for in clause 6 of the Resolution adopted by the Legislative Assembly on the 20th September, 1924, on the subject of the separation of Railway Finance.

The motion was adopted.

DEMANDS FOR SUPPLEMENTARY GRANTS.

A.—Expenditure charged to Revenue.

CUSTOMS.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 4,64,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Customs'."

I have the usual somewhat large number of Demands for supplementary grants to move, and I do not propose to give any special explanations, in advance, of these Demands. They have all been considered fully by the Standing Finance Committee and full particulars have been supplied to Honourable Members. Sir, I move.

The motion was adopted.

IRRIGATION, NAVIGATION, EMBANKMENT AND DRAINAGE WORKS.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 10,31,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Irrigation, Navigation, Embankment and Drainage Works'."

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I will make a few observations on this particular Demand. This is a supplementary Demand for money required to repair the damages on account of floods in the North West Frontier Province. I congratulate the Government for taking speedy action and in adopting such measures as were required to repair the flood damages in the North-West Frontier Province. Sir Frank Noyce, in reply to a question of mine, laid a statement on the table, which was a comprehensive statement, and an actual statement and was not understated. It is stated there that the loss of life during the last floods in the North West Frontier Province was 121 and the loss of property amounted to rupees one crore, ten lakhs and odd. Sir, I am one of those who have always maintained on the floor of this House that it is the Government's imperative function to try to prevent causes of floods and to render all help at the time of floods and thereafter by monetary help and by proper maintenance of drainage of waterways and embankments thereof. I am glad that the Government took action in the North West Frontier Province, and I hope in future when we discuss such subjects on the floor of this House, they will exercise their prerogative of control over the Provincial Governments and see that they always bring forward correct statements of facts about flood damages, and do not issue wrong statements, as my Government of Bihar and Orissa did at the time of the Orissa floods.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 10,31,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Irrigation, Navigation, Embankment and Drainage Works'."

The motion was adopted.

INDIAN POSTS AND TELEGRAPHS DEPARTMENT.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 9,00,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department'."

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 40,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Legislative Bodies'."

Mr. M. K. Acharya (South Arcot cum Chingleput: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I had given notice of a motion for reducing this grant by Re. 1, but, as I understand that the matter which I wanted to discuss is likely to be solved satisfactorily in a day or two and that there is a prospect of its early solution, I do not propose to raise the question by means of a motion on a supplementary grant.

Mr. K. C. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Order, order. Is the Honourable Member at all in order, Sir; in proposing to raise a discussion on a subject that has nothing to do with this motion?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has not moved.

Mr. B. Das: But the Honourable Member made certain observations which were uncalled for.

Mr. President: I desire to state in this connection that Honourable Members who feel aggrieved at the order of the Honourable the President, directing the Galleries to be closed, may make any representations they like to him, and I assure them that such representations will be fully considered by the President. Honourable Members are not entitled to raise a debate on it on the floor of the House in this way.

Mr. President: The question is:

The motion was adopted.

POLICE.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 3,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Police'."

The motion was adopted.

OTHER SCIENTIFIC DEPARTMENTS.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

The motion was adopted.

EDUCATION.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 41,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Education'."

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum (North West Frontier Province: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I should like to avail myself of this opportunity and draw the attention of the Honourable the Finance Member to the conditions imposed by the Government of India on certain grants sanctioned by them for building purposes at the Islamia College, Peshawar in the North West Frontier Province. In view of the very heavy losses that the Province has suffered as the result of the recent floods and to which my friend, Mr. B. Das, has referred on a previous motion, the loss being over a crore of rupees in property and a couple of hundred lives, almost unbearable for a small province like ours. I trust that the Honourable the Finance Member will find it possible to relax the conditions imposed on the grants for the Islamia College, Peshawar, and will not be so exacting as his Department has so far been in that connection.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (United Provinces: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I expected that this time the supplementary grant would be about a lakh of rupees for the Muslim University, as had been promised by the Government last year during the budget time. That, as far as I remember, was the promise given by the Honourable the Finance Member.

Mr. President: Order, order; the Honourable Member cannot raise that question on this grant.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: My point is that this supplementary grant of Rs. 41,000 for the Aligarh Muslim University is insufficient. And I want to point that out to the Government that it ought to have been a lakh.

Mr. President: That is a general question of policy which can be discussed at the time of the main Budget.

The question is:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 41,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Education'."

The motion was adopted.

CIVIL VETERINARY SERVICES.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 61,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Civil Veterinary Services'."

The motion was adopted.

MISCELLANEOUS DEPARTMENTS.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

The motion was adopted.

MINT.

The motion was adopted.

SUPERANNUATION ALLOWANCES AND PENSIONS.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 9,75,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Superannuation Allowances and Pensions'."

The motion was adopted.

STATIONERY AND PRINTING.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 7,11,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Stationery and Printing'."

The motion was adopted.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 3,93,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Miscellaneous'."

Munshi Iswar Saran (Lucknow Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I understand that this amount includes certain items of expense for the Indian Statutory Commission. I make this statement subject to correction. If I am wrong, I hope the Finance Member will correct me. When we turn to the pamphlet called "Supplementary Demands for Grants", which has been supplied to us, we find a very significant circumstance and it is this. While giving the details of the Special Commissions of Inquiry, the Royal Commission on Agriculture, the Royal Commission on Labour, and then "Other Commissions and Committees" are mentioned, but the Indian Statutory Commission has not been mentioned. I do not wish to suggest that this omission is deliberate; I should be very sorry to say that; but then the omission to mention the Indian Statutory Commission in the details in this pamphlet does give rise to an idea that, either there has been a conscious effort not to mention it, or that Government no longer attach any importance to this Commission. Be that as it may, what I find is this

[Munshi Iswar Saran.]

Mr. President: Is it worth while raising this question now? It is flogging a dead horse.

Munshi Iswar Saran: No, Sir; I agree, it is not worth while raising the question of the Commission, but it is certainly worth while not to allow this sum to be granted without a protest. By turning to the proceedings of the Finance Committee, I am glad to find that the Indian Members, Mr. Amar Nath Dutt, Maulvi Sayyid Murtuza Saheb and Mr. Muhammad Ismail Khan, raised their protest against the expenditure in connection with the Statutory Commission. Sir, I accept your suggestion, more especially because the House is very thin at present and therefore I will not press for a division; but I do submit that we should not allow this sum to go unchallenged. Therefore I do lodge my protest against it.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh (Muzaffarpur cum Champaran: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I should also like to add my word of protest to this supplementary Demand being granted by this House. This House has recorded its protest on more than one occasion, and recorded it in a most effective manner against the Statutory Commission, and any grant being made to it. Now, this thing has come up in a very guileless way, as has been pointed out by the previous speaker. The significance of this Demand has been attempted to be covered under the heading, "other commissions and committees". I should like my Honourable friend, the Finance Member, to tell this House as to why the words, "Indian Statutory Commission" have not been used. You have rightly pointed out, Sir, that this issue is a dead issue; it is like flogging a dead horse; but this House must record its protest and must not pay anything even for the burial of that dead horse. On more than one occasion

Dr. A. Suhrawardy (Burdwan and Presidency Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): The horse is very much alive and kicking.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: In your personality that particular animal may be quite alive and kicking (Laughter); but so far as this House is concerned, our protest is already on record, and I therefore strongly object to any sum being granted for the purpose of this Statutory Commission, which has been boycotted by every honourable man inside the House and every honourable man outside the House.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I think there is some misapprehension in the minds of my Honourable friends who have just spoken; we are not dealing with the Budget now, or a complete account of the expenditure of the Government. We are only dealing with certain supplementary Demands. These details that are given in the pamphlet only purport to give information necessary to explain what supplementary

Demands are required. The point had not been brought to my notice beforehand, but I am quite certain that I am correct in stating that no supplementary Demand is required in connection with the Statutory Commission this year, and that is why it is not included in this list. I am quite at a loss to understand the reason of the protest which we have received.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 3,93,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Miscellaneous'."

The motion was adopted.

The motion was adopted.

The motion was adopted.

CAPITAL OUTLAY ON CURRENCY NOTE PRESS.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 22,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Capital Outlay on Currency Note Press'."

The motion was adopted.

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 81,78,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1930, in respect of 'Loans and Advances Bearing Interest'."

The motion was adopted.

THE RAILWAY BUDGET—GENERAL DISCUSSION.

Mr. President: We shall now take up the general discussion of the Railway Budget. I hope that no Honourable Member will exceed 20 minutes in his speech.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): I am lucky in catching your eye at the very beginning. Sir, Sir Hugh Cocke, speaking on the 22nd February, 1928, while discussing the Railway Budget, said that sufficient time was not allowed to the Honourable Members to study the huge Budget which the Honourable the Railway Member presents to the Members of this House and he said that it was very difficult for the Honourable Members to digest all those various volumes in about 24 hours' time. With your permission I will just read what Sir Hugh Cocke said:

"There has not been a great deal of time for us to examine the very voluminous figures and statements made in connection with the Railway Budget this year. We had it on Monday morning and here we are on Wednesday morning expected to have learnt it by heart or at any rate to have studied it so thoroughly as to enable us to criticise it."

[Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi.]

Exactly the same thing has happened this year. We had it on Monday morning and we are here to discuss it on Wednesday morning. He said, however:

"While the Indian Navy was being torpedoed yesterday, I was busily engaged in looking through the figures in connection with the railways."

Similarly we were hurried yesterday passing the supplementary demands which the Honourable the Finance Member presented to us. The difficulty was that, after receiving the Railway Budget, it was hardly possible for any Member of this House to consider all the supplementary demands that were placed before the House, and we had to accept them as a whole without discussing them any further. Therefore, I agree with Sir Hugh Cocke that the time allowed by the Honourable the Railway Member for us to digest the Budget is very short. In this connection, I am reminded of a larger issue, and that is the separation of the Railway finance from the Central finance, which has resulted in the presentation of a separate Railway Budget. This was adopted by a Resolution in the Assembly on the 20th September, 1924. We have now got a separate Budget in pursuance of that Resolution and, therefore, I say that it is very difficult to go through the Railway Budget and also the General Budget that is coming on. It takes us some time to study those figures and when we know that we have again to study the General Budget that is coming before us it makes us very much upset. I would, therefore, suggest that it would be very convenient if the Honourable the Railway Member could present his Budget in the Autumn Session of the Assembly, when the Members have more time for studying it at Simla. The climate of Simla is very good and we will spare the Honourable the Railway Member very many of the criticisms that he will receive in this Session. We know that it is not possible for the Railway Member to do this without the sanction of the Secretary of State. If that is so, I would suggest, Sir, that this aspect of the question may be fully considered before the new constitution is introduced. This separation of Railway finance from General finance is, to my mind, merely on paper. It is not an effective separation at all. Formerly the Government of India had one pocket, or I should say one purse, where they could put in all the money. By this separation they have got two pockets. In one pocket they put in the railway money and in the other the general revenues. Otherwise I do not see how the separation has done any good to the railways as a whole. For all effective purposes it is no separation at all, for the railways cannot raise any loan independently, nor can they work independently. They are interdependent with the Government in their good and bad years, although for no fault of their own. The railways are commercial concerns and must stand on their own legs. If there was real separation, they could go a very long way without any hindrance to their progress. For example, we had recently a very good case to cite, and if the Honourable the Railway Member had not then given way with folded hands to the Honourable the Finance Member, at any rate for this year, the construction of the Dacca-Aricha Railway would have commenced. It is a railway which, according to the Railway Board, has been wanted by the public for over 40 years, a railway which the Railway Board admits would be a paving concern, a railway which will add enormously to the income of the Eastern Bengal Railway and, in the words of the Honourable the Commerce Member himself, it is a railway the construction of which he "should like to have commenced" himself but, as he said, he is "unable to do so."

Now, Sir, if the separation was real, the Member in Charge of the Railways could at once float a loan on his own securities and go on with the schemes which he should have liked to commence, such as we see in the floatation of loans by the Corporations, the Municipalities, the Port Trusts and similar bodies. Therefore, I say that if the House is of opinion that this separation of Railway finance from the Central finance should continue, then I venture to say it must be real and effective and not merely on paper. The Honourable Member in Charge of Railways should in that case see that, in the new constitution, the separation of Railway finance is effective, and that the railways in India are an independent body, and that the Railway Board is a body of Directors directly responsible to the House, the representatives of the shareholders.

Sir, I have not said the last word about the Dacca-Aricha Railway. I have yet a lot to say and I shall do so when I move my cut. All I wish to say now is that we, the Members from Bengal, will not give peace to the Honourable the Railway Member until he gives us an assurance on the floor of the House that the Dacca-Aricha Railway is a settled fact, and that land acquisition for that line shall commence at once.

Sir, then I come to the next point, which is very important, namely, the question of the State Railways running steamer services between important points. I shall venture to show how Incheape influence has paralysed the State Railways by preventing them from running steamer services between important points in the railway system. On this point also I shall exhaustively dwell at a later stage

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has only five minutes more; there is no later stage.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Not today, Sir, but when I shall move my cut. I will try to finish my speech now in five minutes. But, Sir, before I pass on, I must admit that my difficulty in this matter is very great and that difficulty is like that of my Honourable friend the Commerce Member, who is anxious to pay court at the same time to two twin sisters.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas (Indian Merchants' Chamber: Indian Commerce): Court two twin sisters?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: The two sisters are the "State Railways" and "private enterprise". But Sir George may be reminded that marriage with two sisters is not permissible under any law.

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): But the Honourable Member is not yet married!

An Honourable Member: It is not marriage; it is courtship!

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub (Rohilkund and Kumaon Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): Why not have another Sarda Act?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: And he cannot bestow equal attention on both the sweethearts. Sir, it is there that my difficulty lies. The Honourable Sir George Rainy himself said the other day that he was bound to fight, as a Railway Member, like a lion on behalf of the railways, and yet there is the rub. The Inchcape steamer companies—the private enterprise—the stronger of the Siamese twins, give him trouble, and if the interests of the steamer companies clash with those of the railways, Sir George Rainy collapses.

There is another matter of public importance, and that is railway accidents entailing loss of human lives. Sir, the Railway Act provides for no inquiry worth the name and I shall take up this matter when my cut is reached and shall then demonstrate exhaustively how railway accidents, entailing loss of human life, require more sifting and satisfactory inquiries.

Then, Sir, there is the question of the larger employment of Muslims on the Railways. I shall demonstrate from facts and figures that nothing has been done up to this time to add to the employment of Mussalmans on the State Railways. I hope I shall be able to demonstrate fully how niggardly the Mussalmans have been treated in the matter of their larger employment on the State Railways.

Sir, there is one more matter and I have done, and that is the stores purchase policy, and particularly the appalling condition of the Stores Department in the East Indian Railway. Sir, at a later stage of the Budget, I shall be able to show to this House that crores of rupees have been lost by the negligence of the East Indian Railway, and that crores of rupees have been locked up giving no return whatsoever for the money that has been locked there.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: Sir, the Budget presented by the Honourable the Railway Member to this House bears unmistakable proofs of the atmosphere that prevails around us,—I mean unmistakable proof of the condition through which the country is passing. Depression is a word which is not very much appreciated and people want to hear something more cheering, but I doubt if the Honourable Member could present a picture regarding the condition of the country more true than what the hard facts and figures given in the Budget indicate. The financial results of 1928-29 indicate a shortage on the receipts side which was serious, and the final figure of surplus is less than the revised estimate to the extent of very nearly one crore of rupees. The revised estimates of 1929-30 are rupees 4 crores less than the Budget figures, with the result that the contribution to the general revenues which amount to Rs. 6,12,00,000 for that year can be met only by drawing on the reserves to the extent of Rs. 86 lakhs. Since the separation of the Budget, this is the first year, as far as I remember it, when there has been what would be called a deficit in the year's result. The cause of this, if analysed properly and in detail, would be very instructive, but from what the Honourable the Railway Member says in paragraph 5 of his speech, it appears that it is not so much that traffic has fallen off heavily, as that it has failed to expand to the extent it was hoped. This cessation of expansion of traffic is a serious aspect and should be taken into consideration both by the Railway Board and also by this House. We are told that the reduced rates for long distance coal announced last year have acted as a stimulus to the coal trade. I venture to inquire why, in view of this encouraging result of the experiment with the coal trade, the Government of India have not thought of trying reduction of railway rates for some other commodities. It is admitted that our railway goods tariff is not based on anything like a scientific basis and it is necessary to make an experiment in one or two directions with some agricultural products in order to stimulate traffic. Perhaps the Honourable the Railway Member will tell us why he has not made this his third Budget in succession, a budget of agricultural railway programme, as the previous two Budgets were styled by himself and by the Chief Commissioner of Railways. Why, I inquire, are the agriculturists' interests conveniently put in the background at the slightest sign of depression in trade and commerce, which is reflected in smaller receipts for the railways as a whole? I very strongly feel that the Honourable the Railway Member owes an explanation to this House as to why he does not propose to try, in connection with agricultural produce of this country, the same experiment, which he admits he has been able to try so successfully in connection with coal.

Sir, the Budget for 1930-31 can, to my mind, be regarded as just balanced, and it is likely that, unless conditions improve very markedly from what they are today, there may have to be another call on the Reserve Fund of the railways of India. (Hear, hear.) In the Budget they count on an increasing traffic which will bring in about 2 crores more receipts. I venture to ask whether this is what one would call a conservative figure to rely upon. For in an earlier paragraph in his speech, I think it is paragraph 4, the Honourable Member tells us that, as far as cotton traffic this season is concerned, it has been an early crop, and he would not be surprised if there was a falling off in receipts from movement of cotton in the latter part of this year. I would very much wish the Honourable Member the most complete success in all his various hopes regarding increase in traffic, but I feel, Sir, that if one is to judge from the conditions as they prevail at present, and as they seem to an ordinary man in the street likely to prevail for the next few months, or the major part of the next financial year, I am afraid that the modest sum of rupees 34 lakhs, which it is anticipated may be added to the Reserve Fund, may disappear. I should consider the Honourable Member lucky if he does not have to make another inroad on the Railway Reserve Fund.

Regarding capital expenditure, I note that the decrease in this from the previous years is as much as feasible. I do not wish to criticise any special item in the capital programme for the next year. But I cannot help feeling that, when one looks at some of the extravagantly built railway stations—I do not wish to name any particularly, because there are such stations in most provinces which one sees when one goes across touring round India—we are perhaps paying the penalty for the comparatively grand scale on which some of these stations were laid out. (Hear, hear.) I notice a very pertinent question put, I think by the Honourable the Finance Member at a Public Accounts Committee meeting in connection with rent charged by the Railway Department to the Postal Department for a room in the Lucknow Station. The Lucknow Station is a very fine looking building and I would perhaps congratulate the persons who built it if the Indian taxpayer had not to pay the money, and I were not included among the taxpayer. I find that the Postal Department is paying Rs. 500 for accommodation in the new station, when previously, with a modest railway station, they were paying Rs. 55 a month as rent. The increase strikes one as such that only a Department of the Government of India can bear and no one else. If the Postal Department were run by private enterprise—not question of the railway line which has called for the greatest notice from this House from time to time, I mean the Bengal and North Western Railway. That Railway is one over which the Railway Board appear to have the least control, and that is one which gives the least facilities to third class passengers, leaving aside the question of Indianisation. On no account should that Railway be left with its present management because it has now been conclusively proved that, on that line, Indians have least justice.

The main concession, Sir, in the Budget, is the improvement of the service conditions of the lowest paid of the railway servants. It is some consolation that, whilst the public get no reductions in rates and fares, at least some servants of the railways in India are likely to be treated as they ought to be treated. I feel that although, as representing the commercial community, I would very much have liked to see reductions in rates and fares, I welcome this new departure which the Honourable Member has indicated in his speech. He said that, if one wishes to criticise the Government of India regarding their having been tardy in connection with this somewhat wholesome recognition, which they now propose to make, one is welcome to do so. But he warned us that, if anybody wished to criticise Mr. Hayman about the work that he has done in the past one year, he would say that that critic was ill-informed. I do not wish to criticise either the Government of India in this connection or the Honourable Member of the Railway Board in this House, Mr. Hayman. I fully believe the Honourable the Railway Member when he said that Mr. Hayman has done a very full year's work since his appointment. But my complaint is the Honourable the Railway Member in his speech says in paragraph 24:

"Now that the first scheme has been passed and the general principles laid down, progress should be much more rapid upon other Railways."

I think, Sir, we are entitled to ask who has passed "the first scheme" and what are "the general principles" laid down. He has not indicated that in his speech, nor do the various small leaflets and publications given to us throw any light on this.

Sir Hugh Cocke (Bombay European): They are not small but large.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: We are going to have a larger instalment later on and that is why I call these small. The various leaflets, not one of them gives us an idea of what the general principle laid down is, nor what the first scheme which has been passed is like. I note that the Honourable Member has stated that he will try and put this before the Central Advisory Council for Railways. At the moment, until the next elections take place, it is my privilege to sit on that Committee from this House, and whilst I realise the difficulties of the Honourable Member in getting together Members of the two Houses, I venture to ask him whether he is not expecting a little too much from this House if he is expecting us to endorse this policy of his and this principle which, for practical purposes, very few on this side of the House at least are aware of. What is that scheme and what is that general principle which he refers to and which he thinks he has firmly laid down and which would accelerate progress? I find, Sir, that until we know the details of this, it is very difficult for us to say whether we can approve of what he has in his mind or not.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has exceeded his time limit.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: I will not be very long. I will take only two or three minutes more. In this connection I want only to put before the House what the Honourable the Chief Commissioner of Railways has said in the Council of State in presenting the Budget. He said:

"What we want is a contented staff, and a staff which, because it is contented, is efficient. At the same time, it is our duty to see, and we propose to see, that no concession is given to demands which are unreasonable. It must be realised that it is the railway user who foots the bill and we have his interests also to consider. We feel sure that no one would wish that the railway servant should not receive a fair wage"—(and every section of the House will re-echo this)—"but it must be a fair wage for a fair day's work."

If this idea underlies the principle which has been accepted, perhaps we will not quarrel with him. But I do want to make it plain that as far as this House is concerned, we do not know of it, nor does the Central Advisory Committee know about this, and until we are fully cognisant of the details of the scheme which he has in mind, I fear that we must say. "We will wait and see what your scheme is".

One word more and I have finished. The Committee of my Chamber wish that attention should be drawn to the comparative extravagance in connection with the concessions which are being given to Anglo-Indians as being pucca Europeans under the Lee Commission Report. I have, Sir, a statement supplied by the Railway Board to the Committee of my Chamber from which it appears that 40 Anglo-Indians have been given the benefit of the Lee Concession, and the amount involved must be—we have not got the actual amount—running into fairly large sums. They are distributed well over all the Railways in India and one wonders whether many more of such claims are not coming on. Whilst we do not mind justice being done to people where there is not a fair living wage or where the leave rules, etc., are inadequate, I feel that the Railway Member should give a warning to the Railway Board not to fritter away whatever little amount they may have, in any form of luxuries as have been unjustifiably given by the Lee Commission so far as the Anglo-Indian staff are concerned. (Hear, hear.) We protested against the Lee concessions when they were passed and carried against the vote of this part of the House, and I think that when the Railway finances do not look very rosy, we are justified in warning the Government of India that their policy in this connection, even though justified by the recommendations of a Commission like the Lee Commission, is thoroughly unjustified and is nothing short of extravagance.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, it is somewhat difficult to do justice to what one thinks about the different aspects of the Budget in the space of 15 or 20 minutes. But I would like just to contribute one or two points only to this discussion. The Budget presented by the Honourable Member for Railways is a disappointing document. The disappointment may be as great to himself as it is to us, and the disappointment may also be due in part to causes over which he had no control. But in any case the Budget does not call for congratulations, though it may evoke our sympathy. It reflects the condition of general trade depression which prevails in the country. Flood and famine of course mostly account for this and it is unfortunate that the reduction in fares and freights should result in material reduction in the railway revenue. The loss of 2½ crores in the working of the commercial lines is aggravated, as usual, by nearly another 2 crores of loss on the working of the strategic railways. The question naturally arises whether the loss on the strategic lines should any longer be debited to the Railway finance, when Government have decided to run the railways as a commercial concern. (Hear, hear.) One may ask, in all fairness, why the loss on the strategic lines should not be debited to the Military Department, though we know that in the ultimate or marginal accounting of the Indian taxpayer, it is the same whether this loss is debited to the Railway or the Military Department. The point, however, about the scientific adjustment of this loss is that the Military Department would have to bear open responsibility for this increased expenditure in their accounts year by year, and pressure of opinion may be brought upon the Military Department to make a corresponding reduction in their expenditure, now that an attempt is being made to fix that expenditure within definite limits.

Apart from this, the Railway Budget is merely a routine budget. It has practically no features to show. There is no further reduction of fares and freights, nor any special concessions to indigenous trades and industries, nor any material advancement in the convenience offered to the principal client or rather the patron of the railways, the third class passenger. Even in matters of negative reform, such as retrenchment in working expenses and the like, the Budget has got no welcome features to show. We are only meeting with apologies when the Railway Board see that they can be taxed with being at fault. The only good feature of the Budget that I have been able to locate in it is that no ambitious projects of railway construction are being taken in hand during the next year. The time has certainly come to cry a halt in this respect, and the misfortune of lower returns of revenue has been attended at least with this blessing. For the last many years the Railway Department was seized with a kind of fury for railway extension. Dovetailed programmes led to commitments, out of which it was apparently difficult or even unwise to withdraw. I do not say that the public demand for extension of railways has stopped. It is a thing which will perhaps never stop of itself. The man in the interior, who is miles and miles away from a railway line, may even legitimately complain that the blessings of railway construction are unevenly distributed under a single administration. Where is there a village who would not like to see the railway pass by his village, or perhaps even by his own house? It has come to be regarded as a vital artery of economic life, and it must continue to be so till the reductio ad absurdum is reached. But Government ought to know better in this respect, and for once sanity seems to have dawned on them, when they can openly advert to the difficulty of obtaining funds for capital expenditure on railways and the folly of incurring debts for breathless railway extension. If they were otherwise minded, they could easily get officers put on special duty who could make elaborate surveys and always present projects promising an alluring return. But on how many projects has this promise been really fulfilled? Only apologies, with one kind of reason or another have always been offered in explaining away the inevitable disappointment of expectations. The time has, therefore, come as I said before, for crying a halt and taking a survey of the whole situation, and also for making an honest effort at finding out whether, and in how many cases of projects, the principle of profitable commercialism has been really successful.

The inclusion of Railway finance with General finance had no doubt its own faults, but one wonders whether the separation of the two has not already led to financial extravagance, and established an imperial railway autocracy in the form of the Railway Board, who think that their doings should be above cavil or criticism if somehow they make up the fixed contribution to the general revenues. General finance is, after all, more susceptible to the aggregate pressure of the financial burden of the country than the isolated Railway Department can ever be, and this thought naturally leads to the question about the Committee that was appointed last year to reconsider the question of the separation of Railway from General finances. It is certainly suspicious that no meeting of this Committee has been convened during the last twelve months. One would like to know who was really at fault, namely, the Railway Financial Commissioner in not calling a meeting of the Committee, or the members of the Committee themselves neglecting their business.

Well, Sir, I think an inquiry is due into the expenditure incurred during the last few years by the Railway Department on some of its activities, and it is precisely here that the Members of the Legislature, laymen as obviously they are, would like to have greater enlightenment vouchsafed to them in the Explanatory Memorandum of the Railway Budget, or at least in the Annual Report of the Railway Administration. The Railway Board may look upon this act as they like, either as a duty discharged to their masters, the Legislature, or they may even affect to treat it as a sop to the critical curiosity of the Legislature. But more information must in any case be forthcoming by way of giving clues to facts and figures, to enable us to see how far expenditure in certain matters has really justified itself. To make my point clear, I would give only one or two instances. Two years back I asked for a kind of balance sheet showing, on the one hand, the interest charges on the capital amount spent on the Parsik Tunnels near Thana, and on the other hand, savings effected by building that tunnel rather than using the already existing double line for a short distance between the Kalyan Creek and the hill near Parsik station. I thought a balance sheet like that was possible in the case of a project involving, for aught I know, a crore of rupees. I was told in reply that such a balance sheet could not be made, that is to say, specific per contra savings could not be shown in respect of time economy, haulage, fuel, wages, overhead charges, etc., etc., to the tune of about six lakhs of rupees, which obviously represent the recurring charges on account of that tunnel.

The same complaint applies to the enormous sums spent in the name of widening certain station yards, and especially raising stupendous blocks of buildings in the name of remodelling of certain stations at least on the Great Indian Peninsula Railway. I can understand special convenience and amenities in the case of the superior grade passengers, but I plead guilty to the charge of not understanding the extravagance which is exhibited in building luxurious halls and saloons and equipping these with costly fittings, furniture and ornamentation. The very quantity of built up space in these new structures is to my mind out of all proportion to the number of persons actually using them. To take the instance only of the Poona Station, which I have occasionally to use, I will make bold to say the balance of even convenience to passengers is certainly an adverse balance. It may be uncharitable to say so, but there is certainly an element of vain gloriousness lurking behind all this extravagance.

[Mr. N. C. Kelkar.]

Another instance in my opinion is the electrification of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway up to Igatpuri on the one hand and Poona on the other. Even to a layman like myself, it appears that electrification of railways is justifiable only where there is competition between different railways running side by side, and that too in suburban, not or inter-urban areas over a limited distance. These two conditions certainly obtain up to seven or eight miles from Bombay northwards, for there is certainly a congestion of traffic and the need for a more speedy and frequent service.

Mr. K. C. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): What about the Poona Races?

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: There is competition between the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway over this length, and the suburban passengers will surely be benefited by this reform. But beyond that distance no new traffic can be created,—I repeat that, beyond the distance no new traffic can be created—and a gain in point of revenue can only arise from the growth in the volume or the velocity of traffic. But what about the whole length of electrification from Bombay to Poona? For, howsoever ahead one may look, one cannot see how the traffic between Bombay and Poona is going to be proportionately increased, or how the natural development of traffic could not have been dealt with by a steam railway service as before. Passengers between Poona and Bombay will certainly like to reach their destination an hour before the old scheduled time. But surely the railway fares are not going to be increased in proportion to this accelerated service, nor can I see any chance of many more trains being run between these two terminals. And then again there is the question as to in what particularly economically beneficial manner the passengers are going to use the greater leisure they would get by an hour or so? If I remember

12 Noon. aright, the railway management on the occasion of the opening ceremony of the electric railway between Bombay and Poona claimed, with a kind of pride as it were, that this long distance electrification was an unprecedented achievement in the history of railways and that there was done for the first time something for which there was no parallel in the world. But am I not entitled to say that India is perhaps the only place in the world where things like these can be achieved with other people's money? (Laughter.) This at least can be said in favour of Company-managed railways, that they do not allow their management to perform such costly exploits; but here we are having the disadvantages of State proprietorship and State management of railways without all their corresponding advantages. Even in America, electrification is carried out only for short distances and only for services and terminals and for long tunnels and in negotiating steep mountain gradients, and in regions of dense passenger traffic adjacent to large centres of population. But India is a country in which reckless expenditure may be incurred with impunity, and the irony is all the more glaring when we find a State Railway like the Great Indian Peninsula straining at the gnat of expenditure for bettering the conditions of labour employed on it, while it is in other respects swallowing camels. Here I want to raise definitely the question about the absolute darkness in which we have been kept as to the manner in which the amounts allotted last year for this particular purpose have been actually spent. Here is an instance in which we can legitimately complain that adequate detailed information has not been supplied to us. We have been told in a general manner that so many lakhs have been spent last year and so many will be spent next year in bettering these conditions; but one would like to know in exact detail what has been spent upon increasing the salaries and the wages of the poor subordinates and the railway workmen (An Honourable Member: "Mr. Hayman is still working at it!") and what has been or will be spent upon increasing the staff mainly for the purpose of shortening the hours of daily employment, and giving occasional periods of rest, and how much has been or will be spent in actually building quarters for these particular men. Instead of that, the question of the betterment of the conditions of these people is obtruding itself on us wherever possible, and out of all proportion to the legitimate magnitude of its benefit. Detailed information would be similarly welcome in respect of many other topics about which more than any other the Railway Board will know that we really care. But, for want of time, I would only conclude by suggesting that, instead of putting in the hands of the Legislature speculations which fail, explanations which do not convince, boasts which cannot be justified, and apologies that cannot be accepted, the Railway Board would in future kindly put in the form of inset notes or appendices information and more information on some of the topics in which the Assembly takes a vital and lively interest from the point of view of the taxpayer, the trader, the agriculturist, the merchant, the passenger and the son of the soil, who legitimately aspires to have a hand in the working of the railways in all the grades of service from the bottom to the top.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya (Madras: Indian Commerce): Sir, the other day, when the Commerce Member attended a meeting of the Federation of Indian Chambers, he informed us that he was in the throes of the Budget. I thought he had some very remarkable statement and figures in the Budget and I was expecting that we would get some concessions and some reduction in the freights and in other directions. But like the proverbial mountain, he laboured and produced only a mouse. We are told in the Budget Statement that he is in another throe of labour, and that is, that he is trying his best to evolve some scheme for the betterment of the prospects of the lower subordinates in the railway service. I hope his labours in that direction will not be as disappointing as they have been in the presentation of this Budget.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Instead of a mouse he will bring forth a camel!

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: I shall now turn to an important matter which my friend, the Honourable Mr. Ghuznavi, has drawn attention to, and that is that, with reference to the presentation of the Railway Budget, it is generally complained that Members on this side of the House make it a particular habit or hobby to criticise the Government and never come out with any helpful suggestions. Sir, I do not wish to bring any matter before the Assembly if I feel I can get it set right by private conversation with the Members concerned. So, two years ago I went and saw the Secretary in the Finance Department and laid before him certain suggestions regarding the presentation of the General Budget. That gentleman, a very polished and very courteous officer of the Government of India, and a member of the Indian Civil Service, was very kind: he shook hands with me when I went there, and he again shook hands with me when I went out, but sent me out with nothing. I told him that at present we were unnecessarily wasting the time of the House in the matter of the presentation of the Budget. Take the Railway and the General Budgets. We are made to come here and waste a whole day simply to listen to the oration of about forty minutes—to the nightingale songs of the Commerce and Finance Members; and every year, or almost every year, either we feel it is our duty to be disappointed, or else the figures are so disappointing that we find that our time is completely wasted. What happens is that, on one side, the Commerce Member reads his long statement of 11 pages containing 28 paragraphs; on the other side, in the other Chamber his Secretary is reading the same thing in 7 pages condensed into 9 paragraphs. What I feel is—I pity even these Members who make these orations. The same thing is given in certain language here and they have to put a great literary strain on their heads to find words to see how they can give the same substance in other words in the other place. I do not see how any useful object is served by making two statements at the same time in two different places.

An Honourable Member: Hold a joint sitting.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: The rules permit of it, and I suggested to the Secretary that we might have joint sittings, and that there was nothing in the rules against it. Both the Houses might be brought together and a comprehensive statement could be made. Now, in their desire to say something here, and something else there, both the statements are not quite complete. It would be better that we should have one comprehensive statement, giving all the facts and figures plainly, instead of leaving something in this House and something there. Of course in fact the idea is to give as little information as possible to both Houses.

Besides this, I said to that gentleman that, if I was not mistaken, about 20 years ago one Finance Member had started the system of not making a budget oration—he used to have a narrative. I say, Sir, it would be better if these papers were sent to us fifteen days in advance so that we might have ample time to consider them. No doubt the Official Benches have got a large number of Secretaries and armies of clerks behind them, who prepare all these figures, while in our case we have not got all these facilities. We have to sit all the time looking into an enormous mass of papers which come to us in such rapid succession that there is very little interval of time for Honourable Members to go through them and understand and study them. I doubt very much, if we were to throw all these facts and figures on the heads of Official Members, whether they would be in a position to follow them. What I mean is, they should realise our difficulties and give us certain facilities if they really want some healthy criticism from us, non-officials, in the matter.

Now, I do not know whether the suggestion of issuing the Budget Statement to the Members say 15 days in advance will commend itself to the Honourable Member in charge, but what I feel is that, if the one day which is allotted for reading the Railway Budget and another day for reading the General Budget are saved, we can have two more days for the general discussion both of the Railway Budget as well as the General Budget. I understand that the average cost of running this legislative farce comes to about Rs. 3,000 or Rs. 5,000 per day

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt (Burdwan Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I beg to protest against the use of the word "farce".

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: So if my suggestion is accepted, it will give us more time to read and digest the papers, and the Honourable Members in charge also will be able to get something substantial from this side by way of criticism and comment.

Now, Sir, I should like to come to another point, and that is about the Railway Standing Finance Committee. I should like to have in future, along with the Budget Statement, a statement showing how many of our non-official Members, who are very keen in canvassing to get into the Railway Standing Committees, actually attended the meetings of the Committees, and what amount of work they have done. We all feel, Sir, that we come here for the love of labour, but I am afraid in some cases it has become a love of honour. I have come across some instances in which one Member is a member of three or four Committees like the Railway Standing Finance Committee, the Public Accounts Committee and so many other Committees, and as most of these Committees meet almost at the same time, he sometimes misses most of them and he is not able to do justice to any one of them. I therefore think that we should establish a sort of convention whereby a Member should not if possible be a member of more than one Standing Committee at a time

Mr. B. Das: But that would not apply to Government nominees.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: It should apply to all. They also stand for the various Committees, and with the solid vote of the Government, they have got a better chance of getting in than we have got on account of our divisions and parties

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indians): They are nominated.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: They are nominated, no doubt; but by the joint voting system and with the solid help of Government they succeed in getting into more than one Committee

Mr. K. C. Neogy: You are perfectly right.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: Now, Sir, we have been furnished with statements about the items which have been passed, but I should like to have a statement of the items which have been rejected. What I mean is this. I want to have a statement of the items which were brought forward by the Government and were not accepted by the Committees, so that we may know if our Standing Committees are merely saying ditto to whatever proposals Government brings forward, or if they are exercising some check on the working, so that we may be in a better position to select our Committees in future.

Then, Sir, I have to make another complaint about the Reports of the Standing Finance Committees. From the copies of the Reports given to us, I find at the back of those Reports the dates on which the Reports of those Committees were printed or published. Some of the Reports were published in December, but they were actually handed to us only this month

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Do you mean the Reports of the Railway Accounts Committee?

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: Yes.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: There is no Railway Finance Committee.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: I can show you from the back of some of these Reports the dates on which the Reports were printed. Some of the meetings were held about two months ago, and the Reports of these Standing Committees were given to us in this month, only a few days ago, along with the papers which were given to us for the supplementary Demands for Grants for expenditure. Now, if the Reports of these Committees were supplied to us as and when they were published, immediately after the Committees were over, we would have a better chance to study the papers and we would also be able to devote more time and attention to such matters and be of some help to the Treasury Benches.

An Honourable Member: You get the Reports in time?

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: No, I got some of these Reports quite recently with the Railway Budget papers which were handed to me only a few days ago, and I find, as I stated before, at the back of those Reports that some of them were printed in December and some in January, but they were all handed to us only last week. Of course, some were printed only last week, and we could not expect those Reports to be handed to us so soon, but my complaint is that the Reports of meetings which were held in December and January were handed to us only last week. (An Honourable Member: "You are right there").

Then, Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Ghuznavi, made a suggestion regarding the presentation of the Budget in the Autumn Session. It is a matter which has been discussed more than once. The statement which was presented to us the other day, and also the speech of the Secretary in the other House say that much depends—about these figures—on a good monsoon. Well, if the time for the presentation of the Budget is altered, and if it is presented after the monsoon is over, I think Honourable Members in charge will be in a better position to give more definite figures than they are able to give us at the present time. I hope the Government will consider this matter seriously and give some serious thought to altering the date of presenting the Budgets, so that they may be able to give more reliable figures instead of giving some figures now and then revising them because, after all, even the revised figures and the other figures are not completely reliable. Everything is explained away by saying that the whole thing is a mere gamble in monsoons. So when we know that the system is bad, I do not see why we should not make an effort to alter the dates of the presentation of the Budgets. In case the Government are not able to do that, it will be better if they prepare the figures only up to 31st December and furnish them in time. So if the Government of India will consider the matter more seriously about altering the dates of the presentation of the Budgets, it will facilitate our work and probably there will be much less criticism on that score.

Now, Sir, so far this is what I have to say to the officials. Now I will turn for a moment to my non-official friends, and that is

Mr. President: Take some other occasion for it.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Accept that suggestion.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: We all know that the officials have got plenty of time; they have all the information at their disposal; they have also armies of Secretaries and battalions of clerks behind them, and they have got every facility in these matters, but we, non-officials, labour under certain difficulties, and we have to fight a very well organised enemy which is opposed to us (An Honourable Member: "Enemy?"), and as such, should we not organise ourselves and carry out our opposition in a more organised form and in a more systematic and effective manner?

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Join some party.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: I had suggested this to my non-official friends on more than one occasion, and that is why I am taking the time of the House to draw their particular attention to it, that we should organise ourselves and form a bureau of information, set up a secretariat

Mr. President: This can be said privately.

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: No, Sir; it is very difficult, and that is why I wish to draw more public attention to the matter and if you have no objection, I should like to say a few words about it. (An Honourable Member: "Please do so.") If we ask the Government, I think they will be in a position to place at our disposal a set of books to form our Library. We must have our own secretariat. (An Honourable Member: "We have got a Library.") Yes, but that Library opens only at 9 A.M. and closes at 5 P.M. and we can do our work only before or after these hours. We are busy all day here attending the House. If our Library is situated in some central place, near, say, the Feroz Shah Road or the Western Hostel, we will be in a better position to consult these books, and for that purpose, if necessary, the Members of the Assembly could, by convention, contribute a fixed sum and organise their secretariat, so that they might offer intelligent and well informed criticism. Parties could be sub-divided into various committees, and different subjects could be allotted to different Members who should be held responsible for each item. If anything is done by the Government Benches on the other side, they should be watched vigilantly and carefully, so that nothing may go unnoticed and unchallenged. Now, as things are, every Member wishes to talk on every subject or item contained in the Budget. Every year, instead of going into all the important heads, only a few heads are taken up, and with the conspiracy of the leaders of the various parties, only half a dozen items are discussed, and the Finance Member also joins in this conspiracy, and on the last day crores of money are voted by the Honourable the President reading these items at a speed of probably 200 or 300 words per minute. I do not see why so many crores of public money should be thrown away like that. As non-official Members, we ought to organise ourselves in such a way that we can present an effective opposition to the Government in such matters. I shall now turn to the Railway Budget.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member's time is up. Sir Hugh Cocke.

Sir Hugh Cocke: The diversions of the Honourable Member (Mr. Pandya) are very interesting, but it did not seem to me that he left time to get down to the details of the Budget very much. I hope, however, he may be able to arrange for the Library here to be open for somewhat longer hours rather than start a new one on the Feroz Shah Road or at any other place which is near the Honourable Member's residence.

Sir, I generally inflict a few remarks on the House on this occasion, and there are always numerous subjects which lend themselves to discussion

[Sir Hugh Cocke.]

Last year, we had a considerable debate on the subject of the new Member of the Railway Board and it is very gratifying to me to hear from the Honourable the Commerce Member that the new appointment has proved very satisfactory and that the problems which were ready and urgent for settlement at his hands in connection with the staff of the railways throughout the country have come forward and been dealt with by him satisfactorily. There is no question whatever that, in a vast network of railways such as we have in India, the staff problems are very numerous and very intricate, particularly in view of the fact that some railways made their own rules in days gone by and now we have reached a stage when everything has got to be assimilated and run on uniform lines. It was a great flaw, I think, in the previous system that one of the Members of the Railway Board, who was supposed to be an expert in traffic or transportation, was occupying a very large amount of his time on labour and staff problems. I am glad to see from the Report that the mechanical part of the railway organisation, repairs and so on, is still progressing and that the costs of repairs on locomotives and carriages are still coming down, which is very largely due, I believe, to the reorganisation of the workshops as a result of the Raven Committee's Report. Few committees have been more beneficial in their tangible results than the Raven Committee has proved to be in connection with the savings in railway workshops. Incidentally in paragraph 8 I do not quite understand why the comparison is made between the figures of November, 1929, and those of the previous quarter. The word "quarter" appears in two places. I should imagine that the comparison would have been made with the previous year. That is a small point. If it is a misprint, it is just as well that it should be corrected.

I come now to the question of the capital expenditure on railways and new projects. It is very disconcerting, and I think very unfortunate, that the course of finance in this country has been such that railway developments have had to be cut down. Of course one has always got to remember in this connection that the extent to which road transport has already been developed for short distances has been very considerable, and to some small extent that may alleviate the pain which is caused by a review of the cutting down of expenditure on new projects in the last few years. I have got three maps in front of me here, which were presented with the Explanatory Memoranda for the last three years. Any one who likes to make a study of these maps may be interested to see the course of the yellow lines, representing lines to be surveyed. Three years ago there was a considerable amount of yellow line. Last year there was a certain amount, but rather less. This year practically all the yellow goes out. With one exception in the north west corner of India, there is no yellow line, and therefore, I suppose, no lines are to be surveyed. I hope the Railway Department is looking ahead. The mere fact that money may not be available at the moment does not seem to me a very adequate reason for not looking ahead and getting on with surveying new lines, so that when money is available they can be pushed forward at a very rapid rate. It is in my view very important that we should go ahead in the future, as we have done in the past, and this curtailment of expenditure is unfortunate, particularly when it happens late in the year. I think it happened twice in 1927 and 1928, and again it has happened this year. It has been suggested that railway debentures could be utilised to raise money, and I should be interested to know what return the Railway Department have got on their new lines in the last five years. When I was on the Standing Finance Committee for Railways, we had frequently estimates put before us of new lines which were to be undertaken, showing a return of 6 to 7 per cent. and we were then borrowing at about 5 per cent. and there was a satisfactory margin of profit. Are we to understand today that there is no margin between the percentage we can earn on our money expended on the construction of new lines and the rate at which we have got to borrow? If there is any margin at all, even though it be a small one, it does seem to me a great mistake that railway expenditure should be cut down. I know, of course, that there is the difficulty of raising money on satisfactory terms. It is not only the railway position which has got to be borne in mind, but if you raise considerable sums at $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. or 6 per cent. it affects the level of all your existing securities and that brings down values in the books of banks and so on, and it makes the position very difficult for such institutions as banks, who have got to write-off very heavy depreciation on their securities. But I do hope that this position will be looked into and it will be frequently reviewed whether it is not possible to raise more money for railways which are likely to be progressive and remunerative. One project in which we in Bombay are particularly interested is the Sind-Bombay connection. References have been made to that frequently in the past, but I still find no yellow line on the map to indicate that any further survey is going to be carried out, and I should like to know whether anything is anticipated in that connection. I know, of course, that in the immediate future expenditure is being cut down, but we are not dealing only with the immediate future today. We are dealing with things that may happen two or three years hence in the matter of capital outlay, and it would be beneficial if some little extension could be made in this map to show what is expected to be done in the course of the next two or three years in connection with railway developments, and not merely confine it to the immediate year in advance.

Sir, we have had the question of the transport of fuel oil frequently before this House, and Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas today has referred also to the transportation of agricultural produce which he urged should be reduced as often and as much as possible. Fuel oil and agricultural produce go very much together because fuel oil is being used more and more by agriculturists for pumps, engines and agricultural machinery, and I hope that that question of fuel oil will be frequently reviewed by the Railway Board. I think it was pointed out a year ago that the cost of a ton of coal from Jherria to Ahmedabad was about one-fifth of the cost of taking an equivalent amount of fuel oil from Bombay to Ahmedabad, a difference which rather staggers one.

Sir, I think that exhausts my few remarks. There is one little suggestion I should like to make and that is on the Memorandum with which we are presented. In this Memorandum one or two more comparisons might be made with previous years instead of Members having to look up the previous books. I think some of these figures should give results for five years instead of merely the actuals of the previous year, the revised Budget for the current year and the Budget for the coming year. I think in the Memorandum given by the Finance Department we are given many more details enabling a review of the figures for about five years instead of just the immediate previous year. We should also be given certain percentages in connection with the net returns on capital and so on, which I have not been able to find in this particular Memorandum.

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Sir, considering the large amount that is involved in this Budget, and considering the time we can get to discuss it during the general discussion, I think I had better follow the dictum of that great American Sage, Ralph Waldo Emerson, which lays down that, so long as our civilization continues to be one of rail roads and steam engines, our wine will burn our mouth. I do not know whether actually the wine of the Honourable the Railway Member burns his mouth, but the representatives of the taxpayers in this House, who are expected to go through reports and pink volumes that are supplied to them within the brief space of twenty-four hours in order to offer an intelligent criticism on the Railway Budget, have to go without any wine whatsoever. It would have been much better if the Honourable the Railway Member had thought it worth his while to accept a Resolution of mine, which I had tabled some years back, but which unfortunately was not balloted. That Resolution was for the abolition of the Railway Board and the establishment of a Famine Board. I see that the Honourable the Railway Member is laughing.

(At this stage Mr. President vacated the Chair, which was taken by Mr. Deputy President.)

Sir, what is laughter to him is death to the 30 crores of people of India. I trust the Honourable the Commerce Member realises that India is mainly an agricultural country where we need the agricultural resources to be better developed and looked after than swift conveyance from one part of the country to another. It may be necessary for our foreign rulers to have means of swift locomotion to shift an army from one place to another to keep the people under their rule, but it does not in any way benefit the masses. When the late Amir Abdur Rahman Khan of Afghanistan who was a very shrewd and wise statesman, and who knew the British rulers of India too well, was requested to have railways in Afghanistan, he replied:

"I do not see the advantage of railroads save and except that they carry a man from one place to another swiftly, but they take away from life one of its greatest pleasures, namely, the pleasures of caravan journey."

What was really in his mind, we do not know, but that was really a very good answer to those who ignore the good of the masses for the convenience of the few. Sir, we need the resources of our agricultural country developed rather than swift conveyance from one part of the country to the other, and the apathy of the Government about the improvement of agriculture and irrigation has brought untold miseries to the masses.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Will you come here in a caravan?

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Yes, certainly.

Sir, people who are brought up in the midst of the sordid material civilization of the West, can hardly appreciate what happiness there was, before foreign invasion, in this sacred land of Aryavarta, the main occupation of whose people was agriculture. Whatever that may be, I can only sympathise with my Honourable friend, Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya, when he speaks of the enormous resources of the Railway Member and the army behind him, one of whom I see laughing. But, Sir, we have to go on with this constitution till we mend it or end it, so I shall try, in the little time that I have at my disposal, to touch upon one or two points of the Railway Budget in the hope of minimising the evils of Government's railway policy.

The first thing that strikes me is the utter indifference shown to the organisations of trade unions of the railway employees. They would have welfare committees of their own, but they would not recognise these unions to the extent we ask them and listen to what these unions have to say to ameliorate the condition of the labourers.

The housing of the low paid staff and menials does not receive the consideration it deserves. There is a curious thing in the two speeches about which my Honourable friend, Mr. Pandya, was so severe, one here and the other in the House of the Elder Statesmen; we find that 25 lakhs has been allotted for the housing of the menial staff in the speech made here, while we find that 51 plus 25 lakhs have been allotted according to the speech made elsewhere. We do not know what is really meant. Probably that 51 lakhs is meant for the higher officials. I would request the Railway Board to take a little more humane view of these things and humanise the Board rather than be hard-hearted in these matters.

Sir, remarks have been made about racial discrimination by some Honourable Members. I will not refer to it in detail. Only yesterday I had occasion to go to the New Delhi station and I found the third class carriages overcrowded throughout the train, while I found in one compartment labelled III only three passengers sitting quite comfortably and making themselves merry. Even first class passengers are not so comfortable. It was reserved for European and Anglo-Indian passengers. I ask, how long are we to put up with such humiliation and insult? Will the Honourable the Railway Member at least give us an assurance on this point that, from to-morrow, such things will not be seen in the railways? I can well understand why the Europeans and the Anglo-Indians find a warm corner in the hearts of the Railway Board. The reason is not far to seek. Does it not remind us, Indians, that here are the men who claim to be our trustees and who allow the Indians to be overcrowded in the third class compartments, while they themselves are enjoying themselves and laughing? If the Railway Board are really honest on this point, and if they want to do away with racial discrimination, I hope the Honourable the Commerce Member will see his way to put an end to this humiliation at an early date.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: It is a sartorial discrimination and not racial discrimination.

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: I know my Honourable friend's speech on that point and every one appreciates that. What hurts us most is that they have one rule for Europeans and Anglo-Indians and another for us, as if we are inferior fellows. We have cried ourselves hoarse over the subject and I do not wish to repeat it.

One other point that I wish to bring to the notice of the Honourable the Commerce Member is about third class return tickets. The first class passengers, who can afford to purchase their tickets twice without any difficulty at the booking office, are given the convenience of a return ticket, while poor third class passengers, who have to undergo great hardship at the third class booking office, are denied this convenience of a return ticket. The first thing that the Honourable the Commerce Member should do is to diminish the overcrowding in the booking offices and to order the introduction of third class return tickets, for after all it is the third class passengers who are the main support of the railways. Why should the first and second class passengers have this privilege and not the third class passengers? Even intermediate class passengers are allowed return tickets, while they are totally denied to third class passengers. I do not understand the logic of it.

I have also to draw the attention of the Railway Member to the quality of food that is supplied at the railway stations. We very often hear nowadays about the necessity for the improvement and preservation of the health of Indians. Adulterated food supplied at the railway stations is really undermining the health of Indians. The Railway Administration ought to be ashamed of the adulterated food that is supplied at the railway stations. I know how these vendors are allowed into the railways. I know of a vendor in my own town of Burdwan, which is very famous for its sweets

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee (Nominated: Indian Christians): Why don't you supply all the Members with sweets?

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: I shall certainly send them to each and every Member, provided these grievances are redressed. I know a vendor who had to pay Rs. 400 a month in order to get this monopoly to vend refreshments at a station. An honest inquiry will at once prove this. These people, after having to pay an enormous sum for the securing of the monopoly, supply such poisonous things at the station that it is really impossible to take them. Those who are not accustomed to other kinds of catering than the catering of these vendors have necessarily to take their food at the hands of these caterers. Orthodox Hindus like myself can take food only from these caterers at the railway stations. Those who take food at the European refreshment rooms have no knowledge as to how things are getting on so far as these vendors are concerned. It is the levy of these illegal fees that is responsible for making the vendors sell unwholesome food. Will the Honourable the Railway Member kindly inquire into these things and put a stop to them?

As regards Indianisation of the superior services, we find that it is the covenanted men from abroad that fill these positions. I hope that this will cease if the Honourable the Commerce Member really wants to Indianise the services. We find that the higher appointments are generally reserved for Europeans and Anglo-Indians. (Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: "No, no.") My friend, Colonel Gidney, says that it is not so. Sir, there has been a consistent demand on the part of several minority communities for proper representation in the various services. I have great sympathy for these minority communities, but if they will kindly look at one minority community, probably the smallest in India, they will find that at every railway station the members of that community are installed as Station Masters and Assistant Station Masters, drawing salaries of three, four or five hundred rupees. Will the Honourable the Home Member (Laughter)—it is a matter for the Home Member also, because it breeds sedition and disaffection, of which he is the person to take note, and the Railway Member has nothing to do with it,—but will the Railway Member point out to me a single instance of an Indian, drawing Rs. 500 as a Station Master? (An Honourable Member: "Anglo-Indians are Indians.") Yes, they are Indians by courtesy. Whenever there are services reserved for Indians and they want to get into them, they become statutory natives of India; for instance the Deputy Superintendents of Police. But for the purpose of those services where Indians are not wanted, they become Europeans. (Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: "It is absolutely not true.") It is absolutely true if you will only look at the Civil List of any province, and I can give you instances which it is unnecessary to do.

Then, Sir, one of the suggestions I wish to offer is that the strategic lines should be taken away from the Railway Budget and should be transferred to the military expenditure of the country, because really, in the name of railway expenditure, military expenditure is brought in here and we are hoodwinked about the real military expenditure of our country.

Another fact which the Honourable the Railway Member can find out for himself if he makes inquiries, is that foreigners generally take prospective leases of mines and other things in certain provinces. When they find that there is every prospect of getting a good dividend, they at once get a monopoly of the mines and then we find—I do not know whether they are related to each other as cause and effect—we find a scheme for a railway from the nearest railway station to the place finding a place in the Railway Budget.

Mr. Deputy President: The Honourable Member has now reached the limit of his time.

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Sir, our suspicion is that these people have a hand in the framing of the detailed plans and estimates for the next year of construction. Such important lines as the Dacca-Aricha line have been shelved. Another line about which I have been asking questions—I do not find the Financial Commissioner here—for two long years and about which we are told that they will consider it, is the extension of the Bankura Damodar River Railway to the town of Burdwan and Arambagh from Sehara connecting two districts.

Mr. Deputy President: Will the Honourable Member now bring his remarks to a close?

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Yes, Sir. I wish they will take note of these two lines and see that they are constructed.

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad (United Provinces Southern Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg leave to draw the attention of the Assembly to five points this morning, and I will leave the detailed discussion of the Budget till the voting of Demands. The points which I want to raise are, firstly, administration either by a Company or by the State; secondly, the separation of the finance; thirdly, the purchase of the materials; fourthly, the education of the sons of the employees who are posted in the small stations where there are no schools; and fifthly, some kind of supervision of the comforts of the passengers who travel on these railways.

As regards the first point, this question was raised by Sir Austen Chamberlain when he was the Secretary of State for India. He at one time was of opinion that the State should own the railways, but the Companies should administer them. Thanks to the Indian members of the

India Office, and particularly to Sir Abbas Ali Baig, Sir Austen Chamberlain changed his opinion, and the administration of the railways was handed over to the State. Now I quite appreciate the feelings of Englishmen when they favour the Company administration. They see the efficient administration in their own country and they also see the comparatively inefficient State-management in France. But the circumstances in India are quite different from the circumstances in England. In England principal stations are connected by three or four different lines, and there is strong competition between the different companies. In India, if you go from one place to another, very often you will find that there is one and only one line along which you have to travel. The second thing is that the central administration is not located in the country itself, but the central body is situated 5,000 miles away in London, and they do not appreciate the conveniences of passengers. They do not know what is going on except what is telegraphed to them by the Agent. On account of these two facts, it is essential that the State should own, maintain, and administer the railways of this country. Attention has been drawn to the bad arrangements of the Bengal and North Western Railway. Fortunately or unfortunately that is the only line by which I can approach my constituency, and as I had to travel for several weeks on this line, I have seen with my own eyes the discomforts into which the passengers are thrown. In the shivering cold nights, when rain was pouring, I found third class passengers sitting in the open. There were no eatables to buy and there was no shelter for them. I have seen with my own eyes passengers travelling on the top of the railway train, and I have seen with my own eyes passengers travelling all the way from Allahabad to Chapra on the footsteps of the train. If the Honourable the Railway Member will travel, not in his own saloon, but as an ordinary third class passenger in the Bengal and North Western Railway, he will come back to this Assembly and vote with both hands in favour of the proposition that the contract with this Railway should cease tomorrow.

The second point to which I should like to draw attention is the complete separation of the Railway Budget from the General Budget. I maintain that the Assembly is the Governing Body of all the State Railways. We should have our separate reserves, and we should declare how much money we are able to give to the Finance Member for the general expenditure of the Indian administration. It is not for the Finance Member to extract as much money as he needs from the railway funds and even to draw from its Reserve Fund. The Legislative Assembly ought to determine the amount to be put into the Reserve Fund, and the amount to be handed over to the Finance Member for general expenditure. The Assembly should have the determining voice in deciding the amount to be borrowed for the extension of the railways. Attention has already been drawn to the new schemes, and I would very much like the new schemes to be pushed on as far as possible, and if money is not available in the Reserve, we might borrow the money for this particular purpose.

1 P.M. The third point which I should like to mention is the system of purchases. Now, the Railway Department is the biggest purchaser on behalf of the Government. I do not know all the details, but my attention was drawn to some of the inside things that happen in the High Commissioner's Office. Of course I do not want to discuss this aspect today. I may have a separate discussion on this particular point later on, and I would try and induce the Assembly to agree with me that these Advisory Committees ought to be abolished. (Hear, hear.) But today I maintain that the High Commissioner is not the representative of India. He is the representative of Whitehall, and therefore the purchasing committee ought not to be placed in London; it ought to be placed in India. (Hear, hear.) On the question of purchase I want to maintain three principles. The first is that, whoever may be the authority to purchase the material for the railways, that authority or committee should be in India and not in London. The second principle that I should like to maintain is that everything that we require ought to be purchased in India, and I should like to have a certificate from some competent man that those articles which we are purchasing from outside India are the articles which cannot be manufactured or cannot be obtained in this country. This certificate is essential. Whatever we can purchase in this country, we ought to purchase here, and even if we have to bring in large machines, we ought to purchase the parts from outside and fit them here in our own workshops which the Railway Board may open. The third principle which I would like to maintain is that no order ought to be placed in the hands of any firm or any manufacturer unless that firm or manufacturer undertakes to train at least two Indians in his firm in the use and the repairs of the machinery. That is the method which was adopted by Japan, and unless we adopt this method, there will be no hope for our young engineers to get practical training in any European country. The only way in which we can provide practical training is to insist on the firms, from whom we purchase, training at least two of our young men. These young men may be selected by the method which I will discuss later on, but not today. The young men ought to be trained in the use and the repair of the machinery. If this is done, it will be possible for us to go substantially a few steps further and it will be a great gain not only to the Indian revenues but also to the students.

The fourth point which I should like to discuss is about the education of the sons of the railway servants who are posted at small stations where there are no schools. I know that a scheme of this kind is in progress, and I would like to hear from Mr. Hayman or some other Railway Member who is in charge of education, how the scheme is developing. I have repeatedly heard the complaint that the persons posted in small places have great difficulties in providing suitable education for their children. Their salaries are not big enough to enable them to send their children to big towns and defray the expenditure.

Now, the last point which I would like to discuss is with regard to better supervision over the comforts of the passengers. We know there is a law everywhere that if more than three persons sit in an ekka, the ekkawallah is at once prosecuted. Some people may say that this rule was framed simply because we do not want to do cruelty to animals. But I say, no, this is not the case. The rule is made and enforced for the safety and comforts of the public. The same rule exists in the case of lorries. No lorry is allowed to carry more than a certain number of passengers, and if any lorry takes more than the prescribed number, the lorry driver or conductor is at once prosecuted. The railway trains are bigger lorries, and it is the duty of the State to look after the comforts of their passengers. I would extend the principle of ekkas and lorries to the railways. They are all in the same position. No compartment should carry more than the prescribed number. If a certain compartment is labelled to carry 12 passengers and if more than 12, say 13 or 14 are thrust into that particular compartment, then some railway man ought to be prosecuted under the law of the country. (Hear, hear.) In this sense the law is defective and there ought to be some provision in the Railway Act under which, if any servant of the Railway tries to thrust more than the prescribed number of passengers in any compartment, he should be liable to punishment by the Court, not by the Railway authority, but by the ordinary Court of the district.

Now the other thing I want to say is this. We are very particular about the comforts of first class and second class passengers. I would like to hear from the representative of the Railway Board whether the first class traffic is a paying concern. I would like to know whether I am correct in saying that the first class traffic is a losing concern, the second class traffic is a losing concern, that the intermediate class traffic just pays its way, and that the third class traffic is really a gain to the railways and it really pays the deficit made by the first and second class traffic. Am I right?

Mr. M. S. Aney (Berar Representative): Yes.

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: That being so, it is only natural that we should try to look after the comforts of our highest paying customers. Every business man does so. Our Railway Board is very unbusinesslike. The first and second class persons, who are really the losing customers, are looked after well and the people who are really paying customers are entirely ignored. I think it will pay the Company—I do not speak from the strategic point of view, but I consider it only from the financial and business point of view—it will pay the Railway Board to say respectfully to every first and second class passenger, “We will pay you double your fare if you give up the idea of travelling in the first or second class and travel in the third class”. It will be a paying proposition to the railways, if first and second class passengers are induced to accept a fee and consent to travel in the third class.

The other thing is about the comforts in travelling and the comforts about the meals, and the comforts about the waiting rooms for the third class passengers. There I think it is very desirable to have—if I may use the word, borrowing it from finance—special audit of the traffic. We know that it is the principle in accounts that the auditor is always a different person and has no concern whatever with the accountant or the financier. He is independent of them. Now at present the Inspectors who look after the comforts of the passengers are also appointed by the railway people and therefore they do not criticise the actions of their colleagues in their own Department. It is very desirable to establish a new Department altogether—certainly not under the Agent—and I would prefer that this Department may not be under the Railway Member, but it may be directly under the Home Member. (Laughter.) This Department, which I called Audit Department of the traffic, should report any person, whether an Agent or a subordinate officer, who disregards the rules framed for the comfort of the passengers, or thrusts a large number of men in a carriage. If the audit officer finds insufficient light or insufficient latrine accommodation, or insufficient water supply at the railway station or in the carriages, he should be able to draw the attention of the railway authorities through the civil authorities, i.e., the Collectors and Magistrates, and not through the officers of the Railway Department.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Do you want dyarchy in railways?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: An Honourable Member asks me if I am trying to introduce dyarchy in railway administration. There are certain matters where a kind of dyarchy prevails, for example, the case of audit. The audit department is quite a separate department from the accountants' department. The auditor draws the attention of the proper authorities to the fact that such and such a thing is or is not against the rule. If the audit officer, who looks after the comfort of passengers is placed under the Railway Department, he is not likely to discharge his duties to the passengers satisfactorily. If he carries on his duties independently and enforces the rules incorporated in the Railway Act, under civil administration, he will have better chances to secure the comforts of the passengers.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Sir, I should like to refer, in the briefest possible manner, to three points before I deal with the main subjects to which I desire to call the attention of the House today. The first of these three points to which I wish to refer is that relating to the early termination of the contract with the Bengal and North Western Railway. I join the other Honourable Members in pressing on Government to take over this line as soon as possible. Perhaps I am quite as familiar with this line as my Honourable friend Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh who comes from Bihar, and I can honestly testify to the accuracy of all the encomiums that have been showered upon it in this House. I have in my experience known no line that can compare with it in the attention that it pays to the comforts of the passengers.

The second point, Sir, to which I wish to refer, is the case of teachers in Indian railway high schools. I asked the Honourable the Railway Member a question about it the other day, in reply to which I was assured that, as promised last year, provision would be made for enforcing the provincial scales of pay from the 1st April, 1929. I should have liked the Honourable Member either to enlighten us in his speech or to give some information to us in the Explanatory Memorandum with regard to the steps taken by Government to carry out the promise given by them about a year ago. But, apart from this, Sir, I understand that the East Indian Railway is trying, despite the orders of the Railway Board, to introduce a scale of pay different from that which prevails in the provinces. Perhaps, to be more accurate, I should say that an attempt is being made in the United Provinces to go against the express instructions of the Railway Board. I met some time ago a member of the managing committee of a railway high school in the United Provinces, and I was told that the committee had been asked to prepare its estimates on the basis of a scale recommended by the Director of Public Instruction of the United Provinces, but very different from that recommended by the Railway Board itself. I should like to know, Sir, what is the control which the Railway Board exercise over railways subordinate to them if this can happen under their very noses and despite their repeated instructions. I trust, Sir, that this matter will be speedily looked into by the Honourable the Railway Member and that he will see that the spirit of his promise is carried out to the fullest extent at the earliest possible date. Another point which should be considered in this connection, Sir, is with regard to the men to whom the provincial scales are to be applicable. I can understand, Sir, when

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

new scales have been laid down, that particular qualifications should be required of future entrants, but I cannot understand the justice of such a demand from men already in the service of the railways. The United Provinces Government, when they reorganised their educational services, made no distinctions between existing men, whatever their qualifications, and I trust that the same principle will be followed by the Railway Department in applying the provincial scales of pay to teachers already employed in railway high schools.

The third point to which I wish to draw attention is that which has already been referred to by my Honourable friend, Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad. I should like to know what the Government have done with regard to the provision of educational facilities for the children of railway employees. The question has been hanging fire for about two years. I drew attention to it last year, and I was told that the matter would be considered in consultation with the Central Advisory Council for Railways. I know that my Honourable friend, Mr. Aney, has taken the keenest interest in this subject, but even he cannot tell me that any definite advance has been made during the last twelve months. All that he has been able to tell me is that, despite his best efforts, no move forward has been made in this connection.

Sir, I should now like to deal with the two main points which it is my purpose to place before the House today. The first point with which I am concerned is the state of the railway finances. In this connection, Sir, I have unfortunately to voice a complaint which was uttered by me last year in this House. It was suggested last year that, in order to facilitate the comparison of figures relating to the income and expenditure of the railways, we should be supplied with estimates of the income and expenditure of lines that are newly constructed. I asked that the accounts for branch lines, which are already prepared in accordance with the instructions of the Railway Board, should be laid before the House. My Honourable friend, Mr. Parsons, said that there would be no objection to that, but I am sorry to note that the information which he promised has not been supplied to the House. Not having, Sir, that information at our disposal which would enable us to institute accurate comparisons, I must take the figures as I find them. I should like to compare the growth of income and expenditure since the separation of Railway finances, but I shall start with the year 1925-26 for the simple reason that the year 1924-25 was an exceptionally good year for the railways, and I do not want to institute a comparison which would be particularly unfavourable to the Railway Board. In 1925-26 the gross traffic receipts amounted to about 98 crores. Now, if we take the corresponding figures for 1930-31, we find that it is a little over Rs. 106 crores. But to this we have to add a sum of about Rs. 60 lakhs, because of the change made in the manner of accounting for higher charges and payments from one railway to another. We thus find that the total revenue for the coming year is expected to be about Rs. 106½ crores; in other words, the increase in revenue, including lines purchased by the State since 1925-26, is about Rs. 8½ crores. Now if we take the figures for expenditure on the same basis, we find that expenditure has grown at a much larger rate. When I refer to expenditure, I mean the working expenses, including depreciation charges, and interest charges. In the year 1925-26 these two items accounted for a little over Rs. 86 lakhs. In the coming year, making the adjustment I have already pointed out, the expenditure would be about Rs. 98½ crores. That is, the expenditure would show a rise of about 12½ crores. In other words, the growth in expenditure about 9 crores of which is due to interest and depreciation charges and the rest in what may be called the working expenses proper, has outrun the growth in income by about 4 crores. Now, I do not forget the fact, to which attention was drawn by my Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy, in presenting his Budget, that reductions have been made in rates and fares during the last five or six years and which have resulted in a loss of revenue of about 5 crores.

(At this stage Mr. President resumed the Chair.)

Sir, I am perfectly prepared to take this figure into account. But my Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy, will not contend that none of the reductions which have so far been made have borne fruit. I will, however, admit for the present that four crores out of the five have been entirely lost, that is they have not brought about that expansion of traffic and revenue which the Railway Member expected. This shows that the growth in revenue just balances the growth in expenditure.

There is, however, one more circumstance to be accounted for, and that is the provision made for income-tax, I believe for the first time last year, under the pressure of the Finance Department. The figure last year was about 58 lakhs. I do not know what it is this year, but probably it is in the neighbourhood of half a crore. All that we can say therefore is that, as a result of the heavy expenditure incurred by us, we have been able to increase our revenue only by about half a crore.

But this does not give a complete idea of our railway finances. We have also to take into account the provision made for the reduction or avoidance of debt in the General Budget. A large proportion of the provision made for the extinction of the productive debt is on account of money borrowed for the railways. I do not remember the exact figure provided on this account, but I should not be surprised if it were well over Rs. 3 crores. In the second place, we have to take into account the rise in the exchange from 16d. to 18d. I do not wish to go into past controversies, but it is impossible, in considering the present state of our finances, to overlook so important a matter. I have no desire to be like the cuttle-fish, spreading gloom. I do not want to give the House an unduly pessimistic view of our finances, but it would be idle to contend, on a review of the figures that I have just placed before the House, that our position is as sound as we should like it to be.

I should have liked, Sir, to dwell briefly on the growth of our working expenses, and in particular to discuss the figures relating to repairs and maintenance charges, for I could illustrate by reference to them, the point that I wish to impress upon this House with regard to the growth of expenditure but I have no time for it. I will, therefore, conclude this portion of my remarks by saying that, while I do not wish to suggest that the expenditure that we have incurred is wholly unproductive or lost, it is fair to infer, I think, that our capital programme has been proceeded with so rapidly that we have not had time so far to get any return on the capital that we have invested in it. It is time that we went slower and paid more attention to the development of our existing resources. I am particularly glad, therefore, that my Honourable friend, the Railway Member, announced in his speech that there would be stricter control of railway expenditure both on the revenue and the capital side, in consultation with the Finance Member in future. The information which he has given us on the subject, however, is exceedingly scrappy and I should like to know what were the points in which the present arrangements were found to be defective and how it is proposed to remove the existing defects. I should also like, in this connection, to know the exact position of my Honourable friend, the Financial Commissioner. Have the reforms that are now to be enforced been accepted by the Government of India under the pressure of the new Finance Member, or are they the result of the suggestions put forward in the past by the Financial Commissioner, who is supposed to be a watch-dog of the Finance Department?

Sir, the state of our railway finances is intimately connected with another topic which is the last one to which I should like to draw the attention of the House and which will entail no little expenditure if the railways are to have a contented body of public workers. It became apparent some time ago that there was a great deal of unrest prevailing among railway employees. Even those of us who are not formally connected with the Railway Department came to know about a year and a half ago that this unrest was assuming an acute form. My Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy, received a memorandum from the General Council of the All-India Railwaymen's Federation on the subject in September or October, 1928, and a deputation waited on him in that connection in May last. My Honourable friend promised an inquiry into the grievances laid before him by this deputation. I think the points were twenty-four in number, and they ranged from such important things as wages and hours of work and security of tenure, to the supply of uniforms and travelling allowances and such other things. Now, I can understand my Honourable friend taking time to look into these things, but in the first place, I fear that the Railway Board did not wake up to the reality of the situation early enough. It might have taken a leaf out of the book of the Posts and Telegraphs Department and tried to deal at an early date with that unrest, which, wisely handled in that Department, has fortunately for us almost completely subsided. In the second place, as in the political, so in the economic sphere, it is impossible for those who have grievances to wait indefinitely for their redress; and if Government wish to have a contented body of workers, they must take account of the changed conditions and try to proceed much faster than they have done in the past. Sir, the failure of the Government so far to satisfy the grievances of the railwaymen has resulted already in a strike. What methods should now be taken to put an end to the present state of things and to restore amity between workers and employers on our railways? It has been suggested by various bodies and also in the public Press that the Government ought to appoint a conciliation board to settle the dispute between the Great Indian Peninsula Railway men and the Government. Now, Sir, the demands put forward by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway men are the demands placed before the Honourable the Railway Member by the deputation of the All-India Railwaymen's Federation in May last. If therefore a settlement is to be arrived at which would pacify all railway men, I do not see that the particular solution recommended in certain quarters will prove of much avail. It may be that a conciliation board will be able to settle the quarrel existing between the Government and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway men. But the question being a much wider one, Government ought to see that their solution is one which would be accepted by railway men all over India. Besides, Sir, if attempts are made only to settle the dispute which has become acute, an impression might be created on other railways that their grievances would not be listened to unless they too resorted to strikes. On both these grounds, therefore, Sir, I for my part prefer another solution. The Honourable the Railway Member ought to get into touch with the representatives of the body which deals with the grievances of railway workers on behalf of railway men all over India, I mean the All-India Railway Men's Federation, and in consultation with them arrive at a settlement which would be fair to the State and fair to the interests of the employees as well.

The subject, Sir, is an important one, but I cannot go into it at any length on this occasion.

I will only say, Sir, before I sit down, that it must be apparent to the dullest intellect that the times are fast changing. Unless we take the bull by the horns, we may be confronted with a situation which we may find it impossible to deal with with all the resources at our disposal. The Government must take their courage in both hands and approach the problem of workers in this country in the spirit in which His Majesty's Government are today trying to solve the problem of unemployment and its relief in their own country.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, I enter this discussion with mixed feelings, feelings of pleasure in as much that I feel I can genuinely congratulate the Honourable Member in charge of Railways on presenting the Budget he has done this year, faced as he was with many obstacles and great handicaps—sadness or if I may say, apprehension as far as the future of the Anglo-Indian and domiciled European community on the railways is concerned. Any one who has the honour and privilege of knowing the Honourable Member in charge of Railways will join me in saying that he is one of the most sincere friends of India and a well-wisher of every railway man, be he European, Anglo-Indian or Indian and speaking personally on behalf of my community—I use no idle words but plain language—when I say that we trust in him implicitly for he has always looked after our interests. Handicapped as he has been, he has presented a Budget this year in which he has been able to add 2½ crores to the Reserve Fund, I mean after certain deductions have been made. I am not an accountant nor am I an auditor. I am purely a labour Member representing the needs of about 15 to 17 thousand Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans on the railway and the first point I desire to draw attention to is the hobby, or shall I call it the policy, that has been lately inaugurated by the Railway

[Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney.]

Board, I would not say since its birth in 1905, but, since the fever of nationalisation of railways has almost overpowered it. I think I can safely date it to 1925. It was in that fateful year the Railway Board purchased three of the biggest railways in India and placed them under State Control, but at the same time they were able to carry on with their new extensions. Since then they have indulged, if I may say so, in a policy of buying second hand furniture, in the shape of second class railways. Within the last two years, they have bought two more railways, the Burma Railway and the Southern Punjab Railway, with an anticipated annual additional revenue of 95 lakhs but, at what cost? The closing down of almost all important new railway constructions and other retrenchments of all senior staff and the discharge of thousands of workmen. Now, Sir, this policy of the Railway Board is open to serious objection. I want to know how they have been able to find the money for the purchase of these railways? By indenting on the Reserve Fund? If so, then the question arises—was the Reserve Fund inaugurated for the purpose of purchasing second hand railways, or was it mainly constituted with the object of helping railways in lean years, to be able to pay their annual dues into General revenues, as also to supply money if needed when new tariffs were introduced. What do we find, Sir? The Railway Board have utilised its Reserve Fund for the purchase of railways. Not content with the railways at present in its keeping, they have added to them, and in doing so, they have increased their responsibilities, their staff, their management, repairs, etc., Would it not have been better to use this money to ameliorate the grievances of their workmen? I think it was Sir Henry Burt, a well-known railway authority, who, when discussing the Indian railway situation a short while ago, described the policy of the Railway Board of purchasing new railways as extravagant expenditure which stood possessed of two main objects. One was the augmenting of its finances, and the other was to speed up Indianisation of the services. I agree with every word that Sir Henry Burt has said, as judged by the policy of the Railway Board today. To my mind it is very doubtful, Sir, whether this purchase of old railways is more beneficial than continuing and completing our new constructions which you have already projected, and others which have been partly laid down. Personally I think the policy of buying old railways is a wrong one. (An Honourable Member: "Question.")

Now, Sir, this leads me to my second point and that is the Reserve Fund. We have heard such a lot about this mysterious Railway Reserve Fund. Members have today criticised it. I have no desire to emulate them, but I do desire to point out to the Railway Board that this Reserve Fund has been improperly used. I understand that the major part of it has been used by the general revenues of the Government of India as an advance. Be that as it may, we hear it frequently said that the Railway Administration of this country is a first class going concern, a first class investment, etc., etc. I have not the faintest doubt that they are excellent institutions, but I have my doubts if this policy of purchasing old railways and nationalising them is to our benefit and the wisest course to pursue. You have on the one side of this tragedy a Reserve Fund that has been built up during the past few years owing to good monsoons. Most of this money has been spent in various ways. Then in those years in which a good surplus is shown we have the capitalists and the industrialists demanding a reduction in goods rates. Alongside of them we have the sentimentalists in this House shouting "reduce third class fares". Why? The President of this year's Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce has blamed the present fiscal policy for the labour unrest of today. On the other side one hears today the wail of hundreds of thousands of workmen shouting out "we want more pay", "we want more food", "we want more rest" and "we want better houses" and between these two—the capitalist and the workmen—are dangled the money bags of the Reserve Fund. I ask, has not the workman the first claim on any surplus money and would it not be more profitable to use this money to ameliorate his lot rather than to purchase second-hand railways or appease the ever hungry capitalists? I submit, the workman has the first call on surplus money and this is the policy the Railway Board should follow. Speaking personally I know of no body of workmen who today stand in more urgent need of amelioration and more pay than the under paid, under fed and under clad railway workman. I stand today, Sir, a convert to him and his needs and an ardent advocate of his cause. I submit, Sir, that this matter should be seriously considered by the Railway Board and I would suggest to the Railway Member, that each railway should be allowed a certain percentage of its profits annually to be used to ameliorate the lot and the grievances of its workmen.

I now pass on to a very important subject: the question of labour unions. I have been with the Labour Commission a little over four months. Except the South, I have toured almost the whole of India and I have heard the opinions of the Agents of six of the biggest Railways in India with regard to labour unions. Four of these Agents merely tolerate the existence of these unions on their Railways, but are really hostile to them. One Agent (Eastern Bengal Railway) is more sympathetic and willing to co-operate with them, but the one Agent who stands out as the exception to the rest has openly said he is in great sympathy with the railway unions. That officer is the Agent of the Railway, which, I regret to say, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas has today decried. I refer to the Bengal Nagpur Railway. The result of this Agent's sympathetic attitude is that the Bengal Nagpur Railway today got its own union consisting of men who elect their own office bearers. There is no official interference. True, it is called a welfare committee, but it operates as a union which is recognised, helped and guided by the railway officers, and the result is that this Railway is one of the happiest railways in India. I can hear some people on the other side murmuring at my remarks and I also see Mr. Das is looking at me with surprise on his face. I know he does not belong to the Advisory Committee of that Railway now and that he does not like it, but let me tell him that the Bengal Nagpur Railway today has a union working in it.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Lucknow Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Which railway do you mean?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: The Bengal Nagpur Railway.

Munshi Iswar Saran: But Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas spoke about the Bengal and North-Western Railway.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I am sorry, I apologise to him. I misheard him. Sir, this Railway has lately had some disturbance in its workshops, of a sectional nature, but thanks to the good offices of my friend,

[Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney.]

Diwan Chaman Lall, who with officers of the union met the Agent, and the disputes have been amicably settled. I hold up the attitude of the Bengal Nagpur Railway as an object lesson to those die-hard Agents who refuse to recognise them. Sir, the question of railway unions is of great importance to Railways and to India. I can even appreciate certain Agents being hostile to railway unions. I can also realise that the Agent of the East Indian Railway has solid reasons for being hostile to certain railway unions. But, the times have changed and there appears no need for his wholesale hostility today to the railway unions. As a matter of fact, he appeared supremely indifferent to unions judging from certain remarks he made before the Commission. But I say again I can realise his fear of communists controlling his unions, because there is no doubt that he has had grave reasons to suspect certain of his railway unions especially the one at Khagole and to certain extent the Lillooah unions of communistic activities. Now, Sir, while I agree that certain unions have been a danger in the past, I am bound to admit that since those strikes took place many vital changes have happened in Indian railway unions, the chief event being the rupture in the Federation of Indian Railway Unions that took place in Nagpur last year. Out of that rupture a Railway Labour Party has been evolved, led by certain moderate labour leaders, such as Diwan Chaman Lall and Mr. Joshi who have determined to organise and to control railway labour unions on sound constitutional lines entirely devoid of communistic tendencies or principles. I have personally seen evidence of this policy, because I joined Diwan Chaman Lall in a recent movement in which we amicably settled a very important labour dispute on the Bengal Nagpur Railway. These leaders have also recently shown other evidence of moderate views and intentions. Now, Sir, I look upon such conduct as a gesture on the part of these labour leaders, a real, friendly gesture to administer labour unions on constitutional lines. Will the Railway Board respond or not is the question. There are certain railway agents who say they will not tolerate railway unions if they have any outsiders as their leaders. Now, Sir, why is it that railway unions want outside leaders to guide and lead them? Firstly, because the railway workman as a class is not an educated man. Secondly, the educated Indian official or upper subordinate who might be prepared to fill the role of a leader is too frightened to do so. He fears his job, he fears victimization, and I stand here today and openly say that victimization has been practised on labour leaders by certain Railway Agents. The many memoranda presented to the Labour Commission show instances of such victimization, and it is for this reason I say that the gesture given by Diwan Chaman Lall and Mr. Joshi is one that the Railway Board should notice and reciprocate whole-heartedly.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must now conclude his observations.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: It is a gesture that, I think, the Railway Board should follow up in that they should not allow opposing committees to be continued. My suggestion is this. The Railway Board should issue instructions to every Agent to close down his Welfare Committees and to make an honest, serious and sympathetic attempt to open out railway unions and to lead their men on the right lines of trade unionism, so that their unions may be a help to them and be of mutual benefit. I offer this suggestion for the serious consideration of the Railway Board. Time does not allow me to refer to many more points. I would, however, refer only to one more fact, and that is my sadness amounting to apprehension as far as the future of the Anglo-Indian and domiciled European community on railways is concerned. I shall not be able to deal at length on this very important point because time presses, but, I should like to inform the Railway Board that a most serious condition has arisen on the East Indian Railway, a railway which in my opinion is more discontented and where there is more unrest than any other railway in India. The trouble is the result of the revised rates of pay that have been introduced since 1928. These rates affect every railway employee, be he an Indian, a European or an Anglo-Indian. These rates have been called the co-ordinated rates of pay and are supposed to be a fair mean of the wages earned by both the East Indian and former Oudh and Rohilkund Railways. To my mind this is a wrong conception of facts. A study of the Bombay Labour Gazette will show that the difference between the cost of living between the years 1926 and 1928 was 5 per cent. only. But these revised rates of pay in 1928, as contrasted with the rates of pay in 1926, show a reduction in wages in some cases of from 45 to 7 per cent. in the minimum or initial salaries and 50 to 10 per cent. in the maximum salaries. Europeans and Anglo-Indians, who are expected to clothe, feed and maintain themselves as useful members of the Auxiliary Force are expected on the East Indian Railway to join as firemen on Rs. 15 to Rs. 18 a month and as cleaners on Rs. 10 (I have this order with me). A railway ticket collector gets a pay of Rs. 28 a month and he is expected to deport himself similarly. Even an Indian cannot live on that wage. How can the Railway Board expect an Anglo-Indian or a European to live on such a pittance, which is less than what a domestic sweeper gets. I would therefore beg of the Railway Board to reconsider this question of 1928 revised pay. It has caused considerable consternation among the members of all the communities on the East Indian Railway, be they Indians, Europeans or Anglo-Indians. I ask the Railway Board in their own interests and in the interests of the community that has served them so well and loyally to reconsider these rates of pay and to allow the 1926 rates to be reintroduced for the time being. In the meantime appoint a committee to investigate the question, but do not tell your employees, as is often heard, "If you do not like the pay, you can go elsewhere." I know the Honourable Member for the Railways has always given us a square deal in the past and I am confident he will do so again. Before I resume my seat, I again ask the Railway Board to consider the very important services that the Anglo-Indian and domiciled European community has rendered and not to drive it out of railway employment, as these impossible rates invite them to do, for in doing so the Railway Administration in India will be the greater sufferers. I beg of you not to deride a community that has helped your administration to be always railed and kept on the rails no matter what the crisis has been.

Mr. H. P. Mody (Bombay Millowners' Association: Indian Commerce): Sir, the best thing that could be said about the Budget which has been presented to this House is that it is very much what most people expected, and what I have no doubt my Honourable friend the Member for Railways intended it to be, namely, a somewhat cheerless and colourless statement. Now, the great advantage of presenting a gloomy picture of one's finances is that it effectually chokes off all attempts at demanding any measures of relief, or expenditure on items that urgently call for attention. But,

[Mr. H. P. Mody.]

Sir, I am not going to be deterred by the Budget that has been presented from pressing upon the Honourable the Railway Member the desirability of reducing freights on the movement of commodities from one province to another. It is precisely in times like these, when trade and industry are depressed, that you feel the insistent necessity of reducing freights and helping industries. I should like to remind my Honourable friend that it was in a period of very considerable financial difficulties that the Conservative Government introduced their derating scheme, which was tantamount to making a present of several millions of pounds to the industries in England. If that form of assistance was called for in England with its high burden of taxation, it is much more called for in India at the present moment when trade and industry are in a much worse position than they have been for a very long time. I would like to urge upon the Honourable Member that aspect of the question. I cannot say that the railway reserves are in any way extravagant, but I do say that they are more than adequate to permit of a certain depletion, if it is found that by reduction of freights and rates the reserves have got to be drawn upon. My Honourable friend said with regard to one or two items that reduction in freights has been justified by larger receipts. I would like him precisely at this time of depression to try that experiment a little further and to see if the larger traffic that he would get would not make up for the loss arising from lower rates

In this connection, I should like to press upon Government the desirability of revising their policy and instituting a scientific tariff. It is a matter of notoriety that the railway tariff is a very patchwork sort of thing. I should like to give the House just one instance to illustrate my meaning. A certain mill in Hubli gets its cotton from Nagpur. Well, instead of getting it straight from Nagpur, it finds it paying to first get that cotton from Nagpur to Bombay and then from Bombay to Hubli. Obviously there is something very wrong about an arrangement like this. It seems to me that, with a more scientific tariff, it would be possible to avoid such anomalies. I do not suggest for a moment that you can be strictly accurate in everything, but the railway tariff as it exists at the present moment is something which is far from being scientific. So also with regard to the Railway Act which was passed in 1921 and which has long been crying for reform. The Government has adopted a certain procedure, but I think it is very dilatory, and I do not think the urgency of the reform permits of any delay which could be avoided.

Then, Sir, about the third class passengers. My Honourable friend Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad spoke about their grievances and disabilities, and I think, with a very great deal of the picture that he presented before this House, we must agree. I should like to make just one observation. It has been stated, either in the statement presented by the Honourable the Commerce Member or the Chief Commissioner for Railways that while the traffic has gone up by 8 per cent., the accommodation has gone up by 14 per cent., in the last six years. Now, that undoubtedly is an advance, and I quite recognise the work that has been done. But if one considers the tremendous leeway that has got to be made up in the way of providing comforts and amenities for the third class passengers, who are our best customers, I do not think that enough has been done. (Hear, hear.) Their position is most unsatisfactory, and I think that if Government come forward with proposals for ameliorating it, and if it comes to it that we have to spend a lot of money in the process, then I am certain that this side of the House, at any rate, will warmly support Government.

Now, Sir, I should like to say a word about the Kalyan power house. I regard it as a most indefensible transaction. (Hear, hear.) But I am not going to dilate upon it at this stage. I think it is spilt milk and we must not weep over it. But I would like the Honourable the Railway Member to consider whether, in view of the fact that power cannot be generated at anything like a figure at which you can obtain it from companies in Bombay, he is not prepared to reconsider the matter, and scrap the building and remove the plant elsewhere where it can be more profitably worked. I am not talking without the book. I have had something to do with the negotiations conducted by my association with the Power companies for reduction in rates, and I am in a position to state that we can now get rates which were not found possible two years ago. I am certain that, if Government reconsider this question and scrap the plant, which has cost them over a crore and fifty lakhs, when it was expected to cost them 97 lakhs, and if they stop manufacturing power at a figure which is very much higher than that at which power could be supplied from companies in Bombay, I say that that would be a real business proposition.

Then, Sir, I should like to say a word about the improvement of service conditions. I think the House is entirely agreed with the Government that that reform is urgently called for. But I should like to associate myself with the observations which fell from my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, on this question. I think this House is entitled to know on what principle or basis the improvement of service conditions is going to be effected. A vague reference has been made in the Honourable Member's statement to a policy which has been decided upon. Is that policy one of a living wage or a minimum wage, or is it going to be dominated by a consideration of the rates paid in other public departments? These are questions of very considerable importance, the more so as the railway employs a very large force of labour, and anything which affects railway labour affects labour throughout the country. I should like, therefore, to say that, while this House entirely agrees with the Government that the improvement of the conditions of the low paid employees in the railways is urgently called for, I think it is entitled to know the principles on which that improvement is going to be carried out. That, Sir, is all that I have got to say. I quite recognise the very great care which the Honourable the Railway Member has devoted to the Budget, and if he has not come forward with anything very striking, the cause must be found in the circumstances of the day. But I do think that a more courageous policy is called for in the matter of reduction of rates and fares, and at a time when trade and industries are passing through a very grave crisis, I think it is necessary again and again to press that question upon the Honourable the Railway Member.

Mr. B. Das: Sir, my Honourable friend Colonel Gidney, who has recently returned from his labours on the Labour Commission, gave us some of his experiences on that Commission, which he ought to have reserved until the Report of that Commission was published. I now find that, while on that Commission, he dined very often with my Honourable friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, and came in contact with other labour leaders, and he thus wants us to believe that he has become an authority on trade union matters. I think that that is a fallacy which he himself cannot answer. Sir, while my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, feels very much for the unemployment problem on the East Indian Railway, owing to the policy of the Railway Board to try to Indianise the staff more and more on that Railway, he feels that other railways, which he characterises as second class railways, should be left in the hands of the Company-management. He does not want that the other Company-managed railways should be taken over by the Government lest we should encroach on the preserves of his community. This morning we have been told that in the Bengal and North Western Railway Indians are not given higher posts. That is perhaps the reason why my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, wants that the Bengal and North Western Railway and the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway and the Bengal Nagpur Railway should not be taken over by the State, but that they should be kept as close preserves for the domiciled race of which he claims to be a member.

Sir, the Honourable the Railway Member started with the lamentation that there has been trade depression and hence the depression in the Railway Budget. Sir, I am convinced that the Budget is rather a deficit budget. The other day the Indian merchants and industrialists met in the former Assembly Chamber at Delhi, where the Honourable the Finance Member and the Commerce and Railway Member were present, and there the Federation of Indian Industrialists and Merchants raised a cry that there has been trade depression all over and they wanted certain accommodations and facilities from the Government. The reply we received from the Honourable guests we had there was that 'there is no trade depression.' It seems that the gloomy atmosphere of that old house caught hold of the Honourable the Railway Member at least and made him agree with views expressed there and at last he has presented a very depressing Budget to this House.

Sir, my Honourable friend, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru, has already alluded to the alarming state of Railway finance. I find that, while the net income of the railways is almost stationary—less by a crore a year since the Railway finance was separated from the General finance—the working expenses have gone up by 8 to 10 crores per annum. This is very alarming, and this House must take particular note of it. We have got the Railway Standing Finance Committee. They are to be our watch-dogs, but it seems that the Report they submit to the Members of this House is so incomplete, that we cannot get to know what they really do in that Committee. My friend, Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya, has already alluded to this fact, and I would suggest to the Honourable the Railway Member that, in future, the Railway Standing Finance Committee Reports should be published in the same way as the Public Accounts Committee Reports are published. All discussions should be recorded, and then we can know whether the watch-dogs that we send out to watch over the Managing Directors are really doing the work, or whether they are hood-winked and do not exercise any actual check on the Railway Member or the Financial Commissioner.

Sir, my friend, Colonel Gidney, paid some high compliments to the Honourable the Railway Member, but at the same time hit him in the back for the policy of his administration. I am not one of those who speak sweet words and then hit in the back—I always hit on the front.

Since the Railway finance was separated, one of the points we insisted upon, was that the Agents and the Deputy Agents of various railways should be Indians. It is a matter of humiliation for me to say that up till now no Indian has been made a Railway Agent, and no Indian has even been found fit to be made a Deputy Agent. If this state of things is to continue, I think that we shall have to see whether it would not be better to place the railways once again under the administration of the Finance Member. My Honourable friend, the Railway Member, paid high compliments to my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman's work during the year. For ourselves on this side, we shall be glad always to see an Indian or a statutory Indian in high service there getting high praises from the Government of India as it is at present constituted; but as long as there is Great Indian Peninsula Railway strike, as long as more than a lakh of people are out of employment and even ejected from their houses at the ukase of the Agent, of course with the approval of my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, there, how can we say that there has been an Indian Labour Commissioner inside the Railway Board and he is reflecting the views of the Indians there? It matters to me little whether he is an Indian or a European. But when we demand that Indians should be on the Railway Board, we expect that from their natural birth and from their natural association in India, they will reflect the real Indian viewpoint. As long as my friend, Mr. Hayman, has not solved the problem of this huge strike on the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, I cannot say that he deserves all the compliments which the Railway Member paid to him on behalf of the Government of India.

Sir, the railway deficit is nearly Rs. 4, nay 5 crores. There is a deficit in revenue by Rs. 2½ crores and the working expenses have gone up by two crores. Thus, while the expenses have gone up, the revenue has decreased, and we still find that the capital expenditure on the strategic railways is going on. My Honourable friend, Mr. Kelkar, pointed out that all expenditure on these strategic lines is military expenditure. I entirely endorse that statement. The loss of revenue on the strategic lines is more than a crore and a half, and that should be debited to the military side. Again, we know that the military staff, officers as well as the rank and file, receive special concessions in fares and freights from the Railways. Last year, I put a question in the Simla Session wanting to know what is the total amount of money that is involved in these military concessions. My Honourable friend, Mr. P. R. Rau, said that his Department, with his full staff of accountants, Accountants General and auditors and so many other persons, could not compute the sum. I tried my best with the help of my friends to compute that sum, and I find that it is not less than one crore of rupees. I will stand corrected if my Honourable friend, the Railway Member, can put his whole machinery on to it and compute that figure and tell me that it is less by a few lakhs or more by a few lakhs. But it is a fact that the Military Department today enjoys privileges of one crore of rupees by railway concessions. Why should the taxpayer subsidise the Military Department indirectly in this way? The loss on the strategic lines amounts to one crore and 82 lakhs. All this should be charged to the Military Department. The Honourable the Railway Member happens to be a Member of the Government of India, and I think he should not support his friend, the Commander-in-Chief, or the Army Secretary, and see that this expenditure is properly allocated and it must be put in the military side of the General Budget. Sir, these strategic lines I would call the "tragedic" lines, because not only do they bring tragedy to the people through whose territory these lines go, but they are bringing tragedy every day to the Railway finances and the General finances of India. I submit that there should be no further strategic lines, and in that I completely blame the members of the Railway Standing Finance Committee who pass the proposals for these non-commercial lines where the money is ever locked up and no revenue is likely to accrue thereby.

Sir, since we allowed the separation of the Railway finance from the General finance we find that in the name of "efficiency" the policy of Europeanisation has gone on unhampered. The working expenditure on the side of Administration and Agency has gone up tremendously. This sort of thing will not do. I already mentioned that the expenditure has gone up by 8 crores of rupees while the income is almost stationary. If that be so, I would suggest that we should soon appoint a retrenchment committee and see whether we can reduce the general expenditure on the administrative staff of the different railways, including the Railway Board which is not under the control of the Public Service Commission, as regards its recruitments, or under the control of the Finance Member in respect of its internal policy.

Sir, I must say one word about the reduction of fares and freights on the Bengal Nagpur Railway. The Honourable the Railway Member who was connected with my part of the country in the distant past, promised to consider this question this year. Now I find the mismanagement on that Railway does not allow it to reduce the present high rates of freights. The Bengal Nagpur Railway still maintaining the post-war high rates, and everyone who travels on that railway expected that this year there would be some reduction, at least in the third class fares. But that has not happened. Sir, I will deal with this subject again on a subsequent day on the debate for grants.

Sir, I already mentioned that there must soon be a retrenchment committee, to apply the axe to railway expenditure. The Railway Board in its superior position of knowing too much of everything and in its superior isolation from all control of this House, and even that of the Finance Member, do not try to compare their own extravagant expenditure with expenditure on railways in other countries. I ask the Honourable the Railway Member to study how the different railways are being administered in America, Canada and Japan, and then he will have to do some hard thinking as how to decrease the administrative costs that this Railway Board is incurring so recklessly and which are working such abysmal disaster on the Indian finance.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Sir, at this stage of general discussion on the Railway Budget, I would confine my observations only to a very few remarks of a general character. Sir, at the outset I feel a great deal of satisfaction and delight at the appreciation by the Honourable Member in charge of Railways of the work done by Mr. Hayman as a Member of the Railway Board. All those who have had the privilege of knowing Mr. Hayman for some time knew that he would acquit himself very well as the first Indian Member of the Railway Board and it is a matter of satisfaction to me that our expectations have been fulfilled. (Hear, hear.)

Sir it is a matter of regret to me that, on account of financial difficulties, it has not been possible for the Railway Board to take up certain important lines and to initiate new projects, and I regret particularly the omission of any allotment for the construction of the Kashipur-Kalagarh Railway. The want of railway communications in certain parts of the Moradabad district, particularly between Moradabad and Thakardowarah entails great hardship upon the people of the district, especially during the rainy season, and I hope and trust that it will soon be found possible to start work on the Kashipur-Kalagarh line.

The railway staff will, I hope, feel greatly relieved by the passing of the Railway Amendment Act, giving effect to the Geneva Convention, as regards the fixing of their duty hours. The hours of duty proposed in the amended Act may not be the same as in Europe and America, but still the measure is to be welcomed as a first step in the right direction. In fact, in a huge country, like India, it would be rather difficult to adopt the system prevailing in Europe and America. I hope and trust that the improvements incorporated by the Honourable Member in charge of the Railways in his Budget speech will soon be given effect to, and the Railway Board will see that the orders issued by it are really given effect to. The chief difficulty is that the Agents and Divisional Superintendents do not care to carry out the orders issued by the Railway Board (Hear, hear) and all the improvements initiated by the Board only remain a paper transaction. I hope the appointment of the Labour Supervisors, under the new amendment of the Railway Act, will tend to solve this difficulty, and I would strongly recommend that those Inspectors should be directly under the supervision and control of the Railway Board and in no way ought they to be subordinate to the Agents or other inferior officers, so that they may have a free hand and fearless mind to supervise and criticise the acts of the Agents and their under-lings.

There is one more point to which I would like to refer at this stage and it is this, that the Crew Department was introduced and established more than three years ago, but the staff employed in this branch is still shown on the temporary basis and is thus deprived of the bonus and Provident Fund facilities and other privileges attached to the permanent service. It is time that a thorough inquiry was made into the working of this system and a final decision arrived at as to the future of its maintenance.

I wish also to associate myself with what has fallen from my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, as regards the attitude of the Railway Agents and Divisional Superintendents towards the Railway Unions. I have myself had the privilege of being the President of a Railway Union (Hear, hear) and my Union has, during the last five or six years, tried to work in a constitutional and peaceful manner. We have always condemned unconstitutional manners and strikes. Still we find that the attitude of the Agent of the East Indian Railway is quite hostile and unsympathetic towards this Union. Even the ordinary facilities are not granted to the officers of the Union, and my friend, Colonel Gidney, is perfectly correct and right when he says that the railway servants who take any active or prominent part in this Union are victimised and penalised by their superior officers. I hope, Sir, that the Railway Board will take very serious notice of this and will see that the treatment of the Agents and their subordinate officers towards these Unions is sympathetic and appropriate.

I also wish to associate myself with the remarks made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Ghuznavi, about the employment of Mussalmans in the different branches of the railway service. It is really a fact that the orders which are issued by the Railway Board with regard to the employment of Mussalmans are never cared for by those who are in charge of the offices. They are thrown into the waste-paper basket and no effect is ever given to them. From the answers which we received from the Member in charge of Railways in this House, to questions on this matter, it is evident that no effect is given to the orders which are issued by the Railway Board. I would strongly recommend that the Railway Board do insist upon receiving annual statistics, from the different branches of the railways, showing the total number of permanent employments which they give every year and the number which is allotted to the Mussalmans, and if they find that any Department or any Administration has not given sufficient and adequate representation to the Mussalmans in making permanent appointments, the officer concerned should be seriously dealt with. Unless this is done, I am sure that this genuine grievance of the Mussalmans will not be removed. We see that, in order to show the number of Mussalmans on the list, a number of temporary appointments, say for one or two or three months, are given to them and it is shown in the list that, out of so many appointments, so many are given to Mussalmans. But really it is only a camouflage. They are kept temporarily only to show the statistics to the Railway Board, and they are never made permanent. So it is necessary that in the statistics which are invited from the Agents of the Railways, the number of the permanent staff employed should be ascertained, and effect should be given to the orders which are issued in this connection. With these remarks, Sir, I resume my seat.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Sir, I was a Member of the first Assembly which laid at rest, as far as India was concerned, the controversy between the State-managed railway and the Company-managed railway, and I have never ceased rejoicing that, on that occasion, I recorded my vote on the right side, that is, in favour of State-management. One great advantage of State-management, which appeals to a Member of this House, is this. When we bring to the notice of the Railway authorities any grievance connected with a Company-managed railway, the answer is generally given that it will be referred to the Company concerned. But when the Company-managed railway is taken over by the State, the people have at least this satisfaction, that their complaints and grievances will not meet with this cold response. In pursuance, of the policy which was accepted by the Assembly, the Great Indian Peninsula Railway and the East Indian Railway were taken over by the State.

But, Sir, I wish to ask now the Honourable the Railway Member in a very pointed manner, what is the policy that Government are going to adopt in future in regard to the Company-managed railways? At any rate, what is the policy that Government are going to adopt as far as the Assam Bengal Railway and the Bengal and North Western Railway are concerned? I shall show to the House later on that the time has come when a decision will have to be made in regard to these two Railways, and

I therefore ask the Railway Member to tell us what he is going to do. What are the intentions of Government? Sir, the Railway finances have been separated from the General finances; they have got even a Labour Member; they have no justification now for postponing the purchase of these two Railways which I have mentioned.

As regards the Assam Bengal Railway, we find that the contract will determine on the 31st December, 1931, or at the end of any succeeding tenth year, by giving twelve months notice. So, we find that the time has come when Government ought to make up its mind about it. I am, however, more concerned at the present moment with the Bengal and North Western Railway. The original contract was made with the Bengal and North Western Railway on 12th December, 1882, and the notice of purchase must be given on or before the 31st December, 1932. The Bengal and North Western Railway and the Tirhut Railway work conjointly, and the contract with the Tirhut Railway will remain in operation up to the 31st December, 1932. Government ought to make up its mind, and that too very quickly, as regards the Assam Bengal Railway, the Tirhut Railway and the Bengal and North Western Railway.

As regards the Bengal and North Western Railway, there are two ways of looking at the administration of this Railway. There is the people's point of view, and there is the Company's point of view. Let me invite the House first to look at the administration of this Railway from the people's point of view. Take the treatment of the staff. On the 31st March, 1928, the cost of the staff was Rs. 72,82,815; on the 31st March, 1929, the cost of the staff was Rs. 74,71,559. If you compare this rise with the rise in expenditure on staff of other railways, you will find that the rise in the expenditure of the Bengal and North Western Railway is hardly satisfactory. Let me take another point, the question of Indianisation. We find that the number of officers corresponding to gazetted officers on State Railways on the Bengal and North Western Railway on the 1st of April, 1928, stood thus: 64 Europeans, 6 Indians (I am including Anglo-Indians in the expression "Indians") (Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: "Thank you.") On the 1st of April, 1929, we find that there were 63 Europeans and 8 Indians including Anglo-Indians. Now, might I, Sir, pause here for a moment and ask the House carefully to mark the way in which this Bengal and North Western Railway is carrying out the policy of Indianisation? Their process is much worse than the eight units scheme! Now, take the question of reduction in the rates and fares. What is the record of this Company in regard to this matter? Sir George Rainy last year told us that certain Company-managed railways followed the State-managed railways in regard to the reduction in the rates and fares. I shall mention the names of a few of such Company-managed railways: the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway, the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway, the South Indian Railway, the Burma Railways, the Bengal Nagpur Railway and the Jodhpur Railway. We have it on the authority of Sir George Rainy that the Bengal and North Western Railway did not follow this lead.

I have spoken, Sir, about expenditure, I have spoken about Indianisation, I have spoken about reduction of rates and fares; I wish to say a word about the conveniences of passengers. I shall ask Sir George Rainy to depute some of his subordinates to look into the proceedings of the old supreme Legislative Council, and he will find that even then our representatives in that body were complaining against the Bengal and North Western Railway, and we are complaining still, and if Government do not make up their mind to take over this Railway, we shall continue to complain. If I am not mistaken, the Bihar Council passed a Resolution expressing its dissatisfaction with this Railway. I am not going to trouble the House with my own experiences, though I have unfortunately to travel by this Railway. This Railway reminds one of the good old days when one used to travel by a bullock cart and had to put up with all sorts of inconveniences. I wonder if Sir George Rainy has ever travelled by the Bengal and North Western Railway. But if he has not and if he can afford the time he might well try a journey by that Railway. We will feel delighted; he will have a new experience and a new sensation. He will be able to share our enjoyment, though only for once and for a short time.

Let us now look at the administration from the point of view of the Railway Company itself, and we have got it in the speech of Sir Henry P. Burt, K.C.I.E., C.B.E., who is the Chairman of the Company. I am not going to express any opinion about the homily that Sir Henry Burt has attempted to preach to us about the unrepresentative character of the Indian Trade Unions, about Indian agitators and the responsibility of Parliament. I do not suppose it is worth while crossing swords in political matters with a railway man. This speech was delivered on the 28th January of this year. I have carefully read this speech through and through and to me it appears that Sir Henry Burt is absolutely unconscious of all that is happening in India. There is not a word about Indianisation throughout his speech, not a word about doing anything for third class passengers, or for the matter of that for any passengers, not a word about any reduction in the rates and fares—no, not a word about these methods—but I can quite understand his attitude; he looks at the Railway from the point of view of a business man whose only anxiety is to get as much money out of the concern as he can. Better things do not interest him.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must now conclude.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I shall say only a few words more. If you will allow me, Sir, I will read out the resolution moved by Sir Henry Burt. It runs as follows:—

“That a final dividend of £7 per cent. and a bonus of £3 per cent. for the six months ended September 30th, 1929, on the ordinary stock of the company, less income-tax, be and the same are hereby declared, making with the ad interim dividend of £4 and a bonus of £5 per cent. paid on July 29, 1929, a total dividend of £19 per cent. for the year ended September, 1929.”

This Company is giving a dividend of 19 per cent. One can very well understand why there are no reductions, why there are no conveniences. There is an impression that the Directors of this Company have considerable influence in political circles in England. If this Company is not taken over by the State, the Railway Board and the Government must forgive us if we suspect that Government have yielded to the influence of these important and influential people in England. The only way to stop the scandal of this Railway is to purchase it, and I do hope Sir George Rainy will, either today, or during the course of this debate, make a declaration on this point.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh (Muzaffarpur cum Champaran: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I should like at the outset to associate myself with those Honourable Members of the House who have complained of the briefness of time which is allowed to this House for a thorough study of the figures contained in the voluminous mass of literature which was handed over to us only day before yesterday. The House was sitting yesterday and we were very busy. Last year also the complaint was made that more time should be allowed to Honourable Members of this House to study the Budget, and to offer intelligent criticisms upon it. This year also the same complaint has been made. It is not fair either to this House or to the Budget itself that we should be called upon to offer our comments on it within such a short space of time. I hope Government will take note of it, and give us more time from next year.

Now, Sir, what is the position which we find in the Budget? In the budget estimates for 1930-31, the total receipts are put down at Rs. 108 crores, a figure which is nearly Rs. 3 crores more than the revised estimates for the current year; and the total expenditure has been estimated at nearly Rs. 100 crores, which is an increase of slightly over Rs. 2 crores on the revised estimates. The final result is a net gain to the railways of nearly Rs. 8 crores, which is about three quarters of a crore more than the revised estimates of the current year. Out of this surplus, Rs. 180 lakhs goes to meet the loss on strategic railways. I shall not pause to criticise the policy underlying this loss, which is met out of the Railway Budget, because I am quite at one with those friends of mine who have said that, strictly speaking, this loss on strategic lines must be put on the Army estimates. Apart from that, I find that a sum of Rs. 574 lakhs is to be paid as contribution to the General revenues, leaving a small balance of only Rs. 34 lakhs to be added to the Reserve Fund.

Now, Sir, considering the financial situation of the railways, we find that much of the useful activities have been cut short. Only Rs. 5 crores, if I remember aright, have been put down for new construction. I should like to say that the most significant omission in the Budget speech of my Honourable friend, the Railway Member, was the absence of all reference to the subject of improving amenities for passengers, especially third class passengers. I am glad to see, however, that this omission has been supplied by the Chief Commissioner of Railways in the course of his speech in the other place. The House will be glad to be assured by the Chief Commissioner of Railways that this subject continues to receive the special attention of the Railway Board and of the Railway Administrations. It has also been frankly admitted by the Honourable Mr. Russell that the most important question is undoubtedly that of overcrowding in third class carriages. I am one of those who have repeatedly brought this question to the notice of the Railway Board and of the Government, and also quoted the sections of the Indian Railway Act—sections 63, 93 and 97—which deal with the subject of overcrowding. Efforts have no doubt been made to cope with this difficulty, but I am afraid the results cannot be yet said to be satisfactory.

Reference has been made, Sir, in the course of this debate by several Honourable Members to the conditions prevailing on the Railway with which I am more intimately concerned, I mean the Bengal and North Western Railway. The House will remember, Sir, that I have been a very unsparing critic of this Railway, and I have never lost an opportunity of bringing before the Government of India the shortcomings of this Railway. I am glad to notice that in recent years some improvements have been effected, although much still remains to be done. My Honourable friend, the Railway Member, last year invited definite suggestions from Honourable Members of this House so that he might have an opportunity of considering them, and giving effect to them if thought desirable. Now, Sir, in this connection I should like to bring to his notice one or two points. On the main line on the Bengal and North Western Railway there is a train which runs between Katihar and Lucknow, and the overcrowding in this train is very considerable. Therefore, Sir, it has become absolutely necessary that an additional through train service from Katihar to Lucknow should be provided, and this train should, pass through Muzaffarpur and Hajipur. My reason for making this suggestion is that most of the traffic from North Bihar passes through Muzaffarpur, and if a train is added on to go through the congested area, it will very much relieve the overcrowding in other trains as well as on the main line.

Then again, Sir, on the East Indian Railway there is one train, the 15 Up Express between Howrah and Delhi. In this train I have often noticed absolute insufficiency of second class accommodation. I wrote to the Agent of the East Indian Railway last year about this matter. Even during occasions of Dussehra and other rush seasons the second class accommodation on this train is not at all increased. There are only two compartments, and one of them is sometimes labelled, "Reserved for Ladies", with the result that the other second class compartment is packed to suffocation. I should like my Honourable friend, the Railway Member, kindly to look into these matters, and relieve the congestion in the second class compartments on this train, which has been specially noticed and felt by the travelling public.

Now, Sir, I suggested in 1928 that the amount of free luggage allowance for third and other class passengers should be increased, and I am glad to see that this has now been done. Beside giving a much needed relief to the travelling public, it will free the third class passengers from the harassing attentions of the travelling ticket checkers; and I should like to congratulate the Railway Board for making this concession.

I am sorry to say, Sir, that my Honourable friend, the Railway Member, is not in a position to announce any further reduction in third class fares. This will cause some disappointment, especially when we read in his speech that:

"Our reduced rates for long distance coal announced last year have certainly acted as a stimulus to the coal trade, and the lower fares for third class passengers have been accompanied by a growth in traffic. The passenger mile figure has gone up by 5½ per cent. and the passenger earnings this year are likely to exceed those of the previous year by about two-thirds of a crore."

Now, Sir, on reading this portion of his speech, I was encouraged in expecting that a further reduction in the third class fares was under contemplation. In the Explanatory Memorandum also it is stated:

"The increased traffic which we could have normally hoped for from the stimulus of lower fares has materialised, though not to an extent sufficient to make up the loss on the reduced fares, but we are confident that in the near future we shall see our expectations of an increase of net revenue realised."

Now, Sir, the reductions that took place apply only when a traveller travels more than 50 miles. But the average third class passenger travels less than 50 miles, and I would bring to the notice of the Railway Board that they should consider the desirability of extending this concession to passengers travelling less than 50 miles. This will further stimulate travelling, and bring in additional money to the coffers of the Railway.

Then, Sir, I should like to say a word of commendation for the admirable handling of the enormous Magh Mela traffic in Allahabad which I twice visited, for which the Railway Board and Railway Administrations concerned deserve congratulations. (Applause.) The Kumbh Mela traffic has also added considerably to the income of the Railway, as is borne out by the statement of the Chief Commissioner for Railways. This is what he says:

"It is only owing to our purchase of the Southern Punjab Railway in January last and to the pilgrim traffic to the Kumbh Mela at Allahabad, which seems to have surpassed all past records, that we are able to estimate our traffic receipts from commercial lines at 1,02 crores 86 lakhs, which is 80 lakhs above last years' figures."

Next perhaps to the overcrowding in trains, comes the question of the absence of booking facilities, for which something has undoubtedly been done. Then there is the question of absence of water in third class lavatories. This has been a subject of much complaint on the Bengal and North Western Railway. I suggested to the Agent that, instead of filling the carriage tanks by means of hand pipes, which is a very cumbersome and slow affair, overhead piping might be erected at important junction stations to fill the carriage tanks. This has already been done at Gorakhpur and Sonepur, and I expect this will be done at Muzaffarpur and at other important stations also, and then this difficulty will dwindle down to the vanishing point.

There is only one other point to which I should like to advert here, and that is with regard to the termination of the contract of the Bengal and North Western Railway, to which reference was made by some Honourable Members also. An ordinary meeting of the Company was held in London on the 28th January last, and in that meeting Colonel Izat, the Managing Director, said:

"The competition which has arisen by the introduction of motor services is receiving constant attention, and we are meeting it with some success by increasing the numbers and speed of our trains."

For this relief our thanks are no doubt due to this motor competition! The development of the Railway is necessarily arrested by the uncertainty of its future. Colonel Izat goes on to say:

"So far as our system is concerned, its development is further arrested by the uncertainty surrounding the question as to the Secretary of State's intention in regard to the possible termination of our contract in 1932. In the interests of both parties to the contract, it is hoped that his (i.e., the Secretary of State's) decision will not be delayed until the last moment."

Now this is quite reasonable. 19 per cent. bonus and dividend was paid this year as well as last year, and it is quite reasonable that the Government should disclose at an early date, their intentions as to the future fate of the Bengal and North Western Railway, because so long as their fate is shrouded in uncertainty, the relief which is so much needed cannot be afforded to the travelling public. Whether the Government propose to take this Railway under State-management or not is a point which ought to be settled once for all. So far as this House is concerned, it has already recorded its verdict in favour of State management. Now, Sir, some of the points to which the administration of the Bengal Nagpur Railway may look into are the provision of latrines in third class carriages, in sections where such latrines do not at present exist; provision of more intermediate class carriages, and prevention of their use by unauthorised railway servants and their friends, adequate supply of pure and cool drinking water on the trains and on the stations during the hot weather, and the provision of wholesome food for the passengers at stations. This does not exhaust the catalogue of all that the Railway Administration is expected to do, but it must be admitted that improvement has been effected in some directions, and more is expected in the near future. Sir, the conditions of service of the lower paid staff require to be improved.

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member is exceeding his time.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: Very well, Sir, then I will close my speech.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (United Provinces: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I should like

Mr. President: Mr. Yamin Khan will finish in ten minutes, I hope.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: Very well, Sir, On behalf of the Railway Finance Committee I should like to thank the Honourable the Railway Member for all that he has said about the Standing Finance Committee for Railways. I have to acknowledge on behalf of the Committee the great co-operation which the Committee received at the hands of Mr. P. R. Rau, who was acting as Financial Commissioner. The Finance Committee had also great assistance from Mr. Parsons, who spared no pains in explaining every item, in Calcutta and in Delhi. I am sorry that today our most active member and the greatest critic on that Committee, Pandit Nilakantha Das, is not present owing to his resignation. That is a matter of great regret to me. He took great pains over every item of the Budget and he did not agree to any single item unless he and the members of the Committee were thoroughly satisfied that it was not put up in a haphazard way. Certain members of that Committee have now gone out of the Assembly, but I am glad that another active member in the person of Mr. Aney is present here today. He knew the problems very well and I was expecting that he would get up and say a few words during this debate. I have also to congratulate the Honourable the Railway Member on the Budget which he has presented under the pressure which he could not possibly avoid.

Now, Sir, there are certain points which I want to bring to the notice of the Railway Administration. The first point is about the rates. I brought it up in conversations which was not the proper time. I would suggest that the present heavy duty on petrol should be reduced. Petrol is consumed greatly in this part of the country. We find that it is sold at rupee one per gallon in Calcutta and Bombay, while at Delhi and other places it is sold at Rs. 1-8. This extra 8 annas is too much for the railways to charge. As the consumption of petrol is increasing, it is high time that the rates on petrol should be reduced now. Another point is the one referred to by my friend, Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad, and that is the purchase of stores. We in the Standing Finance Committee and especially Pandit Nilakantha Das wanted to be sure that nothing was purchased from out of India, which could be got locally, and I think it my duty to enlighten the House that this had not been ignored wherever we found it convenient to deal with this question. Another point is about Indianisation. In the case of every new item put down in the Budget for a new post, we wanted to be satisfied if no Indian was available to fill the post, and only in case an Indian was not available, we agreed to bring a man from outside India.

Another point is this. There has been in the past a great deal of demand on this subject but it has been ignored. I feel that Government should give consideration to this matter now. There is always a heavy pilgrim traffic during the urs to Ajmer and Piran Kalyar. There is no reason why there should not be a concession to the people who are travelling to these places. About two lakhs of people go to these two places and there has been a long-standing demand from the Muslim community. You give concessions during the Durga Puja holidays and the Kumbh Mela. I may mention that some members of the Standing Finance Committee were invited by the Agent of the East Indian Railway at Lucknow to discuss certain arrangements about the Kumbh Mela. We brought to the notice of the Agent at the time that there should be a concession. There was a promise that we would be called again, but we were not called. We had no other opportunity to press that point, before the Agent of the East Indian Railway. I equally think that, on occasions when there are big fairs, there ought to be certain reductions in the fares and a concession should be allowed for the return journey. When you do give a concession to holiday makers, there is no reason why you should not give this concession so that there may be facilities for those people who may travel by train.

Another point which I should like to bring to the notice of the Railway Member is this. Although I know that there has been a very limited amount of money available for the capital expenditure, and many important works have been cut out, still I think that there is a very important railway line for which there has been a continuous demand in the United Provinces. Addresses have been presented to the Governors of the United Provinces on several occasions and promises have been made that full consideration will be given to this demand. Sir, last year I noticed that certain steps had been taken in that direction, but I am sorry to find that they have been abandoned this year altogether for want of funds. Sir, the line I am referring to is the one which was intended to run from Luxur to Mainpuri, going via Muzaffarnagar, Garhmuktesar, Dibai, Kasganj, Etah and other places. Now, Etah and Mainpuri are the districts which are cut off a great deal from the railway and even the headquarters of the Etah district are lying about 20 miles away from the railway line. There has been a continuous demand for this line, and I remember the time when an address was presented to Sir William Marris, the then Governor of the United Provinces, in which great stress was laid by the residents of the Etah district and also of the Mainpuri district on the construction of this line. A very sympathetic reply was given to this address, and I was pleased to find last year that this programme was included in the Budget. It was however a great disappointment to me to find that this year it has been absolutely cut off and no further steps are going to be taken for the construction of this line. As the Railway Board has now adopted a policy of triennial programmes, there is no likelihood of this work being taken up even in the coming year. I hope that the Railway Board will find it possible to spend some money on this line next year if not in the coming year.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, on the last occasion when I replied to the general discussion on the Railway Budget, I think it was Pandit Nilakantha Das who accused me of killing two birds with one stone. This year a much more serious charge has been brought against me of having married two twin sisters.

Several Honourable Members: You have been charged with courting and flirting, and not marriage.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Then I misunderstood the Honourable Member who used that remark.

Now, this debate today has covered a good deal of ground and a great variety of topics have been noticed, and it will not be possible for me to deal with every point that has been raised. In particular, I do not propose today to discuss those points which must almost certainly be brought up, in one way or the other when the motions for Demands for Grants are discussed. It is more convenient that they should be taken up when the particular Demand to which they relate is under discussion. My Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, expressed the view that our estimate of the gross traffic receipts for next year was somewhat oversanguine and he was very doubtful whether it would be realised. It is true that we have only limited means of estimating what our railway traffic is going to be, for so much depends upon the monsoon, but I am not disposed to take too pessimistic a view of the prospects of the railway revenues. We have had our good years and we must expect also to have our bad years. And I am not very much disturbed if we have to draw upon our reserves for a year or two, because, after all, the reserves are established precisely for that reason, so that we could tide over the bad years without too much anxiety. Then, another point which was raised by my Honourable friend was his disappointment that we had not been able to see our way to make a reduction in the rates for agricultural produce. Other speakers referred to reductions in third class passenger fares and in the rates for fuel oil and petrol. Again, my Honourable friend, Mr. Mody, said that he was sure the House would agree to substantial expenditure in order to improve the lot of the third class passenger. In addition to all these as we all recognise, money will have to be spent on improving service conditions. Now, we have not got an unlimited purse, and ultimately the money we spend has to be paid for by the railway passenger and the merchant who sends his goods. We shall be deceiving ourselves if we try to think that all these things can be done simultaneously. Personally, I am quite sure that, in the present year, we had no alternative but to hold our hand not to make any alteration of rates because we must, before we could face any further loss of revenue, have a much more clear and exact idea of what the improvement in service conditions may cost us.

I think there was some slight misunderstanding as to what I actually said at one point in my speech in introducing the Budget, as far as coal rates were concerned. I said that the reduction of the long distance rate had acted as a stimulus to traffic. It would not have been correct if I had said that, so far, we had got back the revenue we gave up. That is still to come. The only case in which, so far as I know, taking into account the reductions made in the last two or three years, we have got an actual increase of revenue is the third class passenger fares. We cannot, therefore, be too confident that we should be able to get back within any short period, the revenue we might give up if we made further reductions of rates. Perhaps I might mention, with reference to what fell from Mr. Yamin Khan, that the petrol rate was brought down only two years ago and I think it would be premature to consider any further reduction yet.

Another point that was taken up by more than one speaker, and particularly by my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, when he discussed the cutting down of the capital programme, was that too much money had been spent on constructing extravagant stations. I should like to draw attention to certain figures which I think might materially alter the view that the House were inclined to take. The remodelling of the Nagpur Station cost 96 lakhs, out of which sum, only 4 lakhs was spent on the station building. Therefore, it is quite evident that the high cost of remodelling is not due to the building. At Lucknow the cost of the station building was from 10 to 12½ lakhs out of 63 lakhs. These are approximate figures. The cost of the Balasore Road Station was 11½ lakhs out of 139 lakhs, the cost of Victoria Terminus, 11 lakhs out of 88 lakhs. I think these figures are worth giving because, while I should always be ready to inquire whether it was not possible to reduce the cost of station building when we build a new station, it does not seem to me that these figures justify the charge of extravagance.

Another point which my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, mentioned was Indianisation in the Transportation (Power) and Mechanical Engineering Departments. He pointed out that we were putting under training under the apprenticeship scheme 12 men every year, though we are not likely to have, on the State-managed railways, appointments for more than six only annually. These figures are correct, I believe, but if we find that we can only take, in the State-managed railways half the number of men who qualify, we should not hesitate to urge strongly on the Company-managed railways the claims of those who did not obtain appointments from us but who had nevertheless been pronounced suitable for appointment. I have not much apprehension that there would be real difficulty about that.

My Honourable friend asked for some explanation of the scheme for the improvement of the pay of the lowest paid staff on the Eastern Bengal Railway, both as to the scheme itself and as to the principles on which it was based. More than one other Member—Mr. Mody in particular—also referred to the same point. I think that I might put it in this way, that we are aiming at a suitable wage having regard, of course, to the cost of living in a locality and having regard to the level of wages paid in that locality. It is obvious that the railway, being an enormous employer of labour, cannot get loose from the rates prevailing in a given locality. I should be very sorry if I ever found a State-managed railway was paying wages at all below the prevailing rates; in fact I think it is our duty to be a little above the rates paid by other employers, but the view of the Government of India and the Railway Board is that we must keep always in view the rates prevailing in the locality and not legislate for the railway worker as if these rates did not exist. Then the scheme also provides for variations in the scale according to variations in the prevailing wages and the cost of living in each particular area. The railway system will be divided into blocks or zones and the actual rates may vary between one zone and another. The scheme provides for an incremental scale, running from, say, Rs. 12 a month to Rs. 17 a month in the cheapest zone, while in more expensive zones the scale might rise from Rs. 13 or Rs. 14 to Rs. 17 or Rs. 18. We are trying to keep close to the actual conditions as regards the cost of living and prevailing rates of wages in the areas with which we are dealing, and that is the method by which we propose to deal with the same problem on the different railways. Something which fell from my Honourable friend led me to fear that I conveyed a false impression to the House. I did not actually say that I was going to submit this particular scheme to the Central Advisory Council, although it will be included in any Memorandum that we send to the Council about the work which has been done by the Labour Member of the Railway Board. But it will be for my Honourable friend, the Financial Commissioner for Railways, to decide, when the proposal for spending money is brought before him, whether it should go to the Standing Finance Committee for Railways, which is the appropriate body, rather than the Central Advisory Council.

My Honourable friend Mr. Kelkar—and here again this point was taken by several speakers—expressed a desire for a statement showing how far the various projects undertaken in the last few years in the expectation that they would be remunerative, had actually proved to be remunerative. What I will try to do is, I will try, before the end of this Session, to have a statement laid on the table of the House giving all the information we can on that subject. It is not so very long since we began an active policy of construction, and therefore it is early days yet to arrive at any final conclusion. But if what I have said meets the wishes of the House, I see no reason why the statement should not be brought up to date annually and attached to the papers that are circulated at the budget time.

Several speakers have complained about the lack of time for adequate consideration of the Budget after presentation, before they are called upon to discuss it, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya, complained of the time wasted in listening to the budget speech of the Railway Member. I have the greatest possible sympathy with the second complaint. I can very well understand it, but I would only point out to my Honourable friend that attendance on these occasions is not compulsory. (Laughter.) As regards the other complaint, I know that it has been considered again and again whether it could not be arranged to give more time, but there are very grave practical difficulties owing to the dates to which we have to work. But I am quite sure, if my Honourable friends, the Finance Member and the Leader of the House, could see their way to get round these practical difficulties, they would try to meet the views that have been expressed today. But I know from having looked into it myself that it is very far from being an easy question.

As for the suggestion that was made several times that it would be better if the Railway Budget were introduced in the Autumn Session, I am afraid that that requires an amendment of the Government of India Act before it could be done, and I have no doubt that in connection with the new constitution the question will be considered.

My Honourable friend, Sir Hugh Cocke, pointed out that, in the map that is circulated with the budget papers, in the latest map, there are no yellow lines signifying lines under survey. I think there are two reasons for that. One is that, in the course of the last few years, a considerable number of surveys have been made, and there is a certain accumulation of projects which have already been surveyed. In the second place, we are not anxious that survey programmes should get too far ahead of construction programmes, because we find that, after two or three years, the survey figures get out of date and have to be reviewed all over again, and it is not quite safe to trust them after that period. He also suggested that we might show in the map, lines that it was thought likely would be under construction in the course of the next two or three years. That is a suggestion which I am quite ready to consider, and it would fit in quite well with the half yearly review that I and the Finance Member propose to undertake, in our review we shall be looking forward and trying to frame a programme of the course of operations during a period of two or three years, and I do not think that it would be difficult to indicate, in a map, which were the lines likely to be taken up in the near future.

My Honourable friend, Mr. Amar Nath Dutt, referred to several points, and in particular he asked me for information as to what was going to be done about two particular railways. One was the Bankura Damodar River extension and the name of the other, I regret to say, I did not succeed in getting down accurately. I should like to say that as soon as we get his printed speech in the proceedings of the House, I will try to see whether we cannot give him the information he wants with the least possible delay.

A great deal has been said today, as usual, about the third class passenger, and attention was quite rightly drawn to the fact that I did not refer to him in my budget speech. But frankly I had a good many things to say about labour matters in that speech, and I did not want to overload it with too much material on other subjects. The welfare of the third class passengers is a very important matter, and it would be strange indeed if it did not occupy a prominent place in these annual discussions. I may say that it has been under consideration two or three times by the Central Advisory Council during the year. We have been trying to examine it systematically and to see what practical measures can be taken to effect an improvement. As regards overcrowding, I think the best suggestion we had was to take from time to time actual censuses of particular trains without warning beforehand and find out from these censuses whether overcrowding has actually taken place. That system, I believe, originated with a suggestion of the Local Advisory Committee of the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway and has worked very well. I think we have already drawn the attention of Railway Administrations to that system, and perhaps I might say, for the information of my Honourable friend, Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh, that we shall draw the attention of the Bengal and North Western Railway to the matter, and also to the particular train on that Railway which he said was apt to be overcrowded. Similarly, we will draw the attention of the East Indian Railway to the train on that Railway which he says is overcrowded.

[Sir George Rainy.]

My Honourable friend, Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad, whom I should like to congratulate on his very interesting maiden speech, made two suggestions which interested me. One was that, when there is overcrowding, somebody ought to be put in prison for it. I say it is an interesting suggestion, because I was wondering who it was going to catch. Under a system of State management, it might prove to be the Railway Member (Laughter), or if the Standing Finance Committee had rejected a proposal for a larger number of carriages, it might be the members of the Standing Finance Committee. There must be some difficulty, when there is direct State management, in applying practically a system of that kind, because it might often be difficult to say where the responsibility lay.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya (Allahabad and Jhansi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): May I invite the Honourable Member's attention to sections 63, 109 and 102 of the Railway Act. They provide that, if a man enters or refuses to leave a room when the number of seats allotted has been exceeded, he can be prosecuted and fined Rs. 20; and if a railway officer causes any man to enter into any such room where the number is full, he is liable to punishment and a fine of Rs. 20. If these sections are applied, probably much of the trouble will go.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: The Honourable the Leader of the Opposition is perfectly correct in his statement about the law but it is a very difficult law to apply. The difficulty is not the making of the law but its practical application. I am bound to say that that what I trust more than anything else, in order to secure an improvement in the conditions affecting third class passengers, was continuous pressure.—pressure from above, pressure from below, and pressure from all round,—and I attach great importance to the Local Advisory Committees in this connection. This pressure will gradually and steadily get changes made that are necessary and ought to be made. I am not much of a believer in sudden and drastic remedies, but I am a very firm believer in the effect of continuous pressure, and there is not the least doubt that we have done a good deal in the last few years and that has been mainly due to the pressure of the Local Advisory Committees and of this House,—I do not hesitate to say so.

Now, Sir, I should have liked to follow my Honourable friend, Pandit Hriday Nath Kunzru, into the figures he gave us to illustrate the doubt that he felt whether all was well with the Railway finance. But I am afraid that, at the close of a debate like this, it is difficult, as I had no opportunity to examine the figures beforehand, to argue the case in a form which is satisfactory either to the speaker or to those who have to hear him. But as far as nearly I can make out from the figures, what it comes to, is this, that in spite of increased interest charges of nearly 7 crores, and in spite of our reductions in rates and fares, the net gain to the Railway as between 1925-26 and 1930-31 is only reduced by 286 lakhs, of which 250 lakhs are due to a larger provision for depreciation. I do not think that is too bad because it is quite true, as the Honourable Member suggested I think in his speech, that if you pass through a period of vigorous new construction, your fresh expenditure will not for a time be fully re-productive, and you may have to pass through a period when your interest charges are not fully recovered from the new lines. That, I think, is quite possible. However, this is a matter which undoubtedly is one of the things which ought to form part of the review of railway policy which the Honourable the Finance Member and I hope to undertake and I can assure the Honourable Member that that aspect of it will receive consideration.

As regards my Honourable and gallant friend, Colonel Gidney, I was interested in what he said, although I must say that I listened to one or two of his remarks with a certain amount of surprise. But I think the matter to which he personally attached the most importance was the question of the pay in the East Indian Railway. That is a matter which I am prepared to look into, but I am bound to say that my information at present does not entirely confirm the statement of facts which he presented to the House. I found it a little difficult to follow all his views about the impolicy and impropriety of purchasing new railways out of the Reserve Fund, for I found great difficulty in understanding in what sense it can be said that they have been purchased out of the Reserve Fund, or what exactly my Honourable and gallant friend's view as to the proper object of the Reserve Fund was. Certainly it would be very difficult to apply any part of the Reserve Fund to recurring expenditure, save and in so far as we use it, according to its original intention, to tide over a period of bad years when, owing to temporary reasons, our surplus is running low.

My Honourable friend, Mr. Mody, in his request for lower rates referred to the example of derating in England. I do not think that example is quite in point, and the difference is this. What they did in England was to remit the local rates which are essentially a tax on property paid by local residents. They took them off and substituted for them other forms of taxation. But this proposal to reduce railway rates in order to encourage other industries, means that one commercial enterprise is to give up something in order to benefit some other form of commercial enterprise. If the railways are to be run on commercial principles, the question would be, how is the railway to get back the money which it has given up, unless indeed it was proposed that the railways should be subsidised from General revenues? I should not be very hopeful that my Honourable colleague, the Finance Member, would agree to any suggestion of that kind.

My Honourable friend, Mr. Muhammad Yakub, referred to one matter, and that was the fact that the Crew Staff was still temporary. I should like to tell him that orders have now been issued to institute an inquiry whether the staff ought not now to be made permanent.

Then we had the question which I sometimes thought perhaps interested this House in connection with railways more than any other, and that is the question of the purchase of the Company-managed railways. My Honourable friend, Mr. Iswar Saran, is very anxious that I should give a definite and final reply as to what Government propose to do with regard to the Assam Bengal Railway and the Bengal and North Western Railway. Both cases are now under examination, and until that examination has gone further than it has, I shall not be in a position to make a final statement. The only thing I want to say today is that, quite apart from any question of policy, there is a practical problem in connection with the Bengal and

[Sir George Rainy.]

North Western Railway. I think the sum involved in the purchase is in the neighbourhood of 12 million sterling, and if we should decide to purchase it, then we shall have to solve the practical problem how that money is to be provided. Government have come to no conclusion on the subject as yet and there must be a very full examination of the financial aspect of it before they attempt to arrive at their decision. Naturally of course great weight will be paid to the frequently expressed desire in this House that the opportunity of purchase should not be missed.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: May I ask the Honourable Member how he computes that figure of 12 million sterling? Is that the cost of the Railway, plus 20 per cent. or is it the valuation of the Railway as it is today?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I am giving it as an approximate figure, but I think it is the total sum that has got to be provided if we purchase.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: Does the contract provide for the price at which the Government of India can exercise the option of purchasing plus a premium?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons (Financial Commissioner, Railways): I have not the exact details with me, but I think the price was settled a good many years ago, subject to the addition of the capital expenditure spent on the line after the price was settled. I can easily obtain the exact figures for the Honourable Member.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: I should feel grateful if the Honourable Member will put me in possession of the details.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I think what I have said covers the main points which were raised in the course of the debate, although I am very conscious that there are other points to which I should have liked to reply but for the fact that the time at my disposal hardly permits it. I should like, in conclusion, to thank all Honourable Members who have spoken for the interesting and helpful contributions they have made to the debate. I assure them that, if they do not see any fruit of their labours now, yet I do not think it is likely that in the end their labours will be entirely infructuous. (Applause.)

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 20th February, 1930.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, 20th February, 1930.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber of the Council House at Eleven of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

SENIOR COMMISSIONS IN THE INDIAN TERRITORIAL FORCE.

368. The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: Will Government be pleased to state when the new scheme for granting senior commissions to officers in the Indian Territorial Force will be put into operation?

Mr. G. M. Young: The scheme has been in operation since September 1st, 1928. 44 senior commissions have so far been gazetted. The procedure for these commissions is being accelerated as a result of a recommendation of the Central Advisory Committee, and it is hoped that there will be fewer delays in future.

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: Have any senior commissions been allotted to the Punjab?

Mr. G. M. Young: I must ask for notice of that question.

MEETINGS OF PROVINCIAL ADVISORY COMMITTEES OF THE INDIAN TERRITORIAL FORCE.

369. The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: (a) Will Government be pleased to state how many Provincial Advisory Committees for the Indian Territorial Force have been formed and how many meetings have been held by each of these Advisory Committees?

(b) Is it a fact that the Punjab Provincial Advisory Committee of the Territorial Force has not held a single meeting?

(c) Is it intended to summon regular meetings of these Provincial Advisory Committees?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) There are 12 Provincial Advisory Committees. The Government of India have no information of the number of meetings held.

(b) The Government of India have no information.

(c) The answer is in the negative. Under Rule 30(2) of the Indian Territorial Force Rules, the Provincial Advisory Committees are consulted in certain matters, whenever desirable: for instance, applications for the grant of senior grade commissions are always referred to the Provincial Advisory Committee. It is not, however, necessary to summon a meeting for the purpose; the opinion of the members can be obtained by correspondence.

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: Is the Honourable Member willing to obtain the information that I have desired under (a) and (b), considering the fact that there is a complaint that the Punjab Provincial Advisory Committee has not held any meeting, nor has it been possible to consult its members by correspondence?

Mr. G. M. Young: I will certainly inquire into the matter.

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: Will the Honourable Member lay the information on the table of the House when received?

Mr. G. M. Young: I will consider that when I receive the information.

INCLUSION IN THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF INFORMATION FURNISHED IN REPLY TO QUESTIONS.

370. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: With reference to my starred questions Nos. 217, 219, 222 and 223, asked on the 4th February, 1930, will the Honourable Member in charge of Railways be pleased to state whether Government have any objection to placing a copy of the replies on the table of the House, so that they may find a place on the record in the Legislative Assembly Debates?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I would invite the Honourable Member's attention to the ruling given by your predecessor, Sir, on the 1st of February, 1923, on the subject of printing answers to questions in the volume of debates. In accordance with that ruling Government considered that it would be sufficient to supply the information asked for in these questions to the Honourable Member himself and to put a copy of it in the Library.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Is the Honourable Member afraid of placing that statement before the House because he does not want to show that there is not a single Muslim employed on the Assam Bengal Railway?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: No, Sir.

Dr. A. Suhrawardy: Will the Honourable Member state whether it is on grounds of economy or for some ulterior reason that Government refuse to place the information on the table of the House?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: It is purely on the ground of economy and is in accordance with the ruling given by Sir Frederick Whyte on 1st February, 1923.

SUPPLY OF INFORMATION ASKED FOR IN A PREVIOUS QUESTION.

371. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: With reference to my starred question No. 218, will Government be pleased to state what is the objection to giving replies to the same after inquiry?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: In Government's opinion the information could be obtained only by an expenditure of time and labour incommensurate with its practical value.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will the Honourable Member kindly say what he means by practical value, and whether he does not consider it of sufficient importance to let the House know that there is no representation of Muslims in the Assam Bengal Railway?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: We do give, in a general form, details of Muslim employees on individual Railways.

THE STAFF SELECTION BOARD.

372. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will Government be pleased to state when the Staff Selection Board in the Government of India was appointed and when it was abolished? What was the method of recruitment in the Government of India Secretariats before the organisation of this body?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: The Staff Selection Board was created in 1920 and ceased to exist on the 1st October, 1926, on which date its functions were transferred to the Public Service Commission. Until 1910 the method was one of limited competition. From 1910 until the creation of the Staff Selection Board, the Departments recruited by selection from approved lists of candidates.

COST OF ELECTIONS FOR THE CENTRAL LEGISLATURE.

373. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will Government be pleased to state who bears the cost of elections to the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State, and what was the cost of election for the Assembly that was formed in 1927, and the Council of State in 1926? If borne by the Provinces, what relief do they get for carrying on these elections on behalf of the Central Government?

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter: The Honourable Member will observe from Entry 44 in Part II of Schedule I to the Devolution Rules that elections to the Indian Legislature are included in the provincial subject defined in that Entry. The responsibility for financing such elections accordingly rests with Local Governments and no question arises of affording relief to those Governments in consideration of their discharge of that responsibility. The Government of India have no information as to the amount of expenditure incurred by the various Local Governments in connection with the General Elections to the Council of State and Legislative Assembly in 1926 and 1927 respectively.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will Government kindly inquire and let the House know how much really it has cost Local Governments on account of these elections?

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter: I shall consider that.

SPECIAL CLASS APPRENTICES APPOINTED BY THE RAILWAY BOARD.

374. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will Government be pleased to state how many "special class apprentices" have been taken in by the Railway Board this year? How many of them are Hindus, Muslims, and Indian Christians? What examinations did they pass to qualify themselves for these posts, what initial salary will they get, and how much on confirmation?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: A statement giving the information asked for by the Honourable Member is laid on the table.

Statement showing the names, nationality and qualifications of Special Class Apprentices appointed during 1929-30 in the Mechanical Engineering and Transportation (Power) Department of State Railways.

The initial pay of qualified apprentices on appointment as officers will be Rs. 375 per mensem and on confirmation Rs. 525 per mensem.

ELECTION TO THE LEGISLATURES OF MUSLIMS FROM MIXED AND GENERAL CONSTITUENCIES.

375. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: (a) Will Government be pleased to state how many mixed and general constituencies there are in India for election to the various legislative bodies, and to how many of these a Muslim has been returned?

(b) Has there been any difference in the qualification of Hindu and Muslim voters in these constituencies (i) since the inauguration of the Morley-Minto Reforms, (ii) the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms? If so, on what basis?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: (a) and (b). I am not entirely clear as to the sense in which the Honourable Member uses the words "mixed and general constituencies". I have, however, taken him to mean constituencies, not being special constituencies, in which Hindus and Muslims vote together. On this assumption I am placing in the Library a statement containing the information desired by the Honourable Member.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will the Honourable Member kindly place that statement on the table of the House?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: I think the Honourable Member and any other Honourable Member who is interested in the matter can conveniently obtain the information from the copy placed in the Library.

Dr. A. Suhrawardy: Is the reluctance of the Honourable Member to place it on the table of the House due to the ruling given by Sir Frederick Whyte, as referred to by a previous Member on behalf of Government?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: The statement is somewhat long. If, however, the Honourable Member desires, I shall be prepared to lay it on the table of the House.

Elections in Mixed and General Constituencies.

1. In the elections to the Morley Minto Councils the only constituencies properly describable as general were the communal Muslim constituencies. The remaining constituencies in which Hindus and Muslims voted together were all in a sense special constituencies, their electorates consisting, e.g., of members of local bodies, of landholders, of Chambers of Commerce, etc. In the circumstances none of the questions put seems to arise with reference to the Morley Minto Councils.

2. A statutory distinction between special and general constituencies was first made in the electoral rules framed after the last Reforms. In the elections to the Central Legislature there are five constituencies within the assumed scope of the question, namely:

- (i) the Central Provinces constituency of the Council of State,
- (ii) the Burma constituency of the Council of State,
- (iii) the Council of State constituency set up by the Berar Electoral Rules for the purpose of electing a Member to be nominated under rule 3 (1) of the Council of State Electoral Rules,
- (iv) the Delhi constituency of the Legislative Assembly,
- (v) the Ajmer-Merwara constituency of the Legislative Assembly.

A Muslim Member was returned to the first Legislative Assembly by the Delhi constituency. On no other occasion has any Muslim Member secured election in any of these five constituencies. Except that the title qualifying a Hindu to vote at an election to the Council of State will be that of Mahamahopadhyaya, while the title qualifying a Muslim will be that of Shamsulema, there is no distinction between the qualifications of Hindu and Muslim electors for these constituencies.

3. In no province except Burma is there any general constituency in which Hindus and Muslims vote together. In Burma there are five (general) Indian urban constituencies returning between them eight Members to the Legislative Council. Within the Indian constituencies there is no distinction between Hindus and Muslims. Indians living outside their communal constituencies, whether Hindus or Muslims, are included in the general rolls. Three Muslims were returned from the following constituencies in the last general election to the Burma Legislative Council:

- | | | | | |
|--|-----|-----|-----|---|
| (1) Moulmein General Urban | ... | ... | ... | 1 |
| (2) Moulmein Indian community (Indian urban) | ... | ... | ... | 1 |
| (3) East Rangoon Indian community (Indian urban) | ... | ... | ... | 1 |

Information for the earlier elections to the Burma Legislative Council will be supplied to the Honourable Member if he so desires.

"MAJORITY" AND "MINORITY" COMMUNITIES.

376. *Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: (a) Will Government be pleased to state what they mean when they say in replies to questions that, "Certain people are taken in from the minority communities to do away with the preponderance of one community over the other"?

(b) By what statute or convention have the expressions "minority communities" and "majority communities" been coined? Do the people of Chittagong Hill Tracts, who are all Buddhists, belong to a majority or minority community? Are they not counted with the majority communities for the purpose of census?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: (a) and (b). I would refer the Honourable Member to the reply I gave in this House to his question No. 64 on the 3rd September last. My information is that the people of the Chittagong Hill Tracts are not all Buddhists. In Table VI, Volume V, Part II of the Census Report, which shows the distribution of the population by religions, Buddhists are shown separately from others. In Table XIII a broad distinction is made between non-Muhammadans and Muhammadans, and Buddhists are grouped with the former. This has nothing to do however with any distinction between majority and minority communities.

DISCUSSION OF THE GENERAL BUDGET.

377. *Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will Government be pleased to state what objection there is to allowing the discussions of the General Budget as they appear in the Budget proposals of the Government of India scriptim without starting with Customs first?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: Presumably the Honourable Member's question has reference to the discussion of Demands for Grants at the second stage of the discussion on the General Budget. Government have no objection to such Demands being discussed in the order in which they appear in the volume of "Demands for Grants", but as the Honourable Member will observe from your remarks, Sir, which appear on page 1608 of the Assembly Debates of the 7th March, 1929, that order has in practice been varied by mutual agreement subject, of course, to the consent of the Chair. In fact, so far as Government are concerned, they have always wished to follow the wishes of the non-official parties in this matter. The concluding portion of the Honourable Member's question is not clearly understood, because, if the order in the "Demands for Grants" is to be strictly followed, as seems to be the Honourable Member's intention, the House must start the discussion with the "Customs" Demand.

NUMBER OF JOURNEYS PERMITTED TO MEMBERS OF THE CENTRAL LEGISLATURE.

378. *Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will Government be pleased to state how many intermediate journeys a Member of the Central Legislature can make, provided the journey is confined to a fortnight, during the course of a Session?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: There is at present no limit.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA SECRETARIAT.

379. *Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will Government be pleased to state which are the appointments in the Government of India Secretariat, which the executive Members of Government and their Secretaries can directly fill up without the medium of the Public Service Commission (the appointments of menials being excluded)?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: The general rule is that initial recruitment to service in the Government of India Secretariat is made through the Public Service Commission. But promotions or selections for particular posts are made at the discretion of the Head of the Department, save where they require the approval of the Governor General.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING HOUSE AT NASIK.

380. *Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will Government be pleased to state what is the personnel of the Government Printing House at Nasik? Which of the posts there have been filled up by the Government Member in charge of the Department and which by the Public Service Commission? What is their total strength, excluding the menials, and what is the number of Muslim representation therein?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: The total personnel, excluding gazetted officers, is 124. All appointments are made by the Master, Security Printing, India, who is the Head of the Department. Out of 124 employees, 6 are Muslims.

DISTRICT MEDICAL OFFICERS ON RAILWAYS.

381. *Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: (a) With reference to my starred question put on the 4th February, 1930, will Government be pleased to state why there is no Muslim District Medical Officer in the East Indian Railway, while there are so many Indians therein? Who is responsible for these recruitments?

(b) Through what agency are the District Medical Officers recruited by the State Railways and the Company-managed Railways?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) and (b). There was no Muslim District Medical Officer on the East Indian Railway up to recently because there were no Muslim Officers of that rank in service. One Muslim Officer who was recently recruited has been posted to that Railway.

The recruitment of District Medical Officers for State-managed Railways is made by the Government of India on the recommendations of the Public Service Commission. Company-managed Railways recruit such officers direct.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Is the Honourable Member aware that out of 40 district medical officers on State Railways only two are Muhammadans?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I must verify the figures before I can accept the Honourable Member's statement, though I do not wish to suggest that it is incorrect.

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: May I ask if competent Muhammadans are not available for employment?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I have no reason to believe that competent Muhammadans are not available for these appointments.

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: May I then ask the reason for their not being recruited if competent men are available?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: As my reply shows, they are now being recruited.

COST OF AUDITING AND ACCOUNTING FOR THE POSTS AND TELEGRAPHS DEPARTMENT.

382. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: How much does it cost Government for auditing and accounting for the Posts and Telegraphs Department as a whole?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: The expenditure incurred in 1928-29, the latest year for which complete actuals are available, on the accounts and audit of the Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department was Rs. 37,48,000 which included Rs. 1,51,600 for Post Office Life Insurance work and Rs. 8,00,000 for Post Office Savings Bank and Cash Certificate work.

COST AND EARNINGS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRIES AND LABOUR.

383. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: What is the total cost of administration of the Department of Industries and Labour and what proportion does it bear to its total gross earnings?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: The estimated cost of administration of the Department of Industries and Labour during the financial year 1929-30 is Rs. 6,03,000. The Honourable Member is perhaps not aware of the fact that the Department of Industries and Labour is not a revenue-earning Department.

CLASSIFICATION OF QUARTERS IN NEW DELHI.

384. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: Is it a fact that every year, or every second or third year, Government change the limits of pay of the employees of the Government of India for the purpose of allotment of quarters in New Delhi? If so, why?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: Presumably the Honourable Member seeks information in regard to clerks' quarters in Delhi. If so, I would mention that between the years 1920 and 1929 the limits of pay for purposes of allotment of these quarters were changed on three occasions, viz., in 1922, 1926 and 1928. The changes were made because (i) the scales of pay were revised and increased subsequent to the fixation of the original limits, and (ii) to equalise, as far as possible, the percentage of quarters in each class.

RULES FOR THE GRANT OF HOUSE RENT ALLOWANCE IN SIMLA.

385. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: (a) Is it a fact that for the purpose of granting house rent allowance in Simla, Government have made certain rules?

(b) Is it a fact that those employees who had elected old rules five or six years ago are not given the option of changing their choice? If so, why?

(c) Do Government know that, on account of this, a loss of about fifty rupees every year is being sustained by many employees?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state if it is a fact that they change their rules regarding the allotment of quarters in New Delhi, where the Government charge rent from their employees, and do not change the rules of Simla house rent allowance, where the Government give house rent to their employees? If so, what is the reason?

(e) Are Government prepared to consider the desirability of giving another choice to their employees? If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: (a) Yes.

(b) Yes. Two elections were allowed in the matter and it was made clear at the time that the second election would be definitely final.

(c) The men under the new rules get a slightly increased rate of house rent allowance, varying from Rs. 25 to Rs. 50 under certain restrictions from which men under the old rule are free. The difference in the rates cannot be described as a loss to the men under the old rules.

(d) Yes. Because the two matters are entirely distinct.

(e) The matter has been considered and it has been decided that there are not sufficient grounds for making any change in the rules, which are, generally speaking, working satisfactorily.

ADVANCES FOR HOUSE BUILDING.

386. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: (a) Is it a fact that house building advances are not granted to those employees of the Government of India who want to build houses in old Delhi, even in Paharganj? If so, why?

(b) Are Government prepared to consider the desirability of advancing loans equal to two years' pay for the purpose of house building instead of one year's? If not, why not?

(c) What interest do Government charge on such loans?

(d) Are Government prepared to consider the possibility of reducing such interest?

(e) In how many instalments are such loans recovered?

(f) Are Government prepared to increase the number of such instalments? If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: (a) Advances for building houses in old Delhi are not granted to employees of the Government of India whose offices are situated in New Delhi as it is not considered advisable to encourage Government servants to build houses at a distance from the offices in which they work. Paharganj is part of old Delhi.

(b), (c) and (f). Prior to November, 1916, an advance was limited to 6 months' pay and was recoverable in 24 instalments. In November, 1916, the limit was raised to 12 months' pay and the number of instalments to 48. The question of raising the limit for an advance and of increasing the number of instalments of recovery was considered by the Government of India in 1927 and they came to the conclusion that there was no case for changing the rules.

(c) 5 per cent.

(d) No. The rate of interest now charged is less than the rate at which the Government of India are borrowing in the open market.

REVISION OF THE PENSION RULES.

387. *Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: (a) Is the revision of pension rules under the consideration of Government? If so, since when?

(b) When is the revision likely to take effect?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: (a) I would refer the Honourable Member to my reply to starred question No. 721 by Mr. Siddheswar Prasad Sinha published on page 1193 of the Legislative Assembly Debates for the 23rd September, 1929.

(b) The Honourable Member's attention is invited to the reply given by me on the 21st January, 1930, to starred question No. 94, asked by Mr. Lalchand Navalrai.

The 9th January, 1930.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY THE VICEROY.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR PROTECTION OF THE ASSEMBLY CHAMBER AND ITS PRECINCTS.

Mr. President: I have a communication from His Excellency the Viceroy, which it is my duty to read to the House. It is as follows:

"The Viceroy's House,
New Delhi, 19th February, 1930.

Dear Mr. Patel,

After the discussions I have recently had with yourself, the Leader of the Opposition and Leaders of other parties in the Assembly, I am in a position, on behalf of the Government, to communicate to you their proposals for the solution of the difficulty that has arisen, in the hope that these may prove the basis of a working agreement or convention on the matters lately in dispute.

I cannot doubt that you and all non-official Members of the Assembly have only the same purpose in this matter as the Local Government and the Government of India, viz., to be satisfied that adequate protection is secured for the President and Members of the Assembly while in discharge of their duty; and if agreement can be reached upon the practical means to secure this purpose, and the means adopted prove adequate for its attainment, discussion of general principles, upon which agreement might be more difficult, need not arise.

I deal first with the question of the securing of protection in what are known as the inner precincts. In regard to this, Government would propose to depute to the service of the Assembly a senior police officer, who would be responsible to the President for regulating all matters relating to the protection of the Assembly within the inner precincts. For the purpose of his Assembly duty, this officer might be designated, "the Watch and Ward Officer of the Assembly".

In any case in which the special experience of the deputed officer might lead him to think that the precautions approved by the President were inadequate, it should be open to him to consult his superior officer in the Police Department, and if such officer shares his opinion, he should so report to the President, who would forward the report with his observations to the Governor General in Council in order that an opportunity should be afforded to the authorities concerned to confer with, and in the spirit of this convention to advise, the President upon the matter. In an immediate emergency, where such consultation was not possible or when the officer was unable to take the instructions of the President, the officer would be at liberty to take such action in virtue of his powers as a police officer, as his knowledge of the emergency appeared to him to render necessary and in such cases it would be assumed that he does so with the consent of the President.

Government further recognise the general desire among Members of the Assembly that the requisite protection should be secured through an Assembly establishment, and will be ready to co-operate in the early establishment of a staff of suitable quality for this purpose. This staff would be part of the Assembly establishment, subject to the control of the President, exercised through the deputed officer, and could wear such uniform as the President, on behalf of the Assembly, might direct. Until the special staff referred to above can be brought into existence, Government will place at the service of the Assembly and under the orders of the deputed officer, such police as may be required. Such police might, if so desired, be distinguished by the wearing of a special armlet at the discretion of the President.

Should this arrangement be acceptable to the Assembly, Government will arrange to depute a suitable officer, as suggested above, to be at your disposal forthwith for the purpose named, and I understand that you will then without delay take steps, in consultation with the Secretary to the Legislative Assembly and the deputed officer, to recruit the requisite permanent staff.

If, as I trust, these proposals commend themselves to you and the Assembly, I am able to say, on behalf of my Government, that they would view the arrangement embodied in them as an adequate substitute for the system which has hitherto been in force.

As regards the outer precincts of the Assembly, the matter may be examined further, and, in the meanwhile, the Government of India will instruct the Local Government that all orders issued to the police within the outer precincts of the Assembly sector shall be framed with the approval of the President, acting on the advice of the Local Government.

I greatly hope that, with goodwill on both sides, the arrangement that, on behalf of the Government of India, I have here outlined may furnish the means of resolving the unfortunate deadlock which has caused inconvenience to Members of the House, and has been a matter, as I believe, of equal concern to the Government and the Chair.

Yours sincerely,
IRWIN."

Honourable Members are aware of the difference on this matter, which arose between Government and myself, and I hope that the arrangement outlined in His Excellency's letter will prove to be a satisfactory solution of them. Without entering into a discussion of the legal aspects of the question, Government have now proposed the establishment of a convention, which offers means of resolving the immediate difficulty with which we are concerned, and which, I trust provides a permanent working basis for the future. On behalf of the House, I accept the arrangement in the same spirit as that in which it has been put forward, and as the convention which will now be established provides adequately for the exercise of authority by the Chair, I am glad to say that I shall always welcome and be guided on matters affecting the security of this House by the considered advice, which the authorities concerned may tender to me.

As the main question is now settled, I accordingly hereby direct that the galleries be re-opened on and from Monday, the 24th February, 1930, and passes issued to visitors in the usual manner.

Mr. Arthur Moore (Bengal: European): Sir, about a month ago you claimed, and I am using your own language, that your authority was so supreme and your control so complete

Mr. President: Will the Honourable Member resume his seat? Is there any point of order that the Honourable Member wishes to raise?

Mr. Arthur Moore: I wish to be heard on a question which vitally concerns this House, on which it has not been consulted.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member might put down a motion.

Mr. Arthur Moore: I have put down a motion. If it comes on (Cries of "Order, order" from several Honourable Members.)

Mr. Arthur Moore: I have a right to be heard. I appeal to the sense of justice which I know you possess.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member can only act according to the rules and regulations of this House.

Mr. Arthur Moore: There is no rule which prevents me from saying what I have to say.

Mr. President: If the Honourable Member has any point of order to raise

(Mr. Moore remained standing.)

The Honourable Member must resume his seat when the Chair rises. If the Honourable Member has any point of order on any business before the House, he will be heard. If he has no point of order and if he has anything to represent to the Chair, he must come to his room and talk to him.

Mr. Arthur Moore: You have accepted, on behalf of the House, something on which the House has not been consulted. That is the point.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh (Muzaffarpur cum Champaran: Non-Muhamadan): Why are you excited?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member need not be excited. If he has a reasonable amount of support in this House, he will always be entitled to put down a motion of "no confidence" in the Chair.

Mr. Arthur Moore: I am not at the moment expressing any lack of confidence. I wish to make some observations with regard to what you have just said.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is not entitled to make any observations.

(Mr. Moore continued standing.)

Will the Honourable Member resume his seat? He cannot remain standing while the Chair is standing. The Honourable Member is not entitled to make any observation on the statement I have read.

Mr. Arthur Moore: I am entitled to make observations on the statement made. (Honourable Members: "Order, order.") A month ago, you said

(Cries of "Order, order" from non-official Benches.)

Mr. President: Will the Honourable Member resume his seat?

Mr. Arthur Moore: Sir, I am speaking on behalf of . . .

Mr. President: Will the Honourable Member resume his seat?

Mr. Arthur Moore: Sir, I appeal to your sense of justice, which I know you possess.

(Cries of "Order, order!".)

An Honourable Member: We do not want to hear you.

Mr. Arthur Moore: Are you afraid to hear what I have got to say?

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: You are talking wildly.

Mr. Arthur Moore: If you keep quiet and listen to what I have got to say, perhaps you will change your mind.

Mr. President: I have already ruled that the Honourable Member is not entitled to speak on this.

Mr. Arthur Moore: Are you afraid of what I have got to say?

Mr. President: Will the Honourable Member resume his seat?

Mr. Arthur Moore: I wish to be heard.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member, if he does not like the way in which the proceedings of this House are conducted, is entitled to go out.

Mr. Arthur Moore: I prefer to stay. I am a Member of this House.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must behave.

Mr. Arthur Moore: What rule am I disobeying?

Mr. President: You are disobeying every rule of this House.

Mr. Arthur Moore: No, Sir. You have stated that you have accepted an arrangement. Are we not entitled to discuss it? The House has heard nothing of this. Let me point out to the House that you claimed . . .

Mr. President: Order, order. Sir George Schuster.

Mr. Arthur Moore: (loudly) Sir, I wish to be heard and I shall be heard.

Mr. President: Sir George Schuster.

THE INDIAN INCOME-TAX (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): Sir, I beg to move that the Bill further to amend the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, for certain purposes (Amendment of sections 14, 25-A, etc.), as reported by the Select Committee, be taken into consideration.

The question of income tax amendment Acts and their frequent appearance has already been referred to by me in dealing with another motion this week. I feel, however, that the Bill under consideration can only be viewed with approval, because it is almost entirely concerned with concessions. I think, I may claim that the Bill is non-contentious. Two clauses, Nos. 6 and 11, of the original Bill were to some extent, I will not say contentious, but productive of considerable differences of opinion in the Select Committee. The former was intended, roughly speaking, to bring the law in certain provinces relating to the attachment of debts for arrears of tax into conformity with the law in other parts of India. The other related to arrangements for bringing what may be called Income-tax Agents under some sort of discipline and control. It was decided in the Select Committee that these two clauses should be dropped for the present and, if necessary, reintroduced at a later date in a separate Bill after further study and re-circulation of revised and simplified proposals on lines which appeared to carry with them the general agreement of the Select Committee. Apart from this reference to the two particular clauses which have now been omitted, I do not think it is necessary for me to enter into any further explanations on the purpose of this Bill. Sir, I move.

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 2 to 10 were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 11 stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh (Muzaffarpur cum Champaran: Non-Muhamadan): Sir, I beg to move:

"That for clause 11 the following clause be substituted:

"11. (a) In sub-section (2) of section 66 of the said Act, for the words 'within one month of the passing of an order under section 31 or section 32' the words 'within sixty days of the date on which he is served with notice of an order under section 31 or section 32' shall be substituted.

(b) For the words 'one month', in the second place where they occur, the words 'sixty days' shall be substituted'."

Sir, in making this amendment, I am actuated only by a desire to clarify the law, and save unnecessary hardship to the assessee who want to take their cases to the High Court. Section 66 is probably the only provision enabling an assessee to approach the High Court on a question of law. Now, what ordinarily happens in a case is that no dates are fixed for the passing of an order, and the assessee has no opportunity of knowing when the order will be passed and from what time the period of limitation will run. Sometimes orders are passed weeks or even months after the arguments are heard, and behind the back of the assessee, who cannot be expected to dance attendance in the office all the time. There is also no provision in law for informing the assessee as to when the order against him has been passed. Now, you will observe that in section 30, sub-section (2), it is stated, "within 30 days of receipt of the notice"; and in section 66, sub-section (3) it is stated, "within six months from the date on which he is served with notice", so that it will be observed with regard to other provisions of the Act a clear definition of the time of notice has been mentioned. Only by some unaccountable flaw nothing has been mentioned in sub-section (2) of section 66. I only wish to make this point clear, and to substitute the following, "within sixty days of the date on which he is served with notice of an order under section 31 or section 32". Further one month is too short, and so I would make it sixty days.

Now, it may be stated that, even when the period of one month has elapsed, the High Court can still be moved, but in the Indian Law Reports, 6 Lahore, page 373, it was held that:

"A delay of over a month in presenting an application to the Commissioner under section 66 (2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, after the order had been passed which gave rise to that application, robs the Commissioner of all jurisdiction, and a reference by him to the High Court under the section is therefore not competent."

I have changed 'one month' to '60 days', for this reason. The assessee must be given more time to formulate the points of law, as the rulings are that no fresh points of law could be raised in the application to the High Court under sub-clause (3).

I spoke on this subject on the Finance Bill on the 28th of March last year, and I do not want to add anything more now. I understand that the Government are willing to accept my amendment, in which case my thanks are due to them.

Sir, I move.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I am prepared to say, on behalf of the Government, that we are willing to accept my Honourable friend's amendment.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That for clause 11 the following clause be substituted:

"11. (a) In sub-section (2) of section 66 of the said Act, for the words 'within one month of the passing of an order under section 31 or section 32' the words 'within sixty days of the date on which he is served with notice of an order under section 31 or section 32' shall be substituted.

(b) For the words 'one month', in the second place where they occur, the words 'sixty days' shall be substituted'."

The motion was adopted.

Clause 11, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clause 12 was added to the Bill.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I beg to move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE CANTONMENTS (HOUSE-ACCOMMODATION AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. G. M. Young (Army Secretary): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill further to amend the Cantonments (House-Accommodation) Act, 1923, for certain purposes, as reported by the Select Committee, be taken into consideration."

No amendments have been proposed, Sir, in this Bill and therefore it is unnecessary for me to make a long speech. But I think it is due to the House that I should endeavour to explain, in as few sentences as possible, why it is necessary to have a special Act of the Legislature to deal with these houses, and the changes that we now propose in that Act. The reason is the peculiar system which Government, from early times, have employed to secure house-accommodation for army officers in cantonments. When they established cantonments, they used to build, as they still do, accommodation in the lines, and barracks, for the Viceroy's Commissioned officers and the non-commissioned officers and men, both of the British and Indian services. But for officers they adopted a different plan. They laid out, in the various portions of the cantonment, sites for bungalows, and then offered these sites gratis to persons who were willing to build upon them houses suitable for the accommodation of military officers. In many cases the original grantees of these sites were the officers themselves; and even at the present day in certain cantonments, where regiments are permanently quartered, the bungalows are owned by the officers or by the regiments. But in other cases the Houses were built by civilians generally residents of the neighbouring city and leased by them to officers. The result was that, in course of time, the houses passed almost entirely, in many cantonments, into the hands of the civilian residents of the locality. Nowadays when battalions are moved to and fro from one cantonment to another (and it occurs now more frequently than in the old days), considerable difficulty arises in the matter of leasing these houses. The officers have to inquire before they come to the cantonment what houses are available. They have, probably, to make their arrangements with the landlord, generally at a distance and by correspondence; and the house-owner himself has no guarantee that his house will be occupied for a reasonable period, because the officer may soon be transferred.

These difficulties led to the first Cantonment House-Accommodation Act, which was passed in 1902. I need not go into the details of that Act. It was succeeded in 1923 by an Act which did remove most of the disabilities from which both the house-owners and the officers suffered. The insecurity of tenure was removed by introducing the principle under which Government, as distinct from the individual officer, became the lessee of the house for a term of years; and the difficulties about settling the rent were removed by expanding the existing Committees of Arbitration so as to give them a more non-official character. The great drawback of this Act was that it was almost impossible in some cantonments to assemble the Committee of Arbitration as composed under the Act of 1923. In introducing the Act, my predecessor, Mr. Burdon, remarked that there was a very grave danger that the elaborate procedure of the Act might place serious difficulties in the way of its operation, which has proved to be the case. For instance, the Chairman of the Committee of Arbitration has to be a person who is neither a Government official, nor interested in any land or holding in the cantonment. Well, it is very difficult, within the limits of the cantonment, to find a person who answers to that description. Let me take an instance of a particular case which occurred in Peshawar. It was found that there was only one person in the cantonment who was eligible for appointment to the Chairmanship of the Committee of Arbitration. It was also found that it was difficult to assemble the Committee at any time. The result was that the Committee took about eight months to reach a decision. Then somebody discovered that there was a flaw in the composition of the Committee. A new Committee had to be formed, and another six months elapsed before it reached its decision. The present Bill attempts to get rid of these difficulties by substituting for a Committee of Arbitration, a simple reference to the ordinary Courts, with an appeal to the High Court. The other measures in it are chiefly directed against an evil which has cropped up recently of bogus occupation of houses.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): What does the Honourable Member mean by "bogus occupations"?

Mr. G. M. Young: Under the Act, when a house is in occupation of an owner it cannot be appropriated. Instances have occurred where owners went into occupation of houses until some other arrangement had been made for the officer for whom a house was desired. Then the owner vacated the house again, and let it to a tenant who was prepared to pay a good rent and to remain in the House for a long time; whereas with the officer, there was no guarantee of his remaining, for he might be transferred at any moment.

These are the two respects in which the Bill purports to amend the existing law. I have only to add that the main measures in this Bill, including the clause which forms the subject of a minute of dissent by my Honourable friends, Dr. Moonje and Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru, have been approved by a representative deputation of the Indian Cantonments' Association, a body which is very zealous in safeguarding the rights of house-owners in cantonments. That deputation discussed all the provisions of the Bill at great length with the acting Army Secretary last summer, and, as I said, recorded its approval of the main provisions in the Bill.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Sir, I do not wish to speak at length at this stage because I shall have an opportunity of presenting my views in connection with this Bill when we come to clause 6, but I should like to say straightaway that the description given by the Army Secretary of the objects of the Bill should not lull the House into a false sense of security. He has tried to make out that the Bill is simply intended to remove defects of procedure, to give house-owners a better opportunity of earning a dividend on the capital invested by them in the construction of their houses and to provide military officers with more assured accommodation. I am afraid, Sir, that I regard this Bill as a direct attack on the house-owners. Had the Government been satisfied with minor changes in procedure, nobody would have taken any objection to it. But the main clause of the Bill is clause 6. I do not wish to go into the details of this clause because I have already said that I shall be able to discuss the principle involved in it when you put this clause to the vote. But I should like to deal at once with the point of "bogus occupation" raised by the Army Secretary. He said it was possible, under the present Act, for a house-owner to go into a house owned by him simply to prevent a military officer from occupying it. No instances of this kind were given in the Select Committee, but I should like to draw the attention of the House to clause 7 of the existing Cantonment House-Accommodation Act, which was passed in 1923. If a Commanding Officer of a cantonment is satisfied that a house is suitable for occupation by a military officer or a military mess, he can not merely require the owner to allow the Government to take possession of it on certain conditions, but can also compel the existing owner to vacate it. It is obvious then, Sir, that even if a house-owner by dilatory tactics on his part prevents the occupation of a house by a military officer, the Cantonment Officer can subsequently compel the vacation of the house in question.

Mr. G. M. Young: By the owner?

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Will the Honourable Member wait and listen to me?

Mr. G. M. Young: I want to know what the Honourable Member means.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: I am trying to understand what the Honourable Member meant when he spoke of "bogus occupation". The Honourable Member's point seems to be that a house-owner might temporarily move into a house belonging to him with the object of letting it to a non-military man in order to secure a higher rent. I say, Sir, that, under the existing law, even if a house-owner resorts to such tactics, the military officers have a remedy in their hands. They can compel the occupier of the house to vacate it.

Mr. G. M. Young: Not if he is the owner.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: If the owner continues to occupy the house, then it is not "bogus occupation"; on the showing of the Honourable Member, himself, it is really bona fide occupation and I take it that the Honourable Member is not complaining against that.

Mr. G. M. Young: No, Sir, I am not complaining of that. What I said in my speech quite clearly was this, that the owner of a house can, under the Act, as it stands, go into a house for the purpose of defeating an officer for whom a house is required. Then that officer, for whom the house was required, will have to make other arrangements. Probably there is another house in the locality which can be taken. If the officer gets another house, the owner of the house, who temporarily occupied it, will vacate it and then give it to a tenant who is a non-military man.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: The Cantonment authorities can ask the house-owner to execute a lease and then ask the occupier to vacate the house. If however the house-owner continues to occupy the house, it cannot be said that the house-owner moved into the house simply to keep the military officer out. The question must be discussed then on entirely different grounds. We must discuss the reasons for which the house-owner wishes to move from a part of the city in which he is living into a bungalow situated in the cantonment. But I do not wish to deal with the question just now. I shall discuss it in connection with clause 6. But I submit that the speech of the Army Secretary has created a misunderstanding with regard to the main objects of the Bill and he certainly did not represent the situation correctly when he dealt with what he called the "bogus occupation" of a house.

Mr. G. M. Young: I understand the Honourable Member is not opposing the motion for taking the Bill into consideration. If so, I have nothing to say at present.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill further to amend the Cantonment (House-Accommodation) Act, 1923, for certain purposes, as reported by the Select Committee, be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 2 to 5 were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 6, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru.

Mr. G. M. Young: On a point of order, Sir. Do I understand that the Honourable Member is proposing an amendment to the clause?

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: I am not proposing any amendment, but I am within my rights in opposing the whole clause.

Mr. President: Yes, go on.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Sir, in order to understand the significance of clause 6, it is necessary that the House should be aware of some provisions of the existing Cantonments (House-Accommodation) Act. I will not go into the history connected with the amendment of the old Act of 1902. It will suffice for my present purpose to take the Act as it stands. Section 5 of this Act states that every house that is situated in a cantonment is liable to appropriation by Government on a lease in the prescribed manner. Section 6 lays down that where in the opinion of a Commanding Officer of a cantonment a house should be taken possession of by Government, he should serve a notice on the owner of the house, requiring him, after at least three days from the service of the notice, to permit the house to be inspected, measured and surveyed. Section 7 empowers a Commanding Officer, in case he is satisfied, on the report of the inspecting officer, that the house is suitable for occupation by a military officer or a military mess, to serve a notice on the owner, requiring him to execute a lease of the house to the Government for a specified period of not less than five years. It also empowers him to require the existing occupier, if any, to vacate the house.

The House will thus see that, as I have already stated, under section 6 a house can be inspected, measured and surveyed only three days after the service of the notice. The house-owner thus gets an opportunity of moving into the house. Section 10 of the Act lays down certain conditions under which a house shall be exempt from appropriation by Government. One of the conditions under which a house cannot be appropriated by Government is that it should be occupied by the owner.

My Honourable friend the Army Secretary says that section 6, which requires at least three days' previous notice to the house-owner before a house can be inspected, leaves a very undesirable loophole and enables a house-owner to occupy his own house within those three days and prevent the military authorities, under section 10 of the present Act, from appropriating it. Now, Sir, we have to see why it is that practical difficulties have arisen in connection with the occupation of their own houses by house-owners in cantonments. My Honourable friend, the Army Secretary, contended that it was reasonable for Government to see that military officers were provided with accommodation in the cantonments. That is a sound principle.

Mr. G. M. Young: It was not necessary for me to bring out that contention at the time.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: If that was not the contention of my Honourable friend and that is not the principle on which this Bill is based, I think it ought not to receive a moment's consideration at the hands of the House. I thought the entire principle on which the Bill was based was that it was reasonable that military officers should be provided with accommodation in the cantonments.

Mr. G. M. Young: The principle is that this accommodation has been provided for occupation by military officers in cantonments.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: I will grant that it is reasonable that military officers should be provided with decent accommodation in cantonments. The first question, however, that arises in this connection is whether there is such an acute shortage of accommodation at the present time as to lead Government to change the present law in the manner which this Bill suggests. Sub-clause (a) of clause 6 of the present Bill requires that, for clause (c) of section 10 of the Act, which exempts a house from occupation in case it is occupied by the owner, the following clause shall be substituted:

"(c) is occupied bona fide by the owner as his residence and has been so occupied continuously during the one month immediately preceding the issue of the notice under section 6, . . ."

If this clause is passed as it stands, it is obvious that every house-owner can be prevented by the military authorities from occupying his house. Before the House accepts this amendment I think it ought to ask the military authorities to satisfy it that there is such a serious shortage of houses that no accommodation can be provided for military officers, unless the house-owners are prevented from moving into their own houses. We went into this question at length in the Select Committee. It was not contended then that in any cantonment, whether it was Peshawar in the north or Poona in the south, such a situation had arisen and that it required to be dealt with immediately. All that we were told was that there was a very small number of houses that remained to be occupied in future by military officers, and that it was therefore desirable that Government should legislate immediately in order to deal with a situation that might arise two or three or four years hence.

Another question which deserves consideration in this connection is whether the present Act has enabled the house-owners to prevent the military authorities from satisfying their reasonable needs, and to take advantage of the so-called loophole left by section 6 to let their houses to non-military men in order to charge them a higher rent. No instances even of that kind were available in the Select Committee. My Honourable friend tried to make out that this Bill was intended to deal only with bogus occupation; but as I have already pointed out, in case the house-owner lets his house to a non-military man, the military authorities can compel its evacuation. The only circumstance in which the military authorities are powerless is when the house-owner continues to reside in his house; and, Sir, does continuous residence in a house by the owner not constitute bona fide occupation? Great stress was laid in the Committee on the inclusion of the words bona fide in clause 6 of the present Bill, but the speech of my Honourable friend, the Army Secretary, shows the sense in which these words are to be interpreted. If even house-owners living continuously in their own houses can be accused of bogus occupation, what are the circumstances that would constitute bona fide occupation of a house? It is obvious that Government, while employing a form of words that might satisfy the unwary, really wish to use their powers in such a way as to prevent a single house-owner from continuing to exercise the legal right which he has under the present Act.

There is another important fact which I would place before the House in this connection. When the amendment of the old Act of 1902 was under consideration, the house-owners were afraid lest their right to live in their own houses should be taken away. A deputation of the All-

India Cantonments Association waited on Lord Reading in 12 Noon. March, 1923, and received from him the assurance that Government did not intend to take away from them the right they enjoyed of occupying their own houses. The Army authorities think that, as this undertaking was fulfilled in regard to the Act of 1923, they are absolved from observing it any further. Now, Sir, it is the principle underlying this proceeding that deserves the consideration of this House. Lord Reading assented to the request of the house-owners on the ground that it was a perfectly just demand, that the principle underlying it was a thoroughly reasonable one. If this is accepted, the matter ought to wear a different complexion in the eyes of the House. If Government considered it reasonable in 1923 that house-owners should not be deprived of the right of occupying their houses, there is absolutely no reason why they should now introduce a law with the express object of depriving them of that right.

Sir, the real reason why in many places house-owners wish to occupy houses situated in cantonments is, in the first place, that in some of the towns, for instance, those situated on the frontier, there is a great deal of insecurity of life and property. The Indian quarter of the town is not guarded with one-tenth the care that the cantonments are. Is it not natural in these conditions that those fortunate people who own houses in cantonments should like to take advantage of this fact in order to live in circumstances of greater comfort and security? Sir, I lay stress on this subject because, since I began taking an interest in this question three years ago, I have found that it is the case of Peshawar that has come repeatedly before this House. I dare say that the principle of the Bill will apply to all cantonments, but I feel I am justified in saying that it is the difficulties that have arisen in Peshawar in particular that have led Government to propose a change in the existing law. The other reason why the house-owners wish to move into the houses situated in cantonments is that the cities are already greatly congested and they wish to live now in cleaner and healthier surroundings. Is this desire unreasonable? Can it be contended in these circumstances that a man who moves into his house is doing so with the deliberate object of preventing the military authorities from securing reasonable accommodation for their officers? There is another reason also, Sir, which induces the house-owners to move into cantonments and that is that in certain places there are no civil stations. If there were these civil stations, to which people desirous of living in healthier and more sanitary conditions could shift, I am sure there would be no desire on the part of the house-owners to refuse to reside in the civil stations and to insist on living in houses situated in cantonments.

Sir, when I asked questions about Peshawar in the House two or three years ago, my Honourable friend, Mr. Young, said that an officer of the Army Department would be deputed to Peshawar to consider the matter referred to by me and to submit a report to the Government. Well, the officer who was deputed happened to be the Deputy Secretary to the Government of India in the Army Department. Shortly afterwards he became the officiating Secretary, and the result was that no report was submitted to the Government. It was thought undesirable for the officer to submit a report to himself when he became the officiating Secretary. We do not know, therefore, what consultation he had with the house-owners there, what were the points they raised, and what were the views he submitted to Government. But as I have been in touch with the house-owners, I am in a position to say that they took up a very reasonable attitude. They laid before Government the considerations that I have now laid before them and offered to build new houses should Government give them sites on reasonable terms. Sir, if the Government take a large view of the matter, it is possible for them to proceed in such a way as to give the relief required by the military authorities, and at the same time to enable the higher section of the Indian population to live in better conditions than prevail at the present time in congested cities and in towns on the frontier. My Honourable friend, the Army Secretary, contended that the extension of the cantonments might provide no real remedy. I understood him to say that the houses that exist already in cantonments were built on the express condition that the military officers would have a prior right to their occupation. He therefore thinks that, if fresh houses were constructed on the same condition, there is no reason to believe that the same difficulties would not arise in future. Now, Sir, if Government have deeds and documents in their possession enabling them to prove that the conditions on which the houses were allowed to be built in cantonments were such as they are represented to be by the Army Secretary, they have a legal remedy in their own hands. But they find themselves in a difficulty precisely in those places where they are unable to prove that the houses which they wish to occupy were built on the conditions alleged by them. They say that while their statement that these houses were built on the condition already referred to is perfectly correct, on account of circumstances over which they had no control, they have lost the deeds which would enable them to establish this. I am not prepared, Sir, to take them at their word in this matter. Their assertion is purely in the circumstances a matter of surmise. The supposition of my Honourable friend, the Army Secretary, may be correct; on the other hand, it may be wholly wrong. We have therefore to take the matter as it stands, and I contend that no instance has been shown proving that, in cases where the Government have the necessary documents, there has been any difficulty in the way of their occupation of houses built on the condition that they should be available for occupation by military officers. On these grounds, Sir, I am unable to give my support to sub-clause (a) of clause 6. I hope still, Sir, that the Government will pause before they insist on the passage of this clause. There is not in many cantonments a large number of houses at present occupied by house-owners. It is on their own showing a very small one. If their needs are growing, they surely cannot be satisfied by the passing of this legislation. They will sooner or later have to undertake the construction of new houses. Then why should they not embark on such a course now and, in satisfying their own needs, give satisfaction also to the house-owners in cantonments? They ought to bear in mind that, in some places, difficulties have arisen not merely because of a desire on the part of the house-owners to occupy their houses, but because the strength of the forces resident in those places has been lately increased.

I think, Sir, in these circumstances, it is reasonable on our part to ask that the passage of this legislation should be postponed, and that in the meanwhile the Government should consider the larger grounds on which they find house-owners desirous of moving into their own houses. This is a matter, Sir, which has been brought before the authorities by the house-owners of various cantonments and also by the Muslim Association of Peshawar. The work undertaken by the Muslim Association in this connection deserves the special recognition of this House. The Association has been treated with scant courtesy by the authorities. I understand that at one time the Association was told that no correspondence could be carried on with it as it was not recognised by the authorities. I do not know, Sir, whether the authorities were strictly within their rights in taking their stand on so technical a ground, but considering the question in a large way, I do think that their troubles would have been over much more quickly had they listened to the reasonable requests of the Muslim Association, and that they are themselves responsible for the difficulties in which they find themselves now. Sir, I oppose sub-clause (a) of clause 6 and I request that the two clauses (a) and (b) of clause 6 be put to the vote separately. In case, Sir, you find yourself unable to comply with this request, I shall be compelled to oppose the whole of clause 6.

Maulvi Mohammad Shafee Daoodi (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, I rise to support my Honourable friend, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru. He has described in detail, Sir, what the present law is and what the amendment is that is proposed by the Government. I need not dilate upon that. But it is very clear to me that the balance of inconvenience is on the side of the owners. I admit that Government might find difficulties in securing accommodation for its military officers, but the Government have also got to see that the owners of houses in cantonment areas are not put to much inconvenience. If the Honourable Member in charge of the Bill would weigh the inconvenience of the military officers and the inconvenience of the owners of the houses, he would come to one, and one conclusion alone, and it is that the inconvenience is more on the side of the house-owners. It is not difficult for the Government to build for the military officers bungalows in the cantonment area which they require, but it is very difficult for the house-owners who have purchased or built houses in the cantonment area at fabulous expense to hand them over to the Government under the new conditions. There are already certain conditions under which Government can occupy these bungalows; they should be content with that and not go beyond that. It appears to me, Sir, it will cause great injustice to the owners of the bungalows, and I hope every Member of this House will realise it and will lend his strong support in throwing out that clause which has been opposed by my Honourable friend, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru.

Dr. B. S. Moonje (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I rise to support my Honourable friend, Pandit Kunzru. I have not been able quite to comprehend the object of my Honourable friend the Army Secretary. If his idea is that there should be suitable accommodation and adequate accommodation for the military officers in cantonments, he has my full sympathy, but I find that it is amply provided for by the law at present in existence. I have heard allegations against Government in this respect, and these allegations are that the Government do not want Indians to go and live in the cantonment areas, and they say that this Bill has been brought forward primarily with the idea of preventing Indians from going and living there. I do not know how far these allegations are true, but of this much I am sure, that the Army Secretary has not been able to make out a case either in the Select Committee or on the floor of this House that there is any need for this amending Bill. His only object must be, I suppose, to provide for finding adequate and suitable accommodation for the military officers, and his idea also must be to prevent bogus occupation by others of the houses available and needed for military officers in cantonments. These two objects are amply provided for by the Act of 1923. If the idea is, however, to prevent the owners of the houses from occupying their own houses so that they may not have the advantage of living in the cantonment, then the allegations of these people seem to be correct; but the Army Secretary has denied that the idea is to prevent the house-owners from going into their houses to avoid Europeans having to live in association with or as neighbours of Indians in the cantonments. If the house-owner goes into his house and is not in bona fide occupation of the house and wants to deceive the military authorities, there is ample provision for dealing with such cases in the Act of 1923. If he first resides in the house and then vacates and gives the house to another person on higher rent, then under section 7 (b) of the Act of 1923, the military authorities have the power of requiring the existing occupier, if any, to vacate the house. If the owner himself goes and occupies the house for himself, then there must be some motive, for he does not want to go there simply to deceive the military authorities and suffer a loss to the extent of the rent that he might otherwise get; so that is an idea which is not comprehended, being against human nature.

It has not been proved either in the Select Committee or on the floor of this House that there is really a serious shortage of accommodation for military officers in any of the cantonments. If that is so, instead of coming out with this amending Bill, we would ask the Army Secretary to take a constructive view and come out with a constructive scheme by which he could meet both the wants of the military officers and of the house-owners. You will have to admit that house-owners owning houses in cantonments have a right to go and live in those houses; you will have to admit that right, and we in this House will never give support to any measure if the idea is to prevent house-owners from occupying bungalows or building bungalows in cantonments in the interests of their health, in the interests of their security, and in the interests of providing relief to the congestion already existing in certain cantonments. To that extent we shall be opposed in a determined way if the idea be to prevent Indians from going and living in cantonments. The Army Secretary has however my full sympathy and I shall offer him my full co-operation whenever he may come before this House with a constructive proposal to provide for adequate accommodation to the military officers as well as for Indians. But I find that on this occasion he has not been able to make out a case in favour of his Bill under debate because he has never said and he has based his argument in favour of this amending Bill on the supposition that there is a shortage of houses and that the military officers are being inconvenienced for want of accommodation. With these words, Sir, I support my Honourable friend Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru.

*Speech not revised by the Honourable Member.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub (Rohilkund and Kumaon Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): I wish also to support the motion which has been so ably moved by my Honourable friend, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru, that clause (a) of clause 6 of this Bill should be rejected.

Mr. President: There is no such motion before the House.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: He opposed the clause, Sir, and I support him in that. Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru has, in an elaborate and ably-worded speech, fully shown to the House that the existing law is quite sufficient to afford facilities to the military officers in the matter of accommodation in the cantonments, that if really the houses are required for accommodation of military officers in cantonments, the authorities could eject the non-military occupants of the houses if they are not the owners of the houses. Now, the amendment which has been proposed to be made certainly and clearly would prove a source of great harassment to the house-owners themselves. The words "bona fide resident" is certainly such an ambiguous word that it may be used to harass the house owners at any time and in any form. It has been shown and it has also been admitted by the Government that there is not a dearth of houses for military officers in any of the cantonments at present. Therefore it is not clear to me why this amendment is being brought on to the Statute-book. Since this Bill came into this House, we, the Members of the Assembly, have received a large number of representations, applications and communications from house-owners in different cantonments in the country, and there seems to be a great deal of discontent and misunderstanding about this amendment in the minds of house-owners in Indian cantonments. It is not therefore just and proper that a measure which will create such an amount of discontent in the country should be placed on the Statute-book. After the speech of my friend, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru, it is not necessary that I should go further into the details of this clause; and with these few words I wish to support his motion.

Mr. H. P. Mody (Bombay Millowners' Association: Indian Commerce): Sir, I have just one consideration to urge. The object of this section is presumably to get at the owner who is not a bona fide occupier. With that object we all have sympathy; but as the clause is worded, it makes it absolutely impossible for an owner who wishes to occupy his house bona fide to do so; and if that is the position, we can never agree to it. I should like my Honourable friend, Mr. Young, to explain how this clause will protect an owner who genuinely wishes to be in occupation of his house; and unless my Honourable friend is able to satisfy the House that this clause is not unduly restrictive, and does not operate as a sweeping curtailment of the rights of the owner, I for one will vote against it.

Mr. G. M. Young: Sir, I think I shall be able to explain what is the precise object of this clause and also that it does not constitute, as my Honourable friend, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru, sought to argue, an invasion of the rights of owners in cantonments. The fact is sometimes overlooked that all the houses with which this Act deals are houses which were built for occupation by military officers on land granted free for that purpose. Now, my Honourable friend has talked a great deal about the rights of the house-owners. The house-owners undoubtedly have rights, and the object of this amending Bill is in many cases to maintain their rights. But, Sir, the military officers in cantonments also have certain rights. These houses were built for occupation by them. There is, broadly speaking, no other accommodation which they can occupy. This was the manner in which Government provided house accommodation for its officers. As I have said already, they built barracks and accommodation in the lines for the sepoys and British soldiers, and the non-commissioned officers and the Viceroy's commissioned officers. These are perfectly secure in the accommodation that Government has built for them. Similarly, in modern cantonments, as in the New Delhi Cantonment, Government did not adopt the old plan, but built bungalows for occupation by officers. So there again there is no trouble or difficulty. It is only under the curious system that the Government adopted in the first instance to house their officers, that these difficulties arose; and undoubtedly the house-owners found themselves at a disadvantage under that system, because as I say, regiments come and go for short periods, and the house-owner, having built the accommodation for a military officer, had no certainty that the house would be regularly occupied and that he would get regular rent. That was the great difficulty; and the two previous Acts and this amending Bill were aimed at remedying it. The main portion of this Bill is the substitution of a simple method of reference to the Courts for a Committee of Arbitration in the matter of rent. But there are one or two other points in which it has been found that the existing Act has been abused; and this is one of them. My Honourable friend, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru, still does not understand what I mean by bogus occupation . . .

Dr. B. S. Moonje: How has the Act been abused?

Mr. G. M. Young: I shall proceed to explain. My Honourable friend, Mr. Kunzru, still does not understand what I mean by bogus occupation, and perhaps the House will bear with me if I explain it once again. Let me take an ordinary instance. An officer who is occupying a bungalow leaves the cantonment; there is a gap of a month or two before his successor arrives. The owner may find this present system of letting to individual officers very unsatisfactory; he is not secure in his rent, and he never knows when his tenant will be changed. He thinks that it might be a good opportunity to put in a permanent tenant.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: A non-military permanent tenant can be ejected; that is provided in section 10 (c) (iii) of the Act of 1923.

Mr. G. M. Young: If my Honourable friend will allow me to complete the argument I think he will be satisfied. The owner then proceeds to go into the bungalow himself and he occupies it; and when the next officer, who comes in succession, arrives in the cantonment, there is not at that moment a bungalow available for him. Now, under the terms of the Act, as it stands at present, the Officer Commanding the station, who is responsible for issuing notices under this Act, cannot issue a notice to the owner of that bungalow, because the owner is at that moment in occupation. He may have, and generally does have, a house of his own in the city; but still he has gone and entered into temporary occupation of his house. Very well. What is the Officer Commanding the station to do? Perhaps he is able to find another house for the incoming officer; that house might have to be resumed, or appropriated under the Act; but anyhow, somehow or other he finds the officer another house. The need has disappeared, and the Officer Commanding the station would not be justified in issuing a notice under this Act on the tenant whom the owner subsequently puts in, because at that moment there is not a shortage; there is no officer wanting house; and that has happened actually.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: May I interrupt my Honourable friend? Does this not show that other houses are available?

Mr. G. M. Young: I would rather complete my argument if I may. That is the object of this clause—to prevent a contingency which has actually happened in one or two cases. It is not a thing that happens universally. My Honourable friend laid great stress on the fact that there has not been a shortage of bungalows in any particular cantonment, and that no such case has been made out. That, broadly speaking, is true—there are enough houses, in cantonments, taken in conjunction with hotel accommodation and so on, to accommodate the existing number of officers in each cantonment. As a matter of fact, even that is not entirely true of all cantonments. There are cantonments where officers cannot get houses. In the cold weather they have to live in tents. As I have already said, these houses were originally built for occupation by officers. That is what they were intended for. Now, if any owner can go into his house, and has the right, as my Honourable friend says, to live in his house, it follows that all owners have the right to live in their houses; and if all owners exercise that right there will be no houses left in cantonments for occupation by military officers.

Mr. H. P. Mody: And therefore you make it impossible for any owner to occupy his house?

Mr. G. M. Young: All we want to do is to make it possible for every officer in the cantonment to have a house. There is no attempt made to prevent owners from living in their houses except when a change of officers takes place. After all, the house has been built for the officer and not for occupation by the owner. The owners have other houses. The officers have not.

Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi (North Madras: Muhammadan): Why should not Government build bungalows for military officers?

Mr. G. M. Young: When they can afford to do so, Government do build bungalows for officers. But is it reasonable to expect that Government should build new bungalows for occupation by officers in order to allow civilians who are not ordinarily residents of cantonments to come into the cantonments and live in houses which were built for officers? Wherever they can do so without infringing upon the rights of officers, that is to say, whenever the officers are accommodated, there is no objection whatever to a cantonment house-owner living in his house. As a matter of fact a great number of them do. Now, my Honourable friend referred to an undertaking given by Lord Reading in connection with the Bill of 1923, which became law. It is quite true that Lord Reading said in answer to the deputation, that it was not the intention of Government to encroach upon the existing rights of house-owners to live in their houses. That is perfectly clear. Now, Sir, what is the existing right of a house-owner to live in his house?

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: You can always explain away the promises made by the Government.

Mr. G. M. Young: What is the existing right? To live in the house into which he has got. There is no doubt about it. As I said, there is no intention whatever of turning any owner out of his house. My Honourable friend referred to Peshawar. He referred to the fact that the Deputy Secretary in the Army Department went there. I went there myself a year later and met a representative deputation of the house-owners. They were rather perturbed, because of a rumour which had gone out that Government intended to turn house-owners out of their houses—those of them who were already in occupation. I made it clear that Government had no such intention, and that house-owners who were living in their own houses in cantonments would be left unmolested. Not only will they not be affected by the provisions of this Act, but we have no intention of applying to them the power of resumption which we have in the case of every one of these houses. I may also add that the deputation at Peshawar were perfectly content to have all the houses which were left in the cantonment taken up under the House-Accommodation Act.

Then my Honourable friend said that it is incumbent upon Government to make other provision. Well, as I have said, we do build, wherever necessary. In Peshawar there is a scheme of the civil authorities for expansion of the civil station, in order to give an opportunity to people who wish to come out of the city to avail themselves of the greater security, which is provided by the cantonment. But we must first accommodate the military officers who are in the station. As I said, the Peshawar landowners have no objection to our appropriating the houses which are still occupied by military officers. I may add that the deputation to which Lord Reading gave that undertaking was a deputation of the All-India Cantonments Association, the very Association which has now approved of this particular clause. So it is quite obvious that in their minds there was no going back upon that undertaking.

Then I would point out that this clause only enables the Officer Commanding the station to appropriate houses where necessary. That is to say, there must be an officer wanting the house. Besides that, if Honourable Members will look at clause 6 (b), they will see that this right cannot be exercised in respect of any house that has not been occupied by a military officer or military mess, at any time during the three years immediately preceding the issue of the notice under section 6. All that we are trying to do is to secure houses which have regularly been occupied, since the time they were built, by military officers, and that only if there is an officer who actually needs the accommodation. It seems to me a very reasonable provision; and, as I say, it is designed to meet a contingency that has arisen in one or two cases. It is not a general measure intended to meet a general tendency on the part of house-owners to occupy their houses. It is quite incorrect to refer to it in that light. For these reasons, Sir, I think I am entitled to ask the House to pass this clause which is, as I have said, only one of the minor provisions of the Bill, the main object of which is to get rid of Committees of Arbitration, and to substitute a simple and effective method of resort to the ordinary Courts.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: On a point of information. Has there been any case where, in a cantonment, military officers have not been able to get adequate accommodation owing to the insistence of the house-owners to live in their own houses or of the house-owners deceiving in order to give the houses to other tenants at a higher rent?

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Can you quote examples?

Mr. G. M. Young: I cannot at this moment cite instances.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 6 stand part of the Bill

Mr. President: Order, order. As this is a new provision, I cannot vote for it. I must, therefore, vote against it. (Loud Applause from the non-Official Benches.)

The motion was negatived.

Clauses 7 to 17 were added to the Bill.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

Mr. G. M. Young: Sir, I beg to move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

Mr. President: I would advise the Honourable Member not to make that motion just now. In view of the fact that clause 6 has gone out, he will have to make consequential amendments. The Honourable Member may take up this motion afterwards.

Mr. G. M. Young: Thank you, Sir, I see the point, and I do not wish to move at this stage that the Bill be passed.

STATEMENT OF BUSINESS.

The Honourable Sir James Crerar (Leader of the House): Sir, with your permission, I desire to make a statement of the probable course of Government business in the week beginning Monday, the 24th February. As Honourable Members are already aware, Monday, the 24th and Tuesday, the 25th, have been allotted by the Governor General for the voting on Demands for Railway Grants. Wednesday, the 26th, is a gazetted holiday. On Thursday, the 27th, any business left unfinished today will be continued, and thereafter motions will be made to take into consideration and pass the Income-tax (Amendment) Bill, the Insolvency (Amendment) Bill, and the

[Sir James Crerar.]

Indian Railways (Amendment) Bill, as reported by the Select Committee, and to refer to Select Committee the Indian Companies (Amendment) Bill. Elections will be held for the new Standing Finance Committee for Railways and to elect two Members to sit on the governing body of the Indian Research Fund Association. Motions will be made for the election of three Members to the Public Accounts Committee to fill existing vacancies and to fill an existing vacancy in the Standing Committee for Roads. I understand that the Governor General has appointed Friday, the 28th February, for the presentation of the General Budget, excluding railways.

POINT OF ORDER RAISED BY MR. ARTHUR MOORE.

Mr. Arthur Moore (Bengal: European): Sir, I wish to rise to a point of order.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member from Calcutta, Mr. Arthur Moore, has just passed on a chit to me inquiring whether I would permit him to raise a point of order before I adjourned the House. He does not state in the chit on what subject he wishes to raise a point of order. There is no business before the House on which there could be any point of order. But I infer, that perhaps the Honourable Member wishes to raise some point on the statement that I had read to this House in the beginning of the day. If that is so, it was his duty to raise the point then. The Chair had repeatedly asked him whether he had any point of order, but he continued saying, "No", and that he wanted to speak. He is, therefore, too late now. If there is any other point of order which he wishes to raise, I am afraid there must be some business before the House before I can allow him.

Mr. Arthur Moore: I was endeavouring then to raise the point of order.

Mr. President: The Chair asked him whether he was raising a point of order and he repeatedly said, "No".

Mr. Arthur Moore: It was on a point of order that I wanted to speak then.

Mr. President: When he was asked whether he was raising any point of order, he said, "No", but that he wanted to speak.

Mr. Arthur Moore: I am not aware that I said, "No". I was all the time endeavouring to raise the point of order.

Mr. President: As a special case, I will allow the Honourable Member to raise the point of order now.

Mr. Arthur Moore: I am deeply indebted to you, Sir, and with all respect to the Chair, I will endeavour to raise my point of order. I can assure you, Sir, that there is no one more unhappy than myself in the circumstances that I find myself in today

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must confine himself to stating the point of order.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR PROTECTION OF ASSEMBLY CHAMBER & ITS PRECINCTS. 845

Mr. Arthur Moore: I wish merely to say, with the greatest respect to you, Sir, that my point of order is this. Is it in order, Sir, that on a question on which we have been led to believe Honourable Members: Speak up.

Mr. Arthur Moore: Is it in order, Sir, that on an issue which you have assured us is a matter of vital importance to the House, the arrangement you have come to should be accepted in the name of the House without any Member being given an opportunity of expressing his views on it?

Mr. President: On the matter on which I have taken the decision I was not bound to consult any Member. The authority is vested in me alone; yet I have taken the Leaders of parties into consultation from the very start throughout (Hear, hear.) and it is with their full concurrence and knowledge that I have acted in the matter as I have done.

Mr. Arthur Moore: Are you aware, Sir, that party leaders have been pledged not to disclose to their followers what was happening?

Mr. President: The House stands adjourned till eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Friday, the 21st February, 1930.

THE RAILWAY BUDGET—LIST OF DEMANDS.

SECOND STAGE.

Expenditure from Revenue.

DEMAND NO. 1.—RAILWAY BOARD.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I beg to move:

“That a sum not exceeding Rs. 12,90,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1931, in respect of ‘Railway Board’.”

Standardisation of Wages.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indians): Sir, I beg to move:

“That the Demand under the head ‘Railway Board’ be reduced by Rs. 1,00,000.”

Sir, this motion is with regard to the standardisation of wages on Railways. In my opinion this forms a very important matter so far as contentment on the Railways is concerned, and although some people may think it very difficult of accomplishment, I personally think that if it was seriously tackled, it could be done. There is no doubt, Sir, that standardisation of wages in railways generally is a question that may well be referred to a committee of officers, skilled in the ethics of wage determination. With that view, Sir, I desire

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, on a point of order; last year you ruled that all questions of policy should be raised only on token cuts of one rupee or Rs. 100. If the Honourable Member is going to discuss the policy of raising the wages, can he do so by giving notice of a lump cut of Rs. 1,00,000?

Mr. President: What is the idea of putting down Rs. 1,00,000?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I considered it was necessary. I thought a token cut would not meet my needs because this is a very important matter

Mr. President: Order, order. If the Honourable Member desires to raise a question of policy he must put down a cut of Rs. 100.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: May I with your permission now proceed to prove the question of merits in my cut?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has raised a question of policy and he must put down a cut of Rs. 100.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Thank you, Sir, I submit to your ruling. That will take away a few noughts from my cut, i.e., if I reduce it from one lakh to one hundred.

Mr. President: That does not mean that the Chair allows the Honourable Member to reduce his cut to Rs. 100. He knows the ruling which the Chair gave on the last occasion and he must respect it.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, I was not in the House last year, I can assure you that I had no desire to take advantage of your ruling and if any such interpretation be put on my motion, I wish flatly to contradict it, because my intention was to bring it to the notice of the Railway Board with all the force I could.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member could do that by putting down a cut of Re. 1 or Rs. 100. There are other cuts of Rs. 100 on which the same question can be raised. The Honourable Member will go on to the next cut. This cut, as he knows, cannot be moved.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Have I your permission, Sir, to move this motion under a cut of Rs. 100?

Mr. President: Certainly.

Recent Revised Rates of East Indian Railway Wages.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, my next cut is as follows:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 1,00,000."

Mr. President: Is this on the merits, or does the Honourable Member again want to raise a question of policy? I am afraid it is a question of policy.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: No, Sir. It is a question of the merits and I hope my friend from Bihar and Orissa, who objected to my first motion, will be satisfied with that.

This motion is with regard to the reduced rates of pay on the East Indian Railway. Sir, this matter concerns every railway employee on the East Indian Railway. It does not refer to any particular community whatever; it refers to every employee who enters the East Indian Railway after a certain period, November, 1928.

Mr. President: How does the reduction of the Railway Board grant by Rs. 1,00,000 be justified on merits?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Because, Sir, the Railway Board introduced this rate and not the railway concerned.

Mr. President: And therefore the Honourable Member wants to raise the question of policy again. He should have put down a cut of Rs. 100.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, I should like to have a ruling from you as to what is the difference between "policy" and "merits" when a motion is moved on Demands for Grants. Here is a question of great merit; it is a question that involves the pay of thousands of people.

Mr. President: I am afraid I cannot allow the Honourable Member to proceed with the next cut* also, which again is a question of policy. The Honourable Member could discuss the question of policy involved in these three cuts by putting down a motion for a cut of Re. 1 or Rs. 100.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Can I move a cut of Rs. 100 on this motion?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must keep himself in touch with what happened last year.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Can I, with your permission, move a Rs. 100 cut now?

Mr. President: That can be moved when we reach the Rs. 100 cuts. There are other cuts of larger amounts which must be moved first. Mr. Aney.

Abolition of the Additional Post of Labour Member on the Railway Board.

Mr. M. S. Aney (Berar Representative): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 48,000."

Sir, let me assure the House at the very outset that mine is a cut on merit.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, I rise to a point of order. Is the Honourable Member right in moving his motion for a reduction of a sum of Rs. 48,000? This refers to a policy and not merit and should be presented under a cut of Rs. 100.

Mr. President: What is the salary of the Member for Labour?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons (Financial Commissioner, Railways): Rs. 48,000 per annum.

Mr. President: That is on merits.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: But, Sir, in my motion which you overruled, the reduction in the pay of the East Indian Railway ran into many lakhs and not merely Rs. 48,000.

Mr. President: Mr. Aney.

*"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 1,00,000 (Covenanting of employees from outside India)."

Mr. M. S. Aney: I was just going to explain that point, that mine is a cut on merits and not merely on a question of policy. The Honourable Member is definitely assured by Mr. Parsons how that amount of Rs. 48,000 works up to the annual salary of the new Member whose post we want to abolish. So it is naturally a cut on merit.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: He is worth much more than Rs. 48,000 per annum.

Mr. M. S. Aney: The point is this. I want further to assure you at the very outset that this motion is not brought with any personal feeling against any one incumbent of this office. It is not a kind of censure against any person as such. It is a protest against the retention of a post which was created virtually against the desire, against the vote of a majority of the Standing Finance Committee, and which, all experience has shown, has not served the purpose for which it was created. It is on that basis that I am going to attack the retention of the new post and support this motion. So I think my Honourable friends opposite will not misunderstand me when I am trying to make out a case in support of the motion which is before the House.

Honourable Members are aware that this new post was created last year; it is now nearly 12 months' old. Of the many reasons that were given in support of creating a post like this, the most important reason was this, that the labour questions in this country were now assuming greater and greater importance, looming larger and larger, and therefore the work that could be done by the then Member, who was known as Member General or the Member in charge of Traffic, could not thereafter be done by him alone, and a separate portfolio for labour was necessary with a separate Member for Labour in charge of it. The Honourable Sir George Rainy, then in a very lucid speech and in a speech in which he appealed not only to the reason but also to the sentiment of the Members on this side, fervently pleaded that some introduction of the human element was necessary in the mechanism of the Railway Board, because questions of an essentially human nature had to be dealt with in dealing with labour problems. Therefore, he thought that the Railway Board, which was more or less of a mechanical nature, required to be livened up with the element of what might be called human sympathy, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, was put in there. Since that time, since March or April last, my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, has been in charge of this labour portfolio, and he has been doing his work with all the zeal and earnestness which it is possible for one in his position to bestow. In fact, in the Budget speech this year which the Honourable the Railway Member has made, he probably anticipated some difficulty of the kind which my motion suggests, and in anticipation he has already replied, "Here I testify on behalf of the Railway Board to the work of my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, who has been conscientious, active" and all that sort of thing. Nobody denies that Mr. Hayman is certainly one of the ablest officers of the Railway Board. (Hear, hear.) I cannot deny it. In fact, I may say, Sir, that since 1924, since when yourself and myself have both been associated with the work of the railway administration as Members of the Railway Standing Finance Committee, for the last six years, I have had the opportunity of seeing how energetic and active an officer Mr. Hayman is. (Applause.) It is not a question of ability or inability. The question is one whether the particular work for which this special portfolio was created has been done completely to the satisfaction of this House or not, and if not, whether on the basis of the results that are placed before us, we will be justified in retaining this post hereafter. That is the simple question which I would put before the House for its consideration, and I respectfully ask the Honourable Members of this House not to allow personal considerations to be mixed up with this question, which I want to say with emphasis is simply a bare abstract question of policy, a question of the examination of the results of the work done hitherto, during this year, and our own estimate of the same in relation to what was expected of the Labour Member during this year. That is the simple question which the House has to consider. I will show, Sir, that the particular work which he had to do has been described in the Explanatory Memorandum of the Railway Budget of last year. Honourable Members know that, last year, this House sanctioned something like 58 lakhs of rupees for improving the conditions of labour, 30 lakhs under capital programme and 28 lakhs under revenue programme, 10 lakhs under one Demand and 18 lakhs under another. Thus 58 lakhs of rupees were sanctioned by this House and handed over to the office of the New Member to do their best towards the amelioration of the condition of the low-paid staff on the State Railways. I would only like to judge the work of the Honourable Member by what he has been able to do in this direction. So first I wish to give the House some idea as to what was expected of him:

The Explanatory Memorandum says:

"It will be observed that we hope to keep the expenditure brought to account as 'Administration' down to this year's figure; and we should actually have placed it ten lakhs lower, but that we are providing for the present a sum of ten lakhs for improving the service conditions of lower paid railway employees. It is our intention, during the coming year, to start a thorough examination of the rates of pay and wages, and other conditions, under which the lower paid classes of railway servants are employed, with the object of removing any legitimate grievances that may be found to exist; and we have already, in fact, had preliminary consultations with Agents of Railway Administrations on the subject. It will be realised that the inquiry must take some time to complete, for it will entail the detailed investigation of the service conditions in numerous branches and departments, and it by no means follows that what will be found to be required is merely the increase in certain cases of the minimum wage; it is perhaps as likely to be a reduction of working hours, which will mean additional relieving staff, an extension of provident fund benefits to classes who do not at present enjoy them, or an improvement in housing conditions. But we hope that, if our organisation can be strengthened by the addition of a new Member to the Railway Board, who will be charged with the care of this and cognate questions, the completion of the task will be much accelerated. We find it impossible to make any accurate estimate of the sum likely to be required in 1929-30 on this account. Provisionally we have assumed that schemes costing half a crore annually will be ripe for introduction during the course of the year . . ."

That was the anticipation then. It went on to say:

"We are also providing specially in our capital estimates a sum of Rs. 30 lakhs for additions to and improvements in staff quarters. Since the schemes will not, in any case, be in force for the full year, we have for the moment assumed that the revenue expenditure in 1929-30 will amount to Rs. 28 lakhs, and have provisionally distributed this sum, as to ten lakhs under Administration, and eighteen lakhs under Repairs and Maintenance and Operation. But, as we have explained, the figure of half a crore on which these estimates are based is, pending the investigation, little more than guess work, and we shall not hesitate to take steps to increase it, if more is found to be needed."

[Mr. M. S. Aney.]

The House can imagine that a promise was held out in this paragraph that not only schemes for the complete expenditure of the Rs. 50 lakhs that were allotted would be ready, but that there might arise a necessity for the Railway Board to come up for supplementary grants even for a larger sum. Now, Sir, if this House has carefully read the speech which the Honourable Sir George Rainy delivered in presenting the Budget and if the Honourable Members have read these budget papers carefully, as I presume that they have, they will have found that, out of these 50 lakhs, practically a very small amount has been spent. That is the position. I say, "a very small amount" because I find in the Explanatory Memorandum an attempt is made to show, at the eleventh hour, that certain amounts have been spent—a point on which I will have to speak at some length later on. In paragraph 7 of the Explanatory Memorandum, on pages 4 and 5, we are given some details showing as to how the amount of Rs. 28 lakhs has been allotted to the different railways this year, and how much has been spent; and it is also shown that something like Rs. 18,12,000 has been spent out of the amount allotted from the revenue programme, and Rs. 7,53,000 out of the amount allotted from the capital programme. Now, Sir, I may bring to the notice of this House that—it was either in the month of August or September—a meeting of the Finance Committee was called at Simla and before us a scheme was placed. Estimates placed before us in the scheme, showed that the Railway Board had all the plans cut and dried for the recurring expenditure of Rs. 50 lakhs necessary to give effect to that scheme. I refer to the Memorandum by the Financial Commissioner of Railways on proposed improvements in the conditions of service of railway servants, with special reference to hours of work and weekly rest (Geneva Conventions). This was the Memorandum that was placed before us, and it will be found that, out of the ultimate cost of Rs. 50 lakhs in a full year for recurring expenditure, the expenditure on the North Western Railway alone was expected to be Rs. 7.5 lakhs. The costs during the current year for which the budget provision was for 28 lakhs, were reduced to 11 lakhs, and it was proposed to allot 3.25 lakhs to the North Western Railway. So also the capital cost sanctioned by the House at 30 lakhs even brought down to 20 lakhs with an anticipated expenditure of 44 lakhs in 1930-31. The North Western Railway was to have 7 lakhs out of this capital expenditure. Those were the proposals that were placed before us then. That showed that their plans were completely ready, so far as the North Western Railway was concerned, and the hope was held out that:

"From this estimate it will be apparent that the expenditure proposed will in the main benefit the lower grades of staff. It is proposed to instruct the Agent of the North Western Railway to proceed immediately with the introduction of the scheme, and it is hoped that it will be possible to issue similar instructions to other railways in the course of the next two or three months."

It was then thought that, within two or three months, the Railway Board would be in a position to issue similar instructions to other Agents and ask them to proceed with their own schemes for the amelioration of the condition of these low-paid servants. Now, Sir, the total amount for the current year that was required for the North Western Railway was Rs. 3.25 lakhs out of revenue and Rs. 7 lakhs out of capital. I find here now in the Explanatory Memorandum that the North Western Railway is shown to have spent only Rs. 2,25,000 out of revenue and Rs. 5,81,000 out of capital. Probably this latter is for the building of dwelling quarters for them. But as regards other railways, we have got here only the bare statements before us, for which we do not find any entries or items in the Pink Books. The expenditure which is shown here in the Explanatory Memorandum as incurred on the amelioration of the condition of the low-paid staff does not find any reference or get any corroboration whatsoever in the Pink Books for the different railways, which have been supplied to us. Not only that, but I may remind this House—it is very strange—that in the month of December and till the 4th February, 1930, we were being supplied with books of Demands which showed:

"Budget estimates, 18 lakhs : Revised nil

which means that, up to that date, the Railway Board had absolutely no information from the different Railway Administrations as to how much of the amounts that were allotted to them—probably, whether the allotment was made or not, God knows—had been spent. I mention the date, 4th February, because here is a notice which I had received from the Railway Board to attend a meeting of the Standing Finance Committee for Railways on the 5th February. Along with it a budget book was sent to me, and I find that under Administration, under Operation, and under Capital Programme, the budgeted amounts for 1929-30 are 10 lakhs, 18 lakhs and 30 lakhs; Revised zero. For next year, that is for 1930-31, Rs. 10 lakhs under Administration, Rs. 15 lakhs under Repairs and Maintenance, and no provision under Capital Programme, Open Lines. Now, zero under Revised estimates can only mean that, up to that time, the budget officer had absolutely no information whatsoever from the different Railway Administrations about the expenditure incurred, and therefore, the budget officer could not give any figures at all. That was the position. Now, in the Explanatory Memorandum, which has been supplied to us, we have got some information. Rs. 18,12,000 from revenue and Rs. 7,53,000 under Capital have been spent. But I have got these Pink Books, which have been supplied to me by the Railway Board, and they show that there is no amount spent at all till the date of their issue.

My point, therefore, Sir, is this. If the new office of Labour Member was created mainly for the purpose of looking after the conditions of the low-paid staff of the railways, why should it be that he should not be in a position to have his schemes for full expenditure of the amounts provided for 1929-30 prepared and presented, in consultation with the Agents, in time to give relief to the low-paid staff upto the full limits which the budget amounts laid down and why, at any rate, should he not be in a position even to collect correct information from Railway Administrations for inclusion in budget papers? Practically these amounts have lapsed for this year and you are now making only meagre provision for the next year. It means that much needed relief that they could have got this year is denied to them. It can be explained only on one theory. That, knowing as I do my friend Mr. Hayman, who is an energetic and active officer, his services must have been engaged somewhere else and for some other purpose more important, in the opinion of the Members of the Railway Board, than the one for which his post was created. Otherwise I cannot understand the position. His plans were to a great extent practically ready and he promised here in a Memorandum, which was supplied to us in the month of August last, that he would, within two months, be in a position to issue the necessary instructions to all the Railway Administrations; and yet in the month of March we find there is absolutely nothing done; and the figures which are now given here in the Explanatory Memorandum are virtually not corroborated even by the Pink Books, which give the budget estimates of the different railways. What may be called a sort of patch-work is put before us, which looks like some after-thought—a statement showing some expenditure for which we find no corroboration anywhere in the Pink Books. I do not know if anybody has really checked these figures and found out whether they fit in with the figures in the Pink Books. Even for the Finance Member it would be difficult to explain these figures.

That, Sir, is the position. It cannot be said that the demands of labour and of the subordinate staff were not known to the Railway Members. In fact, it was because of these demands that it was thought necessary to create this post of a Labour Member. These demands have been before them for the last twelve months and more. They allowed things to drift in such a way that they have now already developed into a dangerous situation. There is a general strike on, and yet nothing is done by the Labour Member to consider and meet the demands of the men. Sir, some other ideas are working powerfully in the minds of the Members of the Railway Board. It is not as if they did not have their plans ready; their plans might be ready; their estimates might be ready; but they do not think that this is the proper time or that the employees, who in despair have gone on strike, are the proper men to be looked after; ideas of this nature seem to have carried away the Railway Board and the Labour Office; otherwise, I am unable to understand how, with a man so able and active as Mr. Hayman, it was impossible to make proper arrangements to secure the disbursement of this Rs. 58 lakhs for these poor men. These poor men have lost Rs. 58 lakhs this year. You may give them something next year; perhaps that something may be one-half or one-third of the sum budgeted, and for the remaining two-thirds they may have to wait for plans which might take another ten years to mature and develop. Meantime these poor men have to wait—men whose voice goes unrepresented here. The other interests manage to assert themselves, but these poor labouring interests, these poorly paid servants can be easily misrepresented. There is a great misunderstanding on the part of the Benches opposite that there are certain undesirable persons who are at present in intimate touch with these labour unions, and unless they are got out of the unions and unless the employees themselves get out of their clutches, the Railway Board are determined not to do anything. It is this stiff attitude which is responsible for the present trouble, it is not that the plans are not ready. I refuse to believe it because the memorandum which was presented to us in August clearly indicated that the Railway Board had cut and dried plans. But something has happened, and the Railway Board was disinclined to pursue the plans expeditiously and to give effect to those plans, they had withheld the relief; and since that time, for one reason or another, the Railway Board have been inventing some pretext to explain as to why the thing could not be done. My learned friend, Mr. Hayman, once gave me an explanation that he was working on developing some plans for a Calcutta railway. He had these plans worked out for the North Western Railway completely ready; the lines were laid down, the measure of progress that was to be made was clearly indicated, and the formula had merely to be applied to the other railways; yet, with all that, Sir, I find nothing has been done for the sake of labour during the last five months by an office which was created simply for the sake of doing justice to these poor starving millions of the railway employes. No justice is done, and I am entitled to ask this House not to retain hereafter that office, but to abolish it. Rs. 48,000 represents the emoluments only for the office of the Labour Member, and I want hereafter not to allow that office to continue if it is to work as indifferently as it has been working so far in the matter of labour problems. Sir, I am very sorry I am unable to speak—I am breathless; I therefore stop at this stage and commend my motion to the House.

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad (United Provinces Southern Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the impression produced on my mind by the speech of the Honourable Member for Railways was quite different from the impression produced on the mind of my friend from Berar. I thought that Sir George Rainy foreshadowed my motion, that is, of putting one more Indian on the Railway Board. He praised the only Indian Member on the Board now, and I thought the natural consequence of that praise was that he would be quite ready to employ another Indian Member whenever the opportunity arose.

Mr. K. C. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Who is the only Indian now?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: In this discussion there are two important questions which we have to consider. The first is whether the post is needed, and the second is whether the present incumbent is really a fit man for this post. As regards the second point, my Honourable friend admitted that Mr. Hayman is a very studious and hardworking person, and though he did not say so, one could deduce from his speech that it would be difficult to find a person more competent than Mr. Hayman. The Honourable Member also eulogised him, and I believe that any one who has come in contact with Mr. Hayman will admit the fact that he is certainly not a lazy man.

Now, the argument which was advanced by my friend comes practically to this, that certain promises were held out and those promises were not fulfilled. If this can be taken to be a valid reason for the dismissal of a person, I am afraid no person will be found on the Government Benches, because all of them have repeatedly held out a series of promises which have not been fulfilled. I go one step further and say this: we, the elected members, held out a large number of promises to our voters at the time of election, and I am afraid that very few of us will be re-elected if this test is applied.

As regards the question whether the post was needed, I may just draw attention to a pamphlet which I doubt whether any one of us has read—it is called "The Deaf and Dumb". In this pamphlet it was pointed out that the Railway Board are practically deaf; they have no ears to hear the complaints of the railway employees. But, Sir, by the addition of the Labour Member, I think they have removed this particular difficulty: the Labour Member, if nothing else, is at least the ear of the Railway Board, through which the complaints of the railway staff could be heard and attended to. No human being can ever attend to all the complaints of the railway employees. We however have the satisfaction that there is a person, not an Englishman, but an Indian, who will be quite ready to hear the complaints of the employees, especially those in subordinate positions.

As regards the second point, that is, about the slowness with which these officials move, I am entirely in agreement with the Honourable the Mover. These gentlemen are exceedingly conservative and unless we, who are non-officials, put great pressure on them and try to expose them right and left, in season and out of season, they are not likely to move. The only thing, that I have to complain about against my friend from Berar, is that his language was not strong enough in condemning the Railway Board for not fulfilling the promises which they held out, and I hope that, not only Mr. Hayman, but every other Member of the Railway Board will move faster and will realise the feelings of the people and the feelings of the Members of this Assembly.

Now, Sir, instead of abolishing the post, I will move later on for the appointment of another Indian Member who may be in charge of traffic and especially the comforts of the third class passengers. This topic is really very important from a business point of view, because it is the third class passengers who contribute the largest revenue to the coffers of the railways. But their comforts are very little attended to. I would very much like to have either a Member or a Special Officer to look after the comforts of third class passengers. Therefore, Sir, instead of abolishing this post of Labour Member, to which we have not given a sufficient trial, I would rather like to have the addition of a new Member or of a Special Officer to look after the comforts and conveniences of the third class travelling public.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Patna and Chota Nagpur cum Orissa: Muhammadan): Sir, I am sorry to have to oppose the motion for the cut moved by my friend, Mr. Aney. One thing has struck me in his speech, and that is, he seems to have introduced a communal touch in his speech, and that I hate. Simply because an Englishman ought to be removed, you should . . . (An Honourable Member: "He is not an Englishman. He is an Indian.") (Another Honourable Member: "He is an Anglo-Indian.") Whether he is an Indian or Anglo-Indian or an Englishman, if he is a competent man, as my friend Dr. Ziauddin pointed out, he should not I think be removed from his post. Therefore, I have to oppose the motion.

Mr. K. V. Rangaswamy Ayyangar (Madras: Landholders): Sir, I think it was in the year 1917 that I had pressed before the old Imperial Legislative Council for the appointment of an Indian Member in the Railway Board. When, on the presentation of the Railway Budget, I saw that the Honourable the Railway Member praised the services of the two Indians, Messrs. P. R. Rau and Hayman, I was very much delighted for two reasons. In the first place, the Government had accepted our proposal for the appointment of an Indian Member on the Railway Board and that with very great hesitation, and we naturally felt very proud that the Indian Member had fully justified his selection and had earned the confidence of the Railway Board and of the Government, and secondly, both the officers, Messrs. P. R. Rau and Hayman, come from Madras, and we felt a sort of parochial patriotism, and we felt very proud because these officers, who had been selected after much hesitation, had earned the goodwill and confidence of the Railway Board and the Government alike, as was evident from the encomiums showered on their efficiency by the Honourable the Railway Member in his speech the other day.

Now, Sir, there is no doubt there is great force in what my friend, Mr. Aney, has said about the defects in the presentation of the Budget, but the responsibility for this is a joint responsibility and not an individual responsibility. The Indian Member is only one of the Members of the Railway Board and as such, it cannot be said, as in the Ministerial portfolio, the subject is entirely concerned with him, because all the subjects are jointly decided, and it is a joint responsibility, and I do not think that individual blame can in any way be laid upon any individual Member for all the commissions and omissions of the Board. Sir, on the day of the budget discussion I wanted to press that, inasmuch as they found one Indian Member to be very efficient in the conduct of the business of the Railway Board, another Member might be taken on the Railway Board, and that another post of Railway Membership be Indianised. But I see a number of Resolutions tabled on this point, and I should like to hear all of them. With regard to the complaint made about the defects in the presentation of the Budget, I should say that, if at all there is any blame, it is not on any individual Member because the responsibility is a joint one. It is really unfortunate that the labour troubles in the Great Indian Peninsula Railway have sprung up now when the Indian Member is holding that portfolio. I hope these troubles will be amicably settled soon, but these troubles are not new to this country. We had similar troubles in the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, in the Bengal Nagpur Railway and also in the South Indian Railway,—in fact it is a general trouble which could not be tackled by the Labour Member within the short period. But for all these troubles the Indian Member, with the resources he is able to command, is not to be blamed. With these words, Sir, I would ask the Honourable the Mover to consider whether, in view of the fact that it is a joint responsibility and not an individual responsibility, and that the trial given to the Indian Member being not long enough, whether it is fair to accuse him of all the faults mentioned by him.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, my friend Mr. Aney has run full tilt at Mr. Hayman and demanded his head on a charger. I suggest a course by which perhaps that head may be saved, and if I do not misunderstand the real motive of my friend, Mr. Aney, it is also this. What he and myself, in fact all of us want to complain definitely about is this, that till this moment no definite information has been vouchsafed to us as to what Mr. Hayman has been doing all the while, and as I shall presently show, the kind of information which we had asked for has not been vouchsafed to us. With regard to that, I wish definitely to charge the Honourable Sir George Rainy also for having misrepresented matters to us last year when he asked for the appointment of an additional Member in the Railway Board almost solely to devote attention to labour problems, but in this year's Budget he mentions five headings under which work, it appears, was entrusted to Mr. Hayman

Mr. K. C. Neogy: That is by way of window.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Last year we were definitely assured that his work would appertain to the betterment of the conditions of labour. Why I call it a misrepresentation is for this reason. If in his speech last year he had mentioned some of the items that are now made mention of this year, he might not have got our consent to the appointment of a new Member as an integral addition to the Railway Board, because some of these items are matters which are definitely to be discussed and some of these matters have a long history behind them, and the appointment of an integral Member of the Railway Board would not have been necessary, and we could have taken exception to the appointment on that ground, but a sort of picture was put before us asking us to believe that a great problem of the betterment of the conditions of labour was being for the first time taken in hand and all the attention and energy of the new Member was going to be spent upon that and nothing else. It was that allurements that succeeded in getting from us consent to the appointment of a new Railway Board Member. Now, what are the items mentioned in the Railway Member's speech this year? Improvement in the service conditions of the staff generally and in particular of the lowest paid employees? I do say that that matter was not put before us in that light. His services were mentioned as likely to come into operation only in connection with labour and not service conditions of the staff generally. But even supposing that matter was entrusted to him, what are all the facts before us even at this moment as to what Mr. Hayman has done with regard to the improvement in the service conditions of the staff generally? Has there been any mention of that? Any summation of his work in that matter? Any concrete results put before us anywhere up to now with regard to the work in connection with the improvement in the service conditions of the staff generally? That is item No. 1.

Then in regard to the Indianisation of the railway services and the elimination of racial discrimination, what had Mr. Hayman got to do with this? Were we told last year that this work would be entrusted to him? Was our consent asked for on this ground that this particular matter would be referred to him? Why is it now shown that this particular work was given to him? But even then, I do say that this has been put down here only to swell the number of items, so that we should be misled into supposing that Mr. Hayman has been very energetically working at certain things. But this question of Indianisation of railway services was not coming up before the Railway Board for the first time. It has a history of at least five years. In 1925 Government was asked definitely to abolish racial discrimination. Then they wrote to the several Agents and got replies from those Agents, and in 1928 a sort of attempt was made to make the Assembly believe that generalisations would be deduced from the reports received from the Agents, and a definite policy with regard to racial discrimination would be laid before the House. I do not want to go into the details of this question of Indianisation, but it looks funny, when I look at the individual reports of the Agents, that I find there was practically nothing more to be done. God said, "Let there be light and there was light". Similarly, here is the Railway Board saying to the Agents, "Let there be no racial discrimination", and the reports of the Agents say, "There is no discrimination". If that is the state of things, what has Mr. Hayman got to do with this? And even supposing that Mr. Hayman was busy with this, what are the results put before us? Have his labours led to a generalisation of the policy of the Railway Board? Has that policy been laid before us or the Railway Standing Finance Committee? We have gone no further than the reply given in 1925 and 1928. In one year we were told that the Agents were consulted. In another year, we were told that the reports of the agents had been received and the Railway Board was busy with them. Beyond that I definitely want to know what had Mr. Hayman got to do with this business of Indianisation? And again I say that was not mentioned to us at all and our consent, or the consent of the House, because some of us did not consent, was obtained, I say definitely, on a wrong pretext.

Then item No. 3, Revision of the cadres of the superior services and of the methods of recruitment. We were not told last year that Mr. Hayman would be entrusted with this work in connection with the superior services. I suppose Mr. Hayman is a small man by himself to deal with the general conditions of the superior service. The whole Railway Board will have to take an interest in it. The House will have to be consulted on the matter and joint responsibility will have to be taken. There again Sir George Rainy misrepresented matters to us last year and put us on a false scent and now he is coming forward with a detailed enumeration of several items with which, we are asked to believe, Mr. Hayman is busying himself. Again what has he done? Are there any concrete results put before us in the matter of Indianisation? Similarly, also with regard to the revision of the cadre of the superior officers. There is a malicious confusion made between the betterment of the condition of labour, for which he was appointed, and the betterment of the conditions of the superior staff, as if the two were the same.

Then item No. 4, Relations of the railway management with the labour organisations. I may perhaps admit that this item comes under the purview of the work entrusted to him.

Then the preparation of materials, so far as the railways of India were concerned, for the Royal Commission on Labour. I think the Commission was appointed last year. The Railway Board knew that some preliminary work would have to be done for putting the views of the Railway Board and the Government of India before the Labour Commission, but again I say that that was not mentioned to us last year. My sole point is this. Last year we were definitely told that Mr. Hayman would busy himself exclusively and definitely with this one great problem of the betterment of the condition of labour, and at the end of the year it is all hollow. So far nothing in concrete form has been put before us, and I ask Sir George Rainy or Mr. Hayman to put their finger upon a single item in respect of which concrete results have been placed before the Legislature. Then Sir George Rainy says:

"It would take me much too long to enumerate in detail matters which have come up for review under the various heads. That would require a speech in itself and some of the subjects can only be briefly referred to."

Now if we proceed to read the further paragraphs in his speech, there again, we find only passing references have been made and no concrete results have been given. In one place we are told that the matter is under consideration; in another paragraph we are told that the matter is passing under review. The language is varied but the substance is the same. There are only vague statements, and no definite results have been given.

12 Noon.

[Mr. N. C. Kelkar.]

Now, the Railway Finance Committee met on the 10th December, 1929. I do not know whether any subsequent meetings of that Committee were held, as I am myself not a member of that Committee. But on page 25 of the proceedings we read:

"The Financial Commissioner mentioned that at a later meeting he would probably be proposing an addition to the demand for the purpose of improving the conditions of service of low-paid employees."

His appointment was made in March last, and in this book I find that it is simply stated that he would, at a later stage, be probably proposing an addition to the demand of so and so. That means the work is not yet finished. It means that the work is not definitely conceived as to what would be done and what amount of money would be likely to be spent. Mr. Hayman himself probably does not know what is before him. This happened on the 10th December. But I shall stand corrected if I am wrong. I should be glad to be told that there were other meetings of the Railway Finance Committee and that these estimates were put before them.

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: There were further meetings of the Standing Finance Committee at which the estimates under the heads, "Administration" and "Operation" were put, and certain lump sums for the expenditure anticipated at present for next year were asked for. The point was however fully dealt with by the Honourable the Railway Member in his speech.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: In that case, should we not have welcomed on this side of the House a note giving full details of what has actually been done? Those details are not to be found in the Honourable Member's speech or in the Explanatory Memorandum. That is our definite complaint. We are entitled to know what were the actual concrete results.

I would now pass on to other things. In the first place, Sir George Rainy says in paragraph 21 of his speech:

"I may mention the matter in which we have been able to make the most rapid progress, I mean what is sometimes called security of tenure and complaints of alleged wrongful dismissal or discharge from railway service."

Now, we are told that they have made rapid progress. And what is that rapid progress? Here is a representation I have got in my hand which was submitted on the 23rd January, 1930, by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Workmen's Union. There is also a copy of a reply given by the Agent to these demands of the railwaymen. To each of their demands only a vague reply has been given. It has been said that the rules are being framed, the matter is under consideration, the whole thing will be passed in review, the rules are approaching maturity and consideration is being given from day to day. These are the phrases in which replies have been given to those people who have been insistently putting forward their demands before the Railway Board and about which we are assured in the speech of the Honourable the Railway Member that rapid progress is being made. If there was real rapid progress, why were definite rules not placed into the hands of the Railwaymen's Union at least on the 23rd January when the Agent received them in deputation? About two weeks ago, my friend Mr. Aney and myself put ourselves in communication with Sir George Rainy about this railway strike and the demands of the strikers. Even then, we were told that rules were in the making, and for the last two weeks we ourselves have been waiting for a copy of them.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Will the Honourable Member kindly let me know to which set of rules he is referring at the moment?

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: I am referring to the set of rules which relate to leave, tenure of service, pay, etc. Of course, only one set of rules is in my hand, because I was a Member of the Select Committee on the Railway (Amendment) Bill. It relates to the period of rest and the period of employment. Therefore I did not mention anything about those rules, because personally I am in possession of those rules, but what about the House? It may be said that those rules related to a certain Select Committee and therefore they are not put before the House, but they are rules after all. It was intended to operate upon these rules, and perhaps it may be claimed that their operation has already commenced. I do not think that rules relating to a particular Select Committee could prevent the Honourable Member from making them available to the Assembly along with, at any rate, the Select Committee's Report. That Select Committee's Report has been put into our hands recently, but we have not received the copy of the rules. I have got a copy, but the other Members have not. Therefore, I want to ask Mr. Hayman and Sir George Rainy point blank in what particular matter from among the eight or ten points of dispute, are we in possession of concrete results in the form of a policy, statement, rules, regulations or anything of that kind? That is my definite question, and that has necessarily a bearing upon the appointment of a special officer as a special Member of the Railway Board. Supposing rules have been framed, regulations have been made, policy has been developed, and the results have been arrived at, why should not this Assembly have an early opportunity of going into all those things? Must the Railway Member wait till these points are specifically raised as a matter of contention by the different cuts? Why should he not take us into his confidence on these vital matters earlier? In the meantime, the strike has been going on. My motion for adjournment failed, I admit, but that is no reason why the Railway Member should not take the initiative by himself and take the Legislative Assembly into his confidence over such vital matters.

In short, therefore, it comes to this, that we are still only seeking for something. We were led to believe that something was to be obtained by the appointment of the new Member, but what is the result? The result may be compared with the result in that familiar game. A man is blind-folded and is led into a dark chamber and he is asked to find a dark hat there. And the joke, last of all, is that there is no hat there. So my point is that, notwithstanding the promises of last year and the hopes which they created in our minds, we are where we were even by the end of the year. That, I suppose, is the sole reason why my friend, Mr. Aney, has put down that motion and has definitely demanded that the services of the new additional Member of the Railway Board be dispensed with next year. One can see what is the real purpose of the motion, and much will depend upon the nature of the concrete results that will be put before us even now at this day.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla (Bombay Central Division: Muham-madan Rural): Sir, I hope the House will not agree to the motion moved by my friend, Mr. Aney. The whole of his speech, as I understood it, was his criticism of the labour policy adopted by the Railway Board, and I think that the motion that he has put down is a wrong one, or, at any rate, he has chosen the wrong method of ventilating the grievance. I wish he had confined his motion to the improvement of service conditions, and in that case this House would have had a very good debate on his motion. But, Sir, having made the question very personal, after admitting that Mr. Hayman is the best man for the job, that he has done his duty well, and that he has acquitted himself well, to come forward with a motion for the abolition of the post, is I think a position which should not be accepted by this House.

Mr. M. S. Aney: I said nothing of the kind. My Honourable friend has not understood what I said.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: Then, what did you say?

Mr. M. S. Aney: I never said that he acquitted himself well in the job.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: You did say so. If you say one thing you must stick to it.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Well, you go on.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: I was saying, Sir, that the usual procedure in this House, when one gives notice of a motion, is to discuss the general policy of the Railway Board and to ask for suggestions and explanations, and if those explanations are not satisfactory, then to press the cut to a division and try to carry it out. The question now is whether this post was necessary and is necessary. I wish my Honourable friend, Mr. Kelkar, had not made serious charges against the Government, like misrepresentation of facts and taking a decision on a wrong charge, and so on. These are very serious and grave charges, and I hope, Sir, that a man of the position and responsibility of Mr. Kelkar will choose his words better when he is making an attack.

Mr. B. Das: They are quite parliamentary.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: I am not saying that they are not parliamentary expressions.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: What is it that the Honourable Member objects to?

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: I object to the Honourable Member saying that the Government carried their motion on a misrepresentation of facts. I understand that two points emerge from the motion which was moved and carried by a majority in this House, first that the Government acceded to the demand repeatedly made by us on the floor of this House for the appointment of an Indian Member on the Railway Board.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Was it for an additional Member?

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: It may not be for an additional Member. But we have to admit that they submitted themselves to the principle of giving us an Indian on the Railway Board. Secondly, the reason was that, having an additional Member, he will look after the question of the improvement of service conditions in the Railway Board.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: May I ask if the Government mentioned any other jobs or items of business last year in connection with Mr. Hayman's appointment, apart from labour?

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: There were no other additions.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Then, that is what I say.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: Before the Honourable Member makes a serious charge, he must see whether the statement given by the Railway Member, when he presented the Budget and the Memorandum contained therein, are sufficient or not and then criticise. Here is the speech of the Honourable the Railway Member, pages 9 and 10 which practically cover paragraphs 25 to 27, in which the Honourable Member gives you the reasons for not putting into effect the various schemes that have been put forward on the ground of economy. I suppose all Honourable Members have read this speech and so I need not quote from that in extenso. I will read only the last paragraph 27, which says:

"One point, however, I desire to make clear. If and when we are satisfied that the introduction of well-considered schemes involving expenditure are necessary in order to secure the welfare and contentment of our staff, and if we find that the cost of these schemes cannot be met without raising our working expenses to a higher figure than is set down in the budget, we shall not hesitate to place supplementary estimates before the Assembly and ask the House to sanction the additional expenditure."

The Honourable the Railway Member has also pointed out the difficulties. He says in the Memorandum:

"Except on the North Western Railway we have not been able so far to spend any large sum from capital on the provision of extra quarters. This is partly due to the fact that we must await the passing of the Bill now before the Assembly, which will enable us to give effect to the Washington and Geneva Conventions. It is also partly due to the fact that the North Western Railway had plans and estimates already prepared and were therefore in a better position than other railways to make rapid progress."

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Does it not mean that the North Western Railway did not wait for the passing of the law which is to bring our legislation into conformity with the conventions? This legislation has absolutely nothing to do with the reforms, if only the Railway Board wanted to introduce those reforms of itself, and the conduct of the North Western Railway only supports my contention.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: I thought that my Honourable friend was putting a question to me. Instead of that, I find him making a speech. If I were to go on replying to the speeches that are made from time to time, I will not be able to finish my speech within the time allotted to me. If there is a specific question from Mr. Kelkar, I shall always be willing to answer the same, but I would certainly not reply to speeches and interruptions like these. The point is why the Railway Member has not been able to give effect to the recommendations. The difficulties which stood in the way of giving effect to these recommendations have been enumerated in paragraph 27 of the Railway Member's speech. I think the Honourable the Railway Member has been very frank. He says that, first of all, he promised to give effect to the recommendations, but he expresses his regret that he has not been able to present the Memorandum before the Railway Budget was introduced and that he is going to present the Memorandum, giving the House all the Indian Railways, and I am sorry at not having got it. But that is all by the way.

My greatest appreciation is for the remark of my friend, Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad, regarding the deaf ear of the Railway Board. If that be true, then I do not know it. Mr. Hayman is Dr. Hayman. I hear that even my Honourable friend (Dr. Ziauddin) is only a Doctor of Laws; and probably a Doctor of Laws has no better ears than anybody else. Anyway his statement I thought was quite appropriate, that a deaf ear could not be cured in a day. Even a doctor will have to make very many trials, and he may have to make many operations as he may not always succeed in the very first operation. On this score I would like to wait and see what this particular doctor is going to do with regard to the malady we complain of.

As the definite motion before the House that my friend, Mr. Aney, has brought is I think a more or less humorous motion, I hope in good humour he will withdraw it.

Diwan Chaman Lall (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I hope the debate will not become unreal as it threatens to be, over a purely personal issue. We are not discussing, as unfortunately my friend Mr. Acharya seemed to believe, a personal issue involving the appointment of Mr. Hayman alone.

Mr. M. K. Acharya: I never said that.

Diwan Chaman Lall: We are discussing a principle—whether it is Mr. Hayman or somebody else makes no difference—and what matters is the principle involved, and it is for that reason that I beg your leave to say a few words with regard to the question of railway grievances. The question that has been raised by my friend Mr. Kelkar is this. Here is a Member appointed on the Railway Board to represent the workers' point of view. What has he done during the course of his appointment, which has been for one year now, in the matter of adjusting the grievances of the workers? That, I take it, is the substance of the charge that has been made by Mr. Kelkar. It is not for me to give a reply to that charge. I hope Mr. Hayman when he gets up to give a reply will be in a position to satisfy himself, his own conscience and the conscience of this House and the Members on this side. That is for him to do. My object at the present moment is this, to say that I am not satisfied that the Railway Board have been doing the right thing, and have been dealing with the labour problem in the right spirit, or with expedition or with efficacy or with intelligence, during the past year. And I say that for very good reasons. The first thing that I would like to draw the attention of Honourable Members to is this. I do not know that there is any one here on the non-official side who really does understand the technical details of the problem that we are discussing.

Mr. M. K. Acharya: Not even you?

Dewan Chaman Lall: Not even I, and I am humble enough to confess that; and I do not indulge in those wild speeches in which my Honourable friend has been indulging, pretending that he knows anything about a subject when he does not know anything about it. I have been trying for the last ten years to study the problem and I am humble enough to confess that I do not understand the full implications of this problem yet. What I do understand I am going to give my Honourable friend the benefit of, and I hope he will be a wiser man after he has listened to my speech. The first thing that I understand, Sir, is this that here was a demand made by the organised trade unions of the Railways who went up in a deputation to the Honourable Member in charge last May, and they said, "Here are our 25 demands, will you look into these demands, will you discuss these demands with us, and after having discussed them will you give us your reply?" The Honourable Member was good enough to take the members who came in deputation into his confidence. He had a full discussion and a report of the discussion I hold in my hand and after the deputation disappeared—in Simla I think it was—from that day to this, nearly a year, the Railwaymen's Federation has not had one line from the Honourable Member or from the Railway Board in regard to the grievances which they brought to his notice. (Hear, hear.) I want to know what policy was being dictated to the Honourable Member by the Railway Board, or what policy he was dictating to the Railway Board, which prevented him from getting into touch with the Railwaymen's Federation and telling them exactly what he had done or what he contemplated doing with regard to the grievances brought to his notice. It might have been a policy of non-co-operation. Non-co-operation has been in the air for a considerable period. My impression of the Railway Board is that they are a body of absolute autocrats, who do not regard anything that has happened during the last ten years as that which might make them change their policy towards the labour unions of this country. I do hope I am mistaken. I hope what I am saying at the present moment is not going to be the policy of the Railway Board for the future. But I want to know from them at the present moment why it is that they could not have sent at least one letter to the Railwaymen's Federation saying, "These are the things we have discussed with you, these are the things we have accepted, these are the things we are not prepared to accept". If the answer is that the time was too short, we were not in a position to come to any settlement or any decision with regard to the numerous grievances brought to our notice, then my reply to them is this. Are there not certain matters which the Railway Board, since last May, have decided? And I want to know from them if it is not a fact, taking one instance alone, the service agreement, that they have already come to an agreement. Have they or have they not come to a decision? Did they consult the Railway unions before they announced that decision? If they did not consult the Railway unions, what else is it but pure autocracy on the part of the Railway Board in coming to a decision on a matter vitally affecting the service of eight hundred thousand employees on the railways and not consulting them as to the decision that they intended to announce by taking them into their confidence before announcing the decision? And what is that decision? As Honourable Members probably are aware, except my friend, Mr. Acharya, any railway employee can be dismissed or discharged arbitrarily or could be, before this new rule was made. They have now made a rule to the effect that, in the case of employees of ten years' service, the man who is going to be dismissed will have the charge sheet placed before him and such summary of the evidence that there may be. Now if that is the position with regard to men who have been on the railway lines for ten years in your service, why, I ask in the name of all that is logical, all that one calls common sense, do you not apply the same rule to people who have been in your service for one year? Why a limit of ten years? If a man, desirous to have his

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member going to take long? Today is Friday and I should like to adjourn earlier.

Diwan Chaman Lall: I think I would like to take a few more minutes, probably half an hour.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till a Quarter Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at a Quarter Past Two of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

Mr. President: Mr. Chaman Lall.

Diwan Chaman Lall: Sir, I was referring to one matter which I consider to be of some considerable importance, namely, the fact that, unless and until the question of the service agreement is definitely settled at the time of the agreement, there will always remain this tangle, this sore between the Railway and the employees as regards their service agreement. Last May this matter was raised and it was said by Mr. Giri who came leading a deputation, that so far as this question is concerned it is a matter in which railway men in India feel very keenly. They expect they should not be discharged without being informed exactly for what reasons. I want to ask the Honourable Member in charge whether it is not a just demand to make to ask the Railway Board to make such rules in the service agreements as would enable a man, before he is discharged or dismissed, to obtain a charge sheet, to obtain the evidence that is against him, and be given an opportunity to defend himself by testing the validity or the truth of the charge. I take it that that is the procedure in almost every other Government Department. Why should there be an exception so far as the Railway Board is concerned? I want a definite lead in this matter from the Honourable Member.

However, that is only one of the matters that I have to mention. There is another matter of very great importance, and that is the question of the 60 hour limit. We understand that the Railway Board have been dealing with the question of the Washington and Geneva Conventions. They presented a draft Bill to the Assembly, but the 60 hour limit was accepted, so far as India is concerned, nearly ten years ago. It was an exception made against India, for reasons I do not know. I want to know what the policy of the Railway Board is in regard to a revision of the 60 hour limit. Have they a policy of their own, or are they sticking to the policy which was embodied in the Washington Convention? Further, I want to know what leave rules they have sanctioned. I want to know whether they consulted any of the unions before they sanctioned those leave rules. I want to know whether, before they publish those leave rules, they intend to take into their confidence the united body of railway workers under the federation of railwaymen's unions, and if they do not intend to do that, I want a reply to the question, why is it that they do not intend to do that? Now, in every Government Department—I understand in the Postal Department—there is a 20 per cent. leave reserve. I want to know what the extent of the leave reserve is so far as railwaymen are concerned. I want to know whether this matter, having been raised last May by the deputation that saw the Honourable Member, has received the careful consideration of the Railway Board, and if it has, what conclusions they have come to in regard to this matter, and having come to certain conclusions, whether they intend to take the next step which I think is absolutely essential in order to secure peace on the railways, namely, to consult the railwaymen's unions. Sir, it is one thing to listen to grievances, and after having listened to grievances, to set your own machinery in motion and evolve certain schemes which you think are just and considerate; but it is quite a different thing to take the men into your confidence and evolve those schemes in complete consultation with the men who are going to be affected by those schemes you are evolving.

Mr. President: How are these matters relevant to the question of the abolition of the post of Labour Member?

Diwan Chaman Lall: I am not wanting to dispense with his services. What I am saying is that, if I get a satisfactory reply from the Railway Board in regard to the points that I have raised, I will not oppose the demand, but if I do not get a satisfactory reply, I will be forced to oppose it. I am raising all these points because they are points which might affect the Labour Member himself as he is in charge of the labour portfolio, and I want to know, since this matter has been raised, what the policy of the Railway Board has been as distinct and apart from the policy of the Railway Member. I take it that the Railway Board will be competent enough to give me a reply to all these matters. Take another matter which is of very great importance, and that is the question of the policy of the Railway Board towards railwaymen's unions. What is the policy of the Railway Board? Is it a policy of encouragement, or is it a policy of defeatism? I want the Honourable Member to tell me what the policy of the Railway Board is in regard to the encouragement and formation of these unions. If the Honourable Member says to me that he is quite willing to deal with these unions as he dealt with them last May, and that the policy of the Railway Board is one of encouraging these unions, I ask what has happened to the Railway Board that they should have taken the step which they took a few months ago—a short while ago—namely, taking away the passes which they were issuing to the accredited representatives of these unions, who went about on union business? If their policy is one of encouragement, why was this step taken? It seems to me, Sir, that the policy of the Railway Board is one of defeatism at the present moment. I am mentioning all these points in order that I should get a reply from the Honourable Member as to whether he is prepared now to lay down a definite policy in regard to these matters, and if he is not prepared to lay down a policy, then I must throw in my lot with those who wish to censure the Railway Board in regard to this matter.

Now, I come to the question of wages. I listened to the Honourable Member the other day, and he amazed me when he made a statement in replying to a question that was put to him. The question was this: how are you going to settle and improve the wages of the lower paid employees on the Eastern Bengal Railway, and the reply came—I do not know if Honourable Members noticed the significance of the reply—the reply was that, "We are going to discover the prevailing rates of wages in those localities, and then we are going to get hold of the cost of living index, and on that basis we shall revise the rates". Now, the Honourable Member knows, and I think every Member of this House knows that one of the most difficult things to get at is the cost of living index. You will have to appoint, Sir, not one expert, but a series of experts for working it out, not for a period of a year or six months, but over a period of years before you arrive at a correct estimate of the cost of living index, and it will not be an easy matter for the Honourable Member even to go to the length of finding out the actual living wages in those particular areas; that is an impossibility under present conditions, and I take it that, whatever is going to be done is going to be done by mere guesswork and not by means of any scientific investigation, which I consider, in present circumstances is impossible, because Government do not possess the machinery to make these necessary investigations. If that is the position, I want again to ask the Honourable Member what is the policy of the Railway Board in regard to the improvement of the position and wages of the lower paid staff. We in this House, Sir,—I say this deliberately,—are less concerned than the employees on the railways; the 800,000 employees who are working on the railways, want an answer to all these questions, and they want to know exactly what the policy of the Railway Board is. The manner in which the Honourable Member can satisfy the railway unions is by keeping in close and constant touch with those unions. I submit that it would be absolutely impossible for any one of these unions to get a satisfactory reply to all the questions that they have raised unless and until the Honourable Member takes them into his confidence and evolves a scheme whereby he can constantly keep in touch with these unions and hear their grievances from time to time. In regard to this matter, another question comes to my mind, a very important question; the policy of the Railway Board so far has been to discourage any consultation between the unions on the one side and the administration on the other in regard to individual grievances. I say that is a wrong policy. I say that deliberately because it is the individual grievance which goes on accumulating and which leads to the bigger general grievance; and I want the Honourable Member to tell me whether in view of these matters which have been raised and brought to his notice, he is prepared now to revise the policy hitherto followed of not consulting the unions with regard to individual grievances. He can quite easily follow the lead of the Bengal Nagpur Railway, where in spite of this rule, I am told on definite authority, individual grievances are discussed between the representatives of the unions and the administration; and if that can be done and happy results achieved because it is done, I want to know why it cannot be done on other railway systems in other parts of India.

Then comes the question which was raised by Colonel Gidney some time ago in regard to the welfare committees, a question which is akin to the question of the recognition and encouragement of trade unions. What is the basic idea behind the welfare committee? I take it that there is this distinction. With a trade union you have a free combination of men who can order their own society as they choose. With a welfare committee there is no free combination of men: they are ordered by the Railway Administration according to rules laid down by the Railway Administration. I ask again, is it the policy of the Railway Board to encourage unions which are officialised unions, whose rules and regulations are laid down generally by the administration, or is it the policy to encourage real bona fide trade unions on the railways. (Hear, hear.) I say deliberately that these grievances, not only in regard to these matters, not only in regard to housing and fines, but in regard to a multitude of other grievances, have cropped up from time to time and have now accumulated to such an extent that it is up to the Honourable Member to throw out a generous gesture and say, "We are prepared to deal with the recognised unions and place our cards on the table and ask for a discussion in order that we may settle the grievances that have been brought to our notice". There is no other method, excepting the autocratic method of sitting and deciding in the Railway Board with men, some of whom may be experts and others may not—people who are generally not in touch with the labour world—deciding matters which affect the destinies of nearly a million human beings. It is not possible by this method to get any satisfaction for these human beings or us who happen to be their representatives. The only method is of close consultation; the only method is to go and take them into your confidence; the only method is of encouraging those regularly constituted and fairly strong unions on the railways which have presented and have done their best to present their case in the best light possible to the Honourable Member. And in winding up my speech, I ask the Honourable Member to pay attention to all these matters, and I ask him to announce to this House without any further delay, what his policy is and the policy of the Railway Board is in regard to these matters that have been raised, and to let us know what method he intends to adopt in order to put an end to the grievances that have been brought to his notice. I submit that the position of the men on the railways now is not at all a healthy position, and I think it is up to him to realise and up to the representatives of the people in this Assembly to bring to his notice that it is not a pleasant and healthy state of affairs. Something drastic, something urgent, something reasonable has got to be done in order to bring about a better feeling on our railways and better satisfaction for the men whose grievances have not been redressed for such a long time, and I hope the Honourable Member will take this step and announce to this House and through this House to every labour employee on the railways what his policy is going to be—not a policy of negation but a policy of constructive goodwill and co-operation with the workers in order to better their conditions, life, labour and service.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, I hold no brief for Mr. Hayman or for the Mover of the motion, my reason for entering this discussion is because, as a man who has spent twelve years in intimate touch with railway problems and railway workers—not as a President of a union or just casually meeting the workmen in order to hear what they may have to say—I feel I am able to bring practical evidence to bear on the issue. Sir, I have heard every grievance and argument from the men themselves and so I feel I possess a very deep knowledge of railway problems today. As I listened to the speech of my friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, I was very pleased to notice a marked change and contrast in the way he tackled his subject this year as compared with his methods of last year. It clearly shows that my friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, has now come out as a labour leader of moderate views, and one possessed with a solid desire and determination to do some good for the railway men in a proper constitutional manner. I refer particularly to his remarks on labour unions.

Sir, the remarks made by the Mover appeared to me to be a sort of double-edged compliment to the Labour Member of approval and disapproval. At first Mr. Aney paid Mr. Hayman a great compliment, after which he appeared to want to kick him out of office as useless. You may shake your head, Mr. Aney, but you cannot blow hot and cold, that is how I interpret your speech. He first said that Mr. Hayman was a very capable officer, and next he catalogued a list of crimes or sins of commission and omission which he and other Members of the Railway Board have committed. He was followed by my friend, Mr. Kelkar, who made some very serious and wild allegations against the Honourable Member, Sir George Rainy. Sir, I hold no brief for either of the Honourable Members, but I have watched the progress and change of railway development, for the past twelve years, and I am personally familiar with all the work that has been done by the Member in charge of Labour. I care not whether he is an Anglo-Indian, an Indian or a European. I look upon him as an officer of the Government and as a servant of this House, and I make bold to say, without any fear or contradiction, that I do not know of any one who could have done the amount of work that Mr. Hayman has performed during his eleven months period of office, or as efficiently. I do not say this because Mr. Hayman happens to administer this portfolio, but because of the full conviction which I have of what he has done. Let me take a few instances with which I am personally familiar. Mr. Kelkar talked airily about dismissals and discharges. He is evidently not aware that this question of dismissals and discharges was settled by the Railway Board and I believe was in the hands of Agents in November last. I know that it appeared in the East Indian Railway Weekly Notice of the 15th January, 1930. This new procedure, Sir, is a great advance on what it was before. A railway man now has ample opportunity to present his grievances and his defence before discharge and to get a sympathetic hearing directly from the officer concerned. Moreover, there are many railways today in which their officers are in personal and close touch with their men, although I agree with Diwan Chaman Lall that all Welfare Committees, which are really "Farewell Committees" should be done away with. This happy position in the railways today is the outcome of the labours of Mr. Hayman; and yet my friends, Messrs. Aney and Kelkar, wanted to know today what has been done, and in their ignorance desire to censure and get rid of the Member. We hear a lot from the opposite Benches about the evils of racial discrimination: well, that has now been abolished on railways. The cry, that racial distinction in the matter of educational facilities should be abolished, has also been listened to and been abolished; the great cry that there should be no racial distinction in wages between various classes of employees has also been almost abolished and is entirely in the revised East Indian Railway rates of wages, and today let me tell this House that a European or Anglo-Indian working as a cleaner can only do so on a princely pay of ten rupees a month. Now, Sir, all these corrections and improvements have been effected by Mr. Hayman and within the short space of eleven months. There are many other improvements he has effected, Mr. Kelkar wanted to know what had been done by Mr. Hayman in regard to the improvement in the lot of the lowest paid railway employees. I know that, in the East Indian Railway, every low-paid employee from the gangman, bhisti, sweeper, etc., upwards, has had his pay raised from 20 to 30 and 40 per cent.—this being the difference in pay between 1920 and 1929. How they got the money to effect this improvement is another question, which I propose to deal with on another occasion; but, it is a fact that every low-paid employee in the East Indian Railway has had his pay raised. The Eastern Bengal Railway has also improved the wages of these employees. The Bengal Nagpur Railway today has a union working on its own Railway . . .

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Is that the information before the House?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: It has been published in the Press and is public property. I am not giving any private information. These are some of the accomplishments effected by this Labour Member, but not all, Sir. Then with regard to the housing conditions of the staff generally. In this matter no distinction is now made between any class of employee. This has been another of the activities of the Labour Member.

Then take the question of Indianisation of the Railway Services. Why should you bring the charge that there has been no Indianisation in the Railway Services? You have only to take up any Report issued by the Railway Board this year to find how far the Indianisation of the Services has progressed, some say too far. I am not going to criticise this matter as regards its effects on Anglo-Indians, for if I wanted to, I could, but I refer to it in this manner to prove to the House that Indianisation is a very live wire today. The Reports of the Railway Board say that the official cadre has been Indianised during the year from 31 to 32 per cent.; but, what of the hundreds of Indians in officiating appointments? If this is not Indianisation, what is it? Leaving other matters aside, Indianisation is such a live wire today, that you cannot Indianise any more on the railways although there is a distinction made in the opposite Benches between the Indian and the Anglo-Indian, in your minds, not in mine. (Hear, hear.)

Now, Sir, my friend, Mr. Kelkar, asked what had been done with regard to the revision of cadre of the superior services. When the Honourable Member in charge referred in his speech to the superior services, I think he meant the promotion of subordinates as officials and the appointment of Indians to the superior services. I know, Sir, that a large number of Indians have been appointed by the Railway Board. The recent eight direct appointments, that were made in the Transportation (Power) Branch, were made because the present superior apprentice branch was unable to supply qualified and trained recruits, and, may I add, these direct appointments were made despite the fact that the Central Advisory Committee ordained that 20 per cent. of promotions to official grades should be from subordinates. So even here the Labour Member has gone out of his way to Indianise a particular Railway Department.

Then, Sir, I should like to refer to the improved relations today between the railway management and their workmen. I have been in close touch, and my friend Diwan Chaman Lall will support me in this, with all the railway workmen who presented themselves to give evidence before the Labour Commission and I can assure the House and my Honourable friends, Messrs. Aney and Kelkar, that the railway men themselves today realise that there is in operation a serious and determined effort on the part of the Railway Board and Administrations to establish a feeling of bon camaraderie that in my opinion, unhappily ceased to exist when the railways were brought under State control and the Divisional system was introduced.

Then, Sir, we come to the last of Mr. Kelkar's grouses, the part played by Mr. Hayman in the preparation of the Railway Board's Memorandum for the Labour Commission. I have nothing to say about that work, because the Memorandum speaks for itself as an outstanding proof of Mr.

[Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney.]

Hayman's ability and fitness for office. I hold no brief, as I said originally, for Mr. Hayman, but I am telling this House absolute facts with which I am personally familiar, and I was really surprised when I heard the charges brought against him by my friends, Messrs. Aney and Kelkar. Sir, these Members appear to have specialised in the art of walking on thin ice. My surprise is that their ice has not cracked long ago and they have not drowned themselves in their sea of ignorance on railways matters. My friends, Messrs. Aney and Kelkar, talk as if they were really familiar with railway labour problems, but when put to the test, as evidenced in their speeches, they show their unfamiliarity with, indeed they show their abysmal ignorance of the whole subject. Now, I ask, is it the work of the Labour Member to build houses and if he does not squander the taxpayer's money at lightning speed and within a given time, is this to be considered a crime? On the contrary he is entitled to our eulogy and approval, not our censure.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Who suffers in the meanwhile because the necessary assistance is not given? Do you?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Neither you nor I. Suffer Mr. Aney.

Mr. M. S. Aney: That is the reason.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: My friend must remember that Rome was not built in a day.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Yes, yes; it won't be built in a century.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: But we shall both be dead by then. The question before the House is this. If you are going to pass a vote of censure on a Member, pass it for some solid reasons, and not for imaginary reasons such as Mr. Aney has thought fit

Mr. M. S. Aney: The reasons contained in these papers are quite obvious.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I give you facts. I have now told you what has been actually done by Mr. Hayman during the last twelve months of office, and I have not the slightest hesitation in adding that every railway Indian workman will bear me out when I say that a change of heart is in evidence everywhere, because there is a definite change of policy, and that policy is being guided by the Honourable Member in charge of the Railways, and is being operated and led by Mr. Hayman, the Member whom you now wish to censure with a cut of Rs. 48,000. Sir, with these few words I oppose the motion.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, I am grateful to my friend, the Mover of this motion, for he made it clear that he was not moving it in any sense for personal reasons, and indeed, there was nothing in his speech which could have conveyed a different impression. He said that the point he wished to bring out was not a personal question at all, but a question as to the manner in which the work of this very important branch of the Railway Board had been performed; and the chief reason he gave in support of his motion was that the progress made had not been nearly as rapid as it should have been. In particular, he pointed out that we had been unable to spend even half the money included in the Budget for the current year, and he also mentioned the fact that, in August last, we were much more sanguine as to our ability to spend during the current year. Perhaps, I might explain that particular point at the outset. In August last, when the figures were prepared, we were still in hope that the Bill to amend the Indian Railways Act, in order to give effect to the Washington and Geneva Conventions, would be passed in the September Session. It is obvious, I think, that until the Legislature had definitely embodied the new provisions in the law, we could not embark on an extensive building programme, nor could we engage the additional staff on any large scale until buildings were provided for them, where necessary. That, I think, explains that point.

It is not only on the other side of the House that there is regret that we were unable to proceed as rapidly as we should have liked, and I can assure the House that it is the desire of the Railway Board and of the Government of India that we should make as rapid progress as possible with these matters. But my Honourable friend will perhaps forgive me if I say that his proposal is not altogether logical having regard to the reasons which he advanced in support of them. His argument amounts to this, that because we move so slowly, we must not be allowed to move at all. If no provision is made in the Budget for a Staff Member of the Railway Board, then the whole of the work we have been trying to do during the last eleven months in this direction, will be paralysed; the essential machinery will be destroyed, and instead of accelerated progress we shall see progress most seriously retarded. I do think that, if what my friend desired, was that the House should express dissatisfaction with the rate of progress, an ordinary Rs. 100 cut would have been quite as effective and a more logical method of conveying his idea.

I should like to turn now to what was said by my friend, Mr. Kelkar, who brought what is unquestionably a somewhat grave charge against myself. He said that, by the manner in which I presented my proposal for the appointment of an additional Member of the Railway Board to the Assembly last year, I had misled the House, and that I had obtained sanction on the plea that the work of this additional Member was to be confined strictly to labour matters, and that he was to do nothing else. Now, that charge is absolutely and entirely without foundation, and I would like to draw the attention of the House to what I said when I dealt with that matter. I first of all pointed out the various branches of work which at that time came within the sphere of what was known as the Member, General. I said:

"Since the railways exist for the conveyance of passengers and goods, his primary concern is with the movement of traffic."

That was the first branch of his work. I then said:

"The second main branch of his work is commercial and might, I think, be summed up under the name of 'Salesmanship'."

Then, in the next paragraph, I dealt with the third branch with which the General Member has to deal, namely, establishment,—

"which covers the rates of pay and conditions of service of every grade of official employed on the railways of India, who now number more than 800,000 men. He must be prepared to grapple with the intricacies of pay and allowances when schemes of reorganisation have to be carried out, and with the special problems which arise when a Company-managed railway is taken over by the State and its staff has to be incorporated in the State railway services. He must also be prepared to deal with all the multitudinous questions that may be summed up under the general heading 'the welfare of labour', which includes housing, provident funds, leave rules, medical attendance, assistance towards education, hours of work, etc."

[Sir George Rainy.]

Now, I explained, as clearly as I could, that it was very hard to expect that the Member who was chosen for dealing with the traffic questions and with the commercial questions should also have the capacity to deal effectively with establishment questions. I then said in paragraph 25 of the speech:

"The conclusion at which the Government of India have arrived, was that the General Member should be set free to devote his whole time to those matters which are his primary concern, namely, transportation and the commercial management of the railways, and that a new Member must be added to the Board who would be specially charged with responsibility for all establishment questions and for the welfare of labour and of the staff generally."

Now, surely that is perfectly clear. I never suggested that his duties were to be confined purely to labour matters. On the contrary, I was at great pains to explain otherwise. Finally, on this point I should like to refer to the Memorandum placed before the Standing Finance Committee for Railways by the Financial Commissioner on this very matter. This is what he said, and I believe this was before every Member at the time the discussion took place in the House:

"For these reasons the Government of India have decided that it is necessary to create an additional appointment of Member of the Railway Board, thus providing that there will be one Member in charge of the transportation and commercial work and one Member who will be in charge of all staff work, including both labour questions generally and all the establishment work which at present is performed in the Establishment Branch."

Now, could anything be clearer? I know quite well that my Honourable friend had no sinister motive in charging me with misleading the House, but I do hope he will recognise that it was hardly a fair charge to make. (Cries of "Withdraw".)

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: May I just interrupt the Honourable Member for one minute and point out to him two things, which give the impression that I have got, which is the impression shared by many? As he is referring to the establishment side, I draw his attention to paragraph 27 of his speech last year. It begins, "On the establishment side", etc., and then throughout that paragraph he refers only to two things and nothing else—a good deal of unrest and trouble amongst the railway workmen. That is one, and the only other illustration he says which I would give is, "The obligations the Government of India have incurred under the Washington and Geneva Conventions", all along giving us the impression that the centre of gravity of the work to be done by the new Member lay entirely on the labour problem. Just one word more. I will point out what impression he gave at the very time to Mr. Jamnadas Mehta, and here is what Mr. Jamnadas Mehta said. It is relevant from this point of view that it was the impression created upon the mind of a Member who was present and listened and knew everything. I will just quote him. He said:

"Sir George Rainy, I did not know, was a great tactician with a very skilful strategy behind him. Twenty eight lakhs are provided for increasing the wages of labour; what a great increase of work for the Railway Board. Thirty lakhs are to be spent on improving the housing conditions of labour. Does it require another Member?"

That will show that, so far at least as Mr. Jamnadas Mehta was concerned, he was under the impression that the additional Member must be responsible mainly for this labour work, and the contention that we have here put forward throughout is that he is not attending to that side of the work.

• The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I had hoped to hear a different statement from my Honourable friend, but I do not think that the personal question is of sufficient importance that I should take up the time of the House with it further. I do not doubt for a moment that my Honourable friend was conveying what was quite clearly in his mind, but I hope I have satisfied the House that it ought not to have been in his mind.

I turn now to the matter to which I propose to devote the major part of my speech. As I said when I introduced the Budget, I regret that it was not possible to place in the hands of the Members before the discussion a Memorandum explaining the work which has been done by the Railway Board in his sphere since my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, assumed charge of the branches concerned with establishment and labour questions. But I promised a Memorandum would be placed before the Central Advisory Council, and I am quite ready to promise also, if Honourable Members would like to have it, that we will circulate copies of the Memorandum to every Member of the House. I quite recognise the right of the House to ask for information as to what we have been doing during the last 11 months, and I will endeavour to satisfy that desire. There must of course be a limit to the amount of information one can convey in a speech on a proposed reduction of a Demand, but I will try as far as I can to amplify the brief outline which I was able to give in introducing the Budget.

I should like, in the first place, to make it clear that, although Mr. Hayman is not confined purely to labour matters, yet unquestionably much the greater portion of the work he has been doing during the past year has in fact been directly connected with labour questions. It has always been recognised that labour matters must have precedence. But, before I come to these more directly labour questions, I should like to say a little about some other important matters which have come before him during the year, because no account of the work he has been doing would be anything like complete unless something was said on these subjects. Now, one of the questions with which he has been dealing is that of racial discrimination. I was very surprised to hear from my Honourable friend, Mr. Kelkar, that that was not a proper matter for a Labour Member to undertake; I was surprised because, judging from what one reads in the newspapers, it is emphatically a matter which, in the opinion of the railway workers of India, should be considered by a Labour Commission, and if it is suitable for consideration by a Labour Commission, I do not quite see why it should be excluded from the purview of a Labour Member.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: I thought it was already disposed of and that there was nothing remaining to be done.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Even assuming that my Honourable friend's impression was right, and that Mr. Hayman was confined to labour matters, even so, racial discrimination is a perfectly proper and suitable matter for him to consider. I said, when I introduced the Budget, that as regards this question of racial discrimination, we had reached a stage where I thought that discussion with the Central Advisory Council would be helpful and fruitful. I could not possibly attempt to go through all the various items today, but I want to mention some of them, where we have already taken action since Mr. Hayman assumed charge. Here, for instance, in the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway, the limit of pay for the grant of second class residential and school passes was lower for the European and Anglo-Indian employees and higher for the Indian employees, and this distinction has been abolished in respect of all staff appointed after a certain date. In the second place—this is on the East Indian Railway—the quarters allotted for European and Anglo-Indian employees were more spacious than those allotted to Indian employees, and orders were issued by the Agent in December last, that in future all allotments should be made by posts and not by individuals, and so the quarters previously reserved for European and Anglo-Indian employees will be available to Indian employees at the same rents, should they desire to occupy them.

Again distinctions made as regards free medical assistance and other facilities have been removed by the issue of an order issued in January last to the Chief Medical Officer, whereby equal medical assistance and other facilities are admissible to all staffs in a particular grade, irrespective of their nationality.

In the case of travelling allowance, the distinction between the rates of daily allowance admissible to Europeans and Anglo-Indians on the one hand, and Indians on the other hand, under the Company rules has been removed by the orders of the Railway Board—issued in July last—and the travelling allowance of all subordinates is, for the future, to be governed by the State Railway rules.

Take another matter. The Railway is now prepared to equip all quarters for senior subordinates with electricity at stations where electricity is available, provided the occupants are willing to pay the charges. There again racial discrimination has been removed.

The training of nurses was formerly confined to the daughters of European and Anglo-Indian employees, but it has now been extended to the daughters of Indian employees as well. I could give three or four more instances, but it is hardly possible to give an exhaustive list in a speech. I have mentioned them now because I want to make it clear that, quite apart from these matters which we hope to discuss with the Central Advisory Council, we have already, wherever we found it possible, taken action to redress what was complained of.

Amongst other subjects, unconnected with labour, I should like to mention that, with the addition of a new Member to the Railway Board's office, and with the introduction of the new standardisation department, a considerable amount of reorganisation was necessary in the Railway Board's office, the burden of which fell on Mr. Hayman, and he had also to take responsibility for framing the course of instruction at the Dehra Dun Staff College. Again there was the big question of settling the cadres of the superior services, a matter which may be of some interest to the House, because I hope that, before very long, it may enable us to settle the vexed question about the local traffic service which from time to time pops up at question time. This question also fell to him. But I will not go on to dilate upon these matters, not directly connected with labour, because I recognise that it is labour questions which are of primary importance, and it is in them that the House is most interested. For all reasons they must have precedence. One of them, however, I think I had better leave to another occasion, because when the Bill for the amendment of the Railway Act comes before us, there will be a natural opportunity to deal with questions about the hours of employment and the periods of rest.

Of the various points that were brought to my notice by the deputation of the Railwaymen's Federation that I received at Simla, I think, perhaps, one to which they attached primary importance—I do not say they put it absolutely first—was the question of security of tenure to which my Honourable friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, has referred in his speech. The new rules on this subject were issued in November last and a copy was sent to the Secretary of the Railwaymen's Federation. I am very sorry indeed that these rules have not penetrated to the railway unions, and I propose to issue instructions to the Agents that, when general orders on a matter of that kind are communicated to them, it is very desirable that they should, on their part, convey the orders of that sort to the unions which they recognise. Copies of these rules are already in the Library of the House, but here, again, if it would meet the convenience of Honourable Members—the type is still standing—there would be no difficulty in printing extra copies. We shall be very glad to circulate copies to the Members of the House, and I will see that that is done.

Now, these rules that we have issued were criticised by my Honourable friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, and in particular he argued that a distinction was drawn in these rules not as regards dismissal,—I think "dismissal", was the word which he used—but as regards discharge for inefficiency, and that distinction was drawn between men who were of less than ten years of service and men who had more than ten years of service. I do not want to discuss the merits or demerits of that particular distinction today, but what I do wish to point out is that, whether or not the rules go as far as my Honourable friend would like to see them go, or as the Railwaymen's Federation would like to see them go, they are clearly a marked advance over the procedure that was in existence previously. We have taken a distinct step forward in the direction which the Labour Unions wish.

My Honourable friend raised the question why, before we issued these rules, we did not have a further discussion with the Railwaymen's Federation. My answer is this, that when we had clearly made up our minds that we could go a certain distance, it seemed to me desirable that we should go that distance at once and not wait for further consultation, which might hold up the case for a long time, in the hope that perhaps we would go further. It does not mean that these rules are fixed like the laws of the Medes and Persians, for all eternity, so that they cannot be altered. This is a matter which I know is of great interest to the railway staff generally, and I anticipate that it will become the subject of discussion from time to time between the Railway Board or possibly the Railway Member and the Railwaymen's Federation.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru (Agra Division: Non-Muhammādan Rural): Was there previous discussion between the Agents and the Trade Unions, as promised by the Honourable Member to the deputation which he received in May last?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: As regards these particular rules, I do not think so, but I am not absolutely certain.

(At this stage Mr. President vacated the Chair which was taken by Mr. Deputy President.)

Another matter was the leave rules. The new leave rules, I am informed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, are likely to be published in Saturday's Gazette, and I will issue instructions as regards them also that copies should be circulated to Members of this House so that they may see what they are. The question of the leave rules is a complicated one; technical questions are involved which gave us infinite trouble, and these questions had to be settled with the Auditor General and the Finance Department. It was not till my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, took them in hand that we were able to get out of the thicket of technical difficulties in which we were entangled. These rules apply not only to inferior servants, but also to all new entrants into the service, whether they are in the officers' grade, the subordinate grade or are inferior servants. The rules are not of course uniform for all grades, but within a grade,—whether of inferior servants, subordinates or officers—the only distinction that arises is over the question of domicile. In certain cases the rules for officers of European domicile are more liberal than those for officers of Indian domicile, but there is no distinction on the ground of race or nationality. Now the great step forward so far as the former Company-managed railways are concerned in respect of these rules is that, whereas at present I think it is true to say that for large classes of their lower paid establishments with the exception of certain holidays in the year,—the number varies on different railways, 15 on one and 17 on another—the workmen are not entitled to any leave except leave without pay. Under these new rules, once they have completed three years' service, they become entitled to 10 days' leave in the year on full pay, apart from holidays; after ten years' service, 15 days', and after twenty years' service, 20 days', plus a certain amount of leave on medical certificate. I will not go further into the details because Honourable Members will be able to see for themselves when they receive copies of the rules. It may be that, in this case also, we have not found ourselves able to go so far as the Railwaymen's Federation would like to see us go; but we have made a genuine attempt to improve the conditions of service in this particular respect, and we mean to make our policy effective by the provision of leave reserves which will be required if it is to be made possible for the men to take leave to which they become entitled under the new rules.

There was another matter which engaged Mr. Hayman's attention, a very practical matter which clearly affects the welfare of the staff, namely, the acceleration of the payment of wages at the end of the month. He made a special inquiry into that matter at Moradabad and what he found was that the orders issued by the Railway Board were perfectly sound orders, which did not require alteration, but that practical effect was not being given to them. He took immediate steps, with the approval of the Board, to put an officer on special duty to work out a detailed scheme, so that full effect should be given to the orders previously passed to prevent delay in the payment of monthly wages.

Then again he has given special attention to the service conditions of workshop employees. In their case, the new leave rules will be a distinct improvement, and there are other provisions such as a month's notice on discharge, and one or two small matters of that kind, which ought also to be appreciated. Another matter which has received attention is the Staff Benefit Fund. The rules about this Fund are in their final shape and will come into effect on the 1st April, 1931. I hope that Staff Benefit Funds will be established generally, not only on the State-managed lines, but also on the Company-managed lines.

Another question we have taken up,—and I personally believe it is a very important matter for the welfare of the staff,—is that of co-operative credit societies for the railwaymen. My attention was specially drawn to it at the Conference of Railway Agents last October, when the President, Sir Ernest Jackson, who has done a great deal for the employees of the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway in that particular line laid great emphasis on its importance. I said then, and I should like to repeat it now, that anything which can be done in that way to relieve the indebtedness in which so many railway servants are involved would be a very real improvement.

Now, as regards what must obviously be a question in which railwaymen take special interest, namely, the revision of the wages of the lowest paid employees, I explained what the position was in my Budget speech. Having got the first case settled, we are now going on to the others in accordance with our programme previously laid down, to take up in succession the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, the East Indian Railway and the North Western Railway, and we will try to get these schemes through and get them approved as quickly as we possibly can. My friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, I think inadvertently suggested that we were going to consider not only the prevailing scale of wages of the locality, but also the cost of living index. That is correct, except that I did not use the word "index". His comment was that everybody knew that to get an accurate cost of living index was a very difficult and troublesome matter indeed and required very full investigation. There I entirely agree with him. But I did not in the least intend to suggest that we would delay action until somebody had made a complete investigation and devised an accurate cost of living index. All we can do is, using such data as we have and can readily obtain, to ascertain approximately what might be a reasonable figure to take and to work on that. I think it necessary to say that, because I should be very sorry to convey an impression that we were holding up action until we could comply with what I think is, today in India, only an ideal. I do not think anybody has yet solved the question how in India a satisfactory cost of living index can be devised.

My Honourable friend went on to ask for a declaration of policy,—it was the policy of the Railway Board he asked for—but in these matters, it is more often than not the policy of the Government of India which is in question, and I should be very glad indeed if I were in a position to deal at length with these various topics. I do not, however, think, it is possible for me today to take up his various points one by one, and try to answer them seriatim. What I do want to say is this. I quite recognise that, when I received the deputation from the Railwaymen's Federation in Simla, that was not the last stage in the discussion. When I addressed the deputation, I tried to make it clear to them that, while I recognised that there ought to be further discussion between the representatives of labour and the Railway Administrations, that would not necessarily take place between the Railway Board and the Federation. It might more appropriately take place between the Railway Administrations and their own local unions. But at the same time, there are some of these demands put forward which are not of a local nature; in their essence they are really of an all-India nature, at any rate, so far as the State-managed railways are concerned. I mean such questions as the leave rules or the security of tenure rules, hours of work and so on. Now, I quite recognise that there may be advantages if consultations take place with representatives of labour at the headquarters, and I do not exclude that idea for a moment. I think it is probable that such further discussions may come about.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: If the Honourable Member will permit me interrupting him, will he kindly state whether those consultations will only be confined to the Federation of the Railway Unions, or extended to representatives of other bodies?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I was speaking, Sir, on the assumption that the Railwaymen's Federation was representative, or at any rate, the most representative body of railway labour. If there are other bodies, not connected with the Federation, who would wish to be consulted at such a time, I have not the least idea of suggesting that they ought to be excluded. All I can say is that, at the moment, they were not present to my mind. My mind was naturally concentrated on the body whose representatives I have met. I do not think it is possible for me to go in detail into all that the Honourable Member, Diwan Chaman Lall, said. I should like to say this, that the general policy of the Government of India towards Railway Trades Unions is quite definitely an attitude of sympathy and encouragement. I can imagine that from time to time, there may be difficulties about particular unions. Our hope would always be that these difficulties would be overcome and we should strive to maintain amicable relations wherever it was possible. It is only to this extent that I wish to qualify what I have said. Clearly at this stage, when trade unionism in India is in its early days, it may not always be possible to maintain cordial and friendly relations with all the unions. That is a question for practical decision in each case as it arises. But undoubtedly, our general view is that the trade unions, if wisely guided—and I cannot overestimate the enormous importance of wise guidance to the unions at this stage—if wisely guided, they are capable of doing a great deal of good work in the interests of labour not only on the railways but in practically all industries, and I should like, if I may—interested as I am and interested as the Government must be in wise guidance of labour—to express very briefly my appreciation of the courageous action taken by some in November last at Nagpur, when it seemed there was a real danger of the whole labour movement coming under unwise management. (Applause.) I do think those who acted so promptly on that occasion are entitled to great credit and are entitled to be heard with great respect whenever they speak on labour questions. (Hear, hear.)

I do not wish, Sir, to weary the House. I have tried to give the House some idea of the magnitude and volume of work with which Mr. Hayman has had to deal. If the House thinks that he has not been proceeding as fast as they wish, then censure the rest of us as much as you like. But do not censure him, and in particular do not deprive me of the Labour Member of the Railway Board, because I am sure that if you do so, then the work which he has been doing will come to a standstill altogether. I do hope that the House will not carry this motion. (Applause.)

Mr. M. S. Aney: Sir,

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (United Provinces: Nominated Non-Official): May I ask, on a point of order, if the Honourable Member has got any right of reply?

Mr. Deputy President: He has moved the cut.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: The rules which apply to Resolutions do not apply to cuts.

Mr. Deputy President: Let me see what the Honourable Member has got to say?

Mr. M. S. Aney: I have heard with great interest the very exhaustive statement which, if not completely satisfactory, is somewhat assuring. That is one redeeming feature of the debate which unfortunately took a somewhat acrimonious turn at one stage. The one point which I have not been able to understand is this—and it was the point which I wanted to raise—that we have had a certain allotment made at the beginning of the year, that this House wanted the Railway Board to utilise a particular amount of money in the interests of labour by the end of the year. That was the meaning of the allotment, and the manner in which the budget allotments have been worked out is the sole matter under consideration by this House on this motion at this stage. Even now, they do not say how the 10 lakhs, 18 lakhs and 30 lakhs allotted have been spent. In fact, if we go by the figures as they are given under the revised estimate in the volume of the Demands for Grants, we find absolutely no mention made of any expenditure during the course of the year there. That is the great difficulty, and that is the main reason why I think I was justified in bringing to the prominent notice of this House the absence of information as to how and in what useful way this money was spent, or whether any money was spent at all. I would therefore request the Financial Commissioner of Railways to revise the book of demands in view of the statement he has made in a certain paragraph of the Explanatory Memorandum. So long as he does not do that, the world will always understand what I have stated as the only correct position with regard to the money allotted. However, I have received the assurance that something is being done, and a good deal is intended to be done within as short a time as possible. I hope that this year at least we have got a promise about which we shall have no occasion to repent or grumble. I do not therefore wish to press my motion.

Mr. Deputy President: The question is that leave be given to Mr. Aney to withdraw his motion.

The motion was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Displacement of Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Europeans on the various Railways.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, the motion that stands in my name and which I move is:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 10,000."

Sir, the question of this reduction became apparent when I received Volume II of the Railway Board's Report.

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: On a point of order, Sir. In accordance with the Honourable the President's ruling this morning, I am doubtful whether Colonel Gidney can move this cut to reduce the Demand under the head Railway Board by Rs. 10,000. The Honourable Member is raising a question with regard to the pay of certain Anglo-Indians and domiciled Europeans on various railways, whose pay is brought to account under the head 4—Administration or 5—Repairs and Maintenance and Operation. The point of his motion is to urge on the Railway Board that a certain number of domiciled Europeans and Anglo-Indians should not be displaced. It appears to me that he is raising a matter of policy on a grant which does not cover the salaries of employees concerned on the various railways.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: My motion relates to a question of policy in the same way as Mr. Aney's cut of Rs. 48,000.

Some Honourable Members: No, no.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I am not addressing you and your "No, noes". I am addressing the Chair and I say, "Yes". But I am prepared to reduce my cut to Rs. 100, if I can do that when the time comes, and if you will permit me, Sir. In order to remove any apprehension of the Railway Board, for it appears to be afraid of all my cuts today, I am prepared to let the Railway Board have a baksheesh of Rs. 9,900 of the cut proposed, and shall move a cut of Rs. 100 when the time comes later on, as regards the policy of the Railway Board. May I have your permission to do so, Sir?

Mr. Deputy President: Yes, Mr. Neogy.

Re-examination of the Convention of the Separation of Railway Finance from General Finance.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

It is my intention to raise the question of the re-examination of the convention of the separation of Railway finances from General finances. This is the sixth year in which we are considering the convention of separation. Full five years have gone in which this convention has been worked, and more than once before the demand has been put forward from this side of the House that this convention should be re-examined and revised. From a perusal of the Resolution of September 1924, which embodies this convention, it will be seen that it was laid down in that very Resolution itself that, the "arrangements shall be subject to periodical revision but shall be provisionally tried for at least three years". That indicates,

Sir, that at that time it was considered by the authorities that three years' trial would be quite fair, and that on the termination of three years, this convention should be examined for the purpose of finding out as to how it has worked in practice and in what respects it might be usefully revised.

(At this stage Mr. President resumed the Chair.)

At this stage, Sir, I desire to go as briefly as I may into the history of this separation of the two Budgets which, as far as I can remember, was first raised in the year 1899. The proposal then was that the Budget of the Public Works Department, which included the Railway Department in those days, should be separated from the General Budget. We do not find that any action was taken on that proposal at that time. It must be remembered that, in those days and for years before, complaints were voiced, mostly in England, that the railways in India were being starved, and that the departmental financial rules under which the railways worked in India were not quite suitable to the requirements of a big commercial undertaking which the railways represent. In 1901 we find one, Mr. Thomas Robertson, was appointed Special Commissioner for Railways in India by the Secretary of State to go into the various questions relating to railway administration in India, including the question of State versus Company management; and this gentleman was expected, among other things, to report on the feasibility of adopting a systematic plan of railway development in India, in response to the complaints which I have mentioned that the railways in India were being starved, and that there was no systematic plan of railway development, thanks to the hand-to-mouth policy which was followed in respect of railways. Mr. Robertson in his Report dated, I think, 1903, made certain suggestions which have some sort of resemblance, though a very distant resemblance, to the separation convention which is in operation at the present moment. He recommended the formation of what he called a railway fund, more or less corresponding to the Railway Reserve Fund that we have at the present moment, and he also made certain other recommendations, which remind one of some of the details of the present convention. It does not appear that any definite action was taken even on this Report so far as these points were concerned. Next we come to the year 1907, when what is known as the Mackay Committee came out, and here again we do not find that any radical change was either recommended by the Mackay Committee in the financial arrangements of railway administration in India, or that any definite line of action was chalked out by Government as a result of that Committee's recommendations so far as the question of separation of finances went. The Mackay Committee tried to remove certain misapprehensions which prevailed with regard to the defects of the late departmental system, and made certain practical suggestions for improving the procedure in regard to allotments. We then find that this question of separate budgets took shape only after the Acworth Committee came out in 1920-21. We also find that in 1921 the Associated Chambers of Commerce passed a resolution asking definitely for the separation of the Railway Budget from the General Budget. As is well known, the Acworth Committee were equally divided with regard to the most important question of principle which was referred to them, namely, the question of State versus Company management; but they were unanimous in making a recommendation that the finances of the railways should be separated from the general revenues and that there should be a Member of the Executive Council in charge of the Railway portfolio and it should be his duty to present the Railway Budget separately from the General Budget. I need not go into the details of the recommendations because they are well known to this House. In those days the Government of India were generally opposed to the idea of State management, but it seems they favoured this idea of the separation of finances. When, therefore, in 1923, the policy of State management was practically accepted by Government, though only with regard to the Great Indian Peninsula and the East Indian Railways at that particular moment, at the instance of this House, they made a proposal, so far as I understand, to the Secretary of State that as the policy of the Government was going to be in future to undertake the management of the State-owned railways, they did not like the idea of the Legislative Assembly, a popular House as it is, interfering in the details of the railway administration; and my information, Sir, is that they made a positive proposal to the effect that the Railway Budget should be separated from the General Budget and should be made wholly non-voted, just as the Army Budget is at the present moment; that it might be open to the House to criticise the Budget, but that it should not be needed to put the different Demands to the vote of the House. That was their original proposal to the Secretary of State. Be it said, Sir, to the credit of the authorities in England, that they did not fall in with this proposal. The Secretary of State, it is understood, pointed out that the railways of India belonged, as they do, to the taxpayers; and in view particularly of the fact that the general revenues, which means the taxpayers again, had subsidised the railways in the past in the days of their adversity when they could not pay their pay, it would not be just and proper to remove the Railway Department from the control of the Assembly, and that he would not agree to any departure in this matter being made without the consent of the Legislative Assembly itself. This led to the convention which is embodied in the Resolution which was adopted in this House in the year 1924. As a result of this convention, we have the Commerce Member presenting the Railway Budget separately year after year, and this is the sixth separated Budget that has been presented.

Now, Sir, when the Commerce Member rose to make his speech in presenting the Budget, the other day, I felt tempted to rise to a point of order for the purpose of drawing attention to the rather ambiguous constitutional position which he occupies with reference to the Railway Budget, for those who have studied the latest Report of the Public Accounts Committee must have noticed that this question came up for examination at their hands. It was pointed out by certain Members that the Government of India Act and the Statutory Rules framed thereunder seemed to contemplate only one annual budget of the Government of India, and only one Finance Member who was given certain specific rights under those rules. I am perfectly aware that a notification, or rather an order, has been issued by His Excellency the Governor General investing the Honourable Commerce Member with certain specific rights under certain statutory rules in which certain definite functions are allotted to the Finance Member. Sir, I do not know what the exact position of the Honourable Member is today. The Honourable Sir George Rainy represented a trinity yesterday—he was the Commerce Member, he was the Railway Member and he was also the Finance Member. It may be that he is no longer the Finance Member today, having regard to the particular rule under which His Excellency the Governor General's order was promulgated. Yesterday I was rather struck by the fact that my Honourable friend, Sir George Schuster, made himself rather scarce from the floor of this House; he did not seem to feel quite comfortable in his seat and he did not stay for more than two or three minutes at a time when he came in. Well, Sir, it is a sort of conundrum that the Finance Member ceases to be a Finance Member when the railway finances are under discussion; and the fact that the Honourable Sir George Schuster allowed himself to fade into the background yesterday is to my mind symbolical of the position which he and the Finance Department occupy with reference to the Railway Department under the convention of separation.

I think we might now examine this question as to how far the separation affects the financial control; and from that particular point of view I will take up the position of the Financial Commissioner of Railways for examination, because I take it he constitutes the pivot of the scheme of separation, the pivot on which the system works. I am perfectly aware, Sir, that the underlying idea of separation, both here and also in those European countries where it is in operation—I mean those countries where there is State management of railways and where Railway finances are separated from the General finances—the fundamental idea is that the Finance Minister should not exercise any meticulous control over the financial administration of the railways. Sir William Acworth, who is the author of this idea, or rather one of the authors of this idea of separation so far as India is concerned, has also an interesting Report on the Austrian railway system, and in that Report he amplifies his idea about the position of the Finance Minister under a scheme of separation. There he points out that the Finance Minister, under a scheme of separation, should be the watch dog, whose duty shall be only to bark and not to bite,—that is how he put it. Now, Sir, the position, therefore, is that the Finance Member of the Government of India no longer bites the Railway Member or the Railway Department as he used to do in the past, but he is content with merely barking at it. Not merely that. Instead of doing the barking himself, he has delegated the work of barking to the Financial Commissioner. The Financial Commissioner I described at one time as the Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde of the Railway Department. In one capacity he is expected to represent the Finance Department. Inside the Railway Board he is a sort of ambassador of Sir George Schuster; in another capacity he is thoroughly identified with the day to day administration of the Railway Department. On a previous occasion I pointed out that, from the manner in which he seems to identify himself with every little detail of railway matters that comes up in this House in the shape of questions, it seems that, though he may not be said to have altogether lost his financial soul, certainly his financial soul has got rather attenuated and his railway soul predominates at the present moment.

Now, Sir, the examination of the position of the Financial Commissioner gives us the real key to the whole position. Questions have been asked time after time in this House regarding the various powers which the Financial Commissioner exercises, and it was brought out only very lately, that in regard to certain matters, his powers exceed the powers which used to be exercised by the Governor General in Council before the separation of finances. (An Honourable Member: "No, no.") Now, Sir, the Honourable Member will say that that is the essence of separation. I say, yes, that is certainly separation, and if anybody in this House is dissatisfied with the condition of things, he really is fighting not merely for tinkering with the convention, but his objection goes really to the very root of the matter.

[Mr. K. C. Neogy.]

I am in entire agreement with the Government in this matter that it is not possible to tinker with this convention. Either you should concede the powers to the Financial Commissioner that he at present enjoys, or you should restore the control of the Finance Department as it used to be in the past. There is, I daresay, no half-way house. Theoretically, of course, the Honourable the Finance Member can always call upon the Financial Commissioner to come up to him and explain matters, and it is always open to the Financial Commissioner to approach the Finance Member and consult him in regard to the financial questions involved in the railway administration. But from what we know as a matter of fact, from experience of the past few years, I do maintain that this control of the Finance Member is nothing but illusory. So far with regard to the relations between the Financial Commissioner and the Finance Member.

With regard to the relations between this House and the Railway Department, I do maintain that this House has been made to impose a self-denying ordinance on itself as a result of the acceptance of this convention. In so far as it is no longer open to this House to claim anything beyond a fixed percentage of dividend from the Railway revenues, to that extent I take it it will be conceded that this House has imposed a restriction upon itself. Apart from that, Sir, it has been brought out in several sessions of the Public Accounts Committee that the powers of re-appropriation enjoyed by the Financial Commissioner and the Railway Board practically reduce the vote of this House, particularly in regard to capital construction, to more or less a farce. This matter was brought out in discussion once or twice before this House, and those Honourable Members who have gone carefully through the Report of the Public Accounts Committee, and through the evidence that was tendered before the Public Accounts Committee on behalf of the Railway Department, know very well what the exact position is. It is rather a technical point, and I do not want to take up the time of the House any further by dwelling on it.

Now, Sir, what is the net result, from the point of view of efficiency of administration, of all these five years of trial of this separation convention? What evidence will satisfy this House on this point? Will the evidence of the Auditor General satisfy them? Sir, here I am reading out the observations made by Sir Frederick Gauntlett in September last before the Public Accounts Committee, page 325 of the Evidence Volume. He was referring to the different Appropriation Reports on the railway accounts. He says:

"It leaves me with rather a feeling of disquiet. This is the last occasion on which I should be present, and I do think that while there is steady improvement elsewhere, I hesitate to say that things are all right in the Railways. I do see substantial improvement in the Army, but I cannot say the same thing about the Railways."

Then a question was put to him as to what he attributed this to. His answer was, "Inefficient administration". That is the testimony of an officer who has spent his lifetime in the service of India, and these are the words which he uttered on the eve of his retirement, after we had given full five years trial to the system of separation.

Sir, it was claimed by the supporters of this separation, that most of the ills from which the Railways suffered were due to the departmental system of control, and that as soon as the separation was inaugurated, things would settle themselves. But I have quoted the opinion of a very impartial observer who was in intimate touch with the financial aspects of the railway administration to show how these hopes have been realised.

Then, Sir, reference was made to the policy of extravagance to which the Railways seem to have been committed ever since the separation convention was established. Reference was also made by no less a person than Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas to an incident in which the rent payable by the Postal Department to the Railways on account of accommodation given to them by the Railway Department at the Lucknow station had gone up something like 100 times on account of the lavish expenditure undertaken by the Railways in re-building their station at Lucknow. Sir, the Executive Council of the Government of India is a close corporation. We do not know what passes within the closed doors of the Cabinet. We are not privileged to know whether any individual Member differs from any other individual Member on any particular question. When they come to this House they present a united front. It is seldom, therefore, that it is possible for us to find out as to what one Honourable Member thinks of the administration of another Honourable Member. But, Sir, in this particular case, which was referred to by Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, we have the advantage of the opinion of Sir George Schuster on the policy of extravagance followed by the Railways. I think the Honourable Member in an unwary moment expressed himself very frankly on this particular point, and the circumstances of the particular case were so appalling that any one who was present at the meeting of the Public Accounts Committee could not help giving vent to his inmost feelings. Honourable Members will find a reference to this particular case on page 47 and onwards in the evidence volume of the Public Accounts Committee, the latest issue. This is how the case was summarised by Sir Frederick Gauntlett. A new station was built at Lucknow on a great scale of elaboration and the Posts and Telegraphs Department is now being asked to pay a huge rental for a room in the new station for the Railway Mail Service! It seems that the rent paid by the Railway Mail Service before the new building was put up was about Rs. 55. and as a result of the huge expenditure on this new building, the rent had gone up more than 100 times, and the Postal Department was asked to pay this enhanced sum, because the rent depends upon the proportionate cost of the space occupied. This is what Sir George Schuster said:

"I think this enormous increase in rent indicates that the accommodation provided at Lucknow has been provided on an extremely elaborate scale and I doubt if the Government of India can afford to maintain that sort of standard."

And we share his doubt to the fullest extent. Of course he was speaking with reference to the extra charge that is laid on the shoulders of the Post Office in this transaction, but this observation has an indirect reference to the extravagant policy of the Railways too. Now, Sir, the Honourable Member further went on to observe, "The principle seems to be rather important". The question is why didn't you fight the Railways over this question? This was the question that some of us put to the Postal Department, and the Honourable the Finance Member said, "The principle seems to be rather important and when big sums are involved I think it would be worth your while to fight for the principle". Sir, if I may pause here for a moment, here is an instance in which the Honourable the Finance Member is inciting the Member for Industries and Labour to fight the Honourable the Railway Member. I am sorry the Honourable the Home Member is not here at the moment. Otherwise I should have asked him to consider, in consultation of course with the Honourable the Law Member, as to under what particular section of the Penal Code the Honourable the Finance Member could be brought to trial for this incitement.

[Mr. K. C. Neogy.]

Now, Sir, that at least shows the gravity of the situation. I have quoted the evidence of two of the most eminent authorities who could speak with inner knowledge, and certainly with a proper sense of responsibility, namely the Auditor General of India and the Finance Member of the Government of India. If we had a minister in charge of the railways responsible to this Legislature, as the Minister for Transport—this happens to be the case in every other country where this system of separation exists—I mean those countries where the systems of State ownership and State-management exist,—perhaps I would not have complained. But so long as the Honourable Member is not responsible to this House, I would, acting on the principle of setting a thief to catch a thief, rather have one irresponsible Department of the Government of India, namely, the Finance Department, controlling another irresponsible Department of the Government of India, namely, the Railway Department. Till we have responsible government established in this country, that would be a fairly satisfactory arrangement of things so far as I can judge.

Now, Sir, simultaneously with the establishment of this convention, there has been a very large delegation of authority, first from the Secretary of State in favour of the Government of India in regard to the management of railways. The Government of India, which is another name for the Railway Board, have in their turn made a very large delegation of financial and administrative powers in favour of not merely all the Agents of the State-managed railways, but also in favour of the directorates of the Company-managed, State-owned lines. The result has been that the control of the Railway Board has got diluted. They themselves admit that their control has changed in character. They do not admit that the control has been altered to any very material extent so far as practical results are concerned, but they admit, at the same time, that the control has changed considerably in character. The result of that is every year visible in the Public Accounts Committee. I do not want to weary the House by going again into the evidence given before the Public Accounts Committee, but I may tell the House this much, that so far as the experience of the Public Accounts Committee goes, this delegation of powers has produced results which are not at all satisfactory. Instances are on record in which the money of the taxpayers has been wasted in capital expenditure and in revenue expenditure. The abuse perhaps is nowhere greater than in the case of the Company lines. The control exercised by the Railway Board over the Company lines has never been of the same character as the control exercised by them over the State-managed lines, and very naturally too, but this system of delegation of authority, which has benefited even the Company Agents, has been accompanied by very distressing results. We had a very elaborate examination of the question before the Public Accounts Committee last time when we had the benefit of the evidence of Sir Austin Hadow, among others on this point, and the feeling that was left on our mind was that things were not going on well in the Indian Railways. In these circumstances, quite apart from the provision which is contained in the convention of separation, that this convention shall be open to re-examination at the end of three years, it is needed that an early re-examination of the whole position should be made at the instance of this House. Sir, I know that there are some Honourable Members who are prepared to swear by the present arrangements, there are some, again, who would be satisfied if the arrangements could be modified to a certain extent here and there. I have never concealed my attitude in this matter. I have ever been an opponent of the whole scheme of separation, but I am free to admit that certain arrangements which have been brought into being simultaneously with separation, and which have no essential connection with separation, have improved things to a certain extent, so far as this House is concerned. I am free to admit that the institution of the Standing Finance Committee, the Central Advisory Council and the distribution of Demands into different heads in the Budgets, all these things are undoubted improvements, but they have no essential connection with the scheme of separation. Again, Sir, the institution of a reserve fund is not also of the essence of separation. What has been lost by separation is the rigid financial control of the Finance Department, and I should like to see that restored exactly in the same manner as it used to be exercised before the separation was brought about. Sir, I move.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas (Indian Merchants' Chamber: Indian Commerce): May I just inquire whether the reply of the Government Member can only follow all other speakers? Personally, I should prefer to hear what the Government have to say before we proceed with this motion further.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member for Government will not be given a second opportunity to speak.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: As a matter of fact, there are three Honourable Members on the Treasury Benches intimate with railway matters and they can arrange among themselves to speak after we have spoken. It would be very convenient to know at this stage what the Government have to say about the case put forward by my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy. I therefore suggest that an Honourable Member from the Government Benches may usefully be asked to speak now.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I quite appreciate what has fallen from my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas. It is sometimes convenient that the Government Member should reserve his speech until a reasonable number of other speakers have spoken, but in other cases it may happen that Honourable Members of the House wish to hear, at an early stage of the debate, what the Government have got to say. Now, it seems to me that my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, in what he said in support of his motion, was under a certain misapprehension. He said that the essence of the separation convention was not one thing and it was not another, but the essence was the position and powers of the Financial Commissioner—I think I correctly understood him

Mr. K. C. Neogy: I described him as the pivot of the whole scheme.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: But the remarkable thing is that the Financial Commissioner had the same position and powers before the convention that he has at present, and therefore it is very difficult to say that what had already been given to him before the convention for the separation of the Railway finance, is in principle the essence of the convention. It would be quite possible to abolish the convention tomorrow, but it would not in the least follow that there would be any change in the position and powers of the Financial Commissioner as regards the sanctioning of expenditure and so on.

[Sir George Rainy.]

My Honourable friend justified his motion, mainly on the ground that a tree shall be known by her fruits, and that the fruits of the railway tree during the last five years were not palatable to him. I think that the Members of the Railway Board would be perfectly content to be judged on the result of their administration since 1924, provided due regard was had to the conditions prevailing in the Railway Board before that year. No one would contend that we have reached the stage of perfection and that there is nothing more to be done to improve the administration of the railways. We are quite conscious that there are a number of things which might with advantage be done. But I do say that, since the whole system of railway administration was reorganised, beginning from the date when Sir Clement Hindley was appointed Chief Commissioner of Railways, the administration of the railways during the following years will challenge comparison easily with any previous period in the railway administration in India. There was a different spirit breathed into the administration as compared to a time that I can remember not so very long ago. Now, when the House is asked to judge the results of the present system on the basis of mistakes, errors of judgment and so on, to which attention has been called by the Public Accounts Committee, I would ask the House to remember that necessarily the Public Accounts Committee had only one half of the picture before it. As I pointed out to a meeting of the Railway Agents in last October, the Audit Department is not interested in the good deeds of an officer; it is only interested in his crimes. That is the purpose for which it exists and it must discharge those duties, and rightly and naturally it brings to notice what it finds amiss. The best that any one could expect from an Audit Department would be an entirely blank report. As against any mistakes or any errors of judgment that may have been brought to the notice of the Public Accounts Committee last August or September, I should be perfectly content to set on the other hand the remarkable improvements which have been made in the railway administration of India during the last five or six years. In the passage which my Honourable friend read from what Sir Frederick Gauntlett said to the Public Accounts Committee, I regretted a little that he did not read a little more. He read the passage up to Mr. Roy's inquiry when Sir Frederick Gauntlett said that he could not see there had been the same improvement in railways as in other departments. Then Mr. Roy asked:

"What do you attribute this to? What has been your reading?"

To which Sir Frederick Gauntlett replied:

"Inefficient administration,—I won't say at the headquarters. I was talking to Mr. Wrench this morning, and I told him that if there was an officer of Mr. Wrench's calibre in any branch of the railway administration, he would obtain the same results that he has obtained in the workshops during the last five years, and that is nearly a crore of rupees a year."

Yes, but how is it that Mr. Wrench was given the opportunity of producing these valuable results? Precisely because the people who have been administering the Indian railways for the last six or seven years have always been on the look-out to find talent which would give them results of that kind, and as they were on the look-out for it, they found it. I should like to quote a further passage from what Sir Frederick Gauntlett said and which my Honourable friend has not read. Colonel Gidney asked:

"Then you admit there has been improvement?"

Sir Frederick Gauntlett replied:

"I want to make the point quite clear. I think the amount of work that is being done by the Railway Board shows a wonderful record, and all that I say is that the job is so enormous that there is still a great deal to be done. It is not merely the general administration at the top that is to be looked into, but it is the strengthening of the individual control right down the lines that requires a close investigation."

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Hear, hear.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Now undoubtedly all that has fallen from the Auditor General in a matter of this kind ought to be treated with the greatest possible respect, and if his views are, as a result of his experience, that a tightening of individual control is required, I think very likely his views are correct. But it is evident from what he said that, while his object was to emphasize the need for a distinct improvement in the railways, it was not in any way his object to condemn the system as a whole. I should like also, when I am on this point, to draw the attention of the House to certain figures. For the four years before the separation of Railway Finance, the net gain to the State from the railways averaged 106 lakhs a year. During the five years following the separation, they have averaged 972 lakhs a year; that is to say, the average gain per year to the State since the separation has been more than nine times the average gain in the four years prior to the separation.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: What does the Honourable Member argue from that?

Mr. B. Das: Mismanagement in the past!

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I think I am entitled to say that, if under a changed system of administration a very important improvement results, prima facie some credit is due to the people who have been in charge of the administration and of the system. Surely that is a reasonable inference.

Mr. K. C. Roy (Bengal: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, will the Honourable Member kindly tell me what have been the real net earnings since 1924?

Mr. President: Order, order. Will the Honourable Member be ready to answer this question tomorrow?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I shall be quite ready to answer it tomorrow.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Saturday, the 22nd February, 1930.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Saturday, 22nd February, 1930.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber of the Council House at Eleven of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

MEMBER SWORN:

Mr. Bhupathiraju Sitaramaraju, M.L.A. (Ganjam cum Vizagapatam; Non-Muhammadan Rural).

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

BOMB PLACED IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM BY MR. FRANK BIGGS.

388. Mr. B. Das: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the Reuter message of the 4th February, 1930, that Frank Biggs the discoverer of the bomb at the British Museum (near the Indian Section) has been detained in Scotland Yard and would be charged with an offence under the Explosive Substances Act?

(b) Are Government aware that the previous message of Reuters connecting the finding of the bomb with the Indian residents of London has caused great indignation amongst the Indian public?

(c) In view of the fact that Frank Biggs has confessed that it was he himself who manufactured the bomb and placed at the British Museum, will Government be pleased to state:

(i) If they have asked the Secretary of State for India independently to inquire into the case and ascertain the motives that prompted Frank Biggs to telephone as Ali Khan, an Indian resident?

(ii) If the Secretary of State issued any statement to the British Press refuting this allegation against Indian residents in London?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state if they received any independent message from the Secretary of State or did they send any message on the subject to the Secretary of State after reading Reuter's message on the Frank Biggs bomb incident?

(e) Will Government be pleased to inquire and inform the House if Frank Biggs was ever employed in India or if he is connected with any Anglo-Indian Organisation in Great Britain?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: (a) Yes.

(b) I doubt if the general trend of Press comments in India would support the view suggested.

(c) (i) No.

(ii) I have no information, but a Press telegram reports that the Home Secretary has stated in the House of Commons that the incident was a mischievous hoax and that no person of Indian origin was involved.

(d) and (e). No.

ARREST OF MESSRS. MOHAMED NASIR AND B. C. BOSE IN ITALY.

389. Mr. B. Das: In reference to the reply of Mr. Henderson in the House of Commons (Free Press Beam Service, 4th February, 1930) that both Messrs. Mohamed Nasir and Bimal Chandra Bose, who were arrested by the Italian police and suffered imprisonment for nine days, and after undergoing considerable hardship were finally deported from Italy, were innocent and that the police had acted under a misapprehension and that it was a case of mistaken identity, will Government be pleased to state if the India Office was in any way responsible for this prosecution or misapprehensive information?

Mr. E. B. Howell: No, Sir.

PROTECTION OF THE INDIAN SHOE INDUSTRY.

390. Mr. Muhammad Rafique: (a) Will Government be pleased to state:

- (i) The total number of packages of shoes despatched to other parts of India from Agra and the neighbouring districts in 1927-28, 1928-29, and from 1st April, 1929 to 31st December, 1929;
- (ii) The total weight of shoe packages despatched to other parts of India from Agra and its neighbouring districts during the year 1927-28, 1928-29, and from 1st April, 1929 to 31st December, 1929;
- (iii) The total number of shoes despatched from Agra and its neighbouring districts to other parts of India during the year 1927-28, 1928-29, and from 1st April, 1929 to 31st December, 1929; and
- (iv) The total number of rubber-shoes and rubber-soled shoes imported into British India from foreign countries in 1927-28, 1928-29, and from the 1st April, 1929 to 31st December, 1929?

(b) Are Government aware that imports of rubber-soled shoes have greatly affected the Indian shoe trade?

(c) Is it a fact that by the appearance of very cheap rubber-soled shoes from Japan the daily output of Indian shoes has been reduced to half?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state the annual average value of imported rubber-soled shoes from Japan?

(e) Are Government going to take any steps to protect the Indian shoe industry?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: (a) (i) to (iii). I regret that as yet I have not been able to obtain the information asked for. I will see whether it can be obtained from the railways and inform the Honourable Member of the result of my inquiries.

(iv) Government have no information beyond what is contained in the Sea-borne Trade Accounts, copies of which are in the Library. Only figures for canvas shoes with rubber soles are shown separately in the returns, and the imports of these from Japan are negligible. There has been a large increase in 1928-29 in the imports from Japan of boots and shoes of other sorts. I will inquire from the Customs Department whether this increase is in rubber soled shoes, and communicate the result to the Honourable Member.

(b), (c) and (d). Government have no information.

(e) A representation has recently been received from the Indian Footwear Protection Association, Agra, on the subject and is under consideration.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON MENTAL HYGIENE.

391. The Rev. J. C. Chatterjee: (a) Are Government aware that the first International Congress on Mental Hygiene is to be held at Washington U. S. A., from May 5th to 10th, 1930, and that many civilised Governments are co-operating with the Committee of Organisation?

(b) Have Government received an invitation or request from the Committee of the forthcoming International Congress on Mental Hygiene for co-operation or support?

(c) Do Government propose to participate or send representatives to the Congress?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: (a) Yes.

(b) The Government of India have so far received only a preliminary announcement.

(c) The preliminary announcement was only received on 18th February and the Government of India have not had time to consider the matter.

APPOINTMENT OF INDIANS TO THE INDIAN AIR FORCE.

392. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: Will Government be pleased to state how many Indians have up to date received the pilot's air certificate; and have any of them been appointed in the Air Force service in India? If so, at what pay?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: Up to the 15th of this month, 21 Indians had been granted private pilots' licences (Class A) under the Indian Aircraft Rules, 1920. Up to date no Indian pilots trained by Indian flying clubs have qualified for the issue of pilots' licences for passenger or goods aircraft (Class B).

The Honourable Member presumably refers to their appointment as civil pilots on the Indian State air service. If so, the attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the reply given in the Legislative Assembly on the 20th January, 1930, to part (g) of the starred question No. 76, asked by Dr. B. S. Moonje.

INDIANS TRAINED ON THE "DUFFERIN".

393. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: How many Indians have passed their final examination in the training ship "Dufferin" up to date; and has any of them been given an appointment? If so, at what pay?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: The first batch of cadets joined the "Dufferin" in December, 1927, and will complete their full course of training in May, 1930, when the first final passing out examination of the ship will be held.

INDIANS TRAINED IN THE INDIAN SCHOOL OF MINES, DHANBAD.

394. *Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: How many students have passed out of the Indian School of Mines, Dhanbad, up to date; and how many of them have been given appointments under Government?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: So far, eight students have left the school after qualifying for the certificate of the school. None of them have received appointments under Government, but three other students secured appointments as Class II officers in the Survey of India before completing their Certificate Course.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: May I know why none of the students who have qualified themselves have got appointments under the Government of India?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: The three students to whom I have referred as having secured appointments as Class II officers in the Survey of India before completing their Certificate Course, got their appointments by being successful at a competitive examination. The eight students who have qualified for the certificate of the school did not either sit for that examination or did not succeed in the competitive test. There were no other appointments in the Government service for these students, though I understand that some of them are now trying for a suitable appointment in the Colliery Department of State Railways.

THE VIZAGAPATAM HARBOUR.

395. *Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: (a) Will Government be pleased to state what is the total estimated cost of construction of the Vizagapatam Harbour?

(b) When did the work begin; how far has the work progressed; and what is the nature or detail of the work already completed, and its approximate cost up to date?

(c) When is the work of construction likely to be completed? By what agency is the work of construction carried on; and who have been the supervising officers on behalf of the Government?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) The latest forecast is 286½ lakhs.

(b) October 1925. Up till the end of September, 1929, the latest date for which complete information is available, the work may be said to be two-thirds completed. Of the larger items in the scheme, the position up till the end of September, 1929, was as follows:

	Completed. Per cent.
Land	77
Quay wall	100
Dry dock	90
Purchase of plant	75
Dredging	29
Reclamation	24
Staff quarters	37
Manganese ore berth	22
Oil Depot	14
Transit and store sheds	7

The approximate expenditure up to the 30th September, 1929, was Rs. 161.93 lakhs.

(c) It is hoped to be able to berth ships in 1932. The work of construction is being carried out partly departmentally and partly by contract. The supervising officers who have been in charge of the work from its commencement are:

Administrative Officers (Agent, B. N. Railway)—

Mr. L. Greenham,

Mr. C. Carroll,

Mr. V. E. D. Jarrad.

Engineers-in-Chief—

Lt.-Col. H. Cartwright Reid.

Mr. O. B. Rattenbury.

Mr. W. C. Ash.

Deputy Engineer-in-Chief—

Mr. O. B. Rattenbury.

Mr. B. Das: In view of the trade depression all over the country, is it not time for the Government to revise their policy of expenditure on this scheme, and may I know whether their original schemes will ever fructify as anticipated?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I am afraid I do not follow the Honourable Member? Is what he suggests to postpone the work on the Vizagapatam Harbour and the Railway in order to utilise the money elsewhere?

Mr. B. Das: What I am asking the Honourable Member is whether the Vizagapatam port will prove a successful port in view of the trade depression all over the country, and whether the huge expenditure that the Government have incurred and are going to incur on that port is likely to produce the desired result, as was anticipated in 1923-24?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I think, Sir, that since the port will not be opened till 1932, and since we may reasonably hope that the trade depression will not go on indefinitely, the existence of a trade depression is not in itself a reason why we should stop short in the middle of works in progress, particularly when we remember that, if we did take that course of action, all the money already spent would be wasted.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: May I know to whom the contract for the construction of the Harbour has been given?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: What my friend, the Financial Commissioner, said was that the work was being done partly departmentally and partly by contract. There is no question of any one firm being given the contract for the whole work. Particular pieces of work have been made over to particular contractors.

CREATION OF AN INDIAN AIR FORCE.

396. *Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the reply of the Secretary of State for India in the House of Commons (vide the Hindustan Times, dated the 26th January, 1930) that "the creation of the Indian Air Force formed a part of the accepted policy of Indianisation, and was already under consideration"?

(b) Has correspondence on this subject been proceeding between the Government of India, and the India Office, and will this House be given an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the proposal before a final decision is arrived at?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Yes.

(b) The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. The House was informed of the decision to create an Indian air unit nearly two years ago, on March 10th, 1928. I am glad to say that six Indians succeeded in qualifying for entry into Cranwell at the examination held last November, and will proceed there to be trained to become officers. Steps will be taken simultaneously to recruit and train in India the rank and file required for the new unit, so that it may come into effective being when the officers are trained. Meanwhile, the necessary legislation will be submitted to the House, not later, I hope than the Simla Session this year.

REFUSAL TO DR. SUDHINDRA BOSE OF PERMISSION TO STAY IN INDIA.

397. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: (a) With reference to my starred question No. 780 of the 24th September, 1929, regarding the ban placed upon Dr. Sudhindra Bose, and the reply of the Government that, "It is not a fact that Dr. Bose applied for permission to remain in India for more than six months", are Government aware that, in asking for visa Dr. Bose requested the British Ambassador at Washington to let him stay in India for a year, but the Ambassador in his letter stated definitely that the India Office in London had refused to let Dr. Bose remain in India for more than six months?

(b) Do Government propose to take necessary steps to place on the table the letter of the British Ambassador to Dr. Bose referred to above; and the letter of the India Office on the basis of which permission to stay in India for more than six months was refused to Dr. Bose?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: (a) and (b). I think, Sir, there has been some misunderstanding about this case. It is true that the visa granted to Dr. Sudhindra Bose for his visit to India was restricted to six months. This was made plain by me in the answer, which I gave to the Honourable Member's question No. 164 on this subject on the 5th September, 1928. I did not intend to convey by my answer given on the 24th September, 1929, any contrary impression. I was referring to Dr. Bose's attitude after he had arrived in India on this restricted visa. It was understood from him, when he had an interview with the Secretary in the Home Department, that as he had made all arrangements for returning to America, he did not ask that his existing visa should be extended. But he desired, when he next visited India, that he might be granted an unrestricted visa. As the Honourable Member is aware, Dr. Bose has been informed that the question will receive careful consideration if and when he applies for facilities to come to India again.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: Sir, Dr. Bose has written to me a letter in which he says, "In asking for visa, I requested the British Ambassador at Washington to let me stay in India for a year. The Ambassador's letter to me stated definitely that the India Office in London had refused to let me remain in India for more than six months". Is the Honourable Member going to inquire into the matter, and place the British Ambassador's letter on the table? If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: The previous reply to which I referred, was to a question which I understood to refer to Dr. Bose's statement of his case in India, not to his previous application. I have already answered the Honourable Member's question in replying to a previous question on the 5th September, 1928, and I must refer the Honourable Member to that reply. As regards the future, I have nothing to add to what I have already stated, namely, that, if Dr. Bose does again apply for facilities to return to India, the case will receive careful consideration.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Will the Honourable Member kindly state to the House why, in the first instance, the India Office objected to Dr. Bose's stay in India for a longer period than six months?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: That, Sir, has already been replied to in my answer of the 5th September, 1928, as regards the grounds of the restriction imposed on Dr. Bose.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Will the Honourable Member kindly state, for our information and enlightenment, why it was considered that his stay in India should be permitted only for six months and that it would become dangerous beyond that period?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: I have nothing to add to what I have already stated on this matter.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: May I ask whether Dr. Bose was a British Indian subject before he went to America?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: Dr. Bose was a British Indian subject at the outbreak of the Great War, and after the war, became, I understand, a naturalized American subject.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Is it a fact that, in accordance with the decisions of the American Courts, Dr. Bose cannot be naturalised as an American subject?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: I must ask for notice of that question.

Mr. Sarabhai Nemchand Haji: May I ask, Sir, whether Dr. Bose renounced his Indian citizenship?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: I understand that that is the consequence of the action that he took, but I should not desire to give a specific answer to that question without fuller consideration.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: With reference to the Honourable Member's reply to my question of the 24th September, 1929, is it not a fact that Dr. Bose applied for permission to remain in India for more than six months? I have quoted Dr. Bose's own definite statement to show that he applied for permission to stay in India for more than six months, but that the India Office refused to grant him that permission. May I know whether it was at the instance of the Government of India that the India Office refused to grant him permission?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: The reply I gave to the Honourable Member on that occasion was, I agree, open to misconstruction, but I understood the Honourable Member's question at that time to refer to Dr. Bose's statement of his case when in India, and not to his original application, which was for a period exceeding six months.

(b) Yes, as a general rule.

AMOUNT OF FREE LUGGAGE ALLOWED TO RAILWAY PASSENGERS.

164. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: With reference to my suggestion made in the course of my Railway Budget speech on the 28th February, 1928, that the scale of free luggage allowance granted to railway passengers be revised and raised, will Government kindly state which Railway Administrations have revised the scale, and what is the revised scale of free luggage allowance for different classes of passengers?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: The Honourable Member is referred to the reply given to unstarred question No. 28 in the Legislative Assembly on the 20th January, 1930. I understand that all Railways which are members of the Indian Railway Conference Association have adopted the revised scale, except the Bengal Provincial, Darjeeling-Himalayan, Dibru-Sadiya, Jamnagar and Dwarka and Jorhat Provincial Railways.

(e) Is it a fact that the Cantonment Board, Ambala, has imposed octroi by abolishing the bonded warehouses again after re-starting them on receipt of the District Magistrate's orders?

(f) What action do Government propose to take in the matter?

Mr. G. M. Young: Parts (a) to (f). Government have no information. I am making inquiries and will communicate the result to the Honourable Member in due course.

PROSECUTIONS INSTITUTED BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE CANTONMENT BOARD, AMBALA.

166. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Is it a fact that the President of the Cantonment Board at Ambala sanctioned as many as 43 prosecutions under the Cantonments Act in January, 1930, under section 25 of the Cantonments Act?

(b) Will Government be pleased to state what urgency there was in those prosecutions to justify a resort to section 25?

(c) Did the Vice-President protest against the President's superseding the Board by his action in sanctioning the above prosecutions and dissent from the Board's Resolution to confirm the same?

(d) Have Government issued any instructions allowing the use of the emergency section 25, for routine Cantonment Board work of launching prosecutions for offences committed under the Cantonments Act?

(e) If not, do Government propose to take suitable action to prevent the President from making a similar use of section 25 in future?

Mr. G. M. Young: Government have no information, but I will make inquiries, and communicate the result to the Honourable Member.

(b) Have the elected members of the Kirkee Cantonment Board and the people of Kirkee submitted representations against the "change"? If so, what action has been taken on the same?

(c) Is it a fact that the Government's letter intimating the decision about the change was kept confidential from the elected members of the Kirkee Cantonment Board for some time? If so, why?

(d) Is any kind of correspondence addressed to the Cantonment Authority kept confidential from the elected members? If so, what is its nature? Have Government issued any instructions on the subject? If so, what?

(e) Who is the Assistant Secretary appointed at Kirkee in place of the Executive Officer? Was his appointment opposed by non-official members? If so, on what grounds?

(f) Do Government propose to cancel the change and revert to the old arrangement?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Yes, because Kirkee is very close to Poona and it was necessary to meet an urgent demand for a whole-time Executive Officer in another cantonment.

(b) Government have received no such representation.

(c) Government have no information.

(d) Government have no information. They have issued no instructions on the subject; nor do they correspond direct with cantonment authorities or any military authorities subordinate to the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief.

Desai, an elected member of the Cantonment Board, Deolali, dissented from the majority decision about item No. 4 of the Agenda in the meeting of the Cantonment Board, Deolali, held on the 26th November, 1929, and that a note was made in the proceedings about his dissent and its being incorporated in the proceedings?

(b) Did Dr. Desai send his note of dissent? If so, how was it dealt with? Did the Executive Officer return it on the ground of its being too long requiring the dissenting member to abridge it?

(c) Will Government refer to the law under which the President was empowered or justified to question merely the length of the note? What was the specific irrelevant matter which was desired to be expunged and why was it not pointed out to the member?

(d) Did the member send the abridged note later and was it incorporated in the proceedings? If not, why not?

(e) Has the dissenting member made any complaint about it to the Southern Command? If so, what are the definite allegations made in the complaint?

(f) Is it a fact that one of the allegations is that the proceedings as written at the time of the meeting, were subsequently altered?

(g) Have Government made any inquiries into the complaint and, if so, with what result? If not, do Government propose to make the inquiry?

Mr. G. M. Young: I am making inquiries and will communicate with the Honourable Member on receipt of a reply from the local authorities.

(e) Are Government aware that this act is considered by the Kohat people as one of racial discrimination?

(f) Did a deputation of the Kohat Landlords' Association wait upon the Officer Commanding, Kohat, in this matter?

(g) Is it a fact that the deputation was not received with proper courtesy and that the members thereof were not offered seats?

(h) Do Government propose to remove the restrictions to allay public feeling in the matter?

Mr. G. M. Young: I am making inquiries and will let the Honourable Member know the result in due course.

EXPULSIONS FROM CANTONMENTS.

171. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an article headed "Victims of old section 216" in the Cantonment Advocate of October, 1929?

(b) How many people are still under orders of expulsion from Cantonments under the section 216 of the old Cantonment Code repealed in 1924?

(d) Yes.

(e) No, his exclusion followed his conviction on a charge of attempting to seduce soldiers from their allegiance.

(f) Government have recently addressed the local military authorities on this case: and I will inform the Honourable Member in due course of the result of the reference.

RESUMPTION OF BAZAR SITES IN CAWNPORE.

172. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an article appearing under the heading "Alleged Resumption of Small Bazaar sites in Cawnpore" in the Cantonment Advocate of October, 1929?

(b) Have Government arrived at any decision with regard to the cases mentioned in the letter of the All-India Cantonments Association, published in that article?

(c) Will Government be pleased to lay the papers of each case on the table?

(d) Is it a fact that in all these cases, the landlords affected have regular "sale deeds" for the houses standing on the sites and that their sites have been resumed owing to the houses standing thereon being in a dilapidated condition, without their being given any opportunity to oppose such resumption departmentally, or in a court of law?

(e) What is the procedure adopted in case of a resumption of site?

(f) Have Government taken legal opinion as to the validity of such resumptions when the landlord in possession thereof has not been ejected through a court of law?

(g) Do these resumptions serve any military purpose? If not, do Government propose to cancel these resumptions?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Yes.

(b) to (d) and (g). The matter is under the consideration of Government and I will let the Honourable Member know the decision as soon as possible.

(e) The procedure is set forth in the pamphlet entitled, "Rules, Regulations and Orders in regard to the grant of sites of lands and the occupation of lands and houses in Cantonments in British India", a copy of which is in the Library.

(f) Yes.

DISCHARGE OF CANTONMENT FUND SERVANTS.

173. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the Resolution No. 2 of the All-India Cantonment Fund Employees Conference held in October, 1929, at Ambala Cantonments, regarding the discharge of Cantonment Fund servants?

(b) If so, what action have Government taken thereon? If no action has been taken so far, do Government propose to take any action?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Yes.

(b) The suggestions of the Association were considered and an amendment to the present rule was published for criticism on December 28th, 1929. The suggestions received in response to this notification are now under consideration.

APPEALS AGAINST DISMISSAL IN CANTONMENTS.

174. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Is it a fact that before the introduction of the present Cantonments Act in 1924, every Cantonment Fund employee drawing a salary of Rs. 30 per mensem or above had a right of two appeals against his dismissal, the final appeal lying with the Government of India?

(b) Has this right been curtailed in the rules framed by the Government under the New Cantonments Act?

(c) Is it a fact that, under the above rules, a Cantonment Fund employee dismissed by a Cantonment Authority has only one right of appeal and that to the Command concerned?

(d) Has the All-India Cantonment Fund Employees Conference requested the Government to provide the right of two appeals as before, the final appeal to rest with the Government of India?

(e) What action have Government taken on this request? If no action has been taken so far, do Government propose to take any action? If so, what?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) No, Sir. The right of appeal to the Governor General in Council was restricted to those Cantonment Fund employees whose salary was not less than Rs. 100 per mensem.

(b), (c) and (d). Yes.

(e) The right of Cantonment Fund servants to prefer two appeals was modified by the Cantonments (Amendment) Act, 1926, to bring it into conformity with the principle which applies generally to Government servants of the corresponding class. The Cantonments Association has been informed accordingly.

RECRUITMENT OF ASSISTANT SECRETARIES IN CANTONMENTS.

175. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) How many Assistant Secretaries have been appointed in the cantonments of India, since the introduction of the Cantonments Act of 1924?

(b) What are their names and educational qualifications? What training in cantonment administration did they receive before they were posted to their duties?

(c) What is the method of their recruitment?

(d) Has the All-India Cantonment Fund Employees Conference recently held at Ambala made a request that a certain percentage of those appointments be thrown open to the senior employees who have a fairly long experience of cantonment administration?

(e) Have Government arrived at a decision with regard to this request? If so, what?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) 21.

(b) Government have no information.

(c) The appointment of Assistant Secretaries is carried out by individual Cantonment Authorities.

(d) Yes.

(e) The suggestion would not be feasible, for the reason given in the answer to (c) above. There is nothing to prevent a Cantonment Authority from appointing a senior clerk, if it desires to do so; but obviously it cannot be compelled to appoint any particular person.

EXECUTIVE OFFICERS IN CANTONMENTS.

176. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Will Government be pleased to state what the total strength of the cadre of Executive Officers in India is? How many of them hold the King's commission and how many the Viceroy's commission?

(b) What is the difference in the emoluments of the above two classes of the cadre? How many Indians are there in each class and how many of them are Hindus, Sikhs, Muhammadans and others?

(d) Has the attention of Government been drawn to an article headed "European and Indian Executive Officers", published in the Cantonment Advocate of January, 1930?

(e) Do Government propose to revert the Indian Executive Officer of Lucknow to the regiment? If so, why?

(f) Do Government propose to consider the request made in the above article that the Indian Executive Officer of Lucknow may be kept on in the cadre?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) 41, of whom 30 hold the King's Commission and 11 the Viceroy's Commission.

(b) King's Commissioned officers of the Cantonments Department draw regimental rates of pay plus a graduated scale of departmental pay ranging from Rs. 125 to Rs. 300 per mensem. The pay of Viceroy's Commissioned Executive Officers is Rs. 400—20—500 per mensem. There is at present only one Indian officer holding the King's Commission in the Department, who is a Christian, and 11 Indian officers with Viceroy's Commissions, of whom two are Hindus, five Sikhs, three Muhammadans and one a Christian.

(c) Government have no information beyond that given in the Census Report of 1921.

(d) Yes.

(e) and (f). All first appointments to the Department are made on probation, subject to passing a departmental examination. The present Executive Officer, Lucknow, failed to pass this examination within the prescribed period, but he has been given one further chance. If he is successful at the next examination, the question of his reversion to his regiment will not arise.

ABSENCE OF MR. AUGIER FROM MEETINGS OF THE CANTONMENT BOARD, NEEMUCH.

177. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an article published under the heading "Augier Controversy at Neemuch" in the Cantonment Advocate of January, 1930?

(b) Is it a fact that Mr. Augier, an elected member of the Cantonment Board, Neemuch, went outside India for five months and was absent from five consecutive meetings of the Cantonment Board?

(c) Did the other elected members of the Cantonment Board, Neemuch, and the All-India Cantonments Association approach the Honourable the Agent to the Governor General in Central India to remove the name of Mr. Augier under section 34 (1) (b) of the Cantonments Act?

(d) How was this request met by the Honourable the Agent?

(e) Is it a fact that there is a sharp difference of opinion between the Honourable the Agent and the All-India Cantonments Association, about the interpretation of section 34 (1) (b)?

(f) Are Government under the circumstances prepared to secure an authorised interpretation of the section?

Mr. G. M. Young: I am making inquiries and will communicate the result to the Honourable Member in due course.

REPRESENTATION BY DR. DESAI, A MEMBER OF THE DEOLALI CANTONMENT BOARD.

178. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an article headed "Deolali Muddle" published in the Cantonment Advocate of January, 1930?

(b) Is it a fact that the proceedings were changed as stated in the article?

(c) Why was the statement of reasons in support of this dissent by Dr. Desai not incorporated in the proceedings?

(d) What action have Government taken on Dr. Desai's representation on the subject?

(e) Are Government aware that instances of such disregard of cantonment law by the President and the Executive Officer of various Cantonment Boards are multiplying?

(f) Are Government prepared to make an inquiry into the present case and take suitable action against the office responsible for the irregularity?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Government have seen the article.

(b) to (f). I am making inquiries and will let the Honourable Member know the result in due course.

SANCTION TO THE CONSTRUCTION OF GARAGES BY THE MOTOR AND CARRIAGE WORKS, AMBALA.

179. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Is it a fact that the Punjab Motor and Carriage Works, Ambala, applied in September, 1929, for the construction of a few garages on the land already held by them on lease, and that the Cantonment Board, Ambala, unanimously recommended the construction?

(b) Is it a fact that the Northern Command asked the Cantonment Board to enhance the rent of the leased land as a condition preparatory to their sanction of the proposed building?

(c) Are Government aware that the Cantonment Board, Ambala, unanimously held that since the rent was already being paid for the whole land, there was no justification for demanding additional rent for constructing additional buildings on the same land, answering the same purpose?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state what action has been taken upon this unanimous recommendation of the Board and if the sanction has been given? If not, on what grounds has the Board's repeated recommendation been rejected?

(e) Are Government aware that the firm is being put to heavy loss owing to the municipal sanction to the proposed building having been withheld so long?

(f) Is it a fact that in the letter No. 3427-A.D.-4, dated the 7th December 1929, from the Army Department to the All-India Cantonments Association, the Army Secretary has definitely stated that the Government of India do not propose to interfere with the discretion of the Cantonment Authority in matters of above kind?

(g) Will Government be pleased to state whether the above-mentioned principle is being followed in this case? If not, why not?

Mr. G. M. Young: Parts (a) to (e) and (g). I am making inquiries and will let the Honourable Member know the result.

Part (f). The Army Department letter quoted referred to the exercise of a discretion specifically conferred on the Cantonment Authority by Government to grant agricultural leases by private agreement instead of by auction. It appears to have no bearing on the present case.

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. WEATHERAL BY THE EXECUTIVE OFFICER, AMBALA CANTONMENT.

180. Pandit Thakur Das Bhargava: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an article published under the heading "Waste of Cantonment Fund, Ambala", in the Cantonment Advocate of December, 1929?

(b) Will Government be pleased to state what the technical qualifications of Mr. A. C. Weatheral are, who is mentioned in the article to have been employed both as a contractor and temporary servant of the Board to look to the service line and to test private installations?

(c) Is it a fact that the new arrangement has cost the Cantonment Fund about Rs. 500 per mensem as against Rs. 40 per mensem paid for the same work when done through the contractor Messrs. Goela and Co., Ambala?

(d) Do the rules in the Cantonment Account Code permit a person to work both as a contractor and a temporary servant of the Cantonment Board at the same time?

(e) Is the Executive Officer empowered to pay travelling allowance to a contractor of the Board for journeys undertaken outside the jurisdiction of the Board, without the permission of the Board?

(f) Is it a fact that the Executive Officer, Ambala, allowed Mr. Weatheral to undertake journeys and paid him travelling allowances without any reference to the Board?

[Sir George Rainy.]

why, up till now, further meetings have not been summoned. The Government have felt more and more strongly, with the progress of the months, the extreme difficulty of tackling this subject seriously unless it can be linked up with the much larger and more important constitutional questions which are likely to come into the forefront in the very near future. It is true that minor amendments might be made in the convention irrespective of these larger questions, but since it is open to members of the Committee to raise the whole question of the system under which Railway finance is separated and the railways are administered, it seems to me very difficult to work out any sort of satisfactory scheme, unless we have, at any rate in outline, before us the general framework of the new constitution into which the administration of the railways will have to be fitted.

Then there is another point, a practical one. Naturally a very important question in reviewing the convention is the amount of the contribution which the railways of India should make to the general finances. It is obvious that the whole financial position of the Government of India may be profoundly affected by any constitutional changes that are made, and therefore, until we have some idea of what the new financial position will be, it seems to me impossible to reach any decision about the contribution with any hope that it would remain in force for more than perhaps a couple of years. Taxes on transport—and the railway contribution is of that nature—are of course open to obvious objections. At the same time there are objections to all forms of taxation; and it seems to me and to the Government of India that that is a question which can only be fully and fairly considered when we are in a position to consider the financial position of the Government of India as a whole. It is my intention to call a meeting of the Committee before the end of the Session and to place these views before them, explaining the difficulties which Government feel and the doubts which they have, whether any practical purpose would be served by persevering with the review of the convention at this stage. I have thought it right to explain our point of view to the House today, so that they may understand how the whole position is.

Before sitting down, Mr. President, I should like to add one word—it would really be more relevant on the motion for another out which stands in the name of Mr. Neogy, but which I am led to understand may possibly not be moved—I mean about the financial control of the Government of India over the Railway Board. The Honourable the Mover made some allusion to that subject in his speech. Now, what I have to say there really arises out of what I have already said about the Report of the Public Accounts Committee. Clearly, the Railway Board, like everybody else, must be subject to financial control. I do not exclude the possibility of revising in certain respects the present arrangements if we could devise a better way. But I should be very unwilling to disturb in essence the present system until the right time had come to consider all possible alternatives. In the meantime, however, it is clear that we ought to do our best to make full use of the present system as it exists so as to make quite sure that there is no absence of salutary control, and it is for that reason as I tried to explain, when introducing the Budget, that the Government of India have decided on a half-yearly review of the Railway financial position in its broadest aspects by the Finance Member and the Railway Member. That will give opportunities by which important matters in which the finances of the railways are closely concerned may be fully and fairly considered by both the Members of Government who are specially charged with responsibility in these matters.

I think, Mr. President, that concludes what I wished to say today, but I will finally add merely this, that I am fully convinced that separation of some kind is essential if we are to get commercial management on the railways and successful administration.

I have twice said that I was about to conclude, but unfortunately I have only now remembered one other point to which I would like to allude, and it is this. If the review of the separation convention is to be postponed, then I think we ought to utilise the interval in getting ready any material which may now be lacking, so that no further time will be lost when the inquiry is resumed. It has been suggested more than once that a good deal of useful advice and assistance might be obtained if a railway expert from another country with experience of the management of a really large railway system were brought out to India and asked to help us with his advice. The particular matter in connection with which the employment of an expert was suggested was, I think, the allotments to the Depreciation Fund and the whole system on which the Depreciation Fund is constituted. I think that is a useful suggestion, and if it commended itself to the Committee, I think Government would find themselves in a position to agree. It is right that I should mention that, because I do not wish to convey the impression that we are merely putting aside the review without any idea that it should be taken up again until a very distant date.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas (Indian Merchants' Chamber: Indian Commerce): Sir, I am sure the House will thank my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, for raising this question at this stage and for putting forward the view, held very strongly on this side of the House, in that lucid manner, which is generally associated with everything which Mr. Neogy handles. But, Sir, I have not been able to understand exactly what my friend has in his mind, except that he wishes to raise this question for discussion here. I do not see how he can press this motion before this House, because all that he indicates in his amendment is, "Re-examination of the convention of the separation of Railway Finance from General Finance". Now, as my friend knows, that question is under examination, and a Committee of this House is sitting in connection with it. I wonder if my friend, Mr. Neogy, feels that that Committee has sat too long without submitting a Report. If that is so, I feel that the Honourable Member has explained the difficulty which appears to him and to Government regarding the reason why the Committee could not complete its work till now or why it may not be able to finish its labours say within the next six months or a year. I, Sir, have the honour of being a Member of that Committee, and I also happen to be, what the Honourable the Railway Member said, a Member of the Sub-Committee appointed by that Committee. The various items which have been selected as heads for consideration for the revision of the convention embrace so many different aspects, that we feel that, until substantial knowledge is available to us regarding the next stage of political reform, the Government are perhaps right in saying that they cannot come to any definite conclusion as to the lines on which the convention should be based. As a matter of fact, we, non-officials on that Committee, were waiting to see what the two Honourable Members representing the Government on that Committee had to suggest by way of Government proposal.

but they themselves found it rather difficult to put forward any suggestions, and a Sub-Committee was appointed to go into further details. I do not know whether the House will look at this aspect of the question in the same manner as the Government of India have done, and as indeed some of us on that Committee have done. but I suggest that there is a good deal in what has been put forward by the Honourable the Commerce Member, and this part of the question should not be pressed unduly today, especially in view of the proximity of the date when further light will be available to us regarding political reforms.

But apart from that, if my Honourable friend Mr. Neogy's idea is to suggest to that Committee that they should inquire into the question whether the separation of the Railway finance from the General finances of the country has proved beneficial to the country,—if his intention is to raise a debate on that question—then I suggest that there can be only one reply to it, and that is, that so far as the scheme has been worked, it has been beneficial. I am prepared to concede, and indeed I expect even the Honourable the Commerce Member will concede, that certain weaknesses and handicaps have been experienced, but they are not such as cannot be remedied. As a matter of fact, I feel strongly, Sir, after the practical experience that we in this House have had of the last five years' working of this convention that, if this convention had not been agreed to in 1924, the finances of the Government of India in the Railway Department, at any rate, may have been considerably different from what they are today. During all the last five years, the Budget presented by the Honourable Member in charge this week has been the only Budget which showed a deficit, but the actuals of last year have shown a considerable deficit of about 86 lakhs of rupees, and I would suggest that, if we were working on the same old lines which existed before 1924, we might have repeated to us the same wail that had been repeated before the Acworth Committee, as to how the railways were furnished for funds and the country's general revenues were augmented by railway surpluses in good years. I am sure my friend Mr. Neogy has studied Chapters III and IV of the Acworth Committee's Report, which contain detailed information as to how this greatest asset of the Indian taxpayer, namely, the Railways, was allowed to suffer owing to the exigencies of the finances of the country as a whole. If one had the time, one would very much like to refresh the memory of this House, even briefly, regarding some of the exasperating things which were revealed before the Acworth Committee, as a result of which they came to the conclusion that the only solution to remedy the evil, if State management was allowed to continue, was the separation of the Railway finances from the General finances of the country.

I feel, Sir, despite all the various points that have been put before this House with the authority of the Auditor General, no case has been made out as to why the present arrangement should be discontinued. But I agree with my friend that many aspects have been brought to notice which require to be remedied, and I am sure that my friend will have everybody in this House with him if he tries to devise some method or methods to remedy the evils he complains of and I am sure that even the Honourable the Railway Member will co-operate with him wholeheartedly in that direction. But to come to the conclusion that, because a few drawbacks and defects have been experienced, the whole separation scheme should be given up, is a conclusion which, I am not sure, my Honourable friend would like this House to come to. But he has frankly told us that he himself has been opposed to the separation scheme from its very start, and if he wishes to press his view before the House now, I hope the House will not agree with him.

Sir, the Auditor General has, I think, done a great service to the country, and even to the Government, by the very frank manner in which he has brought to light the various acts of omission and commission in the Railway Department regarding their expenditure policy. The Honourable the Railway Member said that an auditor is no auditor at all if he does not pass some criticism and make suggestions for the improvement of the system. I think great credit is due to Sir Frederic Gauntlett, the retired Auditor General, for the able manner in which he put his views before the Public Accounts Committee. I also think that this House ought to be grateful to those active Members on the Public Accounts Committee who follow up these questions from year to year and bring them to our notice. But all this does not necessarily support the idea that the two Budgets should be amalgamated. All that I say is that ways and means should be devised as to how the various defects can be remedied, and I suggest that there are other ways for tightening the control, than scrapping the fundamental convention on which the whole separation is based and which has so far worked to the benefit of the country as a whole.

Now, Sir, one of the things which appeared to be at the back of Mr. Neogy's mind was, to use his own words. "The inference is that the Railway Board's administration of railways has been inefficient". I believe these words were used by the Auditor General. Perhaps from the audit point of view the administration may have been inefficient, but I think the Auditor General himself said somewhere that the job is enormous,—these are also words which I think were quoted by the Honourable the Railway Member. Well, if the whole task is so enormous and if the asset of the taxpayer in the shape of the railways has no parallel in any other country, this House ought to be prepared to view some of these proofs of inefficient administration with a little leniency. I do not say that we should tolerate them. I do not say that we should pass over them lightly. I suggest that we should take the strictest view of them, as far as remedying them is concerned, but I do think one need not be unduly harsh and run down the administration simply because these mistakes or blunders, as one may like to call them, have been discovered in the administration of the Railway Board under this convention during the first period, namely, of the first five years. After all five or six years is not a long period in which one can expect the most able administration to achieve the ideal, and feel that we ought to judge it with some consideration.

One of the motives of my Honourable friend may be to inquire if the Finance Department's hold on the Railway Board is the same now as it was before the convention, or whether that control—and it is a healthy control—has considerably relaxed. Now, if the convention was set aside, what would be the result, would the Finance Department have a larger control over this Department? And if it is so, one would like very much to know why the Finance Department, under the convention, cannot exercise the same control that it did exercise. I am all this time thinking of the healthy control, not the meticulous control which acted as handicaps to the Railway Administration in its beneficent activities, as pointed out by the Acworth Committee. Can this healthy control be adversely affected by the separation? There is only one point raised by Mr. Neogy, which struck me as being a point worth considering in this connection. Before the convention, the Finance Department had what they called a watch dog over the Railway Department's powers of expenditure and powers of capital outlay too. Since the Convention, that officer of the Finance Department has been attached to the Railway Board as a Financial Commissioner, and it is possible that, as Financial Commissioner and a part of the Railway Board, he may have identified himself a bit too much with the Railway Board, that is more than with the Finance Department. I do not know if this actually is the case, but if that is one of the complaints of my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, I think this House would very much like to hear what the Honourable the Finance Member has got to say about it. Surely that is a defect which can easily be removed, and we need not hesitate to express our opinion frankly on this question, because my Honourable friend Mr. Parsons is the Financial Commissioner under reference. In this House, we are discussing the policy and not personalities. Personally I dare say Mr. Parsons has done very well by the Railway Board and by even the Finance Department. But after all Mr. Parsons cannot always be there, and if we are to consider whether the Finance Department's agent controlling the Railway Board would well be outside the Railway Board as an independent controlling authority on behalf of the Finance Department of the Government of India, I suggest that that point raised by Mr. Neogy is a very good point and may be usefully considered by the Government of India in the "light of the experience of the Finance Department till now".

Sir, I would like to hear from Mr. Neogy (unfortunately perhaps he has no right of reply), or from any other Member who holds opinions similar to Mr. Neogy, as to whether he does not think that, since the convention, this House has had on the whole a better say in matters of capital expenditure and even of revenue expenditure? I have been trying, since yesterday afternoon, to recall to my mind any items of capital expenditure which were not approved either by this House or by a committee of this House, and which were carried through by the Government in spite of that. The only instance I can recall, and it is a very bad instance indeed, is the instance of the Kalyan Power House. It is an instance which, if I may say so, will stand to the lasting discredit of the Railway Board. That instance proved the surreptitious manner in which the project of the Kalyan Power House was carried through, in spite of its being turned down by the Railway Finance Committee. It has cost the country 50 per cent. over the estimate, and one need not, at this stage and on this subject, go into the other indirect losses to which the country has been put. Barring that one solitary instance, I think this House has had, through this committee, a fairly good say, any way a better say, in matters concerning expenditure on Railways than it had till 1924.

I wish, Sir, to take this opportunity of mentioning to the Honourable Member an important aspect of the separation of the two budgets. I have here a copy of the various terms of the separation convention stipulated at the time of the separation of the two Budgets. Paragraph 9 of that convention reads as follows—I am reading from page 3870 of the Assembly Debates, Part VI, Vol. IV of 1924. Condition No. 9 reads as follows:

"In view of the fact that the Assembly adheres to the Resolution passed in February, 1923, in favour of State management of Indian Railways, these arrangements shall hold good only so long as the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway and existing State-managed railways remain under State management, But if in spite of the Assembly's Resolution above referred to Government should enter on any negotiations for the transfer of any of the above railways to company management, such negotiations shall not be concluded until facilities have been given for a discussion of the whole matter in the Assembly. If any contract for the transfer of any of the above railways to company management is concluded against the advice of the Assembly, the Assembly will be at liberty to terminate the arrangements in this Resolution."

Now, Sir, when this convention was made in the year 1924, it was taken for granted that it would come up for revision in say five years' time. What has happened is that, at the end of five years, a Committee was appointed by the Government of India, but that Committee, as the House now knows, is not likely to submit its report for some time—may be for a year or even longer.

An Honourable Member: It was only for three years.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: The minimum period fixed was three years, but it was allowed to continue longer. In December 1931 notice has to be given to the Bengal and North Western Railway, if that Railway is to be acquired by Government. There is not much time between now and December 1931, and in view of the other existing subjects that are likely to come up, there may be nothing feasible till then. I would therefore like the Honourable the Railway Member to give an assurance that he will read this Condition No. 9 as including the acquisition for State management of railways, contracts for which fall due hereafter. I do not think it would be fair on the part of Government to point out that Condition No. 9 only related to the Great Indian Peninsula and the East Indian Railways, and therefore they were free to come to any decision they liked regarding the Bengal and North Western Railway. That would be the most unfair advantage they could take of the confidence of the Assembly, namely, that they would abide by this convention till revised. And, unless the Honourable Member is able to reply on this debate that, we can confidently rely on them to include in this condition also the acquisition of the Bengal and North Western Railway being brought up before the House before the Government of India come to any conclusion, we shall have just reason to break the convention now. I feel that, in view of the difficulty which he indicated in replying to the general debate on the Budget about the acquisition of the Bengal and North Western Railway for State management, I am quite justified in asking for a categorical assurance that the inclusion of the Bengal and North Western Railway would be deemed to be understood under condition No. 9.

I feel, Sir, that I ought to say a word regarding what has fallen from the Honourable the Railway Member about some expert advice being made available to the Committee sitting for revision of the convention. It is necessary to ascertain whether we are setting aside a sufficient amount and not too much or too little for depreciation of our railway assets. There is a strong feeling that we may be setting aside much too much and we may thereby be depriving the general taxpayer of India of concessions that may be made available to him if a larger contribution could be had from the Railway Budget. On the other hand, the Railway Department may feel—and perhaps the Honourable the Finance Member also shares this feeling—that a sufficiently large amount is not being taken to depreciation out of the gross receipts of the railways for depreciation of this huge machine. I agree that it would be very difficult for any Member of this House, however qualified he might be regarding railway matters, to pronounce an opinion off-hand. I have personal experience of the extremely useful service which can be rendered by a suitably selected expert from England being brought out, who could review the whole thing, go into figures and give us expert advice. I have nothing but admiration for the useful service which the experts brought out with Lord Inchcape for the Retrenchment Committee of 1922, rendered to the taxpayer and to the Railway Administration of India. If Government desires that such assistance should be had, I personally think that we ought to support such a proposal. It may cost us Rs. 20,000 or so, but it will be an extremely good investment to make. There is only one condition which I would make in this connection and that, to my mind, is an essential condition. The person so brought out shall not be a person connected with the railways of India, either directly or indirectly. He must not be a retired official of the Indian Railway Administration, nor must he be a person connected with any of the existing railway companies which have their head offices in London. I think it is necessary to make this a condition precedent for the selection of the personnel. The person brought out should be a person connected with one of the big railway systems in England or Europe or the United States of America, a person who has an open mind. It is only when a person of this nature is brought out, as was done in the case of Lord Inchcape, that I think it would be money well spent. I recommend my friends on this side of the House to approve of this suggestion, which has been made on the condition which I have just mentioned.

I have only one word more to say in conclusion. I feel that there is a very large scope still left for justified and useful economy in the administration of the railways of India. The enormous size of the railway machine and the large distances through which the railway system runs, are, I think, justifiable reasons why we, on this side of the House, should have patience in judging the results of the Railway Board's administration. There is one good change which the Government of India seem to have made. I believe that they have begun to accept and act up to the recommendation of the Acworth Committee's Report, namely, that in selecting persons for the railway administration, Government need not be guided by the same rules as they are for the civil administration of the Government of India. The Acworth Committee unanimously recommended that persons should be selected not so much for reasons of seniority, as is being done in the other civil services, but more for reasons of their being particularly capable and fitted for the job. And I would like the House to know one of the best instances of this which I can think of. It is the appointment of Mr. Russell as the Chief Commissioner for the Railway Board. I think in point of seniority Mr. Russell is not very senior, but in point of ability he made his mark for great capacity of a rare order on the Great Indian Peninsula Railway. I had occasion to work with him on some Boards in Bombay and if what he achieved in Bombay is an indication of what he is capable of achieving here, we expect to find the Railway Board in a different state of efficiency under his management after two or three years.

12 NOON. The same can be said about another officer mentioned by the Auditor General and quoted by Mr. Neogy and the Railway Member. If persons are selected for the Railway Board administration free from the red-tape of seniority alone, but on merit and if this House will keep a close eye on the criticising of details and not lose patience regarding the useful convention which they have stood by till now, I am sure that we will not regret it. I, therefore, think that the debate raised by my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, can be regarded as most useful, and I hope that the Honourable the Railway Member will be able to give an assurance regarding the Bengal and North Western Railway being included in condition No. 9 of the convention, as far as the acquisition of that line is concerned. I am sure that the points raised in the debate were noted by members of the committee which is at present sitting in order to consider the separation of the two Budgets. Sir, I would not like to conclude without repeating my faith in the convention being maintained and upheld by this House in principle, and the details being watched by us, by such energetic Members of this House as my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): It had not been my original intention to intervene at all in this debate, but I think I may take it that I have had a direct call from my Honourable friend, who has just spoken, to give this House some impression of the position from the point of view of the Finance Department. Perhaps the mere fact of the Finance Member intervening in a debate at this stage has in itself a certain significance. It shows at least that a very important question of principle is being raised, and that my Honourable colleague and myself do consider these matters together. My Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, speaking yesterday, referred to the fact that he thought that at times I looked rather uncomfortable in my seat. I assure him that that was not the case. If my presence during these debates is somewhat interrupted, it is not because of any feeling of discomfort or lack of desire to listen to what is going on, but simply owing to the unfortunate coincidence that the Railway Budget is always taken in the few days preceding the General Budget, and I regard those few days as the worst days in my own year. It is very difficult to get through under about 18 hours work a day. Therefore, I cannot always be present in the House during the Railway Budgets as much as I should like to be.

Now, on this question of the relations between the Finance Department and my Honourable colleague, the Commerce Member and the Railway Board, I have certain general observations to make. In the first place, I would impress upon you, as indeed has already been impressed upon the House by my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, the great complication of the issues, and the difficulty of reconciling some measure of financial control with that latitude in executive work which is necessary if the enormous railway machine is to work without undue friction. It would certainly never be our object in the Finance Department to put sand in the wheels of that machine. We want to make it work as smoothly as possible and with the minimum of friction. At the same time, it is necessary, in the general interests of the taxpayers of the country, that some control over policy should be exercised from the side of the Finance Department. The relations of the Finance Department in regard to the Railways are rather like the relations between a banker and one of his large clients. We are called upon to finance the railways, and if they make mistakes, it is we who have to put our hands into our pockets to see them through. In one respect the relation is different from that prevailing in private business, to which I have referred, for if the railways of the country get into difficulties, we have got to help them out. We cannot say to them, as a banker can say to one of his clients, "you must close your Schuster has agreed, and that the present arrangements provide for a divided control and therefore an inefficient one. The correct method of separation, as Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas will remember, has been indicated by the Acworth Committee, and their proposals would be entirely the same under any constitution; but so long as the Railway Member is content with the present state of affairs and likes to be a subordinate of the Finance Member, nothing will be done under this or any other constitution.

[Mr. E. F. Sykes.]

Mr. K. C. Roy (Bengal: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, it is difficult at this stage to pick up the debate because two prominent Members of the Treasury Benches have already had their say. I have been a member of the Public Accounts Committee and I think it is my duty to pay a tribute to Sir George Schuster for his absolute impartiality and fairness in the treatment of men and matters. But I regret to find today that he thought that only one side—the audit side—of the picture was presented before the Public Accounts Committee. That is not true. We had before us Sir Austen Hadow, who gave us a vivid description of the railway working. We were indebted to him for placing such wonderful materials before that Committee. There is no intention on the part of this House or on the part of any member of the Public Accounts Committee to cast any reflections on the Railway Board. The Railway Board has undergone a change in its personnel, as Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas has already said. Mr. Russell has come from Bombay with a great record. Then there is Mr. Brayshaw, there is Mr. Hannay, and there is Mr. Hayman, and we have already got on the Railway Board Mr. Parsons. The Railway Board is one of the most efficient units of the Government of India as we all know. But they have their good points and their bad points. The Public Accounts Committee was only concerned with the bad points, and I shall come to that later on.

Now, Sir, I come to Sir George Rainy. In his lucid speech, he has followed the tactics of the Opposition and has given notice of a delaying motion. What does he say? He says, let us wait, let us get the new constitution and then we shall deal with the separation convention. What is the net effect of it? Sir George Rainy will have retired; Sir George Schuster will be on the eve of retirement, and all the Members of the Railway Board will have gone to their homes by that time. That will be the net result. I am sorry to say that the House can never be satisfied with the decision which Sir George Rainy has given us, and I hope Mr. Neogy will press his claim for a re-examination of the entire problem.

Now, Sir, when the Public Accounts Committee approached this matter, they had three ideals in view. The first was, is the convention constitutionally right? Secondly, is the convention administratively right, and the third point is, is the financial convention as a whole right for the taxpayer? These three points were gone into, and the net result was a considerable dissatisfaction with the arrangements that exist, considerably reinforced by the observations of the Auditor-General, who has served India for so many years. It was my privilege to raise the first point, is the Railway Member entitled to present the Railway Budget? We raised this point and the unanimous recommendation was this:

"We desire to recommend that when the Governor General exercises this power of appointing any Member as Finance Member for the purpose of any particular rule of the Indian Legislative Rules, the order of such appointment shall be laid on the table of the House."

This, Sir, as you know, was done. The second recommendation was:

"We also suggest that the Railway Board should obtain the opinion of the Legislative Department as to the interpretation of the definition referred to above."

We are still unaware of the opinion which the Legislative Department gave. I am not a lawyer and I know very little of rules and regulations; but what I know is that the framers of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms never contemplated that there should be more than one Budget. Now the rules in our Manual of Business and Procedure at page 52 distinctly lay down,—and this is the section which was originally framed in the Government of India Act:

"A statement of the estimated annual expenditure and revenue of the Governor General in Council (hereinafter referred to as 'the Budget') shall be presented, each year, to the Assembly on such day or days as the Governor General may appoint."

This was the intention of the framers of the Act. They never thought for one moment, neither Mr. Montagu nor Lord Chelmsford, nor the Joint Select Committee, that there should be two separate Budgets.

Mr. President: Where was the Honourable Member for the last five years?

Mr. K. C. Roy: Then, Sir, rule 48, which was promulgated by the Governor General in Council, says this:

"Nothing hereinbefore contained shall be deemed to prevent the presentation of the Budget to each Chamber in two or more parts and when such presentation takes place, each part shall be dealt with in accordance with the foregoing rules as if it were the Budget."

This was the change made and what was the net immediate effect? The preparation of the Budget passed from the hands of the Finance Member to the Railway Member. This was the immediate effect. I hope Mr. Parsons will speak and he will give his views on the subject. Then what do we find? As my friend, Mr. Neogy, pointed out, the Honourable the Finance Member has lost his interest in the Railway Budget. There is undoubtedly a dual control over the Railway Budget. There is diarchy in the Railway Administration. The matter should be reviewed by the Committee which was set up by this House some time ago.

Now, Sir, as regards the administrative aspect, what is the position today? Sir George Schuster said that the Finance Department has every control. I certainly deny that. The Financial Secretary has no control over the Railway Budget or the finances of the Railway Department. Sir George Schuster undoubtedly has the power as Member of the Governor General's Council. Then let us consider the position of Mr. Parsons. Mr. Parsons is well known to us. He is known for his conspicuous ability. But his position has no parallel in the Government of India. He is the Financial Secretary for Railways; he is a Member of the Railway Board. He is there both in his executive as well as in his administrative capacity. Is there any other officer in the Government of India occupying a similar position? Take the Military Financial Adviser. He is only a member of the Military Advisory Council. There is nobody who occupies that responsible position which Mr. Parsons does, wielding enormous power and enormous patronage. By saying this I do not want to cast any reflection on Mr. Parsons. But the system is neither sound nor good.

[Mr. K. C. Roy.]

Lastly, mention has been made of the fact that we have done fairly well with the railways. I wish to give some figures as I understand them. About the time when the convention came into force our surplus was about 13.16 lakhs and our total capital investment on the railways was about 6 crores. But today our capital investment is in the neighbourhood of 8 crores and the surplus is only 7.07 lakhs. That means the surplus has gone down by 50 per cent. I admit that there has been reduction in rates and fares. I admit also that there has been trade depression. I admit all that, but, all the same, I am not convinced that the railway financial results have been good; and there is a general impression in the country that the Agents have been given enormous powers and that they are wasting money. It necessarily follows that a review of the convention is urgently called for. There has been an enormous increase in the cost of general administration expenditure. Since the convention started, it has gone up by two crores. The people are not satisfied with it. Sir George Rainy could not say that an auditor's report is not all in all. But when he has put the railways on a commercial footing, it is of vital importance to the people of this country, who are really the proprietors of the railways in India that the auditor's report should be satisfactory. The House will remember that it was not many years ago that Sir Charles Innes described himself as the Chairman of a company and this House as a meeting of the shareholders. I hope, Sir, that Sir George Rainy will follow his predecessor's example and will always look to the taxpayers' interest first and judge the auditor's report on its merits in future. I hope he will not hesitate to review the convention which has been the subject of discussion in this House. Sir, I support Mr. Neogy.

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad (United Provinces Southern Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): It will be presumptuous on my part to speak with the authority to which my friends, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas and Mr. Neogy are entitled on account of their intimate relation with the subject since 1921. This question, as has been pointed out, was seriously considered by the Acworth Committee, and they said that witness after witness told them that the then financial arrangement needed drastic revision. In their recommendation No. 3 they say, "We recommend that the Finance Department should cease to control the internal finance of the Railways". Their idea was that the Railways would not be allowed to develop and operate as commercial undertakings if their finances were subordinated to vicissitudes of the general finances of the country. Now, this question was referred to a Committee and that Committee added certain conditions that the contribution should be one per cent. of the capital charge of commercial lines, plus one-fifth of the surplus, with certain provisos. The conditions imposed by the Committee were accepted by the Government and they were brought forward in the shape of a Convention on the 17th September, 1924, before the Assembly. The Assembly added two more conditions which I will describe later on. But these two conditions were not put down as the indispensable part of the convention. Now, the working of the last five years has clearly shown that this convention has worked very satisfactorily. During the last five years, the Railway Department has contributed 30 crores of rupees to the general revenues of India. They have also got at present, in reserve and hard cash, a sum of 30 crores. (An Honourable Member: "No, no.") Sir, according to Standing Order 27, may I draw your attention to the fact that the Honourable gentleman should stand up when he wishes to speak? They have got 30 crores of rupees as Reserve and Depreciation Fund, and in addition to this during the same five years, they have built 30,000 miles of new lines. They added this mileage to the mileage existing before this convention came into existence. These three figures are very encouraging. But at the same time, we should realise how far they have fulfilled the conditions which this Assembly imposed in 1924. The two conditions which the Assembly adopted on the initiation of Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas and on the initiation of the Leader of the Opposition were the Indianisation of the Railway services and the purchase of stores in India. These two conditions were accepted by the Government, but we find that they have not been fulfilled. (Hear, hear.)

In addition to these two conditions, a new situation has arisen, which the Assembly did not foresee in the year 1924, and that is the extravagance of the Railway Department. (Hear, hear.) Now, it has already been pointed out by Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas regarding the power house at Kalyan, that the estimate was 90 lakhs of rupees but the real expenditure was 150 lakhs. (An Honourable Member: "Only 150 lakhs?") Perhaps to my Honourable friend this is a very trifling figure, and he doesn't mind it. Now the question is probably whether, the Members of the Railway Board will bear me out—had the estimate of Rs. 150 lakhs been laid before them at the outset, they would have decided not to build the power house. But this is not a solitary example of extravagance.

Mr. M. S. Aney (Berar Representative): The members of the Standing Finance Committee never even sanctioned the estimate at all.

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: This is not the only example of extravagance. The second example of extravagance is the Kangra Valley Railway. The original estimate here was Rs. 1½ crores, but the actual expenditure was Rs. 3½ crores. I would like the engineers who first framed this estimate to come before this Assembly and to justify the enormous increase between the estimate and the actual expenditure.

Now, the third example of extravagance I would mention is the railway station at Lucknow which has cost Rs. 88 lakhs. Now, if this question had been seriously discussed by the Assembly, I would certainly have requested the Railway Board to drop this project, and that the taxpayers' money, instead of being thrown away in costly buildings like the railway station at Lucknow, should be utilised in securing comforts for the third class passengers. I would have very much have liked, and the public would have looked upon it with satisfaction, that this amount should have been spent, if it was decided to spend it on buildings, in constructing third class waiting rooms in all the stations in Oudh. The Barons of Oudh might be required to give special donations for the particular railway station in their locality.

The fourth example of extravagance which I would like to mention is the Cawnpore railway station, which was estimated to cost about Rs. 90 lakhs, but now they have revised the Budget and the estimate has already been increased to one crore, and by the time it is finished I do not know at what figure it will end. Now, have the gentlemen who are responsible for this considered whether it would not have been more paying from the

the result of that separation. He forgot what my friend, Mr. Jamnadas Mehta, once said—I am so sorry he is not present with us today and that he will not be present on the floor of this House for another six months. Mr. Jamnadas Mehta was a member of the Standing Finance Committee for Railways and he said—my friend Mr. Aney will contradict me if I am wrong—that we have no control over the expenditure; railway projects are brought to us and no sufficient reasons are given; and even the Standing Finance Committee for Railways is very often overruled. My Honourable friend, Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad has just quoted an instance of extravagant railway expenditure—the electrification project at the Kalyan Power House. It was not a technical project; it was a political project undertaken in order to ruin the Tata Electric Company of Bombay; the power house was built to ensure a supply of electricity to the railways as the Tata Company—an Indian-managed Company—could not be trusted to do so during a war or rebellion. I hope my friend, Mr. Parsons, when he replies today, will tell us something about the Kalyan Power House, whether it is an economic and efficient scheme; and I hope he will tell us whether thereby he has reduced the capital expenditure of the great Indian Peninsula Railway and also the working expenses on that Railway. I challenge him to say that on the floor of the House.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas then alluded to the magnificent results achieved by the separation. All alone, Sir, Mr. Neogy has been opposing the separation. At one time I was with him, but when I found the whole House coming to the other view, under the sweet influence of my Honourable friends, Mr. Parsons and Sir Charles Innes, I succumbed to that influence. (Laughter.) I thought the scheme might be allowed to be tried for three years; but now, Sir, another three years have gone and I find there is a breach of contract; even after these six years they have not come forward of their own will to ask us to examine that convention. When I found that breach of contract and after what I came to know in the Public Accounts Committees about the mismanagement on the railways, the scandalous waste of money and also the policy of non-Indianisation which was being pursued by the Railway Board, I felt convinced that we must bring back the Railway finance to the old conditions. After all, Sir, what is the real state of this separation that Sir George Schuster just now told us of? It is merely separation of accounts. If that be so, why not go back to the old conditions? My friend, Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad and others have told us of the wonderful achievements that have been made since the separation was brought about, but they forget the main thing; they forget it is all due to the spirit of the Reforms. It must be remembered, Sir, this was after 1921 whereafter the Railway Budget is amenable to the vote of the Members of this House, and the Government have to take the permission of this House to carry out all expenditure. Whatever has been done—and that is very little—I attribute to the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms. I do not see that any good result has come out of the separation, because the separation is nothing but a little better control of the Finance Department, through the Financial Commissioner, and through the many Chief Auditors and Chief Accountants. If there was laxity of control during the time of Sir George Schuster's predecessor, if Sir Basil Blackett had too much confidence in Mr. Parsons and did not examine the Railway finance himself very often, we are feeling the pinch of it today.

The Honourable the Railway Member had a dig at the Audit. He referred to a speech of his which he gave to the Railway Agents' Conference in September last. I did notice that and I wanted to raise the matter on the floor of the House by a sort of interpellation or by Resolution. But, Sir, unfortunately, as you know, events in the country are marching so rapidly—the Viceroy's statement in October last, the Lahore Congress, the Viceroy's withdrawal from his statement, certain assurance thereafter—all these have so absorbed us that I could find no time to challenge my friend over that fling at Audit. I agree, Sir, that audit is very important. But audit is not the only thing that matters. It is efficiency, efficiency of engineers, efficiency of railway management, efficiency in administration, proper Indian atmosphere . . . (Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: "Hear, hear.") Yes; I am an engineer too, and I could tell my friend, Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla, how much mismanagement is happening on the railways on account of these European engineers, and how our money is being squandered . . .

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla (Bombay Central Division: Muhammadan Rural): Simply because they are European?

Mr. B. Das: Yes, certainly so; and you ought to know that being yourself an industrialist.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: No; I did not know that they are not efficient merely because of their colour.

Mr. B. Das: I shall come to that later on. Now, Sir, what was the policy of the Acworth Committee? What was the policy of the European Chambers of Commerce when the Acworth Committee was sitting? What was the policy of the capital expenditure of the Railway Board before the separation convention and after? The Acworth Committee on page 5, para. 11, of their Report, quote extracts (paragraphs 2 and 3) from a letter from the Bengal Chamber of Commerce to the Secretary to the Government of India, Finance Department. In paragraph 2—I shall quote one line—they say, "This severe curtailment of capital expenditure on the Indian railway system has been received with deep regret by the Chamber. At the same time, the existing financial situation of the Government of India is not overlooked, etc., etc. Further on, the letter quotes from the address of the President of the Chamber, Sir Alexander Murray, whose services to the British Empire everybody knows, but whose services to India I am not aware of, unless he helped to bring on the 18½ ratio to the Statute-book in order to impoverish the masses: He says, "Money must be found and spent on the railways, no matter whether we are to have direct State management or management by boards sitting in London or in India."

Sir, these European Chambers of Commerce represent the applied engineering industry of Great Britain; they want orders for railway appliances such as wagons, underframes, rails for their iron manufactures and locomotive controls, signal boxes, etc., for their engineering firms. They do not mind if Sir Malcolm Hailey's policy in finance had ruined India and India had no money at the time as a result; they wanted capital expenditure so that fresh orders could go to England and the engineering industry in England could flourish.

[Mr. B. Das.]

Now, Sir, the Railway Board was first organised in the year 1905 and the separation took place in 1925. What have the Government done, I ask,—what has Mr. Parsons done—to organise the applied engineering industry in India so that railway appliances can be completely manufactured, and purchased in India? What is the use of your spending 100 crores and sending away 80 or 90 crores every year outside India? It may be that the Tatas are getting a few orders under sufferance as it were. If the Agent of the Bengal Nagpur Railway is so pleased, the orders may not be placed with Tatas at all; he may buy anything that he likes from England because there are combinations and pools well known to this House. Sir, as long as the railway are not nationalised, there is no use of quoting instances of Japan regarding nationalisation of railways. Railways must be controlled and managed by Indians. Now, who controls the railways in India? Of course, I do not question the spirit of honesty of the Honourable the Railway Member, but then he is a part of that machinery, a part of that Government which we want to end. His Government's policy is to continue and perpetuate the old policy to see as to how far the British industries can flourish at the cost of India. British industries must flourish, they must get orders from India, and that is why our friends on the Treasury Benches are not fighting extravagance.

Now, regarding Capital expenditure, I will just quote from a very handy book which Sir Frederick Gauntlett, the former Auditor General, published before leaving India, "An Epitome of the Reports from the Central Committees of Public Accounts, 1923-27 and of the Government orders thereon". I will quote a few lines showing how expenditure was incurred without budget provision:

"They naturally made provision for proceeding with works that they had started or were starting during the course of the year under any contingency that might arise, so that each railway asked for the maximum amount that it could spend, and the result was that, taken all together, the estimates proved to be too high, and there was every year a considerable lapse" (paragraph 8, p. 27 of the Epitome).

Another instance of gross extravagance prevalent in the Railways was the system of "advance indents" whereby orders are placed without Assembly sanction. On page 19 of the Epitome, Honourable Members will find the comments of the Public Accounts Committee and the order of the Governor General in Council. I quote the latter:

"The matter of 'advance indents' for Railway stores is receiving careful consideration. The Government are in full sympathy with the object aimed at by the Committee."

Even in last year's Public Accounts Committee we found that orders for locomotives were placed in London without the knowledge of the Finance Department, or without the sanction of the Standing Finance Committee for Railways. The Honourable Sir George Schuster, as the Chairman, felt surprised at these commitments.

Of course, I do not blame my Honourable friend, Mr. Parsons, for everything, because Mr. Sim was in charge for a certain period.

Then, Sir, I will refer to another matter. The total capital expenditure in 1923-24 proved to be only 23 crores, against a grant of 41½ crores. They spent only 23 crores and 18½ crores were the surplus, and in that year the working expenses were so over-estimated that there was a surplus of two crores in the working expenditure. So the Government order said:

"The Governor General in Council regrets the wide divergence between the actual expenditure of the year and the estimates."

Further on it says:

"As pointed out by the Committee, the most serious divergence was under Railways, where there was a saving of 2 crores under Revenue expenditure and 18 crores under Capital expenditure."

Well, whatever order the Government of India passed, I think the Railway Board might show their fingers to the Government of India, because the Railway Board are not amenable to the control of the Government of India. They are committed to a policy of heavy capital expenditure—that is what the European Chambers of Commerce, the Associated Chambers of Commerce and all these Chambers say. That has been the policy of the Railway Board, and that has been going on till we have come to the deficit which the Honourable the Railway Member read out to us this year. Sir, I do not mean to say that the Financial Commissioner is appropriating too much power to himself, but yet cases have happened when we had to discuss the power of the Financial Commissioner in the Public Accounts Committee. We had to question him about his interference in the matter of new services. We had also to make a recommendation to the Governor General in Council regarding "New Services" as interpreted by the Railway Board; the Governor General in Council had to consult the Secretary of State for India over that matter, and orders have been passed that no expenditure on a new service can be undertaken without a token cut before the Assembly and without the permission of this House. Sir, it usually happened that the Honourable Mr. Parsons, with his two crores surplus money, could easily find finance for the survey of the Kangra Valley Railway or a similar project to the extent of a few thousand rupees. Well, if that sum of Rs. 1,000 is granted, afterwards when Mr. Parsons comes before the Standing Finance Committee,—my friends Messrs. Aney and Jamnadas Mehta might have been absent on that occasion,—but my friends Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla and Haji Chaudhury Ismail Khan would be there who usually think, "Oh, Mr. Parsons is a nice fellow" and Sir, they sanction the expenditure, thinking that it is only an expenditure of Rs. 1,000, but afterwards it would be seen that the expenditure has come to over 3½ crores.

Again, Sir, I have to mention the name of Sir Malcolm Hailey, now His Excellency Sir Malcolm Hailey, because he insisted that the Kangra Valley Railway should be built for political reasons, of course and yet, for an expenditure of over 3 crores the Punjab Government would only guarantee towards interests Rs. 4 lakhs per annum for 13 years. That means for the mistakes and follies of the Provincial Governments and Provincial Governors the taxpayer of the whole country should suffer and the Railway Budget becomes a deficit Budget.

(At this stage the Honourable Member paused to consult some notes.)

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member (turning to the Honourable the Railway Member) wish to say anything in reply?

Mr. B. Das: Sir, I have not yet finished. I will take about twenty minutes more. (Some Honourable Members: "No, no.") Sir, I am in a minority here. This is a matter of great national importance. There are some sleeping Members of the Railway Committee on the separation convention, who have done no work for one year. Let them stand up and reply as to why they have not done any work. You can say "No, no" to me. But why have you not done your work for one year? We are sent there to look after the taxpayer's interests.

Regarding the capital expenditure on the railways, I would again allude to it for a moment. We did give a hundred crores of rupees from the taxpayer's money to meet the deficit income to pay the guaranteed interest in the old days. If the Railway Member will admit that debt to the taxpayer and pay us at least $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest, the taxpayer is entitled to get $3\frac{1}{2}$ crores of rupees every year. Let me forego the interest up to date that has not been paid to the Indian revenues so far. Well, that 100 crores of rupees has been allowed to lapse, and the capital estimate of the railways was fixed at the time of separation at 400 crores and odd. Sir, the Honourable the Finance Member, a few minutes ago, observed that we are going through hard times. I do not mean this year, it may be next year that the Honourable the Finance Member may meet with a heavy deficit and may not have any money to fall back on. I consider he will have to fall back on the Railway Reserve, otherwise he will do the worst thing for India; he would double the salt tax, which will mean the poor man will go without his salt. Why should it be so? The railways have thrived in the past through the taxpayer's money. So if there is any money accumulated in the Reserve the Finance Member must avail himself of that money instead of taxing the poor man again.

To tax salt is the most unreasonable and cruel thing to do.

1 P.M. My friend, Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad, did not know that since the separation convention, the Agents have got very wide powers. Formerly they were allowed to spend only a few lakhs. Today any Agent can spend up to 50 lakhs or a crore. They are a happy family. The Railway Members and the Engineer members control the whole thing. I as an engineer know what it is. Those of us who can recollect our old friend, Sir Clement Hindley, know how rude an engineer could be. Sir, he used to say on the floor of this House during discussion of Railway Budgets that he wanted only advice from us. He did not think that the Assembly had any control over the railways! He never thought that we were masters and that we were here to control the Railway Administration. He said, "If you want to give me advice, I will listen to you, otherwise I do not care". That was his temperament. That is the temper of the European railway engineer. It does not matter whether it is Sir Clement Hindley or Mr. Russell, who comes from the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, which was until recently a Company-managed railway. Is your spirit Indian or British? That is what we have to see. If Mr. Neogy takes his motion to a division, I know that only he, myself and Mr. K. C. Roy will go into the same lobby with him. (Mr. K. C. Neogy: "I will get many supporters.") We offer these criticisms with a view to help the Honourable the Finance Member and the Railway Member and also those sleepy Members of the convention on the non-official side who have not done their duty so far.

One more point. The Lee Commission Report never contemplated that the Lee concessions should be given to railway officers. They have been given not only to Europeans but also to Anglo-Indians. I ask Sir George Rainy who was once President of the Tariff Board. He is supposed to dabble in figures too much. Since 1924, there has been a clamour for more and more pay. Is it not time that the salaries of the Europeans were reduced? The prices have fallen very much since 1922. Will Government revise the scale of salary and special allowances of European officers? Let my friend the Railway Member draw a little less in allowance and let this discriminating Lee concession be done away with. At least, the index of prices justify such reduction.

Now, Sir, I only want to give a few suggestions to Government, if they really wish to work the convention which was to be established in a real spirit of service to India and to which some of us only gave a half hearted support at the time. Sir, (1) I would suggest that a technical Member of the Railway Board should be in future a Member of this House to answer questions on the technical side, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Parsons, should only deal with financial questions. (2) I suggest that the Railway Board's minutes of discussions should be published and put before the Standing Finance Committee for the Railways and in the Library. (3) I further suggest that the Railway Standing Finance Committee should be elected only by the non-official Members of this House, and that the Railway Member and the Financial Commissioner should be Members by their own right. (4) The Agent's power of large expenditure should be curtailed and it should be limited to a maximum of 5 to 10 lakhs. (5) My next suggestion is that, when the Assembly is sitting or whenever it be possible, a non-official member of the Standing Railway Finance Committee should attend every meeting of the Railway Board, if he is in the locality or such members can attend by rotation. For this purpose, they should be treated, by their own right, as honorary Members of the Railway Board. I further suggest that there should be immediately established a Rates Tribunal. There is no use in quoting paragraphs from the Acworth Committee and saying that the Acworth Committee said so and so when that most important recommendation has not been given effect to. We are tired of the Advisory Committees and so I condemn the Rates Advisory Committee.

Sir, I am sorry for speaking long and taking the time of the House. The subject is of vital importance to India; hence my excuse. With these words I support my friend Mr. Neogy's motion.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan, (Patna and Chota Nagpur cum Orissa: Muhammadan): I do not understand why we should now go into this question of the separation of the Railway Budget from the General Budget. The time for going into the larger question in connection with the constitutional reforms is very close when all these matters will be taken up and discussed. Sufficient time has not been allowed for the working of the convention. In these circumstances I may be permitted to ask my friend, Mr. Neogy, to withdraw his motion and, if he does not see his way to do it, not to press it. The matter has been talked out and I am sure the Honourable the Railway Member will give full attention to all these things.

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons (Financial Commissioner, Railways): Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Das, appears to me to have reviewed almost the whole field of railway activity and to have found it almost entirely bad. I wish he had been able to show a little more of that spirit of leniency for which Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas made a plea, or even a little more of that judicial attitude, which, I noticed at the time of the general discussion, was displayed by the Honourable Member sitting near him, Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh. If I may interject, I should like to thank Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh for the generous spirit in which he made his remarks about the Bengal and North Western Railway, and I can assure him that the point of criticism will never be lost on the Railway Board when their critic is eminently fair. Sir, I do not wish to follow Mr. Das in his review at this stage of the debate, nor can I deal with the suggestions which he has made for the betterment in his view of the present state of affairs, except for the one suggestion that another Member of the Railway Board should be nominated as a Member of this House in order to deal with technical questions. Personally, I would welcome that suggestion very much, for it would relieve me of some work, though I am not sure that the whole of this Government Bench can be tenanted by people from the Department to which I happen to belong! I do, however, wish to mention this suggestion because, to my mind, it is relevant to the criticism that possibly, when the Financial Commissioner has been for some time in the Railway Department, he becomes more a railway officer than a financial officer. I think that view is taken partly on account of the fact that in a great many of his public appearances the Financial Commissioner of Railways has to speak on, support and defend activities of, the Railway Department on other sides of their administration than the financial, and therefore naturally there is a tendency to think that his financial duties are taking a second place. That, if I may say so, from my own personal experience, is not so.

My chief object in rising at this stage is to reply to one or two points that have been raised by Members since the Honourable the Finance Member spoke. I should like first to deal with the speech of Mr. K. C. Roy, who appears still to be in some doubt as to what the position of the Financial Commissioner of Railways is. Admittedly, and for reasons that were given in the Acworth Committee's Report, there is no position exactly corresponding to it in the other Departments of the Government of India. But the position in itself is perfectly clear. The Acworth Committee recommended, in paragraph 58 of their Report, two radical reforms; they stated that the essence of their reforms was contained in two things, one, the complete separation of the Railway Budget from the General Budget of the country, and, two, the emancipation of the railway management from the control of the Finance Department. Except on one point, I do not propose to deal with the separation of the Railway Budget. As the House is aware, what has been accomplished is not a separation of the Railway Budget, but a partial separation of the railway accounts and Budget. The only point to which I wish to refer is one mentioned by Mr. Roy. We have again consulted the Legislative Department, who have informed us, as indeed we knew before, that our procedure with regard to the presentation of the Railway Budget is perfectly regular; that procedure is to obtain the authority of the Governor General for the presentation of the Budget by the Railway Member in this House and by the Chief Commissioner in another place. And the legal position is that, though there is separate presentation, the Budget is still one undivided whole, though it is presented in two parts. As the House is aware, the main railway figures still appear in the General Budget.

I turn now to the position of the Financial Commissioner. There, again, the recommendation of the Acworth Committee has not been wholly accepted. The position of the Financial Commissioner has always been, first of all, vis-a-vis the Finance Department, that the Railway Department is bound to consult the Finance Department on any matter affecting the general ways and means position of the Government of India, and in practice, of course, the duty of seeing that they are so consulted falls on the Financial Commissioner. The position of the Financial Commissioner vis-a-vis the Finance Member has always been that the Finance Member can direct him to submit any case or any class of cases to him, in fact, can deal with him in this respect exactly as he deals with the Finance Secretary on the general side of the Government of India. And here I will interpose a remark on something said by Mr. Neogy. The Financial Commissioner does not exercise powers in excess of those of the Government of India. The powers of the Government of India are greater in Railway matter than in other matters, but the Financial Commissioner does not exercise powers which are in excess of those conferred upon the Government of India. If he did so, he would be very soon called to account by the Secretary of State.

Mr. K. C. Roy: Might I ask if the Financial Commissioner is not allowed the same access to the Viceroy as is the case with the Secretaries of the Government of India?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: No, it has never been claimed that the position of the Financial Commissioner is exactly the same as that of the Finance Secretary. In answer to a question given by the Honourable the Railway Member a few days ago, the position was only described as more closely corresponding to that of the Finance Secretary.

Mr. K. C. Roy: In a case of difference between the Financial Commissioner of Railways and the Finance Member, who goes to the Viceroy for orders?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: That entirely depends upon the Department to which the case belongs. If it happened to belong to the Railway Department, the case would be taken by the Secretary in the Railway Department who is the Chief Commissioner. Mr. Roy also charged the Railways on the ground that the financial results of the separation have not been good. Here, if I may say so, I wish he had followed the example of my Honourable friend, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru. Mr. Roy took the figures of the best year the Railways ever had since to separation, namely, the year when there was a surplus of about 13 crores

Mr. K. C. Roy: I took the figures from Mr. Jukes' note.

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: And compared them with the figures of the revised estimates for this year which, as the House is aware, has been a thoroughly disappointing one. That is not a fair method of comparison, because railway receipts are bound in all countries of the world, and particularly in this country, to go up and down in various years. Mr. Kunzru very fairly chose a year which was a fair average year, namely, 1925-26, and what we are anticipating next year, and made his comparison on those figures. I do not entirely agree with what Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru said about those figures, but I do not think this is the time to analyse them. I do anyhow agree with him that they justify our pausing before we again begin to incur capital commitments on a large scale.

Several Members have charged us with extravagance in certain remodeling schemes, and in the construction of the Kalyan Power House. I am afraid the present moment is hardly the time at which to deal with these particular matters, particularly as I have not got the details of the schemes nor the exact figures with me. Speaking from memory, I am doubtful whether the figures quoted by Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad with regard to the Cawnpore remodelling are correct. That is all, Sir, I wish to say on the points raised since the other Members on behalf of the Government spoke.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Sir, ordinarily, I would not have intervened in this debate at all but for the repeated reference made by my Honourable friend Mr. Das to the non-official Members of the Convention Committee having been sleeping all the time. At least during his speech I was not sleeping and this House will admit that.

Mr. M. A. Jinnah (Bombay City: Muhammadan Urban): Now you are awake.

Mr. M. S. Aney: I have been wide awake all the while. That is what I want to say. My point is this. I do not know whether my Honourable friend, Mr. Das, really followed the whole story which the Honourable Sir George Rainy narrated regarding the formation of this Convention Committee of this House and how that Convention Committee has gone into a sub-committee and how, owing to the complexity of the nature of the subjects before them, that Committee has not been in a position to come to any conclusion up to this time. The real difficulty as regards the motion before us is this. The Honourable Member raises a question to which nobody can take any exception, that is the re-examination of the convention regarding the separation of the Railway finance and General finance. As a matter of fact this House has already agreed to the question of examination. It has appointed a Committee for that purpose and the Committee has been sitting, of course, not as regularly as it should have, but the difficulties were not at any rate on the side of the non-official Members or their unwillingness to work on that Committee, but the difficulties were of a different nature. Members on the other side that is official Members have not yet been able to make up their minds as regards the points which they must take into consideration before they can make any recommendation to modify the present convention. Whether the official members of the Committee were sleeping or whether they did not want this Committee to do anything at all, I cannot say. The position is this. Whenever we met, they did not find sufficient time to carry on the discussion on the points which we, the non-official Members, raised. When the whole Committee met twice or thrice, it was soon found that it was necessary to appoint a sub-committee and first settle the points which should be discussed by the general Committee. Then, of course, we succeeded to this extent. The terms of reference were prepared and 17 points have been jotted down as essential for the Committee to consider.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya (Allahabad and Jhansi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): When was that?

Mr. M. S. Aney: That was done some time in March, 1929. Last time the sub-committee met in Bombay, if I remember aright. We met there and then at that time the discussion turned on the point, namely, whether there was any statement made on behalf of the Railway Board before the Simon Commission at all and if so, what stand the Railway Board took with regard to the constitutional status of the Railways before that Commission. If they had taken that point, it was up to the Committee to know it, before they could proceed further with that work. There was a good deal of discussion on that point and no further information was vouchsafed on that point and the matter ended there. After that day, I believe, I am right in saying, no further meeting of that sub-committee was convened at all and the matter stands there.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Because the Honourable Sir George Schuster was away.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Yes; nothing could be done in his absence. Now, Sir George Schuster is here and probably, I believe, this sub-committee might meet before we disperse from Delhi. That is the position in which the sub-committee stands today. If this sub-committee's work is over, then there will be something for the general Committee to do. It is true the questions are of a complex nature. Although I differ from my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, as regards the fundamental point, namely, whether the separation should be scrapped—on that point I have not much doubt in my mind—I entirely agree with him in regard to inquiry on the necessity of re-examination of the convention. Whether the conditions under which the separation up to this time have been worked require to be further modified in the interests of the tightening up of the popular control over the financial affairs of the Railway Board or not is a point on which I and most of my non-official colleagues hold very strong views, and those who have read these terms of reference will find that they are sufficiently comprehensive to include all points to enable the non-official Members to introduce at least some conditions to establish greater popular control over the Railway Administration. The Committee will undoubtedly discuss that aspect of the problem, so that this Committee, if it completes its labours within a reasonable time, may be in a position to place popular control on a more firm and effective basis than what it is on today. I do admit that there is extravagance in the Railway Administration, I do admit that the existing arrangements do not enable us to have sufficient time to study the various plans and estimates that are placed before us, I do admit all these things, but these are defects in the system and these defects can be cured without changing the fundamental thing, namely, the keeping of the two finances apart from each other. It is not necessary to pool the two finances together. In fact it has been expressly admitted that it is not real separation of the two finances at all, it is merely a separation of the accounts only. These two accounts might be kept apart and yet popular control can be properly tightened up if the bodies which are associated with the work of the Railway Administration today, namely, bodies elected by this House, such as, the Standing Finance Committee and the Central Advisory Council for Railways, are placed on a statutory basis and their functions properly specified. Today the position is this; nobody knows exactly what the powers of the Standing Finance Committee are; nobody knows what the functions of the Central Advisory Council are.

Mr. B. Das: None.

Mr. M. S. Aney: None, precisely. It is only such work as is placed before the Standing Finance Committee that has to be discussed within the time allotted to them. In the Central Advisory Council, we have to formulate our position, on proposals placed before us and all that we do is by way of advise to the Railway Board. They are now doing everything on their own responsibility. That is where the matter stands. How these powers can be properly specified; whether an amendment of the Railway Act itself becomes necessary or not for this purpose; all these are matters which are to be considered by the convention Committee. The Committee is there. The non-official Members are not sleeping, and they do not want to sleep. The question is what will be the proper and convenient time for the Government Members to convene meetings and have the work done. I do not know if the present discussion will at least serve the purpose, namely, of impressing upon the Government the necessity of expediting the work of that Convention Committee, and if it does that, then I think the discussion may be taken to have served a very useful purpose. From that point of view, I endorse the suggestion in the motion of my Honourable friend, but I cannot accept the central suggestion made by my Honourable friend in the course of his speech, namely, to do away with the separation altogether.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru (Agra Division : Non-Muhammadan Rural): That is not the motion.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Yes, I know, the motion is not that, but the arguments used in support of the motion tend to show that he wants to do away with the separation. Though he has not worded the motion to that effect, yet by his arguments, he mainly supported the point of view of separation. So far as the motion is concerned, in fact the House has already agreed to it and the Government Members cannot express their dissent from that motion as the Committee has been appointed with their full consent for the examination of this very thing. If this motion is only intended to expedite or accelerate the thing, I believe the Government cannot oppose this motion. Therefore, I find that, although I disagree with some of the arguments advanced by my Honourable friend, I quite agree as to the urgency of the examination of this question and as to getting the work of the Convention Committee expedited without any further delay.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Sir, the general impression created by the speech of my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, was that most of the important questions before the Committee could not be decided without knowing the constitutional changes that we all expected would soon come about. Do Government propose, in these circumstances, that the Committee should set to work and produce its report speedily, or have the Government come to the conclusion in their minds that the Committee is dead? That is the main point on which we require an explanation, and from that point of view, I do not think that the motion of my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, is out of place. It is strange that on this point, neither the Honourable Sir George Rainy nor Mr. Parsons gave any reply at all. Indeed the other day when a question was put to my Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy, with regard to the work of the Committee, I believe, he told us that it had met only thrice. When asked further as to the reasons why the Committee had not met more frequently during the last fifteen months since its appointment, he deprecated any further questions being put and said that, in his opinion, it was not advisable that the matter should be pursued any further. It was left to my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, to make plain to us the reasons.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I think the Honourable Member must be speaking under a misapprehension. What Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas said today was with reference to what I said in my speech this morning. I dealt fully with the matter but possibly the Honourable Member was not present then.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: I was present throughout. If the Honourable Member thinks that he said anything today which might in any way be regarded as not putting a stop to the work of the Committee. I should be very glad if he would reconcile his position today with what it was some time ago. But the reply which he himself gave to some supplementary questions the other day and to which I have already referred did create a great deal of uneasiness. I think therefore that it is up to Government to assure us that the Committee that has been appointed will set to work immediately and will produce its report without any avoidable delay.

The second point, Sir, on which I should have liked Government to throw more light was the position of the Financial Commissioner. Honourable Members on the other side know that exception has been taken to the fact that the Financial Commissioner is not a purely financial officer. My Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy, objected to his being called the other day a Member of the Railway Board. Technically, Sir, he may not be a Member of the Railway Board, but practically, as Sir George Rainy himself admitted, the Financial Commissioner is concerned not merely with financial questions but also with administrative questions. It is also clear from the reply which Sir George Rainy gave to a question of mine, that the Financial Commissioner is, except in regard to questions of a financial nature, under the control of the Chief Commissioner of Railways. We should like to know,—because this is a matter of great importance,—whether the duties of the Financial Commissioner are purely financial or in any way executive or administrative; for I confess I do not quite clearly understand how it is that the Financial Commissioner comes in any matter under the control of the Chief Commissioner of Railways. The main point, however, is whether the Financial Commissioner of Railways is to be an independent financial officer; whether the system that is followed in regard to the Railway Board should be the same as is followed in the Army and the Postal and Telegraph Departments, or whether a different method should be followed and the present practice should be continued. Government have yet to convince us that the Financial Commissioner should take part in the discussion of administrative questions and thus identify himself with the Railway Board.

[Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru.]

the promise then given by the Government has not been fulfilled. Government would be incurring a very serious responsibility indeed if they act again in the manner in which they acted in the past. We have been reminded, Sir, that we are on the eve of great constitutional changes, and I take it that one of the inevitable results of those constitutional changes would be the greater amenability of the Government of India to the control of the popular representatives. It is up to the Government, even before the new constitution is settled, to act in the spirit of the changes that they know will soon come about, whatever the volume of opposition may be amongst our critics in this country or amongst people elsewhere. I trust, Sir, that when this question comes up for consideration, Government will bear the wishes of this House in mind and fulfil, even though in a belated manner, the undertaking, the practical undertaking, which they gave about six years ago.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

The motion was negatived.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Ten Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Ten Minutes to Three of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

Relations of Railways with their Customers.

Mr. K. C. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I do not propose to move motions Nos. 7 to 11. Therefore I come to No. 12. I move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

I want to discuss the relations subsisting between the Railway Administration and its customers. A commercial undertaking is primarily to be judged on the results as shown in its financial statement and the balance sheet; but when that commercial undertaking represents a public utility service, certainly its results can also be criticised from the point of view as to how far it satisfied the primary conditions of a useful public utility service. During past years on such occasions Honourable Members have related their personal experiences in regard to the grievances of passengers who have to travel over the Indian railway system. My present intention is not to relate to this House any personal experience at all. I intend to refer to three cases, recent cases, which were decided by competent courts of law, and I want to give to this House the opinions of judicial officers on the actions of the subordinate employees of the Railway Department in relation to the commercial community and the passenger public. The first case to which I would refer is one which has recently been decided in the Calcutta High Court. This suit was brought by one Muhammad Shamsul Haq against the Secretary of State. This gentleman, it appears, is a hide merchant. He was sent a consignment of raw skins, and on July 2, 1927, he went to take delivery of the goods. I may say that this case relates to the East Indian Railway. It was discovered, when he made the application for delivery of the goods, that one of the bundles appeared to be different and was three seers short in weight. The Railway authorities thereupon refused to deliver the goods to this consignee, and he was told on August 22, 1928, that is, more than a year after the consignment had arrived, that it was available for delivery. I am giving the facts very briefly. The consignee stated that, the goods being perishable goods, they had become absolutely worthless then, and he was not going to take delivery of them, and thereafter he brought a suit against the East Indian Railway. I will now give a few extracts from the judgment of the Calcutta High Court on this particular case. This is what the learned Judge stated:

"His lordship confessed that he did not know whether he was most astonished by the course taken by the Railway authorities, or those who advised the Secretary of State . . . The railway authorities not only broke their contract as carriers of the goods and committed a tort on delivery, but were guilty of conversion of the petitioner's goods."

Then again;

"Every step taken by the railway official was as improper and illegal as it well could be, but far from being apologetic for their irregular and high-handed behaviour, they had sought to escape from their just liability by raising the plea that they had not received notice of claim as required by section 77 . . ."

—a technical plea which the railway authorities had set up in defence of their action. His lordship emphasised this particular point towards the end of the judgment. He said:

"I repeat I am surprised at the attitude adopted by those who have advised the Secretary of State. A great disservice has been done to the Government by involving them in a conduct such as is disclosed in this case. The complainant delivered his goods to the Railway Administration and he paid the freight. It is not suggested that he had been at fault in any way. His goods have been rendered worthless owing to the conduct of the railway officials acting as they suggest under the orders of the police. The object of section 77 is to protect the State against possible dishonest claims. It is intended as a weapon of defence against fraud, but not as a means to enable the railway authorities to deprive their customers of their just dues. Owing to what the Railway Administration and the Government must now realise was a series of blunders and illegal acts on the part of their official, the petitioner has lost both his goods and his money. The loss is admitted and in these circumstances I should have thought that the most urgent desire of those in authority would have been to make amends and not shelter themselves behind technical pleas in their endeavours to escape liability."

I do not remember, Sir, to have seen any stronger strictures having been passed by any High Court in India in such a case. I do not know whether it is the East Indian Railway authorities who alone are to blame, or whether the Railway Board are expected to share some amount of responsibility for the individual railways when a suit like this is brought in the name of the Secretary of State and is fought out to a finish as it has been in this particular case.

Now, Sir, the next case to which I want to refer relates to an incident which created some amount of sensation in Calcutta very recently. A very well-known publicist of Calcutta, named Mr. Roy Chowdhury, was travelling with his family over the Khulna section of the Eastern Bengal Railway. At a station called Bongaon they got down, and along with other passengers changed into an empty carriage, which usually goes to Calcutta, as so and so Down. It happened, however, that on that particular occasion this rake was ordered to be detained at Bongaon and another train was to start for Calcutta from another platform. This sudden change in the train arrangements was not communicated to the passengers beforehand and consequently the passengers were put to a good deal of inconvenience; and when they went to the Assistant Station Master on duty to ascertain the real state of things, they were

[Mr. K. C. Neogy.]

“savagely treated” by that official and to add insult to injury, Mr. Roy Chowdhury, who was the spokesman of the passengers there was prosecuted under section 504 of the Indian Penal Code and section 120 of the Railway Act. Now, Sir, let us come to the judicial decision in this particular case. The trying Magistrate held that the passengers had a genuine grievance, and that the station officials were entirely responsible for the inconvenience of the passengers and that the conduct of the accused, Mr. Roy Chowdhury, amounted to nothing more than a representation of a legitimate grievance and entreaties for the redress of that grievance. It goes without saying that this gentleman was acquitted honourably by the Magistrate; but what is more, it appears that in cross-examination the Assistant Station Master stated that he was not really displeased with the conduct of the accused, (laughter) but that he brought the case only as an excuse for the delay in starting the train for which he was liable to censure. Sir, look at the trouble and humiliation to which this respectable gentleman was put simply because the Assistant Station Master thought that he might as well prosecute him in order to escape the liability of explaining a little delay in starting a train. I do not suppose that Honourable Members opposite will be disposed to defend the conduct of their subordinates in this particular case.

The third case, which has also created some sort of sensation, relates to the East Indian Railway. This was a case in which the President of the Congress Committee, Gondia, had to pull the communication cord for the purpose of stopping the train when he found, on going to the lavatory, that there was no water supply in the lavatory. He was travelling third class, as many prominent Congressmen do. He was prosecuted under section 108 of the Railways Act for pulling the chain at Jumna Bridge Station near Agra and this is what the trying Magistrate has found: he found that the accused was perfectly justified in pulling the communication chain under the circumstances of the case, and so acquitted the accused. The Magistrate further passed a sort of censure on the action of the railway authorities, especially the Station Master and guard at the Jumna Bridge Station, and a platform inspector at Tundla station, as in the opinion of the Magistrate it was their legal duty to supply water to the accused, and they had no business to put him in custody, which was probably due to the fact that the accused had published complaints against the railway staff at Tundla in the local weekly called the Sainik. That is to say, they were on the look out for an opportunity of punishing him for the dire offence which he committed of criticising the local railway authorities in a vernacular newspaper. This is what the Magistrate found upon a consideration of the evidence. It seems that the accused in this particular case is contemplating further civil action against the railway authorities, and perhaps the Honourable Member will hear more about it in future.

But, Sir, for every three cases which I have drawn attention to in this House, there must be three thousand which never come to public notice. It is a great curse on this country that every little official, whatever his station may be, considers himself to be a pocket edition of His Majesty George V. So far as the Railway Department goes, I can speak from my own personal impression that most of the officials who are in charge of railway stations and platforms, consider that it is an act of great condescension on their part to allow the public to travel by railway trains. I remember to have seen, at least on one occasion, an official dressed in very fine uniform at the Howrah station flourishing his cane, striking the floor occasionally with it, hurling abuse on the people because there was a large crowd on the platform on that occasion—hurling abuse as the best means of regulating the crowd. It is not my desire to relate any personal experiences on this occasion; but if I were to relate some of them I could give instances in which the railway officials have been guilty of the grossest amount of discourtesy and could be hauled up even before the courts for what they did, if only the Indian public were not so tolerant as they are in these matters. Our besetting sin is to put up with these inconveniences and insults and that is what constitutes the greatest security of the Railway Department.

Maulvi Mohammad Shafee Daoodi (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, I have heard my friend, Mr. Neogy, speaking about the inconveniences and troubles which are experienced by the travelling public as well as the commercial public on this side of the Ganges. But, if I may say so, the trouble is far greater; it is of every day occurrence in the country on the north side of the Ganges, I mean where the Bengal and North Western Railway and the Assam Bengal Railway run their lines. On that side I have seen no railway servant who is polite to a third class passenger.

An Honourable Member: Are they polite to first and second class passengers?

Maulvi Mohammad Shafee Daoodi: Of course they see the person: if the first or second class passenger is a European they are bound to be polite; but when they find that it is an Indian, and especially one who is not educated in English, then there is no chance for him for getting any good treatment at the hands of the railway servants. The traders in that part of the country—I am speaking of that part of the country because I have got experience of that only—cannot get any hearing. They are generally uneducated, but they know their business very well. They do not know the language, and so they are treated as if they were so many cattle. It has come to my lot to find them treated like that, and I have devoted my time to go to the Station Master and ask him as to why the state of things is so bad under his administration. (An Honourable Member: “Quote an instance”.) Even then I find they do not care for my interference. They would of course hear me and try to do something, but as a rule the treatment meted out to the passengers is very very bad. I would therefore appeal to the Honourable the Railway Member, who has been in that part of the country, who has passed his days in that part of the country as Collector of the district, to see that the uneducated people are not treated so badly by the railway servants. He has got a sympathetic heart, I know, and for that reason he will certainly be feeling more for the people of that description. I would therefore ask the Honourable Member for Railways kindly to look into these matters and mend the unsatisfactory state of affairs. I believe it was last year that I saw a notice hung up at all the stations telling the railway servants that any incivility on their part would be severely dealt with. That has been done, I know, but it has been done only recently, say during the last one or two years, but I feel, Sir, that much more scrutiny is required and greater care should be taken to enforce good treatment to the travelling public.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, the first case alluded to by my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, the civil suit by Mr. Shamsul Haq, had already attracted my attention from the report which appeared in the Statesman and it struck me at once that we ought to make inquiries, because, as Mr. Neogy has pointed out, the comments of the Judge were extremely severe, and it seemed to me that it was desirable that inquiries should be made promptly. I should like to point out, however, that because the learned Judge referred to the advisers of the Secretary of State, it does not in the least follow that the case has at any stage been before the Railway Board, because any civil suit in which the East Indian Railway is concerned must be brought in the name of the Secretary of State, since the whole property is vested in him, and the adviser of the Secretary of State may have been the solicitor or the counsel employed by the East Indian Railway in Calcutta. As regards the other two cases, I had not noticed them, and I shall be very grateful if the Honourable Member will let us have a brief note about each of them so that we may be in a position to institute inquiries promptly.

[Sir George Rainy.]

The Honourable Member said that these were only three cases, but he feared there might be 3,000 cases going all over the country. I had hoped that in these matters things were gradually getting better, because there can be only one desire amongst all Members of this House, on whichever side of the House we may sit, and that is to ensure to passengers reasonable and courteous treatment and to prevent bullying and improper action by railway officers. The difficulty is to know what precise measures can be taken which will bring about the desired results.

I was sorry to hear from my Honourable friend, Mr. Mohammad Shafee, of the state of things which he says exists now north of the Ganges, a part of the country with which I am very well acquainted. One point occurred to me when he was speaking. I do not know whether he has ever written to the Agent to bring to his notice a concrete case. Obviously, he has taken a keen personal interest in the matter, and I think it would be desirable that, when he finds a really bad case, he should write to the Agent direct and ask him to take action

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub (Rohilkund and Kumaon Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): Agents do not care to reply.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: One of the difficulties is that sometimes these cases do not come to the notice of the higher authorities, and I should be perfectly prepared to write to the Agent myself, send him a copy of what I have said in this House and tell him that, when complaints are made to him by persons whom he knows to be respectable persons, he should make a real effort to make the subordinate staff understand that it is their business, as far as they can, to attend to the needs of passengers and assist them, and not to obstruct them or bully them. I hope that that will show, at any rate, that we are anxious to do what we can to bring to an end a state of things which we all unanimously deplore.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

The motion was negatived.

Indianisation of the Staff of Railways.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

If you will permit me, I will combine the three points in Nos. 13, 14 and 15 for the sake of economy of time and speak on the question of Indianisation generally.

Mr. President: Indianisation generally?

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Yes, Sir. It is not my intention to make a long speech. I feel that I have already been responsible for taking up a long time, but I am

Mr. President: Is there no other cut on Indianisation later down on the list?

Mr. K. C. Neogy: I believe there is Munshi Iswar Saran (Lucknow Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): If you will kindly turn to page 3, you will find that there is a motion by me for a cut, and that deals with racial discrimination.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: May I point out, Sir, that No. 30 (Racial Discrimination) is not necessarily the same thing as Indianisation?

Munshi Iswar Saran: Indianisation is part of racial discrimination.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, it will be very difficult to keep out racial discrimination from Indianisation, and we are bound to have that point brought in once again when you come to

Mr. President: Very well. Let the whole question of Indianisation be discussed on Racial discrimination.

Failure of the Railway Board to settle Labour Problems and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Labour Troubles.

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to give notice of the motion to discuss the question of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway troubles. I have reason to believe that the Railway Member will be approached by a deputation from the Railwaymen's Federation at an early date, and in these circumstances I do not.

Mr. President: Order, order. If the Honourable Member does not wish to move his motion, he should not make a speech.

Mr. B. Das: One sentence more, Sir.

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member is not entitled to make a statement if he does not make the motion.

Mr. President: The next motion, Mr. B. Das.

Mr. B. Das: I will move my motion, Sir, that the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100.

Mr. A. M. Hayman (Railway Board: Nominated Official): On a point of order, Sir. Did you not just rule that we should pass on to the next motion?

Mr. B. Das: You must have mercy on this particular question, because it has attracted the attention of the whole country. I have reason to believe that the Railway Board was approached by the Railwaymen's Federation and that at an early date.

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member is not entitled to make a statement if he does not wish to move the motion.

Non-development of Railway Communications in Orissa.

Mr. B. Das: I beg to move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

In the budget estimate of 1927-28, the Railway Board proposed the survey of the following railway lines in Orissa:

Berhampore-Russelkonda, Bhadrak-Chandbali,
Jagatpur-Kendrapara, Jajpur Road-Jajpur, and Rayagudda-Sasahandi-Jogdalpur.

After some time, Government thought of retrenchment. They did survey these lines and spend a little money. It was shown in the Pink Book of the Bengal Nagpur Railway Budget of that year that the actual construction of these lines would be taken up in the year 1928-29. Then the subject was entirely dropped. I do not know whether it was due to a policy of retrenchment on the part of the Railway Board or whether it was the policy to deny the people of Orissa proper communication. Although money is found for the development of railways, though at a loss in other provinces, I find that my sub-province has so far been denied the pleasure of having adequate railway communications. The former Railway Member, Sir Charles Innes, once told us that some of the lines would be taken up soon besides the Cuttack-Talcher-Sambalpur line which will form the central communication of natural Orissa. But he was always in love with the Madras Presidency. He developed the Vizagapatam-Raipur line and neglected the Orissa communications. When the people in Orissa heard, in 1927, that these lines would be constructed, they were happy. The whole trouble is that the European Chamber of Commerce in Calcutta and the Bengal Nagpur Railway itself do not like the construction of these lines to be taken up because that will short circuit the traffic on the Bengal Nagpur Railway and interfere with its profits, although the British India Steam Navigation Company will get increased profit by increased coastal trade and traffic. If my Honourable friend, Mr. Parsons, brings forward the argument that such lines will not pay, I will point out to him cases where crores and crores of rupees have been spent, which cannot bring in more than 3½ per cent. My part of the country is frequently affected by floods and scarcity and I would ask the Honourable the Railway Member to consider the question of developing communications in Orissa, which is badly in need of them.

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: To deal with the last remarks of the Honourable Member first. The Honourable the Railway Member authorises me to say, on behalf of the Honourable the Commerce Member, that he is not in charge of communications! Mr. Das has wisely anticipated the first and main objection that I have to raise, namely, that though we have investigated a good many projects in areas which include Orissa, very few of them have been found to hold out any chance of being remunerative. Admittedly, there is in Orissa as a whole a paucity of railway communications, considering the large area to be served, though actually we are improving the position by the construction of the Raipur Vizianagram line, which will pass through a good deal of the south west portion of Orissa. That at least will open up some part of the province for which the Honourable Member speaks, and I hope that he is glad that, in a poverty year, we have made a large allotment for the continuation of that line. I failed, I am afraid, to catch the names of all the other lines he mentioned, but three at least were recently, investigated, the Bhadrak-Chandbali, Jagatpur-Kandrapara and Jajpur Road-Jajpur. None of them showed the slightest chance of being remunerative. So following our usual practice, I think, the Local Government was asked whether they would like to guarantee them; and as the Local Government was not prepared to give a guarantee, I am afraid all we can do is to postpone them indefinitely. Further, as the Honourable Member must be aware, a time like the present is not the time when we can make a promise that we shall be able to take up fresh extensions of the railway system, particularly where those extensions do not seem likely to earn a high return. I do not know if the Honourable Member mentioned another line—the Sambalpur-Khurda. It was investigated a good many years ago, and it was not possible to make out that it would anywhere near pay for construction. The real trouble is that a good deal of Bihar and Orissa is not very thickly populated, and a lot of the country there is very difficult country for railway construction and the cost of building railways is therefore correspondingly high. It may be inevitable therefore that the development of communications should take another form than that of railways.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

The motion was negatived.

Reorganisation of the Central Advisory Council for Railways and of Local Advisory Committees.

Mr. B. Das: Sir, I move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

Sir, we, the non-official Members of the House, do not like the constitution of the Central Railway Advisory Council. We do not like that there should be a panel system of election for eight members, out of whom six will be nominated to this Advisory Council at the option of the Honourable the Railway Member. Further, we have very often, in the debates on the floor of this House, asked the Honourable the Railway Member to make the debates and the proceedings of the Central Railway Advisory Council public. Nothing is published and, although this year while the Budget was being prepared, we did receive a pamphlet publishing minutes of different Local Advisory Committees, nothing has been mentioned about the work of the Central Railway Advisory Council. We cannot understand why the activities of that body are treated so confidentially.

Mr. President: That is not relevant.

Mr. B. Das: Sir, in a former debate, the Honourable the Railway Member said that the discussions . . .

Mr. President: The question is about the reorganisation of the Central Advisory Council and not about the publication of its proceedings.

Mr. B. Das: Sir, I am coming to that question. Therefore, I would like that there should be no panel system of election, and whenever the Government want any number of Members from this House to assist them in their work they can come to it for the exact number. I might mention here that we wanted to send two gentlemen from our party for nomination to this Committee but one of them, whose name I will not mention, refused to stand, because it was a panel system of election. That happened only this morning. So, when the reorganisation takes place, I hope this House will then have more material about the proceedings of the Central Railway Advisory Council.

Now, I will come, Sir, to the next part of my reason for this cut. The Local Advisory Committees are functioning much better on the Great Indian Peninsula and the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railways where the Bombay capitalists and industrialists exist. They also work well on the East Indian Railway. There they work much better, but in the part of the country from which I come, the Advisory Committee of the Bengal Nagpur Railway does not function properly. I have some experience of that Committee, and my inference is that the Agent of the Bengal Nagpur Railway is not amenable to the dictates of the Honourable the Railway Member. The Agent receives his instructions from the Managing Director of the Bengal Nagpur Railway about the number of persons that each Advisory Committee should have. There are at present four Advisory Committees on the Bengal Nagpur Railway, one is at Calcutta, one is for Bihar and Orissa, one is at Nagpur and the one for Vizagapatam, which has not yet been constituted. In each of these Advisory Committees there are only six members, two representing the Government of the locality in which they may be working, two representing the European business interests and two representing the public interests. If one were to turn to the pages of the East Indian Railway time table, one would see that it has got half a dozen Advisory Committees and each Advisory Committee consists of 18 to 20 persons, representing the municipalities, the Chambers of Commerce, both European and Indian, the Legislative Council, the public, and various other interests. I think, when the Railway Board advised the various railways to form their Local Advisory Committees, they did not advise them properly as to how they should be constituted and manned. I think it is high time that the Honourable the Railway Member should ask each of the Agents of various railways, both Company-managed and State-managed, to see that the Advisory Committees should be more representative in character. They should not only represent the Government of the locality and the Chambers of Commerce, but the representatives of the people should also be represented on them adequately. I know that, in the Bihar and Orissa Legislative Council, they passed a Resolution the other day demanding that the Bihar and Orissa Councillors should be represented on the Bengal Nagpur Railway Advisory Committee. That has not been yet conceded. I do think that it is not proper and it is an injustice to people of Orissa and Bihar too that only two persons should represent the public interests on the Advisory Committee of the Bengal Nagpur Railway for the local section of Bihar and Orissa and that is the reason why I have moved this cut.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Aziz (Chittagong Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I want to say a few words on one or two matters concerning the Local Advisory Committee in Eastern Bengal. I think this is the only occasion when we get a little chance of making our ideas heard by the Railway people in this House. As the House knows, there is a State-managed railway line which is at present controlled by a company with headquarters in Chittagong. Its length is more than 1,100 miles and it has its branches in many parts of Eastern Bengal. This railway has also got a Local Advisory Committee in Chittagong. This line extends from the borders of the Bay of Bengal to the jungles of the Himalayas. On the Advisory Committee of such a big line you will find that the Chairman of the Chittagong District Board and the Municipality are alternately represented, and the Commissioner of the Chittagong Division is an ex-officio member. One member is nominated by the Assam Government from amongst the Members of the local Legislative Council and one is nominated from the ranks of the non-official Members of the Bengal Legislative Council. The total number of members comes to about 11. If anybody were to read the discussions of that body, it would astound him. During the course of its existence, I do not think it has sat more than half a dozen times and I cannot think for a single second that they have at all taken the trouble of paying any heed either to matters relating to the local representation or the representation of the non-official members on that body. That is one complaint. In the second place, I do not know how it is manœuvred, perhaps it is God's work. It is so very inexplicable that invariably those gentlemen who happen to come from the Bengal Legislative Council or the Assam Legislative Council can hardly follow its proceedings. Some time ago I had the privilege of putting a question to the Railway Board here and a list of their activities was given. It was placed on the table of the Library and not the table of the House. If anybody were to take the trouble to ransack the volumes kept under that big dome, he would find that a hundred and one questions were discussed by this body, but not one was of any substance. In short my grievance is this. If, as has been described by Mr. Neogy, the Assam Bengal Railway cost the Indian taxpayers ten crores, and if they have been losing up to now—I find they lost 6 lakhs last year and 14 lakhs this year—if these efficient officers on that Railway mean business, I think they will take counsel from the railway officials here at Delhi and Simla and try to mend matters. With these few words, I support Mr. Das' motion.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Sir, I do wish to ask Sir George Rainy earnestly to consider this very modest proposal of my Honourable friend, Mr. Das. Why have a system of nomination at all? Why insist on this House giving you a panel and on your retaining the power of choosing six or whatever may be the number out of the panel? Can't you have, I ask, so much confidence in this House as to say, "Please elect the exact number that is wanted". It may be that there are some rules somewhere in support of this procedure. If there be some such rules I say that those rules must go. We are not going to have nomination now in the year of grace 1930. Let it be straight election, and if you cannot trust the Legislative Assembly, then I do not know whom you are going to trust. Then, there is another matter which I think deserves serious attention and it is this. As my Honourable friend has pointed out, the Advisory Committee in certain provinces has got a smaller number of men, while in other provinces the number is larger. I wish to ask Sir George Rainy kindly to pay a little attention to this anomaly. Why not go into the whole thing carefully and put the Advisory Committee on a systematic and organised basis, so that there may be framed rules and regulations to guide their work as well as to fix their numbers? If this is done, I am inclined to think that these bodies will prove more useful than perhaps what they are today. But, anyhow, I shall certainly expect the Honourable Sir George Rainy to do away with the system of panel as far as the Assembly is concerned. I understand—I do not remember it myself—that last year in connection with the election for a certain panel, this House took strong objection to this course. Personally, Sir, I must say that, if I were to be asked to be elected to a panel and to run the risk of not being nominated, I should certainly not agree, and I am very pleased to hear that some Members of my party took up the same attitude. It is not an extravagant proposal, and I hope Sir George Rainy will convince us of his sweet reasonableness, to which testimony has been borne by so many Honourable Members on this side of the House, by accepting it. Indeed, this proposal is very modest. If it is not accepted, then we shall say that there is no change in the spirit of Government.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, I should like to deal first with this question of the system of election by panel instead of direct election for certain Committees. The matter was raised last year rather emphatically more than once, and the opinion was firmly expressed on the other side of the House that a number of Honourable Members disliked the panel system and preferred to have direct election. Last September when I proposed the reconstitution of the Advisory Committee of the Commerce Department, I undertook that the matter would be examined in order to see whether any change of system could be carried out. I am speaking now not of the Central Railway Advisory Council, but of the ordinary departmental Advisory Committees which are constituted under rules made by the Governor General. That is to say, it is not a matter in which the Governor General in Council passes orders, but the Governor General himself.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Can't representation be made to the Governor General himself with great respect?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Obviously representations can be made. But I wish to say—I am authorised to say—on behalf of the Governor General, that he does not consider it advisable to make any change at the moment, and he thinks the best plan would be, in view of the probability that the life of this Assembly, after the end of the Session, will be short, that the members of the departmental Advisory Committees, who are already in office should be invited to continue to constitute the Advisory Committees up to the date of the dissolution of the Assembly. The whole matter would then be reconsidered before the time comes to constitute Advisory Committees in the new Assembly. But as regards this particular body to the reconstitution of which this motion partly relates, I should like to point out that the manner of election is provided for in the separation convention itself, and therefore, it would be a very unusual method for the Government of India to depart from the convention by changing the method of election. Whatever may be the case about other Committees, I am bound to say that, in the case of the Central Railway Advisory Council, the panel system can be of very little importance because it consists of the 12 Members of the Standing Finance Committee for Railways—that is one nominated official Member of the Legislative Assembly and 11 Members elected by the Legislative Assembly—and in addition, there are, in the Central Advisory Council, six Members of the Council of State and six Members from the Legislative Assembly. Thus the total strength of the whole body is 24 (including one official), and the only difference from direct election is that altogether 27 members are elected, 11 directly by the Assembly, and two panels of 8, one from each House. From each panel six members are then nominated. Obviously the panel method makes a very small difference indeed as regards the constitution of this particular body, and personally I should not be prepared to argue keenly about the substitution of the method of direct election. However, for the moment, we must carry on in accordance with the provisions of the convention, and this is hardly the appropriate time at the moment to make a change.

Now as regards the local Advisory Committees, I think the grievance of my Honourable friend, Mr. Das, is mainly against the Bengal Nagpur Railway, and in particular the small number of members on its various Advisory Committees and the non-representation of interests which he thinks ought to be represented. When we get his speech in print I shall be quite ready to look into that particular matter on that particular Railway.

Very much the same applies to the complaints made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim, about the Assam Bengal Railway.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh (Muzaffarpur cum Champaran: Non-Muhammadan): And the same complaint about the Bengal and North Western Railway.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: If the Honourable Member had spoken before I did I should have made my promise to him also. However, I do not mind adding him to my little list. Most of the Committees contain a much larger number of members. A Committee of six certainly seems to be small and I see no reason why the enlargement of these Committees might not be considered. It is a matter on which I think the Local Government would often be in the best position to advise us whether a satisfactory Committee consisting of a larger number could be constituted. The only thing I should like to say by way of qualification is that, when we are dealing with a Company-managed railway in a matter of this kind, the final decision must obviously rest with the Company. It is not a matter in which our contracts with the companies give us any power. But if we are satisfied that there ought to be changes, then we should not hesitate to use all the influence we could with the Company.

Mr. B. Das: Sir, I beg leave to withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Removal of Penal Clauses from the Agreements by Company-managed Railways and their reintroduction.

Mr. B. Das: Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

On this motion I want to deal with the question of the removal of the penal clauses from the agreements of the Company-managed railways and I want that they should again be introduced if the law permits it.

Sir, I do not know why the Acworth Committee, of which my Honourable friend Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas was a member, did not observe that certain penal clauses were removed from the contracts of Company-managed railways and it was these clauses that gave the Secretary of State and the Government of India the option to terminate the contracts with certain Company-managed railways for their mismanagement. My attention was particularly directed to this point because I live on the borders of the Bengal Nagpur Railway, and in the Appropriation Accounts on Railways I found so many charges of gross mismanagement, so many scandals against that Railway. Mr. Parsons asked the Public Accounts Committee of 1926-27 to give him time for one year more so that he could properly investigate the charges against the Bengal Nagpur Railway. Then last year we could not go into the details as the Railway Board could not decide finally, and on the assurance of the acting Financial Commissioner that they were going to write a very strong letter to that Railway, we dropped the matter till the next Public Accounts Committee meeting. Then while we were looking into the contracts of these railways, we found that, in 1912, the following penal clause, which gave the Secretary of State the option to give six months' notice to the Bengal Nagpur Railway, was removed, and I directed the attention of the House to this by putting a question on the 25th September last which was question No. 919:

"Is it a fact that in paragraph 89 of the original contract of the Bengal Nagpur Railway (main contract dated the 9th March, 1887), the following penal provision occurred :

"The Secretary of State may also, if default be made by the Company . . . or in case the undertaking or any part thereof at any time in the opinion of the Secretary of State be in course of gross mismanagement by the Company or be worked at a loss as shown by the revenue account and have been so worked for not less than three half-years continuously down to the time at which the Secretary of State shall give to the Company the stipulated notice of termination under this present power, terminate this Contract by giving to the Company in England six calendar months' previous notice in writing of the termination of this contract'."

The Honourable Sir George Rainy replied:

"There is nothing on record showing the reasons for the change."

Then my friend, Mr. Neogy, put a supplementary question:

"Do I take it that the Government of India were not consulted before this change was made?"

The reply was:

"They were not consulted about this particular change."

This change took place in 1912. Then my curiosity went further to find out how far the Secretary of State had parted with our national birth rights to his cousins the Directors of the Company-managed railways. With regard to the other Company-managed railways Sir George Rainy gave the following reply:

"There was no penal clause in the original contract of the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway, but there were such clauses in the contracts of the Assam Bengal, Madras and Southern Mahratta and South Indian Railways. The penal clause in the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway contract was deleted in a supplemental contract dated the 26th June, 1908. The correspondence relating to this supplemental contract does not throw any light on the reasons that led to the deletion of the penal clause."

Sir, some of us know that the Government of India only serve as hand-maidens to the Secretary of State, sitting six thousand miles away. That the Secretary of State should part away with such provisions simply to help British trade and commerce and British financial interests! I could never understand, and I blame more the present Railway Board, which is nothing but a replica of the old Railway Board that was formed in 1905, and after the formation of that Railway Board these things happened. Yet I find some of the Members of that Railway Board are at present

Managing Directors of the different companies. I find myself unable to understand the policy by which Members of the Railway Board afterwards become Directors of the Bengal Nagpur Railway. I find there are two, Sir C. Wynne and Sir Ernest Bell, who are Directors of the Bengal Nagpur Railway, and I find from the Acworth Committee's Report that Sir Henry Burt, of whom my friend Munshi Iswar Saran spoke the other day, is also a Director of the Bengal and North Western Railway. At the same time he used to represent the India Office on the Company-managed railways as Director of the India Office. This is the sort of patronage which the Secretary of State extends to the very men who try to exploit India. It is a very serious question that the Secretary of State should part with so many of our birthrights, where such large sums of money, involving the Bengal Nagpur Railway and other Company-managed railways, are concerned. And then he goes and extends the contract of the Bengal Nagpur Railway till 1950. Why did he not extend it for two or five or even ten years? Sir, I am an electrical engineer, and if I get a licence for electrifying a town, I get it for the first 30 years, and then it is extended for every ten years, whereafter the municipality has the right of option to purchase. Sir, in this particular case, I should like to know who was the Secretary of State who parted with so much privilege of the people to the Bengal Nagpur Railway for 38 years from 1912 to 1950. I know the Bengal Nagpur Railway will be left in the same dilapidated condition as the Great Indian Peninsula Railway was in when it was taken over. The permanent way will be found in a worse condition. There will be no wagons, no carriages and all the money will be taken away in surplus profits and in salaries by the top-heavy European management. That was actually the condition on the Bengal Nagpur Railway until it was brought to the notice of the Public Accounts Committee by the Audit Department. I may not carry this motion, but I have done a public service (Hear, hear.), in drawing attention to this injustice by the Secretary of State and the Government of India of the time. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I am afraid I cannot satisfy my Honourable friend's curiosity as to the Secretary of State whom he held to be responsible for the change in the penal clause in the Company-managed contracts. But judging from the dates on which the contracts were amended, I suspect it was in the time, first of all, of Lord Morley and possibly later, of Lord Crewe. The Honourable Member has resurrected a matter which lies buried in the mists of the past, for we have entirely failed to discover exactly why these changes were made in the penal terms of the contracts. I can, however, venture a surmise what the reasons were. Originally, when there were guaranteed Companies who had no capital in the undertaking, the contracts were simple in form. I say simple because they contained, I believe, very few clauses, some of which were quite general in terms. Time passed, and experience was gained as to the directions in which it was necessary to tie down the Companies; and when the contracts were revised the duties of the Companies and the rights of the Secretary of State were more carefully defined. To take the Bengal Nagpur Railway, there are clauses in the contract which probably contain all that would have ever been acted upon under the old penal clause. One clause says:

"The Company shall keep the undertaking and the stations and works belonging thereto in good repair. And shall also keep so much of the undertaking as for the time being shall have been opened for public traffic and the stations and works belonging to the part which for the time being shall have been so opened in good working condition and fully supplied with rolling stock, plant, machinery and stores to the satisfaction done to give effect to your announcement that 33 per cent. will be employed from the minority communities? What have you done, I ask in all seriousness? What have your Agents done in response to those circulars? They have treated them as mere scraps of paper. Sir, I am giving concrete cases, and I quote facts and figures. Take for instance, the District Medical Officers. Among the State Railways the total number is 39. Out of a total of 39, you have got only 2 Mussalmans, and I will give you further figures. I ask the Honourable the Railway Member to contradict my figures. On the Eastern Bengal Railway there are one European and 3 Hindus. On the East Indian Railway, there are 4 Europeans, 1 Mussalman and 10 Hindus. On the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, there are 7 Europeans, 4 Hindus. On the Burma Railway, 4 Europeans. On the North Western Railway, 1 European, 1 Mussalman, 2 Hindus and 1 Sikh. So, out of 39 you have got 2 Mussalmans in all the State Railways. Then, Sir, I come to the next concrete case, and it is this. I will ask the Honourable the Railway Member, is it or is it not a fact that there is not a single Mussalman in any State Railway who is either the head or the deputy of any department?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: The Chief Medical Officer on the Eastern Bengal Railway?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: I am referring to the head or the deputy of executive departments. There is not a single Mussalman in any of the State Railways, although they have got many Mussalmans who have been employed for the last 15 or 20 years, and have got very good records of services. And this is the way they treat us and they try to bluff us from year's end to year's end, and that bluffing, I can tell you, you can have this year only and no more. (An Honourable Member: "Why not?") We shall make the deaf ears hear. (An Honourable Member: "You mean you are going to get independence.") I will give further figures. In the Report of the Railway Board on Indian Railways, Volume I, page 114, there is a "Statement of gazetted officers and corresponding ranks employed on Class I Railways, Railway Board and other railway offices, excluding the Nizam's State Railway and the Jodhpur Railway". Let us examine this statement of gazetted officers. What is the position of the Mussalmans? The position is this. Out of the total in 1928 and 1929, the percentages were, Europeans in 1928, 68.5 per cent. and in 1929, 67.3. Hindus in 1928, 17.4, in 1929, 18.51. Then come the poor Mussalmans with 3 per cent. in 1928, and what is the improvement in 1929? 3.3 per cent. My friend Colonel Gidney's community of Anglo-Indians

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I thought we were recognised as Indians?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Here they are separately shown as 8.3 per cent. in 1928 and 7.7 per cent. in 1929. Then, Sir, I come to the subordinate officers drawing a salary of Rs. 250 per mensem and over. Let us see what you have got there. Even on Rs. 250 we have got absolutely nothing. The percentages were, in 1928, Europeans 23.8 per cent., in 1929, 23 per cent.; Hindus, in 1928, 22.3, in 1929, 23.1; Mussalmans again, in 1928, 3.8, and in 1929, 4 per cent. Even on a pay of Rs. 250 per mensem the Mussalmans have got only 2 per cent. (An Honourable Member: "What is the page please?") It is on pages 118 and 119. Anglo-Indians were in 1928, 43.9 per cent., and in 1929, 42.5 per cent. Then, Sir, I will refer to pages 120 and 121. Here there is a statement showing the number of appointments created and vacancies which occurred among officers of gazetted rank on the State Railways, and of corresponding rank on Companies' railways (class I),—of course excluding His Highness the Nizam's Guaranteed State Railway and the Jodhpur Railway: Let us see the position here.

State-worked Railways:

No. of vacancies actually filled in 1928-29—49.

Of these the percentages are, Europeans—25, or say 50 per cent. (Hear, hear.)

Hindus 14, or say 28 per cent.

Muslim 1, or say 2 per cent.

Anglo-Indians 8, or say 16 per cent.

Out of 49 only one Muslim was appointed.

What was the position in 1927-28?

No. of vacancies actually filled—96.

Europeans 44 (again nearly 50 per cent.)

Hindus 30, say 31 per cent.

Muslims 3, say 3 per cent.

Anglo-Indians 16, say 17 per cent.

I am reading from the Railway Board's Report on Indian Railways for 1928-29, Volume I. This is the position which the Muslims have got in the State-worked railways. I will take one or two more railways,—the Assam-Bengal Railway about which my Honourable friend, Mr. Parsons felt so embarrassed the other day that he was afraid even to lay on the table of this House certain information asked for by my friend, Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim. I had a suspicion then and my suspicion is now confirmed by what I have now seen, that they do not appoint any Mussalmans at all on that Railway; and that is the reason why Mr. Parsons did not want to lay that information on the table of the House, but merely put it in a shelf in the Library. The number of vacancies on the Assam-Bengal Railway actually filled was 5; Europeans 2, Hindus 2 and Anglo-Indian 1—Mussalmans nil. Then, Sir, take the Bengal Nagpur Railway:

No. of vacancies actually filled—19.

Europeans 10,

Hindus 4,

Muslim 1,

Anglo-Indians 4.

Taking the South Indian Railway next.

No. of vacancies actually filled—16.

Europeans 4,

Hindus 8,

Muslim 1,

Anglo-Indians 2.

[Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim.]

Then again, if we look at the Report for the year 1928, we find that, on the 31st March, 1928, the number of gazetted officers was 2,178, whereas the number of Mussalmans was only 65, and there also we find the term "other classes" mentioned. The figures for 1929, of course, have been given by Mr. Ghuznavi. Therefore, Sir, if the House looks at these things dispassionately, it will see that—surely the people for whom we have been speaking are not pariahs, have certainly some stake in the country, they have a great heritage behind them,—therefore, as I said, if Honourable Members will look at this question dispassionately, they will see that our demand for a proper share of representation in the services is right and just. Of course, one hundred and one replies are ready when we put interpellations in the House, and they go on behalf of the community as a whole. We get answers to the effect, "The reply will be submitted to the Honourable Member in due course. It will be sent to the Library after publication" and so on. If the idea is only to give such evasive answers, I say the Railway Board are entirely mistaken in their policy, because, after all, a man, and for that matter, a nation has got its various phases of life. A child attains adolescence in time, and in time it gets into its full senses and demands his full rights. I think, so far as this side of the House is concerned, Sir, every one will agree with me when I say that our representations have been treated in a manner to make even a sober man like myself feel that our cries are cries in the wilderness. This is a very serious matter, and I should like the Treasury Benches to give their serious attention to it. With these few observations, Sir, I bring my remarks to a close.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: May I suggest, Sir, that the Honourable Member in charge should speak at this stage in order to find out whether the debate should be prolonged any further.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Sir, I find myself at a great disadvantage in answering Mr. Ghuznavi at this stage, because I feel I cannot keep off the ground of Indianisation generally if I am to give him a satisfactory answer. Now, Sir, to begin with, if Mr. Ghuznavi wishes to start from say the year 1924 or 1925 and to charge the Government and the Railways of India for not having proceeded with Indianisation at a pace that they ought to have, previously to that I am not going to say I can defend the position entirely.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: Are Mussalmans not Indians?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: That is why, Sir, I said at the beginning that I am at a disadvantage.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: Why do you make so many promises to Mussalmans?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Therefore, Sir, I wish to ask the House to consider this. We started in 1924 with a certain number of Mussalmans in the different branches of our service.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Do you mean to say that there were no Mussalmans in 1924?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I do not know, Sir. What the Honourable Member means. He is very well acquainted with the figures. What I wanted to point out was that we have to look at this question in three separate parts, the officers' grade, the upper subordinates' grade, that is, posts which carry a rate of salary of Rs. 250 or more, and then all the other posts in our services. What have we done in recent years to increase Indianisation in the officers' grades? Perhaps I shall be able to say more on this subject later on another motion, but I want to tell the House now that, since 1925, when Government gave an undertaking to proceed as expeditiously as possible with Indianisation of the superior services and to fill 75 per cent. of our vacancies, we have, within this short period of four or five years attained by last year a percentage of 71. If that is not a good record, I do not know what is.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: That is not the point before us.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I will come to the point of the Mussalmans.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: The question of Indianisation is going to be debated on the motion of my friend, Munshi Iswar Saran. The point is now quite different.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I explained my position to the Chair. However, Sir, I will pass over this point very quickly. The point I want to make here is that we have attained to 71 per cent. in four years for the officers' grades. Ever since I have been in charge of this business, I have made up my mind that we shall soon fill vacancies up to 75 per cent. and thus meet our full obligations, and, Sir, we have taken in in this 71 per cent. as many Mussalmans as qualified under our rules. If the Honourable Member made a charge against us that our rules are defective, that our procedure is defective and that the rules of selection for our officers' posts are defective from his point of view, yes, if he brought that forward, I am sure that Government would consider any suggestions that he had to make.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Do you mean to say that you don't get Mussalmans to appear at the examinations or that they don't pass?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I will give you a direct answer. The Muhammadans do appear, but few of them pass sufficiently high to be selected. I will give you an instance. Take the Indian Civil Service of Engineers examination of last year. We got one or two Mussalmans out of a large number that we wanted, and because we felt that the Muslim community was not fully represented in that service, we went down the list and took one more on the basis of filling one-third of the required number to redress communal inequalities.

Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi (North Madras: Muhammadan): Why do you come with the plea of Indianisation now?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Recruitment of Muslims is part of the scheme of Indianisation. I pass on now, Sir, to meet another point made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Ghuznavi, namely, that among the heads and deputy heads of departments there was not a single Mussalman on any of the railways of India.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: State Railways.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: You might well have added Company-worked lines also. Now, I wish to say, in the first place, that the policy of the Railway Board and of the Government of India, in filling posts in the administrative grades, is exactly what was reflected in the remarks made by my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas, this morning. For these grades we do not go by actual seniority. We pick out the best man we can get for a job, paying due regard to seniority. I think the Mussalman community of India should be very proud, because I cannot remember a single instance of a Muslim officer having been superseded for any one of these posts, although I remember many cases of Europeans, Anglo-Indians and Hindus being superseded on grounds that they were not fit for promotion.

[Mr. A. M. Hayman.]

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Why have they not been superseded?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Because they have not reached that stage of seniority yet when they have to be considered. That is the answer to my friend Mr. Ghuznavi. There is another point of which my friend is unaware. While on the one hand we have not yet superseded any Muslim officer for promotion, we went, I think, out of our way in selecting a very capable officer on one of our State Railways for the post of head of a department on another railway. I refer to the Chief Medical Officer of the Eastern Bengal Railway. My Honourable friend, Mr. Ghuznavi, complained of the paucity of Mussalmans in the Medical Department grades. My Honourable friend, Mr. Parsons, explained the other day, in answer to a question, why that was so. I would like to supplement his remarks in just one particular. Very recently when we wanted to fill up three posts of District Medical Officers on State-worked railways, I particularly asked the Public Service Commission not to recommend three qualified officers, but to recommend a very much larger number. Now, Sir, I did that because I wanted to get a large list of qualified Indian officers for such posts. I did that because I felt, just as Mr. Ghuznavi felt, that although we had only three vacancies on the State-worked lines, the Company-managed lines ought to take some of our Indian officers as District Medical Officers. I got a list of nine officers who were qualified, and of those one was a Mussalman in the first three places. There were two other Muhammadans who were qualified. I have specially written to the Agents, of each of the Company-worked railways and asked them particularly to take into consideration the claims of these gentlemen when filling posts on their railways. Perhaps in a little while this request will bear fruit. That is the answer to my friend Mr. Ghuznavi's complaint about Medical Officers, Sir.

I do not think the House would require me, in view of the explanation I have given, to follow Mr. Ghuznavi through the figures that he has quoted of the paucity of Muslim officers in our services. The paucity is there because we began with a very low figure. We are out to do everything possible to take them in, and they on their side must qualify themselves for our examinations, or at least pass sufficiently high. We cannot pass on to Company-managed lines, with real hope of success, the names of people at the bottom of a long list.

The next point to consider is the representation in the subordinate services. As I said previously, we will consider this under two heads, and I take the easier head first, that is the subordinates other than those who are drawing salaries of Rs. 250 and over. I have got some figures which compare the figures of the different communities on the 1st of April, 1926, with those on the 1st of April, 1929.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Monday, the 24th February, 1930.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I present the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill further to amend the Indian Tariff Act, 1894, for certain purposes.

THE STEEL INDUSTRY (PROTECTION) BILL.

THE RAILWAY BUDGET—LIST OF DEMANDS.

DEMAND No. 1.—RAILWAY BOARD—contd.

Larger Employment of Mussalmans.

Mr. President: Mr. Hayman will now resume his speech on Mr. Ghuznavi's cut on Demand No. 1.

A

Mr. A. M. Hayman (Railway Board: Nominated Official): Sir, when the House adjourned on Saturday, I had just completed my review of the position as affecting the Muslim representation in our services, so far as it concerned our superior grades, and I had just got on to the subject of Muslim representation in our subordinate services. I said I would approach this question under two headings, firstly, in relation to those employees who draw a rate of salary of Rs. 250 and over and, secondly, all other classes, that is, those who draw salaries less than Rs. 250. Now, Sir, in respect of the latter class, I have some figures before me which compare the representation of Mussalmans on the 31st March, 1926, with that on the 31st March, 1929, and which show the increased percentage that has taken place in regard to Muslims. I will read these figures to the House:

31st March, 1926. 31st March, 1929.

Europeans	..	..	..	4,920	4,841
-----------	----	----	----	-------	-------

Fall in percentage—1·61.

--------	----	----	----	---------	---------

Increase in percentage—6·80.

Muslims	..	..	..	164,185	173,876
---------	----	----	----	---------	---------

Increase in percentage—5·90.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim (Chittagong Division: Muhammadan Rural): These figures include coolies also, who get only 6 annas per day.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: The Honourable Member is right; these figures include all such classes.

31st March, 1926. 31st March, 1929.

Anglo-Indians	..	..	..	13,559	14,231
---------------	----	----	----	--------	--------

Increase in percentage—3·48.

Total including other classes	..	..	..	721,242	773,888
-------------------------------	----	----	----	---------	---------

Increase in percentage—7·30.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas (Indian Merchants' Chamber: Indian Commerce): Does the Honourable Member realise that there are no coolies nor scavengers amongst Europeans and Anglo-Indians? Is this a fair comparison to give on this debate in this House?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I am stating our published figures and I leave it to the Honourable Member to draw his own conclusion.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: I am only pointing out that, by quoting these figures, the Honourable Member does not help to clarify the position. On the contrary, he is making the issue more confused.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: When you have heard me out, Sir, you will change your opinion. (An Honourable Member: "But the figures do not indicate that.") These figures, Sir, relate to Class I Railways, that is, the State-managed Railways and the State Railways worked by Companies. A study of these figures will bear out the fact that, in respect of the totals, the Muslim representation in our services is increasing. It will perhaps help the House if I just quote a comparison of the increases and decreases on particular railways. The increases are as follows:

	Percentage increase.
Assam Bengal Railway	40·5
Bengal and North Western Railway	3·07
Bengal Nagpur Railway	20·6
Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway	0·34
Eastern Bengal Railway	23·21
East Indian Railway	12·1
Great Indian Peninsula Railway	5·13
Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway	4·99
South Indian Railway	6·76

The above figures show the increase in the percentage of Muslim representation. There is only one railway in which there has been a decrease and that is the North Western Railway, where the percentage decrease is 0·98. I am not going to make too much of these figures, and I pass on to the consideration of the first heading, namely, the appointments on salaries of Rs. 250 per mensem and over. I feel quite rightly that, in this case, if the Muslim community is absolutely disappointed with the percentage of their representation, they may take it from me that I am also disappointed.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla (Bombay Central Division: Muhammadan Rural): What do you propose to do if you are disappointed?

An Honourable Member: To appoint more Muslims!

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum (North-West Frontier Province: Nominated Non-Official): He is going to tell us that the Muslims are inefficient.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I think I had better quote the figures. The following relate to our State-managed Railways.

	Total number of posts.	Number of Muslims.
1926	5,486	198
	Percentage 3·6.
1927	5,554	227
	Percentage 4·08.
1928	5,767	263
	Percentage 4·56.
1929	5,985	291
	Percentage 4·86.

[Mr. A. M. Hayman.]

The position on our Company-managed railways is worse:

	Total number of posts.	Number of Muslims.
1926	2,687	49
	Percentage 1·82.
1927	2,744	60
	Percentage 2·18.
1928	2,719	57
	Percentage 2·09.
1929	2,772	56
	Percentage 2·02.

There has been some increase in the percentage on the State railways, but, I am not going to make much of this. But actually in the case of the Company-managed railways the percentage has fallen in 1929. I can quite understand the dissatisfaction of my Honourable friend, Mr. Ghuznavi, with these figures. I am not going to say that he should be less disappointed with them because there has been some increase on the State-managed railways in recent years. The figures are really very low. But, Sir, there are difficulties in the way of increasing them rapidly and I wish to put before the House as frankly as I possibly can what those difficulties are. In the first place, Honourable Members would, I have no doubt, realize that, after all, the total number of posts in these grades is limited.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): I have been quoting from figures where you said that a number of appointments had been filled up. That is what you said. You have not taken more Muhammadans there.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: The fact that you have an increased percentage of Muslims on our State-worked railways is a direct answer to that question, Sir.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub (Rohilkund and Kumaon Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): By how much?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I will give you the figures. I hope to meet your point if you will just listen to me. I wish just to tell the House that the total number of posts in these grades must necessarily be limited, and the number of Muslims that can be appointed to these posts is therefore necessarily limited. There is one other consideration. It is this, you must have vacancies. And when the number of posts is limited, necessarily the number of vacancies that you get year by year is correspondingly limited. There is also something, Sir, which the Government are not going to do. Government are certainly going to try their very best to remove the defect about which the Honourable Member has complained, but Government are not going to create vacancies in these grades by ousting existing employees, no matter to what community they may belong. (Interruptions.) I do not mind the Honourable Members interrupting me. My point is that we cannot oust the existing holders of posts, no matter to what community they belong. We shall not be guilty of that. We shall not also be guilty of something else, which might bring about quicker promotion of Muslims. We shall not be guilty of superseding the claims of men with long services who are well qualified for promotion.

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum: Nothing of the sort has been suggested to you.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: It is best that I should explain the difficulties. Now, with the limitation in the number of posts and with the limitation in the number of vacancies and with our desire not to do injustice to our existing employees of all communities, including Muslims, it seems to me that the pace cannot be too rapid, by which we will be able to remove the defect complained of. There is a further suggestion, which is often made to us, to the Agents of Railways and to the Railway Board as to the means by which we really could remove the defect rapidly if we had the heart to do so, and that is by the direct appointment of people of particular communities to the upper subordinate grades. This suggestion has been put forward to us very often. I will ask the House to bear with me a little when I tell them that the duties and responsibilities which we attach to these posts in the upper subordinate grades, that is, posts of Rs. 250 and over, are such that require knowledge, training and experience. Often we are pressed to take in persons direct into the rank of Traffic Inspectors of Railways. Now, Sir, I just give a brief outline of the duties of a Traffic Inspector of Railways. He is required, so far as his jurisdiction is concerned, to see that all trains, passengers and goods run to time table time and to investigate causes of delay. He is expected to take the initiative to put matters right. He is concerned with all matters connected with the working of trains and to bring important defects to the notice of his superior officers. He is expected to make suggestions for the framing of working time tables of railways. He is required to assist the Traffic Officers in getting most out of the wagons during the busy season of a railway. The importance of this duty cannot be over-estimated and it is only a Traffic Inspector with ability and experience that can give his best to the railway in this connection. He is also in charge of the duty of seeing that no unavoidable delay takes place in loading and unloading of wagons at stations. He is required to give close and constant attention to the quick transit of smalls. For this purpose a detailed knowledge of traffic in smalls and a clear conception of working costs and operating conditions generally is essential. I can go on enumerating many more of the duties and responsibilities of a Traffic Inspector, but I do not think I need weary the House any further. I think it is quite clear that, in order to discharge those duties efficiently, we want men of training and of experience. And what, Sir, is true of the duties of a Traffic Inspector of a railway is true, although the degree might differ, sometimes a little more and sometimes a little less, it is true of the duties of all the upper subordinate posts of our railways which carry a salary of Rs. 250 and more. But I can quite understand my Honourable friends who are interested in this question from the point of view of proper Muslim representation and who are absolutely dissatisfied with this low percentage of four, saying, "But what are you going to do, if you are really out to increase this percentage at the quickest possible rate?"

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum: We do not want an increase. We only want justice to be done to us.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: What we are going to do is this. We have already started training schools some years ago, and we are going to carry out our policy of training our employees with greater vigour and with greater intensity. We are going to see that our subordinates in the lower grades of all classes and communities—particularly the Muslim community, which is not properly represented in the upper grades—are taken into our training schools and given proper technical training so as to fit them, within the quickest possible time, to fill the higher posts that fall vacant. I am hopeful that the rate at which the Muslims will get into these posts will be much faster than hitherto.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: When will you start doing that?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I should like, in this connection, to read out to the House a passage from a letter that I caused to be written to the Agents of all Railways.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Lucknow Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): What is the date?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: This month.

An Honourable Member: Perhaps yesterday?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: May be. I ought to explain the reasons for not writing this letter two or three months back. It was decided that this subject should be discussed with the Agents of Railways in March when they all come up here for a Conference with the Railway Board. We have placed this subject for discussion before them. There is and was no intention of delaying the matter. The matter could not be discussed earlier. The letter says:

"The Board would be obliged if Agents of Railways would come prepared to discuss also the arrangements in force for training persons already in service to become equipped with knowledge and experience to be able to undertake efficiently the conduct of the duties of the higher paid posts in the subordinate ranks of all departments of the railway. One important aspect of this question is that ample opportunities should be afforded to the Indians in the different lower grades to qualify quickly for promotion to the higher grades. It is the Board's desire that the arrangements should be such that their practical effect will be evident in the figures relating to the number of Indians occupying the upper subordinate posts in the different departments of railways."

I may add, Sir, that in addition to what is written there, I am going to take up the matter with vigour with the Agents, especially the Agents of the Company-managed railways

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: The Honourable Member has been telling us things like this for the past four or five years. Agents come and Agents go, but nothing is done and things go on in the usual way.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: The signs are hopeful. It is better that we hold meetings twice a year than once in five or six years.

I now turn for a moment to the observation made by my Honourable friend Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim. He said that two vacancies occurred on the East Indian Railway by the transfer from that Railway of two Mussalman officers to the Railway Board. He wanted to know why we did not take this excellent opportunity offered to us and put two Mussalman officers in their places. I want to explain, for the information of my Honourable friend, that when officers of our services are transferred from one post to another, it does not mean that we have a vacancy in our services and can recruit people against those vacancies. Our recruitment is made upon the basis of calculating the number of vacancies against our cadre and we rectify the recruitment numbers so arrived at with reference to the number of vacancies that actually occur from year to year and the members of the community that get in are those that come in under our ordinary rules. Now, I must pass on to make a reference . .

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Are those two vacancies then filled up by somebody else? Then there is no vacancy there at all for the Mussalman gentlemen who were brought into the Railway Board?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Of the two Mussalmans that were brought into the Railway Board, one was brought in to fill a post that had been in existence for a considerable time, and it merely meant that one officer went from here—a European officer went from here—and the Mussalman officer from the East Indian Railway came in his place. There was no real vacancy at all. In the other case, it was a newly created post of Deputy Director of Establishment. Inasmuch as it is a new post, we recruited one more man to fill a vacancy in our services in the ordinary way. I think, Sir, at this stage I ought to refer to the fact that a deputation of Muslim gentlemen,—I think they were all Members of the Assembly and the Council of State,—waited upon Sir George Rainy in September, 1929, and complained of the paucity of Muslims in the Railway services, and instanced the office of the Railway Board, the Audit Department of the Eastern Bengal Railway and the Accounts Department of the East Indian Railway. Sir George Rainy pointed out that the Audit Department of the Eastern Bengal Railway was not under his control, that the Accounts Department of the East Indian Railway was under the Financial Commissioner of Railways and that he understood that the Financial Commissioner had introduced a competitive examination for the recruitment of people in the subordinate services, and that, in accordance with the general declared policy of the Government of India, one-third of the vacancies were reserved for the rectification of communal inequalities. For the rest, he gave me strict instructions that I was to review the position and to see what could be done in order that Muslims should have proper representation.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Is it not a fact that this competitive system was introduced very recently?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Is the Honourable Member talking of the competitive system in the Railway Accounts Department?

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Yes.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: The Accounts Department is an infant only one year old and therefore the system was very recently introduced.

One of the members of this deputation suggested the issue of a supplementary circular letter to all Agents, drawing attention to the previous orders of Government on the subject of recruitment to the subordinate ranks, and asking that the Agents of Railways should be instructed to observe them very carefully in future. But after some discussion, the deputation agreed with Sir George Rainy that the better course would be for the Railway Board to discuss the question with the representatives of the Railways when they come up in October and to find out from them what difficulties they had in obtaining a suitable proportion of Muslims for the subordinate services. The deputation represented that it was possible that we did not get all the Muslims that we wanted because advertisements did not appear in the newspapers which were read by Muslims. We took up that question at once and we wrote to every Agent and told him that he was to pay strict attention to this. Now, Sir, I should like to explain that, when the Agents came for the discussion, I took them over all the figures that I had, and other figures too which they brought with them, and I insisted on the view which I just mentioned, that I was absolutely disappointed with the percentage of Muslims in the upper subordinate ranks, and I asked them to do their best to see that their arrangements were such that the defects were remedied in the quickest possible time. But I think I ought, in fairness to the House, to refer to just one or two passages which the Agents put before me as to their difficulties in getting the number of Muslim candidates that they required. Here is a brief extract from what the Agent of the North Western Railway said. I am not going to say that I entirely agree with all the views of the Agents, but they are in day to day contact with things and we are entitled to hear them.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Did you inquire who wrote this note for the Agent?

Mr. President: Mr. Hayman.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I do not do that, Sir,

"The great majority are not wanting Railway employment. I imagine a very large proportion of Muslims are at the land. I think it is very difficult to lay down any rule which would ensure our recruiting even the full proportion of Muhammadans."

The Agent of the East Indian Railway gave me certain figures to show that the number of Muhammadans was very low in the upper grades but had doubled itself in the course of four years and he thought that the rate of increase was going to continue until the representation reached a reasonable figure. He informed me that he had pressed upon his Divisional Superintendents and Heads of Departments the desirability of giving Muslims a fair chance, and especially of making appointments to suitable grades. He said that selections were made by selection committees, and he assured me that there was no communal bias of any sort against Muslims. He added:

"Our upper subordinates are recruited from people in the lower grades and all appointments are made from men who come in at the bottom, but when it comes to clerical work, the work of Assistant Station Masters and people of that sort, there is a distinct difficulty in getting Muhammadans. At Asansol for 25 vacancies we examined something like 300 applicants, of whom only 5 were Muhammadans. I was particularly keen on getting in Muhammadans to balance up matters, but they were not putting in applications, and I know that it was not that applications were withheld because all applications were opened by the Staff Superintendent himself who was just as keen as myself to get Muhammadans."

Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury (Assam: Muhammadan): Were the posts advertised in the papers?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: They were advertised; but I will not take the line that they had been properly advertised, because we admit that we did examine this question and gave instructions to the Agents as to how they were to proceed in the matter of advertisements in future.

This is what the Agent of the Eastern Bengal Railway said:

"We have difficulty in getting guards, clerks, storemen, first-class apprentices and train examiners who are Muhammadans. I may say that, while I have had many letters from Hindu gentlemen asking me for jobs for their relatives, I have not had one single letter from a Muhammadan,—direct application to myself I mean. And if you take the case of my Chief Medical Officer who is a Muslim, he had the greatest difficulty in finding one Muslim Assistant Surgeon to accept employment on the Railway."

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: I could give him half a dozen if he had asked me.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I made that remark in order to provoke my friend Mr. Ghuznavi to reply. I am glad he made that statement because I shall be happy to pass it on.

Mr. Richardson, representing the Great Indian Peninsula Railway said:

"Our experience seems to be similar to that of the East Indian Railway. In the ordinary way Muslims do not apply."

I impressed upon all those present, Sir, what I told you I did, and I followed it up by making up our mind that we should discuss this matter again with the Agents when they come up in March on the basis of the figures I have placed before the House today. But there is one other little thing that I ought to mention to show that we are really in earnest in our efforts to accelerate the pace at which Muslims shall get proper representation in our upper subordinate grades. I have felt, not only now but even before I took my present post, that one of the ways by which Muslims would get fair representation was if some of the posts of Staff Officers on our Railways were filled by Muslim officers. It is only a little time ago that, following up this idea, the Railway Board consented to send out a Superintendent of the Office as an officer in the North Western Railway in one of these staff appointments. Very recently again when I wanted a staff appointment on the East Indian Railway, I went out of my way to the Department of Industries and Labour and got a Muslim gentleman from there and put him into the post. Now I am going to follow that up and if I have two Staff Officers in this little time, I shall have a proper proportion of Muslim Staff Officers on our State Railways as quickly as I possibly can; and I think that, if our Staff Officers are Mussalmans, they will, without doing injustice to the other communities,—I make a strong point of this, Sir,—make the Muslim subordinates understand the value of getting better equipped and better trained and becoming more efficient and thus qualifying for the higher posts.

I think, Sir, I can bring my remarks to a close just now. Before I do so, I wish again to emphasise that I am still not satisfied with the representation which the Muslims have in the upper subordinate posts on our railways. But I give my solemn undertaking that I have this question at heart, and I will push it forward with all the energy that I can command. I will be the driving force in this question, and I shall get the Agents of railways to take my view and to rectify the existing defects. But, Sir, I also wish to make it clear that nothing that I or the Agents will do will be done in a way to bring about injustice to any of the other communities.

Sir, I oppose the motion.

Raja Ghazanfar Ali Khan (North Punjab: Muhammadan): Sir, such a speech, even if it had come from a Back Bencher of the Nationalist Party, would have been the cause of great disappointment to every fair minded Member of this House. It is a greater disappointment when it comes from such a responsible officer of the Railway Board. He has enumerated certain usual drawbacks which are generally pointed out against a community whose proportion in the services is very unjust and unfair. He has not told us of any specific remedy to remove those defects. He has laid great emphasis on certain things, about which no mention was made by any Member. He has said that the Government would not be guilty of this and that. He has said that they would not be guilty of giving preference to juniors over seniors who are already in the service and have got a long record of service behind them. Nobody has so far brought forward that suggestion or put that suggestion before him. What we wanted was that, subject to efficiency, the representation of each community should be in proportion to its population. Nobody denies that efficiency is absolutely essential for any responsible service. But what we want is that a community which is already backward, even if it satisfies the minimum demands, the minimum qualifications required for that service, should be given preference, even if the members of the other communities happen to hold a few more qualifications by way of getting more marks in the examinations. This is what we want. He has said he has been writing letters to the Agents every year and that Agents have been meeting annually in March with a view to consider whether they can find means and ways of giving more appointments to the minority communities. The result of all these efforts for long years has been that the percentage of the Muslim community still remains at 4 per cent. Whatever his reasons may be, whatever arguments he may have given, however many meetings may have been held, and however many circulars might have issued, the fact remains that the Muhammadans are still 4 per cent., and that percentage remains almost stationary or has remained stationary for a long time. As I have already pointed out, we do not want that the service should suffer on account of inefficiency. We would not insist that a non-technical Muhammadan should be appointed to a technical post if he has not qualified himself for that post. But what we want is that the community should not be deprived of a fair and equal opportunity of getting these appointments, even when we are thoroughly convinced that they have been making rapid progress in education and can produce and supply any number of young men absolutely efficient and able to carry on the duties if they are given a fair opportunity. I am afraid the real trouble is that in all these comparatively unimportant posts, when they fall vacant, it is not the Members of the Railway Board who decide as to who should be appointed to these posts and how these posts should be advertised. It is the men in the office, the Superintendents, the Head Clerks and so on in whose hands lie these appointments mostly. I would not blame them for having communal prejudice. Some of them, I am sure, must be absolutely fair-minded and liberal-minded who do not care for these small communal matters; but it is natural that every human being would like to give preference to one who is related to him in some way, by ties of blood or by friendship or by association.

Now, the fact is this, that a Superintendent who happens to be a Hindu, because as you know a large majority of them are Hindus, receives a recommendation letter from a friend who has got his son-in-law or some cousin of his son-in-law applying for a post. If Sir Hari Singh Gour's efforts would be successful in getting a Bill through this House for inter-marriages, I think this question would not arise. (Laughter.) But when the Superintendent is determined to appoint one of his own relations or the relation of a friend of his as a clerk, that man must be a Hindu. Under the present circumstances, he cannot be a Muhammadan. That is the real trouble, and unfortunately the subordinates form an idea of the policy of the officers, but not by the circulars which are issued nor by the speeches which are made in this House where the speaker knows fully well that there are at least 20 or 30 people sitting opposite who will have the opportunity of criticising. But they judge from the temperament, from the general habits and nature of that officer as to what he wants. For instance, you issue a circular. In that circular you write that efficiency should be the chief consideration; nobody's interests should suffer; you must not be unjust to any community and so on, and you put down about one dozen qualifications and then down below you write that you are gravely disappointed to find that there are certain communities who have not got a fair proportion of appointments. Your last sentence has got absolutely no value for them. They know that you are doing it just to get up and answer a charge when it is levelled against you that a certain community has a very poor representation. That is the fact that you have to face. Unless you are determined to pass a definite rule that, for a certain service you want a B.A. or M.A., or a man with certain qualifications, and for some years to come you would not entertain any application from any person belonging to the majority community who are already preponderating in that service, unless you make that your definite policy, your attempt would not be successful. But if you make this a point, a definite matter of policy, your attempt next year would not be, when we again start this question, simply to get up and read out half a dozen circulars to us. Unless you make it a definite policy, I think there is absolutely no use, and no person will be satisfied with whatever reasons you may give.

Another point to which my Honourable friend has just now referred—I am glad he has given me an opportunity to say something about that—is that a certain officer was disappointed that, while half a dozen Hindu friends sent introductory letters to him, no Muhammadan sent any and that shows that the Muhammadans are indifferent. Luckily I have got a little bit of personal knowledge of the North Western Railway because I come from that province. In the first instance, I think it is much easier to have an interview with His Excellency the Viceroy for one hour than to see your Agents even for five minutes. (Hear, hear.) It is not an easy process to approach an Agent. The man who wants to see him may have a very important public position and he may want to see the Agent on a matter of public interest, still if I just describe the process he has got to go through, you will all agree with me that no self-respecting man would ever consider to go near him. You go to the office and half a dozen chaprasis come up to you and ask you, "Whom do you want to see?" You say, "Agent". "Yes, all right, you see the Superintendent first." "I have not come to see the Superintendent, but I want to see the Agent. If you want I will see the Agent's Private Secretary." They say "No; if you want to see the Agent's Private Secretary, you have got to see the Superintendent". The Superintendent, if he thinks that there are sufficient reasons to give, will recommend your name to the Secretary. Then the Secretary will call you. He will hold another inquiry, and if I satisfy him, he will say, "Yes, there is some legitimate object for which you want to see the Agent". Then he will mention it to the Agent who may send you the word before you get into his room that he could hardly spare three minutes and you must finish your conversation within three minutes.

I can tell you, it is not a story, these are all facts. How can you expect any man who has got any worth among the public to go and even discuss these questions with your Agents? If we were convinced that every responsible officer in the Railway Department was honestly after finding out means to satisfy the legitimate demands of various communities, everyone of us would have given our heartiest support to him and would help him in every possible way. On the other hand, we find that their attitude is most hostile and insulting.

Then another thing which you mentioned to us was that the number of vacancies is limited. I do not think there is any Member of this House who would ask you to increase Budget and to create new post simply to employ Muhammadans. What is the use of your plea? If a man is prosecuted criminally and is before a court for a charge of theft or murder, he goes there and says, "Well I most emphatically deny that I have ever committed a theft, I most emphatically deny that I have ever committed a murder", but that is not going to help him. You say that the Government

Mr. President: Order, order. Owing to his long absence from this Chamber the Honourable Member has perhaps forgotten the rule that he should address the Chair.

Raja Ghazanfar Ali Khan: I am much obliged to you, Sir. I am absolutely certain, Sir, that if the Members of the Railway Board, and every responsible officer for the matter of that—we cannot draw any distinction between one Department and another, particularly in the Government of India—almost everywhere they are more busy with higher matters of policy than with these little affairs which do really matter. If the Government of India would persist in this policy, which is more or less one of indifference in communal matters, I am sure unfortunately they will be responsible indirectly for creating trouble. What will be the result? Now, supposing, Sir, after one year, we have got people's representatives sitting on those benches and in charge of the various Departments, and supposing a Muhammadan happens to take the place of the Honourable Sir George Rainy, he would naturally be anxious to see at least that his community is not unjustly treated. No doubt, within one month, Sir, you will find big articles appearing in all the papers that a Muhammadan has been appointed and there is another Aurangzeb who has come to India. But on the other hand, if this policy is really pursued by the Government, of doing justice to the legitimate claims of the Muhammadan community, just as they are situated at present, nobody would blame them for being another Aurangzeb. They are therefore in a better position to satisfy our legitimate demands, and I trust that, instead of making speeches, giving arguments, and trying to reply to all the points put by the Opposition, they would honestly and earnestly do their best to remove these legitimate grievances.

Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury: Mr. Hayman has told us that he is disappointed with the rate of progress of the employment of Muhammadans in the railway services, but I am very much disappointed, Sir, with the speech he has made. Lord Reading, Sir, laid it down as the policy of the Government that in all Government services one-third of the vacancies should be reserved for minorities for removing communal inequalities. Some years ago the Home Department issued a circular to that effect to all Government Departments. But, Sir, the autocrats of the Railway Board have no respect either for the Home Department circular or the pronouncement of the Viceroy. In the office of the Railway Board, the policy of the Government acquires a new orientation; they absolutely ignore the Home Department's circular and the Viceregal pronouncement. They have got, Sir, a wonderful set of rules, which must have precedence over everything else. Mr. Hayman says that there are few vacancies in the railway services. Mr. Ghuznavi referred to 49 appointments that were made last year in the gazetted rank in State Railways, and searching throughout the length and breadth of India from Kashmir to Cape Comorin, Mr. Hayman could not find more than one single Muhammadan who could satisfy the requirements of his rules. I do not know, Sir, what those wonderful rules are, but whatever his rules may be, I think they are only fit to be thrown into the waste-paper basket, because these rules contravene the policy laid down by the Government of India, by the Viceroy. Then, Sir, Mr. Hayman says that Muhammadans do not stand high up in the examinations. May I inquire, Sir, from Mr. Hayman what is that examination which all the Anglo-Indian boys pass when they get into the railway services in their hundreds? His talk about all these examinations is mere eye-wash. (Interruption.) I do say, Sir, that in making appointments in the railway services, there is nepotism and jobbery. Mr. Hayman himself has quoted what one Agent said, namely, that he received several letters from several Hindu friends for one particular job. Then Mr. Hayman said, in reply to an interruption from Mr. Ghuznavi, that there had been an increase in the percentage of Muhammadans. The increase has been, Sir, from 3.8 to 4 per cent. in one year. I think, Sir, that if we make progress at this magnificent rate, Dr. Ziauddin will be able to calculate if, by the end of this century, we shall be able to reach the one-third percentage! But, Sir, I am not going to make any appeal to the Government to redress the grievances. I know it is absolutely futile. I have no illusions in that respect, Sir. My Honourable friend, Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim, with a very pathetic faith in the sense of justice of the Government, goes on interpellating day after day only to receive the most evasive and most arrogant replies from Mr. Parsons. When I think, Sir, of the attitude of the Government towards Mussalmans, I am reminded of certain lines of Kipling in his ballad "Tommy Atkins" in the "Ballads of the Barrack Room":

"It is Tommy this, and Tommy that,
And Tommy get away. . . .
It is thank you, Mr. Atkins,
When the Band begins to play,
And the Band begins to play,
And the Band begins to play."

[Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury.]

Well, Sir, whenever any nasty job is to be done, when the Simon Commission is to be supported or the Public Safety Bill is to be rushed through, Government remember their dear old friends, the Mussalmans. It is then all fraternisation, all hugs, embraces and kisses, all a case of, "Thank you, Mr. Atkins, I am very much obliged", but when the job is finished, the Government have no use for the Mussalmans. Then the position is, "Get away". I want to say to Mr. Ghuznavi and Mr. Azim that this is the reward of all flirtation that they have been carrying on with the Government for the last three years. The more kisses we bestow, the more kicks our community receives. So, Sir, I am not going to appeal to the Government. I shall address my appeal to my Honourable friend on my right, my own fellow countrymen; I wish to tell them that here is a section of their countrymen who are smarting under a real sense of grievance, and they look to them, Sir, and to Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, as Nationalists, as the custodians of the interests of Indians both the Hindus and Muhammadans, to see that their grievances are redressed. We, Sir, do not want any special privilege, we want only bare justice; we want that, having regard to the requirements of efficiency, our community should get their due share. That is all we want. And we shall be satisfied with nothing less.

(Munshi Iswar Saran rose to speak.)

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member wish to address the House?

Munshi Iswar Saran: It looks like it, Sir.

Mr. President: I hope no heat will be introduced into the debate. Munshi Iswar Saran.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Sir, I am rather surprised that an inoffensive, harmless and cold and cool-headed person like myself should by any stretch of imagination be considered to be guilty, even in his wildest moments, of producing heat.

Sir, I deeply regret that I have to intervene in this debate. I had not the slightest idea of addressing the House on this question, though I have considerable sympathy with the motion of my Honourable friend, Mr. Ghuznavi. My Honourable friend, Raja Ghazanfar Ali, however, has left me no choice but to make the position of the Back Benchers of the Nationalist Party quite clear. May I say, in passing, that this kind of game is one at which two can play? I shall not condescend to cross swords with Raja Ghazanfar Ali over the political attitude of the Back Benchers of the Nationalist Party. I shall only tell him that, only yesterday and the day before, the Back Benchers were discussing this question, and each and every one, without any exception, was in considerable sympathy with the grievance of the Muhammadans that their representation in the railway services was not what it ought to be. But, Sir, a friend of mine, whose name I shall not mention, has told me after Raja Ghazanfar Ali's speech that, in view of the remarks that he has made and the suggestions that he has put forward, the only course left was to remain neutral. I do not know what course we shall ultimately adopt. But I wish to say Maulvi Sayyid Murtuza Saheb Bahadur (South Madras: Muhammadan): Is that the decision of your party, or your individual opinion?

Munshi Iswar Saran: A Back Benchers' decision, Sir.

Dr. A. Suhrawardy (Burdwan and Presidency Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): Back Benchers in rebellion!

Munshi Iswar Saran: Thank God that ours is a party in which the Back Benchers are not in battalions; it is much better than a party which has got no Back Benchers.

There is one very dangerous remark which was made by Mr. Hayman, and I sincerely hope that Sir George Rainy or the Railway Board or the Executive Council will not accept it. What he says is this; appoint some Staff Officers who are Muhammadans and then this difficulty will be removed. No, Sir; do not appoint Staff Officers who are either Hindus, Muhammadans or Parsis or Christians in order to make up the deficiency of their respective communities in this or that service. Appoint Staff Officers who will hold the scales even. You want men who will not allow their judgment to be influenced by the consideration that they belong to this or that community.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Past story is so very shady.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I have very little acquaintance with shady affairs, Sir, and so I am afraid I cannot express any opinion about them. I do think that the suggestion of Mr. Hayman that the appointment of Staff Officers should be made in order to enable these officers to make up the deficiency of their communities is thoroughly wrong in principle and a strong protest against it is necessary.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Then you will have to remove all the existing Staff Officers.

Munshi Iswar Saran: My Honourable friend, the distinguished Deputy President of this House, hardly does me the honour of following me. I cannot have the impudence to suggest that he has not got the brains to understand my remarks, he has not been gracious enough to follow what I was saying. Have by all means Muhammadans in adequate numbers in the railway services; they should not have a feeling of grievance as indeed no community should have a feeling of grievance. But what I say—and I beg you to consider it seriously—is, do not appoint any Muhammadan or any Hindu in order that that particular officer may be able to appoint more men of his community. That principle is vicious and should be condemned outright.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Therefore I said you will have to remove all the existing officers.

Munshi Iswar Saran: No, because they have not been appointed for this reason, they have not been appointed with the distinct object that they will make up the deficiency of appointments of this community or that.

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum: But still the result is the same.

Munshi Iswar Saran: My Honourable friends do not realise what they are talking about. If that be so, then they are giving a handle to the other side to say, "If we appoint Hindus, Muhammadans suffer and if we appoint Muhammadans, the Hindus suffer". Where are we going to end then? (An Honourable Member: "That is childish.") (Another Honourable Member: "The Muhammadans have suffered.") My

[Munshi Iswar Saran.]

Honourable friend, Raja Ghazanfar Ali, put forward a suggestion which I think again requires a word of very strong protest, and it is this; he says, make a rule that no one of the majority community should be appointed till the percentage of the Muslim community is completed

Raja Ghazanfar Ali Khan: No; of all the minority communities.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Let us pause and consider the matter (An Honourable Member: "This was the scheme of Mr. C. R. Das.") It does not lie in the mouth of those who have deserted Mr. C. R. Das to take his name in vain. What I submit is this; if you are trying to lay down a principle like this, you are bound to create more bad blood. I cordially support my friend, Mr. Abdul Matin Chaudhury, in the remarks that he has made. It is a matter which has to be settled by goodwill, by forbearance, by sympathy.

Raja Ghazanfar Ali Khan: It is Government's duty as well.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I agree, it is Government's duty as well, and let Government do it, not in the way suggested by Raja Ghazanfar Ali, but in the way which meets with the approval of every sensible, every thoughtful and every patriotic Hindu, Muhammadan, Christian, Parsi or Sikh.

Raja Ghazanfar Ali Khan: I agree with the word "sensible".

Munshi Iswar Saran: Sir, I will allow that remark to pass without notice. I wish only to say this; that the motion of Mr. Ghuznavi has considerable force. While I was studying the question of Indianisation only yesterday, I felt myself that the representation of Muhammadans in the railway services was very inadequate and that it did need looking into. There is no doubt about it. I shall discuss this question in detail later on. I shall say only one word to my friends on the other side and then resume my seat. Let them and us unite in putting forward such proposals as will bring them the relief they are entitled to. Let us unite in getting Indianisation and at the same time in getting the share of the Muhammadan, the Hindu, the Sikh, the Parsi and every other community in India; let every one have its due share, but let us unite in order to get the real power. Let us unite so that these services might be Indianised; let us concentrate our attention on Indianisation rather than on proposals which lead to discord. And may I, before I sit down, say that my Honourable friends, like Raja Ghazanfar Ali, should, particularly at this juncture, take great care not to say things which are unnecessarily provocative, because every effort is being made so that such differences as we have may be destroyed and not perpetuated.

Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan (East Central Punjab: Muhammadan): Sir, I did not want to speak on this occasion, as I thought that my 12 Noon. proposed cut would give me an opportunity to express my views on this subject, but I am afraid that, at the rate we are progressing, I may never reach my cut, and therefore, Sir, I welcome the occasion which is afforded to me by this proposed cut of my friend, Mr. Ghuznavi. Sir, I do not desire that this debate should degenerate into a purely communal discussion. I do not desire that any communal bitterness should be introduced on this occasion, but I do desire that the just claims of the communities, especially of the minorities, should be conceded, and I expect my friends on both sides to consider that, in the matter of giving justice, there should be no question of communities. They must come forward and follow the divine law that justice should be administered without fear or favour

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Hear, hear, I am with you.

Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: I know that some Honourable Members on my right and some others on the official Benches are terribly bored on account of the long discussion on this subject, but I would request them to have a little patience and to weigh the question scrupulously and see on which side the justice lies. Sir, no organised community can last long unless it is based on justice and fair play, and if justice is not given, then that community is doomed to failure and destruction. We are now approaching a period when new aspirations will find material expression, I hope very shortly, in the matter of new reforms, and I appeal to my Hindu brethren that they must on this occasion show by their attitude that they can be safely entrusted with the interests of other peoples, and if they do not show that attitude, then India's aspirations will not materialise. It is a great problem, and I hope that they will not, by their attitude, try to destroy the efforts which are made by the whole of India to regain the liberties lost by her.

Mr. M. S. Aney (Berar Representative): Including yourself.

Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Sir, in this matter of the employment of Mussalmans in the service of the railways I am very deeply interested, as my community set up a great agitation when they knew that they were very unfairly and unjustly treated, and in response to that agitation the Government issued a circular in 1925, in which they laid down, in categorical terms, that the claims of the minorities must be properly safeguarded, and that 33 per cent. of the appointments should be reserved for redressing communal inequalities, and the remaining 67 per cent., should go to other communities, but the minorities also might be given the benefit of these appointments. The Mussalmans were for the time being satisfied, and they thought that, after all, justice was coming, but experience showed that justice delayed was justice denied. No real amelioration of the conditions of service with regard to Mussalmans took place. The Railway Clearing Accounts Office was established soon after this, and the Muhammadans expected that, as a result of their agitation, the assurance given by Government in 1925 was adequate and that their claims would be properly considered. The Clearing Accounts Office had, as its Director, Mr. Scott, and as Assistant Director, one gentleman called Rai Bahadur Faqir Chand. I need not introduce the Rai Bahadur to the House here, because his notorious activities with regard to ignoring Muhammadan claims are well known, and although articles appeared in the public Press, and questions in the Assembly were asked, no notice was taken of his activities. Not only that. On the contrary, Government tried to justify the high-handed proceedings of this officer. (An Honourable Member: "He was promoted.") Yes, as my friend tells me, he was promoted. That was the reward of his notorious activities. Numerous questions were asked in this Assembly demanding that figures might be supplied as to the strength of the staff and the situation of the communities in this office. But Mr. Parsons systematically refused to give this information, and I think his plea was that he did not want to accentuate communal feelings. Well, that was a very honourable and admirable object, but may I ask him, if these figures you can easily conclude that the silence or the refusal of Mr. Parsons was rather significant. Mr. Mitra has said that 17 men were given rapid promotion, and out of these 17, there was only one Muhammadan. I will show the House how that rapid promotion was given. I will read out the names:

Name.	Qualifica- tion.	Date of appointment.	Pay at the time of appointment.	Present Pay.
			Rs.	Rs.
Mr. Kashi Ram	F.A.	April 1926 . .	100	190
Mr. Jodish Ram	Matric.	December 1925	80	120
Mr. Prem Chand	B.Sc.	January 1926 . .	60	160
Mr. Jaswant Rai	B.A.	February 1926 . .	60	170
Mr. Faqir Chand	Matric	Transferred from Audit.	54	146
Mr. Kishori Lal	do.	do. . . .	42	146
Kunwar Kishor	do.	December 1925 . .	60	115

—Now, comes the list of wretched Muhammadans—

Mr. Abdul Rahman	B.A.	April 1926 . .	60	76
Mr. Abdur Rashid	F.A.	April 1925 . .	50	60
Mr. Mohammad Hasan	F.A.	April 1925 . .	50	60
Mr. Abdur Rashid	F.Sc.	Transferred from Audit.	60	78
Mr. Saeed	Matric.	July 1927 . .	100	80 plus 20

—It is a sort of degradation—

Mr. Sardar Mhammad	F.A.	May 1926 . .	50	76
Mr. Ahmad Hasan	B.A.	1928 . .	60	60
Mr. Abdul Hamid	B.A., LL.B.	1928 . .	80	80

Well, Sir, from the above list you can easily see how the Muhammadans are being treated. Although the official Benches were doleful and very bored, I cannot help saying that, in spite of their boredom and ennui, they must pay some regard to the claims of the Muhammadans, and I do hope that this voice which is raised in protest against the injustice done to the Muhammadans will carry weight with them and pave the way for the amelioration of the lot of the Muhammadans in the near future.

Colonel J. D. Crawford (Bengal: European): It was not my intention, Sir, to intervene in this debate, but I think we feel very strongly on these Benches that there is every necessity to show the utmost justice to minorities. It may be that we, minorities ourselves, are not active enough in pushing our way into the various services, but if that is the position, then it seems to me that it is up to Government to go out and make a greater endeavour to secure recruits from communities inadequately represented, rather than leave the position as it is. I recognise that Government on this occasion have made a very reasonable statement to the Muhammadans. Mr. Hayman's speech seems to me to have been thoroughly conciliatory. Still the figures—I think even my Hindu friends will admit—are not satisfactory, and if this sort of proportion is to remain in the services, we are going to have our communal differences extended for a considerable time. The way out of the difficulty, it appears to me, is to go out and see if you cannot find, by special recruitment, sufficient numbers of any particular community to meet your requirements. It is perfectly true that the Muhammadans have not turned their attention adequately to service in the Railway Department, and I admit, therefore, the difficulty of Government, but it might be possible for Government to advertise more freely and make a real effort to see whether they cannot get members of the Muhammadan community suited to their purpose. The actual motion, of course, if passed, would be a motion of censure on Government, and I do not feel that that is justified in view of Mr. Hayman's reply to the House. It seems to me that the debate points to the fact that we all desire Government to continue with its policy of finding equality in the services for the various communities, and if the opinion of my Muhammadan friends is that, I suggest that the debate might be left there by the withdrawal of Mr. Ghuznavi's motion.

Mr. Abdul Haye (East Punjab: Muhammadan): Sir, I want to say only a few words by way of reply to what fell from the lips of my Honourable friend Munshi Iswar Saran. After making certain remarks, towards the end of his speech he appealed to the Muhammadan Members and said, "You make common cause with us in the matter of Indianisation of the services". Well, Sir, I have been in this Assembly for seven years now, and during this period, there has not been a single occasion when a Mussalman Member has stood in the way of Indianisation of the services. We have always lent our unqualified and whole-hearted support to this national claim. But here this morning, I want to say, that even in that matter of Indianisation, my unfortunate community has suffered. Sir, my Honourable friend Mr. Hayman, the spokesman of the Railway Board, when he was on his legs on Saturday afternoon replying to the arguments of my Honourable friend Mr. Ghuznavi, did not dare to come to the point at issue straight. For a pretty long time, he was beating about the bush. He said, "We, Members of the Railway Board, have been very busy with the scheme of Indianisation and we have achieved a great success". He said, "About 75 per cent. of Indianisation has been accomplished and when what remains is also achieved, we shall turn round and see what is due to the Mussalmans. We shall then do something in that direction." This clearly means that, up till now, they have ignored this important community. Sir, his argument reminded me of the robbers and their code of ethics. What do robbers do when they go out to carry out their nefarious trade? They put their heads together and they say, "Here we have to rob other people of their property. At the time when we will commit a dacoity or robbery the time at our disposal would be very short. Let us make the best of the occasion and carry away as much property of our victim as we can. Let us neither quarrel, nor find fault with each other. Do not say, you have taken more than myself, and when we go superior nature. Whether we are Hindus or Muhammadans or Christians, if statements are made which we think are unjust and which we think had better not have been made, we need not necessarily reply to them. Let us ignore them and yet see what justice there is at the bottom of the proposal that is put forward. Perhaps in that way we shall be holding up a much better example to our fellow-workers than by attempting to answer and to criticise what we disapprove and hold to be wrong.

Well, Sir, I do not wish to detain the House longer. I feel that there are some steps which may be taken. There is something evidently wrong. The number of Muhammadan young men available in the country is happily now very much larger than it was twenty years ago. Education has made great progress, and Muslim young men are giving a very good account of themselves even in the competitions at the Universities and in their examinations. May it be that want of due publicity of vacancies in these offices or at the requirements of these offices, i.e., want of knowledge among Muslim candidates of these requirements, is responsible for a sufficient number of young men not offering themselves for the services to which reference has been made? In any case I hope that the Government of India and the Universities and other Educational institutions will co-operate to let the student world know what the requirements of particular departments are. And not merely that, but they should give students facilities to qualify themselves for service in those departments in which Mussalmans may be found to be very deficient in number. I think, Sir, it should be recognised that it is the duty of the Government of the day, whichever Government it may be, that it should inform the youth of the country, without any distinction and without any partiality, of what opportunities there are for them in the public services of the country and afford them facilities to obtain that particular kind of education which may be needed to qualify them for those services. If we introduce such a system, this kind of talk of any possible partiality on communal grounds will become a matter of past history. Sir, I support the motion.

Mr. M. A. Jinnah (Bombay City: Muhammadan Urban): Sir, although the motion before the House involves a very minor issue in itself, it has got a very far-reaching effect on matters of much graver importance both within the House and outside in the country. That, Sir, is my only excuse for taking part in this debate and detaining this House for a little while.

Now, Sir, my Honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, just now said that there must be some cause—of course he was not able to define it—for this appalling state of affairs which was disclosed so eloquently, not by language or oratory but by cold print, printed figures, which speak more eloquently than any language or rhetoric or any arguments. The facts have been disclosed from the official records. Now, I think it is admitted and cannot be denied that they disclose a most deplorable state of affairs. The next question is, what have the Government of India been doing, and what have the real authorities been doing. That is the next question. The same story goes on year after year. It is true—and here I can assure my Hindu friends—that some of us feel very keenly, feel very strongly on the subject, and yet we restrain ourselves from questions of this character in this House if we can possibly help it, because we do not desire that there should be created any bitterness or ill-feeling amongst Honourable Members of the position and responsibility that we find in this House. But I have always wondered, and I wondered when my Honourable friend was speaking as to what is the cause of all this. He said it may be want of due advertisement. It may be due to some causes, something or other. Sir, am I to assume that the Government and the Railway Board are so inefficient or so ignorant and so incapable of understanding a simple question of this character, namely, the recruitment of a particular community on the ground of fairness and justice to that community? Are they so incompetent that they cannot devise methods and measures? Are the Government really so bankrupt that they cannot handle this simple question? And for all these years, you know, Government knows, Sir, that this has been one of the sorest points with the Mussalmans, and we find unfortunately, beggars cannot do anything else except to wait in deputations on the Railway Board and the Government Member and His Excellency the Viceroy when he goes on tour, and every time a very nice reply is given, and we are informed that we are very loyal, and Government are always our friends, Government are always ready to do anything for the Mussalmans particularly, but "what can we do, you are not efficient, you are backward in education, we cannot find men in your community suitable for the various posts". Now, Sir, that is the argument and reason that is advanced. I am really beginning to think—and I am sorry if I am unduly accusing the Government of India—but I really am beginning to think that this is done with some object or policy behind it. I hope, I am wrong. I make the statement with great hesitation. I am really beginning to think, Sir, that this is done with some definite policy or object behind it, and that object, it seems to me is this, that Government deliberately—not because of their incompetence or incapacity of realising or appreciating—I refuse to believe that—but they deliberately follow a policy which leaves a very great grievance on the part of the Mussalmans. There are unfortunately some Hindu friends of ours who look upon this question with great resentment, and who say that the Muhammadans are, day in and day out, clamouring for appointments in the services of the Government whether they are efficient or not. The Government take advantage of that sentiment of the Hindus. In view of this sentiment the Government feel that, whenever the question comes up, the Hindus are more likely to stand up and take up this position that in the services nothing but pure merits should count, recruitment should be by competitive examination—in short, survival of the fittest. Government rely upon this attitude and feel sure that some will resort to this argument. Government therefore make use of all the sentiments, feelings and the opinions which are expressed, and know that, whenever the question comes up, the Hindus are not likely to support the Mussalmans, and that therefore the Mussalmans will be provoked, embittered, and thus estranged, they will look to Government for favours and so then steps in the Government and goes on with sweet words and occasionally throws a few crumbs with the definite object that there may not be any good understanding arrived at between the Hindus and the Muhammadans. (Hear, hear.) Now, is that your object?

Sir Hugh Cocke (Bombay: European): Sir, I rise to a point of order. Is the Honourable Member entitled to continue addressing the Government and not the Chair?

Mr. M. A. Jinnah: Sir, Sir Hugh Cocke, I think, will have to learn yet to teach me. I have been in this House much longer than he has been (Hear, hear) and I think his interruption was without any justification whatever and I think he knew it and he probably too felt my argument too strong, and he wanted to take me away from that line. I do not think he will succeed in that. (Laughter.)

Therefore, I say, and I appeal to my Hindu friends not to play this game and estrange Mussalmans, and here I want you not to misunderstand me, because, as far as I am concerned, I have from the very start of my career stood for Indianisation, and I certainly will be the last person to advocate that the efficiency of the service should in any way be prejudiced (Hear, hear.), because of communal claims. We do not want incompetent officers or servants, we want competent men. (Hear, hear.) But you must admit that, in getting competent men, in getting qualified men, you must have regard to the interests of the various communities, whether they are Anglo-Indians, whether they are Parsees, or Christians or Muhammadans. (Hear, hear.) I have always stood for Indianisation, from, I think, the days of Dadabhai Naoroji. I have always supported it, and whenever an argument was advanced in favour of efficiency, I have supported it and I think Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya will remember, once the Honourable predecessor of the Home Member, Sir William Vincent, said that if we were going to have a system of competitive examinations, the Mussalmans would suffer tremendously, and he was at that time the champion and the guardian of the interests of the Mussalmans in that particular question. I think, Sir, you were also in that Council and I remember this game being played very often. I think it has been given up now to a certain extent. Perhaps it is finding its roots deeper and becoming more ingenious than the obvious game that used to be played. His game was again to divide the Hindus and Mussalmans over this question because the motion was moved by a Hindu whose opinion was that this particular service in this particular Department should be recruited by competitive examination. And I remember, Sir, on that occasion I said that I was in favour of efficiency, and that if the competitive test was the only test of efficiency (about which I have my own doubts), I would rather follow that test, even at the expense of Mussalmans. But, Sir, that is not the point. Competition is not really after all, the best test. (Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: "Hear, hear.") It has been so found not only in this country, but in many other countries—however, I won't go into that matter now, Sir.

I therefore, Sir, whole-heartedly support this motion, and I am very glad—if I may say so, I sincerely congratulate the Leader of the Opposition on giving a correct lead to his community, which I most cordially reciprocate. (Applause.)

Mr. M. K. Acharya (South Arcot cum Chingleput: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I just want to make a few remarks, and as usual in my own philosophical way. I will be very brief. I am sure my Muhammadan friends will believe me when I say that, so far as one humble Member of this House can do anything to support this motion, I am whole-heartedly with them. I think it is a duty which I owe to myself, indeed it is a duty which I owe to my Muhammadan fellow countrymen, for whom I have so much love and regard, that I must raise my humble voice in support of what they may consider to be their legitimate share of public appointments. I am, however, a little sorry, Sir, whenever any of my friends come up with any of these questions as to the larger employment in any inferior services, or for that matter, even in the superior services, on behalf of this particular community or that particular community, and so on. I thought, Sir, that we old-fashioned Brahmins alone were beggars. I am afraid our Muhammadan friends, perhaps by long association with us, have become adepts also in this art of begging. I wish, Sir, that we could forget for a moment the art of begging, and talk of something not of service but of some kind of rule, self-rule. "How many clerks are there in such and such a Department?" I am sorry that these questions are raised constantly and are allowed to turn the course of the debate, and very often allowed too to appeal to our lower natures. That is the feeling that I had when I heard some of the remarks made today. Of course, anybody will say that it is absurd that some very good Muhammadans, clerks in offices, should be started on Rs. 60 and remain on Rs. 70 or Rs. 80 for two or three years, while some other clerks, Hindu or Anglo-Indian or Parsi, who start on Rs. 70 or Rs. 80, within two or three years rise to Rs. 200 or Rs. 270 and so on. That is injustice, and as the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition well put it, I hope such cases will be brought to the notice of the senior officer concerned, who is responsible for dealing with such petty inequalities and injustices, and that he will be dealt with it in a manner that will open the eyes of others and put them on a proper code of justice to their subordinates.

While admitting this, Sir, I will appeal to my Muhammadan friends just to think whether, having been rulers for such a long time in India, it is not rather a little derogatory to themselves that they are constantly bringing up these questions relating to the services, and laying so much stress upon the fact that there are very few Muhammadan clerks here and very few Muhammadan clerks there. Talking for the Hindus, I wish that we were able to yield more places to Muhammadans, or even to get on without Government service for that matter. I often used to tell many a graduate that had come to me, "Even a chauffeur gets Rs. 40 or Rs. 50 and even a cook gets Rs. 30, why do you wish to get a clerkship on Rs. 20 or Rs. 25?" That is my feeling with regard to these services, so let us not make a great mountain of this minor issue. As Mr. Jinnah has said, it is unfortunate that there is a major corollary attached to it. Whether we are Hindus or Mussalmans, we in this country should live in amity and peace and goodwill, and not quarrel on this small question, which is likely to engender communal heat. Let ninety per cent. of all offices be given to my Muhammadan friends rather than that communal heat and communal ill-feeling should be engendered. After all, service is not going to elevate the nation. Service is not going to bring us Swaraj. It is character, it is merit of a different calibre, and not the traits that are being cultivated as clerks in offices that we require in the great national task that lies ahead of us. That is my appeal to my Muhammadan friends. By all means let them get as many clerkships as they wish, and let my Muhammadan friends have no feeling of injustice in their minds; let the Hindus cheerfully give to them as many vacant clerks' places or even officers' places as will satisfy them; but let us stand closer together and not be deflected from the great national work that lies before us, by the consideration of a less number of Muhammadans here or a less number of Muhammadan employees there.

Maulvi Sayyid Murtuza Saheb Bahadur: Sir, but for the speech of the last speaker, my Honourable friend, Mr. M. K. Acharya, I would not have intervened in the debate at this moment. Of course, as a philosopher he has placed his philosophic observations before the House. I know what amount of philosophy he has taught to us. But am I to understand, Sir, that he is not in favour of Indianisation because Indians need not care for these appointments? If he is not in favour of Indianisation, he may of course oppose the token cut put forward by my Honourable friend, Mr. Ghuznavi, but, Sir, I do not see any reason why the Mussalman demand for a due share in the services should be ignored altogether. If non-Moslems get their due share, of course, we do not grudge it, but there is no reason why there should be animosity or ill-feeling between the communities. On the other hand, if our Sikh friend, for instance, Sardar Gulab Singh, should move the token cut standing in his name, all Mussalmans will support him. Mr. Acharya says that Mussalmans were rulers once: that is the chief reason why even now they want to rule in each and every department of the public service. Of course, we would not be contented to remain in service. So far as Swaraj is concerned, of course, my Honourable friend, Mr. M. K. Acharya, who comes from my province, knows that we are at once with him in demanding Swaraj, but before we get Swaraj, this kind of Swaraj also is necessary. Along with Indianisation we want our due share.

So far as my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, is concerned, he said he had succeeded in achieving the object to a great extent in the matter of Indianisation, but I would ask my Honourable friend as to how it is that, in attending to Indianisation, he has ignored this important minority community. He says, "Let Indianisation go on, afterwards the claims of Mussalmans will be attended to". The same thing is repeated by my Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran. Sir, he also says that Indianisation should be carried out first, and Mussalman claims may therefore be put off. But, so far as I know, Sir, he knows Persian; he cited a Persian couplet the other day. Today I am going to ask whether he knows the other couplet: Are the Muslims to keep waiting till Indianisation is effected? Are they to keep waiting for centuries? That is our case, Sir. (An Honourable Member: "This Government will pass away.")

As for another point raised by Munshi Iswar Saran, I have to say this. When he started his speech, he said at the outset that he was in favour of this cut; but after having heard the speech of Raja Ghazanfar Ali Khan, he changed his mind; and not only he but all the Back Benchers of his party. I do not know, Sir, how we come to conclusions as regards certain points. Are we not open to conviction? Are we not convinced of the justice of a certain point and then decide as to which way we should vote? Or is it the case that, because Raja Ghazanfar Ali Khan or somebody else says something which may be offensive to him, he should change his mind along with other Back Benchers? I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition has come forward and said what the attitude of that party will be. I hope the appeal made by the Leader will find a ready response in all the Members of that party. With these few words, I support the motion.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, has explained so clearly the attitude of the Government and of the Railway Board in this question and has also explained the action which we are trying to take in order to increase the proportion of Muhammadans in the railway services and I do not think it will be necessary for me to speak at any length. I have listened with the greatest interest to the debate and I should like very specially to acknowledge the words which fell from my Honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, and also from my friend, Colonel Crawford, who spoke on behalf of the European Group. I believe that it must be a cause of satisfaction to all Members of the House that a question, which my Honourable friend, Mr. Jinnah, described as small in itself but in its relations by no means small, should have been discussed in a worthy and high-minded spirit.

My Honourable friend, Mr. Jinnah, with some hesitation, expressed a doubt whether the previous action of Government in this matter was not due to some motive. All I shall say, in reply to that, is this: that for nearly three years now this question in one form or another has been before me, and I am not conscious that, on any single occasion, the motive suggested was even indirectly present to my mind as a possible motive which might dictate my line of action; and I do not believe that it has ever been present to the minds of any other Members of the Government. The other alternative is—and this, I admit is a more probable one—that the Government are incompetent

Mr. M. A. Jinnah: That is clear.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: At least we hear it so often from the other side of the House that we almost begin to believe it. Mr. Jinnah has said that, when it was such a simple matter, why did not we get to business and put things right? But, Mr. President, we know that it is not quite as simple as that. There are difficulties. I do not wish to enlarge upon these difficulties, but I must mention one, because it enables me to say something about what fell from my Honourable friend, Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan, on the subject of the Railway Clearing Accounts Office. From the figures he read out to the House, it must have been clear to Members that a very considerable proportion—I think something like four-fifths—of the men in that office are people who have been transferred from other Government or railway offices to the Clearing Accounts Office; and so far as they are concerned, necessarily the communal composition of that section of the office must be determined purely by the people who happened to be in these other offices at the time the transfer took place.

Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Because they are all non-Moslems?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I merely mean this, that if you find that in the staff of the offices from which these clerks were transferred, there was a certain proportion of a particular community, necessarily after they had been transferred the proportion will still be the same. Now, my Honourable friend, the Financial Commissioner, after the transfer took place, and recognising the great preponderance of the majority community among the men taken over from other accounts offices, undertook to go somewhat beyond the ordinary rule and to give one-third of the vacancies to minority communities, irrespective of the number of appointments these communities might obtain out of the other two-thirds owing to their success in the examination. But the difficulty is to find enough candidates from three communities to come forward and get a pass in the examination, because it appears especially in the case of the Muslim community, that those who are in a position to pass can get better appointments elsewhere. Now, I do not want to lay any great stress upon that, but it is a real difficulty. What I wish to lay particular stress on today is the view which Government take. Difficulties there are, but we want to overcome these difficulties.

[Sir George Rainy.]

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: You have been saying that all these years.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Where there is a will there is a way, and I hope my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, has convinced the House

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Not at all.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: That, so far as he is concerned, there is the will, and that he is confident he will find a way, and I hope that the pessimism of my Honourable friend, Maulvi Muhammad Yakub, will not be justified.

One of the ways he proposed to adopt came in for a little criticism from my friend, Munshi Iswar Saran. He suggested that it was wholly improper to select Staff Officers because they belonged to a particular community in the hope that they would recruit large numbers of their own community. Surely that is not quite the position. My Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, pointed out that he wished to have Muhammadan Staff Officers in the right proportion, to their numbers, in the services. Surely, no one would propose to lay down a bar against the employment of Muhammadans as Staff Officers, and surely when the position is that for one reason or another suitable candidates of the Muslim community do not present themselves for these railway appointments and that if special attention were paid to the matter, suitable candidates would come forward—surely then it is reasonable to employ as Staff Officers people who will take pains to see that they do come forward and that their claims are fairly considered? We are not dealing with a race in which both sides start fair and even. The position we have to deal with, as it is put to us from the Benches on my right, is that the Muhammadan does find great difficulty in getting a fair chance. It seems to me in those circumstances that it is most reasonable that a proper proportion of Muhammadans should be employed as Staff Officers, because if they are so employed then we can really test the assertion that there are plenty of suitable candidates if we only take the trouble to look for them. I will only add one word in conclusion, Mr. President. I have said, and in doing so I echoed the words of my Honourable friend, Mr. Jinnah, that although this particular question may be a small issue in itself it may have very important repercussions. What I wish to add is this, that nothing could give greater relief to Members of the Government than to see this communal question satisfactorily settled not only as regards appointments but everywhere else also.

Mr. President: The question is:

“That the Demand under the head ‘Railway Board’ be reduced by Rs. 100.”

(Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi rose in his place.)

Mr. President: I thought that the Honourable Member rose to reply?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: No, Sir.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member wish to withdraw?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Yes, Sir. After the assurances given by Mr. Hayman, I want the leave of the House to withdraw my motion.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member wish to withdraw?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Yes, Sir.

(Cries of “Yes” and “No” from several parts of the House.)

Khan Bahadur Makhdum Syed Rajan Bakhsh Shah (South-West Punjab: Muhammadan): “Ham log taiyar nahi hain.” (We are not prepared to agree.)

Mr. President: What is the wish of the Honourable Member? Does he wish to withdraw?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Yes, Sir. (Cries of “Yes” and “No” from several parts of the House.)

Mr. President: The question is:

“That leave be given to Mr. Ghuznavi to withdraw his motion.”

The Assembly divided:

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad (United Provinces Southern Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, before the Division results are announced, may I raise a point of order?

Mr. President: What is the point of order?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: The point of order is this. In the Manual of Business and Procedure supplied to every Member of the House, on page 55, No. 155, it is said:

“Not more than fifteen days shall be allotted by the Governor General for the discussion of the Demands of the Governor General in Council for grants. Of the days so allotted,”

Mr. President: Order, order. Is it in connection with the division?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: It is. It may refer to this motion as well, if my point of order is admitted by you. The point is this:

“Of the days so allotted, not more than two days shall be allotted by the Governor General to the discussion of any one demand.”

We are on Demand No. 1, and we have taken two days and a half on it. Are we in order according to the rules?

Mr. President: Has the Governor General allotted two days for any one Demand for grant?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: That is what I read in the book. I do not know.

Mr. President: Order, order. The result of the voting is Ayes 43, Noes 26.

Desirability of State Railways running Steamer Services between Important Points in the Railway System.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

I have tabled this motion with a view to discuss the desirability of State Railways running steamer services between important points in the railway system. Sir, developing my point which I raised on Wednesday last as regards the State Railways running steamer services of their own between important connecting points, let me at once disabuse the minds of Honourable Members of the impression, if I have given any, that the State Railways should run inland steamer services in competition with private enterprise. That was far from my mind. I did not mean, Sir, that the State Railways should in any way interfere with the present working of the inland steamship companies. What I meant was that, as the State Railways run their own ferry services across rivers connecting the railways from one side of the river to the other, they should also run their own steamer services connecting the railway system between two important points. For instance, before the Sara Bridge was built, the State Railways had their own passenger service, steamer service, which crosses the Padma River between Damukdia Ghat and Sara Ghat, thus connecting the Eastern Bengal Railway with the Northern Bengal Railway. This service was abolished, after the Hardinge Sara Bridge was constructed. Now, when the State Railways were running their own ferry steamers, there existed two inland steamship companies, and they had their own steamer services running along the Padma, carrying passengers and goods from the stations on either side of the river, including Damukdia Ghat and Sara Ghat. I may inform Honourable Members that those steamship companies in spite of the State Railway having their bridge and in spite of the State Railway discontinuing their steamer services, have still their steamer service running along the Padma river. Similarly, the Eastern Bengal State Railway, even up to now, runs its steamer ferry, Fulchhari and Bahadurabad, connecting the Eastern Bengal Railway and the Northern Bengal Railway at those two important points. Here also the two steamship companies ply their steamers, and have their stations at both these places, and they are continuing to ply even now.

Sir, in 1884, when the State acquired the Eastern Bengal Guaranteed Company Railway, they had their own steamer service connecting the two important points, namely, the railway termini at Goalundo and Narayanganj. But at the same time these two inland steamship companies plied their own steamers between Goalundo and Narayanganj all the same. Then, Sir, the Eastern Bengal Railway had their own steamer service between Goalundo and Sirajganj and so had these two inland steamship companies theirs. And though, after the Sara-Sirajganj Railway line was opened, the passengers from the Calcutta side do not travel by the new circuitous way, namely, via Goalundo, the steamer companies all the same are maintaining their services and evidently without suffering any loss. All that we want is that there should be no break in the link, that is, the railways should connect their lines where they have their termini and where a steamer service is necessary, steamer services should be run by them, as otherwise there will remain a break in the through communication of railways, in consequence of which the railways will not have full and efficient control over the entire route. At the same time this House is deprived of that control. It can by no means lead to any competition with private enterprise, whereas the railway services will be more useful and efficient. I have already said that the railways had their own steamer services between Goalundo and Narayanganj. At that time two steamer companies ran their services in competition with each other, with the result that the rates were fair and the conveniences of the travelling public were looked into.

We have at present the two inland steamer companies, the R.S.N. and the I.G.S.N. As far as my information goes both are now the properties of the Inchcape group. Now, Sir, these two steamer companies, somewhere in 1885 or 1886, approached Government, and the Government agreed that their State Railways would abolish their own steamer services, with the result that the two steamer companies combined and they now enjoy an absolute monopoly. Since then the fares have gone up by leaps and bounds, concessions such as reduced fares for return journeys are practically denied, and they have now an absolute monopoly in the jute traffic. Finding that they have no other companies competing with them, finding that the State Railways have abandoned their own steamer services, they have fixed the freight between Goalundo and Narayanganj terribly high. That freight is to my mind out of all proportion to their prevailing rates elsewhere, where they find that the Railways have also similar lines which they run. Sir, had these Railways continued their steamship services, had they been in existence now, it would have served as a check on their high-handed action. When my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, introduced his Inland Steam Vessels Bill, he did, I must say, a distinct service to us who come from Bengal. After the introduction of that Bill the steamer companies realised that trouble was ahead. Formerly, when the Railways were running their own steamers, they had their first-class cabins, second class, intermediate and third class. And even when the Railways abandoned their own steamer services, but these steamer companies had not combined, they also gave various facilities to the passengers. But when they felt absolutely secure, they combined, and what was the result? The steamers that plied between Goalundo and Narayanganj had only first class cabins, and the most rotten arrangements that could exist, because they found that there was no competitors in the field and the Railways had given up their own services. Then, again, what they did was this. The Eastern Bengal State Railway could carry the jute traffic from Goalundo to Calcutta, Calcutta being the centre where this jute of Eastern Bengal has a market. But to bring that jute from Eastern Bengal one has to go further beyond Goalundo. In order to carry the jute from Narayanganj to Calcutta one will have to go to the steamer companies to book their jute so as to take it as far as Goalundo, because they have no State Railway service. Now, these steamer companies increased their rate of freight between Narayanganj and Goalundo in order to cover the loss of freight that they incurred in not being able to capture the full freight from Goalundo to Calcutta, and thereby deprived the State Railways from having their legitimate freight from Goalundo to Calcutta. I think I have made it clear.

Sir, the railway freight between Goalundo and Calcutta, a distance of 154 miles, was much cheaper than the steamer freight for taking their jute or any other commodity by the steamer route from Goalundo to Calcutta. But the steamship company made their profit from exorbitant freight between Goalundo and Narayanganj, and to deprive the State Railway from earning their legitimate charges from Goalundo to Calcutta, they reduced their freights by the steamer route from Goalundo to Calcutta to such an extent that no trader would think of sending his commodity by rail unless that particular commodity was urgently required at Calcutta, and only because he could get it to Calcutta in a shorter time. That is the reason why I say that, in connecting two important State Railways or two Railways, one managed by the Company and the other by the State, the important links should be served by the State and not by private enterprise. I have no quarrel with the present steamship companies. They can run their own steamships as they are doing now. What I want is that the Honourable the Railway Member should consider whether or not, in the interests of the State, the railways should have a service connecting the important points between two railways, either Company-managed or State-managed. Sir, I move.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, I do not wish to speak at any length upon this motion today. My Honourable friend, the Mover, has stated that he had no wish to see the State Railways, engaging in competition with private enterprise, and as I understood his argument, he drew attention to various cases where the Railway had its own ferry service from a point on one bank of the river to a point on the opposite bank and where nevertheless the Indian steamship companies had their own service running up and down the river and calling at these opposite points.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: The State Railways were running a steamer service between Goalundo and Calcutta and at the same time the steamship companies were running too.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: If my Honourable friend will give me a little time, I think I was actually reproducing what he said. It is the earlier part of his speech. Then he went on to say and he drew attention, quite correctly, to the fact that formerly there used to be State Railway steamers between Goalundo and Narayanganj. It was long ago, but I have no doubt it was so, and he expressed the view that, if we were to revive this service, there would be no real competition with private enterprise. I do not know what the steamship companies would say about that; but I know what I should say. As soon as I revived the service, I would find that the inland steamship companies would be competing with me, and the effect of the competition would certainly be that both the services would be carried on at a loss. That may be a very good thing for the travelling public and for the merchants.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: But you are suffering a tremendous loss. You are not allowed to carry on, because the steamship companies have reduced the rate to such an extent between Calcutta and Goalundo that they do not allow the railways to get the freight.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I am afraid there is no particular bearing on the point I was dealing with at the moment. The position would be very pleasant no doubt for the public and for the merchants, but would not perhaps be so attractive to those who are responsible for the financial results of the State Railways. After all, that particular route between Goalundo and Narayanganj is the most important inland water route in the whole of India, excluding Burma, which is in a different category, and I think it is quite clear that, if we were to undertake that service, we should be letting ourselves in for a great deal more than what might appear at first sight. It will be a somewhat expensive service, and would involve a certain amount of capital expenditure of various kinds, and just at the present juncture, I am by no means anxious to extend our activities in any the State of the Eastern Bengal Guaranteed Railway, it was found desirable and necessary, in the interests of the State Railway which then comprised, as I have already shown, three railways, the Eastern Bengal, the North and South Bengal Railways, that this amalgamated railway should do away with steamer journeys and should connect the line between Aricha and Dacca, thus establishing a through railway communication all over the province which would not only give this particular railway much more income than it is now making, but would be of very great convenience to those who have to travel through that part of the country. But, Sir, the steamer services between Goalundo and Narayanganj were a standing block in the way of the accomplishment of this very useful project. Honourable Members are aware that Bengal holds the world's monopoly in jute. Let me tell Honourable Members that the jute is mainly grown in Eastern Bengal and that the percentage of jute growing districts—I myself have been in the jute trade ever since my childhood and Honourable Members can rely on the statements I am making so far as the jute trade is concerned—in Northern Bengal is about 40 per cent., in West Bengal it is less than 10 per cent., and the rest of it comes from Eastern Bengal, which is known as the hessian jute, or the fine quality jute which is mostly grown in Eastern Bengal. My Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, was complaining the other day as to why the Honourable the Railway Member had not treated agricultural produce in the same manner as coal.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: I hope you agree with me.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Certainly. Was it, he asked, because the agricultural interests were not so vocal as the coal interests? Sir, today I ask the same question. Why is it, I ask, that the Government have not constructed the Dacca-Aricha Railway for so long? Is it because it would break the practical monopoly of the steamer companies in the transit of jute from East Bengal to Calcutta, as it would then enable the cultivators to export their jute to Calcutta at a much cheaper figure than the one they are compelled to pay to the steamer companies at the present moment?

Sir, the House will be shocked to hear something more about this matter. There are some Indian companies, apart from these two inland steamer companies. They can also carry, and they do carry, a portion of this commodity at much cheaper rates than these two steamer companies charge. But, Sir, do you know why those Indian companies cannot carry jute and these commodities? Do you know, Sir, that, if they want to send their commodities through these Indian steamer companies; they cannot do so? Do you know the reason? The reason is that the English banks refuse to pay the advance 90 per cent. on the bill of lading. If you bring your jute—I wonder where my friend Mr. Haji is today—by other than these two steamer companies, the banks refuse to pay or advance 90 per cent. on their bills of lading. And not only that, Sir. The jute mills say, "We will not advance a pice unless you bring your jute through these two favoured companies." And still the Honourable the Railway Member thinks that the Dacca-Aricha Railway is not such an urgent project and that it can be shelved, and the Finance Member came to his aid! I will say this, Sir, that this shelving of this railway on account of the stringency of the money market is not true. That is not the reason behind it. It is something more. For, after all, what did we want this year? Nothing more than the amount required for the acquisition of the land. You have provided that amount in this Budget; but still, there was a belated reply to a letter which the Chamber of Commerce wrote asking the Honourable the Railway Member to withhold his hand from going on with this scheme—a letter which was addressed to him on the 4th of June, 1929,—and no reply was vouchsafed to this letter for ten months and it was only on the 10th February, 1930, that the Honourable the Railway Member gave them a very long reply—and what does he say in that reply? He says, "We do not agree with you; we have investigated the whole thing. We will continue the construction of the railway. But—there came the 'but'—since we cannot go on this year owing to financial stringency, we will reopen the whole question again." As I said already, the financial stringency was not standing in the way, because we did not want more than a couple of lakhs of rupees in the present year. But what was the real trouble? The real trouble was the Inchcape twin was in the way, and that was the trouble of the Honourable Member. He dare not go against the interests of the Siamese twin, the steamer companies. Sir, with your permission I will just deal with that letter. After stating what the Bengal Chamber had said, it is stated in the letter: "We find that the railway will be useful. We find that all the arguments that you adduce in favour of the abandonment of the scheme are of no use. We also find that the Bengal Government is with us". This is very interesting, and I should like to read it to the House:

"The Government of Bengal, to whom a copy of your letter was forwarded, have stated that their support of the project is not affected by the representation of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. In the ordinary course, therefore, the construction of the line would have proceeded. But, owing to financial circumstances, it is impossible to allot funds in 1930-31 for the commencement of the actual work of construction."

Surely, you cannot commence the actual work of construction before you have acquired the lands, and the acquisition of land will at least take you one year. You had no business to stop the acquisition of the lands; you have got the necessary money provided in the present year's Budget, and as late as the 15th January, 1930, when you were holding a meeting of the Railway Standing Finance Committee, I asked my Honourable friend, Mr. Parsons, whether the scheme of the Dacca-Aricha Railway was a settled fact. He said it was. He also said that the money that was required, so far at least as this railway was concerned, was provided in this year's Budget.

Then comes the letter of 10th February, 1930. What does it say? That letter says this:

"But, owing to financial circumstances it is impossible to allot funds in 1930-31 for the commencement of actual work of construction and an opportunity has thus presented itself to make sure, and as your Committee suggest, in a project of such magnitude this was in any case desirable, that the construction and traffic estimates are as accurate as they can be made."

Does the Honourable the Railway Member want to tell us that, when he presented the scheme before the Railway Standing Finance Committee, the matter was not fully gone into, and those estimates which had been already prepared were not correct? Or had he any doubts about those estimates which had been prepared already? If that be the case, I should say that, whatever estimates are produced before the Standing Finance Committee for Railways are a mere sham. Does he mean to say when he went up to the Secretary of State for sanction, he had not got a correct estimate on which he wanted sanction? Why is it necessary for the Honourable Member again to have a correct estimate? Is it contended that the estimate you have already prepared is not correct? Is that the practice you have with regard to all the other railway estimates which you present before the Standing Finance Committee for Railways? Certainly, if the estimate which you had already prepared was not a correct estimate, what business had you to put it before the Standing Finance Committee for Railways and get their sanction? Not only that, Sir. The Railway Department has got the sanction of this House to construct the line, and so you have no business now to come forward and say that we are going to reconsider the whole question again.

Then further on in that letter my Honourable friend, the Railway Member, says this, because he does not intend to go on with this Railway. This is what he says: "The total estimates are at present under preparation". Good Heavens! We thought that the total estimates were made long ago and placed before the Railway Standing Finance Committee. We also thought that you had got the sanction of this House and you then went up to the Secretary of State. But he says that the total estimates are at present under preparation, and they have apparently instructed the Agent of the Eastern Bengal Railway to go on with another estimate and perhaps to carry on the working out of the estimate for a couple of years so that the money allotted for this year need not be spent. But the Honourable Member for Railways does not want to say that in so many words. (Laughter.) He merely refers to the money trouble, but it is not the fact. I know the real reason. I have my own suspicions. I can tell the House that the visit of Sir George Schuster to England had perhaps something to do with it. I can tell the House quite plainly, that is the principal reason. (An Honourable Member: "You have got Sir George Schuster on your brain.") His return to India as late as December last has got something to do with this affair. Something must have been put in his ears by the Incheape people in London. That is the whole thing, but the Railway Board want some camouflage to hoodwink the House; they want some ostensible reason to put before the House as to why they did not start the work of this railway after getting the sanction of the Secretary of State, especially when we were given to understand by a responsible Member that, though the financial stringency existed generally, it did not exist so far as this railway line was concerned, because we wanted only two lakhs which had already been provided in this year's Budget.

Now, Sir, whatever I have said so far will be confirmed by this letter from which I was reading out. They want to shelve the whole scheme absolutely for the present, and so they say that they want further material. The present Agent, Mr. Maffin, who is in favour of this railway scheme will be going away shortly, say on the 1st of April, and the permanent incumbent, Mr. Pearse, will be in his place, but Mr. Pearse has been dead against this scheme from the very beginning, and the Railway Board want that the reconsideration of the scheme should not be started when the present Agent, Mr. Maffin, who is favourably inclined towards this, is in office, but they want the scheme to be examined by his successor who, it is well known, is opposed to this project. This will be clear from the fact that when he had no authority to make any statement, in the year 1928, Mr. Pearse made a statement in Dacca, I call it a very prophetic statement, as if he was the Finance Member of the Government of India and knew all about the finances. He said in effect "What rubbish are you talking about this railway? The Government of India have got no money to provide for this scheme, and so this scheme cannot go on". This is what he said.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Is that speech printed somewhere?

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Yes, it is not with me just now, but I will give it to you tomorrow. Of course, my friend Mr. Neogy immediately wrote to Mr. Parsons, and he too was surprised. This is what I understood from my friend, Mr. Neogy. Mr. Parsons seems to have said, "How on earth could he (Mr. Pearse) make such a statement; he was not the Finance Member". Of course, it was contradicted. He says: "Detailed estimates of the work are at present under preparation"—we know they will be under preparation till Mr. Pearse returns from leave—"and the only expenditure to be incurred"—this is a camouflage—"in 1929-30 and 1930-31, is in connection with the final location and its acquisition of land". In order that Members may not think that the whole thing is shelved, how nicely the whole wording has been put! They say we will go on with the acquisition. Then the letter says "The Agent of the Eastern Bengal Railway has been instructed that, in preparing the detailed estimates"—as if no detailed estimates were prepared before—"no pains must be spared"—as if pains were spared on the former occasion—"certainly no pains will be spared"—because Lord Incheape is there—"in ascertaining the probable cost of the line," and he has also been asked to review carefully the traffic estimates, including the jute and coal traffic "about which your Committee are specially concerned". His special attention has been directed to the difficulties "your Committee anticipate in the working of the Padma Wagon Ferry," and the doubts they expressed regarding the bridge over the Dhaleshwari River. Lest we should think that the scheme will be shelved, there is again this assurance: "I am, however, to add that the information at the disposal of the Railway Board as regards the working of other wagon ferries does not lead them to endorse the views of your Committee on the former point". A sort of assurance is still given to the effect that your information is not so accurate as to enable us to abandon the railway. All that we want is a little time, so that the whole thing can be shelved and nothing will be heard of it afterwards! Sir, I will not take more of the time of the House. I shall add only one word, and that is, that unless the Honourable Member gives us an assurance on the floor of this House, we shall give him no peace. Sir, I move.

Mr. K. C. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): There has not been one other topic during recent times in which public opinion in Bengal has been so unanimous as in regard to this question. I do not want this House to be misled into thinking that, in so far as it relates to a small tract in Eastern Bengal, this particular scheme is absolutely of local importance and nothing more. If Honourable Members have studied the Railway Board's reply to the letter of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, they must have seen that the Railway Board itself mentions that, apart from the fact that this particular railway will serve the local needs of the district of Dacca, it will form a very important link in the chain of communication between Eastern and Western Bengal. Indeed, this small length of railway line, if built, will provide an all-rail route from Western Bengal to Eastern Bengal and also connect Assam with Bengal by an all-rail route. Now, Sir, apart from the question of its local importance and the position it is going to occupy in the future in regard to communication in Eastern Bengal and Assam, this question merits the serious attention of this House. It has already been pointed out in the letter of the Railway Board that, having regard to the development in railway traffic in Eastern Bengal, which is at present cut off from Western Bengal by a very wide stretch of water, and having regard also to the development of railway facilities in Assam, if Eastern Bengal and Assam be linked up with the rest of India by an all-rail route, the revenues of the railways generally are likely to go up considerably. Therefore the merits of this particular line are not to be judged merely from the probable income which it will yield as a local feeder service. So much for the financial prospects of the line.

Then, Sir, with regard to the urgency of it from the point of view of the locality which it is going to serve I do not know whether it is at all known to this House that there is a tract in the Indian Empire where it sometimes takes about thirty hours to traverse a distance of 40 or 50 miles for the purpose of going from the headquarters of a district to certain places in its sub-divisional areas. But this is exactly what happens during the dry period when there is lack of communication between the town of Dacca and the sub-division of Manickgunje. Sir, even the Chamber of Commerce in their letter admit,—I am quoting from the letter itself,—

“In the past, the lack of water has compelled the closure of steamer service above Manickgunje during the dry season.”

And they go on to express the hope that things will improve in the future and that there may be more water in the river in future than there has been in the past. It is a very cautious admission, so far as it goes. They admit that there is no regular steamer service beyond Manickgunje, but what about the steamer service between Dacca and Manickgunje? I happen to come from the particular area which lies between Dacca and Manickgunje and I may tell this House that through steamer service is not always possible to be maintained between Dacca and Manickgunje for more than four or five months in the year. During the remaining months passengers have to get down midway between the two stations and they have sometimes got to wait for long till arrangements for transshipment are made. The rivers are drying up very fast, and the speed at which the steamers travel in this tract exceeds the average speed of a fast bullock cart by very little, even when there is a steamer service. Now, Sir, having regard to these facts, the Government of Bengal have, for the last few years, been insisting upon the Railway Board undertaking the construction of this line, because even from the administrative point of view, the want of suitable communication between important sub-divisional areas and the district headquarters has been leading to very great difficulties. My Honourable friend, the Member in charge of Industries and Labour, if he were to make inquiries, would find out what difficulties the Postal Department have got to undergo in order to carry on the mail service between Dacca and Manickgunje. They never depend upon the steamer services. If the steamer service was really so very satisfactory as the Bengal Chamber of Commerce want to make it out to be, there should have been no reason for the Postal Department not to avail themselves of the facilities thus offered by the steamer companies. Then again, Sir, I remember to have seen a report of an economic inquiry made at the instance of the district authorities of Dacca some years ago, in which it was pointed out that, as a result of the lack of communication between the sub-division of Manickgunje and the rest of the world, there was sometimes an appreciable difference in the prices of things that rule in that particular area which is so unfortunately situated. It was also commented upon in that Report as to how far this affected the economic condition of the people living in the Manickgunje sub-division. It is no wonder, therefore, that the people of Eastern Bengal have for the last half a century—fifty years, Sir—been pressing for the construction of this particular line. No Viceroy has visited Dacca, no one Governor has ever visited Dacca, but has not been told, in the addresses of welcome presented to him, as to what importance the people of that locality attach to this particular line; but for a very long time the Government were not disposed to pay any heed to this public demand. For some years past, however, the Government of Bengal have taken up, I am glad to say, the cause of the public in this matter. It is the practice of every Local Government to submit a list of railway schemes, on which they are keen, for the consideration of the Railway Board every year, and I am sure, I will be borne out by the Honourable Member in charge that the Government of Bengal have been placing this project, if not always at the top of the list, at least very high up in the list successively for the last few years, and yet the Government of India would not relent. About six years back they said, “Well, we are not very keen on constructing this line for you, unless you guarantee to refund to us the cost that will be involved in carrying out a survey”. The Government of Bengal meekly agreed to that proposition, because they were so very sure about the financial prospects of this line. Then, the Government of India undertook an inquiry, and once they went into the matter, they found what great possibilities this particular line had before it. They are now fully convinced that this is going to be one of the most paying propositions in the whole of India so far as railway extensions go. I know that that estimate—I mean the estimate of earnings—which has been placed before this House and the Standing Finance Committee is considered to be an unduly modest one indeed by responsible Members of the Railway Board themselves. Now, Sir, the Railway Board having completed the survey and having satisfied themselves that the line will be a very paying one, submitted its proposals to the Secretary of State, because the total amount involved in this scheme would exceed the financial limit of the Government of India's authority for sanction, and therefore as a matter of formality, the scheme had to go up to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State sanctioned this scheme, and thereafter it was placed before the Standing Finance Committee, and the Standing Finance Committee sanctioned it, and then the scheme was included in the budget proposals of the Railway Board, and this House, without any division and without any dissentient voice, agreed to this scheme being undertaken. And here may I pause for a minute just for the purpose of pointing out that although at all these various stages this scheme has been before this House continuously during the last five years, and although this was included in the budget proposals of the Government during the last year, and the year before last, and although the interests of the Chamber of Commerce are fully represented in this House as also in the other, nobody ever thought of raising his voice of protest against the construction of this line. (Hear, hear.) Perhaps the steamer companies thought that, after all, the Honourable Sir George Rainy would not have the courage to undertake the construction of this line in view of the interests of the steamer companies that are involved. However, Sir, when it was found that the scheme was about to be undertaken for construction, the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, like the spoilt child that it is, sent up a protest to the Government of India asking them peremptorily to stay their hands. Now, I should like to know whether the Government would tolerate this sort of language from any other public body. The Bengal Chamber say, "This has been engaging the serious attention of the Chamber and they request that until their views have been received by the Board, any action committing the Government definitely to the construction of the line should be suspended". Well, long before that the Government had definitely committed themselves to the construction of this line.

Then again, Sir, towards the close of this letter, the Committee hope that they may be informed at an early date that it has been 4 P.M. decided to withhold any further action as regards the scheme until an enquiry such as they have asked for has taken place. I should like to know from the Honourable Member in charge as to whether he would stand this kind of hectoring language from any other public body. (Laughter.) Now, Sir, Government received this letter in June, 1929, and they sent out their reply only in February, 1930. When a letter like that came from the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, all the five Members of the Railway Board began to quake in all their five pairs of shoes, and when that process of quaking was over, they sat down to compose a suitable reply to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. So far as the reply goes, I have nothing to complain with regard to the first portion of it, which very satisfactorily meets every point made by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. But it seems to me that two hands were employed for the purpose of drafting this letter. The first portion was drafted, I imagine, by an honest railwayman, and for the purpose of drafting the second portion, I think my Honourable friend requisitioned the services of Mr. Howell, the Foreign Secretary, in order to give it a proper diplomatic touch. (Laughter.) Now, Sir, in the concluding paragraph of the Bengal Chamber's letter they have condensed many inaccuracies,—I was going to say downright falsehoods. It is difficult to imagine that it could be possible even for the Bengal Chamber of Commerce to condense so much of misstatement in so short a compass. They first of all say that this is not a matter of urgency. That is a statement which I deny. It is an absolute and deliberate lie. I understand there is an Honourable gentleman here who represents the interests of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. I may tell him that I am prepared to repeat all that I am saying now outside this House so as to give him an opportunity of taking any action he likes against me. Then the second lie is this: "The traffic is already adequately provided for by the inland steamer companies". The third lie is that it "is little needed", and the fourth lie is that, "Opportunity was not given to the public to express their views on the scheme".

The scheme has been before the public of Bengal for the last half a century, and before this House at least for the last five years.

My Honourable friend, Colonel Crawford, made a very generous offer. He said, "I am prepared to make a present of a road to you, will you accept it?". I do not know whether my Honourable friend holds the portfolio of the Public Works Department in the Government of Bengal, because as far as I understand the constitutional position, none but the Government of Bengal have got any authority with regard to the construction of roads within the provincial boundaries.

An Honourable Member: What about the Roads Committee?

Mr. K. C. Neogy: The Roads Committee can only say as to whether they are going to find money for a particular scheme or not. It is not for them to dictate which particular road is to be taken up.

Now, Sir, when Dacca was the capital of the Eastern Bengal and Assam Government, I know that that Government, finding that the Government of India were adamant in this matter, themselves wanted to investigate the possibilities of a motor road over this area, and I am told that the estimates which they got were absolutely prohibitive; and if my Honourable friend Colonel Crawford were to make inquiries from the Government of Bengal, he would at once understand the absurdity of his suggestion. Moreover, there is certainly a good deal of difference between a railway and a motor road. The Government proposal is to construct this bit of railway on the broad-gauge system. I may tell Honourable Members of this House who may know this fact that, in Eastern Bengal and Assam, there is not one inch of broad-gauge line at the present moment. The intention of Government has been to construct this line on the broad-gauge system with a view to making it possible for goods waggons to travel right from Peshawar down to Eastern Bengal with loads of merchandise; and I think it is also conceivable that in future, when traffic develops, they would convert the metre-gauge sections of the Eastern Bengal and the Assam Bengal Railways into broad-gauge, so that a time may come when it would be possible for a broad-gauge wagon to travel right from the North-West Frontier of India to the North-Eastern Frontier.

In this connection, Sir, I want to emphasise the importance of the wagon ferry, because without a wagon ferry, the utility of this broad-gauge system would suffer considerably; and if there is a broad-gauge ferry between Goalundo and Aricha and this line is constructed on a broad-gauge basis, it will be possible for coal to be transported from the coalfields of Western Bengal and Bihar right down to Eastern Bengal, apart from merchandise of other kinds. This would be a very important development in railway transport in Eastern Bengal, and surely all these facilities could never be supplied by the construction of a motor road between Dacca and Aricha.

Now, Sir, I beg this House not to consider this question as a parochial one. I have already indicated the importance of this line in the railway system of India, and I have also shown how, at different stages, this House has committed itself to the construction of this line. And if it does not materialise, whatever reasons may be put forward by the Government in support of their action, I may tell the Honourable Member that the conviction will go deep down in the hearts of the people of Bengal that, when it comes to a question of taking an action which is likely to prejudice the interests of the British commercial people, the Government of India have absolutely no nerves left in them to stand up and say, "We are going to do this because we think it is the right thing and we are not going to listen to your interested cries of opposition".

Sir, one of the things stated in the letter of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce amused me very much, because I do not remember to have come across a more comical thing in my experience. They say that this line is likely to affect the sanitation of the country. Since when did the Bengal Chamber of Commerce come to feel such a great concern in the sanitation of the country? Sir, there is a Bengali saying that if a woman pretends to love a child more than its mother, that woman is surely a witch.

Sir Darcy Lindsay (Bengal: European): Sir, my Honourable friends Mr. Neogy and Mr. Ghuznavi have brought considerable heat into this discussion, which was aimed at the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, and also Mr. Ghuznavi's friend Lord Inchcape. Sir, I would like to inform the House straightaway that I have had no word whatsoever from the Bengal Chamber, and so I am not talking as their spokesman. But I do feel, coming from Bengal, coming from Calcutta, that Mr. Neogy has been a little hard. He has, I think, no less than five times given them the lie direct.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Yes, and I am prepared to repeat them outside this House if you want it.

Sir Darcy Lindsay: I do not propose to take him up on those particular points, but I would like to assure him, Sir, and the House that the Bengal Chamber, when they put forward the letter they did about this line, did so with the best of intentions and in the interests of the country. They, like all of us, are aware that money at the moment is not readily available and they felt that the money that was going to be expended on this project would be better expended elsewhere.

Dr. A. Suhrawardy (Burdwan and Presidency Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): On sanitation?

Sir Darcy Lindsay: Sanitation I thought was a provincial subject.

My Honourable friend, Mr. Ghuznavi, has even challenged the honesty of Sir George Schuster. I am ashamed of you, Sir. He insinuated that Sir George Schuster had, during his sojourn in London, been influenced by Lord Inchcape and he came out here again and blocked this proposition. I would like, if it was possible, to take up a small bet with my Honourable friend, Mr. Ghuznavi, that there was no truth in it.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: I do not go to the races unfortunately.

Sir Darcy Lindsay: Now, Sir, in my view, the Railway Board, if they had wished to listen to the demands of the Bengal Chamber or the views of the Bengal Chamber in the way my Honourable friend Mr. Neogy, indicated, would have answered that letter at once. No; they did not do so because their intention was to go on with the railway. At a later stage, they found that a shortage of money prevented them from going on with the scheme, and I do not think it is unreasonable to adopt the course they propose adopting and the course that they have outlined in their reply to the Bengal Chamber which implies, "You have made certain statements as regards the line not being required or the line not giving as full a return as we think it will do. As we cannot go on with the construction immediately, we are quite prepared to look further into the question that you raised". I am quite convinced, Sir, knowing the Railway Board as I do, and their Financial Commissioner, that if this line offered the prospects, the golden prospects, that my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, has portrayed, it would be the very first project the Railway Board would enter into. Much has been made of the vested interests. I deny that the Chamber, the Bengal Chamber, had any such thought when they put forward this letter. All they did was to point out that there was no immediate urgency for the line. The trade in jute down and the trade in coal up was efficiently provided for by the steamer services and therefore there was no real urgency for the line.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Have you been over that section?

Sir Darcy Lindsay: I have not, but I am only putting forward the view, as I see it, as put forward by the Bengal Chamber. I do protest at these unkind inferences that have been brought in by the two Honourable Members I have mentioned.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: I am prepared to give the Honourable Member an opportunity of suing me in a proper court of law for stating what I have done on the present occasion. Why does not my friend take that opportunity? There is no use of complaining like this.

(Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad rose in his place.)

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member going to take long?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: No, Sir, only a few minutes.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: Will not the Government Member reply?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: I thank Mr. Ghuznavi and Mr. Neogy for the illuminating information they have given us this afternoon. They have established beyond doubt five points which I will just mention. In the first place they have proved that the estimates prepared by the Railway Board are not reliable. I gave four illustrations day before yesterday and now another illustration is added today. The estimates are not very reliable and the Railway Board themselves are doubtful at every stage. The second point, which is equally important, is that they cannot make up their minds about the order in which the capital works ought to be undertaken. They had money for building a railway station at Cawnpore, and a railway station at Lucknow, in which they can have no profit whatsoever, but they had no money to build this very important line, which would have given an income from 6 to 10 per cent. The third very important point is that the Railway Board have saved 30 crores of rupees in the Reserve Fund and the Depreciation Fund. Now where is this money invested? Is it not possible to invest this amount in building a new railway which would have yielded an income of from 6 to 10 per cent.? The fourth point, which is also equally important, is that these steamer companies are exceedingly inefficient. I wonder whether any Member of the Railway Board has travelled by these steamers. I had the opportunity to travel by them and I found that they were all old steamers, probably purchased from some Rhine company long ago, where they were ordered to be dismantled. Probably the companies purchased them second-hand at very cheap prices. They certainly would not have been allowed to be used in any river in a European country. It is very desirable that this monopoly should be ended as early as possible.

The last point which Mr. Neogy brought out—it is really very important—is the fact that the Railway Board set aside their decision or the wishes of the Assembly on account of the single letter from the Chamber of Commerce. It is a practical proof that to the Railway Board the Chamber of Commerce is much more important than the Assembly. Today I very much sympathise with the people who have left the Assembly on account of the fact that it was a waste of time and waste of energy when it had not even got the status which the Chamber of Commerce at Calcutta enjoys. Their authority is manifested from the language which the Chamber of Commerce uses in addressing the Railway Board. I would ask you, Sir, whether you would permit a Member to move a motion in the Assembly in the words used by the Chamber of Commerce: "That this Assembly hopes that it would be informed by the Government of India at an early date that they have decided to take such and such an action". The Resolution which we are permitted to move is only in the shape of a request, and I think the Assembly is not permitted to use language which the Chamber of Commerce has used in laying their grievances, or I should say orders, before the Government.

The Honourable Member from Calcutta has just said that money was not available and any money that was available had been spent elsewhere. Of course, what is the meaning of "elsewhere"? Probably another railway station at Jhansi or some other place (Interruption.) would not like to make definite suggestions: I withheld my suggestions the last time, as I understood definitely from Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas that a sub-committee was sitting to consider all these matters and we would like to have the report of that sub-committee before the next Session of the Assembly.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I am not sure that I can congratulate the last speaker on his intervention in this debate, for I was unable to see the bearing of most of what he said upon the construction of the Dacca-Aricha Railway, which after all is the matter raised on this particular motion. Now, Mr. President, my Honourable friend Mr. Neogy asked me why was it that I stood "this sort of language from the Bengal Chamber of Commerce", and he evidently thought that I ought at once to have taken my tomahawk and gone for their scalps. Well, I am a man of peace, Mr. President, and I do not know that I am very much moved by people using strong language and I have never felt myself that a case gains in strength by the violence of the language in which it is expressed. Now, as regards the question of the Dacca-Aricha Railway, I should like to make certain things clear. In the first place, the Railway Board and the Government of India are quite satisfied that this railway is needed, and that it is a matter of urgency and that it should be constructed as soon as possible. There is no question at all about that. It is explained very clearly in our reply to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. It is not only, as my Honourable friend Mr. Neogy put it, as a means of local communication that it is important, but much more as an essential link in a trunk system of through communication. I believe that, in the future, it will be quite an important line. That is why we propose to construct the line on the broad gauge.

Now there have been dark surmises, and even definite assertions, that the one thing which weighs with the Railway Board and the Government of India is the letter from the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. I have never been very much afraid of that very eminent and respectable body, and in this matter I do not see any reason why I should be afraid. No doubt the Bengal Chamber of Commerce rightly and naturally regard it as part of their business to see that private enterprise gets a fair show, and naturally, they approach this question as one in which the inland steamship companies are interested. It seems to me that, in the nature of things, they must do so. Now, while I have indicated more than once in this House that I am not very much in favour of the railways leaving the solid ground and embarking on the rivers to compete with steamship companies, I am very much in favour of the proposition that, where there are good grounds for constructing a railway line, we should enter into competition with the steamship companies in our own sphere, and the fact that the construction of the Dacca-Aricha Railway may bring about a reduction in the rates and fares charged by the steamship companies is, to my mind, a very strong argument for the construction of the line. I should like to make that point perfectly clear. But I have been asked why then, when we found that we could not provide funds this year or the next to construct the line, we said that, in connection with the preparation of the detailed estimates, certain questions would be re-examined. Well, if I had not the fear of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce before me, I had at least a salutary respect for the views of another body, namely, the Public Accounts Committee, I think my Honourable friend Mr. Neogy will agree with me, that the Committee were not altogether satisfied with the procedure sometimes adopted in recent years of starting work on important projects before the preparation of detailed estimates. In any case, in this case we shall have the detailed estimates before us before we start construction, and when admittedly it is an expensive line, it is certainly desirable that we should have these estimates. In essence what we said to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce was this, that we were prepared to re-examine two things. The first was this. Supposing the detailed estimates revealed that the line was going to cost a great deal more than the original estimate, surely we should have to reconsider the matter, unless indeed our revised estimates of traffic showed that the traffic was likely to be a great deal larger than we originally estimated. It seems to me that, in the nature of the case, you cannot say, "I don't care what figures are revealed in the detailed estimates, I shall refuse to reconsider the matter". That is an attitude which no responsible authority can adopt. The other matter is the question of the effect that the construction of the line might have upon river conservancy and the public health. Now, as my Honourable friend Colonel Crawford in an interjection at an earlier stage of the debate asked, "Why not have a road", I would like to point out that the effect of a road, both on river conservancy and on public health, would be exactly the same as the effect of a railway, for unless it was an embanked road, it would be under water for about four months in the year, and if it is an embanked road, then you have to face the complicated questions of the adequacy of the water-ways, the obstruction to drainage and so on. In the letter to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce it was mentioned that these matters would be re-examined, because it is always at the stage of the detailed estimates that these matters come up for final settlement. When we get the final location survey as it is called, it is at that stage that the size of the water-ways to be provided is settled in consultation with the Local Government, and also all points in which the construction of the line might have a direct bearing upon river conservancy. As far as I can see,—I am not an expert in these matters—there is no real danger that the line will seriously interfere with these interests, but naturally the experts on these subjects must have their chance. It is the Government of Bengal who are specially charged with responsibility in these matters, but whatever be the opinions, the views or the figures we receive at the time of the submission of the detailed estimates, the Railway Board and the Government of India will approach them from this point of view, namely, that they regard the line as very necessary and urgent and one which they would desire to construct at the earliest possible date.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: Sir, I am not intimate with the area about which the discussion is on, but I am very much interested, after hearing what has been revealed to us, to know exactly why the Government of India and the Railway Board have put off the construction of this line for which experienced non-officials and officials from Bengal have repeatedly said that there is the greatest necessity. It is not usual, Sir, to make any remarks when an Honourable Member is presenting a Budget, either the Railway or the General Budget to this House, but for once, this year, when the Honourable the Railway Member was presenting the Budget and he came to the point giving some information about the postponement of this line, my Honourable friend Mr. Neogy used rather a strongish expression, which, I felt at that moment was indiscreet. But after hearing what I have heard from both my Honourable friends, Mr. Ghuznavi and Mr. Neogy, even though one may agree with what has fallen from my Honourable friend Sir Darcy Lindsay, I would very much like Sir Darcy Lindsay to appreciate that the remarks made by my two Honourable friends on both sides can justifiably be forgiven as being due to their exasperation at the way in which the Government of India seem to have played with this scheme.

Sir, it is comparatively easy to preach patience to people when one is not hurt himself; and my friends in the European group have always been in that happy position of getting up and asking us to be moderate and modest and to have patience. I feel strongly that if my friends on those Benches were in half the position in which Mr. Ghuznavi and Mr. Neogy are today, pleading for this railway line, they would have used not only similar language, but perhaps stronger methods of asserting their views and their wishes. All that I can say is that, bearing in mind the history of this line, as given in this letter of the Railway Board dated the 10th February, 1930, the people of Bengal in that district appear to me to have patience which can almost be said to be angelic.

Now, Sir, what is the history of this project? For fifty years the people of Bengal have asked for this Railway. Since 1920 the Government of Bengal actively pressed for it. The Government of Bengal—and surely they cannot be said to be partial in this connection—have offered to pay for the expenses of survey, and they have even offered the Railway Board that, if there should be a deficit in the minimum earnings required from this line, they would pay it out of the provincial revenues. Apart from any other views which have been expressed by my two friends in the course of this debate, may I venture to ask the Honourable Member what justification the Railway Board had in not taking up this line when there was such solicitude shown by the Government of Bengal, and when there was this offer of the Government of Bengal? This is a plain question which will require a good deal of explanation. It is not necessary to give us assurances of the bona fides of this Chamber or of the Government of India. What we want to know is, in view of this, how is the Railway Board justified in putting off the construction of this line when they undertook the construction of other lines,

The only reply and the only inference that can be justifiably drawn, especially by non-officials who are not in the know of what is noted in Government files, is that the influence of some person or somebody may have helped to put this scheme off till now. It need not necessarily all have happened in the time of my Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy. But if one reads the history, as given by the Railway Board themselves in this letter, the inference is perfectly justified that the scheme has been delayed in spite of such great pressure from the Bengal Government, and even in spite of that Government's offer to make good any deficit in the return on this line, in order to please some one or satisfy some interest. It is no good giving us mere assertions and saying that that is not so; we want to see the proof of it; and surely unless the Railway Board are prepared to say that the Bengal Government were also led away by the enthusiasm with which Mr. Ghuznavi and Mr. Neogy put forward their case, only then can the Railway Board say that the pressure that is now being brought to bear upon the Railway Department by Members in this House is unjustified.

Sir, a good deal has been said about the money part of this scheme being somewhat prohibitive at this juncture. I am one of those who feel that, at this particular juncture all avoidable expenditure should be put off. But on the admission of the Railway Board itself, this line, to use their own words, "will more than pay its way". Further on they say:

"I am to explain that the traffic estimates of the new line assume that only a small proportion of the jute traffic will be transferred from the inland steam vessels to the railway."

In addition, Sir, as I have said, the Bengal Government offered to make good any deficit, should there be a deficit in the minimum return on this line. All this is not enough to make the Railway Board move in the direction which will give an assurance to the people of that locality that they are going to get the railway; for what is it that has really frightened and exasperated my two friends, so far as this reply is concerned? The question of re-survey and fresh estimates. Now, I think they are justified in suspecting

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: May I point out, Sir, that the re-survey and the detailed estimates were inevitable in any case?

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: They may have been; why not then start acquiring land as my friend, Mr. Ghuznavi, said? Can the Honourable Member give any reasons?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I would only point out that it is better, before you acquire any land to decide whether it is that particular land which you really want to acquire—that is the object of the final location survey.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: How long do Government think it will take them to make up their minds about it? Perhaps the Honourable Member might oblige me with a reply now by interrupting me; I will wait for his reply.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: We shall make up our minds when we receive the detailed estimates.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: How long does it take Government to receive detailed estimates in this sort of matter? I wait for a reply. (There was no reply.) Surely, the Honourable Member can interrupt me completely now and give me a complete reply so that we may know what the exact situation is.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: May I say, Sir, that I am very sorry if I have in any way inconvenienced the Honourable Member. I think the House will bear me out when I say that I do not very often interrupt; but I am afraid I did so on this occasion and I am very sorry I inconvenienced the Honourable Member, particularly as my interruption may have seemed discourteous.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: I thought the Honourable Member was going to elucidate a point of view which very much required elucidation. I welcome the Honourable Member's interruption, but I see the Honourable Member is not prepared to give me further replies in order to clear up the matter. However, Sir, I will not press that point of view. The Honourable Member is invariably most courteous to everybody in this House.

My point therefore is that I think the Members on the Treasury Benches and my Honourable friend, Sir Darcy Lindsay, and my friends on the European Benches should fully realise the feelings of my two friends. They feel that, if the Government think that it is inevitable to have re-estimates made, by all means do so. But why not go on with the acquisition of land and why not indicate to the House in this debate that the period required for that purpose will be two, four, six or eight months? For, Sir, it has not been unusual to have re-estimates which may give a set-back to a scheme. And my friends, Mr. Neogy and Mr. Ghuznavi, say, "We have been clamouring for this line for fifty years; we came almost to the point of getting it and here comes the Bengal Chamber to tell you, 'Do not go ahead until you have heard from us; we would like you to modify it' ". I feel, Sir, that there is a great deal of justification for most of what has been said, although I very much wish that a few somewhat heated words which were used had not been used. The omission of some allegations would have improved the case of this side of the House.

Sir, I cannot help feeling that if the Government of India really wish to assure the House that they are looking after the interests of the agriculturists this is a case where we want proof of it. I am told—in fact the Honourable Member in the course of his remarks admitted it—that the construction of the railway will have a beneficial effect by bringing about a lowering of the steamer freight rates. And what is it that is being transported on these steamers? The most substantial part of the revenue comes from the transport of cultivators' raw produce. What better investment can the Government of India have? They have the opportunity of killing more than the proverbial two birds with one stone; they are serving the best interests of the cultivator and meeting with what has been a popular clamour, both from the people of Bengal and from the Government of Bengal. I believe, Sir, that it was the Acworth Committee which said that the construction of railway branch lines with private capital should not be encouraged. In fact it was after that Committee's Report that the Railway Board stopped all construction of branch line railways with private capital. I myself then believed in that and I still believe that private capital brought in with State capital side by side does cause some complication. Unfortunately, we have now come to a stage where the Government of India can plead that they are unable to borrow with normal ease. We know the reasons for it,—one need not go into them here,—but the Government of India cannot have things both ways. They cannot hold up a most useful project on the ground that they have not the money or the credit with which to raise money. If they feel that they cannot raise the necessary money easily, I would like to ask the Honourable the Railway Member whether the Government would like to entrust this to private enterprise. I realise fully that it means going past a very important decision taken by the Railway Board on the unanimous recommendation of a Committee, but in the case of a line like this the construction of which has been hanging fire for the last fifty years, I would strongly suggest to the Government of India that they may, as a very last resort, even try this method of entrusting the raising of the capital to private enterprise if they feel that they cannot get money on their own. Sir, I very greatly sympathise with the motion moved by my friend Mr. Ghuznavi, and would ask the House to support it.

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons (Financial Commissioner, Railways): Sir, I should not have risen today except for the remarks which have fallen from my Honourable friend Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas. He suggested in his speech that the Railway Board had played with this scheme. That is not so. I have, I regret to say, not got all the papers with me, but I am practically certain that this scheme has taken less time to get through than most of the larger schemes for the construction of railways which we have had before us in recent years. The position is briefly this, Sir. Up to 1924, and before we had opened up or decided to open up a good deal of the area served by the Assam Bengal Railway, there was very little chance of the Dacca-Aricha Railway being a paying proposition, either on the broad gauge or on the metre gauge. In 1924 the Bengal Government again asked us to re-investigate this scheme, and—this is the date I am sorry not to have in my memory—I think we began the re-investigation and survey in the winter of 1925. But I am not quite certain on that point. In any case, a survey can only ordinarily be done in the cold weather, and I am quite certain that, when we got the results of the survey, it took us no unreasonable time to examine the scheme, considering that it raised the very big question whether the line should be built on the broad gauge or the metre gauge. That does require very careful consideration when you are proposing to build an important new railway in a tract which is partially served by the broad gauge and partially by the metre gauge. I am certain that there was no delay, after the Railway Board had dealt with the scheme, in obtaining the sanction of the Government of India or the sanction of the Secretary of State, or in placing it before the Standing Finance Committee for Railways; and as soon as it was passed by the Standing Finance Committee, we placed the money for the scheme in this year's Budget. The amount was actually 27 lakhs. Except for the beginning of the final location and preliminary steps in regard to acquisition of land, we should not in any case have been able to spend any money on the construction of the Dacca-Aricha Railway until this cold weather; and by this cold weather it was known that the financial position next year was such that we could not put down any large sum for the continuation of the construction. Obviously,

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Tuesday, 25th February 1930.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber of the Council House at Eleven of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

MEMBERS SWORN:

Mr. Sadasheo Dhoondiraj Talatuley, M.L.A. (Central Provinces: Landholders); Mr. J. Ramsay Scott, M.L.A. (United Provinces: European).

SHORT NOTICE QUESTION AND ANSWER.

COMMUNAL RIOT AT DACCA.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: (a) Are Government aware of a serious Hindu-Muslim riot, entailing loss of lives, that broke out in the city of Dacca in the last week of January last?

(b) Is it a fact that riot continued for several days and that it brought the normal life of the city to a standstill?

(c) Is it a fact that, in consequence thereof, all Law Courts, schools and colleges had to be closed?

(d) Is it a fact that the authorities had notified, on January 25, under section 35A of Act V of 1861, prohibiting all unlicensed processions throughout the city of Dacca?

(e) Are Government aware that the student champions of Independence were determined to take out a procession without licence?

(f) Did the processionists take out any licence from the authorities on the "Independence" day?

(g) If the answer to the above question be in the negative, why did not the District Magistrate disperse the procession in the beginning, especially when the authorities were satisfied that an unlicensed procession was likely to bring about a breach of the peace?

(h) Are Government prepared to form a mixed committee of officials and non-officials to inquire into the matter?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: (a), (b) and (c). I would refer the Honourable Member to the reply I gave to the short notice question by Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim on the 11th instant. I understand that for some days the normal life of the city was suspended after sunset, but that during the day business was not greatly interfered with, except for occasional closing of shops in areas in which outbreaks occurred. The Law Courts continued to function throughout, but schools and colleges were closed up to the 5th February.

[Sir James Crerar.]

(d) to (f). Notices were issued under section 30 of the Police Act, requiring processions to take out licences. The gathering which was the cause of the disturbance was formed by the amalgamation of small groups of students carrying flags and shouting. These groups did not apply for a licence.

(g) The District Magistrate did not anticipate any communal trouble or other disturbance, and decided that, instead of dispersing such gatherings, it would be preferable to take action against the leaders afterwards.

(h) I understand the Local Government do not propose to constitute any committee of inquiry. I have no doubt the facts will be in issue before the Courts.

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum: Do Government feel strong enough to enforce their orders, whether they are with respect to the grant of permission for processions or whether they are for refusal of permission?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: This matter was dealt with by the local authorities, and I have no doubt that the District Magistrate, who had to deal with a difficult and emergent situation, exercised his discretion properly.

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum: Do the Government of India feel any responsibility in this respect, or does the whole thing lie with the Local Government? The matter is one of imperial concern and not very much of a local nature.

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: The action to be taken in a particular position of this kind is necessarily one which devolves immediately upon, and must be discharged immediately by, the local authorities.

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum: I asked whether the Government of India feel strong enough to get their orders respected in matters like this?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: Yes, Sir.

Dr. A. Suhrawardy: The Honourable Member has just stated that the District Magistrate did not anticipate any communal trouble. Will the Honourable Member please state whether the District Magistrate anticipated any political trouble, due to difference of opinion between the champions of Independence and those who did not share the view of those champions? If not, why did he require licences to be issued at all?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: The District Magistrate no doubt considered that, in view of the demonstrations which had been announced for that day, there was considerable possibility of trouble and he took his measures accordingly.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Are Government aware of the allegations that have been made in the papers regarding the action of the District Magistrate, the Deputy Superintendent of Police and other police officers in the matter of refusing adequate protection to the Hindus.

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: The whole of the circumstances with regard to these disturbances will be before the Courts in connection with the cases which are now pending, and I do not think it would be proper for me, at this stage, to make any further statement with regard to them.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the allegation that has been published in the papers regarding the action of the District Magistrate and the police officers?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: I have seen statements in the Press.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Is it a fact that the first trouble arose as a result of the burning of the holy books of the Mussalmans by the processionists?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: These are questions likely to come under investigation in a Court of law.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Do the Government propose to make inquiries about these allegations?

Mr. President: That question will be under investigation by a Court of law.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Is it not a fact that there are certain allegations, which cannot possibly be the subject matter of any judicial investigation that may be taking place at the present moment?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: I am not aware of that.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Is the Honourable Member aware that certain allegations have been made regarding the apathy of the District Magistrate, when particularly the Hindus wanted protection from him, which he was not inclined to give?

Mr. President: There cannot be any fine distinction as to what will come before the Courts and what will not.

BILLS PASSED BY THE COUNCIL OF STATE LAID ON THE TABLE.

The Secretary of the Assembly: Sir, in accordance with rule 25 of the Indian Legislative Rules, I lay on the table the following Bills which were passed by the Council of State at its meeting held on the 24th February, 1930:

- (1) A Bill further to amend the Special Marriage Act, 1872, for certain purposes.
- (2) A Bill to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments, and
- (3) a Bill further to amend the Prisons Act, 1894, for a certain purpose.

MESSAGES FROM THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

The Secretary of the Assembly: Sir, the following two Messages have been received from the Secretary to the Council of State. The first Message is as follows:

"I am directed to inform you that the Council of State has, at its meeting held on the 24th February, 1930, agreed without any amendments to the Bill to centralise and vest in the Governor General in Council the control over certain operations relating to dangerous drugs, and to increase and render uniform throughout British India the penalties for offences relating to such operations, which was passed by the Legislative Assembly at its meeting held on the 12th February, 1930."

[Secretary of the Assembly.]

The second Message runs as follows:

"I am directed to inform you that the Bill further to amend the Indian Patents and Designs Act, 1911, for certain purposes, which was passed by the Legislative Assembly at its meeting held on the 27th January, 1930, was passed by the Council of State at its meeting held on the 24th February, 1930, with the following amendments, viz.:

1. In sub-clause (1) of clause 1, for the figures '1929' the figures '1930' were substituted,
2. In sub-clause (b) of clause 9, in proposed sub-section (1A), for the word 'January' the word 'July' was substituted, and
3. Clause 28A was renumbered as clause 29 and the subsequent clauses were renumbered consecutively.

The Council of State requests the concurrence of the Legislative Assembly in the amendments."

Sir, I lay on the table the Bill as amended by the Council of State.

THE RAILWAY BUDGET—LIST OF DEMANDS.

DEMAND No. 1—RAILWAY BOARD—concl'd.

Mr. President: The House will now resume further discussion on Demand No. 1 of the Railway Budget.

Policy of Reservation of Compartments as "for Europeans".

Mr. K. C. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

My intention is to invite Government to make a declaration of their policy in regard to the reservation of railway compartments as "for Europeans". About five years back I had the privilege of bringing forward a Bill for the purpose of making such reservations illegal. That Bill was passed by the Legislative Assembly, but Government, in the plenitude of their wisdom and in the plenitude of the support which they can always command in the other House, prevented that Bill from reaching the Statute-book. A few days back my Honourable friend, Mr. Aney, introduced a similar Bill. Unfortunately, it has not yet been possible for this House to take that Bill into consideration. I should, therefore, like the Honourable Member in charge to make a declaration as to whether their policy in this matter has undergone any change.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I can dispose of this motion quite briefly. My Honourable friend, the Mover, has referred to the Bill for which he was responsible, which was carried by the Assembly five years ago, but was subsequently rejected in the Council of State. At that time the view advanced by Government was that the practice was dying out of itself that the reservation of compartments was being reduced to much smaller dimensions and that, in course of time, the practice would disappear. In connection with Mr. Aney's Bill, which was not reached on any of the days devoted to private Bills, the Government of India again reconsidered the matter. It appeared that since Mr. Neogy's Bill was before the House, the practice of reserving third class compartments for Europeans and Anglo-Indians had been abandoned on the Burma and South Indian Railways. The practice now only obtains on five railways, viz., the Bengal Nagpur, the North Western, the Madras and Southern Mahratta, the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railways. In the whole of India, one small compartment is reserved on 83 trains, which is 4.4 per cent. of the total number of trains. The Government of India, after considering the matter carefully, came to the conclusion that the time had come when the practice might be discontinued altogether. What they have decided to do is to take steps on the State-managed railways, so that, by the end of the year 1930 the reservation of third class compartments for Europeans and Anglo-Indians will be discontinued. They have also decided to use their influence with the Company-managed railways of which there are only two, viz., the Bengal Nagpur and the Madras and Southern Mahratta, to bring about the same result. They have no reason to believe that these Companies will be unwilling to fall into line with the policy of the Government in the matter.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Reduction of Rates and Fares on the Bengal Nagpur Railway.

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, with your permission I would omit Motion No. 25 and move Motion No. 26, which runs thus:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

This motion relates to the reduction of rates and fares on the Bengal Nagpur Railway in 1927-28. The Honourable the Railway Member, in his budget speech that year, announced certain reductions of third class rates and fares on the East Indian and the North Western Railways. He said:

"We expressly invited the attention of the Agents to the passenger fares in the light of statistics, and did tell them that it would be proper to consider further reductions. As a result of this, the East Indian Railway, the North Western Railway and the Southern Mahratta Railway were justified in proposing further reductions, and they have already been brought into force in one case on 1st January."

Sir, I began to wonder why the rates were not reduced on the Bengal Nagpur Railway. When I looked at the accounts of the various railways in India, as submitted before the Public Accounts Committee, last year, I began to compare the profits of the Bengal Nagpur Railway with those of the Eastern Bengal and the North Western Railways. I give below the profits of the three railways for the years 1925-26, 1926-27 and 1927-28:

					[Percentage of profits.]
Bengal Nagpur Railway	..	..	..	..	4.72
				..	5.08
				..	5.03
East Indian Railway	..	..	..	..	3.97
				..	5.37
				..	5.38
North Western Railway	..	..	..	..	4.22
				..	3.48
				..	3.55

[Mr. B. Das.]

I cannot understand why, in the North Western Railway, which gives a net income of 3·55 per cent. there was a reduction of third class fares for people travelling on that line. It may be that the territory over which the Bengal Nagpur Railway travels is not adequately represented on the floor of this House, and therefore nobody brings forward a motion to press on the Honourable the Railway Member that there should be a reduction of rates there.

Sir, as a member of the Public Accounts Committee, last August I put various questions as to what was happening on the Bengal Nagpur Railway, regarding reduction of third class fares. I have referred already on the floor of the House to the fact that there have been various extravagances on that line, and that matter is still under the consideration of the Public Accounts Committee and the Government of India. Sir, last year, at Simla, the Public Accounts Committee appointed a sub-committee, which was presided over by my Honourable friend Mr. Neogy, and that sub-committee gave its finding about the Bengal Nagpur Railway in the following terms:

"As regards the serious irregularities on the Bengal Nagpur Railway, we understand that a comprehensive letter has been addressed to the Company by the Railway Board, which will be considered by the main Committee. In the circumstances, we refrain from making any comments at this stage."

The main Committee went into their findings and their conclusions are given in page 24 of the Report of the Public Accounts Committee:

"As regards the sub-paragraph 8 of the Report of the sub-committee, we are satisfied that the points raised by us have for the present been adequately dealt with in the letter addressed by the Railway Board to the Agent, Bengal Nagpur Railway, but we desire to have a full report next year, on the action taken as a result of this letter."

There has been a huge waste of expenditure and a huge waste of money. I would quote only one instance, which will convince Honourable Members how the Bengal Nagpur Railway has been recklessly squandering money. This is found in page 93, paragraph 14 of the Appropriation Accounts of Railways in India for 1927-28:

"Loss in Departmental brick manufacture. In 1923 an estimate was sanctioned by the Agent—"

Of course, the Agent had the advice of the Chief Engineer and other Engineers who are supposed to be experts in the line,—

"for cost of plant, kilns, etc., amounting to Rs. 2,97,244 for manufacture of bricks by departmental agency. This estimate was further revised in 1924 under Agent's sanction to Rs. 4,59,432. . . . The cost of outturn for bricks thus works out on the year's outlay to Rs. 102 per thousand, and including proportionate charges on Capital Block Account, to Rs. 139 per thousand, against Rs. 14, the contractor's rate."

This conclusively shows the extravagance of the Bengal Nagpur Railway, and how public money is squandered, while we want saving, so that third class passengers, who are the largest contributors to the Railway might get the benefit of reduced fares. Instead of that, the Bengal Nagpur Railway is spending money on mad experiments. Probably that engineer who advised the Agent was not an expert. I do not know whether he is still in service. What could have been obtained at Rs. 14 per thousand from the market, the Railway manufactured at Rs. 139 per thousand. Sir, I do not want to quote other instances of extravagance, but I would ask Honourable Members, who would be interested in rectifying the mismanagement of this Railway, to look into the Appropriation Accounts of Railways in India for 1927-28, and they will find ample material supporting my statement. I would have thought that the Honourable the Railway Member would press on the Bengal Nagpur Railway to bring about that happy result, when they would reduce their rates and fares. It seems that, before 1916-17, the Bengal Nagpur Railway had an investment of about £45 millions, and when in 1912 the Government of India entered into a fresh contract with that Railway, the rate of interest was reduced to 3½ per cent., and the money that has been borrowed since then by the Government of India, except a few crores borrowed after 1922, was borrowed at more than 3½ per cent., so that the Bengal Nagpur Railway makes a profit every year. Any surplus which the Bengal Nagpur Railway might earn, after paying 3½ per cent. to the Government for paying interest on borrowed capital, must go towards the reduction of rates and freights.

Now I claim reduction from another point of view. I find on page 18 of the same Appropriation Accounts that the number of passengers who travelled on the Bengal Nagpur Railway in 1926-27 was 24,540,700, and in 1927-28, they were 25,874,300. As regards the tonnage carried, in 1926-27 it was 13,546,000, while in 1927-28, it was 15,617,000. Well, I look to the favoured railways, that is railways in which the passengers are favoured with reduced fares so far as third class passengers are concerned, such as the East Indian Railway and the North Western Railway, and there I do not find any appreciable increase in the number of passengers or in the tonnage, rather I find in the North Western Railway that the tonnage carried has been reduced from 19 million odd tons to 17 million odd. In the East Indian Railway, I find just a slight increase of tonnage and also passengers. Sir, I am not an expert in these matters. I think my Honourable friend Mr. Haji may contribute something to the discussion of this matter. While there has been an increase in both the number of passengers travelling as well as in the quantity of tonnage carried, we find that the same post-war high rates of tariff still prevail on the Bengal Nagpur Railway.

Why should not Government enforce an equitable system of rates on all railways? If the Government do not insist on reduction of rates and freights, they help the Company-managed railways to appropriate their surplus profits towards payment of higher dividends, in addition to the guaranteed interest that Government pay. Apart from that, I do not wish to see that the Government should simply be a tax-collecting department. The railways are public carriers, and if they are carriers, they should charge only reasonable rates so that all classes of people, especially the third class passengers, might be benefited. My Honourable friend the Railway Member has himself admitted that the Bengal Nagpur Railway travels through a poor country. When Government think of reducing railway rates and freights, they ought to consider first the claims of the railways which travel through comparatively poorer parts of the country. Sir, I submit that the time has come when the rates and freights on the Bengal Nagpur Railway should be reduced. I remember in the last Public Accounts Committee, we raised a discussion on this subject, and even the Chairman, Sir George Schuster, was pleased to observe that circumstances, as they appeared before the Public Accounts Committee, justified a reduction of rates and freights on the Bengal Nagpur Railway. With these remarks, I move my motion.

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons (Financial Commissioner, Railways): Sir, I admire the ingenuity with which my Honourable friend has at last brought the irregularities of the Bengal Nagpur Railway to notice on the floor of the House. I presume his argument is more or less as follows. The Bengal Nagpur Railway has been squandering money. If it had not been squandering money, it would have been better off, and if it had been better off, it could have reduced rates and fares, and more particularly it could have reduced third class fares. I do not think that misrepresents my Honourable friend. I am not sorry that he has succeeded in bringing up this question, which I understand raised some public comment at the time when the matter came before the Public Accounts Committee, because I think there are some remarks which ought to be made. It is not an easy position for the Financial Commissioner of Railways to defend a Railway Administration against charges of irregularity, because it is very much his duty and his wish to enforce regularity on railways, and anything he says may, therefore, be misconstrued, as showing a lightness of heart or spirit on his part towards one of the important sides of his duties. On the other hand it is necessary, in these matters, to be judicial. Therefore when I came out from home, I myself went through the various irregularities which came to the notice of the Public Accounts Committee. The number actually mentioned in this year's Report was 30. They were not all serious, and some of them were mainly formal, nine being first brought to notice in the Report for 1927-28, while 21 had come forward from the previous year's Report. Now if there were 30 irregularities spread over two years on any individual Railway Administration, serious enough to be brought to notice in an Appropriation Report, there would be very good prima facie grounds for condemning wholeheartedly the administration of that Railway. But actually,—and this is what I think was not realised at the time,—that was not the position. Of these 30, only four were irregularities relating to the years on the accounts of which the Reports of 1926-27 and 1927-28 were compiled. With regard to another three or four irregularities, I have not been able to get any information as to the date of the occurrences, and I may mention that, in some cases, the dates of the irregularities were not given in the Reports. That makes 8. The remaining 22 were spread over the years from 1910 onwards to 1925-26; that is to say, these 30 irregularities were spread over a period of 18 years. That obviously puts a very different complexion on the matter, and is obviously relevant to any charge that the Bengal Nagpur Railway has been, as a whole, badly administered. I myself have had my quarrels with the Bengal Nagpur Railway Administration on certain of these cases, but I do think that it is desirable to be judicial in a matter of this kind, and not to condemn a Railway Administration root and branch because certain things have not been done well on that railway.

I will now pass on to the question whether the Bengal Nagpur Railway should be asked—or compelled as, I think, the Honourable Member said—to reduce its rates and fares, and particularly its third class fares. No one would, I think, gather from my Honourable friend's remarks that the Bengal Nagpur Railway in some respects may even be said to have gone further than some other railways in the matter of reductions. Their reductions in fares, I may say, are all for distances of over 300 miles. As a whole, the Bengal Nagpur Railway has followed the policy which we follow, of reducing fares and freights for longer distances, in order to encourage traffic over longer distances, and that is an extremely sound policy. In 1926 they reduced intermediate class passenger fares, and also third class passenger fares. They reduced ordinary third class fares, for example, from 3½ pies per mile for distances over 300 miles, to 2½ pies per mile,—a reduction of a full pie. They also reduced, following our own reductions of 1929, their luggage and parcels rates. They increased, as we have done, the free allowances of luggage of third class passengers from 15 to 25 seers, i.e., an increase of over 50 per cent., and they made various substantial reductions in the rates on various agricultural commodities, such as oil-cake, manures and wood. They followed us in the reductions on coal.

Now, the question whether they should make further reductions is, to start with, very much a question of the financial position of that Railway; and if the Honourable Member had referred to the Pink Books which we supply, he would have seen that the Bengal Nagpur Railway had a loss in 1928-29, the last year for which accounts are available, of nearly 48½ lakhs, whereas the North Western Railway, with which he made a comparison, had in that year a profit of Rs. 33,80,000. Obviously a railway which has incurred a fairly substantial loss is not in as good a position to effect further reductions of rates and fares as a railway which is earning a profit, and I myself should not be prepared to press the Bengal Nagpur Railway to make a further reduction at present, unless it was a reduction which was likely immediately to bring a corresponding increase of revenue from increased traffic.

There is a further point with regard to the Bengal Nagpur Railway. It is, as a whole, a line which runs through a country which is not thickly populated. It has heavy gradients, so that trains are expensive to move, and its goods traffic is largely in heavy ores, a not very paying traffic. Therefore you cannot expect that Railway to pay as well as other Railways, nor can the inhabitants of that area actually expect to get their transportation as cheaply as the inhabitants of other areas, for instance, those served by the East Indian Railway, because the line has cost more to build and the revenue obtained from the line, when opened, is lower than it is in more favoured localities. As regards the recommendation which has been made in the Public Accounts Committee's Report, we shall of course give that recommendation very serious consideration owing to the body from which it came. It does, however, as far as I can see, go against the whole of the previous rates policy of the Government of India, which has been to fix the rates, subject to certain maxima and minima, with regard to the individual circumstances of each Railway Administration.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

The motion was negatived.

Sardar Bahadur Honorary Captain Hira Singh, Brar (Punjab: Nominated Non-Official): On a point of order, Sir, my motion No. 62* is on the same subject as No. 28

Mr. President: We are only half way yet.

Racial Discrimination.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Lucknow Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, in view of the discussion which has already taken place, I do not propose to move my cut No. 29, and therefore by your leave, I shall go to cut No. 30.

*"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Re 1. (Transportation of food stuff and fodder from Punjab colonies to other places.)"

[Munshi Iswar Saran.]

I beg to move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Railway Board' be reduced by Rs. 100."

Sir, this debate year after year is humiliating and provoking. It is humiliating that we should go on protesting year after year against our being deprived of the full opportunity to serve in the Railway Department in our own country and that our protest, our entreaty and our request should all go in vain. It is provoking because we find that the bar sinister still exists in spite of our protest and struggle. But I suppose we have to carry as long as the wrong is not righted.

May I, with your permission, say only one brief word here as regards the Anglo-Indian community, because in the discussion unfortunately something will have to be said about them. I wish to assure that community that we all are anxious that it should have its due share in the railway service, indeed in all services. But at the same time, we are very anxious that no community, be it the Hindu community or the Muslim community or the Anglo-Indian community, should have a preponderance of posts in any Department or in any service to the detriment of other communities. (Hear, hear.) I shall offer a word of advice, if I may, to the Anglo-Indian community. The time has come when the Anglo-Indians ought to make up their minds once for all in regard to the attitude they will adopt towards the big problems that are engaging the attention of the country today. Let me say in all friendliness that they should cease to play the role of Mr. Facing-both-ways. That role will not do; it will not pay. I hope they will take suggestion in the spirit in which it is offered. They ought face the realities of the position. They ought to determine their aim, and the destiny that lies before them.

As regards racial discrimination, Sir, there is no one who will be prepared to assert that it does not exist. If I am right in making this statement, as I submit I am, then the question naturally arises, what is Government doing in regard to it? I must confess, Sir, that, perhaps on account of my ignorance or want of information, I am unable to comprehend the attitude of Government. I do say, and I do wish to lay stress on it, that they have no consistent policy unless the policy be to tolerate racial discrimination. May I invite the attention of the House to a speech which was delivered by Mr. Parsons in the budget debate of 1928? On that occasion Mr. Parsons said:

"Whether Government holds" (I am leaving out the unnecessary words) "Whether Government holds that Indians are incapacitated constitutionally or otherwise from carrying out properly the duties of the subordinate posts which we are now discussing; the answer is immediately and directly 'no'. Government do not propose"—

I shall beg the House to mark these words—

"Government do not propose to have any policy of racial discrimination in that matter. It has been pointed out by my Honourable friends that, in certain specific instances which they have brought before the House, there appears, I should prefer to call it, a remnant of racial discrimination either in the terms which are offered for initial employment or in the treatment after employment of different communities. I wish to say here and now that the Railway Board do not countenance any such discrimination. They have definitely informed all Railway Administrations that discrimination of that character should be abolished and they have obtained assurances from the Railway Administrations that they are taking steps to abolish that discrimination."

This statement was made not by a private Member; this statement was made by the Government spokesman on behalf of the Railways. If we carefully consider this statement, the conclusion seems to be irresistible that Government admitted the existence of racial discrimination and made up their minds to remove it as quickly as they could. Then, Sir, we come to the speech of Sir George Rainy, which he delivered in 1929, and I apologise to the House for giving this long quotation, because it is necessary for the purpose of the particular argument which I wish to develop that I should give a somewhat long quotation from his speech. Says Sir George Rainy:

"We have to recognise specially on a railway like the East Indian Railway or the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, which are now State-managed, that we took them over with all the inheritance of the rules which had been framed under Company management, and that we cannot, by any sudden stroke of the pen, eliminate all the differences which have grown up under those rules. What we can do, and what we ought to do, is steadily to maintain the pressure so that where these rules definitely admit racial discrimination in particular matters, this should be rectified and the racial discrimination eliminated. That is what we are aiming at, and I entirely agree that these annual debates on the subject in the Assembly are of great use because they keep the attention of the Railway Board and of the Railway Member concentrated on the point, so that more rapid progress is made than would otherwise be the case."

Again, Sir, I submit that after carefully considering this statement of Sir George Rainy, one felt certain that the existence of the disease was admitted. It was further admitted that Government was going to apply the remedy and that these annual debates in the Assembly would make Government apply the remedy with greater rapidity. But, Sir, in the present speech of the Honourable the Railway Member, what do we find? He says:

"I must also refer to the elimination of racial discrimination, but I can do so only briefly. The whole question has been systematically considered and we have now reached a stage when the material has been digested and consultation with the Central Advisory Committee is likely to be both helpful and fruitful."

After admitting the existence of racial discrimination, after telling us that Government are going to remove it, we are now told in 1930 that the materials have been collected, and we have now reached a stage when a consultation with the Advisory Committee will be both helpful and fruitful and the conclusion obviously will be come to after this consultation.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas (Indian Merchants' Chamber: Indian Commerce): In regard to the method. It is a step in advance.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I am indebted to my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: I am only putting forward a construction which strikes me.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I take it that it is in regard to the methods by which racial discrimination is to be removed, that consultation is necessary. Am I right?

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: Yes, about right.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I am content if I am about right. I submit, Sir, that as far as this racial question is concerned, if Government are really

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

[25TH FEB. 1930.]

in earnest, very little consultation is necessary. If any consultation was necessary, that stage has passed.

There is racial discrimination as regards recruitment to the services; there is racial discrimination as regards the treatment that they mete out to their Indian and non-Indian servants; there is racial discrimination as regards the facilities and amenities they give to their Indian and non-Indian servants. Sir, this is a matter which has been discussed threadbare; this is a matter which has been agitated in this House and in the public Press and on the public platform for a very long time. Are we to understand that the question is so full of difficulty and complexity that it is necessary, in order to come to some conclusions, to consult the Railway Advisory Committee? I ask, Sir, why was this consultation, which has been mentioned now by Sir George Rainy, not mentioned by him last year or by Mr. Parsons the year before? I do submit that, in spite of my very best efforts—I wish to assure Sir George Rainy and my Honourable friend Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas—that in spite of my very best efforts to put the most generous and the most charitable construction on this idea of consultation, I am very painfully and reluctantly driven to the conclusion that this was not necessary. We know, Sir, that in 1926 Mr. Sim, speaking on behalf of the Railway Department, admitted the existence of racial discrimination, and it is in 1930 that the question of consultation has been brought forward! I say, Sir, if this consultation has to be made, it ought to have been made much earlier. Did the Government take six years' time to make up their mind whether they should consult the Advisory Committee or not? I submit, Sir,—and I shall be sorry if I am doing any injustice to Sir George Rainy or to Government,—that for a man who has studied this question carefully and deeply, there is no other conclusion possible than this, that they are not serious about this matter. We get lip sympathy in abundance. Personally, speaking for myself, I hate that word "sympathy". Indians do not want sympathy; they want justice; they want recognition of their rights. Then, Sir, sympathy becomes of no avail when it is not translated into action. We are told that instructions have been sent to the Railway Administrations, and yet I shall show to the House later on that those instructions have not been observed, have not been obeyed. A tree is known by its fruits; the value of the instructions lies in the action that they lead to. If they lead to no action, or to unsatisfactory action, then it is very little satisfaction to us that they were issued. There is one question which I should like to put. Are Government unable to enforce the policy which they lay down, or which they approve of? Is it possible for Railway Administrations to snap their fingers at the instructions which are issued by the Railway Board on behalf of Government? If that be so, Sir, then there are only two alternative conclusions, and I leave it to Sir George Rainy to decide which he will accept; either the Railway Board is feeble and incompetent, or all this talk about bringing about a change is insincere. The alternatives, Sir are incompetence or insincerity; let the Railway Member make his choice as to which he will accept.

Now, Sir, as I have already submitted this question has been engaging the attention of the House for a long time. I shall give a few figures to show how the matter actually stands, and I have been careful to take only figures of the period since Sir George Rainy came into office.

We find that in the year 1926-27, the number of Indians filling gazetted posts—I shall beg the House to mark this—increased from 26.85 per cent. to 29.7 per cent. On the four State-managed lines the increase was from 32.02 per cent. to 34.68 per cent. In the year 1927-28, the number rose from 29.26 per cent. to 31.82 per cent., and on the four State-managed railways it rose from 34.74 per cent. to 38.09 per cent. Then, in the year 1928-29, from 31.51 per cent., it rose to 32.71 per cent., and on the five State-managed railways it increased 35.99 per cent. to 36.22 per cent.; Sir, at the rate roughly of 3 per cent. annually Indianisation is proceeding. I ask, how long will it take to reach the maximum?

My Honourable friend Mr. Hayman told us, in answer to my friend Mr. Ghuznavi, "Good heavens, what nonsense about Indianisation you are talking? We have almost reached the highest figure possible". Mr. Hayman either takes us to be very simple-minded because he is new to the House, or he has said something which I for one am unable to understand. I shall request Mr. Hayman to controvert the conclusion that I have drawn from the figures that I have quoted that, during these years, the increase has been only 2 per cent. or 3 per cent. at the outside. I shall now ask him to consider how he has been filling the vacancies that have been occurring. I submit, Sir, that this is a very good test of Indianisation. We find that in 1927-28—I am taking only one year's figures—the percentage of Europeans to the number of vacancies filled among officers of gazetted rank was 32.0 per cent., and it rose to 43.0 per cent. in 1928-29. What do we find about Indians? In 1927-28 the percentage was 68.0 per cent., but it fell in 1928-29 to 57.0 per cent. Sir, this is how Indianisation is going amongst gazetted officers.

Let us turn for a moment our attention to Indianisation in the subordinate staff, as I may call it, who get Rs. 250 or over on: 12 Noon. Class I Railways.

In 1928 the number of Europeans was 2,046.

In 1929 the number of Europeans was 2,051.

In 1928 the number of Hindus was 1,921.

In 1929 the number of Hindus was 2,068.

As regards the Mussalmans, I must say that their representation is very very inadequate; in 1928 the number of Mussalmans was 330 and the number rose in 1929 to 360.

The number of Anglo-Indians was 3,784 in 1928, and it rose to 3,800 in 1929.

The number of "Other Classes" rose from 536 in 1928 to 662 in 1929. Taking the subordinate service alone into consideration, if you go on Indianising at the rate at which you have gone on, I assert that it will take a very long time to Indianise the entire service which is enough to exhaust the patience even of a very patient man like myself. My Honourable friend, Dr. Moonje, says it will take a century to Indianise. What is a century when compared with eternity. (Laughter.)

Let us come to the Railway Board itself. What do we find there? We had thought that, any rate in the Railway Board itself, Indianisation would proceed at a greater pace. We find that in 1928 there were five Europeans (I am talking of the subordinate staff) and in 1929 there were six. The number of Hindus went up from 87 to 130 in that period, while the Mussalmans increased from 10 to 13 and Anglo-Indians from 17 to 23, and other classes remained at the same figure—12 in 1928 and 12 in 1929. That is how it goes on in the Railway Board.

Look at the result of the instructions that have been issued to various Railway Administrations and see how Indianisation is being carried on by them. Take the Assam Bengal Railway. We find that in the Agency Department there were three Europeans in 1928 and the same number continues in 1929—there are no Indians whether Hindus, Mussalmans or any others. (An Honourable Member: "It is a Company-managed railway.") Never mind whether it is a Company-managed Railway or not. On the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway in the Agency Department in 1928 there were seven Europeans, and in 1929 their number increased by one. The number of Anglo-Indians was one in 1928 and we find the same number in 1929. There are no Hindus or Mussalmans in this Department.

Then take the subordinate staff on the Eastern Bengal Railway. There are a number of Traffic Inspectors who get from Rs. 300 to 500 and there is no Indian amongst them. Take the Assistant Station Masters—there are a number of them who get from Rs. 280 to Rs. 330 and there is no Indian among them.

Mr. B. Das: They are all Anglo-Indians; they are not Europeans

Munshi Iswar Saran: My Honourable and gallant friend, Colonel Gidney will give you an answer that might satisfy you.

Then on the East Indian Railway we find that, in the Stores Department, there are four officers who get from Rs. 550 to Rs. 600, and there are no Indians among them. There are two officers who get from Rs. 500 to Rs. 550 and there are no Indians among them. Amongst the three officers who get from Rs. 425 to Rs. 500 in the same Department, there are no Indians. Then take the Boiler Inspectors; there are no Indians among them. There is no Indian mechanic. Then take the Station Masters, A class—Rs. 430 to Rs. 530—there are no Indians. Station Masters, B class—Rs. 360 to Rs. 400—there are no Indians. Station Masters, C Class—Rs. 300 to 350—there are no Indians. I shall not trouble the House with any more figures; the few that I have given are enough to show that the picture is sad and depressing.

An Honourable Member: Take the North Western Railway; it is no better.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I have cited only a few cases by way of example. I know it will be said that some of these are Anglo-Indians who are statutory Indians and that no objection can be taken to them.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indians): Have you any objection to it?

Munshi Iswar Saran: My Honourable and gallant friend, Colonel Gidney, asks me if I have any objection. I say "Yes" for this reason: Conceding the claim of Anglo-Indians, what we have to decide is whether they should be allowed to shut out members of other Indian communities from railway services, and whether the members of this particular community should be allowed to have, if not, the practical monopoly, at any rate, the vast majority of the railway posts, I say, Sir, the present policy is wrong. It is true that, having regard to their past history and the present condition of the Anglo-Indian community, they are entitled to certain considerations and certain concessions; that is very different from saying that the Anglo-Indian community should continue to enjoy the advantages which it has enjoyed so long.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Whoever said that? I do not remember to have said so, but I know you envy my position.

Dr. A. Suhrawardy (Burdwan and Presidency Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): You need not say it; it is a fact.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I wish to make it perfectly clear to them that, as far as we are concerned,—I hope I am speaking on behalf of a great majority of Members on this side of the House—we do not wish the Anglo-Indian community to be kept out of railway employment, but we do object to the unfair advantage which they are enjoying today and we do resent the disadvantages and handicaps of other Indian communities. I say to the Anglo-Indian community, "Please go into other Departments as well, have your share in them, as indeed every other Indian community is entitled to have its share". Let me illustrate this point, and it will be clear even to my Honourable and gallant friend, Colonel Gidney. Take the Judicial Service; suppose we had competent, educated and capable Anglo-Indians who came forward and said, "Let us have our share in the Judicial Service", can Hindus or Musalmans turn round and say, "No, thank you; look at past history; we have made the Judicial Service what it is"? That would not be fair. (An Honourable Member: "But we are kept out as a matter of policy.") There are so many interjections and interruptions that I hope Sir George Rainy will take note of their meaning, significance and force; then only will he be able to appreciate the extreme moderation of the remarks which I have the honour of addressing to the House. . . .

Sir Darcy Lindsay (Bengal: European): In all humility.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Quite right; my Honourable friend, the Leader of the European Group is perfectly right; it is in all humility that I am making these submissions, but my trouble is that, in spite of the humility, the request will not be granted. (An Honourable Member: "Why do you say that?") Because I know from past experience.

Intimately connected with this question is the question of the training of Indians in various workshops. I shall only ask some one, on behalf of the Railway Department, please to answer these questions:

(1) How many Hindu and Muslim boys are being trained in the various workshops such as the Jamalpur or Kharagpur workshops?

(2) Is the test of admission the same in the case of all boys, or is there any distinction made between these tests?

(3) Do the Indian and Anglo-Indian boys get the same allowance during the period of training?

[Munshi Iswar Saran.]

(4) Do they start on the same salary after they come out of the workshops?

I fully recognise that my Honourable friend Sir George Rainy is a terribly busy man, and I suppose his duties are so multifarious that he cannot be expected to look into every detail of every department, but I shall beg of him to consider, whether in his opinion the training that is being given to Indian boys is sufficient, whether he thinks that they are receiving the encouragement that they ought to receive or whether he feels that there is a distinction made between them on the one hand and between Anglo-Indians on the other.

These questions have been discussed, I might say, ad nauseum, and therefore, I do not wish to repeat them. I am only inviting the attention of the Honourable Sir George Rainy and the Railway Board to these questions.

Now, what about the education of the children of the railway employees? What amount do you spend over the education of the children of Anglo-Indian employees and of Indian employees? Have you raised the position of the teachers of purely Indian schools, or are you still in the stage of contemplation? Has the process of the digestion of the material on the subject been completed or is it still going on? The next question is, what is the East Indian Railway Company doing at the present moment in regard to Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): It is a State-managed railway now!

Munshi Iswar Saran: Many unpleasant facts have been brought to my notice, as well as communicated to me, but I think I shall do well in not referring to them. I shall only ask the Honourable Sir George Rainy to see for himself whether there is any distinction made in respect of leave rules and the rules of promotion.

Then comes the old questions of accommodation and of medical relief which have been brought to the notice of the House and of the Railway Member, and I hope when some one gets up to reply on behalf of the Railway Board he will be able to tell us that that distinction has at any rate disappeared.

Sir, there is one other minor matter, for which of course I suppose the Railway Board cannot be held responsible, but it is a matter which I wish to bring to the notice of the Honourable Sir George Rainy in the hope that something will be done to remove a little irritation that we sometimes feel, and that is the question of platform tickets. It is a very very minor and small matter, but I know how it irritates us. An Indian goes to a railway station and the ticket collector, very rightly of course, asks, "Have you got a platform ticket?". But if the Indian has got European clothes on, the chances are fewer of this question being asked, but if an Anglo-Indian or European goes, then in nine cases out of ten he is not asked to produce a platform ticket. I know that the Railway Board have got nothing to do with it; this is a very small, very insignificant and very trivial matter; but these little things do give rise to irritation and produce a lot of unpleasantness. I would therefore ask my Honourable friend the Railway Member to give a little attention to it.

The question under discussion is so vast that if one desired to go into all the details, one would occupy the whole day and even then the catalogue of grievances would not be complete. Having regard to the time of the House that I would be justified in taking, I have made only a few brief remarks, which indicate our difficulties, in the hope that they will be speedily removed. I wish to assure the Honourable Member in charge and other Members of Government that it is not pleasant for us to be constantly harping on this question. But Government must bear the responsibility of these unfortunate discussions. If a man has a pain, he will continue to cry, unpleasant though it may be, as long as the pain lasts. There will be no necessity for this unpleasant debate if the causes are removed.

My friend Sir Hugh Cocke last year said, "Indianisation or no Indianisation, we want efficiency". This attitude gives rise to misunderstanding and trouble as it is based on a woeful disregard of our real position. I was very pleased to read the report of a speech or interview of the Honourable the Leader of the European Group, wherein he asked his countrymen to try and get underneath the skin of Indians and to see what they feel. If Sir Hugh Cocke had anticipated the spirit and attitude of my genial friend, the Leader of the Opposition, he would not have made this remark. Sir, we are more interested in India and its future than any Member of the European Group can ever pretend to be and we desire to increase our efficiency and will not and cannot allow it to be impaired in any way. But I say, do not in the name of efficiency for the sake of Heaven perpetrate an injustice. Give us a fair chance, give us opportunities for which we are clamouring, and at the same time see that efficiency does not suffer.

Now, Sir, what is the remedy for all these troubles? The remedy is that Sir George Rainy instead of being responsible to the Governor General in Council or to the Government in England, should be responsible to this House. If he is responsible to this House, this difficulty will vanish in no time. That is the real remedy. (An Honourable Member: "That is the only remedy".) Yes, I stand corrected, that is the only remedy. I hope we shall get that remedy soon. I do not make a secret of this fact that I feel,—and I am very sorry to say that,—that my protest and the protests of other speakers who will follow me may not produce the desired results; but, Sir, as the late Mr. Gokhale said in the present condition of India, we have to serve her not by our successes but by our failures.

Dr. B. S. Moonje (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I have listened very carefully to the speech of my friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, and I agree with him to a very great extent. Perhaps there is a point in his speech wherein I may not agree with him. It may be due to the fact that I may not have fully comprehended his ideas or his object. The point that is under debate at the present moment relates to racial discrimination, and racial discrimination, so far as I have been able to understand it, relates to such discrimination between Indians on the one hand and non-Indians on the other. That is what I have understood by racial discrimination. If that is so, I have not been able to understand how he has complained against the monopoly which the Anglo-Indians are at present enjoying in the railway service. I cannot understand that, in the public administration of a country, there could ever be this distinction between Indians, Anglo-Indians, Hindus, Mussalmans and Sikhs. I have always understood that the administration stood for equal opportunities to all, whatever their caste or creed might be. If on the point of merit, the Anglo-Indians have got the monopoly, I have not the least grudge or grouse or complaint. The complaint comes in when that monopoly has not been based on merit ascertained through open competition. If an Anglo-Indian boy competes for a certain position, along with other Indian boys, and if he is found fit physically, educationally and morally, then I would be the first man to say that that boy must have precedence over others.

An Honourable Member: What about military services?

Dr. B. S. Moonje: This is not the occasion to discuss that subject.

An Honourable Member: You wanted the baniyas for the Army. Where were they in the Great War?

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Whether a baniya is a baniya, a non-military man so long as he is Hindu or he becomes a military man immediately he is converted to Islam and becomes a Mussalman, or whether he remains a baniya, even after he has been made a Mussalman is a thing on which I will say something at the proper time. This is not the occasion for it. What I complain of now is the system under which merit and open competition are not given precedence, and which is based on distinctions of caste, creed and colour. The British bureaucracy is now doing things as it likes, in spite of our pleadings and warnings, but it must understand that its time is up, that the time is coming when power will have to be transferred, and when we get self-government or Swaraj, there will be no such distinction of creed or colour in the matter of recruitment to the public services. Public Services form the very soul of Swaraj and I hate the idea of poisoning the soul with the virus of communalism. It is on the public services that good Government, peace and order are based, and I grieve most when that fountain of good Government, peace and order is being infected with the poison of communalism, such as Indians against Anglo-Indians, Hindus against Mussalmans, Sikhs and so on. It is this kind of communalism that I condemn most.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must confine himself to racial discrimination.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: I want to explain what the Government have done.

Mr. President: Communalism has nothing to do with the question before us.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: I bow to your ruling. I would like to know from the Government Benches on what basis they give a monopoly to Anglo-Indians as against non-Anglo-Indians.

Mr. President: As the Honourable Member has himself pointed out, racial discrimination is between Indians and Europeans.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: I accept your ruling. I should like to know from the Government on what principle they have discriminated Anglo-Indians as against non-Anglo-Indians.

Mr. President: I would ask the Honourable Member not to open that question.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: There is another kind of discrimination. I may call it racial discrimination. I may call it discrimination which is not based upon any justice or equity. I will give an instance to make myself clear. There are Assistant Station Masters. They have to pass certain examinations. I am told, I am open to correction, that when the examination is held, an Anglo-Indian is set a less stiff examination and the Indian has to pass a stiffer examination.

Mr. President: I thought the Honourable Member did not make a discrimination between Anglo-Indians and other Indians. The question really, according to the Honourable Member himself, is that racial discrimination means discrimination between Indians on the one side and Europeans on the other.

Mr. Lalchand Navalrai (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I raise a point of order. Do the Anglo-Indians admit or acknowledge that they are Europeans or that they are Indians? If they are Indians, then your ruling will hold good. In the other case . . .

Dr. B. S. Moonje: As this question of discrimination has cropped up, I will not qualify it as racial or communal. I would call it only discrimination. Now, is there such discrimination in the matter of railway recruitment?

Mr. President: The question we are discussing is racial discrimination.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: I would now deal with racial discrimination. Now, Sir, there are English boys who are residents in India. They are set the same examination along with Indians but the test is less stiff for them and stiffer for Indians excluding Anglo-Indians who are included in them. After passing the same examination, the English Assistant Station Master is given higher pay and the Indian Station Master is given less pay. Is that racial discrimination or not? If that is so, then I would insist upon the Government Benches explaining why this happens, and whether this kind of discrimination exists in the services or not. I appeal to the Government Benches to bring to an end this kind of discrimination as soon as possible, and if that is not going to be done, we shall give them no peace, nor shall we allow ourselves to have peace of mind. We are bent upon seeing that all kinds of discrimination, not based on merit and competency, as ascertained through open competitive examination, whether it is racial or otherwise, is removed from the services, and it is from this point of view that I support the motion.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla (Bombay Central Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, before I proceed to criticise the Honourable Member for Railways, I think it is necessary that the House should know the statement that the Railway Member made in connection with the Indianisation. In his speech on page 7, paragraph 19, under the head "Indianisation" he says:

"I should like to mention the special efforts which have been made to bring the Transportation (Power) and the Mechanical Engineering Branches into line with the Civil Engineering and Transportation (Traffic) and Commercial Branches in the matter of Indianisation. A scheme for the training of apprentices has been in force since 1926, but the period of training being six years, it could not provide fully qualified officers until the end of 1932."

[Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla.]

And the last sentence of this paragraph says:

"It is proposed to continue similar arrangements until 1933, when the scheme for the training of apprentices will bear fruit and provide the requisite number of Indians for these Departments."

Paragraph 20 runs thus:

"Under this head I must also refer to the elimination of racial discrimination, but I can only do so briefly. The whole question has been systematically considered, and we have now reached a stage when the material has been digested and consultation with the Central Advisory Council is likely to be both helpful and fruitful."

Sir, I can only say that this statement is not satisfactory, and also that it does not go far enough. I would therefore like to mention what we mean by Indianisation. We mean by Indianisation this, that every class of people that belongs to India or calls itself Indian should have an equal opportunity to serve in Government Departments, and the total amount of Indianisation should be 75 per cent., as stated by my friend Mr. Hayman. We want to lay great stress on the question of the gazetted officers. There are two definite issues before the House. The first is, when was the competitive examination system introduced? And the second is, why was it introduced? The impression that is created in the mind of the Indians here is that these competitive examinations are a sort of obstruction put in the way of the people who are qualified to get into Government service or the railway service. And, though my friends, Munshi Iswar Saran and Dr. Moonje, have criticised the preponderance of Anglo-Indians in the services, I think the point before the House is that what we mean by the term "Indianisation", is the equal distribution of services between all classes and communities. I particularly want to lay emphasis on this point, that racial discrimination not only between Indians and Europeans, but also between Hindus and Muhammadans should cease. That should be the objective.

Mr. President: Order, order. I cannot allow the Honourable Member to proceed in that strain.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: I want to emphasise what I mean by Indianisation.

Mr. President: Indianisation is Indianisation.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: Indianisation means the throwing open of equal opportunities to all Indians.

Mr. President: Order, order. That is a different issue altogether. It is a question between the Europeans and the Indians that we are discussing now.

Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla: Sir, the question is that Government must inform the House as to how many vacancies have occurred in the various Departments of the railways and also how many new appointments have been made by them to fill in the posts. After this information has been obtained, we would like to know how many posts have been filled by Indians, and how many by non-Indians. And I would also like to emphasise, in this connection, that in every case where the appointment has not been given to an Indian, Government must explain their reasons for doing so. If those statistics are provided to this House, I think it will be satisfied, or at least will be able to find out, how far Government have carried out the intentions and wishes of this part of the House. This part of the House, Sir, is very keen that Indianisation should go on as rapidly as possible, and if Government find any difficulty to get suitable Indians, then efforts should be made by them, through the help of provincial committees of responsible men to bring in new recruitment. Sir, I do not believe, I must say at the outset, in any of these competitive examinations, because they are nothing but a farce, and generally lead to dissatisfaction. They are mere obstructions. Government therefore should lay down minimum qualifications necessary for particular appointments. They have suggested apprenticeship for seven years, which means that for seven years there will be no real Indianisation. Now, I think we have got enough qualified men in India who can be taken in the railway services, and, though it may look a little tiring to the Government Benches to hear a debate of this character, or it may appear that we are wasting the time of the House on this debate, I must say that this is the only place where we can make our voice felt and can also make the Government understand that they must now try their best to have Indianisation in the services, especially in the case of the gazetted officers, who are getting Rs. 250 and more. The figures, that were supplied by Mr. Hayman the other day regarding the Muslim representation, relate to a separate matter of Indianisation, and, though he told the House the other day that 75 per cent. of the services had been Indianised, I hope he will tell us today what percentage of the Indianisation has been enforced in the gazetted ranks. This is the most important point to which we would like to draw the attention of the Honourable the Railway Member, and I hope he will pay serious attention to it and meet the wishes of this House in such a way that there will not be any occasion to move a similar cut next year.

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee (Nominated: Indian Christians): Sir, whatever I may say on this motion, I am extremely anxious not to say anything that would cause any bitterness between race and race. I am perfectly sensible of the statements that have been made by the Honourable the Railway Member and Mr. Hayman, that they are extremely desirous to remove, as far as they can, all traces of racial discrimination that exist in the railway services and in the matter of facilities that are given to the employees on the railways. I am not so pessimistic as my friend, Munshi Iswar Saran. I also realise that there are certain inequalities in the shape of concessions that have been enjoyed by a certain class of servants for a long time, and cannot in fairness be withdrawn at a moment's notice. I am also further prepared to admit that certain classes of His Majesty's subjects are, by reason of their upbringing or education or their physical fitness, particularly fitted for a certain kind of work in the public services of the country. But notwithstanding all that, my only desire is to call attention to one phase of the question. I would not describe it as an instance of racial discrimination, but rather of racial inequality that exists and seems to exist in a definite, distinctive and decided measure among the employees of the railways. I refer, Sir, to the inequality in the matter of educational facilities for the children of European employees as against those provided for children of Indian employees.

Now, Sir, reading from this book which is a report of the inquiry on the expenditure of railways on the education of the children of employees in the Railway Department, conducted by Mr. C. W. Jones and submitted to the Railway Board on the 31st October, 1927, we find that Government accepted the responsibility for the education of the children of European railway employees in the following terms. The Report says:

"The educational facilities provided by the railways seem to have had their origin in the necessity felt by the Railways, in the absence of other agencies, of providing some form of education for the children of imported European employees who, in the earliest days, formed a considerable proportion of the Railway Companies' employees and many of whom were stationed at places where no European schools were available. Almost every large railway settlement had its European school from the earliest times."

Now, Sir, the same Report goes on to justify the expenditure which the Government undertook to incur on the education of children of European employees by saying:

"Not only is expenditure in this matter required in the interests of the railway employees themselves, but the railways will be indirectly reimbursed by the greatly improved recruits they will be able to secure locally without indenting, as they now do, on England. It should be an object at these schools to bring up as many lads as possible for employment as guards, drivers, fitters, etc., and they should not be encouraged, as so many Indian school boys seem to wish to do, to qualify merely for clerkships and such like employments."

In this matter, the Government of India went further and in 1881 the Governor General, from the Home Department, issued a circular and laid it down:

"That the Governor General in Council desires that European schools may eventually be opened in every station where the average daily attendance of 12 children could be got together."

It was a good thing that the railways accepted responsibility for the children of their European employees. The Report also states that, after some time, they also accepted responsibility for the education of the children of Indian employees. The Report goes on to say:

"With the entrance of educated Indians in large numbers into the services of the railways, the railways seem to have been impressed with the desirability of providing educational facilities for the children of Indian employees in places where the local authorities do not provide schools of any description or in some cases where such authorities do provide schools which contain only primary schools."

I have shown, Sir, that the railways have accepted responsibility for the children of European employees as well as for those of their Indian employees. That is so far as it goes quite right and proper. Railways being great employers of labour, ought to set the example of how employers ought to treat their employees and the children of those employees, by providing amenities and facilities for their employees and for their children. Now, the main point is how have these responsibilities been discharged by the railways. I am quoting from the Report of the Inquiry, which was presented in October, 1927. In that Report we are told that the railways maintained 95 European schools. I want to lay special stress on this fact, that no less than 30 of these 95 schools have got only 20 pupils, or less, on their rolls. Then, again, 11 of these 95 schools have got only 10 pupils, and even less, on their rolls, and yet these schools are maintained at a large cost. Now, we find that the total employees who are classed as Europeans on the railways are 15,074.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Does that include Anglo-Indians?

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: I am not going to separate Europeans and Anglo-Indians.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: But I want to know whether the figures you give include Anglo-Indians.

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: I think they include also Anglo-Indians, because, so far as I understand, railways class for this purpose Europeans and Anglo-Indians together. The cost of these 95 schools is no less than Rs. 7,60,009 a year, and in addition to this cost of Rs. seven lakhs sixty thousand odd, the railways also supply scholarships and other assistance in the form of free passes, and so on, to the children of European employees, and I hope to some extent to the children of Indian employees as well. I want to draw the particular attention of the Honourable the Railway Member, not to the fact that European employees have been given educational facilities,—for that is right and proper and may they long continue to have those facilities, for a better educated European is an asset to this country just as much as a better educated Indian is—I have no quarrel with that position, but what I want to point out is that the Indian employees and their children also deserve raising up in this matter. I submit that they also ought to have such facilities as are commensurate with their numbers, and to which they are entitled, because the railways have accepted responsibility for the education of the children of all their employees, whether they are Europeans or Indians. Now, Sir, the total number of employees on the railways is 693,986—there again I quote from the figures in the Jones Report—and if you take out 15,074 European employees from this number, the bulk still remains. This is for over six lakhs of employees, there are only 57 railway schools for Indians.

Colonel J. D. Crawford (Bengal: European): Would there not be ordinary schools available in those places?

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: We are also informed that four lines, the Bengal and North Western, the Great Indian Peninsula, the Rohilkund and Kumaon and the Eastern Bengal, do not provide any schools for their Indian children. The cost of these 57 schools for Indians is Rs. 2,95,000, whereas the cost of 95 European schools was over Rs. 7,60,000.

Then, there is another aspect that I want to draw attention to. Every European child in a railway school in the primary department costs as much as Rs. 115 per annum, whereas an Indian child in a similar primary school run by railways, costs only Rs. 19 per annum. If we compare the cost of education of each child in an Indian railway school, we find that, in a great many cases, the average cost is even less than the average cost of other civil schools in the same station, or in the same province, and who is here who can say that the average cost of an Indian pupil in an ordinary Indian school is at all large, or even say that they receive the best kind of education. We all know how poor the ordinary school is. That has been pointed out again and again in this very House. Well, Sir, my Honourable friend, Colonel Crawford, asked me whether there are no civil schools for Indian children in those railway centres. I quite see the force of that point. I see from this very Report that, in some of the schools for Indian children, which the railways maintain, the proportion of non-railway children in some cases is as large as one-third of the total. But my point is, are there not a large number of outside European children being educated in the railway schools which are maintained for European children of railway employees? But that is only one point. I want to point out that the Governor General in Council laid it down that, wherever 12 European children could be got together in a railway station or in a railway colony, there a school should be established. I am trying to plead for the Indian children whose parents are stationed, because of their service under the railways, in out of the way, lonely railway stations. I plead that there is hardly a railway station on a line—even a flag station—where the number of Indian children is less than 12. The number of subordinate employees or it may be the number of menials, as they are unfortunately designated, employed at railway stations—even though they are flag stations—must be larger and surely there would be more than 12 children in those stations, and in many cases the number runs into 50, 60, 100, or even more.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Three children per employee is the usual calculation.

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: You can take it at that. There might be even four. I do not think there is any flag station where there are less than four employees. I am not so anxious about the children of employees in large stations because in those places you have the ordinary schools where they can send their children. It is the duty of the railways to assist those in need, and the great need lies in the case of thousands of children in little, lonely out of the way stations where they receive no education whatever. It has been repeatedly said that, whereas the railway employee in a small station, if he is a European—I am including Anglo-Indians also in the category and refer to them as Europeans generally—if he receives a scholarship, he sends his children to a boarding school at Mussoorie or elsewhere. He receives a liberal scholarship, which enables him to send his children to a boarding school. Now, is there a system where an Indian employee, living in these tiny little places, gets similar facilities? Is he able to get a scholarship to send his child to another place? It was said at first—I see in this very Report an argument—that Indians do not desire and do not care to send their children to boarding schools, and therefore the question of scholarships did not arise. I submit that that day has long passed and an Indian would now be willing to give education to his child even if he had to send him across the seas; and therefore that is a point to which I want to draw the attention of the Honourable the Railway Member, that he may be able to devise some means by which scholarships could be made available for these people to send their children away to boarding schools, or to places where schools do exist. And more than that I want to make one point as strong as I can, namely, that there is a need for the railways to provide primary schools in places where no schools exist, and there are hundreds and hundreds of such stations where no schools exist. I also want to point out that, in the case of the existing railway schools, it has been shown that they are no better than the other ordinary schools and in some cases they are much worse. The conditions of service there are worse: the salary of teachers is not higher but much lower, and there is not the same security of tenure as in other schools. As the railways have thought it necessary, and rightly thought it necessary,—I have no complaint against that policy,—to improve the conditions of employees, for instance in the Oakgrove School, or in other schools which they maintain for European children, I want them to do all that they can to improve the status, pay and salaries of their teachers in Indian schools, so that the right kind of education may be given there. Then I also want to make it clear that whereas the railways justify their expenditure upon the education of the children of their European employees on the score that it makes them more efficient guards, more efficient Station Masters and more efficient railway servants, the same argument applies with equal force as a plea for their doing more for the education of the children of the Indian employees. There is no reason why these children should not make as efficient guards or Station Masters or whatever is required of them if proper education and training is given to them.

In conclusion, I will say only one thing. In his Budget speech, the Honourable the Railway Member laid great stress on this, that whereas the Budget in many respects was of rather a despondent character as it was a lean year, he said that the one bright spot,—he may not have used those words but that is how I interpret them,—the only bright spot was, that money was being provided to ameliorate the conditions of the subordinate staff, and he said that everything would be done to make their conditions brighter and more hopeful. Now, Sir, I ask, is there anything which they value more than educational facilities? People who are already in service may be labouring under certain handicaps; they may be inefficient in certain ways, but all our hope lies with the rising generation.

He has also laid great stress on the subject of Indianisation. He wants efficient Indians, and the best way to produce them is to provide good schools for the children of the Indian employees. I do hope that, in all the concessions that he desires to grant to the subordinate staff, and in all the prospects that he has held out to them, that one question of the education of their children and facilities for them will be put in the forefront, and that something will be done and done before long. This Report was submitted as late as 1927. I am told that the Central Advisory Council were to be taken into confidence in considering this Report. I have been a member of that Council, being a member of the Railway Finance Committee for the last year. I know of no proposal that has been brought before us for the education of children of railway employees, and I do not know what action Government have taken. So far we know no definite scheme, and certainly no definite action seems to have been taken. I urge, therefore, that this matter should be expedited and the hopes that have been raised may soon be fulfilled.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I should like to intervene in the debate at this stage, Mr. President, to deal specially with what fell from the last speaker on the subject of education, and I should like, if I may, at the outset, to express my appreciation of the admirable manner, if I may say so, in which he put forward his views. I propose to leave my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, to deal with the greater part of the remarks made by other speakers.

Now, as regards this question of the education of the children of railway employees, I should like to explain how the matter stands. A scheme was drawn up and it was provisionally approved by the Central Advisory Council, I think about a year ago. Then we consulted the Railway Administrations about certain details, and the matter was mentioned in the Central Advisory Council last September. At that time the Council appointed a sub-committee to examine the case further, and it was hoped that it would be possible to assemble the sub-committee to discuss the question before the Budget was introduced. It has not been possible, and I should like to explain exactly why. The scheme which has been drawn up provides that, in respect of all railway servants admitted to the service after the 1st February, 1929, there shall be no discrimination according to race, community or creed, and that if assistance is given to one class of employees, that will also be given in similar circumstances to others. That is the vital element in the scheme. At the same time it was thought right that the privileges, which existing employees enjoy under the rules at present in force, should not be withdrawn from them.

The second essential point in the scheme is this, that for the future, that is, in the case of those recruited after the 1st February, 1929, assistance should be given only when suitable education cannot be obtained at the place where the parents of the child are posted, and it is necessary to send the child away from home to be educated. A further limitation is imposed in the scheme, namely, that assistance should cease when each child has completed the middle course, and should not extend to high school education. I have given a considerable amount of time and thought to that question since the papers reached me from the Railway Board just five or six weeks ago. I know how deeply interested in it Members of this House are, and coming from a nation myself which has a certain reputation in educational matters, it is a question in which I take a personal interest. I could not satisfy myself that we ought to acquiesce finally in the position that the assistance is to stop with the termination of the middle course. The House will note that I do not contemplate going back on anything we have already agreed to. We will go on with the scheme as it stands at present. But I am anxious that the question of continuing assistance up to the high school course should be fully explored. I do not feel that I personally could acquiesce finally in discontinuing assistance after the termination of the middle course unless it could be demonstrated that the cost of granting assistance during the high school course also was prohibitive. I quite recognise, of course, that there are important financial considerations to be taken into account. It was because I was unable to place before the sub-committee or the Central Advisory Council any considered proposal for a modification of the scheme in respect of high school education that I did not summon a meeting of the sub-committee. Perhaps I was wrong. Perhaps I was too sanguine in thinking that

1 P.M. it would be possible to work out a scheme. At any rate the scheme already approved by the Central Advisory Committee does, as I have said, provide for the grant of assistance to children of Indian employees during the primary and middle courses in all cases where the children cannot obtain suitable education at the place where their parents are posted and have to be sent away from home in order to obtain education. Whatever else may happen, that stands. I am afraid it will be necessary, before we can work out any scheme for extending to high school education, to try and ascertain what the number of children is at places where there is no high school within easy reach. It is obvious, I think, that it is likely to be much larger than the number of children whose parents are posted at places where there is no primary or middle school. That question, however, will be explored.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: What about discrimination? May I know whether it is proposed to abolish the discrimination that obtains in regard to the rates of expenditure per head?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: No, Sir. We do not propose to abolish it as regards employees who were already in our service on the 1st February, 1929. But we definitely issued orders last year that all employees recruited after the 1st February, 1929, are to be entitled only to such benefits as may be admissible under the new scheme and not in accordance with any rules or system previously in force.

The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee: May I ask the Honourable Member if he proposes either making an inquiry or taking steps to provide primary schools in small stations where no such primary schools exist?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: That, Sir, is a very difficult question. I was impressed by the earnestness of my Honourable friend. What the Railway Board have felt is this. They do not consider that Railways are usually well organised for the management of schools, and they doubt whether railway officers are the most suitable persons to run schools. For this reason an essential part of the scheme provisionally approved by the Council is that we should try, as opportunity offers, to make over the schools already in our possession to be managed either by Local Governments or by local bodies, or by suitable private trusts or committees. I think that the Railway Board would be averse to undertaking a large increase of responsibility in the way of establishing new railway schools in large numbers. In certain cases, there may be special reasons for establishing railway schools. Let me take the case of the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway Workshops, which have been transferred to Dohad in Gujrat, or the new workshops of the South Indian Railway at Golden Rock in Trichinopoly. Where you have got a case like that, where a new railway colony is established, we cannot expect that Local Governments or local bodies will establish schools at once to meet the needs of the school children at such places, and the Railway may have to establish its own schools. But I should feel a good deal of difficulty myself about embarking on any large programme of railway schools scattered up and down the country. I feel that, for the present, I would rather concentrate on the system already adopted, and confine our assistance to helping the parents to get their children educated by sending them elsewhere. The only limitation I can think of is this. If it could be shown that you could do it more cheaply by having a school at a particular place instead of giving the grants to all the children to go elsewhere, that would be a fair case for consideration.

The only other point that I wish to mention before sitting down, Mr. President, is this. The Honourable the Mover of this motion said, if we were in earnest in removing racial discrimination, why do we consult the Central Advisory Council? May I inquire whether the Central Advisory Council is regarded as unnecessary in any case in which the Government of India are in earnest?

Munshi Iswar Saran: I did not say that.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: What I particularly wish to do is to inform the Council fully of the action we have already taken, and in my reply in the general discussion of the last Budget I gave half a dozen instances in which we have already taken action. In addition to that, there are some other points which present difficulties, and it seemed to me that it was a fair thing to do, a proper thing to do, to put these difficulties before the Central Advisory Council and hear what they had to say. I think that completes what I can usefully say at this stage.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

[25TH FEB. 1930.]

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, it is often asked, what is there in a name? Others say, "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet". I have today been honoured with such a multitude of names that I really do not know what I am, but I do know the value of a name. First of all, I desire to thank the Honourable the Mover for the very very reasonable and moderate way, in which he referred in his speech to the community I have the honour to represent, though he made a pointed attack on it. Sir, as railway employment forms the chief source of existence for the Anglo-Indian community, I feel I am entitled, with your permission, to enter into this matter in some detail. I was not present last year when this discussion took place; but, I feel very fortunate in having the opportunity of listening to my Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran. The speeches that have fallen from previous speakers have revealed a confusion of thoughts which never fails to manifest itself when the subject of racial discrimination or call it "Indianisation" is discussed. (Hear, hear.) Sir, I yield to no one in this House in my desire to effect Indianisation, compatible with efficiency, at the quickest possible moment. You may call it racial discrimination if you like,—to my mind these two terms are homologous. But, Sir, I decline to entertain the suggestion for one single moment, that the plea of Indianisation can be in any way whatever connected with the charges of racial discrimination—in favour of Anglo-Indians;—charges which resolve themselves in the last analysis into nothing more than a covert attack on the established tradition which the Anglo-Indian community occupies on railways. Now, Sir, as you rightly pointed out, racial discrimination as referred to by the present motion can only be practised where many races are concerned. I should like to hear from my Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, how many races there are in India, and how many races are represented on the Indian Railways. I thought my Honourable friend was a Nationalist—Munshi Iswar Saran: You are right.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: And I thought that, as a Nationalist, be always looked at a question of this character from a nationalistic point of view and not from a racial or communal angle, yet, I have had the misfortune to listen today, to what I would not but call (though moderately worded) a diatribe against the Anglo-Indian community employed on railways, a community which possesses only 14,000 jobs out of almost a million—a fraction only. Sir, as I listened to him I wondered, whether he was serious or whether he was pulling my leg. But I seemed to discern in what he said that the fly in his mental ointment was a tiny little yet very important community called Anglo-Indians.

Mr. President: I have so far restricted Honourable Members to the European community in this discussion, but if the Honourable Member wishes to drag in the Anglo-Indian community, it will open up a very wide field.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Thank you, Sir. I have no desire to open up a wide field of discussion. I am only dealing with the points my Honourable friend the Mover made in his speech with reference to my community and which you allowed.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must take the risk.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Very well, Sir, I am not afraid of the opposite Benches or to take risks. To prove any racial discrimination you must bring facts and figures in support of it. Generalisations are useless, for they always react on the speaker, as my Honourable friend Mr. Kelkar realised the other day, and I am afraid the Mover's speech lost much of its weight because it was devoid of any facts or figures. Fortunately, Sir, I possess a large number of official facts and figures, which I have carefully collected, to show that, as far as the community which I represent is concerned, any discrimination that exists, places me in the position of a plaintiff rather than that of a defendant as the Mover has indicated. I ask Honourable Members of this House to refer to the Pink Books that were supplied to us the other day, and to devote their attention—because it wants serious attention—to the last four or five years' figures, 1926 to 1929. I am talking about State Railways in particular, but my figures include all first class railways. Now, Sir, it will be found, by reference to those books, that Government have divided railway employees into two categories or into two races, and these are the only two races between whom there can be any real racial discrimination, the two races being Europeans and Indians, who are generally called Statutory Natives, which is sub-divided into Hindus, Mussalmans, Anglo-Indians and other classes. (Munshi Iswar Saran: "Not Statutory Natives, but Statutory Indians.") These are the two categories. Now, Sir, I want this House to take particular notice of the category in which the Anglo-Indian community is included. It is included along with Hindus, Mussalmans and the other classes as Statutory Indians. (An Honourable Member: "You go to European schools.") Yes and you go to Moslem schools. Now, Sir, a perusal of the figures that I shall presently quote will give rather astounding results. In the year 1925-26 there were 721,242 total employees on the railways, and in the year 1928-29 there were 773,888, a difference of 52,646. Now let us see who these new employees are. We find—I want my Moslem friends to listen—of these 52,646, there were 31,290 Hindus or 59 per cent. of the total, 9,691 or 18.4 per cent. were Muhammadans, and 11,143 or 21 per cent. belonged to other classes. (An Honourable Member: "What about you?") There were only 672 Anglo-Indians recruited or 1.28 per cent. of the total. And this notwithstanding the fact that during this period 2,500 miles of railway were added and an equal number of miles are under construction and traffic returns had increased by 70 per cent. The figures for 1927-28 and for 1928-29 further show that there has been a decrease of 14 Anglo-Indians as against 5,501 new Indian employees. Indeed, the total figures for 1928-29 show that there was only one additional Anglo-Indian employed during the whole year.

I see some Honourable Members are smiling; no doubt they will say that such general figures are of no use at all. Now, Sir, these figures are of use because, in general terms, they show that there is no racial discrimination though there is a marked reduction in the Anglo-Indians. These figures include all grades of employees, from the menial to the highest official. But taking them as a whole, I challenge my Honourable friend, the Mover, to prove that there is even a vestige of racial discrimination. In fact, Sir, the figures that I have just quoted prove quite the reverse. Surely neither he nor any of my Honourable friends on the opposite side—I know I have very many friends on the opposite side, except when railway matters are discussed in this House—do not deny these 14,000 appointments that are held by the tiny Anglo-Indian community on the railways or the 672 new appointments out of 52,646 recruited within five years, surely none of you want to deny this to my community, and which you have tried to exclude

Mr. President: I have tried my best to save the Honourable Member, but if he is subsequently attacked by other Honourable Members, he will have to thank himself for it.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: The Honourable Member is misleading himself, Sir, by quoting these figures.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I wish to submit just this point, Sir. Perhaps other Honourable Members who were called to order at an earlier stage might have some sense of grievance if the subsequent debate were allowed to take a wider latitude in its course.

Mr. President: I entirely agree with the Honourable Member. But if the Honourable Member himself does not take the hint, the Chair will not give him any protection when he is attacked.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I ask for no protection. I do not fear the opposite Benches—I am prepared to attack and to be attacked and to defend myself, but I am not prepared Maulvi Muhammad Yakub (Rohilkund and Kumaon Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): Are you an Indian or not?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I now want to show to Honourable Members what these 14,000 Anglo-Indians' appointments consist of and to do so I must divide these 14,000 appointments into (a) those lower subordinates receiving salaries from Rs. 25 to Rs. 250 per month, (b), those in receipt of salaries above Rs. 250, and (c), officials. Such division will give you a correct idea of the actual appointments held by Anglo-Indians. This will give you a real idea as to how many appointments you are attacking and how many you envy. Out of these 14,000, there were in the year 1929, 10,262 jobs occupied by the community carrying salaries less than Rs. 250 per month. There are 3,800 upper subordinates' jobs carrying salaries over Rs. 250 per month, and there are some 168 or 169 jobs as officials. Now, Sir, it is these 3,800 upper subordinate jobs which are the storm centre of the Mover's criticism. There are 3,800 Anglo-Indians today as against

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is answering a charge that I have never allowed other Honourable Members to make.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: But, Sir, if the appointments held by the Anglo-Indian community are to be attacked by the Honourable the Mover, I want to attack him back. I am not afraid of him, and I want to come to grips with him.

Mr. President: Very well.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I want to attack and to challenge the Honourable the Mover's charge of racial discrimination and his remarks against my community.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: We wish, Sir, we had been given that opportunity.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: What I mean is this: these 3,800 upper subordinate appointments should be added to the similar appointments held by Indians; and why? Because we are Indians; we are classified as Indians in official records, we have admitted ourselves as an Indian community and the Statute, Victoria XXXIII, gives us our status as Statutory Indians

An Honourable Member: What about the schools? Why do you go to European schools?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: For the same cultural reasons as you go to Indian Schools—but you can go to European Schools if you like.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: If you are an Indian, why do you belong to the European Group in the Assembly?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: For the same reasons as you belong to the Muslim groups. Therefore, Sir, the contest is between Indians and Europeans and this is the only racial discrimination that can exist. There can be absolutely no racial discrimination between Anglo-Indians and Indians, because Anglo-Indians are an Indian community, the same as the Hindu, the same as the Muslim, etc. After this classification by Government, by Parliamentary Statute and by the community's own acceptance, why do you ask me if I am an Indian? That question was settled in 1870 when Act XXXIII was passed—years before I was born—and it stands good and is legal and occupational tender whether you or I want it or not.

An Honourable Member: Why do you sit on those Benches then?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: That is my business, just as it is your business to sit on your particular benches. With the position of the Anglo-Indian community clarified, how can the Honourable the Mover say that there is racial discrimination between me and him? Therefore even in the lower and upper subordinate ranks, Indians preponderate by more than 75 per cent. because in 1929 together we hold 6,890 out of 8,941 upper subordinate jobs. The Honourable Member has already been told that, the official grades, nearly 75 per cent., are Indians; i.e., the high water mark has almost been reached. This being so, Sir, how can the Mover now state that there is racial discrimination? He would certainly be right if he said there was communal discrimination. The whole trouble lies in the Government responding to appeals from the opposite Benches, in the shape of questions, Resolutions and such motions, calling upon Government to answer how many Europeans, how many Indians and how many Anglo-Indians are employed in a particular service. The fault does not lie with the community which I represent, because the Government, in their replies, forget the undeniable and legal fact that Anglo-Indians and for that matter, Sir, even pure-blooded Englishmen, permanently resident in this country, are Statutory Indians, the same as Hindus, Muslims, etc., (Hear, hear), and I stand here and state that I am proud to be recognised as belonging to an Indian community. (Mr.

[Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney.]

K. C. Neogy: "Oh!" You can say "Oh" if you like, Mr. Neogy. In fact I do not care what you say on this matter, for neither you nor any one or the opposite Benches can deprive me of this right.

Mr. President: Order, order.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I am sorry, Sir; but when the Honourable Member wants to interrupt me, I think he ought to stand up in his seat. Anyhow I desire to add that it matters not whether the Anglo-Indian community say they are Europeans or Indians. You Indian-Indians have decided to refuse to accept them as such: He is by statute and by every law an Indian community and he is advised by Government to accept this status, yet you reject him and say he is not an Indian nor is he a European—but let me tell you—you won't deprive me of my jobs for this reason.

An Honourable Member: Do not claim better rights than the ordinary Indian.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: That is a right I have never claimed, though I have more claims to such rights than you.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): May I ask the Honourable Member one question? I say that, notwithstanding the definition of Anglo-Indian as a statutory Indian, Government themselves make a distinction between Anglo-Indians and Indians. Are you aware of that?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, I am not here to answer for Government's action or the distinctions they make; I am here to state

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: But if they do make that distinction, are you prepared to take cognisance of it?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I take what is given to me and more if offered; so would you if given the opportunity.

An Honourable Member: You take more than you should.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Certainly, I'd take more if I could get it. Sir, I want clearly to define our position on the railways. It is not the fault of the Anglo-Indian community that you object to it being classed as Indians; it is the fault of my friends on the opposite benches in their envy of my position. I realise the fact that India is changing and I want you to realise that the policy of the Anglo-Indian community has also changed—the unfortunate thing is that to suit your own purposes you refuse to realise it. According to the 1870 Parliamentary Statute, I am an Indian and my Honourable friends opposite know it; but if they want to twit the community on the matter, this racial or communal discrimination degenerates into a farce. Do not twit the Anglo-Indian with not being an Indian when you will not accept him as such. A concerted attack was made on the community last year by my friends on the opposite side; unfortunately I was not here then; but I am here now to fight it. I am, however, glad to see that the Honourable the Mover has not done so in his speech and I much appreciate it; but I do repudiate that any racial distinction exists in the railways today in the sense that the Honourable the Mover has tried to prove; and I would ask Government in future, when replying to questions, not to encourage the opposite side on this question of racial discrimination. (Hear, hear.) The Legislative Assembly Debates are full of questions, "How many Hindus, Muslims, Anglo-Indians and Europeans are there in various services?" and the Government in their replies place Europeans and Anglo-Indians apart to other communities. (Laughter.) You are apparently dissatisfied, and are hungry to secure these four thousand upper subordinate jobs which we hold today after long and continuous service (An Honourable Member: "Prescription?") amounting to nearly 70 years, during which period we have helped the Railway Administration of this country and made the railways what they are today. The Anglo-Indian community has gone unrecognised for the great services it has rendered to the railway administration of this country. I call upon the Government to deny whether it would have been possible for the railway administration of this country to have run, especially during the many recent crises, I mean the strikes, without the loyal and patriotic work of its Anglo-Indian employees? That is an undeniable fact, Sir. You on the opposite Benches can say what you like, but the fact remains that you envy these 4,000 upper subordinate jobs which we have gained by long, faithful and loyal service to our railways and our Government. One of the Members now, in the year 1930, asks the Anglo-Indian community on the railways to make up its mind and to determine on their loyalty their aims and objects? To whom? Our loyalty, Sir, has been determined years ago. It has never faltered—may be to our loss—but our loyalty is to the British Raj; and our loyalty has always been on the side of law and order and to the railways we serve.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Is he talking relevant to the motion, Sir?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: As I say, Sir, these 4,000 jobs are the storm centre of the opposition on that side, but they may take consolation in the fact that more than fifty per cent. of the Anglo-Indians in these jobs today are men over forty years of age; this will give you some indication of how many years' service they have rendered before they got these jobs. In another ten years at least half of these men will have been superannuated and that will be your time for Indianisation of these jobs, and your desire will be satisfied. In the last five years Indians were given 852 upper subordinate jobs, while Europeans were decreased by 75, and Anglo-Indians by 9. Is this not 75 per cent. Indianisation since railways came under State control? Again in the official grade, during the past five years, Indians secured 148 appointments, Europeans lost 27 and Anglo-Indians gained 17 only.

Now, Sir, I submit, it is up to the Government to boldly state on the floor of this House whether it is their intention to respond to this clamour of the Opposition Benches by taking away these jobs we occupy today by virtue of our long and continuous service. Surely my friends on the other side are not so envious of these 4,000 jobs as to dispossess us of them? Surely you can allow us to be superannuated after we finish our term of service and then get into our shoes. Surely you do not want to drive us out when for years yourselves merely sat down and refused to enter railway service and only did so after we had made it more attractive for you? (A Voice: "Really?") Yes "really," only the illiterate and partially educated Indian went into railway service about 15 years ago, but now more educated

Indians are coming in and, though I admit you have got every right to get your rightful share, for God's sake do not try to step into the shoes of these four thousand before their time is up; men who have done well by the country and who have served the Government and railway for nearly 70 years.

Now, Sir, I call upon Government to state in unequivocal terms that it is not their policy in any way to bargain with any party in this House, be it Hindu or Muslim (An Honourable Member: "Or Anglo-Indian"), in their clamours to dispossess us of these jobs. Mr. Hayman stated yesterday in very clear terms that Government were not going to deprive any community of their present jobs. But since then we have had forceful appeal from my Muslim friends to recognise their claim for a higher percentage of appointments. I remember the time, Sir, two years ago when I pointed out to my Muslim friends the paucity of appointments they held on railways and I think my friends Mr. Abdul Matin Chaudhury and Mr. Ghuznavi will remember how I urged on them to make their demand. I am delighted to see today they are demanding a proper share of appointments in the railway services. I sympathise with them in their just claims and I am prepared wholeheartedly to support them.

Having disposed of alleged racial discrimination, Sir, I will now deal with those instances where true racial distinctions exist.

Mr. President: Order, order. Does it mean that the Honourable Member was irrelevant so long?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: No, Sir.

Mr. President: He says he will come to racial distinctions now?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: No, Sir. I am now, referring to genuine racial discrimination as between Europeans and Indians in certain matters. I have explained the position of my community

Mr. President: Order, order. Considering that the Honourable Member was in the minority of one, I tried my best to save the Honourable Member's community from attack; but he has not taken the hint from the Chair.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till a Quarter to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at a Quarter to Three of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, having shown that racial discrimination cannot and does not exist between Indians and Anglo-Indians, and that none exists between Europeans and Indians as far as the percentage of railway employment is concerned, I shall now refer to the subject of covenanting employees to the railways from Europe, as this is a matter in which there is real racial discrimination. Formerly the practice of covenanting railway servants was largely resorted to, but as time went on, these covenanted employees were replaced by recruitment in India.

My complaint is that, though our railway workshops have been in existence for 30 to 50 years, covenanting of employees in the disguise of skilled workmen still continues, and under the excuse that skilled workmen cannot be obtained in this country. I had a recent communication from the Railway Board, which states that, during the last three years, 101 employees were covenanted from England to State and Company railways. I refer to subordinate employees, mainly in connection with the workshops, and from the statistics of various railways I have been able to extract a table of figures. I have before me the figures of nine of the largest railways in India. There is a total of 294 Foremen in these nine railways. Of these, 197 are Europeans, and of the balance, 95 are Indians. If you were to add to these European Foremen, those who claim a non-Asiatic domicile, you would get a total of about 215 European Foremen, as against 79 Indians, i.e., about 66 per cent. are Europeans. I should like to add that the Indian Foremen are mainly composed of men employed in two or three of the largest railway workshops. I take as my illustration the most modern railway workshop in India today, the one at Golden Rock. Now, in the Golden Rock Workshops, there are 12 European Covenanted Foremen and 22 Indian Foremen, and on this Railway—the South Indian, there are only two European Loco. Foremen as against 11 Indians. Compare this with what obtains in other railways where there is 80 per cent. of covenanted imported men, as against 20 per cent. of those recruited locally. This recruitment of covenanted men today is supposed to be due to want of properly trained men in this country. As I said, our railway workshops have been in operation for over half a century in the case of some railways and yet we are told that we cannot produce skilled workmen to undertake these jobs. These workshops are maintained at an enormous expenditure. Trained Works' Managers and trained specialists, skilled mechanics and Foremen have been brought out from Europe on large salaries, and in the year 1930 we are told that we are still wanting in knowledge and are unable to provide our own needs, although there are many engineering firms in this country that are able to produce skilled Indian workmen who can turn out work of as good quality. Recently, the North Western Railway with a knavishness native to that railway, asked the Railway Board to covenant 12 Chargemen from Europe, as if we could not produce Chargemen in our railways in India. Mr. Hayman, the Labour Member in charge, rightly objected to this. He asked the Agent to recruit these men locally, and the Agent replied that he was unable to get any suitable Chargeman from the workshops. Yet we have these 11 first class railway workshops annually turning out skilled Indian Chargemen by the hundred, indeed there are 392 Indian Chargemen in these eleven workshops today, and in the South Indian Railway Workshops alone over 50 per cent. of the Foremen are Indians. Still this Agent writes to the Railway Board that he can not get these Chargemen locally and urges on the Railway Board to recruit them from England. Surely 12 Chargemen were procurable from the State Railways. The Labour Member, be it said to his credit, refused to comply, and asked the Agent to recruit his men locally. Finally the Railway Board agreed to four Chargemen being recruited from England.

Now, what happens when these covenanted men arrive from England? They are insinuated into a cadred service, they are entertained on a higher initial salary and for this reason they are put on the top of the list over the heads of every one of the other Chargemen; in other words these men of 25 and 30 years of age become senior to experienced men of 40 and 45, who are waiting for promotion, and so block the promotion of all those who are senior to them in service. I consider this to be unjust and fundamentally wrong. This is what I call genuine racial discrimination, and a very glaring type. It affects nearly 600 to 700 locally recruited skilled workmen—Foremen, Assistant Foremen and Chargemen in our railway workshops. Now, let us see what happens in the case of covenanted railway officials. When a young European official comes out, he is not placed in a cadres service above locally recruited officials. He takes his place along with others—Indians—according to the date of his enlistment. He moreover gets his basic pay, the equivalent of locally recruited officials, but to that is added his overseas Lee Commission allowance. He therefore receives a higher salary, but he is not for this reason placed in the cadre above those recruited locally. But in the case of a young Chargeman who comes out to this country, he is supposed to be a more skilled and experienced mechanic. I ask; what skill could he have attained at the age of 25? He is brought out as a specialist in some piece of modern machinery. Now, I submit, with the rapid changes in mechanical devices, that any new machinery of today is old machinery tomorrow. These men are therefore specialists for a very brief period, but they are permanently engaged and in time they are mainly used as supervisors or Sergeant Majors looking after the discipline of the workshops, and they not only start on a higher initial salary, but receive other advantages, such as passages to England, etc., which are denied to Indians, but the gravest injustice is that they are placed in a cadres service above the heads of senior and more experienced and higher trained technical men recruited in India. Furthermore, that Chargeman by virtue of his being brought out to India on a higher salary, gets the first vacancy as an Assistant Foreman, although there are hundreds of better and senior men waiting for promotion. For that reason he has prior promotion as a Foreman and ultimately becomes an official. I submit that that is absolutely wrong.

I want the Government Benches to state what their future policy is going to be in this matter. I know that the covenanting of these men has been considerably reduced during the last few years. We have no objection whatever to the covenanting of these workmen from England, but what I do object to is this, that they should be placed above all locally recruited men on the top of the cadre and given priority and all these privileges over locally recruited men. We welcome them as workmen and as comrades, but when they come to this country to work in a workshop they must be given their position in the cadre according to the date of recruitment and not initial salary. They should be given the same basic pay as we receive, but they can be given an overseas allowance as is given to officials and in that way may be allowed to make up any deficiency of their present pay. But to put them in a position prejudicial to the other workmen is, I consider, unwarranted and unjust racial discrimination, and I call upon the Railway Board to take the earliest opportunity to discontinue it. It cannot be denied that Indian railway workshops are quite capable of providing all their skilled workmen. Of course, I can well imagine most of the Railway Agents denying this fact, and from what I have recently witnessed I do sincerely sympathise with the Honourable Member in the possession of some of the Railway Agents that he has today working the railways. But apart from this I want to know the reason why the Government of India should continue to allow Railway Agents to covenant at the rate of about 40 men annually, especially when I confront them with what the expert engineering officer of the Railway Board, a man who has made himself famous in the production of railway workshops—I mean Mr. Wrench, has said in a recent contribution from him to the London Times, dated 18th January, 1930. This is what he says:

“India can now claim that so far as the railway workshops are concerned she has little to learn from the rest of the world.”

Now, Sir, I would ask the Railway Board, in the face of such an admission, if the importation to India of covenanted workmen can be justified any longer on the plea of superior training or on the plea that, because a man comes from England, he must ipso facto be superior to men trained in Indian workshops, that have nothing to learn from the rest of the world.

I now come to my next point, Sir, another case of genuine, not alleged racial discrimination. Perhaps Members of this House are familiar with a system of confidential reports that is practised on railways. Certain railways do not practise it, but you may take it from me that in most State Railways these confidential reports are of a demi-official nature in which records are kept on the file right up to the end of a man's service. In other words, this poor subordinate's future and promotion are ruined, i.e., he is stabbed in the back by such reports and does not get a chance to defend himself. The Railway Board issued a circular in July, 1929, to all Agents, instructing them, in regard to confidential reports on officials. Thus, they have brought into practice a procedure which is in operation for all Government servants, officials and subordinates, especially in the Army. Under that system, any adverse remarks made against an officer, are communicated to the officer concerned and he is given the option of defending himself. The Railway Board has very rightly introduced that system so far as their officials were concerned, but no such system has been introduced regarding subordinate officers recruited in this country. I consider that this is not right and should be remedied. In my opinion, every man, official or subordinate, who is adversely reported on should be given an opportunity of defending himself and should not be attacked in the dark and carry that stigma throughout his service to his prejudice and detriment. I submit that demi-official correspondence should be stopped.

My next point is one of very marked racial discrimination between Europeans and Indians—based on domicile. It has been generally admitted, and the newspaper reports have broadcasted the complaint that the medical administration of the railways in India is sadly deficient. I would qualify that criticism by adding that the raison d'être of that deficiency or inadequacy is the want of money. And when you have no funds, you cannot make progress at the rate at which you want to. Notwithstanding that extenuation, there is no doubt that the medical administration of Indian Railways is really at a very low level, both from the quantitative and qualitative points of view. The result is that railway workmen in India have great trouble in obtaining medical relief, because of the pressure that is brought to bear on medical officers by District Officers of the railways. There are many instances when skilled medical or surgical aid is necessary, but in all such cases Indian workmen have to pay from their own pockets. Let me illustrate my point. If a man suffers from an infectious disease, he is taken to a civil hospital and he has to pay all the expenses of his stay there, which sometimes come to Rs. 20 or Rs. 30 a day. It is true this money is returned to him after a few months when the railway authorities have satisfied themselves. In the meantime, the employee is driven to the money-lender and contracts a debt. This is a small matter compared with what I shall now refer to.

There is a circular which has been in operation for years in all railways regarding medical relief for officials with a non-Asiatic domicile as against those with an Asiatic domicile. This I look upon as not only racial but unjust discrimination. All officials who can claim a non-Asiatic domicile are entitled by this order to free medical and surgical attendance including skilled nursing not only in their railway hospitals, but also in civil hospitals. They are entitled to the services of specialists, surgeons, physicians and nurses and even special medicines when necessary. They have to pay for their food only. In short, no matter what happens to this official, he is entitled to all these privileges simply because he is born in England and not in this country. The Railway pays for all such expenses. But an official born in this country of Asiatic domicile is denied all these privileges and the order says that when such medical aid is necessary, he has to pay for everything. I can understand racial discrimination in the case of active workmen, but when it is practised among officials who do equal duties and bear equal responsibilities and who are exposed to the same diseases, I must confess I am lost in amazement to justify this marked racial discrimination. This House should not tolerate such treatment and it should insist that such difference be stopped at once. It is a thing that is not fair either to the workman or to the administration, and would not be tolerated in any other civilised Government.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member will now conclude his observations.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I will take only five or ten minutes more, Sir. There is another important racial matter, which concerns recruitment in this country. Honourable Members must be aware of the fact that there are, practically speaking, two classes of officials engaged on railways. One class of official is imported from England, and the other class is recruited in India. I am not referring for my purpose to Indian officials permanently recruited in India, my criticism refers only to subordinates officiating as officials. I will take one railway to illustrate my point, namely, the East Indian Railway. On that Railway I believe there are to-day over 50 subordinates who are officiating as officers. Now, Sir, when a subordinate—say a Station Master is promoted to officiate as an official on the junior scale—he is given his own grade pay of Rs. 300 or so plus an extra monthly allowance of Rs. 10, which I would call bakhshish. He therefore starts as an acting railway official on Rs. 310 with an annual increment of Rs. 20. The official whose duty he is performing is on the grade pay of Rs. 300—50—900 per month. This sort of racial difference should not be tolerated by this House. In my opinion equal duties with equal responsibilities, should be the rule, and whether the employee be black, brown or white, he should be given equal remuneration and status. Evidently the Railway Board do not think so. They utilise these skilled and experienced upper-subordinates as their hewers of wood and drawers of water. While occupying these responsible posts, these subordinates are expected to maintain an adequate social position and carry out these responsible duties, and yet they are paid an extra Rs. 10 on starting, with Rs. 20 increase per annum. I have previously brought up this matter in this House and I received assurances from Mr. Parsons last year that it would be remedied. I now once more appeal to the Honourable the Labour Member on the Railway Board not to delay any longer. I call this practice dishonest economy, because you are making use of a class of subordinates as officials not only at one-third the wages, but as a leave reserve to your permanent officials. You are estimating a class of subordinate officials on a mere pittance of Rs. 10 extra. Surely you cannot call this honest economy?

Two more points, Sir, and I have finished. One point refers to racial discrimination in a particular service, I refer to the Signal Engineering service. Sir, officers recruited into this service from India are called "Probationers" and those recruited from England are either "on probation" or "short time covenant". All are generally recruited to the junior scale. Those locally recruited are invariably started on Rs. 300 per month while those recruited from England are started on higher salaries ranging from Rs. 435 to Rs. 1,000 per month. Now, Sir, the point is this, a junior scale officer has to put in 16 years of service to reach the senior scale, the pay of the junior scale man recruited in India being Rs. 300. In reply to a question I asked the Honourable Member on this very point last year, he said there were no officers at present who were placed in higher positions than the dates of their entry into service justified. I refer here to those imported from England. I also asked the Government of India whether it was not a fact that officers who were recruited from England were engaged on a higher pay, and they therefore reach their maximum much sooner than they would if they had been started on the lower scale of pay, and who by virtue of their higher initial salary would supersede those officers recruited in India but senior to them in service. It is therefore apparent that those who are recruited from England have thus a great advantage over those recruited in India and the latter, for no fault of their own have to suffer. I should like the Honourable Member to look into this and remedy this injustice, otherwise the chances of promotion and the future of those Indian recruited officers who are now in this Department will be seriously affected. The Honourable Member also stated, in reply to the same question, that the initial salary of an officer was fixed according to age and qualifications. This is the sort of loophole possessed by those in whose hands the power of making such appointments lies. The Honourable Member may take it from me that, out of six men who were recruited from England and who would affect the promotion of those locally recruited, none of them possesses a degree in Signal Engineering and some of them were previously employed as subordinates in English railways and yet they have been brought out as high officials and supersede Indian recruited men. Two of them are younger than all the locally recruited men and most of them do not possess qualifications, equal or better than the locally recruited men. How can the Railway Board justify such recruitment, which is unfair to its locally recruited officers? Why should such imported officers be placed, simply on account of a higher initial salary, in a cadred service above locally recruited senior men? This is racial discrimination with a vengeance, and in my opinion should be stopped forthwith.

Before I sit down, Sir, I want to ask the Honourable Member, when he is deciding on a policy of standardisation of wages in the various communities—I am now referring to those recruited in England as against those recruited in this country—to see that the standardisation is not done with reference to the domicile of the employee, but purely on merits. In standardising and any reduction in wages of those recruited in India, I wish the Honourable Member to give to this House an assurance that he will take into serious consideration the minimum living wage of the particular community and assess the wages accordingly. All I ask is for a living wage compatible with one's standard of living—not an existence wage. I ask the Honourable the Railway Member to give this House a clear pronouncement on this matter.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Sir, the subject of racial discrimination has been before the House ever since 1925. The Railway Board wrote to the various Railway Administrations in that year and informed them of the views expressed in this House regarding the treatment of Indians in matters of employment, etc. But it is strange that the Board called for no report from the Railway Administrations. Perhaps they have complete confidence in the railway managements. Perhaps they do not attach too much value to the opinions expressed in this House. But if the Railway Board had taken the trouble of circularising the company-managed railways on the subject of Indian employment, I think it was up to them to inquire to what extent these managements proposed to give effect to the policy recommended by the Railway Board. If they had done so, the question might have been solved earlier. It was only two years later, Sir, that the Railway Administrations were asked to submit their report. Very nearly all of them stated that they well knew what the wishes of the Railway Board were and that they were trying to act up to them. Not one of them, so far as I remember, admitted that there was racial discrimination in connection with the employment of Indians. A year later, after the debate that took place in this House, the various Administrations were circularised again. Some of them found, strange to say, that there were some matters in regard to which objection could be legitimately taken, but these were all of a minor character. On the whole the replies received last year are of the same kind as those received earlier. I do not know whether the Honourable the Railway Member has any papers in his possession on this subject which have not been placed in the Council Library. But if the papers placed in the Library are all that he has in his possession, I must say that the memoranda that we have received are not worth the paper on which they are written.

In 1928, when the question of racial discrimination was brought prominently to the notice of the Railway Member, various points were raised showing how Indians were discriminated against. Besides, general figures were given to show what were the proportion of Indians in what are known as the subordinate grades. But apart from that, definite instances were given with regard even to lower grades to show how Indians were being treated. Specific illustrations were given with regard to the manner of appointments of guards, drivers and ticket collectors. Attention was drawn to the different methods of selection of Indian and European apprentices at Jamalpur for the technical services. The question of medical relief was also prominently drawn attention to. So far as I was concerned, I concentrated my attention on the East Indian Railway. But other Honourable Members, who took part in the debate, pointed out that the distinctions I had complained of were rampant on other railways also. It was the clear duty of the Railway Board, when asking the railway managements to report on the action they proposed to take to remove all traces of racial discrimination, to inform the Board what the existing rules were in regard to matters complained of in this House, what were the other matters in regard to which racial discrimination existed, and how the Administrations proposed to change the rules against which legitimate complaints had been made. That procedure does not seem to have been followed. If it has been followed, at any rate we have not been informed of it, and there are no papers before us to show what replies have been sent by the railway managements. I must therefore trouble the House again for a while with our grievances in the East Indian Railway with regard to the very subordinate services of which I have just made mention. I will not repeat what was said in this House last year or the year before last. I only propose to place fresh instances of racial discrimination in regard to these services before Government and this House.

First, take the question of Guards. I should like to know how these guards are selected for "A" grade, because that was the grade in regard to which complaints were made in this House. I understand that selections are arbitrary, and neither seniority nor educational qualifications are the determining factor. Again, I should like to know how many Indians have been either appointed direct to "A" grade or even promoted to that grade. I should also like to know whether the Sunday allowance is now allowed to Indians. Perhaps my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, will tell me that a rule has been made now on the East Indian Railway that no man appointed after the 1st April, 1929, would be eligible for this allowance. But I understand that, in spite of this recent rule, men bearing European names have been allowed the Sunday allowance, while it has not been allowed in the case of a single Indian.

I will now pass on to the case of Drivers. Have Indians been promoted to the "A" grade of drivers as yet? If not, why not? Has the period during which an Indian can rise from fireman to driver, which is 10 to 15 years as compared with 5 to 10 years in the case of a European, been shortened? There is nothing in the replies that we have received to show that any action has been taken in this direction.

Coming, Sir, to the technical services, I understand that, while Indians are required to have passed the Matriculation examination in the first division, the passing of the Junior Cambridge examination is considered adequate in the case of Anglo-Indians. Exceptions are not made in the case of Indians, while they are made in the case of Anglo-Indians. Indians are required to compete amongst themselves, and people bearing European names amongst themselves. Even when Indians have passed out of Jamalpur, I understand they are not employed in the Loco. sheds. I have been told that no technically trained Jamalpur Indian has yet been sent to these sheds either as a fitter or as a supervisor or as an inspector.

[Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru.]

Take the question again of medical relief. Questions have been asked on this subject repeatedly in this House, and my Honourable friend Mr. Parsons has answered them in his usual unsatisfactory manner. I should therefore like to tell the House again what the grievances of the Indian staff in respect of medical relief are. There are no nurses for indoor Indian patients. There are Anglo-Indian nurses, but they attend Anglo-Indian indoor patients. When there are no Anglo-Indian patients, I understand, even then, they do not attend on Indian patients. (Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: "Yes, it is so.") I know of cases where they have refused to attend on private Indian patients, even when promised adequate fees. Then, Sir, there are no proper arrangements for Indian maternity cases. Some time ago my Honourable friend Mr. Parsons sent me a statement, showing the number of cases confined in East Indian Railway hospitals. I should have liked to know what were the fees that Indians had to pay in those cases to the District Medical Officer, or to the officer subordinate to him. I should have liked to know how many of these cases related to lady passengers and not to the wives of the railway employees. Again there are no midwives employed for Indians. The staff of the East Indian Railway has, I believe, approached the Agent more than once in that respect, but a deaf ear has been turned to their request. There are other questions that can be put in that connection, but I am perfectly certain that my Honourable friend Mr. Parsons is thoroughly aware of them. They can all be easily removed if he would only exert himself a little in this respect.

Lastly I will take the question of housing accommodation for Indians. Indians, whatever their pay, are allowed quarters in exceptional cases: Europeans and those who are allied to them, are allowed quarters as a rule. In the second place, the amenities allowed to Indians are far inferior to those allowed to Europeans, and those classed with them by Government. Then, Sir, all quarters for Europeans and cognate classes are fitted up with electric fans and lights, irrespective of pay. Indians getting above Rs. 125 per month can be allowed electricity, but in practice their applications are turned down. I could give many other instances of this nature which are exceedingly galling and humiliating, but I will give only one which relates to the Fines Funds, to which the attention of the House was drawn last year. I see that the deputation of the All-India Railwaymen's Federation, which waited on the Honourable the Railway Member last May, also drew his attention to this subject. The complaint has generally been made that the Fines Funds, although contributed to largely by Indian employees, are used mainly for the benefit of European and allied railway servants. Government promised last year to convert the Fines Funds into Staff Benefit Funds, and to have committees representative of railway employees for their management. I should like to know what has been done in this respect. If these funds were properly used, institutes could be set up for Indian employees as they are in existence today for European employees. I trust, Sir, that some satisfactory explanation on this subject will be given; for connected with these institutes are many other questions which I do not wish to raise today. There is one other point with regard to which I should like some explanation from my Honourable friend Mr. Hayman. I understand that the East Indian Railway Company employs a musical band, which is reserved for the use of European institutes, and that wherever swimming baths are provided, they are reserved for Europeans and those who are supposed to be allied to them.

I hope, Sir, that the instances that I have given will convince the House of the existence of grave racial discrimination in connection with the employment of Indians and their subsequent treatment. As regards housing accommodation and medical relief, I have the testimony of the Honourable the Railway Member himself on my side. Speaking during the Railway Budget debate last year, he said with regard to these two matters:

"Now, Sir, we have received reports from the Agent which refer, amongst others, to these two matters, and I think it is clear, that as things stand at present, there is not complete racial equality in those particular matters. I think there are differences in the quarters allotted to European and Anglo-Indian subordinates which apparently are in some cases more spacious and comfortable than those allotted to Indian subordinates. As regards medical attendance and medical assistance, it appears from the reports we have received that there are differences in the rules as regards the kind and quality of attendance that is to be given."

This confession was made by the Honourable the Railway Member last year. Has any improvement taken place during the last twelve months? If not, how long are we to wait for it?

Sir, I shall now deal with one case relating to those services which are technically regarded as subordinate. I refer to the local traffic service. I understood from my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, last year that all the direct recruits for the local traffic service were Indians. The House should therefore know how these direct recruits had been treated. When the Local Traffic Service was formed, it was laid down that men belonging to this service would be eligible for 20 per cent. of the annual recruitment to the superior traffic service and that promotion would usually be made at an early period of service. In 1926 the rule was changed and the subordinates were included in the allowance of 20 per cent. which was laid down only for the direct recruits formerly. My Honourable friend, the Railway Member, promised in September last to look into this matter. But we do not know what the result of his inquiries has been. Take another point, Sir, in this connection. Since 1925-26, when direct recruitment to the Local Traffic Service ceased, only six persons had been promoted from the subordinate services and the Local Traffic Service to the Superior Traffic Service. I explained that point during the discussion on the Railway Budget last year. Only one of these, Sir, was a man directly recruited to the Local Traffic Service. Of the other five, I believe only one was an Indian and the rest all bore European names. My Honourable friend, Mr. Parsons, promised to look into this matter, and to see whether those men in the Local Traffic Service, who were considered fit for promotion, could not be speedily promoted, so that there might be no sense of grievance amongst the members of the Local Traffic Service on this point. On this point again, we are ignorant of the action taken by the Government. Indeed we have some right to complain that, although this matter has been before the House for the last three years, they have taken no action, either to give satisfaction to their employees or to assure this House that they mean to treat their Indian employees in the same way as they treat their European or other employees.

Just one more point, or two points more, Sir, before I sit down. My Honourable friend, the Railway Member, knows that I have frequently drawn his attention in this House to the position of the teachers of the Indian Railway High schools. I do not know whether provision has been made in this Budget for an increase in their salaries. But I understand that the East Indian Railway is trying, despite the clear orders of the Railway Board, to introduce a lower scale than that recommended by the

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

[25TH FEB. 1930.]

[Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru.]

Board. I asked for a definite reply regarding this matter from my Honourable friend opposite the other day; but none was forthcoming. I press my point again and I want to know whether the East Indian Railway is subordinate to the Railway Board or its master? Is it to be allowed to defy the express instructions of the Railway Board or must it bow to them and loyally and ungrudgingly carry out the instructions that have been issued? Sir, this House is in no mood to tolerate the idiosyncrasies of the individual Agents on these matters. The Railway Board must show that they can control their subordinates.

Mr. President: That is not a case of racial discrimination.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: It is, Sir, for this reason. The question arises because the salary of the teachers in the Oakgrove High School, which is meant for Europeans, are much higher than those allowed to the Indian teachers. The salaries allowed to the Head Mistresses of the European primary schools are in many cases higher than those allowed to the Headmasters of the Indian Railway high schools. While as a rule free quarters are allowed to the Head Mistresses of the European primary schools, these quarters are allowed only in exceptional cases to teachers in Indian Railway high schools. I had placed these facts before the House earlier and therefore did not wish to weary it by repeating them. But I am obliged to you for reminding me that, but for the additional explanation that I have given, what I have said might not have been fully intelligible to the House.

There is one point in this connection, on which the Railway Board themselves have to make up their mind. The Railway Board, while directing that the provincial scale of pay should be applied to teachers in the Indian Railway high schools, have laid down that it should be applicable only to those teachers who possess qualifications corresponding to teachers of similar grades in Government high schools. Now, Sir, the Government of the United Provinces, at least, made no distinction between teachers already in Government service when it reorganised the educational service in 1921. Men who have been with you for years may be supposed to have made up in experience for their deficiency in respect of technical training. It is only fair that the benefit of the new scales should be allowed to existing teachers unreservedly. Otherwise there will be very few who would be able to take advantage of the new scales. Unless the condition laid down by the Railway Board is abrogated in connection with the existing teachers, it will be a case of breaking in the spirit the promise uttered to the ear.

The last point I wish to refer to is in connection with the higher services. My Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, the other day said that the Railway Board was trying to do all it could to increase Indian recruitment and that this year it had recruited Indians for 71 per cent. of the vacancies. I have a little difficulty in that respect which, I hope, will be removed with the assistance of my Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman. I have consulted the Railway Administration Report for 1928-29, and I find that, in that year, there were 49 vacancies that were actually filled on State-worked Railways. Twenty-five of these were given to Europeans, so that more than 50 per cent. of the vacancies were filled by Europeans. Now I know that the rule with regard to the appointment of Indians to 75 per cent. of the vacancies, which is connected with the recommendation made by the Lee Commission, refers to the superior revenue establishment of State Railways. The spirit of that rule should be understood if the wishes of the House with regard to Indianisation of the services are to be given effect to. It is not sufficient that the revenue services alone should be Indianised. Adequate opportunities must be given to Indians for employment in other directions also. My Honourable friend, the Railway Member, said the other day, that definite attempts were being made now to increase the employment of Indians, in the Transportation (Power) and Mechanical Engineering Departments, but there are other Departments too in which I see that a larger number, a majority of the vacancies has gone to Europeans. I think this is a thing that requires some explanation, and I trust that it will be forthcoming.

There is, Sir, no subject on which this side of the House feels so keenly as on that of racial discrimination. We have been assured that the matter is under consideration by the Railway Board and that their policy is to eliminate old differences based on race or colour. But of what use is their sympathy? Of what use are their enunciations of policy? Of what use are their circulars, if they cannot compel their subordinates to fall into line with their wishes? This House expects the Railway Board, Sir, to make its pressure felt. If the Railway Board is incapable of it, it is time that it made room for other men who can show greater efficiency and managing capacity.

Sir, I have, during the discussion, deliberately refrained from referring to the community which is so ably represented in this House by my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney. My Honourable friend, Sir, did not deserve the indulgence that I have shown to him. He failed to take the hint you gave him, and instead of resting, under the protection which you so kindly accorded to him, he attacked us right and left and asked the Government to continue to show that preferential treatment to his community which it has received in the past. I do not wish, Sir, to deal with my Honourable friend according to his deserts, but since his speech might have misled this House I think it is pertinent to point out what position the Anglo-Indian community themselves take in regard to their relations with Hindus and Muhammadans and other Asiatics of pure descent. My Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, in a memorandum, which he has submitted to the Royal Commission on Labour in India, has stated:

"It is an undisputed fact that it was with British capital that the pioneer Englishman and his offspring the early Anglo-Indian and domiciled European laid the first railway sleepers in India about seventy years ago."

Here he claims kinship with the European. As a member, Sir, of the Territorial Force Committee he asked that Anglo-Indian accused should enjoy the same privileges as the European accused in the matter of juries. In regard to enlistment in the Army, he did not ask that Anglo-Indians should serve along with Indians in the Indian Territorial Force; he wanted that they should be in the Indian Auxiliary Force, and that having been conceded, he used it as a lever to press Government to treat Anglo-Indians on the same footing as Europeans in the matter of trials before law courts. This shows, Sir, that the Anglo-Indian community think that they are more nearly related to Europeans than to Indians. If this is their view they ought not to object to their being classed by us as Europeans in matters of employment. They must be prepared to fan the criticism that is directed against Europeans and to bear the consequences of their action.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I am not afraid of the consequences. Your criticisms refer to 1923. This is 1930.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: I am not perturbed that my Honourable friend has decided upon this course. He has resolved to throw in his lot with Europeans. I wish him well, but let him not complain if we, hereafter, relying on what he has said, treat him as a non-Indian. I do not say that there is no time for the Honourable Member to retract what he has said; I will give him unlimited time to change his position, but so long as he classes himself with Europeans he must be content to be regarded as a non-Indian.

Mr. Lalchand Navalrai: I thought he became a good boy in the end?

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Now, Sir, my Honourable friend took the figures relating to the employment of Indians in all grades, even in the lowest grades—he took Indian scavengers and peons too—and showed to what extent their number had increased. If my Honourable friend's argument is sound, then no trace of racial discrimination exists even as between statutory Indians on one side and Europeans on the other. I am sure when he proved his point, he proved too much. (Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: "Too much for you.") Too much for the Honourable Member himself, who, at the end of his speech, indulged in special pleading on behalf of his own particular community. Sir, my Honourable friend told us that the Anglo-Indian community occupied its present position in the Railway services because of its aptitude for Railway work and because of their proved fitness and efficiency for the duties that had been entrusted to them.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I never used the word "aptitude".

An Honourable Member: He is improving on your language.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: I am not using the exact words of the Honourable Member. I am only quoting the substance of what he said. He must remember that Indians were definitely kept out of the railway services in the past, and that the educational qualifications were deliberately kept low in order to permit of the admission of Anglo-Indian candidates. If that is the situation, the Honourable Member cannot say that he is coming through the open door and that no favour is being shown to his community. If the same standards are observed in regard to recruitment, if equal opportunities are given to all communities for admission to the railway services and if then the Anglo-Indian community can hold their own, he would be justified in getting up in this House and saying that the Anglo-Indian community possessed what it did because of sheer merit. But so long as the present position remains, so long as he allies himself with Europeans and the Europeans take his community under their protecting wings, it is no use pretending that the Anglo-Indians enjoy predominance in the railway services because of their special merits or qualifications.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: That does not take us very far.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: One word more, Sir, and I have done. My Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, drew attention to the grievances of the Anglo-Indian community towards the end of his speech.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I did not. I referred to genuine cases of racial discrimination of which the Member was ignorant.

emoluments that are given to the various communities, because it has been, to a certain extent, thoroughly discussed. But, Sir, there is another aspect, namely, the matter of railway construction, where racial discrimination is rampant. It is the policy to carry on railway construction on the basis of racial discrimination. I can give you instances if you please. I think the Honourable the Railway Member knows that there is such a place as Talcher, where we had no railways before; but the reason why a railway was constructed there was because certain European miners went there with prospecting leases at a very advantageous rate when no Indian would think of taking leases of those tracts, because they knew that to carry coal from that place would cost them so much that they could not carry on a trade profitably; but these European miners who went there knew very well that, as soon as they got advantageous terms, they would be able to have a Railway line constructed with the help of the Railway Board. This is one aspect of racial discrimination which should also be condemned.

Now, Sir, there is another tract of country in West Bengal, far more civilised, which was in fact the harbinger of civilisation in Bengal, which is called Gangarides or Rarh; and will you believe it, Sir, that that tract of country has got no railways up till now? Why? Because eminent men like Sir Rash Behari Ghose and others came from that tract and they wanted that the tract should have railway communication. If the Government could postpone a line like the Dacca-Aricha Railway, about which we had ample discussion the other day, a proposal which they had before them for fifty years for which they have been rightly condemned, their conduct deserves greater censure for neglecting this tract of country for more than half a century. It was in the early seventies that Horace Bell the great engineer first thought of having a railway through that tract. It was in 1878. Ten or twelve years afterwards there was another survey, about 1888 or 1889, and after thirteen or fourteen years, there was another survey during Mr. Chadwick's time. I do not know whether the Railway Department is in possession of all these facts; but I know all these facts personally from my childhood as my father happened to be a railway engineer. In 1906 the project took the shape of the Howrah-Bishnupur-Chord, and we thought the line was going to be constructed. But somehow or other it dropped though the late Mr. Bhupendra Nath Bose, a Member of the old Imperial Legislative Council tried his level best to have this line constructed. But as soon as Mr. Bhupendra Nath Bose was away from the council, the Railway Board did not think it necessary to take any further steps. Since then, Sir, humbler individuals like myself have come in their places in this Council and they have been approaching every one possible from the Honourable Member downwards to construct a line through that tract, but the Government have turned, so far, a deaf ear to all these requests. Two or three years ago the District Magistrate of Hooghly and another Honourable Member and myself approached Mr. Parsons, and he told us that he would look into the matter. This tract of country is the birth-place of the greatest of Bengali poets, Kavi Kankan and other poets like Rupram and Ghanaram and others. It is inhabited by a highly civilised race, and therefore, probably, the Honourable Member thinks that this tract should be cut off from other parts of the country.

Sir, the Bankura-Damodar River Railway was constructed with a guarantee from the Government, and what are the figures of that line? In 1927-28, the gross earnings amounted to Rs. 2,12,000 while the working expenses were Rs. 2,28,000 or a loss of Rs. 16,000 in running the railway.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: In so far as he wished to point out that Anglo-Indians were treated differentially from Europeans as a class, I am entirely with him. Should he desire that Anglo-Indians should have the same privileges as are afforded to Indians, he will have our hearty support.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Yes, I do.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: But should he desire that Indians should remain where they are, but that his community should be afforded a privileged position, there will be no greater opponents of that claim than we on this side of the House. We recognise Anglo-Indians as our countrymen. We are prepared to deal generously by them. We are not going to insist on proportions in their case. We are not going to say that they should not be given a single appointment more than they are entitled to by virtue of their population. But the Anglo-Indians must definitely regard themselves as Indians. They must throw in their lot with the people of this country. They must develop an Indian patriotism and remember that their glory lies in serving the land of their birth.

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt (Burdwan Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, this subject of racial discrimination has been discussed only from one aspect so far, namely, the percentage of the various communities in the railway services and the amenities offered to the various communities in the service in the shape of medical relief and other things. A certain amount of heat was also generated, as it must do, when such racial questions come up. I for one stand for nationalism and do not believe in any racial discrimination and in that I am backed by the gracious message of Her Most Gracious Majesty, Queen Victoria, of revered memory, who, when assuming the reins of Government of this continent of India, assured her people that, in all appointments there would be no distinction of caste, creed or colour. But of late the rulers sent out to India, have overlooked that policy, and have introduced racial and communal discriminations in the matter of appointments to services from political motives. I remind them that, in the near future, they will be hoisted with their own petard as the engineer was. If they rake up these questions of communal antagonism in the way in which they have been doing, at times sedulously asking one community to come in and make its representations, and assuring them of appointments, then you are bound to create bitterness in other communities by rousing racial jealousies.

(At this stage Mr. President vacated the Chair which was taken by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya.)

I for one believe that efficiency should be the sole test for the public services. I do not believe in any communalism. It may be to the interests of our foreign rulers to rake up the worse feelings in us, but I warn them that such things will not last long. The majority communities are in a position to bid goodbye to you and all your services; in fact this hankering after service has been the bane of our public life in this country and has dissuaded many a patriot from active service in the field of politics. I know, Sir, that it has spoiled even the Calcutta Bar. When one man was raised to the peerage, there were twelve other aspirants in the Calcutta Bar who thought they would one day become peers of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

So, Sir, I want to say nothing about the racial discrimination so far as the percentage of appointments in the railways is concerned or the

In 1928-29 the gross earnings were still less—Rs. 1,82,000—and the working expenses came to Rs. 2,35,000, or a loss of Rs. 53,000. Besides this, the Government have to give to this railway line the guaranteed interest which they promised. Why is this line not paying? Because it would not traverse that portion of the country from which there could be enough traffic. There is the sub-divisional town called Arambagh, which is about fifteen miles from the railway station of Sehara on the Bankura-Damodar River Railway, and ten miles North is the town of Burdwan intercepted by that great river, Damodar, whose floods create havoc. Am I to understand, Sir, that because they have to construct a bridge over the Damodar, they will not extend the line from Sehara to Burdwan? Or is it because we, humbler people, are there and they don't want to do anything for us. (An Honourable Member: "Where is the racial aspect?") This is the racial aspect.

Mr. Chairman (Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya): Will the Honourable Member confine his remarks to the question before the House, which is racial discrimination in the railway service?

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Now, Sir, why should the Railway Board make this racial discrimination against people who reside in this highly civilized part of the country which is known as the Dakshin Rarh? I believe the Dakshin Rarh has been responsible for producing the greatest men of Bengal, who have been a thorn in their side. Beginning from Raja Ram Mohan Roy, up to date, most of the greatest men like Sir Rash Bihari Ghose and Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu came from the Dakshin Rarh, and therefore the Railway Board will not care to build a railway

Mr. M. S. Aney: Discriminating against the gifted Bengalee race?

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Yes, you might say so. Sir, I once more reiterate from my place in this House that racial discrimination is observed not only in the matter of employment of the children of the soil in the railways, but also in the matter of railway construction, and we condemn it in no uncertain voice. As I have already submitted, there is the Dacca-Aricha Railway, about which we had a long discussion yesterday, and as there was no chance of the cut about the Bankura-Damodar River Railway being reached, I have taken this opportunity to speak on this subject in connection with racial discrimination.

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad (United Provinces Southern Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I do not grudge the privileges given to any particular class, nor do I propose today that they should be withdrawn, but I do advocate that those privileges should be extended to all. I would confine my observations to educational matters to which reference has been made by my Honourable friend, the Revd. Mr. Chatterjee, and also by the Honourable Member in charge of Railways. There is no doubt that the Railway Board will have to maintain a certain number of schools for reasons which I will give later on, but I do not like that these schools should be labelled as European schools and Indian schools. This racial discrimination ought to be removed. I can certainly understand that certain schools should be maintained for those boys who live in European style, but I also maintain that the Indians who desire to live in European style should also be admitted to these schools; but if you maintain an efficient school for those boys who live in European style, I would demand that equally efficient schools should also be maintained for those boys who desire to live in Indian style. I can also understand it if you have a school in which the medium of instruction is to be English, but that school ought to be open to everybody who desires that his sons or wards should be taught through the English medium. I can also understand, if you have a special school to prepare the boys not for the Indian University examinations but for the examinations conducted by the Oxford and Cambridge Universities, but such schools should be open to every boy whose parents desire that their sons should pass these English examinations. I can further understand a differentiation based on the cost of education, and it may perhaps be necessary to provide a school where fees may be comparatively high. But it does not follow from this that you should overlook the education of those children who cannot afford to pay the high fees. You have to care for those who can afford to pay the high fees as well as for those who cannot afford to pay those fees.

Now, Sir, it is not possible for the Railway Board to establish an Education Department of its own, and nobody on this side will advocate the establishment of such a department; but it is absolutely necessary for three main reasons to establish some schools for the benefit of the children of the employees of the Railway Department. Unfortunately the policy of education and the way in which it is carried out is very much to be blamed. Of course, I do not like to discuss the educational policy, because we will have ample opportunity for it when we take up the Education Budget.

I now give the reasons on account of which it is necessary for the Railway Board to establish some schools. One of these reasons is, that all these schools, on account of the special policy adopted by the Education Department for the promotion of secondary education, are overcrowded. If the present railway schools are closed today, then the children now attending those schools will find it exceedingly difficult to find admission either in the European schools or even in the High Schools maintained by the Education Department. My second reason is that the railway officials are transferred along the same line from one province to another, and the children who are being educated, say in the United Provinces, will find it exceedingly difficult to receive their education, say in Bengali, if their parents are transferred to that province. The medium of instruction is different, and the curriculum of studies is also different. The third reason is that the number of students in every school is very limited. There are certain facilities afforded to civil servants. In every province, if a civil officer is transferred to another district, he finds very often a school of the same type, and there is a provision that, whatever the number of the students in a particular class may be, the sons of the civil servants so transferred should be admitted. But I doubt whether such facilities will be extended to these railway servants. For these reasons I think it is desirable that the Railway Board should maintain a certain number of schools of their own.

Then the Honourable Member raised a question whether the schools maintained by the Board should be Middle Schools or High Schools. I very emphatically say they should be High Schools and not Middle Schools, and this for two reasons. In the first place, it is more difficult for these children to find admission in the High Schools than in the Middle Schools. The number of Middle Schools is comparatively larger. Middle Schools also exist in smaller towns. Besides the boys can also find their way to High Schools through what they call the special classes provided in vernacular and High Schools. Therefore, wherever a school is established, it ought to be a High School. My second reason is that, even for low paid appointments, as my friend just stated, the Matriculation certificate is necessary, and therefore it is highly desirable that the Railway Board schools should see that the boys, after leaving those schools, are enabled to enter the Railway Department if the parents desire their boys to do so.

Now, the cost of a High School maintained on public school lines, that is the line which we have advocated for the English boys, is not very prohibitive. A school of this kind will cost about Rs. 50,000 per annum and this cost can be reduced by the amount of fee which we may charge. And the amount will be increased if the students are lodged and fed at the expense of the Railway Board. But if the students are required to pay the ordinary fees which they usually pay in other schools, then the cost of maintaining a High School will be reduced to Rs. thirty thousand a year. - If the Railway Board be not in a position to establish schools of their own, then they can arrange with some of the good existing schools to admit the sons of the railway employees, especially sons of those who are posted at stations where no schools exist, at a moderate cost. Now, this arrangement can conveniently be made with a number of selected schools in different localities, and by this arrangement the cost of education per head will substantially diminish. So much I have to say about education. There are two more things to which I should like to draw attention. Reference has been made to the Report of the Lee Commission and the percentages of 50 and 75. I maintain that this Lee Commission Report is out of date. It was written at a time when the country was not seriously considering Independence or Dominion Status. Now, with the new political outlook, this Report is out of date, and we want a much higher percentage, as high a percentage as the country can afford.

I would also draw your attention to item No. 53 standing in my name which is co-related to this motion. As I will not have the time to move that motion, I do request the Governor General in Council, through the Member for Railways, that, whenever a vacancy occurs in the Railway Board, it should be filled up by an Indian and not by an Englishman. If you take the total figures of the Indians and the Europeans, the figures of the Indians will always be high. I admit that all the coolies in the Railway Department are Indians, that all the clerks drawing salaries of Rs. 25 and below are Indians, but they are not now the subject under discussion. We want that the higher services, the Members of the Board, the Agents, the Staff officers and the posts carrying higher salaries should be Indianised.

*Mr. N. C. Kelkar: I just want to say one or two words very briefly. I support the cut motion for this reason, that in the latter part of the speech of Colonel Gidney we have received complete support for our contention that there is racial discrimination as between Europeans and others. I also welcome the cut motion because, in my opinion, it is going to give the Honourable Member for Railways a welcome opportunity for making a statement, which I suppose he has yet to make, by way of laying down the general policy of the Railway Board in the matter of racial discrimination. I may be wrong, but I may remind him that, on the 4th February last year, Mr. Parsons, in reply to Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru, with reference to the removal of this discrimination, stated, that a full statement would be laid on the table as soon as all the replies had been received, and any action, which it was found necessary to take, on them had been determined. I plead guilty to the charge of ignorance if that statement has been already laid on the table, but if it has not, then here is an opportunity for the Honourable Member to make a full statement bringing the results and facts up to date.

Now, with regard to Colonel Gidney's remarks about the Anglo-Indian community, I think his defence is absolutely weak. He knows very well that his community does enjoy considerable patronage and preference, and yet he wants to pretend that there is no such favour shown to his community. He wants to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. His community is a kind of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, with two faces, one towards the Indian, the other towards the European. He has also got faces turned towards the Indian and also towards the European, and through both these mouths he is prepared to get for his community all possible advantages that could be secured under one pretext or another, whichever may be suitable to him for the moment. He is an Indian when there is a policy of Indianisation.

(At this stage Mr. President resumed the Chair.)

He is included among the Indians in filling the 75 per cent. of posts reserved for Indians. There is nothing wrong in that, because they come in as Indians. That would be his line of argument. But when it is a question of reaping the special educational facilities through schools reserved for Europeans, then he is an European and not an Indian. When it is a question of reaping the benefits of the Auxiliary Force, then he is an European, at least a non-Indian. So this Anglo-Indian community is very conveniently playing a double game of being Indian at one time and non-Indian at another. All that mischief comes out of the dubious definition of Anglo-Indian as a statutory Indian for practical purposes. The merits of this definition are on a par with the other definition of an Indian nation of which we have heard a good deal. We know what an Indian national is when it is convenient to the European, and we know what an Indian national is when it goes against the interests of the Indian. So under the darkness of this dubious definition, a number of sins of selfishness are being committed both by the Government and by the Anglo-Indian community.

Now, whereas, Colonel Gidney says that there is no distinction between Anglo-Indian and Indian, Government say that there is a distinction. He cannot get over that, and with regard to that distinction, however, there are two different reasons given by the Government and the Anglo-Indian community. Colonel Gidney puts it on the basis of loyalty. But Government are more shrewd. They do not want to put it on that ground. They say, "You have got aptitude; you are the bone of our bone, the flesh of our flesh; how can you avoid having special aptitude? Though in your innocence you do not know that you have got special aptitude, we know that you have special aptitude. It is not for your loyalty that we are showing this favour, but it is on account of the special aptitude that you have got." In this letter which the Railway Board wrote to the different Agents of all railways with a view to get information about Indianisation and racial discrimination, they say the same thing. I do not know whether Colonel Gidney is aware of the great compliment which Government are deliberately paying to the Anglo-Indian community for their special aptitude. Next time when he speaks about this, he should have regard to the reason of aptitude along with the reason of loyalty. This is what Government say: "Agents have already been informed that for the purpose of Indianisation, Anglo-Indians are statutory Indians, and the Government desire it to be clearly understood that they do not suggest, and never have suggested, that Anglo-Indians should be discharged merely in order that they may be replaced by Indians. Also they recommend to the full the aptitude of the Anglo-Indians for certain branches of railway work, and they are not in favour to any policy which would oust the Anglo-Indians from those branches. (They consider, however, they must be also good to the Indians for they are also under the same Government and the Government must appear to be impartial.) They consider, however, that Indians should also be recruited for these branches, particularly the subordinate Traffic Service (not the higher) and should be given equal opportunities of showing their aptitude and capacity for the higher and better paid posts."

I want the House to mark the words: "They consider, however, that Indians should also be recruited for these branches." What does it mean? It means this, that primarily the Anglo-Indians should be recruited, and, of course, there should not be any room left for saying that Indians have not been admitted and therefore they must also be taken. That really gives the clue as to what percentage Government really intend to give to Anglo-Indians and Indians. Sir, the word "also" reminds me of the racecourse talk that I heard some time back. I have not seen a race myself, but of course I have talked about racecourse matters. "So-and-so won the race and so-and-so also ran." So, it is like that. The Anglo-Indians won the prize and so-and-so Indians also ran in that direction. Then, again, once they are admitted, Government do not say how many Indians will be given the same opportunities for promotion and training, etc., as the Anglo-Indians. And who has answered the question as to how many Indians will be admitted in the first instance? Even the railways have made that distinction, and in the letters received from the Agents, this appears to be the case. Of course, they are not so innocent as my friend Colonel Gidney is, because he wishes to ignore the distinction between Indians and Anglo-Indians. In all the details that the Agents have given, they have included Anglo-Indians along with Europeans as distinct from Indians. In this letter from the Assam Bengal Railway, dated the 22nd December, 1927, the figures are given for Agency, Audit, Medical, etc., for Europeans and Anglo-Indians and Indians. We find there that in the Traffic Department there are 21 posts given to Europeans and Anglo-Indians and only 10 are given to Indians and yet the Agents are prepared to say that there is no racial discrimination. I would repeat again what I said the other day: "God said, 'Let there be light, and there was light'." And the Railway Board said, "Let there be no racial discrimination", and there was no racial discrimination. But when you go through all the replies, you will see that the Railway Agents have taken shelter under the same pretext as the Railway Board, viz., particular people or groups of people have a special aptitude for a particular kind of work. Who is going to solve this riddle? Who knows what aptitude is required for a particular kind of work? After all, the Agent is in the highest position, and he is the sole judge of the quality of the work and the quality of the human being that does the work. There is an end to it. When he says that that is his final opinion, that is the end of the whole thing. Therefore, I entirely support the cut motion of Colonel Gidney because he has, in the latter part of his speech, very clearly brought out the distinction that is observed and the favouritism that is shown to Europeans as against Indians.

Mr. A. M. Hayman (Railway Board: Nominated Official): Sir, when I got up to speak last Saturday, I said that I felt myself under a great disadvantage. Today too, Sir, I feel under a disadvantage even greater than I felt on Saturday. I feel it because one of my Honourable friends on the other side made an observation—I think it was Munshi Iswar Saran—that I tried to mislead the House in regard to certain figures I had quoted.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I did not say that.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I am sorry, Sir. Then it was somebody else who said that I had tried to mislead the House by quoting certain figures, and that I ought to remember that I was a baby in this House and that he and several others had been here for many years. Well, Sir, actually in the matter of the study of the figures and drawing inferences from them, I claim to be very old at the game. I have spent 31 years in the Government service almost entirely in compiling and studying figures and drawing inferences from them. But from another point of view there was a lot of truth in his remark, and it is because of this that I feel myself under this great disadvantage. It is true that I am a baby in this House when it comes to a question of speaking, because I only come here for a few days now and then each year, and I do feel a certain amount of nervousness when I have got to deal with such a big subject, on which so many Honourable Members have spoken. Although I have all the facts and figures with me, I feel that on this subject I cannot readily marshal my case in such a way as fully to convince the other side of the House. Therefore, I will ask the Honourable Members on the other side to bear with me a little and have a little patience if I do not present my case as strongly as I ought to.

I think I should first begin by saying a few words on the question of the Indianisation of all our superior services of railways. Although the Railway Board have, for many years past, followed the policy of progressive Indianisation, it may be said that this policy was only pursued systematically from the year 1925. In that year, Government set before itself the goal to Indianise the superior services by filling 75 per cent. of the vacancies by officers of Indian domicile. It was just about that year that this House, when dealing with a proposal for the separation of the Railway finance from the General finance of the country, added a recommendation to the main Resolution which was not part of the Resolution, and urged upon the Government that the Railway services should be rapidly Indianised. It was shortly before this that the Lee Commission had reported and they made this definite recommendation in regard to State Railways superior services:

“That the extension of the existing facilities should be pressed forward as expeditiously as possible in order that recruitment in India may be advanced as soon as possible up to 75 per cent. of the total number of vacancies in the Railway Department as a whole.”

I have read these words over because I think in a way they are a direct answer to an observation made by my Honourable friend Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru, that we ought to examine our position carefully in respect to each of the separate departments of our railway service, and proceed as rapidly as possible to get 75 per cent. in each of our different services. Lest I should overlook the point, I think I might tell the House, as a further answer to the observation of my friend Mr. Kunzru, that, while the goal which we have set before us is the attainment of 75 per cent. for all the services taken together, we ourselves for practical reasons have got to take some of the services apart, because of the different rules of recruitment for these services and the different way in which we have to obtain the Indians for the vacancies in each of them. Sir, we have laid all the information that we have on the subject before the House, and if the House, or any Member of the House, will read page 64 of the Railway Board's Report for 1928-29 he will find that we have given figures there which show the rate of recruitment in the different sub-divisions in the year 1928-29. The figures given there are significant figures, and I will read them to the House; to the Engineering Branch, 80 per cent., to the Transportation, Traffic and Commercial Branch, 83 per cent., to the Mechanical Branch 18 per cent. and to other Branches 94 per cent.

I will now make one or two observations to meet the criticisms that were made in connection with recruitment to our superior services. The criticisms were mainly directed against our rules of recruitment. Our rules of recruitment were drawn up soon after we applied ourselves to the task of going in for rapid Indianisation, and those rules were all discussed with the Central Advisory Council before Government put them in their final shape and issued them.

The first applications for appointment, under the Regulations, to the Indian Service of Engineers, and Transportation and Commercial Departments, were called for only in July, 1926. In the case of Mechanical Engineering and Transportation (Power) Departments, we have explained here from time to time that our method of recruitment was to train apprentices partly in this country and partly in the United Kingdom, and we prescribed that the total training should be completed within a period of seven years. Later on, we found by re-examination of the position that we were able to reduce the term to six years. We have now got, Sir, 37 young men under training, all of Indian domicile, and we hope that we shall be able, both on our State railways and on our Company-managed railways to find employment for every one of them who eventually qualifies. I just mention the fact about these dates, because I think there is some credit due to Government for having done so much in these few years, that is from 1926 in some of the services, from 1925 in some other services, and from 1927 in yet other services, in these few years from then up to now. We have, in the last year for our State worked railways, recruited 71 per cent. of our vacancies for our superior services.

I should like to say a word about that figure, because two or three of the Honourable Members today, in their speeches, paid great attention to the figure of 49 per cent. which appears in our Report. Now, Sir, what happened was this, and it is explained in a note at the foot of the statement. We say here, of the total vacancies filled during the year, 49 per cent. were filled by Indians as against 54 per cent. in 1927-28 and 47.5 per cent. in 1926-27. Now comes the significant point. “The drop in the percentage of Indian recruitment is accounted for by the fact that 20 recruits of the permanent establishment for 1928-29—9 for the Engineering Department, 7 for the Transportation Traffic and Commercial Departments and 4 for the Medical Departments joined their duties after 31st March, 1929. They were actually recruited for 1929, but they joined rather late. That makes up our 71 per cent. That is a straightforward and honest claim. It is not 49 per cent. but it is 71 per cent.” Then, Sir, I have got to give a short explanation . . .

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty (Salem and Coimbatore cum North Arcot: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Is it not a fact that in the recruitment of officers to gazetted rank in 1928-29, 51 per cent. of those who were newly recruited were Europeans? The Honourable Member would find it at page 64.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: If I am correct that for our State Railways 71 per cent. who were recruited were all of Indian domicile, then the percentage for Europeans could only be the difference between 100 per cent. and 71 per cent.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: I am asking about the recruitment of officers to gazetted rank. Is it not a fact that, out of those recruited to gazetted rank in 1928-29, 51 per cent. were Europeans? How does the Honourable Member reconcile that with his statement? These figures are to be found in page 64 of the Report.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: As we have in 1928-29 recruited persons of Indian domicile to the extent of 71 per cent., then the recruitment of Europeans could only be 29 per cent.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Will the Honourable Member say what were the total number of vacancies that were recruited for, and how many Indians were appointed?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I shall supply the Honourable Member with information about this later on. In the meanwhile I do want to get on to a few more important points in reply to the observations of other Honourable Members.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Will the Honourable Member explain what he means by saying that 51 per cent. of Europeans were recruited to the gazetted ranks in that year?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I can only repeat what I said in reply to my Honourable friend Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru. I must be fair to all Members, and so I must pass on to reply to some of the criticisms made by them.

Mr. M. S. Aney: That leads us nowhere.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: May I know if these 20 additional appointments will be taken into consideration also in the following year, that is, 1929-30, for the purpose of calculating the percentage for that year?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: The Honourable Member's observation is a very proper one, and I do not think that we would have the courage to attempt to do what perhaps he suggests that we would do.

Sir, I will repeat that the figures I have supplied relating to our State-managed railways are correct. The position of our Company-managed railways is not quite satisfactory and I am not going to disguise from the House that, personally, I am not altogether satisfied with the progress that has been made on our Company-managed railways in this matter of progressive Indianisation, namely, the wish to reach 75 per cent. at the earliest possible date.

Mr. B. Das: The Bengal Nagpur Railway is the worst in this respect.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I am glad the Honourable Member raised that point and I can give a reply now. I faced this question with every desire to meet the obligations of Government by commencing an examination into the details for the past few years of each and every Company-worked line. It is my intention to speak to the Agents of each of the Company-worked railways when they come here next month. But very recently I had an opportunity, when I went to Calcutta, to cover the whole ground with the Agent of the Bengal Nagpur Railway, which my Honourable friend, Mr. Das, says is the worst railway in this respect.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: The best railway in India—none better.

Mr. B. Das: For the Honourable Member's community.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Perhaps it is the worst railway because the Honourable Member is not now a Member of the Advisory Committee?

Mr. B. Das: Don't care to be on it.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Grapes are sour Mr. Das.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Well, Sir, the time that I spent with the Agent was time well spent. It was not merely that we talked about Indianisation and used a number of words and then that I came away from him with a general promise that he would look into the matter and that he would do all he could. I am not satisfied with that sort of thing. I tackled the Department in which there was difficulty in getting Indians, that is the Transportation (Power) and Mechanical Engineering Departments. Mr. E. Jarrad, the Agent of the Railway, was, I must say to his credit, ready to move forward, and before I left Calcutta he had got hold of three young Indians in his shops who had gone through a certain amount of superior training and who had superior education, and he said to me, "I am quite prepared to make these three young men probationary officers in the Mechanical and Electrical Departments, if the Railway Board would help me by giving me three Probationers' posts for this purpose". I said the Railway Board would only be too glad to do so. Now, Sir, he has come up with a definite proposal officially to give effect to that discussion of ours, and it is only a matter of a little time when we shall place these proposals before the Standing Finance Committee to get sanction to the posts. Thus there will be a beginning on one of our Company-worked railways to take Indian officers into their Transportation (Power) and Mechanical Engineering Departments.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Are they Indians or statutory Indians?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: I do not really like to enter into that question, but I will answer the Honourable Member because he puts it very pointedly. They are all Hindus. (Laughter.) We went through the matter carefully to pick out the qualified people, and the three qualified people that we got hold of were Hindus.

There is one important thing which I should like to tell this House before I leave this subject, and it is this. I shall strive personally to get to this 75 per cent. on our State-managed railways and on the Company-worked lines. I do not see any difficulty, except in the Mechanical Engineering and Transportation (Power) Departments. Beginning with this year, we advertised for as many candidates as we could get for appointments in the Transportation (Power) and Mechanical Engineering Departments. My Honourable friend Sir George Rainy has explained fully to the House how far we went to lower our qualifications, to remove age restrictions and other restrictions, in order to get young Indians to come forward to fill these posts. We did not ask for a limited number of candidates to come forward, we asked for as many as we could get. We had on our State-managed railways eight vacancies. It was our intention, if we got more than eight, to endeavour to get Company-managed lines to take some, because they have themselves put but few Indians into those posts. Unfortunately we got only seven qualified candidates. We propose again this year, and in the next year, to continue to call for applicants for these posts. I have personally gone out of my way to see a few of the young men who applied this year and were not qualified. I have pointed out to them where their defects lay and I have asked them especially in the remaining time between now and the next call for vacancies to try and supplement their qualifications, so that next time they may be qualified. I will appeal to the Members on the other side of the House that, if they know of any young men who are almost qualified under the terms of that advertisement, to give them advice how to supplement their qualifications so that next year they may be qualified to come into these posts, because, if we do not get the full number that we require until our apprentice scheme brings fruit, we shall still not be able to get the full 75 per cent. Indian recruitment. But we will do something more. In order to make good this deficiency on the Mechanical Engineering and Transportation (Power) side, we have transferred, now and then, officers from our Civil Engineering side, to the Mechanical Engineering side. If we have found that an officer in the Civil Engineering side has an aptitude for Mechanical Engineering work, or can efficiently perform the duties of Transportation (Power) officer, we have transferred him to the other side, in order to increase the vacancies on the Civil Engineering side, simply because we know that we can get the full 75 per cent. proportion of Civil Engineering officers in this country. We shall continue that process to make up deficiencies. But, Sir, I do not want to mislead the House. I do not want the House to think that we have a large number of Civil Engineers who can take on the duties of Mechanical Engineers and the duties of officers for the Transportation (Power) Departments.

There is only one other observation, before I leave this subject of the recruitment to our superior services. I make it because I think there is a genuine misapprehension, on the part of some of the Members on the opposite Benches, about a statement I made that we had recruited 71 per cent. of our vacancies. I think some of the Members on the opposite Benches think that I said that we had not got 71 per cent. Indians in our services. That is not the case. We naturally could only recruit against vacancies.

I am not going to say a word about appointments which carry salaries of less than Rs. 250 per mensem. But I do think I ought, because of the remarks that have fallen from the other side of the House, to supplement the observations that I made the other day in regard to employees, who occupy posts which carry salaries above Rs. 250, in order that I may make the position which Government takes up in this matter quite clear. Government's position in this matter is that there shall be no racial discrimination and,—forgive me for going on to a subject which I know you do not like,—there shall be no communal discrimination,—absolutely none whatever. We will promote to these appointments, on consideration of their qualifications, with due regard to seniority and with no racial or commercial discriminations. A man must first be efficient to discharge the duties of the post which is vacant, and we will take into account his seniority. Purely to meet the point about racial discrimination in these posts I wish to read just a few figures to the House. I wish to compare the total figures relating to the number of such posts held by Europeans in 1925, with those in 1929, and the corresponding figures of Indians.

Number of posts		7,822	8,941 (an increase of 1,119).
Europeans		2,412	2,051 (a drop of 361).
Indians		5,410	6,890 (an increase of 1,480).

The House will see that the increase under "Indians" i.e., 1,480 was greater than the total increase in the number of posts which was 1,119.

I quite realise, Sir, that, in some matters, this House feels, or some Members of the House feel, that while Government and the Railways have from time to time claimed, particularly in this matter of our higher posts and posts like apprentices in our workshops, that there is, in theory, no racial discrimination, there has been racial discrimination in practice. Sir, I have, with a due sense of my responsibilities, paid every attention to the remarks that have been made in this House on that score. I take for instance, Sir, the case of the apprentices in our mechanical workshops, and say definitely that my preliminary examination of the question led me to believe that there was racial discrimination. There was communal discrimination in the way these apprentices were dealt with, both as regards their recruitment and as regards their appointment after they qualified themselves. I do not want to disguise it at all, and I wish to take this occasion to acknowledge the very helpful assistance that I obtain in my examination of this matter by the very searching questions put in this House by my Honourable friend Mr. S. C. Mitra. Now, Sir, we did not leave the question where it was. The matter has been very thoroughly examined. The whole of the facts have been sifted by the Railway Board and placed before my Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy. He has decided that new rules of recruitment shall be drawn up for all our State Railway Workshops in India. Details of the rules for recruitment and for appointment after recruitment are ready, and it is our intention to discuss them with the Central Advisory Council for Railways before we promulgate them. We want to discuss them with the Central Advisory Council because we want to get the benefit of their advice. There are some of the Members of the Council who are in close contact with these questions. We do not want to pretend that we know all about the subject and we want to get their advice and we will give very careful attention to the advice that we receive. I would like just to read one little portion of the notes that we had prepared in connection with the apprentices' scheme.

"In the rules relating to the recruitment and training of all classes of apprentices, care will be taken to ensure that there is no racial discrimination and the rules prescribed for State-managed railways will be circulated to Company-managed railways with a view that their method of recruitment and training of apprentices be investigated, with a view to placing matters on an entirely satisfactory footing and to removing any vestiges of racial discrimination that may exist either in the rules or in their practical application."

Mr. B. Das: I thank you for the change in the rules. It is the Kharagpur Workshop of the Bengal Nagpur Railway.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: If we fail, it is not that we do not want to do the right thing. That is not all. I have here a complete memorandum prepared for all our staff of the subordinate services. It is not yet ripe to put it in a final shape before Government and therefore it is not ripe to be discussed by the Central Advisory Council. I propose to discuss these rules in all their details, in all their bearings, with the Agents of the railways when they come here next month. The rules have been sent to the Agents of the railways and they will study them and bring their difficulties with them. In sending out these rules, I have searched all the records of the Assembly and put down the representations made against our existing procedure. I have also had the newspapers read for two or three years, and extracts made of articles regarding our methods of recruitment. We are going to make an honest attempt to face the complaints that have been made against us.

I will pass on to the notes that I have made while listening to some of the previous speakers, and, in the short time available to me, I shall attempt to answer some of them. I take, Sir, first the point which I considered to be really very relevant to the motion moved by my Honourable friend opposite, and that is with regard to the question of racial discrimination. The case that I want to say a few words on is the reference made by Colonel Gidney regarding the practice of railways of getting covenanted men to our workshops. I think, Sir, that Colonel Gidney did quite rightly by bringing up this question. But I do not think he was absolutely fair to us, because he omitted to refer to some portions of an important communication that we sent to him. It is an important one and I wish to read to the House the important parts:

"The Railway Board being anxious, in accordance with their policy, to confine the recruitment of subordinates from England to cases where the efficiency of work would suffer appreciably unless persons possessing the requisite qualifications were obtained for particular posts, decided that only 6 Chargemen, specialists, should be obtained from England on a five years' contract. The number has since been reduced from 6 to 4."

"This policy is followed in order to avoid recruitment from outside India, except occasionally, when specialists in highly technical grades and with experience of modern methods of properly equipped shops are required for the efficient conduct of workshop operations."

Now, Sir, Colonel Gidney while on this subject referred to the statement made to the Press by Mr. Wrynch. Is that correct?

Mr. President: Order, order.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Let us give credit where credit is due, and if our railway workshops have lately attained that position that they are equal or second to none in the world, let us give the credit to these covenanted foremen, who come out to us with up-to-date methods and up-to-date knowledge of modern shops in other countries. However, to remove one misapprehension that Colonel Gidney has in this connection, I would explain that when we bring a person out from England to a particular post, we bring him in the pay of the post; it may be that because of the age or the qualifications of the person, we sometimes give him a higher minimum initial pay than the minimum pay of the post. But this is a practice we follow when we have to recruit an expert in India who might be of Indian domicile. But I challenge my Honourable and gallant friend Colonel Gidney, Sir, and I assert that the statement that he made that we bring out these covenanted chargemen on salaries twice the salaries that we pay to people doing corresponding work in India is without foundation.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I accept the challenge and am prepared to now prove my statement. I

Mr. President: Order, order.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Sir, I would give way to the Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, but for the fact that time is very short, and I want to give some reply to the statements made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Kunzru. I only want to say one thing more about Colonel Gidney's remarks, and it is because I feel that I ought to say it in justice to our subordinate employees. Colonel Gidney said that we had removed an old back-door practice of ours by issuing instructions to our Agents that adverse remarks made about superior officers should be communicated to the officers at the time, and that we had not yet stopped our bad practice as we had not done anything of the kind for the subordinate service. Now, this question attracted the attention, some time ago, of this House. It was raised, very properly raised, by my Honourable friend, Maulvi Muhammad Yakub. Here is the reply that we gave to the Honourable the Deputy President:

"I am directed to state that the practice in force on all Railways, except the Burma and Assam Bengal Railways, is to obtain and consider the explanation of an employee before a decision is arrived at to record an adverse remark in his service record; and the employee concerned is advised of the entry recorded against him."

That, Sir, even goes beyond what we do for our officers. It says here, "We obtain and consider the explanation of an employee before we make an adverse remark against him". There are instances, in ordinary practice, where we make adverse remarks against our officers without first obtaining their explanation. We wrote to the Burma Railways and the Assam Bengal Railway, pointing out to them the practice in other railways and suggesting to them that they should follow suit.

Mr. M. S. Aney: Are you sure that it is the practice in other railways?

Mr. A. M. Hayman: If the Honourable Member will bring to our notice any instance where it is not the practice, we shall see that the orders of Government are carried out.

Sir, my Honourable friend Mr. Kunzru made several detailed remarks to prove that there was racial discrimination in practice in several matters. In a way, Sir, I have really pleaded guilty to some extent.

One of the cases Mr. Kunzru referred to was that of workshop apprentices. I know also that he feels keenly on the subject of the appointment of guards and drivers to the higher paid posts of these ranks. As time is short, I offer to show him personally at my office that I have been pursuing that question with vigour for the last ten months; I offer to show him what the several railways have done. I think the North Western Railway have during the last twelve months made a very decided move forward in this direction. The Eastern Bengal Railway, Sir, has done fairly well. (An Honourable Member: "What about the East Indian Railway?") So also the East Indian. The Great Indian Peninsula Railway, I admit, has practically done nothing at all, but I am in correspondence with the Agent on this matter, and I am going to find out what his difficulties are, and I am going to make a serious attempt to see why he cannot do what the others have done and are doing. My Honourable friend made a point—and a good point too, I think,—that Sunday allowances were allowed to one class and were not allowed to another class. I promise him that I shall get the papers and see that justice is done in this matter. I would like, Sir, to make a remark in connection with the complaint that there is racial discrimination in the matter of the allotment of residential houses to subordinate employees. I have a distinct recollection that orders have issued because, I moved a good deal to get those orders issued some time ago to our State-worked railways, that every quarter was to be allotted to a post and was not to be allotted to any individual or to any community. It was to be allotted to a post, and the holder of that post was entitled to live in that house no matter to what community he belonged. I will have the practical application of those orders looked into, and if they are not being followed, I will give my Honourable friend my assurance that it will not be long before they are given effect to on State-managed railways.

My Honourable friend also referred to the Staff Benefit Fund. Sir, my Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy, explained briefly the other day that we have come to the stage where complete rules for the Staff Benefit Fund have been drawn up; we are at the stage, Sir, where we have necessarily to consult other Departments of the Government of India who control labour forces, Department like the Industries and Labour Department, and we also have to consult other Departments who are concerned. For this reason we have decided that the Staff Benefit Fund shall come into force on the 1st April, 1931, and then, Sir, I would like to emphasize that the Fund is going to be run on lines whereby the men themselves will have a deciding voice, subject only to the veto of the Agents, 5 P.M. as to how the money in the Fund is to be spent.

(It being then Five of the Clock.)

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, 27th February, 1930.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber of the Council House at Eleven of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

MEMBERS SWORN:

Sir Cowasji Jehangir (Junior), K.C.I.E., O.B.E., M.L.A. (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban);

Rao Bahadur B. L. Patil, M.L.A. (Bombay Southern Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural); and Chaudhury Khaliquzzaman, M.L.A. (Lucknow and Fyzabad Divisions: Muhammadan Rural).

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

THE SYSTEM OF BEGAR.

398. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: (a) Is it a fact that the system of begar (forced labour) obtains in parts of British India, and has the attention of the Government been drawn to the following extract from a speech delivered by the Agent to the Governor-General in reply to an address given him by the Kotah Durbar (Rajputana) in 1923:

"Even in British India begar is not evidence of the wickedness of the system of administration. In olden days, supplies and fodder and so forth were freely given to touring officers as a sign of affection and hospitality and gratitude for protection and help in times of trouble. Abuses have no doubt crept in, and the system of administration has become less dependent on the personal factor; and the institution has had to be curtailed. But I for one should be very sorry if it were completely abolished even in British India."

(b) In what parts of British India is the system of begar prevalent, and what steps have Government taken, or propose to take to put a stop to it?

(c) Has not the League of Nations declared forced labour to be illegal, and is not India a signatory to the Resolution?

Sir Frank Noyce: (a) Forced labour, in return almost invariably for cash remuneration, is permissible in British India in certain cases, principally of grave emergencies and danger to life and property from irrigation works and embankments. The speech to which the Honourable Member refers has come to the notice of Government as a result of this question.

(b) Full information has already been furnished either to this House or to the Council of State in respect of the system of begar or forced labour so far as it prevails in various provinces in India. I would invite the Honourable Member's attention to:

- (i) the reply given in the Legislative Assembly on the 11th February, 1924, to the Honourable Mr. V. J. Patel's question No. 276;
- (ii) the reply given in the Council of State on the 12th September, 1927, to the Honourable Sir Harcon Jaffer's question No. 116, and
- (iii) the reply given to Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan's question No. 156 in the Legislative Assembly on the 1st March, 1928.

(c) I presume that the Honourable Member refers to the Slavery Convention adopted by the League of Nations in 1926. Under Article 5 of this Convention, the High Contracting Parties undertake, each in respect of its territories, to prevent compulsory or forced labour from developing into conditions analogous to slavery. The Convention does not prohibit compulsory or forced labour levied for public purposes. It was signed on behalf of India with certain reservations.

Mr. Lalchand Navalrai: Will the Honourable Member be pleased to say whether the begar system, in whatever form it prevails at present, exists on account of the hospitality, gratitude or affection of the people, or is it enforced by Government officials under compulsion?

Sir Frank Noyce: I should like to have notice of that question, Sir.

Mr. B. Das: Is it not a fact, Sir, that the representative of the Government of India on the Forced Labour Committee at Geneva stated that the Government of India do not support forced labour in any way?

Sir Frank Noyce: I have no information, but I am content to accept the Honourable Member's statement.

Mr. Lalchand Navalrai: Will the Honourable Member please state whether the Government of India are also of the same opinion as that of the Agent to the Governor General in Kotah that he would be sorry if the begar system were ever abolished completely?

Sir Frank Noyce: No, Sir.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: What steps have Government taken with regard to the discontinuance of this system as indicated in the answer given to my starred question No. 393, dated the 11th September, 1929?

Sir Frank Noyce: I am sorry, Sir, I have not the Honourable Member's starred question in mind.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: Then how can you expect me to bear in mind the answers to which you have referred in your reply?

Mr. M. S. Aney: Does the Honourable Member understand the difficulties of Honourable Members on this side when he merely makes reference to replies to starred questions of such and such a date in such and such a year?

Mr. B. Das: May I ask another supplementary question, Sir?

Mr. M. S. Aney: Is there no reply to my question, Sir?

Sir Frank Noyce: I beg your pardon?

Mr. M. S. Aney: Have the Government realised the difficulty of Members on this side understanding the replies given by Government to questions put from this side whenever Government Members make references to their replies to certain starred questions given on such and such a date and published in such and such a Volume?

Mr. B. Das: May I ask one other question, Sir?

Mr. M. S. Aney: Do they realise or do they not realise our difficulties, that is what I want to know?

Mr. President: Mr. B. Das. Next question.

REPORT OF THE TARIFF BOARD ON SALT MANUFACTURE.

399. Mr. B. Das: Will Government be pleased to state if the Report of the Tariff Board on salt manufacture in India will be available to this House before it discusses the budget demand in respect of "salt" or before the House discusses the Finance Bill?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: The Tariff Board have not yet submitted their Report.

PROMOTIONS IN THE RAILWAY CLEARING ACCOUNTS OFFICE.

400. Mr. Muhammad Rafique: (a) Is it a fact that Mr. Mitra has given, in his Report on the seniority of Railway Clearing Accounts Office staff, a list of seventeen men who have been given too rapid promotions?

(b) Is it also a fact that some other cases, in which the promotions were more rapid than those mentioned in the list, have been overlooked? If so, why?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) Yes, but Mr. Mitra enumerated in the same Report the reasons which led to the too rapid promotions and accepted them as sufficient for not reversing the promotions.

(b) No.

SALARIES IN THE RAILWAY CLEARING ACCOUNTS OFFICE.

401. Mr. Muhammad Rafique: (a) With reference to the reply given to question No. 915 on the 25th September, 1928, will the Government be pleased to state on what date the competitive examination for recruitment of the clerical staff was held by the Controller of Railway Accounts before 1929?

(b) Under what rules were the men appointed from 1925 to 1928 given high salaries in the Railway Clearing Accounts Office?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) No competitive examination for recruitment of the clerical staff was held before 1929.

Is it a fact that the former is an unqualified man?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: It is not a fact that Mr. Mangal Das (who has also passed the Training Class examination) has been promoted as officiating Senior Accountant?

RECRUITMENT OF THE STAFF OF THE RAILWAY CLEARING ACCOUNTS OFFICE:

403. Mr. Muhammad Rafique: (a) Is it a fact that the recruitment and selection for the Railway Clearing House experiment was done by Mr. W. H. Scott and Rai Bahadur Faqir Chand, as stated by Mr. Mitra in his seniority Report, and the only qualification required for recruitment was the confidence of these officers?

(b) Is it not against the statement made by the Financial Commissioner, Railways, on the floor of this House that the recruitment is made by the Director and that the Rai Bahadur has no hand in it?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) Prior to the introduction of the new rules of recruitment, the responsibility for the selection and recruitment of staff for the Railway Clearing Accounts Office rested entirely with the Director. It was open to him, as to other heads of offices, to avail himself of the help of his assistants, if he desired to do so.

(b) No.

APPOINTMENT OF ACCOUNTANTS IN THE RAILWAY CLEARING ACCOUNTS OFFICE.

404. Mr. Muhammad Rafique: (a) Is it a fact that nine unqualified accountants were taken in the Railway Clearing Accounts Office?

(b) How many of them were Muslims?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) Five of the nine accountants referred to by the Honourable Member came in as such with the staff transferred to the Clearing Accounts Office from other Railways, the other four were promoted from the office under the rules then in force, in the absence of passed men in the office.

(b) Two were Muslims and one was a Sikh.

Was it indicated to them that Government desired to have their opinions on the subject matter of that Report?

Mr. Sarabhai Nemchand Haji: When Government consider the representation of India at this Conference, will they consider the desirability of getting genuine Indian national representation at this Conference?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: They will certainly consider the question of giving representation to Indian steamship companies.

Mr. Sarabhai Nemchand Haji: Will Government further see to it that under the term "Indian Nationals" they will not include European interests, as has been the practice of late?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: The matters, Sir, which will be dealt with at this Conference, are very technical, and one of the points which the Government of India will have to take into consideration is that their delegation should be adequately organised in that respect.

TENDERS FOR THE SUPPLY OF STONE BALLAST FOR THE NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

416. *Lala Rang Behari Lal: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if it is a fact that, in September 1928, the Divisional Superintendent, North Western Railway, Delhi, had called for tenders for the supply of 22 lakhs of stone ballast from the Mochibagh and Delhi Kishanganj quarries, of which one was given to the lowest tenderer, whereas the other was not given to the lowest tenderer, although it was of the firm which had been supplying ballast to the North Western Railway for the last 15 years?

(b) If the reply to part (a) be in the affirmative, are Government aware that the tender of another firm was recommended and accepted by the Agent, although it was 0-12-0 per one hundred cubic feet higher and, if so, will Government state the reason?

(c) Will Government be pleased to state if it is a fact that the tender which was not accepted was of a firm who were the recipients of a bonus of 2½ per cent. for supplying in a remarkably short time?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: With your permission, Sir, I should like to answer this and questions Nos. 417 and 418, together.

I am calling for an urgent report from the North Western Railway Administration and will communicate with the Honourable Member as soon as it has been received.

CONDITIONS OF TENDER FOR STONE BALLAST FOR THE NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

†417. Lala Rang Behari Lal: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if the two principal conditions of the tender and contract referred to in the preceding question were that:

- (1) Measurements of 13" in depth would be considered as 12", and
- (2) Time was of the essence of the contract?

(b) If the reply to part (a) be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state why it was subsequently altered to 12" in depth instead of 13" to a foot? Did this cause a loss of 8½ per cent. to the Railway?

(c) Will Government be pleased to state if the contractor completed the said contract within the specified time or the time was extended?

(d) If the time was extended, what was the period of extension, and did the contractor complete the work in the extended period?

(e) If the reply to part (d) be in the negative, will Government be pleased to state if the said contractor's security was forfeited under rule 13, Part II, of the North Western Railway Handbook for works?

ORDERS FOR THE SUPPLY OF STONE BALLAST FOR THE NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

†418. Lala Rang Behari Lal: (a) Are Government further aware of the fact that a circular was issued by the Agent, North Western Railway to subordinates not to give any further ballast supply contracts without tenders?

(b) If the answer to (a) be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state if they are aware that a further order was also given to the previous contractor to supply about 5 lakhs ballast, which cost about Rs. 40,000, without any tenders, although rule 1, Part I of the North Western Railway Works Handbook distinctly states that all works amounting to Rs. 25,000 or above will be let out by tenders?

†For answer to this question, see answer to question No. 416.

(c) If the reply to part (b) be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to inquire why the conditions as laid down in the Handbook and also the circular letter of the Agent, were ignored and what action do Government propose to take in the matter?

NAUTICAL TRAINING IN ENGLAND AND IN INDIA.

419. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Are Government aware that there are six schools of nautical training in England and that the number of pupils by ages are as follows?

(i) Under 13 years of age	..	..	..	22
(ii) 13 and under 14 years of age	..	..	..	255
(iii) 14 and under 15 years of age	..	..	..	777
(iv) 15 and under 16 years of age	..	..	..	421
(v) 16 years of age and over	..	..	..	109
Total				1,584

(b) If the answer to part (a) is in the affirmative, what arrangements are made in India, in view of the Government proposals for expansion of the Royal Indian Marine and for establishing a Royal Indian Navy, for similar training of Indian boys? How many Indian boys, if any, are under similar training at present in India?

(c) Besides the ordinary book education, what other technical subjects are taught which form the speciality of the nautical training schools in England?

(d) Besides the ordinary book education, what other technical subjects are taught to Indian boys under training on the "Dufferin" ship to give a speciality of its own to it?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) There are considerably more than six training institutions in the United Kingdom, the primary object of which is to train boys for the Royal Navy and the Mercantile Marine. Government have no precise information of the number of boys at present under training in those institutions or their ages.

(b) The training of boys in the Royal Indian Marine is carried out in the depot ship "Dalhousie" which is stationed at Bombay. There are at present 103 boys under training.

(c) The boys are given instruction in practical seamanship—including boat work, knots and splices, lead and log line, flags and signals, steering, anchors, cables, rockets, boat hoisting and lowering, barometer, thermometer, and aneroid, etc.

(d) Meteorology, Navigation, Nautical Astronomy, Seamanship and Magnetism.

ARTILLERY CAMPS FOR INSTRUCTION OF TERRITORIAL UNITS AND UNIVERSITY TRAINING CORPS.

420. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a report appearing in the Pioneer of Saturday, the 1st February, 1930, page 14, of the Auxiliary Force camp of exercise and of its interesting and varied programme?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to state how far are the Bhaghara Chatham Lines, where the Allahabad Auxiliary Force held from the 18th January, to the 26th January, their annual camp of exercise, from Mat-deori, where the artillery annual practice camp was held on the 24th January, 1930, of the 19th Field Battery R. A., A. F. I., commanded by Captain W. S. R. Jervis?

(c) Was the Auxiliary Force camp associated, in any way with the artillery camp, so that the Allahabad Auxiliary Force might have an occasion to witness and learn artillery shooting?

(d) If so, do Government propose to arrange similar artillery camps for the benefit of the Territorial units and the University Training Corps?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Yes.

(b) About two miles.

(c) No, Sir. The force was camped together in the Chatham lines, but the other units did not witness the artillery practice, nor could they have learnt artillery shooting by doing so.

(d) Does not arise.

MUSKETRY SCHOOLS FOR THE UNIVERSITY TRAINING CORPS AND TERRITORIAL UNITS.

421. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Will Government please state if the small arms and musketry schools are open to men and officers of the University Training Corps and the several Territorial units?

(b) If so, will Government please state how many men and officers of these corps and units have so far received training in these schools?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) and (b). Officers and men of the Indian Territorial Force are not debarred from training at the schools mentioned, but none have as yet undergone such training.

The courses last 11 weeks for non-commissioned officers and 6 weeks for officers. Applicants are required to pass a preliminary examination.

I am informed that there have been no applications during the last year from officers or non-commissioned officers of the Indian Territorial Force to attend these courses. Few officers, and still fewer non-commissioned officers, could afford the time, even if they have the inclination, to leave their ordinary avocations for these periods, in addition to their annual compulsory training. Those who can afford the time would increase their military efficiency very much more by attachment to a regular unit than by going in for specialist courses. Officers of the permanent staff of the University Training Corps and Indian Territorial Force Units are, however, trained at the schools with the object of passing, on the instruction that they receive to the personnel of their units.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Supposing that officers of the University Training Corps apply for permission for training, will Government arrange for the training?

Mr. G. M. Young: That would depend upon whether there was a vacancy available at the school at the time.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Supposing there is a vacancy available, will the Government make arrangements.

Mr. President: That is a hypothetical question.

TRAINING OF INDIANS IN AVIATION.

422. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Is it a fact that in England boys are recruited as officers in the Royal Air Force for what is called short service and are then trained at one of the Air Force flying schools?

(b) If so, is it a fact that most of these officers, after completing their short service, generally go in for civil aviation?

(c) If so, do Government propose to make similar arrangements for Indian boys?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Yes.

(b) No, Sir. Only a very minute proportion of short service Royal Air Force officers obtain employment in civil aviation after the termination of their active service. The large majority of them go into other professions.

(c) No, Sir. The object of the short service commission is to provide a reserve of pilots for war. All short service commissioned officers in the Royal Air Force serve for five years in the Royal Air Force Reserve after completing their active service. It is clearly necessary to establish a regular Indian unit before starting to create a reserve.

RECRUITMENT OF INDIANS TO THE ARMY EDUCATIONAL CORPS.

423. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of the rules and regulations concerning recruitment to the Army Educational Corps?

(b) Do Government propose to institute recruitment to the corps preferably from Indian University men?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) A copy of War Office Army Order No. 231, dated June 15th, 1920, containing the rules for appointment to the Army Educational Corps, has been placed in the Library.

(b) No, Sir. The Corps is part of the British Army, liable to serve in Great Britain and any other part of the world in which there are British troops, to whose educational needs it is intended to minister.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Have Government got any scheme for starting an Educational Corps for the Indian Army?

Mr. G. M. Young: I should hardly like to answer that question without notice. There is no separate Indian Educational Corps: but the arrangements made for education in the Indian Army include the Army School of Education at Belgaum, where the teachers are trained.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AN INDIAN AIR SQUADRON.

424. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Do Government propose to establish an Indian air squadron in India at an early date?

(b) If so, when and how do Government propose to recruit officers and the rank and file for the squadron?

(c) How do Government propose to train the rank and file of the squadron?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Yes.

(b) The officers will be required to pass the qualifying examination for the Royal Air Force Cadet College at Cranwell and to go there for the normal course of training which takes two years. As the Honourable Member is aware, six Indian candidates have recently passed the examination. The rank and file will be recruited in India from suitable applicants of the artisan class as soon as the first batch of cadets go to Cranwell.

(c) The recruits for the rank and file will be sent to the Royal Air Force Aircraft Depot at Karachi, where they will receive specialist training in the maintenance of aircraft, engines, etc., under British instructors. Government hope, that after two years of such training, by which time the cadets will have completed their course at Cranwell, the rank and file will be sufficiently qualified to be posted to the first Flight of the Indian Squadron.

TRAINING OF INDIAN BOYS FOR THE AIR FORCE.

425. *Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Is it a fact:

- (i) That in England one thousand boy apprentices or even more are required every year by the Royal Air Force;
- (ii) That they are drawn mainly from secondary schools and other day and night schools;
- (iii) That they are then trained for three years or more in the training schools of the Air Force as mechanics, pilots, aircraftmen, etc.;
- (iv) That out of these trained boys, some are selected as non-commissioned officers, some are sent up to Cranwell for training as commissioned officers and the remainder are employed as rank and file in the Air Force; and
- (v) That these boy mechanics and apprentices receive training for three or more years, along with general education, as Carpenter (Regger), Fitter (Aero Engine), in Electrical trades (Electricians and wireless operators) and a number of other important trades such as pattern making, coppersmiths' work, instrument making, turning, etc., at practically no cost to them?

(b) How do Government propose to give such preliminary training as airmen to Indian boys for preparing India to undertake the full responsibility for further development of aviation in India?

(c) Do Government propose to send a number of well selected boy mechanics and apprentices for training in England as British boys are trained, or to provide facilities for such training in India?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) (i). Government have no exact information of the number of boys required annually for training as Royal Air Force apprentices, but the Honourable Member's figures are probably approximately correct.

(ii) I am told that the boys are drawn from all classes of schools, including public schools, but that most of them come from grammar schools, secondary and board schools.

(iii) Boy apprentices are not trained as pilots. They are trained for three years, either for general trades at Halton or for electrical or wireless trades at Cranwell.

(iv) Yes, but the numbers selected for the grant of cadetships at Cranwell does not exceed 12 a year.

(v) The Honourable Member's statement is generally correct, but the boys so trained enter into contracts to serve in the Royal Air Force in any part of the world for 12 years unless they purchase their discharge from the service within three months from entering it. To do so costs £20.

(b) Assuming that this part of the question refers only to the training of Indians for the Indian Air Squadron, the answer is that the necessary preliminary training will be provided in the Royal Air Force Aircraft Depot at Karachi.

(c) Indian boys can be fully trained as mechanics and apprentices in India. There is no necessity therefore to send them to England.

RECRUITMENT TO THE ARMY EDUCATIONAL CORPS AND SIMILAR SERVICES.

426. *Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table copies of rules and regulations concerning recruitment of officers for the Corps of Military Accountants, the Army Pay Corps, the Army Educational Corps, the Army Medical Corps and the Army Veterinary Corps?

(b) Is it a fact that in England recruitment is also partly made directly from members of civil professions of these categories?

(c) Are Government aware that in England men holding University degrees are much preferred for recruitment as officers in the Army Educational Corps?

(d) If so, do Government propose to institute a similar practice in India?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) and (b). The Government of India have no information regarding the first two Corps, which are not employed in India. Copies of the rules for the Army Educational Corps and the Royal Army Medical Corps have been placed in the Library. No copy of the rules for admission to the Royal Army Veterinary Corps is available. Most of the officers of the Army Educational Corps are taken from the regular Army, but Government understand that a few have been recruited from civil sources in the United Kingdom.

The answer to part (b), in respect of both the Royal Army Medical Corps and the Royal Army Veterinary Corps is in the affirmative. All the candidates are civilians.

(c) Government understand that the possession of a University Honours degree is considered a desirable qualification.

(d) There is no separate Educational Corps in the Indian Army, but educational training in the Indian Army is carried out by Indian military officers and non-commissioned officers, who are seconded from their units and specially trained at the Army School of Education in Belgaum. Government consider that the present system provides the best method of meeting the educational needs of the Indian Army.

RECRUITMENT OF OFFICERS FOR THE ARMY BY NOMINATION FROM UNIVERSITIES.

427. *Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Is it a fact that in England recruitment of officers for the Army is also made, in addition to admissions through Woolwich and Sandhurst, by nominations from Universities and by transfer on passing the required examination from the Reserve and the Territorial Forces?

(b) Are Government aware that in England recruitment by nominations from Universities is much preferred for the reasons:

- (i) That it avoids early specialisation through Woolwich and Sandhurst, thus ensuring a more liberal education;
- (ii) That in many ways it admirably equips a man for administrative positions later in his career; and
- (iii) That those who have exceeded the age limit for admission to Woolwich and Sandhurst and yet desire to seek a military career, can be given a chance?

(c) If so, do Government propose to establish a similar practice in India?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Yes, Sir.

(b) The Honourable Member has stated some of the advantages of the system of University Commissions, but its great value lies in the admixture of a comparatively small element of University men with the principal source of supply, which must continue to be found in the cadet colleges. It is not a fact that recruitment from the Universities is much preferred in the United Kingdom or that the bulk of Army officers could ever be obtained from that source.

(c) Not at present. I would draw the attention of the Honourable Member to the recommendations made in paragraphs 29 and 30 of the Indian Sandhurst Committee's Report.

CADET SCHOLARSHIPS.

428. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Are Government aware that in England cadet scholarships are awarded to successful cadets, after each competitive examination, in the order of merit?

(b) If so, are Government prepared to establish similar scholarships for those Indian cadets also who are not sons of soldiers in the Indian Army?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) The answer is in the negative. Cadet scholarships are awarded after the first year of instruction, and not after the competitive examination. They are restricted to the sons of military officers or of those who served in the army during the war.

(b) Does not arise.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Have the Government any scheme for the establishment of scholarships for the sons of those who are not military men?

Mr. G. M. Young: Here, again, I hardly like to give an answer without notice, but I think there are some scholarships already which are not restricted to boys who are the sons of soldiers.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: What is their number?

Mr. G. M. Young: That, Sir, I certainly cannot answer without notice.

GRANT TO INDIANS OF SHORT SERVICE COMMISSIONS IN THE ROYAL AIR FORCE.

429. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Is it a fact that in England suitably qualified civilian candidates, who do not wish to make the Air Force their permanent profession, are accepted without examination, other than a medical one, for short service commissions for a period of four or five years and are then trained in Royal Air Force Flying training schools, and receive instruction in aviation and aeronautical military and technical subjects, so that, after acquiring a knowledge of flying, aero engines, mechanical engineering and allied matter, they may, after completing their four or five years' service as commissioned officers in the Royal Air Force, be fit for employment in the commercial aviation industry?

(b) If so, do Government propose to take Indians similarly for short service commissions?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) and (b). The Honourable Member is referred to the answer to question No. 422. Although there is no specific entrance examination for short service commissioned officers, the Examining Board in England require to be satisfied that the candidates have received either a public school education or an education of an equivalent standard.

FORMATION OF AN INDIAN AIR FORCE.

430. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the reply given by the Right Honourable Mr. Wedgwood Benn, Secretary of State for India, regarding the formation of an Indian Air Force?

(b) If so, do Government propose to introduce in India the practice in vogue in England of enlisting boy mechanics between the ages of 15 and 16½ years as rank and file and also as non-commissioned officers in the proposed Indian Air Force? Do Government propose to establish an Indian Air Force Medical Service? If so, when and how do Government propose to recruit officers for such a service?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) Yes.

(b) The Honourable Member appears to be under some misapprehension. The Indians required as mechanics for the Indian Air Force will be trained in India in the manner described in the answer to his question No. 424. In England no facilities are provided at the public expense for the training of pilots or mechanics for civil aviation and it is not for the Royal Air Force in this country to provide training for that purpose. Government do not propose at this stage to form a separate Indian Air Force Medical Service.

Mr. K. C. Roy: May I inquire whether it is the intention of the Government of India to form an Indian Air Force?

Mr. G. M. Young: Quite clearly so.

Mr. K. C. Roy: What will be the estimated cost?

Mr. G. M. Young: That will depend on the size to which the Force, ultimately expands.

CONTROL OF TRAVELLING TICKET INSPECTORS.

431. Mr. B. Das: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the existing practice of control and direction of the Travelling Ticket Inspectors in the different State Railways?

(b) Is it a fact that the Travelling Ticket Inspectors, including the crew system, do usually work under the Accounts and Audit Department of most of the Railways?

(c) Will Government be pleased to state the reasons that led the North Western Railway to place in certain divisions its staff of Travelling Ticket Inspectors under the Traffic Department?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) Travelling Ticket Inspectors on State-managed railways are under the control and direction of the Traffic Department except on the East Indian Railway where they are under the control of the Accounts Department of that Railway.

(b) No.

(c) Prior to September, 1927, the Travelling Ticket Inspectors on the North Western Railway were under the Audit Department. In September, 1927, it was decided to place these on four out of the seven Divisions of that Railway under the Traffic Department as an experimental measure. In January, 1928, it was decided to place all Travelling Ticket Inspectors on the North Western Railway under the Traffic Department.

IRREGULARITIES OF TRAVELLING TICKET INSPECTORS.

432. Mr. B. Das: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the articles in the Hindu Herald of Lahore of the 13th September, 1929, the 8th January, 1930 and the 20th January, 1930, regarding the irregularities of Travelling Ticket Inspectors and Head Travelling Ticket Inspectors of the North Western Railway, specially of the Delhi Division?

(b) Are Government aware that, while Head Travelling Ticket Inspectors in certain divisions travel in uniform while working, a few do not do so?

(c) Is it a fact that the Head Travelling Ticket Inspector of Delhi Division was drawing a daily allowance of Rs. 8 per diem or more while officers of superior services only draw Rs. 5 to Rs. 6 as daily allowances?

(d) Is it a fact that there were allegations against the Head Travelling Ticket Inspector of Delhi Division for charging false mileage and drawing travelling allowances against rules? Has any departmental inquiry been made? If so, with what result?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) Yes

(b) Yes.

(c) I am informed that the Head Travelling Ticket Inspector of the Delhi Division has drawn travelling allowance averaging somewhere in the neighbourhood of Rs. 8 a day.

(d) I understand that the reply to the first portion of this question is in the affirmative, and that, as regards the second and third portions of this question, an inquiry has been instituted by the North Western Railway and is not yet completed.

ALLOWANCES OF TRAVELLING TICKET INSPECTORS.

433. Mr. B. Das: (a) What is the usual rate of allowances that is allowed to Travelling Ticket Inspectors, including the crews, on (i) the East Indian Railway, (ii) the North Western Railway, and (iii) the Great Indian Peninsula Railway?

(b) Are Head Travelling Ticket Inspectors in other Divisions of the North Western Railway and in the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsula Railway allowed such heavy allowances?

(c) Is it a fact that at times the allowances drawn in a month exceed the salary of the month in many cases?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I am obtaining information from the Railways concerned and will communicate with the Honourable Member when it has been received.

IRREGULARITIES OF THE POSTMASTER, AMRITSAR.

434. Mr. B. Das: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the judgment of the Additional District Magistrate of Amritsar, as published in the Hindu Herald of Lahore of Saturday, the 8th February, 1930, in which severe strictures have been passed against the Postmaster of Amritsar?

(b) Have Government made any inquiry into the following questions as referred to in that judgment? If so, what are the decisions taken on them?

"In the end I have to say two things. (i) The Investigating Officer of the Post Office, B. Vishwa Nath, who throughout attended the trial, tutored witnesses not only outside the court room, vide P. W. 9 Faqir Chand, but persisted in suggesting answers to witnesses in the witness box on crucial moments with the result that I had perforce to ask him to leave the court room, on one hearing.

(ii) The Postmaster tried to put obstacles in the way of an expeditious trial. He made arrangements for Post Office clerks to attend court on the 14th November, 1929, and cancelled them without cause to delay matters. Further he suspended a postman D. W. 31, when he learnt he was going to give evidence in defence."

* * * * *

"Lastly the Postal Inspector and the Postmaster between themselves have suppressed some telegrams and the further statement of a clerk made before the Town Inspectors. Finally, the seals bearing date 13th August, on the Protecting Cover Ex. P. D. which was protected on 12th, must have been with the connivance of the Postmaster and the Inspector. It is a very serious thing, almost a forgery."

(c) With reference to the following observations of the Court, will Government be pleased to state what steps have been taken to standardise the punishment for each of the parties referred to therein?

"Accused has led evidence in order to lay bare the irregularities committed by the Postmaster. I need not dilate upon them but it is true that the Postmaster has been lacking in fairness and justice. For example, on the one hand, Mohammed Latif, postman, is caught red-handed in attempting to misappropriate Rs. 200 and is fined Re. 1 only, on the other Gurdial, postman, is reduced in pay for delivering Dak at the door of the slaughter house without going inside. On the one hand he dismisses half a dozen candidates appointed by his predecessor; on the other hand he brings his own people from Lahore and appoints them straightaway without any period of probation, e.g., Nurdin, Nathu and Nasir Mohammed. Rather, he goes much further and allows Nasir Mohammed, a relation of his, to draw pay from the 1st October, 1929, to the 17th October, 1929, for a period for which he never worked. Again on the one hand, he took no action against D. W. 34 Mohammed Latif, postman, for misappropriating Rs. 3 from a money order; on the other he reduced Jai Kishen Das for not wearing a uniform which was dirty and too small for him. Similarly he takes no action against Khuda Bakhsh who paid annas seven less in a money order delivery.

* All these points have been proved by direct evidence of documents and files which are placed on the record."

(d) Will Government be pleased to state if any superior officer any time made any inquiry into the discriminating punishments awarded by the Postmaster, as mentioned in part (c), and how it is that such irregularities escaped the attention of the higher officers?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) Yes.

(b), (c) and (d). The Postmaster General, Punjab and North-West Frontier Circle, is inquiring into the matter personally. Suitable action will be taken after the inquiry is completed.

INCOME AND EXPENDITURE OF MILITARY SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

435. Dr. B. S. Moonje: Will Government be pleased to supply information in connection with the military schools at Jhelum and Jullundur and the Prince of Wales Royal Military College, Dehra Dun, on the following points:

- (a) The yearly budgets of income and expenditure;
- (b) The sources and amounts of yearly income;
- (c) The numbers on the staffs for education, training, supervision and medical relief;
- (d) The pay and allowances of each on the staffs;
- (e) The yearly expenditure on dairy and its staff, with amounts of milk and butter supply;

(f) The expenditure on the establishment of bakery, aerated water and cooking, and the amount of income, if any, derived from them; and

(g) The lengths of rifle ranges, if any, and yearly amounts of ammunition for miniature and other ranges for rifle practice?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) The figures for 1929-30 are:

Budget.—Dehra Dun Rs. 2,47,490; Jhelum Rs. 80,000; Jullundur Rs. 83,320.

Receipts from fees.—Dehra Dun Rs. 1,41,750; Jhelum Rs. 11,830; Jullundur Rs. 13,350.

(b) The Army estimates bear the cost, and the receipts from fees are credited to them.

(c) and (d). A statement is laid on the table.

(e) Nil. The Dehra Dun College used to run a dairy, but no longer does so.

(f) There are no separate bakery or cooking establishments. The schools at Jhelum and Jullundur have no mineral water factories. The annual expenditure on the soda-water factory at the Dehra Dun College is Rs. 600, and the income is about Rs. 400.

(g) Miniature ranges only, 25 yards in length, 50 rounds a year for each of the senior boys. The juniors are not allowed to fire.

SUPPLY OF HOT WATER AT THE WESTERN HOSTEL.

436. *Sir Darcy Lindsay: (a) Are Government aware that there is considerable inconvenience experienced by residents at the Western Hostel, New Delhi, by the defective and almost primitive arrangements in the supply of hot water for the daily bath?

(b) If the reply is in the affirmative, do Government propose to examine the position and carry out at an early date the original intention of installing a direct hot water service to the bath from a central boiler?

(c) Are Government also prepared to consider the urgency of supplying the bath-rooms with wash basins fitted with hot and cold water connections as is the practice appertaining to first class hotels?

(d) What is the daily charge made to residents for the supply of hot water and the amount of recovery for a full month with all quarters occupied?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) The reply is in the negative. I understand that no representation on this account has been received from any resident of the Western Hostel during the nine years during which it has been occupied.

(b) Does not arise. I understand, however, that there was no original intention of installing a direct hot water service to the bath from a central boiler.

(c) Government do not propose to take any action in the matter until they are satisfied that the inconvenience referred to is generally felt and that the residents are prepared to meet the additional charge which the provision of improved facilities must lead to. I understand that the cost of providing improved facilities will amount to about Rs. 50,000. I should like to add that I understand that the charges now recovered from residents at the Western Hostel are appreciably lower than those levied at first class local hotels from casual residents.

(d) The daily charge is 3 as., and the amount of recovery for a full month with all the quarters occupied would be about Rs. 400 for all the quarters.

Sir Darcy Lindsay: Can the Honourable Member refer me to any first class hotel where there is an extra charge for hot water service?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: In my reply I have not referred to the question of the extra charge for the hot water service. I have referred to the aggregate charge.

Mr. M. A. Jinnah: What was the original intention of the Government to deal with this grave problem?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: There is no question of original intention. All that the Government did intend already exists in the building as it now stands. That was the original intention.

Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: But why were hot water taps put in those tubs?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: So far as I know, hot water taps were not put in in those tubs. The arrangement is that the hot water has to be taken at certain points and then carried by the bearer into the baths. It may interest my Honourable friends to know that, in my bungalow the arrangement for hot water is probably more primitive than that at the Western Hostel.

Mr. M. A. Jinnah: Is the Honourable Member aware that, in the bath tubs, there is actually a hole for the hot water tap? Was that the original intention of the Government or not?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: My information is that that was not the original intention of the Government.

Mr. M. A. Jinnah: Then why was the hole made? (Laughter.)

CONTRACTION AND EXPANSION OF CURRENCY.

438. Mr. Mukhtar Singh: (a) Will Government be pleased to state:

- (i) The normal amount of currency before the war;
- (ii) The normal amount of currency in 1930; and
- (iii) The amount of currency contracted and expanded during the period 1920 to 1930, giving the dates and the amounts when the contraction and expansion has taken place?

(b) Will Government be pleased to state if there are any rules or instructions to expand or contract the amount of currency during the different seasons of the year? If the answer be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to place a copy of those rules or instructions in the Library of the House?

(c) Will Government be pleased to state if the contraction or expansion of currency has anything to do with seasonal changes in the country or to the export of different raw materials from the country?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: (a) (i) and (ii). The balance of currency notes in circulation at the beginning of 1914 was 64,57 lakhs and at the beginning of 1920 1,82,91 lakhs. The amount of rupees in circulation is not known. Statement of the last Annual Report of the Controller of the Currency gives the total of rupees coined, but it is impossible to say how many of these are in actual circulation.

(iii) A statement is laid on the table showing the expansions and contractions of the note issue from the 1st January, 1920, to the 31st December, 1929, effected in other ways than the exchange of coin and notes. The net result of these operations was that the amount of notes in circulation on the 31st December, 1929, was 3½ crores less than on 1st January, 1920.

(b) There are no such rules or instructions.

(c) It will be seen from the statement mentioned in the answer to (a) (iii) that in most years there have been contractions during hot weather months and expansions during the cold weather to correspond with the seasonal variations in the demand for currency. The export of raw materials depends primarily on international demand. Obviously when large quantities of crops are being moved, and when prices of such crops are high, more currency will be required than in the slack seasons, or when prices are low. The currency policy of the Government must adapt itself to the needs of the situation, and the provisions for the issue of emergency currency are designed to give elasticity for this purpose.

†This question was withdrawn by the Questioner.

DIVISIONAL SCHEME FOR RAILWAYS.

439. Mr. Mukhtar Singh: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if any scheme known as the divisionalisation scheme was prepared in 1924? If so, will Government be pleased to lay a copy of that scheme on the table?

(b) Is it a fact that under the above-mentioned scheme the East Indian Railway section from Ghaziabad to Kalka was to be made over to the North Western Railway and the section from Ghaziabad to Ambala via Saharanpur was to be made over to the East Indian Railway?

(c) Is it a fact that under that scheme the East Indian Railway section from Ghaziabad to Kalka has been made over to the North Western Railway?

(d) Is it a fact that the Ghaziabad-Ambala section via Saharanpur could not be made over to the East Indian Railway on account of the construction of a yard by the North Western Railway?

(e) Is it a fact that the yard referred to in part (d) was completed in 1929, but that still the transfer of the Ambala-Ghaziabad section to the East Indian Railway has not been made?

(f) Will Government be pleased to state when is it likely that the transfer of the above section will be made?

(g) Is it a fact that on account of the above transfer being delayed the East Indian Railway clerks have to be transferred to distant places and have to suffer a great deal of inconvenience?

(h) Is it a fact that the principle underlying the above scheme was to provide Punjab employees with places in the Punjab, and similarly to provide United Provinces employees with places in the United Provinces?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) The reply to the first part is in the affirmative. I am sending the Honourable Member a copy of the Report regarding the scheme in question.

(b) The reply to the first part is "yes" and to the latter part "no".

(c) Yes.

(d) to (g). Do not arise.

(h) No.

SHOOTING OF TWO VILLAGERS AT MOTHKI MASJID.

440. Munshi Iswar Saran: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if it is a fact that two villagers were shot at village Mothki Masjid?

(b) Is there any truth in the allegation that they were shot by two soldiers of the Gordon Highlanders?

(c) Has a prosecution been started? If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: (a), (b) and (c). The incident referred to took place on the 30th January last. Three villagers are reported to have been injured with pellets from a shot gun. Their injuries, which were attended to in hospital, were slight. Two soldiers of the Gordon Highlanders are alleged to be implicated in the affair, which is at present under investigation by the police, with a view to the institution of criminal proceedings.

COAL TRAFFIC.

441. Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi: Will Government be pleased to place on the table a statement showing the coal traffic for six months prior to the reduction of coal freight and for six months after the reduction in coal freight?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: The statement required is placed on the table.

SPEECHES OF SECRETARIES TO GOVERNMENT MADE IN THE LEGISLATURE.

442. *Mr. E. F. Sykes: Are the speeches of Secretaries to Government delivered in either House of the Indian Legislature to be taken as conveying the views of Government?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: Secretaries who are Members of the Legislature are certainly competent to state the position of Government, and it may therefore be presumed that their speeches convey the views of Government unless from the context it appears that they are expressing a personal opinion.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

INSTITUTION OF AN IMMIGRATION SECRETARIAT.

182. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: Has the attention of Government been drawn to the leading article in the Tanganyika Opinion, dated the 20th September, 1929 (page 8), under the heading "Government of India, and the Colonies"; and have Government decided to institute a special immigration or colonial secretariat? If not, why not?

Sir Frank Noyce: The attention of Government has been drawn to the article referred to by the Honourable Member. A Joint Secretary was sanctioned for the Department of Education, Health and Lands, with effect from the 16th December, 1927, to pay special attention to overseas work, and recently the Government of India have decided to appoint, from 1st April, 1930, a Deputy Secretary to understudy and assist him. Government consider that these arrangements should be tried for some time. If they prove inadequate, the question of establishing a separate Secretariat for overseas work can be considered.

MEMORANDUM PRESENTED BY THE EAST AFRICAN DEPUTATION.

183. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: (a) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of the memorandum presented to them by the East African Deputation that visited India, under the leadership of Mr. Pandya?

(b) Will Government be pleased to make a statement on the efforts made by them to represent the case of the East African Indians before the Imperial Government, especially after the submission of the memorandum referred to in part (a)?

Sir Frank Noyce: (a) A copy of the memorandum referred to by the Honourable Member has been placed in the Library of the House.

(b) I would invite the Honourable Member's attention to the relevant passage in the address delivered by His Excellency the Viceroy in this House on the 25th January, 1930.

SYSTEM OF TAKING THUMB IMPRESSIONS OF INDIAN IMMIGRANTS TO THE BELGIAN CONGO.

184. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the leading article in the Tanganyika Opinion, dated the 15th November, 1929 (page 10), under the heading "In Congo-Belge"?

(b) Are Government aware that the system of taking thumb impressions from the Indian immigrants to Congo-Belge still continues; and what is the result of the representation "at once" made to His Majesty's Government, as indicated in the reply given to my starred question No. 502 of the 16th September, 1929?

(c) Do Government propose to take any further steps in the matter?

Mr. E. B. Howell: I have not seen the article in question, but inquiries made through His Majesty's Government have elicited the fact that all immigrants to the Belgian Congo, irrespective of their nationality or race, may be required to have their finger prints taken. In the circumstances it is not proposed to make any further representations on the subject.

OVERCROWDING ON THE DECK OF THE "KARAGOLA".

185. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a report published in the Tanganyika Opinion, dated the 29th November, 1929 (page 4), regarding overcrowding on the deck of the "Karagola"?

(b) Are Government aware that Pandit Bhawani Dayal brought the matter to the notice of the Captain of the boat, and the Assistant Port Officer, but without any result?

(c) Are Government aware that persistent complaints have been made from time to time regarding the grievances of deck passengers on board the steamers belonging to the British India Steam Navigation Company, and have Government seen such reports in the Tanganyika Opinion, dated the 6th December, 1929 (page 9), the 13th December, 1929 (pages 2 and 10), and the 3rd January, 1930 (page 5)?

(d) What steps have Government taken so far, or do they propose to take now, to ameliorate the condition of deck passengers and remove their legitimate grievances?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: (a) Government have seen the report referred to.

(b) A few days prior to the arrival of the S.S. "Karagola" at Bombay, a telegram signed by the Social Service League was received by the Port Officer, Bombay, complaining of the conditions under which the deck passengers were travelling on board the said vessel. Immediately upon the arrival of the ship, an inquiry was made by the Assistant Port Officer, the Principal Engineer and the Ship Surveyor, and it was found that there had been no breach of the statutory requirements. It is also understood that a deputation of the deck passengers complained to the Master as soon as the vessel left Mombassa that she was overcrowded, that the Master explained that the space allotted was in excess of the requirements of the rules, and that he and the Chief Officer visited the passenger spaces and did what was possible to make the passengers comfortable by a re-arrangement of their baggage, which appeared to be the cause of the complaints.

(c) Government have seen the reports referred to.

(d) The rules governing native passenger ships were revised last year, after a careful examination of the problems affecting the deck passenger trade. Under the revised rules, the space to be available for each deck passenger has been increased, and a higher standard of sanitary arrangements has been prescribed. Government do not propose to take any further action.

OPENING OF A TELEGRAPH OFFICE AT TALEGAON DASHASAR.

186. Mr. M. S. Aney: (a) Will Government be pleased to state whether the residents of Talegaon Dashasar in Taluk Chandur of Amraoti District, in East Berar had applied in the year 1920, to the Postmaster General, Nagpur, for opening a telegraph office there and the Postmaster General informed them by his letter No. E.-21/40, dated 31st July, 1920, that the said telegraph office would be opened on the execution of an indemnity bond by the residents of the town for an annual guarantee of Rs. 272 for a period of 10 years to cover the costs of construction of the telegraph line to, and maintenance of the telegraph office at, the town.

(b) Is it a fact that the residents of the aforesaid place duly informed on the 8th May, 1924, the Postmaster General, Nagpur, through the Superintendent of Post Offices, East Berar Division, Amraoti, of their willingness to execute the indemnity bond and submitted a bond duly executed by them to the Deputy Commissioner of Amraoti District, as required in the aforesaid letter of the Postmaster General, Nagpur?

(c) Will Government be pleased to state whether the Postmaster General, Central Circle, Nagpur, instead of taking steps to open the telegraph office on the receipt of the above correspondence, as per his orders, dated the 31st July, 1920, directed the Superintendent of Post Offices, East Berar Division, in his letter No. E.-21/40, dated the 19th May, 1924, to inform the residents of the town of Talegaon Dashasar that they would be required to guarantee an annual amount of Rs. 1,123-3-0 for a period of ten years instead of Rs. 272 mentioned in the previous orders?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state whether in reply to further representations on the subject by the residents of Talegaon Dashasar, the Inspector, Post Offices, Wardha Sub-Division, communicated to them in his letter No. 3570, dated Wardha, the 10th January, 1925, that he was directed to demand from them an annual guarantee of Rs. 1,410 for a period of ten years for opening a telegraph office at their place?

(e) Will Government be pleased to furnish the details of the total estimated annual costs of Rs. 1,123-3-0 and Rs. 1,410 mentioned in the two letters referred to above as against Rs. 272 required in the order of the Postmaster General, Nagpur, in the year 1920?

(f) Will Government be pleased to state whether before addressing the letters, dated 19th May, 1924, and 10th January, 1925, demanding guarantees any inquiry was instituted by the Government through their officers to make any estimate of the income likely to be had annually by the opening of a telegraph office at Talegaon Dashasar after carefully considering the volume of trade and commerce carried on at the place annually? If so, will Government be pleased to place the copies of the report on the table for information?

Mr. H. A. Sams: (a) Yes. According to the orders then in force, the Posts and Telegraphs Department demanded a guarantee equivalent to half the estimated annual cost of maintaining and working the office.

(b) It is reported by the Postmaster General that, in 1924, the residents expressed to the Deputy Commissioner their willingness to furnish the guarantee quoted in 1920, but no bond was actually executed by them.

(c) The Government of India decided in 1922 that, instead of demanding a guarantee equivalent to half the estimated cost of maintaining and working an office, the Posts and Telegraphs Department should be protected against loss to the full amount. Further, the system of calculating the amount of the guarantee was revised in 1923 and again in January, 1924, according to which the percentages to be charged on the capital cost were raised and put on a more equitable basis. It was, therefore, necessary to recalculate the amount of the guarantee. The revised amount of the guarantee was found to be Rs. 1,123-8-0, and this amount was duly communicated to the residents for their acceptance.

(d) On receipt of further representations for the opening of a combined office at Talegaon Dashasar, further investigations were made in 1924, and on account of the increased estimated cost of the line and revised apportionment of charges between the Postal and Telegraph Branches of the Office, the revised guarantee of the proposed office was found to be Rs. 1,410-0-0. This amount was accordingly demanded for a term of ten years.

(e) The required details are as follows:

Details of calculation of:

	Guarantee of Rs. 272.	Guarantee of Rs. 1,123-8-0.	Guarantee of Rs. 1,410.
Capital cost of line	4,984 0 0	4,984 0 0	5,950

Total	544 2 7	1,123 7 1	1409-51
Guarantee	272 0 0 (Half of above)	1,123 8 0	1,410

(f) No. The matter was not brought to the notice of Government and no inquiries were instituted under their orders. The Postmaster General no doubt must have made investigations into the prospective revenue of the proposed office, but the result of his investigations is not available, as the old records have been destroyed.

OPENING OF A TELEGRAPH OFFICE AT TALEGAON DASHASAR.

187. Mr. M. S. Aney: (a) Will Government be pleased to say whether they are aware that the wire connection to the town of Talegaon Dashasar from the line running between Dhamangaon and Yeotmal will be only two to three miles?

(b) Do Government propose to disclose the grounds on which the Postmaster General, Central Circle, rejected the less costly proposal of placing the telegraph office at Talegaon Dashasar on the existing wires in the year 1924, and to urge him to reconsider the same?

(c) Will Government be pleased to state whether it is not a fact that the Posts and Telegraphs Department has been making a considerable profit from the combined post and telegraph offices situated in the four districts of Berar, and the total number of places served by the telegraphic service is comparatively less than that in any other province in British India yielding the same rate of annual profit to the Posts and Telegraphs Department?

(d) Will Government be pleased to say whether they propose to reconsider the subject of the opening of a telegraph office at Talegaon Dashasar and revise the amount of annual guarantee after a careful inquiry into the conditions of trade and commerce at that place?

Mr. H. A. Sams: (a) The distance of Talegaon Dashasar from the line running between Dhamangaon and Yeotmal has been reported to be four miles.

(b) The exact reasons are not known, but the matter is under the further consideration of the Postmaster General.

(c) The accounts are not kept in such detail as to enable the Honourable Member's statement to be checked.

(d) Yes.

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim (Chittagong Division: Muhammadan Rural): I have also withdrawn my candidature. I have since written to the Secretary.

Mr. President: It is very inconvenient that Honourable Members should withdraw at the last moment. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim also has withdrawn his candidature.

(The ballot was then taken.)

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO THE GOVERNING BODY OF THE INDIAN RESEARCH FUND ASSOCIATION.

Mr. President: The House will now proceed to elect two Members to sit on the Governing Body of the Indian Research Fund Association. There are three candidates whose names are printed on the ballot papers which will now be supplied to Honourable Members in the order in which I call them.

(The ballot was then taken.)

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): Sir, I beg to move that the non-official Members of the Assembly do proceed to elect, in the manner required by rule 51 of the Indian Legislative Rules, three Members to be Members of the Committee on Public Accounts in place of Mr. T. A. K. Shervani, Mr. S. C. Mitra and Kumar Ganganand Sinha.

The motion was adopted.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND THE STANDING COMMITTEE FOR ROADS.

Mr. President: I may inform Members that for the purpose of election of Members to the Committee on Public Accounts and the Standing Committee for Roads, the Assembly Office will be open to receive nominations up to 12 Noon on Saturday, the 8th March, 1930. The election for the Committee on Public Accounts, if necessary, will be held in this Chamber on Monday, the 17th March, while the election for the Standing Committee for Roads will take place on Thursday, the 13th March, 1930. The elections will be conducted in accordance with the principle of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote.

DEMAND FOR SUPPLEMENTARY GRANT IN RESPECT OF RAILWAYS.

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons (Financial Commissioner, Railways): Sir, I beg to move:

"That a supplementary sum not exceeding Rs. 86,30,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st March, 1930, in respect of 'Appropriation from the Reserve Fund'."

This is merely a balancing figure, representing the sum which, on the basis of our revised estimate, is required to make up the contribution for the current year to General revenues.

The motion was adopted.

THE CANTONMENTS (HOUSE-ACCOMMODATION AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. G. M. Young (Army Secretary): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill further to amend the Cantonments (House-Accommodation) Act, 1923, for certain purposes, as amended, be passed."

When I made this identical motion a week ago, you very kindly advised me to postpone it, in order to see whether any consequential amendments in the Bill were required. There is a consequential and purely formal amendment which is about to be moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Gwynne. Clause 6 of the Bill has fallen out, and the subsequent clauses have now to be re-numbered. All the other clauses of the Bill have been agreed to by the House. Sir, I move.

Mr. C. W. Gwynne (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I beg to move the formal amendment of which I have given notice, namely:

"That clause 7 be re-numbered as clause 6 and the subsequent clauses be re-numbered consecutively."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill, as amended, be passed."

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN INCOME-TAX (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill further to amend the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, for a certain purpose, be taken into consideration."

Sir, I took the occasion of my motion for the introduction of the Bill to explain very fully the objects and reasons of this simple measure. I do not think it will be necessary for me to take the time of the House any longer in giving further explanations. Sir, I move.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 2 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter (Law Member): Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 1, for the brackets and word '(Amendment)', the brackets and words '(Third Amendment)' be substituted."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That clause 1, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The motion was adopted.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I move:

"That the Bill, as amended, be passed."

The motion was adopted.

THE INSOLVENCY LAW (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter (Law Member): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill to amend the law relating to insolvency, for certain purposes, be taken into consideration."

Sir, when I introduced the Bill a few days ago, I indicated its purposes. They are designed to remove certain defects in our insolvency law which have recently been brought to notice. They are fully explained in the Notes on Clauses which are annexed to the Statement of Objects and Reasons. I wish merely to add that the time has come when the whole law of insolvency in India should be thoroughly revised. I am waiting for the monumental work of my Honourable friend, Sir Dinshah Mulla, on Insolvency, and as soon as that is published, I intend to take up the general revision of the law of insolvency. Meanwhile we must be content with the removal of the defects as they come to light. Now, this Bill is intended to remove three such defects, which are fully explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons. Sir, I move.

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 2 to 6 were added to the Bill.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter: Sir, I beg to move that the Bill be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN COMPANIES (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I move that the Bill further to amend Indian Companies Act, 1913, for certain purposes, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Law Member, Mr. N. C. Kelkar, Rai Sahib Harbilas Sarda, Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla, Mr. A. H. Ghuznavi, Sir Hugh Cocke, Mr. K. C. Neogy, Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty, and the Mover, with instructions to report on or before the 6th March, 1930, and that the number of Members whose presence shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Committee shall be four.

Sir, this Bill deals with an important matter which is of considerable interest to the commercial community, but I do not think that I need give any very lengthy explanation of the objects and genesis of the measure. It will be desirable, however, that I should explain, as briefly as I can, the circumstances which have led up to this piece of legislation.

One of the main objects in passing the Indian Companies' Act of 1913 was to ensure that the accounts of companies were properly audited, and it is obvious that, with the growth of Indian commercial and industrial enterprise and the consequent growth in the number of limited companies, it becomes increasingly important to ensure that the audit of these companies' accounts is effected in such manner as is likely to inspire public confidence. Under the law as it stands, there are at present three classes of auditors who are permitted to audit the accounts of public companies. In the first place, the Governor General in Council is empowered to declare by notification that the members of any institute or association specified in the notification shall be entitled to be appointed to act as auditors of companies. Six associations and institutions have been specified, all of them incorporated in the United Kingdom. Secondly, there are the holders of unrestricted certificates granted by a Local Government, who are entitled to act as auditors of companies throughout British India. The Act itself imposes no limit on the discretion of Local Governments in the matter of granting these unrestricted certificates, but by an arrangement made between the Government of India and the various Local Governments, the grant of these certificates is ordinarily confined to persons who have obtained the Government Diploma in Accountancy of the Accountancy Diploma Board, Bombay. Such persons are not, however, permitted to practise in any particular province without first obtaining a certificate from the Government of that province. Thirdly, come holders of restricted certificates, who are entitled to act as auditors only within the territories of the Local Government granting the certificates.

Now, I do not wish, in anything I say, to reflect in the slightest degree upon the present holders of certificates, but it is necessary to explain the reasons why, not only Government but a large number of non-officials, who are interested in this matter, thought that changes were required. As long ago as 1917, the Government of India, in a letter to the Government of Bombay dealing with the question of extending and improving the system under which auditors' certificates were granted, expressed the view that the ideal system was one by which control is exercised by an autonomous association of professional accountants over the professional discipline of its own members. That is what the Government of India and, I believe, commercial opinion generally look forward to as the ultimate ideal. In the second place, a system under which the grant of unrestricted certificates in India is limited to persons who have obtained their theoretical training at one centre is not likely to be acceptable indefinitely, and if there were no other reason, the ever increasing demand for properly qualified auditors would create the necessity for the establishment of other sources of supply. At the same time, the existence of several entirely independent authorities, widely separate geographically, each laying down its own system of training and imposing its own standards of qualifications, would inevitably result in a variety of standards, and would doubtless tend to the establishment of a practice of limiting admission to act as an auditor in any province to persons possessing the provincial qualification. Such a development seems to be clearly undesirable. Commercial and Industrial undertakings are no respectors of provincial boundaries; while comparisons between the standards required by different centres would be unavoidable and would be likely seriously to impede the growth of that confidence on the part of the investing public to which I have already referred. Lastly the perpetuation of such a system renders transition to the ultimate ideal of an autonomous institution, to say the least of it, considerably more difficult.

These are the main considerations by which Government have been guided in deciding to move the Legislature to amend the existing Act in such a way as to centralise the procedure for granting certificates to auditors. The Bill itself is a comparatively simple one. It substitutes the Governor General in Council for the Local Government as the authority empowered to grant certificates and to make rules to regulate the manner in which, and the conditions subject to which, certificates will be granted. At the same time it abolishes the power now vested in the Governor General in Council to allow a member of a specified society to act as auditor in India without the necessity of obtaining an Indian certificate. The new certificate will entitle its holder to act as an auditor of companies throughout British India. The Bill also contains provisions enabling the validity of existing certificates to be saved for a sufficiently long period after the proposed enactment comes into force—an obviously necessary precaution to prevent dislocation of business.

Finally, the Bill leaves certain extremely important matters to be dealt with by rules made under the Act; and of those the most important is the constitution of an Indian Accountancy Board consisting of members representing the interests principally affected or having special knowledge of accountancy to advise the Governor General in Council on all administrative matters and to assist him in maintaining the standards of qualification and conduct of persons enrolled on the Register of Accountants which is proposed to be maintained. The rules may also provide for the establishment of local accountancy boards at selected centres. Some special word of explanation is, I think, desirable in regard to this proposed institution of an Accountancy Board, for herein lies the germ of what Government sincerely hope may develop in course of time into the autonomous body which, we hope, will be eventually established. To the principle of an Accountancy Board and the best method of introducing it into our legislation, a very great deal of careful thought has been devoted. It is not in any way a scheme evolved from the inner consciousness of the Government of India, but one which has been examined, elaborated and approved as the result of conferences and discussions between the Government and leading representatives of non-official expert knowledge and experience. It has met with the general approval of the Local Governments and of commercial and professional opinion. As the scheme was originally drawn up in 1925, it was contemplated that the Accountancy Board itself would, subject to the approval of Government, grant diplomas, prescribe qualifications of auditors, arrange for the conduct of examinations, and be empowered generally to carry out the objects of the scheme. But when the scheme was re-examined a little later, in consultation with commercial and professional opinion to which I have referred, it was unanimously agreed that, at the outset, the Board should be constituted as an advisory body, and this feature of the proposals has met with the approval of a large majority of those who have been consulted. The guiding idea has been that, at the inception of the scheme and for some little time afterwards, the ultimate responsibility should remain with Government, and that to proceed faster would be to imperil the whole fabric and incur the destruction of public confidence.

Now, Sir, I should like to explain the reason why we do not propose that the constitution of the Accountancy Board should be settled by the Act itself but should be left to rules. That was a decision which was arrived at only after very full and careful consideration. What we feel is that, if the constitution of the Board were finally settled by the Act, the scheme would become too rigid. At the outset, we shall only be feeling our way, and it might be necessary, or very desirable, to make alterations from time to time as experience indicates their desirability. If in order to effect a change, however small, in the composition or constitution of the Indian Accountancy Board, we were obliged to have recourse to fresh legislation, I feel that we should be encumbered by unnecessary difficulties.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to say this, that from the start, our object has been to proceed in consultation with, and with the approval of, commercial and expert opinion. In framing the rules, we shall act in the same spirit, and before framing the rules I have no doubt that we shall call together those who are likely to be members of the Accountancy Board when it is eventually constituted, so that the rules may be drawn up with the full advantage of their advice and assistance.

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt (Burdwan Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg to move that the name of Mr. S. C. Mitra be added to the Select Committee.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I have no objection, Sir.

Mr. President: The question is that the name of Mr. S. C. Mitra be added to the Select Committee.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill further to amend the Indian Companies Act, 1913, for certain purposes, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Law Member, Mr. N. C. Kelkar, Rai Sahib Harbilas Sarda, Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla, Mr. A. H. Ghaznavi, Sir Hugh Cocke, Mr. K. C. Neogy, Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty, Mr. S. C. Mitra and the Mover with instructions to report on or before the 6th March, 1930, and that the number of Members whose presence shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Committee shall be four."

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN RAILWAYS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I move that the Bill further to amend the Indian Railways Act, 1890, for certain purposes, as reported by the Select Committee, be taken into consideration. When I moved that this Bill be referred to a Select Committee in the last Session of the Legislature the form of the

[Sir George Rainy.]

Bill was very different from the form in which it has returned from the Select Committee. As it was originally introduced, the Bill was little more than an enabling Bill, empowering the Governor General in Council to make rules on the subject of the limitation of hours of work and the provision of periods of rest for Indian railway servants. As it has returned from the Select Committee, the Bill though unchanged in principle, has been to a large extent modified by the incorporation in the Bill of a number of provisions which it was originally intended should find a place in the Rules. I have not the least doubt that this is a great improvement and that the House will concur in that opinion. The most important of the provisions which are now incorporated in the Bill itself are the sixty-hours' week, the weekly rest, the appointment of supervisors of railway labour, a much more limited rule-making power, and provision for the compulsory payment of overtime in certain cases.

Now, to deal first with the question of the sixty-hours' week and the weekly rest. I know that some members of this House, for whose opinions I have great respect, would like to go further. It is not necessary that, at this stage, I should say much on this subject, because a more natural opportunity will occur when the amendments, of which notice has been given, are moved. But I should like to say a word or two to make clear the point of view from which Government have approached the question. Government do not regard this Bill as the final solution of the question of the hours of labour on the Indian Railways, but our first duty, whatever we may hope for in the future, is to implement the obligations we have already incurred and to make the sixty-hours' week and the weekly day of rest fully effective; but if we try to do too much at one time, instead of expediting matters, it may lead to almost indefinite delay.

Again, there is a distinction between what is to be made obligatory by law and what humanitarian considerations, in given circumstances, may make reasonable and proper. If, in a given case, Government say that they do not think that, in this Bill, provisions should be inserted to limit still further the hours of work, it does not mean that Government consider that, in all cases, the maximum hours of work would be reasonable hours of work,—in fact we gave in the Select Committee an undertaking that we would investigate the question with a view to fixing the hours of work at a lower figure than a sixty-hours week for those railway servants whose duties were specially arduous. I have thought it desirable to say so much at this stage, but I do not think it would be advisable that I should develop my ideas on this point still further in view of the amendments which are to be moved.

The only other matter to which I think I need specially allude is the clause in the Bill which provides for the appointment of Supervisors of railway labour. I regard that provision as a very important one, and if we are to make further progress in removing legitimate grievances as regards the hours of work of railway employees, the usefulness of these Supervisors can hardly be exaggerated. They will, in fact, be the eyes and ears of the Government of India to bring to their notice conditions which are unsatisfactory. Their primary duty will, of course, be to see that the law is enforced, but in addition to that, it is my desire and intention that these Supervisors should report to the Government of India cases which come to their notice where, although there is no breach of the law, there is a condition of things which requires improvement on the ground that, having regard to all the circumstances and conditions, the hours of work of railway servants at a particular place are unreasonable. I think that is of very great importance, because if India is to move forward in this respect, it is not enough to rely solely upon rigid provisions of the law, and a great deal must depend upon the manner in which the law is administered. For instance, in order to do justice to the staff of large and busy stations, where the pressure of work is incessant throughout the day, it may be that a further limitation of the hours may be very desirable, but it does not in the least follow that at wayside stations where there are only three or four trains in a day, it is reasonable to impose precisely the same limitations as might be suitable at the busy stations. I shall hope to get from the Supervisors of railway labour reports dealing with conditions as they exist at particular centres, so that it may be possible for the Government of India to deal with those conditions, irrespective of any legislative compulsion upon them to do so. I do not think, Sir, I need lengthen my remarks at this stage, and I now move.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I wish to offer a few brief observations on this Bill, and I think I must do so at this early stage, because I have not myself handed in any amendments, and with regard to the amendments that have been sent in, I am not inclined either to support them or to oppose them. I have made myself quite clear in the note which I have appended to the Select Committee's Report. That is a note not of dissent necessarily, nor is it one of entire agreement with the Select Committee's Report. I think I have fully stated my own reasons for taking that attitude in that note itself, and the reason which led me to take up that attitude is that, while on the one hand I do regard the demands of the workers for an eight hours' day as certainly reasonable, on the other hand I think, just as was explained by the Honourable Sir George Rainy himself, that may not apply to all localities and all kinds of work under the control of the Railway, and therefore making a 48 hours' day a statutory provision in the Bill would perhaps be too rigid a thing for practical purposes. So between these two limits, the question will have to be investigated whether, in fairness to the workers, a 48 hours' day also may have to be prescribed. For aught I know, in certain Departments or in certain kinds of work, I am told that 48 hours' work already obtains, and in some other cases it is 56 hours—this is what I am told. On behalf of the Railway Board we were told that an attempt was being made to bring the hours down from 60 to 56. Therefore, I found in the Select Committee that it would not be a very proper course to set the Government committed positively to an 8 hours' day by a rigid rule of law. I accepted the present arrangement now embodied in the Bill as only a first instalment,—I have exactly said so in my note,—and I do look forward to a time, in the not distant future, when even these hours will be still further reduced.

Sir, when I appended my note to the Select Committee's Report, in fact when I did my work in the Select Committee, I had not read the literature about this business, which I have subsequently read, and I may frankly tell this House what my impression has been after reading that literature. My impression has been that Government have been grossly negligent of their duties in respect of putting into legal shape their obligations with regard to the Geneva and Washington Conventions. The Conventions were embodied in certain Articles, I think, in 1919 or 1920. This Government expressed their ratification of the Conventions in 1921 and 1923. The question, therefore, naturally arises as to what prevented Government, since 1921 or 1923, from giving that agreement a strictly legal form, which they themselves regarded as necessary, up to this time for several long years. What was it that kept them back from undertaking the necessary action in this matter?

In 1927, Government, in reply to a question on the subject, said that the limitation of 60 hours would be applied to certain specified branches of work by executive order, but the specification can only actually fulfil the terms of the Convention when made by a competent authority. The question naturally arises, what was there to prevent Government from selecting or fixing upon the competent authority and at once proceeding to legislation on the subject. Were they in need of legal assistance or advice in the matter? Supposing they wanted both, were they not available at an early stage? Why did they waste all these seven years in proceeding to fix the competent authority and embodying those two provisions in the law, as they now have done. If they had done so before, then one more thing would have happened, namely, the consultations between employers and the employed. That would have been possible. We are now told that consultations have not been held because no competent authority was fixed. No rules were made and no schemes were put into operation. Things have been happening in a haphazard way and not under any settled scheme of rules. Therefore my contention is that Government have been in this matter grossly negligent. In 1929, in the course of the debate on the demands for grants, the question was raised whether a new Member should be added to the Railway Board. In that connection I think it was Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas who suggested that there was no necessity for the addition of an additional Member, because, if it was alleged that the appointment was made necessary by the work involved in giving effect to these Conventions and other things that work might well be postponed for a year or two. That is what he simply suggested, and Sir George Rainy said this to him in reply. He regretted the words in which Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas referred to the Geneva Convention, mentioned that there were other countries which had failed to satisfy their obligations under that Convention, and said that, if we had to wait for another year or two before we carried out our obligation it did not matter very much. Then he said, "I think it would be very regrettable if that were to be taken to be the general feeling of the House". Of course that was not the feeling of the House. That is not the feeling of the House even now. Sir George Rainy further said:

"India has an excellent record as regards carrying out all international obligations. I feel almost a sense of shame" (Shame came to him then when it was a matter of appointing a new Member of the Railway Board) "and unless that particular matter in the Railway Department was carried out, I cannot claim that we have fully satisfied our obligations."

That was a legitimate argument for opposing the suggestion that a new Member should not be put on the Railway Board, but what answer has Sir George Rainy to give, I really wonder, for no action having been taken by Government all these long seven years. What was there to prevent Government from taking the necessary action? After all, it is Bill of two or three clauses. Nothing beyond that. The competent authority, it goes without saying, is the Governor General in Council. What legal advice or assistance did Government require to justify their putting off action till this day? I get a clue to this dilatory action of the Government in the proceedings at the Convention. I am reading from a book by Hetherington on the subject of "International Labour Legislation". There he gives the history of what happened at the Convention itself. Countries were taken up for treatment, and only in the case of certain oriental countries exceptions and exemptions were allowed and special mention is made of India in this connection, and also of Japan. What is said about India is this:

"The representatives of the Government of India were somewhat unwilling that the Commission should make any substantial recommendations in the case of India." (They wanted the entire matter to be left to the pleasure of the Government of India.) "They indicated that the main difficulty in the way of an immediate enlargement of the Factory Acts . . . was the complete absence of information as to the smaller industries of India. The Government, therefore, was quite unable to measure the administrative responsibilities which an extension of the Acts would require it to undertake. It was at the moment engaged on an inquiry on this point; and it desired that the Conference should delay the consideration of the Indian position until the results were available, and the Government had had time to submit its proposals."

The Commission, however, was not unsympathetic to the plea of the Indian Labour delegate that the Government would be nothing the worse for a little stimulation; and, especially in view of the suggestions it was making to other oriental countries, it thought it well to take a large view of its duties than was contemplated by the Government spokesman. It therefore embodied in the Convention a definite prescription with regard to India." (Then the prescriptions are given. Of course some latitude was given to the Government.)

But there is an important clause here which reads:

"The researches at present in progress should be expedited, so that, at the earliest possible date, the Government of India might be able to lay before the Conference its proposals for a still further extension of labour protection."

Now, it appears that it was represented by the Government of India before the Convention that Government were already busy with their own schemes and adjustments, and so on, in order to come into direct line with the recommendations of the Convention, and apparently they have taken nine or ten long years in order to complete their researches, and they have not even now completed their researches. In the Select Committee it was put to us that it would require a great deal of time to go into the details about these things, namely, the hours of employment, the period of rest and so on. I innocently thought that it might be so, and I have said in my note that some adjustments would be necessary and details would have to be worked out. I quite admit that work of that kind is necessary, and therefore I was opposed at this stage to a rigid rule of law committing Government to a sixty-hours' week uniformly for all kinds of work and for all kinds of locality, but I took care at that time to get from the Railway Board an assurance that an investigation had been started by Government and will be continued with a view to fixing hours of work at a lower figure than 56 hours a week for those railway servants whose duties are specially arduous and involve continuous concentration. Now, coming back to the point I just now mentioned, in practice we are told that even 48 hours' work is the rule in certain matters. 56 hours applies to certain matters, and Government are making an attempt to come down to 56 hours in cases where they have not already done so. But the rule of law which is now laid before the House provides only for 60 hours. So I take it that, within the limit of 60 hours, they are going to have certain schemes ready in order that they may prescribe different scales of hours of work and rest, etc., for different kinds of work and different localities. But we are, up to this time, absolutely in the dark as to what has been done and what is being done. I may again today raise the same question about the lack of information made available to the Members of the Assembly when matters of this nature are brought before the House in a number of ways. I shall therefore like the Honourable Member for Railways to make a clear statement as to what is being done and what are their intentions with regard to the bringing down, of their own accord, the hours of work from 60, which is mentioned in the Bill before us. It is only when we feel satisfied that honest efforts are being made to come down from that margin of 60, that we can consider whether we should support a definite amendment for 48 hours or not. I do not wish to say anything further on this Bill. I have expressed my views in the note. I wanted however to take advantage of this opportunity to make a few observations and to tell the House exactly what I had in my mind when I signed the Report of the Select Committee, as I have myself not given notice of any amendments.

Diwan Chaman Lall (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, as I listened to the speech that has just been delivered by my friend Mr. Kelkar, I felt that the time had arrived when not only should the Government of India appoint a Labour Member for the Railway Board, but that non-officials should equally appoint a Labour Member to assist them with the work of co-ordination in respect of labour legislation. I think my friend Mr. Kelkar will agree with me, because I say this in no disparagement of him, that he always takes a very kind interest in labour matters himself. But I was surprised when he made the following statement: "I want to know what is being done in order to reduce the hours from 60". Sir, I looked in despair towards him and the other Members of the Legislative Assembly who were members of the Select Committee. Surely, it was their duty as members of the Select Committee to find out what the Government has done so far in regard to the 60 hours, and what they have not done. Why did they not find this out in the Select Committee and why did they not ask the Railway Department to place their files before them for investigation? Why did they not get at the real position as to what the actual facts are in regard to the application of the 60 hours today on the railways in India? To come to this House and then demand from the Honourable the Railway Member as to what he has done, after having signed a minute of dissent on the Select Committee, seems to me to be a very surprising proposition. It seems to me to be putting the cart before the horse. Before signing the minute of dissent or before putting their signatures on the document which was presented by the Select Committee, it was the obvious duty of every Member to get all the facts relevant to this proposition. If they were not brought to the notice of any Honourable Member who put his signature to this document, then I say that he put his signature to this document blindly without having realised the implications which are inherent in the Report of the Select Committee.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: We will not allow the Government to proceed with the Bill now.

Diwan Chaman Lall: I agree with my Honourable friend. Although the information may not have been elicited in the Select Committee, yet the case cannot be allowed to go by default and we must get that information. May I, in reply, say that the information is really available. The information is not a secret document which the Honourable the Railway Member carries in his breast pocket nor is it only to be found in the archives of the Government of India. The information is available and can be obtained from every employee of the Railways. Any railway employee who suffers because of the present system of hours is in a position to inform the Honourable Members of this House as to what exactly is the situation.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: We would like to know that from you.

Diwan Chaman Lall: My Honourable friend would like to know that from me. I have not as yet accepted the portfolio of the Honourable the Commerce Member, and therefore it is not my business to enlighten the Honourable Member, but I will certainly make an attempt if the Honourable Member would like me to do so. Now, what is the actual position? The position is that that in the year 1919 the Government of India obtained a special exemption as far as India was concerned in the application of the Washington Convention.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty (Salem and Coimbatore cum North Arcot: Non-Muhammadan Rural): It is not right.

Diwan Chaman Lall: I will read out the actual wording of the Report to my Honourable friend to prove that it is right. I would go so far as to say that not only did the Government of India obtain this exemption for reasons stated by Mr. Joshi who was representing the workers of India but that certain exemptions were obtained for Japan and for India. Mr. Joshi, in his speech, made this statement:

"At the outset it is my duty to explain that personally I do not approve of the idea of excluding India altogether from the main Convention on this question to be applied to Western countries."

He said he did not agree with it. I do not know what exactly my friend Mr. Shanmukham Chetty was referring to when he said that that is not correct. What is not correct? Was not an exemption obtained?

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: No exemption was given to India under the Washington Convention at all.

Diwan Chaman Lall: In that case all that I can do is to read out the Washington Convention and convince my friend, Mr. Shanmukham Chetty, that there is a special provision in the Convention exempting India. If he will kindly turn to the Convention, he will find Article 10, to which I want him to pay special attention. It runs thus:

"In British India the principle of a 60-hour week shall be adopted for all workers in the industries at present covered by the Factory Acts administered by the Government of India and in such branches of railway work as shall be specified for this work by the competent authorities."

This is however not the case with other countries where they have a 48-hour week. I would like Mr. Chetty to explain how he says that that is not so. Is not the exemption there in Article 10? Has he got any other copy of the Washington Convention which does not contain Article 10? Article 10 does give special exemption to India.

Mr. Tin Tut (Department of Industries and Labour: Nominated Official): It is a special provision, not a special exemption.

Diwan Chaman Lall: This is only hair-splitting. My Honourable friend says it is a special provision and not an exemption. What does the special provision mean? Does it or does it not mean an exemption?

Mr. Tin Tut: It does not mean exemption from all provisions. It is a special provision made for India.

Diwan Chaman Lall: It means a special exemption in regard to 48 hours of work and that is all we are discussing. Does it or does it not mean that? Every other country has got a 48-hour week, but for this country there is a provision, which amounts to a special exemption for India, giving her a 60 hour a week. I do not know what my Honourable friend is worrying about. What is the actual effect of it? Is it not this, that India is put on a special basis, a distinguishing basis, a different basis, a differential basis, namely a basis of a 60-hour week?—Is that correct?

Mr. Tin Tut: It is correct.

Diwan Chaman Lall: I take it therefore that there is special treatment as far as India is concerned in regard to this matter. Now, the point is this. This happened in the year 1919, and since then ten years have elapsed. What has the Government of India been doing during that period of ten years? Why did they not undertake a revision before this period of ten years? In this connection, Sir, I wish to point out to the Honourable Member opposite that, not only was it incumbent upon the Government as a matter of general policy, or as a matter which was brought to their notice time and again by public opinion in this country as represented by the workers, but there was a provision laid down in Article 10 itself which anticipated a revision of this special provision at a meeting of the General Council. May I read out that particular provision? It reads:

“... but further provisions limiting the hours of work in India shall be considered at a further meeting of the General Council.”

Since this special exemption was obtained by the Government of India, I want to know whether this provision in Article 10, namely, an anticipation that this matter of reduction of hours from 60 will be considered again at a General Conference, whether this provision was taken notice of. I want to know whether action was taken by the Government of India to press its attention upon the Conference in order that the Conference should undertake a reduction of hours from 60.

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Why did not the Honourable Member raise the question when he was at Geneva?

Diwan Chaman Lall: I cannot help my Honourable friend's ignorance. If my Honourable friend does not read the Reports of Conferences at Geneva and elsewhere to which he goes as an Adviser, it is not my fault. I am not here to enlighten my Honourable friend. If he had read the Reports, he would have found that time and again those who have gone to Geneva have raised this matter of reduction of hours, and we have brought it prominently to the notice of the delegations assembled at Geneva. It is not my duty, I am not the Government of India that I should do so. It is their duty if they have due regard to these matters. It is their duty to take up this matter with the General Conference. It is their duty to take up the matter with the delegates assembled at Geneva in order to discuss whether the time has or has not arrived for a reduction of hours from 60. If, instead of doing so, the Honourable Member comes here ten years afterwards and says, “For ten years I have not honoured this obligation which rested upon me as a Member of the League of Nations”, although it is perfectly clear that it is not obligatory upon them to carry out any of the ratifications of the International Labour Conference, yet it is a moral obligation which rests upon their shoulders. They say, “For ten solid years we have kept quiet about this and now we come forward”. With what? With the very same provisions which obtained ten years ago and which I say cannot be held to be valid today. I want to know why the Honourable Member did not obtain the sanction of the Government of India in order to reduce the hours from 60 to 48, as he should have done in compliance with the general rule that applies to other countries. Even Great Britain, after a good deal of fight at the last Session, declared her policy and her intention to ratify this particular Convention. They had some internal trouble with regard to this matter, but that did not affect the position that, generally speaking, the eight hours' day prevails throughout Great Britain. My point is this, that now after ten years of experience of the working of this particular measure in other countries, after ten years of exemption that they obtained—being under that exemption—after ten years of trial and waiting, without having ratified this Convention, why at this particular stage does the Government of India come forward with a proposal of this nature?

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Is there not a Conference next year?

Diwan Chaman Lall: My Honourable friend, Mr. Kelkar, has given the answer. The answer is that, after ten years, the matter has got to be revised and the matter will come up before the Conference again, and the Government of India want to go with a white sheet, looking like angels, to the League and say, “Look, we have ratified this Convention”. The Government of India know perfectly well that, within a short period, this matter will come up before the Conference for revision. I daresay, when the matter does come up for revision again, and if this House gives its consent to this provision of sixty hours a week, the result will be that the hands of the Government of India will be strengthened and they will go to the Conference and say, “We have in this the representatives of the people of India behind us; they accepted a 60-hour week and we do not wish to propose any amendment to this particular legislation.” Now, it is a dangerous thing, an exceedingly dangerous thing, from all points of view, for any Honourable Member who has the interest of his country at heart to give his consent to this provision of a 60-hour week, and I hope Honourable Members will realise the full import and full importance of this. I know that objection can be raised and it can be said that other industries in this country are not working on the basis of 48 hours a week, and therefore why should railways alone adopt this provision.

[Diwan Chaman Lall.]

My reply to them is twofold. My first reply is this, that, even on the railways today, almost a general rule prevails of an eight hours' day. I take it that, generally speaking, in the running staff it is an eight hours' day, I mean generally speaking. In the workshops it varies from 42½ hours to 48 hours a week, generally speaking. Of course, there are exceptions, as the Honourable Member knows perfectly well. If that is so, where in actual practice in many cases you have an eight-hour day or perhaps a nine-hour day in some other cases, why should we be tied down to a sixty-hour week, or ten hours a day? Why should this Assembly shut its eyes to the actualities of the situation in order merely to give the Government of India a tactical advantage over us with regard to a sixty-hour week. I want to know what is the justification for this?

Then, my second point, and a very important point, is this. The other day, I read in the newspapers that, when a similar matter came up before the Legislative Assembly, namely, the question of a minimum wage fixing machinery, what was the reply of the Government of India? The reply was this, "We do not intend to deal with this matter at this stage because we have appointed a Labour Commission and we shall await the Report of the Labour Commission". Now, if this was the idea in the mind of the Government of India, that is, they must await the expert Report of a particular body on a particular subject before they could take any action, which action they could have taken already, because they have had the expert Report before them, namely, the Resolutions, the Conventions and the draft recommendations passed at Geneva in 1928—they had the consensus of opinion of the entire world which sends its delegates to Geneva who, after a full and representative debate with all the experts that assemble there to thresh out the whole problem—if in spite of all that expert opinion available, the Government of India still say, "No, we must await the Report of the special inquiry that we are conducting through the Labour Commission", then what I say of their attitude in regard to this matter?

Mr. Tin Tut: Those experts had no knowledge of the special conditions that obtain in India.

Diwan Chaman Lall: Well, Sir, this bogey of special conditions is always trotted out for the purpose of differential treatment. They know perfectly well that there are no special conditions in India. I challenge my Honourable friend to tell me what special conditions there are in India, which prevent him from giving the railwaymen an eight-hour day. I challenge him to say, on the floor of this House, what special conditions there are which prevent him from giving the railway workers a 48-hour week. Will he accept my challenge and tell me? I pause for a reply.

Mr. Lalchand Navalrai: (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Perhaps he will tell you that we are more manly and able to work long hours.

Diwan Chaman Lall: I know there are no special conditions.

Mr. Tin Tut: I have no special knowledge of railway workers in India.

Diwan Chaman Lall: Quite so. Why did my Honourable friend so quickly jump to his feet and interrupt me?

Mr. Tin Tut: I did not refer to railway workers.

Diwan Chaman Lall: If my Honourable friend does not refer to railway workers, then what are the special conditions which my Honourable friend wants to know and of which he has no knowledge? Either he must be ignorant of this, or I must confess that he very ignorantly interrupted me in my speech. I take my stand upon this, and I challenge any man to contradict me on this point, that is, there are no special conditions in India which will prevent the Government of India from giving a 48-hour week. Well, they may turn round and say, "It is all a question of finance, it is all a question of detailed adjustment". If it is a question of detailed adjustment, it is up to them to limit themselves to a fixed period and say, "Until our inquiries are complete, which may take say, six months or eight months or one year or even two years, we shall have this provision". I say, give us a guarantee that, after a definite period, we shall revert to the 48-hour week. If it is a question of finance, my reply is this; in a matter of this kind you cannot bring in your plea of finance. It is an urgent matter which will brook no delay. It is very unjust for you to treat the railway workers in the way you want to; it is unfair that you should squeeze all the money that you can from the blood and sweat of the railway workers and say, you cannot give a 48-hour week merely because there are special conditions in India and special questions which differentiate India from the other countries of the world.

Now, Sir, I do appeal to Honourable Members to look at this problem carefully. There are other problems connected with this Bill I P. M. which I shall deal with as the amendments come up; but I rose merely to make my appeal to Honourable Members to regard this as a serious problem and to ask the Government of India, why they could not have also waited in regard to this provision until the Report of the Labour Commission was published? Here again, Sir, logic will drive the Government of India into a contradiction, and here again I will be told that this is a different case. Again the question of differential treatment,—minimum wages, one proposition, sixty-hour week, a different proposition. All these matters have been submitted to your own Committee which you have appointed; yet you will take time by the forelock, come before the Legislative Assembly and say that you want a sixty-hour week and not await the result of the Committee you have appointed. You cannot have your cake and eat it. Is the urgency of the problem such that you must go ahead with it? But if you plead urgency, then may I ask, who is urging you? Is it the worker? He will thereby be adversely affected both by the Geneva Convention of 1921, which you are implementing, and by the Washington Convention of 1919, which you are implementing. Is it the worker who is urging you? Is there any body of workers whose complaints you are giving effect to in regard to this matter? I ask, where is the urgency then? Wherein lies the urgency except to save your faces at the next Conference, when there is a revision of this matter to be undertaken at the Geneva Conference? Where is the urgency? I say, Sir, the time has come when Honourable Members on this side of the House ought to look upon these problems not from the narrow industrial point of view, but from the wider national point of view, namely, the interest of the working classes. You cannot have an A. 1 industry in this country with a C. 3 population; and if you are going to permit the Government of India, one of the biggest employers in this country, to bring in this kind of differential treatment, you may just as well say farewell to all sympathetic contact between the working classes on the one side and the rest of the people on the other. And I ask my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, who is a big industrialist, can he give me any justification why he should not be supporting this measure of a 48-hour week, except merely perhaps on account of its repercussion on other industries? Let us be honest and straightforward. Either a case has been made out for a 48-hour week on the railways or not, and if a case has been made out for a 48-hour week, it is no concern of ours to consider what its repercussion will be upon other industries. And if a case has been made out,—and I hope we shall be able to establish conclusively that a case has been made out,—I hope my Honourable friends will vote for the proposition of Mr. Abdul Matin Chaudhury.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: Sir, I am not in the least surprised at the enthusiastic plea of my Honourable friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, in favour of the adoption of an 8-hour day on the railways. As was pointed out in one of the reports of the Director of the International Labour's Office, "of all the subjects of social reform, an 8-hour day is nearest to the hearts of the workers"; and it is no surprise, therefore, that my Honourable friend, representing the workers of India, grew enthusiastic in advocating the adoption of an 8-hour day in India also. If it was the intention of my Honourable friend to take the Government of India to task for the inordinate delay of nearly ten years in applying the provisions of the Washington and Geneva Conventions to the workers on the railways, he has my entire sympathy. But if it is his intention to ask this House to adopt an 8-hour day for the railway workers, I am afraid I must oppose any such move, and I have no doubt that the House will turn down the proposal. My Honourable friend knows a good deal from first-hand information of the work that is being done in the International Labour Organisation at Geneva. Sir, I may claim also some first-hand information of the great work that is done by that International Organisation. My Honourable friend said that, in Washington, a special exemption was given to the Government of India from the provisions of the Washington Hours Convention. I must inform this House that it is not correct to say that the Government of India were given any exemption in this matter. The provision for 10 hours' work per day for the Indian labourer was a part of the Washington Hours Convention, and this provision was included in the Convention at Washington, not as a matter of favour to the Government of India or to the Indian employers, but as a matter of right granted to India in the Articles of the Treaty of Versailles. If Honourable Members will turn to Article 427 of the Peace Treaty, they will find this special provision:

"They recognised that differences of climate, habits and customs, of economic opportunity and industrial tradition make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment."

It was the object of those who were assembled at Washington to introduce a uniformity of legislation in matters of hours of work throughout the world, and it was recognised by the authors of the Washington Convention that, if any attempt at social legislation like this were to prove successful, it was a condition precedent that no country should have any advantage over any other country. It was recognised that an 8-hour day, production in any particular country might not be the same as an 8-hour day production in another country. They recognised that, for the successful working of this Convention, it was necessary to take account of the fact that there were differences of climate, habits and customs, and of economic opportunity which make it necessary that differentiation, if necessary, must be made between one country and another. It was, I submit, under the provisions of this Article in the Treaty of Versailles that the clause relating to a 10 hours' working day was embodied in the Washington Convention; and in the face of this fact, it is not correct to represent that the Government of India were shown any special favour, or were granted an exemption from the operation of the Washington Convention. My Honourable friend asked, and challenged my Honourable friend on the opposite side to prove, if there were any conditions peculiar to India which warranted the adoption of a ten-hour day as against an 8-hour day in the European countries. My Honourable friend said that he did not know about the railways. Well, Sir, I will ask my Honourable friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, whether, taking into consideration the industrial efficiency of the Indian worker, he could say that, in a factory in India, the worker could turn out the same amount of work in eight hours as a worker in Western countries can do in the same time.

Diwan Chaman Lall: Does he get the same wages? He gets one-sixth of the wages.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: He will get the same wages when he does the same work.

Apart from inefficiency due to climatic conditions, I would draw the attention of my Honourable friend to a passage that occurs in a certain Report. The United Textile Factory Workers' Association of Great Britain published in 1927 a Report of an inquiry which was made in India during 1926. The Report states that:

"The hours of work in cotton spinning factories are in accordance with the provisions of the law. The machinery is kept in motion for ten hours per day but the individual worker does not work continuously for the whole day as he is allowed time for prayers, bathing, smoking, etc."

Diwan Chaman Lall: This is not a fact. The engineers are kept working for 11 hours and not 10 hours.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: The machinery is working only 10 hours per day. I would invite my Honourable friend to go into any cotton mill and verify it for himself. The Report adds that it is doubtful whether more than eight hours' productive labour is performed by individual workers.

Diwan Chaman Lall: Therefore bring it down to 48 hours.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: If you bring it down to 48 hours, the productive hours will be reduced to probably six hours per day. When it is already ten hours per day, we have got here an authoritative finding . . .

Diwan Chaman Lall: I question that authoritative finding. Whose finding is it?

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: The finding of the United Textile Factory Workers' Association of Great Britain.

Diwan Chaman Lall: Authoritative!

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: Which conducted an independent investigation of the conditions of work in textile factories in India.

Diwan Chaman Lall: Mr. Tom Shaw.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: In the face of these facts, it is idle to contend that we must adopt the eight hour day in India also. My Honourable friend drew the attention of this House to the fact that the Washington Convention will shortly come in for re-examination and revision if necessary. Last year, in the 12th International Conference, Mr. Joshi attempted to have a resolution passed requesting the governing body of the International Labour Office, in revising the Washington Convention, to reduce the hours of work in India from 10 to 8 hours per day, and as a result of a compromise arrived at between the Government delegates, the employers' delegate and the workers' delegate, the formula was changed. The governing body has now been instructed, in re-examining the Convention, to go into the question whether the economic conditions in India have so altered as to warrant the reduction of the working day from 10 to 8 hours. Before the result of that inquiry by the governing body is available, I would submit to my Honourable friend that it is premature to ask this House to adopt an eight hours' day. My Honourable friend is perfectly correct in saying that, though there may not be objections for adopting the eight hours' day on the railways, excepting the financial burden that it might impose, its repercussion on the general industrial position in India would be of a very serious nature, and as one interested in the industrial development of India—and I can assume that my Honourable friend, Mr. Chaman Lall, is one of those who would like to have a healthy growth or industrial development in India,—I would request this House not to make any departure from the provisions of the Washington Hours Convention as applicable to India, and not to adopt any motion which seeks to reduce the hours of work from 10 to 8 per day.

Mr. A. M. Hayman (Railway Board: Nominated Official): Sir, I intervene at this stage only to make a few brief remarks because I feel that the whole question as to whether we should adopt a 48 hours' week or a 60 hours' week will come up for fuller discussion when there is a motion for an amendment. I feel it necessary, in the first place, to draw attention to the fact that it was the original intention, if one judges from the history of the case, when article 10 of the Washington Convention was drawn up and which fixed the principle of a 60 hour week for India, that that principle should apply only to such branches of railway work as correspond to work done in workshops and in factories. There is abundant evidence, Sir, for the statement that I make. What did we on our railways do in actual practice? We at once, as quickly as we possibly could, took action to give effect to the principle so far as our workshops and our mines were concerned. We went a step further also in actual practice and we did begin to apply the principles embodied in the Convention to other classes of our railway servants. I make bold to say that we did begin to apply this principle ten years or so ago to other classes of railway servants. If a charge is made against us that we have not moved as fast as we ought to have, I am not going to defend that charge. But we have, from humanitarian considerations, and because we did want to do the best that we could for our men, moved forward, and we have done a great deal in past years to reduce the hours of work of our railway servants of all classes. I can prove by details that we have reduced the hours of work of many classes. I want to say also that we have spent money, lakhs of rupees, during the last ten years in employing additional establishment necessary on account of our reducing the hours of work of certain classes and that we have invested large sums of money in providing additional quarters for our subordinate establishment. It is difficult for me, at this stage, to separate how much we spent on additional quarters on account of our reducing the hours of work and how much for other considerations. But I happen to remember the total amount that we spent in the last six or seven years in providing additional quarters for our subordinate establishment, and it is seven crores of rupees.

I pass on next to another point which my Honourable friend, Mr. Kelkar, made, and I think we, on this side of the House, are obliged to him for making it. It was the charge that we should have brought this Bill earlier. We, Sir, only some time last year realised that the proper thing that we ought to do in this matter of ratifying the Washington and Geneva Conventions was to bring a Bill before this House. Up to that time there were impressions in the Government of India that the whole matter could be dealt with by executive orders, and it was by executive orders on our State-managed Railways that so much has been done as I have already shown and it was because the Company-managed railways were ready to follow the lead given by the State-managed railways that they too reduced their hours of work, and they too had to spend a great deal of money on that account. But Government, some time last year, realised that the proper thing was to bring forward a Bill before this House, and they worked towards it as quickly as they possibly could, and they brought forward a Bill during the last Session. That Bill was not passed at the last Session, and nobody was more sorry than I myself for that, because I had my plans to give effect to it all worked out, and I would never have been charged, by my Honourable friend, Mr. Aney, that money provided for improving service conditions was not spent. I would have been only too glad to spend the money for the improvement of the service conditions of our employees.

Now, Sir, we are also charged with not trying to move fast enough, with not trying to do all that we could do. My long training, Sir, in finance has taught me, when anybody makes that charge, to look at the bill of cost. What is the bill of cost in this case? We are ready to spend within eighteen months or so from today, a recurring expenditure of Rs. 50 lakhs, in order to give better hours of work for our railway servants, and about Rs. 75 lakhs to provide them with more quarters. I say, Sir, that it is a telling reply to any charge against us, that we are not now moving as fast as we should. I do not wish, Sir, to follow too closely all the arguments made by my Honourable friend Diwan Chaman Lall, because my Honourable friend Mr. Chetty seems to me to have met most of them.

completely, but I do think I ought to say what was in our minds when we examined the question as to whether Government should not try to work to some lower figure than 60 hours a week. We decided to be guided first and foremost by humanitarian considerations. We do not expect any one of our workers to work for a number of hours that will undermine his health. But we did take into account one or two other considerations. We did take into account the fact that conditions in India are different from other countries; that the outturn of work by the labourer here is less than in other countries. We do, as we are responsible to the taxpayer, see that we get value for the money, and we also do take into consideration the possible effects of our action on other employers of labour. I would only add this, Sir, I do not want to make too much of the point because, for one reason I have not verified the information, but I heard it said the other day by a gentleman who is responsible for running a large railway in America, that a system of 17,000 miles was managed with a lower number of employees than the number we in India are employing on the Eastern Bengal Railway, which has a mileage of only 2,000. We have got to take such facts into consideration. No doubt, Sir, we as a Government Department, as a large employer of labour, ought to be guided by humanitarian considerations; we will do our best for our men; we will see that their health is not impaired; we will give them quarters near their work where necessary, and do all that we possibly can to make them live in healthy surroundings; but we have, when dealing with service conditions, to take into account what the possible effects upon other employers will be. I say again that we will do all that is possible in this matter to ameliorate the service conditions of our employees, but that we must pay attention to the interests of the taxpayer, i.e., we must see that we do get value for money.

Mr. K. C. Roy (Bengal: Nominated Non-Official): Normally speaking, Sir, any attempt to tinker with the Indian Railways Act would have met with opposition from me, because I am one of those who believe in a thorough and exhaustive revision of the existing Railways Act. The Act is fifty years old, and only a small amendment was made some time ago to bring into being what is known as the Indian Railway Board. I may also mention to the House that the Honourable Mr. Jinnah moved a motion in the Imperial Legislative Council for the revision of the Indian Railways Act. This was opposed by Sir George Barnes on behalf of Government, and was lost on the floor of the House. Ever since, very little attempt has been made to improve the Indian Railways Act and to bring it into line with modern conditions elsewhere. When I got notice that there was to be a Bill to amend the Indian Railways Act, my first inclination was one of opposition, but when I read the Bill, I found that it was a very beneficent measure, calculated to improve the conditions of Indian labour. I at once agreed to support it. I owed my seat on the Select Committee to my Honourable friend, Mr. Chaman Lall. It was he who suggested that I should sit on the Select Committee, as it would give me an opportunity to look into labour conditions. When we were sitting on the Select Committee, I thought Sir George Rainy, a shrewd Scotchman, was going to be stiff and taciturn, but I found him very genial, always anxious to oblige, and in fact he was prepared to go far beyond what my Honourable friend Mr. Shanmukham Chetty and others of the same school could desire. Mr. Hayman who, it is true was in that Committee, not as a member, but as adviser, was very anxious to go a long way to meet my friend Mr. Abdul Matin Chaudhury. Although he was not prepared to legislate for a 48-hour week, he was prepared to meet him as far as possible. Here I may mention, for the benefit of the House, the clause as it stands in the Bill:

"A railway servant, other than a railway servant whose employment is essentially intermittent, shall not be employed for more than sixty hours a week on the average in any month."

The House will note the expression "not more than sixty hours". And with the assurance which Mr. Hayman has just given, Mr. Abdul Matin Chaudhury can have no reasonable cause for apprehension.

Sir, I approach this Railway Bill from three standpoints. I approach it as a representative of the taxpayers' interests as one who is interested in employment of private labour, and as one who wants to see that the Indian railways flourish, on a sound financial footing. Only recently it was my privilege to speak in this House about the net surplus of Indian railways for the last five years. This surplus can only be regarded as unsatisfactory. I therefore asked Mr. Hayman, supposing we were to legislate for 48 hours a week, what would be the expenditure involved. He said that a good part of the net surplus would be swallowed up. That was a position to which I was not prepared to agree. From my own experience of the employees on railways I know that they are very well looked after. They are employed on the best industrial service in the whole of India. They are very carefully looked after not only by the Agents and by the other superior officers of the railway, but also by the railway medical men. They are provided with excellent houses and they live under conditions of abnormal life quite different from those working in factories or other industrial workers in cities like Bombay and Calcutta under abnormal conditions. This is also one of the grounds on which I am opposed to 48 hours a week.

My next reason was the effect of a 48-hour week on private employment. Already the growing charges of the civil administration of this country and also of the railways have materially affected the position of private employment. I think Government have been too considerate in fixing the salaries for their subordinates as well as for their officials; the result is that it is slowly becoming a difficult problem to get suitable candidates for private employment on economic rates. In the circumstances, I felt that it was my duty to oppose a 48-hour week. What I feel we want is a sound financial foundation for our railways. But if you bring into legislative enactment at once a 48-hour week, the net result would be that it would absorb a substantial portion of our net railway surplus every year.

Lastly, Sir, if I may say a word of warning to my friend, Mr. Chaman Lall. My recent experience about railways in India has taught me that discipline and attention to work, which used to be the feature of railway works in India, are slowly going down. The standard of efficiency has also suffered. To a certain extent we at this House must be prepared to bear the responsibility because too many questions about railwaymen's grievances are brought before this House. The time has come when we must consider seriously the advisability of starting a "Grievance Committee".

[Mr. K. C. Roy.]

Unless we have committees of this sort like the Whitley Committee, the discipline of the railway services will suffer by the present method of bringing these questions before the House. I support the Bill, Sir, and unlike Mr. Kelkar, I will vote for the consideration of the Select Committee's Report.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

MEMBER SWORN:

Mr. T. N. Ramakrishna Reddi, M.L.A. (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural).

THE INDIAN RAILWAYS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. President: I think I had better put the question; other speeches will follow on the amendment.

The question is:

"That the Bill further to amend the Indian Railways Act, 1890, for certain purposes, as reported by the Select Committee, be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 2 stand part of the Bill.

Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury (Assam: Muhammadan): Sir, I move:

"That in clause 2, in sub-section (1) of the proposed section 71C for the word 'sixty' the word 'forty-eight' be substituted."

When this Bill was referred to the Select Committee, I pleaded for an eight-hour day for the railway workers, and I need hardly repeat that this demand for an 8-hour day is a demand for the barest act of social justice to the workers. It is universally conceded that the workers must have rest, that they must have recreation and that they must have time for the discharge of their social and family duties, just as my friend Mr. Chetty or my friend Mr. Hayman should have. This principle of an 8-hour day is generally accepted throughout the world as a principle for hours of work in all industrial and commercial undertakings. In England 92.6 per cent. of the workers work on an 8-hour day and less; under an agreement that has been entered into between the National Union of Railwaymen and the employers, the railwaymen in England work for 48 hours a week—six days of 8 hours, and Sunday is treated as overtime. In France there is an 8-hour day Act, which applies to all the industrial and commercial undertakings, not only in France but in Algeria and other colonial possessions; they have got an 8-hour day Act for the miners and for the seamen, and according to the statistics collected in 1926, out of over six million workers in France employed in industrial and commercial undertakings, over five millions work for 48 hours and less.

In Germany, the average scheduled hours of work in the German Federal Railway, for the workers, are eight hours a day for continuous workers and in the case of intermittent workers it might be extended to ten hours.

In the Italian railways the average hours of actual work in the State Railways are fixed at about 48 hours—and the same is the case in industrial, commercial and agricultural undertakings where continuous attention is necessary. In Italy, Sir, 10 per cent. of the workers work for less than 48 hours a week; about 60 per cent. work for 48 hours, and 27 per cent. for more than 48 hours.

In the Austrian Railways the maximum is 48 hours a week. On railways in Poland the maximum weekly hours are 46. In Esthonia on railways the maximum is 47. In Spain, in the coal mines and industrial undertakings and in the railways, the maximum is 48 hours a week; and 92.5 per cent. of the workers in Spain work for 48 hours or less.

In Greece the 48-hour week is applied to tanneries, printing works, manufacture of confectionery and chocolates, of leather goods and trunks, of the paper-making industry, tobacco stores and factories, underground work in mines, manufacture of cement and to slaughter houses.

In Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, Szecho-Slovakia, and the Kingdom of Serbs, Croates and Slovanes, in all the industrial undertakings the maximum hours of work are 48 hours a week.

In Norway and the Netherlands the maximum is 8½ hours a day and 48 in the week. In Lithuania in workshops and factories the maximum hours do not exceed 48. In Latania manual workmen work for eight hours a day and non-manuals for six hours a day.

So much, Sir, about Europe. I shall next come to America. In America, out of twenty-seven principal industries, fifteen industries work for 48 hours a week or less. I could give you some examples. The average weekly hours in furniture manufacture is 48; in lumber manufacture and mill work, 47.5; in printing publishing, book and job, 47.3; in paper products, 47.3; in cotton manufacture, 47; in leather tanning and finishing, 46.9; in wool manufacture, 46.6; in hosiery and knitted goods manufacture, 46.1; in silk manufacture, 46; in printing and publishing newspaper periodicals, 45.8; in automobile manufacture, 45.2; in electrical and apparatus manufacture, 45; in boot and shoe manufacture, 44.8; in rubber manufacture, 44.7.

Then, Sir, in the railways in Argentina, in Peru, in Bolivia, in Uruguay the maximum is eight hours a day.

In Australia, in Victoria, Tasmania, Western Australia and Queensland the maximum hours of work are eight hours a day. In New South Wales it is 44 hours a week, in New Zealand the maximum is 8½ hours a day and 48 hours a week.

Coming next to the Union of South Africa, drivers and foremen in railways work for 96 hours a fortnight; guards and ticket-examiners work for 108 hours a fortnight; the permanent way staff work for 53½ hours to 51 hours in Summer and 49½ hours to 48 hours in the Winter.

[Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury.]

Sir, this is the position all the world over; and here in India we are being asked to accept this atrocious principle of 60 hours and 84 hours a week.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: How much is it in Japan?

Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury: I have no information available. Even in India, in the case of postal workers in the Railway Mail Service and those, who work in the day, work for 36 hours in the week; those who work day and night work for 33 hours in the week; and those who work only during the night, work for 30 hours only in the week. I do not understand why railway workers, who are working under identical conditions, should be condemned to longer hours, while those working in the Railway Mail Service under the Postal Department are working 30 hours a week.

I should now like to deal with some of the objections that have been raised by the previous speakers. My friend Mr. Shanmukham Chetty said that India should be treated differently from other countries because of climatic considerations. I entirely agree, Sir. If eight hours a day is justified in the West there is justification for still shorter hours in India, because, Sir, eight hour day in a tropical country is more fatiguing, more exhausting and more deleterious to the workers' health than eight hours a day in a temperate climate.

Then, Sir, Mr. Hayman and Mr. Chetty argued about the repercussion on other industries. I have never heard a more absurd argument than the argument about repercussion. If we carry it to its logical conclusion, it means this, that in the railways there should be the lowest wage and the longest hours because, unless you pay the lowest wage to the railway workmen, there will be repercussion on other industries; similarly, in the railways, according to this argument, you should have the longest hours, because if you reduce the hours of work there will be repercussion on other industries, and the workmen will demand shorter hours. This position, Sir, on the face of it, is quite untenable.

Then my friends Mr. K. C. Roy and Mr. Hayman referred to the cost. I would ask them one simple question. Do you intend to sweat your labour to provide a surplus revenue? Mr. Kelkar said that he would agree to this as a first instalment; I suppose he takes it as an advance. It has taken the Government about 11 years to make a move in this matter, and I do not consider this measure as an advance at all. I consider it as a backward step. I consider it as a most retrograde measure, I consider it as an anachronism at the present day, and I say to Honourable Members of this House that they will be condemning themselves and this House before the bar of world public opinion if they lend their support to the proposal of Government.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, not being connected with business of any kind, either as a labourer or as an employer, I find myself in some difficulty. I thought that the Report of the Select Committee would provide some enlightenment on those points which were obscure before; but I have not been able to derive any information from the Select Committee's Report which would enable me to solve the doubts that existed in my mind.

Sir, before making up my mind with regard to the merits of the controversy between Government and some Members of this House on the one side, and my friend Diwan Chaman Lall and Mr. Abdul Matin Chaudhury on the other, I should like to know what is the number of men who will benefit if the legislation before the House is accepted in its present form. You have about eight hundred thousand men on State-managed and Company-managed railways. You propose to make some exemptions. It is only certain classes to whom the new legislation will apply. I think it is a fair demand on our part to know what is the proportion of existing railway employees that will benefit by the fixing of a 60 hours' week. In the second place, Sir, I should like to know what are the present hours of work in the more important railway departments. It has been alleged by my friend Diwan Chaman Lall that in the railway workshops and in certain other activities railway employees already work only for eight hours a day, or even less. If that is so, it is quite clear that these men do not stand to gain anything from this new legislation. If in the more important departments of activity the principle of a shorter day has been accepted, I think it is for Government to justify why a longer day should be enforced in the case of other men.

The third point on which I want information is what would be the increase in expenditure if the Bill placed before us by Government is accepted. I should like them to bear in mind in this connection that there are certain forms of work in regard to which overtime allowances are paid. If the hours of work are shortened and an additional staff is employed, to what extent will the money saved on the payment of overtime allowances suffice for the engagement of the new staff?

Lastly, Sir, I should like to know what additional expenditure would be incurred in case an 8-hours' day is accepted. You are already prepared to face a certain increase in expenditure by the acceptance of the Washington and Geneva Conventions. I should like to know what the excess over this expenditure would be if the 8-hours' day is accepted.

These are the specific points, Sir, on which I desire some information. We cannot decide the issue before us even on purely material grounds unless this information is forthcoming. But I should just like to say a word or two with regard to the point of view that I adopt in considering a matter of this kind. My Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy, has on more than one occasion told us that it is impossible for Government to deal with labour questions without bearing in mind prominently financial considerations. It is obvious, Sir, that an industry of any kind cannot provide for labour more than its earning capacity renders possible. But on the other hand, I should not like these questions to be judged from a purely financial standpoint. The human factor has also to be considered. It is not merely that the trend of modern sentiment has changed, but practical conditions in India themselves require that the human factor should be borne prominently in mind in dealing with these questions. And here I cannot forget that Government have taken about ten years to give effect to the Washington Convention and about four years to the Geneva Conventions. Had their recommendations been accepted earlier, more experience might have been gained, and it might have been possible for us now to have material in connection with the inquiry that is to be undertaken by Geneva next year.

My friend, Mr. Shanmukham Chetty, drew our attention to a very important point when he asked us to remember that the delegates of the employers and the employed had both agreed last year to have the question of reducing the working hours considered next year. We have also to remember that the length of the working day is one of the matters which will come under the consideration of the Labour Commission. I have no desire to prejudge the conclusions that might be arrived at, either by the Labour Commission or as a result of investigations at Geneva, but in view of the inquiry that is to be set on foot by Geneva next year, and the fact that the matter is to be considered by the Labour Commission, I think those of us who feel keenly on this subject ought to have no hesitation in making both Government and the other authorities that are concerned with this question feel that it is not only the labourers that are anxious for an amelioration of their position, but that those also who occupy a neutral position desire that they should be considered first and foremost as human beings. We should all bear in mind that the greatest capital at our disposal today is the efficiency and welfare of our human material.

Dr. L. K. Hyder: (Agra Division: Muhammadan Rural): I cannot claim that I am a labour agitator. I cannot claim that I administered the railways of the Government of India. I look at the matter from a detached point of view, and I have listened with the utmost attention to the case which has been made out for a 60 hours' week by the Members opposite. To my mind, Sir, there is in the case an unargued inference. That unargued inference is that, if you reduce the hours of work from 60 to 48, you will increase the cost. Now, Sir, this is the unargued inference to which I take objection. Is it at all likely, is it quite certain, that there will be an increase in cost? If you have shorter hours, the thing omitted from the calculation when the jump was made to this unargued inference is that there shall be, under no circumstances, an increase in the efficiency of the labourer. In other countries they have found out that there is an intimate relationship between the output and the hours of work.

Then, Sir, it is said that it may be all right elsewhere, we have no reason for believing that shortening the hours of work will make any increase in efficiency. I say, Sir, that the thing has to be proved before it has to be accepted on this side of the House.

Then, Sir, it has been said, leave the foreign countries alone; this is a special country with special circumstances. Unfortunately, Sir, I was not present in the House when the special circumstances were referred to, but I have revolved them in my mind, and I said to myself, "Can it be the climate?". Then of course it struck me at once that if the special circumstance referred to centre round the climate, then the argument is on this side and not on that side. If the special circumstances referred to the physique of the people, then again the argument is on this side and not on that side, on the side of shorter hours and not on the side of longer hours. If the special circumstances include a leisurely way of doing business, then I say the argument is on this side and not on that side, because we want you, Sir, to speed up and not to adopt the leisurely way of sending ten trains in 24 hours. It is no use asking the workers of the railway to adapt themselves to the leisurely way of running the trains. I have no doubt in my mind that the gentlemen who are responsible for administering the railway system in this country are aware that there is an economy of high wages. What my friend on my right was trying to do was to bring out the fact that there is also an economy of short hours. That is the whole meaning of the amendment which has been moved by him. There is another matter to which I shall refer. I would not base the case for shortening the hours, as my friend on my right has done, and it struck me as peculiar also that while on the one hand it was said that the Railway Administration entertains a humanitarian outlook, on the other that it could not forget the interests of the taxpayers. I say, Sir, that I neither accept the one position nor the other. Let us look at the railway as a business concern, and that is the only aspect, and let us not then talk of social justice or social benevolence or humanitarian views. No, Sir, the railway worker is engaged in an industry, and the case for him rests, and can be made to rest, not on giving a dole or being charitable to him, but on his being intimately connected with the industry itself, and the whole question is whether the man whom you engage on one of these terms, the terms of 48 hours, is a man who gives the value for the money he receives. That is the case on which the railway worker should be judged, and there should be no talk either of benevolence or of a humanitarian attitude, because these things do not and should not come in the calculations of a capable railway administrator, and the worker himself stands on solid ground when he says, quite frankly and openly, "For 48 hours I shall give you an output in work which may be equal to the output which you might exact from me in 60 hours". That is the case. Well, Sir, it is on this ground that, after listening to the speeches delivered on that side of the House and also on this side, and after giving a proper amount of attention to this matter, I have come to the conclusion that the railway worker can stand on his own ground as an independent worker. Reference has been made to what is done in another country. Of course, the obvious retort is: what is done in the large majority of countries? There, there is the fear of the future which is perhaps deterring certain Members of the House from supporting my friend. The fear is that, if this legislation is introduced, there is no doubt that other industries will follow. I say, when then? Even in other organised industries the labourer shall be able to earn his wage by reason of the efficiency of his work, which should be limited to 48 and not 60 hours a week.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh (Muzaffarpur cum Champaran: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I welcome this piece of legislation as a tardy recognition on the part of Government of the much-needed relief due to a deserving class of our public servants, I mean the railway employees. But, Sir, I should like to record my disapproval at this piecemeal interference with the Indian Railways Act. The Acworth Committee, if I remember aright, recommended that a wholesale revision of the Act should take place in the light of present day requirements. This was many years back. I also tried to bring this matter up before the House, but I was told that only last year the question of a somewhat comprehensive revision of the Indian Railways Act had been referred to the Rates Advisory Committee. So far as this legislation is concerned, there is no doubt that it is in some respects an advance upon the existing condition of things, but I should have wished it to go a little further. There are certain provisions of the Indian Factories Act which deal with the employment of labour, the hours of work, period of rest, and so on. I need not refer specifically to those provisions, but I would mention in passing sections 21, 22, 27, 28, etc., of the Indian Factories Act. I would only say this that overwork in factories is a matter which may be dangerous only to the workman himself, but overwork on the part of an employee on a railway is dangerous to a large number of the travelling public who have to travel on that railway. Let us take an instance. Suppose, a pointsman of a railway whose work is a risky one has been long on duty, and if an accident takes place on account of any inadvertent inattention or temporary absence on his part, he may not himself suffer, but it results in fatal consequences to the passengers. Therefore, Sir, I think that the amount of relief and respite given to workmen on the railways should be on a more generous scale than the amount of relief and respite given to workmen under the Indian Factories Act. I need not dwell on this fact that a workman who has been long on duty is physically and mentally unfit to discharge the responsibilities of his post requiring sustained exertion. It is therefore necessary that he should be given the much-needed relief to which he is entitled not only on humanitarian grounds, but also of public safety. If the causes of railway accidents are analysed, it will be found that many of the accidents owe their origin to inadvertent inattention or unconscious negligence on the part of some railway employees, who have been overworked and cannot bear the strain. The Bill, Sir, proposes to introduce 84 hours a week for those railway employees whose services are essentially intermittent.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: On a point of order, Sir. Will not this question arise on the next amendment, which stands in the name of Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury?

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: I need not dwell, Sir, on that point, because it has not yet been taken up. But I am glad to see that Government have undertaken an investigation into the whole question, and the result of it will be awaited with interest. Besides, we have got the Labour Commission which is now in labour, and by next year we may expect the recommendation of this Commission, which is likely to be on a more generous scale so far as the hours of work are concerned than the one which is proposed under this Bill. My information is that, in Japan, the hours of work are ten hours. I do not know if my information is correct, but I shall be glad if I am corrected. So, India is not the only country which has got a ten hours' working day, but we should try to bring it down to eight hours here.

In conclusion, I would like to say this. I find that a period of two years will be taken to give effect to the provisions of this Bill after it becomes law. This period, to my mind, is a rather long one, and I should have liked that the provisions of this law should come into force much earlier than that.

Rai Sahib Harbilas Sarda: (Ajmer-Merwara: General): Sir, I rise to support the amendment proposed by the Honourable Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury. In the minute of dissent which I appended to the Select Committee's Report, I said that in two other Departments of Government, the hours of employment per week were not more than 48. In the Telegraph Department, for instance, the signallers do not work for more than 48 hours a week. In the Railway Mail Service, which is a branch of the Postal Department, sorters do not work for more than 36 hours a week. Mail guards, whose duties are less arduous, work at the utmost for 56 hours a week. In the Telegraph Department the day is one of eight hours, with relaxation on Sundays. If this is so in two Departments of Government, where work for eight hours a day is deemed sufficient, and if, as the Honourable Mr. Hayman has said, in the railway workshops the rule for years has been 42½ hours or 44 hours of work a week, then I see no reason why there should be a provision in this Act to allow work up to 60 hours a week. I think, therefore, that, on the analogy of the Telegraph and Postal Departments, the week should be a week of 48 hours work only.

Diwan Chaman Lall: Sir, I rise to support the amendment of my Honourable friend Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury. I want to be very brief in this matter because I have already said a good bit upon this subject. One reason why I rose to speak was because of the very able speech made by my Honourable friend Mr. Shanmukham Chetty. Mr. Chetty brandished the sword of his forensic ability in my face, and thereby gave a tremendous amount of assistance to Honourable Members sitting opposite, whose sword, it seems to me, happens to be a wooden one. What are the arguments advanced by my Honourable friend Mr. Chetty? I think he objected to what he understood me as saying that I implied this, that India had obtained an exemption from the Washington Convention. He would prefer me to say that India had obtained an exemption in the Washington Convention. It is all a difference of "from" and "in". I do not recollect that I myself was guilty of that blunder. I have had this matter thrashed out on another occasion in another country with the High Commissioner of India, and I was perfectly aware of what I was saying. What I was saying was this, that India had obtained an exemption in regard to the 48 hours a week in the Washington Convention, and I read out Article 10, which gives that special exemption. My Honourable friend over there said it was a provision. I say, call it what you like, provision or anything you like, the actual effect of that is that that exemption was obtained by India in the Washington Convention. Now, my Honourable friend Mr. Chetty referred to Article 427 and he said, "Well, in regard to Article 427, you are empowered, the authority is given to you by the Treaty of Versailles itself to make these exemptions". I do want to read to the House Article 427. I want to point out that there in Article 427 general principles were laid down and a high hope expressed by the high contracting parties that these general principles would be the guiding factors in labour legislation to be undertaken by those contracting parties, and it was said that the high contracting parties recognised that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual of industrial wage earners was of supreme international importance. Well, the first test that I want my Honourable friend, Mr. Chetty, to apply is this, whether an eight hours' day would conduce more to the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual of the industrial classes of India or whether a ten hours' day would be more conducive to that end. I want him to answer that question. Would it not be better for the railway worker to work eight hours a day and have leisure and develop himself mentally, or would it be worse for him if he had the leisure that would be available to him by working ten hours a day?

The second point is they said, it is of supreme international importance. The high contracting parties have framed in order to further this great end a permanent machinery provided for in section 1. Then they go on to say that they recognise that differences in climate, habits and customs and of economic opportunity and industrial traditions make strict uniformity of the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment. Now, I want to ask my Honourable friend again, what particular exceptions laid down there militate against the grant of an eight hours' day to the workers on the railways in India. Let me take the first, that is climate. Climate is a factor which does not militate against the Honourable Member granting us an eight hours' day on the railways; on the contrary, it ought to help him to give us an eight hours' day. I hold in my hand a Report issued by a fairly well known authority, published by the International Labour Office, on the question of the relation of working hours to climate, and this is the conclusion that this author comes to in regard to the subject of working hours in relation to climate. The author insists, on scientific considerations, that for industrial countries which are situated south of Europe, the hours of work should be shorter than for other northern European countries, at any rate during the hot season. If climatic conditions in Europe lead this scientific investigator to state that, where there is a higher temperature in Southern Europe, you should have shorter hours, then why should not that principle be applicable here in India, and to the railway workers in particular? I ask, Sir, whether it is not a fact that the question of climate is an argument in our favour, not an argument in the Honourable Member's favour.

Then, take the next, customs and habits. I have yet to know of an individual in this country who possesses the courage to get up and say that the habits and customs of Indian workers are such that they prevent the Honourable Member from giving us an eight hours' day on the railways.

Take the next question of economic opportunity or industrial traditions. Is that the ground, I take it, which anybody would be foolhardy enough to advance? Is there anybody who would say that the economic opportunities and the industrial traditions of India are such that we should stick to sixty hours a week rather than to forty-eight hours a week? If these are the only exceptions laid down there of which advantage could be taken by national countries, then I ask where is the argument for stating that, because those exceptions are laid down in Article 427, therefore it is perfectly right that exceptions must be taken advantage of. And when we go on in Article 427 to the general principles laid down, what do we find? The fourth principle is the adoption of an eight-hour day or a 48-hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it is not already attained. This was in the year 1919. The standard to be aimed at is 48 hours a week. I want to ask my Honourable friend over there, what has he done during the last ten years to attain this particular standard which was brought to his notice as the standard to be aimed at for the benefit of the working classes in India? I want to ask this question: whether during that period anything has been done to approximate to this standard? If anything has been done to approximate to this standard, what is the experience gained? Does the Honourable Member's experience tell him, I want to ask him in all sincerity, does his experience tell him that a 60-hour week is desirable for the railway workers? Can he honestly get up in his seat and say that his experience is that a 60-hour week is better than a 48-hour week? I take it that my Honourable friend would not make that statement. If it is not correct that a 60-hour week is better than a 48-hour week, then what are the conditions? Why is it that a provision of a 60-hour week has been embodied in this Bill and why is it being passed into a statute as far as the railway workers are concerned? I want to ask my Honourable friend, Mr. Shanmukham Chetty, to give me the reasons why he wants it. If my Honourable friend is so fond of Geneva and of the statutes laid down, in the Peace Treaty, why does he want the 60-hour week? He remembers the Preamble, in which it has been said that the existing conditions of labour involve such injustices and hardships and privations to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world is in danger. There is a statement made in the Preamble to the Peace Treaty, in reference to the organisation of labour and they recognise that those conditions of hardship which create this unrest have got to be done away with and a better system adopted. Now, my Honourable friend has had ten years in which to work that better system. Why has he not adopted it? The argument that I would place before him is this. Let him take for instance the workshop employees. Is it admitted that workshop employees work 48 hours a week or less than 48 hours? Is it true or is it not true? Let me take the engineering department, labour employed on the maintenance of permanent way that is gangmen and keymen. Is it not a fact that they are not working more than eight hours a day? Again, take the case of gate keepers. Do they or do they not work in three shifts of eight hours a day? Take your station staff. On all important stations, are they not working eight hours a day? Take your large sheds. Are they also not working on eight-hour shifts? So is the case with your running staff. If it is a fact that all these people are working on an eight-hour shift today, then I ask what is all this camouflage for? You come to us on the floor of this House and, in spite of the fact that in actual practice many thousands of your workmen are working on an eight-hour day basis, you want to pass—after this exemption has existed for the past ten years—a law that the railway workers should be ruled by the 60-hour week and not the 48-hour week. I would have understood my Honourable friend if he had turned round and said, "In regard to this particular class of workers, who no longer are working more than eight hours, I will make an exception. In regard to the running staff, I may have a little difficulty, and therefore I will so circumscribe the sphere of this Act or so limit its operation or so limit its duration that, after I have investigated, I will go back to 48 hours". I could have understood this if he had said so. What is it that induced my Honourable friend to publish this scheme at the present moment in regard to the 48 hours and the 60 hours? This problem has been raised by me, and why? I want to know if it is fact that, in actual practice, he has got a 48-hour week which applies to many thousands of his workers. My Honourable friend, Mr. Hayman, would say, prohibitive cost. I challenge that statement and I challenge him to produce figures about this cost. Take your running staff. Your running staff, the guards and drivers, are paid on the basis of certain miles, or certain hours of work done over and above their duty. Now whatever extra is earned by them in the overtime that they put in, suppose you were to limit their hours of work to eight, you could then increase your staff; or whatever increase you give in the shape of overtime, you could distribute the money to your extra staff. Even if you have to spend more money, is it not right that you should spend that money? My Honourable friend there puts up his hands and he says, no money. But you have plenty of money. What has happened to your reserves? Where are they? A mere book entry? Are they mere book entries? I believe you have got 15 crores as your Depreciation Fund and 20 crores as your Reserve, making 35 crores. Could you not take a little flea-bite, a few crores out of that and deal with this problem? I do not believe for a moment that it is a question of crores. It is a simple question, and if you only had the will, you could deal with it promptly and efficiently. But the Government of India move very slowly; they think they move very surely, but I am not quite certain. I think the attitude they have adopted in regard to this matter demands a straightforward reply. Will you tell us exactly why you are now at the present moment coming forward with this demand, and tell us why it is not 48 hours? What is the objection to 48 hours? If you say it is finance, have you worked out the figures of finance? Have you worked out the figure of cost? How much extra cost would it involve? Give us the figure; it is no use taking the vote of this House on an issue in regard to which facts have been withheld from us. Let us have all the facts and figures here. Have you got any facts or figures to substantiate the statement you have made? If it is either cost, or if it is climate, if it is expediency, if it is the demand of the workers, if it is compliance with Geneva, let us have all these arguments; because, as far as compliance with Geneva is concerned, you have not got a leg to stand on. You have not got a leg to stand on so far as the question of climate is concerned. I do not know, nor I think does any other Member of the House know, what the extra cost would be, because I believe you have not worked out the figures of that extra cost. Under these circumstances I submit that it would be wrong on the part of any Honourable Member to suggest either to Government or to any industrialist on the floor of this House that they must not adopt 48 hours a week merely because of its repercussion upon other industries in India. This is an honest, just, straightforward and reasonable demand, namely, a demand for 48 hours. What business has any Honourable Member on the floor of this House to turn round and say that he will not give it merely because it might have some repercussion on other industries? Are the Government of India, I want to ask, in the pay of the Indian capitalist or the British capitalist in India, that they have this tender regard for the needs of the Indian and British capitalists when they have no regard for the Indian worker on the railways? Which would they prefer, the dividends of the industrialists, or the happiness,—intellectual, moral and physical happiness,—and well-being of the industrial worker on the railways? They have their choice and I hope they will be wise and make their choice in the right direction.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, this question, which has been under discussion since the House resumed after lunch, is of course the crux of the whole Bill. The most important question that can be raised on this Bill is whether the limit for the hours of work should remain at 60 a week, as fixed in the Bill, or whether it should be reduced to 48, as proposed by my Honourable friend Mr. Abdul Matin Chaudhury. Now, although the amendment stands in the name of my Honourable friend, perhaps I am entitled to say that the protagonist of 48 hours is my other Honourable friend Diwan Chaman Lall, since he has made two speeches on the subject and Mr. Abdul Matin Chaudhury has made only one.

Now, one of the reasons which he adduced as reason, why the House should make the limit 48 hours and not 60, was the delay of the Government of India in dealing with this question. It does not seem to me to be a very relevant reason, but since something was said about it by more than one speaker, I think it is reasonable that I should reply in regard to it. It is obvious from what I said in a speech during the Budget discussions last year, that I feel myself that the question has been delayed much too long. I frankly admit it. But if anyone asks the reason why the question was not taken up effectively sooner, I can give an answer in two words. We should never have been able to take it up effectively until we had the Labour Member on the Railway Board. It is a simple point that you must have people whose definite business it is to work out the complicated details of a question like this, and until we had the necessary machinery, we could not deal with the difficulties. It took me two years, after I became a Member of Council, to make up my mind that we must correct the defect in our organisation, and it was not until that defect had been corrected, that it was possible for me to make any substantial progress with this question of compliance with the Washington and Geneva Conventions.

I should like to refer to the questions put by my Honourable friend, Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru. What are the existing hours of work in the workshops, he asked, and if, as has been stated, you can work 48 hours or even 42 hours a week in the workshops, does not that admit the principle of 48 hours a week, and ought you not to apply that limit generally? Now, the reason why we could, without a great deal of difficulty, keep within a 48 hours' week or even a lower limit in the workshops is that we could shut down the workshops for one day in the week altogether and work eight hour shifts on the remaining six days. If it were possible to shut down to a very large extent, as is customary in European countries, the work of the railways generally to (say) 50 per cent. on one day in the week, the whole question would become a great deal easier. In Europe a large part of the work is closed down on the weekly rest day, and for a very large portion of the staff no substitutes are required on that day; whereas in India we cannot close down or reduce the work, because the trains run as they do on other days, and the result is that, with a 48 hour week, we should require substitutes for the whole of the staff on the weekly rest day. That brings me to what my Honourable friend Dr. Hyder said. He said, are you sure that there will be an increase of cost? Is it not true that, in many branches of industry, the economy of short hours and the economy of high wages has been demonstrated, and would it not be the same on the railways? So far as the workshops are concerned, it is a perfectly good argument. In theory it can only be tested by experience, but I should not be the least surprised to find that, given efficient control and management, you might pay higher wages and work shorter hours, and still get a larger output. But my difficulty about the great bulk of the labour, who will benefit from this Bill, is precisely this, that I do not see how the output can increase. What is the output of a railway as a traffic carrying concern, except the number of passengers it carries, the volume of goods it carries, and the number of trains that pass over the lines in a given period? If, in order to work to a 48-hour week, the railways have to incur increased expenditure in order that the staff at each station may work shorter hours, there will be no increase in the number of trains, no increase in the number of passengers, no increase in the volume of goods carried, and therefore there must be an increase of expenditure which you cannot recoup directly by any increase in earnings. The only compensating advantage, from the commercial point of view that you can expect, is greater safety from accidents perhaps, or other indirect advantages of that sort. I do not think that Dr. Hyder's argument is fairly applicable to the circumstances of the railways.

Now to revert once more to certain other questions put by Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru. He wanted to know how many men would profit by the provisions of the Bill, he wanted to know what the increase in expenditure was likely to be as a result of the operation of this Bill, if it passed into law, and wanted to know what the further increase in expenditure would be from the introduction of a 48-hours' week. The second question, I can answer. The first and the third, for reasons which I will explain, I am not in a position to answer. With regard to the second, the recurring expenditure, as a result of the present Bill, will be about 50 lakhs a year or possibly it may be slightly higher. I understand that the non-recurring expenditure on the construction of quarters, etc., may amount to as much as 75 lakhs. But as regards the further increase in expenditure which would result from a 48-hours' week, if I had an estimate in my possession which I could regard as giving a reasonably accurate idea of what it was likely to cost, I should be most happy to lay it before the House. I have not got such an estimate nor can I give the figures of the number of men likely to be advantaged by the passing of this Bill into law. The reason is this. In order to get really accurate figures, we should have got to examine the conditions in every railway station in India and see exactly what the conditions are at each station and what additional staff is required in order to give effect to the change in the law. Still more would that be necessary to get an accurate estimate of the cost of a 48-hour week. But I am quite confident of this, that it would cost considerably more to go on to the 48-hours week than it costs to give effect to the provisions of the present Bill. Until that matter has been fully explored, apart from any other argument, I could not ask this House to agree to the adoption of the 48-hour week. My Honourable friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, seemed to me to argue that, because Government could not show that the cost was prohibitive, therefore the House ought to tell the Government to go ahead. Now, I would ask this, supposing we are going to construct a new Railway line or a new project, or to make a large improvement and if we come to the Standing Committee and say we have no evidence that the cost will be prohibitive, would the Standing Finance Committee tell us to go ahead?

Diwan Chaman Lall: May I interrupt my Honourable friend? My point is not that. My point is merely this. You had ten years in which to investigate the possibilities of a 48-hours' week. Why have you not investigated that possibility?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I have given my answer to my Honourable friend already. Until we had our labour organisation at the Headquarters of the Railway Board, there was not the least chance of this question being adequately examined. I made it quite plain that this very question, the adequate examination of this very question, was one of the main reasons why I considered it necessary that the organisation of the Railway Board should be changed.

Again my Honourable friend asked, had we not the reserve available? I have always been taught, ever since I came to this country, that it was not right to use non-recurring income to meet recurring expenditure, and I am afraid I am too old to unlearn that lesson.

I have now run over the main points why the Government of India are unable at present to accept the reduction of the figure in the Bill from 60 hours to 48 hours. It would mean a serious addition to the expenditure of the railways, and it is an addition which, if introduced suddenly, might mean a definite increase in rates and fares. The whole question will have to be examined in connection with the revision of the Washington Convention, as far as India is concerned. There is no question about that. But at present I would press upon the House that, what we have got to do is to carry out the obligations we have already incurred and not to commit ourselves to other obligations which involve heavy expenditure and which we could not give full effect to for several years to come, because the whole of the preliminary work has still to be done. But my Honourable friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, says, why have the Government brought the question forward at this stage as a matter of urgency? Having waited for ten years, why could they not wait a little longer? In particular, he said, if the House should decide in favour of the Bill as presented by Government, then it would in effect be providing an argument why, when the Convention comes under revision, we should not move forward to a 48-hour week. Now, if I thought that this Bill would prejudice the freest and fullest examination of the question whether or not a 48-hour week should be adopted in India, I should be very sorry to bring it forward. But I cannot believe that it will have that prejudicial effect, and I am quite sure that that idea was not present to the mind of any Member of Government. For one reason alone it seems to me that the apprehension expressed by my Honourable friend is quite groundless. After all is not this a matter very much within the sphere of the Royal Commission on Labour, and is it likely that my Honourable friend or his colleagues will be deterred from making any recommendation they think right in the interests of India because the Legislature of India passes a Bill to give effect to obligations incurred by the Government of India several years ago? Is it likely? and if not, what reason has my Honourable friend for feeling any apprehension on the point? For the reasons I have given, Mr.

President, Government are unable to accept the amendment
4 P.M. moved by my Honourable friend, and I hope that the House will not accept it either.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That in clause 2, in sub-section (1) of the proposed section 71C for the word 'sixty' the word 'forty-eight' be substituted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: I think this is a convenient stage to adjourn unless the Honourable Member in charge of the Bill desires that we should continue.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: I think it is desirable, Sir, that this Bill should be proceeded with. I am very anxious that there should be no possibility of this Bill not getting through this Session.

Mr. President: Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury.

Maulvi Abdul Matin Chaudhury: Sir, I move:

"That in clause 2, in sub-section (2) of the proposed section 71C, for the word 'eighty-four' the word 'sixty' be substituted."

This clause provides for an 84-hour week for the essentially intermittent worker. It makes no provision for hours of rest or for a holiday. If, Sir, the hardship involved in this case is not apparent to Honourable Members from the clause itself, nothing that I can say will have any possible effect on them; and I do not want to take the time of the House by expounding the obvious. I move.

Mr. A. M. Hayman: Sir, my Honourable friend has spoken just a few words on his motion, and I propose also to be very brief. I wish to say that there are many safeguards that we are going to take in order to prevent our essentially intermittent workers from being called upon to work for more than a reasonable number of hours. It is true that we have provided for a maximum of 84 hours' duty for them; but we will, by executive instructions, see that, if required to be on duty for about 12 hours a day, they definitely enjoy long periods of inaction at least during such duty. Our rules will provide two periods of inaction which exceed half an hour each and we shall see that there are other periods of inaction too. I would like to say that it is our intention to examine the work of every one of our employees from the point of view of finding out how much actual work they do, in order to classify them as essentially intermittent or as continuous workers. I would like to make just one brief reference to what the practice is in other countries in dealing with this question. In most of the Western countries the practice is to value the number of hours work which are essentially intermittent work on the principle of adding to the number of actual hours work a certain fraction of the hours during which an employee is on duty, but no work is actually performed. That is the principle adopted by almost all the Western countries, but they differ very largely in the basis on which the conversion is made. Some take the period of duty at only one-fifth, some at half and others at two-thirds of the working hours. We had at one time seriously considered whether we should not go in for this principle of measuring the hours of duty when work was not performed at a fraction of the hours of work thus doing away with the classification between continuous workers and essentially intermittent workers for the purpose of prescribing the maximum number of hours of duty for all. But we gave up that idea simply because we thought that it was better, in the interests of the men, to do so. These, Sir, are the brief explanations that I would give to satisfy the House that we are justified in adopting this higher number of maximum hours of duty for our essentially intermittent workers.

Diwan Chaman Lall: Sir, I am greatly at a loss to understand what justification there is for 84 hours, and why the Honourable Member over there is not prepared to accept the sixty-hour limit for these intermittent workers. What is the difficulty? I would like to know what difficulty there is. I would like to know, and I am sure Honourable Members on this side also would like to know, exactly why it is that 84 hours is a favourite figure and not 60 hours with the Government. Now, it so happens that it is our misfortune that Honourable Members opposite bring up these important suggestions affecting the lives of thousands of people, and on this side, with a House constituted as it is, they can turn round and treat these Benches with utter contempt. As one who would like at least to be treated to an intellectual treat, I am missing even that from the Government Benches. I would like some sort of statement of their reasons, valid or otherwise—that is for the House to judge—but let us have the reasons at least. We have got a bare statement already in the Bill that you have presented before us. Firstly, Sir, let us know why it is that you want 84 and not 60. If Mr. Hayman—I am not usurping his functions, Sir,—had turned round and said, "Here are my facts and figures of different classes of workers and continuous workers and intermittent workers, whose work is such that we are unable to put down a limit of less than 84 hours a week", I would have said "I will give my thought to it, I will give my best consideration to it." But I am not presented with these facts and figures; the Select Committee, as far as I can make out, have not been presented with these facts and figures; and I take it that this figure of 84 hours is put down because it has been the general rule so far that there are certain classes of workers who are working 84 hours a week, and therefore we are bound to that position. When a friend of mine over here turned round a little while ago and said that this was a step forward, I interrupted him and I questioned in what way this was a step forward? You prepare your rosters, and I can prove to the complete satisfaction of the Honourable Member over there, that in the preparation of your rosters now such difficulties arise as are not beneficial to certain classes of workers; and if that is the position, I ask, how is this a step forward? Now, I want to ask the Honourable Member—I am very glad and I congratulate the Honourable Member over the appointment he holds and I entirely agree with Sir George Rainy in what he has said, that it is since the appointment of this Member of the Railway Board that these matters have been looked into and I wish him all the luck in the world—I want to ask the Honourable Member not merely to look at these figures—I want him to look at them with a sympathetic eye. For instance, let us take the case of the intermittent workers. I want to know what the policy of the Government of India and of the Railway Board are in regard to the question of equated hours. Have you got a policy? Have you come to any conclusions? Let me give an example. Here is a worker who, if his total duty is totalled up, puts in, let us say, six hours of work in the course of a day, but he is put off for another spell, which totals ten hours a day. Knowing that, in all civilised countries, as far as I am aware, there is some sort of system whereby he is compensated to some extent, I want to know is he compensated here to any extent? . . .

Mr. B. Das: Now you are coming to the point.

Diwan Chaman Lall: I am glad, Sir, my friend, Mr. Das, is awakening to the realities of the situation. (Laughter.) He says that now I am coming to the point; he means by that, I suppose, that he sees the point. (Laughter.) I want to know whether it is or it is not a fact that there is no such system here. If there is, I would like to know what it is. Whether that is going to be worked by the Government of India, by the Railway Board or by the Honourable Member or not, I want to know, and until I do know that I shall oppose this proposition tooth and nail.

I come now to the difficulties that arise in regard to intermittent work, difficulties which can only be adjusted by a most careful consideration of the demands of the workers themselves. Here is a question which my friend will have to look into. When I am presented with a statement of this kind, that is to say, the old hours work were eight hours a day; and, in order to give rest for 24 hours, the rosters have been changed, and in one case the change has been such that it would seem there is now a system of employing a man for 12 hours a day for two days. I ask, is that in the interest of the workers? These matters cannot be adjusted unless there is the closest contact between the worker on the one side and the employer on the other. It is all very well for the Agent to put a man on special duty and tell his clerk to work out a roster on that basis. But when the roster is actually worked out, the worker finds that it is not to his advantage, that the roster has been broken in, and that he is made to work for longer hours on one or two particular days in the week, and in this way difficulties arise. How does my friend intend to adjust those difficulties? Does he intend to adjust them by calling a conference of the workers' representatives sitting in conclave with them and then decide the matter or by the mere ipse dixit of the Department over which he presides?

Now, Sir, I do want to know, as I started by saying, the justification for the 84-hour limit; why will not my friends over there accept the 60-hour limit? Secondly, I want to know, what method does the Honourable Member propose to adopt in order to give some compensation to those people who are engaged in intermittent work? There may be several classes of workers in regard to whom it may be said that their work is intermittent. I want to know what particular compensation, on the basis as it is prevailing today in other countries, he proposes to give them. Thirdly, I want to know whether he is prepared to accept the proposition that this matter must be settled in consultation with the representatives of the Union. May I ask lastly this, whether the Honourable Member is prepared, even though this measure may become the law, and may gain the sanction of a statute, the House being constituted as it is, to consult the representatives of the workers and fix a lower limit if it is found that the lower limit is a reasonable one?

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, I shall deal very briefly with the arguments that have been put forward. I should like, in the first place, to draw the attention of the House to the definition of "essentially intermittent" in clause 2 of the Bill. New section 71A reads thus:

"The employment of a railway servant is said to be 'essentially intermittent' when it has been declared to be so by the authority empowered in this behalf, on the ground that it involves long periods of inaction; during which the railway servant is on duty but is not called upon to display either physical activity or sustained attention."

This definition has been borrowed, I understand, from the definitions in force in various European countries.

Now, my friend, Diwan Chaman Lall, asked what steps were going to be taken to make sure that the interpretation placed upon the term "essentially intermittent" was reasonable and proper. The proposal in the rules is that power should be delegated to the head of each railway, and that he should have power of sub-delegation, but the control that will be exercised will be very largely exercised through the reports of the supervisors of railway labour. I quite realise that there is a danger of want of uniformity in this matter and of some railways classifying too freely as essentially intermittent work which ought not to be so classified. In addition to any control that we may be able to exercise direct from the Railway Board, we shall rely very largely on the reports of the Supervisors of railway labour, who will be specially asked to give their attention to this question.

Now, as regards the limit of 84 hours a week which is proposed to be fixed, I would like to make it plain that we are not pledged under the Washington Convention to fix any limit at all. It would have been possible simply to say that workers, once they were classed as "essentially intermittent" should be left out. We have inserted this limit because we think it reasonable that, even when a man's work is very light, and the actual work in proportion to the hours of duty is very small, there should be some maximum limit.

Finally, my friend asked whether the question of essentially intermittent work would be discussed with the Railway Unions. It seems to me that, if the men on a given railway are not satisfied with the manner in which work has been classed as "essentially intermittent", it would be entirely proper that the matter should be discussed between the

[Sir George Rainy.]

Unions and the Railway Administration. But if my Honourable friend means that we should discuss the question of the limit proposed to be set down in this Act either with a Union or with the Railwaymen's Federation, that is rather a different matter. Clearly, we cannot take the decisions of the Legislature elsewhere, as to a Court of revision. At the same time, it is only a maximum that is fixed by law, and it is perfectly open to the Railwaymen's Federation to represent to the Railway Board or the Government that a lower maximum should be fixed, and there would be nothing illegal in fixing a lower maximum on the State-managed railways. But I think it would be a great mistake if the Federation were to raise that question as an abstract question, and if the question is to be raised at all, it would be fit to take it up as regards particular classes of labour, so that we could get down to the facts and come to a conclusion as to what is a reasonable limit to the hours of work. That completes, I think, what I have to say, Sir.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That in clause 2, in sub-section (2) of the proposed section 71C, for the word 'eighty-four' the word 'sixty' be substituted."

The motion was negatived.

Clause 2 was added to the Bill.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, I move that the Bill, as reported by the Select Committee, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Half Past Four of the Clock on Friday, the 28th February, 1930.

THE BUDGET FOR 1930-31.

INTRODUCTORY.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): In presenting my budget proposals this year, I intend to depart to some extent from the procedure which has been followed hitherto and to confine my explanations of the past, current and prospective conditions, as far as possible, to a broad descriptive statement, leaving the great mass of detail of figures to be supplied in the Explanatory Memorandum which will be circulated to Honourable Members together with a copy of my speech. Nevertheless, it is necessary to give a good many figures in order to explain the situation and I am afraid that I have so many important matters to propound that it will not be possible for me to be very brief.

2. Honourable Members will recollect that, in reviewing the position Actual out-turn of 1928- last year, I said that the main question for consideration, in deciding our policy was whether the gap caused by the final remission of the provincial contributions in 1927 had been filled, or whether the time had come to recognise that it had not been filled and that it would be necessary to find some new source of revenue. In dealing with the revised estimates for 1928-29, I pointed out that the results for the year had been, or were likely to be, improved by a number of fortuitous circumstances, that is to say, a throwforward of land customs revenue from the preceding year and an abnormal anticipation of salt revenue owing to speculation. I indicated that, had it not been for these fortuitous circumstances, we should have had to anticipate a deficit in 1928-29; and I therefore thought that it was clear that the gap, to which I have referred, had not been filled in that year. Subsequent events have reinforced that conclusion. There was, in fact, a serious deterioration under several headings in the last two months of 1928-29, on top of which came an exceptional item, namely, a heavy drop in the amount which could be credited to revenue from the Gold Standard Reserve, due to the necessity for writing down the securities as a result of the raising of the Bank of England rate to 5½ per cent. in the middle of February last. This last item did not, of course, represent a realised loss and will, in fact, be more than made good by extra receipts in the current year. As a result of these factors, the year 1928-29 actually closed with a deficit of 1.06 lakhs instead of with the surplus of 30 lakhs anticipated in my revised estimates last year. The exceptional items of deterioration to which I have referred, may be regarded as counterbalancing, to some extent, the special favourable items which I mentioned last year, so that, on the whole the results of 1928-29 now appear more nearly in their true colours.

3. What this result has meant to us is that, instead of being able to make an addition of 30 lakhs to the balance of 74 lakhs standing to the credit of the Revenue Reserve Fund, the whole of that balance had to be drawn upon and we were left with an uncovered deficit of 32 lakhs.

REVIEW OF THE YEAR 1929-30.

4. Turning now to the results for the current year 1929-30, though I can see no cause for anything like permanent pessimism for the future, there are many things which have increased the difficulties of the present. Failure of rains in some places, excessive rains with serious flood damage in others, combined with political uncertainties which have had an unsettling effect on commerce and industry, have been factors special to India, while, at the same time, India has suffered from the general disturbance to world conditions caused mainly by the unprecedented Stock Exchange speculations in the United States followed by the sudden and sensational collapse in October. The speculation was accompanied by a huge demand for money to finance Stock Exchange transactions at high rates of interest which attracted a flow of capital from all countries on a scale which has hitherto been unknown. The collapse seems likely to result in a period of business stagnation in America, which has already produced a serious fall in the prices of all commodities. While the effect of these events on monetary conditions in India has been apparent throughout the year under review, the effect of the fall in prices on trade and production is only now beginning to be felt. I propose to revert later to general economic conditions in India. At the present stage, it is only necessary to give a brief review of the actual trade conditions in the first nine months of this year.

5. The visible balance of India's trade, including private imports of treasure, for the nine months ended the 31st December 1929 was 41.62 crores against 39.76 crores in 1928 and 33.07 crores in 1927. Exports of Indian merchandise, however, show a deterioration of about 8½ crores as compared with last year which is accounted for by a large drop under jute yarns and manufactures (3.38 crores), jute raw and waste (2.71 crores), wheat (1.46 crores), barley (1.58 crores) and hides and skins (1.39 crores). Rice exports, on the other hand, have been considerably more encouraging and show an improvement of 2.51 crores, while exports of cotton are also slightly better than last year (.22 crores).

6. Imports of foreign merchandise also show a considerable drop as compared with last year (4.54 crores) which is shared by cotton yarns and manufactures (2.11 crores), other yarns, manufactures and textile fabrics (2 crores), iron and steel and manufactures thereof (1.39 crores). It is satisfactory to note that imports of rice which amounted to 1.49 crores in the first nine months of last year fell to 7 lakhs during the same months of the current year, although imports of wheat increased from 1.75 crores to 3.64 crores.

7. Despite the fact that the fall in the exports is about twice that in imports, the visible balance of trade has actually risen, as net private imports of treasure also fell by 6.38 crores to 18.12 crores which is the lowest figure touched since 1922-23.

8. The unfavourable factors to which I have referred, have, of course, been reflected in our budgetary results, but, on the whole, we have been fortunate in the sense that we have had certain special wind-falls, as a result of which I can anticipate that the accounts for 1929-30 will close without showing a deficit. In the first place, we have found ourselves, as a result of the facts which I have already explained, without any balance to the credit of the Revenue Reserve Fund and, therefore, unable from this source to make good the deficit of 90 lakhs which, as Honourable Members will recollect, I had anticipated for the current year. Apart from this, the results to date indicate, on balance, a deterioration as compared with the budget estimate. While Taxes on Income, Salt and net Opium receipts indicate a probable improvement of 1.12 lakhs, there are deteriorations under Customs (55 lakhs), Miscellaneous payments (52 lakhs), Railways (13 lakhs), Posts and Telegraphs (50 lakhs) and other heads (8 lakhs). I must here mention that the items affecting Interest—that is to say, taking into account outgoings and receipts together—only show a net deterioration of 3 lakhs; but the deterioration would have been considerably larger if we had not had exceptionally large receipts from interest on the Gold Standard Reserve. The high rates of interest prevailing for money during the first nine months of the year, combined with an appreciation in the value of our investments from the low point to which they had, as I have already explained, been written down on the 31st March 1929, have combined to give us an altogether exceptional figure under this heading. Our receipts, in fact, exceeded the budget estimate by 74 lakhs. I shall refer to this matter again.

9. The result from all the figures which I have given, is a net deterioration of 66 lakhs as compared with the budget estimate, and this, combined with the original deficit of 90 lakhs, which, as explained, cannot be covered, as expected, by a transfer from the Revenue Reserve Fund, brings us to a total deficit of 1,56 lakhs. As against this, however, we can balance a special wind-fall, because we are able to bring into account a large sum held by us at credit of the German Liquidation Account under the Treaty of Versailles, which, as a result of decisions arrived at at the Hague Conference, will now accrue to the Government of India. By a curious coincidence, this amount is 1,56 lakhs and exactly balances the deficit previously disclosed. On this basis, therefore, the year 1929-30 will close with an even balance.

10. I do not, however, wish to give a misleading picture and we must fully realise that several exceptional receipts—apart from this special wind-fall—have contributed to the result. I have already alluded to the exceptionally high item for receipts under the heading of interest on the Gold Standard Reserve, and, in addition to this, there are several items which can hardly be regarded as normal. I would refer specially to the sugar import duty on which we anticipate a receipt of 8.35 crores as against the budget estimate of 7 crores, and jute export duty, which at 4.71 crores, is 50 lakhs above what I consider to be a safe and normal figure. Further, the revised estimate for Taxes on Income includes a special wind-fall of 30 lakhs as the net result of certain judgments in the Privy Council. I refer to these matters, because, in any review of the position undertaken for the purpose of considering future policy, it is necessary to eliminate exceptional items of this kind. If, on this basis, we examine the position since the final remission of the provincial contributions, we find that in 1927-28 there was an actual deficit of 2.21 lakhs; in 1928-29 a deficit of 1.06 lakhs; while, for 1929-30, the figures which I have given sufficiently clearly explain the position. These results indicate that, taking into account the unavoidable increase in expenditure, and even making allowances for the present depressed trade conditions, the gap caused by the remission of the provincial contributions has not, on a normal estimate of revenue and expenditure, been fully filled.

PROSPECTS FOR THE YEAR 1930-31.

11. I must now turn to the prospects for the next year—1930-31, so arranging my statement as to indicate, as clearly as I can, the main framework of the problem with which we have to deal. I will start with certain preliminary explanations. First, on a matter of detail, in the figures which I am now going to give to the House, I shall eliminate receipts on account of the two-anna petrol tax which are off-set by the block grant on the other side to the Road Development Fund. Secondly, in my forecast for next year, I am not taking into account the possible effects on revenue of serious disturbance or the practice of civil disobedience. Even if we could consent to the assumption that the threats of such action will be realised (which, of course, we cannot do), it would be impossible to estimate its effects. Nevertheless, I cannot avoid taking some account of the reaction of the attitude of certain political leaders and parties on business conditions in the country, for, to some extent, that reaction is already an established reality. A serious blow has been given to confidence, both within India and outside it, by the doctrines preached in December last at Lahore and since then throughout the country. In saying this, I refer not only to the threat of repudiation of debts—which I am convinced that no responsible Indians take seriously—but also to the general programme of civil disobedience and the attitude of hostility to the British connection and British interests. It is not for me, in a financial speech, to express views as regards this policy or the ideals which underlie it. I only wish to refer to the inevitable economic results.

12. Translating this view into a practical appreciation of the budgetary prospects for next year, I am forced to the conclusion that, even allowing for a reasonable good monsoon, the prospects of trade cannot be regarded as very bright. World conditions are against us and the chances that business in India can develop favourably in spite of these adverse factors, are very seriously reduced by the blow to confidence in new enterprise which has been given by the conduct to which I have referred.

13. Adopting this appreciation of the position, my forecast as regards the main headings of revenue would be as follows:

Revenue.

Customs.—I am allowing for a net deterioration, exclusive of the Road Fund receipts, of 1.09 lakhs as compared with the budget estimate of the current year, and of 42 lakhs as compared with the revised estimate. The total estimate for Customs, exclusive of the Road Fund receipts, is thus put at 49.30 crores.

Taxes on Income.—I expect we shall collect 17.30 crores, which is 70 lakhs more than the current year's budget figure, though only 20 lakhs more than the revised estimate.

Salt.—I have assumed a receipt of 7.05 crores which again is 70 lakhs more than the original estimate of the current year. This latter, as explained in my last budget speech, was abnormally low as a result of speculation.

Opium.—Compared with the budget for 1929-30, next year is expected to show a drop of 33 lakhs in receipts as a result of the ten-year programme, and of 7 lakhs in payments—a net diminution of 26 lakhs.

14. The net result is that, so far as the main heads of general revenue are concerned, there will, on the basis of existing taxes, be a net growth of no more than 5 lakhs as compared with the budget estimate of the current year.

15. Turning to departmental transactions, this House is already aware that the contribution from the Railways to general revenues is likely to be less satisfactory than in recent years. The total is estimated at 5.74 crores, as compared with the budget figure last year of 6.25 crores, showing a net deterioration of 51 lakhs. In Posts and Telegraphs, prospects for next year are likewise unsatisfactory. It is necessary to anticipate a deficit of 48 lakhs on the Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department and of 8 lakhs on the Indo-European Telegraph Department. Taking into account the capital expenditure charged to revenue, the net deterioration as compared with the budget estimate of the current year is 48 lakhs.

16. It will be seen, therefore, that, on the results of the two large Commercial Departments of the Government, the Railways and the Posts and Telegraphs Department, we have to anticipate a total deterioration of 99 lakhs as compared with the budget estimate for 1929-30.

17. I will now turn to the main heads of expenditure. In dealing with this, I intend, throughout my remarks, to draw a distinction between normal administrative outgoings and those other heads such as Debt Services, where we have to meet either charges for the service of our loans or make provision for redemption or security. Expenditure of this sort falls in a different category, for the charge for service of the loans is unavoidable, while to provide money for security provisions cannot be criticised as extravagance but is, on the contrary, a thing to be commended as sound and prudent finance.

18. Having drawn the distinction between these two kinds of expenditure, I will turn to examine the former, namely, the whole field of normal administrative expenditure. It is on our action in this field that I expect and, indeed, desire Honourable Members to turn their most critical scrutiny. There is a general demand for retrenchment and economy on the one side, and, on the other there is the persistent and insistent pressure for increased expenditure on particular projects, such as improvement of conditions of service, education, hospitals, and sanitary arrangements, agricultural endowment, police measures, roads, etc., and very often those who press most vehemently for retrenchment in general, are among the strongest supporters of particular proposals for new expenditure. I shall deal later with the general position as regards an economy survey and the possibilities of retrenchment. For my present purpose, I merely wish to give some indication of the total amount of new demands for which, after most careful scrutiny and rigid exclusion of everything that is not necessary, we have thought it essential to provide. In what I have now to say, I shall be comparing the budget estimates for next year with the budget estimates for 1929-30, because it is in this way that I can most clearly present the problem.

19. In the first place, there are the normal increments in rates of pay for the existing staff of Government officials. Now that a time-scale basis has been adopted in practically all Departments, this is an inevitable commitment, and, unfortunately, we have not yet approached anything like the peak figure. It is very difficult to frame an exact statement of the yearly increase due to this cause; but I am satisfied, after careful investigation, that a fairly reasonable estimate of the total increase under this heading, as compared with the budget estimates in the current year, is 25 lakhs.

20. Apart from this, there are a number of new demands of a special nature which are of sufficient interest for me to call the attention of the House to them:

	Lakhs.
Census Operations	11

This requires no special explanation. It is expenditure which has regularly to be undertaken every ten years and is not a normal annual charge.

Grant to Aligarh University	5
---	---

This grant is made in accordance with the undertaking which has already been given by Government in this Assembly.

Recurrent Grant for Agricultural Research	5
---	---

This is the first year in which this grant figures in the budget estimates. This money is to be devoted to special schemes for agricultural research and is additional to the annual expenditure of about 2½ lakhs which is also included, to its full extent, in the budget this year to meet the charges of administrative staff.

Special Fund for financing measures for the encouragement of Sugar Cultivation	10
--	----

This is an item to which I have special pleasure in making reference, as it represents a first step in a definite constructive policy by the Central Government, taken up as a sequel to the recommendations of the Agricultural Commission. It is to be hoped that this, combined with other measures included in my budget proposals, will have a definite and far-reaching effect on the agricultural production of India and the material prosperity of cultivators in the sugar-growing districts.

Banking Enquiry	7
-------------------------------	---

This requires no special explanation as the circumstances are familiar to Honourable Members. There was no corresponding provision in the Budget for 1929-30, although I had to ask for a supplementary grant for the current year. I will only take this occasion for saying that I have great hopes that the Banking Enquiry may represent the first chapter in a long story of development of India's resources under the leadership of Indians. Much valuable work has already been achieved and, in time, the country will come to appreciate the work of, and express gratitude to, those on the Provincial and Central Committees who have taken the lead in this work. I do not wish myself now to select any particular names for mention; but I should like to express general satisfaction and gratitude for the whole-hearted co-operation which I have received. My Honourable friend Mr. Kelkar, in the course of his speech in the budget debate last year, told me that the spirit of co-operation was dead. I ventured, on that occasion, to express my disbelief in this dictum, and I am glad to be able to say that my experience during the last twelve months has supported my view. As I have said on many occasions, I do not expect that any striking and spectacular measures can be produced immediately as a result of this Enquiry. But I do hope and I most sincerely believe that a strong and steady movement will be started as a result of the interest evoked by the Enquiry and the education of public opinion which the reports will produce. As a result of this Enquiry, we shall have a simultaneous survey of conditions throughout India of a kind which has never before been achieved, and I am certain that this survey will throw into high light the field for work to improve conditions, while, from the recommendations which will be made, we shall get valuable help as to the nature of the work to be undertaken. I have great hopes also that, from the Provincial Committees and from the Central Committee, there may spring up some form of permanent organisation for keeping watch on the field for action, learning lessons from the development which takes place and proposing new measures from time to time as the need for these becomes apparent.

[Sir George Schuster.]

I have been told sometimes that the procedure adopted has been cumbersome and unbusinesslike; but I have been very gratified to find that, as the result of the Enquiry and the interest taken in it have become clear, those who criticised at the beginning have tended to change their view. Possibly, viewed as an act in one of the late chapters in the history of an old and experienced bureaucracy, there may be something of an amateur and unbusinesslike nature in the procedure which we have chosen. But I prefer to regard it not in this light but as an act in the first chapter of a new volume in the history of India's constitutional and social evolution. Doubtless, mistakes have been made and doubtless, much of the work may prove to be of an amateur and inexperienced nature; but, if mistakes have been made, they will be mistakes from which further experience will be gained, and nearly all of those who gain experience on the various committees in this Enquiry will remain in the country and be capable, in their further public service, of giving to the country the value of that experience.

The next special item to which I come is the Royal Commission on Labour for which the increase over the budget provision in the current year is

This again is a subject well-known to the Assembly, and again it is an enquiry which, one may hope, will produce results of lasting value to the country and of great benefit to the wage-earning classes.

A further item of special interest is a provision for the next instalment in the programme for developing the Territorial Force in India of.

This grant will provide for a further instalment in the current programme, and will mean, principally, the improvement of training facilities for existing units and the raising of two new urban Companies.

The largest item of special new expenditure to which I now come is that on measures to be taken for the development of Civil Aviation, the total of which, including many non-recurring items, amounts to ... 24.5

The policy which has been adopted in this matter is now well-known and the Government's plans have been fully discussed and considered in the Standing Finance Committee. In framing their policy, the Government have endeavoured to meet the wishes of the non-official representatives in this House, and I would only take this occasion to remark that the greater part of the expenditure which we are now undertaking, particularly that for the provision of ground organisation and meteorological facilities, is really forced on us by our international obligations.

Apart from the above items, I will select for special mention the following:

	Lakhs.
Further instalment of the programme of medical and public health improvements in centrally administered areas	3.5
Broadcasting	2.7
Special repairs to flood damages in the North-West Frontier Province	5
Andamans reclamation (increase in grant made in 1929-30)	5
Mechanical extraction of timber in the Andamans	2
Forest conservancy in the North-West Frontier Province	1.5
New staff and equipment for the Imperial Department of Agriculture	1.5
Agricultural development in Baluchistan	.5
Appointment of Indian Trade Commissioners overseas and strengthening of the superior staff of the High Commissioner for India, London	.5
The total of the above items is roundly	95
To this must be added a sum for miscellaneous new items of	26

These, together with the sum of 25 lakhs to which I referred at the beginning as representing the increase on account of increments of pay, bring the total of the new expenditure, for which we have to make provision in the budget, to 1,46

21. I have risked wearying the House in giving these details, because I have been anxious this year to place before Honourable Members a full picture of the problem which we really have to meet, and I have thought that, by analysing and selecting the new items of expenditure, I should enable them to understand the case more clearly than can easily be done by a scrutiny of the very complicated volume in which the Demands for Grants are set out. The items to which I have referred are those in regard to which, as I have said already, the Government's policy as regards economy is chiefly to be tested.

22. I must turn now to those headings of expenditure which fall into the other class, and I would refer chiefly to the Government's debt obligations. I shall first deal with ordinary interest payments.

Interest on Ordinary Debt shows an increase of 46 partly as a result of larger treasury bill transactions, and partly because larger provision has been made for the cost of conversion operations.

Interest on Other Obligations, including provision for cash certificates on the basis which has hitherto been adopted, shows an increase of ... 61 of which 15 represents higher rates of interest to be allowed on Provident Fund balances and 21 is accounted for by higher borrowing rates.

[Sir George Schuster.]

23. Interest receipts are put at the same figure as in the budget estimate for the current year, 3.45 crores, and here I would explain that we propose, in future, to adopt a more conservative system as regards the Gold Standard Reserve interest. We propose, in fact, to treat £1,600,000 as the standard figure of revenue. If, in any year, the actual receipts exceed this sum, one-half of the surplus will be added to revenue and one-half will be transferred to an Equalisation Fund, which Fund will be available to be drawn upon to make the receipts up to the standard figure of £1,600,000 in any subsequent year in which they fall below that level. It is, I am glad to say, possible to make a start by putting a balance in this Fund immediately. The actual receipts for 1929-30 are estimated at £2,400,000, and out of this sum it is proposed to make a start by placing £100,000 to the credit of the Equalisation Fund. For the coming year, we estimate the receipts at £1,700,000, so that, acting on the rule which I have stated, we propose to include £1,650,000 in the budget estimates of revenue and to transfer the balance of £50,000 to the Equalisation Fund. I am convinced that this proposal represents a great improvement in our system and is in accord with principles of sound finance. The fluctuations which have occurred in the past have been of so wide a nature as to be embarrassing to the budgetary position and to create a misleading impression as to our general revenues. I need only quote the example of the last two years. For 1928-29 the ultimate figure was £1,243,000, while for 1929-30, as I have already stated, the revised estimates put the receipts at no less than £2,400,000. As I have already explained, the figure which we are now taking gives us the same total of interest receipts as in the Budget for the current year, and, therefore, allowing for the increases in interest payments, the net deterioration under the general head of Interest is 1.07 lakhs.

24. I now come to the subject of the special provision to meet our liability in regard to Post Office Cash Certificates. Honorable Members are so familiar with this subject that I need not go into great detail. The amount which we calculate as likely to be payable next year in respect of bonuses is 1 crore. But this, Honorable Members are well aware, is something much less than the liability which will actually accrue during the year. The total balance remaining in the hands of the Government from receipts from Cash Certificates will amount, at the close of the current year, to 35½ crores, so that the provision of 1 crore represents less than 3 per cent. on this. I have carefully calculated what the full amount of the liability, which will accrue during the next year, will be, and it comes to a figure of 1.88 lakhs. If, therefore, we are to make full provision for this accruing liability, we ought to find another 88 lakhs for the purpose, and it must be remembered that this will only cover the liability accruing during the year and will include no provision for meeting the liability which has already accrued. I have come to the conclusion that this accrued liability must be regarded now as part of the Government's debt and that, having regard to the provision which we make annually for reduction or avoidance of debt, the situation in regard to this is not unsound. But I feel no hesitation in saying that the time has come when we ought to make full provision for the liability which, in future, will annually accrue. Therefore, I have to provide for this new charge of 88 lakhs.

25. I next come to the provision for reduction or avoidance of debt. As Honorable Members will recollect, I stated in my budget speech last year, that I proposed to bring this under review in accordance with the arrangements originally fixed and I promised to take representatives of this House into my confidence before making any change. In accordance with this undertaking, I have communicated on two occasions with the leaders of the non-official parties in the House. On the first occasion, I asked whether they had any suggestions to make, and to this request I received no response. On the second occasion, I informed them that, after my own consideration of the matter, I had come to the conclusion that our arrangements in this respect were so closely connected with the arrangements for the Railway Convention that I thought that the two reviews ought to be undertaken concurrently with one another. My reason for this view is shortly as follows.

26. According to the present Convention, the Government receive, in addition to the refund of the actual interest which the Government have themselves to pay on loans raised for Railway purposes, a contribution, which, although it is made up of various elements, may be regarded as a percentage on the capital advanced to the Railways. Looked at in this way, it represents the distribution of even less than 1½ per cent. on the Government debt, which forms the basis of the present provision for reduction or avoidance of debt. In fact, I think it is, on broad lines, correct to regard the one as balancing the other, and we shall arrive at a truer picture of what the Government draw from the Railways if we realise that, in fact, the Government get no profit but apply practically all that they receive, apart from a refund of their own interest payments, for the amortisation of their capital. When, therefore, the contribution falls below a certain figure, the Government, if they made up their accounts on a profit and loss basis, would actually show a net loss on the year. This is not the occasion for me to examine the justice or otherwise of this arrangement, but I think that what I have said is enough to show that the two arrangements are closely inter-connected. I may say that, when I represented this close inter-connection to the leaders of the various parties, the response, so far as I received any, appeared to me to indicate a general agreement with my view that the two Conventions must be considered together. I feel, moreover, most strongly, on general grounds, that this is not the time when, keeping in view our credit in the world, we ought to attempt any substantial diminution in our provision for reduction or avoidance of debt. Anything that savours of a "raid" on a public Sinking Fund is normally,—and, I think, quite rightly,—viewed with disfavour. I hope, therefore, that I shall have general agreement from Honorable Members that it is better to leave this provision substantially untouched and to bring it under review at the time of the general revision of finances including a re-distribution of the sources of revenue as between the Central Government and the Provinces, which must be a sequel to the proposals of the Constitutional revision which will shortly be before us.

[Sir George Schuster.]

23. Interest receipts are put at the same figure as in the budget estimate for the current year, 3.45 crores, and here I would explain that we propose, in future, to adopt a more conservative system as regards the Gold Standard Reserve interest. 25. I next come to the provision for reduction or avoidance of debt. As Honourable Members will recollect, I stated in my budget speech last year, that I proposed to bring this under review in accordance with the arrangements originally fixed and I promised to take representatives of this House into my confidence before making any change. In accordance with this undertaking, I have communicated on two occasions with the leaders of the non-official parties in the House. On the second occasion, I informed them that, after my own consideration of the matter, I had come to the conclusion that our arrangements in this respect were so closely connected with the arrangements for the Railway Convention that I thought that the two reviews ought to be undertaken concurrently with one another. My reason for this view is shortly as follows.

26. According to the present Convention, the Government receive, in addition to the refund of the actual interest which the Government have themselves to pay on loans raised for Railway purposes, a contribution, which, although it is made up of various elements, may be regarded as a percentage on the capital advanced to the Railways. Looked at in this way, it represents the distribution of even less than 1½ per cent. on the Government debt, which forms the basis of the present provision for reduction or avoidance of debt. [Sir George Schuster.]

27. I have, however, thought it justifiable to introduce two small changes in our present system. In the first place, we are now regularly in receipt of certain annual payments on account of Reparations. These have hitherto been added to the provision for reduction or avoidance of debt. But, on the view which I have taken above, this provision is at present adequate by itself, and I do not think that there is any justification for increasing it by the adventitious addition of Reparation receipts. I feel the more justified in adopting this view for the next year, because I propose next year, for the first time, to make adequate provision for our accruing liability in respect of cash certificates. This means that a receipt of 32 lakhs which would otherwise have been added to the provision for reduction or avoidance of debt will be available for other purposes and I think we may regard it as earmarked against the provision which I am making for the Post Office cash certificates.

28. The second change which I am proposing is of a minor nature. I have found that, in regard to the sterling debt incurred since the 31st March 1923, the rupee equivalent on which the percentage for reduction or avoidance of debt is based, is still reckoned on an exchange rate of 1s. 4d. I am proposing that the conversion should be made at the present statutory rate which is obviously the correct basis. This makes a difference of 12 lakhs. Even allowing for these two changes, the increase in the provision for reduction or avoidance of debt is 27 lakhs, the total amount standing at 6 crores as compared with 5.73 crores included in the budget estimates for 1929-30.

29. I can now recapitulate the position in order to show the problem with which I have to deal in balancing the Budget next year. Comparing our position with that provided for in the budget estimates of 1929-30, I have to provide for the following items of deterioration:

	Lakhs.
Deterioration in the main Commercial Departments, Railways and Posts and Telegraphs	99
Essential new services and demands	1,46
Net addition to interest on dead-weight debt	1,07
Special provision for bonus on Post Office cash certificates	88
Increase in provision for reduction or avoidance of debt	27
To these items must be added the budget deficit of 1929-30	90
This gives us a total of	5,57
Against which the net improvement on the main revenue heads is only	5
There is thus a total gap to be filled of	5,52

The problem before us is how to fill this gap.

30. In the first place, I must make clear the principles on which I have endeavoured to act this year in dealing with expenditure demands. I have set before myself two guiding rules. The first is that no new administrative expenditure shall be admitted which is not either essential or productive; the second, that whatever new expenditure is admitted on these grounds must be balanced by corresponding economies. There must, in fact, be no net increase in the normal outgoings of the Government. These rules have been followed in my proposals.

Lakhs

31. In stating my problems, I have shown that the essential additions for new services and demands amount to 1,46 and, according to my rule just stated, this must be balanced by corresponding economies. Actually, as a result of the elimination of certain previous non-recurring items and of other variations, there is an economy in the civil estimates, of 62 and, on top of this, I am providing for a reduction of military expenditure of 80 that is to say, the net military grant, apart from expenditure on the Territorial Force, will be reduced from 55 crores to 54.20.

These two reductions together account for 1.42 lakhs against the new expenditure of 1.46 and I have thus been able to comply, within a very narrow margin, with the rule which I had set myself.

32. This is, in broad outline, a true presentation of the picture, though I have, for the sake of brevity, omitted a mass of minor confusing details. I might present the same picture in another way so as to provide Honourable Members with a cross check on my statement. They will find, from an examination of the budget estimates, the following net changes in the main heads of normal outgoings:

Civil Administration	+60
Other Direct Demands on the Revenue	+3
Miscellaneous	+10
Civil Works (other than Road Fund)	-3
Or a total increase of	70
Against which may be put the reduction in Military expenditure of	80

33. I must, at this stage, say a few words on this last item which, I am sure, Honourable Members will view with considerable satisfaction. The actual arrangement which I have been able to make with the Army authorities on this subject requires special explanation. This House will recollect that, in the course of my budget speech last year, I explained that, in order to enable the Army to carry through their plan of re-equipment, a programme had been arranged, providing for a stabilised military budget (exclusive of the expenditure on the Territorial Force) at a net figure of 55 crores for the four years beginning 1928-29 and ending 1931-32. According to this programme, we should have before us two more years at 55 crores, with the prospect of a reduction at the end of that period when the programme of re-equipment is completed. In the budgetary proposals which I am now presenting, we are taking advantage immediately of part of the ultimate reduction. This is made possible because the Army authorities have been able to agree to spread the programme of re-equipment, which remains to be carried out, over a period of three years instead of two. This means that instead of getting 55 crores in each of the next two years, to be followed by a drop in the third year, they are to work on a basis of getting 54.20 crores for each of the next three years, after which a further substantial drop is anticipated.

[Sir George Schuster.]

34. The net result is that, although we are not departing from the original programme of re-equipment, we are distributing the burden in a way which is fairer to the tax-payer of today and we are actually realising now a substantial part of the economy which was ultimately hoped for. I trust that Honourable Members will be gratified by this definite sign that Army expenditure is really to be reduced.

35. I may now turn back to my main problem. The two items of savings to which I have referred amounted to 1,42 lakhs. This reduces the gap of 5,52 lakhs, which I have to find funds to fill, to 4,10 lakhs. This can only be done by finding new sources of revenue and it is to my plan for achieving this purpose that I must now turn.

Budget Proposals.

36. The sum required is substantial and the provision of funds to meet it has been, as Honourable Members will readily recognise, a matter for prolonged and anxious thought. I believe, however, that it can be found by measures which not only will not impose an oppressive burden on any class, but will, in their indirect results, actually stimulate the country's economic development. The measures which I shall propose include changes—reductions as well as increases—in the customs duties affecting rice, cotton piece-goods, kerosene, sugar and silver, supplemented by a small change in the income-tax.

37. I will start with a proposal for reduction of duty. I am proposing—and I feel sure that the House will welcome this proposal—a reduction in the export duty on rice by one-quarter, that is to say, from three annas a maund to two annas three pies a maund. There has been, as the House knows, a world-wide fall in the price of rice and the present time is therefore opportune for giving some help to the cultivator in Burma who has been a sufferer from this fall in prices. My proposal will remove the disparity, which at present exists, between our export duty on rice and that imposed by Siam, one of Burma's principal competitors in the trade. This proposal will cost us 30 lakhs; a larger sacrifice of revenue from this source could not, in present circumstances, be justified. Although Burma which is mainly interested, is far from us, I hope that this plan will commend itself to the House and be regarded both as an act of justice and a step in the right direction. It means, however, that the gap which I have to fill is increased to 4,40 lakhs.

38. I must now explain my proposals for raising the necessary new revenue, and I will make a start with the most difficult question which we have had to consider—the cotton duties. Here two motives come into play—first, the provision of revenue; second, assistance to the Indian cotton mill industry. Our line of action must take into account both these motives, and though I, as Finance Member, am not directly concerned with the second, which properly falls within the province of my Honourable Colleague, the Commerce Member, it has been decided by the Government of India that I should take this opportunity to announce the whole of the Government's proposals.

39. Action taken for the provision of revenue is a straight-forward matter, but the consideration of protective measures raises much more serious difficulties. Let me state, as briefly as I can, how these difficulties have appeared to us.

40. There is, of course, at the outset, the obvious problem of reconciling the interests of producer and consumer. Measures of protection must be so designed as to be effective for their purpose with the minimum interference as regards prices to the consumer.

41. But, apart from this, there are certain special difficulties in the present case. In the first place, the whole question of protection of the cotton industry was investigated by the Tariff Board a comparatively short time ago, but the case which has now been presented on behalf of the mill-owners claims a measure of protection greatly in excess of anything recommended by the Tariff Board. In these circumstances, a further enquiry might reasonably be considered desirable. But, as against this, we are told (and it is a fact which we cannot dispute) that the case is urgent, and that, if action is to be effective, it ought not to be delayed.

42. In the second place, the conditions affecting the industry are not identical throughout India. Bombay is at once the most important centre of the cotton mill industry, and the centre more seriously menaced by foreign competition. At other centres, the average profits of the mills are nowhere high in relation to the capital invested in them, but throughout the world the industry is passing through a period of depression, and low profits are not a valid ground for special assistance.

43. In the third place, as was pointed out by the Tariff Board, the increasing competition from the up-country mills is one of the most important factors contributing to the depression in Bombay. Therefore, whatever measure of assistance is accorded to the industry as a whole, it is likely to be ineffective in ensuring permanent recovery to Bombay, unless the industry there seizes the opportunity afforded by that assistance to reorganise itself and increase its efficiency.

44. Moreover, there is another aspect of this question in which the public and the Government are greatly interested. Bombay has been the scene, during the last two years, of a prolonged and exhausting struggle between capital and labour. Without pronouncing judgment on either side or anticipating the views which may be expressed by the Royal Commission on Labour which is now sitting, it is fair to say that there can be no permanent restoration of prosperity to the Bombay industry unless the relations between labour and capital can be improved and all the conditions affecting labour brought up to a higher standard. These two considerations have, in the present case, a special significance, for, Government are being asked to take emergency measures, not to protect an industry in the early stages of its development until it can find its feet, but rather to save an industry (or, more accurately, one important section of it) which is suffering from a special deterioration or atrophy.

45. Although the report of the Fiscal Commission admits that protective measures are justifiable in such circumstances, the Government feel that emergency action, not immediately preceded by a Tariff Board enquiry, ought to be taken only if it can be shown that inaction might inflict grave injury on the national welfare. They feel also that, if such emergency action is taken, a special responsibility far more serious than any that exists when the protection of an infant industry is in question, rests upon them, as trustees for the public, to take all possible steps to ensure that the assistance given will be utilised to the full. In such cases, it might sometimes be possible to make the adoption of protective measures conditional on effective reorganisation by the industry itself. But here the urgency of the situation creates a special difficulty. If action is to be effective, it must be immediate, and if the Government were to insist on certain steps being taken as a condition precedent to any measures of assistance to the industry, these measures might come too late. Nevertheless, this aspect of the matter cannot be ignored and I shall refer to it again.

46. I think that, in these remarks, I have sketched, in broad outline, the main framework of the problem which concerns us.

47. The conclusions which we reached fall under two heads; first, that, in view of the revenue position, a general increase in the revenue duty from 11 per cent. to 15 per cent. was justified, secondly, that while this increase in revenue duty must have an important protective effect, it might be justifiable to supplement it by some special protective measures, provided that, having regard to the special circumstances to which I have called attention, such measures were limited in duration, and also limited to purposes necessary to meet the immediate needs of Bombay. In fact, it would not be justifiable at this juncture, as regards protective measures, to attempt more than to erect a temporary shelter under which the Bombay industry can reorganise itself, and after a reasonable period, for this purpose, it will be necessary to have a Tariff Board enquiry to consider future policy, and, in particular, how the Bombay industry has reacted to the assistance given.

48. I refer again later to the precise significance of this purpose, but, at this stage in my account, I must turn to one aspect of the matter on which I have not yet touched. It is, of course, too well known to need remark that, in all public comments on policy as regards cotton duties, the possible reactions on British interests are always prominently mentioned, and that we as a Government are often suspected of undue solicitude on this account. Having regard to the long and troubled history of the cotton duties in India, and to the public interest in the matter, it has been our desire to put before this House as full and frank a statement as possible. Let me make it clear at the outset that the fiscal autonomy convention is a reality, and that decisions on matters of this kind are left to the Government of India, and it is on this basis that our deliberations have proceeded throughout. But, in the final stages, there has been addressed to us a communication, not by the Secretary of State, but by His Majesty's Government, to reconsider the position.

49. In this message, His Majesty's Government asked us to take into account both the reactions of our proposals in India and their serious effects in England, effects which they felt sure that neither we nor the Legislature would desire to create. To this we replied that, though we were deeply impressed by a message of this nature, we nevertheless felt bound to adhere to our main proposals. We pointed out the following considerations: first, that we needed revenue; secondly, that customs is our chief source of revenue; thirdly, the duty on cotton piece-goods now stood below the level of the general revenue tariff; fourthly, Indian industry was suffering from a deep depression and the Bombay mills were approaching a desperate position which might affect the whole future of this important centre of Indian commerce and finance. We recognised and deplored the possibility of serious effects in England, but we stated we felt clearly bound to put Indian's interests first. At the same time, we realised how important it was to India, from the political point of view, to take account of British opinion, and that, quite apart from this, we were of course concerned at this time to avoid unnecessary injury to British interests. We stated that, after careful consideration, we had decided that we could not modify the general application of the 15 per cent. revenue duty, but that we should be prepared to propose to the Assembly that, as regards any additional and temporary protective measures, their application might be limited to non-British goods, and that, in these circumstances, there should be imposed, in addition to the 15 per cent.

Temporary protective revenue duty, a 5 per cent. protective duty measures. with a minimum of 3½ annas per lb. on plain grey goods, against all cotton piece-goods from outside the United Kingdom, this protective duty to be in force for three years only, and an undertaking to be given that we should have its effects examined by the Tariff Board before the end of this period.

50. We explained that, in placing this proposal before the Assembly we should point out that, so far as we are aware, this is the first occasion on which the considered opinion of the Cabinet has been conveyed in this form to the Government of India and that we were impressed by the significance of the precedents so established.

51. We informed His Majesty's Government that it would not be right for us to ask the Assembly to commit themselves to Imperial Preference as a principle, but merely to adopt a particular course which, in our judgment, was consistent with India's interests at a critical juncture when much might depend on India's response to the British Government's appeal. We also stated that we should have to make it plain to the Assembly that, while there were grounds for treating plain grey goods specially, we could not, in any circumstances, agree, for the emergency purpose which we had in view, to an additional protective duty of 5 per cent. on all classes of piece-goods irrespective of country of origin, since the immediate benefit to the Indian producer would be wholly incommensurate with the burden imposed on the Indian consumer. Finally, we made it clear that, in a matter of this kind, after frankly stating our conclusions, we should desire to put our carefully considered views before the Legislative Assembly with whom the final decision must rest.

52. That is how the matter stands, and it is on this basis that our proposals are now put forward. I have thought it right, frankly to put the position before Honourable Members in this way. Indeed, whatever our proposals had been, we could have consented to no other course, for we feel that it is essential, at this transitional stage of the constitution, that there should be full confidence, wherever possible, between the Government and the Legislature. There are certain points with reference to what has passed between ourselves and the British Government, and to the attitude which we adopted, on which I desire to give a further explanation.

action, a further investigation by the Tariff Board at the present juncture was not advisable. It is the special duty of the Board to investigate facts and arrive at findings thereon. But owing to the labour disputes of 1928 and 1929, it is more than doubtful whether any material for investigation, beyond that available to the Tariff Board of 1926, exists. Again, conditions in the Bombay mill industry have, since 1926, been examined by the Tariff Board, the Fawcett Committee, and the Pearson Court of Enquiry, while trade conditions have recently been investigated by Mr. Hardy. In these circumstances, we felt that the proper time for a further enquiry by the Tariff Board will come when some progress in reorganisation and rationalisation has been made by the industry in Bombay, and the prospects of ultimate success or failure of the industry can be assessed.

61. There is one more point left for me to deal with in conclusion. I have already referred to the special duty which the Government feel to be imposed upon them in this case to satisfy themselves that effective use will be made of the assistance given, and that attention should be directed particularly to the improvement of labour conditions. We recognise that the ultimate failure or success of the mill industry in Bombay must depend entirely upon the extent to which the millowners utilise the present opportunity in order to improve their efficiency and labour conditions, and that, if full use is not made of this opportunity, the position of the industry may be no better at the expiry of the period of three years than it is to-day. We have already addressed the Bombay Millowners' Association on this subject and have impressed upon them the urgent necessity of working out schemes which may re-establish the industry on a firm basis. Although it has not been possible for us to lay down the lines on which the reorganisation should proceed, or to prescribe the particular measures which should be taken, we propose, now that our policy has been declared, to enter immediately into consultation with the Government of Bombay on this subject, which is their primary concern. It appears to us right that some method should be devised whereby the force of public opinion may be brought to bear effectively upon the situation. At the same time, it is our desire to give the Association all the assistance in our power in order to ensure that the examination of the various problems may be thorough and adequate, and that it may be carried out with the aid of the best expert advice available whether in India or in other countries. Apart from technical assistance, it seems clear that some drastic financial reorganisation and some rationalisation of the methods of manufacture is necessary if the Bombay industry is to be put on a permanent foundation of prosperity. On this subject I cannot at present say more than this—that we are prepared to examine what is required in this direction and to consider whether any form of Government intervention is possible or appropriate. This aspect of the problem is one of great difficulty and I do not propose to lengthen my speech by enlarging further upon it at this stage.

62. I would add, in conclusion, that, although I have spoken chiefly of Bombay, we have also the other industry of India in view and we particularly hope that the measures which we propose will be of real benefit to the hand-loom industry throughout the country-side.

63. We estimate that the net increase in revenue from our proposals, allowing in full for the protective effect, will be 1,25 lakhs. The proposal to increase the revenue duty will be included in the Finance Bill, while a special Bill will be introduced by my Honourable Colleague, the Commerce Member, containing the protective proposals.

64. My next proposal is to increase the excise duty on kerosene from 1 anna to 1 anna 6 pies per gallon, coupled with a reduction in the import duty from $2\frac{1}{2}$ annas to 2 annas 3 pies. This combined proposal is expected to give us an extra 35 lakhs. At present, there is a difference of $1\frac{1}{2}$ annas per gallon between the excise duty and the import duty on kerosene and the effect of the proposal now made will be to reduce that difference by one-half. In framing our proposals regarding kerosene in this form, we have kept two objects in mind: first and principally, we have desired, simultaneously with getting more revenue, to make a change which should, at the least, ensure that the price of ordinary kerosene to the consumer is not increased, while secondly, we have felt that prudence and justice demanded that we should not make too sudden and drastic a change in the conditions of the indigenous industry, having regard particularly to the position of the smaller companies. Moreover, too drastic a change might hamper further development. In reducing the margin by one-half we have thought that we have gone as far as it would be wise to go, at least as a first step. It means that the marginal duty in favour of the indigenous industry will be reduced from about $18\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. to $9\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.

65. The next proposal which I have to mention is an all-round increase, in the import duty on sugar, of Rs. $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cwt. I am not proposing any change in the existing classification, so that the effect of the proposal will be that sugar of 23 Dutch Standard and above, which at present pays duty at the rate of Rs. $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cwt., will pay duty at Rs. 6 per cwt.; sugar below 23 Dutch Standard but not inferior to 8 Dutch Standard will pay at Rs. $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cwt., instead of at Rs. 4, and sugar below 8 Dutch Standard and sugar candy, which at present pay at 25 per cent. ad valorem, will be subject to a composite duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem plus Rs. $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The duty on these lower grade sugars has, it is true, little significance for the revenue, since imports are at present very small, but it is desirable to keep a due correspondence between the different grades in order to prevent the substitution of lower for higher grade sugars. Molasses, which is dutiable at 25 per cent. ad valorem, will remain subject to duty at that rate and will be treated separately from sugar, since its use is mainly as a raw material for industries and, in fact, a Tariff Board enquiry as regards its treatment as a raw material used in the manufacture of denatured spirit, is already in progress.

66. The increased duty on sugar should yield 1,80 lakhs; but, in estimating its effect upon the consumer it is necessary to bear in mind that the world price of sugar is exceptionally low. The average landed cost of sugar in India from April to December last was no more than Rs. 8-6 per cwt., whereas the average for the previous six years has been Rs. 12-25 per cwt., a difference of about Rs. $3\frac{1}{2}$ as compared with the proposed increase of Rs. $1\frac{1}{2}$. Thus, even the comparatively large increase now proposed should not at present be seriously felt by the consumer.

[Sir George Schuster.]

Ultimately it may,—and probably must,—have some protective significance; but, for the present, it must be regarded primarily as a revenue-producing measure. I would, however, remind Honourable Members that an increase in the production of sugar is one of the most valuable opportunities available for improving India's agricultural production, and that, with this possibility in view, we are proposing a special grant this year of 10 lakhs (to be continued, if necessary, in subsequent years) for the encouragement of sugar research and sugar production. These two proposals must be considered together, and their possible reactions fully appreciated. It may interest the House to know that duties on sugar, at about the level which we now propose, are in force in most European countries. What we are now proposing amounts to a duty of 9s. per cwt. The present import duty on sugar elsewhere is as follows:

			s.	d.
England	..	..	11	8
U. S. A.	..	..	10	3
Germany	..	..	12	7
France	..	..	8	6
Austria	..	..	12	0
Australia	..	..	9	4

67. I next propose to obtain an additional 70 lakhs by a small change in the rates of income-tax and super-tax. I hope that the House will agree that, when we are seeking new sources of revenue, it should not all be raised by indirect taxation, but that some direct taxation is justified so that the burden may be equitably spread. At the same time, I recognise that this is not a suitable period for imposing any heavy additional burdens which would be felt in industry or commercial enterprise. Our proposal, therefore, is that, on personal incomes of Rs. 15,000 and upward, the income-tax rates shall be raised by 1 pie in the rupee, and a corresponding increase shall be made in the super-tax in all grades, other than the flat rate of super-tax on companies. The additional yield from income-tax is estimated at 56 lakhs and that from super-tax at 14 lakhs. It has been brought to my notice that, owing to certain features of our income-tax system—particularly the deduction of tax at source, an alteration in the rates might, in certain cases, be taken into account twice in the first year when a change in rates is made. I shall see that the necessary steps are taken to avoid this result.

68. In referring to income-tax, I wish to mention some other changes which I hope shortly to bring under consideration. If the normal economic progress of India is maintained during the next twelve months, it ought to be possible for us to enter on next year in a stronger financial position. I hope then to be able to make a start in introducing the principle of allowing business losses incurred in any one year to be carried forward to the next year. I also hope to be able to remove the present double super-tax on companies, so far as that affects genuine trust and finance companies. Both these changes ought to be beneficial to the progress of business enterprise, and it will be my settled purpose so to regulate taxation as to remove, when opportunity offers, any imposts which may be said to have a hampering effect on such enterprise.

69. The total yield of the taxes which I have now mentioned amounts to 4,10 lakhs, so that I am still left with 30 lakhs to find. I consider, however, in the special circumstances now prevailing, that it is on every ground desirable to have some margin of safety, taking into account the uncertain prospects which we have before us, and taking into account also the paramount importance, to which I have already referred, of improving our credit by displaying a strong financial position to the world.

70. It is with this and other objects in mind that I propose to re-introduce the import duty of 4 annas per ounce on silver. I have, however, purposely kept this proposal till the end, for, in putting it before the House, I want to make quite clear certain conditions which will, I think, generally commend themselves to the public.

71. An import duty on silver is a familiar feature in the history of Indian fiscal policy. Prior to 1910, silver bullion and coin other than coin of the Government of India, were included in the general tariff schedule of articles liable to an import duty of 5 per cent. ad valorem, and in that year, the rate was raised to 4 annas per ounce. During the war, the import of silver was prohibited, and after the war, in pursuance of the recommendation of the Babington-Smith Committee, the duty was removed at the same time as the prohibition of import. The Committee advocated the removal of duty mainly on account of the strong feeling in India that it was an obstacle to the establishment of a world market for silver in Bombay and placed the Indian consumer of silver at a disadvantage in comparison with the consumer in other countries. I have given full weight to these objections, but circumstances are different today. It is proposed to meet the former objection by allowing a full rebate of the duty on re-export of any silver which has been imported and has paid duty. As to the latter objection, we feel now that there is a strong counterbalancing advantage in taking a step which will have the immediate effect of improving the internal price of a commodity in which the savings of the masses are to a considerable extent invested. The recent fall in the price of silver has, in fact, put an entirely new aspect on the matter.

72. Apart from this, there is another important new factor in the situation, in that the Government, owing to their possession of surplus stocks of silver and the erection of the new refinery at Bombay, have got into the position of being themselves important "producers" of silver. Our proposal, therefore, has the new incidental advantage of providing Government with a protected market for their own produce. Having said as much as this, however, I must say more in order to avoid the creation of any misunderstanding. I feel that it is important that the masses of India, who invest so large an amount of money in silver should realise that silver is only an ordinary commodity, liable to fluctuations in price, just as other commodities are. It has no sacred properties which make it immune from these vicissitudes, and although the Government, in taking these measures, have in mind, as one of the main advantages, an improvement in the internal value of silver, we should, in the long run, be doing a very poor service to the population of India if we allowed it to be supposed that the Government have the power definitely to maintain prices at a particular level. It is far better that the people should generally appreciate the realities of the situation in this respect. At the same time, the Government do recognise the importance of the interests involved owing to the position of silver in India, as, in some respects, a store of value and while they must, as holders of a surplus commodity which they desire to sell, reserve freedom of action, I am prepared to assure this Assembly that, in exercising that discretion, the Government will not go to the market unless they are advised that as in the past, the market will not be appreciably affected by their operations.

73. If there is any danger of the world's production of silver exceeding the consuming capacity of all markets, then, of course, there must be a tendency to falling prices. Only the combined action of producers and holders can prevent this. The Government of India, holding as they do surplus stocks, which, in the public interest they consider that they ought to realise, cannot fairly be asked to do more than other producers; but I am prepared, on behalf of the Government of India as important holders or producers, to say that, if the other interests concerned show any desire to consider the possibility of joint action for the regulating of sales in order to meet the world's demand, the Government of India would willingly co-operate. Further than this we cannot in the public interest go, but what I have said amounts to a carefully considered and important proposal, and it is for the other producing interests to consider if they will make any response. In the meanwhile, I think I may say with confidence that, at the present level of prices, the imposition of the duty which we propose is not likely to have any serious effect on the consumption of silver in India.

74. While our reasons for imposing the duty are, as I have explained, of a special nature, I am also prepared to say that special circumstances will govern our intentions as to the disposal of the revenue produced. We must, as I made clear, regard the proceeds primarily, at the present stage, as a reinforcement of the general financial position of the Government; but, if our estimates as regards the other heads of revenue are realised, and there is a surplus resulting from the imposition of the silver duty, then I am prepared to say that we have a very special purpose in mind for the application of that surplus. We regard this duty, principally in fact, as a measure which will give us a margin of revenue from which we shall be able to make a distribution to provinces after the forth-coming statutory revision to give them the funds which they require for nation-building services. Though it will not be for the Central Government to dictate to the provinces how such contributions should be applied, there will be an opportunity for discussing this matter when the whole distribution of the sources of revenue is considered, and I think I can say with confidence that additional funds are chiefly required by the provinces for such purposes as economic and agricultural development and primary education. If, pending the further allocation of revenue to the provinces which I have in view, any surplus is actually realised, then, of course, any proposal for its expenditure will be submitted to this Assembly.

75. It is on these grounds that I have stated that our proposals in regard to the silver duty must be regarded in a very special light. We propose to include, in our budget figures, a revenue of 1 crore, as a conservative estimate.

76. On this assumption, our budget estimates provide for a surplus of 70 lakhs of revenue over expenditure. As the budget proposals other than those relating to income-tax and super-tax will have effect forthwith, the current year's revenues will also benefit to the extent of 35 lakhs, which amount accordingly appears as a revenue surplus in the revised estimates.

REVIEW OF BUDGET PROPOSALS.

77. It is of course obvious to me that these proposals will be subjected to the most searching scrutiny, and the question which will be asked on all sides is whether there is any justification for imposing so heavy an additional burden of taxation.

Justification for new taxation.

78. Before this question is put, I would ask Honourable Members to pause and consider carefully what item of taxation in my proposals does not offer at least some indirect advantages. I venture to say that, with perhaps the sole exception of the income-tax proposals, such advantages will be found. But that is not by itself a sufficient answer, and it is necessary to examine the position further, and attempt to frame some interpretation of the symptoms of the present financial conditions. For, if the short-fall of revenue is merely the result of temporary combination of abnormal circumstances, then one must hesitate to impose the full corresponding burden of permanent taxation, and it might be justifiable to adopt temporary expedients. If, on the other hand, there is a permanent and unavoidable shortage of revenue, then the position must be tackled boldly in order to establish, before it is too late, a sound foundation.

79. In order to judge whether the present condition is permanent or not, there are two main aspects to be examined, that is to say, one must ask, on the one hand, whether the expenditure required this year is abnormally high and capable, either now or in future years, of reduction, and, on the other hand, whether the revenue anticipated is below the normal expectation owing to special circumstances which are unlikely to be repeated.

80. As to expenditure, I have already drawn the distinction between actual administrative outgoings on the one hand, and, on the other, such items as interest on debt and those provisions which do not represent actual outgoings in cash, but which are required, on principles of sound finance, as reserves against established or accruing liabilities. I will deal first with administrative expenditure. In regard to this I have, during the past year, in accordance with an undertaking which I gave to the Assembly in my last budget speech, conducted in the Finance Department a close scrutiny and survey of the growth of expenditure during the past five years. Reports have been prepared for each Department and these have been circulated to members of the Standing Finance Committee. A good deal remains to be done in the way of completing the details of this Enquiry, but I have gone far enough to come to the conclusion that, for various reasons, we cannot count on being able to find any substantial margin for reduction in the cost of the civil administration of the Central Government. In fact, with all the new services and heads which are being pressed for consideration, it is only by the exercise of the most rigid control that we shall be able to keep the growth of expenditure within bounds. The possibility, therefore, of cutting down administrative expenditure, does not, in my opinion, afford any substantial ground for postponing the imposition of taxation to meet the present deficit. But by accepting this conclusion, I do not imply that the search for possibilities of reducing our present scale of expenditure must be abandoned. It has, in fact, been decided by Government—and the proposal has recently been reported by me to the Standing Finance Committee—to appoint an officer on special duty to continue the examination in further detail. It is, in my opinion,

Provisional conclusion.

[Sir George Schuster.]

Further investigation. necessary to carry out a very close detailed investigation of the causes which have led in the past, and are still leading, to a steady increase in expenditure. Those Members of this Assembly who have sat with me on the Standing Finance Committee are fully aware of the difficulties in this matter. Applications are made in a particular case for improvement of conditions of pay in particular offices. A good case is made out and the improvement, involving perhaps by itself only a moderate increase in expenditure, is approved. But one move leads to another and it is inevitably found that other sections of Government staff, claiming to be working in similar conditions, again press that a similar improvement shall be accorded to them. These claims are difficult to resist, and, moreover, it must be remembered that the control does not lie entirely in the hands of the Central Government. It often happens that a particular claim is pressed in order to afford to members of some branch of a Central Government Department, conditions equally favourable with those prevailing for men in the service of the Provincial Governments working under similar conditions and in the same place. But the time has come for a comprehensive review of the whole situation, so that we may ascertain what claims on these grounds are likely to be pressed in future and that we may, if possible, fix, in consultation with the Local Governments, certain uniform principles from which there can be no departure. Apart from such special cases, the Government have become committed in the past years, to time-scale systems of pay, the full effects of which were not perhaps appreciated at the time when they were granted. These put upon us definite and unavoidable commitments, and I have already indicated that the normal rate of increase under this heading amounts to something like 25 lakhs per annum.

81. It is important that we should know where we stand in this matter and also when it is likely that the peak of this increase will be reached and what the figure of Government expenditure at that point will be. It is this kind of question which justifies the special appointment to which I have referred, for, the time is coming when, as part of the constitutional reforms which we shall have to consider, it will be necessary to re-arrange the distribution of heads of revenue between the Central Government and the Provincial Governments. When that time comes, it is essential that we should be able to assess, with some accuracy, what our own future commitments are likely to be.

82. These remarks cover one kind of growth in expenditure. But I Possibilities of retrench- shall be asked whether, even admitting that ment. this kind of growth is inevitable, it is not possible to make large cuts in the number of appointments and in the amount of the personnel employed. This, indeed, is a subject which will come within the purview of the special examination which we propose. But I should be deceiving this Assembly if I were to hold out any expectation of large economies in this direction. I doubt whether it is adequately realised to what an extent the gradual development of the present form of constitution is placing increased work on the shoulders of the officials of the Central Government, and I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that there is not a single Department of the Government of India in which those occupying the higher appointments are not at present overworked. Indeed, I think it far more likely that, as representative institutions grow and sessions of the Legislative Assembly become longer, it will be necessary to divide up some of the existing Departments and create new appointments for their representation in this Assembly.

83. I may, however, again be asked whether there is not a possibility of a different form of economy in the shape of elimination of certain services. At the time of the last big retrenchment movement, certain accessory services were largely cut down, particularly Scientific Departments and such minor departments as the Statistical Branch. My reply to such a question would again be that, unfortunately, it is only too likely that the move will be in the other direction. We are, in fact, at present faced with the need for meeting the demands of a large number of new services. Honourable Members are only too familiar with some of these. The development of agricultural research, for example, is an entirely new demand, as also is that of civil aviation. The former is one which may be fruitful of great benefit to the country; the latter is necessary unless India is to lose her place among the civilised nations of the world. Moreover, it brings in its train other needs such as the development of meteorology and wireless organisation. Again, if we look back on the cuts that were made during the last retrenchment campaign, I think it will be generally admitted, as proved by experience, that, in some respects at least, the economy has not been worth the sacrifice. In advancing this opinion, I have particularly in mind the Statistical Branch; and there, as some Honourable Members know, we have, in response to a far-seeing demand which has been pressed by various influential Members of this House, started on a course which will, I hope, provide those statistics for the gauging of the country's economic conditions which it so badly needs. Public opinion generally seems to be awakening to the desire that the Government of India should adopt a far more active and constructive economic policy than it has followed in the past, and that, in many matters, the Central Government should take upon themselves the responsibility of giving a lead and assistance to the Provincial Governments. This is a desire with which I most heartily sympathise, and it would, in my opinion, be false economy to resist it.

84. Lastly, I would impress on Honourable Members one consideration which has been brought before me very vividly in the course of my work in the Finance Department. The Central Government are directly responsible for the administration of certain areas, and I am afraid that one cannot resist the conclusion that the standard of services provided for in those areas, has, in many respects, been allowed to fall behind that prevailing in the neighbouring areas under Provincial Administrations. This is not a state of affairs which the Central Government can view with equanimity, and I feel convinced that there are considerable arrears to be made up in this direction.

85. For all these reasons, I have myself regretfully come to the conclusion, which I have already stated, namely, that, however energetically and ruthlessly the search for economies is carried out,—and I shall myself welcome any measures for the conduct of such a search,—there is not room for any substantial reduction in the civil expenditure of the Central Government.

[Sir George Schuster.]

86. If I turn now to those other kinds of expenditure to which I have referred, namely, those measures for the support of sound financial principles and the provision of adequate reserves against our obligations, I could not honestly put before this Assembly proposals less adequate than those which I have framed. It is, in my view, of vital importance that, at this stage in India's constitutional development, when we stand at the threshold of a now constitutional advance, nothing should be done which would suggest to the outside world that India's credit will be less carefully preserved in the future than in the past. India must be above suspicion in this respect, and in the end, I am convinced that this will prove sound economy and, by improving the country's credit, help materially to reduce the burden of interest which it will have to pay.

87. If I turn now to the revenue side of the picture,—the second of the two aspects which need examination,—it may be said that the estimates which I have presented, do imply, first, the expectation of a set-back in the tax revenue, or, rather a halt in the normal rate of its growth as evidenced in the results of the last seven years, and, secondly, a very decided worsening in the position of the Commercial Departments of the Railways and Posts and Telegraphs. I am prepared to admit that it is quite arguable that, on the revenue side, the picture which I am presenting, is abnormal and likely to be improved in future years. But, for many reasons, I feel sure that it will be unwise to allow such an argument to prevent the introduction of new taxes sufficient to meet the situation as I have to present it today.

88. I have many reasons for this conclusion, some of which I may state shortly as follows. In the first place, some of our present sources of revenue are likely to disappear, and, in the case of others, reductions may become desirable. The following special cases may be quoted: As regards opium, we are already committed to the disappearance of this revenue after 1935, and it is essential to find new sources of revenue to replace it. As regards the export duty on rice, I have already indicated in my proposals for this year that this, at its present level, may be a burden on the proper economic life of the country and further reductions may become desirable. It is possible that economic conditions may alter the justification for other forms of export duties as, for example, on jute; while, as regards income-tax, if again we put first the need for removing burdens which hamper the economic development of the country, I should myself welcome the opportunity of being able to introduce certain changes, as, for example, the introduction of provisions for allowing trading losses to be carried forward beyond the year in which they have occurred and the abolition of double super-tax on holding companies. Again, new needs for expenditure are constantly likely to press upon us and I have already referred to some of the new services which are now being developed.

89. Yet another consideration is this. We have, in my opinion, been working, in the past three years, with a dangerously low margin. In a country like India, subject to great risks of loss of revenue from failure of rains or from floods, it is desirable to have some margin of revenue over expenditure from which a reserve can be built up in reasonably good years. Memories are short, and although the last two monsoons have, in places, been unfavourable, it is many years since India has suffered from a real failure of the monsoon.

90. The last consideration to which I have to call attention, is one which bears most weight in my own mind. We have got to prepare for the probability—indeed, I think I may say, the certainty—that the next stage in constitutional development will need provision of more money for the provinces and that, in some form or other, the Central Government must be prepared to relinquish part of its own sources of revenue. After all, it is in the hands of the Provincial Governments that the real nation-building services lie, and the two great needs for India are agricultural development and, as a necessary condition of its success, the increase of a really effective form of primary education. Of all the tasks, the responsibility for which my present office lays upon me, that which I take most seriously is the duty of finding revenue in order that those provinces, which are at present handicapped by financial difficulties, may make a great start forward in developing the services which the country really needs. I believe that, in the new taxes which I have proposed, I have opened the way, if things go well, without putting any burden on the economic life of the country or subjecting to hardship any particular class, to create a margin which will enable us, as soon as the constitutional reforms are settled, to give a fair measure of assistance to the Provincial Governments in the next chapter of their history.

92. The gross proceeds of the rupee loan in the current year amounted to about 35½ crores of which 22½ crores represented conversion of bonds maturing from 1930

Current year. to 1932. This substantial reduction in the amount of the loans maturing in the near future has considerably improved the position for next three years, but the actual cash received in subscription to the loan was 13½ crores only, i.e., 4½ crores less than the total new loan provided for in the budget. As I anticipated at this time last year, it was necessary to resort to external borrowing on a Sterling borrowings. considerable scale. Sterling bills for £6 millions in each case were issued in London in May and December. The former issue matured in February and in order to place ourselves in funds to meet them, short-term bonds for £6 millions were issued early in February. The total net amount of funds raised during the year in England has thus amounted to about £12 millions. I must deal briefly with the conditions in which the issue of the short-term bonds was undertaken and the reasons underlying Government's action. Honourable Members will have been fully aware from the general review of the Government's policy as regards capital expenditure and borrowing which I gave in my budget speech last year, that I had arrived at the conclusion that external borrowing would be necessary. I then explained how and why, in future, it would be necessary that the rate of capital expenditure should be more nearly balanced than had been the case in the past five years by the increase of our capital resources in the form of fixed loans. It was therefore desirable, in any case, to raise a sterling loan as early as possible after the summer. Conditions, however, were then very unfavourable owing to the position in New York and the existence of a bank rate of 6½ per cent. in London and we thought that we should gain by waiting for cheaper money rates. When the New York boom collapsed, the anticipated easing of money commenced, but, by that time, political anxieties had begun to dominate the position in the London market for Indian securities. I need not give a long account of these events which must be still fresh in the minds of all Honourable Members. I need only say that the nervousness of London investors was intensified by the attitude adopted at the Congress meeting at Lahore in December. Therefore, while our anticipations that money conditions would become more favourable were realised the adverse effects of political reactions counterbalanced the advantage obtained. The facts, however, had to be faced, and as during the year Government had to meet the greater portion of the £5½ millions for the purchase of the Southern Punjab Railway and about £7½ millions for other railway capital expenditure, we felt that, in spite of the unfavourable conditions, we should not be justified in financing this capital expenditure entirely by temporary borrowing in the form of India bills. We considered, indeed, that some more permanent borrowing was, according to sound financial principles, essential.

93. In saying this, I wish to emphasise that our power to issue bills in the London market is in the nature of a reserve which ought to be kept available to meet temporary shortages of sterling resources. Prudent finance demands that this reserve power should be utilised as little as possible for financing permanent capital expenditure. By the issue of two-year bonds with the option of extension for a third year, we have obtained accommodation for a period sufficient to allow for the passing of the present political uncertainty and have, at the same time, avoided the burden to the Indian taxpayer, of floating a long-term loan in particularly unfavourable conditions; conditions which, I hope, will prove to be of a temporary nature. In the meanwhile, I am glad to say that the success of this operation, even though the terms were onerous, had a very good effect on our credit in London.

94. The combined amount of the above borrowings corresponds roughly with the budget forecast, but owing to events which it was impossible to foresee, it was necessary to supplement our resources by large issues of treasury bills in India. In the first place, contraction of the currency to the extent of 6.86 crores against cancellation of rupee treasury bills and 2.94 crores against silver withdrawn for sale depleted our resources by nearly 10 crores.

95. Without entering into a long exposition, I wish to explain briefly, and in very elementary terms, the real significance of these currency operations. There is much misunderstanding on these subjects, which is fostered by the peculiar position of the Government of India and the combination of roles which they have to play. In the first place, it is Government themselves who have to do the work and, therefore, as happens in all countries, they are blamed for every untoward occurrence—as some of the Honourable Members opposite would soon find out if—as they hope, and as I often wish they could,—they were to change places with us. But apart from this common experience, the Government are not only the currency authority but are themselves the chief operators in the remittance market. When there are difficulties as regards exchange, which would be expressed in other countries by a tendency to export gold, that is expressed in India by difficulties for the Government to effect remittance, and when we take action to protect the currency position, which in other countries would be regarded as quite normal, it is represented here as artificial manipulation of exchange by Government in order to meet their own remittance needs. That appearance induces an unduly hostile type of criticism.

96. Then again, let us consider the internal currency position. If, as has happened in the current year, prices fall and the country requires less currency, and if, on top of that, large quantities of redundant silver currency are returned from hoards, the currency authority must meet the situation by cancelling currency. Otherwise, an inflated condition exists, internal prices would keep unduly high in relation to external prices, and internal rates for money unduly low. The result would be that the natural flow of exports, which is necessary to maintain the country's balance of trade, would be restricted and a very unhealthy situation dangerous to stability of currency would be set up. When currency becomes redundant and has to be cancelled, the profits of the currency authority diminish, for, all issues of currency, whether it be silver currency the bullion value of which is less than its face value, or notes for which the authority merely has to bear the cost of printing, bring profits; and the less the amount of currency outstanding, the less the profit. But when we as a Government, in our functions as currency authority, have to cancel currency and thus submit to a corresponding loss of profit, we are accused of pursuing a policy ruinous to the country's interests because we appear as borrowing money at interest in the form of treasury bills and then destroying it by contraction. In actual fact, however, the loss thus incurred only represents a loss of the profit which we would have made if the country had needed the extra supplies of currency.

97. Some of our critics, however, will say that we have carried this process unnecessarily far and that, in contracting currency, we have not only incurred this loss ourselves but have starved the commercial world in its needs for currency. Of this, as I have, on recent occasions, frequently explained, there is no evidence. Actually, since the beginning of the last busy season, say, from the 1st December, 1928, to the 30th November, 1929, the net contraction was 15·89 crores and the net reduction of notes in circulation was only 2·48 crores. The reason for this small effect of our operation on the note issue is that very large quantities of rupees have been returned. When rupees are returned, notes are automatically issued against them, and if these rupees have come not from active circulation but from hoards, a corresponding inflation would, in fact, have taken place. These have been the actual facts this year, and the proof of the pudding lies in the eating. In spite of the contraction of currency, all the evidence shows that the currency needs of the country have been fully met so far as it was healthy to do so. In support of this contention, I need merely point to the fact that the Imperial Bank's cash, which is the real index of the adequacy of the currency, is considerably higher than it was at this time last year, although no expansion of the currency has been effected this busy season. This shows clearly that the contraction of the currency has not been excessive.

98. While this necessary contraction of 10 crores to which I have referred, counterbalanced part of our borrowings, other factors have contributed further to worsen our ways and means position. The chief cause has come from the Railways. As a result of the falling off in railway receipts and the increase of working expenses, the Railway Reserve Fund will have to be drawn upon to the extent of 86 lakhs to meet the contribution to general revenues, whereas an addition of 3·26 lakhs to the Reserve Fund was provided for in the Budget, while the addition to the Depreciation Fund is now expected to be one crore less than was anticipated. As against this, it was possible to effect a saving of 2·32 lakhs in railway capital expenditure, but, even allowing for this, there is a deterioration of nearly 3 crores under Railways. Borrowings by the Provinces are now expected to exceed the Budget by about 2½ crores, and, in view of the heavy disbursements in April in London and in India the closing balance will stand at a figure 9 crores higher than provided for in the budget estimate. For these reasons, the revised estimate provides for an increase from 4 crores to 24 crores in the amount of treasury bills outstanding with the public, of which I would remark again that 9 crores is represented by increased treasury balances.

99. In my last budget speech, I dealt at length with the railway capital expenditure and envisaged the possibility of a drastic reduction in 1930-31 in order that the credit of the Government might not be over-strained. The purpose thus indicated has been fulfilled, and as the House knows, we are allowing 16½ crores only for railway capital expenditure, i.e., 7·4 crores less than the revised estimate for the current year. It must be noted that the real reduction in new railway capital expenditure sanctioned is actually larger than these figures indicate, as 2·35 crores of the programme for 1930-31 really form part of the sanctioned programme for 1929-30. Allowing for this, the programmes for the two years compare as follows:

	Crores.
1929-30	26·50
1930-31	14·40
Reduction	12·10

This comparison brings out more clearly the drastic nature of the curtailment effected.

100. With this provision for railway capital expenditure, our borrowing programme for 1930-31 is, so far as new money is concerned, a very modest one. So far as sterling operations are concerned, I assume that the £6 million India Bills falling due in December will be renewed; but, if conditions are favourable, this floating debt will be funded. As regards India, I estimate that a loan of 23½ crores will be required, of which 7·4 crores only will be new money and the remainder, namely, 16·1 crores will be utilised for redeeming outstanding loans, principally 1930 Bonds. This provides for reducing the amount of outstanding treasury bills from 24 crores at the close of the current year to 20 crores at the close of the next. I anticipate no difficulty in carrying out this programme without disturbing the market for Government securities, and, if conditions improve, it may be possible, to fund a larger amount of the floating debt than I have assumed in my present calculations. On looking back on these proposals, I feel justified in saying that provided only that political disturbances do not upset either conditions in India or confidence in England, our borrowing programme is of such a nature that we could confidently look forward to a general appreciation in Government securities.

101. A year ago, it was estimated that we should require to remit £35½ millions to London in 1929-30. Throughout the year the exchange position has been difficult. India, like most other countries in the world, was affected adversely by the high money rates consequent upon the attraction of funds to New York to finance the speculative boom on the Stock Exchange and by the fall in prices and general trade depression which followed the collapse of this boom. In addition, the uncertain political outlook has led to the export of capital on a considerable scale. As a result, our power to effect remittances to London has been temporarily curtailed and we now estimate that the total remittance through the market in the current year will amount to £19 millions only. This will suffice, with the help of the sterling borrowings referred to above and the transfer of £9½ millions already effected through the Paper Currency Reserve, to enable the Secretary of State to close the year with a balance of £6·8 millions. Assuming that the £6 million India bills falling due in December 1930 will be removed, the amount required to be remitted to London next year is estimated to be about £31·8 millions. This figure includes £3·3 millions for capital expenditure on railways as compared with £7·5 millions in the current year and £2·4 millions for repayment of debt (capital portion of railway annuities, etc.)

[Sir George Schuster.]

102. I should, of course, make it clear that the entire ways and means programme outlined above can only be considered as tentative and subject to modification in the light of the actual circumstances of the time.

103. Following the practice of previous years, I quote the market prices of certain typical rupee securities of the Government of India:

104. The fall in prices since last year may be ascribed to a number of causes. Some would no doubt attribute chief importance to the magnitude of the Government's own needs. I explained this aspect of the situation very fully in my speech last year. It is clear now, in retrospect, that from 1925 to the beginning of 1928, the full effects of the capital expenditure programme launched by the Government were not felt. Such expenditure as was incurred was met very largely from reserves, while the expenditure itself had not got fully under weigh. When once expenditure got going at the full rate, and had to be met not from reserves but by fresh borrowing, it was obvious that the price of Government securities must come down from the high peak to which they had climbed. I gave a clear indication of this in my speech last year and also explained that, while I felt it necessary to curtail capital expenditure, it would not be possible to give effect to this at once without great economic loss, because so much work was already in progress and commitments such as the purchase of the Southern Punjab Railway had already been undertaken. I made it quite clear, however, that it was my intention to put on the brake as soon as possible, and, in the meanwhile, I endeavoured to settle the terms of our rupee loan last year on such a basis that it would represent a rock-bottom price from which a steady appreciation might be expected as a result of the curtailment of future borrowings. I think we may at least congratulate ourselves on the fact that, in spite of all the unfavourable developments which have since occurred, last year's rupee loan only stands about one point below the issue price. If it had not been for two unfavourable factors over which we had no control, I am certain that last year's loan would now be standing at a handsome premium.

105. What, then, are these factors? There has been, first, the wave of dear money which swept over the world culminating in a 6½ per cent. bank rate in England, which made it necessary to tighten money rates in India in order to protect our currency position. And, secondly, there has come upon us a new difficulty in the fall of our sterling securities due to the fears felt in London as to the future political stability of India. I have already said that I believe these fears to be entirely unjustified, but their results are unfortunately realities which we have to face. Any fall in our sterling securities creates serious difficulties which must re-act on the local situation. Either of these two last factors would have upset the rupee security market quite apart from our own borrowing operations.

106. Honourable Members will ask: "What of the future?" And I must answer this question in relation to each of the three factors which I have mentioned. As to the first, our own demands on the market, I have already given a clear answer. We only expect to ask the public to give us about 7·4 crores of new money next year. If we had only to consider our domestic monetary conditions, I would say with confidence that our troubles were over and that we could anticipate a steadily rising market in our Government securities.

107. As to the second factor, the rates for money prevailing in the world, we can again look with confidence to the future. I need only say that, in my view, everything points to a period of cheaper money for some time to come.

108. As to the third factor, I am afraid I can speak with much less certainty. What we have to expect from the operation of this factor depends mainly upon the action of the leaders of public opinion in this country, as represented by Honourable Members of this Assembly and those outside. If there is clear evidence that such leaders are facing their responsibilities and are determined to oppose all revolutionary movements and to co-operate in a course of peaceful and orderly evolution, disclaiming those threats of unconstitutional action and repudiation of debt which we have so recently heard, then I am quite certain that the outside world will regain confidence in India and that we shall advance once more to our former high level of credit. But, if a contrary course is taken, then, it will be impossible to avoid unfavourable reactions on India's economic development. There must be a lack of that confidence which is so necessary to the initiation of new enterprises, and it is almost certain that a flow of capital from India will continue. Speaking on behalf of the Government, we have done all in our power to create a strong and healthy financial position, and I think what I have already said has demonstrated the effectiveness of our action in this direction. If the insidious lack of confidence continues to sap our foundations, we shall, as a Government, do our best to protect them and shall not hesitate to take strong financial measures for that purpose. But this will mean that our energies and resources will have to be devoted to defence rather than to constructive new enterprise and that the hopeful prospect of an all-round recovery, which would bring prosperity in so many directions and for which, so far as lies in our power, we have created all the necessary conditions, will be unattainable. The future in this respect lies in the hands of leaders of non-official opinion in India. The responsibility rests with them and not with the Government.

109. I do not propose to lengthen my present remarks by going into further detail now regarding figures of India's debt. Among the papers which will be circulated will be found a statement prepared in the same form as was introduced last year, with explanatory notes.

[Sir George Schuster.]

GENERAL REVIEW OF THE ECONOMIC SITUATION.

110. Before I conclude, I must make a few short observations on the general economic situation. I was taken to task, in the course of the budget debates last year, for devoting insufficient attention to the general position of the masses of the country; but I must point out that my main task in a budget speech is to explain particular financial proposals and it is impossible for me to cover the whole work of Government. Moreover, it must be remembered that the main field for work in nation-building services comes within the sphere of the Provincial Governments and I cannot roam at large over this field without exceeding my own functions. Nevertheless, the effect on the general well-being of the country must be at the root of all our financial policy and I think that, if my proposals this year are carefully and impartially studied, it will be found that this has been throughout their main purpose and intention. I am afraid the time is now short and my remarks on this part of the subject must be very brief. I have dealt recently with various aspects of the situation in a speech to the Federation of Indian Chambers and I trust that Honourable Members will do me the honour of reading this speech. It is very obvious at present that India is suffering from a general wave of depression. It is also obvious that, apart from this special depression, there is great room for improvement in the standard of living of the masses of the country and of general economic production. It is necessary to make a clear distinction between these two conditions. The first is temporary and not special to India. It is mainly produced by causes over which the Government have no control. The second is one which demands the constant and urgent attention of all the forces of society, public and private alike. As to the first, I hope, in the course of the debate, to have an opportunity more fully to express my views. I only wish to emphasise at present that I think that the depth of the depression is exaggerated in comparison with the very special period through which the country passed in the years 1924-25 and 1925-26. If we examine the trend of economic events in India since the end of the War, we find that the volume of imports and exports has, on the whole, shown a steady progression with two exceptional periods, first, as regards imports in 1920-21 and, secondly, as regards exports in 1924-25 and 1925-26. As regards prices, while the prices of imports have tended steadily to decline, those of exports, for various world causes, tended to rise during the period from 1921 to 1924. Since then, world prices for Indian imports and exports have steadily declined. The point of time at which the general rise in the prices of India's exports culminated coincided with an exceptional period for the volume of agricultural production, and this produced, in the two special years 1924-25 and 1925-26, to which I have referred, an exceptional peak of prosperity. Public opinion as to the course of Indian trade and general conditions, tends, I think, at present, to be framed too much with reference to this special period, and though I do not wish to minimise the effects of the present depression. I think that, if our view is cast back along a longer period of India's history, we shall find that the present conditions are not, in comparison, so black as they are sometimes painted and that the general economic course of the country has been one of steady advance. The cause of the continued fall in world prices for India's chief imports and exports since 1925-26 is somewhat obscure. It would appear to be world-wide, as, on the basis of 100 for 1926, the Index numbers of general prices in the United Kingdom, the United States and India are 92.2, 96.8 and 95.3 respectively for 1929. While a fall has thus taken place in all the three areas that for India lies between those for the United Kingdom and the United States. This world-wide fall in prices has been put down by some to general over-production, both of raw materials and industrial products, throughout the world. It is known that large scale mass production has been developing throughout the world during the last few years and that tropical and sub-tropical areas have extended their output of raw materials. There are others who would give, as a further reason for the general world-wide fall in prices, the insufficient production of gold for the general requirements of the world as a whole.

111. Unfortunately, the fall did not end with 1929. Conditions in America, to which I have already referred above, have led to a large recession in business activity all over the world. The immediate out-look is uncertain.

The out-look. Manufacturers and dealers are using up their stock of raw materials and refusing to enter into fresh commitments until they see how far this recession is likely to go. The result is that the fall in the prices of primary products, which was a feature of the year 1929, has been accelerated. India has been particularly hard hit by this world development. Since the 1st January the price of cotton has fallen by about 15 per cent. and the price of wheat by about 12 per cent. while the prices of other staple products such as jute and rice show no signs of recovery from the low level which they reached during the year 1929. It would be rash to attempt to say when the tide will turn, but there are signs in America that the trade recession will not be so severe as was anticipated, and it looks as if prices are now so low that the world will soon begin to take more interest in the products of India and be prepared to enter into commitments for the future. There is reason to hope, therefore, that a recovery from the present economic depression will not be long delayed.

112. Whatever the reasons for the fall and whatever the future prospects, it is clear that the condition of the agricultural classes of India must be seriously affected, and it may be that, in order to maintain their position, they have to part with an undue proportion of their own production. Measures of immediate

Lines of policy. relief are difficult, but the main lines of the policy which should be pursued seem clear. In the first place, and above everything, it is necessary to stimulate and improve the agricultural production of the country and, as a supplement to this, to put the poorer agricultural classes into a position in which they can retain a greater proportion of their own produce for their own subsistence. In the second place, it is desirable to encourage industrial development provided that this can be done in conjunction with, and as a supplement to, the agricultural life of the country. In the third place—and this is a minor matter but still one of very great importance—the whole country urgently needs the provision of better methods for the study of its own economic conditions than are at present available.

113. I venture to say that, if the significance of all the proposals to which I have referred in this speech, is examined, it will be found that steps are being taken in all these directions. I shall hope to enlarge further on this subject in the later stages of the debate, and not encroach further upon the time available this evening.

Conclusion.

114. Before concluding, I should like to emphasise again what I regard as the main features of the budget proposals.

First, all additional expenditure on normal increments and new services, including the large agricultural grants and such important new services as civil aviation, is being balanced by economies,—mainly on military expenditure.

Secondly, principles of financial soundness are being doubly reinforced. No financial weak spots are being left as regards debt redemption and the Cash Certificate liability, while I have provided for a margin of safety in case events next year prove unfavourable. We can thus face the most stringent scrutiny of financial critics with confidence.

Thirdly, we are making a substantial start towards a constructive economic policy and opening the way for beneficial expenditure. If the year proceeds without abnormal disturbances to trade or civil security, we shall have money at our disposal to increase our resources for these purposes, and having prepared these foundations, the Central Government next year ought to be in a position either to initiate important schemes themselves or to provide additional revenue for the Provincial Governments to give them the power for a more generous effort to this end.

Fourthly, although substantial new revenue is to be raised, the measures which I have proposed are so designed as to reduce restrictions on economic action and to lighten, rather than increase, the burden on the poorest classes. This is directly the case as regards the reduction of the rice export duty and of the import duty on kerosene, while all except one of the other measures ought to have indirect beneficial effects. I have, moreover, indicated various directions in which, with the normal proceeds of our new resources, I hope to remove certain hampering impediments to the business activities of the country.

Fifthly, we have, in our proposals affecting cotton, made a determined effort to remedy a special malady from which the industrial life of the country is suffering, and by restoring health to one important centre, to improve the general condition of the country.

Sixthly, we have made a determined effort, by a proper control of capital expenditure, to give a chance for recuperation of the country's credit, so that, with strength restored, a healthy growth, proportioned to our resources, may be once more resumed.

115. I would ask Honourable Members to give all these points impartial consideration and to read into my proposals their future promise no less than their present performance.

116. I may possibly be criticised for seeking to raise more revenue than appears to be immediately needed for actual outgoings, but I hope that what I have said will have convinced at least a majority of this Assembly, first, of the paramount importance of creating reserves to strengthen our resources and credit at this present critical juncture in India's history, and, secondly, for preparing the way for a more generous allocation, to the Provinces, of sources of revenue for nation-building services. It has often been said that the Reforms introduced after 1919 have failed to achieve their full effect owing to lack of adequate funds in the hands of the Provincial Governments. I am desirous of doing all in my power to prepare for better success in the next step.

117. Of one thing I feel certain—that, whether my particular proposals are popular or not, and whether or not they are open to criticism in detail, the main purpose which I have in mind is the right purpose, and that the future will prove the truth of this contention. A Finance Member has to suffer the slings and arrows of criticism for his immediate actions, and, perhaps in very rare cases, to receive some meed of praise if Providence brings good times in his tenure of office. But his own efforts should really be judged by their more lasting results, and I can hope with confidence that, if my present proposals are accepted, my successor, from whatever quarter he may come, will, in the future, look back to me with gratitude for having proposed these drastic measures at this stage. For the present, it is my purpose, as, I hope, it will also be that of this Assembly, to make clear to all concerned that, whatever political clouds may be hanging over us, or whatever political changes may be in store, it will ever be the determination of the Government of India to keep Indian finance firmly secured on an unshakeable foundation. (Applause.)

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): Sir, I move for leave to introduce the Indian Finance Bill, 1930.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

[28TH FEB. 1930.]

Mr. President: It is not necessary. The question is:

"That leave be given to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Tariff Act, 1894, and to amend the Indian Tariff (Cotton Yarn Amendment) Act, 1927."

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Tuesday, the 4th March, 1930.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Tuesday, 4th March, 1930.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber of the Council House at Eleven of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

MEMBERS SWORN:

Mr. Hattiangadi Shankar Rau, M.L.A. (Finance Department: Nominated Official); Rai Bahadur Satis Chandra Dutta, M.L.A. (Surma Valley cum Shillong: Non-Muhammadan); and Dr. R. D. Dalal, M.L.A. (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official).

THE GENERAL BUDGET—GENERAL DISCUSSION.

Mr. President: The House will now proceed with the General Discussion of the Budget.

Mian Mohammad Shah Nawaz (West Central Punjab: Muhammadan): Sir, the Budget of the ensuing year, which was presented by the Honourable Sir George Schuster on Friday last, in a very clear and frank manner, exhibits some very disappointing features. The net position is that the Government are faced with a deficit of 5 crores and 52 lakhs, which is sought to be wiped out by retrenchment in civil and military expenditure to the extent of one crore and 42 lakhs and by the imposition of fresh taxation to the extent of 4 crores and 10 lakhs. We are told by the Honourable the Finance Member that the present year has been a bad one, and the accounts of 1929-1930 would have shown a deficit of one crore and 56 lakhs, but for a special windfall which will bring to the Government of India exactly the same amount under the Treaty of Versailles. The ensuing year is certainly most discouraging, and the imposition of fresh taxation has caused considerable anxiety. At a time, Sir, when there is general trade depression throughout the world, when the purchasing capacity of the Indian people has seriously diminished, when the monsoons have failed in certain parts of the country, and at a time when floods and locusts have done great damage to the crops, economy and not additional taxation should have been the watch-word of the Honourable the Finance Member. Well, Sir, the outstanding feature of the Budget of 1930-31 is the imposition of fresh taxation on the poverty stricken people of India. The general increase in the cotton duties from 11 per cent. to 15 per cent. would certainly be welcomed, though not for any other reason, at least in the interest of the Bombay industries and possibly in the interest of the hand loom industry. But I venture to submit that a further 5 per cent. protective duty on non-British goods should be opposed on the principle that it endorses Imperial Preference as a principle. The Honourable the Finance Member has been careful to inform us that neither the Government of India, nor the Assembly is committed to Imperial Preference as a principle, but the fact remains that liberty has been taken to introduce Imperial Preference as a principle, and on this account, the Indians have no other alternative but to oppose this item unless and until India can get all the reciprocal advantages and facilities from England and other Dominions to what it gives them, she can not willingly agree to any scheme of Imperial Preference.

The increased excise duty on kerosene oil, which it is hoped will bring 35 lakhs, and the import duty on sugar, which it is hoped will yield one crore and 80 lakhs, would certainly hit the poor and the middle classes. This item is also very regrettable and probably the non-official Members will vote against it. The rate in the increase of income-tax and the super-tax should be opposed by everybody, and it should be scrapped from the Finance Bill. Lastly, Sir, there is the re-introduction of the import duty of four annas per ounce, on silver, which in my humble opinion will hit the poor very much. The device adopted by the Honourable the Finance Member is very unfair to the poor of this country. The peasants of this country, and particularly the poor classes, purchase silver and they will have to pay, not the world market prices, but a considerably higher price, artificially created by the duty on silver.

Well, Sir, we are told that the present deficit is due to the general trade depression, is due to the unrest in this country and elsewhere, and that the Honourable the Finance Member is compelled to resort to additional taxation. But the question remains whether India or the Indian people are capable of paying the fresh revenues; whether they have the capacity to pay. In my humble judgment, the Indians have no such capacity to pay, and the additional taxation, except probably one tax, the increased duty on cotton, is uncalled for.

Now, Sir, the hard facts of the situation are these. A great section of the people utterly dislikes the present system of Government. They think that the present system is an evil, and they threaten to launch a campaign of civil disobedience, a campaign of non-payment of taxes. On the other hand the Honourable the Finance Member says that the Government mean to impose additional taxation. Hence there are two fires,—the fire of non-payment of taxes and the fire of imposition of fresh taxation. Between these two fires, the position of those who occupy a central position has become very difficult indeed. Between these two fires, I venture to submit, the best interests of India will suffer. I agree, Sir, with the Honourable the Finance Member when he says that the Indian leaders must oppose all threats of constitutional action and disclaim the repudiation of debts, and they should help Government in the maintenance of law and order. So far as the Moderates are concerned, they will help the Government. But, Sir, I do not agree with him at all when he says that the future lies in the hands of the leaders of non-official opinion, and they alone are responsible and not the Government. I say emphatically that Government are also responsible for the present unhappy state of things in this country. The clear duty of the Government is to see that the Indian people are happy, contented and prosperous. Is it not a fact that, despite the fact that the British people have brought peace to this country, the present system of Government is defective? Is it not a fact that the Indian people have to pay a crushing figure of 55 crores,—now reduced to 54 crores and 20 lakhs,—for the maintenance of the Army? And it is a great shame, and as great a disgrace as can befall a nation that the Indians are not trained to lead their own regiments. Indians still believe that the military expenditure can be reduced, at least by one or two crores. But we are told by the Honourable the Finance Member that no substantial reduction can be made. That is very regrettable. In my humble judgment, the Honourable the Finance Member should have told the heads of the Department to adopt a system of rationing the Department, that is to say, he should have told them that their expenditure should be reduced by a certain percentage, and it would then be seen that a lot of retrenchment can be made in the military expenditure and in other services. Sir, I submit that Government either do not understand the Indian distemper or have not got the courage to administer healing remedies to the disease of unrest. That remedy lies with Government. I say this, and I say it plainly, that if the British nation, through her Parliament, is not prepared to grant immediate provincial autonomy and at least fix a minimum time limit, for the attainment of complete Dominion Status, there can be no peace in this country. My own conviction is that the Honourable the Finance Member should have waited for the result of the Simon Report and the result of the Round Table Conference; and if the result had been favourable, he could have come to this House and said, "Now the responsibility is very much yours and you had better place your financial position on an unshakable foundation". I venture to submit that at the present juncture, our esteemed and able friend was not well advised to bring forward a scheme of additional taxation.

The worst part of the Budget is that the Honourable the Finance Member makes no promise—none whatever. He does not say that the present imposition of taxation is a temporary one or is on a permanent basis. Probably he means that this should be a permanent taxation. If he had come forward with a proposal that the additional taxation to the extent of 4 crores and 10 lakhs was simply meant for such purposes as agricultural development or the introduction of primary compulsory education in the provinces, it might have been possible for some of us to vote with him; but he does not say anything of the kind. He simply says that, as Finance Member, he is bound to balance the Budget, and that is all. I submit that, whatever the difficulties of the Finance Member may be, he has to face the difficulties created in this country. The Finance Member really should have made a supreme effort to retrench expenditure which in my humble judgment he has not done. I say, Sir, that although the Budget has been presented in a very frank manner, it is certainly very disappointing in many respects, and the Finance Member will have a very hard task to see that the major portion of additional taxation is voted by the Assembly. He should expect the House to vote for all fresh revenues.

Sir, I have to say something about the military policy and the military expenditure. I have already said that it is a great shame that Indians, except an inadequate and limited number, are not permitted to get admission into the King's Commission. I really do not know why Government are not accelerating the pace of Indianisation of the Army. There may be a risk from the British point of view, but the risk must be taken in the interest of this country. Do they mean to say that they do not trust the Indians? So far as I am concerned, and I am perfectly certain that many Indians are of this opinion, if there is any upheaval in Afghanistan or Turkestan or Russia, with a view to attack India, my country, all Indians will be united in defending their own country and the Empire. I am perfectly certain that, although I am now 50 years of age, a soldier's death would be the best thing for me. I do not know why the Britishers are distrusting the Indians,—I cannot understand that. Are they distrusting the Indians because they think that there is going to be an upheaval in this country? I think not, I think that India's heart is quite sound and that of Great Britain may be sound. We are only adopting our own ways of meeting the situation. We school our manners, act our parts, but we know that our dispositions are quite gentle, tranquil and true. The British Government must know that, after all, if the Indians are trained to command their own regiments, and if the Indian Army is Indianised, it will be immensely better in the interests of Great Britain and of India. I have, Sir, a great complaint to make about this question of the Indianisation of the Army. In my humble opinion the recommendations of the Sandhurst Committee should have been accepted by the Government without any reservation whatever. (Hear, hear.) If those recommendations are not accepted, the talk about the grant of Dominion Status is all humbug. (Hear, hear.) I cannot understand at all that Dominion Status can be granted, or even promised, if the British Government are not prepared to Indianise the Army. I cannot understand why the people of this country are not allowed into the superior ranks in the Army. Without the Indianisation of the Army, the talk of Dominion Status would be absurd, and this is the first step which the British Government should take to show their good faith and that they are prepared to grant Dominion Status to the people of this country as quickly as possible and at any rate within a short time-limit. The Indian opinion is unanimous on the point that the attainment of Dominion Status cannot be deferred for long. I say these are the healing remedies to the disease of unrest. Indians are quite prepared to place the Indian finance on an unshakable foundation. But it is the clear duty of the Government to see that the legitimate desires and aspirations of the Indian people are fulfilled without further delay. The real root cause of present unrest is that the Indians are dissatisfied with the present system of Government and they want that it should be changed, and changed root and branch. If the Government are prepared to do that, the Indian people are prepared to help the Government to their utmost capacity, and I am perfectly certain that the Moderates and all right-minded Indians are prepared to nip in the bud the Independence movement and the movement of civil disobedience provided also that the Government play their own part well and give helpful promises to the Indian people. Without those the financial position will remain more or less unstable. If the British people fulfil their own part of the obligation, everything will be all right. I concede that the Britishers have brought peace to this country. I concede that the Civil Service is a very efficient service. I grant that you have brought prosperity, by Posts, Telegraphs, Railways, and large irrigation schemes. But at the same time, it cannot be denied that it is not a Government of the people. It has many defects, which I have already pointed out, and those defects must be remedied and the remedy lies in the hands of the Britishers. In the matter of the Indianization of the Army, delay has given rise to bitter unbelief. I have, Sir, expressed these thoughts as they have come; I have expressed these thoughts with perfect frankness. They may not be liked by some people, but I have done my duty. I request the Government to consider them seriously. (Applause from Non-official Benches.)

Sir Hugh Cocke (Bombay: European): Sir, I was very interested in the remarks of the Honourable Member who has just sat down, but I thought the tributes he paid at the close of his speech were a little difficult to reconcile with some of his earlier remarks. But at any rate, he referred to his belief that leaders would, under certain circumstances, be only too anxious to nip in the bud any attempt at civil disobedience in this country, and I am quite sure that everybody in this House realises that if that is nipped in the bud, and if we have a peaceful year, it will be reflected very much in the figures with which we shall be presented a year hence. Sir, when we have got to consider large additional taxation, I think it is perhaps desirable that one should look some years back in order to ascertain some of the reasons for that additional taxation, and I have been studying Appendix I of the Financial Secretary's Memorandum to look into the figures not merely of this year and the Budget for next year and those of the previous completed year, but to make a comparison between the first of the years given in Appendix I, namely 1923-24, and the budget estimate for 1930-31. A study of those figures, I think, gives very substantial reasons why today we are faced with a deficit of four crores or so, requiring additional taxation.

Turning to the main items, it will be noticed under Customs, our revenue—it is our biggest head of revenue—has increased roughly from 39 crores to 52½ crores in that period of seven years, that is by 13½ crores, a very substantial increase. But taking the next item, Taxes on Income, our figures have remained stationary. As a matter of fact, the figure for the first year and the budget estimate of next year both show over 17 crores, but in none of the other years is the figure over 17 crores. Actually our figure for 1930-31 is 39 lakhs less than the income revenue for 1923-24, so that under that head there has been no progress at all. Under Salt, we are 3 crores down for that period. Our revenue in 1923-24 was roughly 8½ crores and it is now 5 crores and 71 lakhs, a drop of approximately 3 crores. In Opium, we are slightly up by 40 lakhs, which is rather extraordinary of course in view of the fact that we are reducing our revenue from Opium. But it just happens that the 1923-24 figure is particularly low. In the matter of "Other principal heads", our revenue is down by 50 lakhs, and then we come to the chief item of all in connection with the decrease of revenue, of the Central Government, and that is the Provincial contributions. In 1923-24, our revenue was nearly 9 crores, and today it is nothing at all. In Railways we are 70 lakhs down compared with 1923-24. In total revenue we merely show an increase of 1½ crores in those seven years.

Turning to the expenditure side, we find it mainly increased. Irrigation has gone up by 5 lakhs; Debt Services, 19 lakhs; Civil Administration, 3½ crores; Civil Works, 14 lakhs; Miscellaneous Expenditure on the other hand is a little down. In Posts and Telegraphs, we have increased our net expenditure by practically 1½ crores, because in 1923-24 we had a surplus of 71 lakhs and today we have a deficit of 71 lakhs. Military expenditure shows a reduction of nearly 2 crores, and the total expenditure shows an increased expenditure of $3\frac{1}{4}$ crores. In other words, our revenue in the past seven years has been going up at the rate of 20 lakhs a year approximately, and our expenditure has been going up at the rate of about 50 lakhs a year, but if provincial contributions are excluded, our revenue has increased from 76 crores 80 lakhs to 87 crores 21 lakhs, an increase of 10 crores 41 lakhs. That revenue increase was necessary to balance the provincial contributions which were cancelled, so that I think having regard to one increased expenditure, we have got to face the fact, as the Honourable the Finance Member said in his speech, that we have not made up the gap that occurred as the result of the elimination of the provincial contributions, and really we are imposing fresh taxes in the Central Government today to make up for those provincial contributions, or in other words, to provide for expenditure which the provinces have at last been able to meet but which they could not meet as long as they had to contribute to the Central Government—expenditure which we hope is in the nature of nation-building expenditure such as education, sanitation, etc. Therefore, if we take a broad view with reference to the new taxation, we have to realise that, in the main, it is being put on to benefit the provinces in contrast to the position when the Central Government received a substantial revenue from the provinces.

It is distinctly disappointing of course that the Post Office, as a commercial department, shows no progress, but very much the reverse, the main reason being, I think, the increase of pay of the postal servants, which I think no one regrets. But I noticed the other day that the Post Office in the United Kingdom shows very remarkable figures. The commercial profit there is £9 million. This figure is arrived at after charging interest on capital and meeting a deficit on the Telegraph service of three quarters of a million sterling. It is pointed out that, if the postal rates were reduced from $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ to one penny, it would cost the Post Office a revenue of anything between £5 and £7½ millions sterling, but even if that change took place, there would still be a profit of about £2 millions for the State. Well, in India, we have to carry our letters further and we do not carry so many of them, and we are faced with the fact today that the Central revenues are actually contributing to the Post Office about Rs. 70 lakhs in the current year, namely, in 1929-30 Rs. 73 lakhs; in the coming year's estimates nearly Rs. 72 lakhs.

Another important factor, of course, which the Honourable the Finance Member has had to face, and which is an additional reason for the increase in taxation which is proposed, is the fact that he has to face facts in connection with the accumulated interest on Postal Cash Certificates. That obligation has been increasing year after year. Sir Basil Blackett was attacked, I think, because he made no proper provision for that. His reply was that he was merely following the course followed in the United Kingdom. Whether that course is still followed in the United Kingdom I do not know, but certainly up to that time he was merely following the same course that was followed in the United Kingdom in connection with the National Savings Certificates. Since then, the interest obligation has been mounting up year after year. I think nearly ten years have nearly elapsed since Postal Certificates were first on sale, and therefore we have got an accumulated interest obligation of 10 years on many of these Postal Cash Certificates, which were sold at Rs. $7\frac{1}{4}$ or thereabouts and are to be redeemed at about Rs. 13 after 10 years.

It is interesting to note, I think, as pointed out in the Honourable Member's speech, that the sum required for the reduction and avoidance of debt has risen materially since 1923-24. The amount has risen from Rs. 3 crores and 62 lakhs to Rs. 6 crores. The convention which was established six years ago now has run its time, and is to be reconsidered, as pointed out in the Honourable Member's speech. I hope that, in the reconsideration of that problem, no material reduction will be made in the amount which is provided annually, because I believe sound principles in connection with a country's sinking fund are very essential, and they react on the rate of interest at which one can borrow. Sound finance obviously means a cheaper rate of interest on the money that one borrows.

Coming to the question of income-tax, I am not prepared to oppose the increases which have been made. One regrets perhaps that it has been necessary to depart from the round figure of one and a half annas and propose one anna and seven pies. That perhaps is more or less a sentimental objection. I find that for a man with an income of a lakh of rupees, if my calculations are correct, the additional taxation he has got to pay is Rs. 781, i.e., he now pays in income-tax and super-tax, Rs. 14,062 and he will be called on to pay Rs. 14,843 so that the increase is very small and is not one which I think should be attacked. As regards the other increases of taxation, I for one see no material objection to any one of them, because it seems to me they do not impose a very serious burden on any consumer. If any Honourable Member could show me that the contrary is the case, I should be prepared to reconsider my view, but the taxes on kerosene and sugar and the cotton import duty appear only to impose a very moderate burden on the consumer. I think we have got to pay the bill because it is very essential that the deficit should be met. I regret that there was no promise in the Honourable Member's speech about any reconsideration of the companies' super-tax, because such a tax in the name of a corporation profits tax was removed in England many years ago now, as it was only imposed as a war measure, but here we have still got the companies' super-tax, which is strongly objected to in business circles on the ground that it amounts to double taxation. It is, however, satisfactory to note that business losses will be brought into account in future, and the Finance Member has also promised to reconsider the question of double super-tax on companies, particularly in connection with holding companies.

Sir, reviewing the whole Budget, it seems to me that, although it must excite considerable criticism when a large additional amount is required from the country in taxation, one has got to consider the matter as a whole. One thing we have to remember in particular is that, to some extent, this new taxation is required to meet the increased pay and contentment of the working classes. Whether it is in the Postal Budget, or in the Railway Budget, or in the Central Budget, I think if the calculation were made, it would be found that the additional amount paid to labour in the last few years amounts to a very heavy sum indeed, and therefore in essence we are taxing the country today additionally for kerosene, sugar and so on to meet the increases which have been given to labour in this country in the last few years. No one regrets those increases, because most of us believe they were necessary, and probably still further increases may be necessary to adjust matters between different sections of labour. But, in order to meet that bill, we have got to broaden the basis of our taxation, and it seems to me that none of the proposed taxes really hit any one branch of the community severely or harshly, and if I am right in that conclusion, I think the House might well accept this Budget.

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt (Burdwan Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, while thankful to the Honourable the Finance Member for his very careful exposition of the financial position of the Government, we can hardly congratulate him for the very distressing statement he has presented before us. The frank confession of a deficit budget, with a careful review of the causes in detail, and a genuine and sincere desire to meet the deficit with as little hardship upon the taxpayer as possible, discloses the utter helplessness of a great financier under the present system of Government. While appreciating the limitation of the Honourable the Finance Member, to give any relief to the Indian taxpayer, I shall be failing in my duty if I merely criticise the figures from the standpoint of an economist, overlooking the larger problem from the standpoint of a statesman. I wish the Honourable the Finance Member had been bold enough to take his stand upon a higher pedestal than that of a mere financier registering the decrees of an irresponsible bureaucracy. He has taken the demand of the Executive Government as a matter of course and has prepared the Budget on the basis of that demand. Sir, the budget of a government is not merely an official statement of the revenue and expenditure, but also a measure of the devotion of the rulers to the interests of the ruled; and in the few observations that I am going to make, I shall keep that point in view, leaving canons of finance to be discussed by those who are more competent to deal with the same.

Sir, I am painfully aware of our helplessness in the matter, but we have to declare from our place in this Assembly, as representatives of the people, that we neither approve of the imposition of new taxes, nor do we acquiesce in the increase of expenditure, more than half of which is non-votable. To have to discuss a Budget without being allowed to exercise our vote, is depriving us of an effective weapon of control, which no responsible government can dream of. Yet that is our lot in respect of the military expenditure and other demands which are non-votable. Ordinarily, one is expected to incur expenditure according to his income, instead of spending with a view to supplement the deficit by loan or robbery. Yet the latter is the course that is being adopted in the case of the Indian Budget, as a result of which, not only our debts have increased by leaps and bounds, but it has imposed heavy burdens upon the poor peasants by robbing them of the barest necessities of life. If the Finance Member had tried to cut his coat according to his cloth, India's budget, far from showing a deficit, would have shown a clear surplus. Instead of asking for further taxation, he would have been in the enviable position of relieving the poor Indian taxpayer of some of the crushing burdens of taxation. Sir, India is mainly an agricultural country and no Finance Member who cares for the well being of the teeming millions working in the fields would place any unjustifiable burdens upon them. The Finance Member himself admits that the export duty on rice, at its present level, is a burden on the economic life of the country, and further reductions may become desirable, yet he has dismissed a question of such vital importance by saying that rice exports have been considerably more encouraging. I am very much surprised that the Honourable the Finance Member should make such an irresponsible statement from his position in this House. I would like to invite him to witness the miserable condition of the ill-fed and half-clad tillers of the soil in the villages, who have been reduced to the verge of starvation, not only because of bad monsoons, but also because of the financial policy of the Government. The abnormally low price of paddy in Bengal has been such this year that the peasants have been obliged to part with almost the whole of the produce of the year to pay rent and taxes, leaving very little to feed themselves for the next eight months, before they can grow another crop. This is a serious state of affairs, which no Government having the least concern for the welfare of the agricultural population can ignore. Your Agricultural Commissions and policy of development of agricultural research will not avail them, unless you see your way to devise means of leaving sufficient grain for the consumption of those who produce it, and I ask the Government, with all the emphasis that I can command, to take up the question for solution, without delay, if they are really sincere in their professions of sympathy for the masses.

The Honourable the Finance Member has said that it is essential that, at this transitional stage of the constitution, there should be full confidence, wherever possible, between the Government and the Legislature, and I therefore invite the serious attention of the Government to this dark spot of their financial policy. The inevitable struggle between capital and labour is the outcome of industrialisation, which has not brought peace anywhere in the world; and he must be a very bold man, who can state that the problem will be solved by the Royal Commission on Labour. The real solution lies in de-urbanisation and allowing the villages to flourish amidst the peaceful and happy surroundings of agricultural pursuits, and not in the slumlife of towns.

As regards the appeal of the British Government for Imperial Preference, although the Finance Member does not ask us to commit ourselves to its principle, he has curiously enough asked us to adopt it in India's interests at a critical juncture. In spite of his assurance, we must inform him that Indian opinion will refuse to accept Imperial Preference in any shape or form.

I began by saying that the Government ought to keep in view its income while framing the programme of expenditure, and should never allow itself to frame a budget in the hope of raising a loan or imposing taxes. But unfortunately this canon of sound finance does not appeal to the Government of India, who may ask how they are to carry on the administration of this vast country with the amount that is available, without incurring loans and imposing new taxes. My reply is in two words—reduce expenditure. If you yet ask what expenditure can be reduced, I shall point to the military expenditure and high salaries of civil officers. If you had brought down your military expenditure to at least fifty crores, as prescribed by the Retrenchment Committee, you could have avoided the deficit budget, but you do not reduce the military expenditure on the plea of enabling the Army to carry on their plan of re-equipment, and only show a little decrease by spreading the programme of re-equipment over three years instead of two years, which is thus no real reduction.

The Brussels Conference has laid it down, with the full concurrence of the Government of India and the representatives of the India Office, that the military expenditure of a country should in no case exceed one-fifth of the revenues. I ask you to accept this standard and reduce your military expenditure. This can be easily done by Indianising the Army at once, which will serve the purpose for which the Army is maintained, according to the Report of the Army Commission of 1879, viz., (1) preventing and repelling attacks or threatened aggressions from foreign enemies beyond our border, (2) making successful armed disturbance or rebellion, whether in British India or feudatory states, impossible, and (3) watching and overawing the armies of feudatory native states. But overlooking those weighty observations of the Army Commission, the Indian Army is retained for the maintenance of balance of power, not only in Asia, but in the whole world. The present Premier of England, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in his book "The Government of India" has said:

"A large part of the army in India, certainly one-half, is an Imperial Army, which England requires for other than purely Indian purposes, and its cost therefore should be met from Imperial and not Indian funds."

The North West Frontier from the Pamirs to the sea is the most important land frontier of the British Empire, and its defence and maintenance should not be saddled upon the Indian taxpayer alone; we can justly claim to be freed from at least a major portion of this burden, and I commend this to the very serious consideration of the Government of India and the Home Government. The Esher Committee has laid down that, so far as the question of Imperial defence is concerned, the military policy of the Government of India must be in consonance with the military policy of Imperial defence, and in this view, are we not entitled to demand that the Imperial Government should also share the burden with us?

Besides, Sir, if you eliminate the British element to the extent of at least half of its present strength, and replace them by Indians, you can reduce the expenditure by more than five crores, for it has been pointed out by the Inchcape Committee that the cost of an Indian soldier is Rs. 631 per annum, while that of the British soldier is Rs. 2,503 per annum. But then it will be argued that the British soldier has got greater military qualities than the Indian soldier. (An Honourable Member: "Question.") That argument is belied by history. The Rajputs, Sikhs and the Mahrattas, as also the Gurkhas and Pathans, make as good soldiers, if not better, if they are given the necessary training.

It is said that the ideal which is kept in view about military expenditure is an Army in India, not larger than is essential in India's interests, adequately equipped and fully trained, so that India might obtain the maximum service from a fully efficient force at the minimum cost. If I ask His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, whom I do not see here, whether the above ideal has any place in the military policy of the Government of India, His Excellency's answer is bound to be in the negative in view of the facts stated above.

As for the expenditure on civil administration, I am not aware of any other country in the world where its officers are so highly paid compared with the average income of the masses of the people. In a poor country like India, Rs. 1,000 per month should be the maximum salary, and the best intellects will always be available, when we find the flowers of Indian Universities serving at even a less salary than that. The gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, who would not like to be there on this salary, may make room for patriotic Indians, to whom salary will be of no consideration. (Laughter.) At the present moment you have at least one such patriotic Indian in the person of the Honourable the Law Member, whom I do not see here, who has sacrificed a princely income at the Bar in the prime of life to serve his country according to his lights, and I can assure you that there are many who will be willing to accept much less for the sake of service to their motherland. In this way, if you reduce the high salaries all round, you will be able, not only to avoid a deficit, but will be able also to reduce greatly the burdens of taxation. Sir, year in and year out, we have been pressing for a reduction of high salaries, but the Government have not thought fit even to consider this aspect of the question

Mr. D. K. Lahiri Chaudhury (Bengal: Landholders): How can you compensate for the five crores?

Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: They can compensate for it by replacing half of the British element in the Army by Indians. And the reason for not considering the question of reduction of expenditure is obvious for you want employment for men for whom England cannot provide, and through them you want to carry on the exploitation of this country by having a market for your goods, which you cannot sell elsewhere, and by getting cheap raw material for your factories. So long as India can be treated as the milch-cow of the Empire, there is hardly any hope of reduction of expenditure or taxes.

The Honourable the Finance Member has a fling at us for what he considers to be an insistent pressure for increased expenditure on particular projects, such as improvement of conditions of service, education, hospitals and sanitary arrangements, agricultural endowment, police, roads, etc., while admitting a general demand for retrenchment and economy. He forgets that, while we ask for improvement of conditions of service, we do not ask for luxurious saloons for their travelling or overseas allowances in addition to high salaries. What we ask for is that the ill-paid Indians should get such remuneration as will enable them to feed the mouths and clothe the bodies of those that are dependent upon them, and a fulfilment of this demand would bear but a very insignificant proportion to what is spent for the advancement of the members of the superior services. I regret, Sir, that this should be made an excuse for increased expenditure without really doing anything substantial for the mitigation of the sufferings of the ill-paid members of the subordinate services.

As for demands for expenditure on education, hospitals, sanitary arrangements, agricultural endowments, etc., you have done nothing save and except the creation of some high posts which benefit none except the fortunate recipients of these posts. The only solution for the reduction of expenditure lies in bringing down high salaries of civil and military officers and formulating a scale of salary on the basis of the average standard of living of the Indians, and if the foreigners wish to serve in India, they should be asked to accept that standard.

But, Sir, I forget that the central fact round the Budget is the powerlessness of this House to assert itself, for we are painfully aware of the exercise of autocratic powers for the restoration of the budget cuts and certification of taxation Bills. We have been asked to exercise a calm and judicial spirit in pronouncing our judgment, for the times are not ordinary, as within a few months the representatives of India will meet the representatives of Great Britain to discuss, in the fullest and frankest way, the future of this great country, and much will depend on the spirit in which they meet. Sir, we are prepared to meet, in all humility, the representatives of Great Britain if they are prepared to listen to the doleful tale of foreign exploitation of this ancient country under their rule and would agree to a constitution for the future Government of India which will make the Indians the arbiters of their own destiny to enable them to march forward towards peace and prosperity, as she did, in days of yore. Sir, while on this subject I may be permitted to point out that delay in this matter has been the cause of the attitude of some political leaders to which the Honourable the Finance Member has referred in his speech, and further delay in announcing the personnel and time of the Conference may stand in the way of peaceful and orderly evolution, responsibility for which, according to the Finance Member, rests with the leaders of public opinion as represented in the Assembly and outside. I do not agree with the view that the responsibility rests solely on our shoulders. The responsibility lies equally with the Government, and in order to create an atmosphere of perfect peace and goodwill, there should be a general amnesty to all political prisoners and withdrawal of all pending political cases. However much you may disapprove of the methods of those that have been convicted, you cannot deny that they were actuated by the highest motive for the amelioration of the condition of their countrymen by the establishment of Swaraj, to which you are pledged by the solemn declaration of your Sovereign and the British Parliament. I ask not for a temporary suspension of differences, but for a complete eradication of the seeds of mutual distrust and the establishment of goodwill between England and India, whose course of historical evolution and destiny has been mixed up by an all-wise Providence.

The goal lies through rocks precipitous but not insurmountable, leading to the summit of Sumeru, where rests the golden star of Swaraj, and if you help us in attaining it, it will be one of the proudest days in the annals of England, as was prophesied by a great Englishman nearly a century ago.

I can do no better than conclude with the hope contained in the lines of a great Bengali poet, Nobin Chandra Sen:

Sanmukhey Ajnata Sindhu,

Vasey Krishnapadatarī

Ei tiray Sandhya

Usha Anyatirey mugdhakari

"Though before us, the unknown ocean lieth,

We shall steer with divine faith

Through the darkness of night

To a glorious morning light."

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty (Salem and Coimbatore cum North Arcot: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Mr. President, though there was a tone of subdued optimism in the speech of the Honourable the Finance Member last year, he was not unconscious of the anxious times that were ahead of him; but the feeling of optimism prevailed in the whole of his speech, because summing up our general financial position he then said, "I think one is justified in feeling confident as to the future". While that was the feeling of the Honourable the Finance Member, the general financial situation of the country was viewed with mixed feelings on this side of the House. While some felt cause for disappointment, others were very anxious about our financial future, and in my speech last year I ventured to state this:

"I do not want to concentrate upon the bad patches in the financial situation of the country. Even without concentrating one's attention on the bad patches alone, I must be excused if I venture to remark that, if there is no cause for alarm, there is cause for anxiety, and certainly no cause for jubilation."

Sir, subsequent events have proved that we had sufficient cause to feel anxious. But it must, in fairness, be said to the Finance Member that, in spite of his feeling of optimism, even in his last Financial Statement he disguised none of the difficulties, and exaggerated none of the favourable features. But, Sir, after the lapse of one year, we see that the difficulties that he anticipated have proved to be of a more permanent character and that the favourable features of the Budget have proved to be temporary.

In considering the Financial Statement for the coming year, I must congratulate the Honourable Member for the very vivid picture that he has given of the financial situation. He has attempted to give us a very 12 NOON. full picture in which he has presented, in very clear and unambiguous terms, the difficulties that lie ahead of us. Looking back on the last two or three years, we find that the gap between revenue and expenditure, which many of us thought was probably temporary and might be bridged over, has proved permanent and is growing wider. Sir, what has been the revenue and expenditure position for the last three years? In 1927-28, the anticipated deficit of 168 lakhs has proved to be an actual deficit of 221 lakhs. In 1928-29 an anticipated surplus of 29 lakhs has turned out to be a deficit of 105 lakhs. In 1929-30, the budget deficit of 90 lakhs has turned out to be a revised expectation of a deficit of 410 lakhs. The gap during the last three years has therefore been about 736 lakhs; and this gap has been made good from three sources. 295 lakhs of the Revenue Reserve Fund has been utilised. 289 lakhs, representing abnormal revenue receipts in the current year, have come to the help of the Finance Member, and 156 lakhs of the German liquidation fund have been taken to balance the Budget. But to appreciate the true position for the last three years, you must not forget the fact that, in addition to these three sources, we have utilised 7½ crores of the uncovered liability in the Post Office Cash Certificates. Assuming that the abnormal revenue receipts are legitimate revenue receipts, and that the entire Revenue Reserve Fund was the result of revenue surplus, the fact still remains that 156 lakhs of the German liquidation fund and the 7½ crores of accrued liability in the Cash Certificates have been utilised to balance the Budget. The real deficit therefore has been over 881 lakhs, leaving aside the revenue surpluses. The Revenue Reserve Fund, which the Honourable Member's predecessor set apart for an entirely different purpose, has been utilised to balance the Budget. The receipts from the German liquidation fund, which, according to sound canons of finance, about which we are reminded often by the Treasury Benches, should have gone to the Sinking Fund, have been utilised to balance the Budget, and the accrued liability of the Post Office Cash Certificates has now been added to our permanent debt. The whole situation then comes to this, that we have lived on borrowed capital and extraneous windfalls during the last three years. When the financial position of the last three years is reviewed from this point of view, Honourable Members will realise that the gratification that we all felt over the extinction of the provincial contributions must be tempered by the true state of affairs which has been disclosed since then. The Financial Relations Committee, which fixed the measure of provincial contributions, expected that the help from the provinces was meant to tide over the temporary difficulties of the Central Government, but, Sir, subsequent events have proved that those expectations have failed, and the temporary difficulties of the Government of India have proved to be more of a permanent character.

[Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty.]

Even in his last year's Financial Statement, the Honourable Member had warned us to be prepared for fresh taxation, if necessary. He said:

"But I wish to leave Honourable Members in no misapprehension on this matter. If additional taxation proves to be necessary in the following year, the need will have to be boldly faced."

He has now told us that the need has arisen, and he has attempted to face the need boldly from his point of view. In asking us to be prepared for fresh taxation in the coming year, the Honourable Member gave us what he considered to be proper rules of conduct for his guidance in this matter. He said that, before resorting to fresh taxation, he must be convinced that revenue will not expand any further, that he must be convinced again that expenditure is now at a level beyond which it cannot be curtailed, and thirdly he wanted time to study what will be the avenues of useful and the least harmful taxation. So far as the expenditure side is concerned, I am afraid I cannot agree with the Honourable Member's conclusion in this matter. His position comes to this, that the Government of India have now reached a stage when it is not possible to curtail expenditure any further. The utmost that they can do is to see that if there is any increase in expenditure, it will be counterbalanced by a corresponding retrenchment in the various departments. It will serve no useful purpose for me to say in what respects expenditure may still be curtailed. I will be driven to the inevitable Military Budget and various items of expenditure in the Civil Budget. But our experience has shown that it is absolutely of no avail to give any suggestions in these matters. So far as his estimate of the revenue side is concerned, I entirely agree with him. We have now reached a stage when the normal expansion in the growth of our revenue has come to a standstill. That is the estimate that the Honourable Member himself makes of our financial position, and I entirely agree with him. This only shows that the fears that we on this side entertained for the last four or five years have been justified. We have very often said that the industries of this country have been crippled, and that the purchasing power of the masses has been reduced; but we have been told that we are weeping like Jeremiahs when there is no cause for it. Sir Basil Blackett was of opinion that we were taking an unduly pessimistic view of the whole situation. But if the Honourable Member himself has been forced to the conclusion, that the normal growth of the revenue has come to a standstill, it only proves that the fears that we entertained have been justified by subsequent events. My Honourable friend has attributed this state of affairs to world causes. Certainly world causes have operated in bringing about a depression in which we also have to take our share. Added to these world causes, the artificial appreciation of currency which was brought about in the teeth of non-official opposition has accentuated the whole situation. The appreciation of the currency and its effect has been further accentuated by a steady fall in world prices. When the Currency Bill was discussed, I pointed out from the index figures of the United States that there was a gradual fall in the gold prices of the world, and that an appreciation of our currency at such a period will accentuate our difficulties. Sir Basil Blackett challenged my statement at that time. He relied upon the policy of the Federal Reserve Bank to keep the prices of the world at a certain level, and he was of opinion that there was no cause to apprehend a further fall. But the index figures that my Honourable friend has given in his financial statement have now proved that our contention was correct. As a result of all these various factors, some of which are unavoidable and some of which, in our opinion, could have been avoided, we are now faced with a deficit budget, a deficit which, according to the calculation of the Honourable the Finance Member, is a permanent deficit and must be provided for.

Sir, at this stage of the discussion, I do not propose to examine in detail the merits of the various proposals that the Honourable Member has made for fresh taxation. These I propose to reserve for the time when the Finance and the Tariff (Amendment) Bills are taken up for consideration. But on this occasion I would like to make only one or two general observations.

My attention is naturally drawn to the duty on cotton piece-goods in the first instance. In so far as the Government of India have responded to the repeated call of the cotton textile industry for a measure of protection, the proposals are certainly welcome. But unfortunately the situation has been complicated by the introduction of Imperial Preference. While talking of Imperial Preference, it is difficult to avoid a certain amount of prejudice and to escape from pre-conceived notions. Sir, I might state my view of the situation at the outset and it is simply this. I do not object to Imperial Preference simply because it is Imperial Preference.

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): Since when have you changed your mind?

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: Nor am I prepared to say that I will accept Imperial Preference as a policy.

Mr. B. Das: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: So far as I know, except the voluntary preference that the United Kingdom has given to certain Empire products, no country in the British Commonwealth has yet declared in favour of Imperial Preference as a policy. Some years back, while I was in Australia on the Empire Parliamentary Delegation, I attended a Conference of Empire Statesmen where the subject of Imperial Preference was discussed. Speaker after speaker from the Australian Parliaments said that, in their Tariff policy, they would be guided solely by the consideration of the interests of Australia first and foremost. And may we not be permitted to say that, in the framing of our tariff proposals, we shall be solely guided by the fiscal and economic interests of India and India alone? If it is possible to devise a scheme of tariff by which Indian industries will be able to get all the protection they want, by which the Indian consumer will not be affected, and by which you will give some sort of preference to Empire products, then certainly I, for one, will not object to it. (Hear, hear.) But, Sir, so far as I have studied this aspect of the problem, I think it is very difficult to devise a scheme of tariff which will satisfy these three conditions that I have mentioned. It must give all the protection that the Indian industries want, it must not prejudicially affect the interests of the consumers in India. When the time comes to examine these proposals in detail, I shall develop this argument and I shall then try to show whether the scheme of tariff that has now been proposed will conform to these three principles which I consider ought to weigh with us. I would leave the matter at that.

I would now like to say a word on the silver duty. The proposal for the levy of duty on silver is mixed up with the situation caused by the

[Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty.]

Government of India in the sale of silver. My Honourable friend, I know, would not agree that the fall in the price of silver has been brought about by the action of the Government of India but he cannot deny that the situation has been accentuated by the sales of silver by the Government of India. I am not one of those who would ask the Government not to sell silver under any circumstances. On the other hand, looking forward, as I do, to the establishment of a gold standard currency in our country, I want that the silver in our currency reserve must be replaced by gold, because the longer you postpone this operation, the longer you will postpone the realisation of a gold standard currency. But what does the Honourable Member do with the proceeds that he realizes from the sales of silver? If he had replaced it by gold, then I would certainly have had no objection. But if he proposes, as he has done in the past, to utilise the proceeds simply to meet the expenses of the Secretary of State, then I strongly object to such a policy. The proposal to levy the duty on silver, as I said, is connected with the action of the Government of India in disposing of their surplus silver. No doubt the duty that he now seeks to impose will to some extent increase the value of the silver hoardings in which the poorer people have invested their money. This aspect of the question also will again be examined in greater detail when the Finance Bill is taken into consideration. But there is one aspect of the question to which I would draw the attention of the House at this stage.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is now exceeding his time-limit.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: I am sorry, Sir. May I know what is the time-limit?

Mr. President: The limit is 20 minutes.

Mr. R. K. Shanmukham Chetty: The Honourable Member proposes to levy a duty of 4 annas per ounce, which comes to very nearly 20 per cent. But he does not propose to increase the duty on silver ware and silver thread, which now pay a duty of 30 per cent. If the silver duty is necessary, then I would submit that, as a corollary to that, there should be a corresponding increase in the import duty on silver ware and silver thread.

Sir, as you have already reminded me that the time at my disposal is coming to an end, it is not possible for me to go into any other points. I would only conclude by saying this, that the Honourable the Finance Member, by his proposals for new taxation has certainly balanced the Budget, but as a representative of the Central Government, he has got a greater duty than merely to balance the Budget. The Central Government and the Central Legislature, as the custodians of national finance, have to devise ways and means for increasing the national wealth of the country, and thereby to increase the resources at the disposal of the Provincial Governments, so that the Provincial Governments may in time take on hand great schemes of social and other beneficial legislation. With this object in view, it is high time that the Honourable the Finance Member should concern himself, not merely with the task of balancing the Budget, but of improving the general economic situation of the country, improving the agricultural and industrial situation in the country and in that task, may

I give him a suggestion? He must appoint an Economic Advisory Council, on the lines of the Council recently announced by the Labour Government, so that such a Council might, from time to time, advise the Central Government as to the measures that are to be taken for developing the vast natural resources of the country, and thereby increase the national wealth of the country and place at the disposal of Provincial Governments funds for nation-building services. (Hear, hear and applause.)

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas (Indian Merchants' Chamber: Indian Commerce): Sir, I think it is a tragedy of fate that the year for which promises were held out to us by the previous Finance Member that this House would be able to gloat over surplus balances and dole out all sorts of contributions to nation-building departments and make remissions of taxation should be the year when the Honourable the Finance Member is forced to put before us a Budget proposing additional taxation going up to not Rs. 5 crores as the Honourable the Finance Member estimates, but nearer to Rs. 7 crores. The past three years, whatever may have been the estimates at each budget time of surpluses, have in actual fact resulted in deficits. In 1927-28, the deficit was Rs. 2.21 crores, in 1928-29 Rs. 1.06 crores, and for 1929-30, it is estimated at Rs. 1.56 crores. Add to this the loss which the Honourable the Finance Member estimates for the next year, that is Rs. 4.10 crores, making a total deficit of Rs. 8.93 crores for four years. But this does not enable the Finance Member to wipe off the liabilities which were left uncovered, and he proposes to regard as permanent debt the accrued liability on Postal Cash Certificates, which amounts to another Rs. 7½ crores, and the total thus amounts to Rs. 16½ crores, including the next year. This has been met, or, is proposed to be met, by adding Rs. 7½ crores to the permanent debt and by utilising what are called windfalls of the German liquidation account of Rs. 1½ crores and by utilising fully the revenue reserve of Rs. 2.95 crores. The total by this means amounts to Rs. 12 crores, leaving an amount of Rs. 4.42 crores to be recouped from taxation. I will quote, Sir, the exact words in which the "undertaking", according to one Honourable Member who spoke last year on the Budget, was given by the previous Finance Member, Sir Basil Blackett, regarding what his successor would be able to do:

"From 1929-30 onwards it will be the privilege of this House and of my friend and successor, Sir George Schuster, whose acceptance of the post is a matter of great personal satisfaction to me, to find no outside claimant to the recurring surpluses which I hope it will be their good fortune to enjoy in the coming years and they will be free to turn their minds on the one hand to new directions in which money can be usefully laid out for India's advancement and on the other hand to the readjustment of the burden of taxation and to those reductions of taxation, so welcome to tax-gatherer and taxpayer alike."

(At this stage Mr. President vacated the Chair, which was taken by Mr. Deputy President.)

These, Sir, were the hopes held out to this House when a certain currency policy had to be forced in the teeth of our opposition in 1927, and it is a tragedy of fate that we should today be faced with a situation where the Honourable the Finance Member has to urge this House to agree to fresh taxation, taxation not for the purpose of spending more money on nation-building activities, but for the purpose of putting the finances of the Government of India in, what I may call, a solvent condition. It is a tragedy of fate for us, but as far as the Government which during the regime of the previous Finance Member pressed upon the country this policy in the teeth of our opposition is concerned, one can hardly sympathise with them. All that one can say is that while the suffering is the country's, as far as the Government are concerned, they well deserve the anxiety which must be theirs too.

The Honourable the Finance Member now says that he is left with no option but to ask the Assembly to consider fresh taxation, and before I proceed to examine, in broad details, some of the heads of new taxation, may I touch upon one subject in connection with which I find it somewhat difficult to understand the intention of the Honourable the Finance Member. I refer to paragraph 23 of his speech. Whilst there is a deficit which he wants to be made up by fresh taxation, the Honourable the Finance Member asks us to agree to an equalisation fund, a reserve fund as far as the interest on the Gold Standard Reserve is concerned. In fact he has already made up his mind to start that fund with £100,000 and he proposes to put another £50,000 this year to it. A sum of £150,000, in these days, when fresh taxation is said to be inevitable cannot be overlooked. It is something like 20 lakhs of rupees. I wish to ask the Honourable the Finance Member what justification he has, even on the most conservative lines of finance, for asking us to approve the creating of this fund. If he can do away with it, his demand for fresh taxation would be smaller to that extent. He explains by saying that the securities held in the Gold Standard Reserve have to be revalued at certain intervals, and I understand that this revaluation is to be almost monthly. I do not object, Sir, to the securities in the Gold Standard Reserve being kept at the correct market rate from month to month or even, week by week. That is our security against paper currency, and I am anxious that the paper currency, which we all want to be increasingly popular in India, should have as true and substantial a backing as possible. But is it necessary, Sir, where the securities in the Gold Standard Reserve are short term, to debit the revenues of the country with the temporary discount which may prevail in the market rate? I have in my hand, Sir, the latest report of the Controller of the Currency for the year 1928-29, and I see that the securities amounting to £88,139,000 consisted of British Treasury Bills and Treasury Bonds maturing in April 1929, February 1930, May 1930, in 1930-32, in 1931-33, 1932-34 and 1933-35. These short term maturities, in case of set backs in market valuations, hardly require to be provided for by taking away lump sums from the revenue for the simple reason that in one, or two or at the most five years, as the case may be, these securities are repayable at par. I suggest to the Honourable the Finance Member that, unless he wishes or expects to have to sell these securities in the Gold Standard Reserve in the near future, it is not necessary for him at all to provide for the depreciation—temporary depreciation—in the market value of these securities out of our revenues. I do not know whether it can be the intention of the Finance Member to touch the securities of the Gold Standard Reserve for supporting the Government's pet ratio of 1s. 6d. But I should be extremely sorry for the people of India and for the Government of India if Government's thoughts were running in that direction. I wish very strongly to protest against anything being debited to the revenues of this country for these temporary depreciations in these short-term securities of the Gold Standard Reserve. I do not wish to pursue this any further. I hope the Finance Member will see the point of what I am urging. Either he wishes to sell the securities in the near future and wishes to provide for depreciation on it in anticipation, or if that is not his intention, I suggest that it is unnecessary and this provision of £150,000 should not be approved of by this House.

Now, Sir, to return to the question whether taxation is justified in these circumstances or not. The Honourable the Finance Member says, in paragraph 87 as follows:

"It will be unwise to allow such an argument to prevent the introduction of new taxes sufficient to meet the situation as I have to present it today;"

This makes me feel that my Honourable friend is not prepared to base his Budget on the prospects of revenue going up. In fact, if I may put it more clearly, he apprehends that, as far as India is concerned, we may not be out of the wood yet, and the unprecedented depression which is at present overshadowing the commercial, industrial and agricultural operations may not be the worst that is in store for the country. A very cautious stand, I concede; but at the same time it is one which does not give a good omen for the year 1931-32. His main reasons are contained in paragraphs 88 and 89. He pleads that:

"Some of our present sources of revenue are likely to disappear, and, in the case of others, reductions may become desirable."

He particularly refers there to opium. The reduction therein is Rs. 30 lakhs a year, if I remember aright, and by 1935 the whole of the opium revenue, which amounts to about a crore and 40 lakhs of rupees net, is likely to disappear. I fully realise that this will have to be provided for, but there is no reason why we should provide for all that this year when trade, industry, and the general conditions of the masses are at their very worst.

His next reason is:

"New needs for expenditure are constantly likely to press upon us and I have already referred to some of the new services which are now being developed."

If he has faith in the conditions not growing any worse, may I not ask him to pin his faith on the normal development of revenue as happens in the ordinary course? Anything over and above that need not be undertaken, and I do not think fresh taxation can be said to be justified on this ground of his.

His third reason is in paragraph 89:

"Yet another consideration is this. We have, in my opinion, been working in the past three years with a dangerously low margin. In a country like India, subject to great risks of loss of revenue from failure of rains or from floods it is desirable to have some margin of revenue," etc.

I agree that every person who has got to manage the finances, be it of a corporation or a country, always likes to have something in hand on which to fall back. If it was a question of his sitting on what he had in hand as against his having to distribute it in remission of taxation, I might sympathise with this reason of his. But where it is a question of drawing more out of the people by way of taxation in order that he may have a comparatively comfortable berth in which to travel next year, I am afraid we must protest and ask him to carry on as Government did in the past, when we were told that the margin the Government of India had in hand was ample. It is the same Government of India that asks us today to approve of new taxation and we must remind them of what they carried on with in past years, when they misled the country into the vicious circle the country is in.

Sir, as far as retrenchment in civil administration is concerned, the Finance Member has come to the conclusion that there is not much room for that. He however has frankly told us in paragraph 19 that :

"A time-scale basis has been adopted in practically all departments, and this is an inevitable commitment, and, unfortunately, we have not yet approached anything like the peak figure."

The increase under this for the year 1930-31 is Rs. 25 lakhs. Obviously, once such liberal increases are made on a time-scale basis, Government must find it difficult to go back upon same. Naturally they cannot now expect any sympathy from this side of the House. When these increases, the details of which I need not go into now, were made, they were made on an extravagant scale, without considering the capacity of the country to stand fresh taxation, and one can only insist that Government must reverse their extravagant policy even now.

The main point, however, is regarding military expenditure, and I cannot help wondering how the Finance Member reconciled himself to the trifling reduction of Rs. 80 lakhs for the next three years in the Military Budget. I wish to remind him of what the Inchcape Committee said in their general conclusions on the Military Report. They said, and I am now reading from the general conclusions in Part I, paragraph 3 :

"We, therefore, believe that the adoption of our recommendations will enable the estimates in subsequent years to be reduced to about Rs. 57 crores irrespective of any savings due to further economies or falling prices."

The fall in prices of articles required by the Military Department has been in two directions. There has been a substantial fall in prices of those articles which the Military Department use,—food grains, fodder, piece-goods, both cotton and woollen, iron and steel, motor cars and other articles of transport—these have all substantially gone down since the Inchcape Committee submitted their Report in 1923. But above all, the very substantial expenditure in sterling which the Military Department incur in London has had a great windfall in the appreciation of the rupee. In no Department of the Government of India can there have been an automatic reduction in two directions, and a reduction not from 1s. 4d. to 1s. 6d. only, but from something under 1s. 4d. gold, as the exchange prevailed in 1923, to the 1s. 6d. which Government are struggling to stabilise today. I would very much like the Finance Member to have a statement prepared showing the drop in prices of the various articles which the Military Department require for their use from day to day in a year, and also what has been the saving in rupees in the sterling expenditure of the Military Department in London. I cannot help coming to the conclusion that this aspect was not examined by the Finance Department of the Government of India when they concluded their arrangement for a reduction of Rs. 80 lakhs for the next three years. On a very rough and casual calculation—and I do not claim that it is accurate—I have come to the conclusion that the saving in the military expenditure for the above reasons alone should be somewhere in the neighbourhood of Rs. 4 crores. There is a further saving. I see from the Explanatory Memorandum of the Financial Secretary that there has been a reduction in the pay of British troops, owing to new recruits being taken on on reduced rates of pay, amounting to Rs. 25 lakhs. With all this, to tell us that the reduction for the next three years agreed to has been on the basis of Rs. 80 lakhs on the whole is, to my mind, to rely a bit too much on our credulity. If this House had a free vote on military expenditure, I mean if the whole of this expenditure was votable, one would say to Government, "You have got to make the reduction from the Military Budget because it is not only fully justified but it is over due." (Hear, hear.)

I would further like, Sir, to draw the attention of the Honourable the Finance Member to what the Inchcape Committee said under the head, "Royal Air Force". The budget estimate for the year 1922-23 on this was a crore and 41 lakhs of rupees. The Inchcape Committee have only ten lines in their Report under the Royal Air Force. But they conclude with this very significant sentence which, I am afraid, the Government of India in the Finance Department may have forgotten now. They say :

"And (since) there is a possibility that the extended use of the Air Force might result in economies in expenditure on ground troops" (Hear, hear.) "we make no recommendations."

Has anything been done in this direction or have Government been agreeing to the Military Department spending more on the Royal Air Force without making any reduction either in our ground troops or in our cavalry or in any other paraphernalia of war? If so, all that I can say is that, whilst the British Cabinet has been working for disarmament in the whole of the civilised world, here in India our Government have been steadily increasing their resources in that direction. (Hear, hear.) Do Government expect us to be a party to fresh taxation when they continue to do something quite different from what the British Government have been pressing on the whole civilised world with what looks to me like so much justification and—if I may say so—with so much credit to the Premier, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald? Sir, the conclusion that I, therefore, draw is that this deficit of about Rs. 4½ crores ought to be met by a reduction in the Military Budget, and no further taxation is wanted. But knowing as we do the handicaps of this House in voting on the Military Budget, I have no option but to notice the taxation proposals of the Honourable the Finance Member, with a view to point out where he is really recommending to us taxation which is unjustified.

What is, Sir, the worst feature of the Budget as far as taxation is concerned? The proposed taxation holds out no promise to us of the money being spent in any direction which can be said to be of a nation-building utility. In fact, it is to provide Government with the money with which to put their House in order after the mess made in 1927. In fact, in the words of the Honourable the Finance Member himself—he says this in his concluding paragraphs :

"Secondly, principles of financial soundness are being doubly reinforced. No financial weak spots are being left as regards debt redemption and the cash certificate liability, while I have provided for a margin of safety in case events next year prove unfavourable."

[Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas.]

A very negative advantage, Sir. My reply is—there should have been no weak spots left at any time, in the finances of the country. Is this a confession and a condemnation of the policy of the Government since 1926-27?

(At this stage Mr. President resumed the Chair.)

I feel, Sir, that the other prospects held out to us by the Honourable Member also require a little further examination. He says:

"Thirdly, we are making a substantial start towards a constructive economic policy and opening the way for beneficial expenditure."

One must always sympathise with the Government in that direction; but in view of the past history of the Government till now, one cannot help asking the question, have the Government of India ever had any consistent economic policy to follow which would build up the masses and the people of this country? This is, I dare say, a blunt question to ask. The question by itself carries its own condemnation; but one cannot help asking that question in all frankness when the Honourable Member asks us to console ourselves at the time of voting new taxation, that we should look forward to help a constructive economic policy. But if the Honourable Member knew all the various promises made by the Government in the past whenever fresh taxation was asked for, and how great hopes given and expectations raised were set at naught as soon as there was any deficit to fill up in the Government reserve owing to something else happening, he perhaps would not have asked us to rely upon this so much. I wish to ask him, if the Government of India, less than six years back, appointed an Economic Enquiry Committee presided over by Sir Visweswarayya, and has anything been done with that Report at all, or is that Report simply put on the book-shelves of the Government of India to be looked at and referred to when somebody on the floor of this House refers to it? I want to repeat, have the Government till now had any economic policy which they have laid down and consistently followed? I do not wish to call this a good bait for us. I believe my Honourable friend is too straightforward and honest to put before us any bait as such; but I cannot help reminding him that this will not catch as far as we are concerned. Is he prepared definitely to earmark any surplus that may be had out of this new taxation, after meeting a deficit of Rs. 4 crores and odd, for this constructive economic policy? I know he would say there is no precedent for it and no Government can do it. If that be so, I am afraid I cannot help having to heavily discount this particular attraction which he holds out.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member will have other opportunities.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: I propose to utilise every opportunity in that direction.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member's time is up.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: Is it so? Just one word more and I will conclude. I notice that all through the Budget the Honourable Member does not refer at any length to the masses of the country or to their condition. There is only one reference to them and that is in paragraph 112 where he says:

"It is clear that the condition of the agricultural classes of India must be seriously affected, and it may be that, in order to maintain their position, they have to part with an undue proportion of their own production."

I feel that, in presenting a Budget of the Central Government, it is necessary for the Honourable the Finance Member to take a review of what has happened during the current year regarding the condition of the masses of India. The short statement I have just referred to is significant but requires elucidation.

But the most serious and thought-provoking part of the lines of policy referred to in the same paragraph runs as follows:

"In the second place, it is desirable to encourage industrial development" and these are the words which I would like Honourable Members to mark—

"provided that this can be done in conjunction with, and as a supplement to, the agricultural life of the country."

Is this, I ask, the policy of the Government of India? Is it the ideal of the Government of India to encourage industrial development, provided that it can be done "in conjunction with, and as a supplement to, the agricultural life of the country"? Does that mean that they do not think that the cotton textile industry of India requires their most earnest solicitude, that the iron and steel industry requires their attention? Is it only when an industry directly benefits the agriculturist that the Government of India will pay attention to it? I see that an import duty of almost 100 per cent. on sugar is acceptable to Government, but an import duty of 15 per cent. is to be the maximum for piece-goods from the United Kingdom. If what I have just quoted—and especially the way in which I read it—be correct, it explains to us the step-motherly attitude that the Government of India have adopted in this Budget regarding the cotton textile industry. I propose, Sir, to follow your suggestion and to deal with the details of this and other items of taxation on the relative Bills as they come up.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): I am quite content to exercise the privilege of a back Bencher and to have my say on the Budget at an early stage of its discussion. But I confess I never felt the time limit for speeches so galling as I feel it today, being face to face with such a budget. I will, however, try to be as brief and as terse as I can.

Last year, when I heard the budget speech of the Finance Member, it sounded to my ears like the cautious treading of the soft padded footfall of the tiger. But this year, the tiger has drawn out his sharp claws, and we have before us an unrelenting budget with its pointed fingers digging into the vitals of the Indian people.

After I carefully read the budget statement at home, I was just scratching my head and wondering what good word one could possibly say for it. One such word I ultimately found, and that was that it was a lucid budget, not in the sense, however, of sanity, but in the sense of clarity. A friend was sitting by me and he wondered at my charitable frame of mind. He was simply excited over the Budget and he tried to correct me by saying, "Oh, the Budget is not lucid, but it is lurid". I at once willingly accepted the correction, and only added that the very lucidity of the Budget made its luridness more obvious. For the Budget is lurid in this sense, that in its darkness are to be seen red and blue flames, which make the spectator uncomfortable.

[Mr. N. C. Kelkar.]

Coming to close quarters with the Budget, I find that the Budget is really better in form than its average predecessor.

It is obvious that the Finance Member wanted this time to concentrate on only a few points in his budget statement. We, therefore, find no reference at all in his speech to the policy, for the year, underlying some of the departmental administrations; e.g., he has not said one word about the working of the Postal and Telegraph Department, and owing to an unfortunate convention, other departmental heads make no speeches. Perhaps there was not much to be said by way of disclosing anything like a new policy for the Postal Department. But I take this opportunity to express my sense of the general approval with which the policy of the head of this Department for the last five years has met at the hands of the critics and general public. I think, it is only fair to say that the Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra was always anxious to better the condition of the subordinate staff. During his tenure of office, he redressed many grievances of his Department, which was the most useful, but also the most neglected at one time. The Finance Member has said very little about the Military Department. The only remark I wish to make in that connection is that there is still greater need of economy in that Department than he seems inclined to admit.

The Budget, I have said, is clearer than usual. But even then, one feels that more information should have been given to the public on certain points. Personally I would like to learn more about the reparation amount which comes first on the field, and in this connection, one would like to get more information as to the share of India's total cost, in relation to the War, and the share of the reparations she is getting.

The second thing one would like to have is a full statement about the gold resources of India. An enormous amount of the gold resources has been dissipated in the Currency Department since the new ratio was enacted. Also a full statement as to how the gold reserves were being established, as was recommended by the Currency Commission, with a view to enable India to come on to a full, real gold standard. But even greater was the expectation of a full statement about the sales of silver operations. Admittedly, an enormous amount of Government's silver has been sold, and one would like to know, what was the net loss in these operations. We laymen have no idea of these things, and some of those who know better tell me that the loss has gone up to very many crores. The question, therefore, is how has this loss been made good? Is it made by mere contraction of currency and ad-hoc securities? Also was this purchase money of silver used for buying gold or gold securities? I do not here go into the vexed question of the wisdom or unwisdom of silver sales at a time when silver prices have fallen considerably. But one feels curious to know whether the total loss involved in the sales of silver was greater or less than the amount to be eventually made up by the interest on the gold securities substituted if any. One would similarly like to know whether the sterling loan of 12 million raised this year in England was indispensable, and whether the needed amount could not have been raised in India itself or in any other country at a cheaper rate. My impression is that it would not have been difficult for the Finance Member to raise a rupee loan for the required amount in India itself. I mention these few points as instances of points about which we should have liked the Finance Member to give us more details in his budget statement itself. For he knows that, on all these points, the Indian public take a very keen interest, and if I may say also, feel very suspicious about the underlying policy of Government.

Turning to the Budget itself, as disclosed in the Finance Member's statement, no doubt he has set out some six points as being the main features of his Budget. But we on this side also have our own view of its features, and I would summarise them as follows:

- (1) It is a sadly deficit budget.
- (2) It is marked by extravagance and almost hopeless inability of the Finance Member to control the growing expenditure.
- (3) It imposes new taxation when the country is not obviously able to bear it.
- (4) It is niggardly in its provision for essential beneficial services.
- (5) It is marked by a revived tendency to go in for foreign loans.
- (6) It shows an obstinate tendency to accept the new ratio as a settled fact.
- (7) It shows general callousness towards the depressed condition of the country.

Let us take these points briefly in order. In his valedictory budget statement, Sir Basil Blackett prophesied that "the era of deficits had come to an end". But what we now see is just the opposite of it. The deficit may partly be due to the failure of the natural development of the revenue resources, but it is even more due to the extravagance of the Government. If one analyses the expenditure side of the Budget, it will be seen that enormous amounts are being spent on protection. Some functional development must of course take place in the Government, but the expenditure on it seems to be out of proportion to the benefit realised by that development. There is as yet no inrush of democratic programmes in this country. And yet a large amount seems to be spent on gratifying the instinct merely for imitation; and the least share of expenditure has fallen to essential beneficial services. A shrewd observer has remarked that "increases in Government expenditure have become so common, that economists can now deduce general laws governing that phenomenon. Some of the causes of increased expenditure are industrial revolution and transformation of the economic and the social life of nations. Technical efficiency is another of these reasons. Many nations have used their technical knowledge and equipment for war purposes, and forced themselves to engage in a rivalry and supremacy in military and naval display of preparation that leads them to bankruptcy." And yet there is another reason for the increase of expenditure, viz., mere imitation. This critic says:

"Public expenditure have increased, even in some countries in which the progress both of industrial technique and of democratic principles has been slow. These countries, backwardly political and undeveloped industrially, have imitated more progressive people at least in so far as it concerns implements and paraphernalia of warfare. Cannon and gun boats they must have though even schools and sanitation be lacking. In some cases the rulers learnt the trick of public credit, and while this resource lasted, they were able to indulge in wild orgies of extravagance."

[Mr. N. C. Kelkar.]

I think India can fairly be said to fall under this description, when we compare the expenditure of Government on the Army, aviation, broadcasting, foundation of Capitals, and the erection of palatial Government houses, and the building of garden cities as in New Delhi, and appointment of committees and commissions, unnecessary and useless.

Retrenchment Committees made well considered recommendations, but extravagance seems to laugh at the wisdom of those who made those recommendations. The Finance Member has promised to appoint a new Retrenchment Officer. But that is, I think, mere eye-wash, for he has in more places than one taken up in the Budget itself a definite position that the new demands for expenditure are irresistible, and I wonder, if his Retrenchment Officer will be able to suggest or the Government will carry out economies which come up to the money to be spent on the Retrenchment Officer himself and his Staff! (Laughter.)

As regards the new taxation, I will not say much on that head in my present speech, because that subject by itself is likely to come up for discussion later on. But I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without briefly touching the proposed cotton duties, for they are introducing for the first time in this country the principle of Imperial Preference. The proposals for taxation in this respect are interlocked. We can make no changes by way of increasing the duties. All that we can do is, either to take the proposal as a whole or to reject it. The Finance Member has put the country in what I call a cruel dilemma. If we reject the proposals, we have to refuse the protection to the Indian mill industry, to which it is entitled in its present misery. On the other hand, if we accept the proposals, we have to recognise and accept the vicious principle of Imperial Preference. I wonder, if the present duties are an advance guard of the Empire Crusaders, who are out for protecting the Empire by internal free trade and external tariff walls. As the Manchester Guardian has said, "Empire Free Trade means only an empire surrounded by imperial tariff walls for the protection of Great Britain". No doubt, in recommending his proposals, the Finance Member has tried to carry us into an elevated region of dignity. He has disclosed to us the correspondence between this Government and the Home Government, and has tried to persuade us that the convention about fiscal autonomy is a rock-reality, and that in this case, we have to hold our hand against Lancashire, because His Majesty's Government have not commanded us to do the needful, but come to us with representations and appeals. "Was greater proof needed," says the Finance Member, that "India was a really self-governing country? Is there not here one more piece of evidence, one more external sign of India enjoying Dominion Status? What more should India want to gratify her pride and honour?" But India, I assure the Finance Member, is not so gullible. She knows that the Fiscal Autonomy is not a rock reality, but a mock reality And India is not so dense-headed as not to perceive the "Imperial Preference" which my friend Mr. Birla has said "is now coming by the front door". The Dominion Status that is indicated by the so-called humble supplication of the Cabinet to India is obviously as artificially appreciated as the present Indian rupee. Nor do I believe that our acceptance of this preference is going to give us anything more in return than vacant possession of Dominion Status, if I may use a somewhat legal phrase in a literal sense. I am convinced, therefore, that the elected Members of the Assembly would be utterly unfaithful to their constituencies and to the country, if they accepted the Imperial Preference proposals in the foolish hope, that they would bring Dominion Status any nearer to them.

I am nearing my time, and would like to conclude with only one point, and that is, that the present taxation proposals betray what I may call a spirit of callousness in the Budget. One wonders how the Finance Member could make himself bold enough to advance such proposals, when he knows and even admits that "the country is in the depth of depression". We are still in the throes of a painful process of adjustment of price-levels owing to the new ratio. Stocks of manufactured goods are lying idle and are not moving. Agricultural produce is of course being exported, but is being sold at very low prices. Even supposing there is a visible increase in the exports, it does not necessarily mean that a proportionate increase in its money returns is being realised. Internal prices are admittedly low, and yet the markets are dull. This can be accounted for only by the fact that the people have lost their purchasing power. India's credit has admittedly suffered a set back, as is evidenced by the terms of the sterling loan abroad and the rates of interest for even short term Treasury Bills in India. There has been a serious contraction of currency. The value of silver holdings has decreased enormously. What remains perhaps to convince the Finance Member of the insolvency, or the approaching insolvency of the country and the Government, is that currency notes have not yet depreciated. But if the present ruinous course is persisted in by Government, who knows that even that may not happen, as it has actually happened sometimes before. And in the face of all these facts, if business people and Indian economists lament the present situation, they are simply told that they are mischievous malcontents, who preach messages of despair without justification. The theory of the Finance Member is said to be that, in the whirligig of universal post war depression, India was bound to have its turn sooner or later, and it is only a coincidence that this deferred depression comes to India at a time when there were causes for a special depression of its own. In fact he takes Indian business men to task, as if they were mere croakers and selfish augurs of evil. He has been preaching to them a homily on the uses of adversity and the virtues of hope. But I would reply to him only in the words of the poet:

"All all forsook the friendless guilty mind,
But hope, the charmer, lingered still behind
Thou, undismayed, shalt over the ruins smile
And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile."

Sir Hari Singh Gour (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, we are now at the tenth Budget of the Legislative Assembly, and I think Honourable Members would like to know what we have been doing during all these ten years, what we have been impressing upon the Government, and what the Government have been doing all these years. In the very first year, Sir, of the first Assembly, we drew the attention of the Government to the excessive military burdens which the people of this country were called upon to bear, but the Government said that the military expenditure was intended to protect the people of this country and that it could not be reduced. We took a different view, and we cut down the general expenditure by a percentage and forced the hands of the Government to retrench by passing a Resolution, in spite of the strenuous opposition of the Government, a Resolution which culminated in the appointment of the Inchcape Committee. Sir, I was not satisfied with the terms of reference to the Inchcape Committee. The terms of reference were limited, but in spite of the limitations addressed to the Inchcape Committee, that Committee recommended a drastic reduction in the military expenditure. Pari passu with the sitting of the Inchcape Committee, or a few months before the Resolution which led to the formation of that Committee, there was a memorable Conference of the world financiers in Brussels in which, Sir, India was represented. And what was the unanimous verdict of that Conference of financiers? I shall read to you a few sentences from the conclusions of the Brussels Conference. They said:

"The statements presented to the Conference show that on an average some 20 per cent. of the national expenditure is still being devoted to the maintenance of armaments and to preparations for war. The Conference desires to affirm with the utmost emphasis that the world cannot afford this expenditure. Only by a prime policy of mutual co-operation can the nation hope to regain their old prosperity and secure... the resources must be devoted to strictly productive purposes."

These are the memorable words addressed to the world at large, and to India in particular, by the expert financiers at Brussels. What was the response? So far as India is concerned, the response is contained in this table which I shall briefly read to the House. In 1910-11 the net expenditure on the Army was,— I am giving it in round figures,—19 million pounds; in 1920-21, in ten years' time, it was 81 million pounds. In 1928-29 it came to 55 million pounds. Honourable Members will thus see that, during the last twenty years, the military expenditure has gone up from 19 million pounds to 55 million pounds. And what is the reason of it all? In a very frank statement made by a leading newspaper in England on the question of military expenditure in India, the Manchester Guardian, I find, Sir, the following statement. This is what the Manchester Guardian, in its leading article, says about the military expenditure in India. Dealing with the Viceregal pronouncement on the question of Dominion Status, this is what the Manchester Guardian, says:

"There are two chief reasons why a self-regarding England may hesitate to relax her control over India. The first is that her influence in the East depends partly upon her power to summon troops and to draw resources from India in time of need. This power will vanish when India has Dominion Status. The second is that Great Britain finds in India her best market and that she has a thousand million pounds invested there."

This, Sir, in a nutshell is a statement of England's case against India. The Budget is the result of the interplay of these two forces: the one produces the deficits, the other the Imperial Preference. England cannot afford to relax her control over India or reduce the military expenditure, because the military expenditure in this country is intended for the protection of England's Eastern possessions, and she cannot possibly allow any economic development of the country because, by doing so, England will lose her best market in the East. (An Honourable Member from the European Group: "Quite so"). This is, as I have pointed out, the main reason why the military expenditure in India has continued to be what it is. We are not here concerned with the plain arithmetical figures which my friend Sir Hugh Cocke gave to this House, that you want so much money, you have got so much money, you have got therefore to receive so much more money, and therefore you should get it by additional taxation. What the elected representatives of this House demand is a clear statement from the Government as to what action they have taken since 1921 to change their policy regarding the military expenditure in this country. We have been complaining, and complaining times without number, that the military strength in this country bears no relation whatever to the military requirements of this country. We have been told, and we were told, that one third of the Army in India was kept for the defence of the frontier, one third for peace and security of the country, and one third for what is known as covering troops. Sir, we know as a matter of fact, and as is pointed out in the Inchcape Committee's Report, that since then there has been a great development in the Air Force, and a military officer of great repute contributed an article in one of the journals of this country in which he pointed out that, with the development of the Air Force, the reduction of ground forces has become necessary. Now, what has been done? The Government of India, far from reducing the white troops, far from reducing the burden are treating the civil and military expenditure of this country as if it has been standardised, and it is against this standardisation of the expenditure by the Government of India that this House has annually protested ever since the advent of the reforms. What we therefore want is a change of policy. What we want is that the entire resources of the Government of India should be submitted to the annual vote of this House and we shall then be in a position to advise the Government of India as to how far they should be able to incur fresh taxation if and when necessary. So long as this House is only a partner in the raising of taxes, but has no voice in determining as to how that money is to be spent, this House must be extremely careful not to vote one single rupee to the irresponsible Government unless it is absolutely satisfied that that amount is necessary. But is it necessary in the present case? For the last three years we have been living from hand to mouth, and the secret has now come out that, during the last three years, we have been passing three annual budgets with recurring deficits, and we have been able to tide over the difficulty by merely relying upon adventitious windfalls. We have also got this year a windfall in the German reparation payments of a crore and a half. In spite of these windfalls, we still find ourselves in a region of deficit budgets, and the reason for it is this that the expenditure of the Government of India remains what it is and is going on increasing from year to year.

Now, Sir, I do not care as to how you raise the money, but what I do care is to see how you spend it, and so long as Members of this House are not in a position to scrutinise every item of the Budget, I think they would be perfectly within their rights to refuse to grant additional supplies. We feel morally justified in saying that, if the Members of this House were taken into confidence by the Government of India and if the Government placed all their cards upon the table, they would get the support which they badly need from the elected representatives of this popular Chamber, to press the authorities at home for the reduction of military expenditure. It is an open secret that the provinces, including Burma, are crying out for separation, because they say that the Central Government expenditure is too high. In Burma the cry is raised that Burma must be separated from India because the defence problems of India are not the defence problems of Burma, and the Government of India have made Burma the milch cow, and other provinces equally so. All the nation-building departments in the provinces are suffering on account of the elastic sources of revenue being appropriated by the Government of India and the inelastic sources of revenue being left to the provinces. The remission of the provincial contributions was only a temporary relief, but it is nothing compared to what the provinces would be able to do if the expenditure of the Government of India were brought down to a reasonable figure and the surplus made over to the provinces.

We have been offered a bait. The Honourable the Finance Member says, "If you allow my proposals to go through, I shall provide a small tiny nest egg for the future government that might come into existence". Well, Sir, if Members are here three years' hence, they will probably hear that all this money kept for the development of the nation-building departments has had to be spent because of some expedition here or because of some economic distress elsewhere. I would ask the Honourable Members of this House to make no provision for the future. The future will take care of itself. When the future Government comes into existence, that Government will know how to deal with the Central Government, and the future Governments, Central and Provincial, will decide the inter-dependent financial questions. I do not think that we should permit the Finance Member to over-budget against this future contingency, and I submit, that is my justification for refusing additional taxation. I think the Honourable the Finance Member expects to get, if I mistake not, about 1½ crore of rupees from the import duty on silver and from which he wishes to lay aside about a crore of rupees for the future nation-building departments in the provinces.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: Where do you get your figures from? He did not say that? Your figures are not accurate.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: I do not stand by my figures. I stand by my statement. I repeat, whatever may be the figures, two crores as the Honourable Member opposite estimates, or only a crore on a conservative estimate, as the Finance Member has estimated, the fact remains that the Honourable the Finance Member has said that he is going to lay aside a certain sum of money to be made over to the provinces. . . .

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: In certain contingencies.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: Yes, and those contingencies, as the Honourable Sir Purshotamdas implies, may or may not arise. But that question apart, we are here first of all to ask the Government of India as to what retrenchments they have made in their civil and military expenditure. I have dealt with the question of military expenditure. I shall say one word about civil expenditure. As regards that, Honourable Members are aware that we have protested emphatically against the increase in the Civil Budget. The Lee Commission was appointed, and large increases were made in the pay of the all-India Services. This House protested, and in spite of them, the increases were sanctioned by the Secretary of State. The result is that we are faced with an expenditure of 25 lakhs of rupees on account of the time-scale of pay being fixed in the case of certain civil administration officers. I submit that we are not in sympathy with either the growth of civil or military expenditure, and this House would be well justified in resisting to the utmost every proposal for the increase of taxation.

One word more about the cotton duties. I am one of those who feel strongly for the protection of the industries of this country, but if, with the proposal for the protection of the industries of this country, there is coupled a noxious proposal which differentiates between duties leviable against one country and another, I ask, is this justifiable? As one of the speakers said, we are not entirely opposed to Imperial Preference. We are all anxious that the Round Table Conference should be successful and that British opinion should not be exacerbated unnecessarily, but at the same time our primary duty is to our country, and unless we are satisfied that the duties that have been proposed for the protection of the cotton industry in Bombay and elsewhere are in the best interests of the country, we should be entitled to oppose that proposal. On these grounds, I would advise the House to resist not only the proposal for additional taxation, but also the proposal for the levy of cotton duties, unless the Finance Member satisfies this House on what grounds the differentiating rates which he suggests are justifiable. It is quite clear that, in his speech, he has not made it very clear perhaps because he intended to elaborate it later on. I do not know what the facts are. Elected Members of this House are of the opinion that prima facie no case whatever has been made out for Imperial Preference upon its own merits. Unless the case of Bombay is exceptional, the elected Members of this House would, at any rate, vote against what is a subtle form of Imperial Preference.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

Mr. President: The House will now resume further discussion of the Budget.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, in presenting his first Budget last year, the Honourable the Finance Member told us in effect that he had a difficult legacy to administer. His review of our financial position, though not alarming, filled us with anxiety. He refrained, however, from imposing new taxation, and gave three reasons for the course that he adopted, one of them being that, before imposing new taxation, he wanted to have fuller opportunity of reviewing the expenditure side of the Budget than had been possible in the limited time since he took over office. The Budget which he has now placed before us shows how considerably our position has deteriorated during the last twelve months. He has pointed out to us all the factors that have led to this deterioration. We have to find not merely a sum of about four crores in order to balance expenditure, but have also to bear in mind that certain sources of revenue will soon be extinguished. On the other hand, however, I think we may legitimately hope that certain causes, which have brought about a fall in our revenue, will disappear before long. The deterioration in the Railways and the Posts and Telegraphs account, in the coming year, for a deficit of about 99 lakhs. I hope that the Railway Department will soon be able to show better results, and that we have not reached the limit of expansion so far as our railways are concerned. As regards Posts and Telegraphs too, I entertain a similar hope. I see from the figures that it is not so much that the Post Office expenditure has increased, as that the Post Office revenue has not risen to the extent that was hoped. To an appreciable extent, the recovery in our Postal revenue is dependent on the removal of the present trade depression. When that will take place exactly, nobody knows, but we may legitimately hope that, with the return of a more prosperous year, even the Post Office revenue will show better results than the Honourable the Finance Member expects it to do during the coming year.

These are, Sir, the factors that we might well bear in mind in order to relieve the gloom of the picture presented to us by the Honourable the Finance Member. In the main, however, we must depend for an improvement in our financial position on the economies that we are able to make. Now, the Honourable the Finance Member tells us that he has already made economies to the extent of 62 lakhs in civil estimates and 80 lakhs in military expenditure. But the item of 62 lakhs relating to the reduction in civil estimates is really made up, as he himself says, of certain previous non-recurring items and of other variations. To the extent, then, that economy has been enforced, or that, more accurately speaking, expenditure has been prevented from rising by finding money for new items by eliminating old items, we are really making no permanent economy. Apart from that, Sir, we know that the sale of silver has resulted in a book loss of 6.38 crores in the Paper Currency Reserve, and the interest on this would amount to about 35 lakhs. This is shown on the expenditure side, and is also credited to revenue. I have been given to understand that this sum is included in the figure of 62 lakhs, mentioned by the Honourable the Finance Member. If it is so, then the reduction in our civil estimates is purely nominal. On the other hand, it is fair to point out that the deficit also will be less than the Honourable Member has shown it to be by about 35 lakhs. I do not know, Sir, what the limits of retrenchment on the civil side are, but I will take the word of the Honourable the Finance Member for it, and accept his statement that no considerable economies are possible in that direction. We have, therefore, to turn to the military estimates to see whether any large and permanent reduction in expenditure can be made.

I will place before the House three or four concrete instances to show to what extent economies are still possible in the Military Budget. I am not now dealing with the general question of military expenditure, which is much too high in proportion to our resources. Whether you accept the Brussels Conference percentage of 20, or you take any reasonably higher figure, 30, 35 or 40, our expenditure will appear to bear too high a proportion to our revenue, and to be far beyond our capacity to pay. I wish, however, to deal with specific instances of the manner in which the expenditure on the Army can be reduced. My first instance relates to a subject with which my Honourable friend the Army Secretary is familiar, as I have referred to it more than once in this House previously. The Retrenchment Committee, after recommending reductions in the British and Indian forces, suggested a reorganisation of the infantry reserve, and pointed out that very considerable advantage would result if its recommendations were accepted.

"The proposal to increase the period of enlistment with the colours," it said "would also ultimately reduce the number of recruits required annually. This in turn would reduce the establishment of the training battalions and the strength of the recruiting staff and result in considerable further economy."

Now, the recommendation of the Inchcape Committee was that the peace strength of the infantry battalions should be 20 per cent. below their war strength. The war strength of an infantry battalion, they suggested, was to be 766, 5 per cent. reduction of which would mean a reduction of about 153 or 154 men per battalion. My Honourable friend Mr. Young told me in 1928 that at the time Government announced their acceptance of the recommendation of the Retrenchment Committee to reorganise the infantry reserve, they reduced the strength of the infantry battalions by 64 men per battalion. I do not know whether anything has been done during the last two years to decrease the strength of the battalions further. If such a thing had been done, the fact would certainly have been made known to us. In any case, the Military Budget would not have been silent on that point. I take it therefore that we are still where we were in 1928. This means that, according to the recommendations of the Retrenchment Committee, a reduction of 90 men per infantry battalion has yet to be effected. Now, as we have 80 active battalions, the acceptance or rather the carrying out of the Inchcape Committee's recommendation would mean a decrease of about 7,200 men. There would, as the Inchcape Committee pointed out, be in consequence also a reduction in the establishment of the training battalions, the purpose of which is to train new recruits for the active battalions, and also to provide for wastage during a war in its initial stages.

But this is not all the economy that in my opinion ought to result from the recommendation of the Inchcape Committee to reorganise the infantry reserve. We have frequently complained that the proportion of one British to 2.5 Indian soldiers is unnecessarily high, and that it betrays a distrust of Indians on the part of His Majesty's Government. But even so long as the present ratio is maintained, if the strength of the Indian battalions is reduced in accordance with the recommendation of the Inchcape Committee, it ought also to result in a corresponding reduction of about 2,800 men in the British forces, and as a British soldier costs about four or five times as much as an Indian soldier, this source of economy cannot by any means be neglected. In fact it ought to yield a large sum. Now, when my Honourable friend the Army Secretary spoke last on this subject in 1928, he told us that the reason why Government could not proceed to the extent recommended by the Inchcape Committee was that the reserve was not full. There were still deficiencies in the authorised strength. I understand, however, now that the reserve is completely full. That is the information I have received from the Military Financial Adviser. If that is so, we should like to know what steps Government propose to take in order to carry out the recommendation of the Inchcape Committee which they accepted in principle in 1923 or 1924.

The other point which I should like to draw the attention of the House to is the capitulation rate, which involves us in a charge of about two crores annually. Honourable Members are aware that this subject has been discussed more than once. The Government of India have, at least for half a century, been protesting against the heavy charges debited to India in connection with the training of British officers and soldiers in England. The matter has been repeatedly considered during the last 60 years. In 1923 it formed the subject of consideration by the Inchcape Committee which recommended that, "a fresh regular settlement should be expedited", and suggested that:

"The most equitable arrangement will be to base the payment on the number of troops sent out and the cost of training them, to fix a separate rate for the technical services, and to allocate the cost to the War Office of training recruits between the India Office and the War Office pro rata to the normal colour service in each country, subject to a due allowance for the potential value to the British Government of returned men available for the reserve."

Whenever this question is raised in this House, we are told that the matter is still under discussion. How long is it going to be under discussion? I can understand my Honourable friend the Finance Member saying that these are all questions of policy which cannot be decided at once, and that we must await the decision of His Majesty's Government. But surely if these questions of policy involve heavy charges to India, if because of our financial position heavy taxation has become necessary, it is up to the Government of India to take advantage of our present position and to press on His Majesty's Government the absolute necessity of coming to a speedy decision on these points. This is the time when they can use our needs as a lever to bring pressure on His Majesty's Government to do tardy justice to us in these important matters.

Just one more concrete instance of the feasibility of reducing military expenditure and I will pass on from this subject. It was pointed out to the Welby Commission that the British Government ought to make some subvention to the Indian revenues in aid of military expenditure, and that Commission amongst other things recommended that:

"As a measure justifiable in the circumstances half the cost of transport of troops to and from India should be defrayed by the Imperial Government."

At that time I understand the cost of transport was about £260,000 and His Majesty's Government therefore agreed to pay annually £130,000 to the Indian revenues. This expenditure has however risen considerably since 3 P.M. then, but the Imperial Government still gives us only about £130,000, which translated into Indian money comes to about 18 lakhs of rupees. The cost of transport of troops is now about 76 lakhs. The share of His Majesty's Government, on the basis recommended by the Welby Commission, ought to be about 38 lakhs. I want to know whether His Majesty's Government have been asked to increase their contribution by 20 lakhs. It is a small sum. It will not of course enable us to dispense with the need for fresh taxation; but there is no reason why His Majesty's Government should not fulfil their obligation in this matter.

There are other instances I could give of reduction in military expenditure, but we shall have an occasion of thrashing the matter out when the Military Budget is under consideration. I wish, therefore to pass on to another subject which was dealt with by my Honourable friend, the Finance Member, in his budget speech. I refer to the provision made for the reduction or avoidance of debt. My Honourable friend's announcement came to me, frankly, as a disappointment. He told us that this subject had better await the examination of the convention relating to the separation of Railway finance. I am in sympathy with a large part of what fell from him in connection with the contribution made by the Railways to the general revenues. It may be that at the next revision, the Railways will be called upon to make a large contribution; but the principle which I have referred to can be discussed independently, I believe, of the examination of the convention. The question that we have to decide is whether a productive debt should be amortised. If that principle is accepted, then no matter how the Railway convention is revised, the grievance of the House in this matter will remain. It is true that the general revenues may benefit if the Railways are called upon to make a larger contribution; but so far as the Government of India as a whole are concerned, so long as the present policy of amortising the productive debt is maintained, they will not benefit by a mere re-arrangement of this kind. The importance of this matter may be realised from the fact that the increased charge on account of the reduction or avoidance of debt will be about 60 lakhs in the coming year.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must now conclude.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Yes, Sir. I will, before sitting down, just refer to one other important point in the Budget, that is, the levy of an import duty on cotton goods. As my time is up, Sir, I cannot discuss the question at great length. But I should like briefly to point out that, while we are not insensible to the appeal made to us by His Majesty's Government, and do not desire to take any course that would unnecessarily hurt English interests, what we are asked today practically is to tax foreign imports for the benefit of Lancashire. All the imports that we receive from foreign countries do not compete with us. To the extent that this is true, the levying of a duty on them means an advantage to Lancashire goods in competition with other goods. This, Sir, is a very large principle. This goes far beyond any question of hurting British interests. A similar question came before the House in connection with the Steel Protection Bill. The Tariff Board considered this matter in 1924. But after discussing the various means of having recourse to protection which would affect only the cheaper kinds of continental steel and not the dearer kinds of English steel, it saw that the only way of differentiating between the two kinds of steel would be to have recourse to Imperial Preference. It was not prepared to recommend such a step as the policy underlying it had not been accepted by the Government of India. The position, Sir, seems to me to be the same as it was then, and I do not think that the House can be called upon at this stage to accept the principle which was not recommended by the Tariff Board in 1924. I know that the Honourable the Finance Member has assured us that the present arrangements will remain in force only for three years, and that, even in the meanwhile, the acceptance of the Government's proposals would not be regarded as an acceptance of Imperial Preference. But, Sir, it is an assurance given practically only on behalf of the present Government in England. We know that when Lord Birkenhead was in office, it was believed that, notwithstanding the recommendation made by the Joint Parliamentary Committee it was for His Majesty's Government to decide what protective tariffs should be imposed in this country. The position of the Labour Government is none too secure. They have won on critical occasions only by a few votes, and if a new Government comes into power before these three years are over, we do not know what advantage might be taken of the acceptance of the proposal that has been placed before us by the Honourable the Finance Member. Sir, I do not wish to take up the time of the House any further; but it seems to me that the proposal which the Honourable the Finance Member asks us to accept does involve the principle of Imperial Preference, and that as such, it requires much more serious consideration than has yet been given to it. We have to remember that, in the past, the Government of India themselves have been against a policy of Imperial Preference. The repercussions of that policy must be examined. It must be remembered that the Dominions themselves have not accepted it, and that the return of General Hertzog to power in South Africa definitely means that there will be no discrimination in that country against foreign goods as against goods coming from England. In these circumstances, Sir, we may be pardoned if we are not prepared to adopt a different policy, and we trust that our view point will not be misunderstood, and that we shall not be unjustly accused of deliberately trying to hurt British interests without gaining any corresponding advantage for ourselves thereby.

Mr. M. K. Acharya (South Arcot cum Chingleput: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I propose to make just a very few remarks on behalf of the rural population whom I have the honour to represent in this House. We have heard the proposals of the Finance Member. He has come and told us that a deficit Budget is inevitable, that fresh taxation has to be imposed; and nobody will deny, Sir, not even the Honourable the Finance Member, that after all, directly or indirectly, all this fresh taxation will fall upon the shoulders of the bulk of the people the poor toiling masses. (An Honourable Member: "Question".) Sir, when the question is more seriously raised, the answer will be more seriously given. Sir, it may further be not out of place to raise the question here as to what has happened during the past twelve months, since the last Budget was presented which will justify us to accept the proposed additional taxation. What has happened in the political sphere? What in the economic and what in the agricultural and industrial spheres of the country? How far have the interests of India been safeguarded, promoted, by the Government in order that they may come to the representatives of the people and say, for this and this and these other benefits that we have conferred upon you in this and this and these other spheres, we now want more money from the taxpayer, and we propose that you should grant us additional taxation?

What has happened, Sir, in the political sphere? During the last year a bomb was thrown in this House. A number of young men were arrested; some have been punished, others are under trial, and although I do not want to use that much objected expression "repression"—you can call it what you like—crime has been on the increase, certainly not on the decrease; followed by repression as the order of the day. In fact, crime and repression are, as it were, always correlated; though in no country, in no period in the history of any country in the world, has repression succeeded in eliminating political crime. Therefore, the question arises, so far as the bulk of the people are concerned, who is responsible for it all? Not surely the young men whose blood is boiling with the not ignoble desire to see their country freed; certainly not those who are ready to lay down their lives in order to win by any methods, which they consider suitable, however, violent to us they may appear, the liberty and freedom of their country. Who is responsible? Who has made these young men take to these violent methods? Certainly not those whom I represent. We have never called upon any of these young men to wrench, by violence, Swaraj from the British rulers. But it is not at all an irrelevant question whether the policy of the Government during the past ten years, whether the policy of sitting on the fence during the past ten years particularly, is not responsible for inciting these young men to active violence. It may be, Sir, that we may brand them as traitors, we may brand them as criminals. After all, it may be said of these with but one word altered in the poet's lines:

"For Freedom's battle once begun,
Bequeathed by branded sire to son,
Though baffled oft is ever won."

And, Sir, in this connection I cannot help referring to the demand made in this very city by authoritative leaders of the people before the representatives of the Government, before His Excellency the Viceroy, as the head of the Government, that political prisoners ought to be set free, and that a new era of peace and reconciliation regarding the political problem should be inaugurated and announced immediately. If that demand had been treated with the consideration that was expected or that was required, it might very likely be that we would have in this House today those who were leaders of the Opposition till last year. And therefore, I, Sir, who once belonged to that party, cannot but deplore that the policy of the Government—deliberate, it might have been inevitable, it might have been impossible for them to change it,—without going into these details I cannot but deplore that the policy of the Government has resulted in driving out of the House those whom it might have been possible to have kept in the House for the better administration of the country, both from the standpoint of Government and from the standpoint of the people at large. What next, Sir, has been the progress made during the past year in the sphere of economic development? Well, I do not profess to be a great economist; I am not a capitalist; I am not a millowner, but those who are qualified to speak, the finance and commerce Members of the Opposition here, my friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, and my friend, Mr. Birla, these have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the effect of the wrong currency policy of the Government has been to make India poorer and poorer every day. Has there been a denial of that statement? Yes; many denials and counter-denials. Even today specific charges have been made that the currency policy of Government is responsible for the great havoc that has been played upon Government's own financial position. I daresay that there will be some kind of justification; there never has been a time when there was not justification for any argument that might be put forward or for any action that might be taken rightly or wrongly in any sphere. Therefore, whatever Government may say, the trusted leaders of the people, who have studied the economic figures carefully, swear that the currency and financial policy of Government has been responsible for a great deal of economic depression, trade depression, and agricultural depression; and all these facts, whatever the causes, have been admitted by the Honourable the Finance Member himself. When he comes here, therefore, it is up to him to come forward and say what the specific reasons are for all these kinds of depression; whether it is all due to the financial policy of the Government, or to their artificial currency policy; or to what other specific causes the depression in trade, the depression in commerce, and the depression in production are due.

[Mr. M. K. Acharya.]

Lastly, Sir, what shall we go and say to our electors? Shall we go and say that the additional taxation should be cheerfully borne because, during the past year, during the last Session, the Government chose to come down and interfere not only with our economic and political rights and liberties, but even with our religious institutions? Should we give you more money because you imposed on an unwilling people, imposed upon us all, a law which was not of our asking? It was sinful, immoral, absolutely diabolical. Is it for that that you want more taxation from the people? How are Mr. Sarda and his reforming friends going to answer their electors if they are asked why they did support this absolutely uncalled for interference in the religious institutions of the people? Government may not care, but our elected friends will have to give an answer. However worthy your motives I am not concerned with that; that is not what I am asking today. The best of intentions you may have; yet on that ground your reforms cannot be thrust down the throats of an unwilling people. Having done that, you want to impose additional taxation on necessities. You might impose perhaps additional taxation on luxuries. Excepting the proposed increase in the income-tax rates, all the rest of the new taxes fall directly upon the poor people, upon the masses. Cloth is going to be taxed from 15 to 20 per cent.; sugar, an article of necessity, is to be taxed more. It is annoying even to tax silver more, which, though a minor commodity and not so much a necessity or an article of food, will become dearer to the common people. I repeat why do you tax things which the ordinary people want badly? Why don't you tax articles of luxury? Why do not the heroes and heroines of the Sarda Act pay for their sins, for their silks and soaps and for all their dainties, for their motor cars and cigarettes and things of that sort? Why do you ask the common labourer, the man who has to earn his living by hard work—why do you ask him to pay more for the cloth he wants to cover his nudity with, for the sugar he wants to cheer his crying children with, and for the kerosene with which he wants to light the darkness of his cottage? Is this, according to any moral standard, a reasonable demand to make upon the poor people of any country? I am sorry to read in the Honourable the Finance Member's speech a comparison made of the duties on sugar imposed in other countries. He says it is 11s. 8d. in England, 10s. 3d. in America and so on. What is the average income per head in the countries which the Honourable the Finance Member has mentioned, and what is the average income per head of the toiling men and women of the United Provinces and Madras? The Honourable the Finance Member might as well have given the average income per head in England and the average income per head in India. It is easy to show that in other countries (An Honourable Member: "Who grows sugarcane in India?") conditions are different. My Honourable friend over there says that India grows sugarcane. Yes; India does grow sugarcane, but even then we want more sugar, we have to import additional sugar.

Therefore, Sir, it seems to me to be adding insult to injury to say that other countries like Great Britain and France levy heavier duties:

they are forced to buy the article; England can afford to pay twice as much as she pays now and France could afford to levy thrice as much duty as she now levies. But India is an agricultural country and can grow her own sugar. With better facilities and with a better industrial policy adopted by the Government, India need import no sugar at all and need not pay any sugar duty at all. It may be all right for rich people to say that this will not affect the poor people to any great extent. I claim to know the facts better. I, Sir, as representing the poor people, am not against any help being given to Bombay if she is in need of it: but in good truth it is not that her present condition touches my heart to any great extent. Let the Bombay millowners suffer a little now; they made a lot of money in the old days and they can afford to put their hands into their pockets a little now when the times are bad; it does not matter to me one bit. After all, everywhere in this world there must be ups and downs; it is inevitable; it is not possible in this world of ours always to be absolutely successful in business; and so, however much we may sympathise with the millowners in their present plight, I do not see why the poor man, who wants to purchase eight yards of cloth or a pair of dhoties, should be made to pay more by means of this 15 or 20 per cent. duty, or anything else more than what he pays now, in order that the millowners of Bombay or elsewhere in India should be able to run their mills profitably. I do not see where the logic of it comes in, or the ethics.

It is then said that the hand-loom industry will be benefited by the imposition of this additional duty. What a great concession? What great benefits is the hand-loom industry going to get? Let us consider for a moment what is the production from the hand-loom industry and to what extent this additional duty is going to help it. I really do not know how far this is going to benefit the hand-loom weavers. It is all something like the lamp of Aladdin in the old Arabian Nights.

Therefore, Sir, these baits do not attract me; and I feel it is my duty to enter my very humble protest against what I consider to be the imposition of additional taxation upon the bulk of the people of this country who have not been benefited during the past twelve months by any of the measures that have been adopted by the Government. It has been said "The real remedy is to grant provincial autonomy and then most of these complaints will disappear". But, Sir, I do not believe in this talisman; for what do we find? Have the present reforms put more power into the hands of the people directly? Can the people manage even their own village forests, or village irrigation, or village trades? Have they the power to manage even their own village schools? How has provincial autonomy given any real power to the poor man in the cottage and to the people in the villages to manage their every day affairs? If full Dominion Status is granted tomorrow, and if you give say, to my constituency of 20,000 odd voters, more power, you will perhaps allow them to send one more representative to this Legislature through whose election they will have to pay only more taxes! How is this going to help them? You will tax them still further; the then Finance Member will have to impose more fresh taxation; and the poor man will feel that he has got his reforms at a fairly high cost indeed!

For these reasons, Sir, I consider it my duty to enter my strong protest against the proposals contained in this Budget, and I hope that the very many suggestions that have been placed before the Finance Member will be carefully considered—it is not for me to suggest any more—especially in regard to the Military Budget. I hope the Military Budget will be very carefully revised; it has been already pointed out that, in the normal course, there should have been a saving of between 4 and 5 crores in the military expenditure alone. If that had been effected, justice would have been done; equity would have been done, and the need for fresh taxation would have been avoided. In regard to other items of expenditure also there have been many items which have been pointed out to the Finance Member where he could bring his shears into operation against the enormous expenditure in various departments. I say, Sir, it is high time that some such thing was done. If the Finance Member had done that, and then said to us, "I have done my best and cut down expenditure as much as I could possibly do; give me a little more money to carry on", then perhaps we could consider the matter more sympathetically. If he does this next year—I do not know which of us will be here then and which not—then perhaps the matter will be considered more favourably.

For all these reasons, Sir, I feel that the average man whom I represent cannot at all feel thankful to the Finance Member. Every department has got to be carefully scrutinised before any additional taxation is imposed. It is our plain duty to oppose all proposals for fresh taxation, even though we may sympathise with Bombay and with other centres where mills are operating, and although Bombay may have good reason to support those proposals. Somebody pointed out, that if you impose additional duty against Japan, Japan may be forced to exclude your rice; and then what will you do? I have been told that already there is some such proposals for retaliation against India, and I would not like to invite retaliation at the hands of Japan in order to please Lancashire.

I hope these and other objections will receive full consideration at the hands of the Finance Member, and that he will answer them in a perfectly candid manner before he expects any vote from those who, like me, represent, not the millowners, not the capitalists, but the average man in the street.

Mr. Kikabhai Premchand (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, as a member of the business community, which is so vitally interested in the administration of the finances of this country, and in the fiscal policy pursued, I rise to give my support to the Budget under consideration. The first point which emerges from a careful study of the Budget is that the financial position of the Government of India—I will not say the financial embarrassment, for that is too strong a word—arises from causes not directly of its own making. If the Government had not been so anxious to relieve the provinces of the burden of their contributions under the scheme of 1919, they would have been in a position of substantial financial ease.

Mr. B. Das: On a point of order, Sir. Can a nominated Member speak on behalf of the provinces?

Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: World forces have worked against realising the anticipation of a normal growth of revenue to fill the gap caused by these remissions. But we have this consolation; the funds transferred from the Central revenues to those of the provinces have brought relief to administrations faced by the great growing heads of expenditure, and if they have not in all cases brought ease, they have strengthened the position in the provinces, and made it possible to deal more effectively with the great nation-building agencies which are their principal responsibility. We have to face the consequences of this courageous policy, and the direct result is that the Government of India undoubtedly need additional sources of revenue.

With one qualification, I am in agreement with the proposals to raise this additional revenue. The increase in the revenue duty from 11 to 15 per cent. on imported cotton piece-goods is a wise and equitable measure. It is only right that this great head of imports should bear a fair proportion of the general tariff, which furnishes the principal source of revenue. The addition of a special protective tariff of 5 per cent. for three years on all plain grey goods from outside the British Empire, has also my support. The claim of the textile industry, and particularly of the Bombay mills, to a stronger measure of protection has been amply substantiated, and a sigh of relief went up when it was decided to impose it without further inquiry. The textile industry is weary of inquiries, and the depression which is so pronounced a feature of our industrial position would have grown disastrously deep, if, instead of help, Government had offered it another committee. The special difficulties of the Bombay industry spring not only from foreign competition—severe as that is—but from a long series of labour disputes in which the operative class has stubbornly resisted every attempt to reorganise labour conditions in the mills, or to secure a better return for the wages paid. The industry stands in clamant need of breathing time. The proposals of Government offer it, and in conditions which impose on the industry the imperative duty of proceeding rapidly with those measures to cut out the dead wood, to rationalise production, and to establish co-operative buying and selling, which are by common consent necessary to secure permanent health. I only wish, Sir, to endorse the principle underlying the duty—that it is a barrier behind which the industry must effectively reorganise itself, or the justification for the shelter will cease to exist.

There are certain features of a protective duty of which this House, as the guardian of the interests of the whole community, must take account. The first essential is that it shall be effective—that it must so stimulate internal competition that the burden thrown on the consumer is only temporary.

That need is fully met in the proposals before us; the new duties will fully safeguard the industry against the foreign competition which threatens to crush it. The second essential is that the protective duty shall not press unnecessarily on the consumer. The imports which most directly compete with the Indian mills are plain grey goods from outside the British Empire; the direct competition from Empire goods, textiles, is small, and is amply met by the increase in the general tariff. No good case has been made out for this protective duty on Empire textiles, and therefore there would be no justification for taxing the community in respect of them. I am quite aware that this differentiation is a form of Imperial Preference. I am not afraid of the term; on the contrary, I am strongly in favour of the principle when it can be applied without detriment to the interests of India.

I would invite the careful attention of this House to policies which are gathering strength in the great industrial countries. Not only is rational-to exercise rigid control over new works; the money will come in time and probably in the long run be spent to better advantage.

Surveying the financial scene in India today, I think we may say that it is brighter already for the Budget before us. There is a greater feeling of confidence abroad and confidence is the life blood of commerce and industry. Our great national manufacturing industry, the spinning and weaving of cotton, breathes more freely and faces the future with a more assured confidence. Whilst therefore there is need for caution and prudence, on the whole, we face the future in far better heart than seemed possible a month or six weeks ago. There is only one cloud on the horizon, and that is bigger than a man's hand. It is the threat of repudiation of the national obligations that is in the air, combined with the revival of that form of lawlessness which is called non-violent disobedience. I do not now want to introduce politics into this discussion; my interest is in the business side of the Budget. The foundations of business, and of the industrial and commercial structure, which is of such vital importance to all sections of the community, is confidence, confidence in the sanctity of contractual obligations, whether national or private, confidence in the rule of law. Neither can be sapped without disastrous consequences to the welfare of the whole community. In this matter I look far beyond the immediate present. I try to visualise the India which has won responsible government and Dominion Status in the Empire. What will be the position of those charged with the immense responsibilities for the governance of this land if they have to build on a foundation of lawlessness? None can say what the year before us will bring. We do feel that the outlook is brighter than we dared hope and that the Budget before us has contributed to that end. But we feel equally that these hopes can be realised only in an atmosphere of confidence and respect for law, and I express the strong hope that the Government will see that the law is respected, by whomsoever it may be challenged, and that in this duty, they will have the support of all responsible elements in the country. Only along this path can we win the goal we have set before us.

Mr. W. Alexander (Madras: European): I wish to congratulate the Honourable the Finance Member on the Budget presented, and particularly on the way in which he has tackled a situation full of great difficulty. No one likes fresh taxation or any kind of taxation, but there are, as stated, indirect advantages in each new item of increase in this Budget. Now, as regards income-tax, with an increase of one pie in the rupee, well, there are cases worse than ours. We are now hearing of a Budget shortly to be introduced in another country in which it is said that income-tax is likely to be increased to the extent of about the equivalent of 5 pies per rupee. However, my Honourable friend, Sir Hugh Cocks, has dealt with the various items of the Budget. I only propose to speak with regard to the cotton duties, and I would like specially to refer to the changes which it is proposed to make in those duties. In the call for additional revenue, and also owing to the parlous state into which the mill industry in Bombay has fallen, the necessity for some increase is quite clearly seen. It would not be of any assistance at present to go into all the causes which have brought about this mill trouble. In the Simla Session of 1927, we had long debates on this question, and turning them over today, one wonders if there was a word left unsaid as to all the unfortunate circumstances surrounding the industry in Bombay. Today the urgency of the case is so very great that I feel called upon to press a point or two in respect to the means which are now being adopted, or which it is proposed to adopt, in the effort to bring this Bombay industry back to the state of prosperity it used to enjoy.

First, there is the question of finance. No doubt, in certain quarters in Bombay, reserves have run down or become depleted, but it is also a fact that there are large resources left, and that with those resources pooled, and the necessary assistance from outside, there should be enough finance available to carry the whole thing through. It has been done and is now being done elsewhere and can surely be done in Bombay.

What I am more concerned about, is the prospect with regard to re-organisation, the rationalisation of this industry, which means as described by a well-known authority:

"The attempt to adjust the means of production to the probable means of consumption and so to regulate prices that, instead of curves rising and falling like the contour of the Alps, there should be a fairly level roadway of prices along which trade and commerce may move. In this way the consumer of any material may base his own estimates for future years and the standard of living of peoples may be established with some degree of certainty."

Here is an outstanding instance in actual working. Over 75 per cent. of the entire wheat production of Canada is now sold through one co-operative pool, linked in turn with a similar organisation in Australia, and with combinations of farmers in America and Argentine. But there is no need to go so far afield. So long ago as before the War, in Britain, there were a number of industrial groups, some of them with as many as 70 and 80 different concerns linked up in the arrangement and covering a greater capacity than all the mills in Bombay put together. I have no wish at this time to criticise Bombay, but I must say that I cannot understand why they were not working out their salvation at that time. I am talking now of the years when some of those Home groups were constructed, the years of 1908 up to the time of the War. And this more particularly as Bombay was then, and is now, placed in a more favourable position to carry out such schemes, through contiguity. Some of the groups of which I have been speaking have concerns in them working at a great distance apart, say, 200 or 300 miles, whereas in Bombay one could cover all the mills with a pocket-handkerchief, so to speak. So, in that way Bombay is very favourably placed, but unfortunately she has never taken advantage of it.

Sir, what I fear is this. I fear that the changes necessary to bring about the reduction of the cost of production will not be properly faced, and that there will be fear and shrinking in the same way as a patient shrinks from an operation, which may mean life or death. It is not an easy matter. In the comparatively short history of some of those British industrial groups, works have been rebuilt three or four times, always with a view to reducing the cost of production and the results of those changes have been successful.

Now, Sir, the days of secret systems and processes in regard to industrial organisation and manufacture generally are over, and it should be quite possible for the Bombay mill interests, in this great question of the rationalisation of the industry, to get on the absolutely right course to pursue. The only question is, will they take it? Will they do it? There is a tremendous amount depending on that. I do not like to contemplate the other side of the picture, but if they pursue the right course, as I sincerely hope they will, then there is very little doubt that they will win through.

There is another matter to which I would like to refer. For some time past there has been considerable anxiety in certain districts among the hand-loom weavers, through doubt as to the possibility of an increase in the yarn duties. That doubt and anxiety have now been removed, and whatever may be said regarding other controversial points in this Budget, Government have the satisfaction of knowing that they have earned the thanks and deep gratitude of the hand-loom weaving community. They number about six to seven million people throughout the country and have been described as "the most inarticulate, the poorest paid, and withal the most industrious people in the country". I only hope that it will be possible, before long, to entirely abolish those cotton yarn duties which have been condemned by the Fiscal Commission, the Tariff Board, and by every reputable authority who has gone into the matter and fully understands the implications attached and the evil of taxing a half-manufactured article. Now that Government are proposing to adopt a more constructive economic policy than in the past, I trust this may be one of the first questions to receive consideration.

I have said nothing with regard to the differential 5 per cent. duty, but I would like to point out to my Honourable friends that this duty is primarily aimed "to help a lame dog over a stile". I have no intention of preventing that lame dog from getting over the stile if it is possible to assist him. All I would say is that, having regard to this question of Imperial Preference, I hope the lame dog who happens to be 15/16ths Indian will also be considered.

Mr. B. Das: Sir, when I heard my Honourable friend from Bombay, while he was reading out his speech, I thought it was as though I was listening to the columns of the Times of India.

Sir Hugh Cocke: Is the Honourable Member referring to Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas?

Mr. B. Das: I am referring to his friend Mr. Kikabhai Premchand. When I read the minute of dissent by Mr. Kikabhai Premchand on the Central Committee's Report, I also thought it was as though I was reading from the columns of the Times of India. However, he has tried to represent the provinces. I do not know if the other Back Benchers on the Government Benches, who are the representatives of the provinces, agree with the remark that the Government did not act rightly in abolishing provincial contributions. If the Back Benchers on the Treasury Benches, who come from different provinces, will support the dictum of Mr. Kikabhai Premchand, I am very much afraid that they will not have to go back to the provinces, but will have to remain with the Central Government.

Sir, the most outstanding issue of the Budget speech of this year is the message which the Honourable the Finance Member has transmitted from the British Cabinet. He wanted us to treat it as an important factor. Sir, I would like to treat it as an important subject, but I would ask him to transmit a message to the British Government that, when India becomes an equal partner in the British Empire, by this time next year, I would like to discuss this very subject on its own merits. I will then be in a position to discuss whether preference can be given to the United Kingdom—it is not the British Empire, but the United Kingdom. The Honourable the Finance Member, during his short stay in India, may know and must know, that we Indians are very gentlemanly and very hospitable, and when we call somebody our friend, we like to extend our friendship to him. It is in this light that I would like him to transmit a message to the British Government.

• Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Birla, gave an interview to the Press and said that Imperial Preference has come in by the front door. That is also the view on this side of the House. None of us on this side will tolerate Imperial Preference in any shape or form. Sir, four years ago when the Steel Protection Bill was being considered, I was the first man on this side of the House who damned Imperial Preference. (Hear, hear.) Thereafter, whenever Imperial Preference has been introduced through the backdoor, we on this side have condemned it to our heart's content, in spite of Government carrying it through the support of my friend, Mr. Kikabhai Premchand, and others who are sitting on the Treasury Benches. Sir, my friend, Mr. Kikabhai Premchand, waxed eloquent and said that the trouble of the Bombay mills has come through the labour trouble. I wish he had attended the annual meeting of the Federation of Indian Chambers and heard the President of that Federation, Mr. Birla, when he spoke about labour and its contentment. Why did not my Honourable friend, Mr. Kikabhai Premchand, who, I understand dabbles in stocks, tell the House about the over-capitalisation of the Bombay mills by the mill-owners? However, we will get ample opportunities to discuss this problem when we consider the Bill that will come up before the House shortly. It is no use laying the whole blame on labour. The capitalists are to be blamed for their mismanagement and for their great greed in the past.

I will just speak one word about my Honourable friend, Sir Hari Singh Gour. While he was speaking, he condemned lukewarmly the principle of Imperial Preference, but he wanted that somehow we should offer a bribe to the British Government, because three or six months hence, we are going to meet at the Round Table Conference. Sir, I am not one of those who will offer any bribe to anybody, and I want to meet on equal terms, at the Round Table Conference, the Members of the British Cabinet and the British delegation. If we cannot come to a settlement, we want to retire honourably, and then I will decide whether I will not join the movement of civil disobedience which my Honourable friend, Mr. Kikabhai Premchand, had the audacity to condemn on the floor of this House.

Now, Sir, I must speak one word congratulating the Honourable the Finance Member for his bold courage in taking stock of the present financial condition of India. He diagnosed well, he did very well in pointing it out, but so far as the cure he has suggested is concerned, he has gone about it wrongly. The cure he suggests is certain taxation, Imperial Preference or protective duties; that is not a proper cure. Sir, it was given out in the budget speech of the Honourable the Finance Member that Mr. Jukes would be the Retrenchment Officer to look into the retrenchment of civil Departments and of civil budgets, and see if they are capable of any retrenchment. As everybody knows, on the civil side, there can be very little retrenchment unless it is abolition of the post of a chaprasi here or a clerk there. On the civil side, there cannot be any real retrenchment.

[Mr. B. Das.]

When I spoke on the Railway Budget, I said there should be a Retrenchment Committee to see whether the heavy increase of expenditure to the tune of 10 crores which has grown up during the last five years, could not be reduced. I realise, Sir, that the Railways, irresponsible as they are, do not want to give the Honourable the Finance Member any extra share of their surplus profits. Therefore, they go on spending large sums of money, as much as they like, in the working expenditure, in repairs and maintenance, which the railways would not be spending if they were under the direct administration of the Honourable the Finance Member. Although certain Honourable Members of this House differ from me, I still maintain that there should be direct control of the Honourable the Finance Member over the Railway Budget. I do not think Mr. Jukes can put his finger into the pockets of my Honourable friend, Mr. Young, who has got too much, though it has been reduced by 80 lakhs this year. Still he has got too much money and can well afford to part with some crores. There should be a Retrenchment Committee appointed. It is no use appointing a Special Officer for this purpose, especially one who is on the point of retirement, and who has, for over thirty years, been trained in the spirit of the Civil Service and their clamour, to which we are all so accustomed. He cannot very well point out or lay his finger where the mistakes lie. After all, how much can he show as retrenchment? There must be a Committee and that Committee should go into the railway head, into their finances and into the military account, and also they will have to lay their fingers especially in places where the military expenditure lies concealed in the expenditure on the civil side and also the railway side. I will point out two or three heads where expenditure, which properly belongs to the military side, has been shown in the civil side. There is expenditure of so many lakhs on radios, so many lakhs in aviation and so many lakhs on broadcasting and so on. We do not want all these luxurious hobbies of radios or broadcasting or aviation in India at present, especially because India is a very poor country. We can very well abolish those departments. Then, there is that other department—meteorology, the expenditure on which is growing every year and which properly speaking should come under the Military Budget. If it is a military expenditure; let it be charged to the military head, and let the 54 crores and odd of the Military Budget cover that expenditure. Then, there are also certain hospitals and scientific departments and institutions which purely come under military expenditure, but they are still being charged on the civil side, and the Honourable the Finance Member cannot find the money to meet the civil expenditure. Lastly, I need not once again point out the special concessions in rates and freights given to the Army.

Sir, much has been said about taxation, and I do not want to touch that on silver, the abolition of which has been well supported from this side of the House. I will say one word about kerosene. If Government need this taxation on kerosene, why this differential treatment, why not equalise the tax on kerosene? The money that is invested in Burma is purely British money, it is not Indian money and we also know about the agitation that has been going on for the last three years regarding the separation of Burma from India. Why should we give the British capitalists in Burma an advantage over other oil-producing countries?

Next I want to touch upon this preferential duty a little. My Honourable friend Mr. Alexander said that the hand-loom weavers would not be affected. Sir, I am sorry to hear that. I will prove, when the occasion comes, on the floor of this House, that the hand-loom industry in certain provinces happens to produce 40 per cent. of the cloth that is used in those provinces. My Honourable friend, Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh just tells me about Bihar and Orissa, where it is so. Then, Sir, when my Honourable friend, the gallant Baronet, Sir Victor Sassoon pleaded so much for the cotton yarn protective duty, everybody agreed that it should be for three years. Now by the back door, it is going to be extended for six years. If the Honourable the Finance Member needs a little more money, he had better double the income-tax or the super-tax. He should not kill the hand-loom weavers, who are six millions in India, while the mill hands are only four lakhs and a half. Another thing that I want to remind the Honourable the Finance Member of is this, when the Government passed the Cotton Yarn Protection Bill, what did Japan do? Did not Japan put an embargo on the import of Indian rice to Japan? They thought of doing so and also on pig iron, as my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, reminds me. If you want us to fight, you had better create some quarrels with the European nations or with America. Why do you create this quarrel with an Asiatic nation? We want to be in perfect amity with Japan. Why, this differential treatment of Government to help either my Honourable friends from Bombay or to help the Government Treasury? Why do you want to bring about this difference between India and Japan? We do not want to have any quarrel with Japan in whatever shape. We want to remain in peace and friendship with Japan.

Then my Honourable friend, Sir George Schuster, himself has alluded to the drop in the world prices of commodities. How is it then that he has not taken any steps to abolish the Lee concessions? The Civil Services clamoured in 1922 for concessions because of the rise in prices. Now the prices have dropped. Why don't you reduce these concessions? The Honourable the Finance Member will thereby get a reduction of several lakhs—I do not know if it will not be crores—in his expenditure. I know the Anglo-Indians on the railways have even secured them and even some of them are still clamouring for these Lee concessions, on considerations which only the Departments know, and which we cannot solve on this side of the House. That is my suggestion to the Government whether a Retrenchment Committee tackles the problem or whether Mr. Jukes examines the question of retrenchment, that is, whether the time has not come to reduce these Lee concessions owing to the drop in world prices of commodities.

My Honourable friend, Mr. Acharya, spoke of the hardship of the tax on sugar. It might have been worse, the salt-tax might have been doubled. In that case, the whole country—I do not refer to special constituencies from which my Honourable friend Mr. Mody and others come, for they need not have any fear in this matter—in the case of other constituencies, there would be a huge uproar. I have, however, every sympathy with the Honourable the Finance Member, because he is only trying to ease the burden of legacy received from his predecessor, Sir Basil Blackett, who reduced the earning power of the people of India. Then he is also suffering from the action of the predecessor of Sir Basil Blackett, namely, Sir Malcolm Hailey, who left India, Indian industry and Indian conditions in such a miserable state by dabbling in high finance, that his successor after seven or eight years is feeling the pinch of it. I know Sir George Schuster will have to find money to meet the budget demand, but when he said that he was putting all these taxations in order that he might have a little accumulating surplus for preparing the way for a more generous allocation to the provinces of sources of revenue for nation-building services,—a most pious speech—I believe my Honourable friend wrote this when he was probably thinking of his discussions in London with Mr. Layton and others who were hatching the Simon Seven's Report. In this respect I will pay one word of tribute to the Central Committee, although I do not see eye to eye with all their recommendations. They have said that Salt, Income-tax and Customs should be provincial revenues. I whole-heartedly support that. I aspire to see soon Orissa made a separate province and I whole-heartedly support the idea that Salt, Income-tax and Customs should be provincial revenues. I was glad that that bit of common sense dawned on the Central Committee when they wrote that.

My Honourable friend, Sir George Schuster, is putting in money to be spent on new grants. I will refer to one grant particularly, the appointment of Trade Commissioners. I will welcome it. We have demanded it for the last three or four years; but if it only means that the cadre of the Indian Civil Service posts is to be increased and Indian Civil Servants will get these posts, we on this side of the House will oppose this grant completely. There will be enough Indian commercial men to fill the Indian Consular Service when it is recruited to its full cadre. It seems that there is an unholy alliance—of course (Sir George Schuster is not a party to it because he does not belong to the Indian Civil Service—to send away Indians of the Civil Service abroad and thereby to replace that number by European Indian Civil Servants, so that Europeans might more and more get recruited into the Indian Civil Service. I strongly condemn that, and if it going to be the Indian Civil Service, I will oppose it in due course.

Sir, we on this side clamour for protective tariffs. Protective tariffs have become a windfall to the Honourable the Finance Member for the last four or five years. As I said last year, in the memorandum of the Finance Department which was submitted to the Simon Commission, it was mentioned that 20 crores had come from the steel protective duties alone to the pockets of the Finance Member. At that time we suggested that this money, realised from the protective tariff, should be put away for nation-building work, but it has not been done. Again, there are always clamourers, whether it is the Bombay millowners or glass manufacturers, they all want protective tariffs. That means so much money put into the coffers of the Finance Member. My suggestion is that, if the Finance Member wants to build up the nation-building departments, from this year any money collected under the protective tariffs should be set aside for nation-building departments and should be allocated at a later date, to the different provinces.

Mr. President: I had expected that Honourable Members who can speak with authority on the condition of the Bombay mill industry would participate in this debate as early as possible, but none of them rose today, and if they do not get an opportunity hereafter they must thank themselves.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Wednesday, the 5th March, 1930.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Wednesday, 5th March, 1930.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber of the Council House at Eleven of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

EMPLOYEES DISCHARGED FROM THE EAST INDIAN RAILWAY.

444. Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Will Government be pleased to state how many railway employees on the East Indian Railway, Moradabad Division, were served with notice under paragraph 2, or otherwise discharged after an inquiry was made by Mr. Hayman, Member, Railway Board, in August last? What were the charges against these persons and were they given charge sheets under the rules and afforded an opportunity to explain their cases? If not, why not?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: The information will be obtained and supplied to the Honourable Member.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Will the Honourable Member supply the information on the floor of this House or put the papers on the table of the House?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I will consider that after I have got the information.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Are Government aware that the information which is supplied privately to the Members does not come to the record and afterwards we do not find any trace of it in the proceedings of the Assembly? (Hear, hear.)

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: We always place copies in the Library.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Are Government aware that they are not printed in the proceedings of the Assembly and the public does not get any information about those communications? (Hear, hear.)

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: They are certainly not printed in the proceedings, but copies are placed in the Library.

Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: Are Government aware that the public cannot go into the Library of the Assembly to read the answers?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: Yes.

PROMOTIONS ON THE EAST INDIAN RAILWAY.

445. Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: How many Station Masters, Traffic Inspectors, Loco. Foremen and Fitters-in-charge were promoted to the posts of Assistant Superintendent Transportation, Assistant Superintendent Commercial, and Assistant Superintendent Power, during the last three years and how many of them were East Indian Railway officers and how many old Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway officers?

the qualifying examination were not only given the officiating promotion as accountants, but also the benefit of five years of qualified service over their compeers of the regular establishment in the matter of fixation of seniority, and that the same condition of service has been recognised by the Accounts Department in the case of some of those Training Reserve men who were taken over by the latter Department from the Audit Department?

(b) If the answer to part (a) be in the affirmative, will Government please explain why the same privileges, as were recognised in the case of the Training Reserve, are not extended to the qualified men of the Accounts Training Class?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) and (b). Men of the Training Reserve with the Auditor General had also to wait for vacancies, after passing the qualifying examination. Whilst such men were given the benefit of five years additional service in the grade under the Auditor General, men of the Accounts Training Class have been given a minimum pay of Rs. 80. i.e., they have been fixed as clerks, class II, over the head of all the clerks class III. The question of their relative seniority in class II itself is still under consideration.

NON-STOPPAGE OF FAST PASSENGER TRAINS AT BARARA STATION.

450. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: With reference to the reply to Lala Duni Chand's question No. 1128, regarding the non-stoppage of fast passenger trains at Barara when the Honourable the then Railway Member promised on the 9th March, 1926, that a copy of the question would be sent to the Agent, North Western Railway, will Government be now pleased to state whether they sent a copy of the question, as promised, to the Agent? If so, when and what action has the Agent taken thereon?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: A copy of the question was sent to the Agent, North Western Railway on the 23rd March, 1926. He reports that, in April 1926, five up and five down trains used to stop at Barara railway station. From the 1st March, 1930, four up and six down trains stop at that station.

INFORMATION ABOUT MATCH FACTORIES IN INDIA.

451. Sardar Gulab Singh: (a) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table the information promised by the Honourable Member in charge of the Industries and Labour Department, as "being collected" in response to my unstarred question No. 91 of the 20th January, 1930, about the match factories in India?

(b) If the required information has not yet been collected, will the Honourable Member please state as to when it will be available at the earliest?

APPOINTMENT OF SIKHS AS SUPERINTENDENTS IN THE RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

452 *Sardar Gulab Singh: (a) Will Government please state:

(i) the total number of Sikh Superintendents in the Railway Mail Service, Northern Circle, Ambala;

(ii) if it is a fact that not a single Sikh has ever been recruited to the above post for several years past?

(b) If the reply to part (a) (ii) be in the affirmative, will Government please state reasons why such an important minority of Sikhs has so far been ignored and not been represented in this Department so far?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) (i). The Railway Mail Service, Northern Circle, was abolished in April, 1929. At that time there was one Sikh Superintendent attached thereto. He is now working under the Postmaster General, Punjab and North West Frontier Circle.

(ii) No. Direct recruitment is made only to the cadre of Probationary Superintendents to which cadre two Sikhs have been recruited in the last five years, viz., one in 1925 and the other in 1928.

(b) Does not arise in view of the reply to part (ii) of (a).

APPOINTMENT OF SIKHS IN THE OFFICE OF THE RAILWAY BOARD.

458. *Sardar Gulab Singh: (a) Will Government please state:

- (i) the total number of officers, subordinates, clerks and menials employed in the Railway Board's Office;
- (ii) how many of these are Sikhs and in what positions;
- (iii) the nature and total number of promotions given to the aforesaid staff since the 1st January, 1929; and
- (iv) how many of these promotions were granted to Sikhs?

(b) Will Government be pleased to state:

- (i) the total number of permanent vacancies that occurred in the Upper, Lower and Third Divisions of the Railway Board Office since January, 1928;
- (ii) if it is a fact that not a single Sikh has been given any permanent post in any of the above grades since that time; and
- (iii) why this important minority is always being overlooked in spite of the Home Department's instructions for safeguarding all sorts of minority interests?

(c) Will Government please state:

- (i) the total number of temporary vacancies that have occurred in each of the three divisions of the Railway Board Office, and how many of these were filled up by Sikhs, Muhammadans and Hindus, respectively, since January, 1928;
- (ii) if any more Sikhs have been added to their number than already existed in January, 1928; if not, why not;
- (iii) if there is a reduction in that number, what were the causes that led to it; and
- (iv) in case there is an addition, the number and names of such persons?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I am sending the Honourable Member a statement giving the information required.

APPOINTMENT OF SIKHS IN CERTAIN OFFICES OF THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

459. *Sardar Gulab Singh: (a) Will Government be pleased to state:

- (i) if it is a fact that there is not a single Sikh in the Upper Division of the following offices:—(a) Home Department, (b) Imperial Agriculture Research Office, (c) Assembly Department, and (d) the Legislative Department;
- (ii) the number of total vacancies that occurred in each of the aforesaid offices, and the respective communities to which the men entertained belonged?

(b) Will Government please state if they are prepared to take steps for safeguarding and insuring the interest of the important minority of the Sikhs in case of such appointments in future?

(c) Will Government please state if they are prepared to recruit Sikhs from outside, subject to their passing the qualifying examinations, in cases when no qualified Sikhs are available through the Public Service Commission?

(d) Do Government propose to take steps to encourage the important minority of the Sikhs by appointing a sufficient number of its members in the aforesaid offices whenever vacancies occur in future?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: (a) (i). Yes.

(ii) I shall be glad to send the information to the Honourable Member if he will indicate the period for which he wants it.

(b) and (d). I would refer the Honourable Member to the reply given in this House to question No. 563 on the 17th September, 1929.

(c) Government do not consider this necessary. The application of the new system of recruitment sanctioned in 1928 will doubtless increase the opportunities of Sikh candidates from outside.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION AT THE CIVIL AERODROME.

460. *Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a letter published in the Hindustan Times, dated the 20th February, 1930, (page 6) from Mr. Laxmi Narain Gadodia, regarding the alleged racial discrimination and insulting treatment meted out to him on the 16th February, at the civil aerodrome where the joy rides were taking place?

(b) What are the facts of the case, and how far was the Aero Club of India and Burma responsible for the arrangements made on the occasion?

(c) Is it a fact that the flights given to the wife and child of Mr. Gadodia lasted not more than five minutes each, while the European ladies and gentlemen were given rides that lasted up to ten minutes?

(d) What is the total amount of financial or other assistance which the Aero Club has received up to date from Government, and what steps do Government propose to take to put down sternly any tendency to racial discrimination, or improper behaviour in connection with this institution?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) Yes.

(b) and (c). The attention of the Honourable Member is drawn to the letter of the Honorary Secretary, which appeared in the Hindustan Times of February 22nd. The Aero Club of India and Burma is not responsible for the flying arrangements on these occasions.

(d) The amount paid to the Aero Club of India and Burma up to date is Rs. 52,500. Government have no information that the Aero Club displayed any tendency to racial discrimination, nor can they agree that this incident would justify any such charge.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: With regard to answer to (b) and (c), has the attention of the Government been drawn to the rejoinder published by Mr. Gadodia in the Hindustan Times, dated the 24th February, 1930, in which he calls the explanation of the Secretary "hardly convincing?" (Hear, hear.)

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: Sir, that is a question of opinion. I have a recollection that the Hindustan Times itself thought that the explanation of the Secretary was satisfactory.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: You are relying upon the opinion of the Hindustan Times in support of your answer?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: I am not relying on anybody's opinion. I submitted, to start with, that this was a matter of opinion.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Does the Honourable Member take his inspiration from the columns of the Hindustan Times?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: I do not think that implication arises out of any of my answers.

PROHIBITION OF THE BURNING OF DECEASED HINDUS IN THE BELGIAN CONGO.

461. Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: With reference to my short notice question of the 18th September, 1929, regarding the order of the Belgian authorities prohibiting the burning of deceased Hindus in Belge Congo, will Government be pleased to state the result of the representation made to His Majesty's Government, and the steps taken to communicate the result to the public, as promised by Sir Denys Bray in his reply?

Mr. E. B. Howell: The matter is still under correspondence with His Majesty's Government.

Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh: When is the decision likely to be arrived at, because it is a grave matter affecting the religious rites and ceremonies of the Hindus in that particular territory?

Mr. E. B. Howell: Government are doing all that they can.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Is it a fact that the Government of India communicated their representation to His Majesty's Government by cable?

Mr. E. B. Howell: I cannot remember, but I think they did.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Is it a fact that the Government drew the attention of His Majesty's Government to the great urgency of this question?

Mr. E. B. Howell: I must have notice of the details of the correspondence.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Has any further communication been sent to His Majesty's Government since the one sent in September last?

Mr. E. B. Howell: Yes, Sir.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: When was the last communication sent?

Mr. E. B. Howell: Within the last three weeks, Sir.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: Did Government receive any reply between September and January?

Mr. E. B. Howell: I have already informed the Honourable Member that I would like to have notice of these details about the correspondence.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: It is not a question of detail. I merely want to know whether the Government have received any reply at all to the communication sent to His Majesty's Government by the Government of India in September last?

Mr. E. B. Howell: Yes, Sir, they have. That is why they telegraphed again.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: What is the substance of the reply?

Mr. E. B. Howell: I will ask for notice of that.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: The Honourable Member is referred to my answer to his question No. 152, dated the 21st January.

Mitra: (a) With reference to my starred question No. 291 of the 10th September, 1929, which has been replied through letter dated the 10th December, 1929, to the effect that there is no racial discrimination, will Government please state why Messrs. N. L. Sett and A. Beg were not confirmed along with Messrs. T. E. De Roze, D. Whaley, E. G. Duke, and E. Sylvester on Rs. 160?

(b) Is it a fact that all the Anglo-Indians (excepting Mr. T. E. De Roze, who was also taken to the III Grade after only three months of his appointment) superseded the claims of the following experienced Indian mechanics, and if so, why?

(b) Is it a fact that all Europeans and Anglo-Indians obtain higher marks in examinations than Indians?

(c) Will Government please state whether all Europeans and Anglo-Indians are considered, as a matter of fact, better qualified than Indians?

(c) The answer is in the negative.

465. Mr. S. C. Mitra: With reference to the answer to part (c) of my starred question No. 291 of the 10th September, 1929, regarding mechanics in the Lillooah workshops, will Government please state if they have given effect to their intention to abolish the probationary period in the case of qualified apprentices selected for appointments?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: The East Indian Railway will give effect to this intention in all future cases.

Mitra: (a) With reference to the answer to part (a) of my starred question No. 292 of the 10th September, 1929, regarding mechanics in the Lillooah workshops, will Government please state clearly what considerations were made, of men who were already in service, to fill up the vacant posts filled up by the outsiders, Messrs. Alderson, Watson, Lowe, Moslem, Tucker, and Everson?

(b) Do Government propose to pass strict orders that at least in future outsiders will not be provided for without making a fair attempt to fill up the vacancies from the Department?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) The consideration of obtaining persons fully qualified to fill the vacant posts.

(b) No; but Government will take up any instances where it comes to the notice that outsiders are engaged to fill vacant posts in the workshops in preference to mechanics in service who are fully qualified to fill them.

467. Mr. S. C. Mitra: Will Government please supply the names of the apprentices, Indians, Europeans and Anglo-Indians, who completed their course in 1929, and also the names, technical and general education, and starting salaries of those who were provided for out of them?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: With your permission, Sir, I propose to answer questions Nos. 467, 469, 471 and 472 together. Information has been called for and a reply will be sent to the Honourable Member on its receipt.

APPOINTMENT OF APPRENTICES OF THE LILLOOAH WORKSHOPS.

468. Mr. S. C. Mitra: With reference to the answer to part (b) of my starred question No. 293 of the 10th September, 1929, regarding apprentices in the Lillooah workshops, will Government please state why the surplus

PAY OF EUROPEAN AND ANGLO-INDIAN MECHANICS IN THE LILLOOAH WORKSHOPS.

†471. Mr. S. C. Mitra: (a) Is it a fact that according to the East Indian Railway Agent's Circular Meeting No. 5, Resolution No. 54 of the 11th May, 1927, the scale of pay of the technically trained grade should start at Rs. 110—150? COMPLAINTS AGAINST MR. RAM NARAIN, SUPERINTENDENT, NEW DELHI MUNICIPALITY.

473. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: (a) Is it a fact that complaints have been received against Ram Narain, Superintendent, New Delhi Municipal Committee, of maltreatment and accepting bribes from shopkeepers and others? If so, what disciplinary steps are being taken against him to avoid recurrences of the nature?

(b) Is it a fact that a general complaint was made against him by the shopkeepers community in 1927 and that a resolution was passed by the Committee against him? What steps, if any, have been taken to stop him from repeating the same offence?

(c) Have any steps been taken to get to the bottom of the circumstances regarding the following:

(i) complaints of shopkeepers made to the President, regarding Lala Ram Narain's asking for bribes from them;

(ii) complaints made by Shyam Chand and Dya Chand, shopkeepers, Raja Ka Bazar, made to the Members of the Committee and the Secretary, verbally in regard to his accepting the bribes by cheating them; and

(iii) complaints made by Rai Bahadur Paras Dass against that very person of accepting the bribe of Jamna Dass Murarilal, shopkeepers, Raja Ka Bazar? Were entries in their accounts books signed by the Magistrate, New Delhi, as an Exhibit (P. A.)?

(d) Were there dismissals of two of the employees of the New Delhi Municipal Committee, Messrs. Hari Ram and Mirza Ali Beg, without calling for their explanation and without making any sifting inquiry into the facts?

(e) Were their appeals considered by the Deputy Commissioner, Delhi?

Sir Frank Noyce: (a) and (b). Yes. In June 1927 a charge of maltreatment and bribery was brought by certain shopkeepers. This was inquired into and the Committee found that, while Mr. Ram Narain might have been over-zealous in the discharge of his duties, the charge of receiving things gratis was not established. However, Mr. Ram Narain was severely reprimanded and warned. When the post of Tax Superintendent was created on 1st May, 1928, Mr. Ram Narain was transferred to it and thereby ceased to be connected with the supervision of the shops. In July 1928, another bribery charge was brought against him by two shopkeepers of Raja-ka-Bazar. This was inquired into by the Secretary, New Delhi Municipal Committee, who recorded the statements of the shopkeepers and other witnesses. The case was filed for want of proof.

†For answer to this question, see answer to question No. 467.

A further bribery charge has now been brought and was to have been inquired into by a Sub-Committee on the 27th February.

(c) (i) and (ii). These were to have been inquired into by the Sub-Committee on the 27th February, 1930.

(iii) The Honourable Member is referred to the reply to parts (a) and (b). The entries in the account books were initialled and marked as Ex. P. A. by the Secretary of the New Delhi Municipal Committee in his capacity as such and not as Magistrate, New Delhi.

(d) Messrs. Hari Ram and Mirza Ali Beg were dismissed after searching inquiries had been made and their statements had been heard by the Secretary, who is empowered under the business bye-laws of the Committee to appoint and dismiss officials drawing less than Rs. 50 per mensem. Mr. Hari Ram's dismissal was upheld by the President.

(e) Both have appealed to the Deputy Commissioner and both have been placed under suspension pending further inquiries.

Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: Will the Honourable Member please state whether Ram Narain is in service or is under suspension during the inquiry?

Sir Frank Noyce: I have given the Honourable Member all the information I have at present.

Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: Are Government aware that the other two persons, Hari Ram and Mirza Ali Beg, are under orders of suspension pending the inquiry against them? Will Government please inquire whether the same treatment will be meted out to Ram Narain?

Sir Frank Noyce: I will make inquiries as to his position, but I imagine that from the statement I have already made that he is still in service.

Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: Are Government aware that the Committee appointed to inquire into the complaint made against Ram Narain consists of members who formed the Committee on previous occasions, and who exonerated him from blame? Will Government, in view of that, appoint an independent and impartial committee?

Sir Frank Noyce: I have informed the Honourable Member that I have given him all the information that I have.

CHANGE FOR REVISION OF PAY OF THE OFFICE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE TRUSTEES OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM, CALCUTTA.

474. Mr. S. C. Mitra: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether the Legislative Assembly in September, 1921, voted a supplementary grant of Rs. 5,000 to meet the additional cost on account of the revision of pay of the office establishment of the Trustees of the Indian Museum, Calcutta?

(b) Was it decided at that time that the charge on account of the cost of the establishment of the Trustees of the Indian Museum falls on the Government of India and not on the Trustees of the Indian Museum?

(c) Did Government, after careful consideration, sanction, in 1922, a revised scale of pay for the office establishment of the Trustees of the Indian Museum?

(d) Was the whole amount of Rs. 5,000 referred to in part (a) placed at the disposal of the Trustees or was only the actual amount involved in the adoption of the sanctioned revised scale given to the Trustees through the Pay and Accounts Officer, Miscellaneous Central Departments, Calcutta?

(e) Was the balance of Rs. 5,000 thus left, treated as lapsed to Government or vested in the Trustees of the Indian Museum?

(f) Are the Trustees of the Indian Museum an autonomous body or have their powers and functions been specified and limited by the Act X of 1910?

(g) Do the Trustees of the Indian Museum receive a lump sum grant or an annual grant under three distinct heads, viz., (i) pay of the establishment, (ii) contingencies and (iii) rent, rates and taxes, from the general revenues?

(h) Do the Trustees contribute anything towards the upkeep of the Indian Museum?

(i) Is the monthly pay of the office establishment of the Trustees of the Indian Museum audited and paid by the Pay and Accounts Officer, Miscellaneous Central Departments, Calcutta, from the specific grant made by the Government of India for the purpose?

(j) Was the memorial of the late Head Clerk of the Trustees' Office, Indian Museum, rejected on the ground that he is not a Government servant?

(k) If the answer to part (j) is in the affirmative, who is a Government servant and what is Government service?

(l) Under what clause of the Government of India Act or any other statute does the charge on account of the cost of the establishment of a private employer fall on the Government of India, and how can the general revenues be utilized for the purposes of a private body?

Sir Frank Noyce: (a) Yes.

(b) No. The decision was taken in 1916.

(c) Yes.

(d) and (e). Only the amount required to meet the extra cost of the revision of pay was given to the Trustees. The balance was treated as having lapsed to Government.

(f) The powers and functions of the Trustees are those set out in the relevant sections of the Indian Museums Act X, 1910.

(g) Government make a lump annual grant-in-aid to cover charges under the heads mentioned by the Honourable Member.

(h) and (i). The information asked for is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member when received.

(j) Yes.

(k) Government servant means any person in the civil service of the Crown in India; whether for the time being in foreign service or not, and Government service means civil service of the Crown.

(l) The Honourable Member would observe from entries No. 46 in Part I, and No. 42 in Part II of Schedule I to the Devolution Rules, that the Central Museum at Calcutta is a Central subject and therefore eligible to receive aid from Central revenues.

FRAUD PERPETRATED ON WORKMEN OF THE EAST INDIAN RAILWAY WORKSHOPS AT LUCKNOW.

475. Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: (a) Are Government aware that on December 17th, 1929, certain employees at the Workshop No. 8, at Lucknow, East Indian Railway (Carriage and Wagon Shops), found that their thumb impressions were taken on an application which contained statements quite contrary to their wishes, and that when the illiterate workmen came to know of the fraud, which was being perpetrated upon them, they remonstrated and went on strike for a short time?

(b) If the facts stated in part (a) are correct, will Government be pleased to state what steps, if any, were taken by them against persons who were responsible for perpetrating fraud upon the illiterate workmen? If not, why not?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) and (b). I have called for information from the Agent, East Indian Railway, and will send a reply to the Honourable Member when I receive his report. To relieve the Honourable Member's anxiety, I may say that, in this instance, I shall be prepared to place a copy of the reply, when received, on the table of the House.

LISTS OF STAFFS IN THE DEPARTMENTS OF THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

476. Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: (a) Will Government be pleased to state whether each Department of the Government of India maintains an establishment list like the one maintained by the office of the Auditor General, giving a complete list of officers, superintendents, assistants and clerks and menials? If so, is that open to the public, more specially to those who compile directories? Is that open to inspection by the Members of the Central Legislature?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: Each Department of the Government of India maintains a gradation or establishment list, though not necessarily in the exact form referred to by the Honourable Member.

The reply to the last two parts of the question is in the negative.

Mr. Anwar-ul-Azim: Will the Honourable the Leader of the House kindly tell us whether it is not a fact that the compilers of Liddell's Directory and another gentleman here in New Delhi have got in their directories lists of the establishments practically fully tallying with the establishment lists of the Government of India, and they are already in the Library of the House?

The Honourable Sir James Crerar: No, Sir, I have no information to that effect, but I am prepared to accept the Honourable Member's assurance.

RENT FOR ELECTRIC FANS IN NEW DELHI.

477. *Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Is it a fact that the Government of India have decided to treat electric fans fitted in Government quarters in New Delhi as part of the building since April 1924? If so, will Government be pleased to state whether, in contravention of their decision, any rent for electric fans was charged separately during the year 1929-30?

(b) If the reply to part (a) is in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state the reasons therefor, and also state whether they intend to give any refund for the same? Do Government propose to discontinue charging rents for electric fans from April 1930? If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: The reply to the first portion of the question is in the negative, so far as the period from the 1st April, 1924, to 31st March, 1929, is concerned. As regards the period from the 1st April, 1929, the matter is under consideration of Government and the rest of the question therefore does not arise.

ENTRANCE TO THE EAST INDIAN RAILWAY OFFICES IN CLIVE STREET.

478. *Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Is it a fact that the use of the Clive Street gateway of the East Indian Railway offices at Fairlie Place, Calcutta, is restricted between 9 A.M. to 10-15 A.M. and 4-30 P.M. to 5-30 P.M.? If so, why?

(b) Is it a fact that gentlemen in Indian dress who want to reserve berths or ascertain rates are not allowed the use of the gateway? If so, why?

(c) Is it a fact that the Clive Street gate is the nearest entrance from Dalhousie Square, which is the terminus of tramcars and buses? Is it also a fact that the employees have to undergo a long walk through a circuitous route, owing to the closing of the Clive Street gate? Do the Government propose to open the Clive Street gate to the employees? If not, why not?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state whether two electric lifts have been provided in the East Indian Railway office building at Fairlie Place, Calcutta? If so, will Government be pleased to state whether Indian employees are allowed to use them? If not, why not?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I am ascertaining from the Agent of the East Indian Railway what the present procedure is regarding the matters in question and will furnish the Honourable Member with information on these points.

GROWTH OF MILITARY EXPENDITURE.

479. *Sir Hari Singh Gour: (a) Are the figures given at page 336 of the Central Committee's Report showing the growth of Military expenditure since 1910 correct?

(b) If not, what are the correct figures for the years mentioned therein?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: (a) and (b). The figures are correct, except for a few mistakes which are apparently printer's errors. I lay on the table a statement showing the correct figures for the years in which printer's errors have been noticed.

The remark against the amount for 1920-21 is not correct as the figures do not include loss by exchange.

Statement showing the correct figures of Military expenditure for certain years.

CAPITATION CHARGES FROM THE ARMY.

480. *Sir Hari Singh Gour: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the amount of capitation charges since 1910 up to date?

(b) Were the rates of such charges recently revised? If so, with what result?

(c) Have the Government of India been a consenting party to their payment?

(d) If so, will they be pleased to state on what ground is India liable for the training of a part of the British Army stationed in India?

(e) If not, what steps have Government so far taken to relieve the revenues of India from that annual contribution?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: (a) I lay a statement on the table showing the payments made in each year from 1914-15 onwards. The information in respect of the four preceding years will be supplied to the Honourable Member later.

(b) The latest revision of rates took place between 1920 and 1922 in order to allow for increases in pay and prices since 1908 when the former rate was fixed. The result is shown in the statement which I am laying on the table.

(c), (d) and (e). As the Honourable Member is probably aware, the whole question of the capitation payments has been raised by the Government of India and is now under discussion with His Majesty's Government. I am afraid that I cannot at the moment say more than that, although I hope that it will be possible for the Government of India to make a statement on the subject in the near future.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: May I know when the question was raised for the first time by the Government of India?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I am afraid I cannot give the Honourable Member the exact date. It has been a subject of correspondence for a number of years, having been started before my own connection with my present office. I can inform the Honourable Member that it has been under active discussion during the whole of the past twelve months.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: Is it not the fact that this question has been alive since the last eighteen or twenty years, and in the meantime, while no change in the amount has been made, payment has been made from year to year? May I know whether, if the settlement is finally reached in favour of the Government of India, all the past payments will be refunded to the Government of India?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I think, Sir, that the last part of the question is distinctly hypothetical. It is very difficult to make any further statement on the subject now, other than that which I have already made.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: What machinery do the Government of India now propose to employ for the purpose of settling this question?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I cannot answer that question, Sir, without anticipating the information which I hope to be able to give this House at an early date.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: May I know whether, in a matter like this, there is any independent machinery for the purpose of settling the dispute between the Government of India and the Home Government?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I can, I think, go as far as this in informing the House of the present position of affairs, that one of the most important questions which has been the subject of our recent discussion with His Majesty's Government, has been the form of machinery which shall be employed in settling this very important question.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: Will the Government of India take this House into confidence and consult us as to the suitability and adequacy of the machinery employed for the purpose?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: It has been our intention, Sir—and that has appeared in our correspondence—to take this House into our confidence before any definite step is taken.

Pandit Hirday Nath Kunzru: May I ask whether the question of the capitation rate was discussed with His Majesty's Government in connection with the present Budget?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: No, Sir; it was not discussed in connection with the current Budget; it raises much wider issues of a permanent nature.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Do the Government see the enormity of the question that India is made to pay for the training of the British Army?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: There are a number of important issues raised in connection with this question, as my Honourable friend is well aware; he can rest assured that everything that can be said on behalf of Indian interests in this matter has been said very vigorously by the Government of India.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Do the Government of India propose to take the leaders on the non-official side into consultation while settling this question or tendering their advice to His Majesty's Government?

Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya: And leave the other Members out? (Laughter.)

(No answer was given.)

EQUIPMENT OF THE INDIAN ARMY.

481. Sir Hari Singh Gour: (a) What has been the cost of re-equipment of the Indian Army?

(b) How often has it been re-equipped since 1920? How long does its equipment last, and what are the determining factors in sanctioning its re-equipment?

(c) Is the Army in India equipped and re-equipped as a part of the Imperial forces ready to take the field anywhere, even in Europe, at a moment's notice?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) and (b). The Honourable Member will find all the information available in the statement that I made on the 5th of September, 1928, and in the memorandum that I then laid on the table. It is obvious that re-equipment of one kind or another is always going on and that the life of the innumerable articles of Army equipment varies enormously. The special programme of re-equipment, which is going on now, has been estimated to cost something like 10 crores spread over a period of five years.

(c) No, Sir. The Army in India is maintained for the defence of India, and is equipped accordingly.

MECHANISATION OF THE INDIAN ARMY.

482. *Sir Hari Singh Gour: (a) What is the cost of mechanisation of the Indian Army?

(b) Is it confined to the British troops in India?

(c) Does the mechanisation follow the Cardwell system? When did it begin? How long will it continue and what will be its ultimate cost (both capital and recurring)?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) About Rs. 1 crore were spent on the mechanisation programme last year and the Budget for 1930-31 contains a provision of about Rs. 60 lakhs for the same purpose.

(b) No, Sir.

(c) The reasons for, and the history of the growth of, the policy of mechanisation were fully explained in the statement that I have referred to in the answer to the previous question. Mechanisation is merely modernisation. It began when the motor vehicle began to replace the horse. It has nothing to do with the Cardwell system. How long it will continue, to what extent it will be developed and what it will cost, are all questions that the future alone can answer.

MILITARY EXPENDITURE IN INDIA.

483. *Sir Hari Singh Gour: (a) What is the total annual amount of military expenditure in India taking into account the expenditure—both direct and indirect—the latter including:

(i) loss on the strategic railways and cost and maintenance of strategic roads, and the cost of the Royal Indian Marine; and

(ii) the expenditure classified as political including payments made to Khasedars, and on account of the Military Police Frontier Constabulary; maintenance of hospitals, sanatoria and schools mainly for the health and convenience of British troops and their families; workshops and factories maintained for military purposes?

(b) Do Government propose to show in the Budget all such expenditure under the head "Military"?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: (a) and (b). I would refer the Honourable Member to the Finance and Revenue Accounts of the Government of India. I may, however, say that I think it would be misleading to treat the whole of the items to which the Honourable Member refers, as military expenditure. But, if the Honourable Member will speak to me on the subject, I will endeavour to have an informative statement extracted from the Finance and Revenue Accounts.

MILITARY EXPENDITURE IN INDIA.

484. *Sir Hari Singh Gour: (a) Are Government aware that it was decided in the Financial Conference at Brussels, in which India was represented, that a country which spent more than 20 per cent. of its revenue upon its defence was courting a serious disaster?

(b) What action have Government taken to bring its military expenditure into line with the decision of the Brussels conference?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I would invite the Honourable Member's attention to the reply given by my predecessor to a similar question by the Honourable Member himself on the 25th January, 1926. In this reply it was pointed out that the text of the Brussels Resolution was not in exact accord with the Honourable Member's version. I may add that for the year 1928-29, the latest year for which accounts are available, the total national expenditure of India, including that of the Provincial Governments, but excluding the working expenses of the Railways and of the Posts and Telegraphs and Irrigation Departments was about Rs. 218·81 crores. The net military expenditure was 55·10 crores which amounts to 25 per cent. against 27 per cent. in 1924-25. On the next year's budget proposals I estimate that the percentage will again be considerably reduced. I would invite the Honourable Member's attention to paragraphs 33 and 34 of my speech introducing the next Budget, where I have referred to the definite sign that Army expenditure is really to be reduced.

MILITARY EXPENDITURE IN INDIA.

485. *Sir Hari Singh Gour: (a) Is it a fact, as reported in the papers, that the proposals of Government for retrenchment of the military expenditure have been overruled by Whitehall?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of the correspondence on the subject?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) No, Sir.

(b) Does not arise.

MILITARY EXPENDITURE IN INDIA.

486. *Sir Hari Singh Gour: Will Government be pleased to state the amount of the military expenditure restored wholly or partially, or added to, after its retrenchment in consequence of the recommendations of the Inchcape Committee?

Mr. G. M. Young: As far as I am aware, none of the measures of economy carried out as a result of the recommendations of the Inchcape Committee have since been reversed or neutralized.

EXPENDITURE ON THE CIVIL ADMINISTRATION.

487. *Sir Hari Singh Gour: (a) Are Government aware that its expenditure on the civil administration in relation to its revenue is far in excess of that incurred in any other part of the British Commonwealth?

(b) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing the percentage of revenue allotted to civil and military expenditure of the Central Government during the last ten years, and a similar statement relating to Canada, Australia and South Africa?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: (a) Government are not aware of this fact.

(b) Information is being collected and will be furnished to the Honourable Member in due course.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: In view of the importance of the question, will the Honourable Member, after the information is collected, please lay it on the table?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: Certainly.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST LALA RATAN LAL, FORMERLY HEADMASTER OF THE GOVERNMENT HIGH SCHOOL, DELHI.

488. Maulvi Muhammad Yakub: (a) For how many years was Lala Ratan Lal, Headmaster of the Government High School and Assistant Superintendent of Education in Delhi?

(b) Were any complaints made against him as being an anti-Muslim?

(c) How many Muslim schools were there in Delhi, as long as Lala Ratan Lal was there, and how many Muslim schools were opened and how many existing schools were raised to a higher status since his departure?

(d) Is it a fact that Lala Ratan Lal is again to be transferred to Delhi as an Assistant Superintendent of Education and is shortly to be promoted to the post of Superintendent of Education in Delhi?

(e) Do Government propose to make an inquiry into the past activities of the said Lala Ratan Lal and reconsider the proposal of his being transferred to Delhi?

Sir Frank Noyce: The information required by the Honourable Member is being collected and will be supplied to him later.

APPOINTMENT OF MUSLIMS TO CERTAIN DEPARTMENTS IN AJMER-MERWARA.

489. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: (a) What is the total number of gazetted officers in the Revenue, Excise, Income-tax, Forest, Police, Public Works, Co-operative Societies, and Medical Departments in Ajmer-Merwara?

(b) Are Government aware that there is no Muslim gazetted officer in the said departments in Ajmer-Merwara, though the Muslims form about 20 per cent. of the total population of the province?

(c) Is it a fact that during the last four years a number of gazetted posts in the said Departments in Ajmer-Merwara have been filled in by the appointment of non-Muslims from outside Ajmer-Merwara and by the promotion of non-Muslim non-gazetted officers in Ajmer-Merwara?

(d) How many officers, not previously in the service of the Ajmer-Merwara Administration as gazetted officers, have been appointed to gazetted appointments in the said Departments in Ajmer-Merwara during the last four years?

(e) Do Government propose to fix an adequate proportion of the gazetted appointments in the said Departments of Ajmer-Merwara for the Muslims? If not, why not?

Mr. E. B. Howell: The information required is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member in due course.

APPOINTMENT OF ASSISTANT SUPERINTENDENT OF EDUCATION, AJMER-MERWARA.

490. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: (a) Is it a fact that the present Assistant Superintendent of Education, Ajmer-Merwara, is a third division M.A., B.Sc., of an Indian University without any qualifications in educational training?

(b) Is it a fact that the present Assistant Superintendent of Education, Ajmer-Merwara, was appointed to the post of the Assistant Superintendent of Education in supersession of the Headmaster of a Government high school at Ajmer?

(c) Is it a fact that the Headmaster referred to in part (b) possessed a first class training and qualifications and was senior to the present Assistant Superintendent of Education before his appointment to the said post in grade, actual pay, and length of service?

(d) Is it a fact that the work of the Assistant Superintendent of Education, Ajmer-Merwara, is to supervise and administer primary education and a part of secondary education?

(e) Is it a fact that the gentleman, who gave evidence on behalf of the Nasirabad Cantonment Board, before the Primary Education Committee of the Government of India, pointed out to the said Committee the inadequacy of the qualifications of the present Assistant Superintendent of Education for the proper supervision and administration of primary education?

(f) Do Government propose to appoint, immediately, an experienced officer well-qualified in educational training to the post of the Assistant Superintendent of Education, Ajmer-Merwara? If not, why not?

Sir Frank Noyce: With your permission, Sir, I shall deal with questions Nos. 490 and 497—500 together. The information asked for in these questions is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member later.

Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: Will the Honourable Member please state the reasons why he is not able to collect the information in time so as to enable the House to be in possession of these answers?

Sir Frank Noyce: I think, Sir, it will be seen from the questions put by the Honourable Member that enquiries have to be made into a number of details and these necessarily take time. I did my best to collect the information for the Honourable Member in time to permit of the questions being answered today, but unfortunately was unable to do so.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

[5TH MAR. 1930.]

TERMS OF ACQUISITION BY GOVERNMENT OF CERTAIN RAILWAYS.

491. *Mr. B. Das: (a) In reference to paragraph 208, page 64, of the Acworth Committee's Report, will Government be pleased to state the share capital invested by each of the Companies, (i) Assam Bengal Railway, (ii) Bengal Nagpur Railway, (iii) Bengal and North Western Railway, (iv) Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway, (v) Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway, and (vi) South Indian Railway and the capital invested by the Government of India in each case?

(b) Will Government be pleased to indicate in each case the amount of money to be repaid in case acquisition takes place?

(c) Will Government be pleased to state the present market quotation in case of the Assam Bengal Railway? Has it gone up above 45 as quoted in paragraph 208 of Acworth report?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) I placed on the table a statement showing (1) the total capital at charge of the railways mentioned on 31st March, 1929, (2) the share capital of the companies managing them. For further particulars, if desired, I would refer the Honourable Member to accounts Nos. 25, 25A and 25B of the Finance and Revenue Accounts of the Government of India, copies of which will be found in the Library.

(b) With the exception of the Bengal and North Western Railway, all the lines referred to are already owned by Government and the cash payment involved when and if their management is taken over by Government on the termination of the contracts with the Companies is represented by the par value of the Companies' share capital in each case; in addition to this existing liabilities and debts of the Company incurred with the sanction of the Secretary of State have also to be taken over by Government. The payment likely to be involved in the purchase of the Bengal and North Western Railway is estimated approximately at a little over £10 million sterling.

(c) The market quotation of the ordinary stock was 91 in December.

Statement showing capital at charge and Share Capital of certain Railways.

PRICE OF PURCHASE OF THE BENGAL AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

492. *Mr. B. Das: (a) In reference to the statement made by the Honourable the Railway Member and the Financial Commissioner of Railways on the floor of the House, that the price of purchase of the Bengal and North Western Railway was fixed at 12 millions sterling subject to revision, will Government be pleased to state how much of it is capital invested and how much of it is goodwill?

(b) Did the Acworth Committee make any recommendations regarding prices to be paid to Bengal and North Western Railway at the time of its purchase?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) The method by which the purchase price of the Bengal and North Western and the Rohilkhand and Kumaon Railways is to be determined is indicated on pages 13-14 and 180-181 of the History of Indian Railways corrected up to 31st March, 1928, a copy of which is in the Library. It will be seen that the terms of purchase do not specifically make any provision for goodwill.

(b) No.

PURCHASE PRICE OF THE ASSAM BENGAL RAILWAY.

493. *Mr. B. Das: Will Government be pleased to state if they have borne in mind the following observations of the Acworth Committee, paragraph 208, page 64, in their fixing of the purchase price of the Assam Bengal Railway:

"We should hesitate to advise that the Secretary of State should pay off at par in 1931 shares now standing at 45. But the company is not important and there is ample time for consideration of this exceptional case between now and 1931."

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: Government are aware of these observations of the Acworth Committee. I may point out, however, that the Assam Bengal Railway is already the property of Government, and there is, strictly speaking, no question of fixing its purchase price. The terms of the existing contract provide for the repayment of the share capital and of existing liabilities, including debentures sanctioned by the Secretary of State, on its determination.

DONATIONS FROM THE MILITARY BUDGET FOR NON-OFFICIAL CHARITIES.

494. *Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Will Government please state if it is a fact that donations for non-military non-official charities are made yearly out of the military Budget?

(b) If so, will Government please state what sums have been yearly paid during the last five years for such charities?

(c) Is it a fact that a donation was paid to what is known as the Ex-Services Association during the last year for repatriation in the shape of six passages?

(d) If so, will Government please state:

- (i) to whom these passages were given,
- (ii) to which places,
- (iii) for what purpose,

(iv) the total cost of these six passages, and

(v) whether these persons were at the time in service of the Government?

(e) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of the rules, if any, in force in the matter?

Mr. G. M. Young: (a) and (c). No, Sir.

(b), (d) and (e). Do not arise.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Has the Honourable Member seen the report that six passages were given by the Military Department to ex-Service men?

Mr. G. M. Young: I have seen no more than what is contained in my Honourable friend's question.

ACCIDENT AT A LEVEL CROSSING ON THE BOMBAY, BARODA AND CENTRAL INDIA RAILWAY.

495. Dr. B. S. Moonje: (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the report of an accident on the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway in the papers of the 17th February, 1930 in which it is reported that "one cart was run over by 42 up yesterday (i.e., on the 13th February, 1930) at the level crossing No. 106 at mile 120-11 between Sindkheda and Dondaichi at 6 A.M." and that "the cart was entirely broken, one man killed and one injured who has been sent to the Nandurbar Hospital for treatment"?

(b) If so, will Government please state how many similar accidents at the level crossing on the different railway lines have occurred every year during the last five years?

(c) Do Government propose to build underground roads at such level crossings to prevent such accidents?

(d) Do Government propose to compensate the dependants of the men killed and wounded, and if so, how?

(e) How many times were compensations paid on account of such accidents during the last five years and what were the amounts paid on each occasion?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) Yes.

(b) Prior to the 1st April, 1927, separate figures were not maintained of the number of accidents at railway level crossings. During the financial year 1927-28 there were 136 cases of trains running over obstructions or vehicles at level crossings. In 1928-29 there were 120 such cases.

(c) The policy of Government is that underground or overhead roads should be provided at railway crossings where road traffic is sufficiently heavy to require it.

(d) The Government Inspector's report of his inquiry into this accident has not yet been received and I am unable to say whether compensation will be payable or not.

(e) I am obtaining this information and will communicate later with the Honourable Member.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES IN CIRCLE OFFICES OF THE ARCHÆOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT.

496. Mr. S. C. Mitra: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if full time-scales of pay have been introduced in the case of the ministerial staff of the Circle offices of the Archæological Department? If not, why not?

(b) Are the scales of pay in all the Circle offices standard? If not, are they based on local requirements? Are they similar to the scales of pay of the Local Government offices?

(c) Are the scales of pay of the gazetted and non-gazetted staff of almost all the Departments of Local Governments or the Central Government fixed on a full time-scale basis?

(d) If the reply to part (c) is in the affirmative, why have the ministerial staff of the Circle offices of the Archæological Department been deprived of that benefit?

(e) Do Government propose to settle the lot of the employees in the Circle offices of the Archæological Department in the near future?

Sir Frank Noyce: (a) The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. The second part does not, therefore, arise.

(b) The scales of pay in the different Circles are not uniform. They have been fixed according to local conditions of supply and demand; and with due regard to the nature of the work. The scales of pay fixed by Local Governments are followed only in so far as the nature of the work to be performed justifies this.

(c) The information is not readily available.

(d) In view of the answer given by me to the first half of part (a) of this question, the question in part (d) does not arise.

(e) I am afraid I do not altogether follow my Honourable friend's question. If he has any special grievance of the Archæological staff in any Circle in mind, I shall be glad if he will bring it to the notice of Government who will certainly look into the matter.

Sir Hugh Cocke: May I, with your permission, ask question No. 443? I was detained at a Select Committee meeting this morning, and I received the questions only this morning so that I could not make any arrangements for anybody else to ask the question.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member should have informed the Chair.

Sir Hugh Cocke: I was in Select Committee from 10 O'clock till ten minutes past eleven.

Mr. President: He should have sent across a chit.

RULES FOR LICENSING AND TAXATION OF MOTOR VEHICLES.

443. Sir Hugh Cocke: (a) Are Government aware of the troublesome variations in the rules and regulations affecting the licensing and taxation of motor vehicles at present in force in the different provinces?

(b) Do Government propose to place this matter before the Standing Committee for Roads as early as possible with a view to the standardisation of these rules?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) The Government of India are aware that there are considerable variations in the rules.

(b) The matter does not come within the functions of the Standing Committee for Roads. In paragraph 89 of their Report the Indian Road Development Committee recommended that these subjects might conveniently be discussed at the periodical Road Conferences. This suggestion will be considered by the Government of India.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE ANGLO-ARABIC COLLEGE, DELHI.

†497 Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: Will Government be pleased to state whether it is a fact that:

- (a) the Government Anglo-Arabic College, Delhi is an aided institution and is in receipt of a grant-in-aid under Government rules;
- (b) the Chief Commissioner of Delhi is the Trustee of the College Itmaddowla Fund, keeps a separate account in his office, issues all cheques and disburses salary bills, etc.;
- (c) the Chief Commissioner of Delhi nominates the members of the managing committee (governing body) of the college;
- (d) the Muslims of Delhi have absolutely no hand and say in the matter of selection of members of the College Committee;
- (e) the Deputy Commissioner of Delhi is the ex-officio President of the College Managing Committee, and
- (f) a non-official President from among the members of the Committee or elsewhere has never been appointed in the history of the College?

RULES FOR LEAVE AND PROMOTION OF THE STAFF OF THE ANGLO-ARABIC COLLEGE, DELHI.

†498. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: (a) With reference to the reply to my starred question No. 834 of the 24th September, 1929, will Government be pleased to lay a copy of the rules governing the leave of the staff of the Government Anglo-Arabic College, Delhi, on the table of the House?

- (b) Are these rules printed and supplied to the members of the staff?
- (c) Will Government be pleased to obtain the information, regarding the rules governing promotion of the staff of the Anglo-Arabic College, Delhi?

APPOINTMENT OF THE PRINCIPAL OF THE ANGLO-ARABIC COLLEGE, DELHI.

†499. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: (a) How many applications for the post of the Principal of the Arabic College, Delhi, were received? What are the names and qualifications of those applicants and on what grounds was preference given to Mr. Walker?

(b) Is it a fact that the principals of the St. Stephen's College and the Hindu College, Delhi, get comparatively less pay than Mr. Walker?

†For answer to this question, see answer to question No. 490.

(c) What are the academical qualifications of Mr. Walker? From which University and in which division and year did he pass his M. A. and in which degree college or colleges did he teach before and what subjects?

(d) Is it a fact that the pay of Mr. Walker is Rs. 850 per mensem and that the late principal used to get only Rs. 300 per mensem?

(e) Is it a fact that the Vice-Principal gets Rs. 185 and that there is no professor on more than Rs. 200 per mensem?

(f) Can Government quote any degree college where the difference of pay of the Principal and the Vice-Principal or the other staff is so great?

(g) Is it a fact that on account of the poor state of finances and with a view to meet the high pay of the Principal, highly paid professors have been dispensed with on one plea or another and that promotions to deserving men at present working in the institution are refused and low paid men are entertained?

DELAY IN THE PAYMENT OF SALARIES OF TEACHERS IN THE ANGLO-ARABIC COLLEGE, DELHI.

†500. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi: (a) With reference to the answer to my starred question No. 841 of the 24th September, 1929, will Government be pleased to state whether it is a fact that the professors and teachers of the Anglo-Arabic College get their pay a week and sometimes ten days after the date when it becomes due? What are the reasons for it?

(b) Have Government considered the question of overhauling the whole staff and appointing a lower paid and competent Muslim Principal to this institution? If not, why not?

(c) Have Government considered the question of appointing an elected non-official President when occasion arises from among the elected members of the Managing Committee? If not, why not?

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

OVERWORKED SUB-DIVISIONAL INSPECTORS OF POST OFFICES.

188. Mr. N. C. Kelkar: (a) Is it a fact that the work of the Sub-Divisional Inspectors has abnormally increased in various ways owing to the scheme of giving better postal facilities, etc., to the public in rural areas?

(b) Are Government aware that it has become impossible for the Sub-Divisional Inspectors to manage their Sub-Divisions satisfactorily?

(c) If so will Government kindly state what steps are being taken to improve the state of things?

Mr. H. A. Sams: (a) There has been some increase in the work of Inspectors for the reasons stated by the Honourable Member, but Government do not consider that it has been in any way abnormal.

(b) No, because additional appointments of Inspectors have been sanctioned where necessary to cope with the increase of work.

(c) Additional Sub-Divisional Inspectorships of Post Offices will be created as required.

†For answer to this question, see answer to question No. 490.

APPOINTMENT OF DIVISIONAL SUPERINTENDENTS OF POST OFFICES.

189. Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Will Government be pleased to state how many appointments of Divisional Superintendents of Post Offices were filled up by men promoted from the Sub-Divisional Inspectors and Head Clerks to Superintendents during the last five years?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: Six.

PAY OF CERTAIN SUB-DIVISIONAL INSPECTORS AND HEAD CLERKS TO SUPERINTENDENTS OF POST OFFICES.

190. Mr. N. C. Kelkar: (a) Are Government aware that the Sub-Divisional Inspectors and Head Clerks to Superintendents of Post Offices who held such appointments prior to the 1st December 1919 had to suffer monetary loss by not getting one increment for every year of past service as Inspector or Head Clerk and by not getting any increment for past service prior to 1st September, 1927?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to state the grounds on which their prayer for advance increments under Fundamental Rule 27 was rejected by the Director General, Posts and Telegraphs, in his No. 696-Est./29, dated the 24th October, 1929?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) Government are aware of the facts stated by the Honourable Member, but they do not admit that the officials in question were treated unfairly.

(b) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to item 4 (e) of Part I of the statement of grievances represented by the deputation of the All-India (including Burma) Postal and Railway Mail Service Union and of the conclusions arrived at as laid on the table of this House on the 4th March, 1926, and also the reply given to Mr. N. M. Joshi's unstarred question No. 318 in the Legislative Assembly on the 11th March, 1929.

DUTIES OF SUPERINTENDENTS AND SUB-DIVISIONAL INSPECTORS OF POST OFFICES IN THE BOMBAY CIRCLE.

191. Mr. N. C. Kelkar: (a) Will Government be pleased to state:

- (i) the nature of duties and responsibilities of a Superintendent of Post Offices and that of a Sub-Divisional Inspector in the Bombay Circle;
- (ii) the average number of clerical staff under the control of a Divisional Superintendent and that of Delivery and Menial staff under the control of a Sub-Divisional Inspector;
- (iii) the number of clerks ordinarily sanctioned for a Divisional Superintendent's office and that for a Sub-Divisional Inspector;
- (iv) the average number of offices inspected by a Divisional Superintendent and that by a Sub-Divisional Inspector in Bombay Circle?

(b) If no clerk has been given to a Sub-Divisional Inspector will Government be pleased to state what steps are being taken to relieve him of the heavy clerical work?

Mr. H. A. Sams: (a) (i) Government are unable to give, within the scope of a reply to a question, details of the duties and responsibilities of a Superintendent of Post Offices and of a Sub-Divisional Inspector, respectively, in the Bombay Circle. But generally speaking it may be stated that a Superintendent is responsible for the postal administration of his Division while a Sub-Divisional Inspector assists him in matters of administrative detail in connection with a portion only of the Divisional area.

(ii) Government do not possess the information and do not propose to call for it, as to collect it for the whole of India and Burma would involve an expenditure of time and labour out of all proportion to the importance of the result.

(iii) Four and nil, respectively.

(iv) 35 and 61, respectively. The former figure, however, comprises the more important offices.

(b) Government do not consider that the clerical work of an Inspector is heavy or that there is any justification for the appointment of a clerk to help him with it.

APPOINTMENTS OF SUB-DIVISIONAL INSPECTORS IN THE BOMBAY POSTAL CIRCLE.

192. Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Will Government be pleased to state the total number of appointments of Sub-Divisional Inspectors in the Bombay Postal Circle existing on 31st March, 1922 and 31st March, 1926, and the total number of additional appointments of Sub-Divisional Inspectors in the same Circle sanctioned since then?

Mr. H. A. Sams: The totals are 45 and 38, respectively, but the first figure contains four appointments in Sind, which was subsequently separated from the Bombay Circle. Since the 31st March, 1926, four additional appointments of sub-divisional inspectors have been sanctioned for the Bombay Circle.

APPOINTMENT OF DIVISIONAL SUPERINTENDENTS OF POST OFFICES.

193. Mr. N. C. Kelkar: (a) Is it a fact that Sub-Divisional Inspectors are not promoted to the appointments of Divisional Superintendents of Post Offices like officials of similar status in Revenue, Police and other Departments?

(b) If so, are Government prepared to consider the question of promoting the Sub-Divisional Inspectors as Divisional Superintendents of Post Offices without age limit, etc.?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) Inspectors of Post Offices and Inspectors, Railway Mail Service, are not debarred from promotion to posts of Superintendents of Post Offices, which they may attain under the departmental regulations. A comparison with other Departments would be misleading as conditions in these are not the same.

(b) Government regard the existing system as suitable and do not propose to change it.

STRENGTH OF SUB-DIVISIONAL INSPECTORS OF POST OFFICES.

194. Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Will Government be pleased to state the present standard, fixed for determining the strength of Sub-Divisional Inspectors of Post Offices?

Mr. H. A. Sams: As a general rule, an Inspector is required to devote 144 days in a year to the actual work of inspection and verification. In special cases, however, a somewhat lower standard is sometimes admitted.

PROBATIONARY SUPERINTENDENTS OF POST OFFICES.

195. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Will Government be pleased to state:

- (a) If it is a fact that there are 15 Probationary Superintendents of Post Offices at present?
- (b) What is the distribution at present among the different Circles and on what basis the distribution of Probationary Superintendents is made?
- (c) Whether it is a fact that the number of Probationary Superintendents recruited is usually so regulated as to make them permanent within two years? If so, is not the number of Probationary Superintendents at present excessive?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) Yes.

(b) The present distribution is as shown below:

Bengal and Assam	3
Bihar and Orissa	2
Bombay	2
Central Circle	1
Madras	1
Punjab and North-West Frontier	3
United Provinces	1
Sind and Baluchistan	2

They are ordinarily attached for training to the Circles where the vacancies to which they are appointed occur.

(c) The guiding principle for regulating recruitment of Probationary Superintendents is as stated by the Honourable Member. As regards the second part of the question, Government understand that the possibility of reducing the number of Probationary Superintendents is now being examined by the Director General.

APPOINTMENT OF SUPERINTENDENTS OF POST OFFICES.

196. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Is the Director General of Posts and Telegraphs prepared to consider the question of increasing the ratio of departmental men to Probationary Superintendents in filling up permanent vacancies of Superintendents of Post Offices?

(b) What does a Probationary Superintendent cost the Government before he is confirmed? Is it not possible to cut down this cost in any way, without hampering the efficiency of the Department?

(c) Is it a fact that permanent vacancies of Superintendents are filled up in the proportion of one Probationary Superintendent to one departmental passed candidate, whereas in the case of officiating vacancies Probationary Superintendents are given preferential treatment without considering their relative seniority along with the departmental passed candidates?

(d) Are Government prepared to lay down that the same principle as is followed in filling up permanent vacancies should be observed in filling up officiating vacancies as well?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) No.

(b) A Probationary Superintendent is paid Rs. 200 a month. The extent of the period of his probation depends on vacancies in the Superintendents' grade. The cost on account of a Probationary Superintendent therefore varies according to his period of probation. As regards the second part of the question, the Honourable Member's attention is invited to the reply which I have given to the second part of part (c) of his unstarred question No. 195.

(c) Permanent vacancies are filled by qualified Probationary Superintendents and qualified departmental officials alternately. Arrangements for filling officiating vacancies are, under the orders of the Director General, made by the Head of the Circle in which the vacancies occur as he thinks best and most convenient.

(d) Government are not prepared to interfere with the discretion vested in the Director General, Posts and Telegraphs.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR GENERAL OF POSTS AND TELEGRAPHS.

197. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) What are the numbers of appointments in the various time-scales in the office of the Director General of Posts and Telegraphs?

(b) What is the number of selection grade appointments in that office?

(c) What is the proportion of selection grade appointments to time-scale appointments in that office and how, favourably or unfavourably, does this proportion compare with the proportion in other offices of the same status?

(d) If the proportion of selection grade appointments to time-scale appointments compares unfavourably with other offices of the same status, what action do Government propose to take in order to ensure a flow of promotion?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a)

First Division time-scale clerks	121
Second Division time-scale clerks	68
Total	189

(b) 20.

(c) The proportion of selection grade appointments to time-scale appointments in the office of the Director General of Posts and Telegraphs works out to about 11 per cent. This proportion compares favourably with that in other offices of the same status.

(d) Selection grade appointments in the office of the Director General of Posts and Telegraphs are based on responsibility, not on a flow of promotion. Government do not therefore propose to take any action in the manner suggested.

PAYMENTS MADE TO THE CLIVE TRANSPORT COMPANY.

198. Rai Bahadur Raizada Bhagat Ram: (a) Will Government be pleased to state what sum was paid in the year 1929 to the Clive Transport Company for officers and soldiers travelling with military travelling warrants between Pathankot and Dalhousie?

(b) With reference to the answer to starred question No. 169 of the 5th September, 1929, will Government be pleased to state how much would have to be paid for officers and soldiers with military travelling warrants travelling by some other company?

Mr. G. M. Young: With your permission, Sir, I propose to answer questions Nos. 198 to 200 together.

The information has been called for from the local military authorities and will be communicated to the Honourable Member in due course.

ARRANGEMENTS MADE FOR TRANSPORT OF MILITARY MEN BETWEEN PATHANKOT AND DALHOUSIE SINCE JANUARY 1930.

199. Rai Bahadur Raizada Bhagat Ram: Will Government be pleased to state with what Motor Transport Company they have made a contract for officers and soldiers travelling with military travelling warrants between Pathankot and Dalhousie and at what rates, now that the contract with the Clive Motor Transport Company expired in January 1930?

EXTENSION OF CONTRACT WITH THE CLIVE MOTOR TRANSPORT COMPANY.

200. Rai Bahadur Raizada Bhagat Ram: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if it is a fact that the contract with the Clive Motor Transport Company has been extended for some time?

(b) If the answer to part (a) is in the affirmative, what are the reasons for it?

to the Clive Transport Company. Information about the exact date of termination of the contract with that Company is not now available, but the contractor's service broke down in the middle of October, 1919, and the contract ipso facto terminated.

(b) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the reply given in this House by Mr. Rogers to starred question No. 172 of Lala Hansraj on the 5th September, 1929, from which it will be seen that the increased subsidy at the rate of Rs. 24,911 per annum was paid to the same contractor (i.e., the Indian Horse Dak Company). In consideration for this increase, a mixed motor lorry and tonga service was introduced. This service, however, broke down in October, 1919, and a new contract was entered into with the Clive Transport Company as their's was the only Company which agreed to convey the mails in motor cars and lorries and to render an improved service.

TENDERS FOR CARRIAGE OF MAILS BETWEEN PATHANKOT AND DALHOUSIE.

202. Rai Bahadur Raizada Bhagat Ram: Will Government be pleased to quote the tenders and names of the respective transport companies who are willing to carry mails between Pathankot and Dalhousie?

Mr. H. A. Sams: Tenders for the conveyance of mails from the 1st April, 1930, between Pathankot and Dalhousie were received from the following Companies:

No.	Name of the Company.	Amount of tender for one service each way daily throughout the year.	Amount of tender for a second down despatch for 6 months in the summer.
		Rs. A. P.	Rs. A. P.
1	Rai Sahib Onkar Pershad and Kartar Singh, Lahore Cantonment	2,100 0 0	700 0 0
2	The Clive Transport Company, Limited, Delhi	2,015 1 8	2,020 10 0
3	Messrs. Heera Lal & Sons, Sialkot City	1,250 0 0	650 0 0
4	The International Syndicate, Lahore Cantonment	1,000 0 0	(Not quoted.)
5	The Imperial Motor Service, Pathankot	900 0 0	600 0 0
6	Malak Chand Kohli and Pindi Das, Rawalpindi City	900 0 0	600 0 0
7	Messrs. Narain Das and Company, Lahore	900 0 0	600 0 0

CHARGES FOR GOODS CARRIED BY THE CLIVE TRANSPORT COMPANY AND THE NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

203. Rai Bahadur Raizada Bhagat Ram: (a) Since starred question No. 177 of the 5th September, 1929, was answered, have Government made any inquiries as to the rates charged by the Clive Transport Company for the carriage of goods when not employed as agents for the North Western Railway?

(b) Is it a fact that the rate charged is Re. 1 as. 6 per maund, whereas the North Western Railway charges Rs. 3 per maund for the same?

(c) Will Government be pleased to explain this great difference?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) No.

(b) Government have no information as to the rates charged when the Clive Transport Company are not employed as agents for the North Western Railway, but understand that such rates vary from time to time according to competitive conditions. The rates charged by the Company when employed as agents for the North Western Railway are Rs. 1-12-0 per maund for ordinary packages and Rs. 3 per maund for bulky packages.

(c) Such differences as may exist between the rates charged by the Company when employed as agents and when acting independently are influenced by the fact that the rates in the latter case are subject to competitive conditions and vary from time to time whereas in the former case the rates, like other railway freight rates, are stable.

GRANT OF A MONOPOLY FOR THE CARRIAGE OF MAILS AND PASSENGERS TO THE CLIVE TRANSPORT COMPANY.

204. Rai Bahadur Raizada Bhagat Ram: (a) Will Government be pleased to state why the civil authorities gave the monopoly to ply between Pathankot and Dalhousie to the Clive Transport Company?

(b) Why was the old Company which carried mails and passengers between Pathankot and Dalhousie before the Clive Transport Company not given the monopoly?

(c) Is it a fact that the former Company was an Indian concern?

(d) Is there any truth in the allegation that the Managing Director of the Clive Transport Company had suffered heavy losses in some other concern and that this monopoly was given to him in order to help him?

(e) Has he recouped his losses now?

(f) Is it a fact that the whole Directorate is non-Indian?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: The information required by the Honourable Member is being collected and will be furnished to him as soon as possible.

TRAINING AND APPOINTMENT OF RAILWAY ACCOUNTANTS.

205. Rai Bahadur Raizada Bhagat Ram: (a) Will Government be pleased to state what has been the total expenditure on account of the class started for the training of railway accountants in Calcutta as compared with the budget estimates?

(b) What number of the students of the said class passed the training class examination qualifying for promotion to the posts of officiating accountants?

(c) Is it a fact that the selected candidates for the training class were given in writing to understand that they would be entitled to become accountants in an officiating capacity, on their passing the examination meant for the training class?

(d) Is it a fact that none of the passed students of the class has so far been provided for as an accountant?

(e) Is it a fact that in almost all State Railway accounts offices a certain number of the posts of junior accountants are held by such unqualified men who have been taken directly in these posts from outside the Railway Department, besides those unqualified men who were taken over from the civil accounts offices?

(f) How many posts of accountants and sub-heads in each railway accounts office are held by men of the two classes mentioned in part (e) above who have not so far passed the examination qualifying for accountants?

(g) If the answers to parts (d) and (e) are in the affirmative, will Government please explain why the taxpayers' money was spent in starting and running the training class for railway accountants when there were no posts of accountants to offer them on their qualifying themselves for such posts?

(h) What steps are now being taken to redeem the promises given to these men of the training class at the time of their selection as stated in part (c) that on passing the training class examination their position would improve?

(i) Is it a fact that men of the Training Reserve, started by the Auditor General, on passing the qualifying examination were not only given officiating promotion as accountants, but also the benefit of five years of qualified service over their compeers of the regular establishment in the matter of fixation of seniority, and that the same condition of service has been recognised by the Accounts Department in the case of some of those Training Reserve men who were taken over by the latter Department from the Audit Department?

(j) If the answer to part (i) above is in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state why the same privileges, as were recognised in the case of the Training Reserve, are not extended to the qualified men of the accounts training class?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: (a) to (j). The Honourable Member is referred to the replies given by me on the 5th March to question Nos. 448 and 449 by the Honourable Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan.

SEPARATION OF INSPECTION FROM PURCHASE IN THE CENTRAL STATIONERY OFFICE.

206. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Will Government be pleased to state what progress has been made in the direction of the separation of inspection from the purchase in the Central Stationery Office, as it obtains in the Indian Stores Department?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: The question is under the consideration of Government.

PROMOTION OF CLERKS IN THE POST OFFICE.

207. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if it is a fact that graduates and under-graduates appointed in the Post Office as leave reserve clerks are assigned positions in the Divisional and Circle gradation lists as though they were entertained five years and three years, respectively, before the dates of their permanent entry?

(b) Is it a fact that consequent on the above, the graduates and under-graduates are promoted as clerks much earlier than the matriculate and S.S.L.C. reserve clerks with longer service at their credit?

(c) Is it a fact that graduates and under-graduates entertained in any one Division are shown in the Circle gradation lists as senior to all matriculate and S.S.L.C. leave reserve clerks in the whole Circle with less than five years service?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state the reasons for granting the graduates and under-graduates these concessions?

(e) Are Government aware that, as a result of the above concession granted to the graduates and under-graduates, the other leave reserve clerks are, year after year, losing many places in the Divisional and Circle gradation lists for five years, that is, until such time as they reach the pay equivalent to the initial pay of a graduate and are promoted as clerks much later than the graduates and under-graduates with lesser service?

(f) Is it a fact that certain lady clerks are started on a higher scale of pay in the Post Office?

(g) Is not their seniority determined solely with reference to the dates of their permanent entry in the Department, irrespective of the pay drawn, and is it not ruled that when a woman clerk attains the maximum pay of her time scale, she should wait for promotion to the lowest selection grade until the men clerks who are senior to her by service have received it?

(h) If the answer to above be in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state whether they will follow the same principles in fixing the relative seniority of graduates, under-graduates and matriculate leave reserve clerks and cause the revision of the existing Divisional and Circle gradation lists? If not, will they please state their reasons?

Mr. H. A. Sams: (a) and (c). Divisional gradation lists no longer exist, but it is a fact that graduates and under-graduates appointed as clerks on the special starting pay fixed by Government are given position in the Circle gradation list as if they had been entertained in the Post Office four years and two years, respectively, before the dates of their actual permanent appointments.

(b) No. There is no question of promotion. The date of confirmation depends, for all clerks, on the date of their passing the departmental examination for confirmation.

(d) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to paragraph 13 of Chapter II of the Report of the Postal Committee, 1920.

(e) Yes, the fact is generally as stated except that there is no question of promotion to clerkships; see my reply to (b).

(f) Yes.

(g) Yes.

(h) No, for reasons explained in the reply to part (d) above. I would also add that it is the policy of the Department to give graduates and under-graduates an opportunity of reaching the Lower Selection Grade earlier than men less qualified educationally.

INTRODUCTION OF A PROVIDENT FUND FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

203. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Will Government be pleased to state the probable time at which they would introduce a system in which a Provident Fund would take the place of pensions either in whole or in part for the Government employees, and the stage at which the proposal now stands?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: The Honourable Member is referred to parts (a) and (b) of my reply to Mr. G. Sarvotham Rao's starred question No. 196 on the 29th January, 1930, published on page 336 of the Legislative Assembly Debates.

POSTAL RUNNERS EMPLOYED IN TIBET AND SIKKIM.

209. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the number of runner lines in the Tibet and Sikkim territories and the total number of runners employed on them?

(b) How many of these runner lines are day-working and how many night-working?

(c) Do the runners go in batches of two or more, or is only a single runner employed in each line?

(d) Have Government provided the runners with arms for self-defence? If not, why not?

Mr. H. A. Sams: (a) to (d). The information is being collected and will be furnished to the Honourable Member in due course.

PROMOTION OF PASSED ACCOUNTANTS IN THE POSTAL DEPARTMENT.

210. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the number of officials in each Railway Mail Service and Postal Circle in India and Burma, of the clerical time-scale, who passed the examination held for appointments as accountants?

(b) How many of these were appointed as Head Postmasters, as notified in the Director General's Circular No. 50, dated the 16th October, 1924?

(c) Is it a fact that many of these passed men are not even appointed as accountants and are not paid special pay? If so, how many men are not so employed and why?

(d) Have Government ordered that only those men who will pass the selection grade examination to be held shortly will be promoted to the selection grade appointments?

(e) In view of the assurance given by the Director General in his circular, above quoted, will Government be pleased to state whether they propose to allow all passed accountants to sit for the ensuing selection grade examination? If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a), (b) and (c). The information is being collected and will be furnished to the Honourable Member in due course.

(d) No. Passed accountants on ordinary time-scales of pay are also eligible for appointment to the lower selection grade appointments of accountants and assistant accountants on Rs. 160—250 on condition that they pass the selection grade examination within two years of their appointment to such posts.

(c) The intention of the Orders referred to by the Honourable Member is not as stated by him and in this connection the Honourable Member is referred to the reply given to the Honourable Mr. Mahmood Suhrawardy's question No. 8 in the Council of State on the 19th February, 1930. It is not proposed to allow all passed accountants to sit for the selection grade examination as the selection of the candidates to appear for it is made in order of seniority. Only those passed accountants mentioned in part (d) of the reply who have been promoted provisionally are allowed to appear for the examination irrespective of seniority.

PROMOTIONS IN THE MADRAS POSTAL CIRCLE.

211. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Is it a fact that the Postmaster General, Madras Circle, wrote to the Director General of Posts and Telegraphs that all the officials in his Circle, who had passed the departmental examination for Inspectors and Head Clerks to Superintendents of Post Offices had been confirmed in that cadre and that, as the selection grade examination would not come off immediately, he should be permitted to conduct the departmental examination for officials who were nominated by the Divisional Superintendents in 1927 to fill in interim vacancies in that cadre?

(b) Did the Director General grant the request of the Postmaster General? If not, will Government be pleased to state if they will allow these officials at least to sit for the next selection grade examination?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) No.

(b) The first part of the question does not arise. With regard to the second part it may be stated that those officials who had already been specially selected for, and promised permission to appear in, the old examination for Inspectors of Post Offices and Superintendents' Head Clerks by Heads of Circles (including the Postmaster General, Madras) were, as a special case, allowed to appear for the Lowest Selection Grade Examination held in December last.

PROMOTION OF POSTMEN.

212. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the number of officials promoted from postmen and lower grades to clerkships in India and Burma who possessed less than two years service as clerks on the date of the first incremental examination held for clerks and leave reserve clerks?

(b) Were all the officials of this class compelled to appear for the examination on the ground that they had not completed two years service on the date of examination? How many passed in the examination?

(c) Is it a fact that those who did not pass the examination were reverted to their original appointments in the postmen and lower grades? How many were so reverted?

(d) Were not these men promoted to clerkships after they passed a prescribed test in English composition, arithmetic, etc.? If so, what was the necessity for the Government to direct them to appear for the new examination?

(e) Are Government aware that such men who had more than two years service at date of examination were not asked to appear for the examination, and thus escaped the chances of reversion?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: The information is being collected and will be furnished to the Honourable Member in due course.

ALLOWANCES FOR POSTAL OFFICIALS IN HILLY AND UNHEALTHY TRACTS IN THE MADRAS CIRCLE.

213. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state whether they have any proposal this year to enhance the rates of compensatory allowances and special pay for the hilly and unhealthy tracts in the Madras Circle, and if so, will they please state what rates have been proposed and whether they will be given effect to retrospectively?

(b) If the answer to part (a) be in the negative, will Government be pleased to state when they propose to sanction the enhanced rates of allowance?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) and (b). The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to paragraphs 35 and 11 of the proceedings of the Standing Finance Committee, dated the 16th and 30th January, 1930, respectively.

PROVISION OF QUARTERS FOR POSTAL AND RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE STAFF AT OOTACAMUND.

214. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if they propose providing residential quarters for the Postal and Railway Mail Service staff in Ootacamund (the Nilgiris)?

(b) If the reply to part (a) be in the affirmative, when, how many and what is the total cost of the proposal?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) It is proposed to provide quarters for the post office staff only. Quarters are not required for the Railway Mail Service staff because Ootacamund is not the headquarters of any Railway Mail Service section or mail office. A rented rest house has already been provided for the mail guard working between Podanur and Ootacamund where the mail guard halts and rests.

(b) If funds permit, about 22 units of quarters will be constructed in two years. Estimates of cost are not yet ready. They are being prepared.

BROADCAST LICENCES ISSUED BY THE POST OFFICE.

215. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the number of licences issued by post offices in India and Burma each year for opening broadcast wireless stations, and the amount collected therefor by the Post Office?

(b) What proportion of the amount do Government propose to credit as the share of the Post Office work? If none, why not?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) Probably the Honourable Member refers to Broadcast Receiving licences; if so, the approximate number of such licences issued by Post Offices in India and Burma year by year is as follows:

1924 issued 480.
1925 issued 1,350.
1926 issued 940.
1927 issued 3,600.
1928 issued 6,150.
1929 issued 7,670.

The fee for each license issued is Rs. 10.

(b) 20 per cent. is retained by the Posts and Telegraphs Department, the balance being transferred to the Indian Broadcasting Co.

COST OF THE INDIAN DEPUTATION TO THE UNIVERSAL POSTAL CONFERENCE.

216. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the total cost each year for the last five years of the Indian deputation to the Universal Postal Conferences?

(b) Is the total cost charged to the Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department in entirety, and if so, in what proportions to the Posts and Telegraphs Departments respectively?

(c) Do not the Government of India share the expenditure? If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) There has been only one Universal Postal Conference during the last five years, viz., in 1929. The total cost of the Indian deputation was approximately Rs. 62,000.

(b) and (c). The total cost of the Indian deputation is charged wholly to the Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department and is debited exclusively to the postal branch, the reason being that it is a purely postal charge of the Government of India.

STEAMER SERVICES BETWEEN COLOMBO AND AUSTRALIA.

217. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Is it a fact that the steamer services between Colombo and Australia have been regularised?

(b) Which are the contracting steamer companies, and what is the amount of the subsidy paid per year out of the revenues of the Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) The question is not quite clear. It may, however, be stated that there is a regular service of mail steamers between Colombo and Australia at intervals of about a week.

(b) Mails from India to Australia are sent from Colombo both by the steamers of the P. and O. S. M. Company and by the Orient S. N. Company. The former are under contract with His Majesty's Postmaster-General, and the latter with the Australian Government. No separate subsidy is paid by India for the mails sent to Australia by the P. and O. S. M. Company steamers, as the contribution made by India towards the subsidy payable to the Company by the British Post Office covers these mails.

In respect of mails sent by the ships of the Orient S. N. Company no subsidy is paid by India to the Company but transit charges are paid to the Australian Post Office according to the rates prescribed by the Universal Postal Convention. For each of the years 1924 to 1928 these charges amounted to £580-14-4.

AMOUNT COLLECTED FROM TELEPHONE PUBLIC CALL OFFICES.

218. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state, year by year, the amount of telephone revenues collected through the Public Call Offices opened in the Post Offices in India and Burma for the last five years?

(b) What share of the revenue is credited to the Post Office for its share of telephone work?

Mr. H. A. Sams: (a) It is regretted that as the compilation of the information asked for would be very laborious and out of proportion to the value of the result, it cannot be undertaken; in any case the complete records for the whole period are no longer available.

(b) No credit is afforded to the Post Office for the services rendered in connection with the working of the Public Call Offices.

SUPPLY OF STATIONERY FOR POST OFFICES.

219. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the total sum spent during the year 1928-29 as allowances to Postmasters for the purchase of stationery such as sealing wax, oil, etc., for the use of their offices?

(b) Are these materials, except oil, supplied in kind to Railway Mail Service offices by the Department?

(c) Do the Government of India and the Local Governments supply articles of stationery in kind to their subordinate offices?

(d) Do Government propose to make arrangements for the supply in kind of the articles of stationery to Postmasters in lieu of allowances in cash? If not, why not?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) Rs. 3,29,218.

(b) All stationery articles except oil, paste, match boxes, etc., are supplied in kind to Railway Mail Service Offices.

(c) Yes, so far as offices subordinate to the Government of India are concerned. Government have no definite information as regards Local Governments.

(d) No. On account of the difficulty and expenditure involved in sending such supplies to over 20,000 post offices scattered all over India and Burma.

APPOINTMENT OF AN INDIAN AS CHEMICAL EXAMINER FOR CUSTOMS AND EXCISE, CALCUTTA.

220. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Is it a fact that the post of the Special Chemical Adviser was not advertised after Mr. Jenks, Chemical Examiner for Customs and Excise, Calcutta, left India in July 1928?

(b) Do Government require that the qualification of a Special Chemical Adviser in the Customs Department should principally be of considerable experience in commercial or technical analysis akin to those carried out in the Customs laboratories and a high reputation in scientific circles as a contributor of original research work in scientific journals?

(c) Is it a fact that Dr. H. B. Dunnicliff of the Punjab Educational Service, being a Physical Chemist, was appointed Special Chemical Adviser in November 1928?

(d) Were Government aware that there were, at the time of Dr. Dunnicliff's appointment, many competent Indian chemists in India both in and outside Government service?

(e) If the answer to part (d) is in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state why a suitable Indian was not appointed to the post?

(f) If Government were not aware of the fact stated in part (d) why was not the post of the Special Chemical Adviser advertised and applications invited for the same?

(g) If the post of the Special Chemical Adviser, to which Dr. Dunnicliff was appointed, was not advertised and applications not invited for the same, do Government now propose to advertise for the post to obtain, if possible, the services of a suitable Indian to the post?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: (a) Yes.

(b) The post of Special Chemical Adviser was a temporary one. As a whole-time appointment it was maintained only from November, 1928, to the end of September, 1929. The officer's principal duties were administrative rather than connected with research work. He had to visit the various Custom Houses in order to see that the new laboratories were put into full working order and to examine the general position and make recommendations regarding the future organisation of the laboratory work and regarding the administrative relation of the laboratories to the Central Board of Revenue and inter se. While performing these duties, he was also required to assist with his advice, when called upon to do so, the officers in charge of the Customs laboratories. For the performance of these functions it was necessary to have an officer who combined adequate technical qualifications with experience of the Government organisation.

(c) Dr. Dunnicliff of the Indian Educational Service, Professor of Chemistry at the Government College, Lahore, was appointed to the post in November, 1928.

(d), (e) and (f). In view of the special objects of the temporary appointment in question it was necessary to obtain some fairly senior officer already in Government service. It is for this reason, and also because of its temporary character, that the post was not advertised.

(g) The Government of India selected the officer already in Government service and available at the pay offered who in their opinion was best suited for the work. Since September, 1929, the post of Special Chemical Adviser has ceased to be a whole-time appointment. Dr. Dunnicliff's part-time services have, by arrangement with the Government of the Punjab, been temporarily retained. Both on grounds of economy and in order to avoid a breach of continuity, the Government of India do not intend to terminate this arrangement and create a new whole-time appointment.

HOURS OF DUTY OF TELEPHONE MISTRIES.

221. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Is it a fact that the telephone mistries and telephone operators of the Engineering Branch of the Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department, ordinarily perform fifty hours of duty in a week, without any restriction of the hours of duties on Sundays, holidays and at evening and night, whereas restrictions of duties under similar circumstances exist in case of the members of the signalling establishment? If so, will the Honourable Member in charge of the Department of Industries and Labour, be pleased to state the circumstances under which the telephone mistries and telephone operators are debarred from being admitted to the privileges which are being granted to the latter, as detailed in the Government of India communication of the Department of Commerce and Industry, No. 4830-94, dated 29th June, 1911?

(b) Is it a fact that the telephone operators of certain telephone exchanges, viz., Gaya, Munghyr, Hazaribagh, Dinapore, etc., which are run by three telephone operators, are required to perform 56 hours of duty instead of 50 hours, without any extra or overtime allowances? If so, will Government be pleased to state the circumstances under which such an anomaly is in force? Is this contrary to memo. No. 4148, dated the 12th June, 1919, of the Government of India, Department of Commerce and Industry?

(c) Is it a fact that, except the outdoor workers of the Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department, only the telephone mistries and telephone operators are forced to work on Sundays and holidays without any remuneration? If so, will the Honourable Member be pleased to state if he has any intention to redress the long felt grievances of the telephone mistries and telephone operators by bringing them on to the same footing with the members of the signalling establishment, so far as the overtime allowance is concerned?

(d) Is it a fact that the telephone mistries and telephone operators of the big telephone exchanges are granted the privilege to work only two hours on Sundays and holidays but that the same is denied to the telephone mistries and telephone operators of the smaller exchanges?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) The reply to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. With regard to the second part the nature of duties of the signalling staff of the Telegraph Traffic branch differ materially from those of the Telephone mistries and Telephone operators. Government are satisfied that there is no case for exactly similar treatment in respect of hours of duties of the signalling staff and the Telephone mistries and operators.

(b) Enquiries are being made and the result will be communicated to the Honourable Member in due course.

(c) The answer to the first part is in the negative and the second part does not arise.

(d) No such representation has been made by the men directly concerned but enquiry will be made and the information will be supplied to the Honourable Member.

TRAINING OF APPRENTICES IN THE BENGAL NAGPUR RAILWAY WORKSHOPS AT KHARAGPUR.

222. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Will Government be pleased to place on the table a copy of their complete answers communicated to Mr. S. C. Mitra, by letters, to his starred questions in the Legislative Assembly, Nos. 819—825, dated the 26th February, 1929, Nos. 491—496 and 537, dated the 16th September, 1929, No. 644, dated the 18th September, 1929, No. 827, dated the 24th September, 1929, and Nos. 861—863, dated the 25th September, 1929, regarding apprenticeship training in the Bengal Nagpur Railway workshops at Kharagpur?

Mr. A. A. L. Parsons: I am sending to the Honourable Member copies of the replies sent to Mr. S. C. Mitra. As he will see, they are numerous and lengthy. Copies have already been placed in the Library.

LOWER SELECTION GRADE POSTS OF CLERKS IN THE TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT AND IN THE POSTAL DEPARTMENT.

223. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Is it a fact that an examination has been introduced for the lower selection grade posts amongst the clerks in the Telegraph Department and, if so, have Government considered the question of increasing the number of posts in the above grade also, so as to equalise the proportion with that existing in the Post Office, the sister Department?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: The reply to the first part is in the affirmative. With regard to the second part, the attention of the Honourable Member is drawn to the reply given by Mr. Rogers to his unstarred question No. 415 on the 27th March, 1929.

COMPENSATORY ALLOWANCE IN THE TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

224. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: Will Government be pleased to state when the question of the revision of the compensatory allowance in the Telegraph Department, in certain places, which has long been under consideration, is likely to be finally decided?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: The Honourable Member's attention is invited to paragraph 35 of the Proceedings of the Standing Finance Committee dated the 16th January, 1930, which fully explains the case.

SELECTION OF DEPARTMENTAL CLERKS FOR THE TRAINING CLASSES IN TELEGRAPHY.

225. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state when the departmental clerks are likely to be selected to join the training classes in telegraphy? Is it a fact that recruitment is now open?

(b) Do Government intend to exempt those clerks from the age limit, as a special case, for the purpose of recruitment as telegraphists who joined the Department with the hope of becoming telegraphists? Are Government aware that, owing to there being no recruitment for the last ten or twelve years in some Circles, these clerks have become over age under the existing rules?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) Orders on the subject are expected to issue shortly. The reply to the second part is in the affirmative.

(b) The age limit has been fixed in the interest of the efficiency of the public service and Government do not intend to relax it in any case. With regard to the second part, the facts may be as stated by the Honourable Member, but Government have no precise information.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION EXAMINATION.

226. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Is it a fact that the last Public Service Commission examination was held in December, 1926?

(b) Is it a fact that many permanent vacancies in the various Departments of the Government of India (civil as well as military, and the attached offices) are being filled up by unqualified men? Will Government be pleased to state when they will hold a further competitive examination so as to fill up these vacancies by qualified men permanently?

(c) Is it a fact that the concessions noted below were allowed by the Government of India to its employees when they last sat for the qualifying examinations, held in November 1929?

(i) Concession of age limit up to 35 years instead of 30 years in the case of permanent Government servants of Departments other than the Government of India for admission to sit in that competitive examination;

(ii) Exemption of entrance fee of Rs. 10 per head.

(d) Do Government propose to allow, at the next examination, the concessions referred to in part (c)?

(e) Have Government any intention to change the standard of that examination otherwise than was previously done?

The Honourable Sir James Grerar: (a) The Public Service Commission held a qualifying examination in November, 1929, but no open competitive examination for the ministerial service has been held since 1926.

(b) I have no information that permanent vacancies have been filled by unqualified men. The Public Service Commission has been asked to consider the desirability of holding a competitive examination this year.

(c) Yes.

(d) No, for there will be no more qualifying examinations of this kind, and the next examination will be open and competitive.

(e) Government act on the advice of the Public Service Commission in these matters. If any change is made in the standards, adequate notice will be given to intending candidates.

PAY AND ALLOWANCE OF POSTAL RUNNERS IN TIBET AND SIKKIM.

227. Mr. Amar Nath Dutt: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if it is a fact that the pay of runners employed on the Lhenock-Gnatong, Gnatong-Yatung and Yatung-Pharjong runner lines was not raised in the recent revision?

(b) Were the runners supplied with free ration and a clothing allowance before the year 1924, but are they now given free clothing and a ration allowance of Rs. 15? If so, why was this change made?

(c) Has any representation been received from the runners asking for enhanced pay and ration allowance? If so, when; and what orders were passed thereon?

(d) What comprises a set of warm clothing for these runners? Are a pair of trousers and a coat included in the supply and, if not, have Government considered the question of supplying these articles to the runners?

(e) Is it a fact that some of the postal runners in the Sikkim territory are not given any allowance at all? If so, what is the reason for this discrimination?

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra: (a) Yes.

(b) Yes. The change was introduced as the conditions which had justified the former arrangement had ceased to exist.

(c) Yes. The representation was fully considered by the Director-General and it was decided that the prayers contained therein could not be granted.

(d) The information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member in due course.

(e) Yes. Compensatory allowance or special pay can only be granted if the conditions laid down in rules 9(5) and 9(25) of the Fundamental Rules are fulfilled.

NEW PENSION RULES.

228. Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan: (a) Are Government aware that the pension rules promised by the Government of India in the Fundamental Rules promulgated in 1921, which were to replace the rules relating to pensions contained in the Civil Service Regulations, in regard to non-Gazetted Government servants, are still being awaited? Will Government please state the reasons for delaying these rules for so long a time?

(b) Are Government aware that the average age in India is less than 25 years against more than 50 years in England and other European countries and that this average is even lower in the case of Government servants who have to do sedentary work during their life time?

(c) Are Government aware that admittedly no less than 33 per cent. of Government servants die before completing 30 years' service leaving behind families for whom no provision is made in the existing rules?

(d) Are Government aware that thousands of Government servants who have died or have retired during the interval of about nine years since the new rules were promised have been deprived of any relief that the new rules might have brought to them or to their families and that there will be still many more who will be subjected to similar deprivations until the new rules are published?

(e) Are Government prepared to publish the new pension rules without any further delay?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: (a) I would refer the Honourable Member to my reply to starred question No. 721 by Mr. Siddheswar Prasad Sinha published on page 1193 of the Legislative Assembly Debates for the 23rd September, 1929.

(b) By "average age" the Honourable Member presumably means the "average after life time". This varies with the age of each individual. At age 21 it is about 27 years amongst the ordinary Indian population, that is two years more than what is stated by the Honourable Member. In England at the same age it is 45 years, that is five years less than what is stated by the Honourable Member. The average "after life time" of Government servants in India is considerably higher than amongst the population, and not lower, as stated by the Honourable Member. At age 21, it is 38 years, that is, 11 years more than in the ordinary population.

(c) It is estimated that about 25 per cent. of officers in the Superior Services die before retirement. In the case of non-superior services, the percentage is nearer 30 for those who must retire at the age of 55, but is undoubtedly higher for ministerial officers, who may remain in service till they are 60. The average length of service of members of the non-superior services who survive till they go on pension is, however, in excess of 30 years. I would incidentally mention that in the draft new Pension Rules there is no provision for granting relief to the families of Government servants who die in service.

(d) The Honourable Member is apparently under the impression that the new Pension Rules are to be markedly more liberal than the existing rules. This is incorrect. The draft rules differ from the existing rules mainly in form, though they contain some minor concessions regarding the inclusion of pay drawn in temporary and officiating posts in certain circumstances in "pensionable pay"—i.e., the average pay of the final three years on which pension is calculated.

(e) The Honourable Member's attention is invited to my reply to starred question No. 94 published on page 102 of the Legislative Assembly Debates for the 21st January, 1930.

PRE-AUDIT OF PAY BILLS.

229. Mr. Adit Prasad Sinha: (a) Will Government be pleased to state whether a system of pre-audit is conducted prior to the payment of all bills which are paid to officials in Delhi and New Delhi, or whether it is restricted to particular areas and Departments? If so, what are the areas and Departments affected?

(b) Are the pre-audited payments a conclusive check, or can they be revoked subsequently by objections under post-audit?

(c) Are Government aware that bills pre-audited are inordinately delayed and that payees are thereby caused inconvenience?

(d) Is pre-audit carried out throughout the Punjab and the North-West Frontier Circle of the Posts and Telegraphs Department, or is it limited merely to particular zones?

(e) If restricted, what then justifies the necessity for pre-audit?

[Mr. Ghanshyam Das Birla.]

The first thing wanted today is retrenchment, ruthless and drastic. I have been repeating for the last three years that the first thing that the Government should do, until we can see any sign of prosperity on the horizon, is retrenchment. Sir, I am afraid I am not satisfied with the action which the Honourable the Finance Member has taken. He has appointed a Retrenchment Officer. Now we all know the Retrenchment Officer cannot lay his hands on a policy which may be already prescribed. All he can do is to find out for himself whether, under the policy enunciated by the Government, he could make any retrenchment. He cannot have the courage to tell the Government, "Do this, and do not do that". This can only be done by an independent authority. It is up to this House to review the growth of expenditure from year to year and to have the pruning knife applied by a representative committee appointed for the purpose. I may ask the Government of India, where in view of our slender financial resources was the necessity to undertake new obligations every year. If you look at the net expenditure on civil administration, you find that in 1923-24 it stood at 8.65 crores, and it is now 12.20 crores, an increase of about 3½ crores. We have started civil aviation, and in spite of a very bad year, we have gone in for broadcasting. All these things are very good for a country which is prosperous, but for India, where millions are starving, this is a sheer luxury. So far as criticisms are concerned, we have concentrated on military expenditure, and rightly too. I believe there is great scope for retrenchment there, but what I want to add is that in almost every Department of the Government, if an independent authority made the investigation, he would find that there is equally wide room for retrenchment. Under the circumstances, I am against all new taxation.

I do not propose today, in my speech, to deal with the proposed taxation on its merits. I hope, Sir, with your permission, I shall have opportunities of doing that later on. Nor, do I wish to say anything about Imperial Preference today. My views are too well known. I am strongly opposed to any policy of Imperial Preference at this stage, and I hope the Government will realise the strength of opinion held on this side of the House, and will modify their views. All I want to do at this stage is to draw the attention of this House to the seriousness of the situation, and to the need of retrenchment and a policy of construction which may eventually lead to prosperity. The Budget is lacking in these two directions. There is neither retrenchment, nor any constructive scheme and therefore I condemn this Budget.

Figures were produced by Sir George Schuster at the annual session of the Federation to show that things were not as bad as they were painted. I think, Sir, with your permission, I may give for the information of this House a few figures to show that the purchasing power of the masses is very low and there is no improvement worth the name as compared with the pre-war period. In some respects, indeed, we are in a worse position. Let us take first of all the consumption of cloth. In 1913-14, the annual consumption per capita stood at 16.28 yards. In 1928-29 it was 14.9 yards. Even if we take the average of the three years ending 1914-15, it stood at 15.48 and if we take the consumption on the basis of a population of 320 millions the average for 1926-27 to 1928-29 comes to 15.97 and as I am sure the population has increased, it is not much higher than that at present. Then, Sir, take the consumption of sugar. In 1912-13 the annual consumption per capita was 23 pounds. It is not higher than that today. The figure which I have quoted for 1912-13 is for the whole of India, while the figure for 1926-27 which is available is only for British India, which shows the consumption at 27.28 pounds, and if we deduced from it the figure for the whole of India it might be just about the same. Then, Sir, Sir George Schuster maintained that the consumption of food-stuffs has much increased. He cited figures of consumption of rice, but he very conveniently forgot to take into account the consumption of other food grains. If we take the consumption of cereals such as wheat, rice and minor food grains, we find that, while on a rough estimate in 1914-15 it stood at 365 pounds per capita, for 1923-24 to 1927-28 it was 360 pounds, a reduction of 5 pounds per head per annum.

Then, Sir, much has been made of the imports of treasure. It was maintained by Sir George Schuster, and by other high authorities, that, since 1900, we have imported gold to the extent of 400 million pounds, and therefore India must be rich. Now, Sir, if we are to rely on that argument, the logical conclusion to which we should come about England would be that England is a poorer country than India, because her total gold resources at present amount to only 150 million pounds. What is, after all, our consumption per year? The net private imports of treasure were for the pre-war period about Rs. 1.2-4 per head. It is now Rs. 1.3-8 per head. Just consider for a moment every man consuming gold and silver to the extent of about Rs. 1.4-0 per annum, and it being maintained that we are a very rich country. Sir, it is conveniently forgotten that, what is called hoarding in India, is not actual hoarding in the sense in which it is understood, but that it is consumption and investment, both combined, and it is so because of want of banking facilities in this country for putting money in good investments. If we compare the total deposits held by banks in England, we shall find that, against a circulation of total notes and coin of 360 millions, the deposits held by banks amount to 2,000 million sterling. That is, the deposit is five times more than the circulation of currency. And what do we find in India? The Honourable the Finance Member may correct me, but I think the total currency amounts to about 500 crores, if we take into account all the rupee coins which are in circulation; and the deposits held by banks are about 200 crores. This means that, while the deposits held in banks in India are about 40 per cent. of the total circulation, in England the deposits are about 5 times more than the circulation. Sir, this gives the reason for the system of hoarding, which is so much criticised by our European friends, both official and non-official. When we have more banks in this country and better facilities for investment, surely the tendency of this country to consume gold must decrease. But if the Government want that the responsible people in this country at this stage should discourage people against buying more gold and encourage them to put their money in Government securities, they are bound to be disappointed. And I will give you the reason why. Let us ask for the accounts of gold which was purchased from time to time by the Government of India and the way in which they spent it. If we take the account from 1900 to 1929, we shall find that gold resources to the extent of 140 crores were frittered away by the Government for maintaining the exchange first at 1s. 4d., then at 2s. and afterwards at 1s. 6d.

[Mr. Ghanshyam Das Birla.]

Now, Sir, I do not know how the Government can expect the Indian people to deposit their gold with the Government of India in exchange for Government securities. I want to make it clear that, until we get freedom, until we get full control over the fiscal policy of the Government, and until we are the masters in our own house, I would be the last person to dissuade the Indian people from buying more gold or encourage them to invest money in Postal Certificates and such other things. I say this on account of the bitter experience which we have had in the past. Everybody knows how the Government dissipated our resources. Sir, I would like to ask the Government what guarantee there is that, if once the people of this country decided to hand over their gold to the Government of India, it would not be misused, as it has been misused in the past. I would therefore be very chary of handing over my gold deposits to the Government until I feel certain that I have got control over their policy, and until I know that the Government are not going to abuse their powers, as they have done in the past. Of the many "stupid" things which the Indian masses are represented to have done, there is one at least for which I admire their instinct, and which I think it was quite sensible on their part to do, and that is investing their savings in the precious metals.

One point more, Sir, and then I will bring my remarks to a conclusion. I find that the Honourable the Finance Member is in agreement with us at least on one point, and that is, that he realises the necessity of increasing the productivity of the country. But mere sympathy will not do. What we want is some concrete scheme, and I am very much disappointed that I did not find any concrete scheme in his budget speech in that direction. I will go further and tell this House that it is impossible to launch any constructive measures under the present financial policy of the Government. Let me give an illustration. Suppose we decided today that the Gold Standard Reserve which amounts to about 60 crores should be merged in the Paper Currency Reserve, and that about 60 crores of silver rupees should be taken out of the Paper Currency Reserve and given in loans to the cultivator for increasing his productivity. What will be the effect? The moment you put your money in circulation, the exchange begins to go down. And my friend, the Honourable the Finance Member, cannot sacrifice his 1s. 6d. ratio. He must maintain the exchange at 1s. 6d. at any cost. Any constructive scheme must require money, whether by way of subsidy or loan, and the moment we begin to put money in circulation, the money market weakens, the exchange weakens, and the interest rate goes down. This is the difficulty. No matter whither we go, we cannot get out of our way the stumbling block of the ratio which has become a part of the policy of the Government. Therefore, it is impossible to put forward any constructive scheme until the Government of India are prepared to forget that they have got to do any such thing as the maintenance of exchange at 1s. 6d. However, the duty of this House is quite clear. We know that we have not got any responsibility in this Government; we know that we have got no control over this Government; yet we have got our duty towards the country, and all that we can do, is to draw the attention of the country to it, and agitate for that. I wish to warn the Government again, as I have done in the past, against the disastrous consequences of the present policy.

Although I am not at all happy that our predictions have come out to be true, all the same I think it is the clear duty of every Member on this side of the House to draw attention to the serious situation through which we are passing. Sir, I would like to warn the Government again that this is not the end of the trouble; it is only the beginning. And if we want to save ourselves from the dire consequences, the only thing we can do and should do is to compel the Government to carry out a policy of ruthless retrenchment. Until that is done, I am afraid it will be difficult to find ourselves in a better position.

Mr. W. S. Lamb (Burma: European): Sir, the speakers to whom I have listened in this discussion have avoided for some reason anything more than a broad reference to the taxes proposed by the Finance Member. I do not intend to follow their example because, in the first place, I have, unlike some other Honourable Members, a pleasing duty to perform, and further I desire to deal faithfully, if possible, with one of the proposals of the Honourable the Finance Member. Yearly, Sir, since I came to this Assembly, I have raised my voice in an effort to draw some word of comfort for Burma from a Finance Member. Three years ago I thought I had that comfort, and at this stage of the discussion of the Budget I gave my unqualified thanks for the remission of the duty on hides. That duty is still on the Statute-book and that fact diminishes in some degree the pleasure with which I contemplate the reduction of the export duty on rice by 25 per cent. My full blessings will descend upon the head of the Finance Member when I see the Finance Bill and this proposal steadily going towards the Statute-book. But, although I will not say all I might say about this belated operation, there is, in the speech of the Honourable the Finance Member, something which I can accept gladly and without any mental reservation. I refer to his words:

"I hope that this plan will commend itself to the House as an act of justice and a step in the right direction."

I think there is in that an admission, an admission that for Burma, in the condition of the rice business as it has been for the last four or five years, to be called upon to pay something approaching a crore of rupees a year has been absolutely unjust and a reflection upon those responsible for the financial arrangements between the provinces and the Central Government. The Honourable the Finance Member has referred to the fact that this reduction means that Burma will pay the same sum as the producers of rice do in Siam. The fact that there was a difference against Burma was merely an aggravation of the offence, and it is not sufficient only to take that off. I should like to have from the Honourable the Finance Member, when he comes to reply to this debate, a positive assurance that Burma may expect the remainder of this tax to be removed when the finances of the country permit of it; that is, that if Burma is to remain attached to India and be concerned in the next financial settlement, this crore of rupees or whatever it may be is not going to be used as an argument against Burma's legitimate demands.

I come now, Sir, to proposals which I cannot bless, namely, those contained in paragraph 64 of the Honourable the Finance Member's speech, namely, an increase in excise duty on kerosene and a diminution in the import duty on the same. Sir, it is quite proper for the Honourable the Finance Member to consider that he acquires merit when he deals with the import duty on cotton with unusual frankness, but here when he comes to kerosene, that is a matter of the oil business, which is one of the key industries of Burma and India, he dismisses the questions raised by his proposals in, what shall I say, a short paragraph, with what I might call an ashamed terseness, saying little, but meaning apparently a whole volume. Therefore, before I make particular comment upon his desire to place an additional 50 lakhs on the already overburdened oil companies, I would speak of what is nebulous but apparently fraught with meaning. For what seriously disturbs me—and I think it is known to Honourable Members that I myself have an interest in one of the smaller oil companies—what disturbs me on behalf of the oil companies is the import of his words, “we have thought that we have gone as far as it would be wise to go, at least as a first step”. First step towards what? Is it the immolation of the indigenous oil companies and the apotheosis of the Standard Oil Company and other foreign producers? I say there is nothing fantastic in such a suggestion and I think, Sir, that to deal adequately with this little paragraph, I should have the eloquence, perhaps I should have a little of the vituperative eloquence, of our Honourable Members opposite. For, what do we have in the budget proposals? There is proposed a protection for cotton and for sugar, but when it comes to oil, the House is asked, in effect to accept and applaud the principle that indigenous oil companies require no protection. Here, Sir, is a question of vast importance to the oil companies and to India, and the House is asked to accept the principle with no more than a small paragraph which, as a matter of plain fact, advances no reason whatever for a departure from a policy which has been of immense benefit to India. Government may be right—I do not agree that they are—they may be right in asking this House to take a first step, a step which will signify their acceptance of a principle, but is it suggested that it is possible, on the floor of this House, to come to such a momentous conclusion with nothing more before us than a statement from the Honourable the Finance Member that he and his Government are of a certain opinion? If Government are of a certain mind towards indigenous oil companies, is it not their bounden duty to exhibit to this House such evidence as will enable Honourable Members to come to a thorough, properly considered conclusion? As it is, quite apart from this principle that they are asking us to accept, today this House is asked to confirm and applaud a caveat to the oil companies, that they should at once reduce their returns. It does not actually amount to a reduction of prices, but what it amounts to is that they should reduce their returns of four annas per unit of two tins in order that these 50 lakhs—it is not merely in order that the Honourable the Finance Member should secure the money that he requires towards his Budget,—but in order that the sum of 15 lakhs out of 50 lakhs should go to the Standard Oil Company or other foreign importers. Therefore, Sir, it is a direct attack against the oil companies. The Honourable the Finance Member, I would explain, wants 35 lakhs from this source, but he takes 50 lakhs—half a crore—and gives 15 lakhs to the Standard Oil Company as, I may say to Honourable Members, a free gift which brings no good whatever to India. The Honourable the Finance Member, of course, has not put it that way. He says that they, the Government, decided to make a change which should at least ensure that the price of ordinary kerosene to the consumer is not increased. I am at a loss to understand this statement. At this present moment, as always except during a war of rates, the price in India is at the maximum prescribed by the indigenous oil companies, and this maximum, at the moment, is very appreciably below the world parity prices. That being so, naturally the Standard Oil Company, who have to sell in the same market, have to keep their prices also very much below the world parity prices, and although I am not in their confidence, I have not the slightest doubt that they will have the greatest pleasure in following the example of the indigenous companies when there is an increase in prices to meet this imposition of four annas. The effect of this proposal is to give the Standard Oil Company and the foreign importers, not merely 15 lakhs, owing to the remission of the import duty, but an increased profit on their sales of oil in India. Sir, that sounds uncommonly like brotherly love, and it is very unlike the treatment that the Honourable the Finance Member desires to mete out to those smaller companies for whom he suggests he has an adequate sympathy. Let me tell the House and the Honourable Members that, out of these 50 lakhs, the smaller companies would have to pay 10 or 12 lakhs annually—a heavy burden to add to the load already carried by these oil companies. Actually I may say that there are oil companies which are engaged in as difficult a struggle for existence at present prices as cotton mills in Bombay. It may be, you may think that, if the price is increased as I suggested it will be, they will recover this four annas, and they will not suffer this loss. But I would point out to Honourable Members that there is no certainty that the present rates in India shall be maintained. Any day there may be further heavy and considerable cuts in the world prices of kerosene, and then you will have companies in India attacked by foreign importers and you will have them compelled to fight for their very existence. Therefore, Sir, if such a situation develops, how can the smaller companies possibly continue to live if they have a protection of not more than 9 pies per gallon, and this additional heavy burden of 4 annas per unit, which actually represents 6 per cent. on the full gross selling price in Calcutta, a price which of course contains the freight from Rangoon to that port?

Now, Sir, I have no doubt—at least I think it is very possible—that when the Honourable the Finance Member contemplates the oil situation, he thinks of it in terms of the predominant producer in India. I would suggest to him and to the House that they are being treated with an extraordinary lack of consideration, and I would remind the House that, during the last three or four years, the Tariff Board spent months and months upon inquiries into what is called by the sacred name of equalisation of customs duty. That is, any small manufacturer who makes up his mind that he is going to make something, using raw materials which are brought from outside India, goes up to Government and says, “I am suffering and losing perhaps 1,500 or 2,000 rupees a year”. The Tariff Board promptly sits down, and you can see in the Library the results of their findings in such matters. This question of export duty and excise duty is somewhat akin to this equalisation and I would suggest to Honourable Members that surely indigenous oil companies, who belong to India, who produce the oil from the bowels of India, bringing much revenue to the provinces, and particularly to neglected Burma, are entitled to more consideration than is represented by a small paragraph that effectually conceals the thoughts which have inspired Government to give those 15 lakhs to foreign importers. I trust that when the Finance Bill comes to be considered, Honourable Members will show their repugnance quite definitely towards proposals which mean taking half a crore, that is, this 50 lakhs, out of the consumers of India in support of a principle which they have had no opportunity of debating.

Mr. T. N. Ramakrishna Reddi (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Mr. President, I must deem myself really fortunate in catching your eye. I thank you, Sir, for giving me an opportunity of expressing my views regarding this Budget. My excuse in taking part in this discussion is that I consider that I will be failing in my duty to my constituency if I do not express my views, and if I do not express the utter disappointment with which the country has received this deficit Budget and the entirely wrong way in which the Honourable the Finance Member tried to tackle the solution of making good this deficiency.

Sir, the Honourable Member referred, at the very outset of his speech, to the various causes that have contributed to this state of affairs in this country, some causes which are peculiar to the conditions in India and others which are due to the disturbances of world conditions, especially in the United States of America, which have indirectly contributed to the depression of the commerce and industries of this country. But whether this present state is due to the causes which the Finance Member has attributed or to the ruinous exchange policy and the mishandling of the currency of the country by the Honourable Member's predecessor, as some of the Indian financiers have said, I leave to the better and well-informed Members of this Assembly to discuss and thresh out and lay bare before this Assembly. But it is common ground that a very difficult situation has arisen in this country. Now, my point is, has the Honourable the Finance Member followed the salutary dictum which he set before himself in his last budget speech? He stated in the opening paragraph of his last year's budget speech:

"If my period of office is blessed with a series of good monsoons, my task may be comparatively easy. If not, I know that I may have to encounter difficulties. But difficulties are also opportunities, for, it is by these that a system is tested, and success in overcoming them may lead to its permanent strengthening. . . . If I have an ambition, it is this, that whether we encounter bad seasons or good, you should be able to say of me when my work is done, that I served your country at least to the utmost of my powers and that in all that I did, my main thought was for the interests of the people of India."

Sir, my point is, has the Finance Member taken this opportunity of the difficult situation and tried to do some lasting good to the country in the shape of reducing the heavy military expenditure and the other heavy civil administration expenses, or has he, instead of doing that, tried to impose some additional taxation upon the already heavily burdened taxpayers of India in order to fill up the deficit of 4½ crores? Sir, I will pass in brief and rapid review some of the additional measures that he has proposed for the consideration of this House.

First and foremost is the protective duty on cotton. With regard to the 4 per cent. protective duty, everyone, especially the millowners of Bombay, and not only the Bombay millowners but the up-country millowners also, will welcome it. And further, even though it may entail some additional cost on the consumers, yet the consumers also will welcome this, because it will give some relief to the indigenous millowners, which they are sorely in need of. But what I do oppose is the 5 per cent. duty on all cotton goods imported from various countries except Great Britain, and thus the introduction of this Imperial Preference. If it is to serve as a protective duty, by all means let it be made universal, and it may be made applicable to Great Britain also; but instead of that if preference is shown to Great Britain, the goods that would have been coming from Japan and other foreign countries would flow from Great Britain and thus there is no real protection to the Indian manufacturer. Then what will be the result? We will incur the odium of the other countries without getting any comparative benefit. If the goods do not come from other countries, and such goods come through Great Britain, it is something like fortifying a fort, allowing a breach to remain through which others can enter. The Finance Member stated that this duty is only for three years, and after three years, or within that period, the Tariff Board will consider the situation and give their opinion. Sir, this is something like putting the cart before the horse. After all, it is an experiment, and this experiment must be tried by the Tariff Board. The Tariff Board must inquire into it, must go into the pros and cons of it and then when it is found beneficial, it must be introduced.

The next is the kerosene duty. This must really adversely affect the indigenous industry. On account of this excise duty, the indigenous companies will raise the price of the kerosene in geometrical proportion. There is reduction also in the import duty on foreign kerosene, but this reduction is not such as to counteract the increase in prices, and this certainly will adversely affect the consumers.

Then with regard to the import duty on sugar, as an agriculturist, I welcome this because sugar is consumed only by the middle and higher classes and this will give an impetus to the sugarcane cultivation by the rural classes, and so I welcome this.

With regard to the import duty on silver, I oppose this, because the whole burden will fall upon the Indian buyer, and that is the middle and poorer classes. The Indian consumer has to pay for the purchase of silver over and above the world market rate, and after some time when this duty is removed and the value of the silver is ipso facto reduced, this consumer will become the poorer for it.

Thus the Honourable the Finance Member has explored all these sources whereon to impose additional taxation, without boldly facing the issue and cutting down the military and civil administration expenditure. This is the time to observe economy and retrenchment and not to impose additional taxation. Sir, I do not owe any apology to this House if I venture to harp upon the same old theme of the reduction of military expenditure. It is common knowledge that it is eating away very nearly half of the gross income of this country. The Brussels Convention, to which India is also a party, has set 20 per cent. of the gross revenue as the amount that should properly be spent on the military.

Sir Hari Singh Gour (Central Provinces Hindi Division: Non-Muhammadan): They say 20 per cent. is excessive.

Mr. T. N. Ramakrishna Reddi: I am glad that my Honourable friend says that it is excessive. Even the Retrenchment Committee has put it at 50 crores. In spite of all these years, the Government have not seen their way to reduce the expenditure at least to that amount. What have the Government done? They have fixed 55 crores of rupees annually as the amount they should spend for four years. Of course the Military Department have asked for 10 crores more for modernisation and mechanisation of the Army. The Honourable the Finance Member has spread this amount

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must now conclude.

Mr. T. N. Ramakrishna Reddi: I am on my last point, Sir, I will just conclude. In the last budget discussion the Honourable the Finance Member stated:

"I would say to my Honourable friend, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, that the only way in which that can be done is by improving the position of the agriculturist by the combined effort of Government and of all those interested in the welfare of India . . . directed to the extension of education and to the encouragement . . . and introduction of improved methods of agriculture. Anything else is more than a quack remedy."

And he has also said the very same thing again in this year's budget speech. He says:

"After all, it is in the hands of the Provincial Governments that the real nation-building services lie, and the two great needs for India are agricultural development and, as a necessary condition of its success, the increase of a really effective form of primary education. Of all the tasks, the responsibility for which my present office lays upon me, that which I take most seriously is the duty of finding revenue in order that those provinces which are at present handicapped by financial difficulties, may make a great start forward in developing the services which the country really needs . . ."

The Finance Member himself has felt the need of improving the condition of the agriculturists in India, but what has he done? He has only provided Rs. 5 lakhs, and that sum of Rs. 5 lakhs is intended only for the Agricultural Research Institute; it does not reach the actual cultivator. What the Agricultural Commission recommended was that any money that was provided should reach the ordinary cultivator. That is the real remedy which they suggested. They said:

"Lord Curzon's Government fully realised that a central institution under the direct control of the Government of India would be valueless unless there were at the same time real development of agriculture in the provinces."

Thus, the wealth of the nation lies in the agriculturists, and it is the duty of any Government to improve the condition of the agriculturist. That can be done, not by spending money on research institutions at Pusa or Simla, but by reaching the agriculturist, by introducing demonstration farms in each and every village, and by bringing home to the villagers the improved methods of agriculture. That is the only real and effective way in which to improve the agricultural conditions of India, but for that nothing has been provided. The Honourable the Finance Member may say that it is a provincial subject, but it is common knowledge that the Provincial Governments have not sufficient money to develop this, and it is the duty of the Government of India to come to their rescue. There is also another subject.

Mr. President: Order, order. Mr. K. C. Roy.

Mr. K. C. Roy (Bengal: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, whatever may be the differences upon the merits of the budget proposals presented by the Honourable Sir George Schuster, there can be no denying the fact that the House is deeply grateful to him for his fair and unvarnished account of the Indian financial position, as disclosed to this House by him the other day. (Hear, hear.) His analysis of the position has fully borne out the prognostications made by eminent financiers sitting on the other side, notably my Honourable friends, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas and Mr. Birla, with whom I should like to associate the name of Mr. Chetty. The forecast which was given by Sir Basil Blackett on the eve of his departure from India has unfortunately been belied. I do not deny that he made the forecast with a sense of honesty and sincerity. Sir Basil Blackett's prophecy has been falsified. There is no doubt on that point. Between Mr. Birla and Sir George Schuster there is little room for difference on matters of fact, but there is a great deal of difference in the conclusion, for while Mr. Birla has pointed out to this House that we are at the beginning of our trouble. Sir George Schuster has maintained, in the concluding paragraph of his Budget Statement, that we shall be at the end of our troubles if we accept his financial propositions. I hope, Sir, that the forecast which Sir George Schuster has made in the best interests of India will be realised. In making prophecies in financial matters, one has got to realise world conditions as well as the somewhat unsettled and uncertain climatic conditions of India in regard to the monsoon. But even in spite of these limitations, I wish Sir George Schuster all good luck, so that he might be able to bring forward a prosperity Budget before this House next year.

Mr. Birla, in his thoughtful speech, to which I have been taught to listen with respect, has said that he is opposed to the scheme of taxation, and he said that retrenchment was the only remedy. In that matter there is a difference of opinion between the Finance Member and the Honourable and distinguished Member representing Indian commerce and industry. In paragraph 85, the Finance Member says:

"For all these reasons, I have myself regretfully come to the conclusion, which I have already stated, namely, that, however energetically and ruthlessly the search for economies is carried out,—and I shall myself welcome any measures for the conduct of such a search,—there is not room for any substantial reduction in the civil expenditure of the Central Government."

This is the dictum of the Honourable the Finance Member, which has met with opposition from many Members, of whom Mr. Reddi was the last—and whose maiden speech has been a source of great pleasure to us. But, Sir, as one who has been watching the functions of the Government of India for many years, I can truthfully bear out the correctness of Sir George Schuster's statement. There is indeed little room for economy in civil expenditure which is roughly about 23 crores per year, but there is room for expansion. At the same time, I feel that expenditure has been sanctioned this year which ought not to have been sanctioned at all, and for this I hold the Standing Finance Committee particularly responsible. A reference has been made to certain expenditure by Mr. Birla and by Mr. Das, who attacked the grant for civil aviation and the grant for broadcasting. I know something of broadcasting, because I was a member of the consulting committee when this company was brought into being; and at that time all of us, who were experienced journalists, told the Government of India that it was not right for them to allow the launching of a company which was foredoomed to failure; but our advice was set at naught by the administration in the Department of Posts and Telegraphs. The company came into existence, and the shareholders have lost their money, and they have now come to Government for help and the Government, I am sorry to say, have undertaken a new responsibility which they will not be able to discharge as time goes on.

There are also other items of expenditure which I can cite, such as the creation of the post of Deputy Secretary in the Department of Education, Health and Lands for emigration. When the Inchcape Committee was in session, my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, will recall that suggestions were actually made in the newspaper Press for the abolition of this Department—I think the suggestion was made in the Times of India. With the growth of provincial autonomy, which must come in the process of the political reconstruction of India, the size of the Government of India must be restricted, and I am surprised that an additional appointment of Deputy Secretary should have been sanctioned by the Standing Finance Committee.

I come to another appointment. That appointment is the creation of a post of Administrator for the new city of Delhi; as if the new city has not got enough officers already, we are going to have a costly Administrator for a city which is practically untenanted for the greater part of the year! There is very little room for retrenchment, I agree, in the civil charges of the Government of India, but there is great room to restrain expenditure, that is the primary function of the Finance Committee as well as of the Finance Member.

Sir, while I maintain that there is very little room for economy in the civil expenditure, I say there is very great room for economy in the army expenditure. I have here a statement, extending over a period of forty years, showing the growth of army expenditure. In 1896-91, the net expenditure was Rs. 21 crores, and Sir, you know the net expenditure today is Rs. 55 crores and 10 lakhs. During the last forty years the increase has been more than Rs. 30 crores. That, Sir, is a crushing burden for a poor country like India to pay. This morning the Finance Member gave some very illuminating answers to the questions of my Honourable friend, Sir Hari Singh Gour. Of course my friend was wrong when he said that the military expenditure of a country should be 20 per cent. of its total revenue; that is not correct.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: I never said that; I said that 20 per cent. was excessive.

Mr. K. C. Roy: Please read your question. It is not that: it is 20 per cent. of the total expenditure of a country—not its revenues. I am very gratified with the answers which Sir George Schuster has given; he has held out hopes of retrenchment in our army expenditure, and I hope that he will try and bring the Brussels Conference recommendations into active operation in India; if he does that, our army expenditure will be in the neighbourhood of Rs. 42½ crores, and if we can attain that figure—I am talking roughly from memory—there will be prosperity ahead. I will leave the question of expenditure at that.

I will now turn to one or two political and constitutional aspects of Sir George Schuster's statement. I think his reading of the political position is not quite correct. I think, with the utmost deference to him, that he has overdrawn the picture. He says:

"If the insidious lack of confidence continues to sap our foundations, we shall, as a Government, do our best to protect them and shall not hesitate to take strong financial measures for that purpose."

This, Sir, breathes a spirit of retaliation from a responsible authority. Sir George Schuster, throughout his Budget speech, has applied his world-wide experience of conditions to the framing of his Budget proposals; but in his political analysis, he has not applied world-wide conditions and the world-wide test. What is the position in the world today? There is political evolution everywhere—in fact revolution. Look at old England; new parties are cropping up, which want to subvert the forces of the Conservative and Labour Parties. This is a new phenomenon, which we have not seen for years. What does Lord Rothermere want to do? He wants to throttle India and Indian aspirations. It is not right therefore to judge India's political evolution only by Indian standards. If you like, go to America and see what is happening there. Go to Italy; go even to Geneva, where political assassination was attempted in the very League of Nations. Political assassinations and political offences are not unknown in Europe, and it is not right to say that Indian credit has suffered because there have been conspiracies and political murders and political crimes. The Indian public has got sanity enough to know their interests, and they know their interests lie in the processes of constitutional development and constitutional methods, and not in anarchical doctrines or Soviet precepts. We all know that, and if we have lost credit in the foreign market, the Government of India cannot altogether escape their share of the responsibility; they have brought into this House such legislation as the Public Safety Bill and the Hunger Strike Bill, which they have not carried through this House. Failures of this kind, to carry through Bills of that character, have created a most melancholy impression in foreign countries; so, along with the representatives of the people, the Government of India must share the responsibility for lack of credit in India's finances and in India's good name.

There is another point to which I wish to allude in this connection. The Finance Member says:

"The future in this respect lies in the hands of the leaders of non-official opinion in India. The responsibility rests with them and not with the Government."

Sir, I have conclusively proved that the responsibility also rests with the Government. If the Government of India become a little more responsive to public opinion, and if they can throttle the opposition that is created in England by Lord Rothermere and others, they will be doing not only a service to India but a great service to the British Empire, of which we are proud to be citizens.

The next point on which I wish to criticise Sir George Schuster is as regards his proposal to take time by the forelock and to make provision for Ministers. This is indeed a novel idea; but I find it has caught on already in Ceylon; the Ceylon Government made a similar proposal and I shall read from a Ceylon paper the verdict of the Ceylonese. It will be very interesting to hear it. They say:

"If the Government wants money for its own purpose, let it say so. To utter the plea of Ministers at this stage when the reform is not even in sight is the surest way to make them irresponsible."

Now, I would invite the Honourable Sir George Schuster to consider this question seriously. We know nothing as to what the future reform is going to be; we do not know whether we are going to have a unitary form of government or a federal government. We do not know anything as to what the reform proposals are, but we are asked to a future commitment for Ministers in the provinces. I hope Sir George Schuster will take my suggestion into his consideration.

Finally, Sir, I can only repeat my congratulations to him for presenting his Budget in a fair and frank manner, and express the hope that, next year, he will be able to give us a Budget which will satisfy all concerned and restore his name and authority as one of the greatest financiers in the world of finance and commerce.

Sir Cowasji Jehangir (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Mr. President, being one of the babes of this House, I trust you, Sir, and the Honourable House will not consider me audacious if I rise to speak during the general discussion on the Budget, which happens to have been presented so very soon after my election to this House. But, Sir, as I do not consider myself justified in taking the twenty minutes that you have allotted to us, I will confine myself to only one or two important features in the Budget, which naturally, coming as I do from Bombay, capture my attention.

Sir, I need hardly say that the first point which I will take up is the proposals of Government to protect the textile industry of India. We have long clamoured for this protection. Government have referred the matter to several committees since so long ago as 1926. They then appointed an officer of their own to report on this important matter, but they still continued to think, to cogitate, to meditate and to hesitate. At last they have produced something, and we are therefore thankful. Better late than never.

But while putting forward their proposals they have introduced a feature that has made all Honourable Members in this House and the country think furiously. (An Honourable Member from the European Group: "Not at all.") They talk of Imperial Preference. It is unfortunate for the industry, an industry that has been on the verge of extinction, due to the inaction of Government, that when they do bring forward proposals, they should bring them forward in conjunction with a principle which, it is well known, no Member of this House will ever accept. But situated as we are, let us try and discuss the question impartially.

We must first admit that every one of us is opposed to Imperial Preference. There is not a British Dominion that has accepted that principle. There is not a British Dominion today which will give any concession to any part of the Empire or to England if it is prejudicial to its interests. Further, I say that there is not a British Dominion which will give any concession to even Great Britain, if there is the slightest suspicion that that Dominion will be adversely affected in the future. And therefore, I maintain, Sir, that to ask India to do anything that is not absolutely in the interests of this country, is, to say the least, ridiculous and absurd, and that not one Member in this House will countenance an argument or plea that will go to harm the interests of our country.

But, Sir, we are told that the exemption that Government desire to give to England is in the interests of this country itself. There are three points that will have to be examined. Firstly, whether the imported goods from England compete with ours in this country; secondly, whether the exemption given to England is really a relief to the consumer; and thirdly, whether this exemption will by any chance, within the next three years, enable the imported goods from England to compete better with our own goods in this country. These three points require consideration and elucidation, and I leave it at that until Government place their case before us while introducing their Bills.

Sir, the next point I will take up is the statement, which I welcome, from the Honourable the Finance Member, on behalf of the Government of India, that the Fiscal Autonomy Convention is a reality. But I cannot forget that, after all, the present constitution forces the Government of India to submit their Budget for sanction to higher authorities; nor can I forget that, within the last few years, the Finance Members for India have had to proceed six thousand miles to take their instructions. Sir, I honestly trust and hope that this Convention is a reality, and I am prepared to accept that statement made by the Finance Member. And I not only take it as a reality, but I take it as an assurance that that Convention will be given statutory effect at a very early date. For, after all, if this Convention is a reality, I can see no objection to giving it statutory sanction at the very next opportunity. If it is given statutory sanction, it becomes real fiscal autonomy, and that is what we claim. Without fiscal autonomy, Sir, no reforms, no advance of the constitution, will be of any use. We do not want our Finance Member to go six thousand miles for his instructions. We want him to come to this Assembly. We do not desire to have appeals made to us before we have discussed the Budget, or before the Budget is even introduced. No Budget should be sent anywhere outside this country for opinion or sanction. If protests are to be made, they may be made not only by England, not only by every part of the Empire, but by any country after the introduction of the Budget. That would then be a real convention.

Sir, there is just one point that I would like to deal with. Government have appealed to this House to give serious consideration to their proposals. They ask us "to give full thought to the grave importance of the wider considerations". They remind us that the representatives of this country are soon to meet the representatives of England to consider the future constitution of this country. Sir, I fully realise the importance of this appeal. But may I remind Honourable Members of Government that there is a section of the British public in England which has voiced very different opinions? Up to a short time ago all sections of the British public took credit for being trustees for the teeming millions of the population of this country; that they were here in our interests; they were here to guard the interests of the millions who cannot speak for themselves. Since the famous announcement of His Excellency the Viceroy, a certain section of the British Press, and not an insignificant section, a section which carries considerable weight and influence, a section which has a tremendous following, has changed the trend of their criticisms. They openly declare

I.P.M.: that India is necessary to England and that further reforms are dangerous to the interests of England, because India is England's best market. When this appeal is made to us to look fairly at this question, I will remind Honourable Members of Government and Honourable Members here that there is this powerful section in England which is against giving any reforms to this country, lest this country should deprive England of her trade down here.

Sir, this is an outrageous and monstrous policy to enunciate—that one country should not be allowed to advance because its trade should be reserved for the other country. Our industries and commerce should remain where they are because the interests of another country are affected. All this has taken place within the last four months. The appeal, therefore, I venture to suggest, is inopportune. The appeal ought to be directed to that powerful and influential Press in England who deny us the right to advance commercially and industrially. When we do have real fiscal autonomy, I have not the slightest doubt that, however this House may be constituted, it will look fairly on any proposals that may show some favour not only to England but even to any of its Dominions. But this appeal to us, is inopportune while allowing an important section of the British Press to tell the British public that we should get no advance because their trade and industries will suffer.

Sir, I think the sympathy of the whole House will go out to the Honourable the Finance Member, who, so very soon after his arrival in this country, has had the misfortune to present a Budget with a deficit of 5.52 crores. Although I am afraid he is not going to get the support of at least this side of the House, and also of some of the other Benches to all his measures of taxation, I can only extend to him my sympathy. I do not now propose to go into the other details of the Budget. We shall get an opportunity of asking the Honourable the Finance Member to give us details when the two Taxation Bills are before us, and we shall keep an open mind till those Bills are presented to us.

Dr. B. S. Moonje (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, able people have dealt with the Budget from the financial point of view. I shall confine myself only to the military part of the Budget. I sincerely sympathise with the Honourable Sir George Schuster in the most unenviable position in which he finds himself today, because I know most of his difficulties are inherited by him as a legacy of the past wrong policy and the vicious circle of the system of Government under which he has to work. To that extent, he has our most sincere and honest sympathy, but even making allowances for that, I think it was in his power to do something substantial to contribute his quota to the nation-building part of the Military Budget. He has tried to create an impression that he has begun an era of reduction of military expenditure. If analysed critically, I can only describe it as mere eye-wash or camouflage. He says that Government were committed to pay Rs. 55 crores for the Military Budget for five years, out of which three years have already past and there are still two years more during which Rs. 55 crores will have to be paid annually under this contract with the Military authorities. But he says that he is going to reduce the military expenditure from today by Rs. 80 lakhs for the next three years, at the end of which the contemplated drop in the Military Budget will be ushered in. Let us see if it is really a reduction from today as is claimed by my Honourable friend, Sir George Schuster. Let us see what it comes to. Supposing he had not been so obliging as to reduce the Military Budget before the contract time comes to an end after two years, i.e., in 1932, we would have spent, at the end of the third year, 55 plus 55 plus 50 crores, which is the drop which was recommended by the Inchcape Committee, namely, Rs. 160 crores. Under the proposed arrangement, which is to continue for three years, we would pay Rs. 162.60 crores in three years. He is thus actually giving to the military Rs. 2.60 crores more than the Military Budget has a claim for. Supposing the Government were to say, I am too optimistic to suppose, that the Military Budget could be reduced at once to 50 crores at the end of two years from now, and also supposing the Military Budget stood at 52 and not 50 crores, at the end of two years, what would be the effect? It would come to 55, plus 55, plus 52, that is 162 crores. That is, we shall still be paying Rs. 60 lakhs more. Supposing however, the Government were to say that the Military Budget cannot be reduced to 52 crores, but must stand at 53 crores, then we shall be paying 55 plus 55.

plus 53 crores, which comes to 163 crores. Thus at the rate proposed by the Finance Member, under which we shall have to pay 54.20, plus 54.20, plus 54.20, that is 162.60 crores, it would mean a reduction of merely 40 lakhs. Can my Honourable friend, Sir George Schuster, justify it as practically any reduction at all? I am reminded of a proverb in my mother tongue, Marathi, which, if translated into English, means "Little bits of meat and bread extracted from the crevices of the teeth do not satisfy a man's hunger". It is therefore that I call this show of a reduction eye-wash or camouflage. I would certainly have congratulated the Finance Member if he had been able to induce the military authorities to reduce the Military Budget to 50 crores. Of course we are not going to be satisfied even with that. We shall not cease our agitation until the Military Budget has been reduced to very much less than Rs. 50 crores.

Now, looking at it from the nation-building point of view, the Military Budget is generally regarded as money spent for maintaining a destructive machine. But there are two parts of the Military Budget. One part is set apart for maintaining a destructive machine, which is however an inevitable evil, and another part for the nation-building machine. Let us see what our Honourable friend, the Finance Member, has done in regard to this second part i.e., the nation-building machine. We want to win Dominion Status; we are out to have Swaraj ourselves. The only argument against our claim that the Bureaucracy has been advancing is—where are the people in India who can undertake the responsibility for the defence of the country? That is the standing argument against our claim. In this Budget I find that an attempt is being made to perpetuate that argument. If the present state of things were to continue, even at the end of 100 years from today, we may not be in a position to assure them that the country is in a position to assume the responsibility of its defence from foreign aggression. Such is the Bureaucratic way of perpetuating their standing argument against our national claim.

In this Budget, I find that the Finance Minister, Sir George Schuster, has been generous enough to grant five lakhs of rupees for the further expansion of the Territorial Forces, and, it is the Territorial Forces that form the nation-building part of the military machine. This is not merely my own opinion, but it is the opinion given authoritatively by the various committees appointed by the Government of India, themselves. The Territorial Forces Committee say:

"The object of the Territorial Force is an educational one, to create a national desire for patriotic military service and to afford opportunities for military training; to a wide range of the manhood of India and so lay surely and solidly the foundation of a national army such as will be essential to India when in course of time she attains to full responsible government and takes upon her own shoulders the whole burden of her defence."

The same Report continues to say:

"We think it of even greater importance to develop it as a school wherein the young men of the country may be trained to arms and may fit themselves to take their places in the national army of the future ready to defend their country in time of need. The promise to India of self-government implies in our opinion, the grant to her people of an opportunity of training themselves for her Defence."

This is what I call the nation-building part of our military machine, and it is exactly here that the Department has been starved. They have allotted only five lakhs of rupees for this part of the machine, whereas on enjoyments and luxuries and on those things which do not fall under the category of necessities of life for India, we find them wasting lakhs and lakhs. This fact has been brought out most prominently by several speakers on the floor of the House, and therefore I shall not weary the House by repeating it. Perhaps it may be argued that the Government do not know how better to develop a national army in India. Supposing that argument were correct, I might take the liberty of enlightening the Government on this occasion as to what is happening in other countries. Here I do not mean other countries which have no connection with the British, but their own Colonies where their own kith and kin reside. I find that, in those Colonies, they almost entirely rely upon the Territorial Force for their defence. They regard it as a nation-building part of their army, and they therefore spend money upon the training of the Territorial Force with a lavish—not only a generous—hand, so that practically the whole nation may be so trained and strengthened that none of its neighbours may be tempted to cast an evil eye of aggression on it.

Now, let us see what is happening in a small colony like New Zealand. What does it do in the matter of the development of its Territorial Force? In 1928, there were 805 officers and 20,140 other ranks in the Territorial Force. Imagine a country which is 100 times or perhaps even 200 times smaller than India having as many officers as 805 and as many rank and file as 20,140. Supposing India were to be allowed to do the same thing that is to spend its revenue with a generous hand on the development of her own Territorials, just as the English Colonies are doing, then there would be no need for an army, which may be called an army of British occupation, which costs us about five times more than our own Standing Army. Or, to put it in another way,—here I am not speaking of the British Army in India—don't you think it is more profitable, more advisable, more safe to rely upon a national army in an emergency than an army which has been described as a mercenary army as the present Indian Army is? Even from the selfish point of view, the Bureaucracy ought to say that it is in their own interests to develop the Territorial Force with a lavish hand or with a generous hand; because with the grant of Swaraj to India and the full development of the Territorials, there will be an unlimited source of supply of man power whenever the Empire may find itself again faced with a real emergency as in the last Anglo-German War.

Now, I will tell the House how many boys in New Zealand are under Military training. Senior cadets are organised in battalions and receive physical and elementary military training. Their strength on the 31st March, 1928, was 525 officers and 33,939 ranks. That is to say, almost one-third of the whole school-going-boy-population of the Colony is being given elementary military training. Does it not thus come to compulsory military training, and in a Colony where there is no fear of foreign aggression? There is the British Navy, which is so powerful that New Zealand, Canada and Australia can never entertain any fear of any kind of attack from any other country, and yet they have been spending such large sums, having regard to their revenue and the size of the country, upon the early military training of their youth. All male inhabitants of New Zealand, who have resided therein for six months and are British subjects are liable to be trained for military service as follows:—

(a) The senior cadets—from 14 years of age or the date of leaving school, to 18 years of age, and (b), the Territorial Force—from 18 years of age to 25 years of age; that is to say, practically the whole population between the ages of 14 and 25, are under compulsory military training so that they may be fitted to be a part of a national army in time of need. But what does our Government do for such military training of our boys? They have provided this year a princely sum of Rs. 5 lakhs for the purpose. I remember my friend Colonel Crawford last time twitted me by saying: "Why don't you spend your own money? If the Government does not spend the money, why don't you spend your own money and why don't you start your own military schools?" I might, in reply, remind him that the money which the British Government have in India is not the money that has been brought from England. It is the money which has been raised in India from our own pockets. Instead of controlling or operating upon it ourselves, it is the British people who are doing it, but the money as such comes from the soil, and it comes from our pockets and from our labour. Therefore, whatever Colonel Crawford may say, I have a right to ask that my Indian revenue should be spent on the strengthening and for the betterment of my country.

Colonel J. D. Crawford (Bengal: European): Will the Honourable Member give me some idea as to what the military threat in New Zealand is?

Dr. B. S. Moonje: I am glad that my Honourable friend has put me that question. There is no military threat, there is no fear and yet they are spending on training their youths with a lavish hand. What would they not have done if there had been a threat? I am glad my Honourable friend's interruption has strengthened my arguments. New Zealand has nil in the matter of military threat. (An Honourable Member: "Why has it not?") It is for you to make out a case if you contest my statement. I repeat there is no threat. The British Army and the British Navy are so powerful, that there is not one single country in the world which can look upon New Zealand with an evil eye. If you contest that statement of mine, it is for you to prove it on the floor of the House. And yet what does not New Zealand do in the matter of training her own youths? The New Zealand Government are not sitting idle and complacent. There is no Colonel Crawford in the Legislative Assembly of New Zealand to say to the people there, "Why don't you spend your money; you have got enough money, why should you call upon the Government to spend the money on the military training of your youths?"

Mr. N. C. Kelkar (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): There must be a Dr. Moonje there.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Well, the time is coming when India is to be considered a partner in the British Commonwealth of Nations and then New Zealand will be under our clutches as we are at present under the clutches of New Zealand, Australia and Canada and the other British Dominions including Britain itself. The New Zealand Government has established a permanent staff with a strength of 135 officers, and these have been entrusted with the duty of training the youths in the schools. A standing military staff of 135 officers has been deputed to this work, and their entire duty is that they should train all the youths in military drill, discipline, physical training and elementary military training. Now what about the Territorial

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

[5TH MAR. 1930.]

[Dr. B. S. Moonje.]

Force in India? How many officers are there to train the Territorials in India? How many military officers have been deputed to train the youths of India? I do not think I need worry you with figures. You know a grant of merely Rs. 5 lakhs is considered enough for the purpose. That ought to be enough information for us. But you know, compared with the smallness of the size of New Zealand, and the bigness of India, need I say it is a drop in the ocean? Besides, and over and above that, what else is New Zealand doing? New Zealand has established 156 rifle clubs with 4,360 members, and these clubs are affiliated to, but do not form part of, the defence force. The Government used to issue free of charge, 200 rounds to each member per year. Well, Sir, here is my reply to the question of my Honourable friend Colonel Crawford, "Why don't you spend your own money from your own pocket?" Why is it that the Government of New Zealand issue 200 rounds to each member of the rifle clubs, free of charge? Also to those members of the rifle clubs who want to purchase extra ammunition, it is sold at a reduced rate. It is these things, and it is these analogies before us, that embitter our heart when we see that, on the vital point where our British Government ought to help us, it is not doing, not only not doing, but on the other hand creating a situation which is nothing better than an eye-wash or camouflage, or false impression or whatever you call it.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): May I ask the Honourable Member, on a point of information, whether he means to say that New Zealand gives all this training and makes all this military preparation, although it has no military threat, as stated by Colonel Crawford?

Dr. B. S. Moonje: Yes. My Honourable friend has asked me a question. I think I have already replied to it. It is not for me, and it is not for us to prove that New Zealand has got a military threat or a threat of aggression from outside. It is not for me to do so. My point is that there is no threat, and yet New Zealand, in anticipation of an emergency coming up in the future, is doing all it can to prepare and train its youths. They keep their powder dry, and no General is worth his name who, in the belief that there is no enemy, does not take care to keep his powder ever dry. But I would impress upon my Honourable friend this point, that, whether there is a threat or not New Zealand is right and wise in seeing that its youths are trained. So far as India is concerned, shall I bring forward proofs to prove that there is a perpetual threat on the North-West Frontier Province to India? It is this threat that is being made the excuse for defrauding us of our rightful claim to nationhood, defrauding us of our rightful claim to Dominion Status and Swaraj. In a moment of weakness—that weakness comes upon all nations at some time or other—in a moment of weakness we were defeated, and we were made helpless, and our national Government passed into the hands of the English people who were then foreigners. We are now creating a commonwealth, and if they so desire, we shall be members of the same household of the same Commonwealth, and if they do not desire that, they shall still deserve to be designated as foreigners . . .

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum (North-West Frontier Province; Nominated Non-Official): Who brought them here?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has exceeded his time limit. The House stands adjourned till Twenty Minutes to Three.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad (United Provinces Southern Divisions: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, Education no doubt, like Agriculture, is a transferred subject, but the Government of India cannot wash their hands of all responsibility. A few years ago Sir Andrew Skeen and Major Dauffle visited schools and colleges in India, and they discovered not more than a dozen students whom they declared to be fit for a military career. The Education Department, maintained at an expense of 25 crores of rupees, and having 11 million pupils, cannot produce more than eleven or twelve students fit for a military career,—one in one million. Is that not in itself a condemnation of the Department? There must be something wrong somewhere, but if I examine it closely, I say everything is wrong everywhere. Our curriculum is defective, our mode of instruction is wrong, the text-books are improperly selected, and our system of examination is ruinous. Here in India students are taught not what they like to study, but they are taught subjects in which they have no interest. As regards the mode of instruction, I should first blame the teachers' training colleges. A few years ago the Retrenchment Committee in Bengal recommended that all the training colleges should be abolished. Mr. Zachariah, on behalf of the Government of Bengal, in his quinquennial report said that a degree in a training college had commercial value and had no direct bearing on the daily routine of the teacher's task. As regards the text-books, the Agricultural Commission has condemned the constitution and working of the Text-Book Committee. The Hartog Committee has not a good word to say for these Text-Book Committees. As regards the examinations, I think the British Government, by implanting the British system of examinations in this country had done a great disservice to India. After three quarters of a century, the British people have realised the mischievous effect of their system of examination, but unfortunately it is still being perpetuated in this country. We had in India for centuries a system of examination, which Germany has adopted today.

Mr. President: What about the Budget?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: I am talking about the policy of education, specially of primary education, and advocating a grant from the Central Government towards education. The Hartog Committee is not very sanguine and very sympathetic towards compulsory primary education. They do not oppose it, but reading between the lines, they make us feel that it is impossible to achieve it in the near future. The estimate of cost of it which they have given is 6½ crores of rupees, but looking into the figures . . .

Mr. President: Is that for the centrally administered areas?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: No. They recommended the total expenditure for the whole of British India at 6½ crores; they recommended that the Central Government ought to contribute something for primary education, and they want that the Central Government ought to take up some responsibility for primary education. Now let us examine this figure of 6½ crores. According to the figures given by the Hartog Committee, the total number of boys of the school-going age in the whole of British India is 17 millions. According to their own statement, only 80 per cent. could ever be brought to school. Therefore, we have really to cater only for 14½ millions. We have at present 7½ millions in schools and colleges, and according to their own estimation three millions more could be brought into the existing schools without any extra expenditure. Therefore, in order to introduce compulsory education throughout India now, we have to make provision for four million more pupils altogether. Now, considering the cost of education, their calculation is Rs. 8 per head, and the way in which they got this figure was that they divided the total expenditure by the number of pupils in schools. As I have just said, three million boys more can be absorbed in the existing schools. Therefore, if we add this number, and divide the total expenditure by this increased number, the cost per head will be Rs. 5-8, and not Rs. 8. By calculating it as Rs. 5-8, the additional expenditure would be only about 2½ crores of rupees. This is the amount which is necessary to introduce compulsory free education throughout British India; and I appeal to the Assembly that out of this amount, one crore of rupees ought to be contributed by the Central Government for primary education, and the 13 provincial Governments may be requested to raise the remaining 1½ crores in order to introduce compulsory education. This contribution from the Central Government may not be according to population. It may be according to the need of each province, if proper administration be guaranteed, and the money be not absorbed in the general education Budget, but a special Board of Primary Education be created to advise Government about the way in which the money ought to be spent; and if the curriculum of studies be suitably made, I am perfectly certain that Provincial Governments will agree to fresh taxation to the extent of 1½ crores; and we can introduce compulsory primary education within a space of three years without postponing it for an indefinite period, as recommended by the Hartog Committee.

[Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad.]

About secondary education, the policy of Government was laid down by the Commission of 1882. It was established by the Resolution of 1904 of the Government of India, and again established in 1913. Their policy is this, that we should maintain only one secondary school at the headquarters of each district, and control secondary education by means of inspection, recognition, and the grant system. This policy has been proved to be very mischievous, and there have been regular criticisms of this, and it is not in keeping with the traditions of other countries. In other countries, the State is responsible for the entire system of secondary education. We all know that secondary education is the fulcrum of entire education. It influences primary education on one side, and higher education on the other, and therefore the educational problem can only be judged, not by primary or university education, but by secondary education. And here the State has altogether failed in its responsibility. Sir William Meyer, when he was Finance Member, asked the Education Department to introduce a definite policy for secondary education, but the Government unfortunately have failed to introduce any policy at all.

There is one point to which I wish to draw special attention, particularly of the Leader of the Opposition, as he will be interested in it. It is a common experience, not only in India, not only in the United Kingdom, but throughout the world, that privately managed institutions are nearly all denominational institutions. Therefore, if you leave the secondary education in the hands of the people, and the Government wash their hands of the responsibility, except to maintain one secondary school as a model, then the denominational schools will come into existence. Every religious organisation will try to maintain its own network of schools, and create a special Department to collect subscriptions, and we will have a kind of Government within Government, imperium in imperio, and that will be exceedingly dangerous to the State and to the country. Now we have been discussing a great deal about separate electorates, and I think that the separate electorate is the result of the educational policy that the Government have laid down in this country. (Hear, hear.) First we abolish these denominational schools and the State assumes responsibility for all forms of education, then the people will demand a mixed electorate, as the result of teaching in mixed schools and colleges. (Hear, hear.) Sir, after the war, a great revolution has taken place in every country in education. Germany has introduced compulsory technical education throughout the country. The boys, after receiving compulsory education till the age of 14, are given compulsory technical education till the age of 17 or 18, that is, for a period of from three to four years. England and France, on the other hand, have introduced technical education in their ordinary schools. The central schools have been brought into existence in England, and polytechnics have been very much utilised. My Honourable friend, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, in his supplementary note attached to the Report of the Industrial Commission about 15 years ago, described the necessity of framing a curriculum which would be a mixture of general and technical education. He appealed to the Directors of Industries and of Education to co-operate together and evolve a new type of curriculum which would be a combination of the two. Now, the scheme which he desired to be framed in 1918, has now been actually worked out, both by France and England. They have evolved a curriculum for their schools and colleges, in which they have the combination of general and technical education. They say that technical education has got as much educative value as general education, and the general education is as much utilitarian as the technical education. Here we are still silent, and are doing absolutely nothing in technical education.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member want education to be a Central subject?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: I just want to plead that technical education ought to be financed by the Central Government, because the Central Government draw its revenue from customs and taxes and these are the sources of revenue which help technical education in every country.

Mr. President: Technical Education must be a Central subject?

Dr. Ziauddin Ahmad: Yes; it should be a Central subject. That is what I want. The other thing to which I want to draw attention, is that the Central Government ought to contribute some money to the Provincial Governments for the maintenance of higher education and give them grants in the same manner as the British Government do to the counties and boroughs.

The next point to which I should like to refer is the Advisory Committees which are maintained by the Central Government. I have come across a number of students, both in India and in England, and I have not seen a single one who said that he received some assistance from these Advisory Committees, though a number of them told me that they got on in spite of the opposition and obstruction from them. Therefore, I beg to recommend very strongly that these Advisory Committees in India ought to be abolished and the Advisory Committee in England may also be dispensed with, as they are not fulfilling any useful purpose, and their place may be taken in India by a Bureau of Education, which has also been recommended by the Hartog Committee, and in England by some organisation such as the Congress of the Universities of the British Empire. I had the opportunity to discuss the matter with them, and they would be very pleased to do practically the same work as the Advisory Committee placed in the office of the High Commissioner, is now doing. There is another difficulty. The students are very suspicious of any intervention on behalf of the High Commissioner, and this suspicion will be entirely removed if this work is done by the Congress of the Universities of the Empire. (An Honourable Member: "Question.")

The last thing to which I would like to draw attention is the Public Service Commission. I think it is a white elephant of the Home Department, and I would request the Home Member, had he been here, to kill the animal before he leaves and not to leave it to his successor to bag the game. In the first place, these are the people who make a selection for all kinds of departments. They sit as medical experts and choose a medical man. They sit as engineers and select an engineer. They sit down as accountants to select a person for the Accounts Department. In fact, they pose as being well-informed in each and every Department of the Government of India. I always thought that, in order to select the best doctor, one must be a doctor himself, and in selecting an engineer, one should himself be an engineer. It is impossible for any layman to give an opinion on the selection of a professional person. Their selection, even if they take nominal expert advice, is not of much value. I maintain that any person who considers himself to be an expert in everything practically knows nothing.

The second point is with regard to the competitive examination which they hold. It is a matter on which I have tabled a motion, and I will discuss it when the time comes. But I do maintain that these competitive examinations—I do not bring in any kind of communal representation. I do not bring in the Indianisation of service—I stand only on scientific grounds and I say that these competitive examinations do not select the best candidates. It has been proved very definitely that you cannot select the first and the second by simply adding up the numerical marks allotted to each particular question.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya (Allahabad and Jhansi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the Budget before us is, I hope, the last of the Budgets presented under the existing system, and as I read it, it sounds the death-knell of that system. No critic of the present administration need think of producing stronger arguments against the present system than the budget proposals before us supply. What do they tell us? They remind us that the system is one under which the Government are not responsible to the elected representatives of the people and that they carry on the administration according to their own will, guided only by instructions from England; that under that system expenditure both civil and military has been growing; that it has been growing enormously, and growing inspite of the repeated protests of the representatives of the people. I do not wish to go into figures; but the whole history of India during the last 60 years is a tale of repeated protests against the growth of expenditure. When the Congress met first in 1885, it put forward that protest. Today, the representatives of the people in this Assembly have reiterated that protest in all the criticisms that you have heard on the Budget. Civil expenditure has grown frightfully—as some previous speakers

3 P.M. have pointed out, by so many crores in a few years. In spite of the poverty of the people, in spite of the growing poverty of the people, civil expenditure has been growing. Military expenditure has grown enormously and has not been reduced even to the extent that was recommended by the Committee which the Government themselves appointed. The result of it is that, even today, Rs. 54 crores and 20 lakhs of expenditure is budgeted for for the maintenance of the Army. The Government have, during the course of the last sixty years, again and again been met by a situation in which money had to be found to make up deficits in the Budget. On most of these occasions, new taxation has been resorted to in order to make up the deficits. There is only one important instance of the appointment of a retrenchment committee, to which Dr. Gour has referred. The recommendations of that Committee brought about a reduction in expenditure worth considering, but the most important recommendation of that Committee, made seven years ago, in regard to military expenditure, viz., that it should be brought down after a few years to a sum not exceeding Rs. 50 crores, has not yet been carried out, and there is no sign that it will be carried out in the near future.

Now, Sir, the condition of the country is truly deplorable. Under this system, highly paid appointments, to the extent to which they exist in this country in the civil and military departments, inflict a burden upon the people which they cannot bear, and it is to maintain this system of high salaried officials from top to bottom, so far as Europeans are concerned, that fresh taxation has been resorted to from time to time. We protest. What is the result of that protest? The protests go unheeded. It is the saddest part of the duty of a Member of this Assembly that he should have to make constant protests against the action of the Government, which go unheeded. What is the present situation? In peaceful times, when there is no war threatening us, when we have been far removed from the effects of the last great war, the Government have come forward to propose fresh taxation of over Rs. 5 crores. In no other country, so far as I know, has war taxation been kept up so long. In this country, the high taxation imposed in consequence of the war is still maintained, and the Government have now put forward proposals to add further to that taxation. This is more than human flesh can bear. You cannot think of a more wicked system of Government than this, under which the representatives of the people who have been elected by the people under rules laid down by Government to voice the sentiments of the people, have not the power to compel the Government to spend as they think fit, the great bulk of the money which they are required to raise by their votes in this Assembly. I say deliberately, it is a wicked system of Government, and the sooner we can see the end of it, the better it will be for humanity in India and even in the outside world.

Statesmen in Europe long ago laid down that not more than 20 per cent. of the revenues of a country should be spent on military expenditure. The elected Members of this Assembly, of the first Assembly, brought forward proposals for its reduction. Such proposals have been brought forward again and again. They have taken two shapes, one for the direct reduction of military expenditure, en bloc, the other for the creation of a system of military education for Indians under which Indians will be trained to take the places of European military officers whereby the army expenditure of the country will be greatly reduced. The first has been little attended to. The second has been turned down. The Government appointed a Committee of their own, presided over by a very capable General, on which many of our representatives sat. But the unanimous recommendations of that Committee have been turned down. Now you are face to face with this situation, that the Government maintain military expenditure where it is, or very nearly where it is,—the reduction of 80 lakhs in the Army Budget of 55 crores to my mind is very insufficient—the Government maintain this expenditure nearly where it is. The Government have refused to listen to our reasonable demands, demands which were endorsed even by the officers of Government of their own choosing. The Government have turned a deaf ear to all our representations even to introduce a system under which Indians would be trained to take the places of European officers in the Army, and the Government come to us and ask us to vote further taxation, in order that such a system should be kept up. Can they in reason expect our support? And what are the proposals that they have come up to us with, and what is the time at which they have come to us with those proposals? There is widespread depression of trade, unemployment and suffering. There is great dissatisfaction in the country, and the Government know it with the existing system of Government. I may say that, almost without exception, every Indian who has any sense of self-respect, desires that this system should end and that Dominion Status should be established in India at the next amendment of the statute. Every Indian, without exception, is protesting against maintaining the present scale of taxation and expenditure. And what is the response of the Government to this protest? At this juncture they have come forward with proposals for fresh taxation. Many reasons have been assigned for bringing forward these proposals, but the main reason, I am sorry to think, has not been put forward as it should have been put forward in the Budget. The main reason has been the policy which the Government adopted three years ago in the matter of the 1s. 6d. ratio. All the troubles which are now upon us, nearly all the troubles were prophesied. Speakers in this Assembly and writers in the public Press, and on the platform, pointed out that the very troubles which are now facing the country would arise, but the Government did not pay any heed. Of course the present Finance Member was not responsible for it, but the Government of India were. My quarrel is not with any particular member of the Government; my quarrel is with the system of government. The Government of India are responsible for establishing this 1s. 6d. ratio, and most of the troubles, which we are faced with today may be traced to this 1s. 6d. rupee ratio. And now what is the remedy? Adopting the right measures, I grant it is difficult to adopt the right measures, it requires a great deal of courage, a great deal of statesmanship, a determination to do the right, in spite of all odds against you, a unanimity among the Members of the Government of India in the recognition of what is right and due to India. But the right policy is to undo the evil as soon as you can undo it, and to the extent you can undo it. In every undoing of evil there are some evils which have inevitably to be borne; it is a question of weighing the advantages and the disadvantages, and if the disadvantages are smaller than the advantages, the course of greater advantages should be adopted. We have now had an experience of the evils which were forecasted in connection with the 1s. 6d. ratio. I wish the Government had given us a statement, a full statement, of the losses which the Government of India have had to suffer in maintaining exchange at 1s. 6d. Where have the reserves gone? Why have they gone? How much of them has gone in the vain attempt, the unwise and futile attempt, to maintain the rupee at 1s. 6d.? The rupee will go down, it will not be maintained at 1s. 6d., but the Government refuse to recognise the fact. Will the Government stay their hands even now, and not take any further artificial measures to support the 1s. 6d. rupee? If they would simply abstain from taking artificial measures to support the rupee at 1s. 6d., I venture to say that much of the trouble which we are confronted with, at least a considerable portion of the trouble which we are confronted with, will probably disappear. Are they prepared to do so? If not, why not? And what have the Government been doing by their own action? They have been contributing to the impoverishment of the country. The people of India have got a great deal of silver in their possession. That is their only possession, the possession of the mass of the people scattered all over the country in very small dribblets, like the drops of rain, but which in the total, amount to a good deal. By the action of the Government of India in selling silver, they have contributed to reduce the price of silver. By that act of the Government, the price of the silver which the people possess has been very considerably reduced. Why should the Government of India have resorted to that measure? I ask the Honourable the Finance Member to give one good reason why it should have been necessary for him to sell all the silver,—unless it were to invest it in gold, which I could understand—was it not to bolster up this wrong ratio? And what is to be the sequence now? It is now proposed to put on a duty on silver; that is to say, knowing that silver is going to be cheaper in the world, you are putting on a duty on it whereby its price will be bolstered up for a time in India during which time the people will have to purchase silver at a higher rate than they would have to pay if silver had been allowed to come in at the world market price. They will have to purchase it at that enhanced price, and when this silver duty is removed, or when by other causes silver goes down further in price, they will have to sell it at that lower price. Who will lose, except the people? I can quite understand such a measure being adopted after consideration in the Assembly, after consultation with the representatives of the people, with the definite object of supporting silver under a definite policy of establishing a gold standard and adopting at the same time, other measures by which silver shall be prevented from going down in price, as it is going down now. I can quite understand such a course being adopted as part of a large policy, and the money raised from it being ear-marked—absolutely, every pice of it—for some service of the people, for some benefit to the people. I cannot support the proposal to raise money by means of such a duty, to make up a deficit in the Budget. This is adding to the wrong which has already been inflicted on the people.

[Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya.]

Let me turn to another item of taxation that is proposed. The income-tax has to be increased, and why pray? What is the contingency which has arisen? Is there a war threatening India? What other circumstances are there in existence today to justify this increase of the income-tax at this juncture, at a time of peace, so many years after the war, when there is no threat of war or of trouble with Afghanistan or with Russia? Some friends of mine have said to me, "Let this tax be imposed; it is only the richer people who will suffer". I do not agree with that view. Is it right that the rich people should suffer a wrong? Rich or poor, our people should not be exposed to unnecessary and unjust taxation. There are some others who think that, because there are some high officials of Government who also will have to pay this increased tax, therefore it should not be opposed. But, Sir, I am opposing the taxation because I do not find any justification for it. I am opposing it because so much money will be taken away from my people without any justification. Why is it to be done? Only in order that the deficit of the Government of India may be met. But the deficit ought to, and could have been avoided by prudent financing.

What is the third proposal? It is to increase the cotton import duty from 11 to 15 per cent. for revenue purposes and to add to it a 5 per cent. protective duty limited to non-British goods, i.e., with a preference to United Kingdom piece-goods. Now, I desire to give every reasonable support to the Indian cotton industry. But I ask every Member of the House to consider what the Government proposal for protection means. Have you heard of any country, of any system of government anywhere in modern times, where the Government of the country could bring forward before the Legislative Assembly a proposal of this nature, a proposal that you should make a present of a 5 per cent. duty to the manufacturers of Great Britain because you are anxious to protect your own manufacturers against the competition of another foreign country? And how is this proposal brought in? It is brought in along with the proposal for raising the income-tax. On the one side, you are asked to increase the income-tax on your people, and on the other side you are asked to exempt the United Kingdom cotton piece-goods from the 5 per cent. duty. Let us clearly understand what this exemption from the 5 per cent. duty means. It really means preference. In the Indian Fiscal Commission's Report they say:

"Preference means that goods from one or more favoured countries pay duty at a rate lower than the general rate. Whether the preferential rate is a real reduction in duty, or whether the general rate has been arrived at by making an addition to what is considered the minimum duty, which thus becomes the preferential rate, is, in considering the economic effect, immaterial."

Therefore, Sir, preference means that goods from one or more favoured countries pay duty at a rate lower than the general rate. And what is the effect of it? The effect of it is described by the Fiscal Commission by quoting the Report of the United States Tariff Commission in 1918. They say:

"Where a reduction of duty affects only a fraction of the imports of a particular article, and the major portion of the imports of that article is still left subject to the main or non-concessional duty, the result is not only a loss of revenue to the Treasury, because of the lower rates of duty, but absence of any gain to consumers. The reduction of duty redounds only to the advantage of the foreign producer."

Speaking of the effect of a preferential duty in another place they say:

"The consumer will thus pay the higher duty on the whole supply, and the difference between the two rates of duty will be equivalent to a bounty to the manufacturer in the country receiving the preference."

So that, Sir, the proposed exemption from the 5 per cent. duty means the giving of a bounty to the manufacturer in the United Kingdom. They further say:

"The effect of this bonus is to stimulate the trade of the manufacturers of the country receiving the preference, and in a short time they may secure for themselves the whole market, driving out altogether the non-preferred manufacturers."

That, Sir, is the true position in regard to this duty, and I am surprised that the Government of India should have thought of putting forward such a proposal before this Assembly. Nothing could be clearer than the opinion expressed by the Fiscal Commission on this point. They recommended that, before a policy of Imperial Preference was decided upon, it should be preceded by an inquiry by the Tariff Board who should examine and report whether there were any commodities on which preference might be given to the benefit of the Empire and without detriment to Indian interests. But even that has not been done in this matter. The question whether exemption could be given to United Kingdom goods without detriment to Indian interests has not been inquired into by the Tariff Board. What I have quoted above was the view of the majority of the Fiscal Commission. In addition to this, the members who were in a minority, after pointing out that the effect of such a bonus was to stimulate the trade of the manufacturers of the country receiving the preference, went on to point out that this was not a thing that should be done in the present condition of the country: and they made a suggestion that it should not be carried out so long as India was not a self-governing country.

They said:

"We are in favour of Imperial Preference"—

I do not endorse that view, I am merely quoting it—

"on the distinct condition that India should in this matter be put on the same footing of freedom as is enjoyed by the self-governing Dominions, and that non-official Members of the Legislative Assembly should be given power, by legislation or other equally effective means, to initiate, grant, vary and withdraw preference as may be necessary in the interests of India in all its aspects."

This recommendation was made in 1922. The Government of India have not adopted this course; the Government in England have not adopted this course; and we are asked today to accept this proposal of preference to British piece-goods as one which will benefit India.

I am grieved, Sir, that in this connection we have received a message from His Majesty's Government. I have great respect for His Majesty's Government, but I cannot understand how, with a sense of justice, they could put forward a proposal or approve a proposal like the one that we have before us. For what does it come to? We are asked to raise the duty to 20 per cent. on all cotton imports.

We are asked to have a general duty of 20 per cent. with the exception of goods from the United Kingdom, which means in the words of the Fiscal Commission, the presentation of a bounty to the extent of a 5 per cent. duty to the manufacturers of England. In the speech of the Honourable the Finance Member, he said that we should not cause any unnecessary injury to British interests. Sir, far be it from our minds to cause any injury to British interests. But the real truth in its naked form is this. The proposal of the Government means not protecting the British manufacturers from any wrong, but making a present of a 5 per cent. duty to them. What will be the result? Today the competitor of Lancashire is not India so much as Japan. In the last five years the trade of Japan in piece-goods has increased by 33 million yards. In the same period, the trade of Lancashire has diminished by 38 million yards. Now the proposal is to shut out Japan. Who will then step into the place of Japan? It must be Lancashire, and if Lancashire steps into the place of Japan, how does India gain by it? What is the gain to India? Will it help or hinder the development of India's cotton industry? The test that you have to apply is that preference may be given to another country if it does not injure the interests of the country which gives such preference. The Indian market has been snatched away from England partly by Japan, and therefore we are asked to impose a duty only on Japan and not on the manufactures of England. It clearly means that you want to give the advantage of a 5 per cent. duty to the English manufacturer, so that he may come more smoothly, more happily into the Indian market. It practically means that we should tax our people to help England. Now, I ask, Sir, is it fair that such a proposal should be made to the Indian Legislature? The Honourable the Finance Member referred to the message from His Majesty's Government. His Majesty's Government have been very courteous to this Assembly in making an appeal to us to agree to this proposal, and the Finance Member has enforced that appeal by saying that the situation was a very special one and that if we did so, it would have a very important effect on our discussions at the Conference which is likely to take place in the near future. He said this:

"The times are not ordinary. It may not suffice to keep in view only those factors which in ordinary times might be held decisive, for the times are not ordinary. Within a few months the representatives of India will meet the representatives of Great Britain to discuss, in the fullest and frankest way, the future of this great country, and much must depend on the spirit in which they meet. It is obvious that any gesture of friendship which India can spontaneously and without compulsion make to the British Government in their own present grave industrial troubles is bound to strike a responsive note."

I submit, Sir, that this reference to the Round Table Conference was particularly unhappy. In the first place, the Government of India and the Legislature are not united as to what the change in the constitution should be at the next stage. If the Government of India had told the Assembly and the country that they were prepared to support the suggestion that full Dominion Status shall be established at the next revision of the statute, then they would have had some ground, some justification for asking this Assembly to consider the proposal they have put forward. We do not know what their views are; we do not know how far away we are from Dominion Status. We have been asked to attend a Conference, at least some of us might be asked to attend a Conference, where this question of the constitution will be discussed. Suppose we fail to respond to your request, shall we be prejudiced by that decision? Is it right for you to put this kind of pressure upon us? Even if the position were different, even if the case were not so clear as it is, even then I submit we should have expected you not to put this kind of pressure upon us at this juncture. For, I am sorry to say, Sir, that the inference, shall I say the apprehension, is that, if we fail to respond to this gesture of friendship, opinion in England might be prejudicial against us. I strongly hope, Sir, it will not be. But, if it is, the responsibility for it will lie upon shoulders not on this side of the House but on the other side.

Now, Sir, the Joint Select Committee of Parliament said in their Report on the question of fiscal policy for India, that a convention should be established that in this matter the Government of India, acting in agreement with the Legislative Assembly, should have the power to decide. Mark the words, "in agreement with the Legislative Assembly". They said:

"This examination of the general proposition leads inevitably to the consideration of one special case of non-intervention. Nothing is more likely to endanger the good relations between India and Great Britain than a belief that India's fiscal policy is dictated from Whitehall in the interests of the trade of Great Britain. That such a belief exists at the moment there can be no doubt. That there ought to be no room for it in the future is equally clear. India's position in the Imperial Conference opened the door to negotiation between India and the rest of the Empire, but negotiation without power to legislate is likely to remain ineffective. A satisfactory solution of the question can only be guaranteed by the grant of liberty to the Government of India to devise those tariff arrangements which seem best fitted to India's needs as an integral portion of the British Empire. It cannot be guaranteed by statute without limiting the ultimate power of Parliament to control the administration of India, and without limiting the power of veto which rests in the Crown; and neither of these limitations finds a place in any of the statutes in the British Empire. It can only therefore be assured by an acknowledgment of a convention. Whatever be the right policy for India"—(I invite particular attention to these words)—"for the needs of her consumers as well as her manufacturers, it is quite clear that she should have the same liberty to consider her interests as Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa. In the opinion of the Committee, therefore, the Secretary of State should, as far as possible, avoid interference on this subject when the Government of India and the Legislature are in agreement, and they think that his intervention, when it does take place, should be limited to safeguarding the international obligations of the Empire or any fiscal arrangements within the Empire to which His Majesty's Government is a party."

The Joint Select Committee recommended that the Secretary of State should, as far as possible, avoid interference on this subject, but the interference has taken a more insidious form on this occasion. I have no doubt that His Majesty's Government were prompted by a very kindly thought for the Members of this Assembly. I acknowledge the courtesy which they have shown. I am sure we all appreciate it, but it is unfortunate that this

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member will have other opportunities to speak on this subject. I would ask him now to conclude his observations.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya: Thank you, Sir. But it was least to be expected that, with that clear recommendation, the Secretary of State should be replaced by His Majesty's Government, and that a message should come to us, through His Majesty's Government, at such a delicate time on such a delicate matter. I do hope that the House will consider the whole question very carefully, and I do hope that the Budget, when it is fully discussed, will lead to an alteration of the proposals for new taxation to make them suit the needs of this country, and avoid the infliction of an unnecessary injury upon the people of this country. The right remedy is more retrenchment, drastic and ruthless retrenchment. That should be the policy to be adopted and not fresh taxation upon a people who are already overburdened by taxation.

*Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan (East Central Punjab: Muhammadan): Sir, it is generally considered that the budget debate is always a convenient moment for launching a general assault against the Government trenches, and the clearest objective on this occasion is the Finance Member. My experience, spreading over several years, has shown me that the shafts of criticism shot at him, though they have sometimes pierced his strong armour, have not affected him in the least or brought about his surrender. On this occasion I see that a strong attack has been made on his position, and it remains to be seen what effect it produces on him. It is not, I confess, always very easy to attack a man like Sir George Schuster. His affability, his courtesy, and his spirit to accommodate the Honourable Members is such as to take the sting out of the criticism which we make with regard to his proposals. But, Sir, one thing is certain, that the Government have their difficulties, but we have our duties, and I do not think that either of us can escape them. On this occasion Honourable Members on my right have shown in the clearest terms possible that the proposed Budget is most inopportune, and one which is not likely to appeal to the country. We are now, if I am not using a strong metaphor, on the crater of a volcano. The explosion may take place at any moment. I do not think that, in these circumstances, it is a wise policy on the part of the Government to exasperate public opinion and to create a situation which may add fuel to the fire. I may find other opportunities to speak on certain aspects of the Budget, as you, Sir, have informed the Honourable Panditji, and therefore I would rather reserve my criticism on these points to some other time. I would at present confine myself to only a few observations with regard to the proposal to increase the income-tax, and to levy a tax on kerosene oil.

With regard to the income-tax, my brief remark is that ever since the imposition of this tax, there have been frequent enhancements of this tax and every year the Government find opportunities of adding to its incidence. I do not think this policy of crippling the well-to-do classes, who are active, industrious and enterprising, is a paying policy. I know for certain from my experience that the moneyed classes, who are mostly affected by it, feel so discouraged to invest their money in fruitful enterprises that the prosperity of the country is very much endangered. Taxation is generally resorted to in other countries where prosperity exists. Here in India what is the situation? The situation is this, that there is trade depression and depression in agriculture. Under these circumstances both the rural and urban populations are suffering, and if the income-tax is enhanced, I make bold to say that, not only the urban classes, but also the rural classes, will raise a big howl, and I wonder whether Government would find it convenient to meet that clamour. In Europe the present policy of the Governments in different countries is to try to reduce the burden of the people. During the war, the Governments of the different countries had to resort to heavy taxation, and the people submitted to it quietly and submissively, knowing the dire needs of the situation, but now, in Europe also, the policy of retrenchment and the policy of reducing the taxation of the people is the foremost policy of all Governments. As my Honourable friend the Panditji said, what are the circumstances which compel Government to resort to this policy? There is no war and there are no special circumstances existing which demand such a heavy burden, which is proposed to be imposed on the people. If these moneyed classes are crippled in their resources, I do not think there will be any industrial enterprise undertaken by the people, and if this does not happen, then I cannot understand how the prosperity of the country can increase.

With regard to kerosene oil, I would say that the tax would hit the poorest people in the country very hard. Even in places where there is electric light, for example, Lahore, Delhi and other places, the poorest people, who cannot enjoy the benefits of the electric light, have to burn their dim lights in order to illumine the darkness around them, and these people buy kerosene oil to make their huts cheerful. And if kerosene oil is taxed, then Government would take away from these poor people even of this little consolation. Is it fair and is it right to deprive these poor people of this little commodity, this little chance to light their houses?

Sir, one does recognise the necessity of Government to fill the gap of deficit, and the only stronghold where the treasure lies which could be taken to fill this gap is the military stronghold. I need not expatiate on this subject, as other Honourable Members have fully discussed the military situation in India, but I would certainly add my little quota to it. Sir, the military situation in India at present is such that India has no fear from any foreign aggression. Every country in the world has its military forces ready to meet any foreign aggression and to repel it. And perhaps France or Germany or any other country may require her military strength to be kept up-to-date for fear of mutual antagonism. But here in India this is not the case. Look at our borders. I shall proceed from Burma from the side of China. In China we find a civil war is raging and there is not a ghost of a chance of the Chinese attacking India. Then, we can travel towards Afghanistan and make a big jump from China to Afghanistan. Well, in Afghanistan there is no immediate danger for India. In fact, I never thought that there was any danger for India from Afghanistan. The Government there is now engaged in reorganising its resources and its administration. In fact, if there is any danger to Afghanistan, India may possibly have to help her. Then going from Afghanistan to Persia, we find that there is no peril from this side. Persia is not in a position to attack India. If we leave these two countries alone and go beyond them, we find Russia dominant in those countries. Some apostles of the forward policy may say that Russia might attack through these countries, but I do not believe in this. Russia cannot attack India thousands of miles away from her base. The military strategists may know better, but those who have studied the conditions of the world situation may sometimes offer useful advice and criticism. It is impossible for Russia to attack us. Russia may indulge in propaganda work. The Soviet Government may spread propaganda by subtle means, but she cannot bring her forces to attack India, especially through Afghanistan, when Afghanistan herself is not in a position to give material help to the invaders. Therefore, Sir, I do not understand how it is that the Government of India maintain such an expensive force in India when it is not at all needed. The Government of India maintain a force, which is on a war footing, but the war is not at all in sight, especially on the borders of India. Then, what justification is there for the maintenance of such a large force? This force consumes a very great proportion of the revenues of India, and these revenues come from the pockets of the poorest people. Government exists for the happiness of the people and for their comfort, and for their peace, and if a Government takes away the little the people have to feed themselves and their children, what justification is there for that Government to say that it is a civilised government, an enlightened government for the good of the people? The efficiency of the Government lies certainly in ensuring peace and prosperity to the country. But their present military policy would certainly not show that they are, by taxing the poor, following the policy of efficiency.

Sir, much has been said with regard to the situation in India vis-a-vis the Conference, which may be held in the near future. Although I believe that very strenuous and honest efforts are being made to conciliate India, and to bring about a harmony of aim and purpose, at the same time I cannot close my eyes to the situation which at present prevails in India. We may suspect the motives of Government at home, we may suspect the situation or the formation of new parties in England and their ulterior motives, yet, to be honest and fair, I must say that, if we want success, if we want to carry our aspirations and ambitions to a successful issue, we must face the conditions in England by bringing about a much needed harmony of interests in India itself. Without that, however we may blame Government, however we may try to show to the world that we are able to manage our own affairs, nobody, I am afraid, will feel impressed by mere verbal claims. The world will only feel impressed when we show a united front, and I have every hope that there is a disposition existing in the country at present that there should be a blending of interests of the different peoples in India. And I think the near future may bring about a perfect unity among the people. We have reasonable men amongst us. (An Honourable Member: "Question.") The question becomes very great, I am afraid, when you yourself question it. We have certainly, in spite of what my friend may say, among us people who understand politics, who understand that unity alone can bring about freedom and liberty to this country. But what is being done? My Honourable friend to my right, Mr. Jinnah, says that an army is necessary for the purpose of bringing about unity.

Mr. M. A. Jinnah (Bombay City: Muhammadan Urban): I did not say that at all.

Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan: Then, what did he say?

Mr. M. A. Jinnah: I will say if my time comes.

Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan: If the Honourable Member wants to hear my reply then, I am here.

Mr. M. A. Jinnah: My observations were not meant for the Honourable Members at all.

Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan: Then, I am very grateful to my Honourable friend.

Mr. M. A. Jinnah: But he did not quite grasp what I said.

Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan: My hearing is rather defective. Well, Sir, in spite of this confession on the part of my Honourable friend, I would still persist in saying that there are sensible men among us, and I would put foremost among them my Honourable friend, Mr. Jinnah himself, (Hear, hear and Applause.) and I hope that he will emerge from that Unity Conference, which is at present sitting, with the biggest credentials and will show to the world that the impossible has been achieved. (Hear, hear.) Sir, there is nobody belonging to any country, and there is no citizen of any country, who does not want that his country should not have the breeze of freedom and liberty blown across its face, and I therefore say that, whether I belong to the Muslim community, or whether I belong to any other community, it is our united desire that India should be as dignified, that India should be as independent, (Hear, hear.) and that India should enjoy as much liberty as any member of the British Empire. (Hear, hear.) For this purpose, I am certain that the Indians are ready to make sacrifices. Knowing from my contact with the young and the old, and knowing the temper of the people, I feel sure that this readiness to sacrifice something to achieve the liberties of India will go a very great length in securing for the people of India those liberties which are her birthright. Now, Sir,

Mr. President: I think the Honourable Member must conclude now.

Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan: I shall take my seat, Sir.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar: Sir, in intervening in the debate at such a late stage, my justification is that I wish to invite the attention of the House to one or two important features which arise on the Budget. I do not wish to go into the technical side of the Budget, first, for the reason that I have no time, and secondly, I do not pretend to be an expert in those matters. I will offer my comments on the Budget as a politician, as a layman, and will present the House, for its consideration, with one or two important questions which arise on the Budget. I take the Budget as a kind of diagnosis of the Indian financial situation offered by a very friendly and expert physician, Sir George Schuster. May I remind him that, when he assumed charge, he was reported to have conceived his office as that of a physician called upon to diagnose and improve the financial situation of the country? A local paper reports his speech as couched in the terms of a famous oath of Hippocrates:

"I will use all ways of medical treatment that shall be for the advantage of the sufferers, according to my power and judgment, and will protect them from injury and injustice. Nor will I give to any man, though I be asked to give it, any deadly drug, nor will I consent that it should be given, but purely and holily I will keep guard on my life and my art."

That, Sir, is the conception of Sir George Schuster of his own office, and therefore the diagnosis of the financial situation, coming from such an expert and friendly ministrant, is entitled to great consideration. I may call the attention of the House to the fact that, before this statement of Sir George Schuster was made about a year ago, it was preceded by an equally important observation of his predecessor, Sir Basil Blackett, who promised the House an abundance of surpluses as a result of his financial policy. I will quote a short extract from his speech. He is reported to have said:

"Intrinsically the financial position of the Government of India seems to me to be sound and prosperous. From 1929-30 onwards"—

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

[5TH MAR. 1930.]

[Mr. M. R. Jayakar.]

Honourable Members will please mark these words:

"From 1929-30 onwards it will be the privilege of this House and of my friend and successor, Sir George Schuster, whose acceptance of the post is a matter of great personal satisfaction to me, to find no outside claimant to the recurring surpluses, which I hope it will be their good fortune to enjoy in the coming years, and they will be free to turn their minds on the one hand to new directions in which money can be usefully laid out for India's advancement."

Well, Sir, that is the diagnosis of a physician whose innings was over, and on the scene came an expert medical man in the person of Sir George Schuster. Therefore, his diagnosis of the present situation is very important. What is his diagnosis of the financial situation? Throughout his budget speech, he suggests in several paragraphs, as if he used the words specifically, "I have made every attempt at retrenchment and economy. I have tried my best to see where I could make cuts and the Budget I present to the House is a result of that endeavour; it is impossible to make further economies". I hope that I am not unfair to Sir George Schuster in regarding this as the main implication of the Budget. The Budget is the result of a very close scrutiny on the part of Sir George Schuster, an expert who came with a great reputation in other parts of the world, and is the scion of a high family of great financiers in Europe. His diagnosis of the present situation, which fills me with apprehension, is this, that there is no scope for further economy in the Departments of the Government as constituted at present. His other diagnosis, which fills me with even greater dismay, is that India is in a state of chronic indebtedness, and the extent of her indebtedness, speaking roughly, is about 1½ crores a year normally. I am not an expert in figures, gentlemen

Mr. President: Order, order.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar: I am not an expert in figures and I am stating what strikes me as a layman. I may frankly say to my Honourable friends that it is this aspect of the Budget which fills me with complete despair. The opinion of an expert like Sir George Schuster is that Government have practically come to the end of their tether, that we cannot run the Government except with a habitual deficit of 1½ crores, and that, but for windfalls like the German reparations and the income-tax from the Privy Council, we should have an additional deficit of 1½ crores even in the present Budget. Well, Sir, it is this insolvent aspect of the Budget which I want to put before my Honourable friends. In other words, without mincing words, Sir George Schuster tells us that the Government of India is a bankrupt Government. I am only paraphrasing, in plain words, the observations of the Finance Member.

4 P.M. He tells us, without using these very words, that India has arrived at a stage when her Government has become bankrupt. We must all thank the Finance Member for his frankness, to which I invite the attention of the House.

The remedy suggested is a very difficult one. I do not want to go into the technicalities of the cotton duties, for two reasons; because at the present moment it may not be right to offer any opinion on that, pending the discussions which are going on, and secondly, because it is a somewhat technical question, and I do not claim to have first-hand acquaintance with it. I will leave the question alone for the moment. I shall now refer to another matter, which struck me when I read the budget speech, I mean the portion which relates to the Military Department. Lord Bryce, the great constitutional authority of England, once visited India. He was led by his curiosity to travel throughout this country. On his departure he was asked what he thought of the system of Government in India. Lord Bryce is not in any way a person biased by Indian views. His views therefore are of independent value. I will state to the House the remark which he made about the system of Government in India. He is reported to have said, "I smelt gunpowder everywhere in India", a very significant remark indeed, proceeding from a person of Lord Bryce's acquaintance with constitutional questions and his impartiality and detachment as a person unconnected with India. May I say that I too smell gunpowder everywhere throughout the Budget? A great joke has been perpetrated of 80 lakhs retrenchment in 55 crores of rupees in the Military Department! Sir George Schuster will excuse me for saying so, but it is indeed nothing more. 80 lakhs of rupees in 55 crores; and that too spread over three years; half the revenue at one stroke assigned to the Military !!! When the yearly revenue arrives, the Government distribute it at once into two parts, one for the military and the other for everything else. And all that Sir George Schuster is able to do, with his great friendliness for Indians and his expert knowledge, is to cut down 80 lakhs in three years.

I want Honourable Members to examine the implications of this, that we have arrived at a stage when our Government, otherwise bankrupt, insist on spending half its revenue on fighting. As the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition said, let us hope that this is the last Budget of the present Government. Let us all hope that the next Budget will be different, both in its nature and authorship. But what we have to see today is that we have the testimonial of an expert that this Government is on its last legs, has come to the end of its tether, and cannot proceed. The remedy suggested does not strike the non-official mind as either proper or adequate. It is a scheme of taxation not for the purpose of giving relief to the nation-building departments, but for the purpose of enabling Government to set their house in order. Further taxation for the purpose of enabling a spendthrift Government to make both ends meet!! I am not an economist, Sir George Schuster is. I learnt my economics at college many years ago, but I remember learning the elementary lesson that new taxation cannot be justified on the ground that it enables the spendthrift to meet his extravagance. I can understand new taxation for the purpose of enabling the Provincial Governments to go on progressively in their nation-building departments. When I say this I am not ignorant of the hope held out by Sir George Schuster that if there are surpluses—note the condition—if there are surpluses they will be handed over to the Provincial Governments for the purposes of the nation-building departments. He does not say there will be surpluses, but if there are surpluses they will be handed over. I submit, Sir, that this is a delusive canon of taxation.

Sir, I do not wish to speak long, because I know Sir George Schuster must have enough time to reply. I now come to another part of his budget speech, namely, the appeal made to the non-official Benches by

[Mr. M. R. Jayakar.]

Sir George Schuster and His Majesty's Government behind him, to strike a responsive note at this time as a kind of prelude to the ensuing Round Table Conference. You have ruled, Sir, that this is not the time to go into the question of the Round Table Conference. I will therefore not go into that matter at all. But may I say that we are not unwilling to respond and to strike a responsive note, we all know how every day some of my friends, on this side are engaged in creating a responsive atmosphere. But may I draw the attention of the Government of India to the necessity of creating a similar atmosphere on their side? A responsive note, as the word "responsive" denotes is a correlative and reciprocal process. May I draw the attention of the Government of India to the necessity of pulling up their own men in this connection? In these days when the Government of India are thinking of calling a Round Table Conference, and asking for a responsive atmosphere, what are their own pensioned servants doing,—men who have fattened on the money of the Indian people and drew salaries from the Government of India, men who have retired from here and are being sustained by the revenues of the people of India,—what note are they striking? Are they helping the creation of such an atmosphere? May I in this connection draw the attention of the Government Benches to a report in the Statesman of the 27th February? I will just explain by way of preface what I am referring to. Honourable Members will remember that, a few days ago, I was so fortunate as to get, with the aid of the European Group, a Resolution through this House, that simultaneous examinations for the Indian Medical Service be started in India and England. It was a very mild Resolution, which even the European Group saw the justice of helping me to get through. Referring to that little episode in this House, some remarks have been made in England by a gentleman called Sir Cecil Walsh. This person had the distinction of being a Judge of the High Court of Allahabad, and if my memory is correct, he made himself notorious even when he was a Judge, by his anti-Indian feelings. While a judge, he wrote a book which, as Pandit Kunzru tells me, created a great sensation at the Bar, for his venom against the Indian people. This gentleman has now retired apparently on a fat pension and safe in his retirement, and probably from a cheap boarding house in London, which is often the haunt of such spent up men, he is fulminating against the people whose salt he eats. This gentleman has the audacity,—I wish the Government of India would pull him up for it—he has the audacity to say with reference to my Resolution, I am reading from a report of his speech appearing in the Statesman:

"Sir Cecil Walsh is specially scathing in his condemnation of the half-heartedness of the official Europeans in the Assembly on the occasion utilised by Mr. Jayakar to press, on racial grounds, the claim of Indians to the places and the authority of the Indian Medical Service. Is it not time, asks Sir Cecil Walsh, that English spokesmen in the Assembly stiffened their backs against some of these sharp shooters (of Mr. Jayakar) instead of constantly showing the white feather or retreating from the fight?"

Then he goes on to say,—a most extraordinary statement proceeding from an ex-High Court Judge—that if Indians are appointed in larger numbers in the Indian Medical Service, then:

"The English woman will be obliged to leave India by reason of the lack of reliable medical assistance and the Englishman too will go, and with him the British Raj."

This is the atmosphere that the pensioners of the Government of India are creating in England. This is an atmosphere, the growth of which the Government of India can at once check, and I thought it was necessary for me to draw the attention of Sir George Schuster and his colleagues in the Government to this fact in order that steps might be taken to silence the garrulous pomposity of this ex-judge. This person is, I understand, the President of the Anglo-Indian Association. I should therefore like to ask Colonel Gidney, who has great experience in this matter, whether he thinks that English men and English women in India will leave the country for the simple reason that a few places are given to Indians?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indians): As President of the Anglo-Indian Association and representative of the community in this House, I dissociate myself entirely from the insulting and scurrilous statements Sir Cecil Walsh has made.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar: I am very glad to have that assurance, and I hope that the Government Benches will also dissociate themselves from these offensive lies. Let them remove this irresponsible atmosphere on their side, and we shall be ready to reciprocate. The remedy for the evils touched in the speech of the Finance Member is strict and drastic Indianisation. That is the one remedy that I can suggest. I am not relying on any racial grounds. I am speaking merely from the point of view of economy and retrenchment. As the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, pointed out, the one thing necessary is to Indianise the services and curtail the army expenses. I do not wish to refer to the experience of other countries which came to the conclusion that only 20 per cent. of the total income could be justifiably spent on military expenditure. Whatever other countries may have to say, I know that in my own country it is a most wicked system, under which 55 crores out of about 135 crores are dispensed on military matters.

Another suggestion I should like to make to Sir George Schuster, and to the House also, is that India is too poor to run simultaneously two militant Departments, Civil Aviation and the Army, in full strength. If the ambition of the Government is that these two Departments should go on progressing simultaneously, it will be a disaster. I would wish the House to be careful the next time grants for Civil Aviation come before us. Let the House ask boldly the question of the Government Benches, what retrenchment are they going to make in the Army Department as a result of an advance in aviation? As the result of our grants, progress in aviation will take place, and on the occasion of each such grant let the Government Benches tell us what corresponding economies they are going to effect in the Army Department? I hope the Honourable Members will therefore be more careful, when the occasion comes, and not grant a single farthing for civil aviation until Government agree to make corresponding economies on the army side.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): Sir, I am afraid that I shall have to ask the House to descend from the rather high altitudes in which they have been travelling on Mr. Jayakar's eloquent wings. My task concerns itself with hard and dry facts, and it will be necessary for me to deal with some of those facts. But I would like to express a word of gratitude to my Honourable and learned friend for having reminded me of that oath to which I made reference in my first budget speech last year, as something which expressed perhaps in words which were rather more romantic than are usually employed by those engaged in my material calling of finance, but which nevertheless did express what was to be my desire in administering the heavy task which rests upon me now. For if there is one note which I have tried to strike in framing my budget proposals this year, it is the recognition of my obligations as an honest physician charged with the care of the financial health of this country. It has not been an easy task, and I knew that it would not be a popular task; but I feel that the very worst service which I could do to India would be to disguise the difficulties of the case and to deal with the present situation by mere temporary expedients.

Sir, before I deal with the main framework of the case which has been put against the Government by many of the speakers on the other side of the House, there are one or two particular points—points, some of them of importance—which were raised by various speakers in regard to which, I think, I owe a definite answer, and I would like to deal with those first so as not to interrupt, at a later stage, the main thread of my argument.

Questions were raised as to the reactions of the proposed duty on silver, on silver ware and silver thread, and I was also asked, I think, what the Government proposed to do as regards silver produced by local mines. I am not prepared to give a final answer on any of those points. I can only say this, that they are receiving the attention of the Government. I fully appreciate the points that have been made on the other side, and I hope to be in a position to give definite views on those points very shortly.

Then, my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, raised a particular point as regards our proposals with reference to the Gold Standard Reserve interest. I feel that it is important I should give an explanation on that. My Honourable friend suggested that we were putting by a sum of £150,000, which he calculated as equivalent to 30 lakhs.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas (Indian Merchants' Chamber: Indian Commerce): Twenty.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I beg my Honourable friend's pardon. I understood him to say 30 lakhs. He seemed to be under the impression that we had a sum of 20 lakhs which we might have used for the relief of revenue this year. I should like to explain exactly what the proposal is. The proposal is that we should treat as a standard revenue in respect of the Gold Standard Reserve a sum of £1,600,000 and that if in any one year the revenue exceeds that sum, the excess shall be treated in the following way; one half should go to an equalisation fund and the remaining half should be credited to revenue. To give an illustration of the way in which the system hitherto in force is worked, I quoted figures for the last two years and explained that, as a result of the sudden depreciation in our investments at the end of the year 1928-29, our receipts had only been £1,200,000 roughly, whereas in the current year, 1929-30, owing to the recovery of that loss and to high rates of interest prevailing, our receipts have been £2,400,000, and I explained that this was very disturbing as a budgetary factor. It will be far better if we can rely on a regular receipt under this head and not have the results disturbed by temporary changes in the rates of interest prevailing in London. The figure which we have suggested as our standard revenue is what we considered to be a safe average rate, £1,600,000, representing the interest on a sum of £40,000,000 held in the Gold Standard Reserve, less the amount which they actually held in gold, which is rather over £2,000,000. That represents slightly over 4 per cent. which is, if anything, rather an optimistic estimate of what we can get from our temporary investments of the Gold Standard Reserve. Therefore, I think, looking to the future, that is a sound provision. If anything, I say the estimate is a little bit too liberal. There is nothing that we could draw upon this year to help out the Budget of next year. The figure on which we estimate receipts next year is £1,700,000, but I think it is quite likely that we shall not realise that sum. We have actually included in the Budget, working on our new rules, a sum of £1,650,000, representing the standard revenue of £1,600,000 and half the surplus of £100,000. I think, as I said just now, that we should be fortunate if we realised the full amount, because, since the estimates were made up, rates of interest in London have further come down, and, if anything, I think that is likely to be an over-estimate. There is really no chance of our realising much more than what we are budgeting for.

My Honourable friend raised another question in that connection and asked whether the new principle which we are introducing implied any particular intention to dispose of our investments in the Gold Standard Reserve. The alteration in procedure was made as a piece of sound financial practice; it has no reference to any future intentions; but it is a sound financial practice, because the Reserve is there to be utilised, and it ought to represent at any time the real realisable value of the assets which are supposed to be there. From that point of view, it is important to keep the assets valued at the current price of the day.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: I wish to put a question if the Honourable Member is willing to give way. Supposing these securities are held up to the time they mature, can there be any loss at all when the securities are finally realised? That, I thought, was the question I raised.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I am not disputing my Honourable friend's contention that, if the securities are held till they mature, unless the British Government goes bankrupt, there will be no loss, but the point is that it may be desirable to sell them or exchange them for some other form of investment before they mature, and we want to have that particular Reserve always representing the sum which it purports to represent. If there was any depreciation on any particular investment which had not been provided for, there would be a deficiency in the published valuation of the Reserve.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: Depreciation can come on only if you sell the securities before maturity. Otherwise is it not a mere book entry for the purpose of valuation as required by statute?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: My Honourable friend is perfectly correct in saying that it is a mere book entry. These investments have now been written down, and when they appreciate again in value, the book loss is recovered. There is no difference as regards the ultimate result, and the provision which we now propose to introduce will correct the effects in our budgetary results of any possible alteration in the valuation of the investments, and I think this new provision will really achieve a most desirable object.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: Would the procedure I suggested be in correct, Sir, from that point of view?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: It is very difficult to say what is exactly correct in dealing with a fund of this kind. I might, as a matter of confidence, tell this House that I myself argued at great length on exactly the same lines which have been present to the mind of my Honourable friend, but I was ultimately convinced that the procedure which we propose to adopt is the correct procedure. I should be very glad, Sir, to discuss this at length with my Honourable friend. I feel that perhaps at the present moment we are taking an undue time of the House on what is rather a technical question.

Turning, Sir, to the general case which has been made against the Government, we have not had from the greater number of speakers any detailed criticism of the particular proposals of taxation which I have put forward. The case has rather been argued on more general grounds. It has been said, how can the country face this great and increased burden of taxation? What is the justification for imposing it? A very frequent line of argument has been that we are already at the high water mark of taxation at which we arrived during the war and that now, instead of seeing the tide go down, the public are asked to acquiesce in its rising again to a point which can never have been contemplated. I have endeavoured, Sir, in my budget speech to present the position as it faces us at present as clearly as possible, and to explain to the House exactly why it is that we find this gap to fill. I did not take into review the past history of taxation, and I should like to refer to one or two figures in that connection. Taxes in India—and I think one may include in a nation's taxes both the railway and posts and telegraph rates and direct taxes—were increased by very substantial amounts from the years 1916-17 to 1922-23. In fact, taking railway rates, my summary tells me that there was, during that period, a total increase in fares representing Rs. 11·95 crores, and that in other taxation there was a total increase of Rs. 37·29 crores. Then followed the regime of my predecessor, and in the years 1923-24 to 1928-29, there were actually effected, as the result of definite reductions in rates or taxes, reduction of revenue of just over Rs. 5 crores on railway fares, and over Rs. 2 crores on taxation—a total of Rs. 7·12 crores, and on top of that there was the total remission of the provincial contributions, representing Rs. 9·83 crores. Therefore there was a reduction in what the Central Government could rely upon for their own expenditure of about Rs. 17 crores. Now, the whole point of my presentation of the case has been that expectations of revenue on which the final remission of the provincial contributions was proposed—those expectations of revenue have, for a variety of reasons, not been fulfilled. I do not take a very gloomy view of the position merely because those particular expectations have not been fulfilled. I recognise that this country, like every other country which is mainly a producer of agricultural commodities, is passing through an extremely difficult period today, but I do not regard it as more than a part of the normal ebb and flow of economic movement which now is perhaps more than normal, because we have not yet recovered from the violent oscillations set up by the shock of the Great War. But I feel that we are in one of those periods of depression from which, if history repeats itself—and there is no reason why economic history should not repeat itself in this respect—from which there is every reason to expect a recovery. It is unfortunate that such a period should have come upon the country just after a great risk had been taken in the final remission of the provincial contributions, but I cannot feel that the case is much worse than that. There is perhaps another factor which has supervened, and that is, that the normal growth of expenditure has perhaps been larger than was anticipated, and I think that possibly in the years following the operations of the Retrenchment Committee there was some very ruthless cutting out of particular kinds of work which it had not been really in the interests of Government to have cut out. Those factors have created the gap which we have to face today. So much for the past.

Now, as regards the present picture, I really think that I can claim that I have presented it in a way which could not possibly be misunderstood in my budget speech. And the point I want to make is that this gap, with which we are faced and which I feel that we must fill by sound methods, is not caused by any immediate extravagance, not by any growth of expenditure, but by certain unavoidable causes namely, the interest charges on deadweight debt, the deterioration in the main commercial services, and the fact that we are now proposing to adopt a sounder method in dealing with our liabilities in respect of Postal Cash Certificates. These are the main factors in the situation, and these added to our previous gap of Rs. 90 lakhs which I disclosed last year make up the total for which I have to find balancing revenue. It would no doubt have been possible to disguise all these facts, but I could not reconcile it—I could never reconcile it—with my own financial conscience to have taken such a course. As regards the future I venture to say—although I always hesitate on these matters to make any sort of prophecy—that if we adopt the procedure which I have proposed this year we shall put the country into a very sound position, and that if things go normally with India, we shall find ourselves in the position of being able to devote funds to that nation-building expenditure which all Honourable Members opposite have pressed for.

Before I deal further with that I must make a few remarks on the actual proposals for taxation which I have made. I think I may conclude, from what has been said in the course of this debate, that there is some criticism in all quarters of some of the taxes, and some support in all quarters again for some of the taxes, and that the criticism and support fairly evenly balances itself out. But I am unshaken in the remarks which I made in my original speech that, in the case of all the taxes that I have proposed, there is some counterbalancing advantage. I referred to the possibility of one exception; I thought that possibly it would be difficult to find a counterbalancing advantage in such a direct impost as the income-tax; but there again I could not reconcile it with my own financial conscience to put forward these new proposals without including some form of direct taxation; and perhaps this consideration might commend itself to my critics on the other side, that the introduction of this particular feature will bring home to all of us who are supposed to be responsible for this extravagance, that if there is Government extravagance, we also have to suffer. I think that there is an element of fairness in that, and possibly that consideration will carry some weight with my friends on the other side.

As regards the tax on silver, I thought I had made it clear in my original speech what were the main reasons which caused us to turn at this particular moment to this levy. I was disappointed, I must confess, in the speech of my Honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition, to find that, although I understood that he was very troubled in his thoughts about the existing holders of silver, his consideration has now been diverted to the interests of those who propose to purchase silver in the future. I myself feel quite certain that, in imposing this tax, we have put on something which can hardly be removed, and the danger of loss being incurred by its removal, which was one of the points to which my Honourable and learned friend referred, need not be taken seriously. It can be removed in the unlikely event of silver rising very appreciably, and of course if silver was to rise to anything like its war-time value, to a point where the bullion value of the rupee approximated to its face value, then obviously it would be the policy of the Government to take it off. But otherwise, so far as the position of holders in the country is concerned, the particular point made by my Honourable friend does not, I think, arise.

Now, Sir, in connection with silver, I have been asked, and the demand has been particularly pressed by my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, that we should make a disclosure of the total operations of the Government since the recommendations of the Currency Commission, and I have been very anxious to take the occasion of my intervention in this debate to give my Honourable friend the information which he desires. I wish to make it very clear that I am doing so as a very special case, because I believe no one appreciates better than my Honourable friend how difficult it would be, in the course of ordinary operations, for the Government at all times to be ready to make public what they are doing. The silver market is a difficult market, a tricky market, and for successful operation in that market it is necessary that our plans should not be publicly disclosed. Subject to that reservation, I wish to give the House this information. The total amount of silver sold since the Currency Commission's Report to the end of February, 1930, was 67·8 million fine ounces. The lowest London price on which any contract for refined silver has been based is 22½d. per standard ounce. The average price at which refined silver has been sold works out at 25½d. per ounce. I think that that statement, if it is considered, will answer some of the charges which have been made against the Government. It will indicate, in the first place, that Government have not been in the market during the whole of the recent period of weakness; it will also indicate that our total sales of just under 68 million ounces over a period of three or four years have not been an overriding factor in the world position. It would also indicate that there has been some public advantage in our policy. I daresay some of my Honourable friends will query this, because they will say that, if the Government of India had not sold, the price of silver today would be very much higher than it is; but that I may say is an appreciation of the position which I, after very careful consideration, cannot accept. In any case let us compare the average price which we have got for that silver with the price that prevails today. The average price we got was 25½d. per ounce and the price today is about 19½d. Therefore, on the quantity we have sold, we have realised more than we should realise if we sold today, to the extent of £17,00,000. That at least indicates that the public interest has to some extent been benefited by the Government's policy.

I do not wish, Sir, to attempt to deal in detail with any of the rest of the taxation proposals. I only wish to touch very shortly on some remarks which have fallen from speakers opposite in connection with the Government's cotton proposals. I wish to refer particularly to what was said by my Honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition. I would ask him to read again the way in which I presented the original proposal to this House. He referred to our proposal as interference in a very insidious form. I think, that, if there is one thing that I can claim for the manner in which this subject has been handled, it is complete straightforward frankness. There has been nothing insidious about it. We have definitely put our cards on the table and said, "This is put before the House for the House to discuss".

The other point that I wish to make is—and it is a point, I think, which has not been quite clearly appreciated—that our conclusion on an appreciation of the whole position was that no claim for a general increase in the rate of duty to anything more than 15 per cent. had been established, and that it was only if the incidence of the additional 5 per cent. was limited, that any further duty could be considered by the Government of India, having regard to consumers' interests. I wish to make that very clear, and having said that I leave this subject.

I have dealt, Sir, with the general financial position, and the relation of our new taxation proposals to the past and the present. Looking to the future, I had in mind, as I made most clear in my statement, very particularly the needs of the provinces. Having said that, I come to two points with which I particularly wish to deal, because, in all the criticisms which have been made, there are two points which have mainly come home to me. The first point is that, instead of imposing new taxation, I ought to have found the funds by retrenchment, and the other point is the application of the proceeds. It has been said by some critics in reference to that, "We could have consented even to this taxation if the proceeds of it were going to be employed in nation-building services". Or again, in other words, it has been asked, "What are the Government doing as regards the constructive economic policy?" Those are points of great weight; they are points which have been chiefly present to my own mind in dealing with the whole situation this year.

Now, as regards retrenchment, I would ask Honourable Members to face the facts and to consider the position in which we are placed. I think retrenchment must be considered under two headings. There is retrenchment in detail, the careful elimination of waste in any particular department, and there is retrenchment on a large scale, which means the elimination of whole services, or the alteration of conditions of service on a large scale, or other changes of policy. As regards the former, I believe that the method which I am trying to follow is the most effective method. A great deal more work has been done on this matter than I was able to reveal or explain in my budget speech. My Department has, during the last few months, been working on an analysis of how this growth of expenditure has come upon us, but I have found that, in order to get really satisfactory results, it is necessary to have an officer on special duty for the purpose. That proposal I have clearly explained already. It is a matter which requires prolonged work. It is no use suddenly appointing a Retrenchment Committee to go into questions of this kind. It involves the examination of a great deal of detail, and in that connection, I want to refer to one particular item of the growth of expenditure to which critical reference has been made. I referred in my budget speech to the increasing expenditure, as a result of normal increments of pay, which I put down largely to the operation of our time-scale basis of pay. It seems to have been concluded by many speakers that those increments of pay were increments of pay to members of the Indian Civil Service, based on the recommendations of the Lee Commission. That is far from expressing the truth. The main part of the increments—I cannot give the detailed figures, but this is one of the subjects which will be studied very carefully by our Retrenchment Officer. The main part of this growth in expenditure represents increment in the pay of members of the subordinate services, and we are always being faced with new demands in that direction. My colleagues on the Standing Finance Committee know very well how these things come up, and when I hear from Honourable Members opposite, as was said by one speaker, that they have no sympathy with the Government in their position, I would remind them that the demands for improved conditions of service, particularly for members of the subordinate staff, almost always come from Honourable Members opposite; and one demand leads to another. We are faced with what looks like a hard case, involving perhaps a small sum of money, and particular terms of service for a particular branch of a Department are improved. As soon as that is done, another branch of another Department comes along and says that we must equalise conditions for them and so on. And this perpetual rising up the scale is going on, step by step, as a result of comparison between one branch of service and another. It is not only in the hands of the Central Government that the power to control this process lies. It often happens that these demands are based on comparisons with conditions prevailing in branches of provincial services. I think myself, that the time has come to conduct a detailed review of the whole position in that respect. We must know where we are, and what future commitments we are likely to be involved in. We must have some idea of what the peak figure of expenditure is likely to be. This process is always going on, for, apart from alterations in the basic conditions, we have the normal increments working, and we have certainly not yet reached the peak figure in this respect. We are approaching a time when the whole of our position will come under review, and there will undoubtedly be a drastic alteration in the distribution of heads of revenue. We as a Central Government have got to review our position, we have got to find ways of helping the provinces. Before that time comes, it is most important that we should know exactly where we stand and have some sort of forecast of what these normal increases in revenue are going to involve for us. That is really the main object of this particular retrenchment inquiry which we are conducting, but in addition to ascertaining what the real facts of the case are, we shall of course most ruthlessly hunt out any sort of extravagance.

On the other hand, if we turn to what I describe as the second class of economy, economy on a big scale, I would ask Honourable Members to consider how I can possibly tackle questions of that kind when we stand, as we do today, on the eve of a constitutional revision. This matter cannot be dealt with pending the constitutional revision. I want Honourable Members to understand this, because I confess that I did feel that I came before them with a much poorer statement, a much poorer record of work done, in the way of retrenchment than I had hoped for when I spoke at this time last year. I want them to realise the position, I want them to realise the difficulties under which one has been working, and I want to make it quite clear to them that I do not think that the work which can be done in the way of retrenchment has yet been completed. That is a frank acknowledgment of the position,

Now, that brings me to the point whether my new taxation proposals are justified when I have made that acknowledgment. I feel they are justified, and that is what I have tried to explain in my budget speech. If I felt that there was a prospect of a big permanent reduction in expenditure, I might well have hesitated to make the proposals which I have made. But let us face the facts. Honourable Members opposite seem to entertain the idea that officials like myself and my colleagues are very costly to the taxpayer in India. I am absolutely certain of one thing, and that is that, whatever the form of constitutional reform which is coming, if it is a reform which is going to mean an advance in the direction of representative and responsible government, that reform is going to cost you more. You cannot get away from it. At present we have, sitting on these benches six members of a Cabinet responsible for the Government of the whole of India. The claims on the time of all officials are growing every day. We undoubtedly, in the future, shall have longer Sessions, more interest in the work of the Government among unofficial Members, and quite rightly too. I entirely welcome it, but you cannot get away from the fact that it is going to cost more.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya: Increase the power to produce more wealth.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I am now dealing with the expenditure side. I feel quite certain that, as regards the administrative services of the country, there is no big prospect of retrenchment. I feel very conscious of the need for making a great effort to make retrenchment, but I could not feel on that ground that there was any reason for postponing the taxation which I was proposing.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya: Why don't you propose the reduction of a few battalions for internal security? There are 28 battalions of internal security. Why cannot a few of them be dispensed with?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I was dealing, as my Honourable friend may have appreciated, with civil expenditure. Coming now to the other main field of expenditure, to which of course very considerable comment and criticism has been directed in the course of this debate, the military expenditure side, there again I would ask Honourable Members to recollect what our position is. One of the great disappointments to me has been the reception which my proposals have had for the reduction of 80 lakhs in the military expenditure. That was treated, as my Honourable and learned friend Mr. Jayakar said, as a joke. I think that is one of the words which he used. I think that has a far different significance. After all, a reduction of very nearly 2 per cent. in expenditure is an important reduction, and I ask Honourable Members to regard it as a sign that there is an effort being made to reduce military expenditure, and that when the present period of re-equipment is completed on that ground alone there will be a substantial reduction.

Dr. B. S. Moonje: What is the likely amount?

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: But whatever room there is for reduction in military expenditure, that again is a subject which, on a large scale, we cannot tackle just at the present stage. We are committed to this programme of re-equipment, and as soon as that is completed, the future will be considered, but I do not believe that it would have been possible to deal with that question in a more drastic and effective way than I have done in the circumstances which face us this year.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: I thought you were coming to the change of policy.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I was trying to make it clear that changes of policy could not be considered at the present stage.

Nawab Sir Sahibzada Abdul Qaiyum: I want to know whether it will be safe to reduce the number of troops, with inadequate communications and long distances to be traversed. The North East and North West Borders are fully armed, and excitements of all sorts are going on over there. In the present state of things there, will it be safe to reduce the present Army by a single person?

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya: Quite safe.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster: I think it will be inappropriate to enter upon a debate upon the military necessities at the present moment. I was trying to make the point that this is not the time when large questions of changes in military policy can be tackled, and we have to deal with facts, and in my budget proposals, I have to face the facts as they are. On these grounds, I felt that it was necessary to face, in my own words, the situation as I had presented it. On top of that, I added the further justification that, if things went well, and if in addition to that it was possible to find economies, we had, waiting before us, the urgent need of more money for the provinces. It is in that connection I referred to the possibility of distributing more revenue to the provinces. I am not asking the Assembly to provide money which is not immediately required for the next twelve months. My position is that we need every penny for which I am asking them to vote the taxation. What I do say is that, if at the end of that time, it should prove that there is a margin over and above our permanent requirements, then the imposition of taxation will have been justified, because we shall have waiting before us these needs for finding more money for the provinces, of which I have spoken so often.

Then, I would turn finally to that other point—the application of the proceeds of taxation. We have been asked, what are the Government doing towards a constructive economic policy. A great deal has been said about the Government's failure to pursue any constructive policy in the past. I think in any case our eyes now should rather be on the future than on the past. The main channel of expenditure on this basis, which Honourable Members have in mind must, as I have said, be the Provincial Governments. Therefore they cannot expect to find in the Central Government a very large proportion of that kind of expenditure which they wish to see undertaken; but I can claim, I think, that, in the proposals which I have put forward in the Budget this year, there are definite signs of an attempt to deal with the economic situation. We have our cotton proposals; we have our special sugar proposals; we have the continuance of our obligations as regards the agricultural research work; and we have a thing in which I am particularly interested, our vote of money for the banking inquiry. All these seem to me to be important steps, indicating the desire on the part of the Government to intervene as effectively as they can in certain phases of national life where Government intervention seems likely to be effective.

I was criticised by my Honourable friend, Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas, for the emphasis, or the lack of emphasis, which I laid on industrial development in certain passages of my speech. I must confess that, in writing those words, I had perhaps rather largely my own personal point of view in my mind, and was not consciously writing in the sense of one announcing a deliberate policy on the part of the Government. My Honourable friend criticised me for referring to industrial development, so far as that could be carried out consistently with, and as a supplement to, agricultural development. What I had in mind when I wrote those words was that, in my own view, looking at the conditions in India, there could be nothing worse for the people of India as a whole than to effect a divorce of the ordinary people of the country from the land. I think we are all agreed—I certainly have found in private conversation a great measure of agreement on this point from Honourable Members opposite—that India does not want large urban concentrations. What we want is an industrial development scattered about through the country-side, where people can combine work on the land with earning of money in industrial occupations. But perhaps it was presumptuous of me to venture those words which seem to imply a definite adoption of a particular policy by the Government on that matter. I wish to make that explanation.

I have only one point to refer to in conclusion. Perhaps I may hang the remarks which I have to make on a suggestion which fell from my Honourable friend, Mr. Chetty, in his very interesting and, if I may say so, statesmanlike speech. He referred, at the end, to the necessity for providing machinery by which the economic policy of the Government could be better directed and more actively pursued. He also suggested that it might be advantageous to the Government of India to follow the example of the British Government in constituting an Economic Advisory Council. I may tell him that that idea had also been present to my mind, and I feel that we have a great deal to learn from that example. I have felt, in my short experience in India, that we feel very much the lack of machinery by which the Government can get in touch with unofficial opinion and discuss what should be the main lines of our economic policy. I have also felt a great need for scientific study of the economic conditions of the country. I feel that we often, on all sides of the House, talk in considerable ignorance of what really is happening and as to how conditions here are produced either by local causes or by world causes. The scientific study of all these factors has advanced very much in recent years, and if there is one field on which money could be usefully expended, I think that field deserves our particular attention. As regards the special proposal which has been made by my Honourable friend, I should like to say, on behalf of the Government, that we shall be very pleased to consider with representatives of the unofficial parties what would be the best way of introducing here into India some feature of that kind, and I hope it will be possible for the leaders of the various parties, either themselves or through representatives whom they would choose to speak on these matters, to consult with some of us on that matter before the end of this Session. I feel that a constructive economic policy is badly needed by this country. I feel that there is much to be gained by an exchange of ideas and by an appreciation of the realities of the situation. After all, we have only one object, however difficult it may be for Honourable Members opposite to believe it. We have only one object, and that is the advancement of the good of the people of India.

Sir, I have much more that I should like to say, but I am afraid I have kept the House already longer than fits in with their own convenience. It is difficult to deal adequately with all the suggestions which fall from Honourable Members in the course of a debate like this, but I would assure them that it is my practice to have careful notes made of all suggestions, and to go through them afterwards to see if there is any way in which I can meet them or obtain valuable ideas from what has been said. Therefore, if there are some Members to whose speeches I have made no reply, let them not think that their words have been wasted. (Applause.)

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 6th March, 1930.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, 6th March, 1930.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber of the Council House at Eleven of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

THE INDIAN COMPANIES (AMENDMENT) BILL.

PRESENTATION OF THE REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I present the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill further to amend the Indian Companies Act, 1913, for certain purposes.

ELECTION OF THE STANDING FINANCE COMMITTEE.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): Sir, with your permission, I should like to move the Resolution standing in my name, before the House proceeds to the election of Members for the Central Advisory Council for Railways. I explained to you, Sir, that I have to be present in another place this morning. Sir, I beg to move:

"That this Assembly do proceed to the election, for the financial year 1930-31, in such method as may be approved by the Honourable the President, of a Standing Finance Committee of the Assembly not exceeding fourteen in number to which shall be added a Member of the Assembly to be nominated by the Governor General. The Member so nominated shall be the Chairman of the Committee."

The motion was adopted.

ELECTION OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON ROADS.

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra (Member for Industries and Labour): Sir, I beg to move:

"That this Assembly do proceed to the election, for the financial year 1930-31, in such method as may be approved by the Honourable the President, of six Members to serve on a Standing Committee on Roads which will be appointed by the Governor General in Council and the constitution and functions of which shall be as defined in the Resolution on Road Development adopted by the Assembly on the 4th February, 1930."

The motion was adopted.

PROCEDURE FOR THE ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO THE STANDING FINANCE COMMITTEE AND THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON ROADS.

Mr. President: I have to inform the Members that, for the purpose of election of Members to the Standing Finance Committee and the Standing Committee on Roads, the Assembly Office will be open to receive nominations up to 12 Noon on Saturday, the 8th March, and Monday, the

[Mr. President.]

10th March, 1930, respectively. The election, if necessary, for the Standing Finance Committee, will take place in this Chamber on Thursday, the 13th March, while the election for the Standing Committee on Roads will be held on Tuesday, the 18th March, 1930. The elections will be conducted in accordance with the principle of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote.

ELECTION OF A PANEL FOR THE CENTRAL ADVISORY COUNCIL FOR RAILWAYS.

Mr. President: The House will now proceed to elect a panel of eight Members, from which six Members of the Central Advisory Council for Railways will be nominated. The ballot papers will now be supplied to Honourable Members in the order in which I call them. Out of 13 candidates originally nominated, Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla has since withdrawn his candidature.

(The ballot was then taken.)

THE INDIAN TARIFF (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I beg to move that the Bill further to amend the Indian Tariff Act, 1894, for certain purposes, as reported by the Select Committee, be taken into consideration.

Sir, only two changes have been made in the Bill by the Select Committee. As the Bill stood originally, one item in the Schedule applied the saccharine duty to certain substances of a like nature, but left a wide discretion to Collectors of Customs to decide whether particular substances were of that nature or not. The Committee have altered the Bill, so as to provide that the substances to which saccharine duty will be applied should be notified by the Governor General in Council.

The second change made is as regards the proposed alteration of the rates of duty on radio apparatus of certain kinds. It is explained in the Report of the Select Committee that the failure of the Indian Broadcasting Company and the decision of Government, as a temporary arrangement, to take over the broadcasting, rendered it necessary to reconsider that particular proposal, and it has therefore been omitted from the Schedule.

These are the only two changes made, Sir, and I do not think I need say anything further in support of my motion.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 2 with the Schedule was added to the Bill.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Title and the Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, I move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE STEEL INDUSTRY (PROTECTION) BILL.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy (Member for Commerce and Railways): Sir, I beg to move that the Bill to amend the law relating to the fostering and development of the steel industry in British India, for certain purposes, as reported by the Select Committee, be taken into consideration.

I explained the object of the Bill both at the time of its introduction and at the time of moving for a Select Committee, and as the Select Committee has reported the Bill without amendment, I do not think I need add anything further.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 2 and the Schedule were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I beg to move the amendment standing in my name:

"That for sub-clause (2) of clause 1 of the Bill the following be substituted:

"(2) It shall come into force on the 1st July, 1930."

Sir, Honourable Members remember that at the time this Bill was taken into consideration I put forward my views on the floor of this House on behalf of the consumers and also on behalf of the importers. I must explain that I was a Member of the Select Committee, and I did not write a minute of dissent there as I found there was no substantial disagreement between me and the Members of the Committee. But I have nothing to retract from what I submitted on the first day the Bill was taken into consideration. I received a wire from the Bombay Iron Merchants' Association again. Let me, at this stage, make it clear that I have nothing to do with the iron importers in India, and if I have any sympathy, it is with the Tatas, who own a big key industry—the iron and steel industry in India. But one must be fair. This is the telegram received from the Bombay Iron Merchants Association:

"If Steel Protection Bill is passed, same should not come into force before June next, as trade should be given due notice to enable them to arrange accordingly. Orders placed before introduction of Bill should be allowed at old rates."

Sir, I think this is a very reasonable demand. Orders for iron goods have been placed, and it takes two or three months for the goods to be received. My Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy, the other day mentioned that, during last year, 20,000 tons of iron bars were imported. So if this Bill is passed, and these people are not given adequate time, they will be put to heavy loss. Of course, the Bill as drafted says:

"It shall come into force on such date as the Governor General in Council may, by notification in the Gazette of India, appoint."

If my Honourable friend, Sir George Rainy, intends to notify a date after 1st July, I have no objection. If he assures me of that, I will withdraw my amendment. But if he wants to notify that it will take immediate effect, it will work a great hardship. Although one would like the scope of protection extended to the Tatas, I still maintain what I observed the other day. The Tatas have not organised their marketing all over India, although we are forced to extend protection to their industry.

Mr. President: Order, order. That is not the question.

Mr. B. Das: All right, Sir. I will confine myself to my amendment. The Honourable the Commerce Member who is so anxious to extend the scope of protection to the Tatas under the 1927 Steel Protection Act, should see that the importers are not hard hit, and they should be given a sufficient time limit, so that all orders that have already been placed may take effect, and the goods arrive in India without this increased taxation.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, I regret I am unable to accept the amendment which has been moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. B. Das. He is asking the House to depart from what, I think, has been the uniform practice with the case of all protective duties that have been imposed. The practice has been, that these duties should come into force as soon as the Bill becomes law, and for obvious reasons, because if time is given, then considerable quantities of the protected goods can be imported at the lower rate of duty, and that is to the detriment of the protected industry. I can see no reason whatever for making an exception in this case.

As regards what fell from the Honourable Member, about the terms of sub-clause (2) as it stands in the Bill, the intention of the Governor General in Council is, as soon as the Bill is passed, to issue a notification bringing it into effect in about 7 days. The object of this is merely to give proper notice, proper warning, to the Customs authorities, so that they may be ready with their arrangements. But if so long a period as 3½ months were given, then I think it is certain that there would be time to import considerable additional quantities of these bars and tie-bars and the Indian manufacturer would be prejudiced.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That for sub-clause (2) of clause 1 of the Bill the following be substituted:

"(2) It shall come into force on the 1st July, 1930."

The motion was negatived.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir George Rainy: Sir, I move that the Bill be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN PATENTS AND DESIGNS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra (Member for Industries and Labour): Sir, I beg to move that the amendments made by the Council of State in the Bill further to amend the Indian Patents and Designs Act, 1911, for certain purposes, be taken into consideration.

Sir, the amendments made by the other House are wholly of a formal character. They are three in number. In sub-clause (1) of clause 1, they have substituted for the figures "1929" the figures "1930". In sub-clause (b) of clause (9), in sub-section (1A), they have substituted for the word "January" the word "July". They have also re-numbered clause 28A as clause 29 and re-numbered consecutively the subsequent clauses. I am sure that this House will have no hesitation in accepting all these amendments.

The motion was adopted.

The amendments made by the Council of State were agreed to.

THE SPECIAL MARRIAGE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. C. W. Gwynne (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I beg to move that the Bill further to amend the Special Marriage Act, 1872, for certain purposes, as passed by the Council of State, be taken into consideration.

The purpose of the Bill is fully explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons. It merely seeks to remove a defect in the Act as regards its administration, as pointed out by the Calcutta High Court. Section 2 of the Act provides that, before a marriage is solemnised, the parties and three witnesses shall, in the presence of the Registrar, sign a declaration in the form contained in the Second Schedule to the Act to the effect that either party has completed the age of 21 years. The declaration should also be signed by his or her father or guardian. The declaration at the end of the Second Schedule to the Act contains, in paragraph 6, the form that, if each party has not completed the age of 21 years, the consent of the father or guardian has been given. But the form, as it is at present, does not require the parties to state what their actual age is, and in particular whether or not each party is of the age of 21 years. All that the form requires is that the bridegroom has to state that he has completed 18 years of age, and the bride has to state that she has completed 14 years. This omission is one which is likely to lead to considerable laxity, as the Calcutta High Court has pointed out, as it makes it possible for a minor to get married without obtaining parent or guardian's consent, and in the absence of a specific declaration of age, may lead the Registrar to solemnise marriages without the consent of the father or guardian, even when such consent is necessary under the Act. The present Bill is designed to remedy this omission. This is the main and most important provision of the Bill. In addition, however, in clause 3, sub-clause (2), a few minor provisions of detail have been inserted in order to secure proper identification of the parties and witnesses. Sir, I move.

Sir Hari Singh Gour (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, Honourable Members will remember that I had introduced a Bill for the purpose of removing a similar defect in the Special Marriage Act of 1872. The defect that exists in the Act of 1872 is as follows. If Honourable Members will turn to section 2, they will find that in sub-clause (3) it is stated that each party to the marriage must, if he or she has not completed the age of 21 years, have obtained the consent of his or her father or guardian to the marriage. Now, this Act was passed, as Honourable Members will remember, in 1872. It was introduced by Sir Henry Maine in 1868. Neither in 1868 nor in 1872 was there any statutory law of majority for this country. The first statutory law of majority was passed three years later. It was passed as Act IX of 1875, and it was there laid down for the first time that a person shall be deemed to have attained his majority, except in the very special circumstances mentioned in section 3, on the completion of 18 years. Prior to 1875 we followed the English law, the English law being that a person completed his minority and attained his majority on the completion of 21 years, and because we had no statutory provision in this country in respect of the age of majority, the authors of the Act of 1872 provided for the consent of the father or guardian in the case of persons below the age of 21, as they were treated as minors. But look at the discrepancy between the two statutes of the Indian Legislature. In the case of a person who is above the age of 18 and below 21, under the Indian Majority Act, except under the special provisions of section 3, with which I am not concerned, he is a major; consequently he cannot have a guardian. He wants to get married, and yet this section 2 provides and makes the Registrar say, "I cannot permit you to marry, unless you have obtained the consent of your father or guardian". Now, assuming that he has no father, and he has no guardian either; the result is that he cannot marry at all. He is a man of age; he cannot obtain the consent of his guardian because, under the Indian Majority Act and the Guardians and Wards Act, a guardian cannot be appointed to look after a major; and yet he wants to be married; he cannot marry under the law. This was the defect which I draw the attention of this House to by providing for an amendment of the Special Marriage Act of 1872, by substituting "the completion of 18 years" for "18 and 21 years". But at that time I was opposed both by the Government and some of my more orthodox friends, and they said, "You are further loosening the law, and we will not allow you to remove the defect". The result was that my Bill was defeated.

Now, Sir, my Bill was defeated, but look at the result of it. If this Bill becomes law, the position would be this. Under the present law, as it is administered by the High Courts, if Honourable Members will turn to section 5, they will see that, under this section, every party has to say, "I have obtained the consent of my father or guardian". Under the law, as administered by the High Courts, the Registrar cannot insist upon a declaration to the effect that the person has obtained the consent of his father or his guardian. But if you are to tighten the law, as Government propose to do, you would be disqualifying a person between the ages of 18 and 21 from marrying at all if he has no father alive, and he obviously cannot have a guardian whose consent he can obtain. I therefore submit that, when the Government decided to bring forward this Bill, they should have gone into the whole question, particularly in view of the Bill which I had myself introduced for the purpose of rectifying this defect in the statute law. Now, Sir, instead of following on the lines of my own Bill, what Government are trying now to do, is to disqualify those persons from marrying under the Act of 1872. In the Statement of Objects and Reasons it is very clearly stated:

"The result is that the Registrar of Marriages cannot enforce the provision about consent if the parties refrain from filling in paragraph 5 of the declarations."

Paragraph 5 is this. To those of my friends who have not got a copy of the Act before them, I shall quote:

"The consent of my father or guardian, as the case may be, has been given to a marriage between myself and C D and has not been revoked."

Up to now a man between the ages of 18 and 21 need not subscribe to this paragraph 5 at all. But under this Bill, if it is passed, such person will be disqualified because he will be compelled to subscribe to this paragraph 5. The result of that would be that persons between 18 and 21 would be disqualified from marrying at all. I submit, Sir, that that is a defect which can only be removed in the manner I have indicated, namely, by the amendment of section 2, sub-clause (3), by substituting the words, "and each party must, if he or she has not completed the age of 18 years", thereby bringing the Special Marriage Act into conformity with the provisions of the Indian Majority Act, adding a provision to the effect that he has attained the age of majority as provided in Act IX of 1875. That, I submit, is the obvious way of proceeding in the matter; otherwise you will be making the whole thing thoroughly absurd. You ask a major to go before a Registrar, and the Registrar solemnly asks him, "What is your age?"; he says, "20 years and 11 months". The Registrar asks, "Have you obtained the consent of your guardian?"; he says "No, I have not. I cannot have a guardian under the law, and therefore I cannot get anybody's consent". "Have you got your father?"—"No, he is dead". Then the Registrar says "Very well, you cannot marry". That is the position which this Bill will land us in. Now, I ask Honourable Members, can anybody conceive of such an absurdity as this Bill seeks to introduce into the law of the land? (An Honourable Member: "Yes, the Government can.") The Government can; they are capable of it. I therefore submit that we must oppose this Bill and compel Government to amend section 2 of the Indian Special Marriage Act by bringing it into conformity with the statutory provisions of the Indian Majority Act. I, therefore, Sir, oppose the consideration of this Bill.

The Honourable Sir James Crerar (Home Member): Sir, the intention of this Bill has been explained by my Honourable friend, Mr. Gwynne. It was merely, without making any alteration of substance in the Act as it stands, to bring the Schedules into conformity with the Act, and to remove the difficulty of administration which has been pointed out by the Calcutta High Court. The point which my Honourable and learned friend has raised is one which will require further consideration. If, therefore, the House will agree to pass the motion for consideration now before it, I shall undertake that no further motion shall be made till that point has been examined.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, the point mentioned by Sir Hari Singh Gour is a very important one. I confess I have had no time to look into the several sections of this Act; this Bill merely says that in section so and so, for the words so and so, the words so and so be substituted; the practice in the Legislative Council in Bombay used to be, when I was there, that when such Bills were on, the Government showed us the courtesy of putting on the table the Acts to which the amendments were proposed; but apparently in this House such a courtesy does not exist; and the difficulty therefore is that we cannot understand exactly what the amendment amounts to. Therefore,

[Mr. M. R. Jayakar.]

Sir, I could not realize the real nature of the amendment, but now that Sir Hari Singh Gour has drawn our attention to it, it seems to be so obvious that the proposed amendment, if allowed, will create a most extraordinary anomaly. A person who has attained 18 years of age cannot have a guardian except under the circumstances which Sir Hari Singh Gour pointed out; and yet this Bill seeks to make a declaration under clause 5 compulsory, which is not the rule at the present moment, according to Dr. Gour. The result of that would be, as Dr. Gour has pointed out, that a person between 18 and 21 will not be able to take advantage of the Act; he will have to find a father; if his father is dead this will be impossible: then he will have to find a guardian, which is impossible again because no guardian can ordinarily be appointed to a person who has attained 18. The words "twenty-one" in the original Act according to Dr. Gour—and I agree with him—were inserted at a time—in 1870—when India had not its own Majority Act, which was passed in 1875. Therefore the words "twenty-one", according to the state of circumstances in the year 1870, were perfectly sensible; but after the Majority Act was passed in India and "eighteen years" was made the majority year in India, it seems obvious that "twenty-one" should have been removed long before this. Therefore what Dr. Gour has drawn attention to is perfectly obvious, and I cannot understand why Government cannot accede to the point and solve the whole difficulty, either by leaving the law where it is now, with the result that clause 5 will continue to be optional, or if they want to make it compulsory, they should change "twenty-one" into "eighteen" years. That solves the whole difficulty. We should, however, like to have the opinion of the Honourable the Law Member on this point.

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter (Law Member): Sir, I must confess that I did not apply my mind to this Bill before this moment. The criticism which Sir Hari Singh Gour has made seems to me perfectly legitimate criticism. If this matter were in court I could easily defend these changes. Sir, I shall give an illustration. My Honourable and learned friend, Mr. Jayakar, knows that in the Hindu law of adoption there is a doctrine that a woman cannot adopt without the consent of her husband

Mr. M. R. Jayakar: In certain parts of India.

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter: That is the general law; Vasishta says that no woman may adopt without the consent of her husband. What about a widow? One school of Hindu law has interpreted it in this way: She has not got her husband; consent is not possible; therefore, no consent is necessary. In another school of Hindu law it has been held, on the interpretation of the same text, that a widow cannot adopt because the consent of the husband is a preliminary condition. Now, there are these two different views. In the first view, when there is no husband and, therefore, no consent is possible, no consent is necessary, notwithstanding the injunction of law that such consent should be obtained. Similarly, it may well be argued, if this matter came before a court of law, that in the case of a person between 18 and 21 who has got neither a father nor a guardian, consent is not possible, and, therefore, consent is excused. But these are legal subtleties, and I need not weary the House with legal subtleties.

Mr. President: Is it worth while proceeding with the Bill?

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter: What I say is this, that since we are legislating, we might make the law clear and not leave it to be played with in a court of law by subtleties.

Mr. M. S. Aney (Berar Representative): At least leave it without creating greater confusion than there was before.

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter: Since we are legislating, we might as well make the point clear, and I must confess that if the proposed changes are made, it would create some amount of confusion.

Mr. C. W. Gwynne: Sir, the points that have been raised will be very carefully examined; meanwhile I would ask the leave of the House to withdraw this motion.

The motion was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

THE PRISONS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. C. W. Gwynne (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I beg to move that the Bill further to amend the Prisons Act, 1894, for a certain purpose, as passed by the Council of State, be taken into consideration. The purpose of this small, formal and non-contentious amendment of section 27(2) of the Prisons Act is clearly explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons. It is a measure of administrative convenience rendered advisable by the decision, on a recommendation of the Conference of Inspectors General of Prisons in 1928, that the age limit of an adolescent prisoner should be 21 and not 18 as it was before. The amendment is designed to secure a more convenient and suitable provision for adolescent prisoners, both under trial and convicted, for purposes of proper segregation while in prison. Local Governments have been consulted on this amendment and have all agreed to it. Sir, I move.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 2 was added to the Bill.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

Mr. C. W. Gwynne: Sir, I move that the Bill, as passed by the Council of State, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE REPEALING AND AMENDING BILL.

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter (Law Member): Sir, I beg to move that the Bill to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments, as passed by the Council of State, be taken into consideration.

[6TH MAR. 1930.]

[Sir Brojendra Mitter.]

Sir, this Bill may be described as legislative spring cleaning. The object is to make some necessary amendments of a formal nature in certain enactments and to repeal certain spent or useless matter in the Statute-book. The reasons for the proposed amendments and repeals are fully explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons. Sir, I move.

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 2 to 4 were added to the Bill.

The First and Second Schedules were added to the Bill.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Brojendra Mitter: Sir, I beg to move that the Bill, as passed by the Council of State, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Friday, the 7th March, 1930.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Friday, 7th March, 1930.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber of the Council House at Eleven of the Clock, Mr. President in the Chair.

1. Lieutenant-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney.
2. Mr. N. C. Kelkar.
3. Mr. Abdul Latif Sahib Farookhi.
4. Dr. A. Suhrawardy.
5. Sardar Bahadur Captain Hira Singh Brar.
6. Haji Abdoola Haroon.
7. The Revd. J. C. Chatterjee.
8. Mr. H. P. Mody.

THE GENERAL BUDGET—LIST OF DEMANDS.

SECOND STAGE.

Mr. President: The House will now take up the second stage of the General Budget, namely, the Demands for Grants. With regard to the order in which these Demands should be taken up I have got to make a few observations. As Honourable Members are aware, since the last three years, I have been accepting the arrangement regarding the order arrived at by the leaders of parties in consultation with Government. The usual order is thus varied in accordance with the general sense of the House. This year an attempt was made yesterday by leaders of parties, in consultation with Government, to ask me to accept a particular arrangement. That arrangement was this: that I should take up the Demand under the head "Executive Council" first and allow Mr. Kelkar to move a cut regarding the irresponsibility of the Executive Council, and the House should devote the whole day to the consideration of that question. Then tomorrow, the 8th March, I should allow the Independent Party to discuss the question of general military policy, and in particular the inaction of Government on the recommendations of the Indian Sandhurst Committee. That should, according to the arrangement, occupy the whole day. It was further suggested to me that on Monday, the 10th March, I should allow the new Swaraj Party to move some cut on some head which they might select. I have not been favoured with the particular Demand on which they wish to raise a debate and therefore I am not in a position to announce it to the House, but I have agreed to give them two hours to raise a discussion on any question they choose on any Demand. That will be from 11 A.M. to 1 P.M. After that, the remainder of Monday will be devoted to a cut to be moved by the European Group under the head "Finance". I understand they wish to raise the question of retrenchment under that head. Then on Tuesday, the 11th March, two hours will be allotted to the Central Muslim Party to move a cut on any Demand they select. I was told that they wish to raise the question regarding the Report of the Indian Central Committee. I am not sure whether that would be relevant under any of the Demands for Grants. I therefore look forward to meeting the leader of the party during the recess hour and settling with him what particular cut they propose to move. This will take us up to 1 o'clock on Tuesday. The remainder of that day I propose to allot to unattached Members for a discussion on any question that they wish to raise. They therefore must get together and tell me, in the course of the day, whether there is a likelihood of their coming to any agreement. If they do not come to an agreement and I am not informed in time about their intention, other Grants will be taken up from Tuesday, the 11th March, from 1 o'clock, in the order in which they appear on the paper. If, however, they come to some agreement, and I am informed of it in time, I shall allow the afternoon to be utilised for that purpose. We shall then begin the remaining Demands for Grants in the order in which they appear on the Agenda on Wednesday, the 12th March. I hope this arrangement will suit Honourable Members.

[Mr. President.]

Expenditure charged to Revenue.

DEMAND NO. 28—EXECUTIVE COUNCIL.

The Honourable Sir George Schuster (Finance Member): Sir, I beg to move:

"That a sum not exceeding Rs. 91,000 be granted to the Governor General in Council to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1931, in respect of 'Executive Council'."

Irresponsible Nature of the Executive Council.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I move:

"That the Demand under the head 'Executive Council' be reduced to Rupee One."

In order to enable me to draw the attention of the House to the utterly irresponsible character of the Executive Council, I want to reduce the Demand for the Executive Council to one rupee, or 1s. 6d. at the present rate of exchange! I will cut them off with a shilling and six pence.

Mr. President: What will they do with one rupee?

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: It is for them to find the way out of the difficulty. After all, they are absolutely irresponsible, and they can obtain whatever they like in so many other ways even if we cut down their supplies.

Sir, it strikes me at the outset that the debate that I am raising on this question of the irresponsibility of the Executive Council happens to coincide with the ultimatum which Mahatma Gandhi has given to Government. This, however, is no mere accident of the situation. On the contrary, this coincidence discloses, in my opinion, the essential unity that exists between the working of the minds within the Councils as well as the working of the minds outside the Councils. Gandhiji himself has said that his demands are not exhaustive, but they are only illustrative. Now, what is his purpose in putting before the Government his list of illustrative demands and what does he really want? We all know, and Gandhiji himself knows, that good government is no substitute for self-government. At the same time, he knows as well as we do that mere self-government also cannot always be a substitute for good government. And the political ideal of a nation ought to be to get both these together, and, between them, to get good government through self-government. That is the object with which Gandhiji has put forward his demands as illustrative of his purpose. He practically says to Government: "Here is a list of illustrative demands for you to take up. If you meet them immediately, you will be showing that the angle of your vision is changed and your heart has also undergone a certain sympathetic change, which I look forward to and which I expect and want". If you just analyse his demands, you will find that he has not asked for anything fantastic. I will briefly recapitulate what he asks for. What he has asked for are really items of good government, and if Government are not prepared even to grant immediately those items of good government, Government stand condemned by themselves. Take the demand for total prohibition. India is a country which is very well known for its abstemiousness. All the religions in India prohibit drink, and if a country steeped in liquor like America has at last accomplished its desire to go dry, why is it fantastic to suppose that in India, if we begin to administer it, we should also enact laws of prohibition? Then, he has asked for the reduction of the rate of exchange to 1s. 4d. That, as we all know, is a very burning topic, and this side of the House has always considered it to be a legitimate demand. Then he asks for reduction in land revenue by at least 50 per cent. and that it should be subject to legislative control. Some of the Members may be aware that, in our provinces we are taking up this matter with the Provincial Governments. The demand for the reduction of the present land revenue by 50 per cent. need not look in any way fantastic. At present, the land revenue is assessed at the rate of 50 per cent. of the net profits of the agriculturist, but in my own Presidency I remember the Agricultural League that we have formed has put forward the demand that Government should not be entitled to more than 25 per cent. of the net profits of the agriculturist. This is exactly in consonance with the reduction by 50 per cent. of the present land revenue demand, and we also want that agricultural assessments and revisional assessments should all be subject to definite legislation. So, this demand also is not fantastic. Then he has asked for reduction in the military expenditure by at least 50 per cent. to begin with. The present expenditure is about 54 crores. If we reduce this amount to 27 crores, it practically gives a ratio of about 20 per cent. to our total income, and it is admitted on all hands that 20 per cent. should be the usual amount for the Military Budget of any country. So it will be seen that this demand also of Gandhiji is not fantastic, but is very reasonable. Then, he has asked for the reduction of the salaries of the highest grade services by one-half or less, so as to suit the reduced revenue. That is a natural corollary. If the expense is to be reduced, how can it be done unless you reduce the salaries of the highly paid officials? So, that also is not a fantastic demand. Then, there is the item of a protective tariff on foreign cloth. We are just now busy with that very measure in this House. Then he insists on the passage of the Coastal Traffic Reservation Bill. We all know the history of this measure and how keenly we are all fighting for it. Then he asks for the discharge of all political prisoners. That is essentially a legitimate demand, if Government are to look forward to peace in this country and a settlement anywhere, either in India or in England. Then he wants the abolition of the Criminal Intelligence Department or its popular control. I suppose, even if we get our self-government we will want our Criminal Intelligence Department. But then it is not a question of having the Criminal Intelligence Department, but of having the popular control on it. That is what he has asked for. Then he wants the issue of licences to use fire-arms for self-defence subject to popular control. That subject has been so ably discussed by my friend, Dr. Moonje, that I need not say much about it.

Now, Sir, here is an illustrative list of demands put forward by Gandhiji. What does he in effect ask? He says, give me immediately at least these items of good government, if you are not going to give me full self-government. He has explained further that, though the idea of Independence has been put forward, you need not be frightened, as we ourselves are not frightened by that idea of Independence, and if you make up with us on the basis of these reasonable demands, we shall say that we have got good government as well as self-government and we shall see how to get the exact measure of self-government that we want later on. Therefore I feel like getting my whole thesis out of this coincidence of the putting forward by Gandhiji of his ultimatum, and the debate I want to raise in this House at this moment upon the irresponsibility of the executive Government, which is the pivot of this all-India administration. Now, it may be asked perhaps, "Even supposing you get responsible government, or a due measure of self-government, what guarantee is there that you yourself will get all these demands that Gandhiji has asked for? Who has told you, who has given a guarantee that, supposing you enjoy a measure of self-government or some kind of self-government that you want, you will necessarily get prohibition, remission of land revenue and so on and so forth?" To that my reply is that there is no reason, in the first place, why this will not necessarily happen. I, for one, have absolute faith that, if we get real self-government and the machinery of legislature to carry out the will of the nation, all these demands that have been put forward by Mahatma Gandhi will be carried into operation. That is my personal belief; but on the other hand, even if it happens that these demands are not granted by the Legislature under our self-government scheme, then the country will simply blame itself and will go on trying to get what it wants by overturning Ministries, one after another in turn, and calling upon other political parties to take up the administration. That is a recognised method for a nation to get what it wants under a scheme of self-government. Now, what is the essence of self-government? It is that people must get a chance, through their representatives, to carry out the national will. That, in brief, is the essence of self-government. A nation may sometimes be wrong in its views, but it can always claim the right even to make mistakes, for mistakes there must be. The man's soul says, "Thou God, give me liberty," and liberty for what? Liberty not only to do the right, but also to do the wrong, if I sometimes must do wrong. That is the demand of the soul to God, and that is the demand of the nation to Government. "Give us the right to do what we think best, in our interests; it may be right, or it may be wrong." That is the cry of the nation. After all, that is the privilege which the nation itself wants to exercise. For in the assertion of this right lies the realisation of political life, the political genius and the political soul of the nation.

Now, let us all understand the word, "responsibility," its real significance and its limitations. Even when there is responsible government, it certainly does not mean that the executive possess no power at all. In fact it does possess power, also power proportionate to its responsibility. The Legislature, we all know, is a collective body after all, and can discharge its functions, only by definite limited means. This broad sided activity of the Legislature is not so wide as that of the executive itself. There is a particular method prescribed to the Legislature to express its views and its opinion, and principally that by saying, "Yes" or "No." The Legislature collectively is practically always confined to one method of saying, "Yes" or "No," and giving a vote for or against a measure put before it. That is the language through which the collective view of the Council is gathered. In Alexander Dumas' novel of "The Count of Monte Cristo", there is a character which the author describes as paralysed in respect of all its functions excepting its eyes. That character had only one living function, that is the function of the eyes.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indians): That is short sight.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: And that character had no other function living. Similarly, if you look at the legislative body collectively, you will find that its function is practically confined to saying, yes or no when giving a vote. The Legislature, that is the acts of the Legislature, are controlled by the executive in respect of a number of things, namely, say, the initiative, procedure, ballot, allotment of days for sessions, practically a monopoly of time for official business, order of business, exclusive rights, as for example in respect of money Bills, and ultimately the threat of resignation and the threat of dissolution. These are the checks through which the executive Government tries to exercise its control upon the legislative body, whose function is practically, as I have said, restricted only to giving a vote and saying, yes or no, by a single word.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: That is long sight.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Of course the Legislature willingly submits to this control because it is a control in non-essentials, but in essentials, the control of the Legislature over the executive is, and must always be, greater than the control of the executive over the Legislature. These different advantages on either side are easily seen in practice. Thus, for example, the advantage to the side of the Government and the executive is seen in this fact that, in a properly developed Legislature, it is practically impossible for a private Member to pilot and carry out a private Bill to a successful end. But on the other hand the Legislature collectively

Dr. B. S. Moonje (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): What about the Sarda Bill?

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: But one swallow does not make a Summer. It was because the executive helped Mr. Sarda, that he was able to get his Bill successfully passed by the Legislature.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas (Indian Merchants' Chamber: Indian Commerce): If the Government had opposed it, the Bill could not have been completed yet.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: These different advantages can be shown easily in practice, for on the one hand the executive can make it impossible for a private Member to carry out any legislation. On the other hand, the Legislature collectively can have its revenge and send Cabinets into the wilderness. We have now seen the French Cabinets being scattered like nine pins in the game of skittle at short intervals. How does that come about? Where does it come from? It comes from the natural operation of the expression of the will of the nation as against the executive. What I am trying to put before this House is that the executive and the Legislature have both got power, but only in different forms, and both of them ultimately share that power with the people at large. In well developed democracies, the power is gradually transferred from the Legislatures ultimately to the people in three ways, firstly by the growth of the power of the Cabinet, secondly, by the increase of the electorate, thirdly, by the widening of the franchise and by the growth of independent public opinion in the country. But responsibility is the pivot on which this tripartite balance turns, namely, the balance of the equitable distribution of power and opportunity among the Cabinet, the Legislature and the electorates, all with a common purpose. The word, "responsibility" has a double meaning as it is ordinarily understood. In the first place, responsibility means power, and in the second place, responsibility means liability to take consequences of abuse, or the wrong use of power, therefore, "responsibility" is a two-faced word. It has got two significances practically, but in India at present the executive Government understand responsibility only in the sense of power, and not in the sense of responsibility, and that is my principal point. Whenever Government want to do a certain thing, they very plausibly put it in this way, that Government must be responsible for this. If they want to do you harm, Government will say that they must be responsible for doing this thing in the interest of the country. So in India, unlike other free and self-governing countries, responsibility is understood by Government only in the sense of power and not responsibility. The nation, however, consequently feels humiliated because even the Legislatures with assured elected majorities have no power, no initiative, and national policies are expressed in the Legislatures only to be frustrated by the obstinacy of the executive. Therefore, to put it briefly, our claim for responsible government in India arises out of the humiliation that the nation has suffered from the conduct of Government on the one hand and the weakness of the Legislatures on the other.

Now, what is the present position of the Executive Council in India? It represents practically the whole Government. As we see here, for instance, there are two groups of Members sitting facing each other. One group, on this side, is responsible to the Indian electorates, and another group, sitting on that side, especially the Treasury Benches, is responsible only to the Secretary of State, who, along with his other colleagues, holds himself responsible to the British electorate, which is six thousand miles away from India. This is therefore practically like two swords in one scabbard. In this one Legislature there are two groups of Members, one of which is responsible to the Indian electorate, and another responsible to the Secretary of State, which means to the British electorate, six thousand miles away. Therefore it is practically like having two swords in one scabbard; and out of that situation, you can easily see how, with the least contact and conflict, there is a rattling of the swords. That was of course the original intention of the authors of the new reforms. The Montford Act did not intend to give either the executive or the electors real responsibility in any way. It continued the ultimate authority and power in the hands of the Secretary of State himself. His Council is practically mere eye-wash, and the story must have been heard by many people in this House that, at the end of three years of the life of his Council, Lord Birkenhead was not able to distinguish Mr. Mullick from Dr. Paranjpye. Both were members of his Executive Council, both must have been sitting at some of the meetings, but the story is going round, and looking at the manner of Lord Birkenhead, I can believe that story that, at the end of three years, he did not know Dr. Paranjpye from Mr. Mullick. And what is the business they do? They do not meet and make acquaintance, because they have got practically no business. And here is a limerick given in Sir Sivaswamy Aiyer's book about the work done in the Secretary of State's Council:

"Eleven to Noon, think you have come too soon;
Twelve to One, wonder what's to be done;
One to Two, find nothing to do;
Two to Three, begin to see,
It'll be a great bore, to stay till Four."

That is the method of the work in the Secretary of State's Council, and these are the people who are supposed to be entirely responsible for the good administration of the Government of this country; and this Executive Council, instead of being responsible to the electorate of this country, is supposed to be, and is made to be by law, responsible to the Secretary of State for India.

Now, the Act of 1919, as we all know, did enlarge the Councils, but the Councils were expected, in the words of the Act itself or of the authors of the Act, only accurately and regularly to represent to Government the wishes of the country and adequately criticise its conduct. Nothing beyond that. Here you will see no trace of responsibility, either for the Legislature or the Executive Council. What was expected from the enlargement of the Councils was adequate criticism; and while on that point I may say that, if you expect only criticism from us, why should you expect us to put forward only responsible criticism? If you give us a chance by the game of in and out, then only can you ask us to go in for reasonable and responsible criticism, but if you are not going to give the Legislature any responsibility for what is going on in this House, why do you expect us to be reasonable and responsible for your purposes?

As regards the present character of the Executive Council, I have read what was in the mind of the authors of the new reforms. But I would just like to read one or two passages, giving an exact description of what is the present position in the country. First I will read a small paragraph from Sir Sivaswamy Aiyer's description of the present situation, and I cite him because, in my opinion, he is a man who enjoys an absolute detachment of opinion in political matters. He says:

"The position of the executive vis-a-vis the Legislature is far from comfortable or enviable. Government are therefore obliged to resort to all possible arts of conciliation or exploitation of the differences between the different parties and sections. Opposition has to be overcome by coaxing and cajolery, or bought off by favours or concessions. From the point of view of the Opposition it may perhaps be considered desirable that the Government should be kept in a dependant condition and a pliant mood; but there are limits to pliancy and the statute prevents the Opposition from obtaining a mastery of the situation. From the point of view of the administration, it is a source of weakness to the executive that they should be liable to be defeated at any moment by an irresponsible Legislature. Uncertainty as to the decision of the Legislature, and the want of an assured majority therein, must affect that sense of confidence which is essential to firmness of administration and continuity of policy."

This is by an Indian statesman, and now I am going to read an opinion upon the present constitution of India of a well-known person, Professor Keith, the author of "Responsible Government in the Dominions". His words will show that it is not we in India alone, who have been saying that the reforms are useless, and that they do not come up to expectations. He says:

"The Act of 1919 was passed by a Parliament which was by no means convinced of the wisdom of the new move in India, but which felt constrained to do something to make good the promises given by the British Government during the War to which India had responded by great services."

Therefore it is only by our war services that we have purchased this modified or qualified liberalisation of our political institutions in this country.

"The opposition to it was based on the belief that democratic institutions have never been evolved in the East and therefore could not apply adequately to it, a view recently maintained by Earl Balfour. A more generous conception held that the British rule in India existed for the benefit of the lower classes of the population, who were exposed to injustice at the hands of the wealthier classes and the higher castes."

But Professor Keith himself gives the answer:

"But the difficulty that, after a long period of British autocracy, nothing of substance has been done to raise the position of the depressed classes either economically or in point of education and self-respect is ignored. Nor were the critics aware of the remarkable assimilation of democratic principles by such a race as the Filippinoes under the more enlightened generosity of the United States. The apparent development"—he indulges in a little sarcasm—"of democracy in Japan was explained away, and the autocracies of the Spanish Directory, Signor Mussolini and General Pangalos had not yet occurred to prove the unfitness of European democracies for liberty."

Our Government might point its finger and say, "Why take China and Japan? Look at the European countries. Look at the dictatorship in Spain; look at the dictatorship in Italy; look at the dictatorship in Greece". Then, he says:

"At any rate the Act was marked by a spirit of distrust and caution in strange contrast with the generosity which conceded responsible government to the Transvaal and Orange Free State."

Government have been more generous to the South African Republic in respect of the grant of self-government:

"It is true that certain extremists in India put forward ludicrous claims and refused to recognise fundamental facts", —"but", he says, and that is the crux of the whole situation—

"but none the less a more generous measure would have been well worth risking"— by the Government.

"The Legislature of India, therefore, might be deemed to be representative, but it differed essentially from a true representative Legislature by having ultimately no power to prevent legislation by the Crown."

I would just read one more sentence and show to the House what view a man of that eminence takes:

"The justification for this attitude was, of course, the fact that India, specially vulnerable to attack through the growth of the strength of the tribes on the frontier, the doubtful friendship of Afghanistan."

But in the end he says, and this is most important,—

"But these considerations should have rendered all the more eager the endeavour to open up military careers for Indians and to train the people to defend themselves as a necessary condition of self-government."

Therefore, I have cited to you the opinion of an Indian statesman, Sir Sivaswamy Aiyer, on the present constitution of the executive and the Government, and also the opinion of an English statesman and a great author on responsible government itself. The quotation I have given conclusively proves that, even that man of detachment admits that Government have not gone so far as they should have gone in the matter of reforms in India. Now, in self-governing countries also it may be said that there are two blocks, one block or one party standing for one kind of principles and policy, and facing that block sits another group of Members of the Legislature with a different policy and principles. That is a fact which obtains in every Legislature practically. But then you must remember that both of them are elected by territorial electorates in the same country, and not as in India one block responsible to the British electorate 6,000 miles away, and another block of Members responsible to the Indian electorates. In every self-governing country there are parties, there may be two or three or even four parties, with different principles and policies, and yet why do they carry on the administration, and even peaceful administration and successful administration? Because the country gets a chance to put its will into operation through the medium of the Legislature, though it may be made up of two or more parties responsible to the different electorates with different principles and policies. The real key to the solution of this problem in those countries is that their game of in and out is freely played, and the game allows a chance of making experiments with alternative policies. That is the real cause of the trouble in India. There is no chance of ever trying an experimental policy, an alternative policy. Government have in their hands certain pre-conceived policies, and they go on as if there was great virtue in constantly following only those policies and trying no other policies. But that never happens in a really self-governing country. This process, this game of in and out serves two purposes; either the nation gets what it wants and it justifies the wisdom of its policy by this game of in and out. But suppose the protagonists of particular policies ultimately find out that their policies are not practicable, and they are so convinced, and come to know the practical limitations of their theoretical ideals and principles, and when they are subjected to cross-examination by the stern facts of the practical problems, then of course they give up those policies and they have got nothing to blame except themselves.

for having wrongly conceived those policies. But where certain policies are ultimately realised as successful, or in the case of other policies the practical limitations are found out by the protagonists, the central thing remains, namely, that the nation has got a chance to put its will into operation.

Where the policies are not ultimately realised, or have to be given up as impracticable and hopeless, the game of in and out serves at least as a useful safety-valve for letting off steam of failure or discontent, and the best course for folly or ignorance is, after all, to give it a chance for discovering itself. But there is even a higher purpose of responsibility. The history of evolution of responsibility is interesting. Originally, the theory was that the King governed by the divine right and also could do no wrong. But gradually the view prevailed that those who acted on behalf of the Crown, at least must be held responsible for the legal conduct, and the doctrine that the King can do no wrong ultimately came to apply, not only to offences under the criminal law, but also to political errors. And the King can do no wrong, cannot do any wrong, for the simple reason that he is allowed to do nothing by his own independent will and action, and everything is done for him just as everything is found for him. He is, if I may say so, the most exalted and glorified apotheosis of beneficent inactivity or negation. In the early stages, Parliament in England tried a number of schemes to prevent the Crown from carrying out unpopular policies. One of them was to make the ministers seal Royal documents so that individual responsibility of Ministers could be at once located, and functioning ministers would be assailed and would be called to answer and subjected to impeachment. These crude forms of ministerial responsibility have of course now become obsolete; but something of greater value was obtained in its stead. The responsibility of individual ministers remains to this day, as it was before in past centuries, but in the course of time something more has come in addition to the individual responsibility of ministers, and that is the collective responsibility of the Cabinet, and in the form of this collective responsibility of the Cabinet, democracy has given or taken, whichever you like to call it, hostages to the nation for proper administration according to the wishes of the country. And now the position has settled down finally. It has come to this in England. The King must accept the advice of ministers or find other ministers who will accept responsibility.

Now we are of course as much under the rule of the King as England. The Emperor never comes here. He takes practically no part in the administration of this country. But he must in theory accept, on Indian affairs, the advice of Ministers, or find other Ministers who will accept responsibility so far as the State Secretary is concerned. But even though the State Secretary goes out of office, on account of the collective responsibility incurred by the Cabinet, still in relation to India there is absolutely no change of Government. That game of in and out is never played; no non-official political party is ever given any chance to put its policy into practice, and make experiments with an alternative policy. Therefore, the substance of India's claim for responsible government is that the State Secretary's office should be abolished. (Hear, hear.) The State Secretary's power should, for the most part, be transferred to the Indian Government, and the Indian Government itself should become a national Government. It should be Indianised and also made responsible. That is the substance of our demand for self-government. But here I wish to utter a word of caution. Our claim for responsible government should not be confounded with our claim for Indianisation of the services, because they are two different things. Indianisation is wanted for two reasons. First of all, it is the birthright of the sons of the soil to run the administration of their own country. Secondly, in the interests of the country also I will say we want Indianisation. For we know, and we believe, that, if we have an Indian agency of administration, such Indian agency is bound to be cheaper and more economical. Therefore, if my Honourable friend, the Finance Member, wants to cut down expenditure, instead of putting an officer on retrenchment duty, or appointing a retrenchment committee, let him at once take up and pursue to its furthest conclusion, the policy of Indianisation, which will give us what we want, and will also give him the retrenchment in expenditure that he wants. It is not a fantastic suggestion. Look at the figures of administrative expenditure in Japan, for instance. My Honourable friend Dr. Moonje will be able to tell you what the pay of an army General is in Japan, compared with the pay of an army General in India, and so on. That same scale can be applied to the whole gamut of the administration here. But then we are told, as we were told some time ago by the Honourable the Finance Member, "Don't you be under the delusion that if you get self-government, your expenditure will go down." It may be so, but even if under self-government we shall have to spend as much as now, we shall certainly spend it in a different manner, through our own men, who in return will get very valuable experience of administration for themselves. I will give this as an example. Supposing we spend Rs. 54 crores on military expenditure, we shall certainly create with that a strong national army in the country and establish factories in the country for arms, ammunition and mechanisation, and also schools and colleges for military education. Indianisation is thus very important.

But that is only one part of our aspiration. For India's heart is set upon self-government also. Independent testimony to our real desire for responsible government, in addition to Indianisation—Independent testimony, as I say, comes in from what we find in the Indian States. I am not referring here in any manner to the relations between the British Government and the Indian States over their internal affairs, but what I do point out is, if only to give a parallel, the new movement now going on in the Indian States. Why is the new movement going on there? Our claim for responsible government is not satisfied in the Indian States, where the officers from top to bottom are Indians. There is hardly any Indian State in India where an Indian does not occupy the highest post and does not discharge the highest function. But that is only Indianisation and nothing more. Though there is Indianisation, that does not exhaust our democratic claim and aspiration, for even in Indian States we do say we must have responsible government even at the hands of the Indian officers. What we therefore claim, after all, is the expression of the will of the taxpayer, through the instrument of the legislature and control of the executive. And therefore it comes to this, that if Indian States are mis-governed, we ask both for good government and self-government. But if there are well-administered Indian States, then we do not ask for good government, because it is already there, and still we ask for self-government even in Indian States. Therefore, our claim to responsible government in this country is not spiteful, is not directed against the present rulers simply because they are foreigners. Supposing we enjoy self-government, who knows we may keep some of the Englishmen, the Civilians, if we find them good and efficient men, either as advisers or our permanent officers in the Secretariat, or use them for technical and expert services.

[Mr. N. C. Kelkar.]

Not that India has shut itself entirely against foreigners for all time, or means to do it; it wants Englishmen and Europeans; but the question is, who should possess the whip hand of control, and that whip hand of control is claimed by India for the nation itself, rather than that it should be left with an irresponsible bureaucracy.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is taking a long time.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar: Sir, I have practically come to my last point. I will now conclude by just making one appeal to the Bureaucracy now installed in office, on the Treasury Benches. Sir, with your permission I would like, in conclusion, to address just a few words to the Treasury Benches in a somewhat direct fashion. I would say this to them: "You, occupants of the Treasury Benches, you may be all of you very estimable gentlemen as individuals. I know you possess a high sense of duty, but that duty you owe to an absentee taskmaster six thousand miles away. Don't you therefore feel the irksomeness of your situation? Don't you for yourselves like to be released from that absentee overlord and come into direct relationship, into direct responsibility to the Indian people themselves? When you are criticised, sometimes unfairly criticised, don't you feel like saying to the Opposition, 'Come, good Sirs, here you are, your tasks and your problems, let us see how you, who are so critical of us, acquit yourselves of the responsibility'. Don't you feel the urge of sportsmanship to put you on your mettle and offer a challenge to exchange places with your critics and opponents? Surely you are not so egotistic as to suppose that wisdom and prudence are the exclusive monopoly of the Treasury Benches and that the mere touch of those Benches releases hidden springs of revelation?"

12 Noon. You will surely be prepared to admit that there may be, on this side also, people who may very well claim to share in your gifts as men of affairs and administrators. If that be so, it is your own duty, as much as ours, to fight with the Home Government to make the Executive Council really responsible to the Indian nation. If you fail in that, you will be unfaithful to your own trust. All legitimate responsibility, like honest labour, has a dignity of its own, and by making the Government of India responsible, you would be only ministering to your own honour and self-respect. But if you do not do it, do not think that the destiny of India will remain unachieved". The nation is up and in arms. It is well aware of both of its points of weakness and its points of strength; but it is not going to falter any longer. It has struck its tents and is marching with the music of hope in its ears and the strength of confidence in its ears. Dominion Status and Independence somehow seem intermingled on the horizon; but which of them should be ultimately cherished or accepted as its immediate or ultimate destiny by the Indian nation depends mainly upon the alertness and alacrity which you show in your duty to India. (Cheers.)

Munshi Iswar Saran (Lucknow Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, in rising to support the motion of my Honourable friend, I am anxious that no words of mine should add to the bitterness of the present situation. There is no impartial critic who will not be prepared to acknowledge that some useful service has been rendered by the Executive Council to this country. Whether the service outweighs the disservice is another story.

Sir, the question that we are considering at this moment has got two aspects, one political and the other psychological. I shall, with your permission, first offer a few observations on the political aspect of the problem, and I shall put one or two very straight questions to the representatives of the Executive Council in this House and ask them to give us straight answers.

We have had one hundred and fifty years of British rule in this country. What have our rulers done as regards the education of the people? We are told, in season and out of season, that they are the trustees of the masses. I do not propose to pause, consider and examine this theory of trusteeship—I shall accept it for the sake of argument—but I shall ask, in all seriousness, what have the trustees done for the betterment of the education of these very men whose interests they profess to protect?

Mr. B. Das (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): The Education Member is not present here!

Munshi Iswar Saran: Who opposed Mr. Gokhale's Bill for compulsory primary education in 1911? Who, I ask again, opposed Mr. Sarma's Resolution for the introduction of primary education as a post-war concession? Sir, I hope my Honourable friends on the other side will give straight answers to these questions, because on those answers will depend the verdict not only of this House but of the civilised world on their administration. Contrast what they were doing before the introduction of these shadowy reforms known as the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms with what has been done since their introduction. When our Ministers in the provinces got some kind of power and became in some way responsible to the electorate what happened? By 1927 the number of pupils in primary schools rose to 2.94 millions, or an increase of 44 per cent., while the expenditure on primary education, which was 2.93 crores in 1917, became 6.95 crores—an increase of 237 per cent. I say, Sir, that our progress in the realm of education has been impeded by the Executive Council. They were responsible for our education—they realised the taxes. Why, I ask, did they not educate our people? And today we find ourselves in a position when the reactionaries in England can get up and say, "Oh, you want self-government; you want Dominion Status; how can you have it when there is so much illiteracy in your country?" With that argument I am not concerned at this stage, but I do submit that this argument does not lie in the mouths of those who, by their inaction, have kept us in this condition. The education of the country is one test by which we can judge of the achievements of the Executive Council.

Take the other test; our finances. In his last budget speech, Sir Basil Blackett envied his distinguished successor, because, from 1929 onwards, he would be enjoying surpluses, and he would be a happy man. This view of Sir Basil Blackett, I take it, was the view of the Executive Council. A year after, however, the Honourable Sir George Schuster found the finances of India like the curate's egg, good in parts. What did he say? I shall beg the House to mark this. Only a year after he said there were bad patches in our finances, though there was no occasion for serious pessimism. It was only last year that these remarks were made, and what do we get this year? A frankly deficit Budget, with proposals for intolerable taxation, coupled with Imperial Preference. Sir, there may be some dispute whether this particular proposal constitutes Imperial Preference or not, but I hope the Executive Government and Sir George Schuster will forgive us if we regard it as Imperial Preference, because I find that journals, weighty and responsible, in England have taken this view. What is worse, Sir, is this. This Executive Council gives us no hope of reduction in the expenditure in the immediate future. The Honourable Sir George Schuster, on their behalf, said, in regard to one branch of expenditure—civil administration—and I must confess that he was perfectly frank—that there was no prospect of any reduction in the near future. I submit with great respect, and I can assure the House that I do not wish to use a single word which may be offensive, that if the finances of a country are any test of its administration, then it must be said that the Executive Council or the Government of India is a failure.

Their policy of expenditure, their manipulation of the ratio, about which there has been repeated complaint in this House and outside, their exchange and currency policy, all these taken together have reduced us to our present condition.

While the country was in an unsatisfactory financial condition, what did the Executive Council do? They started giving Lee concessions to their officers. I do not for a moment wish to minimise the services of the able and distinguished men who confer a boon on us by coming over to this country,—they are all eminent men, I hope all of them are,—but the point is, if the Executive Council had been responsible to us, they would have considered whether, in the present condition of the finances of the country, we could afford to give these concessions to these officers. I say, Sir, if we had an Executive Council which was responsible to us, it would not have appointed the Lee Commission, nor would it have accepted its recommendations. What it would have done is this, it would have taken courage to reduce the scale of salaries from top to bottom. As my friend Mr. Kelkar has said,—and I do wish to support him—it is absolutely necessary that, in the present financial condition of India, and for a long time to come, the scale of salaries in this country should be very much lower than what it is. But this reform will only be possible when we have an Executive Council which is responsible to us, or in other words, when we have responsible Government.

Now, Sir, take another thing. The Government of India have disarmed us, and let them for a moment endeavour, if they can, to look at the matter from our point of view. It is not only that this action of Government has deprived us of our capacity to defend our hearths and homes, but what is infinitely worse is that it has led to our spiritual and moral degradation. Having disarmed us, what else did they do? They would not throw open to us the commissioned ranks of the Army for a long long time. The House is very well aware of the history of this question, and I do not think I need go into it in detail. They resisted our demand for the admission of Indians into the commissioned ranks of the Army. After a long struggle, they have yielded, but they have yielded with such ill grace that their present policy, I submit, Sir, is not only halting but dilatory. They have been spending money over the Army, in spite of our protests, for the last so many years. I have sometimes noticed, Sir,—I mean no offence or disrespect to anybody,—that when we hear the annual wail from this side of the House about the military expenditure, some Honourable Members of this House.

Mr. President: We are going to deal with the military question tomorrow.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I submit, Sir, with profound respect that I am not discussing the military expenditure. I am only inviting the attention of the House to the fact of how the Executive Government have failed us in this matter. I hope, Sir, you will permit me

Mr. President: The Honourable Member can do that tomorrow in a general way. He cannot refer to it in detail today.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I shall not go into details at all. I am much obliged to you for your suggestion.

Now, Sir, this expenditure in 1910 and 1911 was over 28 crores and in the present year 1930-31 it is over 54 crores. Now, Sir, I ask if this Executive Council had been responsible to the people of this country, would it have gone on spending money in the fashion in which it has gone on? Why, Sir? We know as a fact that many suggestions, by way of reform, have been made from time to time, and they have been authoritatively made by the well known Incheape Committee, and still a good many of them remain on the pages of the Report and have not been carried out in their entirety. I say again, if this Government had been a responsible Government, it would not have yielded in the way it has yielded to the wishes of Whitehall or of the War Office—I do not know which. Proposal after proposal has gone to the India Office, and it has gone there only to be buried in that grave of India's hopes and aspirations. I do not think, Sir, I should weary the House by citing other instances. Look at any department you will, and you will find that the Executive Council has failed and failed miserably. I said at the very outset that there was something to be recorded on the credit side, but truth compels me to say that infinitely more has to be recorded on the debit side.

I may, with your permission, Sir, turn now from this unpleasant topic to a topic which is somewhat pleasant and hope-inspiring. An element of change has been introduced into the political atmosphere by the announcement which was made by His Excellency the Viceroy, and may I, Sir, here pause and pay my tribute of respect and admiration to His Excellency Lord Irwin, if it may not be impertinence for me to do so? . . .

Mr. President: It is for you to consider.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I would not have done it if I had thought it would be impertinent. Sir, we on this side have differed from His Excellency and from his policy and criticised him, and we still retain to ourselves the right of differing from him and of criticising him and his policy, but that does not prevent us from paying our meed of praise to Lord Irwin for the magnificent part which he has played at this critical moment in the history of the relations between England and India. There has been, I know, Sir, some misunderstanding about this announcement, but may I say that, if one reads dispassionately the announcement together with the speech. . .

Mr. President: I really cannot allow the Honourable Member to discuss the question of the merits or demerits of the announcement in this debate.

Munshi Iswar Saran: I submit, Sir, with profound respect to the Chair that I

Mr. President: I cannot allow the Honourable Member to discuss the question of the announcement.

Munshi Iswar Saran: May I be permitted to explain my point of view, Sir.

Mr. President: Order, order. I have already ruled that I cannot allow the announcement of His Excellency the Viceroy to be discussed on this cut.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Will you be good enough to permit me to explain my point of view so that you may be pleased to consider it. Am I not allowed to make a submission for your consideration? I am perfectly willing to obey your ruling, but surely you will be pleased to.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member knows that I have given a ruling, and the Honourable Member has got to accept it.

Munshi Iswar Saran: Most willingly I accept the ruling. What I want to submit for your consideration is that I am not discussing the question of the announcement of His Excellency the Viceroy. I submit that it is germane to the question which we are discussing, for the simple reason that it provides an opportunity of converting the irresponsibility of the Executive Council into responsibility.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member might vote against the motion in that case.

Munshi Iswar Saran: It is my misfortune that I am not able to explain myself. I hope in course of time I shall be able to make myself better understood. As you have been pleased to give your ruling, I have got to obey it and I bow to it. I shall not refer to the announcement at all. What I say is this. A situation has been created and it is for the Executive Council to so shape its course of action that full advantage may be taken of this opportunity.

I said at the outset of my remarks that there was a psychological aspect of the question. The problem we are discussing is not merely a political problem. I wish Honourable Members on the opposite Benches to realise that it is with us a question of emotion. Indians feel humiliated that the Government of their country is not their own and they are not free. Indians feel that they can only acquire their rightful place among the nations of the world if the Government of their country becomes responsible to them. Even if this Government were the most ideal Government in the world, we would still protest against it and claim freedom. I submit this is a most critical moment and we have got the last chance. Let me hope and trust that Members on the opposite Benches will so shape their conduct as to fully utilise this opportunity and to see that there may be no occasion next year to move this cut. Sir, I support the motion.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas: I rise to support the motion of my Honourable friend, Mr. Kelkar. I am told that it is not necessary this year to repeat this motion, which has been a hardy annual for the past few years, because the Government of India have achieved this year a substantial step forward in securing the Round Table Conference. I submit that the Round Table Conference is an achievement of His Excellency the Viceroy personally, and that this motion concerns the Governor General in Council, namely, the form of Government here of which, there is no difference of opinion on this side of the House, India has had too much and which India wishes to see changed without any further delay. I therefore feel that, unless during the last year or the present year, there have been some changes in the policy of Government, which can be said to have been a welcome change from their past policy, one must consider the question of censuring the Executive Council, which for all practical purposes represents the Government of India in this House. I have come to the conclusion that there has been no such change during this current year in the policy of Government in various departments, and that this hardy annual, as it may be called, is justifiably revived this year, and this House should pass this motion. Previous speakers have referred to the policy of Government from the political and, as my Honourable friend Munshi Iswar Saran said, from the higher points of view. As representing trade and commerce in this House, I wish to submit to the House one or two directions in which the apathy of Government, as far as commerce and industry are concerned, have richly earned to the Executive Council this censure motion. I will begin by quoting what Mr. Stanley Baldwin has said lately in connection with industries of England and the necessity for safeguarding British industries. England is a far far senior country to India as regards the efficiency and capacity of her industries to hold their own. Compared with England, we, Sir, in this country, as far as our industries are concerned, can be said to be practically in our childhood, and still what does the illustrious ex-Premier of Great Britain say? I will quote from the Notes and Comments of the Times Trade and Engineering Supplement, dated the 8th February, of the current year. With your permission, I will quote in full two paragraphs which I am afraid I cannot curtail. They will convey the burden of what I have to put before the House better than any words of mine. I will therefore read these in full. The heading is, "Free Hand for Safeguarding".

"As for the proposed tariff truce, Mr. Baldwin roundly declared that in no circumstances would he or those he led be a party to anything that might be done by the present Government in that direction. He pointed out that there can be no tariff truce between this country and the world; a nation armed with bows and arrows is not in a position to make arrangements with one equipped with modern artillery"—(India has no bows and arrows, nor modern artillery)—"And so he came to the important pronouncement that,"—(these are Mr. Baldwin's own words)—"If I am to cope with unemployment as it stands today, I must have a free hand from the country in safeguarding the manufacturers". He rightly insisted that the mere fact that the Government had such power would be of assistance in making treaties with foreign powers."

Under the heading "Safeguarding Procedure", the paper says:

"Mr. Baldwin's statement has been taken to mean that he does not intend to revive the famous "procedure" by which protracted inquiries were instituted by his Government into the desirability of imposing duties. Government by committee is deservedly unpopular and it is quite certain that industry does not want any repetition of proceedings that imposed upon manufacturers the obligation of proving a case at their own expense and in the teeth of determined opposition from importers of foreign merchandise whose prosperity was the best evidence of the need for safeguarding but in fact enabled them to undertake expensive measures to defend their interests. Another good point was Mr. Baldwin's reminder that when industry was in process of rationalisation, like the lobster when changing its shell, it needed protection during the metamorphosis."

These words, Sir, are true words, and if they are true regarding England they are a thousand times truer regarding the necessity of our industries in India. If the necessity for England to safeguard her industries after progress in industrialisation for more than two centuries is great,

[Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas.]
