BATTLE FOR EMERALDS

By P. W. Rainier.

Condensed from "Green Fire" (John Murray, London)

I have probably mined more emeralds than any man living. Mix beryllium with aluminium in a certain way and you've got an emerald. A white one. Man can make a white emerald synthetically as easily as he makes a synthetic diamond, but only Nature knows how to add to the emerald that dash of chromium which turns it green. The more chromium in the mixture the darker the green colour and the more valuable the gem. A white emerald is worth nothing in dollars and cents; while the dark green bit of fire, which is a first-grade emerald, may be worth anything up to five thousand dollars a carat. One ounce of the very best emerald material would be worth the greater part of a million dollars, but I don't believe there exists a one-ounce emerald of that total value because the larger gems usually have some flaws in them.

Having created one of the most concentrated forms of wealth known to Man, Nature took good care to hide her treasure from him. To make it still more secure she covered the region of the Colombian emerald deposits with a thick layer of forest, and Colombia produces most of the world's worthwhile emeralds. The Chibcha Indians of the high plateau of Colombia mined emeralds from Chivor before the Spanish Conquest. They used to acquire gold by trading for it with the Tolima Indians across the Magdalena River, giving emeralds and salt in exchange for the gold which they threw into the sacred lake as sacrifice to their Sun-God. Soon after the conquest the Spaniards were shown Chivor, and they began to develop the mine just before the middle of the sixteenth century. For a hundred years they continued to develop it, until the conquest of the Muzo Indians, in the Carare Valley across the eastern chain of the Andes, opened up a temporarily more attractive and virgin source of supply.

Chivor lay abandoned after the discovery of Muzo until the close of the nineteenth century, when a young English adventurer, Chris Dixon, made a fabulously rich strike in the Muzo region while he was operating the famous old mine for a British syndicate and so rejuvenated an industry that was tending to become impotent. Capital was forthcoming, and prospectors began to drift forestwards to investigate the legends of lost emerald mines or to hunt for new formations. Pachó Restrepo, the Antioquian, picked on the lost Chivor Mine as his quarry.

Pachó was a stout fellow. He needed to be if he were to rediscover Chivor. Its general location was known, but that might mean anywhere in an area of fifty miles square. Month after month. Years went by. Don Pachó's once substantial fortune began to become attenuated with the strain of maintaining, in such an uninhabited wilderness, the force of men required. Axemen for hacking trails and scores of pack Indians to bring in supplies. Meat was scarce and Don Pachó's men depended for their ration on what the forest provided. Squirrels darting along the fern-wreathed branches of the huge yellow laurel or cedar trees, coners in their holes in the rocky cliffs—the fat buruga, the South American version of the North American ground-hog.

It was a buruga, that found Chivor for Don Pachó. One of his Indians chased the sluggish animal into a hole and proceeded to dig it out. After a yard or so of digging the opening widened. The Indian entered and stood upright. Regular walls and arched roof the opening had. A tunnel. In the soft rock through which it had been driven were the pick-marks of long-dead Indian slaves—three centuries dead or more. The lost mine of Chivor had been found. Don Pachó spent the remainder of his fortune developing his find and was glad enough to unload it on an American syndicate.

Some years later I arrived from New York to take over the position of mine manager. Month by month we explored the veins which our excavations uncovered. At last the character of the rock changed. The silky texture left it. The bottom of the pit was now of a formation which fractured sharply into jagged edges, quite unlike the square-breaking strata which had produced emeralds. Once an emerald vein approached that jagged layer on which it lay the green streak ceased. The pit had "bottomed." We must now open a new pit and wait many months till it had reached the same stratum of formation that we had just finished exploiting. Each emerald pit sunk on Chivor was a gambler's throw.

The emerald vein is but a tiny crack in the rock, seldom wider than a finger's breadth. To find it is the difficulty. The mine area covered about two square miles, while even a fabulously rich spot would cover less than the area of a dining-room carpet. Now I was looking for some favourable indication to guide me in sinking a pit some distance from the mine area in which our pits had been sunk hitherto. I was clambering down the precipitous sides of Chivor peak—hardly one square yard of that stark upthrusting peak failed to feel the impress of my foot during the years! ran the mine. With the geologist's pick from my belt I was chipping off pieces here and there along the face. It seemed to have crumbled unnaturally in places. I examined the nearest of these. The top of it was roughly circular. A tunnel filled with debris from the fallen roof. The others were tunnels too. I noticed scores of them. Placed so close together that the rock between them had barely sufficed to hold up the mountain above. The old Spaniards had mined this spot. Mined it intensively. I went at once for Marco, my Colombian foreman, and together we scrambled down to the scene of my find.

Many months later I sat on the edge of the new pit. The crisis was approaching. If I had guessed right all would be well. But if I had guessed wrong, I would have to do a lot of explaining in my annual report to the company and the Board in New York, with half a year wasted on unproductive work by three hundred men. And then we found a cavity. Just an opening in the rock with one end of it opened to daylight by a stroke of a miner's bar. Lying flat I peered into it. A dust-filled hole. The dust was iron oxide, residue of the original nodule of iron ore. Not a hint of green about it, and yet I remembered that always the most prolific of my previous finds had lain loose in dusty-looking iron oxide. With the pick from my belt I enlarged the hole till I could insert my hand and forearm. My fingers raked the loosely lying iron particles inside . . . blindly because my forearm filled the hole to the exclusion of my vision. There were hard things lying loose in the soft dust. My fingers explored them. Hexagons.

Emeralds. They must be emeralds, although they had shown no glint of green when I had looked into the hole.

My finger-tips selected one and my fingers closed on it. Out into the sunlight I drew it. A good-sized hexagonal crystal that might be a valuable emerald or might be . . . flawed.

Still lying prone my hand went to my trouser pocket for my penknife. The movement of my body brought my gaze to bear over my shoulder. Work had apparently stopped all over the pit, I noticed, and hundreds of Indian miners were clustered behind me. Tense. Hundreds of eyes were fixed on that small hole and on the object which I had extracted from it.

"What a pity! Spoiled emerald." An old minor shook his head sadly.

The veteran's remark brought me sharply to a realization of the situation. The emerald obviously appeared to the miners worthless. What a chance to keep its value secret if I should really have my hand on a valuable pocket! True, I had already had at times valuable parcels of emeralds in the mine safe and as yet no one had tried to hold the mine up for them. But a really rich find might stimulate some of the more daring of the local bandit fraternity to take a chance and hold the mine up. If I could only conceal the value of the find . . . if value there were. Affecting a nonchalance I was far from feeling I tossed the hexagon to the old miner. "Bad luck," I agreed.

From hand to hand the miners passed it, clucking their tongues and shaking their heads. Then one took out his knife and made as though to scrape the paint-like covering from it.

"Stop that," I cried. "You'll break it. I want to put it in acid to clean the muck off it. Bits of it may be worth saving."

7L
Lm 211. N387. M5 1945.10.

As I slipped the hexagon back into my pocket I caught sight of Marco's grim countenance above the heads of the crowd.

"Get me a sack and a shovel," I ordered. "We'll shovel up all that loose dust with the emeralds in it. I'll work over it in my office and see what we can save."

Marco shouldered his way to me through the press. My back to the rest of them, I winked at him and saw his jaw set suddenly till little lumps of muscle jumped into sight along his lean jowl. Quick on the uptake as always, he knew my play now.

"Si, Senor," he agreed quite calmly, although his eyes danced. "Some of the bits may be worth saving. May the Virgin grant we get enough out of them to pay the cost of this great pit."

As soon as I could get clear I scrambled up the side of that emerald pit like a cat with a dog on its tail. I wanted to be alone with that little hexagon that was burning a hole in my pocket. Once out of sight of the miners I whipped out my pocket-knife and began to scrape feverishly at the rusty covering. Hard it was. As though it had been melted on. It took me several minutes to work a small spot clear on one side. Frantically I began to scrape a corresponding little window on the opposite side and let the light shine through it to determine the colour.

At last I held it up. A green ray shone through the little object. Dark green. A hint of fire. I was holding a first-grade emerald, and there were dozens more emeralds in the hole. They would all be of the same colour—emeralds run like that. A fortune for the new York company and a big bonus for me! That one cavity would not be the end of it. I knew the habits of the pretty green gem by this time.

And so it proved. What a find that was! Before that series of pockets had been worked out the high-grade emeralds alone had filled the capacious mine safe and the less valuable gems been relegated to the accommodation of an old tin trunk. Yes, I had earned that bonus, I felt.
