THUNDER UNDER THE EARTH

By Frank Illingworth.

After years of quiescence, Mount Vesuvius has erupted again, engulfing villages and fields in devastation far more destructive and lasting than the worst of total war.

Writers have described how they have watched from roofs the advancing lava, a black tide of smouldering, semi-liquid, cinder-like material exuding sulphurous smoke, flowing down a village street, sometimes at the rate of three hundred yards an hour until the edge of it has reached the building where they stand and they have had to leave to avoid being cut off. British troops have been "under fire" from cinders and ashes—the "black snow" which covers and destroys crops for miles around—and have given their help in saving the inhabitants from the holocaust.

What is this thunder under the world?

There is a probable explanation. Gases born in the seething under-world must have an outlet: and where their power is greatest they burst through the earth's crust.

This is what happened in Mexico in 1943. The peasants of the Uruapan district did not realise that they were literally "sitting on a volcano." Certainly there had been earth tremors, and a wisp of smoke curled from a fissure in the middle of a perfectly flat maize field. But no one could foresee that on February 20 of that year a miniature volcano

From the riven rocks of Arctic Jan Mayan Island to New Zealand, from Alaska and Russia's frozen Kamkchatka Peninsula (the home of fourteen volcanoes) to Erebus in the Antarctic, the world is dotted with Craters. They range from small cones to Kilauea's 1,300 feet deep pit comprising one hundred and ninety acres of molten lava. Some are comparatively docile monsters and puff nothing but steam, but who can tell when their pent up energy will fling as much as 2,982 billion tons of rocks into the heavens—as did Japan's Bandai-San in 1888.

CRATERS BELCH FIRE

The Pacific area is rich in volcanoes. From the smoking Aleutians to Japan, craters belch fire at frequent intervals, with the Dutch East Indies and Hawaii the focal points.

How puny are the flames of a Jap-nesemade war compared with the upheaval of Sumbawa island, in 1815—the most terrific eruption on record in any part of the world. The Japanese attack on Hawaii appears insignificant beside the fury of the island's volcanoes, Kilauea, Mokuaweoweo, and Mauna Loa.

Every so often in undulating waves the lava rises from these pits to slide over the crater's lip and down the mountainside. So it is with Mauna Loa. Not long ago she sent a stream of lave towards the sea and the village of Hoopulou. The fisherfolks' prayers and sacrifices to the fire god Pele proved of no avail and Hoopulou was obliterated.

British troops have seen all the volcanoes in Europe. But it is in the Pacific that they will see their most impressive sights when they follow the chains of volcanic isles to the East's most eruptive islands—Japan herself.

*Wartime discoveries in dehydration and other food processes have great significance for after the war.

FOOD OF THE FUTURE

By Earl N. Bressman.

Director of Agricultural Division, Office of Inter-American Affairs

Condensed from Foreign Commerce Weekly, Washington, D.C.

Recent scientific discoveries are making possible the development of many food products which have lain dormant or neglected in the past. The lessons being learned in the United States war programme, in supplying the needs of the United Nations, point the way towards wider utilization of many products when opportunity permits. These may provide a better diet for thousands of persons who live in the South American republics, and for others.

Among the most important of the new developments is the work now being done in the conservation of meat, eggs, milk, fruit, and vegetables, through dehydration methods. Human beings have always faced the problem of how to preserve food from times of abundance for the time of scarcity—how to prepare food so that it can be transported from the point of production to the point of consumption. In temperate zones, where the time of scarcity is invariably a time of cold, Nature has helped by providing natural refrigeration. But in the latitudes of the tropics and sub-tropics, as in many parts of South America, such a natural asset does not exist. In this large section of the Western Hemisphere, where Nature produces abundant agricultural resources, there exists the anomaly of inadequate diet in the midst of plenty. The reason is lack of technical and scientific equipment to preserve the food products that Nature yields so lavishly. For in tropical climates, not only meats and milk, but fresh vegetables spoil almost overnight.

Thus we have the circumstance of millions of people living on corn, dried beans, imported dried cod-fish, and rice, when their own fields and waters could provide a more balanced diet at less cost. There are pampas with thousands of cattle, but (too often) no way to get fresh meat and milk to distant centres of population. Tasajo, or charque, has provided a partial answer, but anyone who has eaten this crudely dried beef knows that it is a poor substitute for fresh meat.

Recently much progress has been made in preserving basic foods—meat, milk, eggs, fruit and vegetables—by the process of dehydration. This new process expels the water which forms 80 to 90 per cent of the foods we eat. War has forced attention to the need for tremendous quantities of condensed and preserved foods. Until recently it was possible to produce only dried skim milk—that is milk with the butter fat removed. Then a process was discovered for drying the whole milk, including the cream. There are now in the United States 280 factories producing dried milk by the new process.

There are also 85 egg-drying plants in the United States. A standard box of eggs contains 30 dozen eggs and weighs 58 pounds. The same number of eggs when dried weigh only 11 pounds, and occupy less than one-quarter of the space. This year huge quantities of dried vegetables are to be produced, including potatoes, onions, carrots, beets, sweet potatoes, cabbages, spinach and turnips. Other vegetables expected to be on the dehydrated list are tomatoes, green peas, squash, beans, green corn, celery lettuce, peppers, and cranberries.

Methods have been perfected for concentrating the juice of oranges, lemons and grapefruit. One standard box of oranges weighing 90 pounds will yield 4½ gallons of fresh juice, which can be concentrated to a volume of 52 liquid ounces. Each gallon of concentrate equals three boxes of fresh fruit. One truck-load of concentrate equals 30 truck-loads of oranges. But that is one the end of the story. After the juice is squeezed out of the pulp there remains a large amount of juice in the thick outer peel. The juice from the peel is used to produce pectin, a chemical used in making jellies, jams and marmalade. Orange oil can also be pressed from the peel. The oil is used in flavouring beverages, ice-cream and confections. Waste citrus-fruit juice from these operations can be used to make alcohol. The residue of peel and pulp is ground, dried and used for cattle feed. One of the most important food developments to come out of the war is the advance in the knowledge of drying meats. Dried beef is made from lean portions, with bones and fat removed. Dried meat has only one-quarter the weight and one-half the volume of the original meat. It can be eaten months after it has been prepared. The carcass of one average steer will produce about 75 pounds of dried beef.

So the prospects unfold of new products and new markets for food produced in such abundance in the Americas. These new methods of preserving should benefit the trade of the producing countries, besides improving the standard of living. Proteins of meat, eggs and milk, so often lacking in the diet of those who live in the tropics, can now be supplied cheaply in convenient and transportable form. Surplus crops of oranges and the market-gardening, dairying and poultry industries may provide employment for millions. The increased production of dehydrated products will greatly simplify transport. When this war is over the aeroplane will assume an important role in the transport field, and will move cargoes of powdered beef, dried and condensed vegetables over great regions where other forms of transport are inadequate.

The rubber tappers in the remote forests of the Amazon Basin will no longer be restricted to a diet of rice and beans. They can have orange juice, green vegetables (in dehydrated form), meat, milk and fish that need only the addition of a little water to restore them to a form approximating that in which they were produced by Nature. Millions of tons of cargo space will be saved in moving the products to the markets of the world, for sometimes these dehydrated foods can be reduced to one tenth of their original bulk.

PENICILLIN - A WONDER DRUG

By Dr. C. M. Fletcher.

One of the most important advances ever made in medical science has been the discovery during the past 10 years of the group of drugs known as the sulphonamides. These substances have the power of preventing the multiplication within the body of the microbes that cause many serious diseases. The lives that are being saved every day throughout the world by use of these drugs must be numbered in many thousands. But these drugs have one great disadvantage. Although they are far more poisonous to microbes that cause disease than they are to man, they can produce unpleasant and even dangerous results if given to a patient in large doses.

During the past three years scientists have brought into use a drug far more powerful than the sulphonamides, but which is quite harmless to man. The discovery of this substance was due to the keen observation of a British bacteriologist, Professor Fleming, in 1929. He was cultivating in his laboratory the microbe that causes boils. To do this, he had placed the microbe on the surface of a jelly in a shallow dish. He had meant it to grow alone, but, as any housewife who has made jam knows, it is not easy to prevent a mould from growing where it is not wanted, and on Professor Fleming's jelly a mould grew.

Mould was free from microbe

His experiment was spoilt and he might have thrown the jelly away, but he noticed an important thing. The microbe had grown all over the jelly except where the mould was. The mould had apparently prevented the microbe from growing. He took a sample of the mould and set it to grow on the surface of some broth and then examined the broth after a few days. He found it had acquired from the mould the property of preventing the growth of microbes.

Fleming supposed that the mould had secreted into the broth some substance which could stop the growth of microbes, and since the mould was found to be a common one called Penicillium Notatum, he called this substance penicillin. He realised that penicillin might be used to treat infections in man, but his attempts to extract pure penicillin from the broth failed, and his crude extract proved poisonous to animals when injected into them.

No further progress was made until 1940, when a team of scientists at Oxford, headed by Professor Florey, again attacked the problem of extracting the penicillin from the broth. It proved to be very difficult to do so, but eventually a much purer specimen of penicillin was isolated. It was a yellow powder, easily soluble in water. Tested against disease microbes growing in artificial culture, it was found to be at least a thousand times more powerful in preventing their growth than the most powerful of the sulphonamide drugs, and when it was injected into mice that had received a fatal dose of microbes, it cured the infection rapidly, without harming the mice.

Intruder Microbes.

The next step was to try it out in infection in man. For this, much larger quantities of penicillin were needed, and here another problem was encountered. Although the mould was easy to grow, on a large scale, it sometimes refused to produce any penicillin. This failure was found to be partly due to the fact that the large culture bottles which were employed became contaminated by other moulds and microbes, some of which destroyed the penicillin as soon as it was formed. Eventually, means of excluding all such intruders were devised, and at last enough penicillin to treat a patient was produced.

The earliest trials on man were made in 1941. Five cases of serious infections, in which sulphonamides had been given without effect, were treated by the injection of penicillin continuously into the patients' veins by day and night. The first two did not receive adequate amounts, and were only temporarily benefited. The other three were all cured.

*SHORT STORY. This is a true tale of France when it was still divided into Occupied and Unoccupied Zones. The names in the story have, of course, been disguised.

HOW THE PLAGUE CAME TO CAGNAC

By Paul L. Bowen

From Free World, New York

The deceased must have been dearly beloved, for more than a hundred mourners escorted the coffin to the tiny burial ground of the village of Cagnac in Northern France. And Cagnac numbers but 735 souls, not counting the dead that lie beneath the sod. The priest, too, eloquently praised the departed, dwelling upon his outstanding contributions to the community. Nevertheless, as soon as the funeral service was over, the mourners dispersed quickly. They seemed to vanish from the scene in the autumn haze.

There was nothing untoward about the funeral. Nor did anyone comment on the fact that six more funerals followed in quick succession during the next three weeks. It was a damp and rainy autumn—the year was 1940, to be precise—and in the autumn theague seizes even the sturdy people of this harsh country.

"If you will pardon me, sir, who were the deceased, that they should merit such an outpouring of mourners?" asked the travelling salesman of the doctor who had driven over from the neighbouring village of Mandrague—for Cagnac itself supported no doctor. The salesman travelled out of Paris with a line of ladies' underwear, woven of ersatz fibre (made in Germany). According to his story, this salesman merely happened to come to Cagnac just in time to witness two more funerals on successive days,

Despite the cold weather—for it was now December—a large crowd had followed the hearse each time.

The doctor cleared his throat importantly and told the stranger the sad story. An aged farmer in his seventies had been so beloved by his young wife of seventeen that the girl had been unable to bear his death, taking her own life the following day. "Paul et Virginie," the old doctor nodded sagely, tears in his eyes. "Love is stronger than death!" To the salesman Paul and Virginie meant no more than the name of a rival underwear firm. He let it go at that.

But this was only the beginning. On Christmas Eve three funerals were held at once. Again at least a hundred weeping mourners escorted the three coffins. Many of them seemed to come from other villages in the neighbourhood. The mourners must have returned home that same night, for none remained in Cagnac. At the same time, word went around that more funerals would be held at sunrise on Christmas Day, for another travelling salesman—in tomato extract and powdered eggs (made in Germany)—had been asking too many pointed questions.

The plague seemed to gain ground. Twenty-seven times during January the cure's orotund voice rang out into deepening dusk, in eulogy of the departed's high standing in the community or the dead girl's surpassing virtue. Again and again the doctor from Mandrague came trotting over in his buggy and was seen deep in conversation with Cagnac's mayor—the biggest and richest man in the village—as well as with the cure and the sexton. Clearly, space in the little burial ground of Cagnac must have been getting crowded, but evidently a solution must have been found, for the funerals continued in a steady stream throughout February and early March. They were always held in the late afternoon, when the shadows began to deepen. Larger and larger grew the crowds that saw the good countrymen of Cagnac to their last resting-place. Yet the mourners now seemed to bear their grief with singular self-control. One seldom saw anybody weep, though they were all serious enough in mien.

These were hasty and rather ghastly funerals that took place there in the little graveyard of the village. Frequently they lasted till almost midnight, as in times of plague, or like the funerals of miners in some countries. Strangely enough, few of the mourners left the cemetery by the main gate after the sad ceremonies were over. They just seemed to fade away into the shadows. The priest would get home worn out and pale, a gruesome and diabolical grin on his plump face which, thank the Lord, no one could see. Strangers could find no explanation for these things.

But for the indiscretion of still another travelling salesman—salad oil from pulverized whalebone (made in Germany)—the dead might have continued on their well-beaten course in Cagnac. On March 20, however, a small provincial paper printed a brief story about the mysterious plague that had afflicted the village. The Paris press (made in Germany) picked up the story, and one editorial characterized the epidemic as a scandal.

Many more virtuous women and law-abiding men had been put to rest in the Cagnac graveyard, escorted by crowds of mourners, when one day in April a venerable old professor from the Sorbonne arrived in Cagnac on a mission of inquiry, putting up for a single night in the only available guest-room over the little bistro—a room he shared with seven spiders and two hundred and twenty-three cock roaches.

The professor arrived on a Wednesday evening by the 7.10 train from Paris. Later that night he was seen successively in earnest conversation, first with the towering mayor, next with the cure, and finally with the sexton. The next morning, when he hurried from the bistro to catch the 8.28 back to Paris, he was accompanied to the little railway station by the whole village, including old men, children, and even the village idiot, for some mysterious reason called Jacques the Soap Eater.

The little train arrived shrilling its whistle, and the famous professor smilingly waved his umbrella from the window. Everyone cheered, Jacques the Soap Eater tossed his old felt hat in the air, and the train disappeared around a bend....

Three days later, on Saturday—there had been four more funerals in Cagnac in the meantime—The old professor forwarded a document to the German Occupation Authorities. "A Report on the Plague Now Raging in the Village of Cagnac," ran the title. It was a long statement, but its chief findings were as follows:

The inquiry extend over a period of more than one week, during which more than two hundred (200) patients and other individuals were examined.
