Some special comment must be made on civil rights as they are affected by federal law.³⁵ For the most part, United States statutes do not provide for the loss of either citizenship or civil rights. Most such rights derive from state constitutions and laws rather than federal, and their deprivation occurs, therefore, through the jurisdictional power of the state. Hence, a federal conviction of a crime or imprisonment in a federal institution may result in loss of political and other rights by reason of the specific legal provisions for the deprivation of such rights in the particular state, even though the conviction was not had in a state court. Restoration of rights also depends upon state law, but it too may be affected by federal action: Presidential pardon, while it does not itself confer or restore any rights, generally removes the effect of conviction and imprisonment, so that the individual may regain his privileges either with or without further action by the state, depending upon its legal provisions on restoration.³⁶ As under state practice, federal actions of clemency may be specifically denominated as

North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, Wyoming.

³⁵ For a more extended treatment of the subject of deprivation through federal conviction see Alexander Holtzoff, "Loss of Civil Rights by Conviction of Crime," Federal Probation, Vol. 6, No. 2 (April-June 1942), pp. 18-19, and idem, "Civil Rights of Criminals," in Vernon C. Branham and Samuel B. Kutash, Encyclopedia of Criminology (New York: Philosophical Library, 1949), pp. 55-58.

³⁶ Jones v. Board of Registrars, 56 Miss. 766; Cowan v. Prouse, 93 Ky. 156, 19 S. W. 407.

"pardons to restore civil rights" where they are not based upon innocence. Naturally, only federal pardons may be granted for federal offenses, state pardons for state crimes. It should be noted that, in accordance with the principle involved here, civil and other deprivations that are auxiliary to the conviction are quite different in effect than are the major penalties imposed by the courts: a conviction or imprisonment in any state or in the federal courts may result in loss of rights in another jurisdiction in accordance with its laws.³⁷ Similarly a pardon or other device of clemency employed by an appropriate executive has effects elsewhere that depend upon the laws of the jurisdiction where the offender attempts to assert his rights.³⁸

As a partial exception to the generalizations made above, it should be noted that there are some limited provisions in the laws of the United States for a direct denial of rights. Loss of citizenship or nationality may result from a court martial conviction for desertion in time of war or from a charge of treason, of attempting to overthrow the government by force, or of bearing arms against the United States.³⁹

Beyond these provisions, the law disqualifies from holding federal office or ³⁷ It should be noted, however, that a prisoner sentenced to life in a federal court is not civilly dead, and it has been held that a state may not so treat him though he be imprisoned where the local law provides for civil death of prisoners sentenced to life terms. Presbury v. Hull, 34 Mo. 29 (1868).

³⁸ The principle appears clear and sound that a federal pardon cannot be given to a state offender and that state authorities should not pardon for federal crimes. However, at least three states (Alabama, Kentucky, Virginia) have issued certificates restoring civil rights lost through federal convictions, and in two of these the highest courts upheld this power in the governor. See Hogan v. Hartwell, 242 Ala. 646, and Arnett v. Stumbo, 287 Ky. 433.

³⁹ U. S. C., tit. 8, § 801 (g-h).

position of trust individuals convicted of treason, inciting rebellion, conspiracy to violate civil rights of any citizen, bribery, mutilation, or falsification of public records, and government employees who receive compensation for rendering service to any person in relation to a matter, in which the United States is interested, before any government department.⁴⁰

Deportation and loss of citizenship

On a somewhat different footing are the provisions for deportation of aliens on the basis of criminal conviction: the deprivation of the privilege of domicile. The Immigration Act of 1917 makes provision for the deportation of undesirable aliens upon the directive of the Attorney General where it can be shown that they have been convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude.⁴¹ An order of deportation may be appealed to the Board of Immigration Appeals or attacked by a writ of habeas corpus, if the alien is in custody and can show that his hearing was not fair, that the evidence was not substantial, that the order exceeded the Attorney General's authority, or that he has been held unreasonably long.⁴² Also, in accordance with provisions of law in the jurisdiction where such convictions occurred, an unconditional pardon may preclude deportation by blotting out guilt. In at least one jurisdiction (Pennsylvania) completion of the prison term is sufficient to accomplish this result. In one recent year, a governor of New York State granted forty-eight pardons to aliens whose prison terms had expired but who had remained liable to deportation, some of them for a number of years.⁴³

⁴⁰ U. S. C., tit. 18, §§ 4, 202, 207. There are a few other provisions for such disqualification that are of lesser importance.

⁴¹ Immigration Act, § 19. What is "moral turpitude" has been far from clear in the cases. The law provides for deportation where (1) the alien had been convicted of such crime prior to entry; (2) he has been sentenced to imprisonment for a term of a year or more for such a crime committed within five years of entry; and (3) he has been sentenced twice to imprisonment for such crimes at any time after entry.

⁴² See Charles Gordon, "The Writ of Habeas Corpus in Deportation Proceedings," in Monthly Review (Department of Justice Immigration and Naturalization Service), Vol. 3, No. 5 (November 1945), pp. 218-23.

Save for the exceptional offenses we have noted, the native does not lose his citizenship through law violations. When he does sustain such loss he becomes a stateless person, but this does not necessitate his deportation. However, it has been held that when a native here has become a citizen of another country, though he did not intend to abandon his United States citizenship, he may be deprived of the latter and refused admission to the United States as an alien, even if no crime was involved. Under our immigration laws the criminal alien may be excluded or deported for fraudulent admission. The noncriminal alien who is admitted may be deported for the subsequent commission of crimes involving moral turpitude and, if he has been issued a certificate of citizenship, may be deprived thereof.

A REASONABLE APPROACH

It is not proposed in this paper to deal elaborately with solutions to the problems of civil rights. Our purpose was merely to describe summarily the present confused condition of these matters. In conclusion, however, it may not be inappropriate to comment on the principles involved and what may be a reasonable social and penological approach. The deprivation of "civil rights" may be conceived to be either an auxiliary punishment in itself or the incidental consequence of conviction and sentence, not intended to be specifically punitive but merely protective of public interests and of official convenience. Such a distinction as this appears unimportant to the offender: he may well consider these losses to be a part of the vindictive punishments that society exacts. And, in fact, they do appear very frequently to reflect retributive sentiments rather than any real need for community protection. The risk of repeated crime to which society is continuously subject from released offenders is patently greater than the possible consequences of their exercise of the rights that are generally removed.

⁴³ Statement of Pardons, Commutations and Reprieves, Leg. Doc. No. 30, Albany, New York, 1945.

Deprivation of the right to vote, to hold public office, or to act as juror during a period of incarceration is quite clearly a matter of convenience, if not necessity. Loss of the right to practice one's business or profession or to assume a position of trust, even after release from imprisonment, may often be more largely a matter of public protection than of retribution. However, when the right to vote, to act as juror or to testify, to hold office or trust, to practice in an occupation of one's training and choice is denied to probationers, to parolees, to those who have completed their sentences and been discharged, and even to those who have been pardoned, the gratuitously punitive element is great. In such instances, it appears that more mischief than benefit may commonly be worked, for the restrictions imposed do more to prevent rehabilitation than they do to protect the public.

The customary forms of deprivations of civil rights, it is submitted, are not for the most part sound as auxiliary punishments. Except for the deprivation of occupational privileges (including the holding of public office), they do little or nothing to repress crime. This is not to deny that auxiliary punishments—such as restitution, for example—may serve an obviously useful purpose, but the losses of civil rights are not, for the most part, of comparable utility.

SOME GENERAL PRINCIPLES

In the light of what we have written, the following principles are submitted:

1. The ordinary forms of deprivations that we have discussed are not appropriate as auxiliary punishments, for they serve little purpose in deterring crime or incapacitating criminals. Put differently, they are not appropriate measures under a penology that would eschew punishments exacted for their own sake or designed to brand the offender as infamous or outlaw.

2. As a matter of public and official convenience, it is desirable during imprisonment to limit the criminal's freedom to act as juror or serve in public office, perhaps to vote (though no great harm would result, it seems, from prisoners' use of "absentee ballots"). This principle of convenience is restricted, obviously, to the period of actual incarceration. Moreover, though some considerable inconvenience may be involved, it is desirable to permit the exercise of certain important privileges, such as the right to sue and to receive and convey property, real and personal. The right to sue for wrongs done to the prisoner or his property is of special importance. If the offender is not allowed direct access to the courts for such purposes, he should at least be permitted to enjoy these rights through a representative.

3. Aside from periods of incarceration, it may be desirable to protect public interests by prohibiting the exercise of certain ordinary rights for some period of time, such as the privileges of occupation and office. It appears, however, that a finer discrimination should be employed in serving this objective.

Some balance must be struck between the measure of threat to community welfare, on the one side, and on the other both the intrinsic value of maximizing personal freedom under a system of democratic justice and the utility of encouraging the sound exercise of rights in helping individuals to become responsible citizens. For the most part, aside from exceptions that have been noted, the civil and property rights lost through conviction raise small problem of social danger. It appears that the law should not provide flatly for denial of civil and political rights to those who are on probation or parole. Limited and special provisions might well be made, however, for the denial during the period of their sentences of certain political rights (particularly the holding of office) to those who have committed atrocious political offenses and of certain occupational privileges to those who have exploited their occupations in seriously illegal ways. There appears to be no excessive hazard, however, in the English rule that leaves full rights with those who are selected for probation. And there is merit in assisting the rehabilitation of the parolee by restoring all rights to him. There is also some danger, of course, but prison release must involve risk in any event.

4. Justice demands an end to penalties. So does rehabilitation. No principle is more clear, perhaps, than this: upon completion of his sentence, if not before, the offender should be fully restored to his rights. If any of these deprivations are so significant penologically that they should persist beyond the court's sentence to prison or probation, they should be elevated to the status of primary and independent sanctions, specifically designed to accomplish appropriate correctional goals of deterrence, incapacitation, or rehabilitation. In that way, they would receive the special focus of attention required in adjusting penalty both to the offense and the offender. Possibly the grafting politician, the corrupt judge, or the purveyor of illicit medication, for example, should not be permitted ever again to ply his trade. Restrictions of this sort have major impact on the offender, however, comparable to that of imprisonment, and often of even greater seriousness to the individual involved. The employment of a permanent or long-persistent sanction of this sort should be based on quite specific categories of offense and on judicial discrimination as to those individual offenders for whom the sanction appears to be necessary as a matter of public protection. Unfortunately, it has not been possible under our system to control the actions of licensing agencies in accordance with sound principles of justice, but so far as legal deprivations and the behavior of courts are concerned we can eradicate from current practice such obsolete residuals as civil death and blanket deprivations based on conviction or sentence, and such unnecessarily complicated forms of restoration as pardon and certificates of good conduct.

In this entire area of the incidental deprivation of rights and their restoration, we can liberalize practice greatly with very little threat to the public and with considerable advantage in maintaining a legitimate measure of self-respect on the part of the offender. Wisconsin law seems reasonable in this respect.

Paul W. Tappan, Ph.D., LL.B., J.S.D., Washington, D. C., is chairman of the United States Board of Parole and sometime professor in criminology and law at New York University. He is author of several volumes in the field of criminology, including Juvenile Delinquency, Juvenile Delinquency in the North American Region, Delinquent Girls in Court, The Habitual Sex Offender, coauthor of Social Problems, and editor of Contemporary Correction. He has contributed numerous articles to the professional journals of law, criminology, psychiatry, sociology, and social work.

Substitutes for Imprisonment

By WILL C. TURNBLADH

OBVIOUSLY the best substitute for imprisonment and all of its attendant problems and evils would be the prevention of criminal behavior itself. Unfortunately, until such time as the pressures of our society upon the human personality are lessened or realigned, we must deal with the casualties. Until such time as the schools and other community agencies possess the knowledge and facilities to isolate and treat preventively both manifest and latent behavior problems in the very young and make the treatment stick, the magnitude of the crime problem demands that we apply fully the best present knowledge of correctional treatment. And this we are failing to do.

Prison disturbances throughout the country during the last few years have focused public attention not only on the prisons themselves, but on our whole approach to the crime problem. They have clearly revealed that the problem is deeper than the personnel, program, and plant of the prison, vital as these are. Sharing in the responsibility for prison disturbances are sentencing laws, the sentencing practices of judges, probation, and parole. Most prison administrators are saddled with large congregate institutions frequently overcrowded with inmates, young and old, first offenders and hardened offenders, alcoholics, sex deviates, drug addicts, neurotics, and psychotics. Underlying these factors is an apparently widespread public reliance on the jail and the prison as the answer to crime and criminals. Major questions then are: Are we sending to prison only those requiring institutional care and custody? Can we reduce prison populations so that smaller institutions or units of a specialized nature can be developed, or must we look forward to more and larger institutions? Are there alternatives or substitutes for imprisonment which offer at least as much or greater protection to the public?

SENTENCING

The criminal court judge is dealing with a calculated risk each time he imposes a sentence, and the criminal court judges of the nation are called upon to exercise this responsibility over about a million adult and young adult offenders every year. The sentence the judge imposes affects the destinies of individual offenders and their families. It affords or fails to afford protection to the public, and it determines to a large degree the type and extent of the correctional process. The trial or plea is past, guilt has been established, and it is the judge's responsibility to determine what disposition will prevent recurrence of criminal behavior in the individual before him. He cannot categorize all offenders, nor can he find a solution in broad generalities or platitudes.

Since over 80 per cent of the convictions for major offenses are based on a plea of guilty, the judge, in most instances, does not have even the information about the offender which might be brought out in the course of trial. If we agree that the primary function of the sentence is to protect the public, then the sentence must be predicated upon knowledge of the individual offender and the calculation of a course of public action most likely to prevent recurrence of criminal behavior in the individual offender. A major and essential means for the achievement of scientific sentencing, then, is the presentence investigation—a procedure of probation. This investigation, carried out by a trained, qualified probation officer, provides the criminal court with the necessary information relative to the offender's history, his capacities and limitations, his motivations, and his ability to understand his own problems. Often overlooked is its value in helping the offender and his family to understand and accept the disposition by the court. Without the verified information gathered through the presentence investigation, the court is seriously handicapped in discharging its responsibility to society and must inevitably make prejudgments. Many jurisdictions have acknowledged the presentence investigation by a probation officer as an indispensable preliminary to proper sentencing and have made it a statutory requirement in a major category of criminal cases, the category being determined by the penal code and judicial structure.

Presentence investigations

The California statute requires that in every felony case, before judgment is pronounced, the court shall order an investigation by a probation officer.¹ Michigan has had such a provision for years. In any felony case in Colorado the court, if it has discretion as to the penalty, is required to order a presentence investigation.² In most counties in New York State the courts of general criminal jurisdiction order a social investigation prior to sentence in every felony case. In all courts in Massachusetts a presentence investigation is had in all felony cases. In Rhode Island all cases in the superior courts are investigated. Generally, throughout

New Jersey approximately 70 per cent of all felony offenders are sentenced on the basis of a presentence investigation by a probation officer, and some counties make investigations in all cases. The rules of criminal procedure for the United States district courts require a presentence investigation in every case unless the court otherwise directs.³

The function of a presentence investigation is, then, far broader than investigation limited to only those offenders likely to be eligible for probation. The lack of a presentence investigation opens the way to two serious faults in sentencing. First, it makes it difficult for a judge to place on probation suitable defendants, for he does not have the factual basis for selecting them and thus must either take a chance in granting probation or "play it safe" and commit to an institution. Secondly, where there is no presentence investigation, the term of commitment stems not from the characteristics of the defendant, but from other factors, usually the nature of the offense or the strength or weakness of the case against him. A presentence investigation may develop potentials for community correctional treatment in cases which would otherwise appear to be obvious jail or penitentiary commitments. Similarly it may reveal dangerous behavior on the part of a defendant who has been convicted of a relatively minor crime, and it may reveal previous criminal behavior more completely than does the criminal record itself.

It is not without significance that our ablest judges insist on a presentence investigation in disposing of criminal cases. This is, in effect, an assertion that the criminal court is entitled to probation service just as it is entitled to other services, medical and legal. Experience has shown that where thorough presentence investigations by a competent probation staff are available to the criminal court (1) there is greater use of probation as a disposition, (2) jail and prison commitments are relatively lower, and (3) the rate of recidivism or failure on probation is reduced.

¹ Laws of 1947, c. 1178.

² Laws of 1949, c. 195.

³ Rule 32C.

PROBATION AS A DISPOSITION

Most persons experienced in work with offenders agree that the individual's eventual adjustment must be to the family unit, the neighborhood, the job, and community standards. This must be achieved in the community. For the majority of offenders who do not require secure custody or institutional training and treatment (and in most penal institutions "training and treatment" are hardly possible under conditions of mass overcrowding and budget limitations) we are, through imprisonment, postponing the rehabilitative process which must take place if the community itself is to be protected. For this large group of offenders the prison experience and the stigma attached to them and their families are road blocks that we have placed in the way of eventual adjustment.

While national statistics on dispositions have not been available since 1945, when the United States Bureau of the Census stopped issuing Judicial Criminal Statistics, our best estimates are that the criminal courts throughout the country are using probation in about 35 per cent of felony cases and in less than 10 per cent of misdemeanor cases.

Where probation services of a high order are available, courts use probation as a disposition in more than 65 per cent of their cases. Similarly, where the rate of probation use is high the percentage of successes on probation is correspondingly high—this despite the fact that a well-staffed probation service in the exercise of consistent supervision of probationers will revoke probation for violation of conditions which would go unobserved by an overloaded staff. Within many of our states the rate of use of probation as a disposition ranges from 10 to 70 per cent in different jurisdictions, depending on the attitude of judges and the existence or nonexistence of probation service. Of collateral interest is the opinion of a number of wardens that between 25 and 40 per cent of the inmates of their penal institutions could have been dealt with on probation.

At least two conclusions are inescapable: (1) the use of probation can be substantially increased if a sufficient number of qualified probation officers are available to the criminal courts, and (2) such an increase will provide at least as much protection to the public as will a low use of probation and a high ratio of imprisonment.

SOME OBSTACLES

Crime and delinquency are one of the major problems confronting the nation and most of our states and communities. Yet the lack of understanding and the widespread misunderstanding of the nature of the problem itself are appalling. We are far short of possessing a basic philosophy for dealing with the offender, a philosophy which should guide planning and support community and state-wide efforts. Perhaps partly because of this lack of a dynamic correctional philosophy the public generally appears to rely on jail and prison as the answer.

Nationally, less than one-third of our criminal courts have probation service which could be considered adequate or nearly so. Approximately one-third of the criminal courts have no probation service of any kind. The balance have available to them only token probation services.

Case Load

For the 167,000 inmates of federal and state penal institutions there is a total custodial staff of 15,000. This represents a ratio of one custodial staff member to every eleven inmates. If we add the 460 wardens and deputy wardens and approximately 7,500 other employees of these penal institutions, we obtain an over-all ratio of one custodial employee to every seven inmates. Despite this, many of our institutions must be considered understaffed.

For the 675,000 adult and youthful offenders placed under probation supervision by our criminal courts throughout the country, there are approximately 3,000 probation officers. This means that we have a national average of one probation officer for 250 offenders under probation supervision. It is obviously unrealistic to expect even the most skilled probation officer to provide the guidance and supervision required to re-educate and effect a readjustment in severely disturbed individuals where case loads are so high. Where case loads are in excess of one hundred, not even effective surveillance is possible, let alone guidance and redirection. If probation is to approach its optimum use and if it is to provide the full measure of protection to the public, we must establish case-load standards through a realistic appraisal of the duties and responsibilities of the probation officer toward the convicted offender and the time and working conditions required to perform these duties effectively. Certainly the probation officer, working on an individual basis with offenders, should be able to devote at least thirty or forty minutes a week to each probationer and a similar amount of time to case-related contacts such as the family, relatives, clergymen, employers, and other agency representatives who can re-enforce the probationer in his community adjustment. When to this we add the time consumed in travel, minimum administrative detail, participation in training, and the cultivation of neighborhood and community resources, it is obvious that the probation officer has a full-time job with a case load of twenty-five probationers. While this degree of intensity of service and treatment is not required for all offenders, we should not continue to permit such a rationale to justify the prevailing situation. Where probation is allowed to become nothing more than a bookkeeping or card recording system, it is positively dangerous to society and hinders the entire development of probation as an essential and integral instrument in the administration of justice.

California's experiment in parole supervision

The California Department of Corrections and the Adult Authority are taking a courageous and significant step forward by testing the validity of intensive supervision in parole, a comparable community correctional service. In addressing the Western Probation and Parole Association at its fifteenth annual conference, Walter Gordon, chairman of the California Adult Authority, set forth some of the ingredients of this program which he calls an "experiment in intensive supervision."

"Fourteen experienced parole officers have been selected and assigned throughout the state to provide special assistance to newly released men. Each of these officers supervises just fifteen parolees for approximately three months after release, the period when the parolee is most likely to experience confusion and emotional distress. [Specifically, intensive supervision means that the parole officer spends a minimum of two hours a week with each of his fifteen parolees.] . . . Thus, in a year, each of the fourteen parole officers will give this early intensive supervision to about sixty men."

Mr. Gordon's description of the project—the categories of parolees in experimental and control groups, methods of evaluating the success of the program, etc.—can be found in the proceedings of the Western Probation and Parole Association conference and in the March 1954 issue of Focus. The realistic appraisal of this project should have real meaning for all planning and should spur similar experimental efforts in both parole and probation throughout the country.

COSTS

While ideally the full development of probation and related community correctional services should be bound only by their capacity to protect the public and to prevent the recurrence of criminal behavior in the individual, the dominating factor usually is cost. Even so, from a dollars and cents standpoint we have nothing to lose in the optimum use of probation, both as an aid to sentencing and as a disposition.

While completely accurate figures are not available for all penal institutions, the national average is approximately $1,500 a year per inmate. For the average case load of twenty-five probationers per officer at any one time, the cost of probation service would be between $150 and $200 per year per case. The actual cost of probation in criminal courts throughout the country now ranges from a low of $20 to a high of approximately $150 per case.

ACTION THROUGH THE JUDICIARY

In the spring of 1953, thirty judges from juvenile, domestic relations, criminal, and appellate courts, federal, state, and local, gathered at a three-day working meeting called by the National Probation and Parole Association to consider the nation's crime and delinquency problem and to seek some better answers. After probing deliberations there was unanimity of opinion that the judiciary itself had both the responsibility and an opportunity to provide leadership through judges, lawyers, and laymen for the development of services essential to courts in coping with delinquency, family disorder, and crime. A relatively small official body was created—the Advisory Council of Judges of the National Probation and Parole Association—and an agreement was reached on a program of initial action. Former United States Supreme Court Justice Owen J. Roberts was elected honorary chairman; Chief Judge Bolitha J. Laws of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, chairman; Chief Justice Irving Ben Cooper of the Court of Special Sessions, chairman of the criminal courts section; and Superior Court Judge William B. McKesson of Los Angeles, chairman of the juvenile and domestic relations courts section.

One of the first steps taken as a result of this program was the creation by the Association of a National Citizens Council. Under the chairmanship of Charles E. Wilson, former president of the General Electric Company, the Council has been organized to formulate a nationwide attack on crime and delinquency and to seek broad understanding of the nature of the problem. The co-operation of the American Bar Association and the state bar associations is being developed. State citizen councils will be organized to help in the appraisal of state-wide needs and in vigorously seeking these services and facilities as required. There is widespread enthusiasm for this leadership through the judiciary. It is of more than a little significance that judges are seeking and welcoming the active co-operation of lawyers and laymen in these socio-legal problems of the administration of justice.

LOOKING AHEAD

The juvenile, domestic relations, and criminal courts of the country, dealing as they do annually with well over one million cases of human disorganization resulting in delinquency, family breakup, and crime, are natural laboratories for the study of cases. A major key to the solution of the problem of both prevention and correction lies in these courts. Only a few of them have research facilities, and these are extremely limited. What is needed is major research into causes, backgrounds, and the efficacy of treatment methods. Half a million dollars a year spent on research in crime and delinquency would be an infinitesimal fraction of the nation's twenty billion dollar a year crime bill.

As vital as is the need for this dynamic research the fact is that our criminal courts are constantly frustrated in their efforts to apply present knowledge through the lack of probation services. The situation is not unlike that of the farmer who was pressed by the eager salesman to buy a book on scientific agronomy. His answer was, "Shucks, son, I ain't farming half as good as I know how to now."

Since we know that crime motivation is individual, all courts should be entitled to the necessary probation and related services to provide appropriate social investigations of cases prior to disposition or sentence. This diagnostic function should be performed on the first occasion the individual comes before the court and not after successive failures of summary dispositions.

Probation work should be professionalized not only from the standpoint of qualifications of probation officers but also through a realistic approach to case loads and working conditions which make possible effective community correctional treatment.

The use of probation treatment as a disposition should be sharply increased from the present average of about 35 per cent to between 75 and 80 per cent of convictions as corresponding probation services are provided for our criminal courts. In one state, for example, a 10 per cent increase in the use of probation would lessen the demands upon the state penal institutions for facilities for between 1,000 and 1,200 inmates. This, coupled with the estimate of many wardens that as many as 40 per cent of the inmates of their institutions could have been dealt with within the community on probation if necessary probation facilities had been available, underscores the profligacy of our present practices.

A fine, imposed after consideration of the social effect upon the individual and his family and payable in installments where appropriate, is a form of treatment in the community. Experience in England has demonstrated the effect of deferred payment of fines in the substantial reduction of institutional commitments.

When community correctional treatment is utilized at a rate closer to its optimum, then and only then will administrators of our correctional institutions be able to think realistically of smaller specialized institutional facilities. The some three thousand probation officers in our criminal courts and the four thousand in our juvenile courts are attempting a task of public protection and human rehabilitation which requires a force of not less than forty thousand. Until such time as we build a real foundation of community correctional services for all the nation's towns and cities the outlook is grim indeed. We must look forward to the continuance and extension of large congregate penal institutions, where specialized correctional treatment is impossible. And we must look forward to the continuation of the waste of public funds for the commitment to institutions of persons who could have learned to live successfully in the community if they had been helped with their problems early enough.

Will C. Turnbladh, New York City, is executive director of the National Probation and Parole Association.

English Prisons Since the War¹

By SIR LIONEL W. FOX

TO understand the purposes and methods of the English prison system we should see it first against the background of the penal system as a whole, as it stands after the Criminal Justice Act of 1948. A primary purpose of this act, as of most English penal legislation of this century, is to keep people out of prison—especially young people and those of unsound mind. The modern tendency both of legislation and of court practice is to think in terms of "treatment" rather than of punishment for the individual offender, though the conception of treatment does not exclude that of punishment. Whatever action the court takes towards a convicted offender, in so far as it mulcts him of his property or limits his freedom of self-determination, is in fact a punishment; and it does not cease to be so because it may also be used as a form of remedial treatment, adapted to the personality of the offender and directed to his social rehabilitation. It is in this sense that we say that a man is sent to prison as a punishment, but not for punishment.

The English courts have available a wide variety of treatments. In addition to discharge with or without conditions, they may impose fines; they may make probation orders subject to conditions appropriate to the special needs of the offender, including residence in a home or hostel or submission to specified mental treatment;² and where institutional treatment in custody is required they have for adults three types—imprisonment, corrective training,³ and preventive detention.⁴ For persons under twenty-one, over and above the probation system, there is a still wider range. There are attendance centers, based on the compulsory deprivation of liberty during evenings and week ends; detention centers, designed to administer, during a sentence which is normally three months, a short sharp shock to youngsters who will not heed milder measures but do not yet need prolonged institutional training; and for those who do need such training there are approved schools for those under seventeen and Borstals for those over sixteen. Finally, for those over seventeen,⁴ as a last resort when the court finds no other treatment suitable, there is the prison. The whole purpose of all these measures, however, is to keep young people out of prison, and the Criminal Justice Act provides for the eventual prohibition of imprisonment by magistrates' courts of persons under twenty-one, when the alternative measures have been fully developed. These measures, it should be added, include remand centers which will avoid the committal to prison of untried persons under twenty-one years of age.

The law provides not only for treatment but for previous diagnosis. Magistrates' courts have powers to adjourn cases, after conviction and before sen-

¹ This account covers the system in England and Wales, but the differences in Scotland and Northern Ireland, which are under separate administrations, are not significant. The Borstal system is legally outside the prison system and is mentioned here only by reference.

² Criminal Justice Act, 1948, § 4.

³ Special sentences for different degrees of persistent offenders passed under section 21 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948.

⁴ For offenses tried by superior courts the minimum age is fifteen.

tence, to enable full social and medical inquiries to be made to help them to determine the most suitable method of dealing with a case.⁵ Further, before sentencing an offender to Borstal training, corrective training, or preventive detention, a court must consider a report from the Prison Commissioners on his physical and mental condition and his suitability for such a sentence. The duty of providing this guidance to the courts falls largely on the prisons, whose medical officers obtain much experience in forensic psychiatry. But this problem of providing adequate facilities for the medico-psychological and social examination of offenders before sentence, whether in custody or at liberty, is still awaiting serious consideration and development.⁶

We cannot show statistically the practice of the courts on diagnosis. On treatment, the position is clear. In 1951 the courts used the various forms of treatment⁷ open to them, in dealing with offenders aged seventeen or over convicted of all indictable offenses excepting murder, as follows:

Persons aged seventeen and under twenty-one years of age. Magistrates' courts: discharged or bound over 20 per cent; fined 42 per cent; placed on probation 26 per cent; sentenced to imprisonment 4 per cent; otherwise dealt with 8 per cent. Superior courts: discharged or bound over 12 per cent; fined 3 per cent; probation 32 per cent; sentenced to Borstal training 34 per cent; sentenced to imprisonment 11 per cent; otherwise dealt with 8 per cent.

⁵ Criminal Justice Act, 1948, §§ 25 and 26.

⁶ These questions have been more fully considered by the writer, in the light of the U.N. seminar held in Brussels in 1951, in the British Journal of Delinquency, Vol. 3, No. 2 (October 1952), pp. 85-103.

⁷ No worth-while statistics are available on the use of attendance centers and detention centers, which have only recently been developed, or on the forms of condition used in probation orders.

Persons aged twenty-one years and over. Magistrates' courts: discharged or bound over 15 per cent; fined 54 per cent; probation 8 per cent; sentenced to imprisonment 20 per cent; otherwise dealt with 3 per cent. Superior courts: discharged or bound over 8.9 per cent; fined 9 per cent; probation 12.4 per cent; sentenced to imprisonment 58.9 per cent, to corrective training 5.2 per cent, to preventive detention 1.3 per cent; otherwise dealt with 4.3 per cent.

The foregoing considerations serve two purposes: they show the place taken by the prison among the treatments used by the courts, and they show that classification in the English system begins with the sentence of the court.

There are certain other factors in the use of imprisonment which may be of interest in relation to American practice. English courts do not favor very long sentences. In 1950, out of 27,703 men received in prison on conviction with sentences of imprisonment, only 2.6 per cent had over three years, including thirty-eight men with over seven years. While this is in itself a favorable factor for good prison administration and results, its counterpart of useless short sentences equally exists and looks no better for being part of an internationally recognized problem. In the same year, 70.7 per cent had sentences of not more than six months.

Sentences of imprisonment have no indeterminate element. A prisoner may earn by good conduct and industry a remission of one-third of his sentence, and when he is discharged his sentence is deemed to have expired.⁸

Lastly, our penal system seeks to minimize the periods that untried prisoners are held in custody, usually a matter of weeks and hardly exceeding three months in any normal case.

⁸ This statement is not applicable to sentences of Borstal detention, corrective training, or preventive detention, or to sentences of imprisonment for persons under twenty-one. Later reference will be made to these.

PRINCIPLES OF THE PRISON SYSTEM

The basic principles of the contemporary prison system do not derive from the Criminal Justice Act of 1948. They had been gradually developed in practice between the wars and received their legal imprimatur in the act and the rules made under it. They are in close accord, allowing for national differences, with the contemporary version of the Cincinnati Principles of America. They do not appear anywhere in a complete code of this nature, but if they did they would be stated in almost the same words as those used in the General Principles which preface the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners recently approved for the United Nations by its European Consultative Group. Some of them are stated in the Prison Rules of 1949, as follows:

R.6. The purposes of training and treatment of convicted prisoners shall be to establish in them the will to lead a good and useful life on discharge, and to fit them to do so.

R.29. The Rules in this section shall be applied, due allowance being made for the differences of character and response to discipline of different types of prisoner, in accordance with the following principles:

(i) Discipline and order shall be maintained with firmness, but with no more restriction than is required for safe custody and well ordered community life;

(ii) In the control of prisoners officers shall seek to influence them through their own example and leadership, and to enlist their willing co-operation;

(iii) At all times the treatment of prisoners shall be such as to encourage their self-respect and a sense of personal responsibility.

R.154. The training in a regional prison of prisoners so sentenced shall be designed to carry out the purposes specified in Rule 6, and shall include

(i) the provision of work which will so far as practicable help to fit them to earn their living after release, with technical training in skilled trades for suitable prisoners;

(ii) special attention to education;

(iii) the exercise of personal influence on the character and training of individuals by members of the prison staff;

(iv) the provision of every opportunity for the development of a sense of personal responsibility, including for suitable prisoners training in open conditions.

An earlier statement, given in 1945 in an official description of the system published for general reading,⁹ reads as follows:

The contemporary phase of the system develops from five basic ideas: first, that for all prisoners with sentences of suitable length, the prison régime should be one of constructive training, moral, mental, and vocational; second, that such training can be fully carried out only in homogeneous establishments set aside for the purpose, though the principle should apply, so far as practicable in the limitations of an ordinary prison, to all prisons alike; third, that the special training prisons need not, for all prisoners, provide the security of normal prison buildings, since men can only acquire a sense of responsibility by exercising it, and experience has shown that a high proportion of prisoners can be trusted to exercise it in open conditions; fourth, that the services of the community outside the prison should be enlisted to help in the training at every practicable point, so as to break down the tradition that the prisoner is a person cut out of society; and fifth, that this continuing responsibility of society should be maintained after his discharge by effective aid towards social rehabilitation.

But today these principles are commonly accepted. What is of interest is to find out how close practice comes to principle and what are the means employed. The writer would certainly not claim that the English system is among those in which principle and practice have reached 100 per cent conformity, particularly in view of the considerable difficulties which have had to be overcome as an aftermath of the war. These may be summed up as too many prisoners and too few resources.

⁹ Prisons and Borstals, 2d ed., London: H. M. Stationery Office, 1950.

At the present time the over-all population of our penal establishments is running between 23,000 and 24,000, as compared with from 10,000 to 11,000 in the prewar years. We cannot claim that we have been unfairly hampered by government financial policy, but in the economic and financial circumstances of this country in the postwar years no one would expect penal establishments to have any high priority of claim on the painfully limited resources. Nevertheless, we have been enabled to open twenty-six additional establishments, of which seventeen are "open" in the fullest sense and two are of medium security. In spite of this expansion, there is overcrowding to the extent that at present some 4,500 prisoners are sleeping three to a single cell, and perhaps another thousand are sleeping (within prison walls) in huts and other places that could be more constructively used.

In addition to overcrowding, there has been difficulty in recruiting and training the necessary staff fast enough to keep pace with the situation. The lack might have been met by lowering standards, but this we have declined to do, though we shall be glad to increase the length and quality of both preliminary and in-service training as soon as resources permit.

It may be said that today these difficulties of overcrowding and understaffing are found only in the local prisons,¹⁰ and not in any prison where long sentences are served or constructive training is carried out.

¹⁰ See below for a description of local prisons.

CLASSIFICATION

In America the term "classification" is generally used to describe the arrangements made to provide for each prisoner a program of treatment and training within the institution best suited to his individual needs. The English meaning is different. Here it means the division of all prisoners into classes or groups with two purposes: first, to prevent contamination; second, to facilitate the provision of suitable treatment and training. For the first purpose, the classes must be kept separate from each other, and that is fundamental.

The matter of interest here is the classification of convicted prisoners, but there is an initial separation into three primary categories—untried, civil, and convicted. And it has already been noted that the process of classification begins with the sentence of the court, since different forms of sentence will result in different forms of treatment in different types of institution.

For prisoners sentenced to imprisonment, the system is based on divisions by two vertical, or "type," lines and two horizontal, or "length of sentence," lines. The vertical divisions create three classes: the young prisoners class (all under twenty-one), the star class (first timers, more or less), and the ordinary class. These three classes are kept separate from each other, as far as possible in separate prisons. The horizontal divisions separate out first those with long sentences (over three years), and these go to central prisons; then those with sentences of twelve months or more, and these go to regional prisons—automatically if they are in the star class, by selection if they are in the ordinary class. On top of this crisscross there is subclassification by type of custody—maximum, medium, or minimum.

It will be observed that this system calls for a full classification of prisons as well as of prisoners. In fact there are five different types of prison—local, regional, central, corrective training, and preventive detention—and any type except the last two may include open prisons. It follows that no English prison corresponds in any way with any American penitentiary, reformatory, prison, or jail, and American visitors who have not appreciated the whole setup may be liable to misunderstandings in any one institution.¹¹

The local prison, for example, is the nearest approach—at any rate in function—to the American county jail. It is where every offender in custody goes first, civil or criminal, on remand, committed for trial, or sentenced. Whether the convicted prisoner stays there, and for how long, depends on the operation of the classification system described above. Thus it tends to combine the jobs of a post office and a checkroom. The prisoners there are either waiting to go somewhere else or serving short sentences or left there because it is not worth while doing anything else with them. Star-class prisoners are not however left in this unpromising atmosphere; they are transferred at once (unless they have very short sentences) to separate local prisons for their class, as far as possible in open conditions. Young prisoners with sentences of three months or more are also got away to separate prisons for their class. There are twenty-five "all purpose" local prisons serving the whole country and eight more to which stars and civil prisoners are transferred. Five of the last type are open prisons.

¹¹ An up-to-date guide to English prisons and Borstals is included in the American Prison Association's annual directory of State and National Correctional Institutions.

Central prisons are those most suitable for prisoners serving long sentences, who in our view are happier if they are not mixed up with those who are regularly going in and out. For men, there are two for stars and one (Dartmoor) for ordinaries. All long-sentence stars go first to the closed central prison at Wakefield, whence after careful observation and selection they may pass to the open central prison at Leyhill; the latter holds about three hundred men serving any sentence up to life. For women there are also central prisons for stars and ordinaries, but star women suitable for open conditions go to an open regional prison.

Regional prisons carry out a full program of constructive training, on the lines laid down in Rule 154 quoted above, for prisoners with sentences of from one to three years. Not less than 60 per cent of their population is from the star class, with the balance composed of ordinaries or corrective-training prisoners selected as being likely to profit from and co-operate in this regime; those who do not are ruthlessly returned whence they came. For men there are two closed prisons, each of which has an open camp attached, two open prisons, and one of medium security. The selection is made by "review boards" at the local prisons. For women there are two small open prisons, taking up to sixty each.

For young male prisoners there are two regional prisons and one wing of a central prison.

In local prisons the separation of classes is carried out as strictly as may be inside one building not designed for the purpose. Members of the different classes do not meet at exercise or in any form of association, and they are located in different parts of the building.

Such in outline is this complicated system, designed to ensure that each prisoner gets placed with a similar group in the type of prison most likely to provide the training he needs in the conditions of custody most suitable for him.

The arrangements for prisoners sentenced to corrective training or preventive detention are described in the later sections dealing with those sentences.

TREATMENT AND TRAINING

To deal fully with every topic arising under this heading for every type of prison would need a separate article. The situation can only be briefly surveyed under the headings of Rule 154, and one or two others.

Work

All prisoners in all prisons are actively and usefully employed on every weekday, unless for medical or other special reasons it is unwise for them to be so. Even untried prisoners work if they choose.

The working week is about forty workshop hours except in the local prisons,¹² where since the war, owing to staff shortages that are being gradually reduced, we rarely get more than about twenty-two hours a week in the workshops, though there is sometimes additional work in cells.

Except in some local prisons, all industrial work is of good quality, covering a wide range of skilled and semi-skilled trades, though it does not always reach the standards of some of the best American institutions. Almost all articles of furniture, equipment, and clothing used in the prisons are made in the prisons, and large orders are filled for other government departments. Building and engineering construction and maintenance are carried out by the prisons Works Department with prison labor, largely with material made in prison shops, and men in this department may have full vocational training courses in bricklaying or painting and decorating. There are many other vocational training courses covering such trades as engineering fitting, blacksmithing, molding, weaving, carpentry and wood machining, shoemaking and shoe repairing. The rest of the prisoners are employed on housekeeping work and about the farms and gardens.

¹² And for the present at Dartmoor and Parkhurst, though they are scheduled to come onto the full working week very shortly.

In local prisons the problem of finding enough simple work for unskilled short-sentence prisoners is difficult, as it is in most prison systems. Except in the larger prisons, where there are usually fairly good industries, and in the open prisons, the majority of local men have to do work of little vocational value, such as making and repairing sacks and post office mailbags, simple tailoring, and mat making. But at least they work, and the incentive of cash earnings ensures that they work hard.

It may here be added that all prisoners are paid for their work,¹³ but the payments are not related to the conception of an economic wage. They are intended as an adequate stimulus to hard work and to enable prisoners to provide themselves with tobacco and other small amenities at the prison canteen.

Education

Education is a highly organized and important aspect of English prison life and takes many forms.

By arrangement with the Ministry of Education, whose inspectors encourage and inspect the work, an evening education institute is set up in each prison (including local prisons) by the local education authority for the county or city, staffed by its professional teachers. The emphasis is on mental stimulation rather than formal education, and a wide variety of classes is provided, with special interest in handicrafts and the arts. At the end of 1951, 781 classes for men and 196 for women were being held weekly. These included 52 art classes, 59 music classes, and 103 handicraft classes. There are special arrangements for illiterates on the one hand and for higher education on the other. By arrangement with the University of London, prisoners may read for the general certificate of education or for degrees.

¹³ This does not apply in Northern Ireland.

At the end of 1951 over a thousand prisoners were also taking correspondence courses in a variety of subjects. These are provided at public cost for those for whom they may be of real value and who are educationally capable of profiting by them.

All this study is voluntary on the part of the prisoners and (except for the illiterates) done outside working hours. All are eligible to take part from the beginning of the sentence, provided it is long enough for a term to be completed.

The libraries too are usually furnished by the local public library as a branch library. No more restriction is placed on reading than is necessary for administrative convenience, and the men and women normally have open access to the library shelves. A selection of daily newspapers is provided in the rooms where prisoners eat together, and any prisoner may have weekly newspapers and periodicals sent in and keep them in his cell.

Somewhere on the border line between education and recreation lie the radio, which is provided in every prison, and the various concerts, lectures, and entertainments which good friends bring in every two or three weeks. More certainly educational, because something the prisoners do for themselves, are the bands, orchestras, choral societies, dramatic societies, and other such activities which the prisoners run in most central and regional prisons, and in some local prisons too.

Character training

Character training takes many forms and, at least in the training prisons, underlies every aspect of the work. Its essential basis is a small prison. Those now being designed are for three hundred men in four separate wings, for each of which an assistant governor will be responsible as a Borstal housemaster is responsible for his house. All training prisons are already run on these lines, with populations varying between about one hundred and fifty and four hundred, and assistant governors in charge of wings or groups.

This system relies not on elaboration of casework, but on personal knowledge and influence, used as occasion offers, each in his own way, by governor, assistant governor, chaplain, doctor, teacher, trade instructor, and every member of the staff. Co-ordination is achieved through the review boards of senior officials.

Self-responsibility

To teach self-responsibility in the artificially ordered and controlled life of a prison community is almost a contradiction in terms, but if training for freedom is to have any real meaning, there must be opportunities for choice and self-determination. The first step is to keep the prisoners out of their cells, which except in the local prisons and for the present at Dartmoor are used only for sleeping. The prisoners spend the day and most of the evening at work, at exercise, in the association rooms, and in the classrooms, and this free mixing gives them the chance to choose how they will act in a variety of circumstances. Then they can choose whether or not to join in educational classes, clubs, bands, football teams, and so on; how to spend their money in the canteen; what books to read and what papers to have sent in. They manage their own sports and recreations. Those who show reliability and co-operation can become "leaders," which gives them a measure of responsibility though it does not give them any disciplinary powers. Leaders will look after the cleanliness and good order of messes and dormitories, assemble the education classes and see them back to their wings, and so on.

In the local prisons the star class are in association for meals and recreation after the first four weeks, the ordinaries after sixteen weeks. The hour's daily exercise for both classes also gives an opportunity for conversation.

So far as possible in the difficult conditions of local prisons, and certainly in all training prisons, every effort is made to encourage not only self-responsibility but self-respect. This appears in many small ways—by making men shave every morning and letting them keep (within reason) their normal hair styles; by letting women use cosmetics and encouraging them to do their hair nicely; by providing reasonable styles of clothing; by serving meals pleasantly on white plastic compartmented trays, and requiring clean and decent table appointments and good manners in dining rooms; and by encouraging constructive work in handicrafts and the arts.

OPEN INSTITUTIONS

Of all the methods by which a prison regime may hope to inculcate self-respect and self-responsibility and in other ways prepare the prisoners for a normal life in society, the open institution appears to be proving itself the most effective.

Before the war there were in England a few open Borstals, but only one open prison in the strict sense, that is, one in which there are no security walls or fences, locks, bars, special guards, or other physical precautions against escape. At present out of twenty-one Borstals ten are open, and there are seven open prisons for men and two for women. In addition three closed prisons have "satellite" open camps, and there are two prisons which have open camp conditions inside a secure perimeter.

Although this rapid expansion of open institutions was forced on us by overcrowding, we quickly appreciated the intrinsic value of the system; we regard its development as perhaps the most permanently valuable contribution to enlightened penal treatment of our post-war experience. The next step in its extension will be the establishment of open "geriatric centers" for aged and infirm prisoners.¹⁴

PERSISTENT OFFENDERS

The arrangements described above for the treatment and training of persons sentenced to imprisonment import no new penological principle, but the provisions made under the Criminal Justice Act of 1948 for the treatment of persistent offenders may be said to do so. The persistent offender, or habitual criminal, forms the central problem of all penal systems. It is generally accepted that traditional punishments are not sufficient to fight against habitual criminality, and the idea has long been generally accepted that, for the protection of society, persistent offenders who have shown that they are neither reformed nor deterred by traditional punishments should be segregated for prolonged periods under a special regime which is rather preventive than punitive.

¹⁴ The open prison system has been more fully treated by the writer in the International Review of Criminal Policy, No. 2 (July 1957), pp. 1-11.

This regime had existed since 1908 in the English system under the name of preventive detention and is retained in the act of 1948, with the difference that the "cumulative" or "double-track" system has been abolished. The sentence of preventive detention is now passed direct and not on top of another, "punitive," sentence for the particular offense which has brought the offender before the court; he receives the sentence because he is found to be a persistent offender, not because he has committed a particular offense. The maximum sentence is fourteen years.

The new interest here lies mainly in the nature of the regime, which seeks to solve first the problem of providing, for a large number¹⁵ of the worst prisoners in the country, a regime which can be distinguished as preventive rather than punitive; and second the problem of treating prisoners who are ex hypothesi hopeless as if they were not hopeless and trying to fit them to lead honest lives after release. Space does not permit a full account of every feature of this regime, but it may be said that it is served in three radically different stages, of which special interest may perhaps be found in the third.

The third-stage procedure introduces an element of indeterminacy into the preventive detention sentence, in that a prisoner selected to enter it may secure release after serving two-thirds of his sentence, whereas those left in the second stage must serve five-sixths. Selection is made by an Advisory Board, presided over by a magistrate, on procedure analogous to American parole board procedures. Within the stage, the regime follows a normal "prerelease block" pattern, up to the point where a man may be allowed to leave the prison and live in a hostel in another town, under prison management, and go out to work in the town. Except for obey-ing the hostel rules, these men have full self-responsibility, draw their wages at the factory, and live as far as possible like free men. They pay their keep in the hostel, support their families, and are allowed a generous amount for expenses and recreation; the balance of their wages goes to compulsory saving.

¹⁵ At present over a thousand.

All preventive detention prisoners are released on a conditional license, which places them under the supervision of the Central After-Care Association, a semi-official body charged with providing for the resettlement, aftercare, and supervision of all categories of offenders released on a conditional license, and of all released from central prisons.

These methods of dealing with the "incurable" persistent offender are interesting, but there is greater novelty in the approach made by the act to the persistent offender who seems to be not yet so old or so hardened in crime as to be beyond hope of reclamation.

One of the difficulties with this class was due to the courts' practice of passing sentences which required them to consider primarily the nature and gravity of the offense rather than the nature and needs of the offender. To enable the courts to get over this difficulty by giving them power to take the potential persistent offender in good time and give him a sentence of a length and nature to have some constructive effect, the Criminal Justice Act of 1948 provided a new form of sentence known as corrective training.

It was unfortunate that some new name had to be found for this form of sentence, since corrective training as a prison regime is not some novel invention, but simply the type of training which has been given in training prisons for many years. In practice it works as follows. When a prisoner is sentenced to corrective training he is sent as soon as possible to an allocation center for prisoners sentenced to corrective training. There he is observed by an expert staff, who try to find out why he has become a habitual offender and what kind of training will be most suitable for him. He may then go to either (1) an open regional training prison; (2) a closed regional training prison; or (3) an ordinary corrective training prison.

Which type of prison a trainee goes to depends on the view formed at the allocation center of his character and potentialities. The most promising go to (1), the less promising to (2), and the worst to (3).

A prisoner who is sent to a regional training prison to undergo his sentence is not marked out in any way from other prisoners. In separate corrective training prisons we follow—as far as is compatible with complete safe custody and the closer control that is necessary for the type of prisoner sent there—precisely the same methods as those in a regional training prison. The men in these corrective training prisons are given useful work in a suitable type of industry during the daytime, with vocational training for selected prisoners, and a lively educational program in the evenings. Special attention is paid to personal influences, and the prisoners are grouped under assistant governors.

The maximum sentence for corrective training is four years, but the normal sentence is three years. One-third remission may be earned, and the prisoner is then released on a conditional license to the care of the Central After-Care Association.

AFTERCARE

No prison system is complete which does not provide adequately for what is generally called aftercare, though this is in some ways a misnomer. In the first place, if aftercare is done properly the process starts from the beginning of a man's sentence. Furthermore, it also includes the immediate help necessary to re-establish the offender in society, even though he receive no further attention. This distinction is seen in the names of the two forms of society through which aftercare is administered in England.

At all the local prisons there are Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies, which in general concern themselves with what their title implies, the immediate aid a prisoner needs on discharge—to get home decently clothed, with enough money in his pocket to see him to the office of the National Assistance Board, and to get into a job as soon as possible. These societies must be officially approved and have a certificate of efficiency. They are all affiliated with the National Association of Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies, which they manage themselves through elected committees, though the office and staff expenses are paid from public funds. This association co-ordinates the whole of the local work and also takes direct responsibility, as agent for the local societies, for the aftercare of prisoners discharged from regional prisons, where it employs full-time resident welfare officers.

But there are certain categories of prisoners whose obligations are not terminated on release, as are those of men sentenced to imprisonment. These come under the supervision of the Central After-Care Association. Mention has already been made of the functions of the association in regard to prisoners discharged from corrective training and preventive detention, and it also covers prisoners discharged from central prisons, since these cannot be looked after by the local societies. A separate division of the association looks after boys discharged from Borstal and also boys discharged from a sentence of imprisonment. These boys form an exception to the rule that a release from imprisonment is absolute; they are released on a conditional license, an exception made because of the importance of ensuring that young offenders who have served a term of imprisonment have the positive supervision of aftercare, whether they like it or not. For adults released from imprisonment, it is there if they want it, but they cannot be required to accept it.

The Central After-Care Association provides aftercare in the widest sense, not only by re-establishing the offender but by advising and befriending him, and if need be disciplining him, till the expiration of his sentence. To carry out this work it is necessary to have a network of trained social workers all over the country, and for this we use the Probation Service, whose duties include the supervision of such categories of persons discharged from custody as the Home Secretary may prescribe. We also have the co-operation of the Ministry of Labour in finding work, and their officers come into every prison and see every prisoner who wishes to see them some time before discharge.

*Sir Lionel W. Fox, London, has been chairman of the Prison Commission for England and Wales since 1942. From 1946 he was a vice-president of the former International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, and later became president of the United Nations European Consultative Group in this field. He is the author of The English Prison and Borstal Systems (1952) and other works.*

Prison Reform in Belgium Since the War

By PAUL CORNIL

IF one is to understand the reforms of Belgian prisons since 1945, it is necessary to cast a quick glance at the past to learn the background of this new developmental stage. It is a striking fact, for that matter, that each essential stage in the history of our prison reform has arisen out of social problems or political conflicts in which Belgium has been involved. The reforms begun in 1945 confirm that rule.

In Belgium the first penitentiary institution worthy of that name was the house of correction at Ghent, begun in 1772 on the plans of Councilor Vilain XIIII.¹ A decree dated November 12, 1770, and signed by Charles of Lorraine invited the Council of his States of Flanders to search for effective means to combat begging.² It was in response to this wish that Vilain XIIII prepared his project. The institution which he created received, in separate sections, criminals, petty offenders, women, and juveniles. But it was designed especially for the confinement of the vagrants and beggars who were ruining Flanders and with whom fines and corporal punishments had proved ineffective. Vilain XIIII estimated at forty to fifty thousand the number of vagrants "confirmed in idleness and reduced to the necessity of living at the expense of good citizens." It was for the dual purpose of preventing these vagrants from committing outrages and of making them productive at useful tasks that he put them to work in his house of correction. "Why not make them laborers, useful to the community," he wrote, "before they become criminals?"

The inmates worked in knitting and weaving shops organized by private contractors. John Howard, who visited this prison four times, found it at first well organized. In 1783, however, he noted a great change. The shops had been closed because of protests from manufacturers who had complained of the competition they suffered.³ Thus the first Belgian effort at re-education by labor ended in defeat.

A second important stage in the history of Belgian prisons began in 1831, immediately after the revolution which separated Belgium from the Netherlands. A young lawyer, Édouard Ducpétiaux, had been sentenced to a year in prison in 1828 for having criticized in a newspaper article the expulsion of two French journalists. Confined for fifteen months in the Petits-Carmes prison, Ducpétiaux had become acquainted with the promiscuity of congregate imprisonment.⁴ As a result, when he was appointed general inspector of Belgian prisons in November 1830 he undertook the construction of cellular prisons in order to ensure the separation of inmates from one another. Under this impetus a number of cellular prisons were erected throughout the country, the last one not being finished until 1919, half a century after his death.

The regime he put in force completely isolated the prisoners from each other. They worked in their cells. Physical exercise, schooling, religious services, took place in quarters so constructed as to eliminate all communication between inmates. Only certain classes of offenders—juveniles, the sick, and the feeble-minded—escaped this isolating regime.

WORLD WAR I

World War I struck a death blow at this system, which had been conceived by a theorist who had not perceived the serious practical inconveniences of this artificial cellular life. During the German occupation, 1914–18, a rather large number of Belgian citizens were arrested by the enemy and sent to prison. Like Ducpétiaux, therefore, they experienced imprisonment, but this time under the system of cellular isolation. The inconveniences and defects of this system seemed evident to them. After the war, the Minister of Justice, Émile Vandervelde, a disciple of Professor Adolphe Prins, undertook to reform the prisons. Aided by Dr. Louis Vervaeck, he created in 1920 an anthropological penitentiary service for the examination of prisoners and their allocation to appropriate institutions. Since then, every prisoner has been subjected to a medical and anthropometric examination, and since 1930 a social investigation has been made of the prisoner's family if the physician thinks it advisable. The resulting case history should serve to orient institutional treatment. In reality it serves chiefly to spot mental and physical abnormalities.

Since 1924, the anthropological service has been supplemented by the creation of psychiatric annexes, where inmates suspected of mental diseases are submitted to constant observation. Since 1931, prisoners with serious mental disorders have been interned in a social defense institution after a period of observation in a psychiatric annex.

Special prisons were set up in succession: a school-prison for youthful offenders (1921), the regime of which was inspired by that of American reformatories and British Borstal institutions; prison sanatoria for tubercular inmates (1924); social defense institutions for abnormal and habitual offenders (subsequent to the act of April 9, 1930); prisons for first offenders and recidivists (1935–37). In 1938, a medical and surgical center was organized at Forest, in order to permit diagnosis and, eventually, medical or surgical treatment of diseases requiring the aid of specialists.⁵

Parallel with the organization of specialized institutions, the rigorous regime in the cellular prisons was relaxed: exercise, instruction, and religious services were more and more performed in common. A prison labor division was instituted which opened shops for apprenticeship training and production. Preoccupation with the need of assuring the social rehabilitation of discharged prisoners led to the creation of bureaus of social readaptation (Brussels, 1922) and later of a prison social service organization (1930).⁶ These important reforms nevertheless left untouched certain regulations of the Ducpétiaux regime, especially those made necessary by the continued use of solidly con-

¹ For a description of the prison system in 1925 see Thorsten Sellin, "Prison Reform in Belgium," Journal of the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology, Vol. 17 (August 1926), pp. 264–77. A later description is found in A. Delierneux, Jr., "Evolution of the Prison System in Belgium," THE ANNALS, Vol. 157 (September 1931), pp. 180–196.

⁶ M. Poll and P. Cornil, "Prisons et établissements pénitentiaires," in Répertoire pratique du droit belge, Brussels, 1939.

¹ Vilain XIIII, Mémoire sur les moyens de corriger les malfaiteurs et les fainéants à leur propre avantage et de les rendre utiles à l'État . . . présentés aux États de Flandres en 1771 et en 1775. iii, 390 pp. New ed.; Brussels, 1841.

² P. Bonenfant, Le problème du paupérisme en Belgique à la fin de l'Ancien Régime (Brussels: Hayez, 1932), p. 251.

³ John Howard, État des prisons, des hôpitaux et des maisons de force (2 vols., Paris, 1788), pp. 339 ff.

⁴ E. Rubbens, Édouard Ducpétiaux. 2 vols. Brussels, 1922, 1934; cf. Vol. I, especially pp. 123 and 177.

structed cellular buildings, the massive design of which was a barrier to the development of a new order.

WORLD WAR II

The tidal wave of World War II brought reform in its wake. As in 1914, the incarceration of numerous political offenders by the occupation authorities revived an interest in prison problems. Furthermore, the Prison Administration, for lack of finances, had been compelled during the war to make experiments which had unforeseen effects.

The winter of 1940-41 was terrible. Public food rations were inadequate and, in order to live, it was necessary to secure additional food on the black market. In the prisons the inmates could not avail themselves of this expedient. Even the Administration could hardly do so, for it had no money. Long-term prisoners literally died of hunger. At the Louvain Central Prison there were several deaths and many cases of edema from starvation. In order to remedy to some degree this tragic condition, it was decided to expand horticulture in the institutions and, in particular, to exploit the lands of Marneffe, which had been occupied by Jewish refugees and had been abandoned since their exodus to France in May 1940. A group of about fifty prisoners, chosen solely for their physical aptitude for such work, was sent to the château of Marneffe, situated in a park surrounded by an ordinary hedge. It was expected that escapes would be numerous, but this radical experiment with an open regime demonstrated instead the possibility of keeping in custody, without the aid of bars or iron gates, a group of offenders in whom a group spirit, interest in the kind of work undertaken, and also the fear of being returned to a cellular prison took the place of physical restraints.

After the liberation of the country, the prison unit of Marneffe was retained and became a school-prison for youthful offenders and an institution for adult first offenders. Among the latter, we now find criminals serving, almost in freedom, sentences of ten or twenty years. The methods of scouting, which had been timidly tried at the school-prison at Hoogstraten as early as 1930, are much in use at Marneffe. They seem to give good results. This educational system designed for children had to be adapted, however, to the mentality of the adolescents and adults who make up the population of Marneffe.

In 1946 a fire broke out at night in one of the buildings. To fight the flames the inmates formed a chain down to a nearby swamp. In the morning all the prisoners were present. Some months later, when torrential rains caused a nearby village to be flooded, a group of the prisoners went to the assistance of the villagers and earned their gratitude by rendering valuable aid.

Today the open regime is used in four institutions, containing about 5 per cent of the prison population, and it is expected that this system will be considerably expanded.

COLLABORATORS

The occupation period was a difficult one for the Prison Administration, but the postwar period was to subject it to an even more severe test. Owing to the physical hardships of life and aided by the insidious effect of propaganda, the enemy occupation had succeeded in gaining the political, economic, or military collaboration of a certain number of Belgians. Even during the occupation, the actions of resistance groups had resulted in the disappearance of some of these collaborators, who were killed in the street or in their homes.

As soon as the country was liberated, a wave of popular indignation caused the arrest of thousands of collaborators and even of persons merely suspected, who were soon released. In a few weeks, 170 internment centers had to be improvised in order to supplement the inadequate prisons. The number of prisoners rose from 5,000 to 50,000 and then to 70,000. At the end of 1946, 26,000 collaborators were still being held; by the beginning of 1954, their number had dropped to about 600.

The repression was severe, motivated in some cases by odious crimes. Death sentences were imposed on several thousand, and 237 men and 4 women were actually executed.⁷ A considerable number of collaborators were sentenced to long terms in prison.

These prisoners could not be abandoned to their fate behind the walls or fences of their internment centers. As soon as the housing problem was settled and the first hundreds of defendants had been convicted, it was necessary to try to set up a more positive regime for them. The problem was a delicate one, for the majority of these prisoners differed considerably from the ordinary inmates of penal institutions. In particular, the proportion of intellectuals and skilled workers was much higher. Besides, a large number of very young people, without a trade or vocational training, were under sentence for military collaboration.

Classification

With a view to organizing this mass of people somewhat, a preliminary classification was made on the basis of the crime committed: military, political, economic collaborators; informers. This was only a first step—inadequate, even contradictory to the principles of individualized treatment. It was justified by the necessity for clearing the ground and using summary methods. The available means were few. The temporary personnel, recruited in a hurry, was initiated as well as might be by the nucleus of experienced officers of the Prison Administration.

⁷ J. Gilissen, "Étude statistique de la répression de l'incivisme," Revue de droit pénal et de criminologie, Vol. 31 (February 1951), p. 620.

Work programs

The second step was to put these prisoners to work. This had to be done for two major reasons: to avoid their demoralization by idleness and to help to combat the lack of manpower suffered by a country in process of reconstruction. A vast program was initiated, described on the radio on September 16, 1946, by the Minister of Justice, Mr. Albert J. Lilar.⁸ It was a question of launching the task of re-education and reconciliation of these thousands of prisoners, and it was especially necessary to give them an opportunity to atone, by their labor, for the wrong they had done to the national community. Work gangs left the prisons to repair airfields, clear away the rubble of ruins, repair drainage systems, and dig ditches. To begin with, popular reaction was acute at the sight of these prisoners who had been baptized with the name of "incivics" (inciviques), but little by little people became used to them.

The "Battle of Coal"

The country lacked fuel. The Prime Minister, Mr. Achille Van Acker, had launched the "battle of coal." It was decided to have the collaborators participate. Those among them who were under thirty-five years of age and capable of heavy work were invited to volunteer as miners, a dangerous and hard occupation, especially for those men who had never done manual labor.

⁸ Cf. Revue de droit pénal et de criminologie, 1947-48, pp. 165 ff.

Many were hired. The first camp of prisoner-miners was installed next to a coal pit; it was opened on January 17, 1946, and by the end of the year over 600,000 tons of coal had been extracted by this labor force,⁹ which consisted of as many as 3,500 men. The work was hard and dangerous, but the compensations were not negligible. The prisoner received the normal wage of a miner, from which only about 50 francs a day were withheld to pay his cost of maintenance. He could therefore send fairly large amounts to his family, averaging 2,000 francs ($40.00) monthly, but sometimes reaching twice that sum. In addition, he received the benefit of social welfare laws like a free worker, which guaranteed him compensation for an accident or an occupational disease, family allowances for his children, and even paid vacations. It was thought at first that these vacations would remain hypothetical, but a year's work at the bottom of a mine showed that to preserve the health of these workers they must have a week's rest in camp with special nourishment. It was possible to pay them their wages during this leave. And finally, as a last and appreciable advantage, every work day in the mine extracting coal was counted as equal to two days of the sentence.

This experiment was completely successful and lent considerable support to the "battle of coal." But the force of inmate miners declined, owing to the release of young offenders. Furthermore, the lack of regular miners lessened. The last mining camp for prisoners was closed on December 31, 1950.

⁹ A. Luyckx, "Les centres pénitentiaires miniers," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 1 (1947), pp. 29-46.

Re-educational programs

Important as labor was as an element in rehabilitation, it was not enough to guarantee the re-education of those sentenced for enemy collaboration. A special agency directed by a justice of the Court of Appeals was set up to organize the regime of these offenders and supervise their social readaptation. All these prisoners had committed serious breaches of civic duty, but the idea was discarded of trying to reform them by theoretical instruction in the principles of civic responsibility. The problem was attacked by indirect means. First, an effort was made to create a favorable climate in the internment centers. Various services were organized there, through an appeal for the voluntary co-operation of the inmates, who were allowed to take the initiative, based particularly on a spirit of mutual aid and solidarity. A welfare service grew up in this way, based on money withheld from the wages of the inmates. For several years, for instance, the inmate miners alone set aside annually over 15,000 dollars for the "welfare." Another source of revenue was the sale to relatives or other visitors of objects made by the prisoners. With these funds a social service was set up to aid needy families. Libraries and collections of phonograph records and photographs were purchased, boxed, and circulated among the institutions. Periodic bulletins, edited by the inmates, were published in Flemish and French. Athletic contests, dramatic productions, and concerts were organized.¹⁰

Hundreds of those imprisoned for military collaboration had fought on the Eastern front and had lost a limb or been crippled. Thanks to the spontaneous help of a medical specialist, the rehabilitation of these persons and the manufacture of orthopedic appliances were begun.¹¹

¹⁰ W. Hanssens, "Autres considérations sur la rééducation des inciviques," Revue de droit pénal et de criminologie, 1948-49, pp. 356-89.

The vocational training of the youthful offenders who had no trade or who had had to give up their previous trade was done in the classroom, in lectures, or on the job in the vocational training shops. The presence of experienced, well-educated people and skilled craftsmen among the older prisoners made available a teaching force that was sympathetic and often very capable. In addition to the trades ordinarily taught in prisons—carpentry, shoemaking, tailoring, blacksmithing—it was possible to set up shops for watchmaking and radio repairs, to organize courses in commercial advertising, and so forth. The results were remarkable and were later validated by the social readjustment of the young offenders.

It would take too long to describe in detail the many efforts made in this area. Briefly, it was necessary not only to conquer the lack of material means but also to surmount the lack of understanding of that part of the public which protested vehemently because they thought that these enemy collaborators were being treated too well.¹² By and by, however, public opinion calmed down, and, furthermore, the number in this class of prisoners decreased rapidly due to commutations of sentences and conditional releases. The last internment center, at Sainte Croix-lez-Bruges, was closed on March 31, 1951. At the end of 1953 there were still about six hundred of these "incivics," confined in a few prisons and under sentence for very serious crimes—murder, betrayals, and so forth. The re-education services have practically finished their work, for most of the younger people have been freed and those who have spent eight or nine years in prison are hardly likely to be capable of making an effort at vocational training or of moral re-education.

¹¹ M. Van Helmont, "Le problème des amputés," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 1 (1947), pp. 65-66.

¹² P. Cornil, "Considérations générales sur le régime des condamnés pour incivisme," Revue de droit pénal et de criminologie, 1946-47, pp. 924-33.

PRESENT TRENDS

This special experience with the improvised training of thousands of offenders has left profound traces in the management of the prisons. Of course, it affected a special category of prisoners and therefore one which differed greatly from the average in age, social status, and level of general or vocational education. One could not repeat without modification, for common criminals, the experiments made with the above group. Nevertheless, reforms undertaken since then by the Prison Administration have frequently been inspired by lessons drawn from this sad episode in our national life.¹³

Generally speaking, the trend is toward a less rigid regime than that conceived by Ducpétiaux. The cell will be used only as lodging except for those held for trial, who must be isolated, and dangerous criminals unfit for communal living.¹⁴

The specialization of institutions is being pushed along. It has already led to open and half-open institutions. Recidivists are being separated into the "antisocial," who are regarded as dangerous, and the "asocial," among whom we find feeble and weak-willed individuals incapable of avoiding recidivism.¹⁵

¹³ J. Dupréel, "Leçons à tirer du traitement pénitentiaire appliqué aux détenus pour infractions contre la sûreté extérieure de l'État," Revue de droit pénal et de criminologie, 1948-49, pp. 348-55.

¹⁴ J. Dupréel, Aspects de l'action pénitentiaire en Belgique (Nivelles, 1952), p. 103.

¹⁵ P. Genonceaux, "Le traitement des condamnés récidivistes," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 5 (1951), pp. 319-22.

Disciplinary regulations for all prisoners are being progressively modified. The rule of silence, for instance, till recently practiced in most unspecialized institutions, has disappeared.¹⁶ The general tendency is to abolish all prohibitions which made the life of a prisoner artificial and painful without serving any really useful purpose.

A modified regime

Here, for instance, are a few of the measures taken, not all, of course, of equal importance.

The uniform of the prisoners has been changed to resemble the fatigue dress of the army, and has therefore lost that degrading character deliberately aimed at humiliating the prisoner.

Prisoners are permitted to subscribe to a daily newspaper and to certain technical, literary, or illustrated magazines.¹⁷ The introduction of the periodical press into the prisons had evoked some apprehension because of the pointed political character of most Belgian daily papers. The experiment has, however, produced good results and does not seem to have aroused the political strife which had been feared.

In some institutions the use of the radio by prisoners antedated the war. Today it has been extended to most institutions. In the large prisons, a central radio is used and selected programs are broadcast to the cells and certain other areas. The prisoner can shut off the loudspeaker in his cell.¹⁸

All letters written by prisoners and those addressed to them from the outside used to be censored by a staff member. This device was very useful for learning to know the prisoner and appraise his relations with his family. It required, however, considerable work, often superfluous, and from the point of view of the security of the institution or the discipline it had little practical value. Today prison directors are satisfied to control correspondence by a sampling method. They exercise no constant surveillance except over the correspondence of certain prisoners.¹⁹

¹⁶ "Circulaire du 10 novembre 1949," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 3 (1949), p. 291.

¹⁷ "Circulaire du 1er octobre 1948," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 2 (1948), p. 322.

¹⁸ "La radio en prison," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, January 1949.

Visits by the families of the prisoners no longer occur in partitioned visiting quarters. Visitors and the prisoner sit around a little table. Only those held for trial and those who are refractory or dangerous continue to receive their visiting relatives in a cellular room where they are separated from the visitor by a glass window and a grilled partition.²⁰

Prisoners now exercise in common and not in individual little yards. Similarly, the partitions which separated prisoners from each other in the school or the chapel have now been demolished. Football fields and basketball and volleyball courts have been constructed and are being increasingly used.

The design of the cell as envisaged by Ducpétiaux no longer meets present needs. The small, elevated windows were originally meant to keep the prisoner from seeing his fellow inmates. More modern and better equipped cell rooms are being built to the extent permitted by the budget.²¹

In the wings of the cellular prisons sanitary installations are being made, including washrooms, showers, and toilets, so that prisoners can keep themselves clean by better means and avoid the use of the toilet bucket in the cell.²²

¹⁹ "Circulaire du 21 avril 1950," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 4 (1950), p. 236.

²⁰ M. Van Helmont, "Les visites aux détenus," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 1 (1947), pp. 111-13; Circulaire du 17 avril 1948, unpublished.

²¹ J. Dupréel and P. Genonceaux, "Le nouveau modèle de cellule," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, January 1953.

Small dining rooms are being provided by removing walls between two or three cells, permitting prisoners, in small groups of ten to twenty, to take their meals together.

PRISON LABOR CONDITIONS

The Administration is trying to accomplish a rather fundamental transformation of prison labor conditions. Actually, according to the theory hitherto accepted, the working prisoner has no contractual relationship with the state, and the work he does is regarded as part of the punishment he is undergoing. One notable effect of this is that if he suffers an accident at work the law which regulates the payment of indemnities for such accidents does not apply to him. Instead he receives as gratuity an indemnity smaller than the payment he would have received under the law governing accidents during employment.

Nor is this all. Other social welfare laws—unemployment and disability insurance, family allowances, etc.—do not apply to prisoners either, for the reasons just mentioned. The result, for instance, is that the family cannot receive any family allowance and that when the prisoner leaves the institution he does not meet the specifications which would entitle him to unemployment benefits, if he does not find a job. Even before the war, this situation seemed abnormal. The experience already described, involving the collaborators working for private contractors or in the coal mines, led to an initial modification. Today, social welfare laws cover prisoners working outside the institutions for public authorities,²³ and ways are now being sought to extend the benefits of this legislation to other categories of prisoners.

EDUCATION

In the field of education, the Administration in 1950 set up a "documentation center" at the Nivelles prison. This interesting innovation was stimulated in particular by an analogous attempt begun in 1946 by collaborators imprisoned at the internment center of Petit-Château. The documentation center of Nivelles is operated entirely by prisoners assigned to it. It is their job to gather and put at the disposition of inmates of all prisons instructional material referring to the various fields of knowledge or technology. When a prisoner wants to inform himself about some specific field, he fills out a special form indicating especially his occupation and the schooling he has had. His request is forwarded to the Nivelles prison, where the personnel of the documentation center assemble the books, pamphlets, and periodicals which contain the information needed by the prisoner. This material is sent to him and is returned to the center when he has finished with it. In 1952, 7,100 requests were met by the center, which has some 5,000 books, 2,500 pamphlets, and 22,000 issues of periodicals.²⁴

This innovation undoubtedly marks a forward step. It permits prisoners who can study by themselves to receive material specifically bearing on the matter they wish to learn about and appropriate to their level of education.

²³ "Circulaire du 6 février 1950," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 4 (1950), p. 100.

²⁴ "Rapport annuel du Centre de Documentation, 1952," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 7 (February 1953), pp. 371-84; Bulletin . . ., Vol. 7 (March 1953), p. 401.

²² M. Van Helmont, "Activité de l'Administration des Prisons en 1950," Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 5 (1951), p. 172.

In April 1951, the Administration also set up, at Nivelles, a permanent penitentiary exhibit, where staff members and students can see models and plans of penal institutions and other documents of interest to specialists in such matters.²⁵

CONCLUSIONS

The reform movement, some aspects of which I have tried to describe, is still in progress. There is nothing spectacular about it; rather it is a series of minor changes inspired by a general trend. Since 1919 the Prison Administration has stopped regarding itself as a static service satisfied to apply current regulations. It is constantly trying to improve its methods. If we continue to believe in the relative and hence transient value of any type of prison regime, the reform of prisons will never be finished.

Recent developments undoubtedly tend to render prison regimes more humane and give them a more educational character. Does this attitude ²⁵ Bulletin de l'Administration des Prisons, Vol. 5 (1951), p. 308.

Paul Cornil, Docteur en philosophie et lettres, Docteur en droit, is secretary-general of the Ministry of Justice, Brussels, and professor of criminal law, the Free University, Brussels. He has been inspector and head of the Belgian prison system and member of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission and is now president of the International Penal and Penitentiary Foundation and the International Association of Penal Law and member of the scientific committee, International Society of Criminology. In 1951 he directed the United Nations Seminar in Brussels on the medico-psychological and social examination of offenders. He is the author of many articles on penal problems published in various scientific journals.

show better results than did the old system based essentially on repression and intimidation? This is difficult to prove. The number of recidivists remains high. New institutions, like Marneffe, can already show very favorable statistics of social rehabilitation. However, one must note that the process of selection which operates at the time of admission to these institutions permits only the best prisoners to enter, a fact which explains, in part at least, the favorable outcome.

Furthermore, we must recognize that the relative ineffectiveness of penal treatment derives at least in part from factors extraneous to the prison system. The prison is only a link in the penal system. It cannot be an all-purpose institution and still give favorable results. Too often, courts send offenders to prison who do not belong there. Still more often the duration and the forms of punishment do not meet the needs of individual treatment. Before passing any judgment on the effectiveness of prison treatment it would be necessary to improve the methods by which the courts select and measure out the penalties they impose.

Postwar Prison Reform in France

By CHARLES GERMAIN

PRISON reform is a continuous and uninterrupted task. The history of penal institutions is but the recital of a constant evolution of ideas concerning the basis and the means of administering different punishments, especially that of imprisonment, which has remained the characteristic punishment of modern times. This evolution is nowhere ended. Nowhere have penologists declared themselves satisfied. On the contrary, everywhere a constant search goes on for new means more suitable to the struggle against criminality and to the treatment of offenders. In general this work progresses imperceptibly under the influence of ideas that advance slowly and end by prevailing. But it may happen that after some special crisis this or that country will decide to hasten matters and solemnly proclaim a set of principles on which it plans thenceforth to base its penal policy.¹

In France, it was the conditions pro-

¹ In that connection one might mention for the United States the Prison Congress of Cincinnati in 1870, which adopted the famous Declaration of Principles that served as a starting point for the entire modern reform movement; see H. E. Barnes and N. K. Teeters, New Horizons in Criminology (2d ed.; New York: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1951), pp. 523 ff.

This congress was no less important from an international point of view. In fact it was Cincinnati that gave birth to the idea of the international congress held in London in 1872, where it was decided to create a permanent international commission which was given final form at the Stockholm congress of 1878 (see Thorsten Sellin, preface to the Proceedings of the Twelfth International Penal and Penitentiary Congress, The Hague, August 14-19, 1950, Vol. II, pp. xi ff., and preface to the Index analytique et des noms [of the proceedings of the twelve international prison congresses], xii, 323 pp. Bern: Stämpfli & Cie, duced by World War II that occasioned a vast reform movement. Events had brought about a considerable increase in the prison population,² touching social strata which until then had had no experience with prisons. The result was an acute awareness of a problem which for some years had been pressing because of the elimination of the transportation of convicts to French Guiana and which had become still 1952). There is hardly any need to stress the influence which the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission has exercised on penal administration in the various countries up to the moment it was absorbed by the United Nations in 1951. It may be of interest to American readers to note the fact that the first and the last presidents of the commission were American citizens (Enoch Cobb Wines from 1872 to 1878 and Sanford Bates from 1946 to 1951) and that its last secretary-general was Professor Thorsten Sellin. The writer also wishes to draw their attention to an excellent source of reference, the compilation of the Deliberations of the International Penal and Penitentiary Congresses by Negley K. Teeters (198 pp. Philadelphia: Temple University Book Store, 1949). Finally, it is a pleasure for the writer to say that the old IPPC gave him an opportunity to enter into professional and friendly relations that are very precious to him with several Americans, who no doubt will recognize references to themselves in this article.

² The prison population, which fell below 20,000 before the war, reached its peak of 67,000 in 1946. Since then it has been decreasing constantly to 23,000 on January 1, 1954. Postwar statistics include three categories of prisoners unknown before the war: enemy collaborators (29,000 in 1946; 900 on January 1, 1954); hard-labor convicts formerly transported beyond the ocean (on January 1, 1954, our prisons contained 3,200 sentenced to hard labor for crimes against the general criminal law); habitual offenders sentenced to preventive detention, who also used to be transported before the war (1,600 detainees on January 1, 1954).

more distressing because by 1945 the conditions of both prisons and prisoners were disastrous, due to the destruction or deterioration of numerous institutions, the complete lack of physical equipment, difficulties in food supply, and so forth. It was precisely because of these troubles that the time seemed appropriate for drafting a plan for reforms, the urgent necessity of which no one contested any longer and which were based on "the concept that prisons are correctional institutions and that the rebuilding of lives and the ultimate social rehabilitation of their inmates is their primary objective."³

BASIC PRINCIPLES—1945

In 1945, a Commission convened at the Ministry of Justice⁴ formulated the following fourteen points to be regarded as the basic principles of the reforms anticipated.

1. The deprivation of freedom as punishment has as its eventual aim the reformation and social rehabilitation of the convicted offender.

2. In France or in Algeria provisions for its execution apply to all persons sentenced for violations of the common criminal law by the courts of continental France, Corsica, or Algeria.

3. Free from corrupting promiscuity, the treatment of the prisoner should be humane and devoid of vexations and should aim principally at his general and vocational training, and his improvement.

³ Richard A. McGee, Prisons at the Crossroads. An address delivered at the Annual Congress of Correction, Toronto, Ontario, Canada, October 12, 1953. 13 pp. Privately printed.

⁴ The administration of prisons was attached to the Ministry of Justice by statute as early as 1911 but not in fact until 1937. Its organization is one of highly centralized services. The authority of the central administration, the head of which is a general director, who is a career member of the judiciary, extends over continental France, Algeria, and the departments of Guadeloupe, Martinique, Réunion, and Guiana. It covers only adult offenders; juvenile delinquents fall under another division of the Ministry of Justice, that of "supervised education."

4. Every convicted offender against the common criminal law must work; he shall enjoy legal protection in case of injuries sustained while at work. No one shall be compelled to remain idle.

5. Detention before trial shall be in isolation by day and night.

6. The same applies in principle to penal imprisonment up to one year.

7. The allocation to penal institutions of persons sentenced to terms longer than a year shall take account of the offender's sex, personality, and degree of depravity.

8. A progressive system shall be used in each of the institutions in order to adapt the treatment of the prisoner to his attitude and his degree of reformation. The regime shall range from confinement in isolation to semifreedom.

9. In every penal institution where prison sentences of more than a year are served for violations of the common criminal law, a judge charged exclusively with the execution of punishment shall alone have authority to transfer the prisoner to an institution of a different type, to order promotions through the successive stages of the progressive regime, and to transmit petitions for conditional release to the Board created by the departmental order of February 16, 1888.

10. A social and medico-psychological service shall function in each institution.

11. The benefit of a conditional release shall be extended to cover all time sentences.

12. Assistance designed to facilitate their social rehabilitation shall be given to prisoners during and after their imprisonment.

13. Every member of the prison personnel should complete courses given in a special training school.

14. Instead of transportation, preventive detention in a penal settlement may be substituted. In principle, such detention would be for life. However, the detainee might be given the benefit of a conditional release.

These principles, of course, are not marked by any great originality; they are hardly up-to-date.⁵ But they have the merit of having infused into our very old penal system a new spirit which has enabled us to move toward more satisfactory solutions of the problems that criminality raises for every prison administration.⁶

The limited space allotted permits me to give only a very brief sketch of the efforts of the French Prison Administration in some fields which seem particularly worthy of mention. They are: (1) the specialization of institutions for long termers; (2) the problem of short terms; (3) the scientific examination of offenders; (4) the role of the judge in the execution of the sentence; (5) the punishment's function of social rehabilitation; (6) the beginning of probation in France.

I. THE SPECIALIZATION OF INSTITUTIONS FOR LONG TERMERS

In a resolution adopted in July 1951, apropos of the problem of the unification of punishments by imprisonment,⁷

⁵ In a recent article, "La réforme des institutions pénitentiaires en France" (Revue pénale suisse, 1953, pp. 277-320), I have noted in detail the extent to which we have succeeded, with reference to each of the fourteen points, in getting close to the recommendations of the congresses organized by the old IPPC and of the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners adopted in Geneva, December 1952, by the organization which, under the sponsorship of the United Nations, has replaced the old IPPC in the European area. See Conference of the European Consultative Group on the Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders, Geneva, 8-16 December, 1952 (Melun [France]: Prison Printing Shops, 1953), pp. 11-22, 49-66.

⁶ For details regarding the progressive realization of the reform program, see the annual reports of the Prison Administration published in the Revue pénitentiaire et de droit pénal, 1947, pp. 3-136, 163-245; 1948, pp. 141-69; 1949, 115-37; 1950, 257-318; 1951, 277-458; 1952, 145-350; 1953, 165-216.

⁷ On this question, cf. Commission Internationale Pénale et Pénitentiaire, Rapport de Charles Germain, président de la sous-com-

the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission expressed the wish "that differences based only on the nature and seriousness of the offense be removed and replaced by a new differentiation meeting the needs for individualizing punishment."⁸ The unification of these punishments has not been realized in France at the legislative and judicial levels. Depending on the gravity and the legal definition of the offense, courts impose either imprisonment at hard labor (travaux forcés), strict imprisonment (réclusion), or simple imprisonment (emprisonnement correctionnel). In reality, however, there are no longer any substantial differences in the manner in which these different punishments are inflicted. Under such circumstances, it has been possible to abandon this tripartite division in institutional practice. Today the Prison Administration recognizes no other criteria than those based on the personality of the offender and on the treatment he needs. Since it is inconceivable to give each offender a completely individualized treatment, it has been necessary to separate the prisoners into distinct classes⁹ and, consequently, to organize institutions or sections of institutions characterized by more and more diversified regimes.

The selection made necessary by the physical health of the sentenced prisoners is done in a manner that can be considered satisfactory; we have an adequate number of institutions of the hospital type. As for character deviants, the feeble-minded, and the men-mission de l'unification des peines privatives de liberté. Melun: Imprimerie administrative, 1949.

⁸ International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, Proceedings of the Session held at Bern, July 1951 (x, 219 pp. Bern: Stämpfli & Cie, 1951), p. 82.

⁹ Charles Germain, "La classification des délinquants en France." Revue pénitentiaire et de droit pénal, Vol. 77 (1953), pp. 319-49.

tally abnormal, their detection among those awaiting trial is assured in observation sections called "psychiatric annexes." For those sentenced we have the psychiatric center at Château-Thierry where we place abnormal individuals not yet suffering from a real mental disease; the insane properly speaking are confined in mental hospitals, like the noncriminal insane. The problem of the offender who is neither sane nor insane¹⁰ is, however, unsolved, and it is regrettable that numerous difficulties and, especially, financial obstacles have prevented us from undertaking as yet the very important projects which were studied and elaborated prior to the war.

As far as those now called "youthful offenders" are concerned, the Administration opened a school-prison at Oermingen in 1947 for boys and a school-prison at Doullens in 1950 for girls. The treatment embraces moral, scholastic, and vocational training that should permit these young people to start a new life upon their release. In 1950 a controlled freedom hostel was opened at Maxeville as an adjunct to Oermingen.

The need for providing appropriate treatment for two other classes of offenders led us, on the one hand, to set up a center for apprenticeship training (Écrouves) reserved for prisoners who are about twenty-five to thirty-five years of age and who show an aptitude for apprenticeship courses in various mechanical and building trades; and, on the other hand, to organize two open institutions¹¹ (Casabianda and La Trévarresse) for prisoners likely to benefit from a regime based on confidence and a discipline voluntarily accepted.

¹⁰ Sir Norwood East, "The Non-sane Non Insane Offender," in his Society and the Criminal (London, 1949), pp. 229-41.

¹¹ On the question of open institutions, see resolutions adopted in August 1950 at the Hague Congress (Proceedings, Vol. 2, p. 586) and in December 1952 at the Geneva Conference (op. cit. supra note 5, p. 70).

Habitual offenders

A great effort of categorization has been going on since 1948 with respect to habitual offenders, who cause so much worry to prison authorities the world over,¹² as well as to one segment of the doctrinal field, where the war hatchet has not yet been finally buried between the partisans and adversaries of "security measures" (mesures de sûreté; in German, sichernde Massnahmen). This is not the place to engage in a doctrinal quarrel from which the Anglo-Saxon countries have wisely decided to abstain. What is pertinent, however, is that almost everywhere there are attempts to organize for these offenders, who are generally regarded as unreformable by the usual punishments, a special measure, a kind of nonpenal confinement, the regime of which would be clearly different from that of long-term imprisonment. In France, we are at present engaged in segmenting the problem of preventive detention (relégation) by searching for different solutions according to the exceedingly variable personality of hardened recidivists. During the last few years we have set up for them three specialized observation centers, of which further mention will be made later, and five treatment institutions (Saint-Martin-de-Ré, Mauzac, Gannat, Clermont-Ferrand, and Saint-Sulpice), where the inmates are subjected to strongly individualized regimes ranging from close custody to semifreedom. Gradually, as this experiment proceeds, we shall probably require additional new institutions for these habitual repeaters.¹³

¹² See the excellent comparative law study by Norval Morris, The Habitual Criminal (London, 1951; cf. also resolution adopted at the Hague Congress on the treatment and release of habitual offenders (Proceedings, Vol. 2, p. 588).

Large central prisons

Finally, for the application of long prison terms which do not fit any category mentioned so far, we have a dozen central prisons, large establishments capable of holding from 500 to 800 prisoners each. Five of these (Eysses, Nîmes, Poissy, Fontevault, and Clairvaux) are prisons of the classical type where treatment pivots almost exclusively on labor and discipline. Six others (Haguenau, Mulhouse, Ensisheim, Melun, Caen, and Toul) are reformatories; the re-education of the prisoners rests on several bases: work, vocational training, and, finally, an attempt at moral transformation more particularly entrusted to "educators," specialized officers whose task is composed entirely of observation and education. The regime in these reformatories is that of the progressive or Irish system,¹⁴ characterized by the division of the term into five stages: (1) observation period; (2) first treatment stage; (3) a so-called improvement stage; (4) a confidence stage which may approach semifreedom; (5) conditional freedom (parole).

We find these days a certain dislike for the progressive system, which has been abolished by several countries. We have used it in France too short a time to be able to abandon it yet, especially since it is having encouraging results. It seems to be one of those remedies which have preserved all their effectiveness, partly because people believe in it and partly because it has not yet been abused. It has certainly not drawn its last breath, and the chances are that, thanks to refinements of this method of treatment, the name of Crofton is not ready to disappear from our memory.

¹³ Charles Germain, Le traitement des récidivistes en France. Melun: Imprimerie administrative, 1953.

¹⁴ On the origin of the progressive or "intermediate" system, see Barnes and Teeters, op. cit. supra note 1, pp. 522 ff.

II. THE PROBLEM OF SHORT TERMS

It is universally recognized today that short prison terms present serious inconveniences from social, economic, and familial points of view.¹⁵ How, then, can they be remedied, when as a result of statutes and court sentences short terms are in the majority among those received in prison?¹⁶

In the interest of avoiding the mutual contamination which can be produced by the promiscuity resulting from imprisonment in common, which unfortunately frequently persists, a statute of 1875, the provisions of which on this point were conserved by the Commission of 1945, prescribed that terms of one year or less should be served in solitary confinement, night and day, according to the regime which, in memory of the old Walnut Street Prison,¹⁷ we continue to call Pennsylvanian. But while cellular isolation can prevent harmful contacts between prisoners, it is powerless to avoid certain other consequences, such as social rejection and loss of employment. Besides, a regime so uniform contradicts modern tendencies toward individualization of treatment. For these reasons we have recently undertaken a limited experiment conducive to a better handling of the execution of short sentences. The mechanism of this experiment is as follows:

¹⁵ Cf. resolution adopted at the Hague Congress (Proceedings, Vol. 2, p. 592).

¹⁶ In France terms are regarded as short if they do not exceed one year's imprisonment. On January 1, 1954, there were only 5,000 short terms out of a total of 23,000 prisoners, but almost 50,000 were received and about the same number discharged during the preceding year.

¹⁷ Thorsten Sellin, "Philadelphia Prisons of the Eighteenth Century," Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, Vol. 43, Part I, (1953), pp. 326-30.

Once the sentence has been imposed, the authority responsible for its execution (the state prosecutor) requests opinions from the presiding judge of the sentencing court and the magistrate who is chairman of the discharged prisoners' aid committee on the advisability of having the sentenced prisoner serve the term immediately. Armed with these two opinions and the results of a social investigation, the prosecutor decides either to order the prompt execution of the sentence or to defer it indefinitely.

If the prosecutor holds that the sentence should be executed, he so informs the chairman of the aid committee, who then chooses one of the following methods: commitment to solitary confinement, placement in an exterior workshop, or commitment to a regime of semifreedom. In all these cases the offender undergoes punishment, the mode of execution alone being different.

1. For instance, cellular confinement would be used for persons on whom the rigors of cellular isolation are likely to produce an intimidating effect or, again, either for perverts from whom an active contamination may be expected or, conversely, for offenders who need protection against promiscuity.

2. The prisoner placed in an exterior workshop would be assigned to a gang working outside the institution and guarded by officers of the Administration. This regime is especially suited for offenders who were unemployed at their arrest; it permits them to adopt or preserve habits of work, earn a wage that is often appreciable, and stay in good physical shape.

3. Semifreedom involves individual placement in a job outside the penal institution without administrative surveillance during the day and staying in the institution at night and when the prisoner does not work (Sundays and holidays). Applied to serious offenders and youthful ones before their release on parole or imposed as a preliminary test on preventive detainees likely to profit by the same measure, semifreedom is equally suitable, as a mode of serving short terms, for the petty offender when it is desirable for him to maintain reasonably easy contacts with his family and his status in a trade, or when it is desirable to oblige him to engage in regular work at a steady job.

The state prosecutor may consider that, in the interest of the offender as well as of society, there is an advantage in having him avoid all contact with a prison in order to save his job, his place in his family, and if possible his social status. In that case the execution of the sentence is postponed, and the chairman of the aid committee, after written acceptance by the offender, appoints a "delegate" charged with assisting him, supervising his activities, and reporting anything of a nature to cause a modification or cancellation of the order. This situation definitely appears as a form of probation.

III. THE SCIENTIFIC EXAMINATION OF OFFENDERS

The reader will understand that a simple prison administrator can only tread gingerly when he approaches a problem about which it has been possible to write that "the indeterminacy of the phenomena [of human behavior] makes scientific truth [about them] impossible"¹⁸ and also that "the most obvious obstacles to the introduction and carrying out of the ideals of classification are the lack of knowledge of human nature and the absence of definite and certain methods for the diagnosis and treatment of personality defects in the inmates of a penitentiary."¹⁹

¹⁸ Mortimer Adler, cited in Thorsten Sellin, Culture Conflict and Crime (New York: Social Science Research Council, 1938), p. 4.

Nevertheless, since 1950 the idea of the necessity or utility of scientific observation of an offender, either for the purpose of sentencing him or for the purpose of his treatment, has been affirmed in five international conventions.²⁰

Presentence examination

The resolutions adopted during the most recent international meetings claim that in order to be able to impose the most appropriate sentence on an offender the judge should, in addition to the "criminal case history" dealing with the circumstances of the offense, have available a "personal case history" containing all the data that a scientific investigation can furnish, bearing upon the offender's personality and social background. But it has also been recognized that this scientific examination is of interest to the judge only to the degree that the law places at his disposal a gamut of sanctions which permits him to adapt the sentence to the personality of the offender. This is not the case in France at present, and except for mental examinations made to determine the criminal responsibility of defendants, people certainly do not see any necessity for proceeding to lengthy, learned, and costly investigations in order to permit the judge, in the end, to choose between a fine and one of the three forms of penal imprisonment—hard labor, strict imprisonment, and simple imprisonment—since we have noted that they hardly differ in the manner of their execution. The disproportion between the apparatus set in motion and the results obtained would be too flagrant.

It is planned to introduce a presentence examination before granting probation and imposing preventive detention as soon as certain projects now being studied have received the approval of Parliament.

Postsentence examination

Our Administration has very seriously equipped itself in the last few years for the task of making postsentence examinations. We shall quickly review (1) observation in specialized allocation centers and (2) observation in the treatment institutions.

1. The most important specialized allocation center is the National Orientation Center at Fresnes, a sort of clearinghouse or guidance center set up in August 1950 on a national scale, where—except for habitual criminals—all prisoners are sent who have more than a year to serve on the day when their sentences become definitive.

Observation, which lasts on the average five to six weeks, is done by a team of experts who have available a previously compiled case history containing a social investigation, data of a medical nature, and all useful details concerning the prosecution and trial and the offender's behavior in jail since his arrest. The observation includes intensive biological, psychological, and psychiatric examinations, and the center is proud to have even an electroencephalograph. At the end of the observation period, a synthesis of all accumulated data is made by the directors of the center, and this report is discussed by all the experts acting as a committee with a chairman who is a juridical official of the central Administration.

¹⁹ Norman Fenton, "What Principles Should Underlie the Classification of Prisoners in Penal Institutions?" Proceedings of the Twelfth International Penal and Penitentiary Congress, Vol. 3, p. 400.

²⁰ Hague Congress, IPPC (Proceedings, Vol. 2, p. 581); Preparatory Session of the Third International Congress of Social Defense, San Marino, September 1951 (Rivista di Difesa Sociale, Nos. 3-4 [1951], p. 81); U.N. European Seminar on the medico-psychological and social examination of offenders, Brussels, December 1951 (see report of Sir Lionel Fox, British Journal of Delinquency, Vol. 3 [October 1952], pp. 85-103); Société Internationale de Criminologie, Premier cours international de criminologie: L'examen médico-psychologique et social des délinquants, Paris, Septembre-Octobre 1952. 684 pp. Melun: Imprimerie administrative, 1953; Sixth International Congress of Penal Law, Rome, September-October 1953, resolution adopted on second discussion topic, the protection of individual rights during investigation of crime (Revue de droit pénal et de criminologie, Vol. 34 [January 1954], p. 384).

After hearing the opinion of each committee member concerning the treatment that could suitably be applied to the offender, the chairman selects the institution where it will be applied.

The idea of a single guidance center for all of France's habitual offenders having been discarded, the Administration opened, in succession, observation centers at Loos (1948), Rouen (1952), and Besançon (1953), with the aim of arriving at the segregation of the different types of detainees (antisocial, asocial, and retrainable). Because of the special complexity of the personality of these recidivists, the observation period lasts longer—six months—first under a close custodial regime, then in semifreedom which, in favorable cases, may lead directly to a conditional release. The team entrusted with the observation is composed of specialized officials, a social worker, a psychiatrist, and a judge. The judge presides over the allocation committee and selects the treatment and the appropriate institution.

2. Once treatment has begun, continued observation of the prisoner is necessary to determine its effects and, if need be, to modify or revise it according to developments, in other words, to individualize it as much as possible.

At the present moment, the scientific observation of prisoners serving terms is conducted in the school-prisons of Oermingen and Doullens, the six reformatories of Haguenau, Mulhouse, Ensisheim, Melun, Caen, and Toul, and in the treatment centers for detainees at Gannat, Clermont-Ferrand, and Saint-Sulpice.

Here we are dealing with a continuous observation process lasting as long as treatment does and ceasing only with the prisoner's release. It is a teamwork process in which a psychiatrist, a social worker, and the prison director participate together with an "educator" and a judge, who is chairman of the allocation committee.

IV. THE JUDGE'S ROLE IN EXECUTION OF THE SENTENCE

When it comes to defining the duties and powers of judges in penal affairs, it is possible to choose among several conceptions.

The most common conception is that the criminal court is a fact-finding, law-applying, and sentence-inflicting agency, the imposition of the sentence being the outermost point where the competence of the judiciary ends and that of the administrative authorities begins. But the conflict of power between the criminal courts and administrative bodies has led at times to a restriction and at other times to an expansion of the role of the judge. According to the first way of thinking, the function of the judge would end with the formal finding of guilt, and the imposition of the sentence would be left to special agencies of the type of the "treatment tribunal" of Finland or the "adult authority" of California. According to the second, the judge would be empowered both to find the guilt and to supervise the execution of the sentence;²¹ as a matter of fact, some legislations are veering toward a participation by the judge in the executory phase of the sentence, as, for example, Italian law, which has created the "supervisory judge," and Portuguese law, which has instituted a "court for the execution of punishments."²²

²¹ On the respective powers of judicial and administrative agencies, see Max Grünhut, Penal Reform (Oxford, 1948), p. 115; Hermann Mannheim, The Dilemma of Penal Re-

In France, courts have traditionally been regarded as a guarantee of public liberties against arbitrary administrative actions. There is no question, then, of depriving them of the power to impose the sentences provided by law. And when the Commission provided in 1945 that the allocation of the long termers to the different treatment institutions should no longer be made in accordance with purely legal and juridical criteria but on a criterion based on the personality of the offender,²³ the Commission, in order to quiet the scruples of those who feared an abuse of power by the Prison Administration, recommended the intervention of a judge to control the execution of punishment.²⁴ The Administration accepted this suggestion and today the magistrate charged with keeping an eye on the execution of punishments has become part of our penitentiary organization. He is found in all institutions where modern methods of observation and treatment are applied. Designated, at the request of the Ministry of Justice, by his hierarchical superiors, he acts as the deleform (London, 1939), pp. 172 ff., and Criminal Justice and Social Reconstruction (London, 1946), pp. 196, 223-38; Norval Morris, The Habitual Criminal (London, 1951), pp. 22, 199, 200, 264; Barnes and Teeters, op. cit. supra note 1, pp. 292-98, 810-12; Teeters, op. cit. supra note 1, p. 181; IV^{ème} Congrès International de Droit Pénal, Paris, 1937, Actes, Paris, 1939, p. 443.

²² J. Beleza dos Santos, "Le juge d'exécution des peines au Portugal," Revue internationale de droit comparé, 1952, pp. 401-18.

²³ See point 7 of the principles of reform, above.

²⁴ Point 9.

gate of the central Administration and consequently has no jurisdictional power, but it is not impossible that, as ideas change, such power may ultimately be granted by statute. With the development represented by the scientific examination of offenders, the most important duty of the judge²⁵ consists of presiding over the allocation committee composed of the experts who participated in the examination. This provides an excellent occasion for a magistrate to exercise his natural role of arbiter and break a tie vote by technicians from the different disciplines, each of whom might sometimes have an understandable tendency to claim pre-eminence for his particular scientific specialty.

There are other circumstances in which the judge is called upon to intervene during the period following the imposition of the sentence. In Section II we described the role played in the execution of sentences to short terms by the magistrate who is chairman of the aid committee. There is hardly any need to stress that by his activity on this committee a judge has to become familiar with all the difficulties of after-care problems.

These examples show that there is a growing tendency in France to react against the old conception, according to which judges should stay cooped up in law and procedure, and to make them aware of the social mission which is theirs as well. The personal contacts they have with offenders; furthermore, permit them to supplement their purely legal training, which hardly brings them more than an abstract knowledge of the criminal. By this kind of practical initiation they thus begin criminological training, which, it is agreed, is today essential for the administration of good criminal justice, at least in systems like ours which extend the duties of the judge beyond the mere finding of guilt.

²⁵ For other duties, see point 9.

V. THE FUNCTION OF PUNISHMENT IN SOCIAL REHABILITATION ²⁶

In his two latest annual reports, the director of the United States Bureau of Prisons has quite properly stressed some "prison paradoxes," ²⁷ the most striking of which is the one that consists in wishing to correct the social maladaptation of an offender by removing him from life in freedom and, in the artificial environment of a prison, instilling habits in him that are contrary to those of the outside community to which it is expected that he will be integrated or reintegrated when he is released. It is in view of this difficulty that the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, adopted in Geneva in 1952, specify:

10. The regime of the institution should seek to minimize any differences between the life inside its walls and normal life outside which tend to lessen the self-responsibility of the prisoners or the respect due to their dignity as human beings.

11. The treatment of prisoners should emphasize not their exclusion from the community but their continuing part in it. ²⁸

The ideas just expressed are quite in conformity with the views of the French Prison Administration which, through certain provisions, seeks to neutralize the effects of social maladaptation inherent in imprisonment. That is why it attempts to prevent the breaking or weakening of the prisoner's bonds with his family or spouse and to maintain constructive contacts with the outside world. ²⁹ That is also why his leisure hours are made profitable by sustaining or, if need be, arousing his taste for sports, reading, or music. As to industries, the Administration is working toward an organization which is inspired by that found on the outside; furthermore, the prisoners are protected against occupational injuries and diseases. Since 1949 vocational training has developed to the point that the number of prisoners capable of profiting from it does not exhaust the capacities of the apprenticeship training centers or courses. This training is given under conditions identical with those outside—the same programs, the same theoretical and practical exercises, the same diploma, with no distinctive mark to show whence it came; in this area the similarity to life in freedom is complete. An analogous line is followed in the general education of prisoners.

²⁶ The author's comments on this topic are the gist of observations made in his lecture, March 24, 1954, during the Fourth International Course in Criminology organized in London by the International Society of Criminology and directed by Dr. Denis Carroll and Dr. Hermann Mannheim.

²⁷ James V. Bennett, in United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Prisons, Federal Prisons: 1948, p. 3, and Federal Prisons: 1952, p. 46.

²⁸ Conference of the European Consultative Group, op. cit. supra note 5, p. 51.

An important share of the work of social readaptation falls to the social service units of the prisons; they have been greatly expanded in our country. Instituted in 1945, they now include 94 full-time and 70 part-time social workers, 164 all told; only 36 institutions—small ones, for that matter—have none officially. The social workers visit, counsel, and assist the prisoners and provide a liaison with their families. When the day of freedom approaches, they take steps to find housing and employment for them through co-operation with the aftercare organizations.

²⁹ American readers will on this point find a description of an organization model in Handbook on the Inmate's Relationships with Persons from Outside the Adult Correctional Institution, prepared by the Committee on Classification and Casework of the American Prison Association, 1953.

These various measures demonstrate how, while respecting the principle of punishment, it is possible in some respects to bring the living conditions in prison into closer resemblance to the conditions of normal living. But it is possible to make further advances on this line; social readaptation will be made much easier through recourse to certain special facilities in the execution of sentences, such as outside workshops, open institutions, semifreedom, and parole. We have already discussed, in Section II, the outside workshops and semifreedom. A few additional remarks need to be made about parole.

Parole

Parole should be "something more than a mere legal escape route to the outside world." ³⁰ Such, however, had become its practice in our country in spite of the intentions of the authors of the Act of August 14, 1885, who had wanted it to be a means of preventing recidivism. The Hague Congress formulated the problem correctly when it affirmed that "the protection of society against recidivism requires the integration of conditional release in the execution of penal imprisonment." ³¹ This is the manner in which we must view parole, not as an end in itself, but only as the last phase of the punishment, which then ceases to remove freedom and merely restricts it.

In an ideal system, the prisoner should be granted parole "at the moment when—taking into account the limitations of the law and the sentence, the effect of institutional life, and the prospect of social rehabilitation—both he and the community could profit most by such a step." ³² But the perfect application of such a system presupposes an indeterminate sentence, ³³ which is not found in our laws; in France, the offender cannot expect to be paroled before he has served a fixed portion of his term.

When the legal requirements as to the length of time served have been met, the offender can, by ministerial decree, be granted parole, to which are attached various conditions. The first of these is an obligation to reside and work in a specific locality, a requirement that makes it easy to control observation of the other conditions, such as assignment to supervision by an Aid Committee for Discharged Prisoners, transference of all or part of his savings while in prison to this committee, to be paid to him in installments, placement in some privately operated home for discharged prisoners, and so forth. The most important conditions are those that concern placement under the supervision and guardianship of aid committees, charged, in co-operation with the social service units, with the task of co-ordinating the activities of private agencies. The re-establishment of these prisoners as good citizens definitely depends on an effective collaboration between these various organs, for the task is rather difficult when one considers that "the offender who remains reformed must be superior to the society in which he lives." ³⁴

³² Ernest W. Burgess and Thorsten Sellin, in introduction to Lloyd E. Ohlin, op. cit. supra note 30, p. 10.

³³ Thorsten Sellin, "L'expérience de la sentence indéterminée aux États-Unis." Conférence prononcée le 16 mars 1951 à l'Institut de droit comparé de la Faculté de droit de Paris, Revue de science criminelle et de droit pénal comparé, 1951, pp. 417-43.

³⁴ Edwin H. Sutherland, Principles of Criminology (Philadelphia, 1939), p. 588.

³⁰ Adlai E. Stevenson, cited by Joseph D. Lohman in the preface to Lloyd E. Ohlin, Selection for Parole (New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 1951), p. 7.

³¹ Proceedings, Vol. 2, p. 594.

VI. THE BEGINNINGS OF PROBATION IN FRANCE

Although it is already a venerable institution in Anglo-Saxon countries, probation, at least for adult offenders, is considered a novelty on the Continent; for these countries the United Nations secretariat organized in London in 1952 a seminar on this significant problem,⁸⁵ having already published, in 1951, an important and stimulating work on Probation and Related Measures. It was a question of convincing these countries that, as Richard A. McGee puts it, "no convicted offender should be sent to prison or reformatory if he can be dealt with constructively by some other means."⁸⁶

According to the definition given in the United Nations book just mentioned,⁸⁷ "it may be said that probation is a method of dealing with specially selected offenders, and that it consists of the conditional suspension of punishment while the offender is placed under personal supervision and is given individual guidance or treatment."

The conditional suspension of punishment is no novelty in our country, for it was a French act in 1891 which first established "the suspension of the execution of punishment" and which has since stimulated its adoption by many foreign legislatures. It operates as follows: the court imposes a sentence (imprisonment or a fine) and, taking into account information gathered about the offender and on condition that he has no record of prior convictions for a felony or misdemeanor, orders a suspension of the execution of the sentence. It is a mere suspension and differs es-entially from probation in that it involves no special obligation for the offender, nor does he receive any assistance whatever. If he is not given a prison sentence within five years for a new crime, the sentence that was suspended is considered null and void.⁸⁸ There is no intention in France of abandoning this traditional form of suspension. It is perfectly suited for offenders of whom it may reasonably be assumed that the warning given by the court will suffice to keep them in a straight and narrow path in the future, without having to assign them to a kind of guardian who is in duty bound to watch over their conduct as well as give them counsel and aid. But during very recent years it has become clear that it would be useful to have a special type of suspension, to which there would be attached both a control over conduct and aid by guidance for certain individuals who, not being subject to a mandatory punishment, need both control and help during a probationary period if they are to be saved from recidivism.

For these reasons, the Prison Administration began, early in 1951, within the framework of the reorganization of short-term punishments discussed in Section II, a practical experiment which has mainly aimed at verifying whether or not probation could be introduced into our mores. Since the experiment has been conclusive, the government has introduced a bill in Parliament according to which probation is granted by the court, which will then have a choice among: (a) a sentence to a mandatory punishment, the execution of which is ordered; (b) a sentence to a punishment the execution of which is suspended in the traditional ⁸⁵ United Nations, European Seminar on Probation, London, 20-30 October 1952, Proceedings of the Seminar. Melun: Imprimerie administrative, 1952 (nonofficial record).

⁸⁶ Op. cit. supra note 3.

⁸⁷ Page 4.

⁸⁸ Roland Berger, Le système de probation anglais et le sursis continental. Geneva: Revue internationale de criminologie et de police technique, 1953.

manner; (c) a sentence to a punishment the execution of which is suspended and probation ordered, for a period of five years, with certain conditions imposed on the offender, who is at the same time to be given constructive aid and guidance.

It seems useless to go into more details of a text which is still only a proposal and a rather timid one at that in certain respects, notably in the sense that probation is not considered an autonomous measure, but simply a special type of suspended sentence, and also in the sense that, like the traditional suspension, its field of application is limited to less important punishments—fines and simple imprisonment. What must be remembered is that, in spite of these gaps, it would be a starting point in our country for a new trend, about which it can be said that, in the words of Sidney and Beatrice Webb—and this is our conclusion with regard to postwar prison reforms in France—"the most practical and the most hopeful of prison reforms is to keep people out of prison altogether."

Charles Germain is director general of the French Prison Administration, Paris. After graduation from the Law School, University of Nancy, he practiced law at Metz and in 1929 entered a judicial career as vice-president of the Seine court in Paris until 1948, when he assumed his present post. He has been the chief delegate of France to the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission and is secretary of the International Penal and Penitentiary Foundation and vice-president of the European Consultative Group of the United Nations on penological matters. He is an officer of the Legion of Honor and author of numerous reports and articles on penal questions.

Postwar Prison Reform in Sweden

By TORSTEN ERIKSSON

AT the beginning of the last century a lively concern with prison problems arose in Sweden. There, as in most European countries, the Pennsylvania system made a strong impression on the advocates of prison reform, and in 1840 the principle of individual cellular punishment was approved by Parliament. A number of new prisons were constructed and the older congregate system was gradually abandoned. Toward the end of the century the period of solitary confinement was fixed at three years. Prisoners with sentences longer than three years served the balance in congregate sections.

The satisfaction with the cellular system began to pale half a century ago. Its disadvantages led to a progressive reduction of the period of isolation. By the end of World War I it had been cut to six months; for young prisoners it was three months. At the same time other questions were coming to the fore: the occupation of prisoners in the institutions, vocational and other training, medical and psychiatric care for those needing it, the transfer of the care of the mentally abnormal or disturbed to the mental health department, special forms of treatment for youthful offenders, parole and aid for discharged prisoners, probation, and so forth.¹ In Sweden the thinking on these problems took a concise and purposive form in the plan for the reform of the treatment of offenders which was drawn up in 1934 by the then Minister of Justice, Karl J. Schlyter, who captioned it with the motto: "Depopulate the prisons." This plan affirmed the principle that imprisonment should be used as a last resort and that other forms of treatment should be employed to the fullest extent possible. The most important parts of Schlyter's plan aimed at reforms of the system of fines, conditional release, and special legislation governing the treatment of youthful, abnormal, and dangerous habitual offenders.

THE SCHLYTER PLAN

Fines constitute about 90 per cent of the punishments in Sweden. In former years, unpaid fines were transformed into imprisonment according to a fixed scale. For instance, eight days' imprisonment equaled a fine of a hundred kronor (about twenty dollars at present rates of exchange). The number of persons committed for nonpayment of fines ran to about 12,000 or 13,000 a year during the early 1930's. Schlyter's reform of this system, begun in 1931 and completed in 1937, was based on the idea that if the court punishes by a fine, it is to remain a fine and be collected. The following changes were introduced to achieve this end. First of all, the fine itself was democratized by scaling its amount to the offender's capacity to pay. (The exceptions to this rule are of no interest here.) This is now being done by fixing the fine at a given number of day-fines. The number is the same for poor or rich, but the amount of the day-fine varies with the offender's economic situation. A workman with a small income may be sentenced to ten day-fines of two kronor each, while a rich man may get ten day-fines of two hundred kronor each for the same offense. Besides, it is possible to pay the fine in installments. Nobody is put in jail any more because he is too poor to pay a fine. If he openly refuses to pay, the fine is changed into a jail sentence, but this sentence must be imposed by a court, which may suspend both the order to pay the fine and the substitute jail sentence. Because of this reform the number of prisoners committed for nonpayment has dropped to a few hundred a year.

The suspended sentence

Gradually the use of the suspended sentence has been extended to include more and more offenders. In 1939, the courts were granted power to suspend the execution of sentences to hard labor under a year and to simple imprisonment under two years. The recipient had to serve that sentence, however, if he committed a new crime or violated the rules involved. In addition, a form new to Sweden was introduced, namely, the Anglo-Saxon suspension of the imposition of a sentence after conviction. In connection with either form, the court may order probation and fix its conditions. For instance, it may order the probationer to take certain training, avoid undesirable localities, refrain from the use of alcohol, and so forth. In any comparison with other countries with respect to the scope of the suspended sentence, it must be recalled that punishments for theft, fraud, and other property crimes are milder in Sweden than in most countries.²

Waiver of prosecution

We may consider the legislation of 1944 on the waiver of prosecution in the case of offenders under eighteen years of age as complementing the law on suspended sentences. The public prosecutor can now drop a case if the offense is insignificant or if there are assurances that the youth will be otherwise properly cared for and treated. By means of a suspended sentence or a waiver of prosecution most offenders under eighteen are now transferred to child welfare authorities, who must deal with them in supervised freedom or in schools of child care. The system set up for the treatment of criminals therefore rarely has any contact with these youngsters. Prosecution may even be waived in the case of older offenders if the offense is trifling.

² See Thorsten Sellin, "Probation and Parole of Adult Offenders in Sweden," in Bulletin Against Crime: 1948 Yearbook, National Probation and Parole Association (New York, [1949]), pp. 239-51.

Parole

Swedish parole legislation was reformed in 1943. Two forms of parole were instituted, one mandatory when five-sixths of a term of not less than six months had been served, and the other discretionary, when two-thirds of a term of not less than eight months had been completed. When the sentences are for these shortest periods, mandatory parole is generally given. Discretionary parole cannot be given unless certain other prerequisites exist. The parolling authority must, for instance, take into account the circumstance of the crime, the offender's previous conduct, his conduct in the institution, the situation facing him on release, and so forth.

Each one of the above reforms has in its way helped to "depopulate the prisons." Even though the drop in the number of commitments for nonpayment of fines has had little relative effect in reducing the daily population of the institutions, because such prisoners generally stay a very short time, the fact that some ten thousand petty offenders are saved annually from contact with jail must be regarded as a great gain both from the humanitarian and the penological point of view.

¹ See Hardy Göransson, "Treatment of Criminals and Other Asocial Individuals," THE ANNALS, Vol. 197 (May 1938), pp. 120-33.

"Youth prisons"

Two other reforms, however, have had the reverse effect, and have increased the average daily population in the institutions. One involves the treatment of offenders eighteen to twenty years of age. In 1935 a new form of commitment was designed for them, namely the so-called "youth prison," which in spite of its name is intended to be an educational institution for youthful offenders. A person sentenced to the "youth prison" is committed for an indeterminate maximum term of four years to a special treatment agency, the Youth Prison Board. This board fixes the length of time to be served in the institution, generally one year. The idea back of this plan was to get rid of the short, definite time sentences for youthful offenders who need real educational and vocational guidance and training in an institution for a longer period.

Mentally abnormal offenders

The second of these reforms was the legislation of 1937 concerning detention and internment, respectively, of certain mentally abnormal offenders and normal recidivists. According to Swedish law, offenders suffering from mental disease, or an analogous mental abnormality, are transferred to the regular mental health authorities for treatment after having been declared free from criminal responsibility by a court, following a mental examination by experts. The prerequisites for such a judgment by the court are not so rigid as in countries that follow the M'Naghten rule or similar precepts. This means, among other things, that many psychopaths are sent to mental hospitals upon a finding of insanity. In the case of psychopaths who could not be found insane, a law of 1927 had made it possible to commit them for relatively indeterminate terms to special penal institutions, if they constituted a manifest danger or vexation to society because of their abnormal constitution. Chronic recidivists could also be interned for an indeterminate period even though they were pronounced quite normal by medical examiners. This last group of offenders has practically disappeared, but the number of abnormal offenders has been increasing, especially since the amendments of 1937 widened the basis on which commitments to so-called "security institutions" could be made. Questions concerning releases from these institutions are decided by the Internment Board. No one may be paroled until a minimum period, fixed by the court, has been passed.

The Schlyter Plan has not been fully executed as yet. Its originator, no longer Minister of Justice, still functions as chairman of the Penal Code Commission, a committee appointed by the government for the purpose of proposing and making preparation for reforms in the treatment of offenders. But in 1945, the Plan was in a manner of speaking rounded out by a law on the execution of penal imprisonment, which took effect in 1946 and which constitutes a complete break with earlier principles of treating prisoners. Therefore a brief description of its content is in order.

PRINCIPLES OF PENAL ADMINISTRATION

Sweden is somewhat larger than California and of similar shape; it has about seven million inhabitants, approximately a million of whom live in the metropolitan area of Stockholm. In 1950 about 170,000 persons were brought to justice for offenses, or about 32 per 1,000 persons over fifteen years of age. The great majority of these offenses were of a petty nature, such as traffic violations. Those sentenced for property offenses (theft, pilfering, fraud, etc.) numbered 9,972, or 1.8 per 1,000. Eighty-eight per cent were fined and 7 per cent received a waiver of prosecution, leaving 5 per cent who received more serious punishments than fines.

The accompanying table gives an idea of the population of the penal institutions for the year 1952.

COMMITMENTS TO SWEDISH PENAL INSTITUTIONS, 1952, AND POPULATION PRESENT ON DECEMBER 31, 1952

	Committed during 1952	In prison Dec. 31, 1952
Held for trial	2,788	136
Held for mental observation	560	181
Sentenced to hard labor	2,519	1,609
Sentenced to simple imprisonment	2,806	364
Sentenced for nonpayment of fines	362	30
Sentenced to preventive detention	204	434
Sentenced to internment	2	6
Sentenced to youth prison	144	176
Found insane	120	51
Others	164	15
		3,002

The right column gives an approximate picture of the average number of different classes of prisoners; the left column cannot be summarized because of transfers from one class to another. There were 7,043 new admissions during 1952, of whom 173 were women. Sixty women were in prison at the end of the year; half of them were serving hard labor sentences, the other half sentences to simple imprisonment. Fourteen of the new admissions fell in the age group fifteen to seventeen, 315 were from eighteen to twenty, 971 from twenty-one to twenty-four; 4,222 were twenty-five years of age or older. These figures give some idea at least of the organizational problems of Swedish prison administration.

As a human being

The first paragraph of Chapter 4 of the Prison Act of 1945 reads as follows:

The inmate shall be treated with firmness and earnestness and with the consideration due him as a human being. He is to be employed at suitable labor and, furthermore, shall receive such treatment as promotes his adaptation to social life. The injurious effects of confinement must be prevented as much as possible.³

The prisoner has a right to secure books, periodicals, and daily newspapers. He must even be "provided with opportunity to read newspapers," which implies that the institution must lend him a paper if he cannot afford to subscribe to one. He is to be encouraged to maintain "desirable" contacts with near relatives. The warden may censor his mail but may waive this prerogative.

An offender sentenced to hard labor shall as a rule stay in a closed institution during the first three months but can then be transferred to an open institution. Prisoners below twenty-five years of age are to be so transferred at the earliest opportunity. Unless there is some special reason for doing otherwise, a person sentenced to simple imprisonment will be assigned directly to an open institution.

In the closed institutions work is done as a rule in common. The leisure hours of those sentenced to hard labor or to simple imprisonment are to be spent in private except when the inmate is participating in group activities such as sports, studies, or hobby work. Reliable prisoners may be permitted by the warden to spend other leisure hours together, but usually only in small groups. Those sentenced to youth prison or to preventive detention or internment spend all free time together unless they misbehave or are difficult to discipline.

³ The complete translation of the Prison Act of 1945 as well as a survey of the Swedish penal system may be found in Thorsten Sellin, Recent Penal Legislation in Sweden. 70 pp. Stockholm: Strafflagberedningen, 1947. See also his "The Treatment of Offenders in Sweden," Federal Probation, Vol. 12 (June 1948), pp. 14-18, and "Some Aspects of Prison Reform in Sweden," in Philadelphia County Prison, Board of Inspectors, Annual Report 1947 (Philadelphia, 1948), pp. 53-82.

The differences between the various forms of imprisonment have been more and more eliminated in practice. But there is still one difference between hard labor prisoners and those undergoing simple imprisonment: the latter may wear their own clothes, find work for themselves, dispose of all their own earnings, and receive a quicker transfer to an open institution. A bill has been introduced to merge these two forms of punishment into one called merely "imprisonment."

A prisoner may be allowed to work outside the institution, and occasionally he may live in the institution but work outside for a private employer in the vicinity.

Permits to prisoners

All prisoners may receive permission to visit a near relative who is seriously ill or to attend his funeral; permits to visit relatives may even be granted under other reasonable conditions when there is no likelihood of abuse. As a rule such permits are issued by the warden, unless the prisoner has in some way misused a previous permit; in that event the Prison Administration reserves to itself the right to grant a new one. The rules governing the granting of permits are: No prisoner receives one—exceptions being made in case of sickness or death, as mentioned above—unless his sentence calls for at least ten months' imprisonment. In that case, and when the sentence is not longer than for one and a half years, he may apply for a permit after six months. If granted, he may have forty-eight hours, plus the time needed to travel from the institution to his destination and back. Later permits are given at intervals of four months and are lengthened to seventy-two hours each and travel time. Prisoners with sentences in the range of one and a half to three years may receive their first permit after ten months, while those with longer sentences must make special applications to the Prison Administration. The rules governing permits for detainees (that is, abnormal offenders) are much the same; they are more liberal for those committed to a youth prison. The latter may receive their first permit after four months and for a four-day period; later permits are granted at intervals of three months. During 1952, a total of 2,537 permits were granted, of which 391 (15 per cent) were abused. The lowest percentage of abuses was shown by those sentenced to hard labor or simple imprisonment (8 per cent) and the highest by the "youth prison" inmates (30 per cent). It should be noted, however, that as a rule the abuses in question were of a trifling character.

Institutional boards

The so-called institutional boards or committees were another novelty in the 1945 act. Institutional treatment was being administered by a central agency, the Prison Administration. Paroles of those serving some form of indeterminate sentence were being granted by special boards under the chairmanship of judges—the Youth Prison Board and the Internment Board. It was decided to strengthen lay influence and inspection by providing every institution with a local board, chaired by a judge. These boards were to be advisory and were to express their opinion on questions relating to pardons and parole, among other things.

Building program

The Prison Act of 1945 not only presupposed a radical improvement of institutional facilities but made such improvement a chief prerequisite. The Minister of Justice asked the Prison Administration to submit appropriate plans, which was done. These plans called for extensive remodeling of old institutions and the construction of new ones. In the meanwhile the postwar situation had created serious shortages in the building industry and the program was slowed up. Besides, there were differences of opinion about the program proposed by the Prison Administration. New studies of an organizational character would hardly clarify matters. Therefore, Mr. Herman Zetterberg, Minister of Justice, decided on a step-by-step policy, outlined in a proposal to the Parliament in 1950 and approved by that body.

THE ZETTERBERG PLAN

Mr. Zetterberg told Parliament that the differences in opinion regarding the manner in which the institutional system should be developed were connected with the fact that no one had a clear picture of the clientele treated at the institutions. Therefore, the first step should be to study the physical and mental make-up of this clientele and the possibilities for its social rehabilitation. The need for institutions and the nature of their organization would then be easier to assess. The most important questions to be answered would be: How can the clientele be best differentiated? To what extent is there a need for medical treatment, psychotherapy, or occupational therapy? What trades are most appropriate in prison? How large should the institutions be and how should they be designed? How should the personnel be composed and trained? Since institutions and treatment systems usually have been planned on the basis of arm-chair speculation about the clientele and its response to treatment by the means proposed, Mr. Zetterberg's point of view was important. He suggested that the reform of the institutions and of the treatment methods for youthful offenders should be the first step. The second step should be to take up the questions of how to deal with abnormal offenders. In the third and final step attention should be focused on the treatment of the ordinary prison clientele. Since Mr. Zetterberg had in mind a very thorough reorganization of institutional treatment it was obvious that it would take considerable time to complete it. In the meanwhile all possible reforms should be undertaken within the framework of existing facilities.

STUDIES OF THE PRISON CLIENTELE

The studies of the prison clientele referred to above have so far been modest. Primarily, they have been designed to yield some comprehension of the volume of the population received in youth prisons and security institutions. Available recorded data have been used as well as information supplied by the wardens of the institutions. This first series of inquiries is being completed with (a) a prognostic study of all offenders under twenty-one years of age who in 1949 were granted a waiver of prosecution or sentenced for the first time for an offense serious enough to be recorded in the Penal Register; and (b) a prognostic study of all prisoners who left the penal institutions in 1946.

RESEARCH PROJECTS AND EXPERIMENTS

A research project planned to begin in 1955 is of special interest. Samples of offenders subjected that year to different sanctions will be selected, taking into account age differences as well as differences in sanctions. These offenders will be divided into two matched groups, one experimental and the other a control group. The research committee will devote itself intensively to the experimental group, taking part, if necessary, in the determination of their treatment in order to achieve the best possible results. The control group will merely be kept under covert observation for a five-year period. An attempt will also be made to arrange for a second control group made up of non-offenders. The advantage of this type of research is that the reactions of the clientele can be observed as they occur; the conclusions should, therefore, have greater validity. In addition to these studies made at the behest of the Ministry of Justice, a number of penetrating researches are under way. Some are being made at the Criminological Institute, directed by Professor O. Kinberg, others by individual research workers.

The studies of the institutional population have so far yielded rather distressing results from a treatment point of view. Recidivism is generally great among all who leave the institutions, particularly the youngest and the abnormal offenders. In the youngest offenders, the rate is high for those given conditional sentences. The discussion has therefore come to center more and more on the weak spots in treatment. All institutions and all supervisors of treatment tend to lull themselves by false assumptions about the excellence of their methods. Hence, one serious problem is how to evoke a frank and humble attitude toward the results of treatment and yet to preserve at the same time an audacious treatment policy. The same discussion has stressed the importance of a better planned co-operation and preferably a real co-ordination of penological research by different countries. The question has been raised whether it would not be more fruitful for the advancement of correctional policy if the United Nations, for instance, were to abandon most of its procedure of formulating resolutions about the treatment of offenders and instead encourage and assist in the co-ordination of penological research.

The importance of experimentation with different forms of treatment has come to be realized in Sweden. Consideration is now being given to a plan to ask for appropriations to conduct the following types of experiments:

1. Intensive individual therapy of different types, carried on in an institutional setting or in supervised freedom, with control groups made up of offenders not so treated.
2. Intensive group therapy along various lines, control groups being used.
3. Intensive efforts to change the environment to which the prisoner will be released after treatment; control group of prisoners not subject to such efforts.

The cost of the different experiments would have to be analyzed in order to estimate their economic implications.

ROXTUNA

The first item of the Zetterberg Plan was the improvement of the treatment of youthful offenders. Three problems arise in that connection. First, there is the group that receives suspended sentences and needs help and supervision during probation. Second there is the group needing a long period of institutional care—the "youth prison" clientele of Sweden, for instance. Between these groups we find an intermediate one for whom these treatments seem inadequate or too harsh. While the Penal Code Commission under Karl J. Schlyter's direction was considering what to do with the probation clientele and with those seemingly in need of some form of brief institutional treatment, the Minister of Justice had a special committee take up the question of the reform of long-term treatment of the "youth prison" clientele. The problem of what should be done to resocialize the worst of the eighteen-to-twenty-year-old offenders was to be the point of focus in the discussion. Out of this came a proposal to set up a special institution at Røxtuna. Parliament approved, after a bitter political fight due to the high construction and maintenance costs involved. The institution is now nearly completed and can probably be opened in the fall of 1954.

Røxtuna is the result of both Swedish and American experience and views. It is organized on a "small group" principle, which means that the sixty-five inmates will be assigned to separate houses with no more than nine in each. The treatment will be medico-psychological in orientation and the director will be a psychiatrist. The vocational training will be first class and leisure-time activities will be developed with the aid of the Big Brothers.

When the youth arrives at the institution he will be placed in a reception section, accommodating six persons and located in the building where the physician and other high ranking staff members have their offices and where, besides, a sick bay and clinic will be found. After a preliminary examination the new arrival may be assigned to one of the two special houses designed for escape artists and dangerous inmates. A maximum of seven persons can be placed in either house; each will have its own workshop and be surrounded by a wire fence (not barbed, however). At least two officers will always be on duty in each house. If the newcomer is not presumed to be either a bad escape risk or dangerous he will be assigned to one of the four intermediate houses, each of which has room for nine persons, is supervised around the clock by an officer, and is locked at night; the boys may work in shops located on the outside and use the gymnasium and the athletic field during their free periods, under supervision. Finally, there will be a completely open section, without constant supervision from an officer and in which the boys may move quite freely. This can be regarded as a release section.

All the houses that serve as dwellings lie at least fifty meters from each other. They and the houses of the personnel are beautifully situated in a grove; the whole tract will be unfenced.

The personnel will consist of a physician, a psychologist, a nurse, a social worker, and an assistant, who together will form a treatment team, plus administrative and custodial personnel, fifty-one persons in all. Eventually it is expected that a second physician and an assistant will be added. The assistants will chiefly guide leisure-time activities. The custodial personnel will work a forty-eight-hour week.

The cost of Røxtuna will run to 7.5 million kronor, or 110,000 kronor (over $21,000) per inmate, the highest per capita cost ever expended in Sweden for a penal or welfare institution. This fact has aroused criticism, which has been met by an insistence that there should be no stinting when the salvaging of youthful offenders is concerned. The extra cost of their treatment can become a good economic investment if it stops a career of crime which otherwise might be lifelong, cost the public large sums for prolonged and constant incarcerations, and lead to great losses and injuries to private citizens who become its victims.

The animating idea

The idea behind the Røxtuna plan is, therefore, to utilize in the treatment of these most difficult youthful offenders the whole arsenal of medical, psychological, and pedagogical knowledge for the purpose of making them useful and law-abiding citizens. During this treatment the staff must have at its disposal adequate security facilities (closed sections) but otherwise have full discretion in applying the treatment in the light of what seems best from a treatment point of view. This means gradually giving more and more freedom to the inmate. Before he is released to complete freedom among his fellow citizens, his chances of mastering the temptations of freedom will be tested by permitting him freedom of movement in an open section of the institution. The first risk will thus be taken at the institution and not outside in free society.

An expectant and lively interest is being shown in the awaited proposals of the Penal Code Commission concerning the open treatment of youthful offenders and a form of short-term intensive institutional treatment. Some British and American experimental institutions, especially New Jersey's Highfield, with its group therapy program, have been kept in mind in this connection. In order to get a clearer view of Highfield and also the potentialities of group therapy in an institutional setting, American authorities have been requested to lend us Dr. Lloyd W. McCorkle for a couple of months. Furthermore, an experiment in group therapy has been begun with prisoners.

THE DISTRICT PLAN

The Swedish penal institutions number about fifty. Most of them are very small. A few accommodate a hundred or more inmates; the largest one can take six hundred prisoners. The institutions in the middle range have places for about fifty inmates each and a number of so-called colonies have room for about thirty each. The system is therefore complicated and rather difficult to administer. The progressive emphasis on individualized treatment has made these administrative disadvantages increasingly apparent.

Beginning with 1954, the remedy for this situation has been sought in the division of all institutions into seven groups or districts. The largest and best-equipped institution in each is a so-called central institution, to which a number of smaller institutions and colonies are attached. Four of the groups are to handle ordinary prisoners, one is for detainees and internees and one for youthful prisoners. An institution for women and a colony attached to it form a rudimentary group by itself with accommodations for ninety inmates. Only the four groups for ordinary prisoners have been completely set up. Three of them have room for five hundred prisoners each. The fourth, which includes the largest prison, can accommodate about a thousand, but it is planned to divide it into two groups when its central institution is replaced in a few years by two or three smaller institutions.

The southern group

To illustrate the district organization we shall describe the so-called southern group. It consists of the central prison at Malmö, which has a capacity of 180, including 30 beds in a psychiatric section and 10 hospital beds. It also has a special isolation section for disciplinary cases. The other institutions in the group are scattered over southern Sweden: three closed institutions, two of which accommodate about fifty prisoners each, the third about twenty-five; four colonies, each with about forty beds.

The director of the central prison is also superintendent of the entire group of institutions. The main rule governing commitments is that the group is to receive prisoners who belong in southern Sweden. The Prison Administration can allocate a prisoner to a district, but assignment to a specific institution is made by the district superintendent. In deciding this question and the treatment to be given the prisoner, the superintendent shall utilize a classification procedure based as much as possible on the discussion of the case by a classification committee composed of certain officials of the institution. A conscientious effort is being made to limit the written case record of the prisoners to essential annotations on the principle that writing about the prisoner must be reduced to gain time for his treatment. These annotations shall be made consecutively, and the case record must accompany the prisoner wherever he is sent. When the treatment is completed, the case record must be transmitted to the parole authorities, who upon the final discharge of the parolee will send it to the Prison Administration for filing. If the individual later commits a new crime, the court or treatment authority can demand the file from the Prison Administration.

Classification committees will be found in all institutions. The best qualified one will, of course, be found in the central institution, where an inmate who needs a more detailed examination will be transferred. Prisoners with sentences of six months or longer will as a rule be examined at that institution. In any case, the superintendent will decide whether or not such a detailed study is to be made.

The district plan also includes the novel provision that the psychiatrist of the central institution will have the right and duty to keep in touch with the treatment of the inmates in all the institutions in the group. He may admit any prisoner he wants to his own section of the central institution.

THE FUTURE

The next task, in accordance with the Zetterberg Plan, will be the reorganization of the treatment of abnormal and habitual offenders. A project exists to set up an institution of a kind new as far as Sweden is concerned.⁴ It had been estimated that this clientele needs about five hundred beds. The question to be decided was whether these beds should be distributed over several separate institutions as at present or centralized in one. The latter solution was not acceptable to our way of thinking. The planning committee concluded that a middle road could be followed, and proposed the erection of several institutions close together. This arrangement would permit the use of a common kitchen, heating plant, assembly hall, athletic field, hospital, and so forth, and yet keep inmates divided into small and separated groups. The plan provides, therefore, both closed, semiopen, and open departments on a single large tract. Although a considerable increase in personnel—physicians, psychologists, social workers, and other treatment personnel—is envisaged and there is to be no skimping in custodial staff and work supervisors, the end result would mean a considerable saving in costs of operation. Comments on the plan, however, have revealed great hesitancy. It is feared that such a concentration of abnormal offenders may bring trouble. The attitude which the government and the Parliament will adopt is not yet clear.

⁴For details see Thorsten Sellin, "The Treatment of Mentally Abnormal Offenders in Sweden: A Blueprint of Reform," in Vårdorganisation för Förvarade och Internerade (Stockholm: Ministry of Justice, 1953), Chap. 12, pp. 91-103.

The plan of the committee also presupposes a reorganization of the after-care of those released from the institution. It is planned to set up special boarding homes and to improve parole supervision a great deal, with the expectation that the high recidivist rate of this class of offenders will be reduced.

Torsten Eriksson, Cand. Jur., Stockholm, heads a bureau in Sweden's Department of Justice and is its expert consultant in penal affairs. He has served as director of various penal institutions, as staff member in the Prison Administration, as state inspector of the schools for delinquent children, and has participated in the work of numerous official commissions. He has studied penal treatment in several European countries and has twice visited the United States for the same purpose. He is one of his country's representatives on the United Nations Consultative Group on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, and has published (in Swedish) Prostitution and Society (1939), Crime and Society (1940), Gang Criminality (1941), Juvenile Delinquency (1942), and numerous articles in professional journals and the periodical press.

Book Department

	PAGE
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND WORLD GOVERNMENT	163
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY	168
ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY	177
SOCIOLOGY AND EDUCATION	183
PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION	191
SPECIAL TOPICS ABROAD	197
COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS	199
SLAVIC COUNTRIES	204
WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE	209
OTHER COUNTRIES	213
CORRECTION

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND WORLD GOVERNMENT

McCLOY, JOHN J. The Challenge to American Foreign Policy. Pp. 81. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $2.00.

Mr. John J. McCloy, whose experience as lawyer, Assistant Secretary of War, President of the World Bank, High Commissioner for Germany, and Chairman of the Board of the Chase National Bank has given him that capacity to understand which Carlyle in Mirabeau called an eye, tells us in this series of lectures delivered last year at Harvard University what he sees as the nature of the Russian-led Communist threat, the problems which this menace presents to the free world, and how the United States may formulate and execute domestic and foreign policies which will lead the free peoples into surmounting and surviving this danger.

The tyrannical and enslaving Soviet-led threat, Mr. McCloy points out, is political, military, and ideological. It can be met and mastered only by a program for freedom not only stronger but equally comprehensive. While the United States towers as the colossus of freedom, we alone cannot overcome the power of these evil forces. We can win this struggle for liberty, prosperity, and peace only by mobilizing and effectively leading the free nations and peoples of the world and continuing to strengthen the institutions of the free world such as the United Nations, the European community, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which we have, and by building yet other associations which will give us the power of effective collective action. This is what Mr. McCloy calls the community era of history.

Effective American leadership demands, the author tells us, not only the closest cooperation among all the departments and agencies of our government which must participate in the carrying out of our many-sided program, but the men and women who conceive and execute our policies must have broader training and wider understanding of the problems which we must face than has been possessed in the past by those who have had the limited information and outlook only of their particular department or agency. So Mr. McCloy calls for both new policies and new types of minds to formulate and implement the blueprint of the United States-led forces of freedom.

It is essential, Mr. McCloy emphasizes, that we cannot win the battle for a free world unless we preserve the vitality of our own free institutions and traditions and show the unity among ourselves which we call upon other free peoples to exhibit with us and freedom-loving people everywhere.

This book should be required reading for every person at the policy level of our government, for it depicts the challenging magnitude of the struggle in which we are engaged and the wisdom, vision, courage, and strength which the mastering of this menace will demand.

CLAUDE DENSON PEPPER
Miami, Florida

CHAMBERLIN, WILLIAM HENRY. Beyond Containment. Pp. vii, 406. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1953. $5.00.

Mr. Chamberlin has written a number of informative books on the Soviet Union, most of them moderate in tone and all of them based upon wide personal observations in Russia. Like most others he has become increasingly critical of the Soviet government and its foreign policies. In this, his latest book, we find no trace of a former belief that far from being an aggressor the Soviets entertained an almost pathological fear of an attack by others. The reasons for this changed opinion are conclusive and are marshaled effectively.

Beyond Containment, although its title would seem to promise a program for future action, is devoted chiefly to an account of our deteriorating relations with Russia after World War II. It is the author's contention that the developments of these years, so unfavorable to interests of the United States, were largely the result of the mistaken foreign policies of Presidents Roosevelt and Truman. The "appeasement" policy at Yalta, the insistence upon the unconditional surrender by Germany and Japan, the failure to furnish adequate aid to the Chinese Nationalists, all these policies created power vacuums in both the West and the East and were, so the author contends, an invitation to the Soviets to press forward to their goal of world domination. After Roosevelt's "appeasement" came Truman's "containment," an improvement on the former yet wholly inadequate to meet the present crisis. What then should be done? Here the author becomes less definite. Our "main objective," he says, "should be to divide our enemies and do everything possible for the disintegration of the Communist empire," an echo of the campaign speeches of 1952 which caused such tremors of fear among our European allies.

Mr. Chamberlin, however, is no advocate of World War III. Instead, he believes that "Coexistence with a swollen dictatorship like the Soviet Union is possible only on the basis of equal or superior strength, military, economic, diplomatic, moral." Against this view Mr. Truman would probably not protest since it is exactly the one he frequently himself expressed. The new program is thus not substantially different from the old.

If, as is intimated, the first American crusade resulted in the establishment of Communism and the second in its enormous expansion, one may well pause to reflect on the probability of the ultimate good that might result from a third, whether hot or cold. It may well be that there is no definitive solution for the problems confronting a nation placed in the position of world leadership. Perhaps we too shall have to learn, as others in the past have had to learn, to live with our troubles, uncomfortable as that prospect may be. Perhaps even old-fashioned diplomatic negotiations based on realistic power situations may promise more in the long run than crusades, however high the moral and legal plane upon which they rest.

ELMER D. GRAPER

University of Pittsburgh

LANGER, WILLIAM L., and S. EVERETT GLEASON. The Undeclared War, 1940-1941. Pp. xvi, 963. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953. $10.00.

The jointly authored study of United States foreign policy between 1937 and 1941, of which this is the second volume, has provoked an array of assessments by a glittering galaxy of reviewers. The encyclopedic proportions (over 1,700 pages in both volumes), the outstanding reputations of its authors who were enabled to give four years of their time to its preparation (the Rockefeller Foundation provided $139,000 while the Sloan Foundation gave $10,000), and the sources which were made available to these privileged researchers come dangerously close to making of the study "the final word." McGeorge Bundy has written that the magnificent achievement of collection and organization is so thorough it will not have to be done again. If the authors themselves would not quite agree with Mr. Bundy's enthusiastic appraisal, it is only because they are quite aware of the questions left unanswered by their narrative.

Perhaps the most brilliant analysis of the first volume, which would apply in part to the second, was made in a review article by E. Malcolm Carroll in the January 1953 South Atlantic Quarterly. Mr. Carroll raised the question of scholarly detachment of authors who had identified themselves so closely with the government during the war and afterwards. He questioned whether Russian motives could be assessed so easily and categorically without sufficient documentation, and he lamented the lack of consideration for the direct relations between the United States and Germany.

This second volume chronicles the events of 1940 and 1941, and like the first concentrates its attention upon developing world conditions as they impinge upon American foreign policy. While many have regretted the detail required of this approach, it is nevertheless to be expected that it should have been the orientation of historians who have specialized in the balance of power. Their assumption that conditions abroad assume primacy over public opinion in the formulation of U. S. foreign policy is implicit in the remark "Not until the autumn of 1941 did the unrelenting pressure of ugly facts lead the American people to at least tacit acceptance of undeclared and limited war against Germany in the Atlantic." It may be that this assumption has led them to undervalue the role public opinion plays in the formulation of policy. In any event, it is apparent to this reader that the authors have not attempted to compare and contrast the opinion polls they rely on so heavily with other barometers of articulated attitudes which have been available. To conclude, therefore, that Roosevelt often lagged behind public opinion is valid only in so far as the authors' conclusions on the public temper are exact.

MARTIN B. TRAVIS, JR.

Stanford University

HILGER, GUSTAV, and ALFRED G. MEYER. The Incompatible Allies: A Memoir-History of German-Soviet Relations, 1918-1941. Pp. xiii, 350. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $5.00.

This excellent book begins like a mystery novel: a silent handshake inside the Moscow Kremlin in the early dawn, and four pages later five shots and Count Mirbach lies dead. The farewell of Count von der Schulenberg and Gustav Hilger to Molotov on June 22, 1941 came a few hours after Hitler had broken his treaties of non-aggression and friendship by sending planes to bomb Soviet targets. This was 23 years after the assassination of the first German ambassador to Soviet Russia on July 6, 1918. This book is the history of German-Soviet relations during these 23 years, a narrative supplemented and enriched by the recollections of Mr. Hilger, a German born in Russia, who as a German official took part in or observed the conduct of these relations.

These recollections give support to the belief that the Soviet leaders found it easier and more congenial to deal with Germans of the military and the imperial tradition and later with the Nazis than with officials of democracies—German or any other. For example, during the days of the Weimar Republic the Kremlin was in hot water with the Reich political authorities more often than with the military authorities, with whom they were collaborating secretly. Messrs. Hilger and Meyer add to our knowledge of this hush-hush military collaboration, which was exposed but not liquidated until 1933 when Hitler suddenly ordered the Reichswehr to close down all its activities in Russia. One aspect of this military collaboration not mentioned here but revealed by the late V. N. Ipatieff in his The Life of a Chemist (1946) relates to joint preparation of poison gas which Germany and Russia had agreed to share in case of war. Many of the high-ranking Red officers and diplomats involved in this Soviet-German collaboration were victims of the purges of 1936-38.

Hitler's "virtual declarations of cold war against Bolshevism" furnished Stalin with a convenient justification for his liquidation of potential rivals. But Messrs. Hilger and Meyer believe that this elimination of the allegedly "pro-German" faction was in fact "a necessary preparation for the German-Soviet alliance" of 1939. They also believe that Stalin and Hitler, for different reasons, were influenced by the Munich conference to decide that Russian-German collaboration was more to the advantage of both dictatorships than continuation of their cold war.

Once Stalin was convinced that the Nazis might agree to an ideological armistice he went to great lengths to show his willingness to make Hitler's enemies his enemies and to collaborate in the congenial task of destroying what was left of parliamentary democracy in Europe. Once the trade, non-aggression, and friendship treaties with the secret protocol dividing the territories to be conquered were signed, the Soviet rulers appear to have fulfilled their obligations more fully and promptly than the Nazis. There were difficulties, of course, but Communists and Nazis seem to have had fewer troubles while the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was supplying materials to the Nazis than Communists and Americans had later when the Americans were supplying materials to the Russians.

This beautiful friendship between Stalin and Hitler soon came to an end as each became convinced that the other was breaking the agreement in order to gain territories or advantages that both coveted. Hitler decided that the Soviet Union was getting stronger and, if Germany were to settle accounts, as sooner or later she must, it had better be soon. On December 18, 1940, five weeks after Molotov had visited Berlin to bargain for a new settlement, Hitler gave orders for Operation Barbarossa "to crush Soviet Russia in a swift campaign." Meanwhile, in the U.S.S.R. anyone who spread rumors about a possible Soviet-Nazi war was sent to jail. One gets the impression that Stalin was unpleasantly surprised by the swiftness of the Nazi conquests, that he feared, distrusted, and at the same time respected Hitler, and that he was ready to bargain and make concessions to avoid a break. He did not see in Hitler his own weakness, that "dizziness from success" by which dictators are so often afflicted and destroyed.

HAROLD H. FISHER

Stanford University

DEUTSCH, KARL W. Nationalism and Social Communication: An Inquiry into the Foundations of Nationality. Pp. x, 292. Cambridge, Mass.: The Technology Press, jointly with John Wiley & Sons, New York, 1953. $5.00.

The writer of this review is not a student of nationalism and is therefore directly concerned only with Mr. Deutsch's program for investigating it. A proposal to study nationalism with all the relevant methods of the social sciences is not easily distinguished from a proposal that we all resolve to be just as intelligent as we can. This book is so clear (I do not mean that it is easy to read at every point, but that its difficulties are resident in the subject matter rather than the language employed to treat it) and so responsible that its hortatory quality does not offend, but it remains true of this work—as it is of other proposals for broad interdisciplinary research—that study design cannot substitute for what used to be called providence; that is, for our responses to events as they occur. Long before Mr. Deutsch's program could be carried out in toto we should have been forced to reformulate it a dozen times.

Experience in research aimed at informing those who make policy in industry and government suggests that in social research as in the lives of individuals we must limit the span of our attention to problems generated by particular social changes or dictated by particular goals. And, if there is no time to think about the meaning of our partial successes or our failures, there is, for the purposes of science, no time at all. In reading Mr. Deutsch one feels (especially in his earlier chapters) that he is trying to arrange matters so that we can skip the stage of reformulation or reflection which assimilates our earlier results. If we could do this, would not events themselves force us (as they always have so far) to change our perspective?

To particularize: I am much more impressed by Mr. Deutsch's sixth and seventh chapters which make ingenious use of new combinations of existing social science techniques for area study than I am by his suggestion that we study the ability of a people to communicate with one another as the prime index of nationality, taking as our model of communication the communications engineer's concept of the transmissibility of message units through various systems such as telephone networks or between the elements of an electronic calculator. Of the practicability and desirability of such studies there can be no question. One may wonder, however, whether the results would be "critical" with respect to such an extensive concept as nationalism.

More important perhaps is the question of the size of the enterprise to which Mr. Deutsch would be committing his energies. He is so possessed by his sense of the moral and political urgency of understanding nationalism that he proposes in effect to measure the ability of the people of the world to understand each other. Is it improper to say that any undertaking on the large scale he proposes is itself a matter of national policy? And that it therefore requires that its initiators and directors be in possession of national power? Mr. Deutsch is not a technocrat, but his enthusiasm for world organization leads him to suggest means which the social sciences cannot, in isolation from the directing powers of the society, responsibly employ on so large a scale.

ELMO C. WILSON

New York City

EER, HILDING. Freedom of Information as a Project of International Legislation: A Study of International Law in Making. Pp. 176. Uppsala: A.-B. Lundequistska Bokhandeln (for the Royal University Library of Uppsala), 1953. 12 kr.

The United Nations has been able to place international discussion of freedom of information in a setting of grand design—the ideals of the Four Freedoms articulated as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The indifference which plagued the efforts of the League of Nations in this field is gone, but the same difficulties and dilemmas are present. This book reports on the conferences dealing with the transmission of news and the right of correction, 1949 and 1952, and the drafts of the covenant on freedom of information, 1948, 1949, and 1951.

There is as yet, despite a great deal of earnest work, limited reality in efforts to transmute these ideals into international law. The antagonists in East and West hold their bitter, mutually-exclusive positions and the East is excluded from these proposed covenants by their terms. But the nations for which the documents are intended are spaced widely in their development of political freedom. Some baldly censor the press. Most of the delegates taking part were instructed on the assumption that it was quite proper to pass the current of international news through the magnetic field of nationalism.

Mr. Eek has ably placed the conference materials in their social contexts and has noted differences in traditional legal standards of freedom of the press. Drawing on sources outside the conferences with which he deals, he discussed press industrialism, monopolism, professionalism, and performance standards. Linked with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, these topics are domestic and controversial. Efforts to deal with them by international law are wholly unsupported by legal machinery to handle litigation. In bringing them into the frame of reference, Mr. Eek adds to the unreality which persists in this field. He has left to his readers, however, evaluation of the chances of forming international legal institutions which can deal with such problems.

The author was a member of the U.N. secretariat for four years. In the case of the several freedom of information conferences, Mr. Eek did what many a staff man has wanted to do before: After the meetings were over, he sorted out the litter and prepared a draft convention of his own which he felt would improve chances of ratification. This draft stands now untested by discussion as only one man's opinion, but it may gain in importance if discussed by succeeding commissions. Certainly the service performed is one of usefulness to international society.

The principal need of teachers was for a book which would clearly separate and also relate the major documents and the arguments which explain them. Since Mr. Eek chose to go outside the conference rooms for useful material about the press and society, he should also have brought in the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press (1948). As it is, his valuable and helpful book is directed too much at the departed delegates.

The editing and proofreading are not up to professional standards, and this is especially to be regretted in a book published for a distinguished university.

J. EDWARD GERALD

University of Minnesota

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY

WALLACE, DONALD H. Economic Controls and Defense. Pp. xiii, 260. New York: Twentieth Century Fund, 1953. $2.00.

The subject of Economic Controls and Defense contains very little to make it a subject of any long time interest or of any interest whatsoever except in periods of extreme emergency. The fact that Donald Wallace was able to write so interestingly about this subject, which so many people seek to avoid, is a tribute to his long background in the practical aspects of controls. Unless one has lived with the problem of attempting to find a common meeting ground between the theories of defense controls and the practical application of the same, he could not have a proper appreciation of the depth of thought in the contents of Mr. Wallace's book.

This work is one that should be a "must" for government officials who are working on stand-by programs. It outlines most clearly the pitfalls that must be avoided, the danger of too much reliance on direct controls, the benefits and disabilities of indirect controls, and yet weighs all of these against the greater danger of inflation. It does not in any way attempt to glorify the benefits to be derived from a program of controls even in an emergency period, for although controls can only exist as long as some popular support can be maintained for the same during periods that are generally recognized as dangerous, even in those periods a program is subject to constant attack, both frontal and flank. The best way to minimize these attacks is to have a program so well prepared that attention can be given to the current problems of adjustments that are so often used by the detractors of the program.

Wallace's work is one of the best textbooks I have ever had the opportunity of reading on this subject. It is concise and yet it is complete. It meets the requirements of the economists, and yet it is clear enough for the layman to secure a comprehension of the problems involved. It discusses most clearly the fine lines of demarcation as to when each program of controls might be the most effective, and it points out most clearly the dangers of each program. The reading of this volume when the stress of the immediate problems is not with us should be very helpful to all those who might later be involved, whether it be from the standpoint of business or of government.

MICHAEL V. DiSALLE

Toledo, Ohio

MASON, ALPHEUS T. The Supreme Court: Vehicle of Revealed Truth or Power Group, 1930-1937. Pp. 58. Boston: Boston University Press, 1953. $2.50.

This little book of less than sixty pages contains the text of three lectures delivered at Boston University in 1953 on the Gasper C. Bacon foundation. One may wonder initially why Professor Mason felt either a need or a desire to repeat once more the oft-told story of the events that led up to the Roosevelt court plan of 1937 and to the sudden reversal of position by the Supreme Court that did so much to bring about the defeat of that plan. But before one has read many pages the answer is clear, for this is by all odds one of the most informative and sophisticated analyses of the Hughes Court yet available. Chief Justice Hughes is the central figure in these pages, but he is not their hero. That role is reserved for Justice Stone. Indeed, it is probable that this is a preliminary study to the definitive biography of the latter justice that is presumably to issue from Professor Mason's pen at some later date. If so, it holds high promise for the later work.

Let it be clear that this is a highly meritorious study in its own right. This reviewer knows of no other similar essay that more completely and convincingly destroys the theory of the Supreme Court as an automatic purveyor of immutable justice or as a dispassionate arbiter of the early New Deal legislation. Merlo Pusey's recent biography of Hughes is the latest of a long line of works to give support to this theory, and in some ways Professor Mason's analysis of the anti-New Deal decisions of the Hughes Court is a conscious refutation of the Pusey position. Mason does concede that there is something to be said for Pusey's claim that there was no essential change between Hughes's position in the Schechter case and that in the Jones and Laughlin case, but he adds that this was merely the result of "the most characteristic feature of the Chief Justice's leading opinions—that built-in escape hatch through which he might move later on, in whatever direction expediency might then seem to demand" (p. 54).

In fact, the most striking thing about this book is the critical language used to describe Chief Justice Hughes. Moreover, Mason finds support for his views in the Stone-Frankfurter correspondence of the period, to which he has had access. The blunt way in which these two men referred to Hughes in their correspondence is amazing. After the Court's change of position in 1937, Frankfurter (still professor at the Harvard Law School) seemingly had Hughes in mind when he referred in a letter to Stone to "a synthetic halo being fitted upon the head of one of the most politically calculating of men." There is more of the same.

All students of the Supreme Court will find this little essay fascinating reading and a highly intelligent analysis of a crucial period in American constitutional history.

ROBERT K. CARR

Dartmouth College

WEEKS, O. DOUGLAS. Texas Presidential Politics in 1952. Public Affairs Series Number 16. Pp. x, 116. Austin: University of Texas, 1953. $1.25 paper; $2.00 cloth.

The 1952 presidential election was quite different, in its essential character, from any of the other forty-one in our history. The disciplined armies of organized political parties were less conspicuous than in any contest since 1860. The amorphous electorate divided into all sorts of ad hoc organizations. Our partisan politics lost its non-ideological character. In 1912 and 1932, liberal thrusts struck at the respectable way of things. In 1952, there occurred the greatest conservative reaction in our history. It was more pronounced than its prototype of 1920, since the threat posed by the barbarian hordes beyond the Vistula was more real than that of the American Socialists and "Wobblies" after World War I. There was a bit of Theodore Roosevelt's "standing at Armageddon and battling for the Lord," but there was more of the grim desperation of Chalons, and Tours, and Vienna.

In no state more than Texas was politics untraditional. Both parties were split. In fact, there were four parties in this fundamentalist uniparty state. Douglas Weeks has done an excellent job in tracing the course of each of these movements. The author and his excellent corps of assistants observed precinct meetings and county and state conventions of both the regular and "rump" variety. Minorities bolted all over the plains of Texas. Sometimes the bolters were the Loyalist Democrats, sometimes the Shivercrats; sometimes the Taftites, sometimes the lusty Eisenhower amateurs. The confusion of two Democratic and two Republican state conventions was worse confounded by two slates of delegates to each of the great Chicago conventions, by struggles in national committees, in convention credential committees, and finally on the floors of both national conventions.

Most of the data were collected for the Cooperative Research Project on Convention Delegations of the American Political Science Association. But the author has gone beyond the convention delegations to the study of the general election. He analyzes the four competing groups with respect to geographic, social, and economic factors. And he gives some attention to future Texas political allegiance. I am quite in agreement with his contention that "Presidential Republicans" in the South are not, per se, a herald of a two-party system there. An enduring Republican Party can emerge only as it builds its local organization and achieves a continuing leadership which strives to win elections—and not merely to await the patronage crumbs which fall from a national Republican table. The South may indeed become, in the immediate future, the "swing section" of the United States, moving as a bloc to support the less objectionable of the two great parties.

CORTEZ A. M. EWING
University of Oklahoma

NEW YORK, Temporary State Commission to Study the Organizational Structure of the Government of the City of New York. Four Steps to Better Government of New York City. Pp. 137. Albany, New York, 1953. No price.

A spirited contest between the Mayor of New York City and the Governor of New York State over the exact nature of the deficiencies and disabilities of the metropolitan government led, in 1953, to the establishment of a commission charged with the duty of examining said government and reporting thereon to the Governor and the Legislature. This report is the result of that study. The Chairman of the State Committee was Mr. Devereaux C. Josephs; there were a Vice-Chairman and seven commissioners (one of whom, Professor Belle Zeller, is a political scientist). The staff was headed by Mr. Arthur Goldberg, as Counsel, and Professor Wallace S. Sayre, as Director of Research.

Early in 1950 the Board of Estimate, at the Mayor's (O'Dwyer's) bidding, had established a Mayor's Committee on Management Survey. This Committee was presided over by Mr. Lazarus Joseph, who is not the same person as the chairman of the state committee although the names are similar. The Director of Research was Professor Luther Gulick. Several of the people who served as staff members or consultants with Dr. Gulick were associated with the state committee. Therefore, although these two committees seem to have been inspired by different conceptions, those who did the work in each committee are either the same persons or people with the same background, experience, and point of view.

In many respects, the Sayre report is based on the findings of the Gulick report—if one may distinguish the reports by the names of the respective directors of research. The differences lie in the fact that the Gulick study is a very comprehensive one (it took years to complete) whereas the Sayre study took only months) and in the fact that its recommendations are highly detailed. Yet the two reports are obviously closely related and the later one is built on the earlier one.

The state report makes four recommendations. First, that there be a City Administrator, whose function would be similar to those of the typical city manager, with certain important modifications. Of these, the most significant is that he should be the "Mayor's man," completely subordinated and responsible to the Mayor, even though in actual practice he would exercise nearly complete authority over the management of the city's affairs. The second recommendation is that the office of Deputy Mayor be retained, but with certain modifications, chiefly in the representative and ceremonial fields. The third recommendation is that the performance budget system be introduced. The fourth is that there be established a modern personnel system clearly responsible to the Mayor through the City Administrator.

By making these specific recommendations the state committee renders an extremely valuable service. Firmly grounded on the research carried out under Dr. Gulick's direction as well as on scores of other studies made in similar fields, it lifts out of the mass of recommendations made by the Mayor's Committee the most significant and comprehensible reforms implicit in the larger study.

The state committee appears to have found a way to satisfy the demand for a general manager for New York City without diminishing the political importance of the Mayor's office. Already the new mayor, Mr. Robert F. Wagner, seems to have accepted the challenge by putting Luther Gulick in a position to test the validity of the proposal that there be an effective reorganization of the metropolitan executive. As the Sayre report indicates, there has now been adequate study. There is ground for hope that action will be taken along the lines of these recommendations. Not until these steps are taken does it seem likely that the major proposals of the Gulick report will be adopted.

ROY V. PEEL

University of Utah

MARSH, BENJAMIN C. Lobbyist for the People: A Record of Fifty Years. Pp. xii, 224. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1953. $3.00.

This book is an autobiography of Mr. Marsh who organized a "peoples' lobby," located at Washington, D. C. He did not work for himself or for a private interest. As he, himself, says (p. 34), "While it is true that the blood of the kickers is the seed of reform, it is equally true that in America a good many kickers—reformers—are extremely anxious to get into the class they are most vigorously damning. They want to abolish classes by getting into the class they want to abolish. That's one way to do it."

At the turn of the century, these people of Mr. Marsh's type were known as "professional reformers," and in recent years they have been described as "do gooders." He had the confidence of the Almighty but lacked the necessary omniscience. He was carried away by the current wave of socialism and seemed to think that a "planned economy" could settle all the ills of man in society. Unlike a leading American socialist who has been converted away from such specious opinions, he was not persuaded that socialism would not work and that it "enslaved the individual." He insisted that "the three great bulwarks of reaction in America today are organized religion, organized labor and organized farmers" (p. 207). He adds that "the program we urged, with the exception of heavier taxation of land values, is much like that of the British labor party and the moderate Socialist parties of Europe" (p. 208).

Were it not for the sincerity of Mr. Marsh, he would have been a most accomplished demagogue, but there is no doubt of the man's sincerity. However far he wrongly wandered in the remedies he advocated to cure the ills of society, there are many shrewd observations in the book, for he knew "Roosevelt's unlimited capacity to fool a lot of people a good deal of the time" (p. 109).

A careful reading of the book from cover to cover brings this reviewer to the conclusion that its main value is in the fact that it affords a psychological study of a professional do-gooder, and also recounts many of the struggles of those who would substitute a European system of governmental control of the affairs, perhaps both public and private, of the American people for the free enterprise system that has been the cause of much of their outstanding success for the past century and a half.

WILLIAM STARR MYERS

Princeton, New Jersey

MIDDLETON, ARTHUR PIERCE. Tobacco Coast: A Maritime History of Chesapeake Bay in the Colonial Era. Edited by George Carrington Mason. Pp. xii, 482. Newport News, Va.: Mariners' Museum, 1953. $5.00.

Neither the title nor the subtitle of Dr. Middleton's monograph quite describes its contents. It might be called: "Aspects of the Economic History of Virginia and Maryland, 1607-1775." It begins with a well-informed account of the ocean passage from Europe to Chesapeake Bay, with emphasis on the conditions of travel and the art of navigation. Then follow two excellent chapters describing the physiography of the region and its flora and fauna. Part Two surveys the tobacco trade, the slave trade, commerce with the West Indies and southern Europe, the fur trade, and internal and intercolonial commerce. The concluding section consists of chapters on ships and shipbuilding, the merchant marine, masters and mariners, the convoy system, naval defense, and prizes and privateers.

The topical arrangement of data is suggestive of an encyclopedia. The work treats many special subjects, such as ferries, pilots, the volume of shipping, tobacco inspection, and the fisheries. Each topic is treated in isolation; hence the arrangement does not give a full sense of total situations, relationships, or large-scale movements and changes. A discussion of the methods of producing tobacco is somewhat foreign to the general maritime theme; yet the work does not deal with other important features of the internal economy, such as land tenure, the size of farms, or social classes. Two important aspects of commerce—currency and foreign exchange—are ignored. Equally unfortunate is the failure to include an adequate discussion of the English Acts of Trade and Navigation, under which the Chesapeake trade was carried on. And one regrets that the author has not offered an appraisal of the effects of the British colonial system. He shows that commerce bound Virginia and Maryland more closely to Britain than was the case with respect to any other mainland colony. Why, then, did the area that was most closely tied to Britain, commercially, take the lead in resisting Britain's rule?

Mr. Middleton's research has been wide and thorough; hence his study presents an exceptionally large amount of new material. His scholarship is accurate and precise. Most of his accounts of the subjects he has treated are the best now available. The writing—clear, forceful, and concise—imparts a sense of assurance that comes from mastery of a subject. The book belongs in company with the works of Bruce, Wertebaker, U. B. Phillips, and L. C. Gray. Among the many interesting contributions, two stand out. One shows how the Chesapeake network of waterways made possible the tobacco industry; the delicate nature of the cured leaf precluded long hauls by land. The second explains how the Chesapeake region was riveted to Britain in trade by virtue of the convoy system that was employed during the Anglo-French wars.

CURTIS P. NETTELS

Cornell University

FISHER, DOROTHY CANFIELD. Vermont Tradition: The Biography of an Outlook on Life. Pp. 488. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1953. $4.50.

Mrs. Fisher here undertakes to define the Vermont tradition. She is much concerned with Vermont history, but the history is not an end in itself. Rather, the author uses the story of Vermont's past to show how it "shaped, molded and created Vermont character." This is an attempt to relate "the growth of the tradition by which the people of Vermont . . . live, measure the relative importance . . . of the diverse elements of human existence, decide what makes life worth the great effort of living."

After two introductory chapters, the book really begins with the story of the settling of western Vermont in the 1760's. Two chapters set forth the contrast between the free farmers of western Connecticut, many of whom moved to Vermont, and their neighbors in New York. Much of the bitterness of the Yorker controversy, Mrs. Fisher believes, as well as the rugged individualism that is part of the Vermont tradition, stems from this contrast between freedom and New World serfdom. There are two interesting chapters on the Revolution and on the New Hampshire Grants controversy and a fascinating one on the great Vermont folk hero—Ethan Allen.

The problem of political survival was settled when Vermont entered the Union in 1791; the question of economic survival remained. In three provocative chapters, the author sets forth as many important milestones in Vermont's struggle against poverty: the potash industry, the importation of Merino sheep, and the breeding of the Morgan horse. There is a lengthy discussion of the financial ruin that seemed to face the state at the close of the Civil War, and of how four different crises were resolved. There is a concluding chapter which defends the author's thesis that the Vermont tradition has not been destroyed, or even dissipated, in this atomic age.

This is a fascinating book. The organization and approach are original, the author's convictions are as staunch as her research was diligent, and her style is delightful—as witness this:

"Set to write of that peaceful, cheerful swarming out from the old hives to found new communities, a Vermont pen begins to dance and gambol, to toss its head and gallop down the page like a colt let out from the barn to spring sunshine. For it was springtime—no matter what the season of the year—to those forward-looking young people stepping confidently along the roads and trails leading them to the future."

Since this book was written, a community near the author's home has banned books, an action that must have made Mrs. Fisher wince. We shall hope, however, that she is right and that the tradition of freedom and the admiration of integrity remain inviolate in the Green Mountain State.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

Cornish Flat, New Hampshire

FLEXNER, JAMES THOMAS. The Traitor and The Spy: Benedict Arnold and John André. Pp. x, 431. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1953. $5.75.

When an officer of high military rank tries to sell his honor, it is hardly pleasant to lack for takers or to be lectured by an enemy subaltern. Yet that is what happened to Benedict Arnold in 1779 because he seemed to the British strangely inactive after his treasonable offer. Wounded in body and mind, he actually had nothing of worth to offer the enemy until he finally persuaded Washington to place him in command of West Point.

Arnold was consumed by a personal ambition for social recognition, a quality of his character that originated in the humiliating experiences of his childhood. Learning then that a display of bravery would bring praise from his playmates, he later used the same technique on a grander scale as a merchant speculator and a soldier of the American Revolution. When politicians and accountants—neither of whom he ever understood—denied him the honors he thought his courage and wounds should have brought to him, he used his authority as commandant of Philadelphia to engage in illegal trade. Even with the additional income, he still supported his lovely second wife, Peggy Shippen, in a state far beyond his financial means.

Peggy was equally as ambitious as was Arnold and seems to have been the leader in entering into the treasonable plot with John André. When, however, the treason was discovered, her hysterics appeared genuine enough to convince even Hamilton and Washington that she was entirely innocent. Aaron Burr later learned her true role but kept it a secret until after her death.

John André entered the British army as an officer who was ambitious to gain recognition only through his literary productions. While a prisoner of war under brutish American guards, however, he acquired an intense hatred of the leveling tendencies of the Americans, a hatred that eventually led him to urge his commander to slaughter them without mercy. Thus firmly convinced of the righteousness of his cause and sustained by a zeal and courage surpassing Arnold's, André entered into acts of espionage in contacting Arnold that finally brought him to the gallows. There he displayed a courage which made him a hero on two continents.

James Thomas Flexner has told this stirring story entertainingly. Without becoming bookish or psychological, he has related certain experiences and circumstances that may put one in the mood to engage in treason or espionage. Because of the current spy hunt, his account is most timely. Of the three principals, only André comprehended the political implications of the struggle.

This volume is important, too, because of the new information presented in it. In England and Australia André family papers have been discovered that do much to change the accepted picture of the dashing counterintelligence officer. Moreover, a more important book on the traitor than this one probably has not been published since I. N. Arnold's Life of Benedict Arnold in 1880.

ROBERT LEROY HILLDRUP
Mary Washington College of The University of Virginia

BERTHOFF, ROWLAND TAPPAN. British Immigrants in Industrial America, 1790-1950. Pp. 288. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $5.00.

Rowland Berthoff's British Immigrants in Industrial America fills a gap in immigrant literature all the more striking because the rest of the wall has been so thoroughly bricked up. There are many studies of British immigration in colonial days, books about every kind and sort of continental European immigrant to the United States and innumerable impressions of British visitors who were our guests for a weekend or for a decade or anything between. But the "forgotten man" has been the nineteenth-century British immigrant workingman in the American mine or factory.

As the author himself points out, there are many reasons why this should have been so. Barring the Welsh, and a few Scottish highlanders, no contrast of language kept the immigrant under special observation. The British-American was simply taken for granted, while politicians and sociologists alike directed all their attention to the southern Irish, the Germans, the Italians, and the eastern Europeans. Moreover, the tempo of British immigration, though it increased throughout most of the nineteenth century, did not show such a sudden and spectacular rise as that of some other national elements. Except that most British immigration went to the northern states, and there was a strong concentration of Welsh miners in Pennsylvania, there was little of the intense localization which existed in so many other cases.

Unlike most immigrants, the British moved directly to the same occupations which they had followed in the old country; perhaps because nineteenth-century Britain was the most thoroughly industrialized country in Europe. "Thus nineteenth-century British migration to the United States ran not in a broad, undifferentiated stream but rather in many parallel channels. Textile operative, miner, machinist, potter, and stonecutter, though passengers aboard the same emigrant ship, followed each his own course" (p. 29). Those with a Celtic strain—the Scotch, Irish, Welsh, Cornish, Manx—showed the greatest tendency to preserve old customs and ceremonies and a separate press (Chapter XI). It is interesting to note, however, that the Welsh became naturalized at a faster rate than either the English or the Scots (p. 140).

PRESTON SLOSSON

Ann Arbor, Michigan

MANNING, CLARENCE A. Russian Influence on Early America. Pp. vii, 216. New York: Library Publishers, 1953. $3.75.

The title of this brief book should perhaps better have been Russian interest in the west coast of North America in the century before 1870. Whether that period can be considered "early America" is a matter of opinion. Some comment in the introduction and two brief chapters at the end seem to have been a sort of afterthought to bring the story up to date, with no regard for the title of the book, but as an attraction, one must suppose, for today's readers. Certainly the post-World War I period and the "Meaning of Communism" have little to do with the rest of the book which is largely concerned with the Russian-American Company and its activities.

The author indicates in his footnotes and in the astonishingly brief bibliography the use of some Russian material which seems to have corroborated the already well-known and much longer accounts of Hector Chevigny, Frank Golder, Hubert Bancroft, Thomas Bailey, and others. The chapters on the connections between the Siberian merchants and the St. Petersburg directors of the company and relations between the company and the Russian government are the most interesting parts of the book. The grandiose schemes of merchants and government officials and the almost incredible difficulties of the men in the outposts of empire are clear—as clear as the reasons why these schemes were doomed to failure.

The most apparent weakness of the book both for the general reader and the student is the lack of a map of the vast area considered. Eighteenth century place names conceal some spots that a twentieth century might recognize. From eastern Siberia and the islands off that coast to the islands and the mainland of upper North America there are many spots that are not, even yet, familiar, and such names as the Charlotte Islands, Bodega Bay, and Trinidad may not be recognized by present-day readers unfamiliar with the coast north of San Francisco.

The chapter on the background of the Monroe Doctrine has some interesting material, but the brief account in the next chapter of the United States position in 1823 and of Monroe's message of that year is trite, that is, his statement (p. 105) that the British liked the message but "they objected mildly to the statement against territorial establishments, for they were apprehensive that it might somehow develop in a wrong sense." The effect of the Crimean War and of Russia's interest in the Near East on her Alaska policy is well developed, and the initial steps of the attempt to sell Alaska to the United States before the Civil War have not, I think, been so fully discussed before.

The author is, perhaps, handicapped by his effort to deal so briefly with such a long period and so many episodes, for his style is often awkward and obscure, and there are many statements that have little meaning, are unbearably trite, or seem unintelligible, perhaps from too literal a translation of Russian sources. For example, see page 84, "... once the Russians had quit the [Hawaiian] Islands, they had lost their chance to return, for they at once stressed the difference between the competing nationalities, and the verdicts of the people and of the Hawaiian rulers were not in their favor." Nothing in the context will straighten that one out! Or see pages 89-90, "Russian expansion was a curiously complex process, for it was neither exclusively commercial nor military and naval." What country ever expanded by an "exclusive" process? And surely there is some misprint or bad editing in the following? "Then in a true, democratic system the wealth and smash the hermetically sealed prison of nations and restore that freedom and liberty so scorned and despised by the Great Russians to their victims in this long remote part of the world" (p. 208).

ALICE FELT TYLER

University of Minnesota

HÖLZLE, ERWIN. Russland und Amerika. Pp. 312. München: Verlag R. Oldenbourg, 1953. DM 19.50.

This interesting and carefully prepared volume endeavors to present a detailed picture of the relations between Russia and America, especially in the fields of diplomacy and of ideas, from the earliest contacts until some time after the sale of Russian America and the development of the socialist and revolutionary movement in Russia. The author, interested in the philosophy of history, starts with the premise that both countries were on the fringe of Europe and that their development went largely on parallel courses, even though the sources of the development, the Russian-Asiatic sense of autocracy and the American sense of republicanism, were almost diametrically opposed.

There is a strange truth in this hypothesis, as Russia expanded to the east and America to the west. The Russian serfs were freed at the period of the American civil war. The Russian railroads like the American were finally constructed to open up relatively undeveloped territory and not primarily to serve already established settlements. The author could have gone much further in drawing these similarities and still have been well within a conservative interpretation of the history of the two countries.

Yet his method of chapter division emphasizes the somewhat overrefined theory on which he works. They are: I. Bases, First Contact and Early Mutual Interest (from Peter the Great to the Congress of Vienna); II. Struggle for Idea and Space (The Times of the Holy Alliance and the Monroe Doctrine); III. The Community of Interest (The Period of English World Leadership). The rapprochement in I and III are primarily caused by the antagonism of both countries to English sea power. The clash in II is over Russian America and the South American Republics.

The Russians and the Americans had a common interest in opposing England's command of the sea, but for different reasons. The former wished to make sure of their imports in neutral ships, the latter, of their shipping, and under these conditions mutual co-operation failed even during the moments of greatest tension with England. The Russian actions in the North Pacific alienated the Americans far more than did the relations of Hawaii and England. There was a sentimental attraction between the two countries, but except for rare instances of personal contact no real community of feeling—an excess of friendly talk and a lack of real co-operation. It is possible that Baranov might have changed this, but he was unable to carry out his plans, and the Russian-American Company, rapidly turning into an arm of the government, could not support him. It is unfortunate that the book has not stressed the actual friendships and agreements on a low level.

It is curious that the Russians who had crossed Europe and Asia did not expect the Canadians and Americans to cross America by land. They apparently thought of America in terms of the sea and the sea only, until it was too late. They were thinking of legitimacy and the acquisition of new territory rather than of settlement, and even the "progressive groups" from the Decembrists to the Communists were essentially nonsympathetic to the new Republic. The American and Russian use of the same terms differed so widely in their basic assumptions that definite agreement was always impossible, whenever Washington and St. Petersburg tried to deal in realities and not in talk.

This is an excellent attempt to synthesize on a philosophical level the meeting of two countries across the Atlantic via Europe and England and directly across the Pacific where men of the same general character were in close contact. It is in a way an oversimplification, but the author has brought together a mass of material. He has in a sense opened a new field of study which should prove fruitful. His greatest fault is his failure to understand the peculiar nature of the American-English conflicts within a unified linguistic and cultural background, but this does not destroy the value of the work which deserves the most serious consideration by all students of Russian-American contacts both in the past and in the present.

CLARENCE A. MANNING

Columbia University

TRUMBULL, JOHN. The Autobiography of Colonel John Trumbull, Patriot-Artist, 1756-1843. Edited by Theodore Sizer. Pp. xxiii, 404. New Haven: Yale University Press (and Geoffrey Cumberlege, Oxford University Press, London), 1953. $6.00.

This notably fine edition of the autobiography of Colonel John Trumbull, the "patriot-artist," is a historical document of some consequence, for Trumbull was a man of considerable importance in his day. Not only did he win very wide recognition in Europe and America for his portraits of the Revolutionary fathers and his heroic canvasses depicting the highlights of the struggle for independence, but he was also on terms of some intimacy with numerous political and artistic figures of both continents. He was a friend of Jefferson, at whose table he quarrelled with William Branch Giles over the latter's "broad and unqualified avowal of atheism"; he knew Jay well enough to serve as his private secretary in the treaty negotiations of 1794; in Paris, he was the guest of Talleyrand in the company of Madame de Stael and Lucien Bonaparte; the French classicist David was his trusted friend; and he knew and admired Alexander Hamilton.

The autobiography itself, written when the artist was a lonely old man in his eighties, is highly interesting but it is hardly a well-constructed book. Trumbull's memory was faulty, and he committed numerous errors of fact; he omitted entirely any account of whole large sections of life such as that between 1799 and 1804; and he carefully avoided any mention of his illegitimate son or the tragic details of his marriage to a genteel English dipsomaniac.

For all this, the work is nonetheless a masterpiece of unintentional self-revelation. Trumbull was obviously an easy opportunist, and he suffered all his life from a gnawing desire for public recognition and fame. He failed completely to understand the deterioration in his work which took place because of the distractions of diplomacy and the loss of sight in one eye. He was inordinately proud of his short military career of a little more than a year, and he carried the title of "Colonel" for the remainder of his life, although his actual service as a staff officer under Washington lasted only nineteen days. A stanch and unimaginative Federalist, he was naive enough to believe that the excesses of the French Revolution were due principally to the machinations of the Duc d'Orleans. For all his limitations, he was at the same time a man of little malice and some generosity of spirit.

This reviewer has yet to behold a more masterful and scholarly piece of editing than that performed by Professor Sizer. Casual references are carefully documented, hidden details are supplied, and Trumbull's errors are meticulously corrected. This edition might well serve as a model of what fine historical editorship can accomplish.

ALFRED H. KELLY

Wayne University

ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY

HAYEK, F. A. (Ed.). Capitalism and the Historians. Pp. vii, 188. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954. $3.00.

The thesis of this singular little collection of essays is that historians, American and British, have been engaged, if not in a calculated conspiracy against the capitalist system, at least in a spontaneous attack upon it. As Professor Hayek and his colleagues spell out their indictment, the generality of professional historians, in the service of what Professor Louis M. Hacker calls their predominant "anti-capitalist bias," have sedulously propagated and promoted a series of myths about the workings of capitalism. The "supreme myth," according to Professor Hayek, the one which "more than any other has served to discredit the economic system," is "the legend of the deterioration of the position of the working classes in consequence of the rise of 'capitalism.'"

Capitalism and the Historians is apparently prepared to stand or fall on the case it can bring against the historical profession in terms of this "supreme myth." It soon develops that Professor Hayek and his colleagues have no serious case to bring at all. What British or American historian, for example, has argued that living standards for the working class have failed to rise under capitalism? No doubt some one has, some time, somewhere; but Professor Hayek, while pleading as if against overwhelming odds for "the recognition that the working class as a whole benefited from the rise of modern industry," does not name a single historian who would argue to the contrary.

Then, in a tardy effort to whittle down the indictment and render it more plausible, Professor Hayek shifts his ground to denounce historians for suggesting that the immediate impact of industrialism might have been to depress living conditions; this, too, is part of the "socialist" plot. Probably some historians have exaggerated the immediate effects of the Industrial Revolution. (This very phrase is gravely questioned by Professor T. S. Ashton as having too "catastrophic" an implication.) Yet, when Professor Hayek seeks to establish his narrower charge against the historian, even Professor Ashton deserts him. In the course of two able essays, Ashton makes it repeatedly clear that the evidence on the immediate effects of industrialism is complicated, that apparently the industrial system in its first impact benefited some workers and not others (cf. pp. 40-41, 128, 159). Here is Ashton's conclusion: "My guess [sic] would be that the number of those who were able to share in the benefits of economic progress was larger than the number of those who were shut out from these benefits and that it was steadily growing. But the existence of two groups within the working class needs to be recognized." This is some distance from the fiery dogmatism of Professor Hayek's implication that any historian who suggests that the Industrial Revolution was not just ducky for everybody is probably subversive.

The fact is, of course, that most British and American historians have been deeply and uncritically devoted to the capitalist system. In their desire to make a case against the profession, Professor Hayek and his collaborators must roam far afield to drag in Bertrand Russell, Gustavus Myers, Matthew Josephson, Friederich Engels, John Crowe Ransom, and other nonprofessionals. But all the contributors to this queer volume seem to be driven by some curious sense of persecution. Professor Hayek evidently feels himself persecuted by the "socialists," a category so broad in his apprehensive mind that he can describe the American institutionalists as "mostly socialists" and say that "a socialist interpretation of history . . . has governed political thinking for the last two or three generations"; Professor Ashton, by the students at the London School of Economics, who do seem to turn in monumentally silly examination papers; Professor Hacker, by Myers, Josephson, and Charles A. Beard, as well, no doubt, as by a bad conscience over his own radical past; Professor W. S. Hutt, by those incurable sentimentalists who question the virtue of child labor and a fourteen-hour day; and M. Bertrand de Jouvenel, by intellectuals in general.

There is plenty of room for a book in this area. Professional historians have certainly failed too often to allow for the conditions of industrial productivity; this has much too often been taken as a "given" in the historical balance sheet, as if it were an irresistible natural force. But this book adds nothing to such a discussion, except a summons to a witch-hunt. Americans, one would think, have enough trouble with home-grown McCarthys without importing Viennese professors to add academic luster to the process. What conceivably could have persuaded a university press to publish this book is hard to imagine. This volume is one more example of what Senator Fulbright recently called "that swinish blight so common in our time . . . anti-intellectualism."

ARTHUR SCHLESINGER, JR.
Harvard University

CHRISTENSEN, C. ROLAND. Management Succession in Small and Growing Enterprises. Pp. xi, 217. Boston: Harvard University Graduate School of Business Administration, 1953. $3.25.

This is the fourth of a series of studies of small, growing enterprises by the Division of Research of the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration. The problem investigated in this report is that of providing for management succession. It does not disclose quantitative data, but it is reasonable to assume that analysis of a substantial number of cases lies behind the qualitative conclusions. The author states that the estimates of interviewed bank and trust officers—that 70 to 90 per cent of small companies fail to plan for next-generation management—is substantiated by the study.

Why do small enterprises fail to make provision for management succession? The reviewer takes the liberty of presenting a reason, scarcely noticed in the report, that he considers a basic explanation for the reasons that are emphasized. It has been the reviewer's more than 50 years of observation that at the beginning, and while small, an enterprise is likely to be organized and managed by an individual (or partnership) of promotional rather than organizational temperament—promotional in the sense that he sees a market for a new product, or a new market for an old product, and possesses exceptional native ability for interesting sources of capital by skill in personal suasion—but he may not have special skill in management, or even marketing. The enterprise rides along successfully for a generation on the newness of the product or of the market, and the manager temperamentally gives little attention to organizing for future problems of production and competitive marketing, including provision for successor management.

Given such a situation, there are present a complex of attendant reasons, such as are disclosed in this report, for failure to make provision for future management: concern for day-to-day tactics rather than for long-run strategy; unnecessary concentration on details of management; indisposition to teach others; fear that overt training of others will create embarrassing situations; and generally the assumption that because things have come out well in the past they will continue to do so.

The 20 to 30 per cent of small enterprises that do make provision for successor management appear, in varying degrees and proportions, to be possessed of characteristics the opposite of those noted above as reasons for lack of provision. Nearly all of these favorable qualities may be summarized under some degree of temperamental concern for the future and for organization that manifests itself in the development of an atmosphere of interest in management problems, the definition and assignment of management responsibilities, staff conferences, and opportunity for individuals to show their capacities.

Many collateral factors are presented in the study, and the report is one that should be read and pondered by every owner or chief executive of a small enterprise.

H. S. PERSON
Dobbs Ferry, New York

GILBERT, MILTON (Ed.). Income and Wealth. Series III. Pp. xiii, 261. Cambridge, England: Bowes & Bowes, Cambridge International Association for Research in Income and Wealth, 1953. 35 s.

For some years now the discussions of national income experts have become so esoteric as to be completely unintelligible not only to the layman but even to the general run of economists. This volume containing papers presented at the meeting of the International Association for Research in Income and Wealth held at Royaumont in 1951 does not depart from this high technical level. But most of the papers in this volume are oriented towards a theme in which the common man has become intensely interested of late, namely the economic development of the underdeveloped areas of the world.

The main theme of these papers is the comparability of the estimates of national income of different countries. As the backwardness of the countries in the world is mainly judged by a comparison of the national income estimates of different countries, the pertinent question is whether such comparisons are valid. In any scheme of international economic co-operation such comparisons are also involved. The present methods of computing the national incomes overestimate the income of the advanced countries and on the other hand underestimate the incomes of backward areas. As a result the difference between the two appears in an exaggerated form. While admitting that such kinds of errors do inhere in the present national income estimates the majority of the papers contend that comparisons within broadly defined limits can and should be made. The national income estimates are not unique totals for each country, but, in so far as they follow common traditions and practices regarding computations, comparisons can be validly made. That there are many pitfalls in such comparisons and that policies based solely on that criterion are apt to be often wrong is readily admitted by all, and the need to be cautious is stressed at every point.

A subsidiary theme that runs through many papers is what guidance in regard to policy matters can be derived from national income estimates. Here again it has been pointed out that although they are by and large not useful for microeconomic decision they can nevertheless be used for macroeconomic decisions because they give a comprehensive view of the economy as a whole.

Two papers deal with long-term estimates of the national incomes of France and Japan. The computations of the Japanese national income for the period 1882-1957 presented here put them at a much higher level than that of estimates hitherto available. These new computations show that in Japan the national income per capita increased at an annual rate of more than 4 per cent, an extraordinary rate of growth as compared with other countries in the same period. This might permit one to suggest a more critical examination of these estimates.

Full justice cannot be done to the merits of the book in this short space.

N. V. SOVANI

Poona, India

CHALMERS, HENRY. World Trade Policies. Pp. xxxvii, 546. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1953. $7.50.

This book reproduces, largely in their original form, a series of periodic surveys (annual, except in two cases) of the foreign trade policies of the various nations from 1920 to 1953. The surveys, which in recent years have been published in the Foreign Commerce Weekly, deal with changes in tariffs, import restrictions, exchange controls, bulk purchasing and other aspects of the commercial policies of foreign countries. They reflect the wide and detailed knowledge that came to the author from his long tenure as chief of the foreign tariffs division of the Department of Commerce.

While there can be no question about the competence with which the surveys have been prepared or about their utility at the time of their original publication, there is room for considerable doubt that a useful purpose is served by placing them in book form. A succession of annual reviews does not provide the general reader with a satisfactory long-run perspective of the developments in world commercial policies or in any phase of that complicated subject. Although the individual surveys often contain penetrating analyses of the trend of events beyond the time confines of the particular year under study, it remains largely for the reader himself to piece together the various time segments relating to a particular aspect of the topic in order to gain such a perspective. This task of analysis and integration is one that the author was well qualified to perform, and it is to be regretted that he did not do it. The specialist in foreign trade might find some help in these summaries of annual developments, but this will be limited by the very fact that they are summary rather than detailed and by the absence of references to original sources. Also, the book has no index, a defect which is not entirely compensated by a 20-page analytical table of contents.

IRVING B. KRAVITZ

University of Pennsylvania

BECKER, JOSEPH M. The Problem of Abuse in Unemployment Benefits. Pp. xx, 412. New York: Columbia University Press, 1953. $6.50.

This is a greatly needed study and an excellent piece of work. Despite much popular discussion of the abuse problem in connection with the administration of unemployment compensation benefits, this is the first thorough and objective study to appear on the matter. The author is, of course, unable to quantify the problem, but he does seek to determine a crude upper limit to the possibilities of abuse under the present system. This is done by confining the study to the period from VJ Day through 1947. In this period the present system of unemployment compensation was probably subjected to the maximum abuse to which it can be put. Employment levels were high so that the worker had the maximum opportunity to abuse the system. Administration was less well organized to prevent abuse than in any future period that we are likely to see. How significant was the abuse? While evaluating the facts the author is careful to allow the reader to decide by his own standards how significant abuse was as a social and economic problem.

The term "abuse," the author points out, may cover two matters. First there is the matter of legal violation. There is the worker who works too much, who draws unemployment compensation while working, and the worker who works too little, who is either not in the labor force or is voluntarily unemployed yet draws benefits. The author describes the occurrence of substantial legal violations in the 1945-47 period that should cause even the most ardent supporter of the system to want to review its administration. He also describes what some state systems have already attempted to do to check abuse and proposes other constructive measures that may help to correct future abuses.

The second type of abuse distinguished by the author arises through unfavorable economic effects. Did the unemployment compensation program retard postwar conversion by fostering idleness? The conclusion reached is that limiting benefit payments by a stricter disqualification program could not have raised the level of employment significantly. During this period labor force participation was above normal and unemployment never quite reached 5 per cent.

Since the amount of security society is willing to furnish its members is in large part conditioned by fears of abuse, a study such as this is especially useful as a guide for legislators and as a means for promoting informed public opinion not only as to the facts in regard to abuse, but also as to the nature of the problem.

A. MORGNER

Texas Agricultural & Mechanical College

SMUTS, ROBERT W. European Impressions of the American Worker. Pp. ix, 62. New York: King's Crown Press, 1953. $1.50.

This slender monograph, the first of a series, inaugurates the Human Resources Studies of the Graduate School of Business of Columbia University. The series is intended to present the preliminary findings of the University's expanding studies in the early 1930's and formalized as a project by General Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the University, in 1950.

The study summarizes the key changes that have taken place in the position of the American workers since 1890. The first chapter looks at the American worker through the eyes of European visitors between 1885 and 1910. The second chapter is based on the reports of British Productivity Teams which have studied American industry in the last few years.

Socialists like H. G. Wells and Werner Sombart found that in the most advanced capitalist nations of the world Marxian theory called for a most militant socialist movement. Actually, as Sombart said, "There is no socialism among the American laboring class and those who are called socialists are really a handful of bankrupt Germans with no following."

The most striking result of the series of viewpoints collected by Mr. Smuts is that the foreign descriptions of work and workers in the United States in 1890 and in 1950 bear such a close resemblance. Sombart found that the American worker was not antagonistic to the capitalist system as such. And sixty years later the British Productivity Teams reported that they were impressed by the same values that had been noticed by the visitors in 1890. Then, as now, Europeans were impressed with the middle-class living standards of American workers and the high productivity which made such standards possible.

Sixty years ago the Europeans were as much taken with American mechanization and simplification of work as they were in 1950. One cannot help but ask: "Why, then, has there not been a greater change in European production methods during that period?" Perhaps the answer is already implicit in the European class viewpoints and the differing attitudes towards work that the Europeans take more or less for granted.

Mr. Smuts points out, however, that in one major respect the reports of both sets of visitors have differed strikingly. This has been their observation on the role of the trade unions. Few of the earlier arrivals dealt with the subject of the unions, but the Productivity Teams found it impossible to discuss most aspects of American industry without describing the role of the unions. Thus, the growth of union power in the United States has appeared in European eyes to be accounted for by the acceptance of change on the part of trade unions, and this has helped lead to our improved social and industrial civilization.

Mr. Smuts has done an excellent job in selecting and particularly in compressing his materials. His conclusions are thought-provoking and should interest all who may be concerned with labor and trade union developments.

LOUIS STARK

New York Times

Fundamentals of Labor Peace: A Final Report by the Committee on the Causes of Industrial Peace Under Collective Bargaining of the National Planning Association. Case Study 14. Pp. viii, 119. Washington, D. C.: National Planning Association, 1953. $1.00.

If wide distribution and a happy reception are to be taken as indicators that a study has served an important purpose and has filled a need, certainly this can be said of these studies in the Causes of Industrial Peace. Industrial plants, unions, colleges, and universities, here and abroad, are putting them to use, in discussion groups, classes, and for reference purposes.

The reasons for their success, apart from the timeliness and the broad interest in the subject, are the high quality of the studies, their factual approach, and the succinctness of their conclusions. This is no less true of this Final Report. Here is brought together a review of each study, general conclusions derived from the entire series, warnings about their limitations, and suggestions for further investigations. This Final Report should be one of the most useful of the entire series.

Within this broad area, which deals with authority and freedom, obligations and production, the series has centered upon the readily observable causes of industrial peace. The most noteworthy point about the studies—their strength and also their weakness—is that they have dealt with these broad concepts factually, just as relations between the parties have worked out in practice, and they have not attempted to explore the numerous problems that lie behind plant relations. Take, for instance, the point of management acceptance of the union. Very frequently, this attitude was born during the days of the Wagner Act. But during this period, as we all know, many powerful employers' associations were insisting upon either no recognition of the unions, or, if the government was adamant, at the most, arms-length bargaining. Nevertheless, many managements, as is clear in these studies, did not listen to this advice, and not only gave a clear recognition to the union, but acknowledged the right of the union to share in many aspects of plant operation that affected the welfare of its members. Why did these managements take this attitude?

Many similar questions that concern not only the attitudes of management, but the rights and obligations of union officers and members, as well as variations in production in the different stages of union-management relations, are a part of the story of industrial peace. For these, and other investigations suggested in this Report, we shall have to await succeeding studies.

FREDERICK L. RYAN

San Diego State College

PURCELL, THEODORE V. The Worker Speaks His Mind on Company and Union. Pp. xix, 344. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $6.00.

Packington, a short distance from Chicago's central business district, is the scene of this study, and the principals involved are Swift & Company and Local 28 of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) United Packinghouse Workers of America. This plan, typical of America's mass production industries, with its polyglot labor force, is the real object of investigation. The book is about the people in this union—their thoughts concerning their work, their company, their union, their pay, their hopes, their fears, their aspirations, their loyalties and their general problems of existence. This is an industrial community of some 6,000 men and women, employed by an old, efficient, and progressive firm. Company and union sanctioned the inquiry and co-operated generously in its execution.

Conducted through the technique of personal interviews, a considerable number of which are reproduced in the text, the study employs skillfully the well-established case method. There is a detailed survey of the whole complex gamut of human relations in a large and dynamic industrial plant, from managerial policies and attitudes to union practices and methods. Appendixes present additional information and statistical data. Photographs illustrate functional aspects of the plant. There is a thoughtful Foreword by Professor Sumner H. Slichter.

SOCIOLOGY AND EDUCATION

KALLMANN, FRANZ J. Heredity in Health and Mental Disorder: Principles of Psychiatric Genetics in the Light of Comparative Twin Studies. Pp. 315. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1953. $6.00.

No more fascinating research in the human sciences is being carried on than Dr. Franz J. Kallmann's studies of twins. In this book he reports his most recent findings regarding the role of heredity in mental afflictions and various other disorders, and offers constructive suggestions for applying this knowledge. Scores of arresting photographs illustrate the text; and even the most environmentally-oriented skeptic may be hard pressed to argue that the amazing likenesses of the identical twins depicted, persisting through life—in some shown, up to age 95—are not evidence of a genetic pattern of development which may extend also to functional traits.

Basing much of his evidence on the extent to which given psychoses afflict both members of monozygotic ("one-egg," or "identical") twin pairs far more often than they do the dizygotic ("two-egg," or "fraternal") twins, Dr. Kallmann helps greatly to strengthen the belief that hereditary predispositional factors are involved in perhaps most of the common mental disorders. At the same time, the fact that in a certain proportion of cases (about 15 per cent with respect to schizophrenia), one member of a monozygotic pair does not become psychotic whereas the other does, shows clearly that heredity is by no means the sole determinant. Here Dr. Kallmann develops the theory, gaining acceptance among psychiatrists and geneticists alike, that in all complex behavioral conditions genetic tendencies are balanced against environmental influences, and a marked "imbalance" in one direction or another can lead to the disorganization or derangement of vital processes and functions. With a strong genetic push in an unfavorable environment, both members of a monozygotic pair may become similarly psychotic; with

From the detailed analysis there emerge certain fundamental principles, previously established in similar studies, but more adequately defined and supported here. A careful reading of the book quickly reveals the central importance of job protection and status, adequate wages, reasonable hours of work, pleasant and healthful physical environment, racial prejudice and discrimination, nepotism and favoritism, security and seniority, intelligent foremanship, and generally enlightened personnel policies and practices.

The author is firmly of the opinion that in industrial organization, as elsewhere, functional lines should be clearly defined. In his judgment, there is a sound principle of social philosophy which declares that a larger group should not seize for itself functions that can be just as well or better performed by a small group. This is the principle of "subsidiarity," apparently quite generally accepted in Roman Catholic social theory. Father Purcell states: "It is a major conclusion of this book that the principle of subsidiarity must be applied in our American mass-production economy to the industrial plant community" (p. 262). The Chicago Swift-UPWA plant community seems not to have been absorbed or destroyed by the power-centers under which it functions, that is, the corporation and the international union. Rather, sufficient autonomy is enjoyed to assure the well-being and safeguard the interests of all concerned. This significant role of the industrial plant community Father Purcell would jealously protect and preserve.

The whole study is clearly conceived and efficiently executed, reflecting adherence to the best traditions of scientific research in the field of industrial relations. The book is a valuable addition to the literature of industrial psychology and labor economics, and will richly repay thoughtful reading by the representatives of management and of labor as well as by the specialist in personnel management and labor relations.

GORDON S. WATKINS

University of California
Riverside

a minimal genetic predisposition, environmental stress confined to one twin may cause only him to become afflicted. The principle is extended to many other conditions, including epilepsy and various convulsive disorders.

Open to special debate may be Dr. Kallmann's discussion of hereditary factors in homosexuality, the supporting evidence he offers of the remarkable concordance of this behavior in identical twins, and his hypothesis (pp. 118) that there may be a "gene-controlled disarrangement in the balance between male and female maturation tendencies," which may support the old "intersexuality" theory as accounting for certain types of overt homosexuals. Suicide, however, Dr. Kallmann finds highly unlikely to occur in both members of an "identical" pair, thus refuting the belief that suicide may be genetically predestined.

Dr. Kallmann devotes a good part of his book to the practical and constructive application of findings in the field of medical genetics, and puts the aims of this new science in sensible perspective. In this respect, particularly, his discussion is a long step away from the views and proposals of the early fanatical eugenisists. Altogether, this book will offer much useful enlightenment and profit to social scientists, medical men, and serious-minded laymen alike.

AMRAM SCHEINFELD

New York City

GERTH, HANS, and C. WRIGHT MILLS. Character and Social Structure: The Psychology of Social Institutions. Pp. xxi, 490. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1953. $6.00.

This book is designed "to bridge the departmentalized gap which unfortunately separates the sociological and psychological approaches" to an understanding of "the personalities of men in connection with types of social-historical structure" (p. xiv). Within this frame of reference, the authors build their bridge with concepts, assumptions, terms, and assertions culled from many authorities and societies. The principal borrowings, on the psychological side, have been from Sigmund Freud and George H. Mead; Karl Marx and Max Weber have been used most freely on the "structural-historical" side. The ideas of these men, along with those of many others, have been woven into "models" of character structure and social structure to enable the reader to "understand man as an historical actor" (p. xix).

Four "key" concepts are utilized to build the character structure model: the human organism, as a biological entity; "psychic structures," such as feeling, sensation, impulse; the person, as a social actor; and character, as the totality of the individual. The social structure "model" is built around the "key" concepts of role, institution, institutional order, and institutional spheres. The human organism's ability to learn roles provided him by his society ties the character structure model to the social structure model. Thus, the gap between the psychological and the sociological approaches to social psychology is bridged. The authors' theoretical ideas outlined above, are developed in the three substantive parts of the book: Character Structure; Social Structure, and Dynamics.

The several parts of the theoretical argument are integrated one with another in such a way that they are suggestive to the thoughtful reader. However, the materials used to illustrate abstract points are fragmentary; often only a phrase, or a sentence, torn out of its social and historical context, is relied upon to make a point. This method of presentation may confuse the general reader. It will not satisfy the critical professional reader who expects an author to present data to support his argument.

Although the book was written as a general text in social psychology, with the tacit hope apparently that it would be used in both sociology and psychology departments, this reviewer does not foresee widespread adoptions because of the abstract nature of the argument and the shotgun technique used to illustrate it. This will be unfortunate, for the theoretical orientation has merit. The authors have shown imagination in their use of concepts and in the way they have fitted them together. The weakness in the bridge they have built between individual character and social structure is the lack of data to fuse the parts into a whole. Until such data is added the theoretical structure is in danger of falling into the chasm it was designed to span.

AUGUST B. HOLLINGSHEAD
Yale University

SHERIF, MUZAFAER, and M. O. WILSON (Eds.). Group Relations at the Crossroads. Pp. viii, 379. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953. $4.00.

After the pattern of its predecessor, Social Psychology at the Crossroads (Rohrer and Sherif, 1951), this volume presents thirteen lectures on problems of human relations within and between groups, lectures first given in April 1952 at the Second University of Oklahoma Conference in Social Psychology. These rather disparate papers, succinctly summarized by Sherif in an admirable introductory chapter, range widely over a broad and active research front that cuts across a number of social science disciplines. However, several recurrent themes may be singled out for brief comment.

The subtle and pervasive influences of the group in shaping the perceptions, attitudes, and aspirations, as well as the social behavior of its members, and the fact that basic phenomena of group relations underlie in a significant way human behavior within such institutional frameworks as economics, politics, and the law are two readily discernible motifs. The former is well documented in Anastasi's discussion of group differences in psychological characteristics, in Gardner Murphy's paper on the dynamics of social perception, in Jennings' treatment of sociometric structure in personality and group formation, and most notably in Sherif's contribution on the concept of reference groups which he defines as "those groups to which the individual relates himself or to which he aspires to relate himself as a part psychologically" (p. 20). The latter is implicit in Festinger's analysis of complaint behavior and in the discussion of public opinion and collective behavior by Nelson Foote and Clyde Hart.

The role of symbolic communication in group relations is a third recurrent topic. The process of word-making is given central importance in Gibson's nine-step statement of a theory of perception, and Anselm Strauss makes the telling point that the constitution of any human group is a symbolic, not a physical fact. J. P. Scott, a student of animal behavior, in a tempered paper on the implications of in-frahuman social behavior for problems of human relations, sees language as crucial in raising human society to a new level of integration. Scott's summary of the present status of research on animal behavior will be of special interest to social scientists since it reviews much material not readily accessible to them.

Finally, mention must be made of the convergent interest of psychologists and sociologists in the experimental study of small groups. Robert E. L. Faris' paper on this lively research movement stresses the sociological contribution, emphasizing that discipline's traditional concern with the primary group. Launor Carter places leadership squarely in the context of group behavior in an incisive paper that draws extensively on the careful experimental work he and his collaborators have conducted at the University of Rochester over the past several years.

In short, this is an important and richly loaded book that will amply repay close study by both specialists and generalists in the study of human affairs.

JOSEPH B. CASAGRANDE
Social Science Research Council
Washington, D. C.

MADGE, JOHN. The Tools of Social Science. Pp. x, 308. New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1953. $4.75.

During the last three years there have appeared at least half a dozen treatises (including several two-volume works) on the subject of the book under review. The author has apparently not had access to this new and important material. Furthermore, at least in one case, he quotes repeatedly from the first edition of a work, a revised edition of which has been available for over ten years. Accordingly, his book gives a certain impression of being already out of date. The fact is that developments in methods of social research in the last decade have been so extensive that no one person is likely to be expert on the various specialized tools involved. The present attempt to cover in three hundred pages the large and difficult field denoted by the title necessarily results in dealing sketchily with most subjects and omitting others entirely.

The book opens with a section on the relation of language and logic to social research methods. It continues with considerations of (Chapter 2) the use of documents, and (Chapter 3) the problems of observation in social sciences. The fourth chapter, occupying more than one-third of the whole volume, is devoted to various aspects of interviewing, including a brief treatment (nine pages) of sampling. A fifth chapter deals with experimentation in social sciences. A brief concluding chapter on "The Limits of Social Science" concludes the book. The bibliography lacks important recent items, most of them perhaps too recent to have come to the author's attention. There is a brief subject index. The treatment throughout is elementary and admirably clear.

The author is modest and cautious in his estimate of the different techniques with which he deals, as well as in his estimate of the prospects of social science in general. This attitude, while in itself admirable, causes him occasionally to fall back upon familiar platitudes which have a reassuring sound but have little else to be said for them. Thus, it is piously asserted that: "He [the social scientist] is a person who is elaborating a special kind of skill, but above all he is a human being, and no one but he can decide whether his skills, both in their application and in their consequences, are to be used for evil or good" (p. 294; italics are the reviewer's). Alas, many scientists today are engaged in solving technical problems, the practical application of which they do not even know. Under these circumstances, they can hardly be expected to influence greatly either the application or the consequences of their scientific work. Once scientific knowledge is published, the scientist's control of application and consequences is gone, except as his influence as one citizen can move the community. In any event, we see about us on every hand applications of scientific knowledge which the authors of the knowledge could never have dreamed of, or controlled.

But the author of the eloquent sentence quoted need not feel too badly about it, for it will be much applauded as a wishful thought. Indeed, one American reviewer (Alfred M. Lee, Social Forces, Dec. 1953) has already singled it out for special praise! The inability to distinguish between science and engineering, between sociology and social work, reform, pressure group activity, and other activities is still common among social scientists.

GEORGE A. LUNDBERG

University of Washington, Seattle

ANDREWS, F. EMERSON. Attitudes Toward Giving. Pp. 145. New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 1953. $2.00.

Few Americans would be surprised to be told that the partnership of "death and taxes" has been joined by a third member, namely, philanthropic fund raising. For the certainty of monthly campaigns for health and welfare purposes has become as solid as either of these two. Most people, in fact, have become intimately familiar with campaign techniques—and have rather firm reactions to many of them. Housewives, factory and office workers, and even the street trades are in virtually daily contact with the ubiquitous solicitor for organized charity.

It would not surprise us, therefore, if Mr. Andrews' latest book outsold many temporarily better known nonfictional entries in the 1953-54 competition for reader interest. For his review of "Attitudes Toward Giving" is chock full of interesting information about what some of us think of the charity-solicitation situation.

The Russell Sage Foundation commissioned the National Opinion Research Center to get the answers to some of the following questions: What are the present motives of givers? Does giving spring from sympathy for a suffering fellow-man, or from a desire to be superior? Do people deeply wish to leave the world a better place, or just want to escape being thought a "piker?" How far does the social group determine the giving pattern? What sort of people give, and how much, and why?

Despite the technical difficulty of securing reliable answers to these questions, the Research Center staff and Mr. Andrews have produced a documented study of considerable importance and interest. As Mr. Andrews says, "[the study,] though statistically unreliable, constitutes a revealing commentary on attitudes of some givers toward welfare agencies, problems, and fund-raising methods. . . . Persons experienced in this field [can] build on them useful hypotheses for later testing by perhaps other methods."

Few aspects of life in the United States are more fundamental to "our way" than the nation-wide network of voluntary health and welfare agencies. If they are to survive, their fund-raising methods must reflect both the most scientific and the most acceptable techniques of solicitation. Attitudes Toward Giving is not the final piece of research needed to insure this important objective, but it is a substantial contribution to it.

The book is virtually a "must" for professional welfare workers in voluntary agencies. But the giver himself should not pass it up. If he enjoys reports from the Gallup Poll, he will like this one. He will at least find he has plenty of company in his confusion over the multiplicity of health and welfare appeals coming his way this year and next. He will also secure some helpful hints on how he can be sure his contribution will be well used.

A. DAVID BOUTERSE

Pennsylvania Citizens Association
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

KAHN, ALFRED J. A Court for Children. Pp. xxii, 359. New York: Columbia University Press, 1953. $4.50.

This volume represents a three-year study of the New York City Children's Court under the auspices of the Citizens' Committee on Children of New York City, Inc. In the press release, dated October 15, 1953, this committee states: ". . . only a minority of the 7,000 children who appear before it each year are served with both 'kindness and skill.'" Further, in the same release, the committee "... called upon civic groups and public officials for action to provide the Court with the personnel and services necessary for the adequate performance of its task."

To a reader who is not familiar with the Juvenile Courts in our country these are shocking statements. It would be natural for him to criticize and berate those who are responsible for permitting such conditions to exist. Caution must be extended before condemnation. He must seek the answers to such questions as: What are the conditions in the Juvenile Court in his city or county? Are all the children who come before these Courts handled with "kindness and skill?" Does the Court have the necessary tools, such as physical facilities, probation officers, and clinical staff, to provide adequate services? Has his state fulfilled its responsibility in providing the necessary institutions? Are the social agencies, private and public, coordinated in their services so that they represent resources for the Court? Are the citizens informed and interested in their Juvenile Courts?

In the early chapters Dr. Kahn stresses that the Court is frequently the last resort agency. This places a pressure problem upon Courts dealing with children. Intake, disposition, and treatment must be considered in all cases, and there is no latitude comparable to that which exists in agencies with restricted intake. Dr. Kahn points out the importance of the role of the judge sitting in Juvenile Court and the inter-relationship between the probation officer and the child. Throughout the book, the need and use of clinical services are emphasized as they relate to the work of the probation department and the decisions made by the Court. The necessity of supporting services by private agencies and the unmet needs are outlined.

The Citizens' Committee, President Judge, and the Court officials are to be complimented upon making the study and publishing this book. It is a good example of American Democracy in action. The volume contains recommendations for the improvement of the New York City Children's Court, as well as many observations and principles of good practice that should help judges and citizens in other localities improve their Courts.

E. PRESTON SHARP

Youth Study Center
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

WOYTINSKY, W. S., and E. S. WOYTINSKY.
World Population and Production: Trends and Outlook. Pp. lxxii, 1268.
New York: The Twentieth Century Fund, 1953. $12.00.

The purpose of this monumental study is to survey briefly: (a) the numbers, the distribution, the characteristics, and the probable growth of the population of the world; (b) to make an inventory of the resources available to man; (c) to indicate the uses he is making of these resources; and (d) to show how he may conserve them. This survey is intended to assist in providing an answer to some such question as: Is production likely not only to keep up with population growth during the next few decades but to surpass it to such an extent that the level of living of the great majority of the people of the world can be raised well above that now prevailing?

Obviously, even such a heavy tome can only touch these matters lightly and in terms altogether too general to be satisfactory to the student although the lay reader will find it both interesting and helpful. Its great value lies in presenting the vast problem of man's relation to his resources in a clear and understandable form rather than in providing answers to the thousands of specific questions the student would like to ask about the volume and the variety of the resources, the uses being made of them and the problems involved in effecting their better use by the peoples of a hundred areas and countries.

The assembling and organizing of such a vast amount of material relating to the supply of arable land, the carrying capacity of the earth, the world's reserves of minerals, the uses being made of these resources, and the outlook for the increase of particular products (such as grains, fish, animal products, coal, and oil) is very valuable. It commands great admiration on the part of the reviewer both for the vast labor involved and the calm and scientific attitude manifested in presenting the data.

As a compendium of information introducing the layman to the study of the relation of man to his resources the reviewer considers this a most excellent piece of work. As an interpretation of the role science and engineering can be expected to play in the development of the economy of the underdeveloped areas and their probable effects on human welfare within the next few decades, it seems to him to leave much to be desired. It suffers in this respect from the failure to evaluate in realistic terms the length of time it will take these underdeveloped peoples to put our "know-how" of production into operation and likewise to realize how a more rapid increase in production will affect their rate of population growth. Because of these shortcomings the reviewer fears that it will leave the average reader with quite an erroneous impression that population pressure will be of little significance to mankind in organizing his efforts for better living in the foreseeable future.

WARREN S. THOMPSON

Scripps Foundation
Miami University

LOOMIS, CHARLES, P., ET AL. Rural Social Systems and Adult Education. Pp. viii, 392. East Lansing: Michigan State College Press, 1953. $5.00.

This study attempts "to describe the nature and functioning of systems as well as the channels of communication which provide the information and attitudes governing the actions of men. . . . For the first time in the social sciences the linkages of these systems and the manner in which programs and information funnel through them to reach the individual are described."

The volume concentrates on adult education in rural America, that is, in places of less than 2,500 population. (The sample consisted of 263 counties from the major farming areas of the nation.) It seeks to understand "how various organizations use mass media, the use made of various program 'forms,' such as public meetings, conferences, workshops, demonstrations, institutes, tours, and radio listening groups."

Different specialists deal with adult education in the public schools, the Cooperative Extension Service of the United States, the educational efforts of the general farmers' organizations and the co-operatives (Grange, Farm Bureau, and Farmers' Union), the services of the professional and civic clubs (Rotary, Kiwanis and others), the role of the public libraries and the churches. Nowhere can one find in a single volume the overall picture of rural education given in this series of contributions. The wealth of material is almost staggering.

The several contributors are cautious in their conclusions regarding the best organizational procedure with which to carry on community projects and educational activities. It is highly important to understand precisely how the informal relationships are geared to the formal organizations. Who are the leaders? How many formal organizations do they influence? How do they wield influence? How much propaganda is present, and for whose interests? How do various formal structures tie in with each other (church and school and civic club, for example)? These phenomena were not investigated in these studies and yet these data are important for the understanding of how communication takes place and how change may be introduced.

The authors agree that the leaders involved in adult education in rural America need professional training and experience in rural life, the social sciences, and adult education. The reviewer feels this is the keystone of the complicated program of rural adult education, as it is of any educational program. The different kinds of leaders in the various public, private, and religious agencies involved in rural adult education do not seem to have a clear understanding of their own function, of their educational philosophy, or even of the meaning of education. Indeed, the chief limitation of this exceedingly valuable study is the lack of clarity in what passes for rural "education." The inquiry, by design, was limited to three areas, strengthening of democracy, and understanding and strengthening of the economy. Much, if not most, of the effort of the agencies and organizations described in the study as relating to these areas can be considered educational only by grace of language.

It should be added that this is no reflection on the competence of the contributors. It reflects, rather, the complex, loose, unclarified, and relatively unsystematic nature of our rural adult education.

NATHANIEL CANTOR

University of Buffalo

STORR, RICHARD J. The Beginnings of Graduate Education in America. Pp. ix, 195. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953. No price.

Professor Richard J. Storr of the University of Chicago offers an account of the history of graduate education prior to the founding of Johns Hopkins in his The Beginnings of Graduate Education in America. His book describes the gradual transformation in objectives and organization occurring in our institutions of higher learning during the years 1787 to 1865.

Looked at superficially, Professor Storr's work is an account of failure. Jefferson's hopes for the University of Virginia were not all realized within his time; Ticknor's proposals for the reform of Harvard College in the 1820's fell afoul of faculty conservatism and shortage of funds; the Yale faculty of 1828 was dead against "that deluge of innovation and would-be improvements in doctrine, discipline and pursuits which is sweeping over the rest of the Country"; three grand programs for great universities in New York City came to naught within a few years of their conception or founding; the Smithsonian funds went for other purposes than the founding of a national university; while other ventures at Western Reserve, Harvard, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Union College, and the University of the South either petered out, were frozen out, were damaged in internal University controversy, or were lost in the chaos of the Civil War. Offsetting these losses were a few gains, of which the most memorable, perhaps, was the founding of the Department of Philosophy and the Arts at Yale University, the registration of students in that Department in 1852, the offering of the Ph.D. degree in 1860, and the beginning of an uninterrupted history of the conferring of that degree at Yale, with the first doctorate in 1861.

So much for the ostensible losses and gains; the story is somewhat different if looked at with the modest expectations of the historian. It is clear now that during these years was emerging a consciousness of the pressure of advancing knowledge, an awareness of the gulf separating American and European (particularly German) institutions, insight into the need for the financial support of advanced students, a perception of the difference between the spirit of the gymnasium (using the word in its German meaning) and the proper spirit of the liberal arts, and a crystallization of the competing objectives of graduate work—the further cultivation of the intellect as an end in itself, and the furnishing of professional education for career instructors. In the development of these awarenesses many men participated, of whom especial note is taken of George Ticknor of Harvard, Alexander Dallas Bache of the United States Coastal Survey, Henry P. Tappan of New York and the University of Michigan, and that association of scientists comprising Pierce, Agassiz, Gould, Whitney, Hall, and Gibbs, among others, known as the Scientific Lazzaroni. In their efforts to promote graduate education, all knew their failures, some of them bitter, but after their work was concluded, as Professor Storr notes, President Gilman of Johns Hopkins could say at his inauguration on February 22, 1876: "We begin our work after costly ventures of which we reap the lessons, while others bear the loss."

MALCOLM G. PRESTON
University of Pennsylvania

OTTAWAY, A. K. C. Education and Society: An Introduction to the Sociology of Education. Pp. xii, 182. New York: Grove Press, 1954 (first published in London by Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1953), 1954. No price.

Apparently consideration of the sociology of education from an English point of view has been neglected until quite recently. The British have relied chiefly on publications of United States authors whose general conclusions seem to have been found acceptable but whose detail has not been entirely applicable to the English social landscape. Moreover, as the writer of the introduction to the book under review suggests, there is always room for a clear presentation of the problems of society undefiled by the jargon and verbal infelicities with which some schools of thought have cluttered up our vocabulary.

The International Library of Sociology and Social Reconstruction, founded by the late Karl Mannheim and dedicated to the study of society and to contemporary social problems on an international scale, sponsors this book. The volume is described as the first general introduction to the study to be written entirely from an English point of view. The author, a former science teacher, is at present a lecturer in education at the University of Leeds.

The audience at which the book is specifically directed includes teachers at all levels of education and students preparing for the teaching profession. The aims, methods, institutions, and administration of education are examined in light of the economic, political, social, and cultural forces at work in England. Most of the book is written from the point of view of a reasonably objective sociologist. Only in the final chapter does the author consciously assume the role of social philosopher. There he describes the kind of democratic society toward which he would like to see education guide and be guided.

American readers will probably be most interested in the chapters devoted to the social determinants of education in England and to the educational needs of England in the second half of the twentieth century. Comparisons between U. S. and British educational systems are interesting, enlightening, and frequently provocative. For example: "Obviously average standards in the universities of the U. S. A. tend to be lower than in this country, but the conception of university education is different, and the better students all proceed to higher degrees so that the first degree does not count for so much as ours." U. S. plans to increase the common intellectual and social experience of the population "take our breath away." "The problem of specialization . . . has been solved in America; it is postponed to the university stage. They can afford in their High Schools to spend more time in learning less" (pp. 96-97).

Students of comparative education should find this book valuable. Educators who are not familiar with the literature in educational sociology will find the text informative and the annotated bibliography covering the leading references in the field since John Dewey's first publications helpful.

CLAUDE E. HAWLEY
Washington, D. C.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

NIEBUHR, REINHOLD. Christian Realism and Political Problems: Essays on Political, Ethical, and Theological Themes. Pp. 203. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1953. $3.00.

In this volume Niebuhr examines a number of seemingly heterogeneous problems, the contents of which are subtly interrelated. Methodological themes of social science are judiciously interwoven with incisive analyses of the phenomena of power and human egotism. Through it all shines more clearly than through any previous book of the author the mature judgment of a mind which accomplished the rare feat of balancing liberal elements of thought and true conservatism. American conservatism, Niebuhr reasons, could not come to terms with responsibilities which the growing power of this youthful nation involved. The failure of American conservatism is the more remarkable because traditional European conservatism understands the hazards and responsibilities of foreign policy better than does traditional liberalism. European conservatism knows the relations of the nations "to be governed by power factors, to which the liberal mind is usually oblivious." While liberal minds are inclined to project overly comprehensive plans into the future, European conservatives have, through centuries-long experience, been accustomed to the "limited possibilities and short range plans to which the caprices of international relations must reconcile a wise statesman."

In examining the causes of the curious defect of American conservatism, Niebuhr comes up with what he himself calls a sweeping generalization: American conservatism is not conservative at all in the traditional sense; "it is a part of the traditional liberal movement and it exhibits the defects of its creed; but it has not retained many of its virtues." The liberal creed is the product of the bourgeois class. Americans are "a more consistently bourgeois nation than any other," and the many varieties of their political programs are centered in the liberal ethos with such a high degree of unanimity that the term "liberal" has become almost meaningless as a term of distinction.

Our conservatives are conservative only in the sense that they resist social innovation. The business community selected for obvious reasons that part of the liberal philosophy which was drawn from the physiocratic theory and from the ideas of Adam Smith, and which proclaimed the greatest possible freedom of human initiative from state control. Not by mere chance was Britain able to turn toward an "authentic conservative in the hour of peril" while our nation had to turn toward a liberal for leadership in a real national crisis. It was very apparent that only a small fraction of the Republican leaders assessed our position and perils correctly. The business community did not understand the total complex of forces which go into the making of world politics. The liberals of the Roosevelt type, with all their weaknesses in foreign policy, at least were "genuinely internationalist in outlook." In the case of Wilson, the internationalist outlook was devoid of appreciation of the power elements in international relations. "Roosevelt's realism corrected this fault; but both Roosevelt and Wilson were inclined to defy one of the canons of a wise conservatism which restricts policy to limited and foreseeable ends." Even Roosevelt shared the "modern liberal's" penchant for too wide and too sweeping objectives.

The consequent problem arises as to how to generate the practical wisdom of true conservatism without at the same time "losing the humane virtues which the liberal movement developed." Commercial "conservatism" pure and simple tends to create abstract systems of thought which are no less distant from the complex realities of world politics than the systems of the professional theorists, the "ideologues," whom the "men of affairs" despise because they "have never met a payroll." True conservatism is the product of experience which includes all the problems of man's collective life. It is not merely concerned with economic problems. In part at least, true conservatism, according to Niebuhr, is the product of a realistic Christian approach to "the perennial facts of human nature." Whether we win it or not therefore depends on the addition of some measure of Christian humility "to the compound which must serve us as wisdom."

LUDWIG FREUND

Roosevelt College

RAVEN, CHARLES E. Natural Religion and Christian Theology. Vol. II: Experience and Interpretation. Pp. vii, 227. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1953. $4.00.

This is the second volume of the Gifford Lectures at Edinburgh, 1951-52, by Canon Raven, Regius Professor of Divinity, Emeritus, at the University of Cambridge, a scholar who has earned distinction as biologist and philosopher as well as theologian. The first volume was on the topic of Science and Religion. The present volume continues, in the same empirical spirit, to analyze the nature of religious experience and from it to develop an examination and reinterpretation of Christian Theism in Liberal Protestant terms.

The basis of religious experience he finds in the sense of wonder at the mystery of the universe and of self-consciousness at our isolation from it. Man in attaining his self-consciousness encounters the universe and recognizes it as other and alien. His recognition of the mystery and wonder and fear associated with it disclose to him his individuality. This encounter with the infinite is characterized by amazement, adoration, rapture, dread, ecstasy, a sense of communion, abasement, and a consciousness of need and of obligation. It has the distinctive quality of contact with a personal or superpersonal reality. This experience is not confined to saints and mystics. "Most normal people will at some time in their lives have known something not very dissimilar" (p. 45). But the religious mind dwells upon it, cultivates it, and seeks to understand its meaning. It is the argument of these lectures that "The experience is emphatically not to be explained in lower than personal categories. . . . A universe which contains the personal must not be interpreted on a lower scale" (p. 58).

Canon Raven does not claim that his argument for an organismic Theism, as interpretation of the universe thus disclosed, can do more than give reasonable support to a faith which is willing thus to interpret it; and he finds the principal stimulus to that faith in the historic personality of Jesus. In the view of the present writer, however, he does not succeed in making the transition from the primarily aesthetic character of religious experience as he analyzes it to the primarily moral character of that which the Christian finds religiously convincing in the personality of Jesus. He follows Augustine in holding that the sense of sin requires a prior awareness of God (p. 24). Yet how could God be thought of as a moral being unless man had first felt the constraint of "the moral law within"? Surely, as John Baillie so cogently argues in The Interpretation of Religion, and as William James showed in his studies of religious conversion, man's conviction of the existence of a moral power beyond him arises from his experience of the constraining and uplifting influence of a moral power within.

A. CAMPBELL GARNETT

University of Wisconsin

BAINTON, ROLAND H. Hunted Heretic: The Life and Death of Michael Servetus, 1511-1553. Pp. xii, 270. Boston: Beacon Press, 1953. $3.75.

With admirable directness of style and manner Professor Bainton tells the story of the remarkable Servetus, a figure whose career baffled his contemporaries as it does us. He is recalled largely for the role he played in the career of Calvin, yet he stands on his own feet as a man of importance and distinction. The sixteenth century produced more than its share of men with many-sided accomplishments and into this company Servetus fits easily. A Spaniard, a Catholic by birth, he lived a hunted life to the full. Like his Protestant contemporaries he came early in his career to question papal claims and necessarily left service he had taken in the imperial court. His attacks on orthodox views on the Trinity aroused antipathy in Catholic, Protestant and humanistic circles.

By 1532 Servetus was in Paris, living under the name of Michel de Villeneuve, a pseudonym derived from Villanueva, the Spanish hamlet of his birth. With royal and inquisitorial authorities on the watch for him, Servetus nevertheless continued his studies in Paris and, in order to support himself, became corrector and editor for a publishing firm. In this capacity he found opportunity to indulge his humanistic interests. Certainly one of the most engaging parts of his work was his activity in the field of medicine. Although he remained under the influence of Galen and "did not attain an understanding of the circulation of the blood through the body," he did, however, give "an accurate delineation of the course of the blood in the heart and lungs. His first correction of Galen was the result of dissection." For him scientific knowledge could also lead to greater knowledge of God.

The dramatic climax of Servetus' life story comes, of course, with the writing of the tract on The Restoration of Christianity, dissemination of his contentions, and the violent reaction to them, especially in Geneva circles, which led ultimately to his death at the stake in 1553. In connection with this tragic affair Calvin has had many apologists. Professor Bainton is not one of them and he clearly shows Calvin's questionable position. Professor Bainton has told his story well and again demonstrates his pre-eminent qualities as historian, biographer, and writer. Although he writes of the sixteenth century, his pages offer a constant challenge as we face modern problems and should make us ponder long his concluding admonition that "the story of Calvin and Servetus should demonstrate for us that our slogans of liberty need continually to be thought through afresh."

GRAY C. BOYCE

Northwestern University

EDWARDS, JONATHAN. Puritan Sage: Collected writings of Jonathan Edwards. Edited by Vergilius Ferm. Pp. xxvii, 640. New York: Library Publishers, 1953. $7.50.

Jonathan Edwards was born 250 years ago last October 5, and this volume is a commemorative tribute to his memory. The standard edition of the published works of Jonathan Edwards fills ten volumes, and there are also numerous unpublished manuscripts. This volume therefore is of necessity made up of selections from the voluminous literary remains of this most erudite colonial American. It will be surprising to the many who think of Jonathan Edwards as primarily a theologian and a philosopher to learn that his earliest interest was in natural science. And appropriately the early chapters in this volume are devoted to this interest. The first chapter is entitled "Of Insects," which he wrote at the age of twelve, while chapter two is entitled "Of the Rainbow"; the third chapter is "Notes on Natural Science," in which his observations are illustrated by carefully executed drawings.

The second series of chapters have to do with the New England Revival and are introduced by Edward's "Faithful Narrative of Surprising Conversions," followed by five of his revival treatises, the last being "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," which is generally assumed to have been typical of his revival preaching, though it was not. "Some Thoughts Concerning the Revival" and the "Treatise Concerning Religious Affections" have, as Dean Sperry states, a "curious modernity" and are based upon Edwards' observation of what he thought he saw taking place in his converts, and in a real sense these treatises may be considered the forerunner of what is now called the Psychology of Religion.

The treatise for which Jonathan Edwards is most widely known is his "Freedom of the Will," which is chapter XXI of the present volume. It marks the culmination of his long controversy with Arminianism and with the advocates of Free Will. It is a masterpiece of subtle and sustained logic, characterized by McGiffert as "one of the most notable Museum pieces" of historical Christian thought. John Wesley, himself no mean logician, was accustomed to say "you cannot reason concerning spiritual things."

For 20 years Jonathan Edwards was the minister of the Northampton Church, and until George Whitfield jarred him out of his old ways he was a manuscript preacher, which partially explains the quantities of manuscripts he left behind. He was never a revivalist in the usual sense; he did not preach primarily on terrifying themes, as is often erroneously thought. He was always quiet spoken, but at the same time was an unsparing critic of the conduct of the people who sat in the pews. Under his preaching each individual felt singled out, and as Miss Winslow tells us he made hell real enough to be found in the atlas, and more than that "He made those consigned to it personally responsible for being there." And when religion is personalized it is automatically emotionalized.

The revival of interest in Jonathan Edwards, as indicated by a half dozen or more biographies of relatively recent date, gives this careful selection of his writings a special timeliness.

WILLIAM W. SWEET

Dallas, Texas

CULLMANN, OSCAR. Peter—Disciple, Apostle, Martyr: A Historical and Theological Study. Translated from the German by Floyd V. Filson. Pp. 252. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1953. $4.50.

This important volume on the place of Peter within the history of the Christian Church will interest a variety of readers. To students of Christian antiquity it offers a scholarly and fascinating re-evaluation of the evidence bearing on Peter's relations to Christ, the early church, and Rome. Persons concerned with the contemporary ecclesiastical scene will appreciate its orientation to the modern ecumenical discussion and debate. And if these interests are united significantly, that is, if one considers religious convictions as resting upon judgments concerning history, specifically the history of Christ, the book may be regarded as one of the most significant of our day.

The author, who is one of the most distinguished scholars in the related fields of New Testament and ancient Church History, has attracted considerable attention as the result of his teaching and writing. Since 1938 he has been a professor in the University of Basel and since 1949 as well a professor at the Sorbonne in Paris. Among his earlier works his much discussed Christ and Time (1945, 2d ed. 1948; Eng. Trans. 1949) deserves special mention.

The present volume, though marked by an unusual degree of scholarly caution, constitutes a plea to Protestants to take Peter more seriously in the light of his position as a representative spokesman for the disciples of Christ and his later leadership in the Church. Contrary to much traditional exegesis, he maintains that Peter personally is in view in the reference to the "rock" in Matthew 16: 18. He also concludes that "probably Peter actually was in Rome and suffered execution under Nero" (p. 152). Nevertheless, he insists that there is support for the idea of apostolic succession neither in the New Testament nor in the most ancient patristic testimony. And he pleads effectively with his Roman Catholic readers and friends to face this issue more directly than he thinks they have done.

Among the features of the book that do not carry conviction to the present reviewer are his transfer of the "rock" passage to a later setting, his argument that Peter's position of leadership was derived from a special commission from Christ, and his contention that Peter was the head of a distinctly Jewish Christian missionary "organization."

N. B. STONEHOUSE

Westminster Theological Seminary

SMITH, NORMAN KEMP. New Studies in the Philosophy of Descartes: Descartes

as a Pioneer. Pp. xii, 369. New York: St. Martin's Press (and Macmillan & Co., London), 1952. $5.00.

The acute intellect and profound scholarship which students of his work on Kant and Hume have come to expect of Professor Kemp Smith are again displayed in this new volume on Descartes. Over half a century ago Kemp Smith published his first book of studies in the philosophy of Descartes, but these new studies are in no sense a mere revision of the earlier book. As the author explains, so much has transpired in Cartesian studies since 1902 that he in effect began all over again.

The new studies comprise some thirteen chapters, the last of which is responsible for the subtitle of the volume. They are so arranged as to take the reader chronologically from Descartes' birth (on page 3) to his death (on page 363). This chronological order reflects the author's great interest in all the autobiographical details and hints which Descartes and his correspondents give us. Professor Kemp Smith, more than almost any other student of Descartes, takes these autobiographical statements at their face value. As a result he is able to discriminate eight stages in Descartes' philosophical development, and to assign fairly precise dates to his various studies and interests; this lends great authenticity to the analysis of his intellectual growth. On the other hand the reader may still continue to suspect that some of the autobiography, in the Discourse for example or the first Meditation, is literary or philosophical rather than chronological. This is reinforced by Kemp Smith's accusation that in a letter to Princess Elizabeth Descartes is being autobiographically misleading.

In spite of its chronological setting this book is a series of separate studies rather than a single developing study of Descartes. Of particular interest are the studies on his early period and on the last few years of his life. Kemp Smith certainly stresses more than any comparable critic in English the changes in Descartes' thought, and the reasons for those changes. Descartes himself comes to life in these papers, as the improviser who had to fashion basic theories to replace the Thomism which proved unsatisfactory to him, and who lived to regret some of his basic improvisations. We see him as the more or less reluctant victim of his own philosophy, unwilling to develop the occasionalistic aspects of his theories as Malebranche later did, or the parallelistic aspects, as Spinoza was to do.

More attention is devoted here than is usual to Descartes' developing theology as well as to his physics and philosophy. However the discussion of the proofs of the existence of God is oddly unsatisfactory, as if Kemp Smith were marshaling arguments against an opposing interpretation which is never stated.

Nevertheless, all criticisms aside, Professor Kemp Smith's book is probably the only work on Descartes in English which can justifiably claim to compare with the monumental work of Gilson.

MASON W. GROSS

Rutgers University

MACKINNON, D. M. (Ed.). Christian Faith and Communist Faith. Pp. xii, 260. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1953. $4.50.

This is a series of studies by members of the Anglican Communion with about half the space devoted to a penetrating analysis of the Communist faith of Marx, Lenin, and Stalin and its philosophical implications and the other half to the interpretation of the Christian faith from the Anglican point of view.

It is admitted that the New Testament is not a textbook, nor a handout; neither a system nor propaganda; its documents are difficult to handle and impossible to systematize; its bearing upon any political or social order is not immediate. From its pages have been distilled an apocalyptic Christ, a sublime Christ, a thaumaturgical Christ, a communist Christ, an anti-communist Christ, and so on. Christian dialectic is between now and then, not between here and there; it is temporal not spatial. Although God is transcendent, he cannot be left out of account. The gospel has closer affinities with a faith which assumes the indissoluble connection between spirit and matter than vice-versa. "It is by no means obvious that the gospel is spiritual rather than materialistic" (p. 124). There is no sermon on sin in the gospel. Sin as an abstract theological term is not in the gospel. The New Testament forbids the identification of any man or group of men with the enemy and the devil. It demands a death to wealth, family, and power and a surrender of the heart to the righteousness of God.

The general conclusions reached are that Communism is definitely a metaphysics, the doing of the truth, an activism manifesting an absolute faith that Communism is directing the progress of humanity. Therefore appeals to mercy, pity, and justice are irrelevant because class struggle is natural law. The Marxist cannot permit the separation of his questions from their metaphysical center and therefore is "pathetically at the mercy of his illusions." The Stalinist believes that he is promoting "the march of God in the world." He has a single coherent philosophy which claims to explain all historical events and all social institutions. He is interested in the rent book rather than in a prayer book. The oppressed are told they will soon move across Jordan into a land flowing with milk and honey, namely, the classless society. It is this escape from reality into a world of fantasy, which is the main appeal in Communism (229 ff.).

The elements common to Christianity and Marxism are found to be materialism, lack of universal and eternal solutions, emphasis on history and on eschatology (91 ff.).

The difference between the two is realized eschatology over against a sinless society; sin as alienation from God over against sin as alienation from fellowmen; Augustinian doctrine of original sin over against original sin as capitalism; mystery and uncontrollable forces over against no mystery and controllable forces (94 ff.).

Toynbee's slight essay of fifteen pages is very disappointing (pp. 194-208) since in it he seeks to escape from confrontation of Christianity with Communism "by flight from reality into the world of fantasy! In the present the idealist . . . is necessarily a counsellor of despair. For he takes away from men the sense that by ruthless, intelligent action they can master their situation," remarks the editor (235 ff.).

The Communists, we fear, will not be converted to Christianity by perusal of this volume. It ought to convince some Christian "innocents abroad" how close to a draw this war between the two faiths really is.

CONRAD H. MOEHLMAN

University of Southern California

VIERECK, PETER. Dream and Responsibility. Pp. 65. Washington, D. C.: University Press, [c.d. 1953]. $1.50.

In a recent issue of the South Atlantic Quarterly Anthony Harrigan nominated Peter Viereck to succeed T. S. Eliot as arbiter elegantiarum of the new generation of younger poets. The present reviewer considers it a pleasure to second that nomination. Since 1949, when he won the Pulitzer Prize for Terror and Decorum, Peter Viereck has given continuing proof of his major stature as poet and scholar. He combines not only the sensitiveness of a gifted lyric poet, but also the fresh insight of an able and conscientious historian.

Each new work by Peter Viereck gives further evidence of his stature as an outstanding standard-bearer of the tradition of humanistic democracy in an age of crass hedonism. His greatest virtue is his consistency. Again and again he strikes with acid pen against statism and totalitarianism on the one hand and against the old, degenerating bohemian irresponsibility of the so-called avant-gardists on the other. His voice is that of the free individual. Spokesman of an ethics-dedicated "revolt against revolt," he denounces tyranny of any kind (whether red, brown, or yellow), directs shafts of ridicule against those who would keep the artist in isolation, and calls for a genuine human individuality in the search for ethics, beauty, and love. Some may resent his bombastic style as a critic, but none can deny the high personal ethics and the warm love for humanity of this brilliant young American.

In his latest book, Dream and Responsibility, Viereck seeks a clearly conceived poetic ideal by offering a revaluation of the tension between poetry and society. He analyzes four test cases: Stefan George and his circle in Weimar Germany; Ezra Pound and the "New Critics" in America; Hart Crane's "The Bridge"; and the impact of industrialization upon modern literature. He rejects the straightjacket of Marxist materialism on the ground that the intrusion of political responsibility, or fear of being an "irresponsible," degrades art into mere propaganda. At the same time he denounces New Criticism formalism with its accent on didacticism, shallow isolation, and loss of aesthetic magic. The main prerequisite for all civilization and culture, including poetry, is to be found in ethical values, not in narrow political partisanship.

In his concluding chapter Viereck urges the American poet in the machine age to become the mediator between the outward material world and the inner spiritual world. It is not the business of the poet, he concludes, to provide political or economic solutions for the ills of mankind, but, by mediating between the two worlds of machine and spirit, he may inspire in society that bifocal vision which is the prerequisite to any solution. In this way the artist can help man become the master of things instead of things the masters of man.

Throughout this penetrating and provocative contribution to the literature of criticism Viereck emphasizes the goal of human individuality. "What characterizes the human spirit?" he asks. "The earth is a freer place to breathe in, every time you love without asking or calculating any return. It is freer every time you feel spontaneous sympathy for strangers. It is freer every time you make your drudgeries and routines still more inefficient by taking plenty of time out to experience the shock of beauty, whether in nature, poetry, music, or the fine arts" (p. 42).

This is the voice of reason. None but the fool would reject Viereck's world of the free spirit for the totalitarian nightmare of George Orwell's "1984."

LOUIS L. SNYDER

City College of New York

COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS

THOMPSON, FAITH. A Short History of Parliament, 1295-1642. Pp. x, 280. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1953. $4.50.

Miss Faith Thompson has undertaken an incredibly difficult task. An institution is always the product of its environment both past and present and can be understood only in relation to it. Hence the historian of any institution must depict the relevant features of the environment. But Parliament was the central institution of English government, and almost every aspect of English civilization is relevant to it. For the careful and thoughtful reader Miss Thompson has solved this problem very effectively. Three chapters are devoted solely to the civilization that formed the environment of Parliament, and she has succeeded in describing the significant elements in small space. But the reader must be careful. Often a single sentence covers a subject of vital importance if the development of Parliament is to be understood.

Another difficulty in summarizing the history of Parliament is that the subject is an extremely live one among historians. If a subject is dead or at least in a quiet coma, one can frequently say "the generally accepted opinion of scholars is." There are few aspects of the history of Parliament on which there is any generally accepted opinion—the debates are still lively and vigorous. Miss Thompson has mentioned all important views and has used careful judgment in choosing the balance between them. But it will be a rare specialist who will entirely agree with the result. Most will feel that some aspects have been stressed too much and others too little. Miss Thompson has carefully chosen the middle road and hence will be shot at from both sides. For the non-specialist who wants to know what the questions at issue are without worrying much over the merits of the arguments Miss Thompson has performed a signal service.

The story of the origins and development of Parliament is told most skilfully. Miss Thompson has the ability to merge effectively broad generalization, careful exposition of detail, and striking concrete examples. A reader with a respectable knowledge of English history will find the book extremely illuminating. No one who is interested in Anglo-American constitutional, political, or legal history can afford to neglect it.

Obviously in a book of this sort any reviewer will find statements that trouble him. The requirement that permission be obtained to build castles was not new in the fourteenth century but was established by Henry I. The Norman and Angevin kings created earls by charters rather than by letters patent. The footnote on page 255 stating that the kings had sold much of the medieval royal forest suggests that all lands included in the forest had once been royal demesne which is, of course, not true. Even less important but rather annoying is occasional carelessness with names. No one lived in the reign of Edward II who could be called John of Richmond, earl of Brittany. A cadet of the dukes of Brittany was called John of Brittany, earl of Richmond. Margaret Beaufort was the mother of Henry VII, but she was never a queen. Finally on page 198 we are supplied with an addition to the English royal house, James IV. Let me hasten to add that Miss Thompson is not a rabid Jacobite—she clearly means William IV. But these are small flaws that will not trouble most readers of this excellent book.

SIDNEY PAINTER

Johns Hopkins University

POLNAY, PETER DE. Death of a Legend: The True Story of Bonny Prince Charlie. Pp. xiv, 265. New York: British Book Center, 1953. $4.00.

This book is an excellent psychological study of Bonny Prince Charles and is as much the story of the death of a man as it is the death of a legend. What a shame that Bonny Prince Charlie did not die in the Highlands in 1745 during his hours of near greatness! If such had taken place, much later grief to the Prince and to his followers would have been avoided. The legend could have been perpetuated in all its glory. As it was, the "King over the water" became the "Prince in his cups."

Exile is always degrading and in most cases degenerating. Charles II, made of much sterner stuff than his Stuart namesake, illustrated well the moral deterioration of forced expatriates. Charles II however always had hope of ending his travels and returning to his throne. One wonders what thirty years more of wandering would have done to him. Perhaps the Stuart legend would have ended before Bonny Prince Charlie was born.

Fate is a mischievous imp. Never was the poet more accurate than when he pointed out that the saddest words in life are "It might have been." The lost dream, the faded illusion often become a ruinous cancer eating away the souls of men who have no future but only the acrid ashes of the past and the hollowness of the present. With the years the bitterness deepens, the rancor grows. Tried and trusted friends are blamed for not doing their all in the time of crisis or afterwards. Soon the friends drop off—or even worse are sent away—and the man remains alone with his barren emptiness. The bottle, the illicit bed, a mania for collecting, and small and large talk are unsuccessfully called upon to act as opiates. Something that is less than a human being remains. A soul is dead, expiring when hope and faith departed. Without hope and without faith it is easy "to look into the pewter pot, and see the world as it is not."

A few of the very large souls can adjust to the adversity of exile and realize that for them hope for a place on high is ended. Bonny Prince Charlie was not of the stuff of such greatness. In happier times, he might have made a great king, but these were not for the Stuarts' happy times. Unlike his father and brother, the Prince refused to recognize what had taken place in European politics. He could rail at his fate, but he was not even master enough of his destiny to fight it. Shakespeare's Clarence went down in a tub of malmsey. Bottles and bottles of various spirits gave the Prince a false crutch and ruined him and many with whom he came in contact.

According to Mr. Polnay they brought about the "death of a legend."

Basing his study upon various collections of Stuart letters, Mr. Polnay has done his work well. The legend is put to bed, but like all legends it will not stay there. Let us say, however, that this well-written book with a usable index is a fine study of Bonny Prince Charlie, who allowed too much wine to get into his water, and who broke under the buffetings of fate.

JOHN J. MURRAY

Bloomington, Indiana

WINTER, CARL G. American Influence on Canadian Nationhood. Pp. 23. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1954. $1.00.

This brief study merits mention on two grounds. It represents a year-old effort on the part of the publishers to furnish a medium (Annals of American Research) for the prompt and inexpensive presentation of research results, particularly in the fields of the liberal arts and sciences. Such a series should prove valuable to workers in social science fields where the industry of scholars has traditionally outpaced available publication media. In particular, the study (a condensation of a Stanford dissertation) discusses several episodes of Canadian-American relations, some familiar and some less familiar, as they have related to the attainment of Canadian national adulthood, showing how in this process United States influence has usually, but not always, furthered Dominion progress toward a national goal.

Beginning with the Alaska Boundary dispute, the narrative runs through a series of problems developing between 1905 and 1909, to the Boundary Waters negotiation and the arbitration of the North Atlantic Fisheries question, both in the latter year; it proceeds to consider the North Pacific Sealing Convention and the reciprocity proposals of 1911, the Halibut Treaty of 1923, the establishment of a Canadian Legation in 1926, and the Statute of Westminster of 1931, and it concludes with Canada's exercise of sovereignty in the declarations of war upon Germany and Japan. Each of these is treated from the standpoint of its influence upon the growth of nationality.

The study's chief contribution is to the history of the years 1905 to 1911, where it brings out as no predecessor has done the significant contribution of Chandler P. Anderson to Canadian-American affairs. The author's picture of the emergence of Canadian nationality is convincing and interesting. His narrative, like most condensations, occasionally achieves brevity at the expense of clarity. The utility of such a study, and of such a series, depends upon casting a balance between the merits of limited exposure of the results of fundamental research as compared with full access to those results; this reviewer votes in favor of limited exposure as an invitation to the interested reader to pursue matters further.

L. ETHAN ELLIS

University of Rochester

SLAVIC COUNTRIES

KUCHEROV, SAMUEL. Courts, Lawyers and Trials under the Last Three Tsars. Pp. xii, 339. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1953. $6.00.

Within the last century, the history of Russian justice has recorded three quite dissimilar judicial systems. The second of these, introduced by the judicial reforms of 1864 and brought to an end by the October Revolution, provides Dr. Kuchеров with the subject matter of his book. He writes of this comparatively brief period, during which Russia experienced a taste of Western European law, with the enthusiasm of a participant (he was a lawyer in old Russia) and the care of a trained historian.

His thesis, that Russia demonstrated during this period the capacity to fashion viable legal institutions, is a familiar and generally accepted one; but the materials he uses to support his thesis are fresh and unfamiliar to most Western scholars.

The author gives approximately equal attention to three major topics: the courts, the bar, and the political trials. The section on the courts is made particularly useful by a preliminary survey of the pre-reform legal system. The study of the Russian bar is richest in material, which has hitherto not been available outside of sources in the Russian language. And the review of the political trials, while including some which have been covered in other English writings, introduces many about which little has been known in the West.

In bringing these materials together, Dr. Kucherov has been able to demonstrate that for about half a century Russian lawyers did plead courageously, Russian juries did base their verdicts on a passion for justice, and Russian judges did conduct trials with a measure of independence.

Courts, Lawyers and Trials under the Last Three Tsars is an important contribution to Russian legal and judicial history, a field for which the deplorable scarcity of non-Russian literature has been a serious drawback to thorough study. It is an excellent work which, while answering many old questions, evokes many new ones. One wishes that Dr. Kucherov might follow this volume with a series of monographs in which he could give broader consideration to the various special aspects of the subject he has treated here. For the present, it is enough that he has done this much.

SIDNEY HARCAVE

Harpur College
State University of New York

ROSTOW, W. W., in collaboration with ALFRED LEVIN. The Dynamics of Soviet Society. Pp. xvi, 282. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1953. $3.95.

This is a very timely and useful book. "What determines the policy of the Soviet State at home and abroad?" "What are the prospects for change in Soviet society?" In order to answer these questions, the Center for International Studies of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology commissioned Mr. Rostow to correlate the information available in the works of a galaxy of professional scholars in the fields of history, economics, and sociology, of whom eighty are listed in the excellent bibliography. This reviewer would have recommended the addition of one more, Lenin, and one of his many works—Materialism and Empiricriticism. The mention of this title indicates the chief defect of the book, which is its lack of appreciation of the role of philosophy in both form and content of Soviet society.

Mr. Rostow begins by saying, "It is the present hypothesis that the modern Soviet state is to be understood primarily as the consequence of a peculiarly single-minded effort by an extraordinarily centralized regime to pursue two related but not identical goals: the maintenance of its own absolute internal power over Russian society, and the maximization over time of its power vis à vis the external world." In every key decision, the maintenance of power has had priority. In 1917 there may have been a trace of humanitarianism, but Lenin before his death, and Stalin throughout his dictatorship, placed such emphasis on power that, by the time of the Great Purge, 1936–37, the ideological objective was completely subordinated, except as a cloak for those in power and as a sop for the people.

The struggle for succession to power after Stalin's death is well described, with the judgment that there is a sort of truce among the half-dozen chief contestants, who among themselves have conceded to Malenkov the position of primus inter pares. Next comes the stratum of higher bureaucrats in army, administration, security police, production, and information, and below them a vast layer of lesser bureaucrats. The possibility of change lies in the unstable balance among these elements, which could be pushed into radical change by a hardening of the bureaucracy in the interest of self-preservation, by Russian patriotism, by continued failure of internal propaganda to change the character of citizens, especially the peasants, or by the desire of the people for less pressure and more food, or by a combination of these factors. There is a wise caution that change would not automatically thaw out the Cold War, and that external pressure to bring about change in Russia, as in the case of Nazi German aggression, might even strengthen Soviet power.

The book is admirably divided into properly headed chapters and sections, making for clarity, logical development of thought, and balanced conclusions. It is neither propaganda nor counter-propaganda. In this respect, it is stronger than most of the books of defectors or eye-witnesses. On the other hand, it starts with a limited thesis (as quoted) and tends to draw together selected data largely in its justification, thereby becoming a restricted work. Perhaps the Massachusetts Institute of Technology will stimulate the production of another book which will go more deeply into dialectic materialistic philosophy and seek for its antidote, also into the psychology of accommodation and how to overcome it—both with reference to the daily life of Soviet citizens of all ranks. This would help us in preparing for the day desired by the author and by all of us, when there may be free intercourse between the peoples of the Soviet Union and of our own country.

PAUL B. ANDERSON

International Committee of YMCA
New York City

ZENKOVSKY, V. V. A History of Russian Philosophy. Authorized translation from the Russian by George L. Kline. 2 vols. Pp. xiv, 465; viii, 469–947. New York: Columbia University Press, 1953. $15.00.

This comprehensive survey is a landmark in the study of Russian thought. Comparable in scope to such recent expositions as N. O. Lossky's History of Russian Philosophy (New York, 1951) and the symposium Iz Istarii Russkoi Filosofii [From the History of Russian Philosophy] (Moscow, 1951) published by the Faculty of Philosophy of the University of Moscow, Zenkovsky's work surpasses the former in comprehensiveness and the latter in objectivity of presentation. The Columbia Slavic Studies should be given great credit for making available this important work, which is translated with revisions from the original Russian edition (Paris, 1948–50).

In his introduction, Zenkovsky expresses the view that the moral and historical role of man has been the primary preoccupation of Russian philosophy. It is thus in the philosophy of history and the search for a synthesis of theory and practice in human existence that Russian thinkers have made their principal contribution. The author rejects the common assertion that Russia has no philosophic tradition because the theory of knowledge has played only a small part in Russian thinking. He replies by pointing out that the theory of knowledge is only one aspect of philosophy, and sets forth the broader view that philosophy includes all efforts "to unify the spiritual life by rational means." He recognizes, of course that Russian philosophy has been under profound Western influence, but notes that one cannot speak of influence unless there is something to be influenced. In no small measure Russian philosophy has been handicapped by Western influence, insofar as Russian thinkers have been drawn away from their own path. This path Zenkovsky believes to be the Eastern Orthodox faith, which in his view offers sounder insights than does the secularism of the West into the problems that philosophy seeks to solve.

Zenkovsky's first volume covers briefly the period to the end of the eighteenth century which was the seedtime of Russian philosophy, and continues with a more extended treatment of the first half of the nineteenth century in which independent philosophic thought began to take form. In the second volume he discusses the flowering of Russian philosophy in the period from the 1870's to the end of the century, when Solovyov, Fyodorov, Lossky, and others constructed original systems of thought, and he concludes with an important section on the twentieth century. He discusses Plekhanov, Bogdanov, and Lenin among the Russian Marxists, but does not consider Soviet philosophy since Lenin to be sufficiently free from political control to deserve attention. He has much to say, however, on the philosophers in exile, notably Berdyaev and Bulgakov, through whom Russian thought has begun to have world-wide influence.

C. E. BLACK

Princeton University

KERTESZ, STEPHEN D. Diplomacy in a Whirlpool. Pp. xvi, 273. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1953. $4.75.

The recent book on Diplomacy in a Whirlpool by Professor Stephen D. Kertesz is a significant addition to the series of publications by the University of Notre Dame Committee on International Relations, dealing with recent developments in the Soviet Union and its Eastern European orbit. The volume by Dr. Kertesz is not written for public consumption but is oriented toward the specialist of Eastern European politics. It is a penetrating study of Nazi and Soviet take-over techniques applied to Hungary, one of the most reluctant satellites in the Danube Valley. The book is most interesting where Professor Kertesz projects his own personal experiences into the narrative. As a high-ranking official of the Hungarian Ministry of Foreign Affairs he participated in a number of sensitive negotiations during and immediately after World War II and was instrumental in presenting the Hungarian case to the 1946 Peace Conference in Paris.

Dr. Kertesz weaves in his personal impressions, experiences, and diplomatic recollections and offers the reader a number of vivid and provocative profiles of well-known Eastern European political leaders. Occasionally the author is carried away by personal prejudices and his judgments of leading politicians tend to be biased or uncertain. On the whole, however, his personalized approach to the Hungarian diplomatic scene produces an unusually useful volume.

Having traced the development of Hungarian politics through the climatic developments of the Second World War, Kertesz offers two significant chapters on "Soviet and Western Politics" and "Hungary a Republic." The latter is particularly important in presenting a minute analysis of Communist infiltration techniques. Dr. Kertesz gives here an excellent account of the myth of hopeful expectations concerning a tolerable Russian behavior vis-à-vis the peoples of Danubian Europe. Hungarian intellectuals were especially responsible for nursing the optimistic illusion of a limited and moderate form of Communism for their country. The author's description of Hungary as a Republic offers a valuable counterpart to the general surveys of Eastern Europe recently published by Hugh Seton-Watson. It indicates the transitional steps and techniques employed to break down the resistance of an unwilling satellite, refashioning it into a willing vassal state and eventually into the image of a people's republic.

Diplomacy in a Whirlpool has elaborate bibliographical references and several significant documents published here for the first time in English. The reviewer deplores the many typographical errors in the terminal notes of the volume and feels that more careful editing would have helped to eliminate certain errors in both text and bibliographical references.

ANDREW GYORGY

Boston University

KING-HALL, STEPHEN. The Communist Conspiracy. Pp xx, 239. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $3.00.

Communism in its various forms is the most important political problem of the modern world. It therefore produces a great deal of literature both favorable and hostile. Unfortunately, this also means that the literature is contributed to by persons who, for one reason or another, lack some of the essential qualifications for the serious treatment of so vital a topic. This weakness takes many forms. Perhaps the most surprising of them is a tendency to write anti-Communist works using precisely the same methods, and precisely the same style, that we have come to associate with Communist writings themselves. The mechanical juxtaposition of texts replaces a serious attempt to understand the phenomenon itself, and to elucidate and to suggest methods by which it can be combatted. Mr. Stephen King-Hall's book falls clearly into this category.

Mr. King-Hall is a former British Member of Parliament, who has had a distinguished and varied career and earned the gratitude of all students of democratic government by his share in founding the "Hansard Society." It may be asserted without fear of contradiction that his services to democracy, in this respect, a positive one, are very much greater than those made in his new volume. One is, admittedly, put on the alert by the title itself. There are, of course, as we have all too good reason to know, Communist conspiracies. But Communism itself is far more than a conspiracy; whether we like it or not, it is a movement. To believe that the whole problem can be dealt with under the heading Conspiracy is like suggesting that because Guy Fawkes conspired to blow up Parliament the Counter-Reformation can be described simply as a conspiracy.

The number of relatively minor factual errors and the lack of accuracy as well as of discrimination in the bibliography are not perhaps very important, nor should we be influenced too much by Mr. King-Hall's historical introduction where remarks are made on such disparate subjects as the Treaty of Versailles, Hitler, and Mussolini, which suggest a highly simplified approach to the problems of that period to say no more.

It is rather, the core of the book, the analysis of Soviet policy and propaganda, and the attempt to describe the Soviet Empire itself and life within it, that raise the greatest objections. In each case, it is not so much that the facts are selected with insufficient discrimination as that they are looked at altogether externally, that they are not related to the development of Soviet society in its various phases, nor to the terrain in which external Soviet propaganda works to-day. If it were as easy to expose Soviet pretensions as Mr. King-Hall believes, there would be no great and menacing Communist Parties in Western Europe, there would be no defectors from the western intelligentsia, and a book like this would not be necessary.

It may well be the case that these inadequacies are due to the fact that, while much scholarly work on Russia is being done in Western Europe and still more in the United States, its results have not yet been assimilated by general students of politics to the point at which they are ready to be presented as a coherent whole. A bad book is a challenge to write a better one.

MAX BELOFF

Nuffield College, Oxford

SHARP, SAMUEL L. Poland: White Eagle on a Red Field. Pp. ix, 338. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $5.00.

This volume is quite difficult to evaluate as to its character. Some of its pages are typical journalistic reporting; they are followed by pages which can be recognized as the result of historical research. Other pages, especially those dealing with the American attitude toward Poland in Teheran, Yalta, and later, are an attempt to digest the information contained in at least a dozen memoirs written in recent years by statesmen and diplomats.

The book presents still another dilemma. If it was conceived by the author and his publisher as a book expected to achieve wide circulation, the average reader will certainly reject it as such. He will be confused by the unusual amount of whole paragraphs, sentences, half-sentences, and even single words placed in quotation marks. They make hard reading and even harder understanding. If, on the other hand, the book was intended to be a scholarly monograph on Poland, past and present, then the reader, interested in the author's sources of information, will be disappointed by the fact that most of the quotations are not backed up by the source references. Even a bibliography is missing. These shortcomings for both kinds of readers place Mr. Sharp's book somewhere in the wide chasm between so-called non-fiction and monographs for the scholar and student.

By attempting to combine the journalistic and the scholarly approach, Mr. Sharp lost sight of the basic problems involved in his subject. This becomes obvious from his handling of the reconstruction of an independent Polish state after World War I. He discusses the American attitude in this matter in complete disregard of the moral forces in the Allied camp which brought about the placing of an independent Poland among the major war aims of the Allies, and also in complete disregard of the generally accepted right of a people to freedom and independence. According to Mr. Sharp, Poland's restoration was not the logical result of these two elements, but instead, he simply states, "she happened" (p. 68). In his cynical approach to the rights of suppressed nations to independence he writes that "sovereignty is the right of a nation to make its own mistakes . . ." (p. 68).

Mr. Sharp obviously dislikes the favorable attitude of President Wilson and Colonel House towards Poland. The President's known statement "that statesman everywhere are agreed that [as a result of the war] there should be a united, independent, and autonomous Poland," is quite unconvincingly attacked by Mr. Sharp as "incorrect" (p. 264). The discussion of Polish affairs at the Paris Peace Conference as well as the introductory remarks to the chapter dealing with Poland between the two wars, are aimed at proving that the Poland created in Versailles was "impossible" (p. 68). The entire period between the wars is qualified by Mr. Sharp as "a hopeless struggle to defend an indefensible political arrangement" (p. 113). It is quite amazing to find that in this appraisal of the Poland of 1918-1939 Mr. Sharp revives the discarded slogans of both Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia.

In his Preface Mr. Sharp warns the reader that "he may find the book parsimonious in the use of so-called nice words about Poland and the Poles" (p. v). On the jacket to the book the publisher additionally qualifies the book as "hard-hitting." Nobody could object to this approach as long as the author is objective in the presentation of the subject. But the reader will find in the book a painstakingly selected collection of quotations expressing most negative and derogatory opinions on the Poles and Poland up to 1939, whereas favorable expressions, even those originating with the persons quoted, are omitted. It is not possible to describe this manner of presentation as objective and enlightening. Nor is Mr. Sharp's Poland: White Eagle on a Red Field a fair account of Poland's changing destinies. It is a hard-hitting book demanding hard-hitting scrutiny.

W. S. SWORAKOWSKI
Stanford University

WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE

ALBERTINI, LUIGI. The Origins of the War of 1914. Vol. II: The Crisis of July 1914 from the Sarajevo Outrage to the Austro-Hungarian General Mobilization. Translated and edited by Isabella M. Massey. Pp. xvi, 727. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $11.00.

Here is the translation of the late Senator Albertini's second volume of Le origini della guerra del 1914 (Milano, 1943). Since it closes before Germany's declaration of the Kriegsgefahrzustand, the volume under review stops short of the outbreak of war among the great powers.

Yet, despite the incompleteness of the story, Albertini's thesis is clear: The major responsibility lies upon Germany which, after considering (and miscalculating) the risks, not only gave a "blank check" to an indecisive and wavering Austria-Hungary but also encouraged and even urged it to take the steps which made war difficult to avoid. All the powers, however, share some portion of the blame. Russia's decision in principle, on July 25, to resort to partial mobilization, and its general mobilization, ordered on July 30, were fatal steps, neither one of which was taken with full appreciation of its implications. The encouragement of Sazonov by the French Ambassador, Paléologue, who failed to keep in close touch with the Quai d'Orsay but probably acted upon general directions given him by Poincaré, was another significant factor. Without impugning the personal honesty of Sir Edward Grey, but with contemptuous characterization of San Giuliano's aims and policy, Albertini severely blames both men for not taking early enough the action which lay within their power and which might have prevented the outbreak of war. In dealing with the crucial questions from Serbian complicity in the Sarajevo crime to the Austro-Hungarian general mobilization, the author carefully considers the role of individuals and often discovers that there were significant differences of views and misrepresentation of the facts within the councils of governments. Thus he finds, for example, that after July 26 Bethmann-Hollweg and Jagow kept information from the Kaiser and failed to carry out his injunctions fully.

With the aid of Luciano Magrini who completed the text of parts of this volume, Albertini worked upon the origins of World War I for nearly two decades. He not only utilized all the published sources and most of the secondary material but he corresponded with or interviewed many of the key actors in the 1914 drama. Documenting his exposition with copious quotations from both published and unpublished sources, his work at times becomes an annotated collection of sources. Although he failed to draw up general conclusions, his judgments on individual men and events have the freshness, credibility, and vigor that are derived from a thorough grasp of the subject and the experienced and critical approach of a man who himself had participated in diplomacy and politics. If not the last word, this study is a powerful and impressive one that is indispensable for a detailed examination of the subject.

The translating and editing of this English edition has been unusually well done by Isabella M. Massey, whose completion of the third volume will be eagerly awaited by those scholars in the field to whom the Italian edition is inaccessible.

DWIGHT E. LEE

Clark University

BURNHAM, JAMES (Ed.). What Europe Thinks of America. Pp. xiii, 222. New York: John Day Company, 1953. $3.50.

This book does not quite tell what Europe thinks of America, if, indeed, there is a "Europe" which (or should one say "who"?) is capable of "thinking," about America or anything else. It tells what two Frenchmen, two Italians, a Ukrainian, a Belgian, a Briton, and two Poles think about their own countries and about the United States. But the editor straightens this out. His contributors are not "representative." They are "influential Europeans," all "proved friends" of the United States and "good citizens" (three of them exiled) of their own countries. They are "willing to write without diplomatic reservations." They represent "the Center or the Right," who, as Mr. Burnham points out, govern most of Western Europe today. None are Communists, fellow travellers, or neutralists; all are "nonsocialists," and "all or almost all are anti-socialist."

The similarities in these essays will almost convince the reader that there is a "Europe" that "thinks" integrally—a Europe united by a common enemy and also by a common ally regarded with common misgivings. All the contributors write well, with a depth of historical perspective and an understanding of American political processes. They are disarmingly frank in their criticisms of Americans and their own countrymen. (They also have an exasperating tendency to stare unflinchingly into the future and report what they see there as "facts"—and these are "facts" which Americans persist in ignoring.)

Their essays demonstrate repeatedly and convincingly the deficiencies of our habitual "legalistic-moralistic approach to international problems" . . . "the assumption that state behavior is a fit subject for moral judgment," to use Ambassador Kennan's phrases. And they all ask America to assume the inevitable responsibility of world leadership, and to "fulfill its function with true grandeur."

The semblance of European unity is lost, however, when several writers permit themselves to suggest how the United States should implement its role of leadership: increase immigration quotas, lower tariffs, support colonialism, approve trade blocs, intervene to liberate Eastern Europe but guarantee the Oder-Niesse line (no Germans contributed). Each suggestion seems motivated by a particular nationalistic concern.

The essayists are at their best when they leave off politics and talk about people. Then they tell Americans about Europeans, which is after all a more substantial gain than the narcissistic satisfaction of knowing "what Europe thinks of America." For example, the Ukrainian linguist, Yury Šerech describes a permeating Russian value-complex, encouraged by the Soviets, "that it is a shameful thing to have money and to lead a comfortable life." We who are puzzled by Russian public conduct find this explains a great deal—including why Stalin never wore a necktie.

WILLIAM BUCHANAN
Mississippi State College

BRETTON, HENRY L. Stresemann and the Revision of Versailles; A Fight for Reason. Pp. xii, 199. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1953. $3.00.

This book is a scholarly study of Stresemann's policy of peaceful revision of the Treaty of Versailles. Parts one and two cover Stresemann's life and the formative stage of his policy. Part three, the heart of the research, deals with the war guilt question and aspects of foreign policy in the West. The last part treats the secondary issues of revisionism, minorities, and disarmament. An excellent author's preface, summary and conclusion, notes, and bibliography add to the value of the monograph.

Dr. Bretton based his study on the published collection of Stresemann's papers and those papers of the Nachlass, which were found in the captured archives of the German foreign office. This monograph is the first exhaustive documentary analysis of a given aspect of Stresemann's foreign policy and the first attempt to summarize the over-all pattern of revisionism, which was followed by the great diplomat of the Weimar Republic. The author's research is objective, exhaustive, and documented, especially on questions and problems which have been the subject of scholarly debate or government propaganda.

After tracing the nationalistic background of Stresemann, Bretton states that "his political misfortune" in 1918 marks the real beginning of his fight for reason. The author shows how the foreign minister compromised with the German nationalists and socialists on domestic issues without sacrificing his long range objectives or modifying his policy of fulfillment abroad.

The chapter on minorities is a very able analysis of a controversial subject. The author asserts that Stresemann made no effort to further the union of Austria and Germany while his "minority policy" was largely a deliberate attempt to foster irredentism in Polish lands.

This study analyzes only the political significance of the various reparation settlements and omits therefore a detailed account of the economic aspects of the 1929 all-out attack on Stresemann's policy of fulfillment and of revision through conciliation. These anti-Stresemann fanatics were convinced that the Treaty of Versailles was not "a hollow shell." The author does show how the foreign minister separated the principle that Germany should pay reparations from the principle that she should pay all of her reparations and fulfill all obligations before the Allied Troops would leave Germany.

Stresemann's policies did not prepare the way for World War II. He saw clearly, however, that when Russia was ready to raise the question of Poland and the Baltic states "a new era will open up in European history."

RALPH HASWELL LUTZ
Twenty Nine Palms, California

DORWART, REINHOLD AUGUST. The Administrative Reforms of Frederick William I of Prussia. Pp. xx, 250. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $4.00.

The century following the Thirty Years' War saw the emergence of public administration in Prussia. Although the rise of the Prussian bureaucracy has been treated by various writers such as Walter L. Dorn, Herman Finer, and Fritz Morstein Marx, there has hitherto been no full-length administrative history in English on this century. The Administrative Reforms of Frederick William I of Prussia by Dr. Dorwart, Professor of History at the University of Connecticut, fills the gap and is a scholarly contribution, based upon a careful examination of the primary and secondary German sources.

The period dealt with is largely covered by the reigns of the Great Elector, Frederick William (1640-1688), and of King Frederick William I (1713-1740). Dorwart is especially concerned with the latter, "the most talented administrator" produced by the Hohenzollern dynasty. While the volume is not primarily a biography, it contains much biographical material and presents the king in a fairer light than Ergang does in his book, The Potsdam Pöhrer (1941).

The work is divided into eight chapters dealing with such topics as the ministry of justice, the ministry of spiritual affairs, public revenues and civil finances, and military administration and military revenues. Dorwart shows in detail how medieval institutions, in spite of great opposition, were step by step replaced by modern administrative organizations staffed by centrally controlled professional personnel trained in the cameralistic sciences. Thus in 1713, a collegial ministry of finance was established for all civil revenues. The military administration developed separately, but in 1723 the General Superior Finance, War, and Domain Directory was set up as a collegial body over civil and military functions.

The author has included several useful charts showing administrative organization at different dates, an English translation of the Instruction of 1722 creating the General Directory, a critical bibliography and an index. Students of administrative history will find much of interest in Dorwart's monograph.

ROGER H. WELLS
Bryn Mawr College

DE IONGH, JANE. Margaret of Austria, Regent of The Netherlands. Translated from the Dutch by M. D. Herter Norton. Pp. 256. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1953. $4.00.

This charmingly vivid book approaches the familiar characters and events of the sixteenth century from a fresh point of view, that of the life of Margaret of Austria. The gifted and attractive Margaret was a central figure of the century. Daughter of Mary of Burgundy and Emperor Maximilian, married at three to the Dauphin of France and given a polished education in France, married at fifteen to Don Juan, son and heir of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, married for the third time when twenty-one to the pleasure-loving Philbert, Duke of Savoy, Margaret was early experienced in European statecraft and either related to or acquainted with all its principal actors when at the age of twenty-four her father appointed her Regent of his flourishing provinces, the Netherlands. Her letters and papers show a keen understanding of men such as Henry VII of England, to whom her ambitious father almost married her, of Henry VIII and Wolsey who came to her court, of Francis I, and of her only brother Philip the Handsome and his tragic wife Juana, whose children including the future emperor Charles V, were reared in The Netherlands under the supervision of Margaret.

Margaret was one of the best rulers and cleverest stateswomen of the country, using her charms as capably as Queen Elizabeth of England in the next generation. She manipulated European statesmen in the interests of her beloved Netherlands, to the climax in 1529 when she dictated the important Treaty of Cambrai, that "Paix des Dames" which "was to live in history as the masterpiece of Margaret of Austria and the triumph of feminine diplomacy over masculine force."

This book narrates well, if perhaps too briefly, the course of Margaret's life (1480-1530) and her influence upon her times. Its judgments are sure and show the author's capability for synthesis. Perhaps because it was written while the author was working in the Dutch underground during the war, the book makes too little use of the voluminous correspondence between Margaret and her father the Emperor, and of the state papers of the times, all readily available in published form. The book has a bibliography and good pictures, but no notes or direct references to its sources.

Its greatest value to readers of THE ANNALS at this time is in the perspective the book throws upon present day diplomatic patterns and problems. Without reference to anything beyond the sixteenth century, the author describes a maze of intrigue, bluff, manipulation, and power politics in Europe under allegedly irresponsible kings, emperors, and petty nobles, which sounds distressingly familiar to students of twentieth-century European statecraft. Even a casual reader of today's newspapers will see striking parallels and contrasts.

Margaret is described in 1529 as "using her talents to restore to an exhausted and moribund Europe a few moments of peace." The treaty "was to restore the illusion of peace to an afflicted Europe." So even "cold war" and "hot peace" have illustrious historical precedents, and Europe has been "moribund" for a comfortably long time.

OSCAR G. DARLINGTON
Polytechnic Institute of Puerto Rico

HISCOCKS, RICHARD. The Rebirth of Austria. Pp. xii, 263. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $3.50.

The author of this book, now a member of the faculty of the University of Manitoba, served as British Council Representative in Austria from February 1946 to October 1949 and has since revisited the country. He has therefore had direct contact with many of the personages, events, and problems which go into his sympathetic but objective account of the second Austrian Republic. The brief introductory chapter is the least satisfactory in the book, and neither here nor in later chapters does he deal really adequately with the effects of the German occupation and the reaction of the Austrians to Anschluss. The material on the Austrian Resistance Movement is sketchy and hardly sufficient for an over-all evaluation of that movement. The narrative, however, moves surely and clearly in his excellent account of the establishment of the provisional government under the venerable Karl Renner, and through the negotiation of the four-power control agreements under which the Austrian government still functions. How the Russians ever agreed to permit Austrian legislation to go into effect unless vetoed by all four powers within 31 days still remains a mystery, although Hiscocks advances the plausible theory that this was allowed to slip by because the Russians thought all important matters would be the subject of a constitutional amendment, and thus subject to one-power veto.

The establishment of a government and administration which functions throughout Austria, even though limited by four-power action and at times zonal administration, is, of course, the great advantage over conditions in Germany. In contrast to the situation after World War I, when Austria was plagued by bitter party strife, the new Austria emerged with the Socialist and the People's Parties about equal in strength. Under such conditions it was wise not to attempt to form an ordinary majority government with the aid of a few minor groups, but to insist on a "government of concentration" including both of the dominant parties. To rule a country, where class division has split its people into two great camps, "... through one half of the population against the wishes of the other must lead to the jeopardizing and even to the annihilation of democracy" (p. 48). The Russians have never quite recovered from the debacle of the Communist Party in the November 1945 elections. In 1949 the sole Communist included by courtesy in the Cabinet resigned because of opposition to the currency reform law, and he was not replaced.

There are good nontechnical chapters on UNRRA [United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration] and Foreign Relief, Marshall Aid and Economic Recovery, Currency, Prices and Wages, Social Change, and an exceptionally interesting account of the Cultural Revival. Concluding chapters discuss the negotiations for a state treaty, Russian obstruction (which is not so onerous in the political as in the economic sphere), and Austria's clear desire to share in various movements of international co-operation. No mention is made of Austria's participation in the European Payments Union or the international attempts at tariff reduction. The author believes that when independence is restored the new Austria will become a viable state thanks to the combination of modernized and expanded heavy industries (result of Marshall Plan aid) and the return of Russian-seized industries and the increasingly important oil fields.

The book is written without footnotes and is meant to be an informative account for the general reader. This the author has provided in admirable fashion. A good bibliography on postwar Austria and several excellent maps are included.

E. C. HELMREICH

Bowdoin College

OTHER COUNTRIES

Economic Development of British Guiana, The. Report of a mission organized by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development at the request of the Government of British Guiana. Pp. xix, 366. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1953. $6.00.

British Guiana, long neglected, is suddenly getting a lot of attention. Last year Britain suspended the constitution it had just granted the colony, on the ground that bloody revolution was impending. Now comes this report, written before the suspension, but published afterward. The name of Dr. Jagan, which has become familiar to newspaper readers, nowhere appears in its pages, which give a somewhat rosy picture of progress since 1948. Why the years of relative prosperity were also years of spreading radicalism is not explained.

Doubtless there is a connection between the unrest and the existence of this mission. That unrest was due not only to poverty but to the widespread feeling of being stuck in a backwater and getting nowhere. Whatever Dr. Jagan's motives may be, some voters no doubt backed him only with the hope of shocking the government into doing something. If so, they succeeded. This report was hardly out before the Governor announced a program embodying most of its recommendations.

British Guiana might be called a hopeful mess. Poverty and unrest are widespread, yet the resources for raising the standard of living are there. This report, like the earlier one on Surinam, belittles the immediate possibilities of the interior. The inhabitants will not be hauled out of the coastal swamps in which they are rotting and resettled inland. On the contrary, the acreage of agricultural swamp land is to be greatly increased. Nor does the mission propose any large factories or major industries. This is a modest program for expanding current activities and producing locally some consumers' goods hitherto imported. The biggest expenses are for increasing rice output and rebuilding the dreadful roads. No one will get rich that way, but per capita income should rise about 1 per cent a year.

The capital is to come mostly from the government and from abroad. Little local capital has been invested locally. Many companies are foreign owned and much of their earnings are sent home. Some merchants, descendants of immigrants from India, have prospered but retain the Indian preference for conspicuous consumption and hoarding rather than investment. The report reveals that the colony's financial institutions invest most of their assets abroad. So foreign capital is needed not simply because of "poverty," but because money saved in British Guiana has not been invested there. Last year's ruckus will discourage private investors and force the government to fill the resulting gap.

JAMES HOOVER

Ankara, Turkey

GEIGER, THEODORE. Communism Versus Progress in Guatemala. Pp. viii, 90. Washington, D. C.: National Planning Association (Planning Pamphlets, No. 85), 1953. $1.25.

During the postwar era while the United States was growing accustomed to a far-sightedness acquired in fighting Communism on the distant shores of Asia and Europe, it seems to have developed an acute case of myopia regarding a growing problem in its own hemisphere. Only the echoes of Communist rumbles in Guatemala, the most populous country in Central America, have caused "Tio Sam" to look for new bifocals to view this new aspect of the Communist threat as it develops in Latin America.

This little book points up the long history of semi-authoritarian government and ineffective economic institutions which has left underdeveloped Guatemala ripe for a Communist harvest. With an economy rather highly dependent upon foreign investment and foreign markets, with the expanding nationalism of a growing and increasingly dissatisfied middle class, and with a dearth of constructive leadership, conservative or liberal, the country was ready for a radical adjustment. Little wonder then that since the end of the Ubico dictatorship in 1944 a coalition of left wing reform parties has controlled the government. And of greater import, evidence indicates that this coalition has been infiltrated by a numerically insignificant but highly disciplined and politically potent Communist-front party, the Guatemalan Labor Party, the 2,000 members of which have captured the initiative in a government representing over two and a half million people. Surely the goal of the National Planning Association in producing Communism versus Progress in Guatemala, so that "the situation in Guatemala and the application there of Communist techniques of penetration might be better understood," is a worthy one, particularly in that the political and economic conditions in other countries in Latin America are not dissimilar from those found in Guatemala.

Unfortunately, this pamphlet, written for the non-expert (and from its tone for the North American and not for the Latin American, to whom it will often sound patronizing), seeks to provide all of the factors in the economic, social, and political environment which led to the Communist successes in Guatemala. This just cannot be done in 90 pages. Not unexpectedly, the attempt to cover a wide scope in relatively few pages leads to oversimplification and to recurring generalizations. Some of the latter deserve footnoting for further consideration, others simply are not valid. For example, on page 18 it is asserted that "specific application under Communist influence" of measures to improve public welfare, health, and education "seriously threatened the future well-being of the country." Or, on the preceding page, that "semi-literate, economically dependent, and politically inexperienced groups are generally predisposed to vote for the administration in power," in Guatemala "as elsewhere in Latin America." Moreover, the lack of a comprehensive bibliography also detracts from the goal of better understanding of the Guatemalan scene.

In sum, this book is a worthy attempt to supply information on an important but until now virgin subject, but in attempting to do too much it fails to do enough. Until a better study is published, however, it must fill the void.

ROBERT E. SCOTT

University of Illinois

PATTERSON, SHEILA. Colour and Culture in South Africa: A Study of the Status of the Cape Coloured People within the Social Structure of the Union of South Africa. Pp. vi, 402. New York: Grove Press, and Routledge and Kegan Paul, London, 1953. $6.00.

The Cape Coloured people of South Africa, numbering about one million, have been rather neglected by students of the Union's complex ethnic situation. There have been a few good studies of this population such, for example, as Marais's historical work, The Cape Coloured People (1652-1937), and The Report of the Commission of Enquiry regarding the Cape Coloured Population of the Union (U. G. 54-1937). But the present work by Patterson is the first systematic sociological analysis of this fascinating historic group. The author has achieved her stated purpose of writing a "general sociological reference book about the Cape Coloured group, which might serve as a starting-point for more intensive and detailed studies of this group" (p. 11). The report is based on thorough examination of South African library and documentary material and on field interviews in the Union.

As Miss Patterson indicates, the Cape Coloured people are not physically or racially homogeneous. This heterogeneity in physical type is to be expected, considering the diverse ethnic strands intermingled in their past. In the words of the author, they "are the products of an early series of mixed unions, mainly irregular, between Europeans and slaves, Europeans and Hottentots, slaves and Hottentots. The original hybrid groups have been perpetuated, increased and further intermingled by endogamy and cross-breeding, and by additions from the original strains. More recently, the group has been further augmented and further diversified by European-Bantu, Coloured-Bantu and Coloured-Indian crosses, and in addition by innumerable casual sexual contacts with Europeans of all nations" (p. 21).

The major portion of the study is devoted to a detailed analysis of the patterns of differentiation and discrimination as they affect these people in politics, law, administration, economic life, social services, education, and the various facets of social relations. In the main, according to the author, these distinctions are based on values associated with color and are designed to secure and protect the economic interests and status of the European as a white man. The burden of the writer's analysis is that the Coloured people, despite their essentially European culture, are socially marginal and subordinate in status. They hover between the world of the Europeans, or whites, to which they are attached in origin, sympathy, and aspiration; and the world of the Africans, with which they have little in common except their color. The impact of present policy is to further isolate them from the European and compel closer identification with the African. They are the victims, according to Miss Patterson, of a policy designed to establish a "colour-hierarchy."

The author notes some signs of protest among the Coloured people against this policy. She suggests that they are being forced into a position of leadership "amongst the dominated out-groups" and anticipates growing solidarity among the non-European elements. While it may be logical to assume that the Coloured people will assume such leadership there is little evidence that this has in fact occurred. The author's analysis of the background, social characteristics and psychological orientation of the Coloured people would rather suggest that they are not apt to play a major role in the racial struggles of the near future. Apparently they are still too divided socially and subjugated psychologically to be capable of this type of collective action.

WILLIAM O. BROWN

Boston University

BARTLETT, VERNON. Struggle for Africa. Pp. ix, 246. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1953. $3.95.

Mr. Vernon Bartlett, the well-known British journalist, has written a book which may be warmly commended. The bulk of the book is concerned with "black" Africa and its many problems. Mr. Bartlett does not indulge in facile optimism or hasty judgments over the future of Africa. In South Africa, for example, Dr. Malan is faced with a "cruel problem," while "the white settlers of Kenya deserve kinder things than are generally said about them" (p. 171).

In Nigeria and the Gold Coast, the rapid advance towards self-government has created a new and encouraging atmosphere, which has been to some extent cleared of that excessive preoccupation with politics which is the bane of other areas. In Kenya and South Africa, however, the possibility of attaining a satisfactory modus vivendi between the three racial groups is as remote as ever. Mr. Bartlett has the courage of his convictions and supports Professor Keppel-Jones's idea that the Union of South Africa should be replaced by a federation of states each made up of its own racial group. This is the liberal apartheid solution and it deserves the most careful scrutiny.

The weakest part of Mr. Bartlett's book is that dealing with French Africa. The difference between "subject" and "citizen" is hinted at, but no attempt is made to explain the significance of these terms. It would have been valuable also to have learned whether sending African deputies to Paris acts as a political safety-valve, as is often suggested.

In his final chapter the author outlines three possible avenues of profitable advance, if bloodshed is to be avoided. "Two of them are difficult because they deal with mental attitudes, the third demands a sacrifice of national pride" (p. 237). The first is to give credit where credit is due and treat the African as an equal when and where he has shown himself capable and efficient. Secondly, an effort should be made by the African to realize something of the nature of civilization which is so often mistaken and identified with book-learning and the ability to imitate what are merely techniques. Thirdly, Mr. Bartlett considers that colonization and capital investment should be a Western European affair and not the exclusive domain of the occupying power. It is not clear on what grounds Mr. Bartlett supports his belief that Europeans coming from ten countries might attain that racial co-operation which has hitherto eluded those coming from only four of them. But notwithstanding these minor criticisms, Mr. Bartlett's book should be read as a valuable contribution towards a better understanding of Africa.

GEOFFREY F. ENGHOLM

Makerere College

The University College of East Africa

IZZEDDIN, NEJLA. The Arab World: Past, Present, and Future. With a Foreword by Professor William Ernest Hocking. Pp. xiv, 412. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1953. $6.50.

The Arab World stands today on the threshold of a new era. The future of this strategically sensitive area is of importance, not only to the 350 million Muslims and Arabs of the world, but also to America and Western Europe. Dr. Izzeddin's book gives an excellent analysis of the forces at work in the determination of the future and political leanings of this region.

The first half of the book contains a fair account of the Arabs and their lands; the rise and expansion of Islam; the civilization evolved and the impact of that civilization on Europe; the conquest of the Arab countries by the Turks; the awakening of the Arabs in the nineteenth century and the beginning of Western intrusions into this area, with the consequent struggle of the Arabs against European imperialism. Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Palestine, Algiers, Tunis, and Morocco are separately discussed, and the history is vividly brought down to the present: in the political, economic, and educational fields.

The rest of the book, which is both a statement of fact and a challenge, deals with the plans for Arab unity; the part being played by France, Britain, America, and Russia in the Arab World; and the internal forces presently at work in that area. Dr. Izzeddin states her facts and views calmly but clearly and forcefully.

The future of the Arabs depends principally on the use they make of their potentialities, as also on the honesty and fair dealing of the West in their relations with the Arab countries. There is at present much embitterment in the Arab World against the West. For, despite the many good things done by the West for the Arabs, the picture has, alas, been darkened by the Western policies toward Palestine, French atrocities in Tunis and Morocco, so far condoned by America and Western Europe, and the incomprehensibly intransigent attitude of the British towards Egypt and the Suez Canal.

Unless a change is introduced into Western policy towards the Arab countries, which should aim at both redressing the wrongs already made and redefining Western relations with the Arab and Muslim World on a basis of mutual respect and mutual interests, the result may be isolation and estrangement by the Arabs. Voices are already being heard vigorously calling for complete neutrality in the event of a clash between the two rival camps. Dr. Izzeddin would have done well to pay some attention to Islamo-Arab feelings in this direction.

A bibliography would also have aided the reader who might want to pursue the subject further. But this should not detract from the inherent value of the book which should be read by all those interested in the cultural heritage and future of this exceptionally important area, as also in the issue of peace itself.

MUHAMMAD KHALIL

The Royal Cabinet

Benghazi, Libya

JOHNSTON, B. F., with MOSABURO HOSODA and YOSHIO KUSUMI. Japanese Food Management in World War II. Pp. xii, 283. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1953. $7.50.

The techniques for the study of food problems developed so effectively over three decades by the Food Research Institute of Stanford University are here applied with skill and care. Mr. Johnston has a concise and interesting story to tell, and he does it with clarity, objectivity, and careful documentation.

With his main conclusion, that "Deterioration in the quantity and quality of the Japanese diet and the precarious outlook for the maintenance of food rationing appear to have weighed heavily in the decision of the government to surrender in August 1945," one cannot disagree. It should perhaps be noted, however, that the enormous shipping losses and the steady tightening of the Allied blockade, which, as Mr. Johnston accurately observes, gradually brought the importation of food to a virtual standstill in the final weeks of the war, had also, and earlier, brought the importation of vital petroleum (as well as other essentials such as coking coal) to a complete halt, and that the actual lack of fuel probably played as large a role as the near lack of food in the decision to seek an end to the war.

After introductory chapters describing the prewar conditions of Japanese agriculture, trade, and domestic food consumption, Mr. Johnston analyzes the wartime food program, the specific measures taken, and how shortages of fertilizer, labor, and farm implements, and declines in livestock production and in the fish catch affected the Japanese diet and, indeed, the whole wartime economy.

His final chapter, dealing with the post-war period, in which he considers the problems which Japan faces in the years ahead in trying to feed her growing population—now in excess of 87 million—is perhaps the most interesting, and frightening. By 1970 Japan's population will, at minimum estimate be 100 million, at maximum projection, 114 million. While the birth rate over the last few years has been falling, the death rate has been declining even faster. In the 20 years between 1947 and 1967 the number of maturing youths who are seeking employment opportunities will exceed by over 9 million the number who leave the labor force through death or retirement. Will employment expand rapidly enough to absorb this increase? Can productivity in agriculture, after the enormous gains of the last half century which brought food grain yields in Japan almost to the world's highest, be further increased? Mr. Johnston is quite specific in his answer and unfortunately quite pessimistic. "Although future progress in technology may be an important offset to the operation of the principle of diminishing returns in Japan," he declares, "the ratio of farm land to population strongly suggests that a further sizable expansion of the home-grown food supply probably can be achieved only at high cost . . . in general, one is inclined to doubt whether the noteworthy improvements in crop yield achieved over the past half century can be duplicated in future decades." He concludes, as have others previously, that "Japan's own experience during the interwar years, as well as theoretical considerations, point to an enlarged reliance on international trade as the more economical means of obtaining additional food supplies."

JEROME B. COHEN

College of the City of New York

CORRECTION

Dr. Theodor Reik has asked the editors to call attention to the fact that he was erroneously listed as an M.D. rather than as a Ph.D. in the signature to his review of Franz Alexander and Helen Ross's Twenty Years of Psychoanalysis in the January 1954 issue of THE ANNALS.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Ad Hoc Assembly Instructed to Work Out a Draft Treaty Setting up a European Political Community. Draft Treaty embodying the Statute of the European Community: Information and Official Documents of the Constitutional Committee, October 1952-April 1953. Pp. 179. Paris: Secretariat of the Constitutional Committee, no date. No price.

BACH, GEORGE R. Intensive Group Psychotherapy. Pp. xi, 446. New York: Ronald Press Company, 1954. $6.00.

BALDWIN, LELAND D. Recent American History. Pp. 812, xxvii. New York: American Book Company, [c. 1954]. $6.00.

BARRON, MILTON L. The Juvenile in Delinquent Society. Pp. xix, 349, vii. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1954. $5.00.

BETTELHEIM, BRUNO. Symbolic Wounds: Puberty Rites and the Envious Male. Pp. 286. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1954. $4.75.

- BLACKHURST, J. HERBERT. Body-Mind and Creativity. Pp. xi, 186. New York: Philosophical Library, [c. 1954]. $3.00.
- BOEKE, J. H. Economics and Economic Policy of Dual Societies as Exemplified by Indonesia. Pp. x, 324. New York: Institute of Pacific Relations, 1953. $4.50.
- BOLLINGER, LYNN L., and JOHN S. DAY. Management of New Enterprises: A Casebook of Problems on the Establishment and Operation of New Businesses. Pp. viii, 489. Homewood, Ill.: Richard D. Irwin, 1954. $7.35.
- Book of the States, 1954-1955, The*. Volume X. Pp. xi, 676. Chicago: Council of State Governments, [c. 1954]. $10.00 (with 1955 supplement).
- BOWMAN, HENRY A. Marriage for Moderns. Pp. ix, 562. 3d ed. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $5.50.
- BRUUN, GEOFFREY, and HENRY STEELE COM-MAGER. Europe and America Since 1492: Western Civilisation and Its World Influence. Pp. xiv, 907. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1954. $6.75.
- CALDWELL, MORRIS G., and LAURENCE FOSTER (Eds.). Analysis of Social Problems: Supplemented by Case Materials and Selected Readings. Pp. xvi, 715. Harrisburg, Pa.: Stackpole Company, 1954. $6.50.
- CHADWICK, H. M. Early Scotland: The Picts, the Scots & the Welsh of Southern Scotland. Pp. xxxi, 171. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954 (published in England in 1949). $6.00.
- Congressional Quarterly: Almanac 83rd Congress, 1st Session-1953*. Volume IX. Pp. 663. Washington, D. C.: Congressional Quarterly News Features, no date. $17.50.
- COOK, LLOYD, and ELAINE COOK. Intergroup Education. Pp. xv, 392. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $5.50.
- CRONBACH, LEE J. Educational Psychology. Pp. xxvii, 628. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1954. $7.50 trade; $5.50 text.
- DEAN, JOSEPH. Hatred, Ridicule or Contempt: A Book of Libel Cases. Pp. 271. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954 (originally published in England, 1953). $3.75.
- DIENSTEIN, WILLIAM. Are You Guilty? An Introduction to the Administration of Criminal Justice in the United States. Pp. xiv, 184. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C Thomas, 1954. $4.50.
- DRUMMOND, ISABEL. The Sex Paradox. Pp. x, 369. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1953. $5.00.
- ELMER, MANUEL C. First Steps in Social Research—Los Primeros Pasos en el Resumen Social. Pp. viii, 133. Pittsburgh, Pa.: The author, [c. 1954]. No price. Written in both English and Spanish.
- ENGLISH, HORACE B. The Historical Roots of Learning Theory. Pp. 21. New York: Doubleday and Company, 1954. 65 cents.
- FAIRCHILD, FRED ROGERS, NORMAN SYDNEY BUCK, and REUBEN EMANUEL SLESINGER. Principles of Economics. Pp. viii, 780. New York: The Macmillan Company, [c. 1954]. No price.
- FOSTER, WILLIAM Z. The Negro People in American History. Pp. 608. New York: International Publishers, [c. 1954]. $6.00.
- Fünf Jahre Deutsche Mark: Der Wiederaufbau der westdeutschen Wirtschaft seit der Währungsreform*. Herausgegeben vom IFO-Institut für Wirtschaftsforschung, München. Pp. 108. Berlin-Lichterfelde: Verlag Duncker & Humblot, 1954. DM 8.—.
- GEE, WILSON. The Social Economics of Agriculture. Pp. x, 616. New York: The Macmillan Company, [c. 1954]. $6.50.
- GARBER, LEE O. The Yearbook of School Law, 1954. Pp. vi, 119. Philadelphia: The author, 1954. $2.75.
- GRISWOLD, ALFRED WHITNEY. Essays on Education. Pp. xiii, 164. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1954. $2.75.
- HARRIS, L. E. Vermuyden and the Fens: A Study of Sir Cornelius Vermuyden and the Great Level. Pp. 168. London: Cleaver-Hume Press, 1953. 21 s.
- HILL, NORMAN. Contemporary World Politics. Pp. xvi, 714. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $6.00.
- HULTGREN, THOR, assisted by WILLIAM I. GREENWALD. Transport and the State of Trade in Britain. Occasional Paper No. 40. Pp. xii, 114. New York: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1954. $1.50.
- INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT, THE. The Economic Development of Mexico: Report of the Combined Mexican Working Party. Pp. xxiv, 392. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1953. $10.00.
- International Economic Papers, No. 3*. Translations Prepared for the International Economic Association. Edited by Alan T. Peacock, Ralph Turvey, and Elizabeth Henderson. Pp. 255. London, Macmillan & Co., 1953 (distributed in the U. S. by The Macmillan Company, New York, 1954). $3.50 paper.
- JAMES, HARLEAN (Ed.). American Planning and Civic Annual, 1953. Pp. xii, 164.

- Washington, D. C.: American Planning and Civic Association, 1953. $3.00.
- KASUN, JACQUELINE RORABECK. Some Social Aspects of Business Cycles in the Los Angeles Area, 1920-1950. Pp. xiv, 155. Los Angeles, Calif.: Haynes Foundation, 1954. $2.75 cloth; $2.00 paper.
- KHALID, KHALID M. From Here We Start. Translated from the Arabic by Isma'il R. el Faruqi. Near Eastern Translation Program No. 3. Translation of 3d ed. Pp. vi, 165. Washington: American Council of Learned Societies, 1953. $4.00 cloth; $3.00 paper.
- LAMBIE, JOSEPH T., and RICHARD V. CLEMENCE. Economic Change in America: Readings in the Economic History of the United States. Pp. vii, 599. Harrisburg, Pa.: Stackpole Company, 1954. $5.75.
- LANDER, BERNARD. Towards an Understanding of Juvenile Delinquency: A Study of 8,464 Cases of Juvenile Delinquency in Baltimore. Pp. xvi, 143. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $3.00.
- LANDIS, PAUL H. So This Is College. Pp. ix, 205. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $3.00.
- , and PAUL K. HATT. Population Problems: A Cultural Interpretation. Pp. xiv, 554, XL. Rev. ed. New York: American Book Company, [c. 1954]. $6.00.
- LEUBA, CLARENCE. The Natural Man: As Inferred Mainly from Field Studies of Men and Chimpanzees. Pp. x, 70. New York: Doubleday and Company, 1954. 95 cents.
- LEVITT, ALBERT. The President and the International Affairs of the United States. Introduction by Roscoe Pound. Pp. xi, 87. Los Angeles: Parker and Company, 1954. $4.00.
- LIPSON, E. A Short History of Wool and Its Manufacture (Mainly in England). Pp. 205. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $2.50.
- LLOYD, FRANCES. Educating the Sub-normal Child: Aspects of the Work of a Junior School for Educationally Sub-normal Children. Pp. vii, 148. New York: Philosophical Library, [c. 1953]. $3.75.
- LOCKLIN, D. PHILIP. Economics of Transportation. Pp. xiv, 916. 4th ed. Homewood, Ill.: Richard D. Irwin, 1954. $6.50.
- LUNDBERG, GEORGE A., CLARENCE S. SCHRAG, and OTTO N. LARSEN. Sociology. Pp. xxviii, 740. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $6.00.
- MACCOBY, ELEANOR E., and FRANCES FIELDER. Saving Among Upper-income Families in Puerto Rico. Pp. xvii, 165. Rio Piedras, P. R.: University of Puerto Rico Press, [c. 1953]. No price.
- MACIVER, R. M. (Ed.). The Hour of Insight: A Sequel to Moments of Personal Discovery. "Religion and Civilization Series." Pp. xi, 145. New York: Harper & Brothers (for The Institute for Religious and Social Studies), [c. 1954]. $2.00.
- MCLEAN, JOHN G., and ROBERT WM. HAIGH. The Growth of Integrated Oil Companies. Pp. xxiv, 728. Boston, Mass.: Harvard University Graduate School of Business Administration, 1954. $12.00.
- MALLORY, WALTER H. (Ed.). Political Handbook of the World: Parliaments, Parties and Press as of January 1, 1954. Pp. 231. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1954. $3.75.
- MANLY, CHESLEY. The Twenty-Year Revolution from Roosevelt to Eisenhower. Pp. 272. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1954. $4.00.
- MOSHER, FREDERICK C. Program Budgeting: Theory and Practice with particular reference to the U. S. Department of the Army. Pp. xiii, 258. Chicago: Public Administration Service, [c. 1954]. $5.00.
- MURRAY, A. R. M. An Introduction to Political Philosophy. Pp. vii, 240. New York: Philosophical Library, 1953. $4.75.
- MURRAY, GILBERT. Hellenism and the Modern World. Pp. 60. Boston: Beacon Press, 1954. $1.50 cloth; 75 cents paper.
- NEISSER, HANS, and FRANCO MODIGLIANI. National Incomes and International Trade: A Quantitative Analysis. Pp. xviii, 396. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1953. $7.50.
- NEUFELD, MAURICE F. Labor Unions and National Politics in Italian Industrial Plants: A Study of the Development and Functions of Grievance Committees in Italy. Pp. xiv, 146. Ithaca, N. Y.: Institute of International Industrial and Labor Relations, Cornell University, 1954. $2.00.
- NEWBIGIN, LESSLIE. The Household of God. Pp. xiii, 178. New York: Friendship Press, 1954. $2.75.
- NEW YORK TEMPORARY STATE COMMISSION TO STUDY THE ORGANIZATIONAL STRUCTURE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK. Four Steps to Better Government of New York City: A Plan for Action. Part Two. Second and Final Report of the Commission. Pp. 137. Albany, N. Y., 1953. No price.
- OSBORN, ALEX F. Applied Imagination: Principles and Procedures of Creative Thinking. Pp. xvi, 317. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1953. $3.75.

- PODOLSKY, EDWARD. The Jealous Child. Pp. xii, 147. New York: Philosophical Library, [c. 1954]. $3.75.
- (Ed.). Music Therapy. Pp. xii, 335. New York: Philosophical Library, [c. 1954]. No price.
- PRESSOIR, CATTS, ERNST TROUILLOT, and HENOCK TROUILLOT. Historiographie d'Haiti. Pp. 298. Tacubaya, D. F., Mexico: Instituto Panamericano de Geografia e Historia, 1953. $25.00 (m. mex.).
- PRICE, H. H. Some Aspects of the Conflict Between Science and Religion. The Seventh Arthur Stanley Eddington Memorial Lecture, 3 November 1953. Pp. v, 54. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1953. 75 cents.
- ROOT, ROBERT. How to Make Friends Abroad: A Guidebook to Understanding Yourself and Others Overseas. Pp. 119. New York: Association Press, [c. 1954]. $2.00.
- SAPPENFIELD, BERT R. Personality Dynamics: An Integrative Psychology of Adjustment. Pp. xiv, 412, xvi. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1954. $5.50.
- SHAPIRO, HARRY L. Race Mixture. Pp. 55. Paris: UNESCO (distributed in the U. S. by UNESCO Relations Staff, Department of State, Washington, D. C.), 1953. 25 cents.
- SIMPSON, GEORGE. Man in Society: Preface to Sociology and the Social Sciences. Pp. vi, 90. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday & Company, 1954. 95 cents.
- STONE, RICHARD, assisted by D. A. ROWE, W. J. CORLETT, RENÉE HURSTFIELD, and MURIEL POTTER. The Measurement of Consumers' Expenditure and Behaviour in the United Kingdom, 1920-1938. Volume I. Pp. xl, 448. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954. $18.50.
- SWORAKOWSKI, WITOLD S. The Hoover Library Collection on Russia: Collection Survey Number 1. Pp. v, 42. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, [c. 1954]. $1.00.
- TAUSCHER, ANTON. Die Öffentliche Wirtschaft. Pp. xvi, 399. Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1953. DM 24.80.
- TAYLOR, ROBERT J. Western Massachusetts in the Revolution. Pp. x, 227. Providence, R. I.: Brown University Press, 1954. $4.00.
- TRUEBLOOD, ELWYN JUDSON. The Dawn of the Post-Modern Era: Dimensions of Human Life in the Last Half of the Twentieth Century. Pp. xii, 198. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $3.75.
- TUSTIN, ARNOLD. The Mechanism of Economic Systems: An Approach to the Problem of Economic Stabilization from the Point of View of Control-System Engineering. Pp. xi, 161. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $5.00.
- UNITED NATIONS, Department of Social Affairs, Population Division. The Population of Ruanda-Urundi. Population Studies, No. 15. Pp. vi, 37. New York, 1958. 40 cents.
- United Nations Statistical Yearbook, 1953. Fifth Issue. Prepared by the Statistical Office of the United Nations Department of Economic Affairs. Pp. 578. New York: United Nations Publications (distributed by Columbia University Press), 1953. $7.50 cloth; $6.00 paper. In both English and French.
- VAKIL, C. N., D. T. LAKDAWALA, and M. B. DESAI. Economic Survey of Saurashtra. Pp. xv, 664. Bombay: School of Economics and Sociology, University of Bombay, 1953. No price.
- VEDDER, CLYDE B. The Juvenile Offender: Perspective and Readings. Pp. xii, 510. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday and Company, 1954. $6.00.
- WALKER, RICHARD LOUIS. The Multi-State System of Ancient China. Pp. xii, 135. Hamden, Conn.: Shoe String Press, [c. 1953]. $3.50.
- WEIL, SIMONE. Letter to a Priest. [Translated from the French by Arthur Wills.] Pp. 85. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1954. $2.50.
- WILEY, BELL IRVIN. Southern Negroes, 1861-1865. Pp. xiii, 366. 2d ed. New York: Rinehart & Company, 1953. $5.00.
- WILLIAMSON, GEOFFREY. Changing Greenland. Pp. x, 280. New York: Library Publishers, 1954. $3.95.

INDEX

- California correctional system (cont.) prison industries, 25, 60-68
 probation, 51-52
 reception-guidance centers, 54, 55, 65, 86
 recidivism, 46
See also Chino; San Quentin; Soledad
- Camps, 9, 14, 19, 20, 25, 27, 28, 36, 54, 82, 83, 86, 87, 123, 126
- Carroll, Denis, 148
- Case histories and studies of prisoners, 15, 31-32, 131, 161 in the reception center, 53, 56-57, 145-146
See also Presentence investigation
- CASEY, ROY, Catchall Jails, 28-34
- Cells architecture of, 2, 4, 14, 136 equipment and furnishing, 4, 14, 136-137 hours of occupancy of, 4, 21, 22, 23, 125, 135 See also Solitary confinement in reception centers, 55
 life in, described, 20, 22 used to protect prisoners, 20, 144
- Certification, for restoration of rights, 103, 104-105, 111
- Charles Alexander, prince of Lorraine, governor general of the Low Countries, 130
- Charlestown, Massachusetts State Prison, 2-3, 13, 17
- Chillicothe, Ohio, Federal Reformatory, 17, 21
- Chino, California Institution for Men, 14, 80-86 reception center, 54, 55, 86
- Churchill, Winston
 cited, 16
 quoted, 5-6, 8-9
- Cincinnati, Ohio, Prison Congress (1870) and Declaration of Principles, 43, 96, 121, 139
- Citizenship, loss and restoration of, 99, 100, 104, 107, 108-109
- Civil and political rights, 145 of prisoners, 30, 99-111 of suspected criminals, 99
- Civil death, 100, 101, 103, 105, 106, 108, 111
- Civil service and prison personnel, 27, 36, 70
 and prisoners' rights, 102
- Classification, of prisoners, 15, 27, 36, 38, 54, 57, 79, 80, 84, 86, 87, 94 for jails, 30, 31-32
 in Belgium, 131, 133, 138
 in England, 120, 122-124, 127-128
 in France, 141-143, 144-146, 147
 in Sweden, 161
See also Reception-guidance centers
- Clothing of prisoners in jails, 32
 in prisons, 3, 12, 23, 85, 87, 126, 136, 156
 on release, 7-8, 128
- Coal mining, by Belgian prisoners, 133-134, 137
- Collaborators
 in Belgium, 132-135, 137
 in France, 139
- Community, the, see Public, the
- Conditional release, see Parole
- Conditional suspension of punishment, 150-151, 153, 158
See also Probation
- Connecticut, recidivism, 45
- Constitution
 Eighth Amendment, 106
 Fourteenth Amendment, 106
- Coonley, Howard, quoted, 61
- Cooper, Irving Ben, 116
- CORNIL, PAUL, Prison Reform in Belgium
 Since the War, 130-138
- Cornil, Paul, cited, 131, 135
- Corporal punishment, see Whipping
- Corrective training (England), 119, 120, 123, 124, 125, 127-128
- Correspondence of prisoners, 4, 8, 55, 82, 87, 136, 155
- Corsica, 140
- Cost of crime and inadequate correctional work, 24, 39-41, 59, 118, 159 of penal institutional care, 25, 36, 59 for building, 14, 36-37, 40, 87, 159 for operation, 11-12, 24, 28, 36, 37-39, 48, 77, 87, 116, 161 of probation, 116 of the reception process, 58
- Courts and jail population, 29, 34
 and prisoners' rights, 102, 104, 105, 106, 107, 110, 111
 California, commitment to Dept. of Corrections, 86 unwise sentencing, 24, 138
See also Judges; Juvenile courts; Presentence investigation; Sentences; Suit
- Crime causes of, 4, 8, 53, 87, 96, 117
 prevention of, 87, 112
See also Deterrence of crime; Recidivism rates, 2
- Crofton, Walter, 143
- Cronin, A. J., cited, 3
- Custody
 as function of imprisonment, 15, 27, 30, 36, 43, 74, 80, 93, 98, 112, 121, 128 contribution of reception center to, 52, 53
See also Escapes; Maximum security prisons; Medium-security institutions

- Davis, Jerome, cited, 45
- Delierneux, A., Jr., cited, 131
- Democracy, Brandeis on, 8
- Deportation of aliens, 108-109
- Depression, effect on prison labor, 68
- Desertion in time of war, 108
- Detention centers (England), 119, 120
- Deterrence of crime
 as purpose of imprisonment, 2, 4, 5, 8, 9, 42 effect of loss of rights on, 110-111
 penology's failure in, 95
See also Recidivism
- Diagnosis and diagnostic clinics, see Classification; Presentence investigation; Reception-guidance centers
- Dickens, Charles, 10
- Diet, of prisoners
 as cause of riots, 21
 cost of, 12, 37
 in postwar Belgium, 132 in solitary confinement, 83, 106 jail, 33 of 1811 and present, compared, 3, 4 ways of supplementing, 22
- Discipline, in correctional work as primary purpose of imprisonment, 1, 74
See also Punishment directed toward rehabilitation, 2, 5, 7, 8, 43, 81 English standard of, 121 for correctional personnel, 75
 in Belgium, 136
 in France, 143
 in minimum-security prison, 83 laxity in, effect of, 5, 22, 93-94, 97, 98 relation of case histories to, 15
See also Responsibility and self-discipline
- District of Columbia, recidivism, 45
- Divorce, and imprisonment, 101, 103
- Dormitories, prison, 4, 14, 21, 22, 55, 86, 126
- Drugs and liquor, 84
- Ducpétiaux, Édouard, 130-132, 135, 136
- Due process of law, 99, 103, 106
- Dupréel, J., cited, 135, 136
- East, Sir Norwood, cited, 142
- Eastern State Penitentiary, Philadelphia, 14
- Education, in correctional work, 26, 27, 59 criticism of, 1, 6, 22, 49
 expenditures for, 12, 38 for return to society, 6, 7, 8, 48-49 function of reception center in, 52, 55, 56
 in Belgium, 131, 132, 137-138
 in England, 121, 124-126, 128
 in France, 142, 148
 in Sweden, 154, 156
See also School-prisons; Vocational training
- Elliott, Mabel A., cited, 47
- England, correctional system in, 117, 119-129, 131, 160
- ERIKSSON, TORSTEN, Postwar Prison Reform in Sweden, 152-162
- Escapes escape artists, 20, 159 from jails, 32 from juvenile institutions, 2 from prisons, 11, 15, 22, 35, 79, 80, 81, 82-83, 86 warning of, from reception center diagnosis, 52, 53
- EVANS, A. A., Correctional Institution Personnel—Amateurs or Professionals?, 70-78
- Families of prisoners, 6, 7, 52, 82, 83-84, 112, 113, 114, 115, 117, 127, 131, 134, 137, 143, 144, 148
- Farms and farmwork, correctional, 12, 19, 20, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 35, 37, 39, 40, 80, 124, 132
- Federal Bureau of Investigation, arrest reports, as indicator of recidivism, 44
- Federal correctional system appraised, 27, 80 civil service for, 70 escapes, 11
 prison industries, 25, 60 prison life in, 3-4
 recidivism, 45-46
 salaries of personnel, 12-13
See also Alcatraz; Bureau of Prisons; Chilli-cothe; Leavenworth; Seagoville; Terre Haute
- FENTON, NORMAN, The Process of Reception in the Adult Correctional System, 51-58
- Fenton, Norman
 cited, 52
 quoted, 144-145
- Fines, 31, 51, 117
 in England, 117, 119, 120
 in France, 145, 150, 151
 in Sweden, 152-153, 153-154, 155
- Finland, treatment tribunal, 146
- Flynn, Frank T., cited, 60
- Folsom, California State Prison, 79
- Forestry camps, 19, 20, 25, 82, 83, 86, 87
- FOX, SIR LIONEL W., English Prisons Since the War, 119-129
- Fox, Sir Lionel W., cited, 120, 126, 145
- France, prison reform, 139-151
- Franchise, see Voting rights
- French Guiana, 139, 140
- Furloughs (permits) to prisoners (Sweden), 156
- Galway, Edward, 23
- Gambling, in prisons, 23

- Geneva, penal conference (1952) and Standard Minimum Rules, 121, 141, 142, 148
- Genonceaux, P., cited, 135, 136
- Geriatric centers, 126
- GERMAIN, CHARLES, Postwar Prison Reform in France, 139-151
- Germain, Charles, cited, 141, 143, 148
- Ghent, house of correction at, 130
- Gilissen, J., cited, 133
- Glueck, Eleanor T., cited, 46, 47, 48
- Glueck, Sheldon, cited, 46, 47, 48
- Gordon, Charles, cited, 108
- Gordon, Walter, quoted, 115
- Group therapy, 7, 158, 160
- Grünhut, Max, cited, 146
- Guadeloupe, 140
- Guards, prison, 79
- in riots, 18, 19
- on the purpose of imprisonment, 1
- public attitude toward, 70, 72
- qualifications, 7, 26
- relations with inmates, 22, 80, 93-94, 97, 98
- salaries, 12-13
- "trusties" as, 12, 37
- See also Personnel
- Göransson, Hardy, cited, 152
- Habeas corpus writs, 106, 107, 108
- Habitual offenders
- in Belgium, 131, 135
- in England, 119, 126-128
- in France, 139, 142-143, 145, 146
- in Sweden, 152, 154, 161
- See also Preventive detention; Recidivism
- Hague, The, penal congress (1950), 139, 142, 143, 145, 149
- Hanssens, W., cited, 134
- Haviland, John, 14
- Heinze, Robert, 79
- Holland, 17th-century recidivism, 43
- Holtzoff, Alexander, cited, 107
- Hoover, Herbert, quoted, 8
- Hours, of prison personnel, 12-13, 159
- Howard, John, 130
- cited, 130
- Humanitarianism, and deterrence of crime, 2, 4, 94-95, 138
- Hyatt, "Crazy Jack," 19
- Idleness, in prisons, 8, 55, 61, 63, 67-68, 92, 133
- as cause of riots, 7, 20, 22, 24-26, 39-40
- Immigration Act (1917), 108
- Industry, see Business and industry
- Injunctions, 106
- Insane offenders
- disposition of, 19-20, 142, 154, 155
- in riots, 18, 19-20
- Inspection of prisons, 106, 156
- International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, 139, 141
- Bern session (1951), 141
- Congresses, 139, 141, 142, 143, 145, 149
- quoted, 141
- International Society of Criminology, 145, 148
- Interstate Compact for Control of Crime, 36-37
- Ireland, Northern, prison system in, 119, 124
- Isolation, see Solitary confinement
- Ives, George, cited, 43
- Jackson, State Prison of Southern Michigan, 17, 18-20
- Jails, 28-34, 42, 44-45, 46, 51, 55, 112, 113, 114, 123, 146
- Judges
- attitude toward correctional institutions, 59, 92
- French, role in execution of sentence, 140, 141, 144, 146-148
- Swedish, chairman of institutional board, 156
- See also Courts
- Judo, 81
- Jurors, right of prisoners to serve as, 100, 101, 109, 110
- Juvenile courts, 5, 117
- Juvenile delinquency, 2, 5, 34, 47, 51, 140
- See also Young offenders
- Kangaroo courts, 32, 34
- Kendall, Glenn M., cited, 52
- Kilby Prison, Alabama, 23
- Kinberg, O., 158
- KORN, RICHARD, see McCORKLE, LLOYD W., jt. author
- Kutash, Samuel B., editor, 107
- Labor and labor unions, and prison industries, 24-25, 59-68 (passim)
- Labor for prisoners
- contract labor, 10
- hours, 59, 84, 124
- in Belgium, 130, 131, 133-134, 137
- in California, 25, 60-68, 84
- in England, 121, 124, 128
- in France, 140, 143, 144, 149
- in Sweden, 155, 157
- in U. S. federal system, 25, 60
- in U. S. jails, 30-31
- inmate attitudes toward, 79, 91-92
- number of state prisoners employable in prison industries, 59-60
- opposition and criticism, 1, 8, 24-25, 25-26, 40, 59-60, 63, 68, 130
- shortage of, 20, 22, 39
- used for prison maintenance, 39, 40, 52, 53, 63, 67, 84, 124
- used in prison construction, 14, 36, 124
- value and purposes of, 3, 7, 8, 12, 35, 38-40, 48, 59, 63, 84, 134
- World War II production, 24

- See also Farms and farming; Forestry camps; Workmen's compensation
- Laws, Bolitha J., 116
- Lawyers, visits to prisoners, 4, 8, 106
- Legal rights, see Civil and political rights
- Legislation
- and correctional institutions, 8, 15, 24-25, 29, 35, 38, 60, 68, 80
- Criminal Justice Act of 1948 (England), 119, 120, 121, 126, 127
- Prison Act of 1945 (Sweden), 154, 156, 157
- on prisoners' rights, 99-111
- Libraries, prison, 4, 13, 38, 76 (staff), 125, 134
- Licenses, revocation and restoration, see Occupational rights
- Lilar, Albert J., 133
- Lohman, Joseph D., cited, 149
- London
- international course in criminology (1954), 148
- penal congress (1872), 139
- seminar on probation (1952), 150
- Louisiana State Penitentiary, 14, 17
- Luyckx, A., cited, 134
- McCORKLE, LLOYD W., and RICHARD KORN, Resocialization Within Walls, 88-98
- McCorkle, Lloyd W., 160
- MACCORMICK, AUSTIN H., Behind the Prison Riots, 17-27
- McGEE, RICHARD A., Saving Prison Waste, 59-69
- McGee, Richard A., 27, 80
- quoted, 140, 150
- McKelvey, Blake, cited, 60
- McKesson, William B., 116
- M'Naghten rule, 154
- Maintenance, see Operation and maintenance
- Mannheim, Hermann, 148
- cited, 146-147
- Marital rights, and imprisonment, 101-102, 103
- Marneffe, Belgium, 132, 138
- Martinique, 140
- Maryland prison, 13
- Massachusetts
- studies on after-conduct of discharged offenders, 46-47
- See also Charlestown; Norfolk
- Massachusetts State Prison, Charlestown, 2-3, 13, 17
- Maximum-security prisons, 2, 14, 19, 27, 36, 79, 123, 128, 155, 159, 160, 161
- Meals, in correctional institutions, 4, 21, 84, 126, 137
- See also Diet
- Medical services, in correctional work, 4, 8, 12, 13-14, 26, 27, 52, 56, 57-58, 80
- in Belgium, 131, 134-135
- in France, 140, 141, 145-146
- in Sweden, 152, 157, 160
- Medium-security institutions, 17, 36, 79, 80, 122, 123, 135, 161
- Mental defectives, 19, 20, 51, 131, 141
- Mental hospitals
- commitment of prisoners to, 20, 51, 142, 154
- readmission rates, compared to criminal recidivism, 49
- Mentally ill offenders, see Abnormal offenders; Insane offenders; Psychopaths; Sexual problems in prisons
- Merit system, for prison personnel, 12, 70, 78
- Michigan
- forestry camps, 19, 20, 25
- State Hospital, Ionia, 20
- See also Jackson
- Minimum-security institutions, see Open institutions
- Minnesota, studies on after-conduct of discharged offenders, 46-47
- Misdemeanants, institutions for, 28, 29
- See also Jails
- Moral turpitude, crimes involving, 101, 102, 108, 109
- Morris, Norval, cited, 142, 147
- Motion pictures, in prison, 4
- Municipal jails
- estimated number of, 28
- joint or state institutions, 31
- National Jail Association, 29, 33
- National Probation and Parole Association, 104, 116-117
- National Sheriff's Association, 29
- New Jersey
- diagnostic clinics, 52
- group therapy, 7, 160
- riots, 7
- See also Annandale; Trenton
- New York (State)
- recidivism in, 46
- Wallkill Prison, 87
- Newspapers, see Press, the
- Nivelles, Belgium, documentation center, 137-138
- Norfolk, Mass., state prison, 14
- Occupational rights, and imprisonment, 102, 105, 109, 110, 111
- Ohlin, Lloyd E., cited, 149
- Open institutions, 14-15, 27, 36, 79-87
- in Belgium, 132, 135
- in England, 122, 123, 126, 128
- in France, 142, 149
- in Sweden, 155, 156, 159, 161
- See also Camps
- Operation and maintenance, of correctional institutions
- cost
- forestry camps, 87
- jails, 28
- prisons, 11-12, 24, 37-39, 161

Operation and maintenance (cont.)

- studies on jail conditions, 45
- use of prison labor in, 40, 52, 53, 63, 67, 84, 124
- Oregon State Penitentiary, Salem, 21
- Osborne, Thomas Mott, 10
- Osborne Association, 23
- Overcrowding, 11, 20, 21, 22, 24, 26, 32, 112, 114, 122, 126

Pardons

- effect on restoration of rights, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 107-108, 109, 111
- in Sweden, 157
- Parole, 4, 7, 9, 112
 - after-conduct, 47
 - and restoration of rights, 103, 104-105, 109, 110
 - as means of preventing recidivism, 149
 - in California, 55, 57, 58, 63, 64-65, 86, 115-116
 - in England (on conditional license), 127, 128-129
 - in France (conditional release), 140, 143, 144, 146, 149
 - in Sweden, 152, 153-154, 156, 157, 161, 162
 - misuse of, 24, 26
 - pardon as substitute for, 103
 - preparation for, 55, 57
 - supervision of, 8, 36-37, 53, 58, 115-116, 149, 162
 - violation of, 54, 86

Pennsylvania system, in prisons, 14, 143, 152

Personnel, in correctional work

- and firearms, 3, 70, 73, 79, 81, 82
- and riots, 24
- custodial, ratio of, to inmates, 115
- in California and the federal system, 27
- of Roxtuna (Swedish youth prison), 159, 160
- of the reception center, 52, 56-57, 58, 86
- practical judgment test, 72-74
- qualifications, 12, 13, 33, 72-78(passim), 93-98
- relation with inmates, and responsibility for the correctional program, 37, 70, 74-78, 93-94, 98, 121, 125
- shortages, 11, 133
- See also* Civil service; Guards; Hours; Politics; Probation officers; Recruitment; Salaries; Tenure and turnover; Training for correctional work; Wardens
- Philadelphia prisons, 14, 143
- Police (law enforcement officials)
 - and jails, 28, 29, 31, 34
 - arrest reports, 44, 46
- Political rights, see Civil and political rights
- Politics, and correctional work, 7, 10, 13, 22, 24, 25-27, 33, 36, 60, 68, 69, 81, 86
- Poll, M., cited, 131
- Population

- of Belgian penal institutions, 133
- of English penal institutions, 122
- of French prisons, 139, 143
- of Swedish penal institutions, 155
- of U. S. jails, 28-29, 34
- of U. S. prisons, 15, 17, 20, 59
- Pray, Kenneth, 6-7
- Presentence investigation, 51-52, 112-114, 116, 117, 119-120, 145
- President, pardons by, 107-108
- Press, the
 - influence on jail reform, 29, 32
 - newspapers and magazines in prison, 4, 8, 125, 136, 137, 155
- Preventive detention
 - in England, 119, 120, 123, 124, 127, 128
 - in France, 139, 140, 142, 144, 145, 146
 - in Sweden, 156, 160
 - See also* Habitual offenders
- Prins, Adolphe, 131
- Prison, alternatives to, 9, 51, 112-118, 119
 - See also* Camps; Conditional suspension of punishment; Fines; Jails; Mental hospitals; Probation; Semifreedom; Waiver of prosecution
- Prison congresses and conferences, see Cincinnati; International Penal and Penitentiary Commission—Congresses; Geneva
- Prison industries, see Labor for prisoners
- Prison reform, vii, 10, 17, 27, 29-30, 42-43, 60, 77, 87, 94-95, 99-100, 139
 - in Belgium, 130-138
 - in France, 139-151
 - in Sweden, 152-162
- Prison riots, see Riots
- Prisoners
 - inmate social system, 88-97(passim)
 - personalities of, 5, 6, 49
- Probation, 7, 9, 11, 112
 - and prisoners' rights, 104, 109, 110
 - cost of, 116
 - in England, 119, 120, 129
 - in France, 141, 144, 145, 150-151
 - in Sweden, 152, 153, 158
 - increase in, 59
 - desirability of, 117
 - misuse of, 28, 51, 59
 - rates of, 51-52, 114, 117
 - supervision of (probation service), 36-37, 114-117, 144
 - U. N. publication and seminar, 150
- Probation officers
 - and presentence investigation, 51, 113-114, 117
 - case loads, 115, 117
- Professionalism
 - of prison personnel, 24, 26, 27, 70, 75-78
 - of probation officers, 117
- Progressive (Irish) system, 140, 143
- Property rights of prisoners, 99, 100, 103, 105, 106, 110

- Psychiatric diagnosis and treatment, 4, 6, 7, 8, 19-20, 48, 49, 52, 53, 57, 59, 68, 86, 94-98
 - in Belgium, 131
 - in England, 119
 - in France, 142, 146
 - in Sweden, 152, 157, 158, 160, 161
- Psychological services, in correctional work, 19, 48, 56, 86, 94, 120, 140, 146
- Psychopaths, 11, 13, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 53, 154
- Public, the
 - and jails, 29, 30, 32-33, 34, 112, 114
 - and prison industries, 24, 25, 40, 59, 61, 66, 68
 - attitudes toward and responsibility for prisons, 4, 8, 24, 35, 65, 69, 70, 72, 75-76, 87, 92, 112, 114, 121
 - protection of
 - as function of imprisonment and probation, 1, 8, 9, 30, 51, 72, 99, 112-113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 126
 - See also* Custody
 - by deprivation of rights, 105, 109, 110, 111
 - reaction in Belgium, to collaborator-prisoners, 133, 135
- Public office, rights of prisoners to hold, 100, 101, 103, 104, 108, 109, 110
- Public relations, of correctional institutions, 63, 66, 68-69, 75
- Public schools, articles for, made by prison labor, 62
- Punishment
 - deprivation of rights as, 109-110
 - early forms of, 42-43, 95
 - imprisonment as, 1, 2, 5-6, 7, 42-43, 139
 - in relation to rehabilitation, 7, 119, 141, 148
 - labor as, 137
 - not affected by development of legal due process for accused, 99
 - protection of prisoner against cruel and unusual forms, 100, 106-107
- Radio
 - for prisoners, 4, 8, 22, 84, 125, 136
 - influence on jail reform, 29, 32
- Reception-guidance centers, 51-58, 65, 86, 131, 145-146
- Recidivism
 - causes of, 10-11, 42, 48-51, 92, 96, 135
 - compared to mental hospital admissions, 49
 - figures on, 10, 44-47, 86
 - in 17th-century Holland, 43
 - prevention of, vii, 112-113, 116, 138, 149
 - See also* Rehabilitation
 - reduced by presentence investigation, 114
 - Swedish studies on, 158
 - See also* Habitual offenders
- Recreation, of prisoners, 4, 14, 38, 55, 56, 59, 84, 85
 - in Belgium, 134
 - in England, 125-126
 - in Sweden, 156-159
- Recruitment, of prison personnel, 12, 13, 26, 27, 33, 36, 37, 40, 70-71, 72-74, 81, 87, 122, 155
- Reform
 - of prisoners, see Rehabilitation
 - of prisons, see Prison reform
- Rehabilitation
 - and pardons, 103
 - and probation, 114, 117
 - and the humanitarian viewpoint, 94-95
 - as the purpose of correctional work, 2, 8, 15, 27, 30, 37, 43-44, 59, 70, 75, 76, 80, 99, 121, 131, 140, 148-149
 - certificates of, 104-105
 - effect of loss of rights on, 109, 110-111
 - information on, 47-48
 - job performance as test of, 63-64, 92
 - limited efforts toward, 15-16, 37
 - programs in jails, 30-31
 - relation of punishment to, 7, 119, 141, 148
 - "resocialization," possibility and techniques of, 88-98
 - techniques of, 13-14, 48-50, 65-69, 134, 158
 - See also* Education; Medical services; Personnel—relation with inmates; Psychiatric diagnosis and treatment; Recidivism; Responsibility and self-discipline; Vocational training
- Release of prisoners
 - aftercare, 8
 - in England, 121, 127, 128-129
 - in France, 140, 144, 147, 148, 149
 - in Sweden, 152, 162
 - and restoration of rights, 103, 104, 105, 109, 110-111
 - costs of, 37-38
 - equipment for, 7-8, 128
 - fear of, 85
 - job placement on, 25, 63, 64, 65, 66, 84, 92, 129, 148
 - preparation for, 55-56, 79, 83, 87, 125, 127, 142
 - See also* Vocational training
- See also* Parole
- Religious services, for prisoners, 3, 4, 6, 7, 13, 38, 52, 55, 56, 57-58, 59, 84-85, 131, 136
- Research, in penology
 - need for, 8, 10, 41, 49-50, 69, 117, 158
 - reception center's contribution to, 53
 - Swedish projects, 157-158
- Residence rights, 102, 108-109
- Responsibility and self-discipline, in prisoners, development of, 4, 8, 81, 82, 83, 84, 121, 125-126, 127, 148
- Réunion, 140
- Riots, prison, vii, 2, 4, 7, 8, 17-27, 35, 39, 80, 112
- Road building, 12, 25, 39
- Roberts, Owen J., 116

- Robinson, Louis N., cited, 45, 60
 Rollman, Christopher, cited, 2
 Roxtuna, Sweden, youth prison, 138-160
 Rubbens, E., cited, 130
 Runyon, Frank K., quoted, 66-67
- St. Cloud, Minnesota State Reformatory, 47
 Salaries, of correctional personnel, 12-13, 26, 27, 33, 36, 37, 40, 71-72, 78 Sanitation
 in jails, 32
 in modern prison, 4, 136-137
 San Quentin, California State Prison, 21, 25, 62-63, 80, 82
 reception center, 54, 55, 65, 86
 Schlyter, Karl J., 152, 158
 Schlyter Plan of Swedish prison reform, 152-154
 School-prisons, 131, 132, 142, 146
 Scotland, prison system in, 119
 Scouting methods, in school-prisons, 132
 Scudder, Kenyon J., The Open Institution, 19-67
 Scudder, Kenyon, cited, 9, 81, 82
 Scudder, Mrs. Kenyon J., 85
 Seagoville, Tex., Federal Correctional Institution, 14-15, 87
 Segregation, 9, 32, 52, 54, 80, 123, 126, 130, 135, 146
 See also Classification; Solitary confinement Sellin, Thorsten, 139
 cited, 131, 139, 143, 144, 153, 155, 161
 quoted, 43, 149
 Semifreedom, 142, 143, 144, 146, 149
 See also Attendance centers Sentences available range of, 51
 in England, 119, 122
 in France, 141, 145, 150-151 execution of, 2, 11, 146-148 length of, 5
 in England, 120, 122, 123
 short-term, problems of, 31, 120, 140, 141, 143-144, 147, 150, 160 suspended, see Conditional suspension of punishment; Probation
 See also Presentence investigation
 Sexual problems in prisons, 13, 19-23 (passim), 54, 144
 Social work, for prisoners and their families, 4, 6, 7, 52, 57-58, 86, 94, 129, 145-146, 148 Society, see Public, the Soland, California State Prison, 14, 17, 21
 Solitary confinement, 2-3, 83, 106, 130-131, 135, 140, 143, 144, 152, 160
 Spoils system, 13
 Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (Geneva, 1952), 121, 141, 148
 Statutes of limitations, 102, 105
- Stevenson, Adlai E., quoted, 149
 Stockholm
 penal congress (1878), 139
 population, 154
 Suffrage, see Voting rights
 Suit, prisoners' rights to engage in, 100, 101, 105, 106, 107, 110
 Sutherland, Edwin H., cited, 149
 Sweden prison reform, 152-162 size and population, 154
- Tannenbaum, Frank, 1
 TAPPAN, PAUL W., The Legal Rights of Prisoners, 99-111 Tappan, Paul
 cited, 52
 quoted, 103-104
 Teeters, Negley K., cited, 42, 139, 143, 147
 Television
 for prisoners, 84
 influence on jail reform, 29, 32
 Tenure and turnover, of prison personnel, 12, 13, 26, 27, 38, 77-78
 Terre Haute, Ind., U. S. Penitentiary, 14
 Testify, prisoners' rights to, 100, 101, 109
 Textile mill, prison, 25, 62-63
 Tocqueville, Alexis de, 10
 Tombs, the, New York City, 14
 Trade unions, see Labor and labor unions Training for correctional work, 13, 26, 33, 36, 37, 39, 40, 41, 72-74, 81, 87, 122, 140, 157 in-service, 27, 57, 74-75, 76-77, 115, 122
 Training of prisoners, see Vocational training
 Transportation of prisoners, 139, 140
 Treason, and civil and political rights, 101, 108
 Trenton, New Jersey State Prison, 13, 14, 17, 18, 20
 "Trusties," 11, 12, 25
 TURNLAD, WILL C., Substitutes for Imprisonment, 112-118 Turnover, see Tenure and turnover
- Unemployment insurance, for prisoners, 137
 United Nations and penological research, 158
 European Consultative Group on the Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders, 121, 141, 148
 European seminar on probation (London, 1952), 150
 European seminar on the medico-psychological and social examination of offenders (Brussels, 1951), 120, 145
 International Penal and Penitentiary Congress absorbed by, 139, 141
 Probation and Related Measures, 150

- Untried (unsentenced) offenders, 29, 30, 31-32, 119, 120-121, 124, 135, 136, 140
 Utah State Prison, 17
- Van Acker, Achille, 133
 Vandervelde, Emile, 131
 Van Belmont M., cited, 135, 136, 137
 Vervaeck, Louis, 131 Villain XIII, Jean Jacques Philippe, 130
 cited, 130
 Visiting, in correctional institutions at Chino, 82, 83-84, 85
 in Belgium, 136
 in reception centers, 55
 policy in 1811, 3 recent improvements in, 4, 8, 87 special privileges, 23
 Vocational training, for prisoners, 39-40, 49, 52, 55, 56, 57, 59, 87 funds for, 38-39, 41, 68
 in Belgium, 131, 135
 in California, 24-25, 27, 61, 63-67, 84
 in England, 121, 123, 124, 128
 in France, 140, 142, 143, 148
 in Sweden, 152, 154, 159
 in U. S. federal system, 27
 See also Labor for prisoners
 VOLD, GEORGE B., Does the Prison Reform?, 42-50
 Vold, George B., cited, 10
 Voting rights, of prisoners, 100, 101, 103, 104, 109, 110
- Wages for work by prisoners, 4, 84, 124, 134, 144, 156 of prison personnel, see Salaries
 Waiver of prosecution, 153, 155, 157
 Wales, correctional system, 119-129
 Walkkill Prison, N. Y., 87
 Walnut Street Prison, Philadelphia, 143
 Ward, Earl, 18-19
 Wardens, 39, 81 accessibility, 4 and prison discipline, 2-3, 5, 6, 155, 156
 and prisoners' rights, 105, 106, 107
 and public relations, 68
 and riots, 8
 and the reception center, 54 number of, 115 on need for maximum security, 79, 80 on probation, 114, 117 political influence on, 7, 26
 staff relations of, 13, 88
 See also Administration and administrators; Personnel
- Warren, Earl, 66, 80
 Webb, Sidney and Beatrice, quoted, 151
 Western Probation and Parole Association, 115, 116 Whipping as punishment, 42, 43
 in prisons, 4, 23, 95, 106
 Whittier, H. B., cited, 47
 Whittier, John Greenleaf, quoted, 28
 Wickersham Commission (National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement), 1 Widdifield, Samuel W.
 cited, 99
 quoted, 106
 Wilson, Charles E., 116
 Wines, Enoch Cobb, 139 Wines, F. H., cited, 43
 Wisconsin, prison camps, 14
 Women prisoners
 in England, 123, 125, 126
 in Sweden, 155, 160
 Workhouses, 28, 31, 42, 44-45
 Workmen's compensation, for prisoners, 134, 137, 140, 148
 World War I, effect on Belgian penal system, 131-132
 World War II
 contribution of prisoners to, 7, 24 effect on Belgian penal system, 132-135 effect on English penal system, 122 effect on French penal system, 139-140
- Young offenders in Belgium, 130-135 (passim)
 in England
 correctional arrangements for, 119, 120, 122, 123, 128-129 effort to keep out of prison, 119 sentences of, 120
 See also Borstal system
 in France, 142, 144
 in Sweden, 152-157 (passim), 158-160
 in U. S. in jail, 32
 in prison riots, 20-21, 24
 See also Juvenile delinquency
 Youth Authority, 5
- Zetterberg, Herman, 157
 Zetterberg Plan of Swedish prison reform, 157-161
 Zuckerman, S. B., cited, 47

VOLUME 294

JULY 1954

THE ANNALS

of The American Academy of Political and Social Science

THORSTEN SELLIN, Editor

RICHARD D. LAMBERT, Assistant Editor

AMERICA AND A NEW ASIA

Edited by

JAMES C. CHARLESWORTH, Ph.D.

Professor of Political Science

University of Pennsylvania

President, The American Academy of Political and Social Science

69625

SL

M73, NSU

NSU

Copyright 1954, by
THE AMERICAN ACADEMY OF POLITICAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCE
All rights reserved

PHILADELPHIA

1954

BOOK DEPARTMENT

PAGE

ALDEN, JOHN RICHARD. The American Revolution, 1775-1783 . Robert L. Hill-drup	185
ALLEN, G. C., and AUDREY G. DONNITHORNE. Western Enterprise in Far Eastern Economic Development: China and Japan . John E. Orchard	160
ANDERS, WLADYSLAW. Hitler's Defeat in Russia . Axel von dem Bussche	230
BAILEY, SYDNEY D. (Ed.). The Future of the House of Lords . Holden Furber	217
BALLOU, RICHARD BOYD. The Individual and the State: The Modern Challenge to Education . Theodore Brameld	207
BELOFF, MAX. Soviet Policy in the Far East, 1944-1951 . Paul F. Langer	163
BENNETT, M. K. The World's Food: A Study of the Interrelations of World Populations, National Diets, and Food Potentials . Conrad Taeuber	191
BETTS, EDWIN MORRIS (Ed.). Thomas Jefferson's Farm Book: With Commentary and Relevant Extracts from Other Writings . M. L. Wilson	181
BISSON, T. A. Zaibatsu Dissolution in Japan . Jerome B. Cohen	167
BLAKESLEE, GEORGE H. The Far Eastern Commission . A. Viola Smith	168
BRECHER, MICHAEL. The Struggle for Kashmir . Norman D. Palmer	166
BROOKINGS INSTITUTION. Major Problems of United States Foreign Policy, 1954 . Aurie N. Dunlap	172
BULEY, R. CARLYLE. The American Life Convention, 1906-1952 . Alfred Manes	196
BURNS, ARTHUR F. The Frontiers of Economic Knowledge . William Jaffé	190
CAHN, EDMOND (Ed.). Supreme Court and Supreme Law . Bernard F. Cataldo	177
CAIGER, GEORGE (Ed.). The Australian Way of Life . Edward Littlejohn	216
CALVEZ, JEAN-YVES. Droit international et souveraineté en U.R.S.S. John N. Hazard	175
CANTOR, NATHANIEL. The Teaching-Learning Process . Edgar B. Wesley	208
CAROE, OLAF. Soviet Empire: The Turks of Central Asia and Stalinism . Harry N. Howard	223
CHAMBERLAIN, NEIL W., and JANE METZGER SCHILLING. The Impact of Strikes . Joel Seidman	191
CHILDS, MARQUIS W., and DOUGLASS CATER. Ethics in a Business Society . John Ise	196
CHRISTIE, RICHARD, and MARIE JAHODA (Eds.). Studies in the Scope and Method of "The Authoritarian Personality" . M. Brewster Smith	198
COHEN, ELIE A. Human Behavior in the Concentration Camp . Translated by M. H. Braaksma. Malcolm M. Willey	200
COLLIER, ADAM. The Crofting Problem . F. Fraser Darling	219
CZERWONKY, HUGO E. Freedom from Insecurity . Robert L. Patrick	195
DEUTSCHER, ISAAC. The Prophet Armed: Trotsky, 1879-1921 . Bertram D. Wolfe	222
DORRIS, JONATHAN T. Pardon and Amnesty Under Lincoln and Johnson . T. Harry Williams	187
ELSBREE, WILLARD H. Japan's Role in Southeast Asian Nationalist Movements, 1940 to 1945 . Herbert Passin	169
FAIRBANK, JOHN KING. Trade and Diplomacy on the China Coast . C. F. Remer	158
FALARDEAU, JEAN-C. (Ed.). Essais sur le Québec contemporain . S. D. Clark	215

CONTENTS

v

PAGE

FLORENCE, P. SARGANT. The Logic of British and American Industry . Mary E. Murphy	191
FLORINSKY, MICHAEL T. Russia: A History and an Interpretation . Hugh Seton-Watson	220
FREIDEL, FRANK. Franklin D. Roosevelt: The Ordeal . Louis B. Wehle	189
GERSON, LOUIS L. Woodrow Wilson and the Rebirth of Poland, 1914-1920 . W. S. Sworakowski	224
GILLIN, JOHN (Ed.). For a Science of Social Man . Cora Du Bois	197
GLASS, D. V. (Ed.). Introduction to Malthus . Clyde V. Kiser	202
GRAYSON, CARY TRAVERS, JR. Austria's International Position, 1938-1953 . Charles A. Gulick	230
HARBISON, FREDERICK H., and JOHN R. COLEMAN. Working Harmony . Frederick L. Ryan	192
HARDING, D. W. Social Psychology and Individual Values . Henry A. Finch	210
HARRIS, JOSEPH P. The Advice and Consent of the Senate . Dayton D. McKean	178
HARRIS, MARSHALL D. Origin of the Land Tenure System in the United States . Vernon Carstensen	194
HAVIGHURST, ROBERT J., and RUTH ALBRECHT. Older People . Clark Tibbitts	205
HOLCOMBE, A. N., ET AL. The Gaspar G. Bacon Lectures on the Constitution of the United States, 1940-1950 . C. Herman Pritchett	176
Humanism and Education in East and West: An International Round Table Discussion Organized by UNESCO . I. B. Berkson	174
HYMAN, SIDNEY. The American President . C. Perry Patterson	180
JASPERS, KARL. The Origin and Goal of History . Thomas I. Cook	209
KIRBY, E. STUART. Introduction to the Economic History of China . Lien-sheng Yang	160
KOLARZ, WALTER. The Peoples of the Soviet Far East . Harold C. Hinton	164
KOTB, SAYED. Social Justice in Islam . Translated by John B. Hardie. Franz Rosenthal	233
KOUSOULAS, DIMITRIOS G. The Price of Freedom: Greece in World Affairs, 1939-1953 . Theodore I. Geshkoff	226
LEACH, E. R., and RAYMOND FIRTH. Political Systems of Highland Burma . John F. Cady	170
LEBOURDAIS, D. M. Nation of the North: Canada Since Confederation . H. F. Angus	215
LEE, E. G. Christianity and the New Situation . Edward LeRoy Long, Jr.	213
LEITES, NATHAN. A Study of Bolshevism . Frederick L. Schuman	224
LONG, EDWARD LE ROY, JR. Conscience and Compromise: An Approach to Protestant Casuistry . Henry Nelson Wieman	211
MABILEAU, ALBERT. Le Parti libéral dans le système constitutionnel britannique . Carl F. Brand	218
MCCORMICK, RICHARD P. The History of Voting in New Jersey . Ransom E. Noble, Jr.	179
MACMAHON, ARTHUR W. Administration in Foreign Affairs . D. F. Fleming	171
MANGONE, GERARD J. A Short History of International Organization . Oliver Benson	171

	PAGE
MEAD, MARGARET (Ed.). Cultural Patterns and Technical Change . McKim Marriot	199
MEANS, JAMES HOWARD. Doctors, People, and Government . Franz Goldmann	205
MILLER, PAUL A., ET AL. Community Health Action . Marietta Stevenson	206
MOODY, JOSEPH N. (Ed.). Church and Society: Catholic Social and Political Thought and Movements, 1789-1950 . Paul Hanly Furfey	213
MOORE, GLOVER. The Missouri Controversy, 1819-1821 . E. Merton Coulter	186
MOORE, GUY W. The Case of Mrs. Surratt . Ella Lonn	187
MURPHEY, R. Shanghai—Key to Modern China . L. Dudley Stamp	161
NOBLE, VERNON. The Life & Times of George Fox: The Man in Leather Breeches . Clarence E. Pickett	214
NURKSE, RAGNAR. Problems of Capital Formation in Underdeveloped Countries . Helen Lamb	194
PATRICK, REMBERT W. Florida Fiasco . J. Fred Rippey	184
PÖLNITZ, GÖTZ FREIHERR VON. Fugger und Hanse . Arthur Leon Horniker	227
PRESSLY, THOMAS J. Americans Interpret Their Civil War . H. Hale Bellot	183
REID, ED. The Shame of New York . Dayton D. McKean	188
RICHMOND, HERBERT. The Navy as an Instrument of Policy, 1558-1727 . Edited by E. A. Hughes. Gerald S. Graham	217
ROGOFF, NATALIE. Recent Trends in Occupational Mobility . William H. Form	201
ROOSEVELT, THEODORE. The Letters of Theodore Roosevelt . Vols. VII and VIII. Claudius O. Johnson	182
RUCHAMES, LOUIS. Race, Jobs, & Politics: The Story of FEPC . Frank S. Loescher	204
SCHACHT, HJALMAR. 76 Jahre meines Lebens . Eric H. Boehm	228
SCHLESINGER, RUDOLF. Central European Democracy and Its Background . Josef Korbel	231
SMYTH, F. HASTINGS. Sacrifice: A Doctrinal Homily . Justin Wroe Nixon	212
SPELLMAN, HOWARD HILTON. Successful Management of Matrimonial Cases . William M. Kephart	201
STEVENS, LESLIE C. Russian Assignment . A. O. Sarkissian	221
STOTT, D. H. Saving Children from Delinquency . William Healy	203
SWISHER, EARL. China's Management of the American Barbarians . J. K. Fairbank	159
Teaching of the Social Sciences in the United Kingdom, The . Elbridge Sibley	208
THOMAS, S. B. Government and Administration in Communist China . Thomas E. Ennis	162
TUNC, ANDRÉ, and SUZANNE TUNC. Le Système constitutionnel des États-Unis d'Amérique . Vol. I: Histoire constitutionnelle . Shepard B. Clough	178
VEEN, GAELE VAN DER. Aiding Underdeveloped Countries Through International Economic Co-operation . Robert Rockafellow	173
VERNANT, JACQUES. The Refugee in the Post-War World . Oscar Handlin	199
VISSCHER, CHARLES DE. Théories et réalités en droit international public . Richard N. Swift	172
VIVEK. India Without Illusions . Richard L. Park	165
VUCINICH, WAYNE S. Serbia Between East and West . Alex N. Dragnich	226

	PAGE
WARTH, ROBERT D. The Allies and the Russian Revolution from the Fall of the Monarchy to the Peace of Brest-Litovsk . Anatole G. Mazour	223
WEBSTER, NOAH. Letters of Noah Webster . Edited by Harry R. Warfel. John D. Hicks	181
WENDT, LLOYD, and HERMAN KOGAN. Big Bill of Chicago . Dayton D. McKean	188
WHEELER, MORTIMER. The Indus Civilization . W. Norman Brown	164
WHEELER-BENNETT, JOHN W. The Nemesis of Power. The German Army in Politics 1918-1945 . Ralph F. Bischoff	229
WHITE, LEONARD D. The States and the Nation . Charles W. Shull	179
WILGUS, A. CURTIS (Ed.). The Caribbean: Contemporary Trends . Arthur P. Whitaker	232
WOODMASON, CHARLES. The Carolina Backcountry on the Eve of the Revolution . Edited by Richard J. Hooker. Ralph Adams Brown	184
WOOLF, LEONARD. Principia Politica: A Study of Communal Psychology . Leslie M. Pape	211
WRIGHT, ARTHUR F. (Ed.). Studies in Chinese Thought . Kenneth Scott Latourette	162
OTHER BOOKS	234
INDEX	237

The articles appearing in THE ANNALS are indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature and the Industrial Arts Index.

FOREWORD

With the exception of the article by Mr. Tatsuo Morito, the papers in this volume of THE ANNALS are addresses presented at the Annual Meeting of The Academy, April 2 and 3, 1954.

Each of the six sessions of the Annual Meeting was devoted to a single subject—the relations between the United States and a particular country or region in Asia. It was not the purpose of the meeting to air disputes between Asian countries, hence the differences between Pakistan and India, between Israel and her Arab neighbors, between North and South Korea, and between the Republic of China and the People's Republic of China are alluded to but are not elucidated.

Because of the unavoidable absence of Dr. Halford L. Hoskins, his paper was read and discussed by Dr. George A. Coddington, Jr., of the Department of Political Science of the University of Pennsylvania.

JAMES C. CHARLESWORTH

The War for the Mind of Japan

By HARRY EMERSON WILDES

IN this opening article, I want to discuss the impact of the American occupation on Japan and perhaps something about the impact of Japan on Americans.

I want it to be understood that I am not writing either in praise or in condemnation of any individual. The occupation was not one of individuals: the occupation was a joint enterprise, and a joint enterprise not only of Americans and other members of the Allies but also of the Japanese. It is a firm conviction of mine that the success of the occupation was due quite as much to the remarkable co-operation of the Japanese as to the work of the members of the occupation staff—perhaps even more.

Therefore if I say anything in praise of the occupation, it will include praise for the Japanese, and if I say anything in condemnation of the occupation, that, too, must be shared by all of us.

I should like to point out that in the very beginning we entered Japan under difficulties because the Americans and the others who manned the occupation made very little effort to understand the people whose destinies they undertook to govern. Seemingly, we never knew, we never cared to know, the people whom we ruled. Knowing nothing of their customs, their psychologies, their aspirations, we scorned their prejudices as feudalistic; we considered many of their desires as nothing more than a yearning for an outworn ultranationalism. Happily we had passed beyond the point of thinking that Japan was just a land of cherry blossoms and of geisha, but many of us still weltered in the thought that all the Japanese were vicious gangsters. Because we did not know and did not care to know their needs, we alienated many who had been our enemies but who wished to be our friends. And this despite incessant coaching from the sidelines.

Japan wanted us to win this war against the Soviets. But when she tried to help, too many of our occupationnaires suspected insincerity. A few occupationnaires even helped the enemy, though by ignorance, ineptitude, and inadvertence rather than by outright sabotage.

INFORMATION REJECTED

We spurned advice from those who tried to help. The Office of War Information, for example, had marshaled expert anthropologists, psychologists, historians, and other social scientists to study Japan's needs, to study her disciplines, her ethics, her modes of thought. It supplied that very remarkable team with stacks of data and afforded its members a free hand to probe the personalities of the Japanese then living in America.

The result was Ruth Benedict's The Chrysanthemum and the Sword, first issued in mimeographed sheets for occupation information, but the occupation threw away its findings as ill-informed and theoretical. Dr. Benedict, the occupation said, had never set foot in Japan.

That sneer was based on truth. Ruth Benedict had worked with Japanese in California and in various relocation camps. She had read widely in the standard works, in manuscripts, and in great heaps of captured documents, but she had never seen Japan. She had, however, analyzed and evaluated, and her disciplined imagination had taken her deep into the Japanese mind.

AMERICA IN JAPAN

Such scholars as Ruth Benedict, by building on petty and often frivolous incidents, would have found many ways to use Japan's convictions as a force for good, but not the occupation. Scorning the scholarly approach, it saw everything in terms of reactionary plots to bring back ultranationalism. The occupationnaires preferred and trusted unskilled and indiscriminating folk who saw all things American as glistening white, all things Japanese as jet black or blood red. College boys and girls, who lived in American billets, who went in American buses to American offices where they worked only with Americans, who spent their evenings at American clubs or at American movies, who read American magazines and listened to American radio programs, and who, on week ends, went off in American cars to American rest hotels—these were accepted as authorities superior to Ruth Benedict.

Those untrained juveniles—I was among them though not a juvenile—who never saw the real Japan because, in truth, they never left America, controlled all phases of Japan's cultural life. By occupation edict, they could not visit Japanese schools or universities, enter a library, a theater, a music hall, or a movie house, patronize a restaurant, a café, or a hotel, nor, unless in special occupation cars, travel legitimately in Japan. The rule was broken, to be sure, and after four years was relaxed, but only after the occupation, in violation of the orders which created it, had made every effort to prevent legitimate association in Japanese cultural affairs.

In consequence, in warring for Japan's mind, we committed grievous errors for which we have only ourselves to blame. We started out with every possible advantage. We had an honest message to deliver. We controlled every avenue of communication. We had a captive audience which, contrary to all precedent, was eager to hear our message. We had in Washington a skilled and successful propaganda agency which offered its staff for occupation purposes.

Yet with all this in our favor, we discarded our trumps, played badly, and allowed our adversary to pile up points against us.

COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA

To put the matter mildly and charitably, poor judgment let the press, radio, and theater get entirely out of control. These, like the movies, pounded Communism incessantly into Japan's ears. We sat idly by, completely unconcerned. More recently, and to the present day, these same mass media are hammering out anti-American themes, representing our boys in Japan as dope addicts, lechers, sadists, criminals, and degenerates. No one within the occupation ranks then or in official position now could possibly be unaware of this wave of Communist propaganda. Our armed forces even on occasion lent their men and their facilities to Red movie makers for such themes. Despite our powerful, though unacknowledged censorship, this anti-American propaganda has swept unchecked over our captive audience. The failure to check it could only have been due to inattention, to indifference, or to unwillingness to stop its spread. An occupation that was so alert to fears of reviving militarism that it suppressed nascent conservatism was strangely reticent and tolerant towards Communism. True, the worst fever burned itself out in time, and on this the occupation preened itself, but the credit lies elsewhere.

The occupation was complacent about our educational affairs. Here the goal was long range, to indoctrinate the adults of tomorrow by instilling democratic principles into the children of today and, as the results could not be known for years to come, we sat by comfortably, assured that all was well. We worried over the contents of textbooks while Communists mobilized the teachers. We deleted harmless ideas that fanned Japan's legitimate aspirations and her patriotic pride, but we allowed the schools to pass out Communist propaganda leaflets. We forced the schools to pole-vault to heights never seen on land or sea, much less in our own school system. The consequence was chaos.

We let the children hear that established law and order was reactionary, feudal, capitalistic, and intolerable but that "progressivism," which many teachers construed as Communism, not only was desirable and democratic but was favored by the occupation.

We crusaded against Communism, but in doing so we committed tactical and strategic blunders. Ignorant of actual conditions, we appealed to Japanese by using the same arguments, often couched in the very words, that we used at home in warning Americans against the Reds.

U. S. FAILURES IN IMAGINATION

Thus, to people who had never tasted freedom, who knew nothing of justice in its Western sense, who had been taught that individualism was evil and that democracy was degeneration, and by whom Christianity was not generally accepted, we warned that Communism periled all those aims.

Japan remained unmoved by revelations of Russian atheism, of Soviet disregard for private rights, of its hampering of representative government, of its suppression of civil liberties—all these abuses so shocking to Americans but for centuries all too familiar to Japan, left Japan unmoved. Men in military uniform who cherished caste and who, only recently, had plastered Japan with off-limits signs against both Japanese and their own subordinates were ineffective in condemning Russia as undemocratic.

Occupationnaires whose treatment of Japanese officials had been highhanded and whose disregard for Japanese laws and customs had been unconcealed failed to convince Japan that they also would be Russian puppets or to warn against the importation of an alien Soviet culture. Certainly the Japanese were mistaken, but many of them saw but little difference between the Allied occupation of Japan and Russian control of North Korea.

In fact, as Orientals conscious of their Eastern heritage, some of them thrilled at the news that Chinese and Russian armies had driven back American troops. While as Japanese they held contempt for both Chinese and Korean soldiers, the Red victory, however fleeting, proved to them that Asians could stand firm against the whites.

COMMUNISTS EXPLOIT AMERICAN WEAKNESSES

Communist propagandists exploited these opportunities. Pointing to the GI radio programs, to the Westerns, Tarzan, and gangster movies sent by Hollywood for showing in Japan, to comic books, and even to the cowboy suits and toy pistols worn by little boys of the American community, the Reds charged that Americans lacked culture. The arguments would have been laughable had they not been so convincing. The tawdriness, drunkenness, and vice near Army camps, the lack of any real effort to appreciate Japanese culture, the almost insulting assumption that everything American was good and all things Japanese were feudal, worked to Communist advantage.

Not that these accusations were true or that Communists were wholly free from criticism. Soviet soldiers stationed in Japan had been overbearing, grasping, and contemptuous. Their treatment of Japanese employees had been notorious, and their insistence upon Russian superiority had been as constant as it had been loud and boorish. But most of the Soviet soldiers had been withdrawn, and those that remained had segregated themselves. Drunken Russians no longer paraded nightly in the Dai Ichi Hotel corridors chanting "On to Budapest." Red excesses had been forgotten. But GI's continued to stroll hand in hand with pickups on the Ginza or to sprawl, bottle in hand, on cushions of crowded tramcars.

Red propagandists pointed to concrete instances, while Americans preached vaguely about theories unknown to the rank and file of Japanese. We talked of habeas corpus and judicial supremacy, of the Diet as the supreme organ of the state, of equality of opportunity and of the inalienable right of civilians to control the military. But the Reds were quick to point out that we named our housing projects and our movie houses after military heroes and that a huge sign proclaimed that Tokyo's central park was now Doolittle Field, named for the man who had led the firebomb raid on Tokyo.

THE TRAPPINGS OF WESTERNISM

The conservative Japanese strongly resented what seemed to represent the American impact on the Japanese. The fad of Westernism had been indiscriminate; the sense of values was suspended; trappings were more visible than the essentials. To chew gum and drink Coca-Cola, to pet in the romance seats of darkened movie houses, to sing "Buttons and Bows," to wear red shoes and aloha shirts—these seemed important democratic end products.

Aging Diet members and sedate Supreme Court justices sported green paper flowers on Saint Patrick's Day, plodded through square dances, or danced the rumba at the exclusive Esquire Club. A Turkish bath, elaborate to a degree unknown to Istanbul or Ankara, fascinated businessmen who supposed that attractive lady attendants were also available in American establishments.

A virtually new language arose, a fearsome hodgepodge of several tongues, of antiquated slang, of mispronunciation. Après-guerre youth, demanding de-mo-kra-sie hubba-hubba, dammed all the past and asked for skoshi itsy-bitsy hotto-dog and popcorn. And yet in all fairness I should add that even this strange caricature was far superior to any Japanese that I could speak.

Neither the olympian occupation nor the stratospheric Embassy could afford to bend low enough to notice the teenage excesses of the bebop set, but they were singularly silent also in combating Soviet propaganda that the United States was turning Japan into a military base, taking good rice-growing land for baseball fields, mulcting Japan of taxes, and converting free Japan into a colony. None of these charges was true, but we were slow and clumsy in rebutting the untruths.

SOME COMMUNIST BLUNDERS

Luckily for Americans, the Red agents also blundered. They may have been too sure of victory. Had they played their cards well, they might have taken over Japan. General MacArthur was under orders not to interfere with any overturn of government that did not imperil occupation objectives—and Russia was then a full-fledged and equal member of the occupation. But, with incredible maladroitness, Communist leaders, by staging riots and disorders at times when things were running in their favor, sabotaged their own chances. Their encouragement of violence, their plagues of unnecessary strikes, the multiple evidences that Communists who talked so glibly and so convincingly of American colonization were more servile to Russia than loyal to Japan, spoiled their effectiveness as propagandists.

Stupidly, the Reds stressed issues upon which they were at least as vulnerable as the Americans. They ranted against American occupation of Okinawa at a time when Russia held the Kuriles. They raged against American-dictated purges and censorship at the very time the press was filled with tales of Russian thought control. They charged Americans with disturbing the peace while Soviet planes were flying over northern Honshu. They complained of American interference in Japan's domestic affairs at the very time that the Cominform agents were demanding that Japan punish certain Communist leaders for deviationism.

Soviet inconsistencies and blunders, together with the ineptness of Japanese Communist leadership, helped the democratic cause. This was a godsend, since the occupation, by freeing Red leaders and by nursing them into prominence, had given Communists a long head start.

IS IT TOO LATE?

Has that head start been too great? Is the hour now too late? Has Communism won the battle for Japan's mind? Has the occupation's blindness, complacency, and sloth given the Reds a lead that cannot now be overcome?

No one who knows Japan believes that its people favor Communism. The country is not "Red" and does not welcome Red ideas. For more than two centuries it has stood fast against the Russians. It has no love for them today.

But occupation blunders threw Japan into the Russians' arms. We seemed to favor them at first, and though that impression has been clearly counteracted by Washington's more determined stand, we must now, at last, do the work the occupation should have done in 1945 and 1946. We must make clear the fact that democratic policies are not Russian and, for that matter, are not necessarily an American monopoly. We must make clear that the Japanese have also been democratic and not always feudal, an idea that the Potsdam Declaration itself suggested but which the occupation threw aside.

How many occupationnaires made even the slightest use of the magnificent bibliography on Japan's human rights movement which the National Diet Library compiled in 1949? How many even knew that it existed? As propaganda it would have been invaluable, appealing as it did to Japanese patriotism, tradition, and precedent; it won more sympathy than any number of quotations from foreigners of whom the Japanese had never heard. It exerted the same type of appeal as the wartime Office of War Information broadcasts, but was even more effective. Yet the occupation wholly ignored it.

A NEW PROPAGANDA LINE

We must make clear that we do not intend to tell Japan what it must believe. The Russians, whose propaganda has been at least as clumsy as our own, have at least known that they must not force Japan to parrot Soviet slogans. Japanese apologists for Communism believe quite sincerely, however mistakenly, that they can accept Red ideas without losing their own nationality. Americans must convince Japan that her people can be both free-world democrats and Japanese.

We must not condemn everything in the past as wicked, reactionary, and feudalistic. Much in the past was bad and should be discarded, but much, also, was good. Heretofore we have thrown out the baby with the bath. Japanese customs may have differed from our own and we may not have liked them, but Japan has a right to do her own selecting. No one enjoys being ordered about, and Japan, more than any other great peoples of the world, resents being ridiculed, particularly when the orders and the ridicule are in the name of freedom and the preservation of individual dignity.

Prewar militarist stupidities and post-war American policies somehow unwittingly conspired to identify reform with Russian Communism. The highmindedness that thought it beneath its dignity to notice absurd distortions created a situation where Americanism, capitalism, conservatism, and even liberalism had become synonymous with reaction. Japan is not anti-American, but she is opposed to exploitation, to stagnation, and to militarism, and these, without effective protest from us, have been effectively and unjustly pinned to the Stars and Stripes.

We must strike back with the truth about the Rosenbergs, the Hiss case, the color problem, and our relations with Latin America, and we must do it as forcibly, though honestly, as the Soviets have attacked us on these themes. We have a clean case and a just case, but we have been content to assume that we had no pressing need to defend ourselves. We need effective, forceful, consistent, and, above all, interesting propaganda. To rebroadcast a Presidential speech in English is dignified, but when directed to Japan is all too often ineffective.

We started with advantages which we have tossed into the ashcan. We must begin again under handicaps. We must not sit immobile in an ivory tower expecting the Japanese to bow before the shrine. We must get out into the arena, not as a caste apart enjoying special privileges, but as friends and neighbors. The GI with his candy bar, which, incidentally, was illicit, did far more for friendship than the general before whose car all policemen stood at stiff attention. The American "dependents" who loaded up their cars with neighborhood kids to take them to the Ueno Zoo did more to help America than all the formal press releases rolled together. In every natural catastrophe the Army pitched in and helped Japan. This Japan remembers long after the impressive parades have been forgotten.

NOT AS MASTERS

We must lend aid but not as condescension and certainly not as a bait or bribe. If we must stay in Japan for her protection, as well as for our own, we must not stay as aristocrats and masters; we must not expect privileges we do not give to aliens in America. We may not like the laws in force but we must not override them. We may not like the customs but we must observe them. We must not curl the lip and act as though all Japanese are dirty and immoral.

America is God's country but so, too, is Japan. Their folkways are as dear to them as ours to us. She has a right to make her own mistakes as well as to exercise her own good judgment.

Japan will not be moved by legalistic proof that the Russians do not cleave closely to the laws of international relations. She will not be swayed, though, of course, she should be, by long-winded exposition of what the Soviets have done to Poland or to Latvia, nor will she be alarmed to hear that Russian spy rings have been active in Ottawa or Guatemala. These matters must be pinpointed to Japan's own life.

1952 AND 1953

For this reason it was unfortunate that in 1952 and 1953 we let golden opportunities go down the drain. A Communist who was a Russian spy was caught red-handed and we let the Russians turn the case into a national agitation against the American counterintelligence agency which unmasked him. A Russian ship captain landed spies and saboteurs, but when he was arrested we let the Communists divert the matter into a complaint against interference with his freedom. A Japanese whom Northwestern University had supported for fifteen years came out into the open as a Communist and, clutching his Stalin peace prize, attacked the nation where he had been befriended, but we were loath to brand him as an ingrate. A woman who had been deported from America as undesirable spread news that she had been our friend until our wickedness had disillusioned her. But we held our peace about the facts. A high-ranking Russian diplomat in Tokyo deserted to our side and we all but kept the matter secret.

It is high time that we reversed our course in propaganda. We must be truthful and we must be honest. We must not lie nor twist the truth, but we must cease to play the game that helps the Reds prevail. For nine precious years which never can be recovered we have let the Communists carry the attack to us until the score has piled up in their favor. Let us take the initiative and move back to victory.

*Harry Emerson Wildes, Ph.D., is a Philadelphia journalist and writer. He was professor of economics and social sciences at Keio University, Tokyo, in 1924. During World War II he was regional specialist for Japan in the Office of War Information, and between 1946 and 1951 he was in Tokyo with the occupation as chief of the Political and Social Affairs Division, Civil Historical Section, and as a member of the Government Section. He recently served as a Fulbright Visiting Lecturer at the International College of the Sacred Heart, Tokyo, and is author of Social Currents in Japan (1927), Japan in Crisis (1934), Aliens in the East (1937), and Typhoon in Tokyo (1954).*

The Place of Japan in a Resurgent Asia

By SADAŌ IGUCHI

IN the conduct of its foreign policy, each nation seeks its own self-interest. To be sure, all nations profess lofty idealism and, indeed, they may be motivated in varying degrees by sincere altruism. But in the very nature of things, in the final analysis, nations have no choice but to act in accordance with their self-interest. Such are the facts of life; such are the realities of international politics.

But in the pursuit of its self-interest, a nation may have a very narrow vision and seek its advantage at the expense of its neighbors, or it may have a broad conception of self-interest and realize that its own advantage can best be attained by contributing to the welfare of neighboring nations and the general welfare of the world. The first of these two alternatives represents traditional power politics, which ultimately defeats its own ends. The second alternative represents the enlightened statesmanship which we must cultivate if the world is to be saved from catastrophe. Modern science has caused the world to shrink, and today no nation can live unto itself alone. It can find its own well-being only by sharing in the general well-being of the interdependent community of nations. Self-interest dictates, therefore, that the nations of the world develop a consciousness of their mutual and interdependent welfare.

I think I can speak with some conviction on this point because of the recent bitter experiences of my own country. But whatever faults we may have, we Japanese are not the people "who learned nothing and forgot nothing." We have learned our lesson. We have acquired the realization that we can find our self-interest only in the common interest of the world at large, and we are anxious to make our proper contribution to that common interest.

It is in the light of this broad concept of common world interest that Japan today views her position in relation to the new Asia.

As we look at Asia, we see that practically all of the countries of that part of the world are engaged in a great striving for national self-fulfillment. We see a tide of resurgence in which the peoples of Asia are throwing off the impediments of the past and struggling to attain a more complete life of national independence, economic well-being, social justice, personal dignity, and cultural richness. Asia is on the threshold of a revolutionary transformation which will probably go down in history as one of the most inspiring developments of all time.

But because Asia is in the midst of such great change, there is also much confusion. All periods of great change are painful; all periods of great change are accompanied by tension and instability. It should be remembered that only three nations of the Far East—China, Thailand, and Japan—were independent and sovereign states before World War II. All the others—India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Burma, Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, Indonesia, the Philippines, the Republic of Korea—have been recently created as sovereign nations. Such a widespread creation of new nations is a magnificent development, but it is not surprising that the turmoil of creation has not yet all been quieted.

THE ECONOMIC PROBLEM

In this turmoil which besets the new Asia, the most serious aspect, to my mind, is the economic problem. Most of the countries of Asia have rapidly increasing populations which press acutely on the available resources. Modern preventive medicine has reduced the death rates, and the birth rates remain high. Economic productivity has not kept pace with the rise of population. For instance, Asia's production of rice has only within the past few years managed to regain the prewar level. Merely to secure for their people a tolerable livelihood, or even a bare subsistence, entails an almost impossible task for many of the governments of this area.

It has been said that "you cannot teach democracy to a hungry people." Before we can even think of political stability, there must be economic stability; and economic stability requires the attainment of a respectable standard of living by the masses of the peoples of Asia.

Although the countries of Asia are not all at the same stage of economic development—Japan being conspicuously more industrialized than the others—the basic economic needs of all of them are quite similar. All of them must increase productivity and learn to make more complete utilization of their abundant manpower. All of them need more foreign trade—imports to feed and clothe their people and to supply their industries; exports to provide the foreign exchange to pay for the imports. All of them have a crying need for more capital and technical knowledge to develop their unutilized resources.

A CO-OPERATIVE FRONT FOR ASIA

In the face of these common needs, it should be obvious that more can be accomplished by the group working together in co-operation than by each member of the group working independently. Yet very little has been accomplished in the way of co-ordinated planning by the free nations of Asia. Perhaps it is the heritage of a period of colonialism when most of the countries of Asia were separately linked to different colonizing nations of the West. But the fact remains that the more natural intraregional economic relations among the countries of Asia continue to be relatively undeveloped.

Each nation is trying separately to shore up its own economy, to develop its own resources, to educate its own people, and to meet all the myriad other requirements of progress. At the same time, very little consideration is being given to the needs and potentialities of neighboring countries. Except for the United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, which is doing some excellent preliminary work directed toward the development of the economy of all Asia, no real attempt has been made to co-ordinate the efforts of the Asiatic nations for economic development.

I think the moral is obvious. The building of a co-operative front among the free nations of Asia is an absolute prerequisite to the successful solution of the problems we have. The co-operation I envisage would involve the defining of common aims and goals. It would include the practical planning of regional economic development, the drawing up of agreements to bring about an expansion of both intra- and inter-regional trade, and the exchange of ideas and knowledge. Of course, all these objectives cannot be attained in a few months, or even a few years. But a start could—and should—be made now.

To such a co-operative common front in Asia, we Japanese believe we can make a useful and constructive contribution. More than any other country in Asia, Japan possesses industrial technology, managerial experience, and skilled manpower. We have also experience in adapting Western techniques to Asiatic conditions. The industrial economy of Japan is complementary, rather than competitive, to the economics of most of the other Asian nations.

Japan is often called the "workshop of Asia." But we do not believe that the term should be understood in any exclusive sense; all the nations of Asia should be encouraged as rapidly as possible to become likewise "workshops of Asia." But for the present there can be no objections to making full use of what Japan has to offer. Soft goods and utensils made in Japan at prices which the peoples of Asia can afford will contribute to the raising of the standard of living throughout the region. The heavier manufactures of Japan, such as industrial machinery, rolling stock, electrical equipment, and spindles and looms, would help increase the productivity of the underdeveloped areas and would speed the day when all Asia would be one great and prosperous workshop. Food production in Asia would also benefit substantially from the use of Japanese fertilizers, and Japanese agricultural implements have been proved to be particularly suitable for the conditions prevailing in most of the countries of Asia. Japan also possesses many manufacturing techniques, particularly for household industries, which are adaptable to the needs of other Asian countries.

Within our limited capacity, we are willing to export investment capital, although we can only make a small beginning to meet the need. In this connection, the democratic nations of the West could render invaluable help by providing essential developmental capital on the basis of an integrated plan designed to meet the needs of the entire region.

JAPAN'S NEEDS

In all these arrangements, we naturally hope that, as the other parts of Asia prosper, Japan also will benefit. Like many other countries of Asia, Japan suffers from a large and growing population on very limited land. Even more than other countries, Japan suffers from a lack of natural resources. Industrialization and foreign trade are the only means by which Japan can attain a viable economy.

To maintain a minimum standard of living, Japan must import annually well over two billion dollars' worth of raw materials, food, and other necessities. Japan must export enough goods to pay for these imports. But our present trade balance shows a deficit of almost one billion dollars. So far, the difference has been met by the spending of American military forces in Japan and by special procurements for the United Nations effort in Korea, but this source of income is drawing to an end. We must find a solution through the normal channels of international trade.

To expand our foreign trade, we must bring down our present cost of production; for although many Japanese goods are priced at levels which most Asians can afford, other Japanese goods are priced above the competitive range. To bring down our cost of production calls for the modernization of our industrial facilities and of our production techniques, which will require more investment capital. It will also require access to cheaper sources of raw materials. At present many of our bulky imports—such as grains, sugar, cotton, iron ore, coal, and salt—must be brought at great cost from distant and uneconomic sources because sources closer at hand are not open to us. In this connection, it might be noted that in the past our trade with China used to account for about one-third of our total foreign trade. To compensate for the stoppage of this source, we must find adequate opportunities elsewhere. The expanding economies of the free countries of Asia must provide the solution.

We are, therefore, particularly anxious to sit down with the other nations of Asia to work out agreements to liberate international trade from the artificial obstacles which prevent a healthy expansion in the exchange of goods. Efforts of the United States government toward freer trade among the free nations of the world are most reassuring to us, and I hope that they will soon be enabled to minister better to each other's needs. Incidentally, the integration of Japan's industrial and commercial talents to the task of building up the economy of the rest of Asia would reduce the cost to the American taxpayer of American aid to that part of the world.

I am aware that there will be those who will question Japan's sincerity and reliability. But, as Prime Minister Shigeru Yoshida declared on the day the Peace Treaty came into effect, "Our people know that no nation can live unto itself, that no nation can draw dividends unless it invests in the common welfare of humanity." This statement expresses the principle which has come to guide our national foreign policy now.

ON THE FOUNDATION OF THE PAST

I am also aware that Japan is said by some to be taking a course which they characterize as the "reverse course." They imply that Japan is today bent on reversing the course set by the occupation. It should be apparent to any close observer, however, that Japan cannot reverse the course of history, even if she should wish it. And of course she does not wish it. No nation could have experienced war and defeat, and then the tremendous impact of the occupation, without undergoing an irrevocable change. Japan is today going through a period of readjustment. After eight years of the occupation during which the Japanese were guided in new ways, they must now learn anew to guide their own steps. Because we had been under tutelage for so long and because our economy had been supported by outside aid, it was only natural that our people should have become somewhat less self-reliant and accustomed to having others make our decisions for us. This is no reflection whatever on the occupation, whose lofty aims and valuable achievements are above question.

It is inevitable, however, that, in the nature of things, in striking out for themselves our people should grope for a while to find their true bearings. They must rediscover themselves in the light of their newly won rights and their new freedoms.

If there are in Japan today certain tendencies which appear to indicate a return to the past, I would suggest that it is by no means a simple return to the past. It is rather a conscious attempt to take our new bearings in relation to our past. The most valuable and effective of the reforms instituted by the occupation were those which were built solidly on the foundations of our past. No nation can survive if it is cut off completely from its historic roots. What we are now trying to do is to verify what was valid in our past, so that we may build upon it in the present, to the end that we may attain our true destiny in the future. If Japan is to contribute effectively to the strength of the free world, she in her own way must shape her own life to fit into her historic pattern—enriched, however, by her new and broader understanding of the universal principles of humanity, equality and justice.

Japan's present commitment to the ways of democracy is rendered all the more secure by the fact that democracy is no new and alien importation introduced to the Japanese solely by the occupation. Japan has had a representative parliamentary government since 1890 which, although faltering at times, nevertheless developed encouragingly until a notable degree of democracy and liberalism was attained by the middle 1920's. The democratic reforms instituted by the occupation have found ready acceptance because they represent a restoration of a spontaneous indigenous tendency which had been only temporarily subverted.

It will yet take considerable effort before all the neighbors of Japan can willingly trust her. But Japan is making every effort to prove her good faith. For example, she is pushing the negotiations over reparations with the claimant nations with the intention of meeting her responsibilities to the utmost limit possible without wrecking her precarious economy. Japan hopes also to foster mutual confidence by promoting an extensive program of international intellectual exchange. This would involve not only the sharing of industrial techniques but also professor and student exchanges, scientific and business conferences and conventions, exchange of experts in the fine arts as well as in the useful arts, and many other possibilities too numerous to mention. We are confident that if we get to understand each other better, we shall be able to work together more effectively.

THE DEFENSE EFFORT

I have said nothing so far about Japan's defense effort. This subject involves a whole complex of problems which I do not have the time to discuss here. Suffice it to say, however, that Japan is committed to shouldering her due share of the burden of defense against Communist aggression within the limits of her present very modest economic power.

It will be recalled that under the terms of the Security Treaty between Japan and the United States Japan is endeavoring to "increasingly assume responsibility" for her own defense. A Mutual Defense Assistance Agreement has recently been signed in Tokyo under which the United States will aid in building up the defense establishment of Japan.

It is modeled after similar agreements between the United States and many other nations participating in the mutual security programs, and is designed to facilitate the planning of a defense assistance program for Japan. It is a manifestation of Japan's alignment with the free nations of the world and marks another step forward in the ever closer relations between Japan and the United States.

But we Japanese believe that, vital as military defense is, military measures are not the final solution to the Communist menace. Formidable as is the threat of Communist imperialism on the march, just as dangerous is intellectual subversion by Communists from within. Communism feeds on poverty and economic instability, and if we cannot unite to abolish poverty and economic instability, the Communist doctrine will exert a tremendous appeal to peoples who can see no other hope for the future.

Defense measures cannot be pushed faster or farther than the condition of the economy of the country will permit; otherwise we court the risk of a political or economic collapse, or both. Such a catastrophe would defeat all our aims.

Therefore I feel justified in emphasizing economic co-operation as the basic prerequisite for solving the problems not only of Japan but of the new Asia which is emerging today. The vision of a resurgent Asia is an inspiring one, but before the vision can become a reality, the peoples of Asia must join their efforts to attain their common goal. If they do not learn to co-operate, they will succumb one by one to the threat of Communism which lies in wait. A united Asia is a noble ideal, but even more, it is a practical necessity dictated by the enlightened self-interest of all of the free nations of Asia. To that end, the countries of Asia must continue to have the benefit of active American interest and sympathetic effort. Joined together as close partners in the cause of humanity and peace, we can meet with confidence the challenge of our time.

His Excellency Sadao Iguchi, Washington, D. C., is Ambassador of Japan to the United States. After three years' study in Oxford University (1921-1924) Mr. Iguchi held various posts in the diplomatic service, including several in this country. From 1941 to 1946 he served in the Foreign Ministry in Tokyo, resigning in 1946 to become an executive of the Taiyo Fishing Company. In 1951 he was recalled to government service as the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, and in the following year became Japan's Ambassador to Canada, a post he held until his present assignment.

Relations Between Japan and the United States

By ROBERT J. G. McCLURKIN

ARTHUR O'Shaughnessy's Ode, "We are the music-makers," has two particularly famous lines,

"For each age is a dream that is dying,
Or one that is coming to birth."

I have always quarreled somewhat with the use of the conjunction "Or," for in a very real sense each age is both a dying dream and a new one coming to birth. A society which has any vitality at all is a complex and continually changing mixture of the old and the new.

Certainly, Japanese society has abundant vitality. Certainly, also, it is a blending of elements from all the social forces—both internal and external, both from the distant past and from the last decade—which have grown from or converged upon the Japanese people. In Japan in the years from 1945 to 1952 the catalytic action of the occupation speeded almost unbelievably the normal processes of social change.

That occupation had to grow out of and build upon the holocaust of war. It was essentially a military occupation, yet in spite of all the difficulties and all the problems, all the excesses and the failures to understand, the net result of the occupation was good.

The political and economic and social recovery of Japan and the place the country occupies in the world today rest upon two fundamental bases—first, the solid and unrelenting efforts that the Japanese people have put forth and second, what the occupation did. The Americans of the occupation, partly because of their pride in American ways of doing things, partly because they were not all-wise and made mistakes, and partly because American ways were the ways they knew and understood, tried to some extent to create a new Japan in the image of the United States. But six years cannot wipe out the memory and the influence of the thousand which went before. Nor can alien ways completely replace those which are rooted in the native soil. So two years after the Peace Treaty came into force, Japanese society is still in ferment as the new laws and customs and ideas brought by the occupation are being reshaped and modified until they match the fabric of Japanese life.

This process was inevitable, and its results are good. The great strength of Japan lies in the vigor and ingenuity of the people, who for over a hundred years had been struggling to throw off the shackles of an authoritarian society. What the occupation accomplished was to free and strengthen the democratic elements in Japanese life, so that neither militarists nor zaibatsu nor a reactionary bureaucracy could hold them in domination.

However, somewhere in the emotional shock of defeat, the strenuous task of reconstruction, and the eager grasping for something new, something different from a discredited past, the Japanese lost a portion of whatever it was that gave unity of purpose to their society. Now that the occupation is over, the Japanese government and the people are reaching back into the past for the added assurance that comes from doing things in the traditional ways. This does not mean that everything accomplished by the occupation is being upset or reversed, but rather that the Japanese are gradually building a new and typically Japanese democratic society compounded of elements from both East and West.

I believe that the "new" Japanese society will continue to be essentially democratic because the Japanese themselves want it to be, and because the events of the last few years have made it possible. I believe also that it will be stronger and better because it will not be entirely new but will incorporate much of the best from the rich heritage of the Japanese past.

PSYCHOLOGICAL TIES

United States relations with the new Japan rest first of all upon something intangible—a set of psychological and emotional ties which are not less real because they are not susceptible of precise description and analysis.

I suppose that we have always had a special interest in Japan stemming from Commodore Perry's voyage in 1853 and the treaty of peace and unity (Treaty of Kanagawa) signed a hundred years ago. Probably we assume far too much credit for the opening of Japan to the West, for developments within Japan had progressed to the point where the years of ingrown isolation were almost certain to end soon. But it was Commodore Perry's voyage which signaled the end of the isolation, just as it was his voyage which was an early symbol of our own awakening interest in things going on outside the still undeveloped American continent. For both the United States and Japan have been slow to realize the compelling influences of the world around us and to accept the full responsibilities of living in that world.

Recent personal contacts

The psychological and emotional ties between us have grown enormously in strength and number in the past few years because of hundreds upon thousands of individual contacts between Americans and Japanese. Like Brownian motion, which is the never-ceasing, disorderly movement of tiny particles suspended in a liquid or a gas, there is in and between nations a seemingly helter-skelter movement of individuals of all sorts, both shaped by, and shaping, great events. And to carry the simile one step further, just as the motion of the tiny particles can be greatly increased by an outside influence like heat, so the aftermath of the war was a vast increase in what might be called the Brownian motion of individuals between the United States and Japan.

Not all of the contacts were good, not all were friendly and helpful. However, there were a great many contacts, and increasingly as the occupation went on those contacts became wider and more friendly, and the results were better and better. The American soldiers and civilians of the occupation were not concentrated in Tokyo and Yokohama, Kobe and Osaka. They were in all parts of Japan, meeting in daily contacts Japanese farmers and fishermen, miners and textile workers, teachers and local government officials. And still today—two years after the end of the occupation—there are American soldiers and civilians in daily contact with the Japanese. Some of these are United States government officials, some are tourists, some are businessmen and missionaries; by far the largest number are those who are a part of the United States forces stationed in Japan. In the past nine years, more than two million Americans have been in Japan.

Although many of the bad features of American life show up as they always do, perhaps even more plainly, when they are transplanted from the United States, nevertheless this vastly increased contact between the citizens of the two countries has on the whole bred understanding rather than misunderstanding.

I say this in spite of the fact that last summer there was a flare-up in Japan of anti-Americanism, so-called. Actually the Japanese expression for it is idiomatically translated "fed up with Americans." There have been so many of us, for so long, telling them so much, giving them so much advice about how to run their country, that it is small wonder that they feel some sense of surfeit. Nevertheless, the core of truth is that the lasting results of the contacts are good.

Most Americans who have lived and worked in Japan have learned to respect and admire the good qualities of the Japanese character. They have developed an appreciation of Japanese culture. They have built friendships with the Japanese people. Many of these Americans gave all of their energies for a substantial period of time to efforts to help build a new Japan. Thus they have a personal, emotional interest in what happens to the structure which they helped to create.

Intercultural activities

For the belief that this host of individual contacts must have produced a measurable effect upon the United States, there is plenty of evidence. Scarcely a week goes by that the Sunday editions of the New York Times or the Herald Tribune or the Washington Post do not have special articles on Japan. Other examples multiply—the exhibition of Japanese art which toured the United States last year and attracted such large and appreciative crowds, the short stories and articles in the magazines, the movie Rashomon, the success of the Kabuki dance group in this country, the best-selling novel by James Michener. All these things are visible evidence of the pattern of interest that exists.

Nor are the movement and the interest one-sided. There are twenty-three well-patronized American Cultural Centers in Japan in major cities. When it appeared that some of the original occupation centers would have to be closed because of budgetary cuts, local Japanese authorities stepped in to help keep them open. United States documentary motion pictures, distributed through Japanese local governments at a cost to them of a million dollars a year, have a cumulative attendance of 20,000,000 a month in Japan. Japan is one of the largest foreign outlets for motion pictures produced in the United States. Portions of the Voice of America short-wave broadcasts are rebroadcast regularly by the twenty-two new commercial stations in Japan. And Japanese come to the United States, many of them. Students, teachers, labor leaders, and political leaders come here under the exchange of persons program. Businessmen and industrial technicians come to exchange ideas and to develop associations with American firms. Mayors of West Coast United States cities visited Japan last year, and mayors of Japanese cities returned the visit and toured the United States.

Perhaps the point needs no further belaboring. There exists a deep, abiding, and fully reciprocal bond of sympathy and understanding between the United States and Japan, and all relations between the two countries rest upon and are governed by this fact.

COMMUNITY OF NATIONAL INTEREST

The private bond which exists is amply reinforced by a community of national interest, one important aspect of which is a common recognition of the danger of international Communism.

For Japan the threat is even more immediate than it is for the United States, because Japan is the primary Communist goal in the Far East. The Communists covet Japan because of its strategic position in the offshore island defense chain, because of its potential military strength, and most of all because of its industrial potential. They believe that if they could bring Japan within their orbit, the whole balance of power in the Far East would shift in their favor, and it would be only a matter of time until the rest of the Far East would fall to them. They may well be right.

Their ultimate aim is domination of Japan—not neutralization but domination—because the Communists agree thoroughly with at least one biblical dictum, "He that is not with me is against me." But they know that they cannot take Japan over immediately, and they believe that once Japan is neutralized, Communist domination will inevitably follow. So for the present they cultivate interim measures aimed directly at driving wedges between Japan and the United States. Almost every day the Peiping radio and Radio Free Japan, the clandestine radio station somewhere in Communist China which is beamed toward Japan, exhort the Japanese people not to accept military assistance from the United States, to throw out of office elected officials who are friendly to the United States, to make the United States forces in Japan go home, to build trade with the Communist mainland of Asia.

When the Communists attacked Korea they were looking beyond Korea to Japan. When they support the Viet-minh aggression in Indochina, they are thinking not only of control over south-east Asia but also of the fact that Japan needs to buy food and raw materials from there and to sell industrial products in return. They are thinking about Japan. The manner of the getting is irrelevant to them, but they want Japan.

We do not have to rely on second-hand evidence as to Communist intentions. They are explicit. This is Tokuda, secretary-general of the Communist party of Japan, writing in the Cominform Journal in 1952:

... we (the JCP) can instigate the people to participate in anti-American and anti-Yoshida movements. . . . In this connection, we must utilize our legal and illegal press to disseminate the spirit of our party's new platform, particularly the concept of armed struggle, so that we can create a public determination to defend peace, independence, and freedom. Now is the time for all the people to think of arming themselves to meet the plot of the American and Japanese reactionaries, who plan to revive militarism for the purpose of aggression.

And this is Malenkov talking to the Supreme Soviet last August, talking about the task of "normalizing relations with Japan":

Serious obstacles are encountered along this path because the United States of America is pursuing a policy of strangling the national independence of Japan, turning it into a springboard for war. The healthy forces of the Japanese nation recognize, increasingly, that it is essential to overcome the obstacles and uphold national independence.

The Communist line in Japan has changed from armed struggle to popular front; but whether it talks about arming the people to seize power or about "healthy forces" which will "uphold national independence," the object in view is the same—full Communist control of Japan.

Japanese defense forces

The Japanese government recognizes that it is not safe to allow Japan to lie defenseless in the face of this Communist threat, and with our help it is now moving ahead with the strengthening of the Japanese defense establishment. Let me emphasize that both we and the Japanese are thinking exclusively in terms of Japanese forces of a defensive character. Because it is so convenient, people have fallen into the use of the shorthand expression "Japanese rearmament," a term which carries unfortunate connotations of a return to the 1930's. It is especially unfortunate since nothing could be further from Japanese intentions or from ours.

Today the Japanese have a ground force of 110,000 men—out of a population of 87,000,000 people—and small naval and coast guard forces. A year from now they expect to have the beginnings of a three-force defense establishment with a total of about 160,000 men. Although our joint thinking has not gone beyond this year's program, our military experts think that Japan's defense requires it to have eventually a ground force of 325,000 or 350,000 men, a navy consisting mainly of small patrol craft, minelayers, minesweepers, and destroyers, and in time a small jet air force of interceptors and medium bombers for tactical support purposes.

U. S. military assistance

We want to bring our own forces home from Japan as soon as the Japanese have developed their own defensive capabilities to a point where Japan will be safe even though our forces have left. Partly to this end and partly to help build free-world strength, the United States is willing to provide certain military equipment for Japanese ground, sea, and air forces on the same terms and conditions as those under which we are providing similar assistance to other free-world countries. That is the whole meaning of the Mutual Defense Assistance Agreement with Japan, which came into effect on May 1, 1954. But despite the assistance we provide and despite Japan's efforts on her own behalf, for the indefinite future in case of an attack upon the Japanese islands

Japan will need naval and air support from the United States in addition to its own defense forces.

I emphasize that United States military assistance to Japan is not a matter of pure altruism—if, indeed, the pure quality exists. Since the safety of one depends upon the safety of all, when we act to help others we are acting in our own self-interest. Nevertheless, the plain fact is that the others are in danger, too. In an excellent speech in New York on March 18 Ambassador Iguchi underlined the common interests of the United States and Japan. He said:

The interests of Japan have come to coincide with the interests of the United States. . . . We help ourselves by helping each other, and by benefiting each other we contribute to the security and peace of the world. . . . In this common endeavor for our mutual self-preservation, Japan is now ready to contribute her proper share.

This clear recognition of the shared danger, which can be prevented only if we act in concert to prepare against it, is another of the factors underlying relations between the United States and Japan.

ECONOMIC RELATIONS

A third set of factors is economic in nature, for the economic relations between Japan and the United States have great importance for both countries.

The war destroyed many of the old patterns of Japanese trade, and particularly those in which Japan had, in a sense, a captive market and captive sources of raw materials on the Asiatic mainland and in Formosa. These trade patterns have not developed anew. So far as Communist China is concerned, Japan has been co-operating fully with the free world in security trade controls and has, in fact, maintained stricter controls than any other industrial country except the United States and Canada, which have complete embargoes. This action on the part of Japan has been a major contribution to the defense of the free world.

However, Japan must import nearly all of the principal raw materials of its industry and 20 per cent of its food supply, and in the postwar period Japan has turned to the United States as a major source of supply. In the calendar year 1953, Japan spent 700 million dollars to purchase products in the United States. Japan was our best foreign customer for cotton and soybeans; our second best foreign customer for wheat, rice, barley, and bituminous coal. For all of these products and for corn, hides and skins, capital goods, automobiles, oil, and iron ore, the United States was Japan's principal supplier.

To look at the other side of the coin, the United States was Japan's best foreign customer, buying a wide variety of products ranging from silk and china and tuna fish to toys and gadgets. But whereas Japan bought from us to the extent of 700 million dollars, our commercial trade purchases in Japan amounted to only 260 million dollars.

Japan's trade deficit

Unfortunately that story is generally true of Japanese foreign trade. Japan, which can earn its way in the world only by buying raw materials and exporting manufactured products, had in 1953 a commercial trade deficit of one billion dollars. The reasons are various. Curiously enough to those who remember the prewar period, the Japanese in many fields of manufacture—steel is one of the most important—are priced out of the market because of obsolescent machinery and outdated industrial techniques, the high cost of raw materials many of which must be hauled long distances to Japan, and internal inflation. In addition, in spite of the present situation there is sufficient fear of Japanese competition so that many nations are reluctant to allow trade with Japan to develop freely. To some degree, this fear and the concomitant reluctance exist within the United States.

The problem of Japanese trade is one which the Japanese and the free world must face. Fortunately we have a little time, because the expenditures of the United States in Japan, most of which will continue for a while and which result chiefly from the presence of our forces there, have been large enough to cover nearly all of the Japanese commercial trade deficit. But these expenditures will not continue forever. If in the meantime Japanese trade does not develop to a point where the Japanese economy can stand on its own feet, there will be a serious threat of lowered standards of living in Japan and economic collapse. And the inevitable result would be a vastly increased risk of internal Communist subversion.

Even if all controls over trade with the Soviet bloc were removed, and even if it were possible for the Japanese to do business on reasonable terms with the Communists instead of having the business and the trade used as a political weapon against them, trade with Communist areas would make up only a portion of the Japanese trade deficit. So most of the answer must be found elsewhere.

A part of the answer is the responsibility of the Japanese themselves. They will need to call upon all of their own reserves of determination and ingenuity and take those rigorous measures which will be effective in reducing costs of production and improving their competitive position. Their "austerity budget" for the fiscal year which is just beginning is a noteworthy step in this direction. In addition, the creation within Japan of an improved climate for foreign investment would help to overcome the shortage of capital in Japan.

Free world markets

The second part of the answer lies with the rest of us. No matter how great the efforts the Japanese put forth, they will not suffice unless the Japanese are allowed to buy and sell freely in world markets on the same fair and competitive terms as anyone else. One natural trading area for Japan is southeast Asia, and trade with that area has already recovered to prewar levels. But that is not enough. It is only as the co-operative efforts of the whole free world and of the southeast Asian countries produce rising living standards and an expanding economy in that area that the possibilities will be created for southeast Asia to have an expanding and mutually profitable trade with Japan and other free world countries.

However, by talking about Japan's natural area of trade with southeast Asia, the United States cannot shirk its own responsibility. Japan's commercial trade deficit with the United States last year was 440 million dollars, and the United States must do its full part in helping the development of Japanese trade, not only by encouraging others to open their markets to Japanese products, but by giving Japan a fair opportunity to sell its products in the United States.

President Eisenhower, in his recent message to Congress on foreign economic policy, gave special recognition to the necessity of dealing with the problem of Japanese trade with the United States. And in keeping with his message I emphasize the necessity for mutuality in trade relations between sovereign states. The United States and the rest of the free world need Japan as a customer; the United States and the rest of the free world must therefore buy from Japan.

TREATIES AND AGREEMENTS

The prophet Amos asked, "Can two walk together, except they be agreed?" In the world today Japan and the United States are walking together because of a fundamental community of interests. However, the very complexity of the relationships between a nation of 87,000,000 people and one of 160,000,000 makes necessary a full and complete understanding and agreement if the two nations are to continue to walk together in amity and common purpose.

These understandings, so necessary to relations between the United States and Japan, are embodied in many carefully negotiated treaties and agreements. They vary in nature and breadth from the multilateral Peace Treaty to an agreement for the reimbursement of shipwreck expenses. Two of them are concerned with the prevention of double taxation of individuals or businesses who might otherwise be considered subject to both tax jurisdictions. Another one spells out the precise rights and privileges which the citizens of one country will enjoy while sojourning or doing business in the other country. Still another sets the terms and conditions under which military assistance will be provided. And so on and on. These are the ground rules under which the relations are conducted.

A listing of these treaties and agreements in force as of April 1, 1954, reveals something of their scope and variety.

Postwar bilateral agreements between the United States and Japan

1. Fulbright Agreement
2. Security Treaty

3. Administrative Agreement (the detailed implementing agreement for the Security Treaty)
4. Reciprocal Waiver of Non-Immigrant Visa Fees
5. Taxation Relief for Expenditures Made by the United States in Japan under the Mutual Security Program
6. Charter Party Agreement (Agreement re Loan of Naval Vessels)
7. Agreement on Sharing of Claims Costs under Article 18, Administrative Agreement
8. Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation
9. Civil Air Transport Agreement
10. Copyright Agreement
11. Transfer of Amami Oshima Islands
12. Technical Missions by Japan to Study Production of Defense Equipment and Supplies
13. Mutual Defense Assistance Agreements
 - Mutual Defense Assistance Agreement
 - Purchase Agreement (with respect to surplus agricultural products under Section 550 of the Mutual Security Act)
 - Agreement Regarding Guaranty of Investments
 - Agreement on Economic Arrangements

Prewar treaties between Japan and the United States, revived or continued in force pursuant to Article 7 (a) of the San Francisco Treaty

1. Treaty Relating to Extradition of Criminals
2. Supplementary Convention Relating to Extradition of Criminals
3. Arrangements for Direct Exchange of Information Regarding Traffic in Narcotic Drugs
4. Arrangement for Exchange of Information Relating to Seizure of Illicit Narcotic Drugs and to Persons Engaged in the Illicit Traffic
5. Convention and Additional Conventions for the Exchange of Money Orders
6. Parcel Post Agreement with Detailed Regulations

7. Arrangements Relating to Perpetual Leaseholds
8. Convention for the Prevention of Smuggling of Intoxicating Liquors
9. Arrangement Relating to Reciprocal Exemption from Taxation of Income from the Operation of Merchant Vessels

Postwar multilateral agreements to which Japan and the United States are parties

1. Treaty of Peace with Japan
2. Settlement of Disputes Arising under Article 15 (a) of Treaty of Peace with Japan
3. North Pacific Fisheries Convention
4. United Nations Forces Agreement
5. World Health Organization
6. World Meteorological Organization
7. Narcotic Drugs Protocols
 - Amending the Agreements, Conventions and Protocols of January 23, 1912, February 11, 1925, February 19, 1925, July 13, 1931, November 27, 1931, and June 26, 1936
 - International Control of Drugs Outside the Scope of the Convention of July 13, 1931, as amended
8. International Office of Public Health Protocol
9. Agreement Revising and Renewing the International Wheat Agreement
10. International Rice Commission
11. Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labor Organization
12. International Bank for Reconstruction and Development Agreement
13. International Monetary Fund Agreement
14. Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council
15. Fur Seals Agreement (Research Programs in North Pacific Ocean)
16. Universal Postal Union
17. International Civil Aviation Convention
18. International Whaling Convention
19. United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization
20. International Telecommunications Convention
21. Safety of Life at Sea Convention

International organizations set up before or during the war in which the United States is a member and in which Japan has revived its membership

1. Permanent Court of Arbitration
2. International Bureau of Weights and Measures
3. International Cotton Advisory Committee
4. International Council of Scientific Unions and Associated Unions
5. International Hydrographic Bureau
6. International Union of Travel Organizations
7. International Union for the Protection of Industrial Property
8. International Union for the Publication of Customs Tariffs
9. International Wheat Council
10. Rubber Study Group

Bases of good agreements

Fundamentally, all these treaties and agreements have three things in common with all other good agreements. First, every good agreement is a fair bargain. It has advantages and disadvantages for each side. Neither side gets everything it wants. Each side is therefore paying a tangible or intangible price for what it gets. Second, all agreements, good or bad, rest upon consent, every bit as certainly as do the relations between a government and its subjects. Agreements are good as long as the parties have an interest in preserving them and as long as the advantages gained seem to outweigh the disadvantages incurred as part of the bargain. As Machiavelli said:

Not only do princes pay no attention to pledges which they have been forced to give, when that force has ceased to exist, but they frequently disregard equally all other promises, when the motives that induced them no longer prevail.

Third, all good agreements should be written flexibly, so that with the passage of time and the inevitable changes in the specific conditions which existed when they were written, their terms will not constitute a rigid impediment to the peaceful readjustments necessary to meet the changed conditions. This point of view, not new, was developed very effectively in a book written in the 1930's called War, Peace, and Change.¹ Unlike many authors, the author of this work subsequently not only had an opportunity to put his ideas into practice in international affairs, but also lived up to the principles he had earlier espoused. The Japanese Peace Treaty, which he negotiated, stands as the living embodiment of those principles.

Nine years ago the United States and Japan were still at war. In the years since, we have developed deep, extensive, and friendly relationships predicated upon a wide range of common interests. I know of no comparable example in the history of nations.

We have many current problems and difficulties, and doubtless we shall find a full quota of new ones in the years ahead. If we can face them with candor and with mutual understanding and respect, the United States and Japan will continue to walk together in international affairs. And if we do so, it will augur well for the future of the world.

¹ John Foster Dulles, New York: Harper & Brothers, 1939.

Robert J. G. McClurkin, Washington, D. C., is Acting Director of the Office of North-east Asian Affairs of the Department of State. Earlier government service was with the Board of Economic Warfare and Foreign Economic Administration (1942-45), the Aircraft Division of the Office of the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner, as Deputy Director and Director (1945-46), and the Economic Bureau of the Civil Aeronautics Board, as Assistant Director and Director (1946-51).

Japan and the Two Worlds

By TATSUO MORITO

JAPAN, at present, has completely lost her prewar position as one of the "big three" or "big five" powers. She is now a small state just recovering her independence—an imperfect independence, both politically and economically. However, what attitude she will assume towards problems arising from the existence of two conflicting worlds will be significant not only to herself but to the whole world situation.

First, it will be significant because of her position in the balance of power between the two groups of states. It is true, of course, that Japan, like Germany, cannot take the initiative in post-war international politics. Neither can be more than the object of power politics. However, Japan's geographical location at a strategic point and her industrial potential, due in part to her hard-working, trained, skillful manpower, have made the small state very attractive to each of the two worlds. Accordingly, each rivals the other in seeking to win Japan to its side. It has been said that the final aim of the struggle for Korea was to secure Japan.

In such a political situation Japan can no longer remain passive. Now is the time for her to take a definite stand and to play an active role in world politics. Only by doing so can she prove her real worth. The whole world is watching with keen interest to see what stand she will take.

Second, Japan's position as the decisive factor in the balance of the two worlds means not only that of power or strategy but also that of culture and economy—that is, civilization in general. Therefore, her choice will bring about important consequences in international relations.

Third, which side Japan will choose will influence not only international relations but also Japan's own domestic government, and even her fate as an independent state. As is often said, the foreign policy and the domestic government of a state are closely related to and reflected in each other. But in the case of Japan the relation between the two is unequal, the former having far more weight than the latter. This inequality is due, on the one hand, to the degradation of Japan into a defeated and powerless state and, on the other, to the development of world affairs toward closer interdependence, or even unity, of states.

Thus it is not too much to say that Japan's choice of which world to stand by will determine her future course and fate, both internal and external.

JAPAN'S CHOICE

The more important to the world situation Japan's attitude is, the more resolutely as well as prudently must the Japanese people make up their mind. How, then, should the Japanese people solve the grave problem they are confronted with? What solutions are they contemplating?

My opinion is summarized here. In order to realize the peaceful world order which Japan holds as her supreme ideal, the Japanese people must not fail to take into account the reality of international relations, that is, the reality of power relations among states. However, the Japanese people, and perhaps other Asian peoples also, are inexperienced and untrained in seeing the real state of affairs in international politics. Generalization rather than individualization is more familiar in the thinking of Asian peoples in general. Therefore, the old-fashioned utopianism which is now outdated in the Western world of socialism is still popular and influential among peace advocates in Japan.

Since it is difficult for the Japanese to penetrate the realities of international power relations, two theories of peace are often proposed as alternatives instead of close and exact investigation into international politics: one is absolute pacifism and the other, Marxism or economic determinism.

Absolute pacifism

Absolute pacifism is based on the traditional belief in human reason. It derives its basic principle from the idea of liberalism, which regards human reason as supreme and almighty and asserts that once the inherent reasonableness of mankind has been awakened, permanent peace can be brought about immediately. Advocates of absolute pacifism are opposed to the view that a peaceful order can be established only after various obstacles to peace have been removed and conditions of peace fulfilled. In other words, they consider the ideal of peace and non-violence not only the goal of a peace movement, but the beginning and the method as well.

If we put aside re-examination of the premise, it seems rather easy for Japan to steer her course in accordance with absolute pacifism.

Economic determinism

Economic determinism develops from Marxian dialectic materialism applied to the evolution of capitalist society. It prophesies the inevitable disintegration from within of the capitalist economic structure. On the other hand, Marxian political theory leads not to the peaceful coexistence of the two worlds, but to the class struggle, not only domestic but also international. Therefore, Marxian determinism, it seems to me, indicates the direction not of peace but of world-wide class war in the final stage of evolution of capitalist society. However, detailed discussions about Marxian political theory need not be entered into here.

What I wish to point out is the fact that the evolution of capitalist society seems to indicate a movement toward peace and prosperity rather than toward struggle and disintegration. This fact seems to me to prove the fallacy of Marxian theory. Moreover, Marxism advances no definite criticism of the so-called "backward socialism," a term applied to a half-feudalistic, half-agricultural society, while it presents a very elaborate analysis of advanced industrial society. In a backward society that had not been completely released from the feudal regime and accordingly had not fully enjoyed liberalism and democracy, totalitarianism grew influential, and still remains so to some extent even now, as the basic principle of domestic government and world politics. Marxism lacks a clear analysis of the evolution of such a backward socialist system.

Further, it must be pointed out as an evident proof of the one-sidedness of Marxian theory that despite its exaggeration of the warlikeness and aggressiveness of capitalist states neither recognition nor criticism is voiced about the same or more intensified tendencies in the totalitarian camp.

As we have seen above, both absolute pacifism and Marxian determinism present various weak points as the basis of peace and accordingly as a guide of Japan's future international course. However, we must not ignore the importance of human reason as the motive power of historical evolution, nor, at the same time, the contribution of Marxian theory in analyzing the structure of capitalist economy. What I wish to emphasize here is that neither from the standpoint of economic determinism nor from the standpoint of absolute pacifism is it easy or simple to probe the real international situation precisely and to find Japan's right course in the future.

International realities

Very complicated and difficult though the task is, I do not think it impossible. The antagonism of the two worlds is, in its essence, that of power—of political power in the broadest sense, which is based upon a synthesis of military, political, economic, and spiritual powers. Therefore, it is essential for Japan to analyze correctly the complicated power relations around her and her own political and economic strength, in order to decide which side she should stand by.

We, the people of Japan, are prone to consider the international situation, especially the power relations surrounding Japan, from a single point of view, in other words, to see only the aspect that is hopeful and convenient to us and to ignore the other. Herein lies one grave danger. But there is another danger far more serious. It is the over- or underestimating of Japan's national power by the Japanese themselves.

Such a tendency is more or less natural, even unavoidable, in a state which has undergone an unprecedented catastrophe such as the defeat. Having no exact judgment of the true national power, people make serious mistakes—either having far-reaching ambitions beyond their means or losing their spirit of self-help and independence. In neither way can Japan recover her honorable international status and live respected as a peace-loving, independent state.

JAPAN'S FUTURE COURSE

Various views are advocated as to Japan's future course in an international society divided into two worlds. They can however, I think, be classified into five categories, as follows: (1) Japan should be a member of the group of conservative liberal states; (2) she should be a member of the group of progressive liberal states; (3) she should be a neutral state; (4) she should join the third-power group; (5) she should co-operate with the "peace powers." As applied to the postwar foreign policy and peace movement of Japan, views (1) and (2) insist on "majority peace," that is, Japan's Peace Treaty concluded with the democratic states, while the other three emphasize "over-all peace," that is, a treaty with all states. Such a classification may be deduced not only from the basic theories but also from the line-up of political leaders and peace advocates.

Opinions that Japan should be a member of the group of liberal states are based on analysis of, and respect for, the circumstances brought about by the Japanese Peace Treaty and the United States-Japanese Security Treaty, by Japan's new foreign relations in the political, economic, cultural, and other fields resulting from her defeat and occupation by Allied forces, and by the policy of postwar Japan as contrasted with her prewar course. Such opinions are, of course, to some extent colored by the Americophile and Russophobe national feeling of the Japanese people. Advocates of this view assert that only through membership in the group of liberal states can Japan find the best way not only of achieving her independence and security but also of promoting world peace.

Some assert that Japan should stand by the conservative liberal states. These people put more emphasis on the capitalist system of the liberal regime than on the democratic aspect. Therefore, conservative parties which desire the preservation of the status quo are the main advocates of this opinion.

Those favoring membership in the group of progressive liberal states are opposed to these conservatives. They criticize the status quo both domestic and international as incompatible with justice, and intend to reform it gradually by peaceful means. They recognize the political principle and structure of democracy as the means of achieving reformation, or, so to speak, peaceful revolution. They do not stick to the capitalist regime as an eternal and basic political principle of liberal states. Only through membership in the group of such progressive democratic states, they argue, can Japan secure independence and prosperity. This point of view is opposed not only to the conservative one but also to the other three views. It is most strongly supported by right-wing socialists and democratic socialists.

CAN JAPAN REMAIN NEUTRAL?

The following three views were proposed after Japan's desire for a peace treaty with all states proved to be unrealizable as Realpolitik. Therefore they are, it can be said, variants of Japan's insistence on over-all peace, and have both the strong and the weak points of their origin. The feature common to all of the three views is opposition to the liberal-state group, some showing anti-American feeling and others pro-Russian and Communistic tendencies.

The first variant of the insistence on peace with all states was the advocacy of Japanese neutrality. According to this point of view, the best way for Japan to secure independence and peace is to remain neutral, never joining either of the two worlds. The idea was suggested originally by General Mac-

Arthur's denomination of Japan as the "Switzerland on the Pacific." Now, however, it has diverged from its origin. It is accompanied by criticism of the unconditional Americophile attitude of some Japanese political leaders.

Advocates of neutrality oppose the rearmament of Japan on the ground that there is no danger of Japan's being attacked or invaded so long as she remains neutral, not allying herself with either of the two worlds. They argue also that Japan, by keeping herself aloof from the two camps, can be free from the influences of either party, and can go her own way—the third and better way of adopting the advantages and improving on the shortcomings of both worlds. Furthermore, they expect that Japan, through her neutral stand, may keep free from involvement in war even if it breaks out. Thus they conclude that neutrality will bring to Japan peace and prosperity.

It would hardly be possible for the defeated Japanese people to find a more attractive course than neutrality. In reality, however, the neutrality theory is, as is generally known, substantially the conceptual pacifism supported by idealistic liberalists and left-wing socialists or the disguised strategy of Communists and their sympathizers.

SHOULD JAPAN SIDE WITH THE THIRD-POWER GROUP?

The idea of the third-power group is an attempt to get over the utopianism of the neutrality theory and to make it realizable. I may be blamed for using the word "idea," for the theory of the third-power group is no longer a mere conceptual idea isolated from the reality of international power relations. It is a definite Realpolitik supported by a group of influential states steering neither the liberal nor the Communist course but a third and peaceful course. Those states are India, as the leader and other Asian and Arabian countries. The theory of the "third powers" is becoming influential even to some extent, it is said, in the Latin American republics and recently in a part of Western Europe also.

Thus the peace theory and movement of the third-power group are more or less influential in every region of the globe, and Japan is no exception. Advocates in Japan, with ready belief in future peace based on the third road, insist on Japan's affiliation and co-operation with the third-power group, instead of the conclusion of military agreement with or the grant of strategic bases to either one of the two worlds.

JAPAN AND THE "PEACE POWERS"

Since Japan has recovered her independence by concluding a peace treaty with liberal states, Communists and their supporters have recently changed their strategy. Formerly they supported the theory of neutrality or the third-power group, which they utilized as disguised instruments for nourishing anti-American and pro-Russian national feeling. However, they have now abandoned such indirect strategy. They have become critical of the neutrality policy and third-power advocacy and have made their Communistic attitude clear. Their new disguise is the banner of the "peace powers" which the General Council of Trade Unions and other pro-Communist organizations in Japan are flying.

It is natural that the Communistic and pro-Communist stand should be incompatible with that of neutrality or the third-power group. With the end of the Allied occupation and the increase of Communistic tendencies in the third-power movement in Japan, Communists and their co-operators were unmasked. They have now quit pretending to support neutrality or third powers. However, they still need a disguise, lest they should be exposed to the strong anti-Communist national feeling of the Japanese people, and that disguise is the banner of the "peace powers" which they are deliberately flying.

PRESUPPOSITIONS

Which of these five positions should Japan prefer? The answer will vary according to the ideal society the answerer contemplates establishing and his judgment on the political situation, especially the political relations of Japan at home and abroad. I am of the opinion that we, the Japanese people, should rebuild our new Japan on the basis of democracy, peace, culture, and welfare as the new Constitution definitely indicates, that we should steer our new course on this principle as an independent state in international society.

My conclusion, however, presupposes that the antagonism of the two worlds will not be dissolved in the near future, even though it may be weakened to some extent. If the antagonism could be actually dissolved the situation would be utterly different, and the problem of the choice of position would become meaningless. Nor do I anticipate an immediate revolution of Japan's governmental form and foreign policy. If I did, my conclusion would also naturally be different.

The most essential task for us, I repeatedly emphasize, is to probe correctly the status and weight of Japan in international politics. If we fail to do so, any aspiration or policy, however far-reaching and lofty it may be, will not only be a mere conceptual ideal but will also lead our country in a wrong direction.

UTOPIAN NEUTRALITY

Of these five views on Japan's future course, the most attractive to those who are not practical but yet are eager to pursue peace is advocacy of a neutral

Japan. This is proved by the fact that the theory of neutrality is supported by many young people, women, and religionists. However, more and more people have come to realize that however attractive the image of the "Switzerland on the Pacific" may be, in the twentieth century it can be nothing more than a utopia. The reason may be well understood by considering the fact that there could scarcely be a more difficult task for Japan than to conclude a neutrality pact with both of the opposing two worlds; or, if the pact itself could be concluded, it could hardly be observed because of Japan's strategic importance. Moreover, like the security system, neutrality is already out of date now that an organization such as the United Nations and the idea of world government have appeared before the footlights of the international political scene.

Accordingly the advocates of neutrality have changed their project into the third-power system, such as that of India, or the isolation system such as that of Sweden. But it is very doubtful that the proposal of world peace by a separate state can bear effective fruit in an international situation where the antagonism of the two worlds is so intense that the evolution of world history may be determined by it. If it is considered calmly, everyone will deny the possibility. I, too, feel so, especially in the case of Japan, a state not only defeated and powerless, but also suspected by other states as to the validity of her desire for peace because of her foreign policies in the past. Nothing will more endanger the future of the Japanese nation than to embark on such an unstable neutrality policy.

THE THIRD-POWER GROUP

The theory of the third-power group seems to cover the weak point of the neutrality policy, for there will, no doubt, be formed a third-power group strong enough to meet the power of the United States of America or Russia, if Asian and Arabian states are allied under the leadership of China and India, with Latin American republics and some East and North European states joining in, and if, further, British and French co-operation could be counted on. In fact such a tendency has made its appearance in various regions and to various extents, and even seems to be increasing in strength. These facts, it seems to me, have substituted realizability for the utopianism of the neutrality theory and have inspired it with a new life. In this sense, I have no hesitation in recognizing that the theory of the third-power group deserves our respectful attention as a practical development of the neutrality theory.

We should investigate carefully, not in the light of hope but with a cool head, the plan of Realpolitik based on the theory of the third powers. To my great regret, however, there is not space here for a detailed argument, but I shall try to outline the essential points.

It is true that the states mentioned above feel dissatisfaction with the global policies of both America and Russia and have general antipathies to both countries also. Can they then be united in a third group with political power strong enough to check either America or Russia, or perhaps both? Speaking frankly, I cannot help feeling a great doubt in this respect. Can Red China and India, for instance, join hands with each other, breaking away from the Communist group and from the British Commonwealth, respectively, to form a third group? I cannot suppose it. Nor will Great Britain and her dominions, or yet the North European states, leave their democratic league to enter a third camp. The same can be said concerning the Latin American republics.

It may be concluded, therefore, that as a problem of reality those willing to combine themselves into the third alignment are only the southeast Asian and Arabian states, with India as their head. By themselves alone, can they make an influential third group? The strongest bond between them may be their common antipathy to European and American imperialism. Their inner motive to ally themselves with one another seems not so strong. In addition, the national power of each of them is too weak to cope with the power politics of the two worlds.

Weak points of the contemplated Asian-Arabian third alignment will be understood from remarks of Premier Nehru of India who, being fully aware of the situation of those states, recognizes clearly their lack of power. Further, India herself as a whole will, it can be estimated, remain a member of the liberal group as a member of the British Commonwealth, despite her repeated declaration.

As long as the reality of the third-power group is so uncertain, the peace policy based upon it cannot be stable and reliable.

THE COMMUNIST ALTERNATIVE

Since the peace policy of neutrality cannot be relied upon as practical politics, there is no other way Japan can choose except to stand by the side of one of the two main groups—Communist or liberal. We must abandon the attitude of irresponsible onlookers and have conviction and courage in choosing our way. We must select the practical way, even though it is a next to best, instead of the abstract best.

As a problem of practical politics, Japan cannot choose the way to the Communist group, for it is impossible for Japan to do so. Japan's policies both foreign and domestic throughout prewar and postwar periods prove that Japan is an anti-Communist state. If Japan with such a historical background should happen to enter the Communist group, it would be necessary for Japan to undergo a revolutionary change in her international and domestic policies. That means a fundamental change not only of Japanese foreign relations but also of her form of government, namely, the abolition of the Tenno rule and the adoption of a totalitarian system in every field, which would entirely destroy, perhaps with violence, the newly born, postwar democratic Japan. Such a drastic revolution of both government and foreign relations can never be easily effected.

Even putting aside these difficulties, conversion to the Communist side is not per se desirable for Japan.

ALIGNMENT WITH THE LIBERAL GROUP

Not only from the viewpoint of her historical background but also from that of the reconstruction of her future, Japan should prefer the liberal group rather than the Communist bloc. I feel that through affiliation with the liberal group Japan is most likely to contribute effectively to world peace as well as to secure her own independence.

The antagonism and rivalry between the two worlds will never cease substantially, I think, as long as the fundamental ideology of Communism remains unchanged. Declarations of peace and coexistence by Stalin and Malenkov cannot be effective in resolving the struggle. The antagonism, however, will not lead to a World War III fought with such destructive weapons as the hydrogen and atomic bombs, so it may be possible to call even such a state of antagonism "peace and coexistence" if people wish to do so. It is lacking, however, in the basic condition of peace, that is, the spirit of mutual understanding, confidence, and co-operation. Therefore, it can be nothing more than a cold peace and accordingly is a cold war.

In such an international situation of cold peace, Japan should stand by the side of the liberal states, strengthen their power, and contribute to promotion of the peace and welfare of mankind. Why? The reasons are as follows:

1. The group of liberal states guarantees far more freedom to member states than the totalitarian group does. It must be recognized, of course, that in the liberal bloc also each member state is obliged to assume responsibilities, large or small according to the circumstances. Surveyed as a whole, however, liberal states can and do enjoy far more freedom than member states of the Communist bloc. This is evidenced by the fact that members of the British Commonwealth, including India, some North European states, and even Titoist Yugoslavia belong to the liberals, and also by a comparison of conditions in Japan and West Germany with those in East Germany.

Economic aid

2. Japan very keenly desires the investment of foreign capital in order to achieve the reconstruction and modernization of her economy, especially her industry, as the accumulation of Japanese capital is limited and poor. Therefore, we must join hands with such a state as will lend the necessary capital, with no ambition, or as little as possible, to hold political sway over our country.

The liberal bloc under the leadership of the United States is, needless to say, superior to the Communist states on the first issue. In regard to the second matter, it may be asserted that the traditional imperialistic policy of advanced Western states has made them less generous than Russia. In respect to this economic foreign policy, it must be observed that a reduction of control over colonies by advanced imperialistic powers is the general tendency of the post-war international situation. Therefore we should be careful not to consider international mutual aids among interdependent countries in the coming world similar to colonial domination in the past.

As for the Russian attitude concerning economic aid to her satellite states, she not only holds political sway over them but also engages in economic exploitation far more severe than that of the capitalist states. East Germany and Czechoslovakia can be mentioned as examples. It is reported that the revolt which took place in Middle and East Europe last year and other social disturbances there were the result of poverty and the lack of freedom caused by the exploitation and suppression of Communistic totalitarianism in its foreign application.

Remarks of the political leaders of Yugoslavia who succeeded in getting loans from both America and Russia in recent years may be worth listening to. They said that the American way of economic expansion is less imperialistic and less exploiting than any other imperialistic policy; especially as compared with the Russian method that of the United States is preferable. They pointed out that the Russian way of exporting capital usually demands the importing state to accept various feudalistic conditions, such as partial military occupation, political control by bureaucratic and police powers, suppression of democratic tendencies, establishment of a puppet government, and so forth. This may be a good lesson in comparing the attitude toward economic aid of both blocs and may explain the term "Red Imperialism."

Dignity of the human being

3. In respect to ideology and culture also I prefer the liberal world to the totalitarian. In the free world the core of belief and culture is the freedom and dignity of the human being, even if this ideal happens sometimes to be somewhat deformed. On the other hand, in the Communist world the dignity and freedom of the human being are forcibly suppressed under the pressure of technology and authoritarianism. This situation is due to the hurried construction of socialism in a region where the economic system and belief in human rights are backward. People who have once enjoyed human liberty and human rights can never live desirable lives in the culture of backward socialism.

Fears

Preferable though affiliation with the liberal bloc may be, I cannot close my eyes to some possible dangers. They are, as is often pointed out, that Japan, by joining the group of liberal states, may become a munition factory or a source of manpower in the East, and finally become involved in war, or that Japan may degenerate into a colony, enslaved and exploited, or that the capitalist system in Japan may be consolidated and democratization prevented, so that she comes to play the role of agent for suppressing the emancipation of nations in the East.

These may be, of course, extreme fears. But some of them are not groundless and might develop into reality. However, the dangers would be far graver if we entered the Communist camp.

Progressive growth

How could these dangers for Japan be prevented? I assert, by enlightening the liberal states so that they would not remain conservative, sticking to the status quo, but would evolve toward that progressive international society which can and does apply the principle of human dignity and liberty to ever changing world affairs. I suggest the following five points to promote progressive growth of the liberal states:

1. Each member of the liberal group should have the necessary minimum armament to defend herself and the group against attack and aggression both direct and indirect by other states and, at the same time, should have no intention of aggression toward other states. In other words, we must hold not to absolute pacifism, but to realistic pacifism.

2. Advanced and wealthy states, not adhering inflexibly to the capitalist régime, should promote the realization of that peaceful social reformation called for by the imperative of social justice. Especially is it essential to help the evolutionary development of states into welfare states.

3. The more advanced states must help reform the systems of government in Asian and African countries, adopting a democratic overseas policy based upon the principle of interdependence and international mutual aid. Through such reformation those advanced states should realize, in peace, the aspiration for political revolution of backward people in those areas.

4. In domestic administration, each member state of the liberal group should fulfill the revolution of humanity, that is, the restoration of the human consciousness to a condition of human dignity and liberty—in fine, the perfect observation of the spirit of democracy. The greatest evil of modern civilization lies in the suppression of genuine humanity by the increased pressure and mechanism of materialism and by the concentration of power in a small part of society. This tendency is not a feature of capitalist society only, but is likewise outstanding in Communist society. In other words, it is the deplorable evil commonly felt in regard to both capitalist and Communist society.

5. The structure of the group of liberal states is different from that of the Communistic alignment. The former is pluralistic and dynamic; the latter, unified and totalitarian. The liberal bloc should express the superiority of its composition.

The perfect realization of the above five points will make the liberal bloc superior to the Communist group. More than that, it will make possible political contact and economic and cultural interchange between the two worlds through the channel of the United Nations and other international organizations, or through treaties and agreements. So long as the superiority of free states can be maintained, the position and prestige of the United Nations will be raised, for the liberal camp is always the eager supporter of the United Nations.

A THIRD IDEOLOGICAL POWER

In the world of the liberal states, the progressive tendency is stronger than attachment to the status quo. Accordingly, the liberal world is far more flexible and elastic than the totalitarian world. This results from the difference of composition in the two worlds. I believe it is possible for the free world to adapt itself to new circumstances.

However, some progressive states of the free world seem recently to have interest in, or even to approve, the proposal made by Premier Nehru of India for the formation of a third region, a proposal which is a revised edition of the third powers. I hesitate to agree with such an opinion, for it entails a double danger: on the one hand, it cannot make those states powerful enough to cope with either or both of two giants; on the other, it decreases the strength of the free world. The desirable thing at the present state of evolution of world history is, as I have already pointed out, consolidation of the group of liberal states and increase in their progressiveness; dissolution of the cold peace under the superiority of the free world; and the opening of mutual understanding and co-operation between the two camps, as a first step leading to true world peace.

We, at the same time, sincerely look forward to the rise of progressive states in the Communist bloc also. As such progressive powers become influential, the nature of that side will, I hope, change, and a seed of true peace be sown.

In conclusion, the way Japan should go between the two worlds is neither the way to neutrality nor to the third powers, much less the way to the Communist side, but the way to the liberal bloc, to contribute to the promotion of its consolidation and progressiveness. If there is anyone who wishes to use the term "the third" in advocating a peace schedule to secure Japan's independence and safety, he must use it in the meaning neither of a third power opposing the two giants, nor of a third area playing the role of a neutral zone or a buffer state, but of a third ideological power in the countries on both sides of the two worlds pushing the world they belong to towards peace and progress. I mean here by the term "third" a synthesis of both capitalist and Communist ideologies.

Tatsuo Morito is president of Hiroshima University, Japan. Formerly Minister of Education, he is a member of the Japanese National Commission of UNESCO and attended the conference in Paris last year. He has written a number of books on social problems.

A Brief for Korea

By ROBERT T. OLIVER

THE Korean situation has so often been called "difficult and confusing" that I think I should warn you in advance that in my view the basic issues are inescapably simple and clear cut. In my judgment we Americans have tended to label the Korean problem as being difficult to understand when what we really mean is that it is difficult for us to handle and that consequently we should like to disengage ourselves from it wholly if we could. This state of mind did not originate after we became involved in an unpopular war in Korea. On the contrary, it has marked our view of Korea from the first.

To the historically minded, of course, "from the first" is an aggravating phrase. How far back into American-Korean relations do we have to go to get our thinking about the problem firmly and properly oriented?

Koreans go back to 1882, when Korea was first persuaded by Commodore Robert W. Schufeldt of the United States Navy to give up the isolationism of its Hermit Kingdom phase and enter into diplomatic and trade relations with the West. In the treaty with Korea which our Senate ratified in 1883 we promised to use our good offices to assist Korea in case any other nation "should deal unjustly" with her. For two decades American business and American missionaries penetrated significantly into Korean life. We built in Seoul the Orient's first electric street-car system. We developed Korea's gold mines (which produced 3 per cent of the world's gold). Then we became discouraged because of the corruption and inefficiency of the decadent Korean monarchy and because the eager interest of both Russia and Japan in Korea made it clear that we could only maintain an American foothold there at the cost of what appeared to be an unprofitable effort.

Accordingly, President Theodore Roosevelt took steps to relinquish the obligations we had assumed in the treaty of 1883. He sent his Secretary of War, William Howard Taft, to Tokyo to sign a secret agreement with the Japanese Prime Minister Katsura (on July 29, 1904) to the effect that the United States would not oppose extension of Japanese control over Korea, in return for a promise that the Japanese would not attack the Philippine Islands. When Korea's liberal statesmen, Prince Min and General Hahn, sent the youthful reformer Syngman Rhee to plead with Roosevelt to observe the aid provisions of the 1883 treaty, Roosevelt held Rhee at bay with personal graciousness while the Portsmouth Conference proceeded to award Japan a protectorate over Korea. As soon as this was done, the United States was the first nation to close its Legation in Seoul and transfer operations to Tokyo.

TOWARD KOREAN INDEPENDENCE

In 1919, inspired by Woodrow Wilson's promise of "the self-determination of peoples," the Koreans organized a massive nonviolent "demonstration of independence" throughout Korea and elected Rhee (who by that time had received his Ph.D. from Wilson at Princeton) as President of the Korean Republic-in-Exile. For the next twenty-six years (and especially after the Pearl Harbor attack) this government struggled unsuccessfully to win American recognition. The first constructive step toward the restoration of Korea's 4,300-year old nationality was the pledge at Cairo, on December 1, 1943, by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Churchill, and Chiang Kai-shek that "in due course" Korea's independence would be restored.

The close of the Pacific phase of World War II resulted in a series of concessions to Russia, of which one was the "temporary" establishment of the 38th parallel line across the middle of Korea. Within the next few months it became apparent that the Soviet Union had no intention of withdrawing to permit the reunification of the Korean nation under any government except one dominated by Communists. The United States maintained an American Military Government in South Korea for three years, but in another movement of disengagement we persuaded the United Nations to assume responsibility for the establishment of a democratically elected Republic of Korea. Upon the refusal by the Soviet Union to accept United Nations jurisdiction in northern Korea, the projected election was held "in all areas of Korea accessible to" the United Nations Commission. On August 15, 1948, the Republic was inaugurated, under a constitution affirming its sovereignty over all Korea, and with one hundred seats in its National Assembly reserved for members subsequently to be elected for the northern provinces. On December 12 of that year the United Nations General Assembly approved the election which its commission had supervised as being "fair and free" and declared that the Republic of Korea was "the only lawful government" in Korea.

During the next two years the United Nations maintained a commission in Korea "observing and advising" the development of democratic processes and reporting that under the circumstances satisfactory progress was being made. The United States provided economic aid through the Economic Cooperation Administration. The Communists maintained a vigorous program of subversion, which resulted in a bloody uprising in November 1948 but which gradually was brought under control and rendered ineffective. In July 1949, the United States withdrew the last of its occupation troops, leaving behind a 500-man military advisory group, which helped develop a constabulary force of 96,300 men but which denied the Korean plea for a regular army on the grounds that an armed force in southern Korea might lead to an outbreak of war with the heavily armed northern Communist regime.

The process of disengagement continued with a speech by Secretary of State Dean Acheson on January 12, 1950, in which he declared that the American defensive perimeter in Asia lay in the island chain extending from the Aleutians through Japan and Okinawa to the Philippines. This process was continued in the form of a directive circulated to American foreign service personnel asking them to prepare to explain the anticipated fall of Formosa to the Chinese Communists, and in a statement by Senator Tom Connally, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, that if Korea were attacked the United States could not go to its assistance. On June 25, 1950, the Communists put this policy to the test by launching a heavy attack across the 38th parallel.

WAR BEGINS

President Rhee, in Seoul, had no way of knowing that his government would receive outside aid. He had in mind the example of Poland, which had been promised support in 1938 but which, nevertheless, was abandoned to enemy occupation; and the example of Czechoslovakia, which had surrendered to Communist pressure and which in 1950 was still receiving preferred treatment as a "showplace of Communism." Even so, he did not hesitate, but ordered his carbine-armed constabulary to resist to the full the tank-led Communist attack. Within three days half the Korean defensive force had become casualties and southern Korea was left open to invasion without an established front line.

In Independence, Missouri, President Truman was also confronted with the need for an instant and momentous decision. Concluding that to permit armed Communist aggression to succeed in Korea would be a renunciation of the Truman Doctrine which had worked so well in Greece and Turkey and might mark the end of the United Nations (which had been boycotted for six months by the Soviet Union), he moved quickly to assure United Nations sanction and American military support for a "police action" to defeat the aggression.

The first United Nations reaction, which occurred as an astounding evidence of Allied unity and determination, was deliberately ambiguous. The June 27 resolution of the Security Council called upon all the United Nations members for aid "to restore peace and security in the area"; it made no reference to the 38th parallel line. However, after the success of the Inchon Landing, the General Assembly on October 7, 1950, passed a resolution noting that "the unification of Korea has not yet been achieved." "Recalling that the essential objective of the resolutions of the General Assembly . . . was the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Government of Korea," it resolved that "All constituent acts should be taken, including the holding of elections, under the auspices of the United Nations, for the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic government in the sovereign State of Korea." There have been many assertions that the United Nations "never" intended to reunify Korea by force of arms, but the simple fact is that on October 9 the United Nations armies moved across the 38th parallel and headed, with little opposition, for the Yalu and Tumen Rivers.

When the Chinese Communists entered the fighting in November, General MacArthur declared that this marked the beginning of "an entirely new war," and quickly withdrew his forces down below the 38th parallel. The General Assembly of the United Nations again considered the question and decided that its responsibilities had not yet been fulfilled. On February 1, 1951, it adopted a resolution branding the Chinese Communist armies as "aggressors" because of their presence in Korean territory. In subsequent fighting the Chinese Reds were soundly defeated and, on the authority of Generals MacArthur and Van Fleet, were on the verge of collapse. They were rescued, however, by a hint from Yakov Malik, delivered over the United Nations radio facilities in New York, that Russia would welcome a truce in Korea.

TRUCE TALKS

In retrospect there has been almost universal agreement that truce talks ought not to have been undertaken until after the aggressors had been driven from Korean territory. In the summer of 1951, however, a "truce without victory" was welcomed by all the participant governments except the Republic of Korea, which pleaded urgently for a continuance of the war. The "neutralist bloc" led by India demanded a truce on the grounds that Red China had intervened justly to protect its own frontier and that peace in Asia should be sought not by conquest of the Communists but through recognition and conciliation of Red China. England supported the truce on the grounds that she would never "fight to conquer North Korea for Syngman Rhee." The United States was influenced by the feelings of its allies but was even more fundamentally influenced by the "island defensive perimeter" concept. With South Korea kept free from Communist control, Japan would be safe and the island perimeter could not be breached. No goal in Asia beyond this was deemed important enough to justify a full-scale war with Red China. American observers agreed that the truce was a resounding defeat for the Republic of Korea, but they added that this is just one of the international injustices that have to be tolerated.

The subsequent signing of the truce, the withdrawal of two United States divisions from Korea, and the January 12, 1954, speech by Secretary of State Dulles indicating that American policy henceforth would be developed around the theory of "massive retaliation" (directed at Russia?) rather than the fighting of "Korean-style" local wars, all constitute a further extension of American efforts to disengage ourselves from involvement in Korea.

A partial negation of disengagement was achieved by President Rhee, through his threats to disrupt the truce, in the negotiation of the American-Korean Mutual Defense Treaty. But despite earnest efforts by President Rhee, the United States refused to write into the treaty any guarantee to assist in repelling the Chinese Red aggressors from Korea. In the talks between Rhee and Dulles (in mid-July, 1953) Dulles assured Rhee that the truce did not constitute a "surrender" by the United States or the United Nations. "We still stand firmly by our declarations that Korea must be reunified under its own free and democratic government,"

Dulles told Rhee in emphatic terms, "but we shall achieve that reunification by political negotiation rather than through war." Rhee replied in substance, "I agree, provided you will promise me that if negotiation fails you will then resume the fighting with us."

What would happen if negotiation does not succeed, however, was postponed for later decision. The most to which Dulles would assent was to agree to walk out of the projected political conference with the Republic of Korea, if, after ninety days, there was no substantial progress toward Korean reunification. After that, the United States and Korea should jointly consider what further action they would take. The Communists did their best to nullify the effects of the "ninety-day" clause by refusing to hold the conference on October 28, 1953, as they had promised to do; instead, a new date of April 26, 1954, was finally selected. Meanwhile, the Communists proceeded to violate the truce by establishing military air bases in North Korea and by reinforcing their ground armies in that area.

WHY U. S. INVOLVEMENT IN KOREA?

This historical review brings our consideration of American-Korean relations up to date, but necessarily has omitted a number of important considerations. The most important one is whether the United States has any real reason for being involved in Korean affairs, or whether the whole situation is not merely the result of fumbling failures, to be written off quickly as an unfortunate development. One of the strongest proponents of this view has been Owen Lattimore, who, on July 17, 1949, wrote in the New York Post, "The thing to do is to let South Korea fall, but not to let it look as if we pushed it."

The question of whether the United States has vital interests of its own to pursue in Korea breaks down into two major subquestions. Are there negative (largely strategic) reasons for preventing the Communists from controlling Korea? Are there positive (largely political) reasons for assisting the establishment in Korea of a genuine democracy? These questions are of vital import, for they not only help us to understand past developments in Korea but also guide us in shaping our future policies toward that country.

There has been endless debate among the military experts concerning the strategic values of withholding Korea from enemy occupation. When the Joint Chiefs of Staff ordered the withdrawal of American troops from Korea in 1949 and refused to sanction the build-up of a Republic of Korea army, they clearly indicated their judgment that Korea could be "allowed to fall" to the Communists. In my own talks with many of our American officials, I became convinced that they anticipated the fall of Korea through internal subversion and were not willing to make major efforts to prevent this result. Some light is shed on this policy by the fact that the ECA in Korea refused to spend money to build productive resources (maintaining instead a soup-line relief program) and in successive years turned back unspent a substantial proportion of the funds voted by Congress to be used in making South Korea economically self-sufficient. The slowness of the development of the current United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency and United States rehabilitation programs in Korea indicates that this same attitude is still prevalent. In 1949, the policies of withdrawal from Korea were similar in import to the explanations presented in the State Department's White Book on China for our stoppage of aid to the Chinese Nationalist government.

Historians have called Korea "the heart of the strategic triangle of North Asia," bounded by China, Russia, and Japan, and have noted that when Japan secured control of Korea in 1905 it was enabled to move on through that land bridge to the conquest of Manchuria and much of China. But in the aftermath of World War II American and European efforts were devoted to finding a modus vivendi with Russia. This led to deliberate efforts in both China and Korea to establish "coalition governments"—presumably on the theory that it is better to join them than to try to lick them.

In Korea, General John R. Hodge, who commanded the American occupation forces, established a Coalition Committee in 1946 and denounced Rhee for his persistent attacks on Communism, which, Hodge felt, interfered with efforts to establish in a reunited Korea a government acceptable to the Soviet Union. A five-year Trusteeship was proposed for Korea, with joint supervision by the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China. In early March, 1954, this same approach was renewed by Sir Winston Churchill, who proposed that the reunification of Korea be sought under a pattern of joint guarantees by Russia, Red China, the United States, and Great Britain.

TIME IS ON WHOSE SIDE?

Korean spokesmen have pointed out that if they were willing to submit to a government "acceptable to Russia," they could have had it at any time after Japan's defeat. They need not have resisted the Communist attack of June 25, 1950. They could have had that kind of reunification without suffering two million war casualties, having ten million of their people driven from their homes, or having their entire nation laid waste. They cling to the goal which has also repeatedly been stated by the United States and the United Nations, namely, that Korea should be reunited as an independent and democratic nation.

The nature of the strategic dispute involves the basic interpretation of the struggle between the Communist and non-Communist governments of the world. One view is that the totalitarian dictatorship of the Soviet Union is so rotten internally that if the free world can hold a firm peripheral line, preventing the dictatorship from successively handing new victories as sops to its deprived and maltreated peoples, the whole Communist structure will eventually break down. This breakdown might take the form of Red China's becoming "another Yugoslavia." It might consist of disruptive revolutions in Eastern Germany and other parts of eastern Europe. It might result from power struggles among Stalin's successors. In any event, according to this view (which appears to be the one accepted by President Eisenhower) time is on our side and postponement of conflict offers hope of avoiding world war.

According to another interpretation, Communism advances best without "hot war." Operating through an international conspiratorial organization, the Communists seek to disrupt governmental and economic processes in free nations (as in Italy, France, and Indonesia), to arouse resentments against "Western colonialism" (as in Africa, the Middle East, and South America), and to stir up localized rebellions that can be represented as internal civil war (as in China in 1949 and Indochina today). Communist propaganda represents the Korean War as a Communist victory, pictures Communism as "the wave of the future," and depicts the democracies as rich but decadent states intent only on maintaining a status quo which is infinitely to their advantage. Negotiation with the Communists is worse than useless, for they seize upon every concession that is offered, give nothing substantial in return, break the agreements they do make, and count confidently on observance of agreements by the free world because they feel democratic opinion will oppose any violation of agreement as a step toward war. (Our strict observance of the truce in Korea even though the Communists have openly violated it is a case in point.) In this view time is on the side of the Soviet Union, which proceeds systematically to "soften up" the free world while building its stockpile of atomic weapons and awaiting the day when it may feel able to launch the final global attack.

Syngman Rhee is a leading proponent of this latter view. He feels (as do Generals MacArthur, Van Fleet, and Clark) that there is no solution in Korea short of a decisive military victory—limited to the definitive aim of driving the Communists back across the Yalu River. He feels that the truce in Korea was another Munich, which encourages the very aggression it sought to deter. He is convinced that Russia is not yet strong enough to win a global war, and therefore will not fight one now—thus giving to the free world a diminishing period of time in which to reverse the course of the cold war, by improving rather than frittering away our vital margin of military superiority.

The answer, then, to the question of the strategic value of keeping Korea out of Communist possession is not universally agreed upon. Every responsible non-Communist would probably agree that the attack upon southern Korea had to be repulsed to prevent the break-up of the United Nations and to safeguard the "island perimeter." The future will have to demonstrate whether South Korea can continue to stand as a "bastion of democracy" without the integration of North Korea into the Republic of Korea. President Rhee feels that in time the United States will tire of supporting South Korea economically and militarily, and that the Korean people will tire of living on a soup-line economy continually beset by Communist subversion—so that in his view postponement of the issue is tantamount to surrender. The dispute is reminiscent of what was said about China in 1948 and 1949.

KOREAN DEMOCRACY

And that brings us to our second question, for many Americans and Europeans have likened the Republic of Korea to Nationalist China and Syngman Rhee to Chiang Kai-shek. Can we, they ask, properly support a government which is not genuinely democratic? Prime Minister Nehru has gone further and declared that abandonment of Syngman Rhee (presumably even if this meant the communization of all Korea) is required by his view of what constitutes Asian self-determination. Fundamentally the nub of the Korean question is whether the Republic of Korea does actually represent healthy democracy.

This question has many times been answered affirmatively in official statements. The United Nations Commissions in their respective reports have consistently declared that despite difficulties and limitations democracy is being firmly implanted in Korea. United States Ambassador John J. Muccio, who spent four years in Korea, declared on May 30, 1952, that "a workable form of modern democratic government with the classic checks and balances was being molded [up to the time of the Communist attack] out of the crucible of events as they affected Korea." John Foster Dulles, in a speech on July 4, 1950, explained that the Communists attacked Korea because "the society was so healthy that it could not be overthrown from within."

At the same time, many criticisms from private sources have been made against the Republic of Korea, and these need to be examined. Since space precludes their full discussion here, it may be pardonable to refer inquirers to my book, Verdict in Korea,¹ for comprehensive data.

The Constitution of the Republic of Korea grants full suffrage to men and women and contains an elaborate bill of civil rights. Skeptics have pointed out that so do the constitutions of Nationalist China and of the Soviet Union. However, in Korea, every election has been under the close observation of the United Nations. Campaigning is open and vigorous, and there have always been many candidates with differing platforms for every elective office. More than ninety newspapers are published in Korea, and although foreign critics have charged censorship, readers of them find many criticisms of many phases of governmental administration. Executive domination of the legislature is denied by the running feud which has existed between President Rhee and the National Assembly. The report of the United Nations Commission on Korea dated September 5, 1951, highlighted an important fact when it said:

The Republic of Korea has placed no restrictions whatever upon observation within the country by international bodies. . . . This willingness . . . is a sign of a genuine desire to carry out the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations to the best of the country's abilities.

Many of the charges made against the Republic of Korea for alleged lack of democracy ought, rather, to be levied against its poverty, or low level of education, or lack of a tradition of Lockian equality, or the urgent need for defense against Communist infiltration and subversion. Even in the United States, which is infinitely safer than South Korea, the power of the police to ferret out hidden Communist connections has been considerably expanded. The "phenomenal fact" in Korea (again to quote Ambassador Muccio) is that the basic civil rights have been so well maintained.

¹ State College, Pa.: Bald Eagle Press, 1952.

On the constructive side, democracy in Korea has proved so healthy that an average of 86 per cent of all eligible voters have gone to the polls in all the elections. Education has expanded to the degree that four times as many students are in high school as during the Japanese rule, that thirty-nine colleges are in operation, and that illiteracy has been largely eliminated. Women's rights have expanded enormously, not only through gaining the ballot, but in a decided change of social and economic attitudes. The problem of landlord control of the farm lands has been almost wholly eliminated, as Korean farmers have been granted the right, and assisted by government aid, to buy the land they cultivate. Farm rentals now constitute less than 10 per cent of all Korean farm lands.

Constitutional amendment of 1952

President Rhee came under heavy attack from foreign critics in the spring and summer of 1952, when he forced through the National Assembly a constitutional amendment that transferred the power of electing the President from the Assembly to the entire electorate. Admittedly he had to utilize all the pressures at his command to secure the relinquishment by the National Assembly of this vital power. But there is no question that the people of Korea solidly supported the change. All of the Provincial Assemblies voted for it, and 1,400 local Councils (out of a total of 1,700 in all South Korea) adopted resolutions favoring it. The "pressure" exerted on the National Assembly to accept the amendment largely consisted of the convergence upon it of committees bearing these resolutions. Those critics who charged that Rhee was "violating the Constitution" overlooked the fact that it was being amended, not violated, and that our own concept of democracy demands the election of the President by all the voters, rather than by the National Legislature. Rhee himself feels that the future of democracy in Korea would not be safe unless the essential power of choosing the chief executive was safely implanted in the people as a whole.

Korean individualism

The only dependable safeguard of any democracy is the nature of the people themselves. The Koreans have solidly proved their sturdy individualism. The Japanese occupied Korea for a full generation and sought with all their ingenuity to "Japanize" the population—but failed notably. The Russians tried with all the means in their repertoire to rule the North Koreans, but four millions of them managed to escape into the south; and the communization of North Korea had to be accomplished under the leadership of a Soviet citizen, Kim Il Sung, backed by an influx of two million repatriates from Siberia and North China, most of whom were communized during their generation-long fight against Japan. The Koreans have been christened "the Irish of the Orient." Aleš Hrdlička, who was the chief anthropologist for the Smithsonian Institution and who specialized in Korean anthropology, called them "the white people of the Orient." Missionaries have agreed that Korea is "the most Christian land in the Orient." From my own experience among them, I testify with careful assurance that they are a superior people, wholly capable of managing their own destinies and determined to do so. Their determination, high morale, and ebullient individualism under all the hammerings of the war have been noted and praised by a great number of highly competent observers. No such people as the Koreans would endure a despotic government at home any more than they would accept a colonial rule from abroad.

SUMMARY

In a general summing up, then, of the relations between America and the new Korea, a number of conclusions emerge, all fitting together into a rather simple and definite pattern.

1. The United States has been reluctant to maintain close relations with Korea (not wishing to be entangled with affairs on the Asian mainland) but has been forced into recurrent commitments because of the strategic importance of Korea for the defense of our own security.

2. In the Korean peninsula have been planted the seeds of genuine Western-style democracy—a fact which may turn out to be the most important, historically, of all the developments in the Far East in recent years.

3. The war in Korea was an essential defense of the free world against Communist imperialism, and it may prove to be true that we have gravely endangered our own security by our failure to win it.

4. The Korean question was not solved by the truce, but remains one of the crucial issues of the cold war—one that will require decisions in the future fully as momentous as those in the past.

From whatever point of view we may examine the Korean question, its basic simplicity emerges. It is a clear testing ground for the United States and the Soviet Union in the world-power struggle between our antagonistic ways of life. It is a test of the ability of the industrialized Western nations to deal effectively with the emergent nationalism, economic ambitions, and cultural stamina of the Far East. It is a test of the ability of the United Nations to develop a world order based upon law. And finally (remembering the emergence of a massive and modernized Red Chinese fighting force) it remains to be seen whether the Korean War as it was conducted was really a contribution to lasting peace or rather a reproduction of the Spanish Civil War prelude to world war. Any way we look at it, the Korean people are caught in the middle of a vast network of global conflicts. They deserve our sympathy, our understanding, and our help.

Robert T. Oliver, Ph.D., LL.D., State College, Pennsylvania, is head of the Department of Speech at the Pennsylvania State University. During the summer of 1946, he was a guest lecturer in Korea University; he was in Korea as adviser to President Syngman Rhee at intervals from 1949 to 1953 and has also served as adviser to Korean delegations to the United Nations. He is manager of the Washington Bureau of the Korean Pacific Press, editor of the magazine Korean Survey, and author of several books on Korea, including Verdict in Korea (1952) and Syngman Rhee: The Man Behind the Myth (1954).

The Aspirations of Korea

By YOU CHAN YANG

IT is a tragic circumstance that Korea is at this time and has been since the end of World War II an artificially divided nation.

A new and reunited Korea would mean a great deal to the peace of Asia and the peace of the entire world. Our geographical position is one of great strategic importance. The centuries-old unity of our people is another factor. Our record of never having waged aggressive war is still another—in over 4,300 years our people have never attacked anybody, and we have no intention of doing so. All these things add up to the realization that Korea can be one of the most stabilizing elements in a world which desperately seeks stability.

It may seem a singular thing that my country, which was long known as "the Hermit Kingdom," and later, when the Japanese made our peninsula a vast prison camp, as "the Forgotten Nation," should in the past five years see itself the subject of countless headlines, innumerable magazine articles, many, many television and radio programs, and discussions so continual as to defy enumeration. It is saddening that a people and a nation known for centuries as lovers of peace should have had contemporary history record their activities in letters of blood.

All of this means, naturally, that Korea has had a tremendous impact on the rest of the world, and those of us who believe in human freedom cannot but pray that the sacrifices which the Korean people have undergone and the sacrifices that Americans have made on those faraway battlefields shall not have been in vain. For the enemy who produced the war in Korea remains our enemy today. He has but one goal and that is the conquest of the entire world and the subjugation of all free peoples to his concept of mankind as the serf of the state. Our concept, on the other hand, is the one which was given magnificent birth in the city of Philadelphia when this Republic emerged.

The difference in the matter of the two ideologies is as pronounced as day and night. Some way, somehow, one or the other must triumph. For better or for worse we—the war-torn and devastated people of Korea—and you, the great and powerful people of the United States, are in this thing together. Whether or not the issue will be finally resolved in Korea, none can say, but we accepted the challenge first—the challenge of Communist aggression—and we should have been overwhelmed, had you not come to our assistance.

If it is thought that our great President and leader, Syngman Rhee, and his embattled countrymen, who believe in his leadership, have been able to be of service to what remains of the free world, I should like to put my own opinion of that service in capsule form, being a physician. Here it is: They have shown everyone with any knowledge whatever of this crucial period of history the folly of appeasement. In so doing, they have been called upon to pay one of the heaviest prices ever paid by a nation.

Syngman Rhee has been termed a stubborn and obstinate old man. Much of this criticism has come from Communist sources; some of it, I regret to say, has come from sources which have been content to rely on snap judgment, sources which have little or no conception of the profoundly vital issue at stake in my country.

To me, Syngman Rhee is just as stubborn and obstinate as were Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, James Otis, Thomas Paine, and the other great patriots of the American Revolution. Those men knew the issue was very simple. It was freedom versus tyranny. In that long and sometimes hopeless struggle, did they either compromise with the enemy or seek to appease him? Not that I am aware of, and my entire education was in American grade and high schools in Hawaii, and in Boston University on the mainland. No, those men knew that what was morally wrong never could be politically right. And they held to that principle despite the fact that they were confronted by all the might and power of the world's then most powerful empire. Think of it, a little fringe of not more than three million persons strung along the Atlantic coast, standing up and giving battle and finally triumphing over a tyranny able to command the resources and manpower of much of the world. They did not shrink. As a result, people in the United States today are enjoying the privileges of freedom, liberty, and the decencies of life. And that is all our people are asking. Is it a crime to ask for freedom, liberty, and the decencies of life? That is all we want, nothing else. We have no interest in other people's territory.

Syngman Rhee is as stubborn as your early patriots where a moral principle is concerned. That wise old Christian gentleman knows full well and has stated in many of his speeches that "to attempt to compromise with evil is as evil as is evil itself."

A MAGNIFICENT PAST

Somber thoughts must predominate when one talks about Korea these days.

As you know, and as has been said, the past is prelude to the present, and the present is prelude to the future. The Korean people have had a magnificent past—more than forty-three centuries of it on our peninsula. Protected from the mainland of Asia by rivers and mountain ridges, it was possible to develop down through the long corridors of time a culture and a way of life that enabled us to grow from a few hundred thousand into a homogeneous nation of thirty million people. No more homogeneous nation ever existed.

We are an inventive people. Before Gutenberg, we contrived movable type. Long before any other nation, as far as we know, we built the first solar observatory, which still stands in Korea today. Lost somewhere in the dim recesses of time is our invention of the magnetic compass for mariners. Nearly five hundred years ago our scholars evolved the first alphabet of the Orient—twenty-four letters, the existing vowels and most of your consonants. In 1592 our admiral, Yisunsin, used an iron clad type of vessel to annihilate the Japanese invading forces. Even today, Japanese Satsuma ware is Korean made, by descendants of the three thousand artisans who were taken over to Japan and put in the southern part, in the island of Kyushu. All of these things we did by ourselves alone.

Now I recount these things not in a spirit of braggadocio, but so that it may be known what our past has been, and what we have tried to contribute to the march of civilization. Does not an old Korea of this distinction give some hope of what a new Korea may accomplish?

Under the leadership of our great patriot and statesman, President Syngman Rhee—a man of inflexible purpose—the Korean people are in this fight against Communism to the absolute finish. You wonder why? You of the West have taught us the rights of man.

You have brought Christianity to us. Therefore we want to worship God as you are doing today, and we want to be free men and women. Therefore we are determined to fight the despotism of the Kremlin. We would belie our past and forfeit our future if, in the present, we did not show the qualities that enable us to look backward with pride and forward with determination.

Down through the centuries the Korean people have secured not only a good livelihood out of the soil and fruits of the comparatively small peninsula that is our homeland, but also an oversufficiency for our needs. Let me give you an example of what our people can do. In spite of all the destruction that has gone on and of all the young men being taken into the army, our farmers were able to produce enough rice last year so that we can export 600,000 tons. It is fantastic—$150,000,000 worth to export. It shows the determination of our people.

KOREA AND JAPAN

Korea, standing as a bulwark against any Chinese advance further eastward in the Pacific and equally as a bulwark against any Japanese advance upon the continent of Asia, lived in peace for many centuries. But our dream of perpetual peace was shattered when in 1905 Japan defeated Russia and moved into our homeland. For four decades thereafter we knew the harsh tyranny of alien rule. Yes, we were then "the Forgotten Nation."

American victory over Japan restored to us our liberties in part of our country, and let me say that America alone won the war in the Pacific. You destroyed the massive Japanese military machine and you did it singlehanded. The Russians were Johnny-come-lately's—one week before the Japanese surrender!

I went to Japan as the Korean chief delegate to sit down and settle all the existing problems between Japan and Korea, to hold hands, make friends, and go forward from there because we have a greater enemy to fight, to protect ourselves and to protect Japan and the whole Pacific. Therefore I tried to talk realistically, but so far we have not got anywhere.

On October 6, 1953, we opened the conference in Japan. On the first day, the Japanese chief delegate made the following five statements:

1. The repatriation of Japanese nationalists from Korea was a violation of international law.

2. The establishment of the Republic of Korea by the United States and the United Nations prior to the Japanese Peace Treaty was a violation of international law. In other words, the Republic of Korea should never have been founded.

3. The Cairo Declaration by the Allied Powers that there existed an enslavement of the Korean people was nothing but war hysteria.

4. The turning over of Japanese property to the Korean government by the United States Military Government was a violation of international law in spite of its being written into the Japanese Treaty, Article IV (b), which clearly stated that Japan had nothing in Korea, and also that Japan made an unconditional surrender.

5. The thirty-six years of Japanese occupation of Korea were beneficial to the Koreans.

Now do not tell me the Japanese were in there for their health. Do not tell me they loved the Koreans so much that they went in there to help them, when they murdered thousands upon thousands of my people under any pretext. I can tell you that they were trying to wipe out Christianity and to transplant Shinto into Korea, and they made our Christians bow before the Japanese Emperor's picture. Do not tell me that was beneficial to the Koreans.

Think it over, please. I do not mind American aid to Japan, but let us go slow.

Before World War II I used to go around this country telling people, "Japan is going to attack the United States." They said I was a crazy fool. I was not such a crazy fool when December 7, 1941, came around. I was trying to save thousands of your boys' lives at Pearl Harbor. I was operating day and night at the General Hospital there, and thousands of your innocent boys were laid out on the green grass. Think it over, please.

WHAT DOES KOREA WANT?

Uneasy as the present is, we in Korea still yearn and hope to do the things civilized men and women do in other parts of the world. We want to rebuild our homes; we want an opportunity to bring up our children and to educate them without the sound of bombs, shot, and shell. We want to rebuild our schools and our churches. We want to improve our roads. We want—with the extraordinary example of America as an inspiration—to raise our standard of living, to assure every Korean child of the best education possible, and, last but not least, to live in peace. We have proved that we can fight, but we are most proud of our record as a nation of never having committed an aggressive act against any other people. For centuries we have been known as the "Land of the Morning Calm," and our love of peace has been such that the ordinary "hello" and "good-by" and "good night" in Korea takes on an added connotation because we say when we meet a friend or a stranger, "May you come in peace," and when we bid him adieu we say, "May you go in peace." Likewise, when it is time for a good night to visiting friends, we say, "May you sleep in peace." Yes, we love peace.

Regarding the Geneva Conference which is slated to be held the latter part of April, I should be less than frank were I not to tell you that the Korean people face it with grave misgivings. If the conference should, by any chance, result in a Korean peace and the withdrawal of the Red Chinese from the northern half of our country, we should rejoice. But we have had so many conferences with the Communists, and none has resulted in any agreement. We will never get anywhere with appeasement. In fact, Senator William F. Knowland has, in my opinion, an even better phrase. He calls it "surrender on the installment plan." Meantime, from another appeasement corner you have heard the suggestion that the solution of the Korean War may be found in the "neutralization" of my country. I can assure you that the Korean people will never stand for the emasculation of their nationality. We simply are not made that way. We know the history of neutrality; look at Belgium and Holland as two outstanding examples where, when a great and powerful neighbor decided to overrun their lands, their neutrality perished at once. No, we will never accept the status of an unarmed nation while a madman with tanks, guns, and airplanes is poised on our doorstep.

DEVASTATION AND REHABILITATION

The stench of death still hovers over my country. Put yourselves in our place. Imagine your own community in ruins and silent in the darkness of night. All about you in wreckage. Those who have lived here are gone. The dead remain. Your high buildings are broken skeletons against the light of the moon. Perhaps, if you listen intently, you may hear the cry of a child and if you pursue it—and pursue it you will, for humanity always hearkens to the cry of a child—you will find a tiny waif of Communist cruelty, hungry, ragged, and homeless. Where are his parents? How did he get where he is? What can be done for him? You must, first of all, feed him, then clothe him, and then find a place for him to live—an orphanage set up by your poverty-stricken government or by GI's out of their modest pay as soldiers.

In this connection I should like to say that the American GI's have contributed nearly $15,000,000 to save our orphans. Our people are saying, "God bless the American GI." Our Korean people, no matter what happens tomorrow in Korea, will never forget the warm generosity and the kindness of your people and the American GI's. Whether you like it or not, we will always stand by you.

That child we heard is one of nearly 200,000 like him. There are 300,000 war widows in Korea. There are 2,000,000 casualties, civilian and military. Look down, in the moonlight, and you may see a legless man, on stumps, crawling along. We have more than 20,000 of his kind who need artificial arms and legs, or crutches and canes, until they can be fitted for the life of a cripple. Owing to the hardships of war, one-third of our population is afflicted with either incipient or advanced tuberculosis.

Alone and unaided, the task of rehabilitation might overwhelm us, but the American people and their government, as well as other members of the United Nations, have responded with help. In this connection, however, there are some disturbing elements which I feel I should comment on. The bulk of funds expended to date, I regret to say, has been spent to build up the Japanese economy rather than to make our goal of a self-sufficient Korea an attainable goal. Since 1949 we have been asking for fertilizer plants, which are very essential, power plants, and cement plants, but we still have not got them. Large sums of money have been used to purchase consumer goods in Japan for transport to Korea instead of upon the essential repair and reconstruction of Korean factories so that we might make our own consumer goods. We are asking for help so that we can help ourselves. We do not want to be always dependent upon you or upon anybody else. The sooner we are enabled to earn our own way, the sooner we will cease to be a burden on the American taxpayer. That is our aim: to prove to America that we are deeply grateful by standing on our own feet.

It has never been the policy of America to single out one nation in a world area for such preferential treatment and assistance that the other nations in the same area automatically become dependent on the giant. The American creed, as we know it, is that all peoples, wherever located, should have an equal opportunity to move toward full freedom and dignity.

A FREE AND UNITED KOREA

A new Korea faces a multitude of problems. Foremost among them is the transformation of an agrarian economy to one of industrialization. But there is a hardihood, a stamina, in my people that, ominous as the future may seem at the moment, enables them to hope for a new Korea. In addition, they possess, as they always have possessed, the will to work. They know there must be a new Korea, if only for the reason that the old Korea is gone. Modern warfare has virtually wiped it off the face of the map.

But it is inconceivable to any Korean to picture the future of our nation on any basis except complete unity, for north of the hated 38th parallel—hated because it was imposed upon us as a basis of our division—north of the parallel are hydroelectric plants necessary to industrialization, while the south is our food basket. In far southern Korea, for example, many farms are able to grow two crops a year because of the equable climate.

Now one is entitled to ask: Well, what of the future, anyway? My answer must be blunt, a free and united Korea by force of arms if all else fails, or a nation and people destroyed at the hands of Communist aggression.

You must realize, though, that we do not want to fight because we like to fight, but because thousands of our countrymen in the north are the victims of Communist barbarity. They are our flesh and blood. They call out to us to rescue them from banishment to the remote provinces of Manchuria and Siberia in order that their homes and lands may be seized by Chinese Communist colonizers. Other thousands of them are dying of malnutrition and ill-treatment.

Suppose the Communists invaded and held a portion of the United States, uprooting your fellow-Americans and sending them into the jungles of the Amazon or the frozen wastes of Alaska? Would you respond to their calls for help? Of course you would. You have proven on battlefields in many other places what you would do for freedom. All we ask for now is understanding of the steps we feel we may be forced to take.

We Koreans prefer an honorable death, alone if need be, to the dishonor of Communist slavery. We have learned the immortal words of your great patriot, Patrick Henry, "Give me liberty, or give me death!" and we are repeating those immortal words today. I do not think you can blame us for that. Please be patient with us. We do not want any more war if we can help it. But what are we going to do? What would you do? We will go along, and if the Korean issue can be settled by peaceful means, we are more than willing. But we are asking if the peaceful means fail, then what is your alternative plan? What do you intend to do? Throw up your hands and say, "We are defeated," while your boys and our boys are sitting on the hills of Korea to be shot at like ducks when the Communists are ready? What are we going to do?

We are not the first people to prefer death to dishonor. The pages of history recount others, though none more glorious than the annals of your own Revolution. There were many who thought, in that day and age, that the new America of 1776, which preferred death rather than the loss of liberty, might not long exist. But look at this great nation today—the hope of the free world.

That chapter in your history is the most compelling reason for the Korean people, in their hour of trial and adversity, to know that some day there will be a new and reunited Korea.

His Excellency You Chan Yang, M.D., Washington, D. C., has been Ambassador of Korea to the United States since 1951. Educated in Hawaii and in this country, he practised medicine in Hawaii from 1923 to 1951, and in World War II directed a medical unit under the Office of Civilian Defense. Since student days he has been active in Korean independence movements, and has recently developed a plan for rebuilding South Korean schools and training Korean technicians. He took part in the negotiations for the Japanese-Korean peace treaty which went into effect in April 1952 and also in those of October 1953.

The Role of the United States in the Far East

By ARTHUR H. DEAN

WHAT can we do to bring about a lasting peace in Korea and the unification of that sorely harassed land? First we must decide what we mean by "peace" and second what we mean by "unification."

As most of you know, the people of Korea, although not themselves Chinese, were for many years governed by Chinese kings under a mild suzerainty to China. Following the defeat of China by Japan in 1895 and of Russia by Japan in 1905, President Theodore Roosevelt by the Treaty of Portsmouth in 1905 arranged for Japan to have a protectorate over Korea; in 1910 Japan annexed Korea.

One of the major policies of the Allies in the last war was to restore freedom to the long-suffering people of Korea and to bring about its freedom, unity, and independence. The able and gallant leader of the Korean people, Syngman Rhee, has spent his entire life to achieve this end, first against the Japanese and now against the Communists. For purely military considerations after the U.S.S.R. had agreed to come into the war against Japan in 1945, Russian military authorities were invited to accept the surrender of Japanese troops in Korea north of the 38th parallel—a purely fictitious line. Subsequent attempts to bring about the unification of Korea by negotiations with the U.S.S.R. proved futile, and after a plebiscite in the southern part conducted under the auspices of the United Nations, the Republic of Korea, under the Presidency of Syngman Rhee, was set up south of the 38th parallel. A de facto Communist government was set up by the U.S.S.R. in the north.

THE KOREAN WAR

In June of 1950 the Republic of Korea was attacked without warning or justification by forces from north of the 38th parallel, inspired and armed by the U.S.S.R.

Following the adoption of resolutions by the Security Council of the United Nations in June and July 1950, we contributed troops to the United Nations command, along with fifteen other members of the United Nations and the Republic of Korea. The United States took on the unified command of the United Nations' collective effort to put down aggression, and President Truman gave the post to one of our outstanding military leaders, General Douglas MacArthur.

We have reason to be proud of our brilliant achievements in Korea, but after the Chinese Communists came into the war in November and December 1950 we did not unify Korea by military might. Among other things we did prove that armed aggression does not pay, and we stopped the timetable of Red aggression in the Far East.

I shall not dwell on the fighting and the events leading to the signing of the Armistice on July 27, 1953, or on the history of the drafting of Paragraph 60, incorporated into the Armistice Agreement.

THE ARMISTICE AGREEMENT

The Armistice Agreement was signed by military commanders on both sides. One side—our side—is made up of the sixteen members of the United Nations contributing troops and the Republic of Korea. The other side consists of the Chinese Communists and the North Korean Communists.

Paragraph 60 recommended "to the Governments of the countries concerned on both sides" that "a political conference of a higher level of both sides" be held by October 28 by representatives appointed respectively in order "to settle through negotiation the questions of the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea, the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, etc."

As a result of the Cairo Declaration in December 1943, the Potsdam Declaration of July 1945, and the U.S.S.R. declaration of war against Japan, August 8, 1945, the "Korean question" referred to in Paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement may be defined as the unification of a free, independent, and democratic Korea. The "withdrawal of all foreign forces" referred to in Paragraph 60 was defined in the Armistice negotiations to mean the withdrawal of "non-Korean forces."

KOREAN GEOGRAPHY

If you will look at the map you will note Korea's geographical propinquity to China and Manchuria on the west, Manchuria on the north, and the U.S.S.R. on the northeast, which surround it like gigantic pincers, and if you will look about 200 miles to the west from Pyongyang, you will find on the Liaotung Peninsula the great naval and industrial warm-water ports of Dairen and Port Arthur, the eastern terminus of the Chinese Eastern Railroad.

To the north of Korea itself are the winding Yalu and Tumen Rivers. North and northwestward lies Manchuria and to the extreme northeast the U.S.S.R. itself fronts on Korea.

The great industrial city of Mukden is about a hundred miles from the North Korean border. South of Mukden and north of the Korean border is the steel city of Anshan. The important industrial and railroad center of Harbin lies about 250 miles to the north. Just 60 miles to the northeast of the island of Chongjin (Seishin) on the northeast coast of Korea you will find the large Russian naval center of Vladivostok, which is also the eastern terminus of the Trans-Siberian Railroad.

Korea, as you know, is a 525 mile long S-shaped peninsula extending southward from Manchuria and Soviet Russia to within less than 120 miles of the island of Kyushu in southern Japan. It is shaped somewhat like Florida but is very mountainous. Its area of 85,000 square miles is approximately equal to that of Minnesota. The area actually available for cultivation is relatively small.

The east coast of Korea faces the Sea of Japan. To the west across the Yellow Sea lies China. To the south is the Korea Strait and approximately 500 miles to the south lies the island of Formosa, now occupied by the Nationalist Government of China and its intrepid leader Chiang Kai-shek, whom we are supporting both morally and materially in his fight against the Communists.

Then approximately 390 miles farther south are the Philippines. On the mainland south of China and some 600 miles or more west of the Philippines are Indochina, Burma, and Thailand. Further south lies Malaya. To the east of Malaya and south and west of the Philippines lies Indonesia, that is, Borneo, Java, Sumatra, and Celebes, and further south, Australia and New Zealand. To the northwest of Burma lie eastern Pakistan and India.

Korea lies some 5,600 air miles from Seattle and 9,000 miles from our east coast, no further apart in time by air travel than many points in the United States by rail.

Thus you can easily see that it would not be much of a problem for the other side either to invade Korea or to withdraw non-Korean Communist forces into China or Manchuria, a relatively short distance north or west across the Yalu River. But it is quite a problem for us to withdraw our forces.

A DIVIDED KOREA

Although the statement is an oversimplification, for the most part the hydroelectric power, the electrochemical industries, the manufacturing plants of heavy industry, the mines, and the heavy timber are in the North. South of the 38th parallel the people are for the most part engaged in farming—principally rice, beans, or barley—in woodcutting, fishing, or in light manufacturing—textile or foundry work, pottery, and some glass. At present, we are engaged in a great program of rehabilitation in the South.

The people in all of Korea were remarkably homogeneous and united before the attack, and the economy of the entire country was reciprocal. Under the Japanese rule the economy was geared to Japanese needs, and Korea was an outlet for the Japanese market. Now it is rudely hacked into two parts, with an almost fanatical desire on the part of the Communists to unite the economy of the North with that of China and Manchuria. The South has been relatively harder hit, and it will be much more difficult for it to survive without the economy of the northern part.

The problem, therefore, of what we can do to achieve a free, united, independent, and democratic Korea where the people can live happily and carry on their normal peaceful pursuits and how we can obtain the truly effective withdrawal of the Chinese Communist forces from Korea is exceptionally difficult.

Communist reports are very misleading, and generally exaggerated; they conveniently omit statistics or compare statistics for unlike periods. But from present Communist reports it would seem that the Chinese Communists with the aid, or at least promised aid, from the U.S.S.R., East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, and Poland are doing their best to rebuild North Korea and to incorporate and integrate the economic life of North Korea into that of Manchuria and Communist China to the north and west and to prevent the unification of North and South Korea into a free, independent, united, and democratic Korea.

The much harassed and sorely tried people of Korea deserve a better fate than a divided Korea. Their soldiers fought bravely and gallantly by the side of our own and the other members of the United Nations command and they are eager and willing to learn. No people has ever defended itself more bravely or more courageously.

When you see the terrible destruction in Korea and the hard, grinding, unremitting toil which is the daily lot of the Korean people today, and the happy, bright-faced children trooping to school—most inadequately clad for the rather severe Korean winter—your heart goes out to them and you wish that there were some way you could bring an end to their trial, tribulation, and suffering.

But how?

THE HOPE OF UNIFICATION

President Rhee believes and advocates that properly supervised elections should be held in the North for the seats in the Korean Parliament that are now vacant. He is confident that in free elections his compatriots north of the 38th parallel will choose proper anti-Communist representatives and that he and his party will get the great bulk of the delegates.

But the Communists have now occupied North Korea since the latter part of 1945. Millions of people have been killed or maimed or have fled southward—and if reports can be believed, many thousands of anti-Communists have been forcibly carried away into Chinese Communist or U.S.S.R. slave labor camps, and Chinese Communist farmers have been moved into North Korea to take their places.

The Communists are fanatical zealots dedicated to their unholy cause, and short of renewing hostilities it is difficult to see what will persuade them to unification. Let us examine the possibilities:

1. Would they willingly allow the government of Syngman Rhee with its well-known hatred of Communism to have complete control of the governmental machinery in the North? Even if we were to offer them abundant economic aid and financial rehabilitation greater than that now offered by the U.S.S.R. and the Communist countries of eastern Europe, what would they gain by it?

2. We certainly do not want a Communist coalition government for all of Korea with Communist ministers et cetera.

3. We certainly do not want to recognize the independence of North Korea.

Chinese Communist desires

The Chinese Communists apparently want at least six things: (1) the complete withdrawal of all United Nations and United States forces; (2) the giving up of our right to station troops in Korea pursuant to our Military Defense Pact; (3) the unification of Korea under Communist auspices or at least the complete retention of the northern part or a coalition government in the southern part; (4) the recognition of their regime by the United States; (5) admission into the United Nations and the expulsion of Nationalist China; (6) the withdrawal of the trade embargo voted on Communist China and North Korea by the United Nations.

The clear and ringing speech of Secretary of State Dulles on March 29 before the Overseas Press Club, followed up by President Eisenhower's and Senator William F. Knowland's announcements, seems to constitute an effective answer to all of these desires and to indicate that our policy will continue to be one of strong opposition to the Chinese Communist regime.

Coalition government

A coalition government with the Communists is, of course, a fool's paradise, as Jan Masaryk in Czechoslovakia found to his sorrow. The Chinese peasants having received "land distribution" must now give it back to a "co-operative collective." Communist promises have a way of disappearing into thin air. A coalition government would lead to a gradual if not complete paralysis of governmental functions. Neither Korean nor American public opinion would tolerate it—certainly we could not agree to economic rehabilitation of or military aid to a coalition government with Communists.

Unification under appropriate workable and realistic terms is certainly a desirable goal. But we ought not to be confused by words, for unification by coalition with the Communists loses its meaning. Although we should, of course, explore every basis of unification that has a workable chance, we must not surrender the tangible gain of the Korean War for the sake of a so-called "successful conference."

The situation in Korea and on Formosa and in Japan has been changed sharply by the serious difficulties the French and the free Vietnamese face at this truly critical juncture in Indochina where the control of the free world in that area is in so much difficulty.

A PROGRAM FOR THE UNITED STATES

In order to bring about better results and in order to get the complete cooperation of the free world I believe we should do at least nine things in the Far East.

1. We must convince by clear and appropriate action the governments of the Far East, the Communists, and our own sincere friends that we are prepared to deter aggression and infiltration and that we will be able to respond vigorously and ably at places and with means of our own choosing.

2. We must convince them that we are not going to withdraw or become fainthearted or leave our friends in the lurch. This is of vital importance.

3. We must use every means at our command consistent with decent and normal relations between allies, and with due humility on our part, to convince our French allies that it is in their own best interest so to establish the Associated States within the French Union that not only the Vietnamese, Cambodian, and Laotian people but others as well are truly convinced they are independent and are fighting for their own independence and not to preserve some vestige of colonialism.

4. This must be done on a cordial, consultative, constructive, friendly basis with the French, the leaders in Vietnam, and if at all feasible with other leaders in the Far East, so that world opinion will accept the political results as the fundamental concept of true independence for which free men can honestly fight. It will be necessary truly to unite local sentiment behind the government and to deprive the Communists of one of their great propaganda weapons—namely, that we are fighting to further colonialism. We must convince the peoples of Asia we are not trying to prevent a people from achieving independence.

5. We must assure the French and the peoples of Indochina, India, Burma, Thailand, Indonesia, Australia, and New Zealand that we propose to make such efforts as may be necessary to drive the Communists from Indochina on both a political and military basis and that those who are on our side will not be fighting on the wrong side.

6. We must work out in consultation with the French the further training of the Vietnamese army and pave the way for the eventual withdrawal of French forces and their return to metropolitan France.

7. Despite religious and ideological differences, we must do everything within our power to work with the Indians, the Burmese, the Thais, the Indonesians, and others in order to convince them of the terrible dangers of our not being united and of the dangers in a fence-sitting policy.

8. We must work out an economic policy toward this part of the world which is not based on "neocolonialism" but which is unbiased and free from any colonial motive or interest so we can woo them away from believing that Communism is an attractive theory, either intellectually or in practice.

Asian revolution

9. By friendly persuasion and not by domination we must attempt to convince those who disagree with us that we are not completely wrong in our approach to the problem. Prime Minister Nehru, and indeed Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas and to a lesser extent Adlai Stevenson in his recent Godkin lectures at Harvard, if I read them correctly, believe that the revolution in Asia, of which Communism is but a manifestation, cannot be halted; that Communism must be allowed to thrash about in a somewhat irresponsible manner; that given time, patience, and the right treatment, the revolution in Asia will flow into constructive channels; and that we must evolve the minimum conditions on which we would be willing to live and let live with the Chinese Communists.

This argument continues that the right treatment is not a show of military strength and opposition, as this will only provoke; that the right treatment is economic and technical assistance on as large a scale as can be provided to overcome the hunger for food and land and to restore to the Asian a sense of pride in his own individualism; that he must be treated not as a mere creature of the West, for such treatment makes the Asian turn to the false, facile, and fleeting promises of the Soviet Union; the wrong treatment is for the West to ally itself with corrupt and discredited regimes and to bolster them with military aid, money, and equipment, until they are attacked by people rising in revolt under Communist leadership and then to provide active support of the attacked against the native people.

In a sense, they are, of course, correct that Asian nationalism can be channeled but not dammed, and that promises of a full stomach, of more land and greater yields, and of the reduction of crop loans and interest payments by the simple expedient of killing the landowner, the usurer, the money lender, and the owner of the rice mills have a great ideological appeal to a poverty-stricken and exploited people. The Japanese slogan of "Asia for the Asians" had a great appeal for these people, yet some of these countries were overrun by the Japanese and in part liberated by the Communists. Today we are supporting the Japanese and fighting the Communists.

But I wonder how far this argument is correct, for after thirty-seven years the Russian Communists do not appear to wish to work with us. To my mind it is too simple to say we could better solve the whole matter by being kind to Communists.

I do believe that experts in politics, agriculture, plant disease, fishery, agronomy, biology, agricultural marketing, nutrition, and home economics could work wonders. The problem is not just one of more money and more military aid and more industrialization, important though they may be.

MUST THE U. S. GET INVOLVED IN INDOCHINA?

There are undoubtedly those among you who shrug their shoulders and say, "We cannot save the world; we cannot prevent the inevitable from happening; we cannot bankrupt ourselves; and we cannot promise military aid all over the world." Having just fought and at least temporarily put out the great blaze in Korea, why do we wish to get involved in this new great fire in Indochina?

The problem is admittedly exceptionally difficult. If the Communists overrun Indochina, they may in time overrun Burma, Thailand, Malaya, and Indonesia, go north to the Philippines, and attack or infiltrate the Philippines and Formosa from the east. Indochina, Burma, and Thailand presently export more food, particularly rice, than they produce, and if the Communists are in control there they can effectually starve Japan or demand her production and the withdrawal of our troops.

It does not seem to me that we can safely regard this situation as inevitable. For if Communism is so extended, the problems of Prime Minister Nehru and the people of India will be sorely accentuated. The free world may not survive an evolution which might take generations.

The problem and its correct solution concerns you, your children, our future as a nation, and all of our lives.

THE MILITARY SITUATION

Today in the northern part of Indochina the Communist Vietminh forces led by Ho Chi-minh are organized, financed, and supplied by the Chinese Communists and are fighting the French and Vietnam forces in a costly and bloody battle at the garrison of Dien-bienphu, located in Tonkin between the Mekong and Red or Tonkin Rivers, west of Hanoi and north of Luang-prabang and east of Burma and Thailand. The Communists have guerrilla forces in many places in the rice paddies and jungles. They also are attacking southward in Cambodia, in the regions of Muongsay and Attopeu.

The fighting is to determine whether the forces of freedom or Communism shall prevail. While militarily, perhaps, the battle at Dienbienphu is not of fundamental strategic importance, nevertheless the defeat of the French and Vietnam forces there may cast a spirit of gloom and lessen the will of the Vietnamese and the French to fight the Communists. Defeat may make the path of the Geneva Conference and the future of the French Union exceptionally difficult.

If Indochina were to fall into Communist hands or if there were a coalition or a Communist government for part of it, our own problems in the Pacific would be made immeasurably more difficult.

FRENCH AND VIETNAMESE ATTITUDES

The problem in Indochina is a frightfully complicated one. Many native Vietnamese, who have much to lose if the Communists win, appear either to be supporting Ho Chi-minh or to be fence sitting.

In relation to their population and gross national product, the French in the eight-year war have suffered terrible loss of life and have spent vast sums of money in Indochina; the vision of endless fighting in its rice paddies and steamy jungles is abhorrent. True, the United States has been most generous in financial and military support. But the fact that we have thought it wise to conclude an armistice in Korea, the dissatisfaction caused by our insistence on the ratification of the European Defense Community, and the French fear of the rise of German militarism—all exploited by the Communists—contribute to the general distaste with which French people view the situation. The French have made enormous strides in developing this primarily agricultural nation and bringing it into the French Union, but the problem of satisfying the native people on colonialism still remains.

The Japanese occupation during the war, the quarrels between the Pétain regime and the Free French, the necessity for British and Nationalist Chinese troops to occupy the country in order to disarm the Japanese, the constant propaganda and infiltration of the Vietminh, the presence of Communist China on the north, the obtaining by Burma of its complete independence from the British, the organization of the Indonesian Republic to the south and east, the policy of the United States in granting the Philippines their complete independence, and the friction of Cambodia and Laos with Thailand, exacerbated by the annexation of some territory by Thailand with the approval of the Japanese during the war—all make it difficult to rally the native people in support of Vietnam and the French Union against the Communists.

WHERE SHOULD THE U. S. STAND?

With brains and courage and determination to stand by our allies and see it through, to prevent any further extension of the diabolical forces of Communism in Asia, I am sure we can make a greater contribution to the solution of the problem of our present-day civilization by taking affirmative action than we can by standing aloof and allowing the creeping paralysis of Communism gradually to extend over the Far East and southeast Asia.

We must make it possible for these downtrodden and harassed peoples to be restored to a sense of human dignity as creatures of God. We must enable them to believe that they belong in our society as equals and that we are not interested either in exploiting them or in using them to protect our own sons.

We have recently had a very clear and lucid account from the chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission of the latest explosion of a thermonuclear bomb at Bikini Atoll, of the falling of white ashes on Japanese fishing boats many miles away, and of the subsequent illness of the crew. The papers report that the danger area for the new tests has been substantially increased. Whether or not we understand all of these details, at least we know that another war using such weapons might wipe out or at least threaten to wipe out a large segment of our existing civilization and our highly concentrated industrial life. Indeed, the question arises as to whether we or our opponent could survive another such war; or, if we survived physically, whether we could ever again gain individual freedom as we now know it, or ever again live orderly, normal, human lives.

Perhaps at last we have come to the point where the weapons science has built are so truly terrible that we shall really have peace from physical war. In any event it behooves us to do our level best to think imaginatively and to strive for a realistic peace and to do everything that we can by negotiation to bring about a peaceful and constructive settlement of the world's problems.

Arthur H. Dean, LL.B., New York City, was Special Ambassador of the United States to Korea, 1952-1953. He was admitted to the New York State Bar in 1923, and has since practiced law in New York City. He is a director of various business firms, a trustee of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching and of Cornell University, a director of the Educational Television and Radio Center (Ford Fund) and of the Japan Society, a member of the School of Law Advisory Board of Fordham University, and a member of the Committee on Studies of the Council on Foreign Relations. He has lectured and written on legal, economic, and financial subjects.

The Soviet-Chinese Complex

By ADOLF A. BERLE, JR.

THE United States is once more in an area of high tension and great pressure in the Far East. The Soviet Union in close alliance with the Communist government of China has stepped down somewhat its military aggression in Europe but it has accelerated its military effort in the Far East. Though an armistice has stopped active fighting in Korea, the other branch of the Korean War—aggression against Indochina—has been increased. In substance, the Soviet-Chinese military push has been transferred from Korea to Indochina. There, it is clear, the Soviet-Chinese group believe they will find softer resistance, and they are there playing for an immensely more valuable stake.

The American State Department will meet this problem in full force in the Geneva Conference. It does not seem likely that the Geneva Conference can settle anything, and no hopes whatever should be indulged along that line. It does seem possible that a firm position taken by the country may be of help in creating conditions which will end the aggression later on.

The Department of State can take just as firm a position as American public opinion represented in the Congress will let them. Far too little is being done to inform the United States as to the real dangers involved. The fall of southeastern Asia to the Soviet-Chinese complex would be a disaster rivaling the shift of China from the free world to the Kremlin world.

We can afford no more misunderstandings. American policy towards China is not a giveaway to South Korea or to the French empire in Indochina or to anyone else. It must be based on the cold realization that if the Chinese Communist government in alliance with the Kremlin takes over the Asiatic mainland, the world balance will be definitely shifted away from the West and no "military new look" will be able to change that fact.

But while armies are grinding against each other and while diplomacy is temporarily unable to resolve the questions, it is possible that a bridge can be made to communicating, extraofficially, and to discovering what common ground does exist between Communist China and the West. I think there is an area here which can and must be explored; if this exploration is pursued over the next few years it may be possible to bring the Chinese situation once more into negotiating range.

In the long run, China must either act independently of the Soviet Union, or she must be (as she nearly is now) a Russian province. Her interest is that she shall be independent—and that also is the interest of the United States and of the world. The Chinese problem is peculiarly economic, and it is the kind of problem in the solution of which the United States can assist far more than the Soviet Union. The Chinese choice is much the same as the American: either the problem of world peace will be settled by the force of hydrogen bombs, or it will be settled by the understanding that no nation can be aggressor, seizing other countries by force of arms. This is not a case for eighteenth-century diplomacy or for newly styled negotiation. It is a straight case of convincing the Soviet-Chinese complex that more aggression can only mean war, and that the West can not afford to surrender more territory to an aggressive combination.

These are the conclusions; the reasoning leading to them follows.

THREE YEARS AGO

Three years ago the American Academy of Political and Social Science considered the problem of American policy in Asia.¹ The Korean War was then less than a year old. The Communist point of view was set out by Mr. Juliusz Katz-Suchy,² representing the Communist government of Poland. He affirmed that the Communist movement was a part of the "irreversible trend of history," and, quoting the words of Prime Minister Nehru of India, that the New China (meaning thereby Communist China) was "a great power to be dealt with on terms of equality by other great powers."³ This writer, for his part, disclaimed any revelation as to trends of history. Instead he went through some painful arithmetic, fully accepting the power and importance of China but coming to a grim result:

The United States, and with her the peace of the world, is endangered by the emergence of any major aggressive Asian power if that power is allied in simultaneous aggression with a major aggressive European power.⁴

THE CURRENT SITUATION

In the past three years, nothing has occurred to invalidate that bitter conclusion. The tide of events has tended to confirm it. The Korean War is not at an end: there is merely an armistice. Prospects even of holding a peace conference are dim, and those of negotiating a real settlement of the contest seem at the moment still dimmer. Meanwhile, part at least of the strategic and military resources formerly devoted by China to the Korean fighting have merely been channeled southward and are flowing from China to the war now being conducted in Indochina and somewhat less actively in Malaya.

A secondary adventure, the Communist war to seize the Philippine Republic, carried on under the name of the Hukbalahap rising, appears to be near its end, owing to an apparently decisive military and political defeat of the Hukbalahap faction by the Philippine government under the leadership of President Magsaysay. So, as the score presently stands, Russian-Chinese aggression has been defeated, apparently decisively, in the Philippines. It has been stopped at least temporarily by armistice in Korea. It is proceeding full scale in the larger and strategically more important theater of Indochina.

This is certainly not peace. The United States, whatever hesitation and confusion it may have shown in Asian policy prior to 1950, has recognized the situation as pregnant with grave danger of involvement in global war.

Against this background a diplomatic meeting is scheduled to be held in Geneva on April 26, 1954, at which the three principal West European powers have undertaken to sit down with representatives of the Soviet Union and China. So far as public announcement reveals, neither side has given any ground. On the Communist side, agreement upon the Geneva Conference was the signal for intense fighting, the Chinese apparently hoping to present the conference with a fait accompli. On its side the West has no ground to give. Any concession now would appear to be a one-way ticket to future disaster, just as British concessions to Hitler at Munich in 1938 merely fixed the take-off point for World War II. Actually, the Geneva meeting in April is more dangerous in some ways than was

¹ THE ANNALS, Vol. 276, July 1951.

² Ibid., pp. 48-59.

³ Ibid., p. 57.

⁴ Ibid., p. 67.

Chamberlain's meeting with Hitler at Munich, for Hitler had not completed his offensive and defensive arrangements with the then government of Japan, while at Geneva the Western powers will be faced with a fully matured East-West aggressive alliance—the Soviet Union and China—in being and fully armed. Concession of any territory to that combination threatens the safety at least of the Western Pacific; to make one could easily determine the date and base lines of World War III. Already the Sino-Russian alliance has caused the rearmament of the United States and has occasioned re-examination of the strategy to be pursued. All in all, it is the grimmest Asian complex of circumstances America has faced since V-J Day.

One word of semantic caution.

A good deal has been said about the "New China." This writer has no knowledge whatever of the internal developments in that country. Unhappily this is the situation in which most American observers find themselves. All of us have been treated to a vast amount of speculation about Chinese evolution and probable development. But such speculation is largely impressionistic, and hardly well enough based to use as a guide to policy. We had best, therefore, try to answer the major questions in terms of such solid information as is available. The questions themselves, of course, are clear enough, though the answers are necessarily incomplete. It is not enough to estimate the probable working out of forces there.

SOVIET-CHINESE RELATIONS

First. What are the true relations between the government of the Soviet Union and the government of China? If information on this subject exists in the United States (which is difficult to believe) it has not been given to the public. But we can state, on adequate evidence, that the Soviet government has steadily moved to support the Chinese Communist regime in all diplomatic matters and that her powerful propaganda machine has unfailingly forwarded the Chinese Communist contentions. We do know that the Soviet government has supplied arms and technical assistance in large quantity to Chinese Communist armies on the march. Thus the Korean War was conducted by Chinese armies with Soviet planes, Soviet ammunition, Soviet armor and artillery, Russian organizing experts, and so forth. We now see substantially the same thing happening in Indochina, where even the pretense that Vietminh troops are spontaneously organized native guerrillas has largely been dropped. The Vietminh forces are large organized armies, supplied from Chinese bases, provided by Chinese transport, using modern Russian-made and Russian-supplied munitions of war, in maneuvering full-scale armed conflict.

There is every reason to assume that, for the time being, the Chinese Communist government is acting in complete concert with the plans and policies of the Soviet Union. The unclear point is whether the Chinese Communist government is in substance a captive of the Soviet government or whether it has attained enough strength to claim a partnership relation.

For what one opinion is worth, this writer would feel bound to proceed on the assumption that the Chinese Communist regime is not Moscow's partner but Moscow's captive. The Soviet Union substantially controls the chief industrialized regions in this "New China"—that at least we do know. Russian organization and Russian forces dominate Manchuria; the Soviet Union has military and naval bases in the Dairen-Port Arthur area and she holds military lines of communication to them.

Without contrary knowledge, it would seem probable that Russian troops are stationed so as to guard these lines of communication and incidentally to exert military pressure on the area should this be expedient. This amounts to an almost complete grip on the slender manufacturing resources and military potential of "New China." The situation may be compared to the situation in which the United States would find herself if the Soviet Union controlled the quadrangle Chicago-Pittsburgh-Buffalo-Detroit and, being located next door to the United States as Canada is, held military lines of communication guarded by armed forces to the principal Great Lakes cities. Actually, no serious move of any kind can be made by the "New China" against the desires of the Soviet Union on pain of economic strangulation. If it be said that the Chinese apparently endure strangulation and starvation without uprising (as they do), it may be added that Russian wishes can open up or shut off the military potential which the "New China" must have either to maintain its internal structure or to carry out any foreign aggression.

I conclude then that for the time being the "New China" is for the moment a huge vassal of the Soviet Union, and that in the light of present evidence it would be imprudent for American policymakers to consider her in any other light.

CHINA AS AN INDEPENDENT POWER

Second. What are the present probabilities of Chinese emergence as an independent power?

Emergence of a really independent China as a great power would constitute a major change in the Asian situation. The reasoning in this paper is based on the assumption that there is an existing Sino-Russian complex, aggressive in nature, and moving together in common development of policy. Diplomacy to the extent that it can operate at all must therefore treat the area as a unit. Obviously, when the area divides, when the Soviet Union and her interests constitute one factor while China and her interests constitute another, and each can be separately dealt with, the condition of affairs will radically alter.

We are told by some that the situation will change, and that China must be considered as China and not as a part of the Russian complex. Protagonists of this view urge that the Chinese interest in the long run is clearly opposed to the Russian. Also, that Chinese governments have often in history been captured and governed by foreign invaders, as for instances in the time of Genghis Khan and the Mongols, and that always the invading forces have been absorbed, whereupon China has resumed her independent integrity. All this is true. The trouble is that there is no possibility of estimating the time factor. Genghis Khan's conquest of China began in the year 1213. Thirty years later his successor, Kublai Khan, was still operating the complex and Genghis' grandson, Batu Khan, was maneuvering at the head of a Chinese and Mongolian army in Europe, not far from the Iron Curtain line which divides East and West today. It was a matter of eighty years or so before the different elements of the vast empire reappeared as independent factors. It is probably the fact that natural expansion of Chinese population almost certainly will eventually threaten Slavic domination of eastern Siberia, to say nothing of the Slavic grip on Manchuria. But it is one thing to foresee this probability a generation or so from now and quite another to proceed on the assumption that the divergence of interest has reached a point leading China to take any line contrary to the will of the Soviet Union. Unquestionably it would be good American diplomacy to encourage China to do so. It would be sheer folly to assume that the present Chinese regime either can or will strike out on its own in the immediate future. The current evidence is all the other way.

It is rumored that high-level conferences are to take place in Moscow between the leaders of the Chinese regime and Mr. Malenkov and his ministers and that these may reveal the real relationship between the two empires. Even if this is true it is difficult to see that this particular conference will occasion any immediate major change in their relationship. There are plenty of weighty matters to discuss—the mere routine business of running the huge complex is vast and difficult. The economics of the double empire is apparently beginning to be onerous for both countries. The Korean War proved a substantial burden on the resources of the United States, and it must have been proportionately a greater burden on the less developed resources of the Sino-Russian group. The burden was not wholly lifted by the Korean Armistice, since a considerable part of the operation appears to have been transferred to Indochina. It appears probable that the Russian population is beginning to be exigent in wanting consumer's goods. Certainly the Soviet government has been publicizing a policy of giving greater consideration to Russian consumer wants. Quite probably internal considerations may press on Moscow to cut down somewhat on the support she is giving her captive Asian partner. Some vague indications suggest that the total food production of the entire area is deficient and that foodstuffs cannot easily be collected by China and sent to the Soviet Union in barter for armaments and manufactured equipment needed to maintain the Chinese aggressive policy. A fair surmise would be that any conference between the Chinese and the Russians at Moscow will be devoted not to debating differences but to cutting their common coat according to the cloth they have. Divergence of the two powers, this writer believes, is ultimately certain, but not in the foreseeable future.

ATTITUDE OF THE CHINESE PEOPLE

Third. Are not the Chinese people essentially peaceful, well-wishers of the United States, and will they not eventually impose a pacific pattern on their government?

Yes, sometime, but clearly not now. Certainly the Chinese Communist government throughout the year 1953 was quite strong enough to conscript armies, to throw them into the Korean War, and to maintain an extremely determined large-scale attack. There is little reason to believe that they are not still in a position to do this.

A little evidence on the other side was provided at Panmunjom. A very substantial number of Chinese prisoners of war, after surrender to the United Nations armies, made it abundantly clear they were determined not to return within the Communist lines. In China, as also in the Soviet Union, it is sufficiently clear that there are considerable elements in the population who will desert Communist leadership at the earliest practical opportunity. In the Korean War, however, they did not prove strong enough to modify the war plans of the Chinese Communists.

NECESSARY U. S. DECISIONS

The conclusion is simple. We have sound historic economic, ethnic, and political grounds for believing that Soviet domination of the Chinese government, and of its policy and armed action, will not continue forever. These suggest lines along which long-range Western policies may be framed. This huge complex is not a monolith; its maintenance involves plenty of problems. There is not undivided loyalty of Russians to the Soviet regime or of Chinese to the Communist regime, let alone Russian loyalty to Chinese aims or Chinese interest in Russian plans. But, in the year 1954, these weaknesses are insufficient to check the continuance either of Soviet or of Communist aggression, developed according to an agreed-on plan of joint strategy. The plain fact of the matter is that the Sino-Russian impact is able to push armed forces of both countries according to unified strategic plans, and that in Asia the alliance is actually executing a strategic plan of armed aggression now.

The result of that has been to force certain decisions on the United States, and they are in the making at this moment. Because the Russo-Chinese complex has the military initiative, the decisions have to be taken under pressure. They will furnish the bases for the American position at the Geneva Conference. In their implications, they are extremely serious.

In considerable measure they parallel the conditions created in June 1950 when the attack of the North Korean armies forced some very swift decisions on a harried American government. Then it was clear that not to prevent seizure of South Korea would be taken as a plain signal that it had best make terms with the Russo-Chinese force; and the United States, rightly, decided to invoke the aid of the United Nations and to resist. Today an exactly similar thrust on a far larger scale is proceeding in Vietnam and Laos, and failure to meet it almost inevitably entails the ultimate loss of Thailand and a renewed upsetting of the hard-won order which prevails in Burma and Malaya. More than these territories are at stake. The newly won independence of Indonesia has not achieved for that country a solid institutional base. Were southeast Asia in Communist hands, the fate of that vast archipelago would be in doubt, to put it mildly. Further, control of the strategic materials and the rice production of that area could result in great distress in Japan, to say nothing of its eventual effect on certain needed supplies (notably rubber and tin) used by the West itself. It would be folly to take the view that only some Indo-chinese territory is at stake here.

Defense of Indochina has devolved on the government of France. This, in the writer's opinion, is a historical accident. If the Vietminh movement had been Indochinese and not primarily Russian-Communist in origin, the problem would have been solved now, just as were the problems of India and Indonesia. But it is one thing to recognize that the time has come to give countries their independence, and quite another to hand them over to an aggressive group seeking world empire. One must remember that the Communist attack is parallel in one respect to the attack of Genghis Khan. He too evolved a doctrine—the Mongolian "Order of God"—which gave the Mongols sovereignty over the entire earth. Resistance was rebellion, not self-defense. Communist dogma assumes that everyone not under their empire is enslaved and that their right is to "liberate" all territories, liberation, of course, being complete when the peoples and lands in question are subjected to their rule. What the French ought to do with Indochina is one question, capable of being resolved. Handing over the territory to the substantially mercenary forces of the Sino-Russian alliance is not a problem for France, but a problem for the entire non-Communist world.

It is, I think, weariness rather than principle that has led the Western world to divide, somewhat, on the policy towards China. France has lost more men and expended more treasure in defending Indochina from her northern neighbor than the United States did in defending South Korea. The British, knowing this, and being uncertain of the American position, have advocated a course of attempting to trade out the problem with Peiping. They have an added incentive to this course in the hope that they may resume their profitable prewar trade with China. They are undismayed by the fact that British recognition of China promptly after the Communist seizure resulted in nothing but a studied series of insults. Britain's associate and our great neighbor, Canada, has indicated through her very able Foreign Minister, Lester Pearson, a considerable sympathy with the British view. The United States has said nothing definitive, though a considerable amount of help in the form of money and weapons and some technical assistance has been delivered to the French and Vietnamese forces and more has recently been promised as a result of General Ely's recent mission. Clearly a tremendous factor here is the American position, and that position is now being outlined.

U. S. political scene

At this point, account must be taken of the American political scene. The country has been alerted to the Communist danger from many angles. Practically all elements in American political life have expressed themselves in favor of resisting the march of Communism. Unhappily the group who have appointed themselves leaders in the anti-Communist drive, the McCarthy wing of the Republican party, have likewise been most vocal in demanding that not an American soldier and if possible not an American dollar should be committed to the defense of overseas territory. Having spotted their dragon, these Saint Georges have leaped on their horses and charged, at full gallop, in the opposite direction. If their professions are to be believed, defense of the free world must be accomplished by investigating committees, and unhappily this seems to suit the armies of the Sino-Russian aggressors extremely well. Secretary Dulles can go only as far as American public opinion and the American Congress will let him. America's European associates understand that, and being in doubt as to the result may be pardoned if they undertake the lead in proposing solutions.

There is, however, clarifying thought. The United States has a way of exhibiting greatest confusion at the moment when it is on the eve of becoming most resolute. So it was prior to the North Korean invasion in 1950; the immediacy of action and of public reaction came as a shattering surprise both to the Kremlin and to Peiping. For what it is worth, this writer's view is that if the loss of southeast Asia appears imminent, the vast majority of this country will demand decisive action at once. If we are having trouble momentarily in emitting a clear trumpet call, it would nevertheless be folly for the rest of the world to assume that the United States might not react like lightning to more dangerous developments.

So much for background. Let us get at the decisions which the United States seemingly must make as a result of the Communist initiative taken through and by the government of the People's Republic of China.

Demands to be met

For we are faced with certain demands, and all of them have to be dealt with. The Russians and the Peiping radio insist that Communist China should be recognized and admitted to the United Nations. No particular quid pro quo is offered: they want it. The French would like either all-out support in the Indochinese defense or American acquiescence in a so-called "negotiated peace" which in practice means a variety of surrender. The British would like to reopen trade with Communist China, hoping that by the combination of recognition and commercial intercourse that country may be won towards a peaceful and law-abiding point of view. The Japanese want larger export markets, knowing that without them the ninety million Japanese in that archipelago will be in serious difficulties. Prime Minister Nehru appears to want Asia left entirely to the Asians, apparently relying on philosophical forces to bring about peace, progress, and order. Mr. Syngman Rhee wants the Chinese out of North Korea. The United States wants a world in which she is not constantly menaced by attack from both Asia and Europe. The Soviet Union wants southeast Asia first, and after that, the rest of the globe to the extent that she can conquer it by the armies of her captive powers, without subjecting herself to attack.

Sorting out these questions, we may tackle them one by one.

RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

First. Should we recognize Communist China?

If the foregoing reasoning is accurate, the answer is no—certainly not at this time. The grounds are rather different from those usually urged.

Nonrecognition, by itself, accomplishes little or nothing. Few countries, especially if they are large, quail or shrivel up because they are not "recognized" and do not send and receive ambassadors. The United States is not materially stronger because it must express its views to and about China through the medium of the newspapers instead of through a direct diplomatic mission. Recognition of a government conveys no expression of approval or disapproval of the internal policies of its government. Most serious practitioners of foreign affairs do not hesitate to recognize a government however much they may dislike its political practices and philosophy—if anything can be gained by recognition.

But in the present case, it seems, nothing would be gained, while something can be lost. Recognition of Communist China implies not merely establishing normal diplomatic relations, but accepting this captive government as one of the controlling powers in the United Nations. Article 23 of the United Nations Charter names the Republic of China as a permanent member of the Security Council. It is absurd to suggest bringing into the peace-keeping machinery of the United Nations a country which has made war against Korea and signed an armistice there, but which has refused to make peace and is at this moment actively prosecuting war in Indochina under the thinnest camouflage.

This is not to say that there should be no recognition at any time, and still less to say that Communist China should not sometime be admitted to the United Nations. Sir Gladwyn Jebb, presently British Ambassador in Paris, recently made a forceful speech which unquestionably set forth his government's position. In his view, United Nations should be universal, and every country in the world should be in it and amenable to its obligations and discipline. If, as seems probable, the Communist regime in China has come to stay for awhile, this theory would include the present government. Sir Gladwyn is right: the bulk of China does belong inside the United Nations, and this would go with recognition. But the present problem is whether a captive China, committed either by her own or by Soviet will to aggression, really means to accept the obligations involved in entering the United Nations. It is one thing to admit a member to an organization, being convinced that the member will join in and forward its work. It is another to admit a tough, or a gangster, who hammers at the door with a gun butt. A Communist government which would join in fostering and maintaining the peace of the world would be welcome. Any government not prepared to do that is no real member of the group, however sanctified by election and diplomatic acceptance.

It follows that recognition, and with it in all probability membership in the United Nations, should only be granted on very clear conditions, to be established in fact and not by words.

The minimum conditions of recognition would have to be immediate, complete, wholehearted withdrawal by the Chinese Communist regime from the Indochinese war, and from North Korea with real liquidation of the Korean question, and registration of the Chinese-Russian agreements as agreement of collective defense in accordance with the provisions of Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. There should also be an understanding that the status quo in Formosa will be preserved for some considerable time to come. But there is not the most shadowy reason for believing, at the moment, that the Chinese Communist government would do any of these things. At Geneva, it is quite likely to demand that the United States pull out of the whole Pacific area. This scarcely leaves any real basis for talking; more harm than good would be done by another negotiation Panmunjom style.

The policy of not recognizing Communist China, nevertheless, ought not to be doctrinaire. As and when anything substantial can be gained by it, there is no reason why recognition should not be extended. The writer surmises that the time will come, in a few years, when recognition may be of positive use. Apparently nothing can be gained by it now, either for the United States or for the peace of the world. But nonrecognition is an expedient, not a principle.

CHINA AND INDOCHINA

Second. A decision must be taken whether the United States will or will not prevent Communist China from taking all or any part of Indochina, either directly through her own armies or indirectly through the subsidized and maintained armies of Vietnam.

This is a massive decision: the military problem of Indochina has, strategically, at least four or five times the magnitude of the Korean problem. Tentatively, we have already decided to join the Indochina defense. The American government has given arms, planes, technical assistance, and financial help to the defending French and Vietnamese forces. The decision, as far as it goes, seems justified. Passive acquiescence in the seizure of South Korea in 1951 would have signaled to all Asia that they had best make terms with the Soviet Union and its satellite China. Acquiescence in the seizure of Indochina would lead to a caving-in of the entire southeast Asian structure. It is a bitter decision to have to make, but I see little escape from applying the Truman doctrine to Indochina.

This does not mean that we commit ourselves to defend the French empire there. Clear-cut independence for the three Indochinese countries of Laos, Vietnam, and Cambodia may well prove a necessary step. It means, quite simply, that we commit ourselves to keeping the Soviet Union, the Chinese Communist government, or any group acting on their behalf, from taking over. Otherwise southeast Asia becomes part of the Russo-Chinese complex, which in turn has the proclaimed objective of smashing the West whenever it can.

And whatever other complaints we may have about the Soviet-Chinese empire, we cannot accuse them of not attempting to carry out their declared objectives.

I do not, of course, forget Dr. Katz-Suchy's words in 1951. He said that the People's Republic of China had at the foundation of its foreign policy the "possibility and necessity for peaceful coexistence with the capitalist world."⁵ Only a few months later Communist China formally entered the war against the United Nations. The propaganda words of Communist diplomats, like Hitler's word in 1938 that he meant to stop after absorbing Czechoslovakia, are worth exactly nothing. The fact is that Communist China probably will not attack surrounding territory if she believes that she can and will be successfully resisted. Perhaps the best service that can now be rendered to world peace is to make it plain that resistance can and will be interposed and to make it absolutely plain that a non-aggressive Communist China need have no fear of attack.

This brings into consideration the so-called "New Look" in military policy. It has been indicated that our military policy from now on will rest less on throwing large bodies of troops into a particular area and defending on the ground, and more on the possibility of long-range air attacks to center. Perhaps so. But, as Mr. Walter Lippmann has recently pointed out, there seems no good reason why the United States should make commitments of any kind now as to scope and methods of military action should that be needed—as every right-minded person hopes it will not. A government like that of China or the Soviet Union which enters on acts of aggression in this hair-trigger balance takes all the risks there are.

There is no point in making threats. Still less is there any point in suggesting to any aggressor that its risk can be estimated, minimized, or limited. If and when military action is required, our country will have to take whatever military action then appears wisest under all the circumstances.

BLOCKADE OF CHINA

Third. There is raised the question of continued blockade of Communist China.

This is not a decision which the United States can take by itself. It must obtain the assent of its allies and the neighboring countries. It is clear that in two cases at least—Great Britain and Japan—governments with which we have to act do not favor blockade. They want, and perhaps need, the trade. So also does Communist China.

This is a case for a flexible policy, working with facts as they are. Admiral Radford is reported to believe that an all-out naval blockade would be a real answer to Chinese aggression, eventually compelling adoption of a pacific course on the part of the Peiping government. In case of all-out resistance in Indochina, this probably will come about. In less pressing circumstances, I personally would like to see a situation in which trade in the non-strategic or less strategic materials was opened with Communist China, giving her people an interest in a state of affairs in which that trade could be maintained. Such trade currents ought to be sufficiently controlled so that at the first indication of continued Chinese supply to aggressive operations—including Indochina—the trade could be shut off. Normal economic operations with the world ought to be available to any peaceful country, Communist or non-Communist. Such relations ought not to be available when and to the extent that they assist in carrying on operations of aggression. Operating such a policy is not easy. But it is probably easier than either opening the gates without reserve or closing them on purely dogmatic grounds.

⁵ THE ANNALS, Vol. 276 (July 1951), p. 58.

ASIA FOR ASIANS

Fourth. A decision ought to be taken as to the American attitude toward the Indian "Asia for Asians" view.

As has been observed, the great Asian counterbalancing force, if there is one, is India. Indian policy has been obscure, often not well based on fact, and frequently grounded in what appears to Americans an obstinate failure to recognize elementary realities of the present-day Communist governments. We ought, perhaps, to be a little tolerant of the Indians in this respect. Most Americans were quite as obstinately opposed to recognizing the realities of Communist China until the Korean War broke out in 1950. We need not therefore quarrel too much with Indians: their mistake, if it is one, is much like those we made in America from 1945 to 1951.

This is a case where the advice of the Honorable Chester Bowles seems excellent. We had best be friendly and tolerant of the Indian position as far as it relates to India. That vast population will, in any case, go its own way; we could not control it if we wished. We can assist the growth of a strong and vigorous India without swallowing the theories of Indian statesmen—most of which have not stood the trial of events too well in the past three years.

There is absolutely no doubt that the Soviet Union proposes to control India as soon as she can. There is little doubt that the Russian intentions are not to use Communist China as her instrument in India but rather to effect direct organization of an Indian apparatus trained by and controlled from Moscow. Even the Indians will have to recognize this in time, and indeed some do already. The interest of the United States in India is that it should be Indian and not Russian, just as our interest in China is that it shall be Chinese and not an appendage of the Kremlin. With patience, good will, and good sense, there should be a deepening of the comprehension of common interest. It will take time. But it is a fair guess that we shall have the time.

REALPOLITIK 1954

Thus far we have tackled the problem of Communist China in terms of Realpolitik 1954. This is sound: the problems have been presented to us in just that fashion, and both the Kremlin and the Peiping Foreign Offices are Realpolitiker to a greater extent than were the Foreign Offices of Hitler and Mussolini. Because they are aggressors, Americans are forced to meet them on their own ground. But the ultimate solution does not lie in Realpolitik; the fact is that governments which depend wholly on it have a short run in history. While we are dealing with Realpolitik on its own terms, let us remember that any real solution must depend on liberating deeper and more permanent forces.

GENGHIS KHAN'S EMPIRE

In one aspect, the Russo-Chinese complex is following an ancient Asiatic model—the model set by Genghis Khan in the thirteenth century. This empire attained about the extent and substantial power of the Soviet-Chinese complex of today. Some of its doctrines, particularly its almost theological insistence that God and history had given it the earth, are suspiciously close to the theology of Communist extremists now. But the empire created dissolved into fragments in less than a century. Not only did it not leave its organization behind it, but it left only minimal fragments of culture.

THE REVOLUTIONARY PATTERN

A somewhat similar conclusion can be drawn from study of the life history of great revolutions. Characteristically a revolution takes advantage of favorable circumstances; imposes the rule of a small group or class with a strongly held doctrine; emerges as a dictatorship, which in due time becomes a military dictatorship. The power of the central organization strangles the attractive ideas which form the basis of revolution. Presently it becomes a self-perpetuating military-bureaucratic power regime, not seriously interesting the mass of people. Then, historically, it engages in a war, is defeated, and disintegrates. The Communist revolution in Russia is following with surprising vitality this historic graph. The ablest students of the Russian revolution, among them Professor W. W. Rostow of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, highlight the growing potential of the Russian armed forces and the progressive weakening of ideological motivation—this after thirty-six years of undisputed power. The Chinese revolution is comparatively younger, but on straight historical grounds we should expect to find the same repetition of revolutionary pattern. Whatever we have to fear, it is not the Communist dogma. The Communist governments will strangle that more effectively than anyone else. It is not accident that the French Revolutionary armies were unbeatable at Valmy and the Russian armies could not be conquered by the intervention of European powers in 1919 and 1920, while, on the other hand, the French armies under Napoleon were decisively defeated in 1813, and Russian soldiers deserted by hundreds of thousands to the Germans in 1941–42. The problem is not what will happen in the long run: we can almost forecast that. Both the Russian and the Chinese governments will break up. The problem is to assure that the world does not tear itself to a bloody and unrecognizable pulp as history accomplishes its inevitable result.

NATIONALISM

A third consideration is more profound, but more difficult of general understanding. This is the fact that nationalism—the nurturing and preservation of independent sovereign states—was probably logical in the eighteenth century, extremely useful in the nineteenth and early part of the twentieth century, and in mid-twentieth century is beginning to cease to be logical or even useful for many purposes. Only the largest countries can really attain it at all, and even they can only support it with the greatest of difficulty. A comparatively small country with determination, will, and a devoted population handling its economic life without too much reference to the neighboring areas could, two centuries ago, put enough force into the field to stand off even the more powerful neighbors, and could maintain a cultural life satisfying its people and often contributing brilliantly to the world. But mid-twentieth-century scientific progress has shredded the former situation into its component parts.

A small country cannot by itself satisfy the demands of its population for a tolerable standard of living. Even a large one has difficulty in doing so. A small country cannot maintain itself against armies equipped with modern weapons for more than a few days—if that. No nation can maintain a satisfactory interchange of ideas on a wholly nationalist basis: even today the American attempt to cut off exchange of contact with the Communist world—an effort cordially reciprocated—has clearly led to the slowing up of scientific progress of both worlds. These are only illustrations.

This is not the time or the place to elaborate the emerging principles of what seems to be the order demanded by the second half of our century. Enough to say that each country must apparently be intensely nationalist in preserving certain values assumed by it to be crucial—as in the United States the fostering and developing of individuality and of the unfettered minds and souls of free men appears to be a value without which life itself means little. To maintain its power and right to preserve these values a nation must, it seems, join at least in regional combinations. There must be a regional combination for defense, and some freedom of action must be surrendered to the group. It must join a regional combination for its economic life and health, and some degree of freedom of action must be surrendered to that group too. But the group which must unite in defense may or may not be the same regional group that unites for economic development. To maintain a degree of communication with the rest of the world, a nation must join in still further group arrangements—from the obvious ones which parcel out wave lengths for radio as a condition of any radios being capable of receiving anything to arrangements which permit ships to sail the seas or airplanes to traverse the sky. Finally, if there is ever to be a world at peace, a nucleus of world organization capable of becoming in time custodian of peace and administrator of a degree of law must be built and fostered and maintained—and for this reason if the United Nations were to dissolve tomorrow the world would have to reinvent it.

This means that we need not and indeed cannot be stopped by the perfectly accurate reports of the surge of nationalism in Asia. The accounts of emergent nationalism are entirely accurate as far as they go. The pity is that no one has seriously got to work explaining to the world in general as well as to Asia what nationalism of the twentieth century is and does. Within the American Academy of Political and Social Science are many men capable of doing just that. A first-rate academic statement of the realities of national statehood today would be a powerful force towards the cultivation of peace everywhere, and nowhere more than in the Western Pacific and the Asiatic mainland.

TOWARD COMMUNICATION

Once this is done, or even while it is being done, we can get at the accompanying task of discovering common interest. Terribly, or perhaps hopefully, the Asian nationalist who ties up with a Communist invader has more in common with the United States than he has with the prehensile paw to which he reaches for help. On study it will probably be found that the Asian nationalist wishes to realize personal ambitions as do all politicians: to speak his piece in his own country, to neighboring countries, and, if possible, to the world, as does every American Senator. His less vocal followers want jobs or ready access to substance and a degree of comfort. Americans want the same, and they want it not only for themselves but for others, because exchange with prosperous countries is not only more satisfactory but more profitable. The nation complex wants recognition and participation in the development of world affairs, as do most countries. Probably if a real interchange of ideas on an academic basis were sought instead of inhibited (as current thinking seems to exact) we should be on our way towards a real communication with the great areas of Asia to whom at the moment America and the Western world is a paper dragon conjured up by Chinese and Russian propagandists. Striking is the fact that wherever there has been such communication, notably in the Philippine Republic and to some extent even in Japan, common ground has been found, often against a background of the bitterest hostility.

The People's Republic of China has closed every avenue it can towards common thought or common study. But there are great avenues it cannot close. For one thing, there are powerful Chinese communities all over the Far East outside of the Bamboo Curtain. They begin as far east as Hawaii, on American soil, and run all the way across the East to India. There is evidence that Communist China is in continuous communication with these groups, some of which include the ablest living members of the Chinese race. There is the Nationalist government on the island of Formosa. There are powerful groups in Indonesia. Any general ideology which can be worked out with these groups will, I think, have eventual repercussions on the Chinese mainland and, especially if the search for a common denominator includes other Asian groups as well, we shall begin to find the organizing principles of eventual peace in the Pacific. Few will argue that by passing a magic wand over China any group of Communist revolutionaries has immunized the minds of a very old people to all ideas save those generated in Moscow.

So while we are holding the Realpolitik line—as we must—it is time perhaps for universities, economists, students of political theory, and international lawyers to work out and work up methods of communication with their Asian equivalents in those parts of Asia still open to free communication, and for the United States government, perhaps through the United Nations, to assist in transmitting the fruit of that work. The events of today will be yesterday's newspaper soon enough. The ideas generated will be causative for a long time.

So, at least, the problem comes down from the distant mountaintops of statesmanship to the grasp of an academy of political science. In brief, on both sides of this divided world the diplomats cannot solve the problem, and the soldiers with their hydrogen bombs do not appear to. But in reason and in strength, in tolerance and in charity, in strength and in forbearance, the intellectuals perhaps have their greatest opportunity.

SUMMARY

In brief, the situation stands as follows:

The United States with the United Nations is committed to the defense of South Korea. The United Nations is committed to the defense of Japan and the Philippines. The question is nominally open as to the defense of Indonesia, but at least tentatively American policy has defined itself sufficiently so that that archipelago too falls within the projected defense area. Only tentatively are we committed to assist in the defense of Indochina, but the circumstances are such that the world had best proceed on the assumption that the commitment is definitive.

Clearly, in handling the defense the United States will expect the support of the United Nations. But with or without support defense will go forward in case of aggression.

The method of defense is not definitely settled: it might be by limited war as in Korea; or by naval operations where that would suffice; or by direct attack to center as contemplated by the "New Look." Choice in this matter rests with the United Nations if the United Nations accepts the obligation, otherwise with the United States; it need not be made now. But what has occurred through the discussion of military methods is substantially a statement that an aggressor cannot count on being able to make a limited commitment in a little war, or on being able by taking an aggressive initiative to stake out the place, means, and nature of the ensuing conflict. Perhaps that is as good a place as any to leave the discussion, which from here on out belongs within the council chambers of the Department of Defense rather than the debating halls of diplomatists.

We shall press for liquidation of the Korean struggle and simultaneous withdrawal of Soviet and Chinese support for Vietminh and other aggressive adventures of that kind. Recognition of Communist China must await the actual fulfillment of these conditions, accompanied by at least reasonable cause to believe that they will not be repeated.

A flexible trade policy ought to be worked out, tending to give support to these conclusions.

No encouragement whatever should be given either to the Soviet Union or to the Chinese Communist government; otherwise, this writer believes, the results of any parley at Geneva will resemble the conference which sacrificed Czechoslovakia at Munich in 1938. For that matter we should feel no particular pressure to go into that conference. Politicians like to say that the door of the conference room is the door to peace. Regrettably this writer must testify that on two occasions—the Munich Conference in 1938 and the Hull-Nomura conferences in Washington in 1941—it proved the exact opposite. The conferring parties, in both cases, stepped out of the conference room on to the battlefields.

In both these cases the aggressor governments considered themselves relatively safe in going forward because they thought their prospective victims were unable or unwilling to meet the issue. There is considerable evidence to support the view that had they understood what would happen Germany would not have attacked in 1939 nor Japan in 1941. At this time, a practical, clear-cut position seems to be the line of greatest safety.

Adolf A. Berle, Jr., LL.B., New York City, is professor of corporation law in the Columbia University School of Law and is also engaged in legal practice. He was Assistant Secretary of State (1938-44) and Ambassador to Brazil (1945-46) and has been United States delegate to many Pan American and international conferences. Besides books and articles on corporation law and finance he is the author of The Natural Selection of Political Forces (1950).

The Real China

By V. K. WELLINGTON KOO

IN face of the intense cold war between the Communist and the free world, a war which will probably continue for a long time, and in face of the further fact that the Peiping regime is the most powerful ally of the Soviet Union, what kind of a new China will eventually establish itself on the Chinese mainland is necessarily a matter of great concern. Its bearing and effect upon the safety and future of the United States is bound to be far-reaching. Before I proceed to analyze the situation, survey the possibilities, and draw a conclusion as to what would serve the best interests of America and the free world as well as the welfare and freedom of the Chinese people, it will be useful to say a word about the present condition of Asia as a whole.

China, by virtue of her vast population, immense territory, long history, and highly developed civilization, has always played an important role in the development of the Asiatic continent, especially in eastern Asia from Korea and Japan in the north to the Philippines, Indochina, Burma, Thailand, Malaya, and Indonesia in the south. In considering the role which a new China can play in Asia and the degree of her importance to America we must take into account the condition of Asia today.

THE DANGEROUS BACKGROUND

What then is the existing condition of Asia? It is clear that while two-thirds of its territory and more than half of its population are already placed under Communist domination behind the Iron Curtain, the remaining third of the Asiatic continent is divided in policy and outlook. India, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Burma, Indonesia, and Ceylon have recognized the Communist regime at Peiping and, with the exception of Pakistan, are all pursuing what is known as the policy of neutralism and cultivating the friendship of Communist China.

The free countries of Asia are unorganized as a group, and the relations among some of them are still hampered by suspicion and distrust born of the past. Some of these countries, having only recently attained their full sovereignty and independence, are preoccupied with their domestic problems of consolidation and development. They are also highly jealous of their rights and exceedingly sensitive in their dealings with the outside world. Few of their statesmen appear to be sufficiently seasoned to take a far-seeing and long-range view of the present menacing situation in Asia created by militant Communism. Their attitude unwittingly plays into the hands of Communist China and the whole Communist camp headed by the Kremlin. It facilitates Communist fishing in the troubled waters of Asia and makes more difficult the task of the free world to check the Communist threat in the whole Asiatic and Pacific area.

It is against this fluid and dangerous background of the Asiatic continent that I propose to discuss more directly the question of America and a new China.

FORMOSA AND MAINLAND CHINA

Now, first of all, it is necessary to know what is meant by a new China. On the surface there may appear to be two Chinas: one the Republic of China with its temporary seat on the island of Formosa, and the other the so-called People's Republic of China on the mainland, which, as I shall presently show you, is not China at all. Some of you may think it difficult for me in my official capacity to discuss them impartially and even delicate for me to discuss them at all. But let me assure you that I shall endeavor to make my analysis of them as objective as possible. It should not be too difficult to bring out the facts so that even he who runs can see.

TOTALITARIANISM OF THE PEIPING REGIME

Communist China is ruled by the Peiping regime, which is euphemistically described by its sponsors as a democratic dictatorship. This is a self-contradictory term. It, in fact, consists entirely of dictatorship and not at all of democracy. As is known throughout the world, the Chinese Communist party, aided and abetted by the Soviet Union, seized political power over the country by force of arms. There have been no elections of any kind, and absolute political power is wielded by a Politburo of the Soviet pattern.

Indeed, the fundamental laws setting up the regime recognize as citizens only those people who are Communist party members and those deemed to be its sympathizers and supporters. All other people, including landlords, the former bureaucratic class, and the so-called "Kuomintang reactionaries" and their "henchmen," are not recognized as citizens but merely as subjects without any political rights. The whole system is a totalitarian rule of the most despotic kind. It is a reign of terror, and the Communist rulers maintain their power by a policy of terrorism carried out in the form of periodic purges of the people and the party itself.

The American Federation of Labor, after a wide survey of the situation, found that at least ten million Chinese were enslaved in labor camps and compelled to work against their will. Mr. Walter Robertson, Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, recently stated publicly that at least fifteen million Chinese have been killed by the Communist authorities. In fact, arbitrary arrests and imprisonment of people by the secret police, mob trials, mass slaughter, forcible transportation to outlying regions, and confinement in labor camps are ordained by the Communist rulers on the mainland as standard methods to keep the people under subjection and control. The time-honored Confucian classics are banned from the school curriculum, and 86 per cent of all the books published in China in the past half century were ordered to be burned. The cherished institutions of the family, filial piety, religion and ancestor worship, and mutual devotion of husband and wife are tabooed as medieval ideas, while the first duty prescribed for every man, woman, and child in the land is to bow to the will of the Communist party and obey the orders of the Communist authorities.

From this brief outline of its nature and policy, it can be readily seen that the Chinese Communist regime is anything but Chinese either in its conception and origin or in the policy and methods which it employs to rule the people and perpetuate its own power. Although it is called the People's Republic of China and officially described as a democratic dictatorship, it is alien to the Chinese both in spirit and in action. It maintains its control over the people only with the help of the Communist army, the secret police, and the vast hordes of so-called Soviet advisers, who are, in reality, gauleiters watching Chinese Communist leaders on behalf of the Kremlin.

FOREIGN RELATIONS

In its foreign relations the Peiping regime has followed the ruthless Communist pattern, and the free world has gained some enlightening, albeit painful, experience.

Take the United Kingdom, for example. At the beginning of 1950, shortly after the Chinese Communists set up their regime in Peiping, Britain rushed forward and was actually one of the first countries to accord recognition, in the hope of safeguarding her investments in China. British diplomatic representatives were sent to Peiping to negotiate with the Communist Foreign Minister for the purpose of establishing embassies and exchanging ambassadors. Obviously the move from London was meant to be a gesture of good will to Peiping and to induce a feeling of appreciation conducive to the advancement of the British interests in China.

But what has been the reaction of Peiping? What is the outcome? After four years of waiting, the British representative in Peiping has to this day not been received by the Communist Foreign Minister, and no envoy of any kind has been sent to London by the Peiping regime. Many of the British investments on the mainland, such as docks, warehouses, mines, factories, and newspapers belonging to British nationals, have been confiscated. British firms have been arbitrarily closed by the Communist authorities, and British subjects have been seized and imprisoned or expelled from the mainland. Even though many British proprietors of enterprises in China have been able to leave the country after suffering varying periods of maltreatment in the forms of house arrest, imprisonment, and payment of fines, they are still required by the Communist authorities to remit money to Communist China, ostensibly to pay their Chinese staffs, but in reality to increase the steadily dwindling foreign exchange reserves of the Communist treasury. The arrogant attitude of the Peiping regime toward the British and its adamant policy of subjecting them to humiliation and brutal handling caused the British Foreign Secretary, Mr. Anthony Eden, in the characteristic English style of understatement, to declare in the House of Commons not long ago that the British relations with Communist China have been most "unsatisfactory."

The United States has always refused to accord recognition to the Chinese Communist regime, and of course its citizens in Communist China have fared no better. American property, both official and private, has been confiscated, and thirty-two Americans are still pinning away in Communist jails on the mainland. Besides, the American people have come to learn something of the nature and policy of Communist China through their experience in Korea. By valiant efforts to implement the principle of collective security consecrated in the United Nations Charter, the United States, together with its allies, has repelled the Communist aggression in Korea. But Communist China has insisted from the outset that her soldiers fighting in Korea were volunteers, and this deception was at first naïvely believed by the West. Yet she is the real aggressor, masterminded and supported by Moscow. In fact, the aggression of Communist China in Korea has been more than once denounced by the General Assembly of the United Nations. The Korean War was a part of the Communist plan to conquer Asia as a step to world dominion. It has levied a toll of half a million casualties, with the United States alone suffering 32,000 dead and over 100,000 wounded.

PRISONERS OF WAR

The cruel treatment of United Nations prisoners of war by the Communists was shocking to the conscience of the free world. Stories of mass slaughter and burying alive are too gruesome to recount here. Although the bulk of the prisoners taken by the Communist side has been repatriated, over 7,000, including 944 Americans, are still reported to be unaccounted for. The obstinate refusal of the Communist authorities to give further information regarding the fate and the whereabouts of these prisoners illustrates their callous attitude toward human life and their utter disregard of international law and the principles of justice and mercy.

Those who have lived under the Communist rule in China and served in the Chinese Communist army should know the truth. The fact that 14,000 Communist soldiers captured by United Nations forces, constituting 75 per cent of the total number of prisoners of war, deliberately chose not to return to Communist China but to go to Formosa under the government of the Republic of China gives the lie to Communist propaganda that a Communist-ruled country is a paradise.

Thus we can see clearly that the regime on the Chinese mainland internally is a totalitarian dictatorship of the most ruthless type while internationally it pursues a policy of flagrant aggression and constitutes a menace to peace in Asia.

THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT, FORMOSA

Now let me say a few words about the real China, which is represented by the National government with its temporary seat on the island of Formosa.

This government is the only legitimate and lawful government of China. It is headed by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek as the President of the Republic of China. He was first elected to that office in 1948 in accordance with the Constitution adopted by the National Assembly of people's delegates elected throughout the country by direct and secret popular vote. The term of office of the President is six years, and two weeks ago the National Assembly re-elected President Chiang for another term of six years.

The Executive Yuan, equivalent to the Cabinet in the West, exercises the executive power of the government and is responsible to the Legislative Yuan. The Control Yuan is a constitutional body elected by the provincial legislatures on the basis of regional representation; it exercises the power of supervision and impeachment of delinquent officials. The Legislative Yuan, whose members are also elected by popular vote, exercises a power very similar to that of the Congress of the United States. It makes laws for the Republic of China and approves the national budget submitted by the government. It also has the power to summon the Premier and his Cabinet colleagues for interpellation on questions of national policy or on specific cases relating to the conduct of government officials.

Local self-government prevails in Formosa. Not only the mayors of cities and towns but also the members of the Provincial Assembly of Formosa and those of the city and town councils are all elected by the people. In contrast to the dictatorship of the Communist regime on the mainland, democracy is in full operation on the island of Formosa under the government of the Republic of China.

Now and then we hear criticisms of the National government in Formosa by some politically minded Chinese abroad, to the effect that the process of democratization carried out by the government of the Chinese Republic has not been rapid enough and that greater results could have been obtained in this respect. Of course, to criticize the government is one of the rights guaranteed by our Constitution to every Chinese citizen. Indeed, it is nothing surprising, as we see political criticisms made by opposition parties in every democratic country.

But in the case of the Chinese government in Formosa, it seems fair and reasonable to point out that this island, together with all the outlying islands under its control, is constantly threatened with invasion by armed Communist forces from the mainland. A state of war exists in Formosa because of this threat. Indeed it may be said to be in the firing line all the time, as the Communist regime at Peiping has repeatedly proclaimed its intention to attack and seize Formosa. Under these circumstances impartial observers, both Chinese and foreign, have often expressed their wonder and amazement that, in spite of the state of war, so much progress has been achieved by the Chinese government toward establishing and developing representative government and democratic institutions in Formosa.

Overseas nationals

I think it is important to add that, besides the people in Formosa, some twelve million Chinese nationals who live overseas in southeast Asia, Australia, the United States, Latin America, Europe, and Africa support, with few exceptions, the government of the Chinese Republic in Formosa. Indeed, even the people on the Chinese mainland wish the same government well and are eagerly looking to it as the only hope for their own liberation from the yoke of the ruthless Communist rule under which they are now groaning and suffering.

THE POLITICAL DEPARTMENT

Criticism is sometimes directed against the existence of the Political Department of the Chinese Ministry of Defense in Formosa. At first sight this setup appears to be unusual, and there is no precise counterpart in the defense establishments of the Western countries. But in the light of what happened to the government armed forces on the mainland in the struggle against the Communists, this department has been found necessary, especially at the present juncture.

Its work comprises many kinds of duties. One of them is counterintelligence. Another is education, instructing the personnel of the armed forces as to the nature of the Communist menace and the supreme duty of everyone in the armed forces to guard against Communist infiltration, to prepare themselves wholeheartedly to recover the Chinese mainland and liberate their fellow-countrymen from the Communist rule.

Another duty of this department consists of efforts to promote the spirit and morale of the armed forces by attending to the comforts, recreation, and entertainment of the soldiers, sailors, and airmen and to the welfare of their families. These activities take the forms of athletic meets, ball games, theatricals, motion picture shows, and visits to their families. Much of this work in other countries, such as the United States, for example, is done by separate agencies like PX (Post exchange), USO (United Service Organization), the Veterans Administration, and other public bodies; the work itself has been found to be equally essential.

Another important function of this department is to make periodic loyalty checks of the rank and file of the armed forces and to report security risks to the higher authorities for consideration and action. This line of activity has been found indispensable because of the discovery in the past few years of several serious cases of Communist infiltration and espionage involving even some high-ranking officers.

In considering the existence of this department one must again take into consideration the fact that a state of war prevails in Formosa, which is constantly threatened by the possibility of Communist invasion from the mainland. The necessity of safeguarding the security of the island calls for vigilance and the making of loyalty checks. In other countries the fundamental idea of safeguarding security is not much different. It underlies the practice, in the United States for instance, of checking with the Federal Bureau of Investigation before making or confirming the appointment of a person to a public office in the government or to a military post in the armed forces of the country.

MILITARY STRENGTH

As to its military strength, the Chinese government on the island possesses an armed force of approximately 600,000 men, including a large number of army units, a fair-sized air force, a modest navy, and a marine corps. The personnel of these different branches of the armed forces have been thoroughly retrained and to a large extent re-equipped with the aid of the United States in recent years. There is an American military mission stationed in Formosa, headed by Major General William C. Chase, which has been rendering valuable assistance in the training and reorganization of the armed forces, as well as in teaching them how to handle American equipment.

AMERICAN AID

Economically the United States Foreign Operations Administration maintains a China mission in Formosa with an efficient staff to study, discuss, and work out with the Chinese authorities the most essential programs for utilizing the economic aid granted to the Chinese government by the United States. It is gratifying to know that the pattern of close and fruitful co-operation which has been developed in Formosa between the Chinese government and the various bodies of American representatives to ensure that every dollar of American aid is spent honestly and effectively has been regarded by our American friends as a good example for other recipient countries of American aid in Asia to follow.

These satisfactory results have been obtained because it has been the determination of the Chinese government in Formosa, no less than that of the United States, that the generous aid given by this country to China should be made to produce the maximum benefit toward ensuring the security of the island, maintaining a sound economy, and promoting the welfare of the people. These are not my personal observations alone. They are also embodied in the published official reports and statements made by various diplomatic, military, and economic representatives of the United States in Formosa and have been confirmed by the statements of eminent American Senators and Congressmen and radio and press representatives who have visited Formosa. For example, Senator H. Alexander Smith, chairman of the Subcommittee on the Far East of the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who visited Formosa and other parts of eastern Asia last November, said in a report to the Committee:

As compared to the situation two years ago, we found a marked improvement in political stability and in economic conditions on Formosa. If this progress continues, the Nationalist government will become an increasingly important factor in encouraging disaffection from the Mao Tse-tung government among the Chinese on the mainland. Formosa can serve as a rallying point for their discontent as well as a powerful psychological base for a counter-offensive of Chinese democracy.

He went on to characterize Formosa as "a kind of show place for democracy in the East."

INTERNATIONAL RECOGNITION

Internationally, by far the greater part of the free world continues to recognize the government of the Republic of China, whereas the Peiping regime is recognized only by the Soviet Union and its satellites and a few European and Asiatic non-Communist countries. It is encouraging to note that no freedom-loving country in the Western Hemisphere or on the African continent has followed the example of the Soviet Union in recognizing the Chinese Communist regime. Of the sixty member states of the United Nations forty-three continue to recognize the government of the Republic of China. And the maneuvers and protests of Soviet Russia and her satellites to unseat the representatives of the Chinese Republic in that world organization and its various subsidiary organs in favor of the Peiping regime on more than two hundred occasions have invariably been defeated.

COMMUNIST CHINA—PRO-SOVIET, ANTI-UNITED STATES

Here then is the whole situation: the Communist regime at Peiping controls the life and liberty of the Chinese people on the mainland. The leaders of this regime are Chinese by race, but their thoughts and ideas and methods of government and their outlook are no more Chinese than those of the thousands of so-called Soviet advisers who now overrun the country.

The Communist authorities on the mainland are doing everything possible to destroy Chinese civilization and Chinese culture. They officially proclaim the Soviet Union as their welcome teacher, and the people are exhorted and even ordered to worship the Soviet pattern and learn from the Communist Russians. Every important pronouncement from the Kremlin is echoed at Peiping, and every turn and twist of the Soviet policy regarding Asia and the Far East is endorsed by the Peiping regime. The views expressed by Pravda and Izvestia on important international questions have never failed to be echoed in the Chinese Communist official organ, the People's Daily News of Peiping, and in other newspapers under Communist control.

The Red regime, although manned by the Chinese, is tantamount to a branch of the Kremlin. In fact, the Far Eastern Bureau of the international Cominform has its headquarters in Peiping and carries out its schemes of infiltration, subversion, and war in Asia under the general direction of Moscow. Because the Soviet Union regards the United States as its arch enemy in the world and at every international gathering concentrates its attacks on this country, Peiping has organized and proclaimed its so-called "Hate America Campaign." In the schools, in the theaters and press, on the radio, on public platforms and at the officially sponsored mass meetings, the United States is assailed as a warmonger and arch-imperialist. Everything American or of American origin is condemned as tainted with the evil spirit of American imperialism. Hundreds of American-educated Chinese who refused to denounce the United States as ordered by the Communist authorities have been arrested and jailed as agents and spies of American imperialists.

In order to force the people to join in this vicious campaign, literally hundreds of the so-called Sino-Soviet friendship societies which have been established throughout the country also take a hand in organizing meetings and supplying speakers to malign the United States, as well as to eulogize the Soviet Union. The artificial hysteria engendered by the Peiping regime in trying to make people believe that the United States had resorted to germ warfare in Korea was one of their transparent attempts to arouse mass hatred of America.

Communist China may be treated with greater consideration by Moscow than any of its European or Asiatic satellites, but it is not a free and independent political entity. At best it is only a junior partner of the Soviet Union in the Communist world. To further the Kremlin's plot of world domination Peiping has not hesitated to engage in aggression openly in Korea and covertly in Indochina.

REPUBLIC OF CHINA—INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

In contrast with the Peiping regime, there is on the island of Formosa the government of the Republic of China which thinks of the sufferings of the people on the mainland and ponders daily over the supreme task of recovering the mainland and effecting their liberation. While working hard to ensure the security of the island, it has also been exerting its efforts to establish representative government and develop democratic institutions. In thought and action it cherishes the Chinese tradition and fosters the virtues and teachings taught by Confucius and other sages through the centuries.

In its relations with other countries, the Chinese Republic steadily pursues a policy of peace and friendly co-operation to advance the cause of peace. It is a charter member of the United Nations and contributed its part in the writing of the Charter at San Francisco. It is a staunch and consistent supporter of the United Nations, and its delegation has taken from year to year an active part in the proceedings of that world organization. A strong believer in the principles of collective security, it has not failed to offer its assistance to implement this principle, though such offers have not always been accepted by the United Nations.

In regard to the traditional relations of this real China with the United States, it is a notable fact that throughout the 110 years of official intercourse between the two nations there has always existed between them peace and friendship. While every major power in the world in the past century committed aggression or waged war against China, the United States, like China herself, to our great appreciation and gratitude, has always pursued a policy of peace and friendship toward her. In the two world wars in which the United States was involved, China joined in the conflict to be its ally and co-operated with it closely as allies should. Today the United States, as the leader of the free world against actual and potential Communist aggression, finds the Republic of China pursuing a strong and determined anti-Communist policy in close co-operation with Washington.

Although it might seem that there are two Chinas, there is, in fact, only one legitimate, true China, represented by the government in Formosa. It is a reasonable conclusion from what I have outlined that the continued friendly and co-operative relations between China and the United States can be maintained and developed only with the true and new China which has her temporary capital in Formosa. The Republic of China not only enjoys the support of the eight million Formosan people and twelve million overseas Chinese but also represents the hope of the enslaved 470 million people on the Chinese mainland for their liberation from the Communist rule.

THE GENEVA CONFERENCE

With the Geneva Conference, called to discuss the question of Korea and Indochina, public interest is growing and speculation is rife as to the attitude of the participating powers and the possible outcome of the gathering. Will the Communists show a change of heart on the part of their governments and make a sincere effort to reach reasonable and fair settlements in the interest of world peace and justice? What will be the attitude of the countries of the West? Will they enter the conference with the firm resolve to defend the cause of freedom and uphold the principles of international justice and peace? Or will they be influenced by considerations of expediency and seek a compromise by means of appeasement? Whatever the result of the conference, it will be of far-reaching consequence, as it will determine the future course of events in Asia and eventually in the whole world. It is no exaggeration to say that much uneasiness and apprehension prevails in many countries of eastern Asia. They are anxiously awaiting the outcome of the conference.

My country's attitude toward this conference has been stated by Dr. George Yeh, Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs, on February 19, 1954. In the view of my government, because of its inclusion of Communist China condemned by the United Nations as aggressor, the conference sets a dangerous precedent, constituting a negation of the principles of the Charter of that world organization. The Chinese government and people cannot recognize the validity of any decision affecting their interest which may be reached at such a conference.

The position which the United States government would take at Geneva was clarified by the Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles, in a timely and forceful speech before the Overseas Press Club in New York on March 29. He warned in clear and unequivocal language against any further attempt on the part of Communist Russia and her Communist Chinese ally to impose their political system upon southeast Asia. With equal clarity and emphasis he reaffirmed the opposition of the United States government to recognition of Red China and her admission into the United Nations and gave some very cogent reasons in support of this stand.

In this connection I must also refer to the welcome statement of Senator Alexander Wiley, Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate. In an address before the Masons of New York State last week he, too, spoke against recognizing Red China and giving her a seat in the United Nations. His declaration, like that of the Secretary of State, obviously reflects the sentiment of the American people, who, true to their tradition, are strongly opposed to aggression and appeasement of the aggressor.

It is heartening to the freedom-loving peoples of Asia to take note of these authoritative statements of United States policy. They are reassuring, and they will go far to clear the atmosphere of doubt and speculation as to what the stand of the United States will be at the forthcoming conference. They will, I hope, discourage any wavering on the part of other Western powers.

But the policy and attitude of other participating countries on the side of the free world remain a mystery and give rise to much uneasiness. As a student of international affairs I cannot refrain from expressing the view that, in the light of past experience, any attempt to sacrifice fundamental principles of justice and peace and appease the Communists in the hope of getting their promises of good behavior in Indochina and Korea would be a grave mistake of statemanship. Communist bad faith is notorious. Their record of performance in regard to the Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam agreements constitutes an important lesson and a serious warning to the free world.

U.N. MEMBERSHIP FOR COMMUNIST CHINA?

It is conceivable that Communist China, in order to secure the immediate advantages of diplomatic recognition and membership of the United Nations, will not hesitate to deny her sinister intentions toward Indochina and Korea and to sign agreements with the representatives of the free world. For it is a part of Communist strategy in dealing with what they call the capitalist world to launch economic, military, or diplomatic offensives to further their objectives according to circumstances prevailing at a given moment. It may be that the Communists are counting upon the fruits of a diplomatic offensive at Geneva. But Peiping's pledged word can no more be relied upon than Moscow's. In the speech referred to above, Mr. Dulles cited a series of violations of international agreements by the Communists. Stalin himself once said to the representatives of a Soviet satellite that "a treaty is worse than a scrap of paper because you cannot write on it."

Moreover, the Peiping regime, it will be recalled, was denounced as the aggressor in Korea by a formal resolution of the United Nations General Assembly. To admit it into this world organization would be tantamount to putting a premium on aggression and rewarding the aggressor. It would be difficult to imagine an act which would have a more demoralizing effect on the hopes of millions and millions of enslaved people on the Chinese mainland and upon the spirit of the freedom-loving peoples in Asia. In addition, it would further weaken the United Nations, the effective functioning of which has already been greatly impaired by the policy of nonco-operation and obstruction on the part of the Soviet Union and its satellites.

It is sometimes claimed by apologists for the Peiping regime that the United Nations must observe the principle of universality and admit all countries into it without regard to their political ideology. Evidently those who advance this thesis forget the basic requirements for membership prescribed in the United Nations Charter. To be admissible a state must be peace-loving and able and willing to carry out the obligations contained in the Charter. Could Communist China, in view of its flagrant aggression in Korea and of its aid to the Communist forces in Indochina, be considered as a peace-loving country?

As to Peiping's record of observance of its international obligations, the Secretary of State disclosed in the address already referred to that it has committed at least forty violations of the Korean Armistice Agreement.

In some quarters it is stated that it would be better to have Communist China in the United Nations, so that its conduct could be more easily watched and it could be called to account in conference and discussion. If this is the reason for giving the Peiping regime a seat in the United Nations, it is only wishful thinking. The Soviet Union is a permanent member of the United Nations. Has this fact prevented it from instigating Peiping to launch a war of aggression against Korea and to conspire against the French and Vietnamese in Indochina?

Those who advocate Peiping's admission into the United Nations seem to be satisfied that this world organization should serve only as an international forum, unmindful of the fact that the primary objective of the United Nations is to maintain international peace and security through the organization and application of collective security. The Security Council, whose primary responsibility it is to carry out this duty, has been paralyzed by the obstructionist attitude of the Soviet Union. If the United Nations is to be generally only a debating society, then the taxpayers of the member states would have a good reason for complaining that its maintenance is too costly, especially since it now provides as much a forum for Communist propaganda as for others.

TRADE WITH COMMUNIST CHINA

There are people who urge recognition or admission of Communist China into the United Nations in the hope of doing more trade with it in the vast Chinese market, as if the principles of peace and security and the cause of freedom should be evaluated in dollars and cents and bartered away for economic and financial gains. Those who place trade above all other things must be aware of the fact that the immutable aim of international Communism is nothing short of world domination; it is determined to seek its attainment by all means at its disposal.

It must also be realized that the policy of the Chinese Communist regime today is to consolidate its power at home and build up its prestige abroad. While pursuing its policy of expansionism in the neighboring countries of east and southeast Asia, in Burma and Nepal as well as in Korea and Indochina, it is also pressing forward its program of industrialization, so as to increase its war potential. Any move to lift the embargo on strategic goods and promote trade relations with it would be helping its policy of consolidation and industrial development. Once the Peiping regime succeeds in entrenching itself on the Chinese mainland, not only would the hopes of millions of the enslaved Chinese people be dashed to the ground and the supreme mission of the government of the Republic of China to liberate them frustrated, but the task of saving Asia from the Communist grip would become impossible.

The fundamental objectives of United States foreign policy, as I understand them, are peace, security, and freedom throughout the world. Indeed, these constitute the only sound basis for working to raise the standard of living of all peoples and promoting the welfare of humanity. If this understanding is correct—and I venture to believe it is—then every effort must be made to rescue Asia from Communist conquest and domination. For the Communist leaders from Lenin and Stalin down to the present rulers in the Kremlin have always regarded the conquest of Asia with its tremendous manpower, immense resources of food supplies and strategic raw materials, and military bases as indispensable to the success of their plot of world domination. The success of the Communists in consolidating their power in China would portend an ominous future for the whole of Asia, as demonstrated in Korea and Indochina.

HOPE FOR A NEW CHINA

To check this calamitous trend and save Asia for the free world, the government of the Republic of China must be encouraged and supported in its determination to carry out its supreme mission of recovering the Chinese mainland and liberating the Chinese people. Whatever fighting, whatever sacrifices, may be necessary will be enthusiastically undertaken by the Chinese government and people in Formosa. The armed forces under its control today may not be large compared with the Communist army on the mainland, and the population of the island, even with the support of the reservoir of manpower from overseas Chinese, may be limited. Yet the real potential strength of the Republic of China exists among the millions and millions of the people on the mainland. It is sincerely believed—and intelligence reports invariably confirm this belief—that when the army of liberation lands on the coast of the mainland and establishes a beach-head there, not only the anti-Communist guerrillas but the people of the mainland will gladly rally to its banner and join in the fight to overthrow the hated Communist regime.

Once that is done and the government of the Republic of China moves its seat back to the mainland and starts to build up and develop democracy there, as it is doing in Formosa, a true and new China will have arisen: true because she will be faithful to the Chinese tradition and reflect the spirit of the Chinese people, and new because her democracy will be based not only upon the foundation of time-honored Chinese society but also upon the pattern of the United States. It is only that China which the American people can soundly and rightly contemplate and work with for mutual interest. It is only that China which will be in the future, as she was in the past, a loyal friend and faithful ally of the United States, to co-operate in the common task of building a world of peace, security, and prosperity.

His Excellency V. K. Wellington Koo, Ph.D., LL.D., L.H.D., Washington, D. C., has been Ambassador of the Republic of China to the United States since 1946. Before this appointment he was Ambassador to Great Britain (1941-46) and Minister and Ambassador to France (1932-41). In China, he was Minister of Foreign Affairs (1922-24), Finance Minister (1926), and Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs (1926-27), and he has represented his country at many international conferences, including the San Francisco Conference. Dr. Koo was chairman of the Chinese delegation to the first session of the United Nations General Assembly.

Present United States Policy Toward China

By ALFRED LE S. JENKINS

IN recent years we have often heard it said that more heat than light has been cast on the China question. I am not surprised at the heat, nor do I object to it, provided there is also sufficient light. The fate of one-fourth of the world's population is not a matter which can be taken lightly, and the addition to the Soviet bloc of China's vast material and manpower resources is a matter involving not only the security interests of the United States but those of the entire free world. I do not see how one can help feeling strongly about these matters. We need not apologize that our thinking about China is charged with feeling. National policies are an expression of national interests concerning which there is naturally much feeling, and our policies are an expression both of what we are and of what we want. We are a nation of free people. We want to remain free to pursue in peace our proper national destiny, and we want the same freedom and rights for others.

We do not believe that the Chinese Communist regime represents the will of the people it controls. First capitalizing on the natural desire of the Chinese people to enjoy full recognition and respect for their importance in the world community, the regime then proceeded by its "lean-to-one-side" policy to betray the powerful Chinese longings to stand up straight. It has followed slavishly the leadership of the Soviet Union and attempted to emulate it in all its ways. With the aid of thousands of Soviet advisers it has set about methodically to change the entire fabric of traditional Chinese culture, substituting Communism's materialistic, atheistic doctrines, wherein the state is the be-all and end-all and the individual its pawn.

The regime at first attracted considerable support, principally through its sponsorship of a land redistribution program, but is now, after establishment of the prerequisite police-state controls, taking the land away from the owners in the same collectivization process which is familiar in other Communist countries and which invariably has brought suffering in its wake. China's much advertised "new democracy" is, of course, in reality "old Communism."

SOVIET-CHINESE RELATIONS

From its inception the regime has proclaimed a lean-to-one-side policy in foreign affairs and has left no doubt about its dedication to the proposition of world Communist revolution under the leadership of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. While its leaning to one side has not brought it to the position of complete prostration to one side characteristic of the Eastern European Soviet satellites, there is not the slightest evidence that this indicates any separatist tendencies. The difference in status of Peiping in its relationship with Moscow (as distinguished from that of the Eastern European satellites) is due rather to its having come to power without benefit, except in Manchuria, of Soviet army occupation; to the prestige of Mao Tse-tung, arising from his long history of leadership of Chinese Communism and his literary contributions to theoretical communism; to China's assumption of the role of leadership in the Communist program for Asia; and to the geographical position, size, and importance of China itself. This relationship has been characterized as that of junior partner, and the association has every mark of being a willing, determined, and close one.

Although Soviet officials previous to the Chinese Communist assumption of power were protesting that they did not know what "those independent agrarian reformers" were up to, there was already close co-operation between Mao and Moscow. Despite the Treaty of Friendship and Alliance between the Republic of China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics signed on August 14, 1945, which specified that Soviet "support and aid . . . be entirely given to the national government as the central government of China," the Soviet Union a few months later turned over to the Chinese Communists the Japanese equipment it received in Manchuria. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics instituted diplomatic relations with Peiping only two days after the regime's establishment, and five Eastern European Soviet satellites followed suit within the week. The North Korean regime, the East German Communist satellite, and the so-called People's Republic of Mongolia also established diplomatic relations with the new regime during the first month of its existence.

The Sino-Soviet Friendship Association, a mass organization whose aim, according to the Communists, is "to found and consolidate fraternal friendship and co-operation between the Chinese and Soviet people and to develop the interflow of knowledge and experience of the two great nations" was founded in Peiping only four days after the establishment of the so-called "People's Government."

Treaties and agreements

The Mao regime has since concluded with the Soviet Union and other Communist states various economic, military, and cultural treaties and agreements. Strong ideological ties bind Moscow and Peiping, and a number of Chinese Communist leaders are Moscow trained. The Chinese Communists also feel the need for close association with the Soviet Union to develop their military strength and striking power. They need Russian military supplies and equipment and Russian technicians and economic aid for the development of heavy industry, which they view as a necessary base for a large military establishment. In exchange, China can furnish the Soviet Union with needed raw materials and foodstuffs and offer the use of the warm-water ports of Dairen and Port Arthur. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics does not want a strong, independent China on its Siberian border. It is naturally interested in the survival and growth of a Communist China (so long as it does not grow too strong and independent), and in alliance with a Communist China it is in a far stronger power position than it would be otherwise. The close co-operation and interdependence between the Chinese Communists and the Soviet Union in the Korean aggression is well known.

Communist China's attitude toward U. S.

As a corollary to Communist China's "leaning" to the Soviet side, she has unceasingly heaped vituperation and all manner of abuse and insult upon the free world in general and the United States in particular—over the radio, in newspapers, at the conference table, and in numerous periodicals in many languages (even including Esperanto), which are sent all over the world.

Aside from the serious implications of policy in this performance, such conduct somehow seems especially shocking coming from the Chinese. For well over a century Americans have had a deep interest in and sincere friendship for the Chinese people. Our record in supporting China's territorial integrity and political independence is a well-known one. It is a source of deep concern and regret to us that for more than four years we have been cut off from our accustomed close association with the great majority of the Chinese people.

U. S. POLICY ON RECOGNITION

There are some who feel that this unfortunate situation could be remedied if we were to recognize the Peiping regime and if it were accepted as representing China in the United Nations. Actually, even if we considered such action to be morally justifiable, there is not a shred of evidence to indicate that we could expect reciprocity on any satisfactory basis or that it would lead to a renewal of our association with the Chinese on the mainland. During the few months preceding and following the establishment of the so-called People's Government in Peiping, Chinese Communist authorities jailed or otherwise maltreated a number of our official representatives and never recognized their official status. Finally, when the situation became intolerable, we withdrew all of our official representatives, requesting the British to represent our interests. The British have tried to do this to the best of their ability. They are hampered in this endeavor, however, for while they have recognized the regime and have diplomatic and consular officials on the mainland, the Communists have not seen fit to establish diplomatic relations with the British and have refused to accord full accreditation to British officials. The British, and indeed others with fully accredited representation in Peiping, have in vain attempted on our behalf to secure the release of some hundred Americans held in Communist China against their wishes, thirty-two of whom are in jail now, held incommunicado, without trial, and without even a statement of the charges against them.

The Peiping regime has followed no recognized standards of international conduct. It has repeatedly violated the terms of the Korean Armistice Agreement. It has disregarded international rules on the care of prisoners of war. In order to secure sorely needed foreign exchange to carry on its aggressive adventures and its subversive activities in other countries it has engaged in narcotics trade throughout the world, and has directed an extortion racket against overseas Chinese whose relatives on the mainland are at its mercy. In addition to its aggression in Korea and its defiance of the United Nations itself, it has supplied the Communist Vietminh armies with equipment and advisers and trained Vietminh troops on Chinese soil. It has swept aside traditional local autonomy in Tibet and has carried on an active program of intimidation and subversion throughout south-east Asia.

Internally, the Mao regime is a ruthless police state with all that that implies. Millions of Chinese have been murdered or have committed suicide in connection with the phoney land reforms and the campaigns against alleged irregularities of private businessmen. Property of both Chinese and foreigners has been confiscated without compensation. Personal liberty is a thing of the past. The "justice" of the so-called people's courts is subservient to state policies. Movements of individuals are closely controlled. There is forced labor on a large scale. Children are trained and forced to inform on their parents and friends. There is not even freedom of silence, since all must be vocal in support of Communist policies. Mass "brainwashing" is a continuous process through daily study groups and all media of communication. The family unit has become a special target of the Communist system. The Communists have rewritten history, and attempted to make religion the handmaiden of politics.

In view of all these considerations it is hardly surprising that the firm policy of the United States government is one of strong opposition to the Chinese Communist regime. We cannot recognize this regime, and we shall continue vigorously to oppose attempts to accept it in any United Nations organization as representing the Chinese people. We earnestly solicit the support of the entire free world in these policies. We would view with deep concern a "creeping acceptance" of the Peiping regime by the world community of nations.

We further consider that recognition and acceptance of the Peiping regime would have the effect of substantially weakening the will to resist Communist expansion on the part of other Asian people. The nations and people near the Chinese mainland might under such circumstances erroneously tend to view Communism as "the inevitable wave of the future" and more and more incline their political leanings and economic activities to accommodate this conviction. If the Chinese Communist regime were the only China to which the twelve million overseas Chinese could look, the Communists would have an important, ready-made "fifth column" throughout southeast Asia and in many other nations of the world. They already have the support of some of these Chinese, but their following among them has fallen off markedly since the extortion episode and as the nature of the regime's excesses has become increasingly apparent.

Those who favor recognition of the Peiping regime beg the question by urging us to "recognize reality." We do recognize reality, and much of it we do not like. But it is not in the American tradition to confuse the real with the immutable. We recognize with concern an increase in the incidence of cancer in recent years, but we refuse to recognize cancer as "the inevitable wave of the future."

U. S. MILITARY POLICY

So much for our political policy toward the Chinese Communist regime. On the military side it is the view of the United States that the way to deter aggression is for the free community to be willing and able to respond vigorously at places and with means of its own choosing.

EMBARGO AGAINST COMMUNIST CHINA

On the economic side we follow a policy of total embargo against Communist China, and our ships are forbidden to call at Communist Chinese ports. It is realized that every kind of merchandise cannot be considered to be directly helpful on the battlefield. We have felt, however, that the maximum possible economic pressures should be applied against an aggressor engaged in fighting and killing the troops of the United States and other free countries. The aggression in Korea, so far as Communist China is concerned, will not be considered over until its troops are all withdrawn. The Armistice in Korea only stopped the shooting—doubtless because the Communists found the fighting unprofitable—but we have seen no indication so far that the Mao regime has abandoned its aggressive policies. If the time should come when the consideration of lessening economic controls appears appropriate, we shall still bear in mind the effect of such action in regard to Communist China's plans to build a large war potential and its avowed intent to "liberate" all of Asia and eventually the world.

THE GENEVA CONFERENCE

We have been committed since signing of the Korean Armistice Agreement last July and the passage of the United Nations General Assembly Resolution last August to seek a Korean political conference. We have patiently sought since early September to arrange for such a conference on terms consonant with the Armistice Agreement and the United Nations Resolution. The Berlin Conference laid plans for a multipower conference at Geneva on April 26 to consider a Korean settlement. This will not be, as the Communists are claiming, a five-power conference. Communist China, far from attending the conference as a great power, will not in our view even attend as a government. At Berlin we secured Soviet agreement to the following statement:

It is understood that neither the invitation to, nor the holding of, the above-mentioned conference shall be deemed to imply diplomatic recognition in any case where it has not already been accorded.

The time, place, and composition of the Korean political conference are entirely as we wanted. We do not fear this conference. As Secretary Dulles has said:

There is . . . no reason why we should refuse to seek peacefully the results we want merely because of fear that we will be outmaneuvered at the conference table. . . . Our cause is not so poor, and our capacity not so low, that our nation must seek security by sulking in its tent.

We will not be prepared at Geneva to allow the aggressors to achieve at the conference table what they failed to achieve in battle. This applies not only to territorial considerations but to any "deal" which would, as has been suggested in some quarters, trade a United Nations seat and an end to the trade controls for an agreement by Communist China to stop supplying the Vietminh. As a recent New York Times editorial put it, "There is neither logic nor profit in paying a bribe to the Communists to get their worthless promise not to do again what they had no business doing in the first place."

Whatever the Communist attitude, we will go to Geneva in good faith and do our best to achieve just solutions to the Korean and Indochinese problems. There is the bare possibility that Soviet Russia and its Chinese Communist ally may be sufficiently preoccupied with plans for internal development to cause them at least to desire a period of relaxation in both areas on an acceptable basis. Meanwhile, we are keenly sensible to the Communist habit of waging war by cease fire, and we do not discount the possibility that they might use a cessation of hostilities merely as an opportunity to build up for renewed attacks. In our view, any settlement in Korea or Indochina would have to provide effective guarantees against such a possibility.

U. S. POLICY TOWARD THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Certainly we do not contemplate any action at Geneva or anywhere else which would damage the cause of the government of the Republic of China. Our policy is to extend moral and material support to the Free Chinese, and we have no intention of letting them down. This government has been constant in its opposition to lawless imperialism. We do not forget that the government of China under President Chiang Kai-shek, during the long years of its lone stand against the Japanese invader, had several opportunities to reach a seemingly advantageous accommodation with the invading power, but refused to do so. The Chinese government early recognized the true complexion of the Chinese Communists and refused to compromise with them. Just as we view the unswerving friendship of the Chinese government with gratitude, we also view its growth in material strength and political appeal with satisfaction. We are prepared to lend our continued support to these ends, but we cannot ourselves fashion them. This, of course, is primarily a Chinese responsibility. The military and economic progress which has taken place on Formosa during the past four years has been heartening. We hope and are confident that the progress being made there will stand in increasingly favorable contrast to the regimentation and oppression of the mainland regime.

We will continue military and economic aid to the government of the Republic of China. We will continue to recognize it as the government of China, and we will support it as the representative of China in the United Nations. We are convinced that even though it is cut off from the mainland, it is far more representative of the will of the Chinese people than is the Peiping regime. It has conducted itself in the United Nations ably, responsibly, and with dignity. The free world can deal with this government on mutually understandable terms. It does not employ the upside-down vocabulary of the Communists.

THE CHINA PROBLEM

International politics, like domestic politics, is in the last analysis an art of the possible. I do not mean by this that a solution to "the China problem" is impossible. I mean that the solution is not likely to be easy or quick. Time, however, can be on our side. The greatest thing the Communists have to fear is truth. This fear erected both the Iron Curtain and the Bamboo Curtain. There is nothing new about Communism, and we know that it is by no means "the inevitable wave of the future." It has been tried for a long time and has proven itself totally incapable of making good on its promises. We are resolved to remain strong in order to have the time to demonstrate, beyond the power of curtains to hide, the simple truth that the systems fashioned by free men can tap the energies and meet the needs of their peoples incomparably better than can a materialistic and cynical system of coercion and regimentation. This truth must yet make millions free who are now enslaved, including the Chinese on the mainland.

The course which we are now pursuing with respect to China may not be easy or quick, but we must never for one moment doubt the possibility of reaching our objectives with honor and with a full sense of our responsibility to this and to future generations. In this let us not seek the counsel either of the timid or of the foolhardy. We feel strongly about the China problem because it affects not only our security but the very values by which we live. If we stand honestly on those principles which have brought us thus far, we need not fear that we shall have to stand alone.

Alfred le S. Jenkins, Washington, D. C., is Officer in Charge of Political Affairs in the Office of Chinese Affairs in the Department of State. Previous to his present appointment he was vice consul at Peiping, Tientsin, and Hong Kong, second secretary and consul at Taipei, Formosa, and international relations officer in the Office of Chinese Affairs.

Paradoxes in the Indochinese Dilemma

By LAURISTON SHARP.

THE war in Indochina—a colonial war to throw off French imperialism, a struggle to contain a dangerous thrust of Communism, a local trouble become global—frightens the West as it threatens to develop into another Asian situation gone out of control. While the two world colossi flex their thermonuclear muscles, men seek some settlement to end these bitter hostilities which came to Indochina with the coming of peace in the Pacific in 1945 and which marked the return of the Free French among the Indochinese peoples who thought themselves free.

The war has been fought so far with conventional weapons, but it is a highly unconventional war carried on in an unconventional manner. The background, development, and issues of the conflict are so disordered and complex that it is small wonder the public is confused, seeing only a blurred or oversimplified picture taken in the capitals of the nations most concerned through lenses of censorship, propaganda, and inadequate news coverage. This picture aroused little interest among most Americans until about 1950, almost a century after the French began to develop their nation's interest in the area, following the example of other European powers in China. From December 8, 1941, Americans generally have been aware of Indochina's strategic importance in terms of its location, its modern capital equipment and services installed by the French (but since badly damaged by American bombings, scorched earth tactics, or misuse), and its realized or potential resources in agricultural and mineral wealth, hydroelectric power, and one of the most industrious populations in southeast Asia. Only recently, however, have many Americans realized not only that they were being involved in Indochina by containment and economic aid policies, but that developments there were beginning to have very important repercussions on the whole scheme of American strategy in Europe and at home as well as in Asia.

POLITICAL AND RACIAL DIVISIONS

From the point of view of the West, the 28,000,000 people of Indochina are now technically divided among three independent but "Associated States," that is, states associated with France in the French Union: the kingdom of Laos in the northwest; the kingdom of Cambodia in the southwest; and the state of Vietnam which is neither kingdom nor republic although about half of its 22,000,000 population is theoretically ruled, without the aid of a legislative body, by a "majesty," Bao Dai. The Laos are a Thai people culturally akin to the Siamese and, like them, Southern Buddhists, but uninterested in political affiliation with Thailand. The Cambodians, whose ancient kings ruled from Angkor a vast empire, speak Khmer, wholly unrelated to the Thai languages, but share with their old enemies the Thai many cultural traits, including Southern Buddhism. Culturally distinct from either the Thai or Khmer, the Vietnamese, originating in southeastern China and subject to that state from late Han times to the tenth century, are largely Sinicized. Historically, however, the Vietnamese have devoted much of their energy during the past millennium to gaining and maintaining political independence of China.

Included in none of these states but centrally located on the borders of all of them is a vast plateau or mountain region inhabited by a million or two aborigines governed, like a native reservation, under direct French administration. Little is said by the French government regarding the future political status of this region which has some economic and considerable strategic importance.

The complicating factor in the Indochinese situation, of course, is the existence of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, which was established in August 1945 and a half year later was recognized by the French government as a "free state." This is the political entity of some 11,000,000 Vietnamese controlled by Vietnamese Communists led by Ho Chi-minh, recognized since 1950 by the U.S.S.R., by People's China, and by satellite countries as a legal state. It is a government whose people the French call "Vietminh," or more simply, "Viets," and define as being in rebellion against what the free world considers the legal State of Vietnam, developed under French sponsorship after 1948.

As if postwar Indochina were not complicated enough, the situation has been made more complex by the creation by fiat from Peiping in 1953 of a "free Thai state," whose territory comprises a region populated largely by Thai-speaking peoples, including a large section of northwest Indochina or Laos, the southern corner of Yunnan in southwest China, a bit of northern Thailand, and parts of northeast Burma. So far, such a state exists largely as a plan to which might be attracted anti-Vietnamese Thai tribesmen, Laos, Siamese exiles who now have no one to turn to except Peiping, and some of the dissident Shan (Thai) and Kachin leaders from Burma. Presumably such a state would attempt to build on the Thai pannational interests so widely heralded by the Bangkok regime during the war, but which have been little mentioned since Thailand allied herself with the West in the postwar period. This move perhaps gives some hint of a Communist hope eventually to divest Vietnam of some of its non-Vietnamese and south China of some eight or ten million non-Chinese, who might then be lumped together with other peoples, including possibly the numerically weak Cambodians, to form a new, preponderantly Thai state centering on the rice-rich valleys of the Chao Phraya and Mekong rivers between Burma and Vietnam.

For the present, however, the world's interest in mainland southeast Asia centers on the military stalemate and the resulting political dilemma in divided Vietnam. Some of the realities which lie behind the complex Vietnamese situation and which are frequently too little appreciated may be introduced by listing a number of paradoxes which must strongly influence the outcome in Vietnam.

ANTI-CHINESE SENTIMENTS

First. Vietnamese culture includes strong, traditional, and well-entrenched anti-China and anti-Chinese sentiments; yet a Vietnamese government controlling half the population is now allied with China and many Vietnamese must collaborate directly with dominant Chinese.

A unique combination of an original southeast Asian type of culture with Chinese civilization created Vietnamese culture over a period of more than two thousand years. But in the process Vietnamese governments and people fighting for independence from China developed a hearty antipathy for the Chinese and an active fear of political domination by the enormous neighbor to the north. In this situation the Vietnamese, from north to south, from top almost to bottom, developed a nationalist spirit long before the arrival of the French.

Apprehensions were intensely revived during the nine months following the war, when Kuomintang Chinese troops were sent into northern Vietnam by the Allies to supervise the surrender of Japanese forces there. The Chinese stayed on to loot the country and terrorize the populace, until it became a major aim of both French and Vietnamese to get rid of them. Partly for this end, Ho Chi-minh in March 1946 made a number of concessions to the French, whom he had fought so ardently for so many years; and when compatriots accused him of too easy collaboration, Ho, who had lived long in China, replied that it was better to smell the feces of the French for a little time than to eat Chinese excrement all of one's life.

Since political domination of the Vietminh by China still looms above the fine talk, it may be doubted that the present Vietminh co-operation with China is either enthusiastic or popular among Vietnamese in general, although it is probably rationalized among the collaborators by saying that Communist China is a "new" and different nation which, at least in its relations with the Vietminh, it may well be. However, the paradox still remains of China-fearing Vietnamese being forced to work with China, not necessarily because they fear the Chinese less but because they hate the French more. And the danger remains that the West will assume that a dominant Communist China and a Communist-nationalist Vietnam are inevitably and eternally one in attitude and action. This assumption seems implicit in our willingness to negotiate at Geneva with Moscow and Peiping, which can only force the Vietminh into continued subordination and subservience to these capitals.

FRENCH APATHY

Second. Although the French move into Indochina beginning almost a century ago was exceedingly unpopular with large segments of the French population, it was nevertheless accepted as a means to provide bases from which French influences could be brought to bear on China; yet China is in a position now to bring what may be overpowering influences to bear on the French, who are still unable to muster much popular support at home for the current Indochinese operations.

Nothing could better exemplify the reversal of the power situation in east Asia during a century's time than this present state in which China is a major threat to the French in Vietnam rather than the French being a threat to China. Formerly, even in the face of the French people's continuing apathy or opposition, French governments could go ahead with their ventures in Indochina, but now it is a question whether they can continue a colonial course without stronger popular metropolitan backing. The French people have never had the direct interest in colonies that was common in England and the Netherlands: for one thing, they tended to put their savings into banks, letting the banks invest their funds at home, in the colonies, or elsewhere; for another, proportionately fewer French would emigrate or make their lives in the colonies. Few were impressed with the promises of national prestige and the wealth of China in treasure or in souls which were to follow the "adventures of the admirals" (the early French administrators in Vietnam), the little wars, or other incidents which created the faits accomplis which first involved French governments in the Far East. Even though these developments involved no threat to their own or the nation's interests, the French public would complain. It is no wonder that now they should complain more after supporting alone for years a war which is "militarily hopeless, politically a dead-end street, and economically ruinous" and which brings them face to face with the massive threat of a powerful China.

IDEAS VS. PRACTICE

Third. France helped educate a Vietnamese elite in the technical businesses of Western culture and in the doctrines of the French Revolution, including the ideals of liberty, equality, and brotherhood; yet before the war no serious consideration was ever given to the possibility of eventual independence from the strong control wielded by Paris in governing Vietnam, formally or informally. Civil liberties and economic opportunities were limited for Vietnamese, while French colonials were supported in preferred positions and in larger numbers relative to the native population than in other colonial areas.

Vietnam was organized by the French into the two protectorates of Tonkin and Annam and the colony of Cochinchina, with the native government reduced to a shadow. Native inhabitants of the two protectorates had the civil status of protégés, while those in the colony and the larger cities were subjects. Only 2,600 of the entire indigeneous population, a minute per cent, were admitted to French citizenship before the war and thus received the political, if not the social, rights and privileges enjoyed by Frenchmen. Opportunities for responsible service in the middle and higher levels of business, government, and the armed forces were practically limited to Frenchmen or natives of other French colonies. No new opportunities were provided to Vietnamese for the practice of democratic representative government (although citizens have fewer such opportunities in France itself than in some other countries). Indeed, various "representative assemblies" were purely advisory bodies whose suggestions could always be vetoed by French officials.

Capital improvements made in Vietnam, of which the French are justifiably proud, although paid for in part from Vietnamese revenues, provided little profit or convenience to the Vietnamese except for small numbers of the elite. Agricultural and mineral production were increased under the French, but so was population, the increase in people about keeping pace with the increase in goods and low-paid jobs. Industry and hydroelectric power were left largely undeveloped. Modern consumer goods and services were imported almost wholly from France, which had first call on exports. While the country itself was thus enriched and developed, it can hardly be demonstrated that the living standards of the peasant or coolie were improved. Under the French many Vietnamese became acquainted with Western practices, doctrines, and ideals, but had little opportunity to express or achieve these for themselves. During and after the war the French have been reaping this Western whirlwind which they helped sow, as it was inevitable they sometime would.

PARTIES OF REFORM

Fourth. Of many small Vietnamese parties organized for revolution, reform, or gradual amelioration, the Indochinese Communist party was the one hardest hit by the French administration and police from the time of its founding in 1929; yet this meant that during the war they were the native party best equipped by clandestine organization, experience, and motivation to serve the purposes of the Allies in Vietnam and thus to receive their support, and to get themselves into a position to dominate the power vacuum created there at the end of the war.

The small educated elite in Vietnam were the first organizers of parties or associations which sought to change the colonial relationship between France and Indochina either by force or by political action. During the 1880's revolts might be led by mandarins of the old native bureaucracy trying to maintain the status quo. But after the turn of the century trouble for France came primarily from those educated under French and, later, Japanese or Russian tutelage and oriented to Western political concepts. These leaders attempted to organize from the top down, but only on rare occasions, as in 1930, for example, were they able to guide large mass uprisings from the rice roots—revolts that proved ephemeral, in part because of the efficiency of the French sûreté, which was probably more ruthless than were contemporary British or Dutch colonial police.

The Vietminh

Communist parties, with both Stalinist and Trotskyist leanings, entered the scene in the '20's. The former was led, chiefly from outside Indochina, by Nguyen Ai Quoc, traveled son of an ex-mandarin, who after World War I went from socialism in Paris to Moscow to Canton, where he founded the party among Vietnamese exiles and visitors. Briefly in the open during the Popular Front period, the party in 1939 was again forced underground; as Indochina passed under Japanese and Vichy control and uprisings in 1940 and 1941 proved unsuccessful, its members tended to gravitate to southern China. Here in the spring of 1941 Nguyen organized among the Communists and other splinter parties the League for the Independence of Vietnam, the "Viet Nam Doc Lap Dong Minh Hoi," or Vietminh for short. Pressed by local Chinese Kuomintang generals, the Vietminh collaborated for a time under another Chinese-sponsored Vietnamese group organized to work against the French and Japanese in Indochina. During this period the Chinese even threw Nguyen into jail as a "French spy." The rival Vietnamese group, however, proved ineffective. Nguyen was then released from prison and in 1943 under a new name, Ho Chi-minh, received Chungking's blessing and financial and military support for underground work in Vietnam.

While other Vietnamese political leaders lolled in China or collaborated with the Vichy French and Japanese in Vietnam, Ho and his Vietminh League linked up with the guerrillas of Communist Vo Nguyen Giap in north Vietnam, recruited new members, and established new contacts in the country, and soon proved themselves the only pro-Allied Vietnamese group capable of eluding the French and Japanese and of promising effective aid in sabotage, espionage, and the rescue of Allied airmen. While they may have done little useful work, it was nevertheless Ho's Vietminh, sponsored and subsidized by the Chinese Nationalists and the American Office of Strategic Services, which at the end of the Pacific war found itself well organized, well armed, and in a position to use quickly the circumstances which permitted it to take over from the Japanese (who had removed and immobilized all French the previous March) by organizing a de facto government, the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

THE DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF VIETNAM

By the end of August 1945, though still opposed by some Vietnamese parties, this government was firmly established and seated in Hanoi. It was the apparent heir of a Vietnam declared independent of France and united during the previous six months under the Emperor Bao Dai with the collaboration of the Japanese; for it had received Bao Dai's blessing as he abdicated to become a private citizen (better that "in an independent state than emperor of a subjugated country") and to collaborate with it for a time as "Supreme Councilor." It was supported by and included representatives of a fairly wide range of Vietnamese nationalist interests, including Roman Catholics, some of whom still support the Republic. It was led by "Uncle" Ho, rapidly acquiring a wide and popular, almost magical reputation as "the" nationalist leader. By November this government was in such a position that the French General Leclerc could say: "The best thing to do in order not to lose face is to make a 'military promenade' up to the Chinese frontier. Then we should re-embark as many as possible, and get out. There are no other solutions." And the government of the Republic was guided in the name of the Vietminh by members of the Indochinese Communist party who said nothing of Communism and were soon to "dissolve" the party which the French for almost a generation had done their best to destroy. And the Vietminh itself, to top the paradox, had got its start and developed its position originally under the auspices of the exact forces which are now opposing it.

THE MARCH 1946 AGREEMENT

Fifth. Urged by a combination of events and pressures, France and the Hanoi Vietnamese government represented by Ho as President signed on March 6, 1946, a formal agreement recognizing the Democratic Republic of Vietnam as a "free state." Yet exactly ten months later, without making any attempt to "capture" or isolate the Communist leadership of the Vietminh-dominated government of the Republic, France announced its complete repudiation of the agreement, stating that Paris could deal only with the "authentic representatives" of the Vietnamese people.

France, itself recently freed from an occupying power, returned to Indochina with every expectation of reoccupying the territory, of re-establishing the status quo ante and of discussing only then the minor concessions of a reorganization plan for the region hastily announced in March 1945, after the Japanese had suddenly taken over control from the Vichy French. But before French forces could arrive in Indochina, Kuomintang Chinese troops had moved in north of 16° latitude, and British troops south of that parallel, to accept the Japanese surrender and care for prisoners of war as arranged at Potsdam by the Allies in July. The Chinese in the north did not dislodge the government and armed forces of the Republic; indeed, they allowed it to strengthen its situation. In the south, however, the British chased the Republic's representatives out of Saigon and a bitter guerrilla warfare began, soon to be taken up by French forces under Leclerc, the British troops being withdrawn early in 1946.

The agreement of March 1946 was signed in a context including the following elements: The French were established in a few urban centers and held some communication lines in the south. The Republic was established in the north and some forces under its control were fighting in the south. The Chinese were slow in carrying out their assignment, were neutral as regards the Republic, but were ravaging the countryside of the north—both French and Vietnamese wanted to get them out. Many French hostages were in Vietnamese hands. The United States, while aiding the French in France, had announced an official "hands off" policy in Indochina; but during the war, it was rumored, Roosevelt had stated his opinion that Indochina should be placed under an international trusteeship and not returned to French control and more recently American journalists and Office of Strategic Services personnel had apparently urged Ho and the Vietminh to stand firm for the independence of Vietnam, so that the French felt their position threatened by the United States. Ho announced that the Republic would continue to fight against all French forces unless France promised independence, but the Republic had received no international recognition and was weak. The French public was little interested in Indochina and less in fighting to hold it; the French hoped to use the early March high tides to move troops into the north.

In this situation, France was ready to push for the withdrawal of the Chinese and to recognize the Republic as a free state within the Indochinese Federation and the French Union, stipulating that the north (Tonkin), central (Annam), and south (Cochinchina) regions should decide by popular referendum whether they would be included under the authority of the Republic. The Republic, or rather the top leadership of the Vietminh, for there was strong opposition, was ready to sign such an agreement and to accept French troops in the north peaceably. Details were to be worked out in conferences. But in April Saigon began to speak of indigenous demands for a separate "Cochinese Republic" and on June 1, 1946, the French civil administration in Indochina recognized such a government headed by a majority of Vietnamese French citizens!

THE AGREEMENT REPUDIATED

In spite of this inept move to retain a maximum of French power in the south, France welcomed President Ho with the highest formal honors as a chief of state when he arrived in Paris shortly thereafter to discuss—quite unsuccessfully for the Republic of Vietnam—details arising out of the March agreement. This treatment could hardly allay the increasing widespread Vietnamese suspicion of French sincerity, heightened by dirty fighting on both sides in the guerrilla warfare which continued in the south and by constant friction and morbid incidents between officials and other French and Vietnamese in the north. Ho returned to Hanoi, still honored by the French (he told reviewing troops he had seen their mothers, wives, and sweethearts in Paris, who hoped for their quick return, as did the Vietnamese), but accused by many of his compatriots of playing the role of a French dupe in still publicly expressing his hopes for a satisfactory peaceful settlement. Starting in Haiphong and Hanoi in November and December 1946, general and open warfare broke out; the government of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam fled its capital, Hanoi; and in January 1947 France repudiated its agreement of the previous March. Many observers feel that Vietnam was lost to France and the Western democracies during 1946. Whether or not it could have been saved had the French made prompt moves toward unity and real independence while taking key Communists into camp is still a question for the historians to argue.

WAR THAT WAS NOT A WAR

Sixth. With negotiations broken off and fighting become general, France entered upon a war which was not a war, and was supported by the United States without being supported by the United States.

France could not at first admit that the "rebellion" in Vietnam was a "war" for several reasons: such an admission would tend to affirm the legal status of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam; it would open the way for action before the United Nations with possibly dangerous results in North Africa, Madagascar, or other trouble spots in the French Union; certainly for most Vietnamese it would violate the new constitution of the French Republic which states that France will "undertake no war with a view to conquest and will never employ force against the liberty of any people"; and it would require the adoption of rules and conventions of warfare which both sides have chosen largely to ignore in a war of little quarter, few prisoners, Vietminh grenaading of Saigon civilians, and French "strategic" bombing of peasant villages.

The United States accepted the French definition of the struggle in Vietnam as an internal, purely colonial problem, not a "war" with which the United Nations or other nations might properly be concerned. The United States thus maintained officially a neutral attitude. This was apparently a bitter disappointment to Vietminh leaders who were naïve in the ways of international law and who had been so encouraged by some individual Americans or by wishful thinking to believe that aid would be forthcoming from "anticolonial" America that they formally, if fruitlessly, addressed long, serious letters arguing the Vietminh case to Senator Capper, President Truman, and others.

But while technically neutral, aiding neither side, the United States felt it necessary to get rid of quantities of surplus military equipment and supplies in metropolitan France and North Africa, and to do this quickly. Much of this American material soon appeared in Indochina, as was to be expected. This led to accusations by Vietnamese, as well as by Indonesians, Burmans, and Indians, that America was in fact aiding the imperialist powers in their attempts to regain colonial territories by reconquest. The "reservoir of good will," of which Mr. Willkie had spoken, had begun to ebb.

COMMUNISM AND THE FRENCH POLICY

Seventh. The goal of French policy in Indochina from 1947 on was to decrease or eliminate Communist strength; yet the means used in implementing this policy did just the opposite.

The fear of Communism and of the top Communist leaders of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam was a major consideration in the French decision not to deal with, and certainly not to grant independence or make other concessions to, the Republic. Yet they neither offered nor promised any alternative to the Republic which would attract the vast bulk of the Vietnamese people who were either non-Communist or, in smaller numbers, actively anti-Communist, but who at the same time were strongly anti-French in their nationalist desire for independence for Vietnam. The Vietnamese who would not collaborate with the French or sit on the fence could turn only to Ho and his Republic, and many did, thus giving the Communists added strength.

The French, confronted in the country by stubborn guerrillas and uncooperative partisan peasants and finding themselves in the cities on the receiving end of the Republic's brutal terrorist tactics, could see the Republic's power only as coercion and force, to be countered by military action. So Paris voted the military credits (with the help of the French Communist party, which abstained when it could have defeated the bills by voting against them) that put over 115,000 men in the field by late spring of 1947. But military operations against the Republic's forces seemed only to increase their numbers and stiffen the resistance of Vietnamese who felt themselves fighting for Vietnam against foreigners.

In the early years of the struggle Uncle Ho and his government were not defined by the Vietnamese as Communist or even pro-Communist except among the few who were more knowing. The Soviet-type organization of the civil administration and the army meant little to most Vietnamese. For the majority in those years the Republic was an expression of their own patriotic fervor and its chief goals were the total elimination of the French, unification of the country, and then eventually the improvement of the common man's lot. Just as the French were quite unprepared for the realities they found on their return to Indochina at the end of the war, so they were slow in recognizing the potent magical effects worked by the term "independence" as pronounced early in 1945 by the Emperor, aloof and now absent, so that the magic had become firmly associated with Uncle Ho, who might walk barefoot into the village at any moment through the bamboo fence which proverbially kept the Emperor out.

BAO DAI

Eighth. After later attempts to counter the Vietminh leadership with other opposing leaders or groups, none of them having a strong policy, the French turned finally to the former Emperor, Bao Dai; yet this abdicated royal person was from the start clearly not a figure who could rally a wide, enthusiastic, or loyal following behind him.

The Emperor at best had occupied a rather secondary position in the power structure of modern Vietnam under the French. As for Bao Dai himself, he was already compromised by an apparent willingness to collaborate equally with the prewar French, the Vichy French, the Japanese, and the Vietminh, whom he dropped early in 1946 in disgust, moving to Hong Kong. This highly secular Emperor would receive little respect either from the many modern Vietnamese who had repudiated monarchical institutions, or from the more conservative who saw in Bao Dai's abdication and the rise of the Vietminh a clear indication that he had lost the "Mandate of Heaven" without which he could hardly rule. Even though Bao Dai, as chief of state, has stood firm since 1948 in his demand for a unified and completely independent Vietnam, he has been unable to win many away from Ho, who made this demand first.

HESITATION AND FEAR

Ninth. In recent years both France and the United States have feared that any major intensification of the conflict in Vietnam would correspondingly limit French action in the organization of European defense; yet hesitation born of this fear has actually prolonged and thus intensified the war in Vietnam with a result that French action in Europe has indeed been practically paralyzed.

France and latterly the United States have not been willing to commit to Vietnam a striking force sufficiently large and well equipped to ensure putting a quick stop to the conflict there. This decision may have kept China from more active sudden participation in the war, but it has not prevented the struggle from dragging on with a gradually increasing intensity and an always greater commitment of men and more elaborate equipment on both sides. These developments, of course, have kept the French in a position of weakness and indecision in relation to their European situation.

THE EXPLOSIVE PRESENT

Tenth. French hopes for a military decision which would permit negotiation with the Vietminh from a position of strength have led only to an equal expansion of strength on either side; but since this equality of strength has now been extended from the conventional and local level up to the H-bomb and international level, a negotiated political decision appears to be inevitable even though it can be satisfactory to no one.

Lauriston Sharp, Ph.D., Ithaca, New York, is director of the Southeast Asia Program of the Department of Far Eastern Studies, professor of anthropology, and chairman of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology at Cornell University. He was a fellow of the Australian National Research Council, North Queensland Expeditions, and lecturer in anthropology at the University of Sydney (1933-35). Associated with Cornell since 1936, he taught during the war in the Army Specialized Training program and was acting assistant chief, Division of Southeast Asian Affairs, Department of State (1945-46). He has done field study in many areas, including Thailand (1948-49, 1952-53), and has published studies on Thailand and Indochina.

In an earlier and simpler situation limited to Indochina a political decision could have been reached, at least before 1950 and the Chinese Communist victory, with a good deal more freedom and more room for maneuvering on either side than is possible now. The expansion of the situation, the increase in the parties and forces concerned, has served only to decrease and contract alternative political solutions, while increasing immeasurably the danger of explosions both political and physical. Through it all at the bottom of the increasingly charged spiral are the Vietnamese people, more divided than ever before and more unhappy.

Our Common Stake in Indochina

By PIERRE MILLET

I DO not think it is an exaggeration to say that today the problem of Indochina is foremost in the preoccupations of the free world. For example—every week dozens of letters come to my desk from young Americans asking the Embassy if we can help them to fight for freedom in Indochina. Of course, the only thing we can do is to thank those men for their generous spirit and for their courage, well in the American tradition, and explain to them the reasons why we cannot answer their request favorably. But this fact proves beyond any doubt that the concern about Indochina is not now confined to governments, chanceries, politicians, or journalists—that it is the concern of the man in the street. As far as the American government is concerned, the position of the United States towards Indochina has been made quite clear during the last weeks, especially by the President and by the Secretary of State, Mr. John Foster Dulles, in the speech before the Overseas Press Club of New York.

It is not for me, in any case, to define the American position in this matter or to underline what is at stake for Americans in Indochina. I only wish to mention what comfort and what inspiration we get from the fact that once more in a great moment of history, when the eternal values of mankind are again in peril, the United States and France stand together. Indeed, if it were not for American help Indochina would most probably have been lost today to the Communist imperialists.

Nevertheless, if recently the American position towards Indochina has been made quite clear, I feel that many would see more clearly still if they knew, surely, where France stands in this matter. They would see more clearly not only as far as Indochina is concerned, but also about the other problems of the Far East—because at this moment all the problems are closely related: the battle of Dienbienphu, the negotiations in Paris about the status of Vietnam in the French Union, and the prospects of the two conferences in Geneva about Korea and Indochina.

FRANCE IN INDOCHINA

I hope that my readers will forget that I am an official. I know that like my compatriots Americans have a tendency to question the judgment of the government they, and we, have freely chosen. But so far, whether we like it or not, there have not been any substitutes for governments in the conduct of public affairs. I will tell you what we—the French—are doing today in Indochina, what are our intentions for the future of that part of the world, and how we envisage Franco-American relations in the solution of this problem with special reference to the conference in Geneva.

In this statement, I will not try to conceal the mistakes my government may have made in Indochina since 1945. Only totalitarian governments think they are always right—and I hope that, in exchange, it will be recognized that we have, on the whole, accomplished a great task in that part of the world since the Japanese surrender. And if this appears to be the case, I am only asking for your judgment, not for your praise. Only history will tell whether or not France was equal to her duty in Indochina. This is not the time for recriminations but for action, and I find that these words of Winston Churchill in his memorable speech in the House of Commons on June 18, 1940, are relevant to this occasion, "Of this I am quite sure, that if we open a quarrel between the past and the present, we shall find that we have lost the future."

First of all, what is the present situation in Indochina? What is France doing there at the present time?

We are defending the newly acquired independence of the three Associated States and in doing so we are defending the whole of southeast Asia against Communist enslavement.

On this second object, I will not expand. Mr. Dulles, in New York, did it far better and far more eloquently than I could ever dream of doing.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE ASSOCIATED STATES

As to the independence of the three Associated States, from 1947 until the present time France has been negotiating agreements to give these countries full independence within the French Union. If this has not always been apparent to the eyes of foreign observers or to the local populations, it is because at the same time France has been engaged in Indochina in a fight against a Communist rebel which has prevented those observers and the local populations from seeing the true extent of the independence which had been granted by France; that war obliged France to limit the exercise of the newly acquired freedom. But, believe me, that independence is not only written in the agreements the French government has signed; you will find it engraved in the hearts of the overwhelming majority of my compatriots. Colonialism is a thing of the past in my country. Frenchmen at the very time I write are dying in Dienbienphu for the liberation of Indochina and only Communist propaganda can make people think otherwise. If at one time some doubts were possible on this subject, I think it is out of the question since July 3 of last year, when France reaffirmed the complete independence of the three Associated States, opening the way to new and final agreements.

On October 22, 1953, a treaty of association and friendship was signed between France and Laos, in the spirit and in the letter of the Declaration of July 3. A few weeks ago, negotiations were started in Paris between France and Vietnam to reach a similar agreement. Negotiations with Cambodia will follow. But already, through previous agreements, the three Associated States of Indochina have nearly all the attributes of internal and external sovereignty. This fact is still too little known.

In the field of foreign affairs, the three states now enjoy the rights of full sovereignty. They have been recognized by more than thirty countries, and they are free to have diplomatic relations with the governments of their choice. They are members of international bodies, most of them under United Nations control, and in certain cases they belong to organizations—the Colombo Plan, for instance—where France is not represented. May I remind my readers that as far back as September 1951 the three Associated States, through their own representation in San Francisco, signed the Peace Treaty with Japan? The agreement of the President of the French Republic is not requested for the credentials of the diplomatic representatives of the three Indochinese states abroad, nor is it necessary for the accreditation of foreign envoys in Indochina. In this respect the French Union is more liberal than the Commonwealth.

PURPOSE OF THE FRENCH UNION

I have just written, "French Union." Some people say: Why a French Union? Cannot those Asian peoples be left alone? Why should they be associated with a European country eight thousand miles away?

Our answer is this: The reason of such an association lies in the interest of these states. That interest is the cement of the French Union.

The present age has shown the importance and the advantages of great political and economic entities, such as the British Commonwealth of Nations, the Pan American Union, and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, not to mention the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. In the same spirit the nations of Western Europe are now attempting the political, military, and economic integration of that part of the world. In these concepts and creations, the smaller states have found advantages. This is the raison d'être of the French Union, and in the case of Indochina that association has been so far for France more of a burden than a highly profitable enterprise. The French Union, like the Commonwealth, is not a prison. Freedom is its purpose. To prove my point, allow me to read the definition of the French Union as you find it in Article 2 of the recent treaty of friendship and association between France and Laos. The French Union is "an association of independent and sovereign peoples with freedom and equality of rights and duties in which all the associates (and France is but one of them) place in common their resources in order to guarantee the defense of the Union as a whole."

At this very moment, the Vietnamese delegates are trying to find in Paris a formula which will underline the fact that they have freely adhered to the French Union. In this I feel they are right, and perhaps the French Constituents in 1946 exaggerated the prefabricated aspect of the French Union. One does not like to live forever in a prefabricated house; it is only a temporary dwelling until the real house is built. That house, the French Union, is being built, and its walls will be all the stronger if its tenants have all helped in building them.

To go back to the internal status of the Associated States, they have already—in this field—all the attributes of full sovereignty. The only limitations are those imposed by the war now raging in their countries, for instance, military police and censorship.

There were some restrictions concerning rights of jurisdiction over French and Chinese citizens. For them, mixed courts were created like those existing some years ago in Egypt. Today, this distinction is about to become a thing of the past, and negotiations are taking place to that effect between France and Vietnam. They have already been completed for Cambodia and Laos.

Two figures will illustrate the change in Indochina: in 1939, there were more than 28,000 French civil servants in Indochina; today there are only about 2,000, and they are nearly all serving in the administration of the three Associated States and depend on the local governments, not on France.

NATIONAL ARMIES OF THE ASSOCIATED STATES

And, finally, the three states have now their own national armies, symbol and guarantee of their independence. I shall merely mention Cambodia and Laos, these countries which, until recently, were not involved in the war to the same extent as Vietnam; nevertheless, they have now a regular army of about 20,000 soldiers each.

In Vietnam, the progress has been striking. France, with far less means than the United States, has been trying to do what your country has done in Korea.

In 1949, the Vietnamese army counted only a few battalions. Today, it is over 200,000 strong. At the end of the present year it will be about 300,000. The Chief of that army is Vietnamese, and there are about 1,000 French officers and noncommissioned officers as instructors or on the Vietnamese general staff.

While I am on this subject of the national armies of Indochina, I think I should deal with the question of the training of those forces. During the last few weeks it has often been said and written in the United States that this training by the French was inadequate and that the French High Command should accept the dispatch of an American training mission to Indochina. Surprise and regret have been expressed, too, at the reluctance of the French authorities to agree to such a plan.

We do not deny that the training of the national armies could be improved, and we do not refuse the help of American experience. But certain factors must be kept in mind. (1) As I have said, to build up a Vietnamese army from a few battalions in 1949 to 300,000 men at the end of this year is not a poor achievement, and I know that many competent American observers think that no other government could have achieved that result in Indochina. (2) The Korean War is vastly different from the war in Indochina. In Indochina there are mostly "guerilla" operations while in Korea there was a regular war with a well-defined front. (3) For the last eighty years, France has had experience with the local populations. The question of language—among other things—plays an important part. (4) So far, the responsibility for the conduct of the war in Indochina is the responsibility of the French High Command. Such a responsibility cannot be shared—or if it is to be, then the conduct of the war must assume a very different character. It must not be forgotten that in Korea, if the Korean army was trained by the Americans, the Americans too were fighting and dying on that field of battle. I am not suggesting, and my government has never asked, that it should be so in Indochina. I am only stating a fact in order to make you understand the reaction of the French High Command.

The French Expeditionary Corps is now over 160,000 men strong, with about 80,000 French metropolitan soldiers and officers. To date, the losses of this Corps have been over 136,000 in killed and wounded. The losses of the metropolitan French alone are over 60,000 (of whom more than 1,500 French officers have been killed or are missing). Since 1951, the losses of the national armies have been over 20,000.

Going back to the degree of independence which has been granted to the three Associated States, I am sure that many readers will wonder why, if what I have just said is true, war is still raging in Indochina.

Many will wonder, too, why the French did not grant to Ho Chi-minh in 1946 what they have given since 1947 to Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos.

Those are pertinent questions. I will try to answer them as best as I can, and, as I have said before, in doing so, I will not try to conceal the mistakes we may have made since 1945.

WHY WAS INDEPENDENCE DELAYED?

First, why did we not grant independence to the three Associated States after the Japanese surrender just as the United States did for the Philippines and as the British Government did for India, Pakistan, and Burma?

In answering that question, I will point out that the American government spent twelve years in the process of granting independence to the Philippines and that Britain had been for two or three decades in the process of freeing from British rule the three nations just mentioned.

The French were asked to do in a few months for Indochina—and at the very moment that these areas were themselves reasserting their independence—what the United States and Britain had had years to prepare for. On this point, I will admit our responsibilities. It is true that the French administration before and during the war did not foresee the explosion of nationalism which was to take place after the hostilities and did not in consequence take the necessary measures to prepare the independence of the three states of Indochina. There were, of course, large sections of French opinion which were in favor of such measures, but, as you know, France has had since the war coalition governments—too many of them at that—and those governments were formed by representatives of various parties which did not see eye to eye as far as the solution of the Indochinese problem was concerned. On this subject, I will remind you that even the Communists were represented in French cabinets until April 1947.

From that situation resulted the necessity of compromise towards many problems—the problem of Indochina among them—and what was easy for the British government, a one-party government towards India, was impossible for our government in the case of Indochina. This is not an excuse. It is a fact—which I personally deplore as many of my countrymen do.

FRANCE AND HO CHI-MINH

As to the other question, Why did you give Bao Dai in 1949 what you refused to Ho Chi-minh in 1946 or, rather, why did you give Bao Dai more than the Vietminh leader asked for in 1946? This question is related to what I have just said.

In 1946, the French government was not prepared and French public opinion was not ready to give off hand to Ho Chi-minh all he was asking for. The main reason is that we knew better than anybody else except Moscow the Communist past of Ho Chi-minh and some of his associates and that we wanted to be sure that their national aspirations—quite legitimate—did not cover Bolshevik designs.

Anyhow, in spite of these misgivings and suspicions, and in spite of the unrealistic attitude of some quarters of French opinion, we did recognize Ho Chi-minh and started to negotiate with him. Those negotiations were broken off by Ho Chi-minh's attack in Tonkin in December 1946.

In the years which followed, we realized in the hardest way possible—through war—the true character of Ho Chi-minh and of the Vietminh. We realized that they were part of a vast Communist conspiracy, the results of which were to be seen in Central Europe, in China, and in Korea. What would be happening today in southeast Asia if we had accepted Ho Chi-minh in 1946 as the master of Indochina? So we went on working for the independence of the three states of Indochina and we refused to deal with Ho Chi-minh. We had to fight against him.

That is why since 1946 French policy in Indochina has been difficult for many foreign observers to understand. On the one hand, we say that we want the independence of that part of the world, and on the other, thousands and thousands of our boys remain there to fight.

They fight for two reasons. First, they fight to defend the independence of the three Associated States against Communist subversion—against what Marshal de Lattre de Tassigny called in Washington “Communist colonialism.” Second, they fight to defend southeast Asia against the same enemy, a point which was made quite clear by Mr. John Foster Dulles in his speech last Monday.

U. S. AID IN INDOCHINA

The United States government recognized the basic character of the conflict in Indochina when continental China fell to the Communists. When the Mao Tse-tung regime started to give increasing help to the Vietminh, and above all when Communist aggression in Korea took place, the United States government decided to help the French and Indochinese governments with money and matériel.

So the year 1950, which is remembered mostly because of Korea, is also the year when the United States began to take direct interest and an active part in the “new Indochina.”

Four years have elapsed since then. The anti-Communist forces have not been able to achieve a decisive military success in Indochina, and at the French request it was agreed at the Berlin Conference in February that the problem of Indochina should be discussed in Geneva at the end of April.

FRENCH LASSITUDE

The present feelings of my countrymen towards the Indochinese problem are characterized by a growing lassitude. This lassitude, as expressed in the French Parliament and in the French press, has four main sources: (1) military developments in Indochina; (2) the political evolution of the three Associated States, particularly Vietnam and Cambodia; (3) the effects of the Indochinese conflict upon France's position in Western Europe; (4) the Armistice in Korea.

The military situation

After more than seven years of fighting, the French see no prospect of a quick ending of the war. If it had not been for American assistance, I think we should have had to give up the fight. The French people, like the Americans in regard to Korea, naturally want to see the boys back or at least an end of the fighting. Some people in my country say also, If the fight in Indochina is a fight which is of direct concern to the free world, why are we alone, with the Indochinese, to shed our blood for it?

I know that in the United States some people say: Why do not the French pay the price for achieving a decisive victory, as we did in Korea, and send more men—their conscripted men, for instance? Why do they not have a more aggressive and realistic strategy? To that I answer: We have heavy commitments in Europe and in Indochina, we are paying the price, and in that respect we have been living above our means for years. Anyhow the solution of the problem is not to send more French troops to Indochina, although we did it last year in a small way.

The Indochinese conflict is not an ordinary war—like the one in Korea—it is a politico-military struggle and basically a civil war. A civil war to be won in Indochina only by French troops would have achieved no result. That struggle has got to be won mainly by the local anti-Communist armies if the local governments are to win their ideological fight against Communism, that is, to prove that they are fighting for their own independence and not to maintain colonialism under a different name. That is why France, with extensive American help, is building up the national armies. That enterprise may have started too late—but it takes years to achieve such a goal. You may form a soldier in a few weeks; you need years to form a general staff.

A more aggressive strategy? This is the case with the so-called Navarre Plan, but that plan expects important results only eighteen months from now, mostly because it is based on the formation and instruction of new local forces. Will French opinion keep patient until then? And will Communist China tolerate a defeat of the Vietminh?

Political developments

The second cause of French lassitude is to be found in the political developments in Vietnam, and to a lesser extent in Cambodia. In Vietnam, there is no doubt that the resolution of the national Vietnamese Congress which met in Saigon last October created a very unfavorable impression among my compatriots. This Congress, which met only for a short period, which did not represent exactly the distribution of opinion in Vietnam, and which was led by the most extreme nationalists, passed a motion declaring it was opposed to the inclusion of Vietnam in the French Union. The majority of the Congress promptly realized that they had been outmaneuvered and canceled that motion, passing another saying that the Congress was not in favor of the participation of Vietnam in the French Union in its “present form.”

But, as far as French public opinion was concerned, the harm, a very great one, had been done. The reaction of the majority of my compatriots was, Why should we go on being killed for people who do not want to stay with us? This is a very human reaction. After all, what do we expect in Indochina? Certainly not more than the American position in the Philippines. In short, a guarantee of our economic and cultural interests when we go.

The feeling of lassitude is all the stronger because there are doubts in certain quarters about the dynamism of some Vietnamese leaders. Vietnam needs inspiration from them. The United States can provide the money and the matériel for this war. France can give her men—but men, money, and matériel will be of little help without that inspiration. Around the battlefield of Indochina, there are too many spectators on the fence who have not been brought to realize that the match is a match to be fought between local teams.

France and EDC

The third reason for the lassitude of French public opinion must be found in the effects of the Indochinese conflict upon France's position in Western Europe. You are well aware of the important part France must play in NATO and in the organization of the defense of Western Europe. You know too about the European Defense Community plan. In spite of the fact that the French government initiated that project, there is a very strong feeling in France against it. A great number of my compatriots, who have not forgotten German aggression, are afraid that because of France's military commitments in Indochina, where we have the equivalent of ten French divisions, Germany will assume the military leadership in the EDC.

Armistice in Korea

The last important reason for French lassitude towards Indochina is related to the Armistice in Korea. Quite a number of people in France think that if the United States did not refuse to talk to the Sino-Koreans and sign an armistice at Panmunjom, she cannot logically object to the French talking to the Vietminh and eventually to the Chinese who help Ho Chi-minh.

THE PROSPECT OF ARMISTICE

Thus I come to the question of the prospect of an armistice in Indochina and the problems which such an armistice create for the French and the United States governments.

In Berlin, last February, the United States government agreed that the problem of a solution of the Indochinese conflict be discussed at the Geneva Conference, parallel to the Korean discussion. I know that opinion in the United States is not too happy about this decision, fearing that recognition of the Peiping regime and a lifting of the embargo on Red China may be the price of a promise by the Chinese Communists of a settlement in Indochina. I should like to remind you what the French Prime Minister said in the National Assembly on January 8:

We want peace, but not at any cost. We must know, as was the case in Korea, how to go on fighting without becoming discouraged as long as is necessary to arrive at a settlement. We shall never lose sight of the fact that France's aims are the independence of the Associated States and the defense of the world on the southeast Asia front.

A short time after the end of the Berlin Conference M. Laniel, with reference to M. Nehru's truce proposal, made quite clear in the National Assembly the conditions on which the French Command and the Associated States would insist for a cease fire in Indochina. These conditions showed quite clearly that France and her Indochinese allies did not contemplate any armistice which would imperil the position, military and political, of the three states.

The difference of opinion between France and the United States on this problem—and it would serve no purpose to conceal that there is such a difference—is that while both governments are of the opinion that the military operations must go on, the French government thinks that at the same time no occasion must be neglected to ascertain if a solution can be found by negotiation. In this respect Geneva will be the testing ground of Communist intentions.

IF WAR MUST GO ON . . .

If it appears in Geneva that there is no hope of finding a solution of the Indochinese conflict by peaceful means, then there is no doubt about it, the whole conduct of this war will have to be reconsidered by all the parties concerned on the anti-Communist side. Having in mind, among other things, the problems of European defense, any government in Paris will have to find out what alternative there is. We shall have to ask our allies by what practical means they can lighten our heavy burden and how the limits of "joint action" are to be defined. As you probably know, Communist propaganda has adopted the slogan, "The Americans are ready to fight to the last Frenchman in Indochina." I well know the odious character of such a slogan, but its effects must not be underrated.

Do not forget that the failure in Geneva to find a solution or the beginning of a solution in Indochina would mean the return to the same kind of long, indecisive war for many months to come, at least until 1956. Let us not be led astray by such formulas for victory as Give the Indochinese the feeling they are fighting for themselves and not for French colonialism. In this respect the limit has been reached, and the French troops in Indochina know already that whether they win or lose, France will be out of Indochina. Still, even with that knowledge, the men of Colonel de Castries in Dienbienphu fight and die day and night.

Do not forget that apart from the United States no other nation since the war has been fighting more relentlessly against Communism at home and abroad than France, while she had at the same time to face a colossal task of reconstruction and rehabilitation in many fields.

We welcome the criticisms, we ask neither for praise nor mercy, we know we are fighting the good fight for freedom in Indochina. But there, France is fighting not only against Ho Chi-minh, but against Communist China, the Soviet Union, and its satellites.

The men, Indochinese and French, who are fighting and dying now at Dienbienphu are fighting the war of freedom, but should not the responsibilities be shared more equally if what is at stake now in Indochina is not only the freedom of that country in southeast Asia but freedom itself?

Pierre Millet, Washington, D. C., has been Counselor of the Embassy of France since 1950, in charge of its Far Eastern affairs. He has been in the diplomatic service since 1938: in the French Embassy in China, chargé d'affaires in Thailand, and head of the Division of Southeast Asian Affairs in the French Foreign Office. He was a member of the French delegation at the San Francisco Conference.

The Indochinese Question Mark

By PHILIP W. THAYER

AS this article is being written, the new Indochina is a question mark. With approximately half of the country and a like proportion of the population under control of the Communist-inspired Vietminh forces, torn by a fluid war of uncertain outcome, no one can say with assurance what the future may hold for the newly created states of Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. In the troubled picture which presents itself one thing is nevertheless sure: the question of the preservation of Indochina is a fateful one for the entire free world.

Indochina constitutes a connecting corridor between China and the countries to the south and west. Burma and Thailand are immediate neighbors, and the Malay peninsula stretches beyond, separated by no great distances from the islands of Indonesia and of the Philippines. Throughout this immensely rich and promising area the vital need of the people is time; time in some instances to consolidate the unfamiliar fruits of sudden independence, to consider the numerous and complex problems which have been attendant on an abrupt transition from colonial to sovereign status; and time in all cases to re-establish and develop their economies in the aftermath of the retarding and often disastrous consequences of wartime occupation by the Japanese. Preoccupied with these questions, the countries of southeast Asia are in no position to withstand powerful forces of external aggression. For Indochina to fall into hostile hands, therefore, would mean inevitably the loss of Burma, Thailand, and Malaya, probably of Indonesia, and conceivably of India, Pakistan, Ceylon, and the Philippines.

The present situation, in which there is the gravest danger that the Associated States of Indochina may be overcome by the Communist-inspired troops of the Vietminh, poses problems far exceeding in critical magnitude those of Korea.

Since the surrender of the Japanese, developments in Indochina have been characterized on the one hand by the efforts of the French to recapture their former position of dominance, although on a substantially modified basis, and on the other by the growth of a spirit of nationalism which has been capitalized by Ho Chi-minh for other purposes. Ho Chi-minh has posed as a patriot and a nationalist leader. He has fooled and continues to fool a great many people, chiefly among his own countrymen. Actually, however, there is not the slightest doubt in the minds of those familiar with his personal background and with the record of his past activities that he merely has been making very clever use of prevailing anti-colonial sentiments and legitimate nationalist aspirations to play the Communist game. The familiar pattern of Communist techniques is clearly discernible in all that he has done. Indeed, since the success of the Communists in China in 1949, there has been little attempt to conceal the real nature of Vietminh propaganda. Speaking at the inauguration of the Lao Dong (Workers) party in 1951, Ho Chi-minh was on orthodox ground in referring to Americans as "leaders of the world's imperialists and reactionaries," and in sprinkling his remarks freely with such terms as "lackeys" and "running dogs." The following year he characterized Comrades Stalin and Mao Tse-tung as "the most clear-sighted, the most worthy elder brothers, friends of mankind." Even Ho's own people are beginning to see through his nationalist pose. The ruthless tactics of oppression and destruction used by the Vietminh in the areas under their control have been opening many eyes.

THE FRENCH IN INDOCHINA

The French for their part, returning after the war to bring peace to the country and to protect their own interests, have found themselves forced gradually into a position where they have become guardians of one of the most important bastions of the free world. This is a position which they did not seek and for which they have no particular liking. There is little doubt that the French have made mistakes during the last eight years. At a time when we are more concerned with the present and future than with the past, it would be futile to labor these. Mention should be made, however, of the failure of France to appreciate the full extent of nationalist feeling in its desire for independence and sovereignty. At no point apparently had French plans for Indochina envisaged anything approaching the status of Burma or even of the countries within the British Commonwealth. At the most, they looked toward a limited freedom of action under French leadership. It is noteworthy that all matters affecting the interests of France or of more than one state were subject to review by boards in which France had the right to block or to veto. Similarly, France kept a tight control over foreign affairs, foreign trade, justice, and finance. When concessions have been made, they unfortunately have had the appearance of following on the heels of French reverses. The declaration of July 3, 1953, for example, indicating that France was prepared to transfer to the three Associated States various functions hitherto under French control, was not issued until after the unhappy campaign of 1952-53. Even the original agreements of March 8, 1949, taking the first steps toward a limited self-government in Indochina, came at a time when the struggle with Ho Chi-minh was not going favorably and when the Communists were on the verge of triumph in China. In the result, instead of getting credit for magnanimity, France has fallen under the odium of acting only under compulsion or force of circumstances.

Like observations would be pertinent in regard to the French conduct of military operations. It could be noted, for instance, that the final decision to expand the Vietnamese army was a belated one, and that the French have been remarkably persistent in keeping officer control down to the noncommissioned level.

Notwithstanding these comments, sight must not be lost of the fact that the situation of France in Indochina is closely tied in with her political position in Europe. However clear-sighted her military commanders and statesmen may have been in facing up to the realities of the fighting in Indochina, they have been at all times severely handicapped by the constant play and counterplay of sensitive forces in the home government. Recent pronouncements from Paris and developments within the French Cabinet are a powerful reminder of the ease with which an ever delicate balance may be disturbed.

It also must be remembered that France has an overwhelming stake in the economic life of Indochina. The French own all the shipping, all the mines, and all the rubber. In addition, they control almost all the banks, practically all industry, and about two-thirds of the rice. Confronted thus by both political and economic factors of a remarkably complex and far-reaching nature, it is not surprising if the French have found difficulty in making decisions.

VIETNAMESE DISTRUST

The ordinary Vietnamese, sitting in the midst of these conflicting claims and interests, with a phony patriot on one side and a grudging savior on the other, perhaps may be pardoned if he has failed to understand the score. Circumstances have combined to make it exceptionally hard for him to determine, if he is a friend of nationalism and independence, whether his aims would be better achieved by fighting with or against the French or by remaining on the sidelines. Of one thing he is sure: that he has had enough of colonialism and wants no more of it. In his mind the French have been and continue to be identified with colonialism, a fixation to which the French themselves, in the persons of too many of their countrymen resident in Indochina, unfortunately contribute by their treatment of the Vietnamese as an inferior race. In the final result therefore the common people of the towns and fields are likely to view the spectacle of the French in shining armor with some distrust and to be disinclined to give them active support. This attitude is exemplified in the lack of conspicuous success which has attended the development of the so-called "light battalions" (khin quan) among the Vietnamese. These battalions, numbering at present about sixty, were conceived as forces easily mobile, able to meet the enemy on his own terms, and useful in pacifying conquered territory. In the event, however, they have seemed apathetic and notably deficient in the fighting spirit which is essential.

As stated earlier, the preservation of Indochina is of the utmost importance to the free world. The question therefore is, how can that objective be accomplished in the light of present conditions?

BASES OF A NEGOTIATED SETTLEMENT

Since the date of the Korean Armistice there has been persistent talk of a negotiated settlement in Indochina. Only a glance is necessary to note the complete dissimilarity of circumstances. Inasmuch as Premier Laniel himself has indicated the possibility of such a move, it is nevertheless worth while to explore the suggestion, particularly in the light of the conference at Geneva. A negotiated settlement would appear to involve bases either of partition, of coalition, or of an over-all nature bringing in general Far Eastern questions. Although partition offered a natural solution in Korea, the nature of the conflict and of the interests involved makes it entirely impracticable in Indochina. A line of demarcation was readily at hand in Korea which represented more or less accurately not only the fighting line but also the distribution of population. This has not been true at any time in Indochina. The fighting has been of an extremely mobile and opportunist character. So great has been the ability of the Vietminh forces to appear at unexpected places, to disappear when opposed in strength, and to reappear elsewhere, that the French have seemed often to be combating an army of ghosts. No particular section or sections of the country have been consistently involved. Territorial acquisitions have been for the most part of an ephemeral character. Given positions have been one day in the hands of the Vietminh and on the next day back in the camp of the French, with no sureness at any point as to the real sentiments of the inhabitants. Partition on lines of any logical or satisfying significance appears therefore to offer problems of the utmost difficulty.

Coalition is equally implausible. As matters now stand, it is difficult to conceive of a coalition government in which Ho Chi-minh and his supporters would not be represented either directly or indirectly. Such a development would be fatal and hence unthinkable.

Finally, should a negotiated settlement take the form of a local arrangement within the framework of a general Far Eastern picture, problems arise of an even more perplexing nature. No settlement of this kind presumably could be effected without a quid pro quo, and a quid pro quo in this connection inevitably would mean a concession. Could consideration be given, for example, to the recognition of Communist China as the condition for a satisfactory settlement in Indochina? Or to the withdrawal of aid from Formosa? Or to a like cessation of aid in Indochina? Any or all of these possibilities, as well as others equally unpleasant, are almost sure to receive mention at Geneva. Their mere recital is enough to demonstrate the dangers inherent in this type of settlement.

PROLONGATION OF FIGHTING

There remains for consideration the question of continuance of the present armed struggle. Previous forecasts concerning a successful outcome and the time element involved have not been so accurate as to inspire much confidence in current guesses. It will be remembered that as long ago as 1951 eighteen months were mentioned by General de Lattre de Tassigny as the outside limit for triumph. During the intervening years the French have enjoyed an overwhelming preponderance of material advantage. They have had virtually complete control of sea and air, they have held the principal cities and ports, have kept access to the principal producing areas, and have enjoyed the use of greatly superior combat equipment. Numerically, it has been estimated that the French and Vietnamese forces have outnumbered the Vietminh by as much as five to three and have inflicted approximately five times as many casualties. Notwithstanding the favorable inferences which might be drawn from these facts, the fluid character of the fighting, already described, has postponed a clear-cut decision. It may be assumed that the contributions which so far have been made by this country, the recent promise of an additional $385,000,000 (bringing the figures to a point where the United States is paying roughly sixty per cent of the over-all cost of the struggle), and current conversations looking toward further assistance, indicate definite hopes of a not too remote success. In any event, it would appear from present trends that at the very least a continuance of the war will improve the bargaining position, that even a stalemate has the elements of victory, and that the conclusive defeat of the Vietminh is not beyond belief. Local engagements, such as the present struggle at Dienbienphu, should not be permitted to distort this picture. Dienbienphu does not necessarily have great over-all significance. It is doubly unfortunate, therefore, that the situation should have been so built up in the popular mind, possibly as a bargaining point at Geneva, that the moral effect of victory or defeat may be out of all proportion to the actual significance.

Successful prosecution of the fighting, however, presupposes a change of attitude on the part of the majority of the Vietnamese, a change from the hesitancy, the indecision, the apathy, even, which have been so marked in the mass of the population. Only the French can accomplish this transformation, for it involves implanting in the minds of the Vietnamese a clear conviction that the French are in earnest when they talk about independence and are not merely trying subtly to perpetuate their former position. Undoubtedly, France is more in a mood for sincerity at this moment than she has ever been. It is devoutly to be hoped that the negotiations now in progress in Paris may accordingly result in an agreement which will bring genuine independence to Vietnam and not merely a hollow semblance. The hour, however, is late, perhaps even now too late.

COURSES OF ACTION

The foregoing observations have attempted to set forth the gravity of the situation which confronts the free world in Indochina and to enumerate the possible courses of action which may be suggested by way of solution. It is manifest that no one of these courses of action carries with it the assurance of success; on the contrary, all of them leave much to be desired. As tensions mount, however, and as the time approaches when pressures will be increasingly applied in the light of such tensions, clear thinking on the basic issues becomes of paramount importance. Only by firm adherence to principle can the United States remain faithful to its avowed purpose of assuring to the three Associated States the opportunity to develop their rich potentialities along lines freely chosen by their peoples. If, as has been emphasized, the French should relinquish full sovereign rights to the Associated States and leave Indochina, as the British have gone from Burma and the Dutch from Indonesia, this does not mean that the members of the free world should stand idly by while they are driven out by the forces of Communism. No effort, no sacrifice, would appear too great to carry the present struggle either to the point of successful conclusion or to a stage where satisfactory settlement may be possible. In the words of Secretary of State Dulles, if we wish to avoid the greater risks of tomorrow, we must be resolute today.

Philip W. Thayer, LL.B., Washington, D. C., has been dean of the School of Advanced International Studies of The Johns Hopkins University since 1948. From 1920 to 1931 he was in the Far Eastern export-import business, and for part of this period was also research supervisor on foreign trade at the Harvard School of Business. He has been professor of international commercial law at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy (1933-42), acting assistant chief of the Division of World Trade Intelligence in the Department of State (1941-42), special assistant to the United States Ambassador to Chile and cultural relations attaché (1942-45), and expert consultant on legal affairs to the Secretary of the Army (1948). He was editor of Southeast Asia in the Coming World (1953).

Ups and Downs in Indo-American Relations

By NORMAN D. PALMER

THE Republic of India and the United States of America are today respectively the most populous and the most powerful of the democratic states of the world. Each came into existence as a result of a long struggle against British rule. The leaders of the Indian National Congress gained encouragement and inspiration from the American example, and from the stirring words of the Declaration of Independence and other great documents of American freedom. Many Americans followed the course of the Indian independence movement with sympathetic attention, and read the writings of Tagore and Gandhi and Nehru with absorbed interest.

Until 1947, however, relations between the United States and India, on both official and unofficial levels, were for the most part remote and indirect. Since 1947 Americans and Indians have discovered each other. Unfortunately this period of discovery has been an uneasy and trying one, and Indo-American relations have been inescapably colored by the course of world events and by internal as well as external complications. During this period, for obvious reasons, the United States has been forced to concern itself with the defense of the free world in the face of real and present danger, while India has been primarily concerned with the improvement of conditions within her borders and with other grave problems of survival. Basically, because of the similarity of interests and goals, relations between the United States and India have been fairly good; but Americans and Indians alike are distressed by the many points of friction which have arisen between their two countries, and their feelings toward each other have gone up and down like a Yo-yo since 1947.

Many times in India I was asked why Americans have suddenly taken such an interest in Indian affairs. Sometimes this question seemed to reflect suspicion of American intentions, but more often it seemed to be asked simply out of curiosity. The answer to this question is, I think, quite clear. Until 1947 India was a part of the British Empire; her foreign relations were controlled by the British government and largely by Englishmen, and the states of the world had few formal diplomatic contacts with her. Until World War II the United States was not heavily involved in Asian affairs, and her Asian interests, to the extent that they existed, were concentrated rather in the Far East than in the Indian subcontinent. World War II marked the end of the long period of European dominance of Asia; it ushered in a new and troubled era in Asia, in which the growing aspirations of countless thousands of people whose life conditions are among the worst in the world and the survival of many new independent states are threatened by pressures from without and from within and by the generally unhappy course of world events.

The war also projected the United States into a conspicuous position—one might say an embarrassingly conspicuous position—on the world's stage and saddled it with interests and responsibilities which encompass the globe. For better or for worse, the United States is involved in Asian affairs at a time when Asia is becoming an increasingly important factor in international relations. In the new Asia, India is playing a major role. "If India fails," said Mahatma Gandhi shortly before his death, "Asia dies." The United States clearly has a vital stake in India's efforts to improve the lot of the masses of her distressed people and in her survival as a democratic state. Thus the great interest of Americans in India is a reflection of the new position of both India and the United States.

MUTUAL MISUNDERSTANDING

Any American who visits India is impressed on the one hand with the staggering misconceptions and distortions of America and the suspicions of American policies and intentions and on the other hand with the friendliness and good will which the Indian people show toward Americans personally and with the lively interest in the American scene. Any Indian who visits the United States can testify to the existence of the same attitudes towards his country and his fellow-countrymen. Much of the mutual misunderstanding is based on an ignorance of each other's history and values. This ignorance is understandable, if deplorable; but the time has come when India and America must try to learn more about each other. Americans have a special responsibility in this respect, for they are largely a literate people and they can no longer take refuge in the belief that what they do not know cannot hurt them. One does not have to subscribe to the "East versus West" fallacy to assert that the world looks quite different when viewed from different parts of it and through the eyes of people whose life conditions, cultural values, and experience differ greatly.

"It is probably true," stated Robert Trumbull, veteran correspondent of the New York Times in India, in a recent article, "that the Indians understand the United States somewhat better than Americans understand India." In view of the vast differences in educational and material progress between the United States and India, this statement may startle many Americans, or perhaps even make them indignant. But it is indeed "probably true," and it should serve as an incentive for us to make amends as quickly as we can. We must realize at long last that the history of the world is not synonymous with the history of Western civilization; it never was, in fact, and it will become increasingly less so in the future. There are marked differences between Western civilization and Hindu civilization, as Arnold Toynbee and others have pointed out. India is the home of one of the oldest and most advanced civilizations; as a continuous civilization it dates back some 5,000 or 6,000 years. The excavations at Mohenjo-daro in Sind and at Harappa in the western Punjab have demonstrated, in the opinion of no less an authority than Sir John Marshall, that "India must henceforth be recognized, along with Persia, Mesopotamia, and Egypt, as one of the most important areas where the civilizing processes were initiated and developed."¹ Well before the beginning of the Christian era India had produced great rulers, great lawgivers and statesmen, great works of art and literature, and some of the greatest of epics.

WORLD UNKNOWN

How many Americans are in any way familiar with the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, the great Hindu classics? How many have even read the Bhagavad Gita, a work which has had a profound influence on Indian life and thought for many centuries? A few months ago a considerable controversy raged in some Indian newspapers over this question: Who was the greater,

¹ Quoted in Jawaharlal Nehru, The Discovery of India (New York, 1946), p. 59.

Kālidāsa or Shakespeare? The question was obviously a silly one, and the judgment of the correspondents would in no way detract from the recognized greatness of both writers. But how many Americans could discuss such a question intelligently? In fact, how many have even heard of Kālidāsa? Yet Kālidāsa, who probably lived in the fourth century A.D., has often been called the Indian Shakespeare—or perhaps it would be just as appropriate to call Shakespeare the English Kālidāsa!

Coming to more recent times, how much do Americans know about modern India, say of the past century or so? Aside from Tagore and Gandhi and Nehru, what other Indian names are familiar to them? What do they know of Ram Mohan Roy or Vivekananda or Aurobindo or Tilak or Gokhale or Mrs. Naidu or scores of other great figures in modern Indian life? In fact, aside from Nehru and his sister, Madame Pandit, what living Indian political leaders are known to them?

The general lack of knowledge of India's history and culture is obviously a great handicap for Americans who are seeking to understand India today, and especially for those in policy-making positions who need to have a profound understanding of present conditions and trends and of the mainsprings of Indian behavior and attitudes. Another difficulty comes from the magnitude and complexity of India, and from the many facets of Indian life. As Arnold Toynbee has said: "India is a whole world in herself; she is a society of the same magnitude as our Western society." And, as has been pointed out, it is a complex and different society. "The fissures in the Indian soil," wrote E. M. Forster, "are infinite." No visitor to this bewildering country can hope to do more than gain some insights into the complex pattern of developments and attitudes which characterize the Indian scene. Even persons who have lived in India for fifteen or twenty years or more admit that they cannot fathom many aspects of Indian life and thought. In fact, Nehru himself, who has probably seen more of his country than any other living person, is frank to confess that much of India eludes him. There are depths within depths in Indian society which make it at once intriguing and baffling.

PROBLEMS FACING INDIAN GOVERNMENT

A few months ago a well-known Indian magazine asserted that "all American reports on India, official or nonofficial, have been results either of wishful thinking or superficial observation." I believe that there is at least a measure of truth in this assertion. Most of the information we get on India is probably misleading to a certain degree, and even if it is accurate in itself it may be difficult to place it in proper perspective. Most of the reports from India are either overly optimistic or overly pessimistic. There is danger from both kinds of distortion, but I think we should beware especially of the glowing reports. Certainly it is easy to be pessimistic about India's present conditions and about her future. It is by no means certain that she can cope with her vast problems, the full dimensions of which have to be seen at first hand to be appreciated, or can survive as a democratic state. The threat of political disintegration or of a lapse into extremism of the Right or the Left is real. The political situation is confused and uncertain, and the great unanswered question of "After Nehru—who?" haunts the minds of all who are thinking of the future. Many unhealthy forces and pressures are operating in the Indian scene. Americans, I fear, do not appreciate the gravity of these forces and pressures, or how much they circumscribe the actions of the government.

The magazine from which I have quoted holds that

The threat to democracy in India grows out of the cultural tradition and the prevailing intellectual atmosphere. . . . by and large the cultural tradition of India remains mediaeval and authoritarian. . . . we have in India a formally democratic government, but it is neither good, nor efficient, nor stable.

This magazine refers specifically to the rapid growth of unemployment, the absence of popular support for the Five Year Plan, the deterioration of the administrative machinery, corruption and inefficiency, and "the indifference of the middle class to the democratic values of life." "The siren call of Communism," it declares, "reaches the Indian masses through the educated middle class." The problem of the educated unemployed is often mentioned as one of the alarming problems in India, for a discontented and unemployed educated group is always a danger, especially so in a new and still politically unstable democratic state.

Not long ago the most important newspaper in India, which is generally a supporter or at worst a friendly critic of the government, referred to "the difficult food situation, the disquieting rise in unemployment, the soaring cost of living, the hunger for land, the failure of the Five Year Plan, the educational morass"; and it charged that instead of bending its best efforts to coping with these tremendous problems the Indian National Congress was concentrating on internal squabbles, "with the sickeningly familiar charges of nepotism, corruption, and maladministration." "In other words," stated this newspaper, "the Congress is out of touch with reality. It does not know what ails the people, what their real problems are, and how best to tackle them."

Criticisms of this sort are commonly heard in India today. One can easily paint such a gloomy picture of present-day conditions and prospects. I cite some of these charges not for the purpose of criticizing the present government of India, for I believe that on the whole it is a good government and that almost any conceivable alternative would be infinitely worse, but rather to remind you that such criticisms are commonly heard in India today and that they do raise some questions about the present situation and the future. We should ignore these danger signals and warnings at our peril.

PROGRESS IN INDIA

Fortunately there is another and brighter side to the Indian picture. Dr. Paul Appleby, an American expert who made a special study of public administration in India, declared about a year ago: "What the government is trying to do here is, I think, the most important effort in the world today." And great progress has been made. Indeed, a friendly outside observer will probably be more impressed with the record of genuine progress under adverse circumstances than he will be with the criticisms which he will hear on all sides. The partition of India, less than seven years ago, was accompanied by economic, social, and political dislocation, by riots and massacres, by one of the greatest refugee problems in this century of the homeless man. India has made great progress in dealing with the problems attending partition, although thousands of refugees still live like animals in the cities and although relations with Pakistan are still strained.

Within a few months after independence, thanks largely to the efforts of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, some five hundred Indian states were integrated into the Union of India. Less than two and a half years after independence, India became a Republic, under a new Constitution. The work of constitution making is an epic in itself. In late 1951 and early 1952 India held the first general elections in her history, and the largest democratic elections ever held in any country. Some 106,000,000 valid votes were cast. The elections were free and passed off without violence. In a country which had never known nation-wide free elections and where more than 80 per cent of the electorate are illiterate, this was a tremendous achievement. In 1951 the Five Year Plan was launched, and it was made final in December 1952. It is now well under way, and in spite of many criticisms and a disturbing lack of popular support it is helping to transform the face of India. Unfortunately, even if its goals are realized, India will not be much better off than it was when the plan was launched, for each year nearly five million new Indians come into the world and the resources of the country do not permit of the kind of effort that is really needed.

But India is making real progress in increasing the food supply, in providing water and land to the people, in developing its mineral resources, in industrialization, in health and social welfare, and in many other ways. The community development projects and the great multipurpose river valley development projects are truly exciting experiments in India today. In spite of all the propaganda about the progress in China since the Communists gained control, it is probable that the Indian record of actual achievement is more impressive—although less well publicized. Furthermore, this progress has been made in a democratic way and has not been imposed by a ruthless totalitarian regime at great cost of human life and human freedom.

These are impressive achievements, and they tax the resources of India to the limit; but India must make even greater strides if she is to develop the bases of a tolerable existence for the masses of her people. Even if her leaders were less addicted to their policy of "independence" or "nonalignment" and even if there were greater realism and less escapism in popular attitudes toward life in general and world affairs in particular, India still would not be able to be a bulwark of strength in any co-operative military alliance. The United States should realize that India and the other nations of the uncommitted world cannot be expected to enter into the kind of relationship for the defense of the free world which is represented by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or by the Rio Treaty or various bilateral security arrangements. This does not mean that these uncommitted countries are pro-Communist in orientation or are any less concerned than the United States and its "allies" in the defense of freedom. For in this respect all non-Communist nations are "allies," whether they associate themselves in formal defense arrangements or not.

INDIA'S CONTRIBUTION

A more realistic attitude for the United States to take toward a country like India was suggested some time ago by H. Stuart Hughes:

In certain border areas the United States need not require ideological uniformity or a full alliance from those nations to which it gives economic aid and which it regards as its friends. Indeed, to do so would be to undermine their value to the Western coalition. . . . Within the United Nations the existence of a loyal opposition . . . offers the only convincing answer to the allegation that that organization is nothing more than a screen for United States policy. This sort of opposition India, under Nehru's leadership, provides. If Nehru did not exist it would be necessary to invent someone resembling him. Only through some such formula as his will there be even a remote chance of reconciling the leaders of Asian nationalism with the former colonial powers. To push Nehru hard, to try to force him to adhere more closely to the American line, is to invite disaster. Americans need to appreciate more fully Nehru's problems at home and the pressure he is withstanding from the more extreme anti-Westerners among his own followers. The policy he is currently pursuing is oriented just about as far West as he can safely go. If Nehru, through too close an adherence to the Western line, should succumb to his own extremists, then surely we should have lost our best hope not only for a reconciliation between Asia and the West, but also, ultimately, for the peace of the whole world.²

We show a complete misunderstanding of the Indian temperament and of present Indian foreign policy when we criticize Nehru and other leaders of the government of India for their lack of appreciation of the crisis of our time and for their refusal to make specific commitments to programs of mutual defense. The best we can hope for from India is that she will survive as a free state and will gradually gain vigor and unity so that she will be better able to cope with any emergency, from within or from without. Chester Bowles, former American ambassador to India, expressed this point of view very effectively in his inspiring book, Ambassador's Report, a book which every American should read. Mr. Bowles wrote:

If I were given a single wish for the future of our relationship with India and Asia, I would wish to see India and the other new nations of Asia succeed in achieving economic and political stability within the framework of freedom, regardless of what they may think of America.³

² "Containment Reconsidered," The Nation, December 11, 1950, pp. 564-66.

³ Ambassador's Report (New York, 1954), pp. 233-34.

George V. Allen, Mr. Bowles's successor as American ambassador to India, expressed a similar point of view in these words:

America's interest, in one sentence, is that India, which has achieved full sovereign status, shall retain that status completely, and that the faith which the vast majority of the Indian people have in democracy's ability to give them a better and fuller life be sustained and fortified.⁴

FLUCTUATIONS IN INDO-AMERICAN RELATIONS

The ups and downs in Indo-American relations have been particularly marked in the past eighteen months, although I fear there have been more downs than ups. For the sad fact is that these relations have deteriorated sharply in this period. This was particularly true early in 1953, at about the time the Eisenhower administration came into power, and unhappily, after some evidences of improvement last year, the relations are now at a low ebb, due largely to the announcement of American arms aid to Pakistan.

Some of Eisenhower's statements during the presidential campaign, notably his reference to "liberation" and to "Asians fighting Asians," were widely misunderstood in India and caused real alarm. These alarms increased after the Republican victory in November 1952. Many Indians seemed to believe that Republicans were more warlike than Democrats, and they took a dim view of a professional military man in the White House. Toward the end of 1952 rumors that the United States was trying to persuade the nations of the Middle East and Pakistan to join in a Middle East Defense Organization and a very unpopular Anglo-American resolution on Kashmir adopted by the Security Council of the United Nations had adverse effects on Indian attitudes toward the United States. Some of the early statements of Eisenhower and Dulles after the Republican administration assumed office on January 20, 1953, added to Indian apprehensions.

⁴ Address to the India League of America, New York, April 1, 1953.

The recall of Ambassador Chester Bowles was another unpopular move. During his eighteen months in India Mr. Bowles scored a great personal and diplomatic success. At a difficult and delicate period in Indo-American relations he promoted the true national interests of his own country and contributed mightily to friendly understanding between the United States and India. He liked India, and Indians liked him. To Indians he represented the best traditions of the America they admire and respect, at a time when they sometimes wonder whether America is living up to her own best traditions. His recall was a matter which many Indians could not understand. It was useless to try to explain that when a new administration of another party comes into power in Washington, the top diplomatic representatives in most countries, especially the political appointees, are usually changed. Mr. Bowles's recall was regarded by many Indians as another evidence that the Eisenhower administration was not truly concerned with Indo-American understanding.

The reduction-in-force program of the new administration eliminated a few of the ablest members of the American mission in India, greatly lowered the morale and reduced the effectiveness of those who remained, and seriously curtailed some of the most effective programs which the United States was carrying on in India. The transfer of the technical assistance program from the Department of State to the new Foreign Operations Administration, largely for purposes of more efficient administration and co-ordination with other foreign aid programs, seemed to confirm the suspicions of many Indians that the United States was interested in aid to underdeveloped countries solely as a part of its efforts to combat Communism and to provide for the military defense of the non-Communist world.

U. S. MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO PAKISTAN

Now, on top of these and many other unpopular moves, the United States has decided to give military assistance to Pakistan. While this decision can be justified on many grounds and is in keeping with the policy of the United States to help those free nations which seek American assistance in their efforts to strengthen themselves in a dangerous world, it is bitterly resented in India and has imposed new strains on Indo-American relations. Prime Minister Nehru has warned that the United States-Pakistan pact will have the opposite effect of Washington's intention and will create "a wave of uncertainty" and increase tensions between India and Pakistan. Last year Secretary Dulles declared that closer relations between India and Pakistan were a prerequisite to the strengthening of anti-Communist defenses in Asia. Now the United States has embarked on a policy which will increase the tensions between the two new nations in the Indian subcontinent and which will thereby probably weaken rather than strengthen this part of the non-Communist world.

Apparently it is hard for Americans, even those in high places of responsibility, to realize the gravity of relations between India and Pakistan or the effect of a move such as this upon those relations. Feeling on the Kashmir issue in both countries, and particularly in Pakistan, is strong and bitter; and as long as responsible political leaders as well as other molders of opinion in Pakistan continue to speak so belliger-ently on the Kashmir issue, it will be impossible to convince Indians that substantial military aid to Pakistan does not increase the danger of military action against India, thereby forcing India in turn to divert even more of her limited resources to unproductive purposes of defense.

FAVORABLE DEVELOPMENTS

Fortunately not all of the developments of recent months have contributed to a worsening of Indo-American relations. Many of India's worst apprehensions of the Eisenhower administration have proved to be groundless. The President's great address of April 16, 1953, in which he expressed the genuine American interest in peace and called for steps to lessen international tensions, had a salutary effect in India. The truce in Korea gave the lie to those critics who maintained that the United States had to keep the Korean War going because it was geared to a war economy. Eisenhower's dramatic proposal to the United Nations General Assembly for an international atomic pool was hailed in India, as elsewhere, as a constructive step. The agreement of the United States to participate in the recent Berlin Conference on Germany and in the Geneva Conference on Korea and Indochina indicated that the American government had not closed the door to negotiation with the Soviet Union and that its policy was less inflexible than many of its critics charged.

The interest of the Republican administration in India was shown by the visit of Secretary of State Dulles and Director of Foreign Operations Stassen in May. This visit by two key figures in the new administration was greatly appreciated, and both Mr. Dulles and Mr. Stassen made a fine impression. Mr. Dulles' report on his trip to that part of the world showed that he had gained a greater appreciation and understanding of problems and attitudes in the countries he visited. The visit of Adlai Stevenson to India shortly after Messrs. Dulles and Stassen left was also helpful. If Indians had decided the American election, Mr. Stevenson would now be in the White House, and they were happy to welcome him as an unofficial ambassador of good will. The more recent and official visit of Vice-President Nixon also had a good effect. Mr. Nixon was roundly cheered when he told members of the Indian Parliament that when he returned to the United States he would "inform doubters in the United States that any impression that India is leaning toward Communist ideology is completely erroneous." On the occasion of Mr. Nixon's visit Prime Minister Nehru told American newspapermen that there was "no basic chasm" between India and the United States, and "no ill will by the Indian people toward the American people." These reassuring words are, I believe, far more than polite phrases or diplomatic platitudes. "They suggest that in spite of all surface differences relations between India and the United States are basically good. As Nehru told the United States Congress in 1949: 'Friendship and co-operation between our two countries are . . . natural.' This is the rock on which I think we should stand when we attempt to appraise the state of Indo-American relations."

DIFFERENCES IN WORLD POLICY

In the January 1954 issue of Foreign Affairs an Indian writer who signed himself simply "P" warned that "there is a growing difference between South Asian opinion and the United States in matters affecting world policy." On three issues, in particular, the differences are great and disturbing. These issues are: (1) ways to peace, (2) the seriousness and reality of the Soviet threat, and (3) policies toward Communist China.

Ways to peace

We may assume, I believe, that Americans are just as interested in peace as Indians, although many Indians do not appear to accept this assumption. But the American people cannot be blind to the facts of life in this atomic age. Reluctantly and only after sincere efforts to co-operate with the Soviet Union the United States has been forced to conclude that in this dangerous world it must keep its defenses strong and must negotiate from strength and not from weakness. It has therefore placed emphasis upon national security and collective security arrangements, of which NATO is the outstanding example. This policy is viewed with real alarm in India, and the alarm is shared to some extent at home as well as abroad. George F. Kennan, for example, in a lecture at Princeton University in late March 1954 declared that many Americans have now become "wholly absorbed with power values to a point where they were impatient of any discussion of international affairs that tried to take account of anything else—inclined to dismiss references to any other problems as frivolous and inconsequential." Yet these "other problems" are precisely those which the countries of the uncommitted world regard as paramount and pressing.

In a two-day debate on foreign affairs in the Indian House of the People on March 23 and 24 Prime Minister Nehru made two significant restatements of India's approach to world problems. He blamed both the United States and the Soviet Union for the unhappy state of international relations. "Each side," he said, "is afraid of the other. . . . Because of this fear, armament is going on in both countries. . . . If this process continues, the world is heading toward disaster." He charged that the emphasis of the United States on collective security arrangements has created "insecurity, uncertainty, and instability" in Asia. He said that there were "two approaches to the question of war and peace": to consider war inevitable and to prepare for it; or the course he chose to follow, to consider that war "must be avoided if not at all costs, almost at all costs." India, he explained, was determined to remain aloof from power alignments and to continue in her policy of advocating "any step to avoid war." "There is no question," he declared, "of India leaning to this side or that."

The Soviet threat

It is obvious, therefore, that while India and the United States are both seeking ways to peace, their approaches to this goal differ fundamentally. Part of the difference may be explained by their varying interpretations of the Soviet threat. Most Americans, mindful of the bitter lessons of the past decade and before, do not need to be convinced that this threat is real and serious. A recent report of a special study mission of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the United States House of Representatives, which traveled some 30,000 miles to investigate the situation in the Far East, summed up the prevailing sentiment in this country in these words: "The Communist danger cannot be overestimated." Contrast this view with that voiced by "P" in his article in Foreign Affairs:

Why, then, this difference of approach to the external menace of Communism? Primarily, it is because India is not satisfied that there is such an external menace. . . . We may be stupid or completely blind, but where we do not see the menace, we cannot pretend to do so, merely because we are so advised by no doubt wiser people. . . . It may sound strange to American ears, but nonetheless it is a fact that the leaders of India and Burma, and perhaps of other South Asian countries (excluding Siam), do not feel themselves threatened by Communism.

This does indeed "sound strange to American ears," and it may in fact sound strange to some Indian ears as well; but it does reflect a basically divergent appraisal of the nature of the contemporary world crisis.

Policies toward Communist China

The differences of viewpoint regarding Communist China are well known. India was one of the first non-Communist nations to recognize the new regime in China and has been the leading advocate of the admission of that regime into the United Nations. Dealing with the Central People's Government on the great issues in which that government was involved, declared Mr. Nehru on March 23, was "not a question of liking or not liking," but of "facing facts." The United States, on the other hand, has refused to recognize Red China, or to forsake the remnants of the Nationalist regime on Formosa, and it is opposed to the admission of the Central People's Government into the United Nations or any other international organization. This position was emphatically restated in late March in the report of the Congressional study mission to the Far East and again by both President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles.⁵

Americans should give serious thought to the attitudes of other free peoples, but it does not necessarily follow that when they find themselves in the minority they are wrong. Possibly they exaggerate the nature and extent of the Soviet threat; misunderstand the nature of the relationship between Communist China and the Soviet Union; place too much emphasis on "containment," "building situations of strength," "collective security," and "mutual defense"; rely too much on their own strength; do not give sufficient consideration to the feelings and attitudes of other peoples; and so tend to exacerbate the very evils they seek to avoid. But, on the other hand, it is by no means certain that their interpretation of the Communists' motives and intentions is wrong, or that any other policies than those they have supported would secure better results. It is possible that whereas they exaggerate the nature of the Soviet threat, others may underestimate it; that whereas they tend to take too harsh a view of the Chinese Communists, others may be too lenient and in their desire to promote friendly relations with the "New China" may serve as dupes and tools of those to whom friendship as they conceive it has little meaning.

Americans have good reason to take exception to one prevalent Indian attitude. Chester Bowles, in his answers to questions by Indian journalists on the eve of his departure from India in March 1953, defined this attitude and his reaction to it:

Americans are puzzled and disturbed . . . when some Indians who are personally devoted to democratic ideals, refer to the present unfortunate world conflict as a "struggle between two power blocs, each . . . any implicit on world domination." . . . a charge of a "plague on both your houses" seems to us not only wholly unwarranted but also dangerously unrealistic.

This thesis of two power blocs, both equally bad, is a dangerous and misleading one, but it is the stock in trade of many Indian foreign policy analysts. That it is still prevalent and finds expression in high places is indicated by the following excerpts from a special dispatch to the New York Times, dated New Delhi, March 24, 1954:

The United States and the Soviet Union shared equally today in an assessment by Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru of the blame for current world unrest. . . . Considering the expression of the Indian Parliament as a whole, the United States has come out on the short end again.

It should be pointed out that many Indians deplore this tendency to equate the United States and the Soviet Union, and to speak in terms of two "power blocs." Writing in The Statesman (Calcutta and New Delhi) in January 1953 in criticism of a resolution on foreign policy adopted by the Indian National Congress, Mr. A. D. Gorwala, a respected public figure in India, declared:

To talk in these circumstances as if it was a question of a dispute between similar contending parties is to be not only unrealistic but also immoral. And the immorality is emphasized when it is noticed that . . . it seems to make no difference at all that the aggressive side consists of some of the cruellest and most despotic though efficient police states the world has ever seen, while on the defending side are ranged real democracies, paying in their daily conduct, except for very occasional lapses, due respect to freedom, the rights of the individual and the rule of law. The disintegrating power of fear can seldom have seen to better effect than in this spectacle of a professed democracy equating wrong with right, tyranny with freedom.

SHARED ASPIRATIONS

We should not allow honest differences of opinion to make us forget the fundamental beliefs and aspirations which the United States and India share; nor should we forget that by giving sympathetic understanding and concrete assistance to India we are promoting our own national interests and enhancing the prospects for peace and freedom in the world. Fortunately the leaders of the United States, after a considerable amount of blundering and hesitation, are giving signs that they have at last reached the solid ground of common interests. The Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, Mr. Walter S. Robertson, recently stated:

I feel that nowhere more than in Asia, where so many are struggling against such heavy odds for one-hundredth part of the rewards we take for granted, will assistance from us be productive of important returns for all mankind.⁶

And in his report to the American people on June 1, 1953, after his trip to the Middle East and South Asia, Secretary Dulles said:

These peoples we visited are proud peoples, who have a great tradition and, I believe, a great future. We in the United States are better off if we respect and honor them. It profits nothing merely to be critical of others. President Eisenhower's administration plans to make friendship—not fault-finding—the basis of its foreign policy.

These statements suggest that the spokesmen of the Eisenhower administration have found the right words; now let us hope they will find the right policies. One can ask no more than that the present government of the United States will make a renewed effort to live up to its own promises and to the best traditions of the great country whose destinies it is now guiding. In these efforts, I believe, it will have the support of the American people and the appreciation of freedom-loving peoples everywhere, including the citizens of the Republic of India.

⁶ Address to the English-Speaking Union, New York, February 18, 1954.

Norman D. Palmer, Ph.D., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, is professor and former chairman of the Department of Political Science at the University of Pennsylvania. He was visiting Fulbright professor at the University of Delhi in 1952-53. He is the author of The Irish Land League Crisis (1940) and coauthor of Fundamentals of Political Science (1952) and International Relations (1953). He and Mrs. Palmer have written a book based on their experiences in India, to be published in September.

⁵ For a particularly strong statement of this same position, see the article by Alfred S. Jenkins in this issue of THE ANNALS.

India and the United States: Democracy East and West

By GAGANVIHARI L. MEHTA

RELATIONS between different countries are of vital importance in the world today. Without a harmonious relationship not only peace but economic development is impossible. Such relations are determined by a country's conception of its own interests and its immediate and distant objectives. Until the beginning of this century, what mattered most was relationships between different countries of Europe, many of which had far-flung empires with sources of raw materials and markets abroad. The United States of America was preoccupied with its own economic development and with preventing interference and domination by European countries on the whole of this continent. It was only after the emergence of Japan that the existence of Asia came to be realized; and it was not until after the two world wars and the attainment of independence by several Asian countries that the importance of Asia as a factor in world politics began to be gradually, if somewhat reluctantly, recognized. While the problem of the relationship between the Asian continent and the United States is of vital importance in the present conditions, the maintenance of amicable relations between the United States and India is a matter of the highest significance.

TWO BIG DEMOCRACIES

America and India are both large countries, although India is only about one-third of the size of the United States; they are practically on opposite sides of the globe. Each has a large seaboard and is richly gifted by nature —with minerals and metals and a variety of agricultural products. No doubt, India's resources have yet to be fully developed or even completely surveyed, but there is little doubt that, given a period of peace and stability and the application of co-operative endeavor, organization, and technical skill, India's economy has the capacity for immense development.

India is an ancient land with a historic tradition and a cultural heritage that go back to 3,000 years before Christ. The United States is a modern nation. And yet, in a certain sense, India is also a young country. Her political independence was achieved less than seven years ago. We observed the centenary of our railway system last year and our textile industry celebrates it this year. The steel industry in our country is less than fifty years old. But India has for centuries had domestic and cottage industries and handicrafts for which she is justly famous. Nevertheless, as a united, democratic state with a national economy in the modern sense, India is in the initial stages of development.

Incidentally, in one other sense also there is a similarity between the two countries. India, like the United States, has a conglomeration of several races and communities with different religions and creeds. But just as the United States has been welding this large concourse into a national entity, so too through the cultural unity of ages, the framework of a national Constitution, and the elements of an industrial structure, India is also a united nation today. The United States is the largest democracy in the West (population 161,000,000) while India is the largest democracy in the East (population 360,000,000). They have different systems of representative government but the essence and the spirit are the same. Both our countries believe that governments must be based on the consent of the governed; that no man should be punished except after due process of law; that economic well-being is basic for national development and should be achieved by democratic processes. The Constitution of India has derived some of its inspiration from the Constitution of this country, including the Bill of Rights. We have a written Constitution with a federal structure of government and an independent judiciary. No doubt there are many divergences, as is only to be expected, but all I want to stress is that the basic objectives of the two Constitutions are the same. One important feature of our Constitution which has earned widespread appreciation is the absence of any discrimination against a citizen on grounds of religion, color, or caste. India is a secular state.

POLITICAL INDEPENDENCE

During our national movement, we derived inspiration from the early history of the American fight for independence, and we had the moral sympathy and support of many leaders of public opinion in this country. The principle of national self-determination enunciated by President Woodrow Wilson during World War I gave a stimulus to the movement for political emancipation in our country as in several other lands. During the interwar years, and particularly during the war period, the cause of Indian independence was supported by several eminent men and women in this country, including leaders in the Congress and in the administration. This co-operation has continued in the political, economic, and technical spheres during the last seven years when a new India has been in the making.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURE

There has been growing economic interdependence between the two countries. Before World War II, the total trade between the United States and India was valued at about 200 million dollars per annum; it now runs to roughly 700 million dollars. Previously, India's trade with the United States was about 7 per cent of its total foreign trade; it is now nearly 20 per cent even after excluding import of foodstuffs. There have been significant increases in exports from the United States to India in cotton, machinery, oil and oil products, vehicles, and minerals such as sulphur. On the other hand, India supplies nearly 40 per cent of the manganese used by the steel industry in this country, 80 per cent of high-grade mica and a considerable quantity of castor oil (important for lubrication of high-speed aircraft), ilmenite (used for manufacture of special quality pigments and paints), cyanite (for making refractories), chromite, short-staple cotton, burlap, and shellac, as well as tea. It is of interest to know that both in 1952 and in 1953 the United States imported sufficient manganese from India to make 54,000,000 tons of steel, about half the total annual production in this country.

Again, during the last five years about twenty-five American firms have started or expanded manufacturing activities in India. These include the American Cyanamid Company, the Union Carbide and Carbon Company, the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company, Remington Typewriter Company, Otis Elevator Company, and other chemical and engineering concerns. Some of them are participating financially in Indian enterprises, others are collaborating technically, while still others are operating entirely on their own with American capital and management. The total American capital invested in India is about 100 million dollars. The most important example of this economic co-operation is the establishment of two oil refineries by the Standard-Vacuum Oil Company and the California Texas Oil Company, the former in Bombay and the latter in an eastern part of India, Vizagapatam, on the Bay of Bengal. As soon as these oil refineries are ready, along with another being built by the Burmah Oil Company of the United Kingdom, India will produce practically all the petroleum products that it requires. Although crude oil will be imported for the present, it is possible that in future such oil might be obtained in India itself as a result of drilling operations to be undertaken by the Standard-Vacuum Oil Company in collaboration with the government of India. This is probably the first instance in which an oil company of this importance has entered into a direct partnership with a foreign government. Merchant ships of both India and the United States are engaged in carrying important and often strategic goods between the two countries.

TECHNICAL AID

During the last four years, India has also been an active participant in schemes of technical co-operation and has received technical assistance from the specialized agencies of the United Nations and particularly from this country. Under the Point Four program, 101 Indian technicians have received training in this country and 105 American experts have gone over to India to assist in programs of agricultural extension, irrigation, health, education, fisheries, and so forth. In 1951, when India was faced by a serious drought, the United States gave a loan of two million tons of wheat of an aggregate value of 190 million dollars. I might add that India has already paid the full 7 million dollars of interest due on this loan by the end of 1953. Money realized by the sale of this wheat in India has been utilized for development projects, particularly for agriculture and irrigation. Let me also add that the amount of interest realized by the United States is going to be spent for educational purposes in India.

Moreover, because the United States has been conscious of our community of interests and aware of the vital importance of India's economic development, an Indo-American Technical Co-operation Agreement was made in 1952, under which a total of 160 million dollars has been allocated, principally for community development projects. Important private organizations such as the Ford and Rockefeller Foundations have also been extending material and technical help. Such assistance is a truer expression of co-operation between the United States and India than pious resolutions of mutual good will and treaties of "eternal friendship." I must point out, however, that the foreign aid we receive, although invaluable, is marginal and supplements our own efforts. Development programs are formulated by Indians themselves in consultation and co-operation with experts and technicians from abroad, where necessary; and the main financial burden of operating them is on the people themselves. Foreign aid can be acceptable to India if it is given with the object of furthering her economic development and not as an instrument of cold war. In order to produce the best results, it is important that economic aid and technical advice be given without creating a sense of inferiority in the recipient country or engendering any suspicions about the motives and objectives of such programs.

DIFFERING POLICIES

It will, therefore, be evident that there has been close relationship and growing co-operation in various spheres between India and the United States. And yet, if we read newspaper headlines and follow radio commentaries and listen to stray conversations, we hear only of differences and misunderstanding between our two countries; the inference would be that we are drifting apart. Why is this so? We must face this question frankly but calmly, without passion or prejudice. I do not expect to carry full conviction to you in what I am going to say, but it is enough if you appreciate to some extent at any rate India's point of view. Understanding of a different viewpoint does not necessarily imply agreement. What we want is more light and less heat.

I have already referred to the large area of agreement and understanding between the two countries. Our differences have arisen mainly in the international sphere and in respect of the choice of a foreign policy that would be most appropriate for the promotion of peace, particularly in Asia and Africa. These differences arise not because of any clash of interests or any struggle for leadership. Indeed, India does not aspire to any leadership even in Asia, nor has she any economic and territorial ambitions in any part of the world; the policies of the United States also are not designed with a view to building up an empire. Nor do our differences arise from any divergence of "ideological" approach. We believe in democracy both in spirit and as a technique for political and economic progress. We also agree that we should seek to prevent the disaster of a third world war and that all efforts should be directed to this end both in the United Nations and outside. But it is in the manner in which we should ensure peace and reduce tensions that there is a divergence.

Asian aspirations

Indians are of the view that there is inadequate recognition of the importance of Asia in the counsels of nations and we are distressed when we see attempts being made to settle Asian problems by ignoring the wishes and feelings of Asian countries. Asian countries no longer want to be the instruments for the ends of powerful nations. No lasting solution can be reached, whether it be in the Middle East or the Far East, if it does not take fully into account the aspirations and sentiments of the people of these lands. India desires nothing more than to bring to the consciousness of the Western world the new forces which are pulsating in Asia and Africa and which can be ignored only at peril to international peace and stability. This is no exclusive cult nor any trans-continental doctrine of "Asia for the Asians"; it is only a desire to develop our own systems and economies without domination from outside. We want to be friends, not satellites. Independent countries must be accepted as such, not as "camp followers" of countries with immense military and economic power. Enlightened opinion in this country recognizes this feeling and stresses the fact that the United States wants allies and partners. However, the attitude and policies of important Western countries are not always formulated in the spirit of what is called the "free world." Important Asian countries are often ignored in the United Nations and at conferences convened to discuss problems in Asia. Decisions so reached can only be regarded as impositions, which go against all the canons of freedom.

Colonialism

Closely related to this is the attitude to be adopted towards colonialism and racial discrimination. If colonialism is supported, perhaps for ulterior reasons, and undemocratic and unpopular regimes are bolstered up, how can the moral support of the peoples of such countries be elicited and their energies mobilized for democratic progress? Because of our struggle for freedom, people in our country have an instinctive sympathy with similar struggles in other countries, particularly in Asia and Africa. No structure for world peace can be built on the denial of freedom to countries and large masses of people. It is not without significance that countries like India, Pakistan, Burma, Ceylon, Indonesia, and the Philippines, which achieved independence after World War II, have successfully resisted subversive activities within their borders and are building up their own economies, while those countries which have been denied freedom are in a state of chaos and fall an easy prey to extreme doctrines and movements.

Who is the enemy?

The differences in the policies of the United States and India arise mainly from the fact that whereas to the United States the fight against Communism is the supreme issue to which all other problems should be subordinated, India holds that the real enemies of mankind are economic and social evils such as poverty and hunger and disease, racial discrimination, and domination and exploitation of weaker peoples by the powerful nations of the world. These problems would confront us even if the teachings of Karl Marx had not influenced Lenin and even though Mao Tse-tung had not been the ruler of China. As Mr. Lester B. Pearson, the distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada, has observed, "The conflict [between forces of Communist imperialism and free democracy] may not seem so simple to people who are preoccupied with the struggle for self-government and economic progress, millions of whom live under the recurring threat of starvation and who may be pardoned for thinking that hunger and servitude are worse enemies than Marxism." India's government and leaders, therefore, give the highest priority to "freedom from want." Mr. Chester Bowles, the former United States Ambassador to India, mentions in his Ambassador's Report that Sir Gerald Temple, the British general in charge of the war against guerillas in Malaya, told him: "Give me a hundred more divisions and I still couldn't destroy the Communists without the necessary reforms. My job is only 10 per cent military. The remaining 90 per cent is political and economic."

In other words, the theory and practice of Communism have to be studied as a historical process rather than as a malignant germ to be merely exterminated. So long as countries are not aggressive and have no extraterritorial ambitions or militant programs under ideological masks, no harm is done by peaceful coexistence and competition between different political and democratic systems. We believe, therefore, that the sounder method of ensuring stability and progress in the East is to give the common man the hope of a better and a fuller life, rather than to strengthen military defenses and put up bases which may only succeed in increasing tensions or even creating dissensions between countries in that area. In this connection, I cannot do better than quote what a distinguished American, Mr. Adlai Stevenson, said the other day in the last of his Godkin lectures at Harvard University. After pointing out that much of the world in Asia, Africa, and the Middle East was "trying to telescope centuries into decades" in the "drive" for industrial and technological development, he emphasized that a policy based on anti-Communism and military potency was not in the spirit of this drive and "will win few hearts." The challenge, he said, was "for us to identify ourselves with this social and human revolution, to encourage, aid, and inspire the aspirations of half of mankind for a better life, to guide these aspirations into paths that lead to freedom."

Military thinking

In this imperfect world of ours no country can afford to neglect its armed defenses, but it is well to remember that modern weapons have become so destructive that war has now ceased to be, if ever it was in the past, a solution of the differences and dissensions of nations. Two world wars have shown that war is no instrument for the attainment of social and economic objectives or even for the annihilation of systems which are regarded as evil. But now, the way to war is the surest path to disaster. It is, therefore, of vital importance that while military preparations are made, as a guarantee of self-preservation, everything humanly possible be done to ensure that such preparations do not produce the opposite effect by bringing us nearer to war. In other words, the climate of peace should be cultivated and extended by every means possible. The consequences of military thinking dominating political considerations are almost as disastrous today as those of neglecting essential military defense. As Mr. John Foster Dulles, the distinguished Secretary of State of this country, has observed in his book War or Peace, "Military needs are important, and a strong military establishment is a necessity. But we shall fail in our search for peace, security, and justice unless our policies, in reality and also in appearance, give priority to the hopes and aspirations for peace of the peoples of the world."

LACK OF UNDERSTANDING

The worst impediment in the way of full understanding and co-operation between our two countries is, I repeat, not any clash of interests or any differences in ideologies, not any subtleties of Oriental psychology or wiles of Occidental diplomacy, but plain lack of understanding. Indeed, during my stay in this country, extending over a year and a half, I have found that the American and Indian characters are similar in some ways. We are both informal, friendly, and hospitable—and also apt to be sensitive. But there are sharp differences too. The American mind is essentially an engineering mind: it is positive, constructive, and believes in continuous experiment, innovation, and action. The Indian mind is more contemplative: it is reflective, somewhat cautious, slow in tempo, believing in eternity rather than in a few seconds! There are radical differences in economic conditions between our two countries, and we have divergent traditions and customs. Both our peoples would benefit if each could imbibe some of the traits of the other. In India, there is great admiration for the high standards of life in America and there is eagerness to learn the techniques which have made this remarkable progress possible. In this task of improving the lot of our peoples we do not and shall not shut out light from other lands or reject the helping hand of a friend.

CONFIDENCE A SLOW GROWTH

Relationship between nations is a sensitive plant, never more so than today when there is frequently a tendency to treat any difference of opinion as almost an act of defiance. Mutual confidence is a slow growth, particularly between a country which has just achieved independence and has, therefore, pardonable sensitiveness and a country which is the most powerful in the world today through its immense financial and technical resources and which feels aggrieved that its unparalleled generosity in assisting the rehabilitation of countries from the ravages of war and in the development of economies of poorer lands is not adequately appreciated. What will maintain and promote good relations between our two countries is not gifts of money nor aid of arms but a sense of equality of status and a sharing of common objectives. It is only natural that Indo-American relations should be subject to all the strains and stresses which characterize relations between two free, independent, and friendly countries. But so long as the spirit of idealism which inspired your founding fathers and your great leaders guide you and so long as we are true to our cultural heritage and our faith in democratic values, we have nothing to fear.

His Excellency Gaganvihari L. Mehta, LL.D., Washington, D. C., is Ambassador of India to the United States. He was assistant editor of the Bombay Chronicle (1923-25) and manager of the Calcutta office of the Scindia Steam Navigation Ltd. (1928-47). Following India's independence he has been at various times president of the Tariff Board, member of the National Planning Commission, chairman of the Tariff Commission, president of the Indian Chamber of Commerce and of the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce, member of the Constituent Assembly, member of the Indian delegation to the International Conference on Trade and Employment, Geneva, and on the Governing Body of the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research. He is the author of The Conscience of a Nation (1932), From Wrong Angles (1935), and Per-versities (1942).

American Policy Toward India and the Security of South Asia

By JOHN D. JERNEGAN

THE subject of the relations between the United States and India is of deep interest to many of us and of great importance to us all. It is, of course, a subject of special concern to the Department of State.

First let me say that whenever troubled relations between ourselves and the Indians exist, this is no cause of concern to the Communists. There is little they would like better than to see friction between the two countries develop. They would like to see India and America alienated completely from each other. They are trying to accomplish just that right now. The Kremlin today is using all the propaganda devices in its possession to make the Indians feel that we are their enemies; that we represent a new imperialism; that we intend to dominate their economy; that we are bent on involving the whole world, including India, in a new world war; that what we hope to do and see in the area of the Middle East and South Asia is carefully calculated to go against Indian national interests.

These themes, let us admit, have not been selected at random. They have been chosen with the utmost care by the Soviets because they believe that these are the lines which are most likely to be believed in India.

What the Communists do and say, however, is not likely to have any very serious effect on United States-Indian relations; their strength in India is not sufficiently great. But we must frankly admit that today American relations with India are not so completely cordial as we should like to see them. There are various reasons for this. Partly it is a case of mutual misunderstanding arising out of the differing backgrounds of the two nations. Partly, however, our differences arise out of ordinary disagreements over the best ways to handle specific problems. We have, for example, disagreed over the attitude which should be adopted toward Communist China. Likewise, it took us a long time to reconcile our positions in regard to the Korean truce negotiations. Nor have we seen eye to eye over action to be taken in the United Nations regarding French North Africa and other questions involving dependent areas. I could name other instances of disagreement. The list might seem formidable and discouraging, but I hasten to emphasize that a similar list could be drawn up for almost any other major country in the world. Even with our best friends, and sometimes especially with our best friends, we are bound to have arguments.

MILITARY AID TO PAKISTAN

Many of our disagreements with India are now past history and, I hope, in the process of being forgotten. There is, however, one current problem which deserves special attention. It is the most recent to arise and a main source of concern in our mutual relations at the present moment. That is the American decision to extend military aid to Pakistan.

We made that decision for reasons well known to Americans, but sometimes misunderstood abroad.

This country and many others believe that our way of life is critically endangered by a predatory power which recognizes that the greatest threat to its existence is the very presence of democracy. Soviet Communism seeks to destroy us all, and we have ample reason to believe that domination of the Indian subcontinent is a part of the Soviet objective. It bears repeating that the actions of the Soviet Union prove beyond a doubt that it will use every means at its disposal, including war, to enslave us. Unless adequate measures are taken by the free nations acting together, it will succeed.

As the Kremlin's intentions became clear, the United States, as you know, in co-operation with other free nations, took far-reaching steps to meet the threat. These security measures included the North Atlantic Treaty and comprehensive arrangements in the Pacific area.

It has become apparent, however, that a power vacuum exists in the Middle East and South Asia. The countries of this region, largely lacking the resources necessary for a strong military posture, are also torn by other strains and stresses which sap their strength. Thus, we have the conflict between the Arab states and Israel, the Egyptian dispute with the United Kingdom over the Suez region, the tension between India and Pakistan over Kashmir. In addition, in many countries of the Middle East the economic and political situations have resulted in acute internal instability.

At the same time, this wide area remains of immense importance to us. It contains nearly a quarter of the world's population. It has tremendous resources, including oil, many of which are as yet untapped. It is a vital, strategic land, sea, and air route between East and West.

If this part of the world is to live in freedom, if it is to retain the capacity to develop its economy to its own best interests, and if its political institutions are to mature within an independent framework, we believe that it must have the ability to defend itself against aggression. The threat of aggression is ever present.

You will recall that early attempts to create a sound military system in the area failed. Both the idea of a Middle East command and a Middle East defense organization came to nothing for one good reason: both were born of initiative supplied by outside powers. As Secretary Dulles said when he came back from his trip to the Middle East a year ago, no collective security system can be imposed from without. "It should be designed and grow from within out of a sense of common danger and common destiny."

Until very recently, time stood still as far as defense of the Middle East was concerned, but various hopeful signs have begun to show.

First, the government of Pakistan asked the United States for grant military aid. This was a request which had to be taken seriously. The government and people of Pakistan are strongly anti-Communist. They have indicated their desire to stand and be counted with us in efforts to forestall the Kremlin's imperialism. In World War II, the history of the fighting forces from what is now Pakistan was a glorious one, as was that of the troops from what is now India.

India's fear

We were well aware, however, that the Indian government would dislike United States military aid to Pakistan. Its objections were carefully weighed. On balance, after considering them, it seemed clear to us that the consequences of this action feared by India would not develop. Indeed, we believe that as time passes India herself will see that her apprehensions on the subject were not justified.

During the lengthy debate in India while this matter was being considered by us, it became apparent that one motivation for India's opposition stemmed from fear that United States arms aid to Pakistan would be used against India. Therefore, when the decision was made by President Eisenhower to give military aid to Pakistan, he made it absolutely clear in his public announcement and in his letter on the subject to Prime Minister Nehru that the arms we would give could in no way be used in aggression without his taking appropriate action immediately, in accordance with his constitutional authority. The government of Pakistan has indicated to us that it accepts fully the definitive provisions limiting the end use of the aid.

Furthermore, we believe that if the military strength of the subcontinent is increased, it will serve to deter aggression from the outside.

A mind turned from war

Now on this point we differ with the Indian government. It has expressed the opinion that by this act the cold war is brought directly into the subcontinent. Very recently, in addressing the Indian House of the People, Prime Minister Nehru said:

There are two approaches to this question of war and peace. One is the approach of the feeling that war is almost inevitable and therefore one must be prepared for war. The other is that war must be avoided at all costs, if not at all costs, at almost all costs. The two approaches differ as everybody will see. Of course, nobody wants war—or very few people. And yet many people may well say, "We do not want war but how are you going to prevent it? War must come and therefore we must do this and do that."

That is a legitimate approach. And yet if you lay stress on war coming you lose the battle for peace, and war is likely to come because your minds have succumbed to the prospect of war coming in.

That is the danger of the situation: not that people want war, but many people seem to succumb to the idea of the inevitability of war.

Again, in the past, Prime Minister Nehru has put forward the idea of a "no war" area, of which India and presumably the neighboring countries, and perhaps others, would be a part.

I believe the reasons behind this attitude are many, and it is not possible for me at least to say which carry the most weight. They seem to include the following: (1) A feeling that India can best tackle her pressing internal problems if she avoids becoming involved in the "cold war" and that her influence can most effectively be exerted if she is not committed to either side. (2) A conviction that she only stands to lose by putting herself at least potentially in a position which might offend either the U.S.S.R. or Communist China, particularly the latter, and, at the same time, a reluctance to disassociate herself from the West. (3) A deep-seated fear and hatred of colonialism and imperialism and an identification of these with the Western powers, plus an awareness of the implications of Communist totalitarianism. (4) A feeling that moral weight exerted against war will present it from coming.

There are no doubt other motivations, and it may appear that contradictions exist in those I have just listed, but it seems to me that these, in varying degrees of importance, may help to explain attitudes and expressions which appear puzzling to many of us.

U. S. belief in collective security

We in the United States believe the cold war is already on the subcontinent, as it is in every other place in the world. It is there not through anything we or the other free nations have done, but through the actions and intentions of the Soviet Union, Communist China, and the other satellites.

One cannot lightly dismiss the lessons of aggression in Poland or Czechoslovakia or Korea. It could happen in the Indian subcontinent. If it does how will India defend herself—alone, or in the strong company of others who believe her independence should be guarded?

Collective security is the keystone of our foreign policy. In that concept, we think, lies the only hope of preventing another Poland or Czechoslovakia or Korea.

While the United States had under consideration the question of military aid to Pakistan, Pakistan and Turkey had been holding talks which resulted on February 19, 1954, in an announcement that they intended "to study methods of achieving closer, friendly collaboration in the political, economic, and cultural spheres as well as of strengthening peace and security in their own interest as also in that of all peace-loving nations." An agreement on these lines was signed at Karachi on April 2. The United States warmly welcomed this development, and its decision to extend military aid to Pakistan was made within its context.

Now, these matters have not made relations between the United States and India easy. On the problems of security, it may not seem that the two countries are likely to reach agreement in the near future. We believe we are right, and I am sure that the Indian government believes it is right. Indian leaders are as entitled to their opinions as we are to ours, and it is not profitable for either of us to try to impose our viewpoint on the other. But I do not concur with those who say that friendship is being destroyed between us. India and the United States are two great democracies. We have more in common than we have in disagreement.

INDIA AFTER PARTITION

Following the partition of the subcontinent, India was faced with tremendous internal and external problems. There was the problem of unifying the nation into a single political entity from more than five hundred separate states. There was the problem of an already over-taxed economy being thrown further off balance by the partition itself. There was the problem of internal Communist activity. And finally, there was the problem of India's relations with her newly created neighbor, Pakistan.

While the new India moved quickly and effectively to meet some of its most pressing internal problems, the challenges were obviously too great to be overcome immediately. Further, there were and are forces trying to move against what the present government of India considers its peoples' best interests.

The Communists, for example, both those in the Kremlin and those in India taking their orders from the Kremlin, do not want a unified India. In India, as in other countries where they seek to gain power, they strive for disorder, disunity, and discontent.

We find, for instance, that the Communists consistently take the part of those who would weaken the power of the central government. They continually berate the concept of India's Five Year Plan. They belabor the slowness with which its benefits come. They, as happened in our own country during the depression, use the issue of unemployment to advance their aims.

However, Prime Minister Nehru's government has moved steadily forward to the solution of its problems. He himself has taken a strong anti-Communist position. It is clear that he recognizes the threat the Communists are to his country. At one time, he had about 7,000 of them in jail.

The general elections of 1951-52 which were held to form the government were a model of democratic procedure. About 106,000,000 people voted. Unlike the Soviet system, the Indian system gave them a wide range of parties and candidates to choose from.

Unification of the country, which many described as an impossible task, was accomplished swiftly and efficiently.

Faced with a fantastically low living standard, a desperate agricultural situation, the Indian government has taken bold steps to increase food production, to stimulate industry, and to increase India's foreign trade.

While progress has been made, there is a great distance left to travel. If the present economic program is successful, all well and good. If, however, the disruptive forces within the country gain strength and totalitarian efforts meet with increasing local successes, the countries of the free world will have cause for alarm.

U. S. SUPPORT OF INDIA

This possibility brings me to the heart of our feelings toward India. Regardless of our differences on foreign policy and security matters, what the United States is most interested in is a free, independent India following the route of her own choosing. It would be a major disaster if the freedom of India's government and people were taken away—a disaster from which the rest of the free world might never recover.

On our part, there are no hidden reservations or limitations in our relationship with India. We stand ready, as in the past, to help India where we can and in ways that she may desire. We shall do everything in our power to ensure that our relations produce nothing but friendship and mutual benefit.

We are confident that this is India's desire as well.

You will remember that the United States has long given aid and encouragement to India. In 1941, well before Indian independence, the two countries exchanged representatives. In 1942, Colonel Louis Johnson, President Roosevelt's personal representative with the rank of ambassador, participated in the unsuccessful efforts to work out agreement between the British and Indians on India's political future. Subsequently, the United States made known to the British government its views concerning its support of steps which might be taken toward fulfillment of Indian nationalist aspirations. At the same time, we made great efforts through the exchange of information, exchange of persons, and other formulas to ensure that America and our way of life be known to the people of India.

We welcomed wholeheartedly the measures taken toward real independence and the establishment in 1946 of an interim government and a Constituent Assembly to draft a constitution. In October 1946 the two nations exchanged ambassadors.

Following partition in August 1947, and as India began to exercise the rights and responsibilities of independence, the United States increasingly welcomed her active role in world affairs. We have been, for instance, happy to see the active part she has played in the work of the United Nations and its specialized agencies—although we have not at all times agreed with her position.

Economic relations

We have, further, taken a strong interest in the tremendous economic problems which face India. The average life expectancy is thirty-two years. About 75,000,000 each year suffer the debilitating and often fatal effects of malaria. India has a population density of 308 per square mile, compared to 54 in the United States, and her population is increasing at the rate of 5,000,000 a year. Her crop yields are desperately low. Famine is an ever present danger.

To help avert a desperate grain shortage in 1951, the United States Congress loaned India $190,000,000 to purchase 2,000,000 tons of wheat. Since 1951, our programs of technical assistance and special economic aid have been directed to supplementing the extraordinary steps being taken by the Indian government through its Five Year Plan to raise the living standards of its people. In 1952, our programs amounted to almost $53,000,000, in 1953 to $44,300,000, and in the present fiscal year to $89,000,000. Altogether, in grants and loans, the United States government has made about $390,000,000 available to India. We expect to continue this assistance. Under it, the United States is providing technical advice to India's Community Development Program, which is reaching 14,000,000 people in 22,000 villages. Indian leaders and technicians numbering in the hundreds have been brought to the United States for specialized training. Supplies and equipment are being provided farmers who cannot afford to purchase them. In addition, our funds are being used for direct assistance in economic development, industrial as well as agricultural.

Private American foundations are also playing an important part in these efforts. The Ford and Rockefeller Foundations are actively involved in helping improve living standards.

Thus, many, many Americans today are working daily side by side with Indians in the fundamental tasks of improving the lives of India's millions.

American private investment in India is substantial and contributes to a sounder Indian economy. Within the past year, for instance, we have seen a multimillion dollar oil refinery started in Bombay by an American company. India, in turn, has much to offer us economically. From India, we purchase large amounts of important industrial materials, including mica and manganese.

CULTURAL EXCHANGES

Outside the economic field, we find the ties of friendship being strengthened in other ways. A host of India's students and teachers and many of ours are continually being exchanged. These boys and girls and men and women, through the experience of daily living with their hosts, contribute greatly to good will.

India has a great cultural and spiritual heritage on which we can draw. As our two countries know each other better we can benefit more and more in nonmaterial as well as material ways. It has become a cliché to say that the West can learn as much from the East as the East from the West, but it is worth repeating nevertheless.

AREAS OF AGREEMENT

But what gives us the most hope for the future of our relations with India is the fact that there is no basic difference inherent in our respective philosophies of government. India has given the spirit of democracy a new strength. She has given, in the life of Gandhi, a new rallying point to all those who believe in the dignity of each individual. Both nations believe in freedom, in the individual, in his rights as an individual, in the commitment of democratic government to protect those rights. Our concept of democracy is the same. The necessity for protecting that democracy is mutually recognized. The way is open to friendly co-operation in efforts to build a better, more peaceful world.

Looking at the broad picture of our relations, there is much more to cheer than to induce despair. So long as we do not succumb to the doubtful luxury of carping and exasperation, the future is a bright one. The chief task is to build upon those areas in which India and the United States are in agreement and to strengthen them. We do not expect to agree on every issue. There are bound to be differences of opinion between two democratic states, but the basic principles on which we agree remain.

Let me repeat what I have already said: What the government of the United States wants above all is a free, independent, and democratic India. If it is an India which also agrees with the American outlook on international affairs, so much the better. We shall certainly work hard to reconcile our respective points of view, but it is the freedom, the independence, and the democracy of India that we consider essential and that we shall strive to support to the best of our ability.

John D. Jernegan, Washington, D. C., is Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian and African Affairs. He has been a career Foreign Service officer since 1936, when he was appointed vice consul at Mexico City, serving also in Barcelona and Tehran, and as consul general in Tunis. During a tour of duty in the Department of State (1946-50), he was assistant chief of the Division of Near Eastern Affairs, chief of the division, and director of the Office of Greek, Turkish, and Iranian Affairs. He attended the Moscow Conferences of Foreign Ministers of 1943 and 1945.

The Quest for Security in the Middle East*

By HALFORD L. HOSKINS

AMONG the more notable developments in international affairs during recent years are two which, taken together, give considerable character to the contemporary international scene. One is the evolution of what may be called a "new" Middle East. The other is the rapid growth of interest in the countries comprising this area on the part of the United States. It will appear, as we look into these developments, that American concern for this area is quite as new as any of the features which are characteristic of the new Middle East.

If we apply the expression "Middle East" to the lands adjacent to the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea and extending thence to the borders of the subcontinent of India, we are referring, from the point of view of human culture, to the oldest countries in the world. Yet in several ways they are now to be counted among the youngest. Their newness is not to be measured by the elapsed time since they achieved independent status, even though this interval has been brief in every instance. It is rather to be gauged by the degree of maturity exhibited by their political and social institutions; by the type of judgment displayed by their political leaders in formulating and in executing public policy; by the extent to which genuine national patriotism has succeeded in uniting the various elements of the populations and in creating modern, viable nations. In terms such as these, the Middle East is young indeed, and for the most part still conspicuously immature.

THE "NEW" MIDDLE EAST

Evidences of newness abound on almost every hand. They appear in Egypt, where a monarchy nearly a century and a half old, without external support, could not survive a bloodless military Putsch, the authors of which yet govern sans constitution, popular mandate, or even mutual confidence. Similar evidences are to be observed in Syria, where for some years one military clique has succeeded another at frequent intervals without material advantage to the country. The royal regimes in Iran, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia have still to find practicable ways in which to apply great petroleum resources to the social and economic improvement of their peoples. Even in Kuwait, where a paternalistic sheik aims at the uplift of his indigent subjects, only a species of parasitism has been achieved. It is not yet clear what degree of sagacity the Knesset of Israel can bring to bear with sufficient promptitude on a series of problems whose solution is vital to that country's survival. Indeed, in the entire Middle East area only Turkey has reached the stage of political maturity requisite for stability in dealing with a difficult economic situation at home and with pressures from abroad due to its exposed position adjacent to the Iron Curtain.

Thus, except for a hard outer shell in Turkey, the countries of the Middle East must be described as essentially soft in a world—and especially in a strategic area—where softness is a constant temptation to great powers which regard aggression as a fitting instrument of state policy. "Softness" in the Middle East is the result of several contributing causes. Some of them are products of the physical environment. Not too much in terms of economic strength, political development, and material progress can be expected of a country much of whose area is inescapably arid, as in the case of Syria, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, Saudi Arabia, or Iran, or mountainous, as in Lebanon or Yemen. Sudden wealth in the form of oil cannot quickly atone for the lack of other natural resources, such as arable soil, adequate rainfall, or deposits of the hard minerals of industry. Not a little of the underdeveloped character of parts of the Middle East is the result of centuries of Ottoman rule—a regime in which individual enterprise was regarded as subversive. To these factors might be added the influences of climate, age-old poverty, fatalistic philosophy, and even the external environment. For considering the position of the Middle East with reference to great power relationships, it is clear that the peoples of the area cannot hope to be left to develop their institutional life unhampered—or perhaps unhelped—by one or more of the powers whose interests are global in scope.

BARRICADE OR BARRIER

It is the position occupied by the countries of the Middle East quite as much as any intrinsic need for technical assistance or economic aid that accounts for the present interest of the United States in these underdeveloped nations. In a world where two power alignments of states are essentially at war, the Middle East forms either a barricade or a barrier to both power groups. In so far as the area serves to prevent access by the Soviet Union to the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf—that is, to the sea lanes reaching to South Asia, southern Europe, and the greater part of the African continent—it figures as a barricade in defense plans of the free world. To the extent that it inhibits—or in time of war may inhibit—uninterrupted access of the Western powers to the southern shores of Asia, the eastern shores of Africa, and the British Commonwealth countries in Australasia, the Middle East is a potential barrier. It may well be observed, too, that the maintenance of dependable lines of free world communications through this area is not less essential in an air age than in one confined to surface travel. Even if Middle East refueling bases were not required, permission to cross national boundaries still is requisite. Few features of a strategic concept for the free world are more fundamental than maintaining a balance of influence throughout the Middle East.

OIL

The securing of lines of commercial intercourse with parts of the Middle East is not less consequential than the maintenance of other lines of communications, because of the part which petroleum plays in contemporary international relations. It is conceivable that in time to come atomic forces may in part supersede those now derived from petroleum. Meanwhile the industrial scene is dominated by petroleum derivatives. We represent an oil culture. Oil in the contemporary world is power. In a state of world affairs where war on a restricted scale now is in progress and one of unlimited scope might occur at any moment, oil as the first among the sinews of war possesses a significance beyond measurement in ordinary terms. Any optimistic outlook for the free world, in fact, rests on the availability to the United States, as the leader of the free world, of adequate supplies of petroleum at all times and under any circumstances.

* In considerable measure this article is based on parts of a book, now in press, entitled, The Middle East: Problem Area in World Politics, to be published by The Macmillan Company.

It is the greatest of good fortune, therefore, that more than one-third of the world's oil resources, according to current estimates, lie within the Western Hemisphere and presumably—although not altogether certainly—will be constantly available to this country in time of peace or war. The satisfaction to which this circumstance might give rise, however, is gravely compromised by other considerations. One lies in the fact that even now, in time of relative peace and with no unusual handicaps on oil production, the United States consumes approximately two-thirds of all the oil used anywhere in the world. Undoubtedly in time of all-out war it would require more.

Another major consideration consists in the oil needs of Western Europe. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization, of which the United States was one of the principal architects, was created on the assumption that the defense of Western Europe is vital to the survival of the free world in the struggle with Communist totalitarianism. In this struggle European industry is counted on heavily to supplement that of the United States and Canada. But Europe does not rank high among the oil-producing areas and must be supplied mainly from extra-European sources. Inasmuch as the necessary quantities of oil cannot be drawn from Western Hemisphere sources without overtaxing those producing fields, the responsibility for European supply since 1948 has fallen principally on the sparsely populated oil-producing countries of the Middle East, whose minimal local oil needs and slight industrial development have represented complementary rather than competing demands.

In the uninterrupted continuation of the westward flow of Middle East oil the United States thus has an extremely important interest. This can be summed up in syllogistic form. The United States bears the principal responsibility for the security of the free world. The Atlantic Pact nations of Western Europe constitute the first line of defense of the free world. They can serve as a bulwark of defense only so long as they are well supplied with the sinews of industrial and military strength, one of the most essential of these being oil products. Oil in sufficient quantity for these needs, under conditions presently existing in the world oil industry, can be had only from the Middle East. Thus, in the interest of free institutions and possibly even its own survival, the United States faces the problem of establishing and maintaining in the Middle East conditions under which the defense of the area can be assured within reason and the flow of petroleum and petroleum products made secure under any easily imaginable circumstances.

U. S. AND THE MIDDLE EAST

It cannot be said that the United States has displayed a great deal either of ambition or of aptitude for the task of making sure of the westward orientation of the nations of the Middle East. Until World War II brought this country into some contact with Iran, Egypt, and North Africa, Americans generally knew and cared little about the area. The inevitable consequence was, on the one hand, an almost complete absence of interest and, on the other, a severe dearth of personnel fitted by training and experience to deal in a statesman-like manner with Middle East questions as they might arise in the course of foreign relations. Inasmuch as the Middle East had occupied an important place in British foreign policy for at least a century and a half, there was much reluctance on the part of American officialdom, even after the close of World War II, to assume any direct responsibilities in this British sphere of interest.

Only as the decline of British imperial power and the importance to free world security of the Middle East came to be realized did the United States arrive at a more or less reluctant willingness to assume a measure of responsibility in the area. This was first manifested in relieving Britain of the burden of extending aid to hard-pressed Greece and Turkey. While this action proved to be of inestimable utility at a moment of crisis, it was clearly only a stopgap measure at a single crucial point in a contest that already had grown to global proportions. Free world security could on no reasonable grounds be regarded as having been attained by the setting up of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization for the defense of Europe or by assistance to Greece and Turkey. Security being indivisible, it would manifestly be of similar consequence to bring the Arab states, Iran, and Israel into a mutual defense system or at least to make sure of a preferential leaning toward the West in countries so strategically located.

For a task of this nature, as has been observed, the United States was poorly prepared. The measure of its unpreparedness is to be seen in the belief, prevalent but a few years ago and not by any means wholly dissipated today, that a spirit of mutual trust and interdependence could be induced, in countries so lacking as those of the Middle East in the elements of Western material culture, by means of the generous application of the Point Four concept. In keeping with this idea, programs of technical and financial assistance were developed and in due course were put into effect on a contractual basis in most of the Middle East countries. It is not requisite here to undertake an appraisal of the Point Four scheme as a means of improving conditions of life in so-called underdeveloped countries. In some parts of the Middle East the program undoubtedly has conferred benefits of one kind or another. It is essential to note, however, that in view of many of the circumstances prevailing in the area at the period when Point Four was launched, it could not justifiably have been expected to produce the attitudes anticipated in what we may call the political sphere within the critical period of a few years. A brief review of the main factors which have exercised a circumscribing influence on efforts to bring all of the Middle East within the range of a free world security system will help to explain the lack of important progress thus far.

BRITISH INTERESTS

In taking over certain of the responsibilities formerly regarded as lying within the British range of interest, the United States found itself heir to situations resulting from the long-time activities of Great Britain in the area. For many years Britain was the champion of the Ottoman Turkish regime. Parts of the Ottoman Empire—the sections now comprising Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, and Israel—for a varying number of years following World War I had been under direct British occupational or mandate control. British relations with Iran and with the princely houses of Arabia amounted to vested interests, some of which have not yet been surrendered. During the latter part of World War II Syria and Lebanon were beholden to Great Britain, having been freed from the Vichy French by British military action. Great Britain has been the internationally recognized protector of the Suez Canal, the principal member of the condominium for the Sudan, the liberator and sponsor of Libya. It still enjoys special privileges, including military base rights, by virtue of treaties with Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, and Libya.

At the same time, Great Britain was one of the founders of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and on this and other grounds was an indispensable partner in any scheme of defense of the free world. For these reasons, as well as for the sake of some measure of diplomatic collaboration from experienced hands, the United States, in establishing its own relations with Middle East governments, has been under the practical necessity of respecting the position still maintained by Britain in any part of the Middle East area. The inevitable consequence has been the transfer to the United States of a large portion of the suspicion and dislike that was attached to Great Britain as a "colonial" power by peoples still very conscious of their recent emancipation from British leading strings and hypersensitive, as are all young states, to any traces of influence of an imperialistic or restrictive nature. Thus the United States has been unable entirely to avoid involvement in some aspects of the British-Egyptian controversy over methods of closing out the Sudanese condominium and of making arrangements for Sudanese statehood. Similarly, this country has found it necessary to occupy the position of an interested party in the dispute resulting from Great Britain's refusal to evacuate the Suez Canal Zone, which it has occupied under rights acquired by treaty in 1936, on demand by Egypt. The acquisition by the United States of a major air base near Tripoli during the period of British military control of Libya also has been viewed askance in some of the Arab states.

Whereas the problems arising from association with Great Britain were inherent in any direct approach by the United States to the states of the Middle East and could not have been avoided altogether, others, perhaps quite avoidable, have sprung from United States behavior with reference to certain other situations and developments within the area. The part played by the United States government at the inception of the Zionist state of Israel, in the heart of the Arab world, is an instance particularly in point.

ISRAEL

In Palestine, Jews, Arabs, and miscellaneous Christian elements had lived together in comparative amity for many centuries under the various regimes that successively were ascendant in the lands east of the Mediterranean. The rise of serious internal discord in this Holy Land, ironically enough, followed the first stages in political emancipation from the rule of the Ottoman Turks. Under British administration, after World War I, it was the fate of both Jews and Arabs in Palestine to find themselves segments of two much greater groups already politically conscious of their religious and ethnic inheritances and imbued with nationalistic urges. Zionism, on the one hand, and pan-Arabism, on the other, inspired disorders within Palestine which came to assume international dimensions. The events of World War II, which created the need for the resettlement of hundreds of thousands of European Jewish refugees and further contributed to the rise of independent Arab states in the Middle East, rendered it essential, no doubt, that Palestine should be partitioned in some fashion into Jewish and Arab segments. It was one of the great misfortunes of the contemporary world, however, that this could not have been accomplished by the British mandatory regime or by the United Nations in a peaceful and orderly manner. The instant recognition de facto by the President of the United States of the state of Israel proclaimed by Zionist leaders upon the voluntary termination of the British mandate on May 15, 1948, the defensive strength subsequently mani-festated by Israeli forces in the Arab war already in progress, and the annexation by Transjordan of the remainder of Arab Palestine brought an end to the issue of partition. At the same time these developments gave a large measure of fixity to one of the most bitter of all international feuds—kept alive by the plight of more than 800,000 homeless, stateless Arab refugees driven from their former homes in Palestine, and marked by frequent instances of border violence and by a close Arab boycott of everything pertaining to Israel.

In this extremely unfortunate situation the United States on its own account is deeply involved and committed. In an over-all sense, it is involved as the power most responsible for the security of the free world. But in the Arab-Israel controversy, which has a direct bearing on that security, it is committed as a partisan not only by sponsorship of Israel at the time of its inception but also by extensive financial support thereafter, without which the Zionist state could not possibly have continued to survive. Consequently, with respect to the building up in the Middle East of a security system related to that which now applies to the North Atlantic and Mediterranean areas, the United States is compelled to proceed under a major handicap.

OTHER DIFFICULTIES

The Israel-Arab imbroglio is by no means the only serious obstacle to the building up of a security system in the Middle East beyond the confines of Turkey. Numerous other influences have contributed to the growth of an unpromising situation in the area. These include attitudes toward the West engendered by the grafting of modern nationalist sentiment on the ancient trunk of Islam. They spring from memories of earlier forms of European exploitation. In some measure they result from envy of the advantages derived by Western countries from the utilization of Middle East oil resources. They stem, in part, from the countenance given by the United States and other members of the NATO group to France, for the sake of strategic air bases in North Africa, in its harsh efforts to restrain the nationalist aspirations of the Arabic populations in Tunis and Morocco. All of these and other difficulties less fundamental in character add up to the fact that most of the Middle East outside of Turkey cannot presently be counted upon to co-operate actively with the security system projected by the leading Atlantic Pact nations. Whether or in what way these handicaps can be overcome at all is a moot question.

INEPT DIPLOMACY

The elements touched upon as components in this unpromising situation are serious enough, but all too frequently they have been aggravated by inept diplomacy, the usual accompaniment of confused policy or no firm policy at all. It is not quite true, as critics occasionally have suggested, that the United States, influenced by but often disinclined to be guided by British policy, has had none of its own applicable to the Middle East. From the beginning of American interest in Middle East oil in the 1920's, if not earlier, there was something of an embryonic policy relating to the area. This waxed and waned in succeeding years according to the vagaries of political administrations at home and the incidence of crises abroad. After World War II there came a relatively rapid expansion of interest. From aiming broadly at the support of economic interests in the area, United States policy came to embrace political objectives, such as keeping a watchful eye on the activities of Communist agents, encouraging the strengthening of local governmental regimes, giving countenance to Zionist aims in Palestine, and, latterly, inaugurating aid programs not altogether innocent of political motives. Unfortunately, these aims have not always been consistent with one another and hence have not been parts of a whole. Indeed, down to the present, there has been no clear evidence that each of the American aims in the Middle East has entered as an integral part into basic United States foreign policy.

ANGLO-AMERICAN POLICY

In recent years, Great Britain has been in no position to make up for whatever deficiencies there may have been in American foreign policy. With the loss of control over the Indian sub-continent and the relinquishing of one position of vantage after another in the Middle East, coupled with serious economic problems at home and culminating in the surrender of a large measure of initiative to the United States, British policy in the Middle East has been halting and unsure. While British and American interests in the area now are fundamentally much alike, there has been considerable divergence in the methods chosen by the two powers for serving these interests. Absence on a number of occasions of a solid, united front has tended to undermine the really constructive programs jointly or severally undertaken in the area and to lower the confidence of Middle East political leaders in the wisdom and foresight of Western statesmanship. The lack of well-integrated allied policy—policy that does not appear to have arrived at a definite decision as to the course to be pursued should the presently uncommitted Middle East states refuse, at any stage in a defense emergency, to cooperate with the Atlantic Pact nations—goes far toward accounting for security problems in the Middle East area.

There is some evidence as time passes of an increasing measure of Anglo-American agreement on Middle East questions. As far as it goes, this is an excellent augury, for the Arab-Iranian states are not as yet definitely lost to the West. Temporizing cannot be continued indefinitely, however, without great risk of the dissipation of Western influence beyond recovery. Since neither Great Britain nor the United States is in a position to "go it alone," joint policy decisions of a consistent and enduring nature are called for and are not the less needed because they must take into account the diverse interests of other governments outside of the Middle East. But if time for decision still remains, what kind of decision is called for? What course is there but to continue to temporize—to hope that the "soft" nations of the Middle East will recognize their exposed position in time and that, in the interest of self-preservation, they will wish to have the United States or perchance Great Britain serve as their champion?

THE PRESENT TASK

It can only be answered that hope is a poor policy, or no policy at all, when time may be running out and when even the providing of economic and technical aid and conditional promises for the supplying of arms and armaments have failed to make partnership attractive. Possibly some formula has been overlooked that could win over the Arab nations, in particular, to the point of willing co-operation with the West. Thus far, search for that formula, because of the haphazard nature of the search, has been largely in vain. Obviously any attempt to make headway through the avenue of power prestige only undermines belief in the sincerity of any forms of aid supplied, whereas zealous efforts to build up friendly relations through forms of economic and social service or willingness to withdraw from positions of military strength only give the character of bluff to spasmodic demonstrations of power. Attempts to combine the two naturally savor of hypocrisy. So it is clear that those in whose hands lies the responsibility for the shaping of foreign policy face an unenviable task in the translation of long-range security calculations into policy for the Middle East. Any departure from more or less makeshift procedures requires decision in principle; decision in keeping with foreign policy as a whole; decision acceptable not only to the electorate at home but also to allies abroad.

Problems encountered in the contemporary Middle East thus constitute a challenge proportionate to the relationship of that area with its resources to the requirements for world security. That this fact is coming to be appreciated in the United States at last is suggested by a statement in the half-yearly report of President Eisenhower to the Congress on the Mutual Security Program under date of June 30, 1953. It said:

From the standpoint of defensive strength in the area of the Near East as a whole, the Mutual Security Program has achieved substantial, if partial, success. The substantial success lies in the greatly strengthened posture of Greece and Turkey. . . . The success is only partial because, although the area is still free of actual Soviet occupation, it cannot by any means be considered safe for the free world.

While the President's report was instinct with faith that the continuation of a program of good works and avoidance of any unwanted interference in Middle East situations, "so filled with high emotion and incendiary nationalism," would be likely to establish stronger ties with the free world, the absence of any specific allusion to that possibility might suggest a growing measure of uncertainty as to the outcome.

POWER POTENTIALS

While they are wary of the ways in which it may be applied, the peoples of the Middle East are extremely sensitive to the power factor in the outer world. They are not unique in this respect: power and its potential application invariably provide a basis of regard among nations when vital interests are at stake, but nowhere does this apply more illustratively than in the Middle East. The retreat of Great Britain from one position and another under nationalist pressures, the decline of enthusiasm for a common front among some of the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the degree of apprehension displayed by the United States at the growing military strength of the Soviet Union, all have contributed to a strong belief that the West has no monopoly in power. Since Middle East attitudes reflect not only current estimates of power potentials but quite as much the readiness to employ these potentials, the emphasis placed by the NATO powers in the past on purely defensive arrangements has tended to dim the Arab view of schemes proposed for a Middle East defense organization. Conceivably the "New Look" in United States military policy will modify this attitude in the Middle East.

Thus far, in undertaking to establish situations of strength in the Middle East, neither the United States nor Great Britain nor the two of them together with France, Greece, and Turkey and the African and Eastern Commonwealth nations have been prepared to move sufficiently from strength. Whatever may be the power potential of the United States and its NATO allies and associates in and beyond the Mediterranean, it cannot take the place of integrated, constructive, and consistent policy with respect to the Middle East. Even under the best of circumstances the allies will be hard put to maintain a substantial margin of favor and influence in the militarily "soft" yet strategically vital states of the area. The Middle East is so situated relative to the principal habitable parts of the world and bears such an important relationship to the balance of power among nations through its resources in petroleum that inevitably there will continue to be keen competition among rival power blocs for priority of influence in its constituent countries. In view of the fundamental needs and deficiencies of these countries, such competition almost certainly will continue to breed confusion and hesitation among the peoples of the area. Considering their long experience with the methods employed by great powers bent on consolidating their positions and advancing their national interests, there is little occasion for wonder that most of the states in this group, skeptical as to offers of friendship and protection and uncertain as to where the greater danger lies, prefer at the present juncture to seek refuge in neutralism. In seeking to provide for its own security as well as that of the rest of the free world, the United States thus is confronted with a challenge of a major order.

Halford L. Hoskins, Ph.D., Washington, D. C., has been senior specialist in international relations in the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress since 1949. He has taught history at Trinity College (now Duke University) and Tufts College, was dean of the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy (1933-44) and director of the School of Advanced International Studies (1944-49), which he helped to organize, and during the war was consultant in the Department of State on matters relating to the Middle East. Recent works among his extensive writings are The Atlantic Pact (1949) and Middle East Oil in U. S. Foreign Policy (1950).

The Arab Commonwealth

By ABDUL MONEM RIFA'I

I SHOULD like, first of all, to set down here my deep gratitude and sincere appreciation for the letters that reach my office from American groups and individuals expressing their real interest in Arab views. Some write to me saying: "We are constantly hearing anti-Arab views, publicity, and propaganda, in the press, on radio and television, in the movies and at clubs and theaters, but the Arab voice is silent. You people seem to feel that as your cause is just and right, it needs no expression." As to this particular point, might I say parenthetically, "Yes, we still believe that right is its own defense." Actually there is no better mode of expression than to let the facts speak for themselves, especially when the press and the available publicity channels are reluctant to publish what these good Americans seek. Facts are the indisputable, concrete evidence of what is happening and what has happened in recent years in the Arab world, and these factual events form the very basis on which I am building my article. This article is not written by a professor or even by a student, but by a man who has witnessed facts and tries to describe them as they are.

However, an unrestricted discussion of the Arab countries or the Middle East, covering the various aspects of current life there, would greatly exceed the space allotted me in this volume. It may be advisable, rather, to present the major events in that part of the world and note their general indications and main features, and then to comment on the situation as a whole, a situation which is drawing the attention of the entire world. I shall naturally omit the long history of the Middle East with all its national developments and political movements, with all its rises and falls, with its huge background and its treasures. My intention is to concentrate on a new Middle East and on the main factors in its recent formation. Unfortunately for my speech and unfortunately for the present outlook in the Middle East, the situation is dark and gloomy. I should, in fact, prefer to write about the charm of the Middle East, the tranquillity of its life, the beauty of its nature, the purity of its sentiments, the nobility of its traditions, and the idealism of its morals and ethics. I would rather write of these things, of their importance and their effect upon civilization and humanity; or of Middle Eastern arts and their influence; or even of the economic possibilities and the opportunities for social reforms; but I am faced with pressing, bitter events that shift the direction of my thoughts. Therefore, let us come out of the bright American atmosphere, at least for thirty minutes, and live in the present atmosphere of the Middle East.

Developments in the new Middle East are characterized by several striking features.

AWAKENING NATIONALISM

First is the dominant will to attain freedom. The people of the Middle East are descendants of nations and races whose great empires and wide civilizations flourished throughout the world. They have great reservoirs of national pride and self-respect. Freedom to them is a fundamental principle of their life.

I still recall May of the year 1945, when I was in Damascus, one of the oldest cities in the world, a city that has witnessed a long chain of conquests and glories. I still recall the seething masses of people, young and old, men and women, rushing from place to place; in revolt now against foreign colonial authorities and now against their own government, struggling desperately to attain their full freedom. The halls of the capital of the glorious Omayyad Caliphate echoed with the vehement voices of the crowds shouting for independence and liberty.

I was frequently reminded of that scene of Damascus in one of its awakenings during the last three years which I spent in Iran. There again I realized how deeply nationalism was entrenched in the people and how sincere and serious they are about it. There again I saw tens of thousands of people streaming through the streets and squares of Tehran calling for the realization of their national aspirations. That genuine desire for national sovereignty is dominant all over the Middle East, vivid and impressive wherever you go.

In Egypt, we all know how determined the Egyptians are to end the military occupation of the Suez Canal Zone and how the twenty-two million Egyptians are united in this national aim.

In Tunisia and Morocco, we are aware of the struggle for national freedom against the restraint of imperialism. I still remember on my visit to Tunis in 1947 how a man took me by the arm and said, "Brother, since you are visiting our country, do not forget to visit the tomb of our young national poet." I went to the tomb and to the humble little house in which the twenty-four-year-old Tunisian poet had lived, and I started reading, with great admiration, his excellent Arabic poems—poems that are memorized by the new Tunisian generation. It might be interesting to American scholars of political science to read one of these poems, translated from Arabic:

Oh my people!

I wish I were a forester to fell the trees
And leave the roots to perish in the sun.
I wish I were a flood to bare the graves
And clear them of their tenants one by one.
I wish I were a storm that I could roll—
And rage aloud the tempest in my soul.

Oh my people!

I will take me to the forest's solitude
And pass my days in desolate despair.
I'll rid your very image from my mind
And in forgetfulness I'll live and perish there.

I shall forget—and lose as much of you as I am able;
You don't deserve to taste my wine or even share my table.

Oh my people!

You are weak—asleep—you dwell in darkness,
Somnambulant you move not toward the light.

Therefore I leave to sing my songs
To birds that understand my plight.
For singing birds know better the words of Freedom's story,
And winging free they realize—awakening is glory.

THE ARAB NATION

The second significant feature in the Middle East is the tendency towards unity—unity among the Arab countries in particular and closer co-operation among the Middle Eastern countries in general.

The Arabs are in effect one nation, and unity among them is natural. For that unity, as well as for liberty, they rose up in 1916, and since then events have made them realize more and more the significance of their unity. Most of their states are, at present, members of the Arab League, an organization bound by a pact designed to develop further unities among its members. They are also associated in a collective security pact.

might contribute substantially to international peace and stability.

PALESTINE

It is impossible to speak of the Arab countries in particular or the Middle East in general without mentioning the tragic problem of Palestine. The influence of this problem on the attitude of the Arab countries has a major effect on the stability of the Middle East. For us, it is a drastic fact that the Arabs of Palestine were driven out of the homeland in which they had lived continuously for fifteen hundred years. Recollections of violence and brutality rankle. The presence in neighboring Arab countries of hundreds of thousands of Palestinian refugees leading a wretched existence at an almost subhuman level is a constant irritant and focus of resentment. Furthermore, the Arab world believes with strong evidence that Israel is planning further expansion and is making military preparation to this end. The Palestine problem, therefore, should be solved on the basis of equity and justice for the purpose of attaining security and peace in the Middle East.

U. S. POLICY

These are the real factors in the development of the Middle East, and it is not possible to make an accurate appraisal of the situation in the Middle East without fully understanding them. They are, to be sure, generally well known by all students of international relations, but the role they play has often been distorted or misinterpreted. An interested group in America with substantial control over much of its information media has been successful in molding the views on the Middle East of a considerable portion of the American public, and has affected the formulation of government policy. What has been frustrating to most of the people of the Middle East is the striking ab-

The Syrian Constitution states in its first article that Syria is an Arab state and that its people are a part of the Arab nation. The Jordanian Constitution states also in its first article that the people of Jordan are a part of the Arab nation. Every now and then we hear appeals from Arab governments and leaders for an Arab federation.

As there are social, political, and national motives toward unity within the Arab countries, similar factors motivate the Middle Eastern countries to strengthen co-operation and friendship among themselves. The countries in the Middle East, existing in one geographical zone which extends from the heart of Asia along the shores of Africa to the Atlantic Ocean, react uniformly to whatever fortunes and misfortunes may befall any one of them. I recall the huge and impressive demonstrations of the Pakistanis in Karachi in 1951, lasting several days, as they reacted sympathetically to the struggle that was taking place in Morocco. The countries of the Middle East form, as I see it, one social unit, developed, so to speak, into a "Middle Easternism" or even a "Middle Eastern nationalism," if the scholars of political science accept such a term! The solidarity of that area appears in endeavors to establish various forms of co-operation: a Moslem League, an Islamic High Governmental Meeting, an Islamic National Conference, an Inter-Islamic Economic Conference, a Middle Eastern Pact, or an Arab-Asiatic bloc.

This vast region, with its natural resources, strategic position, geographical association, and with all the other political, social, cultural, religious, and historical factors that unite its people, is bound to form sooner or later the third great political entity in the world, which will contribute more and more to the welfare of mankind and the progress of humanity. In fact, such a development sence, in America's Middle East policy, of its traditionally high principles with regard to the Arab national case, those principles which made America famous all over the globe and which are the basis of its international relations. It is essential that in order to succeed in building strong ties of friendship with the people of the Middle East the same lofty principles should be applied with regard to their problems. Unfortunately, however, the solution of the major problem, that of Palestine, is being directly hampered by United States aid to Israel, which increases the tension and complicates the just solution of this problem. However, no attitude shall be decisive in determining the dynamic growth and future development of the Middle East except that of the Middle East itself. The Arab countries with their fifty million Arabs, their extensive area, their substantial natural resources, will continue to progress and prosper, in spite of attempted disparagement.

In view of all these facts, it is in the interest of the United States of America to reconsider in part its Middle East policy, for the mutual advantage of the American people and the people of the countries of the Middle East.

His Excellency Abdul Monem Rifa'i, Washington, D. C., is Ambassador of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan to the United States. Prior to his present appointment he was for three years Minister in Iran and Pakistan. He earlier served as Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Chief Secretary of the Jordan government, and Acting Chief Secretary to the late King Abdullah.

The United States in the Changing Middle East

By N. SAIFPOUR FATEMI

ROUGHLY, the region of the Middle and Near East stretches from the western border of Egypt to the western border of India and from the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea on the north to the Arabian Sea and the Indian Ocean in the south. This large and important area is today very vital to the defense of the free world. Its importance must be considered from three aspects.

STRATEGIC SIGNIFICANCE

The Middle East is a corridor between serfdom and freedom. It is also a bridge between three continents and has been through the ages a springboard for conquerors moving from west to east or coming from the east to conquest in the west. Its strategic position was as important in the time of Alexander the Great as during World War II. Throughout history, control of the Middle East has been the aim of practically every great empire. The area is a barometer of dynamic world forces. It was Peter the Great who believed that anyone who ruled the Persian Gulf and the Black Sea would rule India and Europe.

Since the beginning of the nineteenth century this region has been between the devil and the deep blue sea. British, French, and Russians plagued it all through the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth. Since the end of the war, the United States, in order to stop Russian aggression, has become the champion of the independence of the Middle Eastern countries. She has established air bases in North Africa, in Turkey, in Saudi Arabia and Bahrein. She has sent military missions, arms, and munition to several of the governments of that region.

In August 1951, President Eisenhower told the Senate's Armed Services Committee:

Turkey is only part of the great Middle Eastern problem—we should try to bring in the Arab world on our side. As far as the sheer value of territory is concerned, there is no more strategically important area in the world than the Middle East. This area is tremendously important in terms of what it could contribute for our whole effort. We should use our resources, our power, our organizational ability and above all, our leadership—to get some kind of organization that would rally all of them to go in with us.¹

ECONOMIC IMPORTANCE

Since 1908, when for the first time oil was discovered in Masjid-i-Sulaiman, in Iran, the British, Germans, French, Americans, and Russians have tried their best to obtain oil concessions in different parts of the Middle East. It is believed that its potential oil reserve is 80 billion barrels, 63 per cent of the world's known petroleum resources. The oil industry of one country, Iran, is as large as the entire estimated reserves, production, and refinery capacity of Russia and her satellites.²

The oil fields in that area produce enormously and at low cost. The wells drilled forty years ago in Iran are still able to produce at a rate of 8,000 barrels per well a day. In Iran eighty wells in 1950 produced 30,000,000 tons of oil. In Iraq the average per well a day is estimated at 8,500 barrels and in Saudi Arabia at 12,000 barrels. It is interesting to compare this with the 11 barrels per well a day in the United States and 210 in Venezuela. It cost the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company less than $0.15 to produce a barrel of crude oil, against $0.70 in Venezuela and $1.70 in the United States.

¹ New York Times, August 8, 1951.

² Mohammed Nemazee and S. Nakasian, The Oil Forum, March 1952, p. 93.

All these wells of the wealth in the Middle East, are owned by five American companies—Standard Oil of New Jersey, Gulf Oil Corporation, Standard Oil of California, Socony-Vacuum Oil Company, the Texas Company; two British companies—the Anglo-Persian Oil Company and the Royal-Shell Company (there is also some Dutch interest in this company); and one French company. These eight companies, which enjoy a monopoly of production, refining, transportation, and distribution, send every day about 2,000,000 barrels of oil to markets all over the world. In terms of dollars the income from the oil in that area is well above 1,500 million dollars.

PEOPLE

Last and most important of all is the human interest. In this area from North Africa to the Indian border we have nearly 180,000,000 people. It has been called by Arnold Toynbee the heartland of Islamic civilization and its events reverberate from the rock of Gibraltar to the jungles of India, the steppes of Central Asia, and even the isolated plantations of Java and Sumatra.

U. S. INFLUENCES

Americans first came to this area in the middle of the nineteenth century, as educators, doctors, nurses, businessmen, and preachers of the gospel of truth and freedom. They helped the people and encouraged them in their fight against foreign exploiters and native despots, in their struggles against poverty, ignorance, disease, and tyranny. During the Iranian revolution of 1905-9, several young American educators fought on the side of the revolutionists and one of them gave his life for the freedom of the Iranians.

The American University of Beirut, Robert College in Istanbul, the American University at Cairo, the American Colleges in Tehran and Baghdad, dozens of high schools, and many hospitals, clinics, and libraries throughout the area are monuments to the lofty ideals of American humanitarianism.

In 1910 for the first time the Iranians turned to the United States for financial advice. The next year President Taft sent W. Morgan Shuster and five other American experts to Tehran to help the Iranians put their house in order. They accomplished such an excellent job that both the British and Russians were alarmed; they considered the work of the Shuster Mission harmful to the interests of their empires in Iran and, as a result, forced the mission out of Iran. On his return Shuster wrote his great book, The Strangling of Persia.

Then came Woodrow Wilson and his "Fourteen Points." He was called by the people of Eastern Europe and the Middle East "the Messiah of the West." His promises of self-determination for the colonial countries, of sovereignty, independence, democracy, and an end of the era of power politics, gave new life to an old world. His sincerity, honesty of purpose, and championship of the cause of oppressed nations undermined European imperialism and turned the tables on Communism. He strengthened nationalism and told the people of the Middle East that national sovereignty and independence, not Communism, would be the decisive factor. He condemned both European and Red imperialism and instructed his Minister in Tehran to tell the people of Iran that he was as much against the Anglo-Persian agreement as he was against the Russian invasion of the northern provinces. To him foreign domination and imperialism were intolerable. He could compromise neither with the British nor with the Communist exploitation and domination. This made him a savior in the eyes of many Iranians, Egyptians, Iraqis, and Syrians who were fighting for their freedom.

With the end of the Wilson era and the abandonment of the League of Nations by the United States, the Middle East was forgotten by the American people. Apart from Christian missionaries, a small group of businessmen, and a few oil companies, the people of the United States regarded the Middle East as a land of antiquities, of the Arabian Nights, of strange and backward people.

AFTER PEARL HARBOR

Then came Pearl Harbor. With the Japanese attack and Hitler's declaration of war against the United States, the Middle East became a vital area to America. Thousands of soldiers, technicians, pilots, and diplomats moved in. A Persian Gulf Command was established with headquarters at Khorramshahr and Tehran. At one time there were more than 70,000 American soldiers in Iran. By means of Iranian roads and railways, the Americans sent more than 6,000,000 tons of lend-lease goods to Russia. It was this help which saved Russia. During the Tehran Conference Stalin told Roosevelt, "If it were not for your help I do not know where we should have been by now."

Incidentally, rumors in Tehran were to the effect that in one of these meetings when President Roosevelt told Stalin that he could not send more lend-lease goods to Russia and that already he was under fire of some willful Republican senators, Stalin asked him how it was possible to be in power for ten years and yet have some Republicans in circulation. He was much astonished that they were not all liquidated.

Roosevelt's visit to the Middle East was a great experience for him. He could not conceive that people in a potentially rich region could be living in such abject poverty. He instructed General Patrick Hurley, his special envoy to Iran, to study the country's prob-~~lem~~ and report directly to the White House. In compliance with the President's instructions General Hurley prepared a comprehensive plan for economic and financial aid to Iran. He told the President how for the first time the resources of Iran could be developed for the benefit of the people of that country. He added that Iran had been exploited to such an extent that even the lend-lease goods coming from the United States had been sold to the Iranians by the English company, "United Kingdom Corporation," which "was keeping the money." Hurley asked the President for an independent American foreign policy in Iran. He believed that if Iran's two neighbors left her alone she could be encouraged to develop a "pattern of self-government and free enterprise."

Roosevelt replied to General Hurley:

I am thrilled with the idea of using our efforts in Iran as example of what can be done by an unselfish American policy. If we can get the right kind of American experts who will remain loyal to their ideals I feel certain that our policy of aiding Iran will succeed.

You are right that the distribution of lend-lease supplies throughout the Middle East should be taken over by our own people and I have let the Secretary of State know my views in this regard.³

³ N. Saifpour Fatemi, Oil Diplomacy: Powderkeg in Iran (New York: Whittier Books, Inc., 1954), p. 210.

Subsequently there arrived in Iran from the United States a number of economic advisers, army officers to train the Iranian army and gendarmerie, and a few agricultural and health experts.

THE RUSSIANS IN IRAN

As long as the Western Allies were involved in the war against Germany and Italy they tolerated and even backed the highhanded Russian policy in Iran. With the end of the war the rift between the free nations and their strange bedfellow, Communist Russia, became clear. In Iran the gap became very wide, and it was there that the American "tough policy" towards Russia originated. When the Russians in 1945 set up the puppet government of Azerbaijan the American government protested, and at the Moscow Conference, Secretary Byrnes told Stalin that he was "seriously disturbed" at the prospect that the issue of the Russian evacuation of Iran and the separatist movement in Azerbaijan would be raised at the first meeting of the United Nations. He added that it was exceedingly important that the great nations keep their pledges to the smaller powers. If Iran raised the issue at London it would be unfortunate. . . because, under the facts as we knew them and in view of our solemn pledge, we would greatly regret having to oppose the Soviet Union in the very first meeting of the United Nations and I hoped, therefore, that we could take action at Moscow that would forestall this possibility.⁴

Despite this threat and the complaint of Iran to the Security Council, the Russians kept their troops in Iran after the deadline provided in the Tripartite Pact. Following the withdrawal of the British and American troops the Russians sent some new troops to Iran and even threatened occupation of the capital and overthrow of the government. All the pleas and protests of Iran and of the British and Americans were ignored, and the Soviet government made clear that it was not going to leave Iran alone.

⁴ James F. Byrnes, Speaking Frankly (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1947), pp. 119-20.

By March 15, 1946, Washington, London, and Tehran were very much worried. No one could fathom the mystery of Russian intentions. No one could understand why the Russians were applying such pressure against Iran while the two main problems, the evacuation of Russian troops and the fate of the Azerbaijan government, remained unsolved. The great question everywhere was, What can the United Nations do to solve the Iranian problem?

There was no answer to this question even in Washington. The State Department, frightened by the turn of events in Iran, had instructed the Tehran Embassy to be ready to leave Tehran for the southern part of the country at a moment's notice. There were rumors that the government had decided to transfer the capital to Isfahan. In London the British government saw no solution to the problem.

The Russian conduct in Iran and Eastern Europe, at this time, convinced President Truman that the schism between Russia and the West was not bridgeable and that the United States could not compromise the principles for which she had sacrificed hundreds of thousands of her citizens. Therefore on March 21 he sent an ultimatum to Stalin, asking him to withdraw his troops from Iran or the "United States would put some more people in there."⁵

The Russian reaction to President Truman's ultimatum was prompt. At a time when many people expected the occupation of Tehran by the Russian troops, the Soviet government announced that Iran would be completely evacuated within six weeks.

⁵ Fatemi, op. cit. supra n. 3, p. 235.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN POLICY

Then in 1947 came the Truman Doctrine concerning Greece and Turkey. The changes resulting from World War II and the support given by the United States encouraged the nations of the Middle East to revolt against Britain and France. Syria and Lebanon received their independence. The British were thrown out of Palestine. Iran, Iraq, and Egypt asked for the revision of their concessions and treaties with the British. Unfortunately, British concessions as usual were too little and too late. England did not understand the seriousness of the nationalist movement in the Middle East. She did not fathom the consequences of Iran's victory over Russia, the Truman Doctrine, the events in Palestine, the loss of India and Burma, and the effects of Point Four on the exploited and impoverished people of that area. Here for the first time a great power announced to the millions of poor people in Asia that she was prepared to help them without expecting anything in return. So far the people of the Middle East had experienced exploitation, concessions, domination of their countries by foreign loans and military pressures. After a hundred years of foreign exploitation the average income of the area is $75 per capita per annum, and in many countries 60 per cent of the people are illiterate. Point Four to these people is a continuation of missionary work with government support.

Britain did very little to readjust her policy in the postwar period. She did not heed the warnings and the advice of the Americans. The Iranians nationalized the property of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, and the Egyptians pressed hard for the evacuation of the Canal Zone. The good offices of the United States failed to dam the flood of nationalism and to bring about a solution of Iranian or Egyptian problems. It was from here on that the United States government was caught in the Middle Eastern dilemma. On the one hand the people of the Middle East blamed her for failing to help them against Britain and on the other the British censured American diplomats for interference in their area of influences.

The area is undergoing fundamental and rapid changes. It wants absolute freedom from the British economic and political domination, but the United States, which at one stage encouraged them to defy and resist Russian aggression and Communist imperialism, now is advising them to wait and not to upset the status quo, because any radical foreign or domestic change might play into the hands of the Communists, who are the immediate enemy. To the Middle East American foreign policy at this point looks like schizophrenia. The situation is well illustrated by the story of an Irish Municipal Council which voted three resolutions at one meeting.

They were: (1) Because the old jail is inadequate and collapsing, the jail should be torn down and rebuilt. (2) For the purpose of economy, the old materials in the jail should be used in the rebuilding. (3) The prisoners should be housed in the old jail till the new one is constructed. This is an exact description of what is happening in the Middle East.⁶

It looks as if the prisoners would have to stay in the old jail for the time being.

TODAY'S PROBLEMS

The United States today faces five vital problems in the Middle East: (1) the revolt of the people of North Africa against French colonialism; (2) the Anglo-Egyptian dispute; (3) the Arab-Israeli conflict; (4) the Anglo-Iranian dispute; (5) the poverty and backwardness of the area.

⁶ Edwin M. Right, The Threat of Soviet Imperialism, edited by G. Grove Haines (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1954), p. 306.

I shall not here elaborate on these problems or pretend that I have a solution to all these troubles, some of which have plagued the life of the people for fifty years. But before closing, I should like to make a few general remarks.

Most countries in Asia and Africa are going through two revolutions: one political and the other social and economic. The political revolution is against foreign domination, the social revolution is against interwoven poverty, disease, ignorance, and a corrupt ruling class. In the political revolution, nationalism, not Communism, is the decisive issue. Even the Communist groups in the area have to work under the guise of nationalism; otherwise nobody would listen to them.

The free world cannot be safe while vast reservoirs of poverty and colonial exploitation persist in Asia and Africa. For her own sake, just as much for the sake of those continents, the United States must find ways of solving the problems which threaten the peace and prosperity of the whole world. The old imperialism is certainly on its way out, and a new world quite different from that of the old is in process of being born. The revolutions, violence, pains, and pangs are indications of this new birth.

A CHALLENGE TO U. S.

The people of Asia and Africa expect understanding, help, and fair treatment from the United States and the Western European powers; reform, social justice, and consideration from their own ruling class. All Asia and Africa need a land program that calls for the breakup of feudal estates and their sale to the peasants, along the lines of a plan developed by the Shah of Iran. The rich people of these countries must be taxed and their capital used for the development of their countries. The land and income tax problems are the heart of the difficulties of Iran as well as of other parts of the Middle East.

The Western powers by now must have realized that stability in the Middle East can be achieved neither on the basis of military and economic pressure nor by an alliance with a few politicians who represent the groups defending the status quo, the feudal group, the landlord group.

As long as the changes in Iran and other parts of Asia are not extended to the masses of the people and as long as the grievances of these nations against the colonial powers are not redressed there can be no stability and security and no defense system in that region. Behind the defense system would stand hostile, ignorant, impoverished, and exploited people, to whom defense of democracy "is meaningless abstraction as long as it fails to cure or alleviate a basic malady—hunger." The events in China and Indochina must serve as an example of what may happen if the nationalist movements are not properly channeled and if something drastic and urgent is not done for the masses of the people.

The modern Middle East is a challenge to the United States and Britain. The new governments in Iran and Egypt have gone a long way toward co-operating with the British and even toward meeting some of their unreasonable demands. The Shah of Iran is doing his best to improve the lot of his people and is loved and admired by them. He has divided some of his estates among the peasants. He has devoted his untiring energy to reforms and improvements, but so far he has received very little support from outside or co-operation from the ruling class. The Shah presents an opportunity—an opportunity that is rare. He deserves the support of the people of the free world in his fight for economic freedom and in his struggle for reform and improvements in his country.

The strongest ground on which the United States and the free world can operate in Iran and the Middle East is by settlement of disputes through creation of a partnership and a common interest which will serve the interests of the people of the area first and foremost.

The people of the Middle East also expect the United States to develop an independent foreign policy in that area. They hope that you will speak to them in the language of Jefferson, Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Eisenhower. They are tired of the language of Palmerston, Disraeli, Joseph Chamberlain, Curzon, Jules Ferry, and Delcassé. They request that the United States in her relations with the Middle East avoid the pitfalls of British and French power politics. They pray that no foreign power will influence your high ideals and lofty principles. Your system of government and your way of living can win the hearts of the people of the Middle East, provided that you approach them directly and without the influence of your imperialistic friends and allies.

Let me remind you in conclusion of the words of a great revolutionist and an excellent reformist, Thomas Jefferson, who said:

I have no fear but the result of our experiment will be that men may be trusted to govern themselves without the masters; should the contrary of this be proved, I should conclude either that there is no God, or that he is a malicious being.

Let us all help to prove that Thomas Jefferson was right and that the people all over the world can be trusted to govern themselves without Russian, British, or French masters.

N. Saifpour Fatemi, Ph.D., Teaneck, New Jersey, is a member of the Department of Oriental Languages and Literatures, Program in Near Eastern Studies, at Princeton University. He has at various times served as editor of a leading newspaper in Tehran, member of the legislature in Isfahan, Mayor of Shiraz, Governor General of Fars, and member of the Parliament of Iran. He has also represented his country in the United Nations—as delegate to the UNESCO Conference in Cleveland, member of the Mossadegh mission to the Security Council, member of the Iranian Delegation to the General Assembly, and adviser to the Iranian Permanent Delegation. He is the author, among other works, of A Diplomatic History of Persia, 1917-1923 (1952) and Oil Diplomacy: Powderkeg in Iran (1954).

Book Department

	PAGE
ASIA	158
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND WORLD GOVERNMENT	171
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY	176
ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY	190
SOCIOLOGY AND EDUCATION	197
PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION	209
SPECIAL TOPICS ABROAD	215
COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS	229
SLAVIC COUNTRIES	237
WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE	232
OTHER COUNTRIES

ASIA

FAIRBANK, JOHN KING. Trade and Diplomacy on the China Coast: The Opening of the Treaty Ports, 1842-1854. Vol. I, text, pp. xiii, 489; Vol. II, notes, pp. 88. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $7.50 each volume.

This is an excellent account of the establishment of modern treaty relations with China from the first Anglo-Chinese war to the inauguration of the "foreign" inspectorate of the maritime customs. A distinctive feature of the volume is its attention to the Chinese documents and to the interpretation of events "in Chinese terms."

Within the brief period of twelve years the early treaty and treaty port system reached the point of breakdown as had the Canton system before it. The author does not follow the new difficulties to the second war; he ends his account with the inauguration of the inspectorate which he regards as the key institution (p. 462) in the new relations which were being worked out.

The general reader, if he can be induced to look into a work that seems highly specialized, will be rewarded by a beautifully drawn picture of the early negotiator for the Manchu Court, Chi Ying, whose effort was to bring the British barbarian under civilized control by a real sugar plum or two (p. 105) but chiefly by the sugar plums of trade. He will find, also, a neat exposition of the double hypocrisy of the opium trade of the time and may reflect upon the difference in the blinders worn by the Chinese and the British officials. He will find a lively description of the confusion at Shanghai during the Taiping rebellion.

The historian who undertakes to deal adequately with early Chinese-Western relations must be more than historian; he must be anthropologist, sociologist, political scientist, economist; and he can hardly avoid, if he has any imagination, an excursion into the philosophy of history as well. He must perform services of analysis and generalization beyond any narrow call of duty. The author accepts this with good courage, and his generalizations demand attention especially in the present state of Sino-Western relations.

He finds his significant generalizations rather in the fields of politics and diplomacy rather than in that of trade. There is, for example, a tantalizing reference (p. 297) to the extension of tea production in China but no examination of the nature of the industrial or economic organization which was soon to prevent China from meeting

Indian competition in a growing world market. The general effects—and possibilities—of trade are not explored, which may be accepted as further evidence that the chief importance of the early trade lay in the diplomatic and general international relations of the country.

The Chinese imperial system, which the author rightly considers one of the world's great political achievements, was the empirical fact and the theoretical concept into which, from the Chinese viewpoint, the new relations with the West had to be fitted. This was done, as the author sees it, by taking the Westerner into the system. The adjustment to the Manchu-Chinese dyarchy took the form of the inspectorate of customs and a "synarchy" came into existence. The institutions of the Chinese system were, and may still be, tough and adaptable. Thinking along these lines leads to the conclusion that the theory of imperialism is "not the only avenue of approach" (p. 468) to the problem.

Generalizations of quite a different sort seem at times to be on the point of formulation. There is reference (pp. 22, 468) to a landlord-gentry-scholar-official league against the peasantry in an agrarian-bureaucratic state. This seems to point in the direction of class struggle and to be inconsistent in its implications with the powerful traditions of the Chinese system. If these powerful political traditions may be called Confucian, the current situation may be put into some such questions as these: Is a neo-Confucian solution of the political, social, and economic problem of China a possibility? How might China's relations with the West and with Russia fit into such a solution? By these questions exactly a century is spanned, from 1854 to 1954.

C. F. REMER

University of Michigan

SWISHER, EARL. China's Management of the American Barbarians: A Study of Sino-American Relations, 1841-1861, with Documents. Pp. xxi, 844. New Haven, Conn.: Far Eastern Publications, Yale University (for the Far Eastern Association), 1953. No price.

This handsome volume, the second monograph in the series sponsored by the Far Eastern Association, breaks new ground in the study of Sino-American relations and prepares the way for Western research on a new level of sophistication and control of the sources. One of the pioneers in the American study of nineteenth century China through Chinese sources, Professor Swisher here presents translations of 546 Chinese documents, most of them in extenso and few of them ever before available to the non-Chinese-reading researcher. They make available from the archives of the Manchu emperors the basic and originally secret documentation of the Chinese side of Sino-American relations in the fateful decades from 1841 to 1861. Though published in a photo-lithographed edition of the originally secret imperial compilation in 1930 and since then referred to by many scholars, the content of these documents has never before been so fully laid forth in English.

Professor Swisher's introduction gives the fullest account yet available of how these documents came into being and how they are related to other Ch'ing archives and publications. Of these 546 documents he finds that 19 have hitherto been available in English and that less than 200 of them are available in Chinese in other collections than the special one on foreign affairs which is here translated (the I-wu shih-mo series). Mr. Swisher began the process of selection and translation at Harvard in 1933, and continued it in Peking in 1937-38 and again in 1947-48. The results as now published, with a full complement of the necessary scholarly apparatus, form a landmark in the long and arduous process of understanding Chinese institutions and their functioning in foreign affairs.

Professor Swisher contributes three initial chapters on the handling of Chinese foreign affairs, the Chinese personnel involved in dealing with the United States, and the attitudes of Chinese officialdom toward this country in the middle decades of the nineteenth century. He then supplies introductions to the fourteen chapters in which the 546 documents are arranged, followed by a glossary of Chinese personal names with biographical notes (55 pages), foreign names with their Chinese equivalents (18 pages), geographical names identified (18 pages), and a full bibliography and index.

These research materials could have been made available only through extensive subsidy as well as unflagging persistence on the author's part. They give us for the first time a rough equivalent of the documentary publications from Western government archives which have formed the basis of so much research in international relations. Until further similar volumes can be made available to Western scholarship, it will remain impossible to bring China fully on to the Western academic stage. Political-scientists and students of modern China and American foreign policy now have at hand a really significant segment of Chinese archival material, of sufficient bulk and scope for fruitful analysis.

J. K. FAIRBANK

Harvard University

ALLEN, G. C., and AUDREY G. DONNITHORNE. Western Enterprise in Far Eastern Economic Development: China and Japan. Pp. 292. London: George Allen & Unwin (distributed in the U. S. by The Macmillan Company, New York), 1954. $4.50.

The authors of this book have set forth a running account of the part played by Western enterprise in the economic development of China and of Japan and have drawn some interesting contrasts in the response of these two countries to the Western intrusion. The greater part of the book is devoted to China and to a description of the course of Western enterprise from a primary interest in trade for the sake of obtaining special products from China to the subsequent emphasis on the import into China of Western goods and the gradual development of ancillary enterprises to obtain and regulate the export products. Finally, an account is given of the attempt to modernize not only the industries, but the banking, the shipping, other transportation, and mining, and to establish public utilities. It details the political obstructions and the innate Chinese resistance to the invasion of Western enterprise and describes the defeats and failures encountered. Much detailed research has gone into this part of the book, but, as the authors have said, the greater part of their data has been obtained from Western sources. The problems are thus seen through Western eyes, and no new light is thrown on the enigma of why China resisted so tenaciously and Japan entered so eagerly into Western ways. The emphasis is upon the Westerner and his difficulties, and not upon the Chinese problem and the destructive impact of industrialization upon what had been a very highly developed economy. The result is a rather unsympathetic treatment of the Chinese scene.

The second part of the book describes the rapid modernization of Japan, the significant but relatively small part played by the foreign merchants in the reorganization of Japan's trade and industry, and the vital part of the government in initiating the change and creating the atmosphere in which Japanese enterprise was able to grasp control of its own industrialization, utilizing the "expertise" of the foreigners without being dominated by them. The section on Japan is the better analysis of the two. It is written with more sympathy and with much more understanding than is the Chinese section. This difference is probably due to the senior author's more intimate knowledge of Japan.

The authors plan a second volume on this theme covering Malaya and Indonesia, thus providing a number of mutually contrasting environments in which to study the impact of the West and the policies pursued in these so-called "undeveloped" regions.

JOHN E. ORCHARD

Columbia University

KIRBY, E. STUART. Introduction to the Economic History of China. Pp. ix, 202. London: George Allen & Unwin (distributed in the U. S. by The Macmillan Company), 1954. $4.25.

This book by Dr. Kirby, Professor of Economics and Political Science at the University of Hong Kong, is described by its author as follows, "the present treatise does not purport to give an account or narrative of the Economic History of China, but only to assess the importance of the subject, the position it has reached, its problems and perspectives of development. Incidentally, it presents a very wide bibliography of the subject" (pp. 62-63). As such, it is the first work of its kind in a Western language. The Introduction also contains a sound basic thesis, "that China must be viewed in terms of the interplay of a large number of forces," internal and external (p. 166). In contrast, the reader is repeatedly warned against the dogmatic interpretation in terms of class struggle.

The main contribution of the book lies in its summary of a considerable number of Japanese studies on the economic history of China. The extensive references even include Japanese translations from the Chinese and Western languages. The bibliography in these non-Japanese languages, however, is much less comprehensive and not always up-to-date. For instance, I find references to my early articles in Chinese up to 1937, but no mention of my more recent publications in English. The section on the last millennium is particularly disappointing. The author fails even to mention such leading economic historians as Ch'üan Han-sheng on the Sung dynasty (960-1279), and Shimizu Taiji and Liang Fang-chung on the Ming dynasty (1368-1644). In addition, the book is marred by occasional erroneous or misleading statements concerning historical facts, and by numerous mistakes in the romanization of Chinese characters. Thus the usefulness of this Introduction is appreciably reduced.

Referring to the periodical Shih Huo ("Food and Money," published 1934-37) which was devoted to Chinese economic history, Dr. Kirby remarks, "The contributions are very varied, but the magazine was under Marxist auspices and influence from its inception" (pp. 16-17). As a contributor to the periodical, I never heard anything about its Marxist auspices. Actually, it represented a trend to turn away from Marxist influence because its emphasis was on documentation rather than schematization. This misinterpretation probably arose from a lack of knowledge regarding the whereabouts of its editor, T'ao Hsi-sheng, who is in Formosa, because, in another place (p. 24), T'ao is cited along with Kuo Mo-jo as an outstanding example of present leaders of Marxist thought in Communist China. This kind of misrepresentation appears careless and irresponsible.

LIEN-SHENG YANG

Harvard University

MURPHEY, R. Shanghai—Key to Modern China. Pp. xii, 232. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $4.50.

This timely and well-documented study, enriched by the author's personal knowledge and experience, tells the story of the rise of Shanghai from a fishing settlement in the fourth century A.D. to one of the world's greatest cities and ports. When it fell to the Japanese in 1937 the population was estimated to exceed four million, and in tonnage entered and cleared the port ranked sixth or seventh among the world's ports. Although fortunate in suffering but little from either bombing or destruction by land forces it has since remained, if not at all times in a state of siege, at least cut off from the great channels of international trade which gave it birth and sustained its greatness.

In nationalist hands for four years from 1945, the Communist armies took Shanghai on May 27, 1949, and found themselves in possession of a great western-type city, the chief manufacturing center of the country, and its main gateway to the outside world. At first there was clearly an intention to reorient the city's life—that it should look inland. Signs are not lacking that second thoughts have prevailed and Shanghai is being refaced (witness the gardens along the Bund) to present a model of Chinese Communist enterprise to the outside world.

The author concludes, in a study singularly free from any political, national, or racial bias, that this former bridgehead for the penetration of China by the West is more likely to grow than to decline because of its new function as a catalyst in the changing economic relations between China and the world.

Shanghai's modern skyscraper office-blocks and hotels are built on concrete rafts replacing former pile foundations. Underneath are a thousand feet of alluvium; to the east Whangpoo Creek connected with the great Yangtse River forms a natural and dredgeable, if restricted, harbor. It matters little that the village once on the seaward margin of the great delta is now the city from which the open sea becomes sixty feet farther away every year. The story of the complex foreign settlement on Chinese soil, a western outpost in an eastern world, is a fascinating one. From Treaty port (1842), British settlement, French concession (1849) to famed International Settlement Shanghai had the best and the worst of the West. Law and justice attracted immense numbers of Chinese residents, but prostitution and vice flourished. All that is now history.

L. DUDLEY STAMP

London School of Economics and Political Science
University of London

THOMAS, S. B. Government and Administration in Communist China. Pp. v, 150. New York: Institute of Pacific Relations, 1953. $2.50.

The research program of the Institute of Pacific Relations has presented studies on the development and features of Communist movements in Asia since the end of World War II. Reports have been published on Japan, India, Indochina, and Malaya. The Institute now adds Government and Administration in Communist China, written by S. B. Thomas, a Research Associate of the Institute and a graduate of the East Asian Institute at Columbia University. This well-footnoted and timely book contains chapters on the rise of the Chinese Communists to power, the return to the cities and the United Front policy, the formal program and constitutional structure of the "People's Republic of China," the role of the army, "Middle Parties," mass organizations and impact of the Sino-Soviet tie, the local government network and developments in national minorities, land reform, "suppression of counter-revolutionaries," and the major movements of 1953. The Appendix includes a report by the Central Committee of the Communist Party on "Struggle for Eradication of the Passive Attitude and Unhealthy Conditions in Party Organizations" and an editorial from a leading North China newspaper, "Our Thanks to the Soviet Union for Her Great Help."

The author asks some sagacious questions in an effort to assess the future of communism in China. To what extent will the land reform program give the Communists continued support from the peasantry? Can the Communists rapidly train capable technical-economic cadres in numbers large enough to meet the needs of a growing modern industrial economy? Can Moscow furnish sufficient technical aid and material support for this expansion? What will be the fate of the private businessman after the "struggle for nationalization" of all enterprises? Will the "old type" intellectual find it possible to co-operate with a regime hostile to his way of living and thinking? Will the Communists be successful in forcing their dogmatic ideologies into the minds of the tolerant Chinese? How much resistance will be offered by the devotees of ancient Chinese culture? Will there be an eventual emergence of a specific "Chinese Communism"? Will the Communists be able to reconcile Chinese nationalism with the more recent "proletarian internationalism"? And lastly, how will the strength of the new government and its hopes for industrial modernization be affected by military commitments, as laid down by the planners in the Kremlin?

Some of these questions have been answered. Others have been left for the muse of history to contemplate.

THOMAS E. ENNIS

West Virginia University

WRIGHT, ARTHUR F. (Ed.). Studies in Chinese Thought. Pp. xi, 317. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953. $4.00.

Made possible financially by a grant from the Ford Foundation, this beautifully printed and relatively low-priced volume is at the same time an outstanding example of sound scholarship. Most of the eight authors are American born and trained. The book is, therefore, happy evidence of the recent advance in Sinology in the United States and a welcome augury of still better things to follow.

The book is made up of essays which cover much of the vast range of Chinese thought. Through the first five of them is to be had a more than cursory introduction to the course of the philosophy of China. Other essays deal topically with various aspects of the subject, including the types of symbols which display the influence of philosophy and religion in Chinese art and the problems of interpreting Chinese thought in categories familiar to the Western mind, of translating Chinese terms into Western language, and of putting Western thought into Chinese. The longest essay is a sketch of the history of Chinese thought by Professor Derk Bodde, translator of Fung Yu-lan's History of Chinese Philosophy and a specialist in his own right. The survey is from the novel interpretative approach of the interplay of harmony and conflict throughout the centuries. There is a fresh study of Neo-Confucianism. This is followed by one on "knowledge" and "action" since that stimulating mind of the Ming, Yang Yang-ming, which article pays especial attention to Chang Hsüeh-ch'êng (1738-1801), heretofore little noticed by American scholars. The second longest chapter, quite properly, deals with the more recent scene and the tensions produced by the inroads of thought from the Occident.

The volume makes no pretense of being a well-rounded account of all the vast range of Chinese thought. For example, only incidental mention is made of the massive Chinese Buddhist literature and the reaction of the Chinese mind to that faith, a field in which the editor has unusual competence. However, no better single volume on Chinese philosophy has been written in this country.

KENNETH SCOTT LATOURETTE

Yale University

BELOFF, MAX. Soviet Policy in the Far East, 1944-1951. Pp. viii, 278. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $4.00.

Similar in approach to the author's earlier work (The Foreign Policy of Soviet Russia, 1929-1941), this book provides a chronological account of Soviet policies in East and Southeast Asia from the Yalta Conference to the fall of 1951.

About one-third of the study is devoted to Soviet relations with China and the Chinese borderlands (Outer and Inner Mongolia, Sinkiang). The remainder deals in chapters of about equal length with Soviet policies in Japan, Korea, and Southeast Asia. Joseph Frankel, a specialist on the countries of Southeast Asia has written the latter section (covering Indonesia, Vietnam, Malaya, Burma, Thailand, and the Philippines) and has assisted the author generally with the analysis of Soviet and other research materials.

Mr. Beloff has been careful to maintain scholarly objectivity in his day-by-day account. Even when discussing as controversial and hotly debated a subject as the Soviets' role in the Communist seizure of power in China and the current relationship between the two regimes, the author is remarkably free of parti-pris. He considers it his primary task to present in logical sequence all the available factual evidence, leaving to the reader the task of synthesis.

In some respects, however, the writer has gone beyond this self-imposed role of chronologist. A brief introductory chapter raises some of the issues facing anyone who attempts to analyze Soviet strategy in Asia. In the process, Mr. Beloff has occasion to dispel some widely held misconceptions about Soviet policies. He neither believes in the existence of "a single master-plan conceived in advance for expanding the area of Soviet control to cover the entire Far East" (p. 1), nor, on the other hand, does he hold the notion that Soviet policy-makers operate entirely independent of Communist illusions about the external world: we must expect Soviet policy "to have its own inner logic and coherence" (p. 3).

Mr. Beloff and Mr. Frankel have carefully gathered the many small pieces of evidence from Soviet and other literature. But the author would be the first to admit the inadequacy of available Soviet source materials, especially in so far as factual information is concerned. On many vital questions several equally valid theories can be maintained. There is not sufficient evidence on hand to establish clearly the nature of the relationship between the Chinese Communists and the Soviet government, nor can we, with any degree of certainty, assess the relative importance of the several factors which may have entered into the decisions to strip Manchuria of its industrial potential or to launch the Korean attack.

Despite these obvious limitations imposed upon the author by circumstances, he has provided us with a very useful and much-needed book. The publication of new materials, in the future, and the completion of specialized studies (such as those devoted to the Russian-trained Asian Communists) may eventually further illuminate some of the problems under discussion. For some time, however, Mr. Beloff's study will remain indispensable for the student of Soviet and Asian affairs.

The value of the work is enhanced by a selection of appended diplomatic documents (regarding China, Mongolia, and Korea) and an index. A map would have been desirable.

PAUL F. LANGER

University of Southern California

KOLARZ, WALTER. The Peoples of the Soviet Far East. Pp. xii, 194. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1954. $4.50.

In Russian the term "Potemkin's village" is used to denote an impressive façade masking a far-from-imposing reality. No term could be devised which would more accurately describe Soviet policy toward national minorities. Granted on paper a considerable measure of autonomy, these minorities are in reality ruled by a Moscow-centered trinity of party, bureaucracy, and secret police.

This generalization is especially applicable to the Soviet Far East—the region lying east of Lake Baikal. The enormous distance of the Far East from European Russia and its adjacency to the North Pacific, once dominated by a hostile Japan and now by a hostile United States, guarantee it the closest supervision from Moscow.

The general nature of the steps taken during the past fifteen years toward the control and development of the Soviet Far East are well known: the establishment of military and industrial bases, the double-tracking of the Trans-Siberian Railway and the building of other lines, the development of the Northern Sea Route along the Arctic coast, the efforts to render the region more nearly able to feed itself, the encouragement of immigration, and the like.

Somewhat less known is the impact of these trends upon the non-Russian peoples—Yakuts, Buryat Mongols, Chinese, Koreans, and others—most of whom inhabited the region before the advent of the Russians three centuries ago. In The Peoples of the Soviet Far East Walter Kolarz, a journalist and recognized authority on Soviet affairs, has subjected this impact to a highly critical examination. Drawing on a wide range of Soviet writings, he demonstrates the existence of a program of sovietization much more thoroughgoing, although perhaps less crude, than the Russification in effect under the Czars. An officially sponsored immigration of Russians has inundated the indigenous peoples and has virtually robbed them of their cultural identity and of their political and economic liberty.

Unlike many writers on Soviet Far Eastern policy, Mr. Kolarz appears to have taken some trouble to familiarize himself with the Far Eastern context of his subject; he presents, for example, an able summary of the Sovietization of Outer Mongolia. A very minor slip is the introduction of a notorious quondam warlord of Manchuria, known to English-speaking students as Chang Tso-lin, by the Russian form of his (Chinese) name, Tchan-Tso-Lin (p. 133).

Mr. Kolarz deserves great praise for his treatment of an obscure but important topic.

HAROLD C. HINTON

Georgetown University

WHEELER, MORTIMER. The Indus Civilization. (Cambridge History of India, a Supplementary Volume.) Pp. xi, 98. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1953. $3.75.

When the first volume of the Cambridge History of India was published in 1922, it contained nothing about the Indus civilization. The discovery of that phase of Indian history, so revolutionary of our knowledge, was first publicly announced by Sir John Marshall in the Illustrated London News of September 20, 1924, and was based upon excavations at Harappa in Southwestern Punjab and Mohenjo-daro in northern Sind. Since then these two sites have been further excavated, Chanhudaro in central Sind has had a season of excavation, and various exploratory surveys have been made in western and southern Sind, Baluchistan, parts of the Punjab, and western Rajasthan. There has been a large volume of scientific publication of materials, discussion of the various cultures discovered, comparison with other known cultures of the third and second millennia B.C. in Western Asia, and comparisons and contrasts with later Indic materials.

This volume is a summary and appraisal of our knowledge by Sir Mortimer Wheeler, formerly Director General of Archaeology in prepartition India, later archaeological adviser to the Government of Pakistan, and himself the excavator at Harappa for several seasons, where he made notable amplifications of our knowledge. The book is meant to be, and is, a factual account of the Indus civilization—that is, of the most important of the cultures discovered there, called the Harappa culture. It has an ordered discussion of chronology, climate, the villages of the hills, and the cities of the plain, and it endeavors to give a picture of agriculture, commerce and industry, defense, arts and crafts, religion, and finally the dating.

So far as we can say now the maximum opening-date is 2500 B.C. and the closing date is the arrival of the Indo-Aryans, for which Sir Mortimer is willing to accept a time around 1500 B.C. This would give the Harappa civilization a life of a millennium, which may possibly be pushed farther back in time if it ever becomes possible to reach virgin soil at the principal sites. The author rarely goes beyond his data to speculate; for example, he treats more circumspectly than some other archaeologists the references to forts and the fort-destroying deeds of the god Indra which appear in the Rig Veda. He stays practically neutral on the two tiny statuettes found at Harappa, whose period has been widely debated. He has not, it happens, noted the charming bronze dancing girl found at Chanhudaro belonging to the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, not mentioned in Mackay's published report. The script he flatly, and rightly, considers still unread. He resists well the temptation—irresistible to some others—to give over-interpretations to the religious material.

The book is a well-written lively, reliable description, a much-needed addition to the great Cambridge History of India.

W. NORMAN BROWN

University of Pennsylvania

VIVEK. India Without Illusions. Pp. viii, 216. Bombay: New Book Co., 1953. Rs. 4.4.

One of India's greatest national assets is her family of newspapers. Two or three of the English language dailies must rank among the twenty finest in the world. Readers of the Indian press will discover a rare freshness and vigor of analysis and a standard of prose excellence that compare favorably with the world's best. Columnists, editorial writers, and reporters often come from the ranks of the higher civil service, the universities, executive levels of business, and professional literary circles. The result of their combined efforts in news writing is first-class journalism.

The book under review contains a series of articles written by "Vivek," one of India's most distinguished scholar-journalists. The columns appeared in the Times of India (Bombay and New Delhi) between December 1950 and June 1953. A new series by the same author (now using his proper name, A. D. Gorwala) will be found currently in the Statesman (Calcutta and New Delhi). The Vivek collection has been divided into two sections: one containing articles stressing issues in foreign affairs; the second dealing with matters of domestic concern. Although each statement is short, the compendium read as a whole has a unity of constructive criticism that points out the social philosophy of the author.

Vivek will never be accused of being reticent to speak his mind. Indeed, if anything, he reflects a capacity for unveiling political and economic weaknesses, whether at home or abroad, with a brilliant, brittle, epigrammatic style that must annoy those actually charged with governmental responsibility. As a former civil servant of acknowledged experience and skill, Vivek knows whereof he speaks when dealing with the process of translating aspirations into laws and laws into action. It may be for this reason that the articles on domestic affairs carry with them more of an aura of authenticity than those that concern themselves with international relations.

However, Vivek propounds a thesis on foreign affairs relating to India that should be read along with the pronouncements of Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru. Vivek feels that India has erected a democratic political philosophy in her Constitution that demands not only domestic fulfillment, but also support of democratic ideals abroad. These ideals may manifest themselves in the encouragement of self-determination among colonial peoples; India's Constitution also implies a devotion to the cause of freedom that would bar giving aid and comfort to totalitarian regimes—of whatever variety and wherever found.

There are insights of significance on every page of this small book. It is best suited for those who have a grasp of the main outlines of contemporary Indian affairs. For them, Vivek's book is always provocative and is often wise.

RICHARD L. PARK

University of California
Berkeley

BRECHER, MICHAEL. The Struggle for Kashmir. Pp. xii, 211. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $5.00.

We are indebted to a young Canadian scholar for this useful guide through the many ramifications of the Kashmir question—the central problem in dispute between India and Pakistan and one of the great uncomprehended controversies in contemporary international relations.

Nearly one-half of the book is devoted to an analysis of the discussions on the Kashmir question in the Security Council of the United Nations, and of the proposals of the United Nations Commission for India and Pakistan, of General McNaughton as "informal mediator," and of the two mediators appointed by the Council, Sir Owen Dixon and Dr. Frank Graham. From the beginning the UN efforts to assist in the settlement of the dispute went awry. For example, as Dr. Brecher points out, the United Nations Commission for India and Pakistan (not for Kashmir, be it noted) "laid the ground-work for much future misunderstanding by obscuring the issues in its practice of endless clarification." Such insights are happily frequent in this book; but they are seldom presented with equal facility of expression.

The response of India and Pakistan to the various UN efforts, Dr. Brecher reminds us, "was determined by their basic outlook on the origin and nature of the dispute," and by "the basic disagreement on first principles." He makes some half-hearted suggestions for future UN action, but he sees more hope in direct negotiations between the two countries immediately concerned.

Dr. Brecher's survey of the situation in Kashmir before and immediately after partition is brief and rather superficial. His chapter on "The Importance of Kashmir to India and Pakistan" might be read with profit by those who wonder why the two nations are so concerned about this remote area. His final chapter sets the dispute in the broader context of general Indo-Pakistan relations. He has some interesting and rather uncritical comments on fundamental changes in the State of Jammu and Kashmir since 1947. He attaches great significance to the land reform program, which was indeed spectacular and sweeping; but he does not even question whether the program has achieved the results claimed for it.

Although he refers to events as recent as the riots in Jammu in March 1953, he gives no hint of the political crisis, already bubbling beneath the surface, which led to the dismissal and arrest of Sheikh Abdullah five months later. In his opinion most Kashmiris "favour the continuation of the present pro-Indian Government." He notes "the universal respect and admiration for Sheikh Abdullah" (at least, as he did not add, in the Valley of Kashmir), and he reports that many Kashmiris told him that "where the Sheikh goes, we go." Well, "Sheikh Sahib" is now in "protective custody." His fall from power must be an added source of confusion and bewilderment to thousands of the humble folk of Kashmir who thought of him and the "New Kashmir" as one.

Dr. Brecher has written an intelligent and objective book, based on a careful study of the pertinent documents and on first-hand observations in Kashmir, and in India and Pakistan. Unfortunately the book is unattractive in appearance and bears an outrageous price.

NORMAN D. PALMER

University of Pennsylvania

BISSE, T. A. Zaibatsu Dissolution In Japan. Pp. xi, 314. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1954. $5.00.

The term Zaibatsu has been variously defined to mean "money clique," "oligarchy of wealth," "concentrated business wealth," and so forth. It is the term applied to leading Japanese families, such as Mitsui, Mitsubishi, Yasuda, Sumitomo, Asano, and others, which had very extensive holdings in banking, industry, and trade until 1946.

Over three centuries ago Mitsui, Take-toshi, renounced his samurai status to open a pawnshop and sake and soy-sauce brewery in Echigo during the Genwa era (1615-1623). In 1722, the house of Mitsui developed a written set of rules and regulations, which with occasional revisions, controlled the actions of the eleven Mitsui families until it was abrogated in 1946. Under this code, the personal as well as the business lives of Mitsui members were subjected to regulation by a family council dominated by the head of the main family. Marriage, divorce, adoption, and other personal matters were so controlled, no less than the handling of corporate investment, savings, and profit distribution or reinvestment. A vast commercial and industrial empire grew out of the pawnshop and sake plant, encompassing banks, mining, shipbuilding, manufacturing, and an extensive network of world trade. At its peak the Mitsui combine employed 1,800,000 persons in Japan and about another 1,000,000 in the Far East and the rest of the world.

T. A. Bisson tells the story of the Occupation's efforts to dissolve these combines. His study outlines the position held by the Zaibatsu families and their methods of controlling their business empires. It examines the alternative policies open to the Occupation in dealing with the all-pervasive combines. It shows how the Occupation authorities finally arrived at a dissolution policy and how this—the most ambitious antitrust operation in history—was carried out. Finally, it summarizes, up to 1952, the results and implications of actual decrees and legislation.

The question of these semi-feudal business oligarchies posed a significant question for United States policy. Was it possible to transfer to Asia the free enterprise climate of the United States? The United States decision to break up the entrenched system of concentrated business power represented one of the most ambitious projects of the Occupation. How successful was the experiment?

In Bisson's judgment the U. S. policy decision to dissolve the combines was unrealistic from either an economic or political point of view. From an economic point of view, dissolution and fragmentation meant less efficiency, higher production costs, less ability to compete in essential world markets. From a political point of view Bisson holds that nationalization would have been a preferable policy to dissolution. Nationalization, he believes, would have preserved the advantages of large-scale operation, and it would have had the organized political support, which the dissolution policy lacked. He indicates that the Social Democrats favored nationalization rather than dissolution. "In choosing dissolution instead of public ownership . . . the Occupation weighted the odds against the one party through which liberal political as well as economic change might have been achieved."

Just how nationalization would have fared in the face of the split between Right Wing and Left Wing Socialists and just why transferring the bulk of Japanese banking and industry from the Zaibatsu to the Kanbatsu ("official cliques," or "entrenched bureaucracy") would have advanced the cause of democracy in Japan, Mr. Bisson nowhere explains. In surveying the results under the course the Occupation followed, he finds "disturbing questions about the effectiveness of dissolution," and notes that "by 1952 the combines were again emerging. Dissolution of the top holding companies had struck at the networks of subsidiaries, but the blow was not fatal."

JEROME B. COHEN

College of The City of New York

BLAKESLEE, GEORGE H. The Far Eastern Commission, A Study in International Cooperation: 1945 to 1952. (Department of State Publication 5138, Far Eastern Series 60.) Pp. v, 239. Washington, D. C., 1953. 70 cents.

When an eminent historian and expert in international relations is associated with the making of political history by serving in his country's government and subsequently, with access to all documents, prepares a comprehensive review which is published by his government, we are likely to have a document with unusual authority on the one hand, and the kind of objectivity we expect from historians on the other. Dr. George H. Blakeslee's record of the work of the Far Eastern Commission is such a document. He was political adviser to the Chairman of the Commission, member of the United States delegation to the Commission, and United States representative on its Steering Committee throughout the life of the body from 1945 to 1952. Hence the authority of the study; of Dr. Blakeslee's place as a historian nothing need be said. His aim is to give an account of the Commission from the point of view of international cooperation. He does not hesitate to bring out clearly the strains and stresses which developed.

The Headquarters of the Commission were throughout its existence in Washington. It paid only one visit to Japan in December 1945—January 1946. It never achieved satisfactory liaison with the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers, and as time went on and the viewpoint of the United States with regard to the Occupation changed, friction between the United States and the members of the Commission was frequent.

The Commission's terms of reference represented a compromise between the views of the United States and of the other Allies. It had authority to formulate policies. On the other hand the United States government had special rights and privileges. The Supreme Commander was American and "the sole executive authority for the Allied Powers in Japan," tending as Dr. Blakeslee says "to act in accordance with the views of the United States Government." In the Commission the United States could veto any policy with which it disagreed. Moreover it could issue interim directives to the Supreme Commander on "urgent matters," an elastic concept which was embracing. These directives were subject to review by the Commission, but this right was abridged by delays in submitting them. "The broad rights of the Commission and the specific rights of the United States government together created a condition of political instability." Friction became serious from the time when the Japanese Constitution began to be discussed.

Nevertheless, Dr. Blakeslee records that in the First Period, during approximately the first two years of the Commission's history, the United States and the Commission as a whole worked well together. Forty-six policy decisions were made by the 11-nation Commission, mostly unanimously. This was a period in which the United States and other members were in agreement on the Occupation, and the United States government respected the rights of the Commission. In the second period the United States government had changed its position: Japan was to pay no reparations and, in view of the delay in a peace treaty, should be given rights it would have obtained by the treaty. These positions were opposed by other members of the Commission. Dr. Blakeslee says "The task of passing judgment on . . . the respective positions . . . is rendered perplexing by the fact that judged by development of events and provisions in the Treaty of Peace, the United States was in general correct in the positions it took since these were later accepted by other members of the Commission." It is sometimes necessary to accept what cannot be changed.

A. VIOLA SMITH

New York City

ELSBREE, WILLARD H. Japan's Role in Southeast Asian Nationalist Movements, 1940 to 1945. Pp. vii, 182. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press (for Institute for Pacific Relations), 1953. $3.25.

The Japanese developed in their Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere policy what they justly considered a brilliant scheme for harnessing the nationalist, anti-colonial movements of Southeast Asia to their war effort as well as for extending their own empire. In order to win this support, however, they were compelled to unleash nationalist forces which in the end turned—or would have turned, if not for the end of the war—as surely against themselves as they had been against the Western powers. Thus while the Japanese thought of themselves as using the nationalists for their own purposes, in the end it was the nationalists who had used Japan to advance their own goals of independence and unity.

How the Japanese came to be the used instead of the users is analyzed by Mr. Elsbree in his stimulating and readable volume through an examination of the course of the Japanese Occupation of the colonial countries of Southeast Asia. The book would have gained a good deal if Mr. Elsbree had had available to him as adequate materials for the other countries as he had for Indonesia, his most detailed case example. Also, some important perspective might have resulted from a parallel treatment of Thailand, which is significant for the very reasons it was excluded from the analysis, namely, that it was not under the direct control of a Western power and that its nationalism was not necessarily anti-Western. However, it is to be hoped that Mr. Elsbree and others will deal with these problems with the fullness they deserve at some other time.

The Japanese plan ultimately failed for several reasons. First, the Japanese themselves were not of one mind in their approach and ultimate intentions in the area. The nationalists were able to exploit these differences—between Tokyo and the field, between higher and lower headquarters, between politically and militarily-minded officials—for their own benefit. Thus the Japanese were never able to apply a uniform, monolithic pressure on the native peoples. Second, in order to win their support in the first instance against their Western masters, it was necessary to make concessions to the demands and aspirations of the nationalists in the fields of government employment and responsibility, armed forces, education, and mass media expansion which, in the end, developed the skills, organization, self-confidence, military power, and esprit that enabled them to stand up to the Japanese as well. Third, as Allied pressure on the Japanese increased, the Japanese came to need the Southeast Asians more than the Southeast Asians needed them, and they had to make increasingly greater concessions for continued support or even non-opposition.

Although the nationalist leaders for their part differed enormously in their estimate of and attitude toward the Japanese (some believed in Japan's "destiny," some believed her good intentions, some hoped to use them, some were motivated only by hatred of their colonial overlord or of the white man or of the West) they all followed a course of pressing on the Japanese for more and more freedom and sovereignty. In the light of Mr. Elsbree's analysis, the differences between the "puppets"—the Ba Maws and the Laurels—and the "anti-Fascists" take on the proportion of tactical rather than principled issues. Finally, towards the end of the war, the nationalist forces proved strong enough to assist in expelling the Japanese and to challenge the return of European rule with varying degrees of success.

There is much that the West can learn from the experience of the Japanese in Southeast Asia. Many Americans have come to know by now that the problems of the Occupier are pretty much the same all over the world, whether it is the Japanese in Southeast Asia or the Americans in Japan and Germany. We shall also have to learn that however steady and powerful a pressure we exert on Southeast Asia—in spite of our undoubted moral rightness—the end historical result will be conditioned, if not largely determined, by the needs, aspirations, understanding, and character of the Asians themselves.

HERBERT PASSIN

Ohio State University

LEACH, E. R., and RAYMOND FIRTH. Political Systems of Highland Burma: A Study of Kachin Social Structure. Pp. xii, 324. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $7.00.

Professor Leach has written an important book based on his contacts with the Kachin peoples of northern Burma from 1939 to the end of World War II. The first seven months of this period he spent in the village of Hpalang in the Namkham-Bhamo area doing anthropological research and mastering the Jinghpaw language. His first hand observations were supplemented later by wide reading in European language sources. The author breaks new ground not only in describing the confused social organization of a people hitherto little known, but also in his methodology. He rejects the idea of hypothetical norms prevailing in an assumed stable social structure in favor of reporting actual behavior in concrete situations. He discovered that social structure among the Kachins varied widely from community to community and from time to time in the same community and that the inconsistencies present were the essentially significant aspects in explaining Kachin society.

Traditionally, the hill-dwelling Kachins supplemented their meager livelihood from taungya cultivation by levying commercial toll or military blackmail against their more prosperous and less belligerent Shan neighbors. From time to time a Kachin chief (duwa) established hereditary predominance and attempted to imitate the feudal-type domination of the Shan chief over a limited valley area capable of wet-rice cultivation, and in rare instances a duwa actually turned Shan. Almost invariably, however, such a presumptuous Kachin chief alienated his restless followers, who having plenty of hillside room in which to roam threw off his incipient feudal yoke and reverted to a primitive semi-anarchistic order which recognized no class distinctions or hereditary clan superiority. Kachin society thus tended to oscillate between the loosely organized democratic (gumlao) structure and the better integrated hereditary feudal-type (gumsa) system of dominance by a chief possessing ritualistic and lineage claims to superiority. Mr. Leach cites the multi-tongued (9 languages among 130 family units) village cluster of Hpalang as an example of an unstable gumsa community rent by factional rivalry, which was deterred in 1939 from reverting to gumlao status only by the marked preference of the British administration for the more orderly chief-centered gumsa system.

Although the Kachin situation seems to be fairly comprehensible on political and geographical grounds, the author has buttressed his interpretation by a plethora of technical anthropological data. In fact, Mr. Leach labors his sectarian arguments with professional opponents almost to the point of annoyance. The book will nevertheless stand a long time as a scholarly and realistic contribution to the understanding not only of the Kachins but also of the political and social institutions of old Burma. Particularly noteworthy is the similarity between the authority of the gumsa duwa and that of the Burman myothugyi; the systems of land tenure are similar and also the overriding importance of social status and symbols of rank. Leach challenges Luce and other Burman experts by questioning the assumption that successive waves of Tibeto-Burman peoples have migrated into the Irrawaddy valley in historic times. He thinks that the Burmese are probably the descendants of the ancient Pyu (second and third centuries A.D.) and that the Kachins have resided in northern Burma for many centuries.

JOHN F. CADY

Ohio University,
Athens, Ohio

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND WORLD GOVERNMENT

MACMAHON, ARTHUR W. Administration in Foreign Affairs. Pp. 272. University, Ala.: University of Alabama Press, 1953. $3.50.

This book is the outgrowth of a series of lectures which Professor Arthur W. Macmahon, Eaton Professor of Public Administration, of Columbia University, gave at the University of Alabama under the auspices of the Southern Regional Training Program in Public Administration.

The first chapter deals with "The Concert of Judgment," "the ultimate concert of advice as it bears upon and emerges in decision." High among those who affect this concert are the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who are given power by Congress, not as militarists, but due to our deep worship of the expert, government being "believed to be incurably amateurish" by comparison. It is noted, nevertheless, that there can be "defensive militarism." The increasingly powerful role of the national Security Council and the minor influence of the Cabinet are described.

Recent developments in our "Department of Foreign Affairs" trace the expansion of units for economic analysis and negotiation, for the council diplomacy of the United Nations, "intelligence" research and the operation of informational and economic programs. These functions seem to Macmahon to belong in the State Department, and he is not persuaded that the 1953 Reorganization Plans which established a separate Foreign Operations Administration to handle most of them are the last word.

The chapter on "Field Structure for Foreign Programs" contains excellent discussions of the administrative aspects of NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization), the very powerful United States Special Representative in Europe, the European Coal and Steel Company, the European Defense Community, and other regional developments.

There is a penetrating discussion of the complex subject of interdepartmental coordination and a final chapter on Personnel for Foreign Affairs, which considers the arguments for and against maintaining the traditional separation between the State Department and the Foreign Service. Problems of personnel selection are examined, including the need for area training.

These lectures reveal a deep knowledge of the intricate processes of public administration which should delight the expert in that field. They are at the same time easily readable by the layman. There are apt figures of speech and touches of Macmahon's urbane humor, as well as illustrations useful to the general student of foreign affairs.

D. F. FLEMING

Vanderbilt University

MANGONE, GERARD J. A Short History of International Organization. Pp. ix, 326. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $5.00.

This is an important contribution to the teaching literature in the field of international relations. The author, who is on the political science staff of Swarthmore College, brings a fresh approach to his subject in that he concentrates his attention on the broad historical factors which impel the seventy-odd states of the world to associate with one another in formal international organizations.

Despite the historical approach, the work should not be mistaken for a history in the strict sense. In fact it is this reviewer's opinion that the book is mistitled; its reception may suffer accordingly, since most courses in international organization are planned for a functional approach. Actually the work is well suited to text use in such a course, or in a broader course in international relations (in which some supplementary reading might be required). The historical material is chiefly found in the first four chapters, dealing with international organization before Napoleon, in the nineteenth century, and with international law. The remainder of the book is almost exclusively concerned with the contemporary pattern of world organization. There is a chapter each on the League of Nations, the United Nations, International Administration, Regional Organizations, and the Future of International Law and Organization.

Following each chapter, the author has included a brief appendix, which includes extracts from germane documents. This material has been selected with great care and the extracts carefully edited to compress the most meaningful passages within a limited space. Although the average documentary appendix for a given chapter is only about five pages in length, the author has managed to give the reader a look at some 33 documents in all.

A colorful style and a practical notion of the limitations on international organization characterize the book. Well-written throughout, it repeatedly emphasizes the role of power politics in relation to organized efforts to cope with the many problems of modern world society.

OLIVER BENSON

University of Oklahoma

BROOKINGS INSTITUTION. Major Problems of American Foreign Policy, 1954. Pp. x, 429. Washington, 1954. $2.00 paper; $4.00 cloth.

The most significant feature of this volume is its approach rather than its subject matter. The authors treat each problem as a government official responsible for policy formation would deal with it, considering the relationship of the immediate problem to the total world situation, to domestic conditions in the United States and elsewhere, and to the basic principles and objectives of American foreign policy, and analyzing and weighing alternative solutions in the light of these factors.

Illustrative of this approach is "A Problem Paper on the Soviet Threat," which presents a "predecision analysis," designed to "demonstrate a method of preparing the ground for decision," by including material which "breaks off with an analysis of issues and alternatives" (p. 347). Thus the student is encouraged to follow the process normally pursued by policymakers but is left to make his own choice among possible courses of action.

Substantively, Part One deals with key developments in international relations from July 1952 to September 1953 and surveys "the form and substance of possible negotiations" between the West and the Soviet Union. Part Two reviews the influences which frustrated efforts to preserve the unity of the wartime allies and traces the evolution and crystallization of the principles and objectives of American foreign policy, showing how attempts to apply them to specific situations are conditioned by domestic and foreign pressures. Part Three explores major problems confronting American policymakers at the beginning of 1954, first in the realms of politics, economics, military affairs, relations with the United Nations, and the Cold War, and second by regions and their national components. The text closes with the problem paper on the Soviet threat.

The impact of Soviet expansionism on American postwar actions, and even on the evolution of fundamental American principles, objectives, and methods, is apparent throughout the book. The authors regard 1954 as a potential turning-point, at which "the Soviet Union, either by design or in consequence of internal pressures created by Stalin's death, appeared to be seeking to relax international tension," thus confronting the United States with "the possible need to re-examine over-all relations with the Soviet Union" (p. 110) and other powers. Washington bears also partial responsibility for determining whether the United Nations is to be "a coalition of the free world" or "a universal organization of states" (p. 181).

The authors have provided excellent bibliographical guides to both primary and secondary sources.

AURIE N. DUNLAP

Lehigh University

VISSCHER, CHARLES DE. Théories et réalités en droit international public. Pp. 467. Paris: Éditions A. Pedone, 1953. 2,500 frs.

Urging the friends of international law to face frankly the extensive political elements within it, Professor Visscher in this volume roundly condemns theoretical systems like those of the Vienna School which divorce law from politics. He advocates instead that every effort be made to integrate our constantly growing knowledge about international politics with the traditional doctrines of the law. The former Judge of the International Court of Justice (1946-52) strikes a number of chords familiar to Americans who quite frequently in recent years have heard and played the symphony of "realism" in international relations. Reality to Prof. Visscher, however, does not prescribe jettisoning international law because it functions poorly. He condemns equally the legalist who divorces international law from politics and the specialist in international relations who "sins for his part by failing to understand . . . [that] law is a normative discipline; [that when] one speaks of norms, he speaks of precepts, and that precepts should never be confounded with facts" [translation by reviewer].

He urges his colleagues not to devitalize the law by cutting it off from either the facts of international life or from the "moral inspiration" which alone can raise the conduct of international affairs out of the jungle. He recognizes that an international community does not yet exist, but he speaks of it as one of the "civilizing ideas" which operates slowly and despite eclipses as a positive force generating social and political change. So too he characterizes the embryonic European Defense and Political Communities as "premature" and void of adequate spiritual and political bases, but he still sees in federal principles great possibilities for organizing international life in the future.

This treatise is in four parts. Part One describes international power politics and how the state system has developed since 1648 and treats historically and analytically theories of the state and international law from Machiavelli to Kelsen. Part Two considers the general relations between power and law in international affairs and how ideas of "sovereignty" and "vital interest" hamstringing the United Nations and prevent the international community from developing. In the third and major portion of the work the author examines the principal rules of international law, effectively demonstrating in how few areas states are prepared to abide by detailed codes and how often international legal prescriptions are unrealistic. Finally, M. Visscher describes and deplores the limited role the international Courts have played in settling international disputes.

This treatment of international law will not make happy those "legal theoreticians who ensconce themselves in a purely juridical vision of the world" or "certain writers who abandon themselves . . . drunkenly to a totalitarianism of politics." It will, however, challenge those who believe that there is a place in reality for values, law, and organization and a place in law for reality.

RICHARD N. SWIFT

New York University

VAN DER VEEN, GAEL. Aiding Underdeveloped Countries Through International Economic Co-operation. Pp. 200. Delft: Naamloze Vennootschap W. D. Neinema, 1953. No price. Written in English.

Heer Gael Van der Veen has undertaken the important task of tracing the evolution of "outside" aid to underdeveloped areas from the fifteenth century to the Colombo Plan and Point Four. This University of Amsterdam study succeeds in calling attention to the real difficulties inherent in attempting to implement what the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) in 1951 recommended to the United Nations as a moral duty.

This moral duty flows from the "legally qualified duty" of the less advanced nations to bring to fuller development economic possibilities in their territories. Dr. Charles Malik, the Lebanese delegate, put this question to the Council during its eighth session: "If the international community was of the opinion that the economic backwardness of a given region constituted a real danger, was it not in duty bound to intervene in the interest of the country itself as well as in the interest of the world-community as a whole?" (pp. 12, 169). An affirmative answer might serve as a rationalization for the unilateral imperialism of the First (fifteenth to eighteenth century) and Second (eighteenth to twentieth century) Periods of imperialism. The author has recognized this possibility in his conclusions with respect to each Period. (He finds that during the First Period the West European states did not even take the trouble to rationalize their motives. Their ideas of national interest were enough. Only Vitoria, Gentili, Grotius and a few others were in open opposition).

The author hopes that technical and financial assistance will be based increasingly upon moral principles. Most states have abandoned laissez-faire in undertaking tasks of rehabilitation in the social field within the state. "But regarding the extent of this state-task there is often a wide and fundamental difference of opinion" (p. 174). How much more so in the international field? Point Four appropriations have been small; they have been cut, and they have been infused with military aid. The program is no longer "new" and it never has been "bold."

Space does not permit more than mention of the special case, of Japan (whose development created an international menace), the impact of Wilsonian self-determination, the mandates system, and the history of the slave trade. Heer Van der Veen has important observations in these and other related fields.

The study is exceedingly well documented. Over two hundred titles are included in the Literature. There are 631 citations. Frequently used abbreviations are listed, from Bank to WHO. There is a minimum of statistics. Almost half of the study is a history of ideas concerning international co-operation, international law and cultural diffusion.

ROBERT ROCKAFELLOW

University of Rhode Island

Humanism and Education in East and West: An International Round Table Discussion Organized by UNESCO. Pp. 224. Paris: United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, 1953. $1.50.

As part of its program of developing closer intellectual and moral ties between East and West, UNESCO, at its Fifth Session, authorized an international round-table discussion among thinkers and philosophers. The conference was held from December 13 to 20, 1951, at Parliament House in New Delhi. The government co-operated fully in the arrangements, and prominent Indians took a leading part in the deliberations. The heart of the conference was a round-table discussion in which twelve eminent scholars from various countries participated.

The volume under review constitutes a report to the public of the deliberations that took place. It includes: a succinct review of the round-table discussions together with a summary of the conclusions and recommendations; the major addresses delivered by the Indian notables; and a series of essays, written by the participating scholars, incorporating ideas expressed in preparatory papers and views developed in the round-table discussions. The appendix contains a clearly formulated "basic document" which was drawn up by the UNESCO secretariat as a guide to the discussions and which provides an analysis of underlying problems.

The essays written by the participants in the round table form the main part of the book. These scholarly presentations provide a good introduction to the philosophical and religious systems of the Eurasian world. Hardly any aspect of Indian, Moslem, Classic, or Christian philosophy is left without some reference to it. Although to some extent the old stereotype of the East as representing high-minded contemplative spirituality and of the West as reflecting an aggressive scientific materialism finds an echo, the general trend is to emphasize the common ethical, philosophic, and religious aspirations within the variety of cultural systems. A number of the writers stress the fact that today the differences within each cultural system are greater than the differences between the East and the West as a whole. One point is repeatedly brought out—that the catastrophes of the twentieth century did not arise as a result of conflict between the two types of civilization but from "uncivilized minorities within a single culture." Dr. Radhakrishnan, in his opening address at the round-table conference, did not miss pointing out that Marxist Communism and the opposition to it were both characteristic products of Western civilization.

Besides the general question of the relation between the civilizations of the East and the West, two issues in particular occupied the attention of the participants of the round table: the significance of the scientific movement and the impact of democracy on life and education. Here, too, vestiges of traditional views as well as strong defense of the modern outlook were in evidence. One statement went so far as to decry science as responsible for all the evils of industrialism and militarism. But most of the speakers pointed out its importance for the improvement of living conditions in Asiatic countries. And there was even one speaker who defended science as an avenue to spiritual truth! In discussing democracy a European "brahmin" joined with a philosopher of the East in expressing skepticism of the ability of "the new masses" to absorb higher education. One Indian speaker exhibiting "a somewhat Platonic fear of democracy" sketched an ideal community of three classes along lines of The Republic—or was it a reflection of the caste system? But there were others, from India as well as from other countries, who emphasized the importance of a common education for the people and who recognized the significance of equality of educational opportunity in the development of a democratic social order. A point that received emphasis was the part that universities could play in the training of teachers for the common schools.

Seen in the perspective of the complex economic, political, and ideological problems that must be dealt with in the effort to advance East-West unity, the UNESCO conference seems, perhaps, no more than a wisp of straw in making the bricks for the edifice of world peace. But in these troubled times, surely, we should welcome every action, even if it is but a gesture, that may lead to closer co-operation.

I. B. BERKSON

College of the City of New York

CALVEZ, JEAN-YVES. Droit international et souveraineté en U.R.S.S. Pp. 299. Paris: Librairie Armand Colin, 1953. 800 fr.

The title of this book gives an insufficient idea of its scope. It is in reality a treatise on the various theories of international law current in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics since the Russian Revolution, and an analysis of elements of Soviet practice to indicate what positions have been taken. The author explains that he selects "sovereignty" for emphasis only because since the emergence of Vyshinsky it has been the keystone of Soviet doctrine. In its name various positions have been taken on the international scene. The author then discusses a good many of those positions.

Being in the nature of a treatise, the book discusses the Soviet views on sources of international law and correctly indicates the Soviet predilection for treaties. The author notes the reliance of Soviet diplomats on the nineteenth-century principles of international law, but points out that this is not a mark of conservatism but rather of the usefulness at the present stage in Soviet development of those principles in seeking to obtain the ends of Soviet foreign policy. He understands the influence of dialectic materialism upon Soviet conceptions. He considers that to a Soviet jurist the old form may appear changed when used for current purposes.

One may quarrel not with basic facts but with emphasis. For example, there seems to be underemphasis of the political factors in the discussion of the 1944 grant to Soviet republics of the right of foreign representation. The Yalta record is referred to as indicating political considerations, but the whole operation is considered as an "original" development in international law. The Stettinius memoirs leave no doubt that no one argued international law, but that Stalin wanted a group of votes in the new United Nations organization then in process of formulation, and Roosevelt countered with a compromise, under which only two of the Republics received seats even though the legal status under the Soviet constitution was made the same for all sixteen.

The errors of fact are few, largely in the description of individuals. The author confuses the two Trainins. One was the director of the Institute of Law and the legal theoretician, while the other has been a leading criminologist and in that capacity attended the sessions establishing the charter for the Nuremberg tribunal. The author calls the voices which began to appear in print in the 1940's "young voices." He mentions Krylov and Durdanevsky in particular along with Kozhevnikov. The latter was young at the time, but the other two were well on in years, appearing as new voices only because they had previously been in eclipse because of what seems to have been considered to be a lack of complete Soviet orientation.

In summary, this book presents an accurate account of theory and a valuable compendium of information to place alongside such general books as those of Taracouzio. There is some stimulating speculation in the conclusion. The author understands the role Soviet international lawyers are called upon to play in advancing the cause of their country's foreign office. For those foreign authorities who have failed to understand this relationship the book will be especially valuable.

JOHN N. HAZARD

Columbia University

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY

HOLCOMBE, A. N., et al. The Gaspar G. Bacon Lectures on the Constitution of the United States, 1940-1950. Boston University. Pp. x, 541. Boston: Boston University Press, 1953. No price.

This distinguished potpourri consists of the ten Bacon lectures on the Constitution delivered at Boston University from 1940 to 1950. Six of the contributors are political scientists, two are historians, one is a practicing lawyer, and one is a former Supreme Court Justice. There are as many approaches to the Constitution as there are commentators, but perhaps the most striking characteristic is the number of contributors who do not go on the assumption that the Constitution is what the Supreme Court says it is. In several of the lectures the Supreme Court is scarcely mentioned. This healthy trend is exemplified in Leonard White's fascinating picture of the formative practices in public administration under the Federalists, or Louise Overacker's study of presidential campaign funds. Again, Carl Swisher in the 1947 lecture discusses the postwar Constitution, not in terms of Supreme Court decisions, but in terms of the broad trends in relations between Congress and the President, and the developing powers of those "rivals of government," business corporations and labor unions.

Inevitably, however, the Supreme Court does receive its due. Two pieces deal in judicial biography. Henry S. Commager contributes a masterful vignette of Joseph Story, and Charles Fairman draws on his research into the life and times of Justice Bradley in an attempt to answer the question, what makes a great Justice? Former Justice Roberts comes closer to the present with a review of recent tendencies which he suggests have taken us far from the original constitutional "blueprint" towards a condition of "statism."

Two of the lectures may have more relevance to present problems than the rest. While much has happened since 1943, when Robert Cushman lectured on some constitutional problems of civil liberty, what he has to say on free speech, the Negro and the Constitution, and the Japanese evacuation is illuminated by his usual good sense and clear thinking and is still good reading.

The 1950 lectures by Harrison Tweed offer some explanation of the American Bar Association's current effort to amend the Constitution relative to the Supreme Court. Their proposals, which have now reached the stage of congressional discussion, would fix the size of the Supreme Court at nine, compel retirement at 75, disqualify any member of the Court as a candidate for President or Vice-President until five years after leaving the Court, specifically confirm the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional, and guarantee the Court's appellate jurisdiction in all cases arising under the Constitution. The goals sought by these proposals will probably be approved by most students of the Constitution, but there will be less agreement that a constitutional amendment is required to freeze a present consensus into the Constitution. The American Bar Association's ill-starred venture with the Bricker Amendment has left its competence to advise on such problems somewhat in doubt.

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT

University of Chicago

CAHN, EDMOND (Ed.). Supreme Court and Supreme Law. Pp. ix, 250. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1954. $4.00.

Crisis and contempt are not strangers to the Supreme Court. In the course of its career that tribunal has known the pain of self-inflicted wounds, of which the deepest was the Dred Scott decision. More than once it has weathered the defiance of the Executive. President Roosevelt's threat to "pack" the Court in 1937 is the most memorable instance. On that occasion cynics observed that a switch in time saved nine. A distinguished federal judge was reminded of Jonathan Wild, who, Fielding relates, would have ravished a certain damsel "if she had not, by a timely compliance, prevented him." The President's popular following was large, the damage to the Court's prestige was measurable, but the moral of the tale lay in its ending: the public rallied to the Court's support.

Here was a vivid illustration of the public's respect for the Court—a respect which sometimes, among laymen at least, borders on reverence. Indeed, in the survey of prestige ratings for professions and occupations, conducted by Professor Hatt several years ago, Supreme Court Justices took first place.

This prestige of the Court rests upon its extraordinary power of judicial review. It was in Marbury v. Madison, decided in 1803, that the Court first asserted that power and established itself as the final arbiter of the meaning of the Constitution. Nor is it new learning that causes this celebrated case to be denounced as usurpation by some and welcomed as a national blessing by others. Only four years ago one of the Justices, writing in a law journal, spoke of the case in these hallowed tones: "Upon this rock the nation has been built." More recently a leader of legal education hailed the case as "one of the most significant and dramatic developments in the history of our country."

Denouncer and enthusiast alike will agree that the sesquicentennial of Marbury v. Madison is an appropriate time for appraisal and stock taking. This book is a symposium dedicated to that end. It is an interesting and worthy contribution to the subject of judicial review. The contributors are, and speak the language of, lawyers, but all readers may pursue these pages with pleasure and profit, though they may disagree with many of the views expressed. Justice Hugo Black has expressed warm praise for this work.

There are six contributors, all authorities in constitutional law. Five are teachers in our law schools: Bishoff and Cahn, New York University; Frank, Yale; Freund, Harvard; and Hurst, University of Wisconsin. The sixth is Mr. Charles P. Curtis of the Massachusetts Bar.

In the first part of the book are found six short papers, read at meetings at New York University Law School, together with the spontaneous and unrevised discussion following each paper. The second part of the work is comprised of four comprehensive articles, one by each of the last four contributors named above. Each article, like each paper, is addressed to a particular phase of judicial review. An informative historical introduction (Chapter 1), supplied by Mr. Cahn, the editor, completes the undertaking.

One of the items here mentioned is the growing tendency of the Justices to pick up their pens and write off in several directions. The "spawning" of dissenting and concurring opinions proceeds at an alarming rate and weakens confidence in the Court. Of the 92 cases decided in 1952, for example, there were unanimous opinions in only 23.

Current interest in civil liberties makes Mr. Frank's article on Review and Basic Liberties (Chapter 5) very timely. Those who regard the Court as a champion of civil rights will find challenge in some of the conclusions here reached, not the smallest of which is the assertion that "courts love liberty most when it is under pressure least."

BERNARD F. CATALDO

University of Pennsylvania

TUNC, ANDRÉ, and SUZANNE TUNC. Le Système constitutionnel des États-Unis d'Amérique. Vol. I: Histoire constitutionnelle. Pp. viii, 507. Paris: Éditions Domat Montchrestien, 1954. 1,800 fr.

Rarely does an American historical scholar pick up a foreign book about his country without fear and trembling, and more rarely still does he put it down with a feeling of complete satisfaction. So few and far between are volumes like Alexis de Tocqueville's Democracy in America or Lord Bryce's American Commonwealth that when one receives a study of their distinction, one is overjoyed. It is no exaggeration to state that the work before us belongs to a very select class.

André Tunc, Professor on the Faculty of Law at Grenoble, and his wife spent several years in the United States studying the American legal system and acquiring experience in the service of the International Monetary Fund. To say that they have a command of their material would be a gross understatement; they have mastered it to such an extent that they produced a synthesis of American constitutional history which is an important contribution to the subject. For French readers this work is of especial importance, for nothing of its kind is presently available to them. Furthermore, this volume contains excellent bibliographies of American history in general, as well as of American law, and it has an index which will serve as a useful guide to those Americanisms which are so baffling to foreigners. I know from experience how important it is to have ready definitions of "yellow dog contracts," "featherbedding," and "scalawags."

SHEPARD B. CLOUGH
Columbia University

HARRIS, JOSEPH P. The Advice and Consent of the Senate: A Study of the Confirmation of Appointments by the United States Senate. Pp. xii, 457. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1953. $5.00.

This admirable book is one of those rare studies of American government which will make a reader wonder why nobody ever did this before. At any rate, nobody will have to do it again soon, for Professor Harris and his research assistants seem to have gone into every conceivable aspect of the problem from Washington to Eisenhower.

This book is also one that needed to be written, both because of the intrinsic importance of its subject and because it is the best study so far to appear of the amendment of the Constitution by custom and usage. All students of American government are familiar with the fact that the Senate has in reality (though not in words) amended the Constitution to restrict the President's power to nominate, with some exceptions, to those persons who are recommended to him by the senators from the state of the nominee's residence; but surely few can be familiar with the widespread ramifications of the practice. "Senatorial courtesy" began in Washington's administration, and it has carried down to date. It has helped to preserve the Byrd and other machines. It has kept some of the very best nominees from confirmation.

Where senatorial courtesy is not involved, it is apparent from Professor Harris' study that strong Presidents have generally had the most trouble in getting their nominees consented to; that persons of pronounced convictions who have written or spoken on public questions "are likely to face difficulty in being confirmed"; that "several of the most sensational contests in the Senate have risen over the nominations of Jews to high office"; that pressure groups are often able to stop a nominee they do not like in the Senate, when the President can resist their efforts; and that the Senate will refuse confirmation for strictly partisan reasons: "In the 1948 session, when the Republicans were confident of victory at the forthcoming election, 11,122 nominations were returned to the President without any action by the Senate."

The five chapters in this book on the cases of Louis D. Brandeis, David Lilienthal, and Leland Olds would stand alone as case studies in American politics. These cases also show that any man must really be devoted to the public service to risk the ordeal that these men went through.

Perhaps the nadir of advice and consent was reached when Senator Bilbo spent hours of the Senate's time, and filled up pages of the Congressional Record, with his objections to the nomination of a judge who had, years before, sentenced Bilbo to prison and to a fine of $1,000.

DAYTON D. MCKEAN
University of Colorado

WHITE, LEONARD D. The States and the Nation. Pp. xi, 103. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1953. $2.75.

The Latin maxim, multum in parvo, aptly characterizes this slender volume by Leonard D. White. Originally given as the Edward D. White Lectures on Citizenship, The States and the Nation has now appeared under the imprint of the Louisiana State University Press.

The temper and theme of this book is set by its frank avowal that "A federal system implies a partnership, all members of which are effective players on the team, and all of whom retain the capacity for independent action. It does not imply a system of collaboration in which one of the collaborators is annihilated by the other." Three trenchant sections or individual lectures sustain this argument. The various lecture titles carry their own impact and suggest their individual scope: (1) The March of Power to Washington; (2) The Strength and Limitations of the States; (3) The Next Quarter Century.

Along the way specific policies looking towards the attainment of a dynamic federalism make their appearance and receive forthright presentation, dispassionate yet positive in tone and language. So far as Professor White has a program to offer it compasses these chief points. The states can recover their early role in the federal union if it should be found possible to return to them some functions and activities now carried on or financed in whole or in part by the federal government. Conditions now attached to federal grants-in-aid may be modified so as to afford the states greater freedom as to ways and means of action. The states might help themselves by wider and more effective use of interstate compacts. Lastly, they might avoid further limiting federal legislation in emerging policy fields, says Professor White, by vigorous and energetic use of those powers they now possess.

Fundamentally judgment of any book must proceed from the purpose and objective to which its author sought to dedicate his work. In terms of his own basic premises, Professor White has done a competent job. His argument has been set forth clearly, and can scarcely be mistaken for that which it is not. Absent is a sense of fanatical fervor—either panegyric or diatribe—while realism infuses his presentation and makes mature consideration of his specific proposals essential. At the point of acceptance or rejection of these suggestions, each person of course becomes a free agent. But States and the Nation should be read.

CHARLES W. SHULL
Wayne University

MCCORMICK, RICHARD P. The History of Voting in New Jersey: A Study of the Development of Election Machinery, 1664-1911. Pp. xii, 228. New Brunswick, N. J.: Rutgers University Press, 1953. $5.00.

The search for more effective ways of determining the voters' verdict is an unending one, and if the details of election procedure seem tedious to the non-specialist, the search itself is vital to the functioning of representative government. In our federal system, valid generalization on this as on many subjects is impossible without careful studies of individual states; such a study Dr. McCormick has now provided for New Jersey.

The book is divided into seven chapters: the proprietary period (1664-1703), New Jersey as a royal colony (1703-1774), the Revolutionary era (1774-1788), the early national period (1789-1838), the four decades from 1839 to 1876, the late nineteenth-century years of corruption and reform (1877-1899), and the Progressive era (1900-1911) culminating in the election measures of Woodrow Wilson's governorship. On each period Dr. McCormick gives us a little of the economic and political setting, a description of the election machinery and the changes made in it, and some indication of the way it worked in practice. Statistical tables show the number of voters who went to the polls each year from 1789 to 1900, and their proportionate relation to the total electorate.

The contrast between today's highly regulated election machinery and the casual methods of the eighteenth century is illuminating. Election officers might close the polls arbitrarily to favor their own party, voting places were sometimes as much as sixty miles distant from outlying areas, the polls were kept open for days at a time, and voice voting rather than the ballot was the rule. Yet the system worked smoothly on the whole, and New Jersey's freehold suffrage was liberal for the time.

Since colonial days, there have been two main lines of development: "the extension of the suffrage to ever wider segments of the population," and "the gradual emergence of an ever more detailed body of regulations" to govern the actual conduct of both general and primary elections. In the process political parties, originally ignored by the law, came to hold a highly regulated and therefore a thoroughly official position.

Dr. McCormick finds that the motivations for these changes were much more practical than theoretical. Lawmakers almost never attempted to justify particular suffrage requirements on the basis of principle, and in the long struggle to make the voting process efficient and convenient, motives of honest reform and partisan advantage were inextricably mixed.

RANSOM E. NOBLE, JR.

Pratt Institute

HYMAN, SIDNEY. The American President. Pp. 342. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $4.00.

This is a very interesting and almost unique publication. It is not a traditional or legalistic discussion of the powers of the President as outlined in the Constitution nor is it a development of these powers. It is more of an exposition of the political process involved in the election and activities of the President as well as the relations of the President to the people and the other divisions of the government. It might very accurately be called the unwritten constitution of the Presidency. It deals with matters not treated in other publications on the President and too little known or understood and possibly more vital than the dry bones of the constitutionality of the powers of the office of the President.

It is in this field of extraconstitutionality that the author makes a significant contribution. It is the red-blooded President as the director of the greatest nation on earth in both foreign and domestic affairs that is discussed and not the grand-mama type of Whig King misnamed by the Constitution. It is not the titular type of executive which the Whig scheme of political organization provides for and which is really its chief contribution to practical politics but a world figure exercising semi-royal powers with almost the destiny of the free world as his responsibility. Whereas Jefferson said there would come a time when all Europe would be interested in the election of the American President, it is now mankind. So it has happened that a President of a string of loosely associated provincial states along the Atlantic Coast has become practically a popularly elected monarch of a unified nation whose foreign policy materially involves the peace of the world. While it was once Rome and later Britain that ruled the civilized world, it is now America, with this important difference—that its object is peace and self-government for all peoples.

The President as a candidate to succeed himself as well as the candidate of the opposition is discussed in all of the ramifications of a presidential campaign. The pros and cons of the various proposals for nominating presidential candidates as well as the different suggestions as to the methods of electing presidents are considered in a fresh and convincing manner.

The two-party system as an agent of democracy in phrasing and settling political issues and finally uniting the nation in a modus vivendi is especially emphasized as the most practical and satisfactory political process that has yet been devised. But for this system the nation would undoubtedly fall apart. The party system possibly does more than the Constitution to maintain national unity.

The President as an artist is presented in a contrast between Jefferson and Madison. Madison, whose work in the Federal Convention made him famous, who was quite as much the father of the Republican party as Jefferson, who had had eight years of experience in executive matters as Jefferson's Secretary of State, and who in his Federalist papers showed a most thorough understanding of the problems and workings of modern governments, when confronted with the task of the presidential office was almost, if not actually, a failure. Which is more important as a qualification for the office of President—to be an artist in politics or a scholar? Was this the difference between Hoover and Franklin D. Roosevelt? Anyway, this is an interesting basis for the comparative study of American Presidents.

The President's roles in self-defense, as manager of social justice and prosperity, and as director of war and peace are shown to be important roles of his office. The reorganization of the executive is critically examined, and important suggestions are made. This book is an informative supplement to the literature on the Presidency.

C. PERRY PATTERSON

University of Texas

WEBSTER, NOAH. Letters of Noah Webster. Edited by Harry R. Warfel. Pp. xlvii, 562. New York: Library Publishers [c. 1953]. $7.50.

To later generations of Americans, Noah Webster came to be known as the man who set the pattern for the American language, and made his name synonymous with the word "Dictionary." But to his contemporaries he was something far different. They knew him, to be sure, as a man who was uncommonly conscious of his importance as a lexicographer and grammarian, with a special penchant for disposing ruthlessly of all critics and criticisms. But they knew him also as rather more than an amateur scientist, one who wrote and published A Brief History of Epidemic and Pestilential Diseases, as the author of a History of the United States, as editor of a revised version of the Bible, and above all as a commentator on politics who wrote letters, generally unsolicited and sometimes unappreciated, to such individuals as Samuel Adams, James Madison, Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, Timothy Pickering, Thomas Jefferson, Oliver Wolcott, Rufus King, John Jay, and Daniel Webster.

In politics Noah Webster was a conservative of the first magnitude; furthermore, he identified his opinions with high principle, and felt called upon to castigate his opponents as unmitigated rogues. His letter to Thomas Jefferson, written in October 1801, expressed well the sentiments of extreme anti-Jeffersonians; but with hardly a change it would have satisfied anti-Jackson men equally well in 1829, or anti-Roosevelt men in 1933. Webster's unofficial definitions of the words Republican and Democrat still make interesting reading. "Republicans," he said, are "the friends of our Representative Governments, who believe that no influence whatever should be exercised in a state which is not directly authorized by the Constitution and the laws." But a Democrat is "a person who attempts an undue opposition to or influence over government by means of private clubs, secret intrigues, or by popular meetings"; or, more simply, just "an opposer of administration generally" (p. 208).

These letters supplement and reinforce Warfel's biography of Webster, published in 1936. They range the whole gamut of Webster's interests, his efforts to obtain copyright laws, his theories about the yellow fever, his views on history, education, agriculture, manufacturing, and the reform of the alphabet, his replies to his critics, and his political observations. His long letter to John Pickering should be of interest to all students of language, and for the social and political historian nearly every letter has a point. The editing is painstakingly done, and is reinforced by both an index of words and a good general index.

JOHN D. HICKS

University of California

BETTS, EDWIN MORRIS (Ed.). Thomas Jefferson's Farm Book: With Commentary and Relevant Extracts from Other Writings. Foreword by Francis L. Berkeley, Jr. (Facsimile 179 pp.). Pp. xxiii, 552. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1953. $15.00.

Thomas Jefferson, while a man of many interests, was both a Virginia plantation owner-operator and a countryman of distinction. He loved his ancestral acres, his home, and the environment in which he was born, lived, and died. However, he was much more than a farmer in the ordinary sense. Monticello, as a place where new ideas were being tried out and Arthur Young's Experimental Agriculture was carefully studied, was perhaps more than any other farm or plantation of its time the forerunner of agricultural science and the agricultural experiment station of today. Jefferson's remarkable imagination, curiosity, and scientific instincts, coupled with his capacity for careful observation and accurate record-keeping and note-taking, make him very important in our history of scientific agriculture and rural life. Thomas Jefferson for more than fifty years kept two notebooks close at hand in which he carefully recorded or casually jotted down observations and notes about horticulture and farm management.

Thomas Jefferson's Farm Book is a companion to the previously published Garden Book. Both were edited by the same author and published by the Princeton University Press under the auspices of the American Philosophical Society of which Jefferson was at one time president. This volume begins with a brief but excellent introductory essay by Francis L. Berkeley of the University of Virginia Library, which gives the historical setting and the significance of the Farm Book, particularly in relation to plantation economy of the time. The major part of the volume naturally divides into two parts: First, a facsimile of Thomas Jefferson's Farm Book, and, second, "a commentary and relevant extracts from other writings." For a period of 32 years, 1774-1826, Jefferson jotted down in clear, legible handwriting all kinds of notes and memoranda such as inventories, accounts, bits of handy information, and so forth, in connection with his two plantations, Monticello and Poplar Forest. The facsimile reproduction is excellent and for all practical but non-sentimental purposes the general reader or the meticulous scholar might just as well have the original in his hands. The second part, which contains the "commentary and relevant extracts from other writings," is of great significance and importance.

The Farm Book standing alone is fragmentary and incomplete and does not have much of value except as source material for the research scholar. Dr. Betts, the editor, is professor of biology at the University of Virginia and is the foremost student of the agricultural and horticultural phases of Jefferson's life and activities in Monticello. He has carefully examined all the available letters and other material of Jefferson. He selected and organized this material under topical headings which relate it where possible to the Farm Book. Each topic is introduced by a critical explanatory statement.

This edition of Thomas Jefferson's Farm Book, with the letters and commentary, is both an important source book and a contribution to biography. It will be of particular interest to students of the life and personality of Jefferson, to agricultural and other historians who are concerned with plantation agriculture, and with the emergence of scientific agriculture. To the "countryman" this is a classic for those who live in the country and enjoy and appreciate its historical literature.

M. L. WILSON

U. S. Department of Agriculture
(Retired) Washington, D. C.

ROOSEVELT, THEODORE. The Letters of Theodore Roosevelt. Vols. VII and VIII The Days of Armageddon, 1909-1919. Edited by Elting E. Morison et al. Pp. xiv, 816; viii, 817-1621. Cambridge Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $20.00.

This is the fourth and the last two-volume set of Theodore Roosevelt's letters to appear under the editorship of Morison and his associates. During the period the editors were preparing their earlier volumes, all the unpublished letters from Roosevelt to Henry Cabot Lodge were closed, but later Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr. made available to the editors the letters written between 1884 and 1906. Lodge and Roosevelt were the closest of life-long friends, and they were constant associates in politics, excepting only the Bull Moose years. It would seem, therefore, that until the full correspondence between Roosevelt and Lodge has been made available to scholars, there will remain a great deal to be revealed concerning the influence of these two men upon each other and of their tactics and strategy in relation to other men and the issues.

The letters published in the two volumes under review represent perhaps less than one tenth of the total available for the period covered, but scrupulous and painstaking care in their selection and extended and illuminating comment in the editor's footnotes, including explanations of the matter on which Roosevelt was writing, give the selections high value. In them Roosevelt reveals himself as an eager, joyous, and successful big game hunter, a fairly prolific contributing editor, candidate for President (1912), a hater and often an unfair critic of Woodrow Wilson, a champion of the Allies long before the United States entered the First World War, a would-be division commander in that war, an inordinately proud father (his four sons and son-in-law were in the service, and his son Quentin was killed), and a skeptic regarding world organization and peace plans.

By no means the least significant contribution of these volumes is found in Appendix V, "A Note on Method and Materials," by John W. Blum. The note evaluates the principal sources in such a manner as to be of the greatest possible aid to other Roosevelt scholars and students of his time. Furthermore, the author supplies an additional aid by indicating certain collections which one might assume to be sources but which, in fact, are not rewarding. The Manuscript Collections, some two hundred, are listed in Appendix VI, those being italicized that proved most useful to the editors. The editors would be the first to agree that the basic Roosevelt scholar must go beyond these eight volumes of letters, to the materials the editors combed and other sources, for definitive study of one of America's most versatile and engaging men. But the scholar will nevertheless find the Morison collection of great value, and the general reader and student will find it revealing, interesting, stimulating, and at times amusing.

CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON

State College of Washington

PRESSLY, THOMAS J. Americans Interpret Their Civil War. Pp. xvi, 347. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1954. $5.00.

Professor Pressly has written an interesting and valuable book. It is a survey of the literature relating to the origin and character of the Civil War. In the first third of it there is laid a good foundation in a detailed study of what the protagonists themselves had to say about the war both during its course and after it was over. Upon this is built an account of the subsequent treatment of the subject by the historians both amateur and professional. The turning point in the story is reached with the work of James Ford Rhodes and the rise of academic historiography. In this Professor Pressly very rightly sees the prevalence of a nationalist school of thought. But its conclusions have subsequently been challenged by students dominated successively by the influence of political radicalism, a revived Southern sectarianism, and an extreme abhorrence of war. Professor Pressly thinks that today there are signs of a new synthesis; and his books ends with a discussion of the extent to which this has been achieved by Professor Nevins in his study of the Ordeal of the Union.

It is, of course, extremely difficult at so short a range to see things in a true perspective. And it may be that not all those whose work is here discussed will look in the long run as large as they do now. It is the case, to an extent greater perhaps than Professor Pressly allows, that historical interpretation is cumulative. It does not follow, because historical understanding is relative and not absolute, that all we can look for is a mere fluctuation of equally valid but incoherent versions of past events. To accept this would be to make less than full use of a familiar and well-established scientific procedure. No hypothesis comprehends all the evidence. Every pattern has its discards. But every scrap of evidence discarded is a challenge to the adequacy of the accepted pattern; and historical, like scientific, progress consists in enlargement of the hypothesis to comprehend more of the facts. In this point of view a charge, hinted at on page 299, may be preferred against a good deal of recent work that it has consisted too much of debate and too little of investigation. For it is to be expected of new viewpoints not merely that they should put in a new light what is already familiar, but that they should make intelligible some of the evidence that has hitherto been left aside.

H. HALE BELLOT

University College, University of London

WOODMASON, CHARLES. The Carolina Backcountry on the Eve of the Revolution: The Journal and Other Writings of Charles Woodmason, Anglican Itinerant. Edited with an Introduction by Richard J. Hooker. Pp. xxxix, 305. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1953. $5.00.

Charles Woodmason spent only about two decades of his life in America, yet in that brief span he managed to live two almost opposite lives. From 1752 until December 1765, Woodmason was a fairly successful planter, land-speculator, and minor office holder. From the fall of 1766, at the completion of his visit in England, until late in 1774, he was an Anglican clergyman. Most of his clerical duties were performed in the backcountry of South Carolina. His private journal, for parts of the years 1766, 1767, and 1768, three of his sermon books, a few letters, and numerous miscellaneous writings have been preserved. They are here collected and published for the first time.

This volume consists of an introductory essay and three parts. The first section contains the Journal; the second, Woodmason's miscellaneous writings on "Society and Institutions of the Backcountry"; and the final part includes the writings of this frontier clergyman in regard to the South Carolina Regulator movement. Here again can be noted an interesting ambivalence. In the first two sections, the reader is almost overwhelmed by the bitterness with which this Anglican clergyman denounces the Baptists and Presbyterians, exposes the lack of morality among the frontier people, and reveals the barrenness of life in the Carolina Piedmont. In the last section, however, Woodmason is the apologist and defender of the political rights of these same people. More than any of his contemporaries, he verbalized the situation and fought for a redress of grievances.

Professor Hooker has done a laudable job of editing these documents. His introductory essay evidences a staggering amount of research into the life and activity of Woodmason. He presents the result of this labor in such form that the reader senses the importance of the material that is to follow and becomes interested in the writer. The introduction to part three—the Regulator Documents—is a superb essay which explains the movement, establishes its place in our national history, and clarifies the way in which the South Carolina Regulators differed from their more famous namesakes in North Carolina. Throughout the sources, explanations and cross references abound.

He who reads this volume must, of course, balance Woodmason's violent language with a knowledge of his intense prejudice. Having done this, with the editor's help, many readers will find that they have gained new insight into frontier conditions and problems. In addition, it seems safe to say, many readers will have been intrigued by the personality of Woodmason and by the passions and the contradictions which drove him with such intensity toward frustration and unhappiness.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

Cornish Flat, New Hampshire

PATRICK, REMBERT W. Florida Fiasco: Rampant Rebels on the Georgia-Florida Border, 1810-1815. Pp. x, 359. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1954. $5.00.

Among the components of the United States of America which have a Spanish background none is more venerable than Florida (unless Puerto Rico is included). Yet Florida's history has probably been less explored than the histories of Texas, New Mexico, and California. Capable local historians are industriously writing Florida history, however, as this and other recent works on the subject demonstrate.

Professor Patrick's thorough and well-written volume deals with the efforts of the United States government and its frontier citizens to seize Florida from Spain—or rather the Floridas, for at this time there was both an East and a West Florida. The efforts failed, but they are no less interesting on that account. West Florida was occupied during the period, but was not ceded by Spain until East Florida was also ceded by the Treaty of 1819, ratified two years later.

Professor Patrick roundly condemns the United States for most of its Florida policies. "For more than a quarter-century," he declares, "the United States used diplomacy, intrigue, chicanery, force, and war in its march on the Floridas. . . . The encouragement and consequent repudiation of eager, patriotic George Mathews was indefensible. In their cavalier treatment of him the president [Madison] and secretary [Monroe] acted as autocrats casting aside and denouncing a faithful servant to save themselves embarrassment. By invading the territory of and making war on a friendly power [Spain] without the consent of Congress, President Madison followed in the steps of Old World dictators. The ideals of the young American republic were forgotten as his desire for the Floridas overcame his sense of justice" (p. 303).

It is well to remember, however, that the United States was not only suffering injury from the Napoleonic Wars but was also gravely disturbed by the fear that its security would be threatened by the seizure, sooner or later, of these adjacent Spanish possessions by England or some other strong European power. And it should also be recalled that national unity had long been threatened by the machinations of Spain, England, and France in the Floridas and in the Old Southwest. Approval of these Florida policies and procedures not only by Madison and Monroe but by Thomas Jefferson, Henry Clay, and many other leaders of the time may not justify them, but it tends to create a presumption in favor of their reasonableness in view of the grave circumstances in which they occurred.

It was the United States Senate that rejected the policy of territorial acquisition by aggression and checked Madison, Monroe, and their advisers in their plans of conquest. "Eventually," says Professor Patrick, "the United States acquired the Floridas by fair negotiation. Title to the provinces resulted from a negotiated treaty and not from trickery and force" (p. 304). But the garrisons of the United States were never withdrawn from West Florida after 1814, and Andrew Jackson invaded East Florida in 1818. Spain may be said, therefore, to have negotiated under duress and to have ceded these provinces very reluctantly, after pleading in vain for British support.

The author has used a great variety of sources, both published and in manuscript, and has told his story with evident zest. Two secondary works which he does not refer to in his notes or mention in his bibliography, Frank Updike's Diplomacy of the War of 1812 and J. Fred Rippy's Rivalry of the United States and Great Britain over Latin America, might have given him a firmer grasp of the broader diplomatic aspects of the problem; and a map would have enabled the reader to follow the details of his narrative with greater ease.

J. FRED RIPPY

University of Chicago

ALDEN, JOHN RICHARD. The American Revolution, 1775-1783. Pp. xviii, 294. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $5.00.

This volume is the second in "The New American Nation Series" edited by Henry Steele Commager and Richard B. Morris. It contains in a clear, concise style many of the findings of students of the American Revolution during the half century since Claude Van Tyne's volume in the original "American Nation Series" edited by Albert Bushnell Hart.

In keeping with recent trends in scholarship, Dr. Alden finds that George III was not a monstrous tyrant, discovers no hard and fast line between the Radicals and Conservatives, praises the Second Continental Congress for its achievements, and is inclined to believe that the Articles of Confederation were mostly good. He seems definitely convinced that Silas Deane sold secrets to the British, doubts that a Conway Cabal ever existed, believes the number and intellectual importance of the Loyalists have been exaggerated, and omits the Galloway Plan for colonial administration and conciliation.

Although it appears hard for him to do so in some passages, he confesses the movement for independence was inarticulate before the fall of 1775. He admits that the philosophy of the American Revolution was based on earlier philosophies and precedents. Yet, in his opinion, the Americans combined them in a way that made them liberal—even progressive. Consequently, Jefferson's Declaration, the supreme summation of their views, has revolutionized history.

Dr. Alden is prudently cautious in following the lead of writers who have seen in the land reforms of the Revolutionary generation the development of a more equitable distribution of land. But he seems a little too exuberant in his statements about more liberal voting laws when the colonies became states, and he errs in stating that a Virginian had to own five hundred acres of undeveloped land to possess the ballot. The amount was fifty acres, the same under the state government as under colonial law. Dr. Alden probably is also on shaky ground when he implies, at least, that the western population of Virginia was more equitably represented in the new state government than it had been under the colonial regime.

The most disappointing feature of the book is, in my opinion, its scant and oversimple treatment of revolutionary propaganda and of the intellectual, moral, social, and economic phases of the period. Its most excellent aspect is its splendid description of military campaigns, analyzed mainly from the standpoint of commanders and strategy and, consequently, not overly burdened with detail. The undocumented statement that Massachusetts instructed its delegation in the Continental Congress to vote for independence in January, 1776, is rather startling, since Elbridge Gerry wrote a letter to James Warren, dated March 26, 1776, in which he suggested that the General Court of Massachusetts send such instructions. Gerry was one of the representatives of Massachusetts in the Congress. Disconcerting, too, are the assertions that the delegates of South Carolina and Georgia were sent similar instructions by their governments on or before April 5, 1776. Leading historians of those states have not mentioned such forwardness in the independence movement.

ROBERT L. HILLDRUP

Mary Washington College
University of Virginia

MOORE, GLOVER. The Missouri Controversy, 1819-1821. Pp. xi, 383. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1953. $6.00.

The Missouri Compromise is imbedded in American history as thoroughly as George Washington or Christopher Columbus, and it has come to be considered as much a matter of fact as either of these. Therefore, what could there be new about these Missouri Compromises (for there were really two, or even three, before the question was settled), and why should one write a whole book on the subject? Would it not be retelling a twice-told tale? Professor Glover Moore, who teaches history at Mississippi State College, thought that the story was worth a book and that in fact the whole tale had never yet been told. And anyone who will read this interesting and well-written book will likely agree with the author.

The first debate over the admission of Missouri in the early part of 1819 produced little or no comment outside of Congress, and only by propaganda meetings designed to induce Congress to prohibit slavery in Missouri was the question made mildly exciting to the country as a whole. As the question became more involved during the next two years, the country began to take more notice; but even so, people in general were still more concerned with what could be done about the hard times produced by the Panic of 1819. So, though the dispute sounded to Thomas Jefferson like "a fire bell in the night," and it seemed to John Quincy Adams like "a title-page to a great tragic volume," yet the general public failed to take alarm.

But Professor Moore would not have it understood that the Missouri Controversy was not important. Indeed, it was of vast importance, for it was not a flash out of a clear sky; it brought to the surface a tension which had long been growing between the North and South. And it also gave almost perfect proof that from that time to the outbreak of the Civil War there was to be little or nothing new under the sun in the American political struggle over slavery; for in this controversy appeared the clear outlines of the abolition crusade, the secession threat, Seward's higher law doctrine, Douglas' squatter sovereignty panacea, the Wilmot Proviso, and the threat of political parties based on geography.

Professor Moore has bolstered his book with the results of an impressive amount of research upon a couple of dozen collections of manuscript correspondence, more than a hundred newspaper files, and various pamphlets and books.

E. MERTON COULTER

University of Georgia

MOORE, GUY W. The Case of Mrs. Surratt. Pp. xi, 142. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. $3.00.

Although this small volume of little more than a hundred pages, which examines the truth of the complicity of Mrs. Surratt in the assassination of President Lincoln, is distinctly a piece of historical research, it should make a wider appeal than merely to scholars of the Civil War period; it should hold interest for the students of political science, and, indeed, for all lovers of justice.

Interest in the case cannot, of course, be as keen today as it was at the time of the conspiracy trial, or immediately thereafter when doubts began to be entertained as to her guilt. However, it is never too late to try to establish the truth, and, as far as history can do it, to right a wrong.

Unfortunately, the author is able to reach no definite conclusion in regard to the justice of Mrs. Surratt's execution. He is properly careful and objective in weighing evidence, recognizes that second-hand evidence is difficult to evaluate (p. 10, note 42), has checked statements from one source with other sources wherever possible, and accepts the fact that secondary evidence is not definitive. The conclusion reached is cautious: "there was and is a reasonable doubt" (p. 105), and again the author explicitly speaks of "the death of a woman whose guilt was never more than a guess" (p. 118).

Many questions, which would naturally arise in the mind of the reader, even if the author did not raise them, are still left unanswered, and there is little likelihood—barring the improbable event of the discovery of further documentary proof—that further research will resolve these questions. The author has made a thorough investigation of all available materials, both manuscript and printed, as is attested by the footnotes and bibliography.

The organization is simple and straightforward: the background and life of Mrs. Surratt is given briefly and the dramatis personae of the group in her boardinghouse on H Street in Washington introduced. The involved, protracted controversies ever since her death are reviewed and the evidence produced at the trial painstakingly weighed, upon which evidence the conclusion—so far as a conclusion is drawn—is based.

The style is simple and clear and touched with dramatic vividness. Several illustrations are used to dramatize a book so filled with drama that it scarcely needs such a gruesome illustration as the Execution of the Conspirators (facing p. 84). For those who can enjoy the newspaper account of the actual execution, a photograph of the Constitutional Union for July 7, 1865 is reproduced (facing p. 116), though in so small a type as to be difficult to decipher. A map of Washington to show the relative location of her house to Ford's Theater and other key points in the drama is mildly helpful.

ELLA LONN

Goucher College

DORRIS, JONATHAN T. Pardon and Amnesty Under Lincoln and Johnson. Pp. 460. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1953. $7.50.

Almost thirty years ago Professor Dorris began his study of amnesty and pardon in the reconstruction period. The historians of that period have waited with anticipation for his promised book on this tremendously important subject. If it has been a long time coming, Dr. Dorris can plead, in addition to the usual professorial excuse of the press of other duties, that he had to perform a truly massive job of research. He can also say that he wanted his book to be, when it appeared, as nearly definitive as he could make it and that definitive books on significant subjects are not made in a few years. And he has produced what should stand as the classic account for a much longer period than it took him to complete his research.

Here is the story, told with as much detail as even the specialist could ask for, of pardon and amnesty under Lincoln and Johnson and of the long struggle of the former Confederates to regain their rights and privileges. By far the greater part of the book is concerned with the policies of the two Presidents and with their radical opponents, but the narrative goes down to 1898, when the last disabilities imposed during reconstruction were finally removed. Among the topics treated by Dr. Dorris are: political prisoners, military oaths, pardon attorneys, pardons for the rich, pardons for civil leaders, presidential and congressional amnesty, and pardon and amnesty in the courts. Wisely he decided to highlight his essentially legal account by relating case histories of representative Confederates who sought pardons: Lee, General Ewell, General Howell Cobb, John H. Reagan, Clement C. Clay, and others. A chapter is devoted to Jefferson Davis, who refused to ask for a pardon, although others interceded for him.

All of the subject matter in this book, it should be noted, is difficult and tricky stuff. This is constitutional and judicial history, hard to research and digest and harder to present in comprehensible terms. Dr. Dorris' volume is not one to curl up with for a long evening, but it is as readable and as interesting as a book of this kind can be. Much of its human interest results from the fact that the author had access to the revealing and intimate letters in the Amnesty Papers in the National Archives. He seems to be the only historian who has used them.

Professor Dorris is sympathetic to the South and to the Southern view of reconstruction, perhaps overly so. Nevertheless, he concludes that the clemency of the government during and after the war was in the best tradition of American justice and democracy.

T. HARRY WILLIAMS

Louisiana State University

WENDT, LLOYD, and HERMAN KOGAN. Big Bill of Chicago. Pp. 384. New York: Bobbs-Merrill Co., 1953. $4.00.

REID, ED. The Shame of New York. Pp. xii, 235. New York: Random House, 1953. $3.00.

These tales of two American cities in the twentieth century will not make any American proud of the record of our municipal government. The first book is history, the second an account of contemporary New York, with the vice, crime, and crooked politics there portrayed still presumably continuing.

Big Bill Thompson has been dead these ten years. He left, at the age of 77, over two million dollars, two-thirds of it in old-style currency stuffed into safe deposit boxes. Where he got that money has never been explained. He left more, however: an immense city debt, a record of astonishing corruption, gangsterism, and demagoguery. At the height of his power, he and his political mentor, Congressman Fred Lundin, had such a thoroughly organized political machine that it was called the Thompson Tammany. While Thompson ranted about King George, Lundin from his hotel room took care of graft, patronage, and strategy; until the break came between them, Lundin hoped to make Thompson President, and the William Hale Thompson Republican Club had a war chest of over $100,000 for this purpose. As it was, not only was the government of Chicago in their control, but Governor Len Small and other state officials were their men as well.

Persons who are today horrified at the attacks on schools, teachers, textbooks, and libraries might well remember that it was William Hale Thompson who showed this way to get votes. One of the chief issues in his third (and successful) campaign for mayor was his attack upon the schools and their "un-American" textbooks. While Thompson shot off his verbal fireworks about the schools, Thompsonites on the school board were robbing the schools of millions of dollars. Although he succeeded in his immediate objective, Thompson's attack on the schools plagued him for the rest of his life and made "Chicago the object of ridicule and laughter all over the world." This may be cold comfort to the victims of current attacks, but it is still something to hope for.

Somehow the account of the antics of Thompson does not seem as funny or as sympathetic as the same authors' Lords of the Levee on Hinky Dink Kenna and Bathhouse John Coughlin. His clowning now seems disgusting, his corruption merely repulsive. The voters who, over and over, re-elected him deserve a share of the blame for those incredible decades of Chicago politics. Their behavior seems today depressing.

Anybody who thinks that, with Thompson gone, it can never happen again should read Reid's book on New York. Here are the same vice and crime, the crooked police, the political tie-ins, the gangster-selected judges—all the elements of the scene in Thompson's Chicago except for the blatant demagoguery. The political and gang murders in New York seem to be about as numerous as those in Chicago, but they appear to be committed less spectacularly. Probably the amount of graft has been just as great; Reid says that the Brooklyn police received twelve million dollars a year over several years in gambling protection alone. Much of what Reid recites is familiar to people who followed the Kefauver and other investigations of recent years. Much of the rest is unsupported—perhaps unavoidably—by anything except the author's own assertions.

Both of these books suffer from the newspaperman's dislike of documentation. A hundred times a reader may wonder, "How do they know Thompson thought that, back in 1927?" The most complicated conversations of conspirators are put down word for word as if the authors had been sitting in the room, not merely taking notes, but accompanied by a court stenographer who got every name, initial, and dollar figure. It is not always possible to tell what is real and what is merely possible or hypothetical, to distinguish what was said from what might have been said.

DAYTON D. MCKEAN

University of Colorado

FREIDEL, FRANK. Franklin D. Roosevelt: The Ordeal. Pp. 320. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1954. $6.00.

This second volume of Dr. Freidel's biography covers from January 1919, when Franklin Delano Roosevelt was still Assistant Secretary of the Navy, through his attack of poliomyelitis in 1921, his long uphill fight for health, and finally his election in 1928 as Governor of New York State. In smooth, colorful narrative, derived from diffuse and complex materials handled with critical selectivity and sustained perspective, Dr. Freidel has closely interwoven biography and history.

After F.D.R.'s resignation from the Navy and his subsequent defeat in November 1920 for the Vice-Presidency, he entered every activity which might bring him advantageous recognition, including work on national Democratic party policy. Dr. Freidel asserts that the number of causes he espoused, the mass of his methodically prosecuted correspondence from New York with party figures over the country, and his prolonged championship of Alfred E. Smith for the Presidency—all reflect his own fixed purpose to become President. He fortifies this interpretation by following the movements of Louis McH. Howe, F.D.R.'s secretary and member of his household, a wily, indefatigable political manipulator, obsessed with making F.D.R. President.

Dr. Freidel, no hero-worshiper, emphasizes F.D.R.'s apparently discreditable handling, as Assistant Secretary, of disputes with high naval officers concerning penal and other problems affecting Navy personnel; exposes his ethically questionable appearance as a lawyer before the Navy Department representing a concern for which he had formerly, as Assistant Secretary, procured favorable departmental action; and discloses some weird financial ventures and promotions in which F.D.R. invested time and money.

But, throughout, F.D.R. is contagiously alive, warm, and appealing; immature and superficial, even into his forties, about public questions, yet intuitively, if shrewdly, pursuing justice and decency; in domestic affairs, a dualistic disciple of both Carter Glass and Al Smith, and in foreign relations, a follower of the Woodrow Wilson vision.

Dr. Freidel gives us gripping drama in the preludes and scenes of the 1924 national Democratic convention, where Smith, pushed by F.D.R., deadlocked with McAdoo on the issues of religion and liquor control, so that John W. Davis was nominated. The final chapter's stirring account of how F.D.R., the cripple, was dragooned by Smith into running for the New York governorship in 1928 and gallantly won his "Victory by a Hair's Breadth"—the definite upward turning point in his career—leaves us eager for the next volume. If, in the four still to come, Dr. Freidel can hold the quality of this one, we can well expect the work to have permanent pre-eminence.

LOUIS B. WEHLE

New York City

ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY

BURNS, ARTHUR F. The Frontiers of Economic Knowledge: Essays. Pp. xi, 367. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press (published for the National Bureau of Economic Research), 1954. $5.00.

This volume is a collection of essays, all of which have already appeared in one form or another. Those of Part I have been published as the Annual Reports of the National Bureau of Economic Research for which Dr. Burns was responsible from the time he succeeded the late Wesley C. Mitchell as Director of Research of the Bureau in 1945 until he was granted a leave of absence in 1953 to become chairman of President Eisenhower's Council of Economic Advisers. Those of Part II consist of eight items made up largely of prefaces to earlier Bureau publications, journal articles, full-dress book reviews. The latter group of papers range in time from Dr. Burns's essay on "Long Cycles in Residential Construction" originally published in the Economic Essays in Honor of Wesley Clair Mitchell in 1935 to his review of J. R. Hicks's Contribution to the Theory of the Trade Cycle which came out in the Journal of Political Economy in 1952.

No formal development is to be expected in a miscellany of this sort. Nonetheless an essential unity and coherence is given by the cumulative effect of repetition of two or three leading ideas which make the book a treatise on the scope, method, and achievements of empiricist economics, as well as a convenient source of otherwise scattered writings.

The underlying leitmotif is methodological. To push the frontiers of economic knowledge beyond their present limits, what is needed, according to our author, is emphasis on the painstaking collection and organization of facts prior to the elaboration of explanatory systems. The lifework of Wesley Clair Mitchell, to whom a moving tribute is paid, and the continued labors of the Bureau, particularly on business cycles, exemplify this procedure at its best. Notable progress has been made in defining the phenomenon of business cycles in realistic terms—all this in the hope that out of the close and ingenious study of empirical data, somehow a satisfactory theoretical elucidation will come, at least a more satisfactory one than that given by Keynes or Hicks, for example, whose models are vitiated by assumptions, such as that of a practically constant consumption function or that of a constant investment coefficient, for which there is no empirical justification. It is, however, to be observed that Wesley Mitchell, for all his heroic labors, never got beyond the first half of his program, which he was wont to symbolize in the Marshallian phrase, "The Many in the One," but neither his work nor that of his associates and successors has yet given us a clue to "The One in the Many." Perhaps a little more attention to Alfred Marshall would help, particularly to Marshall's admonition that while "the economist must be greedy of facts, . . . facts by themselves teach nothing." Not that Dr. Burns is unaware of this, for the principle is clearly invoked in his penetrating review of Dr. Nourse's American Capacity to Produce.

The National Bureau of Economic Research is to be commended for republishing Dr. Burns's recent papers, for their value as a collection lies not only in the methodological and analytical developments of interest to the economist, but also in the discussions relating to economic policy which are of interest to the political scientist and to the bewildered citizen seeking to clarify current issues.

WILLIAM JAFFÉ

Northwestern University

BENNETT, M. K. The World's Food: A Study of the Interrelations of World Populations, National Diets, and Food Potentials. Pp. vi, 282. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $4.00.

Reviewing a thousand years of population growth, Bennett concludes: "I hope that I have shown convincingly that consumption levels had risen over a large fraction of the population, that calorie consumption per capita cannot have fallen, that, again over a large fraction of the population, diets had become more diversified in composition, that famine from natural causes had fallen from its status as a nearly universal risk to a status of risk to a much diminished fraction of the swollen population of today."

Part II deals with the American national diet and how it has changed since the years just preceding World War I, and Part III reviews the food consumption in the various parts of the world today and food management as it was developed during the recent war.

The United States spends nearly one-fourth of total disposable personal income for about 1500 pounds of food per person per year. Since the days before World War I, the total poundage has risen but calorie consumption has fallen by about five percent. The consumption of carbohydrates and of proteins has been reduced, but the consumption of milk, vegetables, fruit, and eggs, and thus of calcium, iron, and the major vitamins has increased. Grain products and potatoes together provide about 27 per cent of our total calories; formerly they provided 42 per cent.

Part III deals with international comparisons. Here Bennett makes extensive use of the Food Balance Sheets which have been assembled by FAO (the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations), though he challenges the accuracy of many of the figures which are contained in them, as well as the standards from which deficiencies are measured. He insists that large proportions of the world's population were not short of calories before the war or in recent years. A part of the disagreement is due to the use of different standards. Bennett is concerned with the point at which bodily weight can be maintained; the FAO standards on the other hand are concerned with diets which will promote health. He finds that per capita national income tends rather strongly to determine the degree of national dependence on cheap, starchy staples, though dietary habits and preferences play a strong role as well.

With a persistent search for the facts and a skeptical approach to generalizations, as well as to the bridges which have been constructed over the many gaps in the existing body of facts, he presents in highly readable form the results of many years of painstaking research. He has no causes other than getting at the facts; he scorns the emotionalism that surrounds much current discussion of the relations of population and food supplies and what to him is the "sterile arithmetic" of projections of present trends into an indefinite future. He offers no solutions to the problems of feeding the world's growing population. But his contribution to the thinking about these problems comes from the clear presentation of these problems, of his point of view, and of his findings.

CONRAD TAEUBER

U. S. Bureau of the Census

CHAMBERLAIN, NEIL W., and JANE METZGER SCHILLING. The Impact of Strikes: Their Social and Economic Costs. Pp. viii, 257. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $4.00.

In an earlier study, Social Responsibility and Strikes, Professor Chamberlain of the Labor and Management Center of Yale University devised a method for measuring the cost of strikes in terms of their impact upon the various publics affected, including consumers, industrial users of the struck product, and suppliers of the struck firm. The procedure thus worked out is reproduced in this volume, which applies the technique to seventeen strikes in the coal, railroad, and steel industries and obtains comparative scores for each strike.

In thus attempting to reduce the effect of strikes to quantitative terms the authors must make a number of assumptions at critical points, as they must often fall back upon impressionistic judgments because no data are available. Nevertheless they have sought to get the most reliable figures available, and have shown considerable ingenuity in combining the various effects of strikes into a mathematical formula. The authors take account of the cultural necessity of the product, the period of time that existing stocks will last, and the extent to which other products can be substituted. From all these an urgency rating is derived; and this in turn, in combination with the number of persons affected, yields a score for the strike. Each strike is rated as of a particular day, usually the last day that it was fully in effect.

The authors are greatly concerned with the implications of their findings for public policy. They conclude that some strikes are serious, not because they withhold final products from consumers, but because they deprive employees in related industries of employment income. They criticize the drawing up of lists of industries in which strikes are forbidden or in which government is empowered to intervene—typically on the ground that the products or services are vital to consumers—as a limited and faulty approach to the problems presented by major strikes. They argue for administrative flexibility in the control of strikes, and offer their strike rating procedure as an aid to sounder judgments than are presently made.

This volume represents an important contribution to the study of strike effects.

Both in its method of analysis and in its effort to quantify, it marks a substantial advance over the mere listing of industries whose continued operation is thought vital enough to justify governmental intervention.

JOEL SEIDMAN

University of Chicago

HARBISON, FREDERICK H., and JOHN R. COLEMAN. Working Harmony: A Summary of the Collective Bargaining Relationships in 18 Companies. Case Study No. 13 in series "Causes of Industrial Peace under Collective Bargaining." Pp. xii, 64. Washington, D. C.: National Planning Association, 1953. $1.00.

This is an excellent summary by Frederick H. Harbison, Executive Officer of the Industrial Relations Center, University of Chicago, and John R. Coleman, Assistant Professor, Industrial Relations Section, Massachusetts Institute of Technology. As in all of these studies by the National Planning Association, the principal question is, what makes collective bargaining tick? And the answers are found in the attitudes of management and unions toward one another; attitudes of trust, of accommodation, of informality, and of constructive collective bargaining. There may be fighting, but it is principally the conflicts of conference and debate.

The reader will be swayed by alternate feelings of optimism and pessimism; optimism when he sees peaceful relations growing and their beneficial effects upon both companies and unions; pessimism when he notes upon what fortuitous circumstances peaceful relations come about, and upon what slender threads they continue to be maintained. Since harmony does not come about naturally, and, in fact, there are powerful pressures moving both sides toward the area of struggle, the reader is struck with what appears, at first, to be the inconsequential things that ultimately have important effects. Take, for example, the joint union-management safety committees in plants. These committees perform an important service in safety work, but the most important effects are indirect, in that they teach the parties to work together, and they grow to know one another better. So it is with other joint committees; the principal benefits are indirect. Or take the example of harmonious relations between management and the principal officers of a union; at first sight this appears ideal, but the very circumstance of harmony may lead to a revolt within the union, with charges of class collaboration, however unwarranted, against the incumbent officers. The settlement of grievances is another example; the formal contract procedures are not so important as is the development of informal communication and consultation in the area of problem-solving.

Throughout the summary, the reader is impressed with the highly significant role of management in the development of harmonious relations. The initiative on many points is with management. The unions' requests are basic in the presentation of problems, but it is most frequently from the side of management that the suggestions of co-operation, informal consultation, and of accommodation initially arise. This may be a product of fairly recent history in which many unions were struggling for existence; in any case, the burden appears to be thrown upon management, in very considerable degree, to have the ideas, the imagination, and the initiative, to move into the realm of harmonious industrial relations.

FREDERICK L. RYAN

San Diego State College

FLORENCE, P. SARGANT. The Logic of British and American Industry: A Realistic Analysis of Industrial Structure and Government. Pp. xvi, 368. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press (and Routledge and Kegan Paul, London), 1954. $5.00.

The reports of the various Anglo-American Productivity Teams which visited the United States in recent years stand as a landmark to the thoroughness with which members of these groups surveyed American manufacturing processes and managerial procedures. The competence with which the investigators summarized their findings is indisputable, yet the Teams' recommendations have not had wide implementation in Great Britain, largely because of important differences between the British and the American working climate, business philosophy, and management technique. Although the work of the Productivity Teams continues, now under the aegis of a new body, the complex question of how to introduce the best and most adaptable production and management methods in Great Britain remains relatively unsolved.

This dilemma, solution of which has vital reference to British prosperity, has been analyzed recently by several economists. Probably the most detailed consideration of the subject to date is presented by Professor P. Sargent Florence in his study, The Logic of British and American Industry: A Realistic Analysis of Industrial Structure and Government. An American citizen, Professor Florence has been Professor of Commerce at Birmingham University since 1929, and in 1940-41 he served as Consultant to the United States National Resources Planning Board.

After presenting pertinent information concerning the prevailing size of industrial firms and the pattern of industrial location in Britain and America, Professor Florence interprets the facts in basic terms, such as technical requirements and consumer habits. The contrast between the two countries is discovered mainly in certain social attitudes and motivation, while unexpected similarities are found in industrial structure and government. A wealth of statistical material is presented in easily digested tables.

In what Professor Florence calls the political science of industry, certainly one of the most important issues discussed is how to educate and recruit outstanding young people for business management. "Educational institutions," he argues, "should make it possible for the fittest of the new generation, whatever their class, to prepare for the profession of business government, and thus allow inborn ability plus training plus experience to supply leadership for a new, more efficient, more logical industrial order."

This argument is sustained by a recent editorial in The Times which stated, in part, "British business needs a larger share of the ablest men and women trained by the universities whether as technicians or as managers and directors." Reference should be made to Colonel L. Urwick's brilliant discussion of the whole problem in the report he wrote for the British Specialist Team on Education for Management. Many able observers of the contemporary scene contend that business and financial procedures cannot improve in conception and execution in Great Britain, and indeed in the Commonwealth, unless the range of the managing director, the industrial accountant, the personnel administrator, and the works manager is expanded by higher education.

Professor Florence's book explores this topic in a highly professional manner, and affords adequate discussion of many questions involving labor-management and company-government relations in Britain and America. It should stimulate thought and research on both sides of the Atlantic. The reviewer recommends it especially to those persons whose interests lie in the organization and function of business enterprise, and in the implications of industrial growth and efficiency for national prosperity and international security.

MARY E. MURPHY

Los Angeles State College of Applied Arts and Sciences

HARRIS, MARSHALL D. Origin of the Land Tenure System in the United States. Pp. xiv, 447. Ames: Iowa State College Press, 1953. $7.50.

The author of this study feels that there is a "serious lack of usable information about the forces that influenced the evolution of the present tenure system" in the United States, and that no adequate study exists of "how basic tenure principles were developed." He offers this study which is intended to help "to determine the processes through which the land tenure system of the United States became what it was at the time of its emergence, just prior to 1800." He is concerned with the "changes made in the land tenure system prior to establishment of the national government"; and the "forces, factors, conditions, and situations that brought about these changes and finally secured their recognition." Despite these statements it is clear that the author was more interested in bringing together material from various scattered sources than he was in re-examining this enormously complex problem.

The book is made up of twenty-one chapters arranged as follows: One chapter is devoted to a discussion of the nature of land tenure, two discuss the English feudal system, and two more are required to examine the national claims in American and colonial charters in general. Four chapters are then given over to a discussion of the several types of English colonial organization, followed by a chapter examining the relation of the original grants to the colonial tenure systems. The acquisition of title to Indian lands is disposed of in the next chapter. This is followed by six chapters which summarize the various means by which title to land was transferred to individuals and the nature of such titles. The remaining four chapters consider the emergence of the national land system, the factors which influenced the land system, the impact of the Revolutionary War, and the relation of the colonial developments to the United States land policies.

Students of American history will find here very little that is new. The book is legalistic, synoptic, slow-paced, sometimes not wholly clear. The acquisition of land engaged the lively, unremitting, and often scheming attention of hosts of colonists and of many of their countrymen at home, but the author manages quite successfully to keep his book from reflecting anything of this ceaseless, often passionate, pursuit. However, within the limits suggested, he has provided an orderly and usable handbook on the origins of the American tenure system.

VERNON CARSTENSEN

University of Wisconsin

NURKSE, RAGNAR. Problems of Capital Formation in Underdeveloped Countries. Pp. vii, 163. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $3.00.

Ragnar Nurkse's very readable book discusses the underlying economic realities of capital formation and points out that, whether the institutional framework be capitalist or socialist, development requires that some economic resources be used not for immediate consumption but to increase capital equipment, that is that society "save" and "invest." To Nurkse the presence in the underdeveloped countries of much underutilized manpower makes theoretically possible an increase in total output—hence a development regimen in which consumption is held constant, with the increased manpower engaged in expanding productive capacity, rather than the more Spartan regimen with consumption actually reduced, as under the classic assumptions of full employment and no technological change. But Nurkse oscillates between a static equilibrium analysis, which highlights low consumer demand as an important obstacle to capital formation (because it deprives the individual businessman of the inducement to invest), and a more dynamic treatment of the development process in which high consumer demand becomes an obstacle to capital formation.

Since development is a process which itself generates within business the demand for capital as well as the supply of funds initially from within business (under socialism investment and savings are even more intimately joined), the reader is led to ask, whether it would not be more fruitful to focus on the sociopolitical forces which in fact condition the initiation of the development process rather than on the surface reflection of this process in current saving and investment.

Nurkse, recognizing that underdeveloped countries often have a cultural environment less conducive to the emergence of economic enterprise, accords greatly expanded functions to the state. But the state is, after all, the product of the same cultural environment (so it too needs a metamorphosis). Furthermore the governments of underdeveloped countries are subject to great pressure to expand immediate consumption. Nurkse attributes this pressure to growing awareness of advanced living standards but still thinks it possible for the state to undertake saving, that is to limit consumption, while leaving much of the actual process of investment in private hands. But, even if such a procedure were to accelerate development, would such a distribution of immediate sacrifices and privileges be politically viable in the era of the welfare state?

Nurkse gives underdeveloped countries sound advice on the necessity for complementary action on the home front if foreign loans are to be effective, and he helpfully clears away many familiar misconceptions regarding commercial policies in relation to economic development. Unfortunately, Nurkse's bland view of the nature of imperialism may lead readers in newly sovereign countries to dismiss this useful book.

HELEN LAMB

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

CZERWONKY, HUGO E. Freedom from Insecurity. Pp. ix, 198. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1954. $3.50.

Mr. Czerwonky, an engineer, who since 1933 has been employed by various federal government agencies, has given us a panacea for a multitude of economic evils. This book is reminiscent of Henry George's Progress and Poverty to the extent that the solution is simple and is based primarily upon a tax scheme.

The solution, according to Mr. Czerwonky, is the creation of "a society wherein widespread work opportunity persistently prevails." This society would be brought about by the adoption of the maximum-jobs principle of taxation, two-way bargaining, and amendments to the Federal Reserve Act.

Under the maximum-jobs principle of taxation, the federal government would rely almost entirely upon a manufacturers' sales or excise tax on all finished consumer goods. This tax policy would maximize the private savings available for investment, thereby creating maximum work opportunity and competition between employers for the services of wage and salary workers. In such a climate of ever-widening industrial activity, our present labor relations structure would be unnecessary. All labor relations would be governed by individual contracts of employment, a system which is labeled two-way bargaining. The workers, management, and the public would all be protected "because of the umbrella of widespread work opportunity which would continuously prevail." The Federal Reserve Act would be amended so that the Board of Governors could synchronize the flow of dollars to the flow of consumer goods, thereby eradicating instability within our economic system.

If his program should be adopted, he recommends abolition of unemployment insurance, placing old age pensions on a pay-as-you-go basis, and the allowance of a credit for charitable contributions to the full extent of the federal estate tax. He claims that the adoption of his program would, among other things, eliminate the need for minimum wage legislation, eliminate the discrimination in pay between men and women, eliminate racial discrimination, bring about lasting peace, and make the farmer permanently prosperous.

Although the arguments advanced are supported principally by the repetition of commendatory expressions and promissory representations, Mr. Czerwony points the finger of "economic illiteracy" at the Congress, the entire nation, and even at the economists. Naturally, it is claimed that the fault lies with our educational institutions.

ROBERT L. PATRICK

Louisiana Polytechnic Institute

BULEY, R. CARLYLE. The American Life Convention, 1906-1952: A Study in the History of Life Insurance. 2 Vols. Pp. xxx, 680; viii, 681-1397. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1953. $15.00.

It is hard to believe that there exists no book on the history of America's biggest business, life insurance. All we have are some books on the history of individual companies and on certain phases of life insurance. Therefore, the two volumes by the Indiana University professor, R. Carlyle Buley, fill a gap and are highly welcome, because the American Life Convention, holding almost 97 per cent of the legal reserve insurance in force in the United States and Canada, "plays a vital part in the study of all phases of life insurance, in the influencing of practices and policies, and in the protection of more than 90,000,000 policyholders."

Part I, in its 247 pages, contains a clear history of life insurance from its beginning, about 2,000 years ago, up to the organization of the American Life Convention in the year 1906, almost 100 years after the first commercial company in the United States for life insurance business exclusively had been organized and about 75 years after our life insurance was on the eve of its first great advance by mutuals.

In contrast to the highly concentrated first 247 pages, the following 885 pages, covering the years 1906-1952 of the American Life Convention, offer an abundance of details. The list of papers read before the Convention covers 110 pages, the index almost 100. Also the bibliographical notes are excellent. The same is true of the statistical data, year by year. Much of the association's business is conducted in the annual meetings. Thus, the author had to present the volumes to a large degree as a chronicle.

Founded for the betterment of business methods and the protection of common interests and common rights, the American Life Convention's sphere of activity is much broader. It is an organization to "accumulate facts, disseminate information, further education, abolish abuses, eliminate unsound competition, adjust controversies, establish good will, promote confidence, expose frauds, safeguard investments, prevent venal and misguided legislation, and protect policyholders." Furthermore, the American Life Convention played an important part in "one of the most constructive accomplishments of the century in the field of life insurance," the construction of modern mortality tables. The various sections of the Convention show the great variety of problems life insurance has to deal with: economy, law, taxation, actuarial science, medicine.

It is to be hoped that the two excellent volumes will put an end to the deplorable fact that life insurance is ignored by writers of American history books, even when presenting our economic and social development.

ALFRED MANES

St. Petersburg, Florida

CHILDS, MARQUIS W., and DOUGLASS CATER. Ethics in a Business Society. Pp. x, 191. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $2.75.

This little book was inspired by the several studies arranged for by the Department of Church and Economic Life of the National Council of the Churches of Christ of the United States of America. These studies covered in general and very broadly the relation of religion to economics. The authors state in the Foreword: "What we have written . . . is not a part of the study series itself but rather our interpretation and reflection on all the materials we have used. We have undertaken to present in as readable a form as possible some of the results of the churches' effort to relate the seemingly unrelated parts of our society."

Ethics in a Business Society is more than a summary or digest of the Church series. The authors have drawn from other sources, have added valuable historical perspectives, and have given more unity than was possible in some of the Church series. They paint in broad perspective the really serious problems facing us today, such problems as the following: growing insecurity; the problem of freedom and individualism in an age of giant business; the achievements, real and spurious, of machine technology; the churches' attitude toward imperialism, slavery, and poverty; Marx's "fake religion"; the character and incentives of business leaders; and the alleged spread of corporations and of monopoly. The authors' view of our present status is judicious and properly not very optimistic.

This little book, with all its religious side lights, might well be called "social economics." It is well and interestingly written—one of the most significant books I have read recently. It would be most worthwhile reading for students, and, I venture to assert, even for most economists.

JOHN ISE

University of Kansas

SOCIOLOGY AND EDUCATION

GILLIN, JOHN (Ed.). For a Science of Social Man: Convergences in Anthropology, Psychology, and Sociology. By Howard Becker, John Gillin, A. Irving Hallowell, George Peter Murdock, Theodore M. Newcomb, Talcott Parsons, and

M. Brewster Smith. Pp. vii, 289. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $4.00.

This book contributes importantly to the co-ordination of theoretical positions among the behavioral sciences. The seven authors are evenly divided between anthropology, sociology, and psychology. Each writer is already noted for his cross-disciplinary contributions. Each is asked to consider the relation of his discipline to one or the other of the three fields of inquiry. No brief review can do justice to the richness of the resulting papers. Unlike many compilations that result from solicited contributions, this volume has coherence and consistently high quality.

Murdock, as an anthropologist, believes that sociology is methodologically and scientifically more sophisticated than anthropology but "that the total body of verified theory which has resulted from sociological research compares unfavorably with anthropology in unity, generality of application, in sheer quantity and in potential significance for the integrated human science of the future" (p. 26). M. Brewster Smith as a psychologist provides a penetrating discussion of the interplay between his field and anthropology, a sharp appraisal of culture and of personality as concepts, and the directions from which convergence between the two fields may be expected. Parsons presents views that bear on the theory of action that has become associated with his name and which embraces major notions derived from psychology, sociology, and anthropology. Becker and Hallowell are respectively concerned with scholarly historical resumé of the interplay between sociology and anthropology and between psychology and anthropology. These are useful statements although somewhat less creative and imaginative than the other contributions. With a clarity that is relatively rare in the theoretical writings of social scientists, Newcomb presents a model for constructive collaboration between the sciences of social man that avoids dangers of reductionism but does not reject the idea of levels or of specialization. Gillin, in addition to a foreword, has written the final chapter. It summarizes and restates the position of the authors in terms of the human organism, human behavior, grouping, culture, social structure, personality, symbolization, and communication. It also enters a plea for more rigorous theory building in the social sciences and for better teaching of the "theory of theories" in the logico-ductive-empirical system of thought.

As might be anticipated, the authors are on the whole singularly without crotchets. They build constructive bridges between disciplines and deal rigorously with meaningful problems. This book is not easy reading, but it is a must for anyone concerned with the theoretical frontiers of that science of man whose development in the last decade has been so rapid and fruitful.

CORA DU BOIS

Institute of International Education
Washington, D. C.

CHRISTIE, RICHARD, and MARIE JAHODA (Eds.). Studies in the Scope and Method of "The Authoritarian Personality": Continuities in Social Research. Pp. 279. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1954. $4.50.

The subject of this second volume in the Continuities series is the unwieldy but seminal book on prejudice and personality by T. W. Adorno, Else Frenkel-Brunswick, D. J. Levinson, and R. N. Sanford (Harper, 1950). After an introduction by Miss Jahoda that places the book historically, chapters by contributors follow in neat "con" to "pro" order. The argument runs, in caricature, something like this: The California investigators should have studied something different in the first place (E. A. Shils); their methods were totally inadequate for what they did study (H. H. Hyman and P. B. Sheatsley); yet their principal findings have in the main been confirmed in subsequent research (R. Christie). Harold Lasswell's chapter, which follows, is more concerned with his well-known schema for political motivation than with the authoritarian personality, but he apparently accepts the California findings without criticism. In the concluding piece, Else Frenkel-Brunswick considers the book and subsequent related research from the standpoint of a participant.

In his chapter "Authoritarianism: 'Right' and 'Left,'" Shils is obsessed with a valid point: that "right" and "left" no longer pose the polar antithesis that ordered the ideological politics of the nineteenth century; that, specifically, if Fascism and Nazi Germany were authoritarian, so are Communism and Soviet Russia. He finds serious fault with the study in that it was not designed to expose the authoritarianism of the left. Undoubtedly the research bears the marks of a pre-Cold-War intellectual climate rather than a post-McCarthy one. But arriving at its focus on the pre-Fascist mentality from an initial and continuing concern with American anti-Semitism, it could hardly have been expected to throw much light on Communist authoritarianism.

The detailed methodological critique by Hyman and Sheatsley, on the other hand, is exemplary as an intellectual exercise in the analysis of research design and inference. One might wish that the authors did not take such relish in their double-barreled critical volleys, but one can only admire the virtuosity of the performance. They prove their case: that The Authoritarian Personality did not prove its case.

Christie judiciously assesses several of the book's principal themes in the light of evidence since accumulated. Verdict: While the exact nature and dimensions of authoritarianism remain obscure after the wealth of research stimulated by the book, its conclusions are probably pretty close to the mark for a first approximation. But situational and group membership factors, he holds with Hyman and Sheatsley, are more important than the California authors thought.

One has only to read Frenkel-Brunswick's final chapter to grasp what may have seemed elusive in the earlier sections, why the book created such a stir and warrants this symposium. Here are the same qualities of theoretical subtlety and research imagination that marked the best of the earlier volume. Granted that The Authoritarian Personality falls short as definitive research, how much the richer it has left the whole field of social behavior!

M. BREWSTER SMITH

New York City

MEAD, MARGARET (Ed.). Cultural Patterns and Technical Change. Pp. 348. New York: Columbia University Press (for UNESCO), 1953. $1.75.

Programs of Technical Assistance potentially open opportunities for social scientists to guide cultural change. This manual demonstrates the eagerness of some social scientists to assume such guidance, the relevance of their interests for the task, and the present immaturity of their knowledge.

The book reflects differences among three groups: (1) the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, anxious to induce rapid economic development in "under-developed" countries; (2) the World Federation for Mental Health, sponsor of the book, aiming to improve "mental health" among all peoples; and (3) anthropologists espousing a doctrine of cultural conservation. Differences among these three groups are most evident in the introduction and conclusions of the book.

Between introduction and conclusions, however, are three chapters of independent worth. First come studies of "whole cultures"—Burma, Palau, Tiv of Nigeria, Greece, and Spanish Americans of New Mexico. The last two are written from new materials. Next follows a summary of some 300 reports on success and failure in efforts to change agriculture, nutrition, child care, health, industry, and education in various other cultures. Finally there is a brief catalogue of psychodynamic processes likely to operate in situations of induced change. None of these three chapters is closely connected with any other or with the initial or concluding generalities.

Since the generalities of the book are but slightly connected with each other or with a body of fact they sometimes express conflicting biases. The anthropological introduction argues, for example, that cultural integration should be preserved at all cost. Any change liable to affect traditional values should be made with caution. Values are said to give "continuity" and "meaning" to life; change of values is difficult for individuals, producing tension and mental illness. But psychological statements in the book indicate that traditional values in a culture may conceal "obsolete" and psychically "harmful" practices. "Sometimes," the psychologists warn, it may be necessary to alter "the whole structure of belief." Momentous cultural changes may be induced with psychic ease if motivations are correctly manipulated.

These and other apparent contradictions blunt the advice of the book and obscure its wisdom. It may be doubted, too, if the patronizing views put forward concerning the elites of the underdeveloped countries will encourage those elites to request the assistance of social scientists. As an exposure of current chaos in social scientific fact and opinion, the book may rather serve as a challenge to the social scientists themselves.

McKIM MARRIOTT

University of California
Berkeley

VERNANT, JACQUES. The Refugee in the Post-War World. Pp. xvi, 827. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953. $6.00.

The refugees are distinctly a modern phenomenon. In earlier eras, exile was the fate reserved for the political elite; only the leaders, by choice or compulsion, found it necessary or desirable to leave their homes in the aftermath of unsuccessful war or revolution. Even the greatest disturbances in the wake of the revolutions of 1789 or 1848 produced relatively few emigres.

Since the First World War, however, displacement of a vast part of the civilian population has been an accepted consequence of war. The settlement of 1918 left hundreds of thousands unable or unwilling to return to the places of their birth; and the peace of 1945 brought the numbers of such displaced persons to the millions. In part, these displacements were due to the impact of nationalistic ideas, often tinged with racism; in part they were the product of a political situation in which the masses were more consequential than ever before in determination of the control of the state. Even in countries in which democracy did not prevail, new circumstances forced commitments on thousands of people from which they found it difficult, under altered conditions, to extricate themselves. As a result, the problem of the refugee has assumed ever larger proportions and presents a continuing challenge to modern society.

A long tradition of "asylum" has offered some sort of privileged status to political fugitives. Refugees, furthermore, have exercised a claim upon the humanitarian sentiments of the West; these displacements, like famines or earthquakes, have customarily been occasions for the display of international solidarity. And the refugees, by their numbers and their connections, are a strategic factor of no mean importance. For all these reasons, their fate has been a subject of concern to the League of Nations, the United Nations, and other international organizations.

The present study undertaken on behalf of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees by Jacques Vernant, with the aid of a Rockefeller grant, is the indispensable handbook for understanding the problems of the refugee. It contains a meticulously accurate summary of all the available information on the question. It focuses its attention upon the period since 1939 and particularly upon those groups under the care of the United Nations; but it covers also the surviving groups of displaced persons from the First World War. By its comprehensive scale and its thoroughness, this study supplants all others.

The work opens with a general consideration of the international problem and of the agencies involved. It proceeds to an analysis of the various groups of refugees, by nationalities. The most substantial section of the volume then follows: a place by place analysis of 39 countries in which refugees are presently found. Under each country is included a history of the immigration, an analysis of the legal and administrative position of the newcomers, and some consideration of their economic and social situation.

As might be expected, the book is more valuable for the information it contains than for the tentative conclusions it reaches. Given the marked differences of circumstances, generalizations as to the state of the newcomers must necessarily be tentative and circumscribed. Nevertheless, this does not in the least diminish the utility of the work, which will serve students of international migration for years to come.

OSCAR HANDLIN

Harvard University

COHEN, ELIE A. Human Behavior in the Concentration Camp. Translated from the Dutch by M. H. Braaksma. Pp. xvi, 295. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1953. $5.00.

The author of this volume is a Dutch physician who was a war prisoner of the Nazis from August in 1942 until liberated by Americans in 1945. He was held in the concentration camp Amersfoort, Netherlands, for nearly two months, transferred to the transient camp for Jews at Westerbork, Netherlands, and then shifted to the notorious concentration camp Auschwitz, Poland, where for some fifteen months he experienced all of the horrors that accompanied the extermination program that was carried on there, involving gassings and other forms of extermination of Jews that appear to have run as high as 500,000 a month.

This book, however, is not a personal narrative nor an emotional indictment of German treatment of the prisoners. It is, rather, an objectively analytical study of human reactions to camp existence, devoid of any trace of sentimentality, although illuminated from time to time by personal references that have direct bearing upon the data that are presented. One of its contributions is the systematic presentation of relevant materials that have been carefully combed by the author.

There are four major divisions to the work. An initial chapter provides a documented background concerning the organization, administration, and purposes of the concentration camps, with attention to the devices of extermination that were used. Then follows material on medical aspects of life in the camps, mortality, nutrition, diseases, and sections on medical experiments on prisoners. There is a wealth of carefully correlated material. The longest section, and by far the most valuable, is on the psychology of the prisoner: the stage of initial reaction, the process of adaptation, and the stage of resignation. The pages bristle with hypotheses many of which, as the author would admit, call for further research analysis. The importance in the adaptation process of the previous conception of life in the camps is stressed, and especially significant appear to be the hypotheses with respect to the role of "spiritual" values, broadly defined, in survival. In all of the analysis, the author draws heavily upon the concepts of Freud and interprets the prisoners' behavior in the light of them.

Having described systematically the behavior of the prisoners, Dr. Cohen seeks to understand the psychology of the S.S. members who administered and largely policed the camps. A quasi-cultural approach to the problem mingles with an interpretation of group psychology that is not entirely convincing or satisfactory. Yet the attempt to apply Freud's principles is carried through consistently. In any event, the human reactions are minutely described, and these descriptions have value for social science; even the interpretations may lead to more adequate explanations of the observed behavior. Certainly the mechanisms that are involved are not circumscribed by the electric fences of the concentration camp. It is the larger relevance of Dr. Cohen's material to the every-day world in which we now live that gives the book especial significance.

MALCOLM M. WILLEY

University of Minnesota

ROGOFF, NATALIE. Recent Trends in Occupational Mobility. Pp. 131. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1953. $4.00.

This is the most significant study on occupational mobility since Davidson and Anderson's Occupational Mobility in an American Community. The primary contribution of this work is methodological, for unlike most earlier studies, an attempt is made to measure the amount of occupational mobility which occurs independently of the mobility caused by changes in the occupational structure. The significance of the study is heightened because trends in occupational mobility and origins (from fathers' occupations) are studied for two periods (1910 and 1940) in a rather representative industrial city (Indianapolis). Despite limitations imposed by the source materials (marriage licenses which asked for applicant's occupation and that of his father) certain trends are clear:

(1) There has been almost no change in a generation in the chances of avoiding occupational inheritance; (2) The most probable occupational destiny of males is their father's occupation; (3) Occupational destiny depends increasingly on the worker's social origins or his father's occupation; (4) The barrier between white-collar and manual work is the most difficult to penetrate over a generation; (5) Least amount of occupational inheritance is found among sons of skilled workers; (6) Sons of farmers find it increasingly difficult to become white-collar workers; (7) Occupational inheritance is lowest among Negroes since, irrespective of origin, they are usually forced into unskilled or service occupations; (8) Sons of foreign born suffer little or no job discrimination; (9) Younger men are increasingly less inclined to be occupationally mobile.

Rogoff's findings that deal with older workers, sons of foreign born, and farmers must be considered tentative because these groups are not adequately representative of similar groups in other communities. Further, Rogoff displays a tendency to overstate the differences between her findings and those reported by earlier studies. Despite the significant methodological refinement, one is struck more with the replication of findings. The most important criticism of this excellent study is the general lack of interpretation of the findings. No attention is given to changes in the general social structure of the United States or changes in the industrial structure which may account for changing patterns of occupational mobility. Failure to do so limits the general applicability of the findings, or a consideration of probable future trends in occupational mobility.

WILLIAM H. FORM

Michigan State College

SPELLMAN, HOWARD HILTON. Successful Management of Matrimonial Cases. Pp.

ix, 306. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1954. $5.65.

There is a belief in some quarters that "respectable" lawyers shy away from divorce suits in much the same manner that respectable police officers avoid petty disorderly-conduct cases. In both instances the feeling persists that such interpersonal wrangles are beneath the dignity of the law—that there is much more important work to do; let us get on with it and leave the domestic squabbles to be handled by those with nothing better to do. Mr. Spellman's book does much to discredit this point of view. The author feels that "The greatest personal tragedy in our modern society is divorce." But he feels just as strongly that the state has a vital interest in every divorce proceeding. Between these two often-conflicting perspectives—the wishes of the litigants and the interests of the state—a balance must be struck, and it is here, says the author, that the divorce lawyer is instrumental. And the stakes are high enough to concern all of us.

Mr. Spellman does not criticize existing divorce laws, nor does he preach for an extension of the family court—and on these two counts alone his book is marked as "different." Written for the general public as well as for lawyers who handle divorce cases, the volume is incisively presented. It is likely that practicing lawyers will find in it a wealth of practical material, since, in effect, the author has written a procedural handbook rather than a routine legal reference work. However, it is just as likely that the general public will find it no more intriguing than other books dealing with specialized law.

Social scientists interested in the family field—especially those who, though dissatisfied with current divorce philosophy, are not convinced that the family court is a necessary panacea—should find the volume rewarding, and irritating. Rewards lie in the author's repeated and crystal-clear statements as to what the divorce law is and what the law means. Collusion, connivance, condonation, and recrimination are thoroughly covered, as are separation agreements, pleadings, and preliminary motions. The section dealing with the investigation of marital "misconduct" is the best this reviewer has yet come across, even though a disproportionate amount of space is devoted to the loops and twists of the New York State adultery requirement. On the other hand, estoppel, interlocutory decrees and rights of remarriage, appeals, and out-of-court settlements are largely ignored. Throughout, the author annoyingly uses the term "foreign" to refer to out-of-state divorces. It is also somewhat disquieting to discover, upon checking citations, that side by side with scientific and legal references are several alluding to The Ladies Home Journal, Colliers, Look, and Cosmopolitan.

All in all, the author's approach is refreshing. To anyone who is at all familiar with actual divorce proceedings, it will be evident that what divorce lawyers actually do in the handling of divorce suits is many leagues removed from what Mr. Spellman says they should do. He says they should follow the spirit of the law as well as the letter. He says it forthrightly and without apologies, thereby imparting a sense of dignity to the legal aspect of divorce—a dignity which apparently the legal practitioners would sell down the river.

WILLIAM M. KEPHART

University of Pennsylvania

GLASS, D. V. (Ed.). Introduction to Malthus. Pp. x, 205. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1953. $2.75 (London: Watts & Company, 1953. 10s 6d).

The core of this little book consists of three short papers which, though separately rather self-contained, form a unity in that they are concerned, respectively, with the background, the essence, and the modern implications of Malthus' theory of population. The papers are: "The Historical Context of the Essay on Population" by H. L. Beales; "Malthus and the Limitation of Population Growth" by D. V. Glass; and "Malthus in the Twentieth Century" by Alan T. Peacock. These papers are followed by a classified bibliography, "A List of Books, Pamphlets, and Articles on the Population Question, published in Britain in the period 1793 to 1880," compiled by J. A. Banks and D. V. Glass. The list "is intended to cover the genesis and course of the Malthusian controversy in Britain. While the list is extensive, it does not claim to be complete.

... The period covered begins with Godwin and ends shortly after the establishment of the Malthusian League" (pp. 81-82). Perhaps partly because the bibliography closes with 1880, the paper by Peacock at the close of his article lists some citations of recent works on the economics of population.

The volume ends with reprints of two compositions by Malthus that are seldom seen. "The first is A Summary View of the Principle of Population, originally published in 1830, and consisting of the larger part of Malthus's article on 'Population' which appeared in the 1824 Supplement to the Encyclopaedia Britannica. . . . The second is Malthus's Letter to Samuel Whitbread," the first edition of which was published in 1807. In this letter, "Malthus stated in clear and explicit terms his views on poor relief, views which, both his supporters and his critics agree, powerfully influenced the course of Poor Law reform and coloured the attitude to the social services in general for a century or more" (p. ix).

The purpose of this book is of modest character. "It is not the purpose of the three introductory papers to do more than serve as a stimulus to further study. The reader will not therefore find in those papers a general analysis of the development of population theory or of the relationship between theory and policy. Certain broad views of the writers are, however, evident. First, population theory cannot be discussed without reference to the nature of a particular society, for population is not itself an independent variable. Secondly, to believe, as we do, in the importance of population as a factor in economic development does not thereby involve subscribing either to Malthus's theory as a statement of long-run principles, or to his proposals for social and economic policy. Finally, if there are no grounds for complacency—especially in considering the short-run relation between population growth and economic progress in under-developed countries—... [neither] is there justification for hysteria" (p. x). CLYDE V. KISER
Milbank Memorial Fund

STOTT, D. H. Saving Children from Delinquency. Pp. x, 266. New York: Philosophical Library, 1953. $4.75.

The main concern of this essay, as the author names it, is explicitly to set forth the fact that delinquent behavior is engendered most largely by emotional disturbances and frustrations. He is a psychologist primarily interested in the personality development of children. As a Research Fellow having a grant from the Carnegie United Kingdom Trust, under which he earlier published Delinquency and Human Nature, his aim, he states, is to bring about greater awareness of what he himself has learned about the emotional health needs of children—awareness on the part of social workers, probation officers, and others responsible for the care of children, including parents.

Though Stott's thesis, written in terms of a common-sense approach, is sound, valuable, and to a considerable extent applicable everywhere, his outlook is narrowly insular. In repeatedly speaking of "a new science of personality psychology" he gives credit to no earlier exponents of the points he stresses and he seems unacquainted with the great volume of research and other material which, over many years, has been contributed in this country to his main theme. Then, he curiously omits even mention of the noteworthy London Institute for the Scientific Treatment of Delinquency—this perhaps because he may regard the work there as being tinged with what he scornfully terms Freudian occultism.

After chapters on generally recognized principles that should in family life and in the school and the community offer bases for the prevention of delinquency, considerable space is devoted to the treatment methods of the Approved Schools. These methods, the results, and the backgrounds of boys committed to such Schools has been the subject of a special research study by Stott, from which he has learned much that appears in his book, but he fails to give any information whatever concerning the organization of these Schools and their unique place in the British scene.

(For the sake of the American reader who is handicapped by this lack of background material, the reviewer can supply some orienting facts gained for the most part during a study of the remarkably fine Borstal system for the treatment of older youthful offenders. In Britain there are no institutions corresponding to our state correctional schools for juvenile delinquents, but, developed largely from many old small endowed institutions for the care of needy and delinquent children, there are about 150 now-designated "Approved Schools." These vary considerably in size, and the equipment of some—for example in trade training—is very good. They are all under private and often capable management, but the Home Office keeps close supervision over them and grants considerable subsidies. They receive delinquents from the ages of 8 to 15, all of whom are committed by the lay judges of juvenile courts, whether or not always for definite terms one is not sure. Nowadays, the allocation of cases is not, as formerly, left to the judge, but rather is undertaken according to ages and needs by three classification centers, of which Stott writes approvingly.)

Stott gives sound suggestions for Approved Schools' personnel regarding treatment and better understandings of emotional health needs, suggesting that the 50 to 60 per cent of satisfactory after-conduct could be greatly increased.

In an appendix he offers, as a necessary preliminary to treatment by psychiatric social workers and probation officers, criteria for diagnoses to be made by them. They really should be practicing psychologists, he says, utilizing the principles of "modern personality psychology." The diagnostic criteria are related to the primary human needs for emotional attachments and acceptance and for recognition as an individual with a status. These and the sub-heads of reactive tendencies are not newly formulated. Though in much of this a certain naïvete is revealed, we can believe that many a probation officer might profit by reading the book. The trained psychiatric social worker will find it rather unrewardingly elementary.

WILLIAM HEALY

Clearwater, Florida

RUCHAMES, LOUIS. Race, Jobs, & Politics: The Story of FEPC. Pp. xi, 255. New York: Columbia University Press, 1953. $3.75.

Fair employment practice legislation may receive its first real test if the present "recession" becomes a depression. Seven states, beginning with New York and New Jersey in 1945, followed by Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Washington, and Oregon, and several cities, including Minneapolis, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and Pittsburgh, have passed legislation with sanctions. To date, these state and city fair employment practice commissions have been able to assist the integration of Negroes and other racial, religious, and national origin minority peoples in a wide variety of occupations in business and industry. The commissions have relied almost entirely on private "conference, conciliation and persuasion." They have handled more than 5,000 cases, and only about five cases have reached the public hearing stage.

In his preface the author states, "The purpose of this study is to present a comprehensive picture of the effort to achieve fair employment practices through government intervention. It includes a description of the origins, history, and impact upon discrimination of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice, created by the late President Roosevelt in 1941; an evaluation of state and municipal fair employment practice legislation; an analysis of the relationship between fair employment practice legislation and other social problems; and the history of the movement to achieve permanent fair employment practice legislation on a national level."

Of the four aspects listed above, Ruchames has done an excellent job on the President's wartime Committee. Less than one-fourth of the book, however, deals with the three other topics. The book is weakest in its treatment of state and municipal commissions. The fifteen-page discussion of these bodies is superficial. The analysis of the last two topics is adequate.

The greatest importance of the President's Committee, as Ruchames states, "lies in the stimulus it gave to the movement for permanent FEPC legislation." By his thorough examination of the President's Committee, the author has made a signal contribution to our knowledge of the struggle of Negroes and other minorities for an equal chance. Although in recent years discrimination in employment has been reduced, it is still a tragic fact of American life that millions of Americans—Negroes, Jews, Mexican-Americans, Oriental-Americans, Puerto Ricans, American Indians, and others—are subjected to one of the worst kinds of injustice, job discrimination.

Gunnar Myrdal in An American Dilemma called for a great educational offensive against discrimination and segregation. During the 1940's that offensive began to gather force in employment. With so much to be done on other fronts—housing, schools, churches, and public accommodations—we can ill afford any slackening of effort on the basic job front.

FRANK S. LOESCHER

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

HAVIGHURST, ROBERT J., and RUTH ALBRECHT. Older People. Pp. xvi, 415. New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1953. $5.00.

Older People represents the first attempt to present an integrated statement of the characteristics, situations, and needs of America's older adults in what the publisher appropriately calls an introduction to social gerontology. Following an identification of the problems peculiar to older people and a chapter on attitudes toward them, the book deals with their happiness, health, economic security, work and leisure, family relations and living arrangements, friends, and participation in organized community life.

Part I, the first half, describes the older population on the basis of national data with somewhat more detailed analyses based on material collected in Prairie City, a small midwestern town which was the subject of intensive study. Part II is a more thorough presentation of Prairie City data. Instruments for measuring public opinion toward the roles of older people, the roles played by older people, and older people's attitudes and adjustments are presented and discussed in three appendixes. Data collected by the University of Chicago's Committee on Human Development from various samples of older people with the aid of these instruments are used with good effect in both the national and local analyses.

Perhaps the principal conclusion one obtains from the book is that there is tremendous variation in society's attitudes toward older people and their proper roles and in their own interests, circumstances, and adjustments. In general, society appears to approve continued activity even to a greater extent than do older people themselves. A curious circumstance revealed by the Prairie City data is that many older people withdraw from activity even though activity and good adjustment are positively correlated.

There is also evidence that popular thinking is ambivalent or in a stage of transition with regard to such matters as family relationships and responsibilities, continuance in the work force, acceptance of financial assistance from the community, and persistence in political leadership roles.

In the chapter "A Personal and Social Philosophy of Old Age" and running through the book there is strong implication that the later years should become a period of increased personal satisfaction to be achieved largely through broadened social consciousness and citizenship responsibility, and that community attitudes and facilities must provide an environment that encourages good adjustment and continuing usefulness.

CLARK TIBBITTS

U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

MEANS, JAMES HOWARD. Doctors, People, and Government. Pp. viii, 206. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1953. $3.50.

Among the numerous publications on social organization of medical care, Dr. Means's book stands out for two reasons. It is a statement of convictions gained in almost thirty years of experience as hospital physician, teacher of clinical medicine, and research worker. It is written for the general reader in an effort to "stimulate the formation of an enlightened public opinion" on the problems to be solved in improving and extending medical care.

Like a number of earlier writers on this subject, Dr. Means believes that the American people are entitled to the best possible medical care at the lowest price consistent with high quality and that they "are not now getting it." He advocates prepayment plans "which afford benefits directly in the form of comprehensive service," compensation of physicians by salary, and group practice of medicine; endorses "government aid to both education and research" as indispensable to continued progress; and makes a strong plea for "a threefold attack from a very broad base embodying government, private, and community elements." These are ideas which have been advanced and debated time and again ever since the publication of the classic report of the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care in 1932. How they can be translated into a practicable plan of action by evolutionary process is a question yet to be answered.

Although Dr. Means has no new suggestions to offer, he has nevertheless made a noteworthy contribution to the literature on the social and economic aspects of medicine. He has assembled widely scattered material and presented it in a clear and readable manner. He has analyzed the available facts with a discerning mind and a keen eye for basic issues. And he has stated his conclusions with sincerity and courage. His book has all the earmarks of a crusade. It is certain to be attacked by those who refuse to listen to honest opinions and criticism. It should be studied by those who are genuinely interested in the continued adaptation of medicine to social needs and uses.

FRANZ GOLDMANN
Harvard University

MILLER, PAUL A., and ASSOCIATES. Community Health Action. Pp. 192. East Lansing: Michigan State College Press, 1953. $3.00.

The general public is more and more concerned with problems of medical care, whether the need for the extension of health facilities or the pressing problem of how to meet the rapidly increasing cost of medical care. This little book focuses on community endeavors to develop health facilities. It deals with the attempts of citizens in small communities to acquire hospital facilities and public health services, and to a lesser degree with co-operative prepayment plans for medical care. It contains a factual report of what really happened when people in small communities co-operated to secure better medical care for themselves. Six regions of the United States were studied to compare the differences in community action.

The study was based on carefully drawn up and tested questionnaires sent to local health departments in communities of less than 7,500 population where community action had been initiated since 1940. These were followed by field visits by a research team to five carefully selected communities in different regions.

The book is about an idea—that health is, in part, an enterprise of a community. It is also a book about a process—that of employing community resources for gains in good health.

Perhaps it is not strange that there was more interest in hospitals (and more successful efforts to acquire hospitals) than in either public health services or in prepayment plans. Credit was given to the financial support from federal resources under Hill-Burton legislation. Undoubtedly this aid and stimulation has helped tremendously in the efforts to secure good hospital facilities in small communities. Businessmen in the communities studied were certainly more interested in hospitals than in public health services or prepayment plans. There were 218 successful community efforts to acquire hospitals, recently organized local health departments, and evidence that 18 co-operative prepayment plans will be employed in the communities covered by the questionnaires. Prepayment plan organizations apparently required longer periods of discussion before any action was initiated.

This book gives clear evidence that to move from an idea to an accomplishment requires that some one or some group channel community readiness into purposeful action. Discussion of the variety of sponsorship, the conflicts encountered, the organizational methods used, public relations techniques, the ways of persuading key people, and the contrasts between projects should prove helpful to other communities embarking on similar undertakings. The findings of the study serve to stake out some guidelines for future planning toward major health goals in small communities.

MARIETTA STEVENSON

School of Social Work
University of Illinois

BALLOU, RICHARD BOYD. The Individual and the State: The Modern Challenge to Education. Pp. xxviii, 305. Boston: Beacon Press, 1953. $4.50.

The morale of American education has been so shaken in the past half-dozen years by concerted attacks from demagogues and similar self-appointed saviors that it is of special importance to have books such as Dr. Ballou's widely read by parents, prospective teachers, and others likely to be disturbed by the present babble of tongues.

For Dr. Ballou takes his stand squarely on the side of the finest traditions of an enlightened democracy, and of the crucial role which education plays in their preservation and development. The heart of his interpretation lies in his analysis of three interrelated problems, all of them as old as educational philosophy itself, yet each as indispensable as it ever was: the meaning of human knowledge, the nature of human purpose, and the components of personality. Despite occasional concessions to eclecticism, the author for the most part offers a naturalistic and liberal solution to all three problems.

His conception of knowledge opposes absolutism and finality, and supports an experimental approach that insists upon the self-correcting and tentative character of truth. His discussion of the role of dissent, as basic to this approach, seems unnecessarily general, however. He never deals forthrightly with the heart of the issue today, which is, of course, how far and under what conditions we should allow educators to maintain heretical political views in both words and actions. A careful reading of the policies of, for example, the American Civil Liberties Union and the American Association of University Professors might have benefited Dr. Ballou.

His insistence upon the need for strong and clear purposes is a healthy corrective to an overemphasis on process and method which have been fashionable among liberal educators. Here, again, the argument could have been made more definite: the kind of future that education ought to strive for, especially those sociocultural dimensions adequate to a technological and revolutionary age such as our own, is paid only the most cursory attention. Nevertheless, it is gratifying to find a stress upon the future at all—a needed counterbalance to another recent overemphasis by liberal educators upon the past and present as the chief foci of education.

Dr. Ballou's theory of personality reveals the strong influence of Gestalt psychology. Three aspects are developed: the biological, the aesthetic, and the psychical, each fused with the other two. The only serious question to be raised here is whether anything like enough attention has been paid to the social pole of the personality equation. The influence of pioneers like George Herbert Mead in social psychology or of Alfred Kroeber in cultural anthropology seems to be negligible in the author's thinking.

After assessing the strengths and weaknesses of American schools over the past fifty years, the book concludes with an overview of "critical perspectives for educational institutions" and "the promise of the future: insights for teachers." Here Dr. Ballou offers many suggestions for improving both policy and program, all of them admirable if also largely familiar, sometimes vague, and occasionally overcautious.

The title of the volume is perhaps unfortunate. A great deal of attention is properly paid to the individual, but too little to the theory and practice of the modern state. Only a few words are devoted to such questions as federal aid and control of education, to the growing pressures of organized religion upon the state and its schools, to the conflict between national sovereignty and world government, or to other thorny problems of current political philosophy. The subtitle, however, is entirely relevant, and Dr. Ballou is both earnest and praiseworthy in his effort to measure up to it.

THEODORE BRAMELD
New York University

CANTOR, NATHANIEL. The Teaching-Learning Process. Pp. xvi, 350. New York: Dryden Press, 1953. $2.90.

The title of this book is an artifice or an expedient. It actually deals with only one method and one that is applicable to only a fraction of the curriculum and not with the teaching and learning process as the title implies. In spite of this semantic exaggeration it is a challenging and possibly an important book.

The formal requirements of the school situation tend to foster insecurity, fear, dominance, and hostility in the minds and hearts of teachers. In spite of any possible justification for these attitudes they tend to provoke similar responses from the pupils; consequently teaching and learning are often frustrated. How can the situation be changed? One partial answer is for teachers to recognize their contribution to this frustration. By using group therapy Professor Cantor has demonstrated that teachers can be led to recognize their culpability, confess their guilt, and alter to a considerable extent their attitudes and practices. Since this book is a mirror that reflects pedagogical blemishes, the careful reader can also participate in this soul-cleansing process. In fact, it is probable that teachers who read this book appreciatively will treat their pupils more humanely. By stressing feelings rather than intellect, attitudes rather than knowledge, and freedom rather than authority the author writes in the tradition of Rousseau and thus becomes also a liberator of children.

The book suffers from two faults all too common in educational writing—the implication of newness and the straw-man device. Long ago St. Augustine observed that talking, even when it eventuates in communication, is not teaching, and listening is not necessarily learning. Professor Cantor has arrived at the same conclusion. He is not content merely to pull out the worm of truth; he accompanies the act with cackles of discovery, splutters of excitement, and cluckings for attention, admiration, and agreement.

After a pointless introduction by Professor Stephen Corey, the author takes over and wages a furious battle with "disconnected subjects," "unrelated data," "isolated facts," and other non-existent enemies. He refers to "genuine" and "actual" learning in such manner as to imply that there are two categories—"learning" and "actual learning." He draws up an indictment of twelve or fifteen counts against parents, schools, and teachers. After this arraignment it is rather easy to agree that whatever the author proposes will be an improvement over the situation as described.

Pages and pages are devoted to the meanderings, confessions, and testimonials of Lila, Mabel, Stella, Cora, Harry, Gregory, Philip, Bert, and a dozen other seminar participants. They rejoice over the absence of imposed assignments and exult in the uniqueness of their experience. "The kind of thing we are doing isn't done in colleges" (p. 8). They slowly rid themselves of self-consciousness, become accustomed to the rare atmosphere, and confess their personal and pedagogical sins. Through discussion and contemplation some of them achieve humility, patience, and high resolves, virtues that are transferred to their classrooms.

In spite of these faults and some vain repetitions of the obvious, the book is a fresh, vigorous, and helpful demonstration of one method of dealing with one segment of teaching. Stodgy, formalistic, and aggressive teachers should read this little book and consider its moral.

EDGAR B. WESLEY

Stanford University

The Teaching of the Social Sciences in the United Kingdom. Pp. 140. Paris: UNESCO, 1953. No price.

Described in its preface as a guide for prospective students and visitors to British universities, UNESCO's booklet opens with a chapter by Sir Ernest Barker on "The General Organization of Universities and of other Institutions for the Promotion of Higher Learning." This is followed by five chapters on the teaching of economics; political science; sociology, social anthropology, and social psychology; international relations; and on legal education, which is largely outside the universities. A four-page "Universities Reference Table" which is appended lists the principal curricula and degrees offered in each field in each institution.

Most American students and scholars will learn with some surprise that "only six of the [nineteen] British universities (and four of these six in Scotland) are anterior to the nineteenth century," and that nine of the nineteen are "creations, in their present form, of the twentieth century."

Since about 1920 British universities have offered advanced degrees, usually with the title of doctor of philosophy; but according to the author of the chapter on economics "first class" standing in the honours examination for the B.A. degree is still generally regarded as a stronger qualification for an academic post than possession of the Ph.D.

Sir Ernest remarks that "there has been an uneasy stirring of late . . . reflected in a demand for what is called 'synthesis'"—a revolt against traditional specialization paralleling the current American demand for "general education." "However, the specialization which has characterized British higher education appears to be something different from the vocational orientation which is common in this country. For example, although a diploma in public administration is offered by many universities, we are told that this does not signify 'specialist qualification.' A competitor for entry into the Civil Service must stand on an equal footing with candidates whose degrees are in other fields.

A student looking for courses to meet his particular needs, interests, and capabilities will not find in this booklet the detailed information he requires; nor will a reader in search of more than superficial understanding of the organization, philosophy, and methods of British social science teaching. But both will find here a very helpful introduction to the educational institutions and curricula of another country.

ELBRIDGE SIBLEY

Social Science Research Council
Washington, D. C.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

JASPERS, KARL. The Origin and Goal of History. Pp. xvi, 294. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953. $4.00.

To review in brief compass this work of compressed meaty essences by a world-renowned existentialist is impossible. Apart from expressing gratitude that it has been made available with unusual speed by translation from the German original of 1949, I shall therefore confine myself to noting its general scope and content. In time it runs from the uncertain distances of prehistory to the indeterminate reach of the future. Analytically its range is from technology to deity. Its themes are simple. The first major leap of humanity toward self-consciousness and historical consciousness took place in the Axial Period. That sudden and inexplicable spring forward took place independently yet along the same lines in three different regions and cultures, which founded the great world philosophies and religions in a brief span of centuries preceding the Christian era.

Thereafter in the West a peculiar rationality and confidence in life led to a special development which, though one-sided and incomplete, produced both political liberty and science and technology. The outcome, the industrial order, places us at the beginning of the second great period, universal and unified in space as well as in concept: the factual, as well as the conceptual, unity of mankind today is inescapable. Its effective ordering is imperative. The alternatives are world conquest marked by force and fear, or world organization under federal law. Unfortunately, the corruptions of rationalism, the positivist debasement of technological insights, and the inadequacies of spiritual and humanist vision tend to sap energetic courage and to hamper the concomitant realization of a universal ordering together with liberty and human dignity. Aware of history, we tend to look backward on it, rather than to project it. We need a conscious penetration and depth whereby to unite tradition, present, and future; and, conceiving real unity, to create it. We need proper awareness of the primacy of the person, the nature of God, and the meaning of man. We need awareness also, through history, of the limits of history and of the need to overcome history, by means of the open society of questing and confident human spirits.

Such, in bare bones, are some of the theses, almost caricatured by compression, of an enormously rich and suggestive work, which casts light not only on the meaning of man's historical adventures and on issues metaphysical and ontological, but also on the root social and political problems of our day, on the meaning of the alternatives confronting us, and on the potentialities of a great human future in which the second great step in the realization of humanity may be fully taken.

THOMAS I. COOK

Johns Hopkins University

HARDING, D. W. Social Psychology and Individual Values. Pp. 184. London: Hutchinson's University Library, 1953; New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1954. Text $1.80; trade $2.40.

Concise and modestly written, this excellent and judicious English volume will, I earnestly hope, be widely read in our country. Its arguments are sustained by the admirable temper of "animated moderation." In it, all that is valuable in the skills of English moral science is lucidly brought to bear upon the vexed intricacy of the interaction between persons and the groups in which they enjoy or suffer membership. The emphasis is not merely upon mechanisms and typologies, but invariably also upon moral costs and opportunities.

The following appear to me to be timely and refreshing features of Harding's essay. A revindication of man's social nature is attempted; in the main, I think it succeeds by neat refutations of all attempts to "deduce" social behavior from nonsocial roots. Especially refreshing is the rejection of the "straw man" theory of instincts so often flogged in American texts without any espousal by Harding of the view that moral conduct is all "learned" or "imposed" upon amoral "needs." Crucial effects of childhood training and the cultural variability of socialization processes are freely recognized without drawing the unwarranted consequence that moral validity and innovating responsibility are thereby nullified. Cultural variability is correctly appreciated as settling no normative issues but as supplying only possible alternatives whose costs and compatibility upon proposed borrowing must be faced. A sensitive discussion of the services of subgroups goes far to quiet the fears inspired by those who obsessively speak of the horrors of undifferentiated mass society. With a sure hand, the frequent neglect by social scientists of the study of the conditions of creative autonomy is demonstrated. The calm discussion of the ways in which social feeling and sentiment can and must often be frustrated is balanced by an equally calm appreciation of the advantages of industrial society for the average man, advantages so often cavalierly contemned by the reforming, literary intelligentsia.

No effort is made to evade the need for social invention in the areas of status, leadership, and competition, for the obsolescence of old institutions in these areas cannot, as Harding points out, prevent the emergence of "analogous problems even in the welfare state. A brilliant discussion of the meaning of normality (in many ways the best thing in the book) in terms of irrelevance of motive and coherence of personality is ethically evaluated with precision and tact. Everywhere there is perceptive notice of the required maximizing or minimizing or mediating procedures for dealing with the inevitable conflicts of two or more social desiderata.

Harding's book is both stimulating and tranquilizing for any social scientist. This reviewer would look forward to the author's comments, in a later edition, upon the related work of S. de Grazia, Parsons, Weber, the American game theorists and economists who are interested in the quantification of maximization and minimization problems of human choice, and upon the newer French cultural philosophers who often write discerning social psychology under the head of "metaphysics." As for the general American reader who has recently been acutely interested by the books of Kinsey and Riesman on related topics, Harding's book will do much to save him from the dilemma of a façade of calculation combined with moral dullness or aesthetic vision in which fantasy tends to replace rational estimates.

HENRY A. FINCH

Pennsylvania State University

WOOLF, LEONARD. Principia Politica: A Study of Communal Psychology. Pp. 319. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Company, 1953. $5.00.

This is the third volume of the series originally entitled After the Deluge and prompted by the author's shock at the First World War and his failure to understand its causes. He sought understanding in an historical analysis beginning about 1789. At the year 1848, however, his subject matter became history of which he himself was a part. Instead, therefore, of continuing the chronological method, he shifted in this volume to the analysis of ideas, mainly of freedom and authority and the corresponding modern institutions of democracy and authoritarianism.

Woolf considers the important changes in his time to be changes in the material environment, the intrusion of politics into everyday life, a marked increase in social instability, and vigorous challenges to traditional values. It is the last of these which is Woolf's special concern, with reference, of course, to the other three. He isolates and dignifies such concepts as "individual freedom and initiative, humanity, cooperation for social ends, justice and social equality, truth and reason," and shows that such values, first worked out both in theory and practice by the Greeks, are the very meaning of democracy: they define the value of democracy's free and rational individual. They also define civilization. They are values which are "there," they are objective, and they are discerned and chosen by all men free to discern and choose.

Further, "the ordinary man is right in judging implicitly that the happiness which he gets from the free enjoyment of his ordinary and private process of living, his way of life, is the thing which privately, socially and ethically has intrinsic value. And the value is in life and living . . . not in myths, nightmares and abstractions. It will be found in the thoughts and feelings of individuals, in their reactions to cricket or truth, to football or beauty, in their homes or among their friends, not in the state or churches or 'society' or work or sin or salvation."

Woolf's theme is not new, nor is it demonstrable, as he well knows. But if he is not right, so much the worse for mankind. And if he is right, it bears constant restatement. Woolf's contribution lies in his particular and very able examination of traditional Western rationalism and idealism in relation to modern irrationalisms and authoritarianisms, whether political or religious. "The values in an authoritarian society are fundamentally wrong and the longer it exists the more corrupt they become." Consequently totalitarian dictatorship is not a viable form of government for the twentieth century—the viability of democracy requires a fourth promised volume.

My one criticism is of Woolf's failure to consider the value potential in the organic type of state. Russia doubtless is an authoritarian state with a strong force component, but it is also somewhat an organic state.

LESLIE M. PAPE

Pennsylvania State University

LONG, EDWARD LEROY, JR. Conscience and Compromise: An Approach to Protestant Casuistry. Pp. 166. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1954. $3.00.

Compromise is here interpreted as a form of casuistry. The author recognizes that casuistry is in bad repute. But this disfavor is due to certain evil uses of casuistry, notably by Jesuits and pharisees. The Jesuits used casuistry to evade moral demands, says the author, while the pharisees tried to specify every requirement of the moral law down to details fitted to every situation. These mistaken practices must not blind us to the moral necessity of interpreting high ideals in such a way that they can guide conduct in concrete situations where the practical alternatives of action cannot possibly conform perfectly to the ideal. Such interpretation is what the author means by compromise or casuistry.

Mr. Long is not concerned with ethics and moral conduct in general but with Christian living. "We are interested in that dialectic of Christian experience by which a person comes to terms with the Christian imperative on the one hand and the situation in which he lives on the other" (pp. 15). The standard by which the Christian lives has not been set up by human wisdom nor discovered by the human mind, says the author. It is given by God and "cannot be . . . watered down." Yet the Christian imperative cannot be dismissed because it seems impossible of complete attainment. Men must do what they can to live by it in each concrete situation. This is the problem to be solved by casuistry.

Love is the moral imperative for the Christian, says Mr. Long, and this love is to be measured by the teaching and example of Jesus who made the neighbor's claim for love as great as the self's claim and the claim of God greater than both. "Christian love is the unstinting love of every possible neighbor for the sake of service to God, a love that seeks its only reward in the joy of faithful obedience to God. Such a love can love even those who persecute it and can rejoice even when falsely maligned by those whom it seeks to serve" (p. 47).

The reviewer is compelled to question this claim, which runs through the book. Can anyone love another out of obedience to a command, for the sake of service to God and for the joy of obedience, and not because of what is lovable in the neighbor? I have seen people trying to go through the motions of love in this manner. It did not seem good to me.

HENRY NELSON WIEMAN
Houston, Texas

SMYTH, F. HASTINGS. Sacrifice: A Doctrinal Homily. Pp. ix, 149. New York: Vantage Press, 1953. $2.75.

In these times many Protestant Christians are looking for ideas that will hold their faith together. They are being invited by those who work from the background of the Protestant Reformation to consider such unifying ideas as "the old and new covenants," "the apostolic preaching," and "the biblical philosophy of history."

It might be well for such Protestants to look at the volume under consideration here. Father Smyth is an Anglican with deep Catholic convictions. To him the central unifying idea of Christianity is the idea of "sacrifice," an idea which reached its culminating expression in the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, the Incarnate Son of God. The author begins with notions associated with sacrifice in primitive religions. Everywhere men have sought "to prepare something within their world which is desirable and worthy . . . to be conveyed to their god." The god has then been believed to respond by returning something of the gift with his own life infused into it, revitalizing his worshipers for their tasks.

The Law of Israel reveals the quest for sacrifices without physical blemish; and the Prophets reveal the quest for sacrifices without moral blemish on the part of the donors of the gifts to God. But because of the Fall, all human sacrifices were infected by sin. They were never able to penetrate the barrier between man and the Holiness of God. They "bumped, as it were, against the floor of heaven and recoiled upon men to spread a sense of failure and disaster."

This impasse was broken in the fullness of time by Christ, whose unique accomplishment was that He offered himself as a sacrifice without defect or imperfection. He presented Himself deliberately for crucifixion; and the Resurrection and Ascension were the marks of His breaking through the barrier which hitherto had separated man from God.

The Church is the socially extended body of Christ upon earth, made possible by His ascended life, and His presence now at the right hand of God. The Church's vocation is to continue His sacrificial mission of taking the things of earth and offering them to God. To take the material things of this world, offer them sacrificially to God, and then use them in co-operative love for one's fellowmen becomes the vocation of the individual members of Christ's body.

Father Smyth believes that this kind of Christianity contains the only answer to the materialistic propaganda of Marxism. True Christianity to him has always been more materialistic and more communal than the Christianity of the Reformation.

JUSTIN WROE NIXON
Colgate Rochester Divinity School

LEE, E. G. Christianity and the New Situation. Pp. 157. Boston: The Beacon Press, 1954. $3.00.

More adept at raising issues and problems than at solving them, this is an interesting book even though not a particularly satisfying one. The author, who is the editor of The London Inquirer, begins his discussion by pointing out the present day coexistence of the religious and secular orders. This coexistence is the "new situation" in which the worldly world with its values lives side by side with the religious world and its values. This live-and-let-live condition contrasts with the previous situations of the Church in the world.

The subsequent discussion is the author's proposed prescription for exploiting this new situation for the benefit both of religion and of the secular order. But nowhere does the discussion really get to the crucial issues. It comes out rather as a further analysis of the general human situation made from a self-styled point of view which, valuable as it may be in its own right, is difficult to relate to any of the main streams of interpretative thought found today in either the secular or the theological thought worlds.

To be sure, the alert reader will find in this book many helpful insights and many suggestions which reflect ideas generally part of the current scene, but the reflection is unconscious rather than articulate. There is a good treatment of the relationship of meaning and historic fact, one which is essentially in agreement with contemporary theological thought. There is a similar treatment of the relationship of cultural symbol and religious reality and a valuable analysis of the breakdown of lawful standards in contemporary culture. There is a call to belief in God made on what actually are existentialist grounds. Yet nowhere is the real nature of secularism understood nor the relationship of secular to religious knowledge carefully examined, nor the respective roles of each defined.

Perhaps the failure of the author is a result of his having set for himself too prodigious a task; yet we should hope it is not an altogether impossible one. What the author calls for is at least a conversation, if not actually a rapprochement, between secular learning and religious thought. Such a union can come, of course, only if secular learning ceases to be guided by an alternative secular "faith" and listens to religion and if theological learning takes adequate account of autonomous secular knowledge and resists current efforts to make of itself an esoteric system divorced from communion with the world of earthly knowledge. This book does not see these issues as explicitly as we must in order to develop the kind of working unity for which it rightly calls.

EDWARD LeROY LONG, JR.
Blacksburg Presbyterian Church and Virginia Polytechnic Institute

MOODY, JOSEPH N. (Ed.). Church and Society: Catholic Social and Political Thought and Movements, 1789-1950. Pp. 914. New York: Arts, Inc., 1953. $12.00.

As the editor explains in his introduction to this volume, its scope is "strictly limited." Its theme is "the relation of Catholics to the major secular forces of the period 1789-1950." Two of these forces are explicitly considered, namely, the modern secularized state and the modern economic system. The treatment is organized on a geographical basis. The editor and a dozen collaborating authors discuss their theme, first in relation to the papacy, and then in relation to seven specific countries or groups of countries. As the title promises, both Catholic thought and Catholic movements are included. Official statements by popes and bishops, declarations by various groups and organizations, as well as the writings of individual authors, serve as sources for the exposition of Catholic social thinking. Most of the sections of the book end with an appendix of documents, giving excerpts from important sources. Many significant social movements are considered, but it is interesting to note that Catholic labor movements are singled out for particular emphasis. The editor is a professional historian, and most of his collaborators have followed his lead in placing their material in its relevant historical perspective.

Collaborative works usually show a certain unevenness of treatment, and this one is no exception. Edgar Alexander's section on Germany runs to 259 pages; with its own introduction and table of contents, it amounts to a book within a book. In contrast, Spain has only ten pages, and Italy receives only incidental treatment. Belgium is included, but Holland is not. There is a section on Latin America, but nothing on Canada. Within each section, too, there are noticeable differences of treatment. Thus the section on the United States is confined to a discussion of the Catholic contribution to the American labor movement, whereas the section on Germany is very full and comprehensive. The book as a whole is thus selective, rather than inclusive. Within its limits, however, it is an excellent book. Its authors are competent, and they write clearly and interestingly. They try to be objective, and they make no obvious effort to gloss over the more unflattering aspects of Catholic social history. Probably most readers, like the present reviewer, will disagree with their interpretations here and there. Yet all in all they do succeed in showing how the Catholic attitude toward the modern economic and political situation has crystallized since the time of the French Revolution; and this, after all, was the original purpose of the book.

PAUL HANLY FURFEY
Catholic University of America

NOBLE, VERNON. The Life & Times of George Fox: The Man in Leather Breeches. Pp. 298. New York: Philosophical Library, 1953. $6.00.

The Society of Friends celebrated its Tercentenary in North England in the summer of 1952. As a part of that celebration, Vernon Noble was asked by the British Broadcasting Company to prepare a dramatic presentation for the air. In the course of duty his interest was sufficiently captured by the founder of the Society of Friends, George Fox, that he went further in his studies and has produced this interesting and valuable addition to Quaker literature. It has the great advantage of being written by someone who is not an adherent of the Society and who comes to the topic with a freshness but with an active interest.

As a good dramatist, he sets his stage well for his characters. The divine right of kings was being challenged. Who was the true head of the church—the King, or the Archbishop of Canterbury, or the Pope, or the Presbyterians, or the Baptists, or the Independents? Besides these "respectable" groups there were such extremists as the Grindletonians, the Anabaptists, the Ranters, the Muggletonians, the Behemists, the Manifestarians, the Sabbatarians, the Millenarians, the Traskites, the Fifth Monarchy Men, and others.

It was into this political and religious climate that the Society of Friends was born. The founder, George Fox, was the son of a workman, himself a craftsman, who lived largely by the work of his own hands. Naturally introspective as a growing lad, he consulted with his priest but got most unsatisfactory advice. The use of physic was proposed; marriage was suggested. All the while he himself was reading the New Testament and comparing the teachings of Jesus with what he saw going on among churchgoers about him, and feeling deeply disturbed. The author places emphasis on the young convert's reaction to religious and political practices about him more than he does on the influences of the mystical sects whose teachings and literature he knew. Jakob Boehme, Hans Denck, Brethren of the Common Lot, and Theologia Germanica—all products of earlier mystical sects—have been shown, especially by Rufus M. Jones, to have deeply influenced George Fox. He was a part of the mystical strain of Christianity in contrast to the institutional and clerical emphasis of the church.

In the face of bitter persecution for heresies, the sect Fox founded increased to nearly 60,000 during his short life and played no small part in the struggle for religious liberty in England and America.

CLARENCE E. PICKETT
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS

LE BOURDAIS, D. M. Nation of the North: Canada since Confederation. Pp. x, 270. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1954. $5.00.

After disposing of the history of the preceding century in two introductory chapters, Mr. Le Bourdais divides the period subsequent to confederation into three eras, each dominated, in a way that would be impossible in the United States, by an outstanding statesman. Macdonald, Laurier, and King had, all three, a steadfast determination not to allow any consideration whatever of principle or emotion to deflect them from policies essential to the preservation of Canadian unity. This story of their success is, therefore, concerned in the main with political history.

Mr. Le Bourdais, journalist rather than trained historian, presents a compact, yet comprehensive and readable narrative. It includes many shrewd appreciations of the dramatis personae of Canadian life. The author has his likes and dislikes. Particularly in respect of the later years, when the account becomes more and more journalistic, he writes as an observer "indebted only in a very general way to other writers."

The proportions are good, though slightly distorted by interest in boundary disputes and distaste for problems of constitutional law. It is too optimistic to say that "nothing has been set down which cannot be documented." For instance, the people whom the author describes as Hindus were excluded by Orders-in-Council, sometimes of doubtful validity, and not by an amendment to the Immigration Act.

Omissions are inevitable, yet some are curious: the Chinese Immigration Act stopping immigration from China; the part played by Mr. Meighen in persuading Britain to terminate the Japanese alliance; Canadian insistence that the Statute of Westminster should not enable Canada to amend its constitution; the Rowell-Sirois Commission; wartime friendliness with Russia and its eclipse in the spy trials.

Mr. Le Bourdais is to be congratulated on his sincerity, his fairness to others, and the frankness with which he discloses his predilections. But the sum of these qualities is not objectivity. Is it entirely consistent to reproach Great Britain for a timid appraisal of the risks of hard bargaining with the United States over boundary questions in 1783, 1814, and 1903, or with Russia in 1825, and then to disparage imperialism and approve Canadian reluctance to support its quarrels in other parts of the Empire? Is it quite fair to contend that conscription was unnecessary and unwise in Canada in World War I because the United States, which did conscript, could produce the necessary soldiers?

H. F. ANGUS
University of British Columbia

FALARDEAU, JEAN C. (Ed.). Essais sur le Québec contemporain. Pp. 260. Quebec: Les Presses Universitaires Laval, 1953. No price. 6 chapters in French, 6 in English.

In June 1952, a group of scholars met for two days at the University of Laval to discuss "les répercussions sociales de l'industrialisation dans la province de Québec." This volume represents the results of their deliberations. As in all such collections of papers by different authors, there is no central theme running throughout this book, yet it nevertheless has a surprising sense of unity which reflects the careful planning of the original symposium and the skillful bringing together in the final chapter by the editor of the main conclusions of the various papers.

Beginning with the chapter on the history of industrial development, the papers seek, perhaps more than anything else, to show how what is happening today in the province of Quebec is related to the general economic development of the North American continent. The insularity of the society of French Canada is recognized, but an attempt is made to see it in perspective. Industrialization is not something wholly antipathetic to the social values and institutions of the local society, a development which inevitably must result in destroying all that is precious in the culture of the French Canadian. As Falardeau shows in his chapter on Changing Social Structures, industrial growth is resulting in far-reaching adjustments in the social institutions of French Canada, but the local society is not a passive partner in the changes which are taking place. Commerce and industry have roots deep in the history of Quebec, and, if modern large-scale industrial organization is making demands upon the society very different from the kind made by earlier, simpler forms of industry, the problem of the society of French Canada is not essentially different from that of the society of North America as a whole.

Space makes impossible any examination in detail of the views set forward in the various papers. This reviewer could readily find some things to quarrel with. But any such criticism would be intended to give emphasis to the general excellence of this volume. It marks a distinct contribution to an understanding of one important sector of our North American society. One can look forward to further detailed studies of problems which here could only be discussed in general terms.

S. D. CLARK

University of Toronto

CAIGER, GEORGE (Ed.). The Australian Way of Life. Pp. xvi, 158. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $3.00.

This volume is one of the first of a series being prepared under the auspices of the International Studies Conference, at the request and with the financial assistance of UNESCO (the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization). It includes discussions of the Australian family, educational systems, political, economic, and religious institutions, and foreign policy. Unfortunately, however, these separate contributions do not add up to the Australian way of life.

Though one can hardly agree with Sir Frederic Eggleston that Bernard O'Dowd is the greatest of Australian poets, this is a minor criticism of a contribution which starts the book at a level of brilliance it never again reaches. There are insights, as at the end of Mr. Henderson's article on religion, but we must first travel through much detail. There is Professor Alexander's competent essay on foreign policy; but these do not redeem the whole. The bare bones of factual outlines are there, but little interpretation.

However, this lack of depth may be a reflection of the subject. Some of her writers, particularly the poets, have explored the spiritual dimensions of Australian life, but the average Australian does not share their curiosity. In the social realm there is a similar aimlessness. And growth is stunted by the hardened conflicts of labor and management.

At the conclusion of his description of economic institutions, the late Professor Wood poses the question whether the Australian-managed economy will achieve "ever-normal and equalized material rewards." It is interesting to note that the objectives are not greater productivity and a higher standard of living, but normalcy and equality. And he goes on to assert that Australian economic institutions are now almost adequate for these purposes.

But others in Australia, notably Sir Douglas Copland and Sir Frederic Eggleston, have different opinions. They have asserted that administration has not proved equal to the tasks laid upon it. They deplore the failure of the state to devise methods of administration involving a devolution of authority. And they note that where adequate delegation was made, as in some of the earlier Victorian State enterprises, pressure groups have been successful in breaking down their independence and, by asserting parliamentary control, have inhibited enterprise.

Yet, there is encouragement in Mr. Henderson's comment that "the nation is aching and agonizing for social reconstruction." Habitual attitudes must, he says, be broken by "heroic personalities trying to create a new situation out of apparently nothing." It is time, he concludes, to turn both outwards and inwards, to wider social loyalties and greater spiritual depth, from the cultivation of gregariousness to the development of personality. This is a new theme for Australia, and its appearance may be a sign of a transformation of ideals—from a level mediocrity to a varied maturity.

EDWARD LITTLEJOHN

Detroit, Michigan

BAILEY, SYDNEY D. (Ed.). The Future of the House of Lords. A symposium. Pp. 180. London: Hansard Society, 1954. 10/6d.

This is an extremely lucid and valuable little book which will be especially welcomed by teachers of political science. Its comparative survey of second chambers, its descriptions of the opening of Parliament, of the giving of the Royal Assent to legislation, of prorogation, of procedure and standing orders, and of the place and function of the House of Lords both as the second chamber of the legislature and as the highest court of appeal for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland are models of brevity, clarity, and precision. This book also has the merit of printing in its appendix the forms of parliamentary writs in current use, the Parliament Acts of 1911 and 1949, and excerpts from committee and conference reports on House of Lords reform since 1908, which are not easily available elsewhere.

The editor admits in his introduction that his distinguished group of contributors (Lord Campion, Sir Albert Napier, Lord Pettrick-Lawrence, F. W. Lascelles, Walter Elliott, P. C. Gordon-Walker, Viscount Hinchinbrooke, and the Archbishop of York) have not, for the most part, written about the future of the House of Lords, and it is indeed true that many readers would wish to learn more of various schemes of reform and their prospects of future adoption. Nevertheless, perhaps the best lesson to be derived from the perusal of these essays is an appreciation of the possibilities of the adaptation of this institution to varying conditions from age to age within its ancient framework of hereditary privilege and ecclesiastical pre-ferment. The saving grace of today's House is that most of its less competent members stay at home and its ecclesiastical members do not attempt to be politicians. In a truly "reformed" House, every member, "representing" something either by election or appointment, would, whatever his abilities, be in constant attendance, and, if any ecclesiastics were admitted, they could hardly express the Christian conscience on the great problems of the day with the force, authority, and dignity which historic tradition gives to the present bench of bishops.

There are many delightful and useful tidbits of information scattered through this symposium. Temporal peers may sit in but not speak from the bishops' benches on the right of the Throne, a rule once forgotten by the late Lord Birkenhead much to the amusement of his friends. We learn how the determined opponents of the admission of women to the House successfully marshalled their forces to prevent that issue from being considered separately on its merits apart from the broader issues of general reform. We are reminded that the Lord Chancellor's sole function as presiding officer is to put the question from the Woolsack, that he may speak like any other peer (but not from the Woolsack), that he has a vote but no casting vote, and that the House keeps itself in order by virtue of its Order of 1626 on "asperity of speech" in which "all personal, sharp, or taxing speeches" are to be "for-born." These and other usages dear to the House testify to the force of tradition. Nevertheless there is hope; the house has just changed its ancient rule by which a tie vote meant failure of any motion, whether framed positively or negatively. Henceforth, no proposal for the rejection or amendment of a bill shall be agreed to unless there is a majority in favor of such rejection or amendment (p. 91).

HOLDEN FURBER

University of Pennsylvania

RICHMOND, HERBERT. The Navy as an Instrument of Policy, 1558-1727. Edited by E. A. Hughes. Pp. 404. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1953. $12.00.

In the field of maritime history the work of Admiral Mahan has exerted an influence far beyond the borders of his own country and the span of his own lifetime. The impact of Admiral Richmond's learning on the world is less evident and significant; for one thing his books were a slower and less inspired creation and lacked, moreover, the drama of a new approach. Nevertheless, the lessons Richmond taught on the meaning of sea power based on materials not always available to Mahan are certain to outlive the battleships in which he served. Richmond was that rare kind of seaman (and a distinguished seaman) who obtained, by hard service in library and record office, that disciplined judgment and technical skill which go to make up scholarship.

The Navy as an Instrument of Policy is a straight narrative history (a large part of which has been told before) of military operations at sea, designed to reveal the development of the Royal Navy as a decisive instrument of national power. Military strength forms the main thread of the argument, and the battle is vital to the theme; but the author strengthens his conclusions by emphasizing the contributions of politics, diplomacy, and land operations to the final result. The narrative begins in the days of Henry VII, when the Navy's primary function was to assure safe passage of the Army to France. The Elizabethan Age provided a period of gradual education; statesmen were slow to grasp the importance of controlling sea communications in the interests of national security. Drake's organized offensive against the Spanish overseas Empire illustrated how naval warfare might affect the result of a struggle on the European continent; and on the basis of Mediterranean operations during the period of the early Stuarts, Richmond contends that English statesmen were beginning to perceive, dimly perhaps, that the Navy was "an instrument capable of affecting the course of European affairs by means other than warfare upon commerce" (pp. 67-68). He confesses that his evidence "is as a straw only, showing a breath of wind in a new direction . . .," and he might well have argued that the statesmen of the Commonwealth were the first to glimpse, during the First Dutch War, the full implication of mastery of the sea. In his view, however, only during the Second Dutch War (following the Restoration) did the elimination of the main enemy fighting force become the basic naval strategy of England. Yet, he admits that the English fleet was "expressly specified" as Tromp's primary objective in 1652 (pp. 105, 110), and Tromp's basic principle of smashing the enemy's main fleet certainly inspired not only an equally offensive spirit, but a strategy of concentration on the part of the English.

There is a brief and cogent discussion of the rise of French naval power under Richelieu and Colbert. France, because of the demands of her army, possessed at sea neither the audacity nor the recuperative powers of Holland, and although the material loss inflicted at La Hogue in 1692 was not greater than that suffered by the English at Beachy Head (1690), France abandoned finally her policy of command of the sea and proposed henceforth not to use her navy to crush the enemy's fighting forces but to employ it in squadrons against English commerce.

Full and accurate footnote references were never Admiral Richmond's forte, and an editor's eye, however eagle-like, could hardly discover every error or omission of name, place, and date, of which there are many. (One of the more obvious slips is the repeated spelling of Captain Vetch as 'Ketch'—pp. 353-354.) Both the list of sources and the index are flimsy, but only a very ill-conditioned reviewer could refuse to rejoice at the posthumous publication of the last work of a master.

GERALD S. GRAHAM

University of London

MABILEAU, ALBERT. Le Parti libéral dans le système constitutionnel britannique. Pp. viii, 354. Paris: Librairie Armand Colin, 1953. 1,100 fr. No. 47, "Cahiers de la Fondation Nationale des Sciences Politiques."

The author, a French admirer of British democracy, tolerance, and individualism, has analyzed the decline of the Liberal party which was long their chief exponent. The first section of his book, which covers the years 1906-1922, dates the decline from the great electoral triumph of 1906, because it also brought the Labour party to the House of Commons. Then war, for which liberalism was ill-adapted, led to feuds and a disastrous split; it left the Liberal party no longer on equal terms with the Conservative and even surpassed by a new rival for whose rise to power it was in large part responsible. It had prepared the way for the Labour party's progress by the Parliament Act of 1911 which breached a fortress of tradition; the payment of members of Parliament and the permission for a political levy on trade unionists made Labour financially viable; the democratization of the suffrage in 1918 provided the potential Labour voters. It spoke well for British honor that a party should abandon political advantages in the national interest, but in the two-party system, as the Liberals discovered in 1922, there was place for only one party of movement. The author contends that these social and constitutional facts, rather than the Lloyd George-Asquith feud, destroyed the Liberals as a party of government. He does not speculate as to what might have happened had they possessed a Sir Robert Peel to provide the leadership and program demanded by the situation.

The last two sections cover thirty years of steady decline. The constitution operated against the Liberals, for power bypassed the center party and alternated between the greater rivals to right and left, while the system of single-member constituencies caused it, the minor party, to suffer disproportionate loss in the electoral returns. The Labour party's wisdom in refusing alliances was vindicated by the fate of the Liberals, whose unequal bargains and coalitions with the Conservatives resulted in heavy losses. Since the election of 1935 the party has been only a "party of opinion" with a handful of members in the Commons and a steadily weakening organization in the country. In dying, however, the Liberal party enjoys a triumph of a kind; the author examines the major parties and, except for a bit of class consciousness here and there, he concludes that both are "liberal," and that, since liberalism has become a national tradition, the party has lost its reason for being.

CARL F. BRAND

Stanford University

COLLIER, ADAM. The Crofting Problem. Pp. xv, 191. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954. $5.00.

The crofting problem of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland is that of a sparse, old subsistence agricultural culture of 130,000 souls situated on the fringe of a heavily populated industrial country. The terrain is, by the general standard of Britain, poor and forbidding, and social organization is not developed to the urban level of much of Britain. Public administration which originates from urban conditions is largely incompatible with the needs of a relatively primitive, communalistic culture. The clan system broke down in the eighteenth century; no other effective leadership has taken its place. Rapidly rising population up to 1840 (and in the Outer Hebrides till 1911) caused many problems and much hardship. The subsequent rapid fall in population has brought its own problems, social and economic. Standards of husbandry and diet have deteriorated; the desire for a higher standard of living is strengthening. That is the crofting problem.

Adam Collier was a Scottish economist with a reflective, sociological turn of mind. The present book, full of meat and admirably edited by A. K. Cairncross, represents Collier's much interrupted attempt to investigate the problem with thoroughness and in a scientific spirit. He was killed in a mountaineering accident in 1945, so he neither finished his book nor satisfied his own curiosity.

Collier's chapters on the New Economic Revolution, the Role of the State, the Regional Income of the Highlands in pre-War Years, will stand for a long time. Nobody else has reached such authentic quality in these fields; his chapter on the Decline of Population is accurate as a summary but has been superseded by a much more detailed study by R. S. Barclay in the West Highland Survey, 1944-50, a body which the reviewer directed and in which it was hoped that Collier would have participated in major fashion. West Highland Survey is at present in the press; although it represents a much fuller investigation than Collier, as a one-man outfit, was able to tackle, it is complementary to this remarkable work of one man and will not in any way swamp it.

The chapter What can be Done? shows Collier's lively interest and curiosity in fields which were not his. If he was perhaps a little too optimistic and believing, the fault should not be set against him, for he died a young man. Collier in due course would probably have brought anthropology into the study of economic problems of marginal peoples. Here, he was just feeling his way, and the reviewer feels sure that experience would have caused him to modify his thoughts. The strength of the book is in Collier's firm grasp of refractory data.

The map appearing as an end paper is inadequate to the needs of the book.

F. FRASER DARLING
Malmesbury, Wiltshire, England

SLAVIC COUNTRIES

FLORINSKY, MICHAEL T. Russia: A History and an Interpretation. 2 vols. Pp. xvii, 628, xxiv; viii, 629-1511, xxv-lxxvi. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $15.00.

There have been a sufficient number of bad short histories of Russia in recent years for one to be grateful when a good one appears. Professor Florinsky has spent many years on the study of Russia's history since he left the country in which he grew up. He writes from personal understanding of both Russia and the Western World, as well as from knowledge of written sources in both Russian and Western languages. This book deserves a wider circulation than its high price is likely to give it, not only in America but in Europe and Asia too.

At a time when historical studies are more overshadowed by political passions than they have ever been since serious historical study has existed, the author has bravely maintained scientific standards of honesty. This is even more necessary in the history of Russia than of other countries. The attempt to project the controversies of the present into the recent and distant past has, in the case of Russian history, assumed almost Orwellian proportions, and this, it must unfortunately be admitted, not only behind the Iron Curtain. We have the increasing chauvinism of Soviet historical writing—for which it is important to blame not the historians themselves but the Party bosses who force them to write as the Party wishes. We have the view, so popular with some German and Germanophile writers, that there is throughout Russian history a continuous tradition of aggressiveness, different in kind from the aggressiveness of other nations, and that in the present century the two World Wars were the work of Pan-Slavism. We have the view, widespread in Western Europe, that the Russians are barbarians "incapable of valuing liberty." Whether put forward by sorrowing liberals, pitying the poor irredeemable savages, or by haters of liberalism, contemptuous of "the masses" in Russia or elsewhere, the result is similar. Professor Florinsky does not subscribe to these or kindred theories. At the same time he escapes another snare for historians, that of Olympian superiority to moral considerations. Moral factors are as relevant to history as other factors. In writing for example of Ivan the Terrible, Professor Florinsky shows himself fully aware of this. That it should be necessary to commend Professor Florinsky for observing standards which a few decades ago were taken for granted by western historians is distressing. But the commendation is deserved.

This long book is readable and clear. Most book reviewers nowadays assume that the reading public is not capable of absorbing more than about one fact in every fifty pages, and that any author who fails to provide his readers with prefabricated ideas on every page is failing to do his duty. Whether the majority of readers really have such tastes, the present reviewer doubts. And if they do, then authors should ignore them. Readers of Professor Florinsky will have to use their mental facilities, but the task is made as little arduous as is compatible with scholarship.

The relative emphasis to be given to different periods and different factors in the history of a great nation is a matter on which few can ever agree. Professor Florinsky has made his own choice, and his long experience and knowledge entitle him to respect. Some may argue that the Middle Ages do not receive enough space. The first five hundred of Russia's thousand years of history get only one tenth of the space. But as the interest of the author and of most of his readers is likely to be in more recent periods, this can be excused. More serious is the very scanty treatment given to the Orthodox Church and to religious dissent and sects, especially in the last centuries. Among the factors which moulded the Russian intelligentsia, from which in time the radical and revolutionary leaderships emerged, surely the Orthodox cultural tradition was one of the strongest. Another gap is the problem of nationalities. In the nineteenth century about half (at the 1897 census 56 per cent) of the population of the Empire were non-Russians. The national movements of the subject peoples receive only a few scattered pages or paragraphs, and the social and political problems within the non-Russian areas are barely mentioned at all. On the other hand some subjects seem to be treated at too great length. The Eastern Crisis of 1875-1878 has 40 pages. It has been exhaustively discussed in the books of Sumner, R. W. Seton-Watson, Rupp, and others, and Mr. Florinsky has no essential new contribution to make. The First World War, up to the February Revolution, gets 70 pages. This too has been fully treated before, not least in Mr. Florinsky's own work The End of the Russian Empire.

These are however matters of opinion. They are criticisms of an admirable enterprise, which can be warmly recommended to those who wish to learn some Russian history.

HUGH SETON-WATSON
University of London

STEVENS, LESLIE C. Russian Assignment. Pp. xv, 568. Boston: Little, Brown & Company, 1953. $5.75.

This large and delightfully written book by Vice Admiral Stevens, our Naval Attaché for a little more than two years in Moscow when the cold war was just beginning, is an important addition to the fast growing body of literature on the Soviet Union. Written in the form of memoirs, the book is replete with keen notes and observations on the multiple phases of Soviet life: literature, theater, play-writing, book-printing, museums, moving pictures, fishing and flying, living conditions, concentration camps, women's lot as laborers, and of course the life of the diplomatic corps in that "golden land" held firmly "in the golden hands of the people."

At the present juncture of world affairs, however, the book is most important in its graphic, almost daily account of the tests and trials of our embassy personnel. The author could have had, as subtitle, the "decline and fall of our prestige in the Soviet Union," for while arresting and informative details of many significant events are given, yet all through it this disturbing fact, the sudden—almost catastrophic—fall of our prestige overshadows all else. For instance, the embassy quarters are leased on an annual basis, "but the renewal of leases is always a time of troubles." Every Russian employee of the embassy is required to report back to his government "on everything he can regarding foreigners—their interests, their characters and abilities, and what they are up to" (p. 20). When an official of the embassy is jailed and we try to elicit information about the case, the Soviet Foreign Office "would not even discuss the case with Durbrow [our Minister-Counselor]" (p. 98). The embassy has difficulties in importing supplies needed there. And when permits for importing are issued, then the imported articles are held in customs house. Next the embassy is informed "that everything which has been piling up for the last eight or nine months must be cleared out within ten days or it will be confiscated" (p. 253).

General Carter, our Military Attaché, and several assistant attachés were watching some planes practicing. Red Air Force officers told them that they could not do that. Our attachés were told to accompany them to the airfield headquarters; General Carter refused, and Red officers kept his diplomatic card. Subsequently it took several weeks to make an appointment with proper officials "to discuss the matter" (p. 350). At the end of a year in Moscow Durbrow told the author that 1937 was regarded as the worst year for foreigners in Russia, but that this past year (1948) "far surpasses it." Finally, in mid-1949 when his tour of duty was over the author could say (in Lermontov's words):

"Farewell to you, unwashed Russia, Land of slaves, and land of lords."

The Admiral knew the Russian language and made very effective use of it at all times. His book, along with General Deane's Strange Alliance (1947), and General Smith's My Three Years in Moscow (1949), should have a distinct and deserving place on any selected list of books on the subject.

A. O. SARKISSIAN
The Library of Congress

DEUTSCHER, ISAAC. The Prophet Armed: Trotsky, 1879-1921. Pp. xii, 540. New York: Oxford University Press, 1954. $6.00.

The Prophet Armed is the third in an ambitious series of biographies of Stalin, Trotsky, and Lenin, undertaken by Isaac Deutscher. One book on Stalin's life and one on the effect of Stalin's death made clear the framework of Mr. Deutscher's political thought and approach to his three protagonists. The present volume tells the story of Stalin's great opponent, from Trotsky's birth in 1879 to his apogee in 1921, when, as the powerful Commissar of War, he had just brought the Civil War to a triumphant end. A sequel, The Prophet Unarmed, will recount Trotsky's downfall and murder. A biography of Lenin will complete the trilogy.

In the two Stalin books Mr. Deutscher made clear his belief that the Russian Revolutions of 1917, particularly the Bolshevik seizure of power, were historically necessary and progressive. His criticisms of Joseph Stalin were made in general human terms ("cruel," "despotic," "barbarous"), but these methods were "forced" upon the dictator by the backwardness of his land and people. Only "totalitarian methods" could have industrialized, modernized, and collectivized Russia's industry and agriculture. Moreover, by his methods, Stalin so raised the level of Russia's economy and mass culture that, by the time of his death, he had made Stalinist totalitarianism historically unnecessary and outdated.

In The Prophet Armed Mr. Deutscher no longer argues but takes for granted the soundness of this approach. The minority seizure of power in November 1917, of which Trotsky is the hero, was only the "necessary" sequel to the overthrow of czarism in March. All those who thought otherwise—liberals, democrats, and democratic and agrarian socialists—are treated by the author as wrongheaded, base, perverse, historically myopic. The author is aware of the fact that minority seizure of power and holding of power against the will of even the peasants and workers made totalitarianism inevitable, but both the seizure of power and the totalitarian methods are "justified" by history. Only the "utopian illusions" of Lenin and Trotsky that they might use democratic methods or be bailed out of their dilemma by a revolution in the West are subject to Deutscher's criticism, since the hindsight, which comes from having lived longer, enables him to see that these were illusions. But it is these illusions which make Trotsky into a tragic hero.

Despite this unpromising moral and intellectual framework, The Prophet Armed is a moving and compassionate book. The cold reluctance of Deutscher's apologetics for Stalin are forced upon him by the dogmatics of his political position. But his life of Trotsky is done con amore. The writing takes on deeper dimensions. The research is more thorough, his protagonist more self-revealing. The tragedy of the conflict between the protagonist's dreams and the consequences of his deeds is deeply felt and ably presented. Only at the very end does the cold apologist return to hint that "when next the Prophet Unarmed is contemplated, the question will arise whether a strong element of victory was not concealed in his very defeat."

BERTRAM D. WOLFE
Brooklyn, New York

WARTH, ROBERT D. The Allies and the Russian Revolution from the Fall of the Monarchy to the Peace of Brest-Litovsk. Pp. vii, 294. Durham, N. C.: Duke University Press, 1954. $4.50.

This book produces a rather strange effect of simultaneous remoteness and nearness of the events it relates. Basically there is little that this book adds to what we already know; yet I consider the work a valuable contribution, for it deals with a subject that deserves continuous repetition since public memory is short lived. The subject of this work is the year of turmoil in Russia, March 1917 to March 1918, and the diplomatic fiasco which the Allies suffered in their futile endeavor to tame the events. Since western diplomacy can easily repeat the same follies it becomes absolutely necessary to refresh periodically our memory by reading a book such as this one.

To illustrate, take, for instance, the ill-famed "forgotten peace" of Brest-Litovsk. The subject has been adequately covered by J. W. Wheeler-Bennett. Warth devotes to the same subject a graphic chapter; it contains no startling revelation, yet by reading the account one regains useful insights into Communist tactics and policies. The overtones of the cold war are easily detected on every page.

The book serves other purposes: it reminds of the importance of understanding the peoples to whom we appeal through means such as the Voice of America, urging them to follow our way of life. It revives the memory of Allied blundering policies during the fateful four months following the November revolution, due to the abysmal lack of intelligent information. One cannot escape a sense of remorse at the staring poverty of imagination which the world press or the Allied leaders had demonstrated in evaluating the November revolution. Leading newspapers presented the occurrence as a "freakish happenstance" which would be remedied when "reason" and "sanity" reasserted their rightful heritage in the affairs of man." According to the press the revolution was carried out by "fanatics and anarchists" led by Lenin whose real name was Zederbaum, his comrades a mere handful of German-Jews in the service of the Kaiser. One magazine traced the entire affair to the "cabals of Geneva and Stockholm."

Gullible Allied statesmen were ready to buy sensational documents that presented the crudest forgeries, such as the Sission documents. It is a source of melancholy thought that a student of history such as President Woodrow Wilson should have been easily persuaded by Mr. Creel to accept the obvious forgeries as authentic sources. Dr. Warth aptly cites an "impeccably anti-Bolshevik commentator" who summarized the episode as a reminder that a state of war and a paralysis of critical faculties seem to march together.

Dr. Warth's book should be the desk copy of our policy-forming officials. It should be read by many Americans who seek to form intelligent political opinion concerning many of our crucial problems emanating from the presumably "passing incident" that occurred on November 7, 1917, when the scum came to triumph, as the Journal des débats had reported the November Revolution.

ANATOLE G. MAZOUR
Stanford University

CAROE, OLAF. Soviet Empire: The Turks of Central Asia and Stalinism. Pp. x, 300. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1953. $5.00.

Soviet Empire, which deals with a very important part of Asia and of the Soviet Union, is composed of three essential parts. The first two treat of "The Muslim Period and the Tsars" and the transition, 1917-1924, from czarist control to Soviet domination of Central Asia. Part III, which is of special interest, deals with the contemporary scene, under the general title of "Soviet Pressures." It is concerned with the problems of Nationalism and the Soviet Colonial Empire, Russification, Collectivization and the Suppression of Nomadism, Industrialization and Public Works, Soviet Central Asia during World War II, and the general problem of Deviationism.

Sir Olaf's volume is not a product of personal experience or of profound original research, but it is an important volume because the author has brought conveniently together into a single volume a great deal of material from the appropriate and available sources—what should be known about this highly important area. Readers will find of special interest, perhaps, his remarks about the problem of self-determination and the so-called “higher right of the dictatorship of the proletariat” in Communist jargon on this subject. But the other material in the volume is of equal interest—such as that on industrialization in Central Asia and the economic exploitation of the Turki and other elements in the area. Moreover, the chapter on World War II is of particular interest because of evident attitudes in the area, as reflected by the surrender of thousands of Red Army soldiers from Central Asia and the Nazi attempt to exploit these people.

Sir Olaf's volume is not only very well written, it is also well documented, with an extended bibliography of materials from Russian, Soviet, and Turkish sources, among others, for assistance in further research and study on this problem. In addition, there are four black and white maps which indicate the physical characteristics of the area, trace the Russian advance in Central Asia, mark the railway network, and demonstrate the linguistic distribution. It may well be hoped that the volume will have a wide reading.

HARRY N. HOWARD

Arlington, Virginia

LEITES, NATHAN. A Study of Bolshevism. Pp. 639. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press. $6.50.

Four years ago Dr. Nathan Leites of the Rand Corporation published a slim volume entitled The Operational Code of the Politburos (McGraw-Hill, 1951), as part of a study undertaken for the United States Air Force. He sought, in the tradition of Machiavelli, to reduce to general precepts the political strategy and tactics of the power-holders in the Kremlin. The effort was unsuccessful. Machiavelli as a practical diplomat was concerned with what Princes do. Leites, as an ivory-tower scholar, is concerned with what they say and write, with little regard to their acts or to the arena of their deeds. In a futile effort to reduce Communist ideology to Communist strategy, he failed to illumine either.

In the present volume, compiled with Gargantuan labor and suffocating documentation, he has expanded his earlier effort into a mountain which brings forth not even a mouse. His titles are intriguing: “Push to the Limit,” “If Pays to Be Rude,” “Avoid Adventures,” “The Denial of Accidents,” “The Irrelevance of Truth,” “The Danger of Vagueness,” (37 “dangers” are listed), “The Profits of Pressure,” “The Legitimacy of Retreat.” Each section consists of small quotations strung together from Communist classics and Russian literature, embellished with brief comments.

The result, alas, is wholly unreadable, uninformative, and stupefying. Every quotation is quoted out of context and is therefore meaningless, save to the reader who happens to know the context. The resulting jumble is utterly lacking in analytical or predictive value. This is a pity, for Dr. Leites is an earnest and intelligent researcher, trying seriously to grapple with an important problem of analysis and interpretation. It is a sad commentary on the “social science” here exemplified that its practitioners cannot distinguish between ideologies and policies and succeed in reducing both to nonsense and boredom. The effort is comparable to explaining the politics of the medieval Papacy by verses from the New Testament, the diplomacy of the Ottoman Empire by excerpts from the Koran, or the military strategy of Napoleon by quotations from Rousseau and Voltaire. This effort “to portray the spirit of the Bolshevik elite” portrays nothing, reveals nothing of any spirit save pedantry, and tells us nothing of value about the Bolshevik elite. Fortunately, it is not representative of contemporary social science but only its reductio ad absurdum.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

Williams College

GERSON, LOUIS L. Woodrow Wilson and the Rebirth of Poland, 1914-1920: A Study in the Influence on American Policy of Minority Groups of Foreign Origin. Pp. xi, 166. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953. $4.00.

The subtitle of Mr. Gerson's book promised a study of the little-known effects of activities of pressure groups on American foreign policy. It is too bad that this promise was not fulfilled. Of the 137 pages of text only six (pages 60-66) deal stricto sensu with the subject. The documentation of this part is limited to a few items from the Wilson archives and some earlier published documents. The rich material buried in the archives and libraries of the Polish National Alliance of America and the Polish Roman Catholic Union of America (both in Chicago) still remain untapped. Any serious study of this subject should not omit them. This omission makes Mr. Gerson's presentation incomplete: the work shows, in a quite fragmentary manner, the reaction of Wilson to the political pressure of the American Poles without indicating the strength of this pressure, the efforts behind it, and the means through which it was applied. Thus, an evaluation of causes and effects, of successes and failures of this pressure is impossible.

This, however, is a comparatively minor deficiency in Mr. Gerson's book. The bulk of the volume deals with a characterization of the large group of Americans of Polish descent and the internal politics of this group during World War I, and with the diplomatic history concerning Poland during this period. The author has brought out the crucial role of President Wilson and Colonel House in these events. He has also attempted to deal with the intricate problem of changing political orientations among the Poles in their homeland. Lack of knowledge and understanding of this subject, evident from erroneous use of source materials, is responsible for the essential errors in Mr. Gerson's book. For instance, by confounding “a certain Doctor Paderewski,” mentioned in Pilsudski's writings as a representative of the National Democratic Party, with Ignace Paderewski, Mr. Gerson produced an utter confusion in the presentation of events (pp. 105-106). A more careful study of the sources would have prevented the confusion and the erroneous conclusions. Out of this mistake arose another: Mr. Gerson in several instances presents Ignace Paderewski as a representative and mouthpiece of the National Democratic Party, to which the artist and prime minister never belonged.

Another error exemplifying negligent research and lack of knowledge of contemporary Austro-Polish developments is not less damaging to the book: on page 20 Mr. Gerson quotes an excerpt of a document annexed to the Bilinski diaries. The document in the Bilinski book contains a printing error: its date, instead of 1918, should read 1916. The text of the document is preceded by a reference to the page of the diary where it is discussed. A better knowledge of Austro-Polish developments and a glance into the text of the diary would have saved Mr. Gerson from repeating the error and from drawing an incorrect conclusion. Another Bilinski document was also quoted without consultation of the diary and led to additional false conclusions (p. 20).

Mr. Gerson had a good idea in replacing the usual bibliography of the subject by a Bibliographical Essay (pp. 140-146). However, the books discussed prove that he did not exhaust the available sources. The books on the American Poles are limited to a few monographs in the English language and a single book in Polish. The other pertinent writings in the Polish language, especially those originating during, and dealing with, the years 1914-1919, are completely ignored. He writes, “There are no works which deal exclusively with the Polish problem at the Peace Conference.” Then he goes on to quote, “for the Polish point of view,” a single volume by Smogorzewski. He is unaware of the existence of a four-volume collection of Polish documents relating to the Conference (Acts and Documents concerning Poland at the Paris Peace Conference, Paris, 1920-26, in Polish, parts in French and English) and an excellent book by the Secretary General of the Polish Delegation, Stanislaw Kutrzeba (The Congress, the Treaty, and Poland, Warsaw, 1919, 198 p., in Polish). There exist still other titles referring to special questions at the Conference.

Lack of space makes it impossible to bring out here all the errors, misinterpretations, and other shortcomings of this volume. It is amazing to see how these deficiencies could have been overlooked in a Ph.D. dissertation and unobserved by the publishers of a serious historical series.

W. S. SWORAKOWSKI

Stanford University

VUCINICH, WAYNE S. Serbia Between East and West: The Events of 1903-1908. Pp. x. 304. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1954. $4.75.

Through the use of the primary (also secondary) sources in several languages, especially the much neglected Serbian materials, Professor Vucinich has given us a significant picture of domestic political changes in Serbia during the period under study, and the impact these changes had upon the foreign policies of the Great Powers of Europe as well as upon Serbia's own foreign relations. This book, the product of years of painstaking effort and meticulous scholarship, represents an important contribution to historical research in a field which has received little attention in the English-speaking world. In distributing this careful study it is evident the volume Serbian revolution of 1903 was rily a struggle between two dy-

Arlington the conspiracy to assassinate the Queen and the plan to restore ageorgevich dynasty did not origi-

LEITF in Karageorgevich circles. Popular discontent with and hostility toward King Alexander Obrenovich was widespread, especially after his marriage to Queen Draga, a widow and a commoner, when not "a single general was willing to accept the post of war minister in the cabinet." His father had admonished Alexander that should he go through with his marriage plans "the dynasty could never recover from it," adding that he would be "the first to cheer the Government which shall drive you from the country, after such a folly on your part."

Professor Vucinich devotes considerable space to a discussion of Serbian politics and government in the period following the assassination of the childless Obrenovich royal couple and the coming to the throne of Peter I in 1903. From these pages there emerges a picture of a developing democratic parliamentary order, characterized by freedom, dynamic political parties, and a constitutional monarch. This is a long forgotten or little appreciated fact. By comparison with Tito's tyranny, the Serbia of King Peter I was a model democracy.

Also, in these pages one finds a detailed account of the "divide and rule" policy practiced in the Balkans by the Great Powers. Although Austro-Hungary seems to have excelled in this respect, Russia apparently was not far behind. And some British actions are not free from censure. In treating this whole problem, the author presents significant data on a number of Balkan questions (e.g., Macedonia), together with a great deal of historical information on the developing Great Power controversy in the Balkans during the years preceding the period with which this work is primarily concerned.

Last, but not least, note should be made of the first-rate documentation which characterizes this book, together with its excellent bibliography and the detailed index.

Experts may disagree with some of the author's conclusions, but they cannot deny that this work is a real contribution to historical scholarship.

ALEX N. DRAGNICH

Vanderbilt University

KOUSOULAS, DIMITRIOS G. The Price of Freedom: Greece in World Affairs, 1939-1953. Pp. xi. 210. Syracuse, N. Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1953. $4.00.

Those who love the cradle of democracy should read this small book—a concise and good summary of the foreign and domestic affairs of modern Greece during the most trying period of her existence. Dimitrios Kousoulas, who in his teen age lived in Greece and took part in the underground fight against the German invaders as well as in the civil war against the Communists, unfolds a terrible story of international rivalries focused around his beloved native Greece as well as around the other Balkan countries—Albania, Bulgaria, Rumania, Turkey, and Yugoslavia.

For a hundred years after her emancipation from Turkish domination in 1830 Greece was plagued by internal dissensions and international complications. Not unlike her own mythical Sisyphus, this modern nation with ancient glory was rolling a huge stone—the "Great Idea" of the restoration of the medieval Byzantine Empire under the scepter of the modern Greek King—up to the top of the steep hill, and always it escaped her hands and rolled down to the bottom again. At last, in 1930, her great statesman, Eleutherios Venizelos, had the courage to scrap the whole idea; and, after five centuries of enmity, Greece and Turkey became friends as well as neighbors.

During those later years the Greek people had to cope with a domestic military dictatorship, the unsuccessful Italian fascist aggression, the successful subjugation by the German Panzer Divisions, the ravishes of the various underground resistance groups that fought with frightful brutality less against the German invaders and more against one another for supremacy, and, after its liberation from the German occupation, a bloody civil war between the Communists and the anti-Communists.

Yet, thanks to the Churchill-Stalin "Percentage Agreement"—providing that Great Britain should have 100 per cent predominance in Greece while the Soviet Union should have only 75 per cent predominance in Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania—the subsequent intervention of the United Nations Organization, and especially the Truman Doctrine and American help, Greece managed to preserve her independence.

Disclaiming the intent to express sympathy for authoritarian regimes of any form, the author momentarily departs from his remarkable impartiality in order to praise the dictatorial regime of General Metaxas, which was established by royal decrees abolishing the political parties, dissolving Parliament, and suspending the constitutional Bill of Rights—although admitting at the same time that the said Regime of August Fourth (1936) was unpopular with the liberty-loving Greek people and that the apparent weaknesses of that regime virtually invited the Italian fascist aggression.

Moreover, the author has no sympathy for Greece's two-party system, the Liberal party (Venizelists) and the Populist party (Monarchists). He blames the latter for having undermined the efforts of the great Venizelos to bring about the realization of the "Great Idea" and the Liberals for having discredited the great prestige of the Greek Government-in-Exile during the German occupation and thus frustrated the Greek territorial claims at the peace parleys.

It seems to this reviewer (a United States citizen of Bulgarian origin, who had in his teens a gruesome experience with such "Balkan politics") that these charges are baseless and unfair, for the author himself gives plenty of evidence that the reaching for the Byzantine rainbow in the 'twenties as well as the achievement of the Greek territorial claims in the 'forties was beyond Greek control. History teaches us that a state, great or small, invites disaster if it is divided against itself into two factions, "patriots" and "traitors."

THEODORE I. GESHKOFF

New York City

WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE

PÖLNITZ, GÖTZ FREIHERR VON. Fugger und Hanse: Ein hundertjähriges Ringen um Ostsee und Nordsee. Pp. xiv. 236. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 1953. DM 11.50.

Professor Götz von Pölnitz, whose brilliant two-volume biography of Jakob Fugger was reviewed in these pages in January 1953, gives in his present book the first authoritative and comprehensive survey of the Fuggers' struggle with the Hansa over economic power in its economic-political "Raum" in northern and eastern Europe. The conflict lasted from 1500 to 1600 and spanned the most interesting years in the life of Jacob the Rich (d. 1525), the time of Anton Fugger (d. 1560), his nephew, and of the latter's successors in "the epoch of the decline" of both the Fugger company and the Hansa.

Von Pölnitz devotes roughly half of the 132 pages of text to Jacob Fugger's successful penetration of the Hanseatic sphere of interest. The principal elements of this early phase of the Fugger-Hansa struggle he outlined in the biography of his hero. But in this work the author has fully expanded the account on the basis of the rich material contained in the "Sources and Explanations" of the second volume of the biography and of other hitherto unpublished documents. For the period after 1525, covered in the second half of the text, von Pölnitz has drawn on materials which he and his collaborators have so far collected for "the history of Anton Fugger." As the author makes clear, the entrance of the Fuggers into the maritime trade in the Baltic and the North seas was part of the sixteenth century expansion and of wide encroachment of southern German business firms upon the Hanseatic sphere of influence. But when Jacob Fugger first penetrated this area the classic period of the Hansa's power was long past; it now concentrated entirely upon preserving the position already achieved. The Fuggers were the most successful challengers of this monopoly; through their extensive system of "political finance" they secured the support of the Church and the ruling princes against the Hansa, which enabled them to invade its "powerful economic strongholds."

Fugger und Hanse is not purely economic history, however; it is essentially a study of the political and cultural development of sixteenth-century Germany and Europe. And the Fugger-Hansa conflict is discussed within the context of this development which embraced the great religious schism (Reformation), the rise of national states and economies, the virtual disintegration of the Holy Roman Empire, and the shift of the center of political power to the Atlantic coast, particularly to England. Von Pölnitz shows with admirable lucidity how these momentous changes in the political and cultural structure of Europe perniciously affected both the Hansa and Fugger interests, ending in the simultaneous descent of the contestants.

As a study of Fugger business activities in a specific area, the volume makes a welcome addition to the meager number of such investigations and thus enriches the literature on this famous Augsburg family and its unique business organization. Moreover, it is an important contribution to the history of Europe in the sixteenth century. The book contains 19 pages of bibliographical notes, an 8-page index of persons and places, and 17 selected documents which are published here for the first time. Also, it should be noted that the work appears in a new series of studies on the Fuggers which is being edited by Professor von Pölnitz.

ARTHUR LEON HORNIKER

Washington, D. C.

SCHACHT, HJALMAR. 76 Jahre meines Lebens. Pp. 692. Bad Wörishofen: Kindler & Schiermeyer Verlag, 1953. DM 19.80.

76 years of my life is Schacht's autobiography, first published in Revue, a German illustrated weekly. The book's easy style, the often jovial approach of its author, and the many illustrations are sure to make it popular. Schacht portrays himself as an earthy type, a rugged individualist who was always ready to speak his mind.

Great intelligence, an excellent education, and ambition were the main ingredients which enabled Schacht to rise. He is at his best when he illustrates his exceptional ability to reduce economic principles to simplicity and when he describes his readiness to apply them to the root of the problem despite the opposition of special interests. His roles as currency administrator at the end of the inflation and later as Reichsbank President gave him ample opportunity for a stalwart course.

Schacht entered politics as one of the founders of the left-of-center German Democratic Party. Later, his more conservative and nationalistic views led him to oppose the Weimar Government's policy of fulfillment. Schacht resigned from the Reichsbank presidency in 1930, primarily because of his opposition to the payment of reparations and the unsound policy of foreign loans received by German communities, but returned to his old post under Hitler. He was acquitted at Nuremberg, and then held by German courts awaiting his denazification. Now the head of his own banking firm, Schacht is again the financial expert called upon by many governments.

Schacht's historic role will continue to arouse moral judgments which differ from his own. He was quite obviously attracted to Hitler. An ambivalence of loyalty and opposition to the Führer expresses itself long after he recognized Hitler's duplicity. This cleverly written book could not convince this reviewer that Schacht was not rationalizing his participation in the Hitler cabinet when he says that he tried to exert a moderating influence from within. Surely Schacht must have realized that his role in Hitler's government not only furnished it with the financial know-how it needed, but also lent it prestige and a camouflage of moderation. To Schacht's credit, it should be noted that he was on occasion outspoken and courageous in his opposition to Nazism and Hitler's war policy. His attitude finally led to his detention in concentration camp after the July 1944 coup. But he does not explain convincingly why he continued as a Minister without Portfolio when dismissed from his old post in 1939. Similarly, in 1937, when every minister received the Nazi Golden Party Emblem, he accepted that decoration, though he had by that time set his course against Nazi rowdyism. Another minister (Eltz v. Rübenach) returned his and resigned.

Toward the end the reader is estranged by Schacht's dependence on the argumentum ad hominem, his distortion, and vindictiveness against those whose views of his part in Hitler's rise differ from his own. For those who cannot so glibly dismiss the disastrous consequences of the Hitler holocaust over Europe, Schacht's oblique treatment of the basic moral problem makes this book another in a series of sad commentaries on our time.

ERIC H. BOEHM

Historical Abstracts
Vienna, Austria.

WHEELER-BENNETT, JOHN W. The Nemesis of Power: The German Army in Politics 1918-1945. Pp. xvi, 829. New York: St. Martin's Press (distributors for Macmillan & Co., London), 1953. $12.00.

If you have time to read only one book on modern Germany and on the Germans, it should be this one. Not only is it a brilliantly written history and one of the best examples of Wheeler-Bennett's scholarship; it is also a guidebook for those who are seriously interested in preventing another German rearmament from once again losing for us the battle of the peace. A center of interest in this dramatic story of twenty-seven years is the German mind, and particularly the German military mind. The unraveling of the plot should aid considerably in answering the perplexing question: Why have the Germans contributed so greatly to western civilization and at the same time destroyed so much? How could the nation which produced Heine and Goethe and Hindenburg tolerate the "beasts of Buchenwald"?

The story begins—and ends—with unconditional surrender. For those who have lived intimately with the Germany of this period, dramatic moments such as the ill-fated Kapp putsch, the blood-purge of 1934, and the poorly planned attempt by certain army leaders on Hitler's life, in 1944, stand out as high spots in the tragedy. But even the narrative and analysis of less dramatic events and more plodding years are made alive. One of the most historically decisive periods is objectively analyzed in the chapter on the von Seeckt period, during the early Weimar regime. For when Kaiser Wilhelm II and his entourage crossed the Dutch border in 1918, the Army which had owed loyalty to its Emperor alone lost its political independence. Into this vacuum came General von Seeckt, who successfully avoided parliamentary control over the Army by the Socialists and who instead made of the Army the most powerful political factor in Ebert's and Stresemann's Republic. The first political step led to the second as von Schleicher, the intriguer, followed von Seeckt and as the Army looked on Hitler as one who could convert the worker from socialism to nationalism. But it was not long, as we see, before the Army's use of Hitler became Hitler's use of the Army.

The conclusion is inevitable that the German army aided greatly in the ascendancy of Hitler and the National Socialists and in the revival of German nationalism. Some of the parallels in the periods after 1918 and 1945 are ominous, and Wheeler-Bennett's masterpiece is required reading on current problems.

RALPH F. BISCHOFF

New York University

ANDERS, WLADYSLAW. Hitler's Defeat in Russia. Pp. xviii, 267. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1953. $4.00.

Excellent introduced by an expert on Germany and the Second World War, Colonel (retired) Truman Smith (former United States Military Attaché to Berlin and German specialist in the Intelligence Division of the War Department General Staff from 1941 till 1945), this book shows thorough experience of modern strategy in the broadest sense of the word. Colonel Smith states, obviously with justification, that "General Anders attempts to answer in the present analytical study of the Russo-German war a number of questions and succeeds to the full, with amazing clarity and unanswerable logic." Based on seven maps, Hitler's military blunders and the German army's defeats are recalled. But far beyond being a technical book, it gives the hitherto unwritten story of an astounding misuse of military possibilities by stupid and criminal psychological, that is, political warfare. The chapters "German Policy in the Occupied Territories of USSR," "Treatment of Soviet Prisoners and of the Population of the USSR plus Partisan Warfare" disclose facts, which the writer of this review, then a German soldier in Russia, witnessed or learned about after the war.

Anybody interested in modern mass psychology should not miss the chapter about the "Eastern Volunteer Formations on the German Side," which amounted to more than 800,000 soldiers. He will agree with the author's remark, as does the present reviewer (who met these soldiers in action): "This movement was one of the strongest ideological movements known in modern history." The picture is rounded by indispensable chapters on "Western War Supplies to the USSR," "the Results of Western Bombing of the Reich," and "the Tying up of German Forces in the West." The Conclusion gives the author's excellent estimate of the "Communist Strength in 1953" and a Bibliography, in which anybody who wants to deal further with this grim story will find, if not all, at any rate the most recent and important foreign publications.

It seems probable that Wladyslaw Anders will be counted one day among the great names of a free and independent Poland, as are Thaddeus Kosciuszko and Prince Jozef Anton Poniatowski. The reviewer would like to express the feeling that this sober study may one day be regarded as one of the beginnings on which Polish-German understanding can be rebuilt. This seems possible only in the very climate the book offers, rising above the understandable hatred resulting from the events of 1939—the unjustified German aggression toward Poland and the treatment of the vanquished Poles. The consequences of these days are still with us.

AXEL VON DEM BUSSCHE

Bonn am Rhein, Germany

GRAYSON, CARY TRAVERS, JR. Austria's International Position, 1938-1953: The Re-establishment of an Independent Austria. Pp. xvi, 317. Geneva: Librairie E. Droz, 1953. 15 fr. s.

The chief "text" for Austria's International Position, 1938-1953 by Dr. Cary Travers Grayson, Jr., is from the Moscow Declaration of November 1, 1943, by the British, Soviet, and American governments: "Austria, the first free country to fall a victim to Hitlerite aggression, shall be liberated from German domination." The book is divided into five Parts: "The Austrian Question (1918-1938)"; "Under German Rule (1938-1945)"; "Allied Planning (1943-1945)"; "Under Allied Occupation (1945-1947)"; and "Victim of Cold War (1947-1953)." Except for certain passages, the first two Parts are mediocre or worse. It is inexcusable, for example, to include inaccurate dates (pp. 10, three instances; 24); to present an incorrect account of the immediate origins of the civil war of 1934 (p. 10); and to characterize L. Kunschak as a member of the "peasant wing" of his political party (p. 43).

On the other hand, because of the continuing efforts to distort and falsify historical fact, Grayson merits warm thanks for reminding his readers of the record of three former Chancellors of Austria. Seipel's influence was "anti-democratic"; he "encouraged" the Fascist Heimwehr (p. 7). Dollfuss "crushed socialism and democracy [and] created a Catholic-Fascist Austria" (p. 11). Schuschnigg helped Seipel and Dollfuss and became a "virtual dictator" (p. 11). Possibly of equal importance is the author's suggestion that if Schuschnigg had decided to fight Hitler in March 1938, "even if only on a small scale . . . Austria, at the end of the war, would have been" considered and treated like other fully liberated and "guilt-free" nations (p. 34).

The remaining Parts of Grayson's study were read by this reviewer with steadily rising enthusiasm. Any reader with interest in international affairs will find a compact account of many aspects of them—why Austrian resistance to Hitler has "been generally undervalued" (p. 50); why the decision at Potsdam to include German assets in eastern Austria among Russia's share of such assets was "absolutely contradictory" to the intent of the Moscow Declaration to re-establish an Austria "capable of finding economic security" (pp. 68, 79); why the author concludes that "Both East and West seem to realize that the complete collapse of Allied co-operation in Vienna would signify world collapse" (p. 172); and others. Specialists will particularly appreciate the reproduction of documents (pp. 180-300). Most praiseworthy of all are the author's masterly analysis of the diabolical cleverness and the brutal cynicism with which the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics utilized the Potsdam decision about "German assets," and his explanation of the justness of the Austrians' plea to be "liberated from their liberators."

CHARLES A. GULICK

University of California
Berkeley

SCHLESINGER, RUDOLF. Central European Democracy and Its Background. Pp. xiv, 402. New York: Grove Press, 1954. $5.00.

The title of Mr. Schlesinger's competent work is not quite appropriate. Mr. Schlesinger's discussion of Central European Democracy and Its Background is essentially limited to but two of the several democratic forces that influenced democratic trends in Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia during the period under consideration, 1848 to 1938.

The book, learned as is the presentation, makes sorry reading. In spite of the libertarian spirit of the Central European political movements in the nineteenth century and of the high-powered ideological theses of German socialist theoreticians, the social structure of the Central European countries, with the exception of Czechoslovakia, escaped their impact and remained basically unchanged. The "sham constitutionalism," to use the author's term, as applied after World War I, was nothing more than an artificial framework without economic and social content.

The embryonic labor movements of Imperial Germany and Austro-Hungary battled against lack of political consciousness, for they themselves lacked political orientation; they were confused about their aims and uncertain of their place in a semi-industrial society. Ideological struggle among socialist leaders corroded the unity of the labor movement, and the trade unions were torn between the wings of radicals and mild reformists; thus, disunited and uncertain, they had to face the strong hand of the well-entrenched combination of Prussian junkers, the military and the industrial magnates in Berlin, and the ultraconservatives in Vienna. In the Austro-Hungarian Empire the labor movement suffered, in addition, from the contradictory national interests of its various components. When the pacifist convictions of the labor movement in Central Europe were put to the crucial test in 1914, they broke down for the cheap price of mere existence. Slogans on "the defense of the Fatherland" compromised its ideological standing and brought further confusion into the ranks of the socialist parties.

The story of impotence in leadership continued in the interwar period, now in the new setting of postwar opportunities. Ground between the millstones of right-wing and fascist political parties on one side and the unscrupulous agitation of Communists on the other, the democratic labor movement once again lost sense of direction. When the events in Germany in the early 1930's and in Austria in 1933-34 led to the inevitable clash between the forces of democracy and fascism, once again the democratic labor movement and organization succumbed.

Mr. Schlesinger concludes the story with the catastrophe of 1938, when the last democratic stronghold, Czechoslovakia, fell, though in this case the blame was clearly to be found not on the scene of home politics, but in Western Europe. If his study had included recent developments, he would undoubtedly have to add to the aggravating list of socialist failures the fact that the socialist parties in all countries west of Germany offered little resistance to the Communist onslaught and were completely absorbed by the Communist parties.

Thus we see confirmed once again, as we have during the past fifty years of the socialist movement, their perplexing inability to face history's challenge with adequate means.

It would be, however, one-sided to overlook the achievements of democracy in Central Europe, as it would be unfair to put the responsibility for its failures on any single party or movement. The international factors appear to have played a considerable, if not decisive, role in the debacle, though Mr. Schlesinger does not give them a proper place. A full appreciation of his book presupposes knowledge of the complex political, economic, social, and national picture of Central Europe as it developed during the last hundred years. As a specialized study, sometimes narrowly conceived, it is to be highly appreciated for its research value in the little known area and even less known problem.

JOSEF KORBEL

University of Denver

OTHER COUNTRIES

WILGUS, A. CURTIS (Ed.). The Caribbean: Contemporary Trends. Pp. xxvi, 292. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1953. $4.00.

Not counting the Foreword and Introduction, this volume consists of twenty papers delivered at a conference in December 1952 under the joint auspices of the University of Florida and the Alcoa Steamship Company. These are grouped in five parts: economic 5, social 2, literary and artistic 4, political and diplomatic 4, and peace and security 5. A break-down of authorship shows the following distribution: by nationality, 7 Latin America, 1 Great Britain, 12 United States; by occupation, 12 government, 5 academic, 3 business. No one could complain that the coverage is not broad.

The character of the volume is better indicated by the word "trends" in the title than by the word "problems" which is stressed in the Foreword and occurs several times in the table of contents. When problems are discussed, the discussion is unilateral and long-range; little attention is paid to controversies that have been making the headlines, and there is no argument over pros and cons. For example, the index has only three entries under "Communism"; the only direct reference to the central problem of Guatemala, which has been shaping up rapidly since 1944, is an unexplained allusion to "the Guatemalan Government's harassment of the United Fruit Company" (p. 48); and the main discussion of United States investment and enterprise in the Caribbean area occurs in a paper characterized by its descriptions of Venezuela as "a shining example of the open door to private enterprise and foreign capital development" and of the record of the United States oil companies in Venezuela as "spotless" (pp. 50, 51).

While all twenty papers have something of interest and value for readers curious about the Caribbean area, the two groups that average highest in caloric content are those dealing with economic and social trends, for most of these come to grips with specific long-range problems of the Caribbean area. Particularly noteworthy in this respect are the papers by Miron Burgin on economic development, Gilberto Loyo and Raúl Ortiz Mena on underdeveloped areas, Carl C. Taylor on land, and Francis Violich on urbanization in Venezuela. Papers of the same type in other groups are those by Fernando Rivera on the civil service and John and Mavis Biesanz on "Uncle Sam on the Isthmus of Panama—a Diplomatic Case History." Other papers which are of high quality do not possess this specific appeal in the same degree. For example, the excellent paper by R. S. Boggs on Caribbean ballads deals with the period of the Spanish conquest, and the papers by Harold Davis on political philosophies and by John C. Dreier, Luis Quintanilla, and Misael Pastrana on peace and security deal primarily with themes of general inter-American or Latin American interest and secondarily with the Caribbean area.

ARTHUR P. WHITAKER

University of Pennsylvania

KOTB, SAYED. Social Justice in Islam. Translated from the Arabic by John B. Hardie. Pp. viii, 298. Washington, D. C.: American Council of Learned Societies (Near Eastern Translation Program, No. 1), 1953. $3.00 paper; $4.00 cloth.

The highly useful project inaugurated by this volume promises to do yeoman service for our knowledge of the modern Near East. The language barrier here is particularly formidable. Neither the best informed Western works nor even a prolonged stay in the area itself can put students who do not know Near Eastern languages in touch with the true thinking and feeling of the people and acquaint them with the "grass-roots," attitudes of Near Easterners toward their problems. Now, this series of translations sponsored by the ACLS can be expected to form a ready source of information on all shades of Near East intellectual activity.

Political and sociological scholarship in the Near East is frankly polemical and intensely partisan. Sayed Kotb's book, first published about 1945, is no exception. It is no objective exposition of the subject of social justice in Islam from the historical or sociological point of view. The author's purpose is to disprove frequent accusations that the contemporary Muslim religious authorities are opposed to social progress. At the same time, he intends to show that within its traditional framework Islam provides the basis for a perfect solution of all the social problems of the day.

Specifically, Sayed Kotb is concerned with the chronic problem of the grossly uneven distribution of wealth in his native Egypt. His solution, constituting the controversial nub of the work, is an attempt to prove that, according to Muslim legal thinking, "the property belongs to the society and is merely administered by an individual, so that when his stewardship is over the property reverts to its original ownership, the community (p. 106)." In this connection, the author emphasizes his opposition to Communism. He maintains that Islam is a force to be reckoned with in the political struggle between Communism and the West. In his opinion, the ideologies of both Communism and the West are identical, and both groups are united in their materialism. The spiritualistic ideology of Islam, he believes, remains the only possible alternative.

Throughout the book and its many interesting discussions, the Western reader will constantly ask himself two mutually related questions: Is this Islam? And is this kind of thinking influential in the Near East? In connection with these questions, it should be kept in mind that the recognized sources of Muslim law and theology are immensely rich in all kinds of sociological reflections and, in addition, are rarely satisfied with presenting just one side of any given problem. Sayed Kotb uses those sources skilfully and reinterprets them against a background that is more strongly molded by the ideals of the French Revolution than any other more recent current. His Islam never existed before the nineteenth century, but it is a legitimate reinterpretation of a great religion which is very much alive. Its influence may be minimized by many Near Easterners who have an entirely secular outlook. However, Sayed Kotb's ideas represent a definite continuity with the past and speak the language which the majority of Near East people still understand best. Thus, their actual and potential appeal must not be underestimated by anybody interested in the present and future of the Near East.

FRANZ ROSENTHAL
University of Pennsylvania

OTHER BOOKS

- ABBOTT, [SISTER] M. MARTINA. A City Parish Grows and Changes. Pp. vii, 87. Washington, D. C.: Catholic University of America Press, [c. 1953]. $3.00.
- ALLEN, CLARK LEE, JAMES M. BUCHANAN, and MARSHALL R. COLBERG. Prices, Income, and Public Policy: The ABC's of Economics. Pp. x, 418. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $5.00.
- ARNOLD, MAGDA B., and JOHN A. GASSON. The Human Person: An Approach to an Integral Theory of Personality. Pp. x, 593. New York: Ronald Press Company, 1954. $5.75.
- AWAD, MAHMOUD M. A Challenge to the Arabs. Pp. 120. New York: Pageant Press, 1954. $2.50.
- BAILEY, SIDNEY. Naissance de nouvelles démocraties: Introduction et développement des institutions parlementaires des pays de l'Asie du Sud et dans les territoires coloniaux. Two reports. Pp. xiii, 200. Paris: Librairie Armand Colin, 1953. 650 fr.
- BARBER, JOSEPH (Ed.). Diplomacy and the Communist Challenge: A Report on the Views of Leading Citizens in Twenty-five Cities. Pp. vi, 46. New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1954. 50 cents.
- BATTISTINI, LAWRENCE H. Japan and America: From Earliest Times to the Present. Pp. x, 198. New York: John Day Company, 1954. $3.00.
- BERTELSEN, AAGE. October '43. Translated by Milly Lindholm and Willy Agtby, with a Foreword by Sholem Asch. Pp. x, 246. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1954. $3.00.
- BLACKFORD, L. MINOR. Minor Eyes Have Seen the Glory: The Story of a Virginia Lady, Mary Berkeley Minor Blackford, 1802-1896. Who Taught Her Sons to Hate Slavery and to Love the Union. Pp. xxii, 293. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $5.00.
- BOCK, EDWIN A. Fifty Years of Technical Assistance: Some Administrative Experiences of U. S. Voluntary Agencies. Pp. x, 65. Chicago: Public Administration Clearing House, 1954. $1.50.
- BORTON, HUGH, SERGE ELISSEFF, WILLIAM W. LOCKWOOD, and JOHN C. PELZEL (Compilers). A Selected List of Books and Articles on Japan in English, French and German. Pp. xiv, 272. Rev. and enlarged ed. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press (for the Harvard-Yenching Institute), 1954. $5.00.
- BOSSARD, JAMES H. S. The Sociology of Child Development. Pp. xii, 788. Rev. ed. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $6.00.
- BRAINARD, HARRY G. International Economics and Public Policy. Pp. xiii, 706. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1954. $6.00.
- BRECHT, ARNOLD. The Political Philosophy of Arnold Brecht: "That the dignity of man is to be respected in every individual." Edited by Morris D. Forkosh. Pp. 178. New York: Exposition Press, 1954. No price.
- BROOKES, EDGAR H. South Africa in a Changing World. Pp. v, 151. New York: Oxford University Press, 1954. $3.00.
- BURNS, JAMES MACGREGOR, and JACK WALTER PELTASON. Government by the People: The Dynamics of American National Government. Pp. xxiii, 905. 2d ed. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1954. $8.65.
- CALVOCORESSI, PETER, assisted by KONSTANZE ISEPP. Survey of International Affairs 1951. Pp. xii, 505. New York: Oxford University Press (for Royal Institute of International Affairs), 1954. $10.50.
- CHINOV, ELY. Sociological Perspective: Basic Concepts and Their Application. Pp. vi, 58. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday & Company, 1954. 85 cents.
- COLLINS, JAMES. A History of Modern European Philosophy. Pp. x, 854. Milwaukee, Wis.: Bruce Publishing Company, 1954. $9.75.
- COMMISSION ON FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY. Staff Papers Presented to the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy. Pp. xv, 531. Washington, D. C.: U. S. Superintendent of Documents, 1954. $1.75.
- CREAMER, DANIEL, assisted by MARTIN BERNSTEIN. Capital and Output Trends in Manufacturing Industries, 1880-1948. Studies in Capital Formation and Financing, Occasional Paper No. 41. Pp. viii, 104. New York: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1954. $1.50.
- CROMBIE, A. C. Augustine to Galileo: The History of Science A.D. 400-1650. Pp. xv, 436. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $8.00.
- DAVIS, PEARCE, and GERALD J. MATCHETT. Modern Labor Economics: An Analysis of Labor-Management Relations. Pp. xviii, 659. New York: Ronald Press Company, 1954. $6.00.
- DAY, CLARENCE ALBERT. A History of Maine Agriculture, 1604-1860. Pp. ix, 318. Orono, Maine: University Press, 1954. $2.50.
- DONIGER, SIMON (Ed.). Religion and Human Behavior. "Pastoral Psychology Series." Pp. xxii, 233. New York: Association Press, 1954. $3.00.
- ERICKSEN, E. GORDON. Urban Behavior. Pp. xiv, 482. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $4.75.
- FABIAN, ROBERT. London After Dark: An Intimate Record of Night Life in London, and a Selection of Crime Stories from the Case Book of Ex-Superintendent, Robert Fabian. Pp. 237. New York: British Book Centre, 1954. $3.50.
- FAULKNER, HAROLD UNDERWOOD. American Economic History. Pp. xxiv, 816. 7th ed. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $5.75.
- FERGUSON, JOHN H., and DEAN E. MCHENRY. Elements of American Government. Pp. x, 649. 2d ed. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $5.00.
- FRIEDMANN, W. (Ed.). The Public Corporation: A Comparative Symposium. Pp. vii, 612. Toronto, Canada: The Carswell Company, 1954. $10.00.
- FRIEDRICH, CARL J., and ROBERT G. MC-CLOSKEY (Eds.). From the Declaration of Independence to the Constitution: The Roots of American Constitutionalism. Pp. lxviii, 71. New York: Liberal Arts Press, 1954. 75 cents.
- GOREY, GEOFFREY. The Life and Ideas of the Marquis de Sade. Pp. 244. Rev. ed. New York: British Book Centre, 1954 (originally published by Peter Owen, London, 1953). $3.50.
- GRAYSON, HENRY. Economic Planning Under Free Enterprise. Pp. x, 134. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1954. $2.00.
- GROVES, HAROLD M. Financing Government. Pp. xviii, 618. 4th ed. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1954. $6.00.
- HERTZLER, JOYCE P. Society in Action: A Study of Basic Social Processes. Pp. xii, 452. New York: Dryden Press, 1954. $5.25.
- HROZNÝ, BEDŘICH. Ancient History of Western Asia, India and Crete. Translated by Jindřich Procházka. Pp. xv, 260. New York: Philosophical Library, [c. 1953]. $12.00.
- INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL INDUSTRIAL AND LABOR RELATIONS. Labor, Management, and Economic Growth. Proceedings of a Conference on Human Resources and Labor Relations in Underdeveloped Countries, November 12-14, 1953. Edited by Robert L. Aronson and John P. Windmuller. Pp. v, 251. Ithaca, N. Y.: New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations, Cornell University, 1954. $2.00.
- JAMES, PRESTON E., and CLARENCE F. JONES (Eds.). American Geography: Inventory and Prospect. John K. Wright, Consulting Editor. Maps by John C. Sherman. Pp. xii, 590. Syracuse, N. Y.: Syracuse University Press (for the Association of American Geographers), 1954. $6.00.
- KAMMAT, ARNOLD H. The Ethics of Civilization. Pp. vii, 80. Washington: Public Affairs Press, 1954. $2.00.
- KEIRSTEAD, B. S. An Essay in the Theory of Profits and Income Distribution. Pp. viii, 110. Oxford, England: Basil Blackwell (distributed in the U. S. by Augustus M. Kelley, New York), 1953. $1.75.
- KNIGHT, HENRY. Food Administration in India, 1939-47. Pp. xii, 323. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1954. $7.50.
- LEOPOLD, LUNA B., and THOMAS MADDOCK, JR. The Flood Control Controversy: Big Dams, Little Dams, and Land Management. Pp. xiii, 278. New York: Ronald Press Company, 1954. $5.00.
- MAO TSE-TUNG. Selected Works. Volume One: 1926-1936. Pp. 336. New York: International Publishers, 1954. $3.00. Works will be published in 5 volumes.
- MARKHAM, F. M. H. Napoleon and the Awakening of Europe. In "Teach Yourself History Series." Pp. vii, 184. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $2.00.
- MERRIAM, CHARLES E., and ROBERT E. MERRIAM. The American Government: Democracy in Action. Pp. xi, 944. Boston: Ginn and Company, 1954. $6.25.
- MITCHELL, ROBERT B., and CHESTER RAPKINS. Urban Traffic: A Function of Land Use.

- Pp. xviii, 226. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $5.00.
- MORGENTHAU, HANS J. Politics Among Nations: The Struggle for Power and Peace. Pp. xxv, 600, xxv. 2d ed., revised and enlarged. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1954. $5.75.
- NORDIN, J. A., and VIRGIL SALERA. Elementary Economics. Pp. xv, 783. 2d ed. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1954. $7.95.
- OGLE, MARBURY B., JR., LOUIS SCHNEIDER, and JAY W. WILEY. Power, Order, and the Economy: A Preface to the Social Sciences. Pp. xii, 852. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $6.00.
- OLIVER, HENRY M., JR. A Critique of Socio-economic Goals. Pp. 189. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1954. $2.50 paper; $3.00 cloth.
- OMAN, CAROLA. Lord Nelson. Pp. 158. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $1.75.
- PARSONS, TALCOTT. Essays in Sociological Theory. Pp. 459. Rev. ed. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1954. $6.00.
- PATTERSON, ROBERT T. Federal Debt-Management Policies, 1865-1879. Pp. xi, 244. Durham, N. C.: Duke University Press, 1954. $4.50.
- PAZ-SOLDAN, C. E. La Solidaridad de las Americas ante la Salud: Un Testimonio Personal. Pp. 316. Lima: Biblioteca de Cultura Sanitaria del Instituto de Medicina Social de la Universidad de San Marcos, 1954. No price.
- PENNINGTON, L. A., and IRWIN A. BERG (Eds.). An Introduction to Clinical Psychology. Pp. vii, 709. 2d ed. New York: Ronald Press Company, 1954. $6.50.
- PEPINSKY, HAROLD B., and PAULINE NICHOLS. Counseling Theory and Practice: The British Isles: A Study of the Stone-Press Company, 1954. $4.50.
- PETERSON, SHOREY. Economics. Pp. xx, 827. Rev. ed. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1954. $5.75.
- PIGGOTT, STUART. The Neolithic Cultures of the British Isles: A Study of the Stone-using Agricultural Communities of Britain in the Second Millennium. Pp. xix, 420. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954. $13.50.
- PRICE, F. A. Liberian Odyssey: "By Hammock and Surfboat"—The Autobiography of F. A. Price. Pp. xv, 260. New York: Pageant Press, 1954. $7.50.
- RAISIN, JACOB S. Gentle Reactions to Jewish Ideals, With Special Reference to Proselytes. Edited by Herman Hallperin. Pp. xxiii, 876. New York: Philosophical Library, 1953. $7.50.
- St. Lawrence University and Frederick A. Moran Memorial Institute on Delinquency and Crime, 1950-1953. Edited by Herbert A. Bloch et al. Pp. 197. Canton, N. Y.: St. Lawrence University, 1953. No price.
- SAINT-YVES, LEONARD DE (Ed. and translator). Selected Writings of De Sade. Pp. 306. New York: British Book Centre (originally published by Peter Owen, London, 1953), 1954. $6.75.
- SAYE, ALBERT B., MERRITT B. POUND, and JOHN F. ALLUMS. Principles of American Government. Pp. vi, 442. 2d ed. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1954. $6.35.
- SCHICKELE, RAINER. Agricultural Policy: Farm Programs and National Welfare. Pp. x, 453. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $6.50.
- SETTON, KENNETH M., and HENRY R. WINKLER (Eds.). Great Problems in European Civilization. Pp. xx, 649. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1954. $7.65.
- SHEEHAN, DONALD (Ed.). The Making of American History. Book 1: The Emergence of a Nation. Book 2: Democracy in an Industrial World. Pp. xi, 462; xi, 463-912. Rev. and enlarged ed. New York: Dryden Press, 1954. $2.90 each volume.
- SNIDER, DELBERT. Introduction to International Economics. Pp. xix, 472. Homewood, Ill.: Richard D. Irwin, 1954. $6.00.
- TATE, H. CLAY. Building a Better Home Town: A Program of Community Self-analysis and Self-help. Pp. xvi, 236. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $3.50.
- UNITED NATIONS, Department of Economic Affairs. Economic Survey of Asia and the Far East, 1953. Also issued as Vol. IV, No. 4 of the Economic Bulletin for Asia and the Far East. Pp. xiv, 161. Bangkok (distributed in U. S. by Columbia University Press, New York), 1954. $1.50.
- . Economic Survey of Europe in 1953, Including a Study of Economic Development in Southern Europe. Pp. xii, 314. Geneva: (distributed in the U. S. by Columbia University Press, New York), 1954. $2.50.
- WEHLE, LOUIS B. Hidden Threads of History: Wilson Through Roosevelt. Pp. xix, 300. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $4.00.
- WILBUR, WILLIAM H. Guideposts to the Future: A New American Foreign Policy. Pp. xiv, 176. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1954. $2.50.
- Acheson, Dean, 34
- Africa, 31, 75, 139, 145
- political and social conditions, 38, 127, 128, 156
- See also North Africa
- Alexander the Great, 151
- Allen, George V., quoted, 118
- American Academy of Political and Social Science, viii, 57, 68
- American Federation of Labor, 72
- Amos, quoted, 20
- Annam, 92, 95
- Appleby, Paul, quoted, 116
- Arab League, 148
- Arab states, 141, 142
- anti-Arab propaganda, 147, 149
- in third-power group, 27, 28, 29
- Israel-Arab relations, viii, 132, 142-143, 149, 150, 156
- pan-Arabism and Arab unity, 142, 148-149
- population, 150
- relations with United States, 143, 144-145, 151
- Arabia, 141
- See also Saudi Arabia
- Armed services
- GI's in Japan, 3, 4, 6, 15
- GI's in Korea, 46
- in Iran, 153
- Asia
- "Asia for Asians," 53, 63, 66, 127
- Communism in, 12, 52-53, 54-55, 56-58, 81, 128-129, 156
- in third-power group, 27, 28, 29
- need of communication with West, 68-69
- present conditions and problems, 8-11, 12-13, 52-53, 71, 124, 127-129, 156-157
- U. S. island defensive perimeter in, 34, 36, 38
- See also Middle East; names of countries, as India
- Atlantic Pact, see North Atlantic Treaty
- Atomic Energy Commission, 55
- Aurobindo, see Ghose
- Australia, 49, 52, 75
- Azerbaijan, 154
- Bahrein, 151
- Bao Dai, 89, 94, 97, 103
- Batu Khan, 59
- Benedict, Ruth, cited, 1-2
- Berle, Adolf A., Jr., The Soviet-Chinese Complex, 56-70
- Berle, Adolf A., Jr., quoted, 57
- Berlin Conference, 87, 104, 106, 120
- Bikini Atoll, 55
- Bowles, Chester, 66, 119
- cited, 128
- quoted, 118, 122
- British Commonwealth, 28, 29, 30, 100, 101, 109, 139, 145
- Burma, 49, 52, 53, 61, 71, 81, 90, 108, 109, 112, 121-122
- independence of, 8, 54, 102-103, 128, 155
- Byrnes, James F., quoted, 154
- Cairo Declaration, 34, 44, 49
- Cambodia, 54, 89, 90, 101, 102, 104, 105, 108
- independence of, 8, 52, 64, 100
- Canada, 19, 62, 140
- Capper, Arthur, 96
- Castries, Christian de, 106
- Ceylon, 71, 108
- independence of, 8, 128
- Chamberlain, Joseph, 157
- Chamberlain, Neville, 58
- Chase, William C., 76
- Chiang Kai-shek, 34, 39, 49, 74, 87
- China, 8, 37, 38, 44, 48, 59, 62, 71, 83, 108, 156
- Japanese trade with, 10-11
- See also China, People's Republic of; China, Republic of; Chinese, overseas nationals
- China, People's Republic of (Communist, mainland, Red China; Peiping), 38
- and India, 28, 35-36, 57, 71, 120, 122, 131, 133
- and Indochina, 54, 56, 60, 63, 64, 80, 81, 85, 90-91, 105-107, 111
- and Japan, 17, 18-19
- and Korea, 3, 35-36, 37, 45, 47, 48, 49, 50-51, 56, 58, 60, 63, 65, 73-74, 79, 80, 81, 85, 86
- and Nationalist China, viii, 34, 64, 69, 74, 75, 76, 81-82, 87-88
- and Soviet Union, 28, 56, 58-61, 71, 72, 73, 77-78, 83-84
- Bamboo Curtain, 69, 88
- recognition of, 36, 51, 57, 62-64, 70, 71, 73, 77, 79, 84, 85-86, 106, 111, 122
- revolutionary pattern, 67
- totalitarian nature of, 72, 85-86
- trade embargo on, 18-19, 51, 62, 63, 65-66, 81, 86, 87, 106
- U.N. membership, question of, 51, 62-64, 77, 79-81, 85-86, 87, 122
- See also Chinese, overseas nationals
- China, Republic of (Formosa; Kuomintang China; National government; Nationalist China), 51, 53

INDEX

China, Republic of (cont.)
 and Communist China, viii, 34, 64, 69, 74, 75, 76, 81-82, 87-88 and U.N., 51, 77, 78, 88
 armed forces, 76, 81
 Constitution, 74
 government, 74-76
 sponsorship of Ho Chi-minh, 93 treaty with U.S.S.R. (1945), 84 troops in Indochina, 54, 91, 94
 U. S.-Chinese relations, 37, 49, 76, 78, 87-88, 111, 122
See also Chinese, overseas nationals
 Chinese, overseas nationals, 69, 75, 78, 81, 85
 Churchill, Winston, 34, 39
 quoted, 100
 Civil rights human rights in Japan, bibliography, 5 in Korea, 40
 in Vietnam, 92
 Clark, Mark W., 38
 Cochinchina, 92, 95
 Coddington, George A., Jr., viii
 Colombo Plan, 100
 Collective security, 12, 17-18, 31, 68, 69-70, 73, 80-81, 107, 112, 121, 132-134, 141-146, 151
 Colonialism, 9, 30, 31, 38, 52, 91, 93, 100, 104, 106, 110, 118, 127-128, 133, 142, 156
 Communism
 and Japan, 3, 5, 6, 12-13, 16-17, 27, 29, 32
 and Korea, 34-41, 42, 43, 45, 48-51
 and North Korea, 3, 36, 40, 45, 47, 48-51, 64
 in France, 38, 96, 103, 107
 in Indochina, 17, 38, 52, 53, 54-55, 56, 57, 60, 61, 63, 64-65, 70, 78, 79, 80, 81, 85, 89, 90, 92-93, 95, 96, 100, 103-105 (passim), 108-109, 112
 in Nationalist China, 75-76
 Indian attitude toward, 116, 120, 121-122, 128-129, 133, 134-135
See also China, People's Republic of; Soviet Union
 Connally, Tom, 34
 Curzon, George Nathaniel, 157
 Czechoslovakia, 30, 34-35, 50, 51, 65, 70, 134
 DEAN, ARTHUR H., The Role of the United States in the Far East, 48-55
 Delcassé, Théophile, 157
 Democracy
 in Communist China, 83
 in India, 114, 116, 117, 122, 127, 135, 136-137
 in Japan, 3, 5, 12, 14-15, 26, 27, 29, 31
 in Korea, 37, 38-41
 in Nationalist China (Formosa), 74-75, 76-77, 82 Middle East attitude toward, 156 relation to hunger, 9

Dienbienphu, Vietnam, 54, 99, 100, 106, 107, 111
 Disraeli, Benjamin, 157
 Douglas, William O., 52
 Dulles, John Foster, 62
 cited, 22
 Indian reaction to, 119, 120
 "massive retaliation" policy, 36 negotiation of Japanese Peace Treaty, 22 on India-Pakistan relations, 119
 on Red and Nationalist China, 122
 Overseas Press Club speech, 51, 79, 80, 99, 100, 104
 quoted, 39, 87, 112, 123, 129, 132
 talks with Syngman Rhee, 36
 Economic Cooperation Administration, 34, 37
 Eden, Anthony, 73
 Education
 in Japan, Communist-U. S. propaganda in, 3
 in Korea, 40, 45
 Egypt, 132, 138, 140, 141, 142, 148, 153, 155, 156
 Eisenhower, Dwight D., 38, 157
 and Indo-American relations, 118, 119, 120, 133 on Japanese-U. S. trade, 20 on Red and Nationalist China, 51, 122
 quoted, 145, 151
 Ely, Paul Henri, 62
 European Defense Community, 54, 105
 FATEMI, N. SAÏFOUR, The United States in the Changing Middle East, 151-157
 Fatemi, N. Saïfour, cited, 153, 154
 Ferry, Jules, 157
 Food production and needs, 10, 53, 60, 84, 116, 117, 135
See also Rice
 Ford Foundation, 126, 136
 Foreign Operations Administration, 76, 119, 120
 Formosa, 49
 prewar Japanese trade with, 18
See also China, Republic of Forster, Edward Morgan, quoted, 115
 France and China, 91, 109
 and European defense, 54, 97, 104, 105, 106, 109
 and third-power group, 28
 Communism and Communists in, 38, 96, 103, 107
 in Indochina, 51, 52, 54, 61-63, 64, 80, 89-98 (passim), 99-107, 108-112
 in Middle East, 145, 151, 152, 155, 157
 in North Africa, 96, 131, 143, 155-156
 Franklin, Benjamin, 43
 Free Chinese, see China, Republic of Free French, in Indochina, 54, 89

 "Free Thai state," 90
 French Union, 52, 54, 89, 95, 96, 99, 100-101, 105
 Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand, 113, 115, 136
 quoted, 114
 Geneva Conferences, 45, 54, 56, 57-58, 61, 64, 70, 78-79, 80, 87, 91, 99, 104, 106, 110-111, 120
 Genghis Khan, 59, 61, 66
 Germany, 54, 70, 105
 East, 30, 38, 50, 84
 West, 30
 Ghose, Aurobindo, 115
 Gokhale, Gopal Krishna, 115
 Gorwala, A. D., 123
 Great Britain
 and Communist China, 62, 63, 65, 73, 85
 and third-power group, 28
 in India, 103, 113, 126, 135, 144, 155 in Middle East, 132, 140-142, 144, 145-146, 151-157 (passim) on Korean truce, 36
 troops in Indochina, 54, 94
See also British Commonwealth
 Greece, 35, 141, 145, 155
 Gutenberg, Johann, 43
 Hahn, Kiu-sul, 33
 Haines, G. Grove (Ed.), cited, 155
 Henry, Patrick, quoted, 47
 Hitler, Adolf, 57, 58, 65, 66, 153
 Ho Chi-minh, 54, 90, 91, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 102, 103, 105, 107, 108-109, 111
 Hodge, John R., 37
 Hoskins, Halford L., The Quest for Security in the Middle East, viii, 138-150
 Hoskins, Halford L., cited, 138
 Hrdlicka, Aleš, quoted, 40
 Hughes, H. Stuart, quoted, 117-118
 Hukbalahap, 57
 Hurley, Patrick, 153
 Hydrogen bomb, 55, 56, 69, 89, 98
 IGUCHI, SADAŌ, The Place of Japan in a Resurgent Asia, 8-13
 Iguchi, Sadao, quoted, 18
 India, 49, 69, 108
 and Communist China, 35-36, 57, 71, 120, 122, 131, 133
 and Soviet Union, 66, 120, 121, 122-123, 131, 132, 133
 "Asia for Asians" policy, 63, 66, 127 attitude toward Communism, 116, 120, 121-122, 128-129, 133, 134-135
See also India-and Communist China; India-and Soviet Union community development projects, 117, 136
 Constitution, 117, 124, 125

elections (1951-52), 117, 135
 Five Year Plan, 116, 117, 134, 136 history and culture, 114-115, 124, 136
 in U.N., 117-118, 126, 135
 independence of, 8, 61, 102-103, 113, 124, 125, 128, 135, 144, 155
 industry, 124, 125-126, 135, 136
 Korean truce negotiations, 35-36, 131 liberal-bloc leanings, 30, 133 neutral, "third-power" position of, 26, 28, 29, 35, 66, 117-118, 121, 122-123, 129, 133 Pakistani-Indian relations, viii, 116, 119-120, 132-133, 134 political and economic conditions, 115-117, 118, 134-135, 135-136 population, 117, 125, 136 role in Asia, 114, 127
 trade, 125, 135, 136
 U. S. capital investment in, 126, 136
 U. S.-Indian relations, 66, 113-137
 Indochina, 71, 156
 Associated States, 52, 89, 100, 103, 106, 108, 109, 112
 French Expeditionary Corps in, 102 geographical position, significance, 49, 71, 108
 political and racial divisions, 89-90
 U. S. relations with, 52-54, 56, 62-65, 69-70, 87, 89, 93, 94-95, 96, 97-98, 99, 104-106, 111, 112 war in, 38, 51, 53, 54, 56, 57, 60, 61, 63, 64, 65, 78, 80, 89, 95-98, 99, 100, 102, 103-107, 108, 109-112
See also Cambodia; Laos; Vietminh; Vietnam
 Indonesia, 38, 49, 52, 53, 69, 71, 108, 112
 independence of, 8, 54, 61, 128
 Iran
 aridity, 139
 British relations with, 141, 152-156 oil in, 138, 151-152, 155
 nationalism in, 148
 Shah of, reforms, 156-157
 U. S. relations with, 140, 152-155
 Iraq, 141, 153, 155
 oil in, 138, 152
 Israel, 138, 141
 Arab-Israel relations, viii, 132, 142-143, 149, 150, 156
 U. S. involvement, 142-143, 144, 150
 Japan, 51, 70
 Allied occupation, 1-7, 11, 12, 14, 15-16, 25, 27
 American Cultural Centers, 16
 and Korea, 33, 37, 40, 42, 43, 44-45, 46, 48, 49, 50 attitude toward Communism and Soviet Union, 1-7 (passim), 12-13, 16-17, 29

- Japan (cont.)
 Constitution, 27
 defense and rearmament, 12, 17-18, 26
 government, 12, 23, 29
 in Indochina, 54, 91, 93, 94, 97, 108 in "island defensive perimeter," 16-17, 34, 36
 industry, 9, 10, 19, 23
 intellectual exchange program, 12, 16 intercultural relations with U. S., 1-2, 3, 4, 15-16, 69 investment capital, need of, 10, 19-20, 30 Mutual Defense Assistance Agreement, U. S.-Japan, 12, 18 nationalism, 1, 2, 3, 5
 past of, present validity, 5-6, 11-12, 14-15
 Peace Treaty, 14, 20, 21, 22, 25, 44, 100 place in Asia, 8-13, 16-17, 53
 Security Treaty, U. S.-Japan, 12, 20, 25
 trade, 10-11, 17, 18-20, 63, 65
 treaties and agreements with U. S., listed, 20-22 world politics, her choice in, 23-32
 Jebb, Gladwyn, 63
 Jefferson, Thomas, 157
 quoted, 157
 JENKINS, ALFRED LE S., Present United States Policy Toward China, 83-88
 cited, 122
 JERNEGAN, JOHN D., American Policy Toward India and the Security of South Asia, 131-137
 Johnson, Louis Arthur, 135
 Jordan, Hashemite Kingdom of, 139, 141, 149
 Kālidasa, 115
 Kanagawa, Treaty of, 15
 Kashmir, 118, 119-120, 132
 Katsura, Taro, 33
 Katz-Suchy, Julius, quoted, 57, 65
 Kennan, George F., quoted, 121
 Khmer, 89
 Kim Il Sung, 40
 Knowland, William F., 51
 quoted, 45
 Koo, V. K. WELLINGTON, The Real China, 71-82
 Korea, 71
 early history, 33-34, 42, 43-45, 48 geography of, significance, 37, 42, 49-50
 38th parallel, 34, 35, 46-47, 48, 50, 110
 See also Korea, Republic of; Korean War; North Korea Korea, Republic of, viii agriculture in, 44, 47, 50
 Constitution, 39
 amendment (1952), 40
 independence of, 8, 33-34, 44, 48
 industry, 46, 47
 Mutual Defense Treaty with U. S., 36, 51 rehabilitation programs in, 37, 46, 50
 See also Korea; Korean War
 Korean War, 3, 10, 17, 23, 33, 34-36, 38, 41, 45, 48, 51, 53, 57, 58, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 66, 69-70, 73-74, 78, 80, 102, 104, 120, 134
 Armistice, 36, 38, 41, 48-49, 54, 56, 57, 60, 63, 80, 85, 86, 87, 104, 105, 120, 131
 "settlement of the Korean question," 36-41, 42-47, 48, 49, 50-51, 63, 64, 70, 87
 Kublai Khan, 59
 Kuomintang China, see China, Republic of Kuwait, 138
 Laniel, Joseph, 106, 108
 quoted, 106
 Laos, 54, 61, 89, 90, 101, 102, 108
 independence of, 8, 52, 64, 100 treaty of association and friendship (France-Laos), 100, 101
 Latin America, 27, 28, 49, 75
 Lattimore, Owen, quoted, 36
 Lattre de Tassigny, Jean de, 104, 111
 Lebanon, 139, 141, 155
 Leclerc de Hauteclouque, Jacques Philippe, quoted, 94
 Lenin, Nikolay, 81, 128
 Libya, 141, 142
 Lincoln, Abraham, 157
 Lippmann, Walter, 65
 MacArthur, Douglas, 4, 26, 35, 38, 48
 McCarthy, Joseph R., 62
 McCLURKIN, ROBERT J. G., Relations Between Japan and the United States, 14-22
 Japan and the United States, quoted, 22
 Machiavelli, Niccolò di Bernardo, quoted, 22
 Madagascar, 96
 Magsaysay, Ramon, 57
 Malaya, 49, 53, 57, 61, 71, 108, 128
 Malenkov, Georgi M., 29, 60
 quoted, 17
 Malik, Yakov A., 35
 Manchuria, 37, 47, 49, 50, 58, 59, 83, 84
 Mao Tse-tung, 83-84, 104, 108-109, 128
 Marshall, Sir John, quoted, 114
 Marx, Karl, 128
 Marxism, 24-25, 128
 Masaryk, Jan, 51
 MEHTA, GAGANVIHARI L., India and the United States: Democracy East and West, 124-130
 Michener, James A., 16
 Middle East, 128-129, 131
 and colonialism, 38, 155-157 as third political entity, 149 defense, 118, 132, 140, 141, 143, 145-146, 156 defined, 138, 151
 history and culture, 138, 147
 independence of countries in, 138, 151

- nationalism, 142, 143, 145, 147-148, 152, 155, 156
 oil in, 132, 138, 139-140, 143, 146, 151-152, 155 physical characteristics, 139 political, economic, and social problems, 132, 138-139, 155-157
 U. S. relations with, 118, 138-147, 149-157
 MILLET, PIERRE, Our Common Stake in Indochina, 99-107
 Min, Yong-whan, 33
 [Mohammed Riza Pahlavi], Shah of Iran, 156-157
 Mongolia, People's Republic of, 84
 MORITO, TATSUO, Japan and the Two Worlds, viii, 23-32
 Morocco, 143, 148, 149
 Moscow Conference, 154
 Motion pictures
 Communist, 2
 Japanese, 2, 16
 U. S., 2, 3, 4, 16
 Muccio, John J., quoted, 39, 40
 Munich Conference, 57-58, 70
 Mussolini, Benito, 66
 Naidu, Sarojini, 115
 Nakasian, S., cited, 151
 Nationalism, 8, 41, 52-53, 67-68, 91, 103, 108, 109, 110, 118, 142, 143, 145, 147-148, 152, 155, 156
 Nationalist China, see China, Republic of Navarre Plan, 105
 Nehru, Jawaharlal, 29, 32, 39, 52, 53, 63, 106, 113, 115, 117-118, 119, 123, 133, 134-135
 cited, 114
 quoted, 57, 120, 121, 122, 133
 Nemazee, Mohammed, cited, 151
 Nepal, 81
 Neutrality and neutralism, 71
 as possible course for Japan, 25, 26-29, 32 for Korea, 45
 in Middle East, 146
 of India, 26, 28, 29, 35, 66, 117-118, 121, 122-123, 129, 133
 New Zealand, 49, 52
 Nguyen Ai Quoc, 93
 See also Ho Chi-minh
 Nixon, Richard M., 120
 North Africa, 96, 131, 140, 155-156
 air bases in, 143, 151
 North Atlantic Treaty (Atlantic Pact), 132, 140, 143, 144
 North Atlantic Treaty Organization, 101, 105, 117, 121, 140, 141, 142, 143, 145-146
 North Korea, viii, 36, 38, 47
 Communist control in, 3, 36, 40, 45, 48, 50-51, 64 industrial capacities, 47, 50
 See also Korea; Korean War
 Office of Strategic Services, 93, 95
 Office of War Information, 1, 5
 Oil
 in India, 126, 136
 in Middle East, 132, 138, 139-140, 143, 146, 151-152, 155 in Russia and satellites, 151 in Western Europe, 140 in Western Hemisphere, 140, 152
 U. S. consumption, 140
 OLIVER, ROBERT T., A Brief for Korea, 33-41
 Oliver, Robert T., cited, 39
 O'Shaughnessy, Arthur, quoted, 14
 Otis, James, 43
 Ottoman Empire, 141
 Pacificism, in Japan, 24-25, 26, 31
 See also Neutrality and neutralism
 Paine, Thomas, 43
 Pakistan, 49, 71, 108, 149
 agreement with Turkey, 134
 independence of, 8, 102-103, 128
 India-Pakistan relations, viii, 116, 119-120, 132-133, 134 military defense, 118
 U. S. military aid, 118, 119-120, 131-133, 134
 Palestine, 142-143, 144, 149, 150, 155
 PALMER, NORMAN D., Ups and Downs in Indo-American Relations, 113-123
 Palmerston, Henry John Temple, 3d Viscount, 157
 Pandit, Mrs. Vijaya Lakshmi, 115
 Patel, Vallabhbhai, 116
 Pearl Harbor, 33, 45, 153
 Pearson, Lester B., 62
 quoted, 128
 Perry, Matthew C., 15
 Peter the Great, 151
 Philippines, the, 33, 34, 49, 53, 57, 69, 71, 108
 independence of, 8, 54, 102-103, 105, 128
 Point Four Program, 126, 141, 155
 Poland, 6, 34, 50, 134
 Portsmouth, Conference and Treaty, 33, 48
 Potsdam Conference, agreements and declaration, 5, 49, 79, 94
 Press, Communist, 77, 84
 Propaganda
 anti-Arab, 147, 149
 Communist, 69, 77-78, 84, 106, 117, 131
 in Japan, 2-5, 7, 17
 on Korea, 38
 U. S., in Japan, 2-7
 Vietminh, 54
 Radford, Arthur William, 65
 Radio, 68
 Communist, 17, 77, 84
 Japanese, 2, 17

- Radio (cont.)
 U.N., 35
 U. S., 2, 3, 5, 6
 Ram Mohan Roy, 115
 Revolutionary pattern, 67
 Revolutionary War, 43, 47
 Rhee, Syngman, 33-40 (passim), 42-43, 48, 50, 51, 63
 Rice, 4, 9, 44, 50, 53, 61, 90, 109
 RIFA'I, ABDUL MONEM, The Arab Commonwealth, 147-150
 Right, Edwin M., quoted, 155
 Rio de Janeiro, Treaty of, 117
 Robertson, Walter S., 72
 quoted, 123
 Rockefeller Foundation, 126, 136
 Roosevelt, Franklin D., 34, 95, 135, 153, 157
 quoted, 153
 Roosevelt, Theodore, 33, 48
 Rosenberg, Julius and Anna, 6
 Rostow, W. W., 67
 Roy, Ram Mohan, see Ram Mohan Roy Russia
 in Korea, 33
 in Middle East, 151, 152
 war with Japanese, 44, 48
 See also Soviet Union
 Saudi Arabia, 139, 151
 oil in, 138, 152
 Schufeldt, Robert W., 33
 Shakespeare, William, 115
 SHARP, LAURISTON, Paradoxes in the Indochinese Dilemma, 89-98
 Shuster, William Morgan, 152
 Smith, H. Alexander, quoted, 76
 South America, see Latin America
 Soviet Union
 and Communist China, 28, 56, 58-61, 71, 72, 73, 77-78, 83-84
 and India, 66, 120, 121, 122-123, 131, 132, 133
 and Japan, 1, 2-7, 25
 and Korea, 34-41, 42, 48, 50, 51
 and Middle East, 151, 154-155 economic aid to Yugoslavia, compared to U. S. aid, 30 oil production, 151 recognition of Vietnam, 90 revolutionary pattern in, 67 treaty with Nationalist China, 84
 See also Communism
 Stalin, Joseph, 29, 34, 108, 153, 154
 quoted, 80
 Stassen, Harold E., 120
 Stevenson, Adlai E., 52, 120
 quoted, 128-129
 Sudan, 141, 142
 Suez Canal Zone, 132, 141, 142, 148, 155
 Sweden, 28
 Syria, 138, 139, 141, 149, 153, 155
 Taft, William Howard, 33, 152
 Tagore, Rabindranath, 113, 115
 Tehran Conference, 79, 153
 Templer, Gerald, quoted, 128
 Thai people and language, 52, 89, 90
 Thailand (Siam), 8, 49, 52, 53, 54, 61, 71, 89, 90, 108, 121-122
 THAYER, PHILIP W., The Indochinese Question Mark, 108-112
 Tibet, 85
 Tilak, Bal Gangadhar, 115
 Tokuda, Kyuichi, quoted, 17
 Tonkin, 54, 92, 95, 103
 Toynbee, Arnold, 114, 152
 quoted, 115
 Trade, see China, People's Republic of—trade embargo on; India—trade; Japan—trade Transjordan, 143
 See also Jordan
 Truman, Harry S., 35, 48, 96, 154-155
 Truman doctrine, 35, 64, 155
 Trumbull, Robert, quoted, 114
 Tunisia, 143, 148
 Turkey, 35, 134, 138, 141, 143, 145, 151, 155
 United Nations, 28, 32, 68, 69, 127 admission of Communist China, 51, 62-64, 77, 79-81, 85-86, 87, 122 and Asian countries, 127
 and Indochina, 96
 and Iranian problem, 154
 and Korea, 10, 34, 35, 37-38, 39, 41, 44, 46, 48, 50, 51, 60, 61, 65, 69, 73-74, 80, 87
 and Palestine, 142
 collective defense agreements, 64 defense commitments, 69-70
 Eisenhower atomic-pool proposal, 120
 India in, 117-118, 126, 131, 135
 Nationalist China in, 51, 77, 78, 88 resolution on Kashmir, 118-119
 United Nations Economic Commission, 9
 United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, 37
 United States
 and Africa, 127, 128, 131, 140, 143, 151, 155-156 and Arab states, 143, 144-145, 151 and Communist China, 51, 53, 63-66, 70, 77-78, 79, 83, 84-86, 122
 and India, 66, 113-137
 and Indochina, 52-54, 56, 62-65, 69-70, 87, 89, 93, 94-95, 96, 97-98, 99, 104-106, 111, 112 and Israel, 142-143, 144, 150
 and Japan, 1-7, 9-22, 30, 69

- and Korea, 33-41, 42-43, 44, 46, 47, 48-51, 53, 54, 56, 60, 61, 62, 69, 70, 73, 78, 102, 104
 and Middle East, 118, 138-147, 149-157
 and Nationalist China, 37, 49, 76, 78, 87-88, 111, 122
 military aid to Pakistan, 118, 119-120, 131-133, 134 public opinion as policy determinant, 56, 62
 Van Fleet, James Alward, 35, 38
 Venezuela, oil production, 152
 Vichy France, 54, 93, 94, 97, 141
 Vietnam (Democratic Republic of Vietnam)
 Communist connections, 17, 54, 61, 64, 70, 85, 103-104, 105, 108-109 history, 90, 92-98 war with Vietnam, 54, 64, 95-98, 105, 110-112
 Vietnam, 92, 108
 and the French Union, 99, 101, 104, 105 army, 52, 92, 101-102, 109, 110 attitude to the French, 54, 91, 95, 96, 110, 111-112 cultural background, 89, 90-91
 French citizens in, 92, 101
 independence of, 8, 52, 64, 95, 96, 97, 100, 110, 111-112 relations with China, 89, 90-91, 94 war with Vietminh, 54, 64, 95-98, 105, 110-112
 Vietnam, Democratic Republic of, see Vietminh Vivekananda (Narendra Nath Dutt), 115
 Vo Nguyen Giap, 93
 Voice of America, 16
 Washington, George, 43
 WILDES, HARRY EMERSON, The War for the Mind of Japan, 1-7
 Wiley, Alexander, 79
 Willkie, Wendell, quoted, 96
 Wilson, Woodrow, 33, 125, 152-153, 157
 World War II, 34, 57, 70, 113, 132, 140, 141, 142, 151
 See also Cairo Declaration; Potsdam Conference; Tehran Conference; Yalta Conference
 Yalta Conference, 79
 YANG, YOU CHAN, The Aspirations of Korea, 42-47
 Yeh, George, 79
 Yemem, 139
 Yisunsin, 43
 Yoshida, Shigeru, quoted, 11, 17
 Yugoslavia, 30, 38

New and vivid insights into the troubled East

"A thorough, competent and extremely fascinating piece of political history."—THE AUSTRALIAN OUTLOOK

NATIONALISM AND REVOLUTION IN INDONESIA

By GEORGE McT. KAHIN, Assistant Professor of Government, Cornell University

HERE is the documented and unembroidered account of the events that have reshaped the political face of Indonesia. The history of Dutch rule, the policies of the Japanese during the occupation, the role of the United Nations, the attitude of the native Communists in Indonesia, the interplay of political parties, and the personalities of the native leaders are all shown as interlocking elements in the history of this national awakening.

503 pp., 4 maps. $6.00

A colorful, intimate account of people and new ways in Arabia

THE ARABIAN PENINSULA

By RICHARD H. SANGER, Public Affairs Adviser of the Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs

THE fast-changing Arab world of today is here described by a man who has lived and traveled widely in the Middle East. Bustling Jidda, the model farms of Al Kharj, the mines of the Hejaz, the royal palaces of Riyadh, the towns of the oil coast, as well as King Saud al Saud and the sheikhs, bedouin, and town people of Arabia come to life in this knowledgeable book.

309 pp., 2 maps, 29 illus. $5.00

"Perhaps the best introduction to the modern Middle East to appear in the post-war period."
—THE JOURNAL OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

THE MIDDLE EAST IN WORLD AFFAIRS

By GEORGE LENCZOWSKI, University of California

Recent developments in eleven Middle Eastern countries are systematically set forth.

479 pp., 8 maps. $6.00

Order from your bookseller or from

Cornell University Press

124 Roberts Place, Ithaca, New York

Kindly mention THE ANNALS when writing to advertisers

VOLUME 295

SEPTEMBER 1954

THE ANNALS

of The American Academy of Political and Social Science

THORSTEN SELLIN, Editor

RICHARD D. LAMBERT, Assistant Editor

AMERICA THROUGH FOREIGN EYES

Edited by

RICHARD D. LAMBERT, Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of the Sociology of India and Pakistan

University of Pennsylvania

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

PHILADELPHIA

1954

CONTENTS

	PAGE
FOREWORD	vii

BACKGROUND

HOW OTHERS SEE US	William Buchanan	1
HOW AMERICANS SEE THEMSELVES: STUDIES OF AMERICAN NATIONAL CHARACTER	Reuel Denney	12
THEMES IN THE INTERPRETATION OF AMERICA BY PROMINENT VISITORS FROM ABROAD	Arvid Brodersen	21

AS AMERICA LOOKS IN EUROPE

AMERICA IN EUROPEAN EYES	Jacques Freymond	33
THE SOVIET IMAGE OF THE UNITED STATES: A DELIBERATELY DISTORTED IMAGE	Frederick C. Barghoorn	42
AMERICA AND AMERICAN OCCUPATION IN GERMAN EYES	Norbert Muhlen	52

HOW FOREIGN STUDENTS SEE US

INDIAN STUDENTS AND THE UNITED STATES: CROSS-CULTURAL IMAGES	Richard D. Lambert and Marvin Bressler	62
IMAGES OF THE UNITED STATES AND BRITAIN HELD BY FOREIGN-EDUCATED INDIANS	Ruth Hill Useem and John Useem	73
THE AMERICA-EDUCATED JAPANESE, I	Herbert Passin and John W. Bennett	83
THE AMERICA-EDUCATED JAPANESE, II	Herbert Passin and John W. Bennett	97
THE MEXICAN STUDENT VIEWS THE UNITED STATES	Ralph L. Beals	108
THE MEXICAN IMAGE OF AMERICANS	Norman D. Humphrey	116
SCANDINAVIAN STUDENTS' IMAGES OF THE UNITED STATES: A STUDY IN CROSS-CULTURAL EDUCATION	William H. Sewell, Richard T. Morris and Oluf M. Davidsen	126
THE SWEDISH STUDENTS' IMAGE OF THE UNITED STATES	Franklin D. Scott	136

Copyright 1954, by
THE AMERICAN ACADEMY OF POLITICAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCE
All rights reserved

Issued bimonthly by The American Academy of Political and Social Science at Prince and Lemon Sts., Lancaster, Pennsylvania.
Editorial and Business Offices, 3937 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia 4, Pennsylvania.

BOOK DEPARTMENT

	PAGE
ALLPORT, GORDON W. The Nature of Prejudice . Muzafer Sherif	171
ANDREWS, THEODORE. The Polish National Catholic Church in America and Poland . William W. Sweet	185
ATTLEE, C. R. As It Happened . Carl F. Brand	189
BARLOW, E. R. Management of Foreign Manufacturing Subsidiaries . John F. Mee	167
BARTH, KARL. Against the Stream: Shorter Post-War Writings, 1946-52 . Irl G. Whitchurch	186
BEN GURION, DAVID. Rebirth and Destiny of Israel . Edited and translated from the Hebrew under the supervision of Mordekhai Nurock. Edgar J. Fisher	205
BLACK, C. E. (Ed.). Challenge in Eastern Europe . E. C. Helmreich	195
BLOOMFIELD, ARTHUR I. Speculative and Flight Movements of Capital in Post-war International Finance . Edward T. Crowder	168
BRUNTON, D., and D. H. PENNINGTON. Members of the Long Parliament . George C. Rogers, Jr.	187
BURNHAM, JAMES. The Web of Subversion: Underground Networks in the U. S. Government . Nathaniel Weyl	162
CALPIN, G. H. (Ed.). The South African Way of Life . Melville J. Herskovits	193
CASE, LYNN M. French Opinion on War and Diplomacy During the Second Empire . Gordon Wright	198
CHATTERJEE, MANMATHA NATH. Out of Confusion . Harold A. Larrabee	184
COLE, G. D. H. An Introduction to Trade Unionism . Henry R. Winkler	189
COTTERILL, R. S. The Southern Indians: The Story of the Civilized Tribes Before Removal . Angie Debo	154
DAUER, MANNING J. The Adams Federalists . Alfred H. Kelly	156
DAY, BRIGHAM. Le Canada et les droits de l'homme: Le Concept des droits de l'homme dans la politique étrangère et la Constitution du Canada . H. McD. Clokie	191
DEANE, PHYLLIS. Colonial Social Accounting . Frank R. LaMacchia	191
DEGRAS, JANE (Ed.). Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, 1917-1941 . Vol. III: 1933-1941. Allen S. Whiting	193
DEUTSCH, KARL W. Political Community at the International Level . Martin B. Travis, Jr.	147
ELLIS, ALBERT. The American Sexual Tragedy . Marynia F. Farnham	174
FITE, GILBERT C. George N. Peek and the Fight for Farm Parity . M. R. Benedict	158
FREMANTLE, JAMES ARTHUR LYON. The Fremantle Diary . Edited by Walter Lord. O. P. Chitwood	157
GADOUREK, I. The Political Control of Czechoslovakia: A Study in Social Control of a Soviet Satellite State . Vlastimil Kybal	196
GAMBLE, SIDNEY D. Tin Hsien: A North China Rural Community . G. William Skinner	206
GILMORE, HARLAN W. Transportation and the Growth of Cities . Lee S. Greene	170
GOLOB, EUGENE O. The "Isms": A History and Evaluation . Edmund Whittaker	184
HAMILTON, DAVID. Newtonian Classicism and Darwinian Institutionalism: A Study of Change in Economic Theory . Fritz Karl Mann	166
HARROD, ROY. The Dollar: Sir George Watson Lectures, 1953 . Fred A. Shannon	168
HART, ALBERT G. Defense and the Dollar: Federal Credit and Monetary Policies . Francis H. Case	150
HENTIG, HANS VON. Zur Psychologie der Einzeldelikte. I: Diebstahl, Einbruch, Raub . Walter A. Lunden	172

	PAGE
HOCKING, WILLIAM ERNEST. Experiment in Education: What We Can Learn from Teaching Germany . Harold Zink	200
HOFFMAN, STANLEY. Organisations internationales et pouvoirs politiques des états . Clyde Eagleton	148
JACOBINI, H. B. A Study of the Philosophy of International Law as Seen in Works of Latin American Writers . C. G. Fenwick	147
JAMES, MARQUIS and BESSIE ROWLAND JAMES. Biography of a Bank: The Story of Bank of America, N. T. & S. A. Frederick A. Bradford	169
JEFFERSON, THOMAS. The Papers of Thomas Jefferson . Vol. 8. Leslie Lipson	155
JOHNSTON, RUBY F. The Development of Negro Religion . E. Franklin Frazier	185
KRAUS, MICHAEL. The Writing of American History . Donald Fleming	153
LANE, ROBERT E. The Regulation of Businessmen: Social Conditions of Government Economic Control . Horace M. Gray	165
LANGE, M. G. Totalitäre Erziehung: Das Erziehungssystem der Sowjetzone Deutschlands . Schriften des Instituts für Politische Wissenschaft, Vol. 3. Ralph Haswell Lutz	201
LEAKEY, L. S. B. Mau Mau and the Kikuyu . William E. Diez	192
LEFLER, HUGH TALMAGE, and ALBERT RAY NEWSOME. North Carolina: The History of a Southern State . George B. Tindall	158
LEVINSON, RONALD B. In Defense of Plato . William Ebenstein	180
LINK, ARTHUR S. Woodrow Wilson and the Progressive Era, 1910-1917 . George C. Osborn	160
LOOMIS, CHARLES P., JULIO O. MORALES, ROY A. CLIFFORD, and OLEN E. LEONARD (Eds.). Turrialba: Social Systems and the Introduction of Change . George L. Trager	177
LOWIE, ROBERT H. Toward Understanding Germany . Kurt H. Wolff	199
LUKACS, JOHN A. The Great Powers and Eastern Europe . Oron J. Hale	202
MACKENZIE, GORDON N., and STEPHEN M. COREY in association with JAMES HALL, VERONICA CASEY, MARY NOEL SMITH and others. Instructional Leadership . Edgar B. Wesley	178
MACPHERSON, C. B. Democracy in Alberta: The Theory and Practice of a Quasi-Party System . William R. Willoughby	190
MAURER, DAVID W., and VICTOR H. VOGEL. Narcotics and Narcotic Addiction . Alfred R. Lindesmith	176
MAYER, CHARLES. In Quest of a New Ethics . Translated and with a Preface by Harold A. Larrabee. W. T. Jones	183
MOORE, BARRINGTON, JR. Terror and Progress USSR: Some Sources of Change and Stability in the Soviet Dictatorship . George Denicke	194
MUNDY, JOHN HINE. Liberty and Political Power in Toulouse, 1050-1230 . Sidney Painter	199
MYRDAL, GUNNAR. The Political Element in the Development of Economic Theory . Translated from the German by Paul Streeten. Eugene O. Golob	163
NEILL, THOMAS P. The Rise and Decline of Liberalism . Ralph G. Jones	181
NELSON, GEORGE R. (Ed.), assisted by AUNE MÄKINEN-ÖLLINEN, SVERRIR THORBJÖRNSSON, KAARE SALVESEN, and GÖRAN TEGNER. Freedom and Welfare: Social Patterns in the Northern Countries of Europe . Raymond E. Lindgren	203
NEUTRA, RICHARD. Survival Through Design . Charles S. Ascher	182
NEVINS, ALLAN. Ford: The Times, the Man, the Company . George C. Osborn	170
NICHOLS, LESTER M. Impact: The Battle Story of the Tenth Armored Division . Louis L. Snyder	163

	PAGE
NOEL, MARY. Villains Galore: The Heyday of the Popular Story Weekly . Frederic E. Merwin	160
PAUL, RANDOLPH E. Taxation in the United States . Howard R. Bowen	151
PEACOCK, ALAN T. (Ed.). Income Redistribution and Social Policy: A Set of Studies . Margaret G. Reid	165
PECK, HARRIS B., and VIRGINIA BELLSMITH. Treatment of the Delinquent Adolescent: Group and Individual Therapy with Parent and Child . William Healy	173
PELLING, HENRY. The Origins of the Labour Party, 1880-1900 . W. Henry Cooke	188
PERRY, RALPH BARTON. Realms of Value: A Critique of Human Civilization . Charles Morris	179
PORTERFIELD, AUSTIN L., and ROBERT H. TALBERT. Mid-Century Crime in Our Culture: Personality and Crime in the Cultural Pattern of American States and Cities . Hermann Mannheim	172
RANNEY, AUSTIN. The Doctrine of Responsible Party Government: Its Origins and Present State . E. E. Schattschneider	152
RUOPP, PHILLIPS (Ed.). Approaches to Community Development . Dorothy Moses	176
SCHACHNER, NATHAN. The Founding Fathers . Curtis P. Nettels	155
SCHUMPETER, JOSEPH A. History of Economic Analysis . Edited from ms. by Elizabeth Boody Schumpeter. Leo Fishman	164
SHAH, K. T. The Promise That is New China . Frank Moraes	205
STURMTHAL, ADOLF. Unity and Diversity in European Labor: An Introduction to Contemporary Labor Movements . Frieda Wunderlich	204
SWEET-ESCOTT, BICKHAM. Greece: A Political and Economic Survey, 1939-1953 . Harold F. Alderfer	202
Temple University Survey of Federal Reorganization, The. Franklin L. Burdette	152
THOMAS, NORMAN. The Test of Freedom . Helmut Kuhn	149
TURNER, ARTHUR C. Bulwark of the West: Implications and Problems of NATO . Frank M. Russell	148
UNESCO. Interrelations of Cultures: Their Contribution to International Understanding . Milton Singer	181
VAN DEUSEN, GLYNDON G. Horace Greeley: Nineteenth-Century Crusader . Alphonse B. Miller	159
VIRTUE, MAXINE BOORD. Study of the Basic Structure of Children's Services in Michigan . Howard W. Hopkirk	174
WANKLYN, HARRIET. Czechoslovakia . Joseph S. Roucek	197
WASHBURNE, CARLETON. The World's Good . Francis J. Brown	179
WHITE, WILLIAM S. The Taft Story . William Starr Myers	161
WILEY, W. L. The Gentleman of Renaissance France . Paul Farmer	197
WRIGHT, QUINCY. Problems of Stability and Progress in International Relations . Leland M. Goodrich	146
YOUNG, LEONTINE. Out of Wedlock . Genevieve Burton	175
INDEX	213

The articles appearing in THE ANNALS are indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature and the Industrial Arts Index.

FOREWORD

WE should not, and by and large do not, expect that the United States will stand as virtue incarnate throughout the world. Leaving aside the often remarked tendency of the American tourist to covet and solicit approval and adulation, our foreign policy begs the more modest tribute of being understood. We pin our faith on the intrinsic merits of our way of life, and feel assured that we will be admired once our faults and achievements are counterbalanced. Our consistent emphasis upon international understanding, our rejoicing in the expansion of the media of mass communication as a means of cultural contact, indicate our belief that the American national character is a desirable and perhaps exportable commodity in the world market.

Whether or not we feel that other countries would do well to model themselves after our institutions, we are sure that if we are rightly understood, the frictions and obstacles in the course of our national policy will disappear. The degree of sophistication or naïveté with which this policy is pursued may vary, but the premise is the same. We have chosen as a cardinal element in our foreign policy the promotion of amity. We spend huge sums of money abroad trying to tip the scales of public opinion in our favor. Our "information and education" programs direct their efforts toward presenting an objective picture of the United States—a school day in Connecticut, a farmer's life in the Wheat Belt, small town democracy in action. We want not only our way in foreign affairs but also continuous reassurance from abroad of the moral integrity of our actions. For America the ends of power have been made to fit the means of persuasion.

It is in this light that the present volume directs its attention to the images of the United States held by foreign nationals. The reflections will delight no American Narcissus. What appears is a bewildering variety of pictures, which illustrate the idiosyncrasies of individual viewers rather than the character of the America they are looking at. None of the images is wholly laudatory; nor are they so hostile, disdainful, or patronizing as the more flamboyant among our public commentators would have us believe. What emerges is not a single stereotype but a series of alternative stereotypes which are selected and accepted by foreign peoples to meet their own national and cultural needs. To be sure there are a few national traits which are ascribed to us by almost all foreigners: friendliness, inventiveness, industriousness, materialism, immaturity. The more secure in national status is the country viewing the United States, the more likely is it that we will be seen in terms of separate character traits, each standing on its own merits. The newly emerged national states and our recent or current enemies tend to have an over-all assessment into which are dovetailed the individual traits they see in us.

The countries herein discussed obviously do not represent a geographic or a typological sample. For instance, South America, Africa, the Muslim world, Southeast Asia, China, the English-speaking world, the satellite nations, are important omissions. Those that are included, however, illustrate types of viewers, each substantially different in its cultural setting and in its historical and current relations with the United States. Russia represents the Communist countries, a totalitarian state where public opinion is largely subject to the manipulations of state policy, and a nation with little historical or current contact with the United States. Germany and Japan represent a European and an Asian power recently under military occupation by the United States. The survey of European countries includes nations who experienced a good deal of contact with the United States historically, are currently allies, and to a certain extent are dependent economically and in foreign affairs upon the United States. The Scandinavian countries and especially Sweden represent countries with national status higher than or at least equal to the United States, with a long history of amicable relations and striking cultural similarities. India represents the countries recently emerged from colonial status, endowed with rich cultural histories, having little direct historical contact with the United States, and apprehensive of final commitment in the East-West struggle. And Mexico represents a strongly nationalist country with intimate, continuous contact with the United States, standing in mid-passage from an underdeveloped society to an urban, industrial one. These differences in objective position among the nations are accompanied by sharp differences in the characteristic images which they hold of the United States.

A word should be said about a further mechanical division of the volume. The initial sections are concerned with general national images as they are found in the home countries. In the wake of historical relations and self-perpetuating stereotypes images of the United States have developed which are largely transmitted through the media of mass communication. The second half of the volume is composed of articles, paired by countries, which catalogue and analyze the images obtaining among foreign students who have studied at American universities. The first article of each pair describes the images formed by students while they are still in residence in the United States, and the second presents the images held by students who have returned to their home environment and have become reimmersed in their own culture and their own national viewpoint.

Seven of the eight articles describing the attitudes of foreign students are based upon the results of studies sponsored by the Cross-Cultural Education Committee of the Social Science Research Council during the year 1952-53, and were made possible by grants from the Rockefeller and Ford Foundations and the Carnegie Corporation of New York. The article by Ruth and John Useem which discusses the images held by returned Indian students is based upon research conducted in India during the year 1952-53 under the sponsorship of the Hazen Foundation. Each of the studies was much broader in scope than might be indicated by these focused articles. They were primarily attuned to problems of adjustment and assessment of the educational benefits involved in cross-cultural education. More extensive monographs incorporating the full results of the studies are in preparation for publication elsewhere. In the case of the Social Science Research Council studies, more specialized research projects dealing with critical problem areas in cross-cultural education are now under way.

We wish to thank Pendleton Herring and M. Brewster Smith of the Social Science Research Council, Cora DuBois of the Cross-Cultural Education Committee and the Institute for International Education, and Paul Braisted of the Hazen Foundation for assistance and direction in these studies. Special gratitude is owed to the late Wendell C. Bennett who, as chairman of the Cross-Cultural Education Committee, was primarily responsible for initiating and planning these studies.

RICHARD D. LAMBERT

How Others See Us*

By WILLIAM BUCHANAN

O wad some Power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursels as ithers see us!
It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
An' foolish notion:
What airs in dress an' gait wad lea'e us,
An' ev'n devotion!

ROBERT BURNS, "To a Louse, on Seeing One on a Lady's Bonnet at Church"

EVER since World War II the American family, worshipping at the altar of democracy, has been aware of covert glances and titterings from the rest of the congregation. Is our own devotion not inspiring our pew-mates as it should? Is it their irreverence? Or is something "lousing up" our own appearance?

Any discussion of this problem leads eventually to the use of the phrase "stereotype of Americans." How do foreigners come by this stereotype? Is it accurate? Does it harm us? Can it be altered? How? The concept of a stereotype, though originating in the political arena, has been taken over by the social psychologists for two decades and has been the subject of dozens of investigations. Some of them may help to answer these questions.

WHAT IS A STEREOTYPE?

Though the dweller in Plato's cave had to construct his picture of reality from shadows cast against the wall, the term "stereotype" to describe this process is a modern one, being derived by

* The writer wishes to thank Mr. Jan Stapel, director of the Netherlands Institute of Public Opinion, for the use of original material gathered by that organization and also the American Institute of Public Opinion for material gathered by Gallup affiliates in France and Italy.

analogy from one of the processes in the production of newspapers for mass circulation. In the 1870's a thin "stereotype" plate was developed which could be sent through the mails, and the age of "boiler plate" was upon us. In 1877 some 1,100 of America's 1,400 daily papers could put before their readers the same political cartoon more cheaply than they could write and set their own news. "Stereotype" began to have something more than a technical meaning.¹

The figurative connotation of the word acquired its wide currency from Walter Lippmann's Public Opinion. Our political world, he said, is "out of reach, out of sight, out of mind." Man is learning to "see with his mind" vast portions of the world with which he has had no personal experience.² His opinions must be "pieced together out of what others have reported and what he can imagine."³

There are few occasions for personal interaction or intimate acquaintance between the individuals long distances apart who are, now vitally dependent on each other. Instead, "we notice a trait which marks a well-known type and fill in the rest by means of the stereotype we carry about in our heads. . . . We are told about the world before we see it."

¹ A. M. Lee, The Daily Newspaper in America (New York, 1947), pp. 117, 130.

² Walter Lippmann, Public Opinion (New York, 1922), p. 29.

³ Ibid., p. 79.

Of course, thinking in terms of types, classifying, and abstracting are inevitable economies of time and thought. The danger is that when "we assume that the world is codified according to a code which we possess, we are likely to make our reports of what is going on describe a world run by our code."⁴ Thus when the fixed stereotype governs perception, rather than being governed, corrected, and adjusted by it, our behavior becomes disoriented from the real world around us.

Lippmann's striking description gave prominence to a concept which lent itself well to experimentation. It bore on a problem of American life that was of particular concern to the social psychologist—the presence of minority groups in the society and the necessity of accounting for and, hopefully, alleviating prejudice against them.

The psychologists have generally considered a stereotype as a special case under the more general classification of attitudes or frames of reference. It has been called an "intense and rigid attitude";⁵ an "ethnic attitude" which is "relatively stable" and modifiable only through "traumatic personal experience, intensive re-education or major social change";⁶ a "highly standardized perception of all members of a class of objects or, especially, a class of people";⁷ and a widespread "image or representation" of a national or racial group "usually oversimplified in content and relatively unresponsive to objective facts."⁸

EXPERIMENTAL RESEARCH

The existence of stereotypes was early demonstrated when subjects were confronted with a series of newspaper photographs of a bootlegger, a Bolshevik, a financier, a senator, a labor leader, and others, and asked to match the scrambled titles with the pictures. A group of students and a group of Grange members tended to associate the same pictures with the same titles. Although the matching got better-than-chance accuracy, an exception was a striking tendency to identify the Bolshevik (actually the Soviet minister to France) as an American senator because he sported a wing collar and a kempt Vanduyke beard.⁹

The most useful experimental technique has been the word-list method, in which subjects are given a list of adjectives or adjectival phrases and asked to say which of them best describe each of a list of national or racial types. This has been done with college students and small groups, using long lists of 80 to 100 words, and in mass surveys, using lists of 12 to 24 words. In the first such experiment, on Princeton students in the early 1930's, there was a pronounced tendency to ascribe certain characteristics to certain groups: Ne-

⁸ Otto Klineberg, Tensions Affecting International Understanding (Social Science Research Council, Bulletin 62, New York, 1950), p. 93, and David Krech and Richard S. Crutchfield, Theory and Problems of Psychology (New York, 1948), p. 171.

⁹ For more complete summaries of this experiment and the others mentioned here, see the texts cited in notes 5 through 8 above, and also the following: R. T. La Piere and P. R. Farnsworth, Social Psychology (New York, 1949), Chap. XII; National Stereotypes and International Understanding (International Social Science Bulletin, Vol. III, No. 3, Autumn 1951, Part I), pp. 497-590.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 89-90.

⁵ Muzafer Sherif and Hadley Cantril, The Psychology of Ego-Involvements (New York, 1947), p. 26.

⁶ Eugene L. and Ruth E. Hartley, Fundamentals of Social Psychology (New York, 1952), pp. 695-96.

⁷ Theodore M. Newcomb, Social Psychology (New York, 1950), p. 213.

groes were "superstitious," "lazy," and "happy-go-lucky"; Germans, "scientifically minded" and "industrious"; Jews, "shrewd" and "mercenary"; the English, "sportsmanlike" and "intelligent"; Chinese, "superstitious" and "sly"; Japanese, "intelligent," "industrious," and "progressive."

These tendencies were confirmed in other experiments with students throughout the United States, and also by British experimenters. Even Negro students were found to share the current stereotype of Negroes, though accentuating the attractive or neutral and deemphasizing the unattractive characteristics. Japanese students showed a comparable tendency.

UNESCO inquiry

By shortening the word lists, the Office of Public Opinion Research adopted the technique to the mass survey, and in 1948 this procedure was utilized by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in an inquiry into international tensions. A list of twelve adjectives was presented to a cross section of about a thousand persons in each of eight countries: Australia, Britain, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, and the United States. In all eight surveys respondents were asked which adjectives best described the Russian people, and in seven of these countries "domineering" was in first, second, or third place. In seven countries respondents were asked to describe the American people, and in six of these "practical" and "progressive" were among the first three adjectives chosen. In three countries respondents were asked to describe the Chinese people, and although fewer adjectives were selected, "hard-working" and "backward" were among the first three in each country. In two of the three surveys in which the French were described, "intelligent" and "conceited" were among the top three adjectives, and in two out of three the British were characterized as "intelligent" and "self-controlled."¹⁰

These results indicate not only that stereotyping is a widely prevalent process, but that the content of most stereotypes is approximately the same throughout the Western world. Certain other generalizations about stereotyping may be made from these studies.

Change

While there seem to be certain stable elements in each stereotype, there are also some notable instances of change. Teachers who were running experiments on successive classes in the 1940's noted that after Pearl Harbor the stereotypes of the Germans, Italians, and Japanese had altered for the worse. When the original classroom experiment of 1931 was repeated on a similar group of Princeton undergraduates nineteen years later, they appeared to be more aware of the fallacy of stereotyping and less consentient in their stereotypes.

The most striking instance of change is in the American public image of the Russians between 1942 and 1948. Of the twenty-four words on the list used by the OPOR in 1942 there were seven which reappeared on the UNESCO list in 1948. While differences in length and content of the lists may have had some influence on the results, they cannot account for the obvious reversal of direction of the stereotype (table, p. 4).¹¹

In view of these demonstrations that stereotypes do fluctuate, earlier defini-

¹⁰ Full tabulations for all nations will be found in William Buchanan and Hadley Cantril, How Nations See Each Other (Urbana, Ill., 1953), Chap. V, hereafter referred to as "the UNESCO survey."

¹¹ It is apparent that in 1942 a third to a half of the American public had a favorable impression of the Russians. How many would admit today that they held such views at that time?

CHANGE IN AMERICAN PUBLIC IMAGE OF THE RUSSIANS BETWEEN 1942 AND 1948

	1942 Per cent	1948 Per cent
Hard-working.....	61	49
Intelligent.....	16	12
Practical.....	18	13
Conceited.....	3	28
Cruel.....	9	50
Brave.....	48	28
Progressive.....	24	15

tions which stressed the stability of stereotypes are being altered.

Accuracy

A question repeatedly raised is whether stereotypes correspond in whole or in any part with the "facts"—whether they contain what has been generally called a "kernel of truth."

In one sense, as Lippmann suggested, stereotypes must be incorrect, since they impose a typology upon a group of people which contains (as reason would tell us even if the anthropologists did not) a wide variety of individuals with diverse characteristics. Any stereotype is incorrect in the sense that "all generalizations are false."

It is also agreed that stereotypes are erroneous to the extent that nonphysical attributes assigned to any race or nation are considered hereditary, fixed, or immutable.

The question remains, however: Are there national norms of conduct, even though culturally transmitted and hence alterable in the long run, which distinguish one nation from another? The answer is not yet definitive: "The existence of different personality norms for modern nations as wholes has not been established, and the development of objective techniques which might be used for the study of national character has barely begun."¹²

¹² Ralph Linton, "The Concept of National Character," in A. H. Stanton and S. E. Perry (Eds.), Personality and Political Crisis (Glencoe, Ill., 1951), p. 144.

In certain instances where objective standards of behavior were available, stereotypes of particular minority groups have been demonstrated to be quite false. One notable instance is the stereotype of "Armenians" held by residents of a section of California where a group of first- and second-generation Armenian immigrants had settled. The prevalent stereotype was unfriendly, centering about the beliefs that Armenians were tricky in business dealings, had an inferior code of morality which frequently got them in trouble, and were parasites on the local community. A check of records showed, quite to the contrary, that their credit ratings were about average, that they were involved in only a fourth as many police court cases as one would predict from their proportion in the population, and that they produced less than the expected number of hospital and social work case records. Certainly it is not safe to conclude that the mere existence of a commonly held image of a certain group or nationality is of itself evidence that the view is correct.

American researchers have generally leaned in the direction of considering stereotypes as both false and dangerous. In the interests of alleviating international tensions or diminishing minority group prejudice, they may be excused for considering hostile stereotypes to be unsupported by fact until they are proved otherwise. Our present purpose is somewhat different. A leap to the conclusion that all images of Americans held abroad are foolish, fanciful, and unjustified by our own behavior might do us a real disservice.

Direction

"A pattern of stereotypes," Lippmann said, "is not neutral." It is rather "highly charged with . . . feelings."¹³

¹³ Lippmann, op. cit., p. 96.

The earliest experiments with students showed that peoples who were described in favorable terms (that is, in adjectives deemed by a panel of judges to represent desirable qualities) were those who were ranked highest in terms of preference for association. This relationship between friendliness and stereotypes was demonstrated to exist for nations as well as individuals in the UNESCO survey. Where a large percentage of the sample in one country picked a particular nation as the one toward which they were "most friendly," this nation tended to be stereotyped in favorable terms.

Genesis

The habit of making judgments about people or groups is formed in childhood, when judgments of friends, neighbors, and parents are accepted. Thus stereotypes are "culturally transmitted." Experimenters found the customary stereotype of Negroes developing between the fourth and the eleventh grades. The first responses were hostile, but the description was vague. Specific content items appeared later, negative qualities before positive ones. The stereotype seemed to "jell" at about age twelve. By high school the adult image was approximated.

Interviews with Swiss schoolchildren by Piaget and Weil are particularly revealing, since they show how a child's sense of his own nationality develops simultaneously with the attribution of different characteristics to other nationalities. Five-to-eight-year-olds express preferences for one place or another according to their fancy of the moment: "I like Italy. It's a nicer place than Switzerland . . . they have the loveliest cakes," or "I like Switzerland because it has such pretty houses." Asked about the difference between peoples and countries they give such responses as: "There isn't a lake everywhere. . . . People don't all have the same voice and they don't all wear the same pullovers." Their picture of the world is still in terms of personal experience: "Well, the Americans are stupid. If I ask them where the rue du Mont Blanc is, they can't tell me."

At eight or nine years, the basis of nationality is still egocentric, but something beyond the child's immediate experience is involved: "I like Switzerland because I was born there," or "My mummy and daddy are Swiss, so I think Switzerland is a nice place."

During this intermediate stage stereotypes are forming with a vengeance. Their source is apparent in the following protocol:

What do you think of the French, for instance? Do you like them or not? Try and tell me as much as possible.

The French are not very serious, they don't worry about anything, and it's dirty there.

And what do you think of the Americans?

They're ever so rich and clever. They've discovered the atom bomb.

And what do you think of the Russians?

They're always wanting to make war. . . .

Now look, how did you come to know all you've told me?

I don't know . . . I've heard it. . . . That's what people say.

At twelve or thirteen years these starkly simple evaluations are replaced, at least for some children, with a genuine idea of "reciprocity." "There are some very nice Swiss and some very nice French people; that doesn't depend on the country. . . . All people have their good points," or "There are all types of people, intelligent and stupid, good and bad."¹⁴

¹⁴ Jean Piaget and Anne-Marie Weil, "The Development in Children of the Idea of the Homeland and of Relations with Other Countries," International Social Science Bulletin, Vol. 3, No. 3 (Autumn 1951), pp. 561-78.

Perceptual Basis

Another recent experiment with children, one in which stereotypes were "artificially induced," bears on the process of stereotype formation.

The experiment involved four "friendship clubs" of little girls who met at a settlement house. Pairs of clubs were co-operating on benefit performances to buy themselves club sweaters. The experimenters set the dress rehearsal of the co-operating "Gems" and "Daytons" on a meeting date of the "Melodies," who were required, to their great disgust, to serve as an audience. A pitched battle ensued when "Dayton-Gems" accused "Melodies" of sabotaging their performance and tried to eject them from the hall. Later all participants, including the "Melodies'" partners, who were not involved, were asked to check the usual adjective lists. It is not surprising that the girls found their co-operators more trustworthy, helpful, careful, attentive, skillful, orderly, and clean than their competitors, and less headstrong, tricky, selfish, domineering, slovenly, and so forth. In addition, the tendency to make extreme judgments, favorable as well as unfavorable, was found to be much less pronounced in the case of co-operative than conflictual interaction. Stereotypes of conflicting groups were more distinct.¹⁸

We cannot say of such induced stereotypes that they are "true," for all four clubs were drawn from a homogeneous population and any differences in personality would be due to chance. On the other hand, some of the adjectives selected may be said to describe with fair accuracy the behavior displayed in their relationships.

¹⁸ Rosette Avigdor, "Étude expérimentale de la genèse des stéréotypes," Cahiers internationaux de sociologie, Vol. XIV (1953), pp. 154-68.

Source

These experiments tell us something about how stereotypes appear and when they appear, but little of where the content of national stereotypes originally came from.

One source, obviously, is the folklore, whence came some of the ideas of the Swiss children. Content analyses have documented the recurrence of stereotype items in the mass media, especially in fiction. From Shylock to Stepin Fetchit, from Sam Weller to Hercule Poirot, stereotyped national, racial, and class types have drawn such ready applause that we must conclude that stereotyping meets a psychological need, probably that of ego inflation.

In 1950 Graham culled a list of phrases used in British literature and the press to describe Americans, and asked English respondents to check the most applicable. Phrases current before 1860 were, on the whole, more popular than more recent ones, suggesting that "frequency of response depends chiefly on continued and consistent usage over a long period of time."¹⁹

THE NATIONALISTIC BASIS FOR STEREOTYPES

Deutsch proposes a functional definition of nationality in terms of a "wide complementarity of social communication . . . the ability to communicate more effectively, and over a wider range of subjects, with members of one large group than with outsiders."¹⁷ He suggests as one test of this quality "predictability from introspection"—the extent to which you may predict another's behavior by "putting yourself in his place." "Here is one of the most important bases for the notion of a people, for that 'consciousness of kind,' of familiarity and trust, which we have for people whom we understand, and whom we even understand to be like such excellent people as ourselves."

¹⁹ Milton D. Graham, "An Experiment in International Attitudes Research," International Social Science Bulletin, Vol. 3, No. 3 (Autumn 1951), pp. 525-39.

¹⁷ Karl W. Deutsch, Nationalism and Social Communication (New York, 1953), p. 71.

This "predictability from introspection" is based on "analogy of structured habits" and is thus superior to "outside" observation of behavior of foreigners in only a limited range of situations, even though these observations, as in the case of an experienced diplomatic observer, may have extended over a long period of time.¹⁸

It may be suggested that the absence of this "predictability from introspection"—the failure to really understand the motivations of foreigners—is what makes stereotypes so attractive. Lacking the opportunity to communicate frequently over a wide range of subjects, we cannot "put ourselves in their place." We may do one of two things: dismiss them as "unpredictable" or find a satisfactory explanation for their behavior in the attribution to them of certain characteristics. "They behave in this unexpected fashion," we might say, "because they are a sly, treacherous people."

Stereotypes or images of another people, then, appear to have two components. The first of these may be called the "preconception," since it is based on second-hand material lying about in the literature and folk culture and would exist even if the individual never saw one of these people in the flesh and never had to reach any conclusions about them on his own. The holder begins to form this image in childhood as he learns what his own nationality means and why his kind of people are superior to others. For they always are superior—no studies have recorded a more flattering picture of the out-than the in-group.

The second component of the image we may call "perception." This is what gives it purpose. "To bridge the gap between his inability to make accurate predictions of the behavior of others and the necessity for his doing so, the modern individual commonly resorts to stereotyping."¹⁹ This component is introduced as the individual tries to organize the incomprehensible, unpredictable behavior of foreigners—particularly those actions which he thinks may affect him personally—into a comprehensible, predictable whole. Under conditions of great stress—in wartime, for example—this process can lead to great alteration in national stereotypes. This perceptual part of the operation may be just as biased as the preconceptual if the observations embodied in the stereotype happen to be irrelevant to the use that is made of it, as, for example, when a Frenchman assumes that the Congress of the United States will act like a group of GI's or tourists in the Louvre.²⁰

INFLUENCE OF STEREOTYPES

Some psychologists have concluded that unfavorable stereotypes may predispose a people toward hostility, and ¹⁹ La Piere and Farnsworth, op. cit. supra (note 9), p. 204.

²⁰ The "stereotype" concept seems sometimes to have been confined to the first—the preconceptual—component. This leaves it more or less static, random, and purposeless. We must account for the fact that stereotypes have direction; that both content and direction do change, and with apparent cause; and that some potential content items lie sterile while others reproduce and multiply. By making "stereotype" roughly synonymous with "generalized image" we avoid making it "bad" or incorrect by definition. Since the word-list technique brings out a great deal more than the first component, we also bring the definition more in line with "what the test measures."

¹⁸ Ibid., pp. 85-86.

thus become a contributing cause toward strained diplomatic relations. The evidence collected here suggests instead that unfavorable stereotypes are symptomatic rather than causal. Confronted with inexplicable and hence presumably malevolent behavior on the part of another nation, observers then organize the latent elements in their cultural surroundings into a lifelike, believable picture of an inherently "bad" people—the sort of people who could behave just this way.

Stereotypes are probably more dangerous, both to holder and to object, because they may lead to irrational action, to measures which might never be taken if the actors thought through their implications rather than acting on a plausible oversimplification. For example, it has been suggested that if Hitler and his advisers had not been infused with ideas of the "decadence" of the British and the "internal weakness" of the Russians, he might never have risked a two-front war.²¹ An example closer home concerns our own conduct of the war in the Pacific. Leighton tells how statistical analyses of prisoner-of-war interviews and confiscated diaries indicated to his branch of the Office of War Information that Japanese home-front morale was weak enough in May 1945 to make surrender a real possibility.²² This analysis conflicted with the stereotype, then prevalent among public and policy makers as well, that the Japanese "people" were fanatics who would not surrender. The current estimate was that the war would last until 1946 at least. This stereotype, we may recall, was not entirely fanciful, but was based on the "evidence" of kamikaze pilots and banzai charges.

²¹ See Otto Klineberg, "The Scientific Study of National Stereotypes," International Social Science Bulletin, Vol. 3, No. 3 (Autumn 1951), p. 505.

²² Alexander H. Leighton, Human Relations in a Changing World (New York, 1949), Chap. VII.

This view of the situation actually was not abandoned until after Hiroshima. Had it been revised earlier, that fateful event might never have occurred. Had it not been revised at all, the war might well have continued until invasion and attrition on the mainland had pulverized Japan. In this not inconceivable event, the stereotype of the Japanese people would have been "proved" correct—a "self-fulfilling prophecy."

The influence of stereotypes is ordinarily less dramatic. Graham found, for example, that the fusion of reactions to Americans known personally or casually encountered in the streets with reactions to policies of the United States government led to such composite simplifications as "the GI's were generous, the Americans have a Yankee shrewdness, therefore the Marshall plan arose from mixed motivations of generosity and self-interest."²³

Individual perception has been shown to be an extremely complex process. What we see is to such a large extent what we want to see, what we expect to see, or what we are used to seeing that under certain conditions experimental subjects "see" very strange things indeed. They cannot tell whether they are looking into a square or a very lopsided room. They "see" walls where there are no walls. They "see" their friends expand or contract before their eyes.²⁴ "National perception," which is the basis for governmental action, involves the synthesis of a great many individual perceptions of complicated and distant events, so there is no cause for surprise when it is even more distorted.

²³ Graham, op. cit. supra (note 16), p. 539.

²⁴ See F. P. Kilpatrick (Ed.), Human Behavior from the Transactional Point of View (Hanover, N. H., 1952).

TABLE 1—IMAGES OF AMERICANS, RUSSIANS, AND DUTCH AS REVEALED BY SURVEYS BY NETHERLANDS INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC OPINION*

From the list of words on this card, which seems to you to describe the American people best? Select as many as you wish, and call off the letters and words that go with them. If you have no particular feelings one way or the other, just say so.

Now go over the list again and select the words you think best describe the Russian people. And now select the words that best describe the Dutch people.

	AMERICANS				RUSSIANS				DUTCH
	1948	1954	Ad-justed 1954 ^b	Diff.	1948	1954	Ad-justed 1954 ^b	Diff.	1948	1954	Ad-justed 1954 ^b	Diff.
A. Hard-working.	49	40	44	-5	36	29	36	0	62	63	66	+4
B. Intelligent.	33	26	29	-4	8	5	6	-2	49	41	43	-6
C. Practical.	61	56	62	+1	6	4	5	-1	36	35	37	+1
D. Conceited.	15	16	18	+3	10	8	10	0	14	12	12	-2
E. Generous.	40	29	32	-8	3	2	2	-1	23	25	26	+3
F. Cruel.	2	2	2	0	53	46	57	+4	—	1	1	+1
G. Backward.	1	1	1	0	43	32	39	-4	1	1	1	0
H. Brave.	25	23	25	0	21	13	16	-5	37	36	37	0
I. Self-controlled	16	15	17	+1	3	5	6	+3	36	29	30	-6
J. Domineering.	16	18	20	+4	50	45	55	+5	5	4	4	-1
K. Progressive.	57	58	64	+7	15	10	12	-3	43	51	53	+10
L. Peace-loving.	40	37	41	+1	6	7	9	+3	68	62	64	-4
(Total percentage traits)	355	321	355		254	206	254		374	360	374
Cannot characterize.	10	9			13	17			8	5
Number in sample	942	1262			942	1262			942	1262
Adjustment: 1954 percentage multiplied by:			1.11				1.23				1.04

* Source of 1948 figures, UNESCO survey cited above; of 1954 figures, NIPO survey of late January 1954.

^b The adjustment increases the percentage selecting each adjective by a constant proportion (the "adjustment factor" given in the last line) in order to bring the "total percentage traits" up to the 1948 level. This makes possible comparisons of the relative strength of each adjective, holding constant the over-all tendency for respondents in 1954 to select fewer adjectives.

THE IMAGE OF AMERICA: CONTENT AND CHANGE

The image of America revealed in the UNESCO survey of 1948 is generally favorable. We were considered "practical" and "progressive" by most Europeans. "Generous," "hard-working," and "intelligent" were midway down the list. Favorable adjectives which were not applied to Americans were "brave," "self-controlled," and, significantly,

"peace-loving." Unfavorable adjectives selected were "conceited," applied by Australians and British, and "domineering" by the French. "Cruel" and "backward" were seldom selected. By contrast, the Russians were generally considered "domineering," "cruel," "hard-working," and "backward." Other important components of the stereotype which were not represented on this list of twelve adjectives, of course, could not be elicited. Graham, for example, found in England that "friendly," "informal," "enterprising," and "gregarious" were among the favorable adjectives most frequently chosen, and "cocksure" and "noisy" among the unfavorable. A study of European leaders at the same period by a somewhat different method also disclosed a generally favorable climate of opinion, accompanied by a few widespread views which complicated relations: Americans were "too materialistic," they were "guilty of persecuting the Negroes," and United States policy was "too changeable" and "dominated by Wall Street."²⁵

These findings do not differ in substance from the more specific and detailed reports of correspondents and observers, visiting students and travelers. What such mass surveys lack in completeness they make up in perspective. They evaluate the strength of different viewpoints. They indicate which of two conflicting content items is numerically stronger. They reach the inarticulate and inaccessible people and give numerically proportionate weight to their ideas, however sketchy or uninformed. Most important, they permit comparisons of countries, as in the UNESCO survey, and accurate evaluations of change over a period of time.

The Netherlands Institute of Public Opinion pioneered in demonstrating the utility of this technique for trend studies early in 1954 when it repeated verbatim the UNESCO question of 1948. The Dutch impression of Americans is given in Table 1, along with comparable stereotypes of the Russians and the Dutch themselves.²⁶ An adjusted figure ²⁵ Common Council for American Unity, European Beliefs Regarding the United States (New York, 1949).

²⁶ The tendency to apply to one's own countrymen the favorable adjectives and attribute the unfavorable ones to others is not confined to the Dutch. All nations surveyed in 1948 which allows for the smaller total response in 1954 is used in computing the change over time.²⁷

All in all, the Dutch image of Americans has changed very little during the intervening five years. Americans are somewhat less likely to be regarded as "generous"—a change probably not unrelated to American policy. We are somewhat more likely to be considered "progressive," but this change may be appraised at less than face value, since the image of the Dutch altered in the same direction.

Recent surveys made by other Gallup affiliates show that the stereotype of Americans in France and Italy is also about the same as it was in 1948.²⁸ We are less likely to be called "generous" in France. On the other hand, "domineering," which had pulled an unusually high percentage in France in 1948, had dropped to the level of other countries. The French were more likely to consider Americans "peace-loving" in 1954 than in 1948. If, as seems reasonable, this change has occurred because the French are now themselves directly involved in the East-West conflict, it would be an interesting instance of the American stereotype altering because of French behavior. The Italian survey showed an image of the American people that was considerably more favorable than the public estimate of United States diplomacy.²⁹ showed the same proclivity—Americans worst of all.

²⁷ Differences of more than 4 per cent from 1948 to 1952 are statistically significant at the 1 in 20 level.

²⁸ See Bollettino della DOXA, Vol. 8, No. 3-4 (Milan, February 15, 1954), p. 21. The French and Italian findings are based on lists which were not the same in 1948 and 1952, and adjustments similar to that in the Dutch survey were made to allow for this. Hence these conclusions should be taken as indicative rather than definitive. The actual percentages are not given here for lack of space.

SOME IMPLICATIONS

Americans often wring their hands about the "misunderstanding" of our character and motives that exists abroad. Do the data marshaled here suggest anything we might do to change or improve these stereotypes?

To the writer they do, but it must be made clear that these are his own interpretations, and not the only interpretations that may be made from the data.

First of all, we might hold the consoling thought that stereotypes of Americans, as of all foreigners, exist and will continue to exist, for the simple reason that they are foreign, and hence unpredictable. In this connection, we might remember that the image of Americans, in Europe at least, was a rather favorable one just after the war, and that, though it has not improved substantially since then, it certainly has not deteriorated a great deal.

Second, it appears that the image itself, and the minor changes it has undergone, are to some extent related to our own behavior. Our actions, far more than our words, will serve to sustain this favorable impression. For example, though we know in our hearts we are not really a conceited people, we might examine our own behavior for reasons why we might appear conceited to others.

Third, we might expend a little more effort to determine, in quality and quantity, just what these foreign images are, how widespread they are, and what effect they actually do have on international affairs.

Fourth, we might bend our efforts toward making the stereotypes not necessarily more favorable but more realistic. This can be done over the long haul by increasing the opportunities for communication and common action, by Americans in concert with others. In focusing on the "mass media of communication," we often fail to take advantage of the "mass media of transportation" which make possible mutual association in a great variety of endeavors, not only political but economic, recreational, medical, educational, social, philanthropic, agricultural, and commercial. Personal contact in a wide variety of circumstances might better enable others to "put themselves in our place," and to see us as we are.

Fifth, for the millions here and abroad who still could not participate personally in such interaction, we might try to keep the channels for second-hand communication as clear as possible. Provisions for foreign observers to travel in America widely and report what they see, good or bad, in their own fashion, would at least tend to counteract sweeping generalizations and oversimplified images of Americans.

Finally, since the image of Americans appears to stem in part from the actions of the United States government, we might try to conduct these relations as straightforwardly as possible, so that our policies, even when they must be unpalatable abroad, could at least be consistent and predictable. Explaining the internal political basis for certain otherwise inexplicable actions might allay some unnecessary apprehensions.

Like the lady in front of Burns, we may have attracted too much attention to our hat and our devoutness, and distracted it from the sermon.

William Buchanan, Starkville, Mississippi, is assistant professor of government and political psychologist on the staff of the Social Science Research Center at Mississippi State College. A former newspaper reporter, he has been publicity director at Roanoke College, associate director of the Bicentennial of Washington and Lee University, and assistant in research with the Office of Public Opinion Research at Princeton. He is co-author of How Nations See Each Other (1953).

How Americans See Themselves: Studies of American National Character

By REUEL DENNEY

ONE way of approaching the topic broached in the title is to survey the "national character" studies of Americans, by Americans, of recent years.

Clearly, this is not the only way to answer the question. It limits our answers to those given by specialized students of "national character"—and these compose only one among many of the groups that have something to say about how Americans see themselves. Moreover, since the concept of "national character" is beset by technicalities of definition, the answers will be framed generally in some highly conceptualized view of social structure and culture. They will not necessarily be the answers that might occur to a majority of educated Americans. They will certainly not be expressed in quite the same language that such a group might use.

There are other limitations on this discussion. Not all students of how Americans see themselves are satisfied with the "national character" approach. Why they are not satisfied tends to emerge only after a close look at what national-character analysis claims to be getting at. Therefore, such a look is a necessary part of this paper. This leads immediately to recognition of the diversity of viewpoints in the field.

We can begin by asking whether observers of the American national character agree with each other in ascribing certain traits to that character. They do. A variety of specialists, despite their differences in aims and methods, arrive at overlapping conclusions. At first sight, the overlaps may be not at all obvious. In the "learned behavior" of Americans—call it their national character—Mead¹ has found a tendency toward watchful waiting; Benedict² a high capacity for the moralization of industrial rationality; Adorno and Frenkel-Brunswik³ a tendency toward political dependence on large power structures; Erikson⁴ an insistence on adolescent plasticity; Ruesch (and the British-born Bateson)⁵ a tendency toward the collectivization of intimate aspects of life; and Riesman⁶ a long-range tendency for moral sanctions to migrate from origins in parents to origins within the social organization of people of one's own age. These sampled conclusions do not entirely overlap. In some cases they quite disagree. What is more, it

¹ Margaret Mead, And Keep Your Powder Dry, New York: William Morrow & Company, 1943.

² Ruth Benedict, Patterns of Culture, Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1934.

³ T. W. Adorno, Else Frenkel-Brunswik, Daniel J. Levinson, and R. Nevitt Sanford, The Authoritarian Personality, New York: Harper & Brothers, 1949.

⁴ Erik H. Erikson, Children and Society, New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1950.

⁵ Jurgen Ruesch and Gregory Bateson, Communication: The Social Matrix of Psychiatry, New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1951. See also other papers by Bateson as listed in the bibliography of The Study of Culture at a Distance, infra, note 9.

⁶ David Riesman, with Reuel Denney and Nathan Glazer, The Lonely Crowd, New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1950. For further remarks by Riesman on American character and culture, see his Individualism Reconsidered, Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press, 1954.

is clear that some of the ascribed traits might also be true, to a greater or lesser degree, of the character of other nationals; and therefore not distinctively American. Nevertheless, there are some grounds for agreement on traits (1) seen in Americans by most of the observers and (2) seen by the observers as more characteristic of Americans than foreigners.

As we read our sociological students of American character, they appear to agree that American character is (1) much engaged by the need to internalize the human meaning of industrialism, (2) organized in such a way that adolescence is more of a crisis in the life cycle than in many other cultures, (3) concerned with ambiguity of sexual roles arising from the industrialization of women, and (4) engaged in playing out some sort of this-worldly mysticism that resembles, but is not the same as, the moral materialism of early British industrialism. That is to say, the American character is historically unique in the way in which it disposes its attitudes about male and female, work and play, youth and age. If one asks whether these conclusions answer the question "How do most Americans see themselves?" the answer is that they do not. The point of most of our contemporary researches of this sort is that national character is what makes nationals see themselves as they think they are. Presumably, it takes time for scholarly appraisals of national character to acquire popularization, and thus domesticate themselves in a national belief system.

The term "national character," of course, contains semantic hazards that easily stimulate basic questions from literate Americans not sure of the scope of the term.

The specialist finds it easy to respond, up to a point, to many such questions. National character he defines as something quite different from, though related to, moral character. Character appears in attitudes, but is not fully revealed by attitudes. Conclusions about national character may be documented by references to the assertion that such and such a child-rearing practice appears to be national in its scope and differential in its effects. National character, he says, is subject to ambiguous definition. The term can refer to group traits A, B, and C, which everyone has some share of, though not equally. It can refer to the preponderance of types A, B, and C in the population, types not universal, but statistically noticeable. It can refer to norms of character toward which all nationals feel themselves drawn, no matter how various their success in modeling themselves on these norms. The specialist is likely to add that while it is important to understand these distinctions, it is stultifying to overwork them.

There is, of course, a great variety of traditions in American writing on the American national character. There is no space in this discussion for the approaches suggested by observers earlier than 1900. It is sufficient to say that many of the sharpest formulations of these years either came from foreign observers or were based on American self-analytical reactions to the remarks of foreign observers. It is possible to speak here only of the self-observation that began at about the time of America's intensified contacts with other nationals during and after World War I. Again, there is no room here to report the weathermen, medical men, journalists, politicians, advertisers, publicists, professors of history, and many other professionals who have had their say on American national character—even though their intuitions or phrases have often suggested to workers in the behavioral sciences the direction in which to look.

ASSUMPTIONS OF NATIONAL CHARACTER STUDIES

By far the most useful history of recent interest in national character studies on the part of behavioral sciences is by Margaret Mead, in her essay "The Study of National Character."⁷ She shows there how World War II stimulated policy makers of the United States to study more concretely than they had ever been studied before the contrasts that appear to distinguish American national character from that of others. What is more to the point for this discussion is her lucid summary of the approaches. Some writers, as she shows, have emphasized the impact of American child-rearing expectations and practices on the adult—to be especially noted here are Kardiner, Gorer, and Erikson. Others have emphasized the subordination of national "character" to a general pattern of culture—a pattern in which only some of the results are characterological: such a student is Ruth Benedict. Benedict's remarks on American character tend to emphasize the selectivity of American culture in giving preferential nurture to certain psychological types and certain attitudes toward life.

Still other approaches employed in recent years put other questions and get other answers. British-born anthropologist Bateson's emphasis on the types of social interaction between roles and individuals in the culture comes close to being a "structural" rather than a "characterological" approach. Yet it yields most promising formulations for getting at differences, for example, between the tones of British and American child-parent relationships. In reviewing these and other angles of attack, Miss Mead suggests that there are three general methods at work. One approach emphasizes the study of the patterns of culture in two or more cultures that have had similar historical experiences but appear to display differences in patterning. Another emphasizes the relation between the motivations imparted to the child and the rest of the culture. A third emphasizes the study of key "role-relationships" in the culture. It might well be asked by some readers whether all of these are studies of "national character"; or whether some of them are studies chiefly in noncharacterological variables in social organization.

⁷ In Daniel Lerner and Harold Lasswell (Eds.), The Policy Sciences, Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1951; a Hoover Institute Study. See also Ralph Linton, The Cultural Background of Personality, New York: D. Appleton-Century Co., 1945; Abram Kardiner, Psychological Frontiers of Society, New York: Columbia University Press, 1945.

To return to the definition offered earlier in these remarks, it will be assumed here that "national character," whatever it may mean in a wider sense, denotes specifically the total "learned behavior" of the people who are the object of its study. To speak of national "character" in these terms may mean, as the British psychologist Ginsberg said, to speak either of (1) common traits generally distributed or (2) recognizable patterns of behavior in the group as a whole—or to speak of both at the same time. In this paper, as in The Lonely Crowd, the attempt will be made to hew closer to the first definition. While it is conceded that data about "culture pattern" and "social structure" are indispensable in discussing "character," "character" itself is taken as a unique variable. This position is clearly dependent on three important assumptions.

The first assumption is that we are not talking about constitutional personality types, nor about their national distribution. To be able to talk about the presence or absence of given personality types—whether one uses typologies suggested by Freud, Jung, Adler, or others—is nevertheless indispensable to the task. It is the necessary condition for discriminating these relatively "unlearned" aspects of the person from his "learned" or characterological aspects. The second assumption is that a certain homogeneity over space and time can be found in the learned behavior of the nationals of a given country. Oceans of ink have been spilled over the shape and degree of that homogeneity. The position taken here is that such homogeneity need not add up to very much to make its point. National character is not studied with the hope of proving vast difference between the nationals of countries A and B; it is undertaken with the hope of finding (or conscientiously not finding) marginal differences between many, perhaps most, of the nationals of countries A and B. The third assumption is that this "certain homogeneity" is composed of actualities that cannot be exhaustively explained by reference to noncharacterological concepts of the society such as social structure, culture, world view, and so on.

It should be noticed that we possess a most coherent statement of the approach that emphasizes the distribution of certain types of "personality" in the society, in Ralph Linton's essay on "The Concept of National Character."⁸ Linton makes it clear, in this paper, that he and Kardiner, in their co-operative investigations, distinguish between the "total personality" of an individual and what they call his "basic personality." It is the latter term that they use to denote the general coherence of personality throughout cultural types, or a whole culture, which can also bear the name "national character." This approach, like all the others, tends to turn up data that are best expressed in its own vocabulary. This itself makes more clear truisms which should be almost glaringly obvious by this point. The terms "the individual" and "the society" are complementary terms; either of the two tends to get defined in terms of the other; national-character studies can be discriminated from each other in terms of the way they manipulate emphasis on one complementary term or the other, in their vocabulary.

⁸ In Alfred H. Stanton and Stewart E. Perry (Eds.), Personality and Political Crisis, Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press, 1951. Compare the approach of Margaret Mead, in articles listed in the bibliography of The Study of Culture at a Distance, infra, note 9.

AMERICAN CHARACTER AND INDUSTRIALISM

If we think of the research position having been stated in this way, we might imagine that "the American being studied" might rejoin as follows: "I am quite aware, from my reading of the newspaper, radio listening, television viewing, and so on, that American character seems disposed toward distinctive definitions of male and female, work and play, youth and age. In fact, my everyday experience, matched against whatever I can learn about non-Americans, makes me sure that this is so. What more is it that you have found out that I do not know?"

The answer might run along the following lines. All of us, as Americans, accept the machine so readily that we do not realize the unique qualities of our historic encounter with it. We were the first nation for whom the machine did not mean an accumulation of new amounts of that oldest of miseries: overwork on top of undernourishment. We have paid for this triumph by meeting the machine at a higher and different level of encounter. It did not differentiate us into "powerful" and "powerless"; it conformed us into the "powerful-powerless." A strain of anxiety about industrialization is involved in our anxiety about conformism in all social levels of the United States, among both men and women, among both young and old. The basic imagery of this point is amply demonstrated, I think, in Rhoda Métraux's study⁹ of the interchangeability of terms used to describe the human being and the machine in the United States. It could be documented further by a study of advertising imagery, with the man-shaped machines of Artzybasheff at one end of the scale of hybrids and the Absorbine Jr. puppet-man at another end.

Of course, this means a variety of things. It means that the American winces if he sees a man doing a machine's work—as when he sees a Chicago Negro hand-shoveling coal for lack of a portable conveyor belt. It means also, at the other extreme of viewpoint and the business cycle, that the American sometimes winces if he sees a machine doing a man's work. This is true of some business executives who visit Massachusetts Institute of Technology and see computers making some of the kinds of decisions that they have been accustomed to make. It means that some machines are outmoded while those who know no other way of making a living than tending them are still alive and in need of jobs. And it means that some kinds of jobs and workers are suddenly ennobled by new machine applications—as when the street sweeper rises to glory by being presented with the wheel of a $15,000 automatic machine as fine as the ones that labor aristocrats like "cat skinners" use. In a country where children are as a matter of course trained by science fiction to use machines that have not yet been invented, many of the sixty million work force live at the edge of a technology which is destroying their occupational role by building their skills into machines.

If this seems a long cry from conclusions about the American character arrived at by the specialists I have mentioned, let us look more closely. Erikson has made the point that the American male is strenuously taught to "leave home." He adds the point that a little boy's play with machines (Huck Finn's fantasy of being a steamboat captain) is a part of this process. Both Max Weber,¹⁰ a German observer, and Ruth Benedict have made the point that the American's high capacity for the moralization of the Puritan ethos and industrial teamwork is connected with his belief in the ultimate "rightness" of rapid capital formation. Mead's study of the strain of watchful waiting and calculated risk-taking in the American is at least related to the domination in our public imagery of mechanical metaphors. Gorer,¹¹ a British observer, has made the point that the machines, services, and products of the market tend to acquire a symbolic aura in which biological and mechanical function are overlaid. Riesman has concluded about American child rearing that it teaches children, in effect, to regard themselves as interchangeable parts of a social process, as commodities possessing some of the "substitutability"—and "marginal differentiation"—of goods in exchange. This, to be sure, was part of a wider view which saw American character today as a reflex not merely to industrialism but to industrial abundance.

⁹ Rhoda Métraux, "Resonance in Imagery," in Margaret Mead and Rhoda Métraux (Eds.), The Study of Culture at a Distance (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953), pp. 343-64.

¹⁰ See H. H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills, From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology, New York: Oxford University Press, 1946.

¹¹ Geoffrey Gorer, The American People, New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1948.

AGE GRADING AND CHARACTER IN AMERICA

When F. Scott Fitzgerald said that "there are no second acts in American lives," he was probably referring to a schema like this: Act One, Adolescence; Act Three, Success or Failure. The European drama might be summarized as Act One, Youth; Act Two, Success or Failure; Act Three, Gravy or Regrets. As for this emphasis in America on youth—or else, a good deal of anthropological attention has been paid to the question of whether the so-called storminess of American adolescence is unique. It has been argued by so good an authority as Margaret Mead that, in effect, the American adolescent is stunned by the miseries of the American sexual system, both in fact and in prospect. This may be true. American adolescents tend to betray surprise that their parents have any guts left in them at all and this may be an unconscious tribute to what they imagine to be supertoughness on the part of their parents in surviving a life experience with the American love and money game. On the other hand, successive generations of American adolescents have a way of palming themselves off as cool in comparison to their parents, and thus induce in the older generation the suspicion that if they were stormy, they were fools.

The argument is, generally, that while many other cultures make puberty crisis a crisis, Americans know how to make it a nightmare. It is argued that class aspects of the public school and social mobility system, neurotic patterns in the American middle-class family, the prospective industrialization of adolescent women, the feminine protest mother, and a variety of other factors add up to a conscientious pursuit of unhappiness where adolescent life is concerned. Talcott Parsons,¹² for example, has shown that the American girl starts, in her early years, with a high sense of identity and then is forced to forsake some of the identity and its status; while, on the other hand, the boy starts with a very vaguely defined sense of himself and then comes into a large, sudden wind-fall of prestige when he puts on long pants and becomes defined as a prospective free agent and all-round-doer. Again, it has been effectively argued that the ambiguity of social and occupational roles in prospect for adolescents in a society that keeps them out of the labor market for a long time, is influential.

Without being sure how this all adds up, it is possible for a student of American character to say, as he usually does, that the American is more American in his adolescence than at any other time in his life. Another way of saying this is to say that in later life the American is most American when he shows traces of an adolescence not left behind.

To this observer, most theories place perhaps too much importance on institutional details. The observers of adolescence are, after all, the nonadolescents. The age pyramid shows that there have been more and more of these, living to riper and riper years, for the last couple of generations. Taking along with this the consideration that most youths seem in retrospect misspent, there have been more and more people to think more and more about it this way than ever before. This sets up a communication pressure in which it is unlikely that any youth will claim to be happy while he stands a chance of getting something out of appearing to be unhappy. The audience is too good to resist.

¹² Talcott Parsons, "Age and Sex in the Social Structure of the United States," American Sociological Review, Vol. 7 (October 1942), pp. 604-16.

If one is tempted to ask what this has to do with national character, then the answer might be given in somewhat the following terms. National character, by most of the definitions we have considered, sees people of different cultures as structuring their life expectations, and their age-graded attitudes, in distinctive ways. Some of these traits might best be studied by acquiring greater knowledge of how the age and kinship system works. Some might best be studied by viewing them as aspects of ideology, rather than behavior in response to social structure. In either of these cases, one could neglect character as a dynamic variable up to a certain point. In the last analysis, however, the student of national character would insist that the expectations spoken of here do not exist as mere structural or ideological reflexes. They are "interpreted" in some way, by individuals and by groups—and the way in which they are interpreted shows that they are interpreted by "character" going about its work. The dynamism of "character" helps to explain things that cannot be explained by references to ideology, culture, social structure, and the total personality of individuals.

SCHOLARLY SOURCES AND POPULAR VIEWS

It should be quite apparent from these remarks that these specialists in the behavioral sciences who have shown an interest in American national character are working with concepts that are far from being completely diffused in American public opinion. How do Americans at large see themselves? They seem to see themselves through their reflection in primary group life with the family, and through the reflections that come back to them from the wider institutions of their social life, including the media. They see themselves, of course, through the spectacles of ideology and of differential social perception—in the first instance seeing things as they ought to be and in the second as they think they must be, in fact. The degree to which the general American public asks itself the self-identifying questions asked by the specialists mentioned in this paper is largely a function of the media, and of the public's education. The work of the behavioralists in national-character studies has been rather well reported, as a whole—but not widely and intensively reported. It is fair to say that the more popularized approaches to the national character in recent years have been a rather narrow selection of what the scholarly world offers.

Let us take, for illustration, a quick view of some of the popularly distributed theories of national character. A prime example might be found in the popular "diaper-ology" of Philip Wylie. His well-known and widely known emphasis on the dubious aspects of the mother-son relation in the United States has been a most popular source of self-interpretation for Americans in the last ten years. Still another popular source of folk notions about the national character might be said to exist in such a self-selling piece of fiction as Ayn Rand's The Fountainhead. Here we find a kind of popular diagnosis of American national character as suffering from a lack of respect for individuality and genius—a best seller that fictionally dramatizes the strain of conformity in American national character. On still a different front, we have seen the United States, during the last fifteen years or so, subjected to large-scale campaigns for tolerance. The assumption about national character that appears to lie behind these drives is not easy to condense in a few words. Nevertheless, they seem to assume that Americans will respond to preaching for tolerance because of a trained distaste for unfair play, because of a rationality about welfare losses occasioned by prejudices—and because of considerable reserves of social guilt.

Such a quick view of certain popular mechanisms of self-estimation and self-definition is not intended to sharpen distinctions between "expert" studies of national character and the national character studying itself. The identities in concern are more interesting, perhaps, than the disparities. In the social history of the last twenty years, indeed, one can discover, if one wants to, a converging of the tones of the intellectual, on the one hand, and the general public, on the other, on the theme of national character. Neither are quite sure that such a thing exists in some highly definable sense. Both are sure that it is "better" than many intellectuals thought it was two decades ago. If there is such a thing as national character, then intellectuals today seem to be partaking of some of the faith in it that nonintellectuals have evinced, most of the time, during this troubled century. Along these lines, certain theoretical formulations have been and may continue to be important.

Consider, for example, the emphasis on historical change in The Lonely Crowd. This study suggested that one of the more important things about American character was its tendency to change. Instead of searching for modes of social identity and learned behavior that are constant on the American scene, it suggested systematic shifts from one mode to another. Much of the argument could be expressed in cultural or structural or institutional terms. It was insisted, however, that character is a distinct and dynamic variable. To be burdened with something called a national character is not so threatening if one is under some persuasion that it contains the possibility of change.

There remain to be suggested a few points about the intellectual origins of character studies, and about the shape they are taking now, in a less pressured stage of development than that during World War II. Back of national-character studies loom the figures of Kant and Hegel, along with such folk nationalists as Herder. Students of characterology have traced certain aspects of the interest in national character to that originally German, and later Continental, interest in "viewpoint" suggested by Kant's subjective categories. The study of national character is a tension point in the study of the relations between the individual, the culture, the society, and the state. Despite its late nineteenth-century tendency to degenerate into international and inter-ethnic abuse, it appears, in the twentieth century, to have added an item of flexibility to the vocabulary of the behavioral sciences.¹⁸ American interest in the application of national character theories to America itself could be taken as a determination to attempt deeper self-identification than has been open to, or desired by, Americans of past generations.

Some of the formulations of recent years have, indeed, the quality of social science becoming myth—in the good rather than the bad senses of that term. Miss Mead's remark that all Americans are "third generation," for example, has the force of an epic formulation. Is it true? Is it true that even the descendants of the oldest settlers feel themselves suspended in a generational identification which is no more deep and mature than those who are strictly of "the third generation"? Frost says, ¹⁸ See the work of Otto Klineberg, especially "A Science of National Character," Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 19 (1944), pp. 147-62, for helpful formulations offered a decade ago.

"The land was ours before we were the land's." Is it true that American society is not divided as a third-generation person such as myself thinks it is into two "moieties"—the "old" and the "new"? Are we all that new? If so, no wonder our national character surprises us so much. No wonder it is a topic that so much appeals to us, outside of technical talk, as an opportunity to talk, not only about what we are, but about what we might be.

Reuel Denney is associate professor of social sciences in the College of the University of Chicago. His major interest in the social sciences is the field of leisure and entertainment, and he has published articles and reviews on sports, the mass media, and related topics.

Themes in the Interpretation of America by Prominent Visitors from Abroad

By ARVID BRODERSEN

THROUGHOUT its written history America has been the goal of visitors from abroad, and few countries have so provoked a recording of their observations and interpretations. One of the foremost questions typically asked of the foreigner by the American himself is: What do you think of this country? And when he returns home, the visitor is again met by this query: What do you think of them now? In consequence, any literate visitor becomes an interpreter of America to a smaller or larger public. A complete collection of such interpretations probably by now would fill a medium-sized library. A small sample, representative only of some more notable commentaries, was selected and published by Professor Commager in the volume America in Perspective.¹

The perspective in which the foreign commentator sees America is not always that of a student bent on understanding the country and the American people in their own terms and for their own sake. More often, in fact, the perspective is one of partisanship with regard to issues in the commentator's own country or beliefs in his personal philosophy, and in some cases his interpretation of America is but a convenient language in which extraneous views and prejudices can be expressed with impunity. Hence the liberal's picture of America is apt to differ radically from the conservative's, the socialist, working-class picture from that of the middle class, the artistic and literary person's from that of the businessman.

Each sees America in his own perspective, and some will for their own reasons praise America for her freedom and democracy—or condemn her for them; some will perceive the cultural creativity and the spirit of idealism in America, others deny its existence; some will admire America's industrial and business enterprise, others deplore it as materialism. All these views are recurring themes in the image of America as it has emerged in the perspective of foreign visitors over the last two hundred years. They sprang from the minds that produced them as much as from the subject, and whatever truth they contain therefore nearly always refers to two realities, in part the reality of the perspective, in part that of America.

In exploring some major themes in the interpretation of America, I propose first to discuss the writing of three well-known commentators of the past. Two of the three—Tocqueville and Bryce—rank first in fame and influence among all the authors who have dealt with the subject. The third, less well known for his interpretation of America, is the eminent German sociologist, Max Weber. Secondly, I propose to examine some of the views which appear, from a recent study, to be salient in the minds of foreign visitors in the present period of American and world history.

The visits of Tocqueville and Bryce fell in very different periods of this nation's history. The former saw America still in a preindustrial stage, with a population of 12,000,000, mostly farmers, craftsmen, and traders; the latter when she had grown to a great industrial nation of 62,000,000 people. Tocqueville was the first observer to form a comprehensive view of American civilization—not just random “opinions,” but a systematic interpretation of America, seen as a whole. Bryce was his true successor in this respect, and while their images differed in some ways, the continuity and the fundamental agreement in their interpretations of American democracy remain a most remarkable fact.

¹ Henry Steele Commager, America in Perspective: The United States Through Foreign Eyes. New York: Random House, 1947. Abridged paper-back edition in Mentor Books.

ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE

In 1831–32 Alexis de Tocqueville, twenty-six at the time, spent nine months traveling in the United States on a commission from the French government to report on the American prison system. The fruit of that visit (aside from the prison report) was the first great study of American society and culture ever written, the four-volume work De la démocratie en Amérique (Vols. I and II, 1835; Vols. III and IV, 1840). Few books have won such immediate and widespread fame.

In Tocqueville's interpretation of America one grand theme governs the entire analysis of sociopolitical institutions. This theme, in one word, is equality. What really motivated Tocqueville's passionate interest in the study of America was not the problem of democracy in general, but that of a new society founded upon equality among its members. He saw the movement toward equality as a universal historical trend, the manifest destiny of his own people. His perhaps most urgent concern in studying America was the charting of the inevitable future course of France. He wrote in the introduction to the first volume, “It appears to me beyond doubt that, sooner or later, we shall arrive, like the Americans, at an almost complete equality of conditions.” Tocqueville himself was deeply rooted in the other, aristocratic type of society and did not welcome its passing; but being convinced that this was “a providential fact” at this stage, he proceeded to find out, in America, what good could possibly come of it.

The latter part of Democracy in America (Vols. III and IV), generally considered the more profound, presents in many variations the one theme that the human mind under conditions of social and political equality will develop a new and specific creativity, new and specific modes of social actions and attitudes differing from those of an aristocratic society, but of a certain value if considered in their own terms. This is in fact the counterthesis to the often expressed view that “real culture” (philosophy, art, and literature) is possible only in the old type of society, and that consequently “America has no culture”—a view which seems to be held as strongly in some quarters today as it was almost universally a hundred years ago. Tocqueville has, by virtue of interpreting the American mind in its own terms, the power and also the right of critical evaluation, and while he is as often negative as positive in his judgment, the Americans themselves could not but accept him and learn from him. He has harsh things to say of their “passion to get rich,” of their crude tastes, and their lack of intellectual refinement. On the other hand, he is struck by “the extreme equality of social relationships. The plutocrat and the lowly worker shake hands in the street.” And he confesses to envying America her moral climate, the people's respect for the law, and their faith in human equality, in wisdom and good sense, in man's perfectibility, and hence in universal education. The themes that dominate the first part of Democracy in America relate primarily to the subject matters of government and politics. In the following I shall be able to point to but some of the major motifs.

Decentralization

In the first place, Tocqueville affirms that egalitarian democracy as government by the people—by all the people—is possible only through the people's active participation in their own local affairs. Such participation, however, can become politically effective only under a system of administrative decentralization, that is, one diametrically the opposite of the French centralized system of his time, in which all major decisions were handed down to the local communities from the capital ruling power at the center, and no policy-making authority was vested in the so-called “provincial institutions.” While admitting that the American system has its weaknesses, Tocqueville eloquently pleads in its favor. Decentralization he considered one of the most important lessons he derived for France from the study of democracy in America. If his arguments failed to sway the rulers and people of France, they greatly impressed an influential reader in England: John Stuart Mill later confessed in his autobiography that he “owed his rescue from a thoughtless belief in centralization to Tocqueville's book. . . .”²

Tocqueville found the American federal system a particularly happy construction just by virtue of its combination with local self-rule. This dualism he considered “one of the greatest inventions known to political science,”³ since it permits the American people to enjoy the “happiness and freedom of small nations” while simultaneously wielding “the power of great nations,” or in other words, “combining the different advantages which result from the magnitude and the littleness of nations.”⁴ It should, however, be kept in mind that in making this statement 120 years ago, he did not anticipate a world situation in which America would become a great military power. On the contrary, his assumption was that the “American Union . . . placed in the center of an immense continent . . . is almost as much insulated from the world as if all its frontiers were girt by the ocean,” and consequently “has no great wars to fear.”⁵ Nor did he perceive the explosive potentialities of the domestic issue of slavery which already was looming ominously on the American horizon.

Candidates for public office

An aspect of American democracy which Tocqueville studied with interest was the selection of men for public office, on the policy-making as well as administrative level. In his view, partly because the most distinguished individuals would keep away from public affairs and partly because the electorate itself would by “the natural instincts of democracy . . . reject distinguished citizens as their rulers,”⁶ equality tended to favor mediocrity. The lack of an established civil service, with its social order of prestige and status as well as security of office, made—in Tocqueville's opinion—for a poor selection of talent and an unfortunate instability and discontinuity of administration: “No one cares for what happened before his time; no methodical system is pursued.”⁷ His criticism was con-

⁴ Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, revision by Francis Bowen of the translation by Henry Reeve (7th ed.; Boston: John Allyn, 1882), Vol. I, Chap. VIII, p. 206.

⁵ Ibid., p. 217.

⁶ Ibid., Chap. XIII, p. 256.

⁷ Ibid., p. 269.

² George Wilson Pierson, Tocqueville and Beaumont in America (New York: Oxford University Press, 1938), p. 772.

³ Pierson, op. cit., p. 776.

cerned mainly with the technical efficiency and intellectual standard inherent in American administrative practices, rather than the problems of political ethics.

"The tyranny of the majority"

Tocqueville's principal criticism of American democracy, to which he devotes two full chapters, is summed up in one phrase, "the tyranny of the majority." The irresistible and absolute rule of the majority which he observed on the American scene was based—according to his analysis—upon a system of government which was no longer genuinely representative, but rather a direct rule of public opinion through agents elected for very brief terms and acting under continuous control of the people in its majority. "A proceeding is becoming more and more general in the United States, which will, in the end, do away with the guaranties of representative government: it frequently happens that the voters, in electing a delegate, point out a certain line of conduct to him, and impose upon him certain positive obligations which he is pledged to fulfill. With the exception of the tumult, this comes to the same thing as if the majority itself held its deliberations in the market-place."⁸ Tocqueville with these and numerous other observations demonstrated the tremendously important difference between representative and direct democracies, and again contemporary political thinkers like John Stuart Mill acknowledged their debt to him.⁹ Later observers, stressing other aspects of the American system (especially Lord Bryce), could not agree with Tocqueville's diagnosis of a trend toward direct democracy. More recently, however, it appears that the introduction of new techniques of mass communication, mainly radio and television, into the political process, may well have promoted the development he predicted.

⁸ Ibid., Chap. XV, p. 325.

⁹ Pierson, op. cit., pp. 771 f.

JAMES BRYCE

James Bryce visited America, mainly for the purpose of studying her political institutions, more than fifty years after Tocqueville. His subsequent two-volume work, The American Commonwealth (1888), ranks second only to Democracy in America as a political and philosophic treatise on its subject, and second to none as a systematic analysis and interpretation of American government. It is a classic in the world literature of political science, and is currently used as a textbook in many countries. No book better serves serious students of American politics. Its influence, nonetheless, could but be less profound than that of its great predecessor, for it is largely descriptive and factual, its political message being—British style—carefully understated, rather than eloquently and imaginatively elaborated, as in Tocqueville. Bryce in some important respects carried forward into the present time Tocqueville's fundamental conceptions of American democracy. Simultaneously, he contributed significant new features to the total interpretation. Again, only a few major motifs can be mentioned here.

Bryce shares and restates many of Tocqueville's views regarding the strength and weaknesses of American democracy. Like Tocqueville, he praises the people's spirit of legality and obedience to the law; the reliance on law rather than officials; the restriction of official authority; the simplicity and consistency in public affairs; and the people's faith in liberty and in their own institutions. In addition, Bryce emphasizes certain characteristics which are hardly or not at all to be found in Tocqueville's analysis, since they had not yet developed in the America of the 1830's. The extraordinary stability of the national community; the fundamental unity of the people; its ability to close ranks, on which Bryce comments, became fully visible only after the acid test of the Civil War. The relative freedom from political class struggle, which he emphasizes, became a truly remarkable feature only through the tremendous industrial growth of which Tocqueville saw only the faintest beginning but which fifty years later had produced an unmistakable cleavage in terms of socioeconomic classes in American society.

Bryce lists a third feature among the positive characteristics of the Americans: he says democracy has taught them "fraternity," and defines it as a certain "kindliness, a sense of human fellowship, a recognition of the duty of mutual help, owed by man to man . . . the natural impulse of every citizen . . . to respect every other citizen." Of course, Tocqueville had made similar observations. Yet there seems to be a difference in the feeling tone. Bryce feels closer to the Americans, and occasionally calls them "the English of America." Tocqueville in his time perceived American social manners as "grave, deliberate, reserved,"¹⁰ rather than cordial, and human relations as almost devoid of real pleasure: "They laugh mighty little on this side of the Atlantic."¹¹ Bryce on the contrary refers to "the humorous tendencies of the American mind." The spirit of fraternity which Tocqueville saw was a certain simplicity of heart ("If their demeanor is often cold and serious, it is never haughty or constrained")¹² rather than a genuine kindliness and fellowship.

It is hard to tell whether the difference here lies in the minds that observe or is due to changes in the object observed. Charles Dickens, who visited America ten years after Tocqueville and forty years before Bryce, voiced a curiously ambivalent view. In his American Notes he describes the Americans as "by nature frank, brave, cordial, hospitable, and affectionate," while at the same time finding in them a spirit of "Universal Distrust," a lack of "lightness of heart and gaiety," and a generally "prevailing seriousness and melancholy air of business." Was this a true reflection of an America different from that of the two famous observers just discussed, or a subjective view conceived by a different temperament?

¹⁰ Pierson, op. cit., p. 69.

¹¹ Ibid., p. 90.

¹² Democracy in America, Vol. II, Chap. II, p. 207.

Weaknesses of American democracy

In describing the weaknesses of American democracy, Bryce again follows Tocqueville in important respects. His criticism concerns the level of political life in America, the intellectual standard of leadership, and the technical efficiency of government. Like Tocqueville, he finds a certain commonness and lack of dignity among the people's representatives (they "behave as ordinary men"), as well as lack of knowledge and judgment in legislative and administrative matters. The best talent does not enter the field of public affairs, and in consequence government in all its branches is below the level to be expected in a nation like the United States. "In no country is the ideal side of public life, what one might venture to call the heroic element in a public career, so ignored by the mass and repudiated by the leaders."

Bryce points to two defects of American democracy which had received little or no attention in Tocqueville's analysis: the corrupt and unethical practices occurring in party politics and in city governments, and the formidable power of wealth in America. Not only did Bryce penetrate much deeper into these problems as such (Tocqueville's treatment of party politics was one of the few rather weak parts of his study), but he was also, of course, confronted with a political situation in which a merely technical, moral judgment was no longer meaningful. Both corruption and big business had become inescapable issues in the America Bryce studied. He condemned the cynical selfishness and venality of many politicians and branded the system of machines, rings, and bosses as "the ugliest feature" in American politics. He attributed it to historical causes, and believed that it would decline when people, particularly the masses of new immigrants, learned more and developed an active sense of political responsibility. Civil service reform and better ballot and election laws would also help.

Unlike Tocqueville, Bryce did not consider a "tyranny of the majority" a danger inherent in American democracy. "The features of mob-rule do not appear in her system, whose most characteristic faults are the existence of a class of persons using government as a means of private gains, and the menacing power of wealth. Plutocracy . . . has shown in America an inauspicious affinity for certain professedly democratic institutions." Yet Bryce was convinced that American democracy was strong enough to avert this menace and to overcome any other weaknesses. Toward the end of his life he wrote: "No Englishman who remembers American politics as they were half a century ago, and who, having lived in the United States, has formed an affection as well as an admiration for its people . . . will fail to rejoice at the many signs that the sense of public duty has grown stronger, that the standards of public life are steadily rising, that democracy is more and more showing itself a force making for ordered progress, true to the principles of Liberty and Equality from which it sprang."¹³

MAX WEBER

Approximately a quarter of a century later, Max Weber turned his keen mind to an examination of American democracy and the American people. Weber in 1904 was already near the peak of his career as an outstanding German social scientist. The occasion of his visit was an invitation to lecture at a congress held in conjunction with the Universal Exposition at St. Louis; the more important motivation was his desire to see the country which long had been a main object of his scholarly interest. At that time he was concentrating on the great problem of the nature and sources of Western industrial and business civilization, the historical phenomenon referred to as capitalism; on the eve of his departure he had sent to the publisher the first part of what was to become his most famous work, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism.¹⁴

To Weber, America was the society of modern capitalism, the country where the original sources of capitalism could be studied as nowhere else. What interested him primarily was not the spirit of capitalism itself, not the spirit of business enterprise, hard work, and money-making, often called materialism, but rather its deeper roots which he discovered in the ethic of Protestantism. From that religious source originated, in his view, the particular discipline of mind and the methodical way of life which created modern capitalist civilization. He demonstrated this thesis with a rich material, not the least of which was from American thinkers, especially Benjamin Franklin, whom he considered a prototype of the Protestant translating his religion into a code of capitalist practice.

¹³ Modern Democracies (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1921), Vol. II, Chap. 45.

¹⁴ Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist des Kapitalismus, later edition in Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie, Vol. I, Tübingen, 1934. Partial English translation in H. H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills, From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology, New York: Oxford University Press, 1946.

America to Max Weber was the stage upon which the drama of the modern world was enacted in its purest and most consistent form. In his St. Louis lecture he characterized the American farmer as a businessman, "an entrepreneur like any other,"¹⁵ in contradistinction to the Old World peasant who exists in a precapitalist relationship under the dominance of traditional ruling classes. This meant to him that America was as yet a society without an aristocracy. He was not certain that it would remain so, and at the end of his lecture predicted that America might experience a structural change in the distant future, and develop its own form of nobility based on land monopolies, as an effect of the power of capitalism.¹⁶

Years later, in one of his political essays of the First World War, Weber returned to this theme with a remark in passing: "Unlimited political 'democracy' in America, for instance, does not prevent the growth of a raw plutocracy or even an 'aristocratic' prestige group, which is slowly emerging. The growth of this 'aristocracy' is culturally and historically as important as that of plutocracy, even though it usually goes unnoticed."¹⁷

¹⁵ "Capitalism and Rural Society in Germany," translation in Gerth and Mills, op. cit., p. 363.

¹⁶ Ibid., p. 383.

¹⁷ "Wahlrecht und Demokratie in Deutschland," in Gesammelte politische Schriften (Munich, 1921), translation in Gerth and Mills, op. cit., p. 392.

Bureaucracy

Another major theme heralded in the St. Louis lecture is that of bureaucracy and its role in modern societies. "The importance of the stratum of state officials is and must be much greater in Europe than in the United States." The much more complicated social organization makes a host of specially trained officials, employed for life, indispensable in Europe. In the United States only a much smaller number of them will exist, even after the movement of civil service reform shall have attained its aims.¹⁸ This relative freedom from the bureaucratically formalized type of administration was, to Weber, one of the most valuable aspects of American democracy. Its main strength, however, he saw in the positive use Americans made of that freedom. The lack of formal organization did not mean to Americans an organized individualism, as people abroad, and particularly in Germany, often believe, but on the contrary, a fuller and richer type of community life: "In the past and up to the very present, it has been a characteristic precisely of the specifically American democracy that it did not constitute a formless sand heap of individuals, but rather a buzzing complex of strictly exclusive, yet voluntary, associations."¹⁹ This sentence, written in 1906, sums up what was perhaps Max Weber's crucial experience and his main orientation point during the American visit. The voluntary associations of free men in clubs, religious sects, and other groupings of all kinds which he found flowering in this country were to him the heart and core of American democracy, and a topic to which he returned again and again in speech and writing for the rest of his life.

¹⁸ "Capitalism and Rural Society in Germany," translation by Gerth and Mills, op. cit., p. 370.

¹⁹ "Die protestantischen Sekten und der Geist des Kapitalismus," 1906, in Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie, Vol. I, translation in Gerth and Mills, op. cit., p. 310.

After 1917, when America had entered the war and Weber realized far more clearly than most of his compatriots that Germany inevitably would be defeated, he worked feverishly on ideas for the establishment of a new, democratic government and way of life in his country. In two important respects he presented American democracy as a model. He pointed to its pattern of voluntary associations, the club system, as a type of social order within which human freedom and creativeness could thrive in spite of the progressive bureaucratization of modern society. And he proposed the adoption of the American practice of electing the chief executive by direct vote of the entire nation, a provision which in fact was embodied in the Weimar Constitution of 1919. His idea was that the President of the German Republic should, like the President of the United States, be vested with the powers of national leadership based on popular vote, and not merely the powers of formal authority. He wanted to safeguard German democracy against the danger of becoming a bureaucratic establishment, a mere Beamtenstaat; as a direct "plebiscitarian democracy" it would give rise to genuine political leadership. By a bitter paradox of history, this feature of the Weimar Constitution became one of the avenues upon which, fourteen years later, a very different type of leaders marched to seize power in Germany. The reasons for this tragedy were many. One of them Max Weber could not have foreseen: the development of a new technology of mass persuasion, by radio and sound amplification, against which the German people, in its embryonic state of democracy, was helpless.

U. S. as a world power

One important trend which Weber predicted with certainty was the ascent of the United States to world-power status. Long before America entered the war "he saw that sheer prolongation of the war would bring world industrial supremacy to America."²⁰ At the end of the war he remarked that America's political supremacy was now, after the German defeat, as inevitable as that of Rome after the Punic War, and he added: "I hope America is not going to share it with Russia." He had long seen America and Russia as the two great centers of gravitation in the modern world, and as early as 1906, still under the impression of his American journey, he wrote: "Irresistibly the point of gravity of the population of Western civilization advances toward the great inland areas of the North American continent on the one side and of Russia on the other. This happened once before, in late antiquity."²¹

CONTEMPORARY VISITORS

We have noted some of the major themes in the views of America expressed by three famous visitors in the past. Turning now to contemporary visitors and inquiring what their image of America is, we have a choice of two approaches. One is a content analysis of some or all books and reports on America published in recent years by well-known foreign observer-visitors such as Harold Laski, D. W. Brogan, Geoffrey Gorer, André Siegfried, Raymond Aron, and Simone de Beauvoir. Another method is that of a direct interview survey of a selected sample of individuals. Having recently conducted such a survey (as yet unpublished), I propose here to report briefly some of the principal relevant findings thereof. The persons interviewed were individuals in positions of leadership from many countries in Europe, Asia, and the African continent, visiting America a year or so ago, all for the first time and each traveling individually. They were interviewed here upon arrival, with the aim of establishing their preconceptions of America before direct exposure, that is, as derived from books, movies, and other communication sources, and from ideas circulating in their home countries.

²⁰ Gerth and Mills, "Introduction," op. cit., p. 39.

²¹ Max Weber, quoted ibid., p. 72.

When the foreign visitors who were the subjects of this study arrived in the United States, they carried in their minds a fairly well-defined image of America and the American people. Certain components of this image were universal, in the sense of being taken for granted by all, and were also central and persisting, in the sense of being highly salient and of dominant influence upon the organization of the individuals' beliefs and attitudes regarding America and things American. Clustered around these central components or "grand themes," and related to them in various ways, were collateral themes of a less universal and less persisting nature.

Of grand themes we found four, in shorthand terms describable as world power, bigness and wealth, technology, and big heart. Of collateral themes there were many, and most of them indicated an evaluation, favorable or unfavorable. In the political image there was, for instance, "young and forceful nation" as well as "young and inexperienced nation," "democracy" as well as "race relations impair democracy" and "the civil liberties issue endangers democracy." In the economic image there were themes like "opportunities" as well as "insecurity," "maldistribution," and "small-group rule (Wall Street)." In the social and cultural image there was stress on a variety of positive and negative collateral themes, such as "technical skill and efficiency," "well-integrated multinational society," "materialism," "competitiveness," "success orientation," "indifference toward nonutilitarian values," "rushed tempo of life," "hard work," "violence," "continuing change." In the image of Americans as human beings the main theme was "friendliness and openness in human relations" (big heart) with collateral themes such as "strong," "youthful," "juvenile," "skillful," "active," and "insensitive to non-technological cultural values."

U. S. in international affairs

An elaboration of these general findings presents an image of the world role of the United States envisaged by Max Weber, for one of the central and persisting components of the visitors' image of America, taken for granted by all and frequently referred to, was America's status as a world power. In explaining how she came to occupy this role in international affairs some mentioned the great strength of the country, a theme which was further elaborated with regard to economic resources. Interestingly, there was not a single reference to atomic energy as a basis of American power. Others explained America's ascendancy in terms of a historical process involving the decay of the older nations that formerly held world-power status. The comments on America as a world power reflected a variety of opinions and attitudes, from enthusiastic confidence to sober acceptance of the fact, and from skepticism to hostile rejection. One of the more important reservations, which also was discovered in other areas of the study, concerned the level of maturity and experience of America as a "young" nation in world affairs.

In contrast to the universal consensus regarding the status of the United States as a world power, the respondents did not for the most part comment on any policy involving the exercise of American leadership in world affairs. The most striking omission concerned the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which drew only one brief comment from a visitor from a non-NATO country, while the group included visitors from eight countries participating in the organization. The policy of economic aid to foreign countries was commented on by a number of respondents, and only favorably. Otherwise there were references—mostly indifferent or unfavorable—to a variety of foreign policy issues, like the East-West conflict, Korea, Germany, foreign trade, and American-Arab relations.

Democracy

When asked to define their general concept of democracy the visitors stressed the principle of equality as applied to economic and educational opportunities, and the principle of liberty as embodied in freedom of speech, thought, and worship. Freedom of economic enterprise, never specifically mentioned, may have been implied in occasional references to "individualism." About half of the group stated unreservedly that they considered America a real democracy in terms of their own definitions. From the remainder there were comments expressing reservations with regard to certain issues, mainly race relations, civil liberties, corruption in politics, and citizen participation in political affairs. While there was little evidence of strong prejudice against American democracy, there was also little indication of the deeply emotional faith in it as a model for other peoples which was typical in former times.

Some of the respondents considered certain other countries like Britain and Scandinavia more democratic than modern America.

Bigness and wealth

"Bigness and wealth" was the most firmly and universally established theme of the total image of America. Like the world-power theme it was taken for granted by all and was referred to very frequently. While the group was generally impressed by the great economic opportunities in the United States, there was a feeling on the part of some that the social distribution of wealth and opportunities compared unfavorably with that of certain welfare-oriented European countries. There were also frequent references to the belief that a small, financially powerful group (Wall Street) controls American economy. The total evaluation of American economic life—prior to observation and on the basis of spotty and superficial information—was as ambivalent as that of political democracy: universal recognition of the bigness and wealth, but at the same time a certain skepticism regarding the distribution of wealth in the national economy and, as a consequence, doubt of America's perfection in terms of democratic ideals.

Social climate

Many comments were made on social groups and relations as well as on characteristics of the general "social climate" of America. Dominant themes were race relations and the multinational composition of the population, the latter being the more salient of the two. Curiously enough, the subject of social classes and class relations received very little attention, but the American home and family were commented upon more frequently. The respondents' preconceptions in regard to this important area of American life were about evenly divided between positive and negative.

In the area of social climate three themes were predominant: the tempo of life, the role of violence, and social change. With regard to the "tempo" theme it was observed that visitors from foreign countries, especially Asiatics but also many Europeans, are often affected by the difference in rhythm and tempo of everyday living, the different time consciousness, the stricter time economy, in this country as compared with their own. Many visitors are prepared in advance to find these features here and arrive with a definite, frequently negative opinion about them. The theme indicates a genuine cultural contrast bound to affect the foreigner's total attitude toward American culture and society. As for the "role of violence" theme, many respondents stated that Hollywood movies had created in their countries a conception of America with violence and brutal force as predominant features. They recognized that this was a distortion, yet seemed somewhat affected by these unfavorable popular views. The comments on social change were all favorable, with a stress on growth and progress. In most cases respondents seemed to think of American social change in terms of economic or technological innovations, "new things," rather than new social conditions and new institutions. This means that they expected change and further improvement in regard to matters about which most of them had expressed themselves favorably, rather than in matters about which they had been critical.

Cultural life

Respondents from all countries represented in the sample, except France, commented on cultural life in America. The most striking feature was the general emphasis on American achievements in science and technology. This, in fact, was a central component of the total image of America, on a par with the "world power" and the "bigness and wealth" themes described earlier. While all comments on this third of the grand themes were favorable, the statements also pointed toward a rather serious limitation in the evaluation of American culture as a whole, in the sense that areas other than scientific and technological, such as the fine arts, were believed to be relatively underdeveloped. There were a few comments, however, all favorable, on education in America, and some evidence of interest in the subject. The visitors often reflected on what they believed to be the general goals and value orientations characteristic of American cultural life. The major themes here were "materialism," "success orientation," and "overcompetitiveness." The conception of materialism seemed to be specifically related to the "tempo of life" theme, both of them being aspects of the same fundamental conception of American society and culture, emphasizing scientific and technological superiority. The full pattern of the three themes combined produces an image of a powerful and technically advanced progressive industrial civilization, moving forward by the force of restless effort and struggle, primarily oriented toward goals of material gains and successes.

Character of the people

All but three of the respondents gave their views of the character of the American people. The one grand theme which stood out here was that of friendliness and openness in human relations, the "big heart" theme, which ranked on a level with the three central and persisting themes described before (world power, bigness and wealth, and technology). It should be noted that however critical some visitors may have been of American democracy in certain institutional and material aspects, there was universal agreement that the American people is psychologically a democratic people, natively endowed with a great ability for friendly and easy human relations among themselves, and hospitable toward the foreigner.

Other collateral preconceptions regarding characteristics of Americans were "unspent potential strength" ("youthfulness") and "practical efficiency" ("skillfulness"). The notion of a juvenile or even "childlike" character was related to certain themes in the respondents' political and cultural image of America, such as lack of historical maturity and experience. The efficiency theme fitted into the pattern of technological superiority. Beliefs regarding the typical value orientations of the American people repeated the pattern of positive-negative reciprocity, stressing notions such as "hard-working," "active," and "energetic" as well as "materialistic," "ambitious," "rush all the time." In addition there were statements describing quite different goals and ideals, like "Americans love freedom," "love what is right and just," "are interested in education."

In sum, it appears that in the contemporaneous view of America the themes of political power, economic wealth, and technology predominate, and that the earlier theme of democracy has receded into the background and is now mainly connected with the image of Americans as human beings.

Arvid Brodersen, Ph.D., has been since 1949 professor of sociology on the Graduate Faculty of the New School for Social Research, New York City. From 1946 to 1949 he served with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, Paris, in charge of the Department of Social Sciences, and from 1936 to 1940 was assistant professor of sociology at the University of Oslo, Norway. He is author of Thorstein Veblen as a Sociologist (1937), Science and Politics in Max Weber (1937), The Political Elite (1945), and The Political Machinery (1945), all in Norwegian.

America in European Eyes

By JACQUES FREYMOND *

IN FRENCH EYES

What is America for a Frenchman? First of all, it is the land of liberty, the country for whose independence Lafayette and his French volunteers fought in a battle which announced and prepared the Great Revolution. Without any doubt, the War of Independence and the Bill of Rights exerted a great influence upon the Revolution of 1789. Franklin was, in French eyes, a great man, and America was to remain during the nineteenth century an example of real democracy. "Where could we find greater hopes or greater lessons?" asked Tocqueville in his "Avertissement" to his famous book De la démocratie en Amérique. Alexis de Tocqueville, the aristocrat, was not isolated in his country. To the French Democrats of 1848 America appeared a living symbol of the liberation of mankind from the political chains of reactionary regimes, an asylum where many victims of intolerance found an opportunity to begin a new life.

But this picture of the America of the Statue of Liberty, with Jefferson and Lincoln its main representatives, Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt its modern exponents, could not stand alone in the minds of the French. On the eve of the twentieth century a new America was born, highly mechanized, rich, and mighty; preoccupied with efficiency and rationalization, this America brought with her a new age, her own age of mechanization and mass civilization. For a France whose industrial revolution had gone at a slow pace, for a country which, as it grew older, was more inclined to put the price of life and the value of civilization in refine-

"AMERICA in European eyes." Everyone who begins a study in public opinion is well aware of the difficulties of such a task. What is this "European" view? How is it expressed? How is it possible to choose among all the opinions that are held in the various countries, to assess their relative importance? Can we admit that there is such a thing as a "national" point of view on America? Should we not, on the contrary, assume that opinions will vary according to the social position, the ideology, and the prejudices of those who express them, as well as with the type of America they have in mind? For the diversity of the pictures given of America depends not only on the multiplicity of the approaches, but also on the diversity of a multifaced and ever changing continent. There is hardly a foreign traveler who, having spent more than a month in the United States, has not been struck by the contrasts which exist behind the apparent simplicity and uniformity of American life.

Nevertheless stereotypes exist. Where they come from we do not always know. They just emerge from past and recent history, grown out from an important event or, more prosaically, from long usage. Molded by a multitude of travelers, diplomats and soldiers, writers, journalists, all in search of images and slogans in which to sum up their feelings, they slip, right or wrong, across the ocean, defying time and critics, transmitted from man to man, from one generation to another.

* I wish to express my gratitude to Mr. Thomas J. McIntosh and Mr. Angelo Husler for their great help in the preparation and the translation of this study.

ments and subtleties, this new world was at the same time imposing and disquieting. The great democracy had become the land of capitalism. Materialism was invading the idealistic America of the Founding Fathers. This country which had fought colonialism and slavery seemed itself to be bent upon imperialistic adventure and dollar diplomacy.

World War I—and after World War I and American intervention on the side of the democracies reinforced the bonds of an old friendship. Pershing's words, "Lafayette, we are here," expressed the feelings not only of the Americans, but also of their French allies, who never disdained a certain self-complacency. Wilson, arriving in Paris, was greeted as the messenger sent by the New World to bring peace and a better life to Europe; for a while it seemed that the future of mankind hung upon the presence of this crusader and his ability to sway the politicians of the old school. But only for a while, and then the stubbornness with which he met France's claim for security, his narrow-minded moralism combined with his failure to keep promises, left the French with a sense of frustration. America was still a friend, but a friend whom it was difficult to understand and get along with. There was resentment at having been abandoned by an ally very generous indeed, but one whose leader's idealistic and moralistic approach to the delicate problems of international politics was all the more embarrassing for his associates as it now weighed in the balance for what was deemed a well-smitten Germany and against what was considered a petty, land-greedy France.

From then on, the feelings of the French toward America were mixed and the images more confused. Although they knew how much they needed the support of the United States in their struggle for security, although they admired the great success of the American economy, they could not help criticizing that "American way of life" which was presented as the secret of happiness.

The more they knew about the civilization of the New World, the more they seemed to be convinced of the wisdom of their own way of life. As always happens, a superiority complex came to compensate for the sense of inferiority which had developed because of the tremendous growth of America's economy. The success, therefore, of Duhamel's Scènes de la vie future need have occasioned no surprise, for Duhamel merely expressed an opinion which was widespread in his country. The America he described had exactly that type of civilization to which the French were most strongly opposed, and the Wall Street crash of 1929 confirmed the French view that a solution to the world crisis was not to be found in a country which had forgotten the measure of man but in a new appraisal of the heritage and wisdom of the Old World. "Does this unheard-of mastery over earthly things lead in the end to a higher civilization?" had asked André Siegfried at the end of his book on the United States, published in 1926. Since then, of course, events had demonstrated that the "mastery" was far from complete. American capitalism had fallen from its throne. Although the opening of the Roosevelt era, with its tones familiar to French ears, reconciled France with America, the conviction remained that French civilization was superior.

World War II

World War II which, after a break, brought the two nations together in the same camp again, did not alter very much the French impression of the United States. In 1945, America was still the powerful democracy without whose help Europe and the world would not have been liberated from the domination of Nazism and totalitarianism. But the new victor was greeted with mixed feelings. The demonstrations of sincere joy and gratitude did not prevent the French people from remembering past mistakes and criticizing present ones. The fact that France had been relegated, by the defeat of 1940 and the occupation, to the position of a second-rate nation, the unskillful treatment she had suffered from her American ally, the negative attitude adopted by Roosevelt toward de Gaulle, exacerbated French pride and served to raise a new wave of criticism against American civilization as the French saw it.

Let the liberators go home

In 1944, the GI was welcomed in France and elsewhere in Europe as a liberator. The emphasis at this time was put upon the community of interests of the peoples gathered in the Great Alliance. Praise of Western civilization, to which America belonged as well as France, was one of the favorite themes of all speeches. In 1954, the moral climate seems to have changed completely. American soldiers are not treated as cheerfully as they were ten years ago, but are frequently greeted with a "go home" not always coming from the Communists alone. And allusions to the "Western community" are today usually criticisms which insist less upon the cohesive force of that idea than upon the elements of discord at work among its members. Opinions are contrasted and contradictions are highlighted until the area of agreement, the area of common values, becomes perilously circumscribed.

This change of attitude is at first glance difficult to explain. It seems incredible that America's generous acceptance of the onerous tasks of political leadership should be rewarded by such ingratitude. The tighter the political and economic bonds, the stronger the social and intellectual opposition! But there is, after all, nothing unusual in this; indeed, it may well happen that more frequent contacts between men or nations do not bring them closer. In this case at least, the contacts did not lead the French to a better understanding of their allies, but simply brought into the open sharp differences, both in methods and in respective ways of life.

Who were the Americans whom the French met? GI's, tourists, students, the traditional diplomats, and the numerous officials of the new international organizations. Everyone knows that soldiers and tourists are not always the best representatives of their country. No wonder a somewhat distorted image of the United States was formed, largely upon the impression conveyed by eccentric tourists or GI's enjoying too openly the pleasures of life abroad. But the French had many occasions to travel in the United States, and did not miss them. Numerous were, for instance, the journalists or the intellectuals who spent a few weeks, or even months, in America. One might suppose that these travelers would have brought back new impressions of the United States, helping thus to complete and amend those other impressions gathered in France through contact with Americans abroad. Cases of genuine discovery were, however, all too rare. A cursory study of the abundant literature—books and articles—of the type retour d'Amérique published in France during recent years reveals a rather wide consensus of opinion. The America these writers discovered was not very different from the one which they expected to find: rich, powerful, optimistic, evidently proud of its material successes, but unable to give an answer of positive value to those who are seeking a solution to the spiritual crisis of our time. Here was a mass civilization, highly mechanized and rationalized, in which men could admittedly find a certain amount of material comfort. Yet beyond the satisfaction of the senses there was no place for the development of personality. Individuals were sacrificed to the mass, compelled to conform to usages and habits more compulsive than the laws. "A dictatorship without a dictator, exercised by everyone over everyone else," wrote Albert Béguin in Esprit.

The intellectuals

No wonder the intellectuals were isolated and without great influence upon this nation. In the universities, even in the best of them, culture had to give way to a triumphant technique. André Siegfried pointed to this mégalo manie de la technique in 1950: "Culture properly speaking, with its highly personal character, has been eclipsed by technics and gadgets." The result is a "civilization turned more and more toward collective undertakings where the individual acting alone counts for nothing." And, speaking of the universities, Siegfried said: "The humanities are practically abandoned. Insofar as they survive, they are relegated to a special curriculum which is vaguely suspect as fit only for students of a somewhat unhealthy refinement." More and more the chief concern seemed to be the training of the future specialists who, taken in hand during their early years, are nursed until their entrance into the active life "without ever having made event the most passing acquaintance with the great problems of the soul."

Materialism, lack of culture. These Americans who seem so satisfied with themselves are really overgrown children whose optimism can be explained by their ignorance of the deep sense of life. They do not feel that inquiétude which the French consider the true stimulant of an intellectual life. A critical mind is for the community a source of fear, but of a healthy fear which is, by its nature, diametrically opposed to the neurotic hysteria of the witch-hunt. For behind American optimism subsists a feeling of insecurity which comes from the perpetual and too rapid movement of life and eventuates in psychic disturbances such as McCarthyism.

One could retort that these stereotypes are the products of intellectuals and do not reflect exactly the views of the French people. There is an element of truth in such an assertion, for we cannot ignore the great part played by intellectuals in the framing of images. Besides, it should be noted that many of the intellectuals who show a keen interest in America are oriented to the Left, hence influenced in the main by what we might call an anti-capitalistic prejudice. The reading of Temps Modernes, Esprit, Témoignage Chrétien, L'Observateur d'Aujourd'hui and Le Monde is very instructive in this regard. There are, of course, other segments of the French nation which neither share these views nor accept these stereotypes. It is evident that there are people in the French bourgeoisie, among the workers, and even among the intellectuals who do not bother about the redoutable absence d'inquiétude of the Americans, and take a more optimistic view of the dynamic side of their society.

But la République des Lettres is a power in France, and its views are all the more imposing as they fall upon a soil intellectually prepared to receive them. It is perhaps unnecessary to invoke the time-honored opposition between French Cartesianism and Anglo-Saxon pragmatism. But, on another level of experience, have not the very circumstances of recent French life favored the spread of these gross notions about an America smug in its power and naive in its materialism?

Fear of U. S.

France savored only for a moment the full joy of liberation. Then, with almost tragic insistence, fear returned to plague the moral climate of a sorely tried people. The old fear of weakness confronted by strength, however, was now compounded with a new and more humiliating fear, that of the protected in face of his protector.

America was called to the rescue because her aid was indispensable. Yet the recipients of this aid live in fear of succumbing under the mighty weight of America's friendship. Since her aid cannot be entirely disinterested (indeed, why should it be?), apprehension is felt lest the United States take advantage of the weakness of its former competitors by conquering markets, imposing American ways, and, in short, by supplanting with a new civilization that older one to which the French people are bound by ties not only of time and tradition, but of love.

The Frenchman fears, then, "American economic imperialism." He fears "Americanization." Finally, he fears being victimized by the blunders of a nation which, for all its good intentions, seems to him politically maladroit and lacking in experience. The fluctuations of American policy, the hesitations and contradictions of her diplomacy, the errors of Yalta and Potsdam along with the reversals which followed, congressional debates and commentaries in the American press—these are just so many elements which have served to keep the Frenchman in a state of excited suspense. Will America do enough? Will she go too far? These questions occur to him almost simultaneously and reflect his deep fear of involvement beside an America whose policy, he thinks, vacillates incoherently between extremes of isolationism and aggressiveness.

In fact, the average Frenchman is disturbed not only because he appreciates his own weakness, but also because he lacks confidence in that great nation upon which history has bestowed the conduct of affairs. He feels very superior to the American; again, this superiority complex is all the more marked as, during recent years, it has been called upon to compensate for a very real sense of inferiority.

Center of the world

In spite of its political bankruptcies and its disastrous wars, Europe, and France in particular, persists in regarding itself as the center of world affairs. It is all well and good for philosophers, historians, geographers, and statesmen to expatiate upon "the European crisis," to discover new worlds in Asia, America, and Russia, even to improvise deft variations on the theme "We civilizations, we know now that we are all mortal. . . ." The fact remains that neither those who insist upon these truths nor their readers have as yet accepted them with resignation. For in a world still ruled largely by European criteria, it is hard to admit with grace that beyond this Europe, beyond this Mediterranean heartland, other civilizations may blossom and flourish.

It is with a certain indulgence, then, that the Frenchman regards the American. No one questions the latter's technical superiority, nor his flair for organization. America's doctors, engineers, bankers, businessmen, even her generals have demonstrated on more than one occasion their amazing "know-how." But their talent is above all, in the words of Duhamel, a génie de l'application. This génie de l'application, continues Duhamel in a text which expresses a typical European attitude, "can be exercised successfully for a long time on the basis of laws discovered by Western European investigators since Descartes and Bacon." Le peuple de l'efficacité may give themselves and their neighbors illusions regarding their scientific supremacy, but neither Duhamel nor his canny countrymen are going to be duped by mere appearances, "for we know well that the fundamental thoughts all come from France or England or Germany, anyway, from Europe."

ENGLISH-AMERICAN KINSHIP

It is difficult to gauge the extent to which these feelings are shared by other Europeans, for history has left predisposing marks upon each nation.

Again, as was the case with France, the American Revolution is at the base of American relations with England. Here, however, instead of establishing ties of good will, the Revolution opened a breach, and was disagreeable in the extreme for England, since it constituted one of the few real failures in her history. But a breach between two such realistic down-to-earth peoples could hardly be total or irrevocable; indeed, a common language saved the two peoples from each other, and proclaimed anew the moral kinship which war had destroyed. Paradoxical as it may seem, these sometime rivals have ignored history on the one hand, tastes and dispositions on the other, to join hands in a profound community of interests. While the increased frequency of international contacts may have served only to illumine the opposition between Frenchman and American, with the Anglo-Saxons it has, on the contrary, testified to the power of those familial relations analyzed with such understanding by Denis Brogan.

There is disagreement, though, in all but the closest of families. This is true with special force where traditions, milieux, and even climates are permanently present as factors of differentiation, troubling an otherwise harmonious consanguinity.

The English are particularly concerned about the "pace of life" in America. To them, it seems that Americans are always hurrying—making money, changing things, always "on the go." Revolutions, fanaticism, and dogmatism are but remote echoes in the Englishman's history; in any event, they are superseded in significance for him by a tradition which is less a sacred cow than an active element of the good life. He looks on in consternation as the Americans try to settle problems the minute they occur; this seems to him not a human triumph but an indirect admission of weakness. The American is so impatient to live that life passes him right by. And this impatience is the source of certain faults, in particular of those faults of taste which shock the English. "These Americans have no self-restraint, no sense of privacy!" They lay bare their own private lives as freely as they pry into the lives of others. Well, at bottom they have nothing to hide, for they are a lot of simple plebeians.

This is another case, then, of that superiority complex so characteristically British and European, as well as French. If the Englishman refrains from criticizing, with the French intellectual, the American's "fearsome lack of concern," he is nonetheless prone to regard Americans as overgrown children and America as the "kid sister" who must be taken by the hand and led. Neither the political errors of a Europe where Great Britain was always present, directly or indirectly, nor the extraordinary success of the American Experiment has banished this feeling of superiority. On the contrary, weakness has served here, as in France, to stiffen national pride. And this pride has, in turn, been buffeted by certain attitudes adopted by the United States: intrusion in Britain's colonial sphere, steadfast refusal to share atomic secrets, tendering of unsolicited advice. The grievance on this last score is particularly rankling, as the advice is thought to come from a callow youth who, instead of disseminating his semi-finished opinions, should himself be taking counsel with the old masters who, though weakened, are hoary with experience.

American immaturity

So America is an overgrown child, rich, happy, and generous, but not always able to decide what to do with her wealth and power. Is America disliked because of her wealth? Not at all, except perhaps on the left wing of the Labour party, where the intellectuals and the firmly anticapitalist Bevanites predominate. Of course, the general European caricature of American capitalism finds a place in the British stereotype, even though it is not much to the fore. It is taken for granted, for example, that all Americans have ample means and a relatively high propensity to consume. On the whole, they are regarded by British shop- and hotelkeepers as "walking inflation."

But the most widely accepted image of America is that of an impulsive nation, composed of decidedly immature people. The rumblings of public opinion, the bickerings of Congress, and the contradictory speeches of members of the administration are all regarded as so many signs of instability and lack of civic spirit. How does one go about explaining McCarthyism, if not as a product of fear, the child of ignorance? On this last point, the English do not perhaps go as far as their French neighbors, who see in McCarthyism a nascent American fascism. The English take a more sanguine view of the capacity for resistance of the American social body. Still, they are disturbed by a phenomenon which has grown steadily more powerful and which, until recently, seemed to have no antidote. In England, and in Europe generally, McCarthyism has gradually become one of the most freely accepted notions about America. For the traditional picture of a land of refuge and liberty has been substituted that of a country in which nonconformism has become tantamount to treason.

ITALIAN TOLERANCE AND AFFECTION

To judge by certain evidences, Italy might constitute a partial exception to this general condemnation of McCarthyism. This is not to say that Italians approve of the Senator's antics; quite the contrary. But Italians are inclined to be the most skeptical of Europeans. "The witch-hunt is an organic necessity for America, which couldn't live if she didn't have some witch to hunt . . .," said the Corriere della Sera. "A few years ago the witch was fascism; all those who complain about McCarthy today forget the McCarthys of yesterday, more stupid and more bullying, whom we saw going about their work in Italy at the time of liberation. Before fascism, the witches were alcohol and prostitution. . . . Each of these witches has had its McCarthy."

This difference is to be noted, however, only among certain segments of the population. The Left, and the Communist Left in particular, finds in McCarthyism a useful element of propaganda. This is only one success among many, for the Communist party has, for example, organized a news network in the farming regions thanks to which it can spread, even more effectively than in the cities, its crude image of an America entrenched in a capitalism which is the source of all evil and all woe.

Yet Italy is one of the few countries in Europe in which Americans are regarded with genuine affection. Naturally, there are the traditional lamentations over the plight of the cultivated European confronted by American "barbarism"; Niccolò Tucci furnished a good-humored description of this situation in a recent issue of The Atlantic Monthly. But beyond these prefabricated notions, which circulate as freely in Italy as elsewhere, one will find here work of more positive value. Books such as those of Luigi Barzini, Gli Americani sono soli al mondo, and of Guido Piovene, De America, evidence a desire to see Americans as they are in America rather than as they are thought to be in Europe. This is perhaps why the two essential factors of movement and mass are analyzed and set forth here with more precision than is generally the case in European commentaries on America.

According to an inquiry made by the Istituto per le ricerche statistiche e l'analisi dell'opinione pubblica, of which the results were published in the Institute's Bulletin of February 15, 1954, the majority of the Italian people have a rather favorable opinion of Americans. The Americans are generous and practical-minded; they are clearly more likable than English, French, or Germans; their aid aims at strengthening resistance to Communism, but it is inspired too by generosity. American diplomacy is too simple in its conception, and contradictory. The fact that a woman was named as Ambassador at Rome does not seem to trouble the Italians. Finally, if Italian tastes have been modified by American influences, that is not necessarily bad. Such are, in substance, the conclusions of this inquiry.

Here it is clearly not a question of images properly speaking, but of opinions and feelings. These are precisely the elements, though, of which images are made. In this case, we see the image of the expansive, openhearted, and open-minded American "kid" which is going to please the Italian by virtue of those very elements in its make-up which call forth reserves in England. Finally, the average tourist or GI will be likely to tally with this image of wide-eyed and carefree youth.

We must not forget the influence exercised by the numerous Italian colonies in America which have kept alive their ties with the "old country" through families which are almost clans and whose members are in constant correspondence. Thus the Italian maintains a more intimate contact with the United States than the Frenchman; his notion of America will accordingly be a direct and human one, in which intelligence and political considerations will play a smaller part than affective reactions.

SOURCES OF EUROPEAN IMAGES

The author has given here only a series of impressions, gleaned from reading, travel, and conversation. Going deeper into the subject would have entailed a long inquiry, condemned in advance, like all public opinion surveys, to yield only fragmentary results.

The above impressions may seem pessimistic. The images Europeans form of America and Americans are very often caricatures from which it would be all but impossible to reconstruct the model. This is the result, as we have pointed out, of circumstances, state of mind, and angle of approach. In fact, the stereotypes of America differ not only in relation to national prejudices and political ideologies, but also according to the mental cast, so to speak, the frame of mind. Beside the French, British, or Italian images of America, there will be, for example, a Communist image, clearly defined in relation to a political policy. But there is also a socialist image, a bourgeois image, and even an intellectual image. If one were to seek a common origin for all these European Americas it is altogether probable that he would find such an origin in the basically human disposition to judge others according to one's own personal criteria. Tocqueville knew what he was about when he warned, "Take care not to judge new societies according to the standards of older orders which have come and gone. Such judgments would be unjust, for these societies are so radically different as to be incomparable."

Jacques Freymond, Ph.D., Lausanne, Switzerland, is professor of modern history at the University of Lausanne and at the Graduate Institute of International Studies in Geneva. Among his publications are Lénine et l'Impérialisme (1951), De Roosevelt à Eisenhower: La Politique étrangère américaine de 1945 à 1952 (1953), and articles in the fields of modern history and international politics.

nopoly position, which corresponds to the political and economic monopoly of the Soviet elite, has some corresponding disadvantages. The Kremlin, even more than the upper echelons of the elite in general, has to fight to prevent itself from being isolated and insulated from reality. But thus far the Kremlin has solved this problem with surprising success. It has developed a political, economic, military, and psychological policy which combines exceptional stability of ends with great flexibility of means. The methods by which this result has been brought about are not very well known and cannot be analyzed or described here, but one important ingredient is certainly the extreme sensitivity of the Soviet rulers to problems of information and intelligence.

A SLOGAN FOR EACH PERIOD

While holding firmly to the over-all end of maintaining and expanding the area of direct Soviet administrative control and of strengthening the tentacles that project out into the non-Soviet world, the Kremlin adopts a "general line" for each historical period, and to a certain extent for each political situation and for each geographic and cultural area. On the basis of extensive information, and by using the "collegiate" or "collective" method of decision making at the very top, a balance of conflicting claims is arrived at. We know much less about this process than we should like, but it is striking that there are main themes, even slogans, for each historical situation. These are of course subject to change without notice.

During World War II much of Soviet policy was summed up under the constantly repeated slogan "everything for the front." As the war came to an end, two other slogans became especially important. One was "the moral and political defeat of fascism," which served as the rationalization of a policy of installing "democratic" forces in authority wherever Soviet military and police power could be applied. Closely related was the demand, which alarmed discerning foreign observers in Moscow in 1944 and 1945, for the strengthening of the "military economic might of the Soviet Union." These slogans reflected the realization in the Kremlin that the period in which international alignments pivoted around the "Anglo-Soviet-American coalition" was coming to a close. I have dealt with this period and the early stages of the cold war elsewhere, and shall not attempt even to summarize them here.³

The "Truman Doctrine," the Marshall Plan, and the tense excitement of the Berlin blockade and the Korean War all belonged to the next period, described by the late Andrei A. Zhdanov in his speech at the founding of the Cominform as that of the struggle of "two camps." Of course the most important event of this period was the first attempt by world Communism to extend its power, in direct collision with the United States, by naked military power. It is my belief that the Korean War was a major Kremlin blunder. Its most important consequence, in an extremely complex pattern, was not so much American resistance as two other factors: the threatening and impressive economic and military mobilization of the United States and, above all, a general sense of alarm and resolve in the Western world to resist Soviet Communist aggression. This is of course not the place to attempt to answer the question as to why the Communists made this particular move. The victory of Communism in China probably had a great deal to do with it. The apparent inability of the West to cope with this disaster perhaps led to overconfidence. At the same time, growing optimism about the prospects in the whole "colonial" world, which had been increasing since 1945, also played a part. However, the fall of Dienbienphu and the failure of the Western powers effectively to counter Chinese and Soviet tactics in Indochina and at Geneva threaten to restore or perhaps to more than restore what the Communists lost in Korea.

³ Frederick C. Barghoorn, The Soviet Image of the United States (New York, 1950). On the use of the right "line" for the given historical situation, see KPSS v resolyutsiyakh (Moscow, 1953), Vol. I, p. 517. Although the reference is to the beginning of the New Economic Policy ("Nep"), in 1921, it expresses a basic rule of Soviet behavior which is still followed.

THE KOREAN WAR

The atmosphere generated by the Korean War created extreme alarm and tension in the Soviet Union. It may be stated as axiomatic for Soviet propaganda that irrational appeals calculated to secure mass domestic support are utilized most lavishly when the regime feels most worried about the possibility of foreign conflict. It seems unlikely that the Kremlin ever fully or even to any considerable extent really "feels" the sentiments that it attempts to arouse in periods of crisis among the Russian and other Soviet peoples. However, it manipulates very convincingly the symbols of patriotism and defense of the fatherland against foreign threats. The use of the symbols of Russian nationalism was first attempted on a large scale by the Bolsheviks during the war with Poland in 1920, when the Soviet government made the famous Czarist General Brusilov chairman of a Special Military Conference.⁴ Always latent, the elements of Russian patriotism which could be manipulated by the regime were exploited to the full during World War II.

⁴ D. Fedotoff White, The Growth of the Red Army (Princeton, 1944), pp. 210-11.

During the Korean War, particularly in the Lenin Day speech of January 21, 1951, by the veteran propagandist P. N. Pospelov, the United States and the American people were denounced in flaming terms as ancient foes of the Russian people. The tone of Pospelov's speech and of much Soviet propaganda in the months immediately before and after it indicated that the Kremlin was thinking in terms of a widening of the Korean conflict. This speech was full of positive patriotic symbols such as "Russia," and of negative symbols expressing a zoological hatred for the United States, including "bloodsucker," "beast," "cannibal." To this period also belong the fantastic Soviet and Chinese Communist bacteriological warfare charges. The propaganda of the Korean War was designed to mobilize the Soviet, Chinese, and satellite populations to a fever pitch for all eventualities. Like so much Soviet propaganda, it had a preventive and anticipatory character. Its minimum aim was to reinforce the image of United States "barbarism." Secondly, it was intended to prevent American use of air, atomic, or bacteriological weapons against China. Finally, it would justify ultimate Chinese or Soviet use of superweapons.

Armistice negotiations

Probably the beginning of negotiations for an armistice in Korea marked the beginning of a new phase in Soviet policy. Statements made at the Nineteenth Party Congress, in particular Stalin's article "Economic Problems of Socialism in the U.S.S.R.," and his farewell speech to the foreign Communists, confirmed and outlined the new tactics. Stalin expressed confidence that the "contradictions" among the capitalist powers were more likely to bring about a war within the capitalist world than between it and the Soviet bloc. Thus he selected from the arsenal of doctrines those applicable to the policy of the time.

"RELAXATION OF INTERNATIONAL TENSIONS"

But the full development of the Nineteenth Congress line did not come until after Stalin's death. Despite numerous zigzags and zags, it seems at the time of writing in June 1954 that, by and large, the period since the death of Stalin forms a unit as far as Soviet policy toward the United States is concerned.⁵ Stalin's successors have operated under the over-all slogan of a campaign for "relaxation of international tension." This is the key slogan of the period in which we are living, and it is directed of course against the United States. At times other formulations are employed such as "the world campaign for negotiations."⁶ Toward the end of the period under discussion, the Kremlin displayed greater confidence and increased its pressure against the wavering West. A vital indication was omission from the May Day slogans for 1954 (Pravda, April 21, 1954) of the 1953 assertion that there was no question which could not be settled by negotiation. In the remainder of this paper I shall attempt a brief analytical survey of post-Stalin application of the "negotiations" theme to, and against, the United States. One of the first major Soviet applications of this thesis was the Pravda editorial for May 24, 1953. This vitally important document, which covered the entire front page of Pravda, replied to Prime Minister Churchill's speech in the House of Commons advocating negotiations between Western leaders and the new Kremlin rulers. While welcoming Churchill's initiative and contrasting his attitude favorably with that of President Eisenhower's statements of April 16 and May 20, this Pravda editorial rejected Churchill's suggestion of a new Locarno. Churchill's German concepts were wrong because they envisaged continued dismemberment of Germany and because the "Locarno idea" gave no guarantee of security to Germany's neighbors, France, Belgium, Holland, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. The editorial was artfully calculated to play upon differences between the United States and Britain. Although critical of the substance of Churchill's proposals, it welcomed his call for a meeting of the great powers at the highest level. It contrasted this appeal with the "vague appeals for international understanding" of other Western powers.

⁵ There was an important "hardening" of Soviet policy after the fall of Beria, but it is impossible to say whether or not there was a real difference of foreign policy between Beria and his enemies.

⁶ Pravda editorial for June 24, 1953, used this expression but at the same time warned that the use of force against any "national liberation movement" could lead to "a new hearth (ochag) of war."

The above editorial contained sharp criticism of the Anglo-French and American Conference of Foreign Ministers, which had already been planned by that time. After this conference had taken place, Pravda commented on it in an editorial of July 23. One of the main lines of the July 23 comment was that the three Western powers had demonstrated by holding it that they were attempting to bind the fourth power, the U.S.S.R., by arrangements worked out "behind its back." This editorial, and other statements made during the summer of 1953, argued that it was the will of the people that a genuine four-power conference be held. This popular will had compelled Secretary Dulles to agree to an eventual four-power conference. While making this statement, the Soviet press also argued that the Western powers, led by the United States, were doing their best to "prevent a real easing of international tension." From such editorials and from subsequent statements a major element of the Soviet propaganda "grand design" emerges. The Soviet "negotiations" campaign is only the 1953-54 version of the old but powerful Bolshevik strategy of attempting to pin the onus for aggression on the leaders of the "capitalist" world. More specifically, the Soviet propaganda attempts to exploit the situation which resulted from the finally successful Korean peace negotiations and other factors connected with the post-Stalin international configuration for the purpose of demonstrating that if only the United States would display good will and understanding, there would be no need to continue the cold war. Moscow is attempting to cast Washington in the role of "obstructor of peace."

SOVIET PROPAGANDA—1953 AND 1954

Soviet propaganda on all the major international developments of 1953 and 1954 thus far fits into the above framework very neatly. Of course what the Kremlin really wanted was a return to great-power conferences of the Yalta and Potsdam type. They hoped to use such meetings to slow down Western defense measures and to drive wedges among and within the non-Soviet countries. Refusal to hold them has been branded as a "reactionary" policy designed to keep up the arms race and the profits of capitalists. The Soviet press and diplomatic machines and the apparatus of international Communist-front organizations, particularly the World Peace Council, went into high gear to demand this type of conference. The Soviets had been demanding great-power conferences, and also a "pact of peace," of the United States, Great Britain, France, the U.S.S.R., and Communist China even long before the death of Stalin. What was new, and insidious, after Stalin's death was the scene shifting by which Moscow made it appear that a new era would dawn if only Washington would display an attitude of understanding and meet Moscow's desires for "relaxation of international tension" half way.

Space is lacking to discuss or even to list the numerous subsidiary measures undertaken by the Kremlin to create an impression conducive to the success of its new propaganda. Among those which should be mentioned are the reestablishment of diplomatic relations with Yugoslavia, the withdrawal of certain arbitrary and outrageous demands previously made by the Stalin regime upon Turkey, the granting of visas to the Soviet wives of several American citizens, and, probably most important and effective of all, enticing gestures and a few actions looking toward resumption of a more normal pattern of cultural relations between the Soviet Union and the United States. Malenkov even devoted a paragraph of his very important speech of August 8, 1953, to cultural relations. Characteristically, he reproached the United States for allegedly making it impossible for a Soviet chess team to come to this country and suggested that in this as in so many other fields, alleged American obstructionism was frustrating the positive and constructive efforts of the U.S.S.R.

U. S. WAR PLANS—PRE-STALIN AND POST-STALIN

But as has been suggested in connection with the "relaxation of tension" theme, the old problem of war and peace still underlay Soviet propaganda toward the United States. A much more extensive analysis than can be offered here would be necessary to compare the pre-Stalin and post-Stalin Soviet image of the "American threat" as Moscow sees it or pretends to see it, but it does seem clear that the post-Stalin attitude is, outwardly at least, one of greater security and less tension and urgency. A rough check is furnished by comparing Malenkov's speech of October 5, 1952, with his major address of August 8, 1953.⁷ By whatever method of qualitative or quantitative analysis one may care to employ, one finds that the theme of danger of conflict and of external aggression was noticeably muted in the 1953 as compared with the 1952 document. In this as in other data sampled, there is, as between the post and pre-Stalin periods, a sharp falling off of the most offensive and inflammatory symbols, such as "aggressor," "warmonger," "cannibal," "bloodsucker," so prominent in the vocabulary of Soviet foreign policy of the late Stalin period. By and large, one can say that while before the death of Stalin, as late as the Nineteenth Party Congress or even later, the United States was accused of plotting or even planning war against the Soviet Union, the major emphasis now is upon the alleged role of the United States as obstructing the settlement of outstanding international questions, such as the German problem, the position of China among the great powers, and the war in Indochina. But from time to time charges are still made that the "ruling circles" or the "reactionary forces" of the United States are planning a new war. A spate of such charges followed the Berlin Conference, not immediately, but in connection with emerging outlines of United States policy for the Geneva Conference, as interpreted in Moscow. Pravda for March 26, 1954, for example, violently attacked Secretary Dulles in one of its rare special front-page editorials.⁸ The editorial was entitled "Sowers of Fear and Inspirers of Military Hysteria." It attacked Mr. Dulles' statement of March 19 in the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and also his speech of January 12 at the Council on Foreign Relations. Among other things the editorial stated, "Dulles' statements are nothing more than attempts to inflame war hysteria in the United States, to satisfy the extreme aggressive circles of the U.S.A., who were dissatisfied by the results of the Berlin Conference. . . ." The "sowers of fear" theme was continued in an article on March 31, claiming that Mr. Dulles' "hysterical shrieks" had hurt the American government at home and abroad. They had not scared anyone, said Pravda, and to conceal this "defeat," the American "bourgeois" press had been silent about the Soviet reply. Such items, however, are relatively mild in comparison with the prevailing tone of Soviet international relations comments before the Nineteenth Party Congress.

⁷ See Pravda for October 6, 1952, and for August 9, 1953.

⁸ Ordinarily, the usual single front-page Soviet editorial is a "boiler plate" affair, but occasionally important special editorials are devoted to current developments.

Such attacks are one aspect of a two-pronged offensive. The other aspect is promises and maneuvers designed to prove to the peoples of the world, and also to wavering elite and governmental elements in Europe, that there is no longer any need for the division of the world into alliance systems and military blocs. The prime example of this tactic thus far has been Molotov's proposal that the Soviet Union be permitted to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

U. S. MILITARY POLICY

This sketch of the current Soviet image of the United States would be seriously incomplete if it failed to deal with American military policy as seen from Moscow. Throughout the whole post-Stalin period there has been a steady stream of denunciation of United States bases abroad. A characteristic statement was made by Marshal Bulganin in his May Day address last year when he said, "But because up to now there are no signs of the United States relaxing the arms race, or of curtailing the broad network of military bases which they have flung over the territories of many states in Europe and Asia, particularly in territories bordering on the Soviet Union, our government will in future devote the effort necessary to guaranteeing the defense and the security of our Motherland. . . ." Malenkov in his August 8, 1953, speech laid considerable stress upon the security of Soviet frontiers, particularly in the Middle East. More recently there have been sharp criticisms of American negotiations with Spain, Pakistan, and other countries regarding military bases.

Another important military theme is Soviet accusations that the United States is equipping, training, and supporting foreign troops. Particularly important is the campaign, so prominent in Molotov's statements at the recent Berlin Foreign Ministers' Conference, that the United States is seeking to create a new German Wehrmacht. During the fall and winter of 1953-54, the Soviet press abounded in carefully slanted news items regarding meetings of German war veterans, and similar items were published with respect to Austria. Another rather prominent theme which might be mentioned in this connection is that German industrial and military circles are planning a new Anschluss with Austria.

Not unnaturally, but in highly inflammatory and distorted forms, the Soviet statesmen and propaganda organs have continued to hammer away at the theme of "vigilance" against agents of the "imperialist" powers actually or potentially menacing the Soviet Union. There has been nothing like the hysterical ⁹ Pravda, May 2, 1953.

"vigilance campaign" of the months before Stalin's death, but the theme is kept alive by such events as the accusation leveled in late March 1954 against four members of the American Military Mission in the U.S.S.R. that they had committed espionage while traveling from Vladivostok to Moscow. It is possible that this was the Soviet countermove to the escape of the MGB (Ministry of State Security) agent Rastvorov in Japan, which may have been highly embarrassing to Moscow. From time to time, attacks are made on alleged United States plans for recruiting Soviet citizens for subversive work in the U.S.S.R., usually with reference to funds voted in the Mutual Security Act for assistance to refugees from Iron Curtain countries.

Attacks on aspects of what has been called the "liberation" policy reached their height for several weeks after the East German rebellion of June 16 and 17, 1953. The rebellion was a severe shock to the Kremlin and is probably connected in an important way with the fall of Beria. We cannot do justice to this important event here, but it should be emphasized that the Soviet reaction was both alarmed and devious. The Soviet propaganda of course attempted to play down the genuinely popular elements in the uprising. It was attributed to "Fascist hirelings." Among other things, the Soviet press charged that the "Berlin adventure" had been organized by the American "Intelligence Service." More recently Soviet leaders have charged that the United States was recruiting agents to subvert Soviet rule in the Ukraine.

U. S. ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL SYSTEMS

Even so brief a survey as this cannot omit Soviet discussion of American economic and political systems. The heart of Marxist-Leninist doctrine on international relations is the thesis that the foreign policy of "imperialism" flows inevitably from forces generated by the capitalist economy. There has been no relaxation of Leninist orthodoxy on this crucial point. The glimmering of a deviation from the archaic Leninist image of capitalist social relations contained in Eugene Varga's notable book, Changes in the Economy of Capitalism as a Result of the Second World War, did not survive the postwar ideological reconversion and, to the author's knowledge, there is nothing in the post-Stalin period to indicate any movement toward a more sophisticated and realistic outlook. Therefore it is not surprising that Pravda and other publications have presented the same old line regarding increasing impoverishment of the American workers and farmers, moral and cultural degeneration, and all of the other corollaries of the Leninist myth.

Similar orthodoxy has been displayed with respect to American domestic politics. Quite typical was an article by I. Philippov in Pravda for August 11, 1953. Philippov mildly criticized President Eisenhower for allegedly attempting to present the activity of the 83rd Congress "in the most favorable light." According to the Soviet journalist, the new Congress could not differ from the old one. Its policies had not changed because its class composition was the same. It consisted of lawyers, businessmen, journalists, rich farmers, and a few reactionary labor leaders. It had simply continued the Truman program. Thus the Soviet image of American domestic politics differs in no essential way from that which prevailed before the change of leadership in both the U.S.S.R. and the United States. Even the treatment of Senator McCarthy and people of like mind has not changed much. Relatively little attention has been paid to McCarthy. A mixture of slanted reporting and satire has been applied. There are also numerous quotations from American and Western European sources critical of McCarthy. Apparently, the Soviet press has attempted to treat "McCarthyism" not as in any sense an answer to Soviet policy or the problem of Communism but as a manifestation of pathological tendencies in the American social and political system.

Throughout the entire period under examination, Secretary of State Dulles has been overwhelmingly the major target of Soviet attack. He is often referred to as the "leader" or the "mouthpiece" of the "most aggressive American forces." In contrast, President Eisenhower is seldom attacked directly and even then relatively mildly.

ATOMIC AND HYDROGEN BOMBS

I have reserved for the last one of the most important features of the post-Stalin Soviet image of the United States. There have been rather startling new developments in the Soviet attitude toward atomic, hydrogen, and other "superweapons." The main feature of the new Soviet attitude is a much greater freedom of treatment, of course only by the regime itself in its monolithic press, of such matters as Soviet and American capabilities in these weapons. The new trend was probably inaugurated by Malenkov's statement in his speech of August 8 to the effect that the United States no longer had a monopoly of the hydrogen bomb. Malenkov, Molotov, and Bulganin made direct or "oblique" statements in mid-March 1954, "implying that Russia could reply in kind to any nuclear attack."¹⁰ These statements probably represent the increased feeling of strength and security of the Soviet regime in view of its progress since 1949, when President Truman announced the first Soviet atomic explosion. But the statements, and in particular the background of attribution of aggressive intentions to the United States against which they are made, represent a facet of the over-all Soviet manipulation for Kremlin political purposes of the distorted image of America. In particular, Moscow has seemed since Malenkov's speech last August to be attempting to turn against the United States alone fear aroused by the existence of weapons which, on the American side, were developed as a major element of protection against the potentialities of Soviet advantages in population, geographic position, and other factors.

¹⁰ Harry Schwartz in New York Times, March 18, 1954. Since March several additional and stronger statements on this question have been made in Moscow.

President Eisenhower's proposal at the United Nations General Assembly for a pool of fissionable materials to be contributed for peaceful purposes was not at first rejected, but was commented upon on the front pages of Soviet newspapers on December 22, two weeks after it was made. The comment, like the earlier Soviet reporting of the proposal, omitted the most significant of the President's revelations regarding the destructive powers of superweapons. It was evasive and revolved largely around the idea that such prohibitions on the use of weapons of mass destruction as the Geneva Protocol of 1924 on chemical and bacteriological weapons might produce "positive results." Such statements perhaps were intended to pave the way for the apparently final Soviet rejection of the President's plan early in May.

PRESENT SOVIET LINE SUMMARIZED

What does all this add up to? On the whole, Moscow's post-Stalin presentation of the image of the United States seems designed to create the impression that the world situation has changed and that a new Soviet Union without the dread figure of Stalin is prepared to be co-operative but that an inflexible and obstructive United States refuses to meet Moscow half way. In the meantime, Moscow has returned to the slogan of the "international solidarity of the workers of all countries."¹¹

One could sum up the Soviet line now as Soviet nationalism at home and, abroad, a paradoxical but not unsuccessful attempt to identify Moscow with nationalism and with revolution and internationalism wherever these forces can be used to weaken United States influence. A good deal will depend upon the comparative ability of Moscow and of Washington to effectively formulate and clearly project to the various world audiences images capable of establishing identifications and evoking responses.

¹¹ Slogan two of November 6 slogans in Pravda, October 25, 1953. This slogan, typifying the new emphasis on "proletarian internationalism," replaced its 1952 counterpart denouncing the "warmongers." Sergius Yakobson in his contribution to Language of Politics (New York, 1949) has shown how useful a study of these slogans can be in diagnosing the Kremlin's foreign-policy attitudes. The 1954 May Day slogan in first place, significantly, was "Raise higher the banner of proletarian internationalism."

Frederick C. Barghoorn, Ph.D., New Haven, Connecticut, is associate professor of political science at Yale University. He was press attaché at the American Embassy in Moscow from 1942 to 1947. He is the author of The Soviet Image of the United States (1950) and of articles in The American Slavic Review and other journals.

America and American Occupation in German Eyes

By NORBERT MUHLEN

GERMAN¹ opinion of America today, as reflected in and reinforced by its mass media, is ambivalent, insecure, full of misunderstandings and misgivings, and often contradictory. While this opinion is based on the varying and petrified impressions of the past century, a series of new observations and emotions was added by the close, often personal contacts of the past eight years, when Germans met Americans in their quickly changing roles of enemies, victors, rulers, educators, secret allies, and finally open allies—and, in addition, as individuals in and out of uniform. These age-old stereotypes and new impressions often received new emphasis from the acute situation confronting the Germans in the past five years: Should Germany join America in defense against the Soviet threat so close to her borders, or should she "go it alone" and remain neutral between the big powers? Dependent on this choice and the decision finally taken, the image of America as it developed was often merely a rationalization of the role desired for Germany in the future. Many Germans who tended to be neutral (for quite different reasons) often justified their attitude by developing an image of America as displeasing, if not as dangerous, as that of Soviet Russia. On the other hand, many Germans serious in their will to resist the Soviet threat and knowing that without American leadership it could not be resisted tried to like and understand America, and often discovered that its main values, purposes, and interests were similar to those of Germany herself.

GERMAN EMIGRANTS TO U. S.

For more than a century, America had been in German eyes a country far away and fabulous. Lacking the more direct relationships and experiences, antagonisms and sympathies, that brought England historically close to America, Germany imagined America as the land of noble savages and wide wilderness, a country without history and without despots. The letters from America which German emigrants wrote home in the nineteenth century, passed from hand to hand and printed in local newspapers, confirmed the benevolent picture of "a young, free country." Exactly because America enjoyed all the freedom that Germany lacked it became more fabulous and faraway than ever. On occasion, a German poet wrote an ode in praise of the distant country, but when the poet Nikolaus Lenau emigrated to America to be a free man on free soil, he soon returned in melancholy disappointment; freedom among the pioneers, he found, was shockingly different from the dream.

Toward the end of the century, America changed in German eyes into "the country of unlimited possibilities" and "the country of unlimited contradictions," as the two then most popular slogans put it. Still a fabulous land where people got rich quickly, America was often looked upon with some condescension, in a way far removed from the American stereotype and self-image of oppressed Europeans coming to its shores in search of freedom and a better life. Germans (like other West Europeans) saw these emigrants rather as adventurers, runaways, and ne'er-do-wells; the officer who had to quit the service for some dishonorable act, the boy who had got with child the family cook, the employee in a merchant's office who had embezzled a petty sum—these seemed to be the people who escaped to America, "the Promised Land of failures." The very fact of emigration appeared somewhat suspicious to Germans, who have a saying, "Stay at home and make an honest living." It was "the German urchin in America"—after the title of a runaway's autobiography which was very popular in Germany and helped to shape the image of America from the turn of the century to our day—who later returned as "the rich uncle from America." These Americans, and their country, were viewed with a mixture of respect for their money and disrespect for their past. As late as 1948 a "Primer on America for German Adults" explained ponderously that "the emigrant is for him [the American] not to be pitied or to be scorned [as he is for Germans] but to be revered."² Many Germans looked down from their solid superiority on these shady emigrants, whose boasts, in turn, helped to strengthen the stereotype of "materialistic America," where mammon was idolized and multimillionaires ruled supreme over a people of millionaires, millionaires-to-be, and derelicts.

"GOD'S OWN COUNTRY"

The next stereotype which received almost general currency among Germans was that Americans were convinced that the United States was "God's own country." In Germany this slogan became (and still is) as current a foreign word in talk of America as, more recently and more passingly, Herrenrasse ("the Master Race") in American usage for Germany. Ironically, both slogans became more popular abroad than at home. For America to consider itself as "God's own country" revealed an unbearably hypocritical chauvinism, Germans thought. This stereotype was intensified by disappointment in President Wilson, who, Germans felt, had betrayed Germany by offering the self-determinationist Fourteen Points as a peace program only to abandon them in the imperialist Versailles Peace Treaty. The legend of American hypocrisy that developed in contradiction to the historical facts of the case was accepted as reality by most Germans.

"AMERICANS ARE CRAZY"

A third stereotype of the American character, widely believed (in France, Italy, and recently England as well as in Germany) and seemingly rather hostile, is actually less hostile than the other two. Paradoxically, it is the notion that "Americans are crazy." What it stems from and what it reveals is that Europeans have come to find the thought and behavior patterns of the transatlantic "strangers" (meaning simply foreigners) so different from their own, so "strange" and "outlandish" indeed (in both words, the statement of facts has become a value judgment in modern English usage!) that Europeans could not understand them. To call Americans "crazy" supplied Europeans with a pleasant feeling of superiority, and at the same time relieved them of the task of attempted understanding. Yet the stereotype of "these crazy Americans" contained only a minimum of marked hostility; hostile people prefer to see specific sinister traits and purposes, if not a plot, rather than merely strangeness in what they cannot understand. There was little hostility as long and in so far as the Germans had no reason to be afraid of America. When the United States decided to intervene in World War I, most Germans considered it a rather hilarious joke.

¹ The material in this article is limited to West Germany, as the situation in East Germany differs so greatly that it would require a separate discussion. On East German opinion of America see Norbert Muhlen, "German Anti-Americanism, East and West Zones," Commentary, February 1953; also, The Return of Germany (Chicago, 1953), pp. 270-75.

² Margret Boveri, Amerikafibel für Erwachsene, Freiburg im Breisgau, 1948.

PLUTOCRATIC AMERICA

In Germany's Red Decade, the 1920's, when—as in America in the 1930's and early 1940's—much of the intellectual and cultural life of the country was influenced by Communists and their unwitting followers, the stereotype of America was further and deliberately made to appear unattractive. America, the bastion of capitalism, had then as now to supply the dark contrast to the glowing Great Experiment of the Soviet Union. From most German books and reports on America published at the time there again emerged the stereotype of a country dominated by the dollar, sadly lacking in civilization, backward in terms of culture, social progress, and human decency. The same picture was portrayed again by the Nazis, whose propaganda depicted the plutocratic, racially contaminated, brutal and greedy American. But in secret opposition to the Nazis, a small minority of intellectuals developed an underground cult of America and everything it had and did.

U. S. AS AN OCCUPATION POWER

After 1945, with America turning into an occupation power and a military government with relation to Germany, new images of America were born in German eyes, and old ones strengthened. They reflected—and frequently misinterpreted—the contradictions, uncertainties, vagaries, and intentions of American policies; often they also reflected German feelings of inferiority, insecurity, resentment, and guilt projected onto the powerful victor.

As conquerors

The Americans had come, in the words of their commander-in-chief, "as conquerors, not as liberators." These were the years when "fraternization," or, to be more exact, the expression of human politeness, kindness, and decency toward the defeated was unlawful for an American soldier; when a few Americans—well fed, often luxuriously well housed—announced that in their billets Germans and dogs were not admitted, and secretly bought precious family heirlooms from homeless, half-starved Germans for a carton of American cigarettes or a pound of American coffee; when an American general in charge of information control forbade the playing of music over a German radio station, to bring home to the Germans that there was no reason for them to enjoy life. During these years Germans whose fathers had been executed by Hitler's hangmen for participation in the plot to kill the dictator, Germans who themselves had suffered for years the agony of Nazi concentration camps because they resisted Hitler, young people who had been three years old when Hitler came to power and fifteen when he fell—all were told by occupation officials that to their conquerors all Germans were alike and they must bear the punishment for the crimes committed by the Nazis. To be tough with the Germans appeared as a soldierly and patriotic virtue to a number of Americans, and their toughness sometimes included, as the Germans observed, an infamous imitation of infamous Nazi methods. "The Americans are just as bad as the Nazis were," some Germans began to whisper among themselves in these first postwar years.³

³ This attitude was mainly and most articulately expressed in popular German fiction,

This analogy, more often wrong than right even in individual instances, and all wrong as a generalization, provided a release from uneasy consciences for many Germans who felt either guilty or helplessly ashamed of what the Nazis had done. It supplied a new facet to the German stereotype of America—the facet of American toughness and brutality, if not cruelty, strengthened by popular memories of "the Wild West" and "Chicago gangsters," and further strengthened by some American movies, crime books for adults (Mickey Spillane) and children (crime comics, and so forth), and the reports of crime and juvenile delinquency in the United States.

1947 to 1949

When from 1947 to 1949 the tough American policy of conquest was softened by a wavering, confused, half-hearted policy of co-operation, help, and reconstruction, the old stereotype of American hypocrisy was strengthened again, and combined with the new one of toughness. The Americans who before had played the role of conquistador now turned into an uneasy and implausible mixture of conquistador and social worker. While they ruled Germany by force of arms, they set out to educate her to democracy by force of argument. After first being "conquerors, not liberators," they now pretended and tried to be conquerors and liberators simultaneously. A pseudo-hermaphroditic figure, the Military Government suffered in peacetime from its double nature, the military one ruling by orders and requests and the democratic governmental one expressing the will of the constituents. In addition to being a purely military, security-conscious army organization, the Military Government remained the very opposite of democratic government, since it at first combined the executive, legislative, and judiciary functions without division of powers and later retained the supreme right to veto these functions when performed by the Germans.

INSTABILITY OF U. S. POLICY

What seemed so hypocritical to many Germans was the apparent contradiction between the realities and the appeals made by America. It was indeed difficult for them to understand—and to accept—the underlying reasons, partly changes in American politics, partly changes in world politics, and partly fundamental beliefs as well as passing fallacies prevalent in American thinking. In their minds, it was the idea and the conception of Military Government which stuck, even after 1949 when its name as well as its functions was changed into the inoffensive and tactfully restrained High Commission for Germany. In the period of High Commission rule beginning in 1949 the politics of conquest were quietly shelved and replaced by the politics of alliance, or at least of winning the Germans for an alliance. As the United States needed the active good will of the Germans, the conquerors suddenly became missionaries, teachers, propagandists.

This change, pleasant and profitable as it was for the Germans, did little to improve their stereotype of America. On the contrary, new unfavorable sidelights were added, and old negative stereotypes seemed confirmed. Were not Americans "crazy"—superficial, fickle, unprincipled, extremely naïve at best? Most of the principles which two years ago they had enthusiastically advocated and many of the principles which they had requested the Germans to accept especially the national best seller: Ernst von Salomon, Der Fragebogen ("The Questionnaire"), Hamburg, 1952; also, Hans Hellmut Kirst, Sagten Sie Gerechtigkeit, Captain? ("Did You Say Justice, Captain?"), Munich, 1952.

seemed forgotten overnight and replaced by opposites. Where, as late as 1947, the Americans had not permitted the Germans to publish anti-Communist books translated from the Russian, now they themselves encouraged their publication and distribution among Germans. In 1945, to get an American license to edit a newspaper, Berliners had had to prove they were friendly to Communism, and in Frankfurt and other cities Americans had insisted on the appointment of Communist editors on newspaper staffs; in 1948 the Americans fired the same Communists and demanded proof of anti-Communism from their licensees. It was the same in German officialdom and labor unions, in fact, almost everywhere. Since the Americans failed openly to admit and to explain their own reversal, the Germans concluded that "you can never know what the Americans are up to next." This stereotype seemed particularly valid when they compared American occupation speeches of 1946, proclaiming that no German should ever bear arms again, with American occupation speeches of 1951, scolding the Germans who never wanted to bear arms again.⁴

Many Germans, it is true, recognized that this seeming American instability and fickleness originated less with the Americans than with the Soviets. But they also saw that almost every American change in attitudes and policies toward Germany came about only in reply and as a reaction to a Soviet move; in German eyes, as a matter of fact, American policy in Germany seemed dictated by Soviet Russia. In the first stage, America made every concession to the Soviets that the Soviets requested; after 1946 America began taking defensive countermeasures against the Soviets and their aggressions; after 1948 America made concessions to the Germans in order to "contain" the Soviets. In other words, the Americans seemed never to have an independent political purpose of their own, and no insight into what they should do in Germany. To many Germans, Americans appeared as a people sadly lost on the international scene, unable to perform their part in foreign politics, lacking either the power or the experienced understanding—or perhaps both—needed for world leadership. The United States seemed to be pushed in this direction and that in a helpless defensive against the aggressive, power-hungry, politically shrewd Soviets, while it propagandized its ever changing political practices by preaching never changing eternal principles to the Germans in its program of education, or "re-education."

⁴ This "salto mortale" became the source of countless jokes, cartoons, skits, indicating an officially somewhat subdued, yet strong public reaction.

THE EDUCATION PROGRAM

Whether the education program did more to help or to hinder better understanding of America in Germany is open to dispute. A semantic misunderstanding based on deeper differences between the two cultures from the very beginning contributed greatly to making many Germans resent the program. "Education" in a literal translation, the term generally accepted in Germany for speaking of the education program, is Erziehung, which smacks of the three R's—the elementary schooling given to children, colonial peoples, and illiterates, with the use of the rod, while "education" in American usage means many things, including Bildung (for which there is no term in English). Many Germans agreed that political education, politische Bildung, was badly needed in their country, but that they should be erzogen—educated as well as trained—by their conquerors, seemed an arrogant attempt to treat them as illiterate children and to teach them with authoritarian sternness. Shades of "God's own country!"

Some phases of the education program seemed indeed to fit into this hostile stereotype. Some American "re-educators" resorted to the methods that had been used successfully at home to change "backward foreigners" into democratic citizens, americanizing the immigrants with evening classes, adult schools, and literacy and citizenship courses while their younger generation was kept from delinquency by playgrounds, boy scoutism, and similar things. By presenting the German adults with a deluge of free lectures, evening classes, free libraries, pamphlets, and so on, and establishing baseball teams and playgrounds for the German youth, these backward people were to be kept from crime and elevated to the level of American ways, or, as the much-abused magic word was, "democracy." While hordes of visiting lecturers, writers, impresarios of all sorts explained to the Germans the miraculously good, efficient, and beautiful thing called democracy, to Germans it soon seemed that Americans were suffering from an obsession endlessly to talk about that verbal fetish, democracy. Living in a country which was not democratic, in which there was little opportunity for the citizens to act as democrats, and where the very representatives of democracy ruled in an autocratic way—a system of government Germans called jokingly Demokratatur ("democratotorship," half democracy, half dictatorship)—their democratic education was bound to fail, if not to backfire. To some, it seemed to reveal again the hypocritical nature of the Americans, as well as their overly complacent arrogance. To others, democracy painted in such wonderful colors appeared as something very great and beautiful indeed—yet foreign to, and unobtainable for, Germans.

"There is a broad sense in which anything antitotalitarian is ipso facto democratic. In that sense, there is no difference between our negative and our affirmative program, and democracy is simply there once totalitarianism is done for. But in the common sense of the term, democracy is one of several types of polity incompatible with Hitlerism. . . . And since there were several possible antitheses to Hitlerism, it seemed to many Germans that it was for them rather than for us to choose between them. In point of fact, so it seemed to them, it was the negative part of our task [de-Nazification] that was the legitimate part; the affirmative [democratization] exceeded our mandate," William Ernest Hocking observed correctly.⁵ In fact, "antitheses" to totalitarianism such as a Catholic republic in Bavaria, with religious textbooks in schools as they were wanted and approved by the overwhelming part of the population, were denounced and fought as "antidemocratic" by American occupation officials before 1950 (when George N. Shuster became United States Land Commissioner and established an excellent administration).

Cultural offerings

In addition to political education in democracy, a vast program of nonpolitical offerings was presented by the occupation to create good will, understanding, love for America in Germany. The offerings of American singers, dancers, actors, American music, ballet, paintings, books, American lectures on American national parks, American wildlife, American photography, as they were showered over Germans, left the impression among many Germans that Americans, as is typical among the nouveaux riches, were throwing away their money boastfully to show off their newly acquired culture. That Americans were desperately eager to be admired and that they wasted their money to buy admiration seemed more conspicuous than the authentic great values of their civilization clumsily presented. To most open-minded Europeans, and to Germans in particular, the real greatness and achievement of America lay in the spirit and technique of its social structure. The architecture of American society appeared in the eyes of thoughtful Germans more admirable, more exemplary, than the architecture of American skyscrapers and mansions; American freedom in everyday life seemed to them a greater work of art than, say, American symphonies. Yet except for the few who had experienced it in America itself—in the very successful Exchange Program through which selected Germans are invited to visit the United States for several months under guidance of the Department of State or, ironically, as World War II prisoners of war—or those who had carefully studied it, this culture could hardly be shown convincingly at a distance—particularly not to people conditioned to be skeptical about such claims.

⁵ William Ernest Hocking, Experiment in Education: What Can We Learn from Teaching Germany? Chicago, 1954, the best analytical critique of the United States occupation in Germany, especially its educational phases.

In the first place, the Germans tended to be skeptical of all government propaganda in general since their recent experience with Hitlerism and their present one with the Soviets. In the second place, American government propaganda tended to be especially self-contradictory and therefore self-defeating; in this program, "the American way" of freedom, with its resistance to bureaucratic entanglements and state power, was advertised by the state on a noncompetitive, bureaucratic basis; and the immensely varied, many-faced, pluralistic American reality was distorted by the selection of this or that feature, this or that facet of America which seemingly was provided with an official stamp of government approval. In the third place, America's propagandistic self-introduction to Germans had by nature to lean heavily on the presentation of creative American works; yet many of these books, plays, and essays, in the best American tradition of national self-criticism (usually social criticism), taken out of their context and transplanted into alien surroundings, were accepted as accurate, typical descriptions of American life rather than one artist's or writer's voice of personal protest. They seemed to confirm all the anti-American, stereotyped prejudices held by many Germans—a tough, hypocritical, materialistic, arrogant, uncultured, dollar-ruled country. Self-criticism, as an experienced American official remarked sadly, cannot be exported, yet we have to export it unless we stop trying to familiarize the Germans with America at all.

Successes in intercultural education

Two periodicals published for German audiences under American government auspices—the Neue Zeitung, a daily newspaper combining the better features of American and German journalism (unfortunately published only for and in Berlin since 1953, when its West German circulation was suddenly stopped for reasons of economy), and Der Monat, a monthly magazine bringing international thought and life close to the Germans and generally respected as one of the leading European intellectual magazines today—succeeded in overcoming German resistance against understanding America; they greatly helped to establish a new, friendly relationship toward its culture. In this writer's opinion, only these two publications, in addition to the United States Exchange Program, can be considered genuine and important achievements in the vast American effort of intercultural education in Germany.

ROOT CAUSES OF RESENTMENT

What was often the root cause of the strong German resistance against American "re-education" and of the German acceptance of clichés and generalizations antagonistic to America was the underlying fear that America wanted to remodel the whole world, including and especially Germany, in its own image, with "God's own country" as the blueprint according to which all the other countries and cultures were to be shaped. Irrational as this fear was on the whole, or rather, as it became while occupation and its educators learned their lessons of realism, it contained an actual kernel of truth. In the definition of the United States Department of State following the report of a United States Educational Mission, published in 1947, "the task of changing the German mind . . . involves a total transformation of basic German beliefs, folkways and attitudes."⁶ Many American experts who came to Germany to advise the Germans that from now on there must be a total transformation of their beliefs, folkways, and attitudes (a thing impossible to achieve even had it been desirable, which it surely was not), that they should forget all their traditions and customs, took it for granted that things in Germany should be done the American way; only by this could the country be transformed into a democracy. I know of a visiting professor of journalism with all the credentials and backing of a Special Governmental Expert who decreed that German newspapers should be written, edited, and made up exactly like American newspapers. In another case, an Educational Adviser suggested that German university students should address their instructors by their first names rather than by the stuffy title of Herr Professor, to break down the authoritarian attitudes of youth! (In this context, we can disregard Communist officials, especially numerous in the Information Control and Decartelization Branches of Military Government in the first postwar years, from which they were removed by and large by 1950, who—under guise of "Americanization"—systematically sabotaged the healthy reconstruction of German organizations and institutions.) As late as 1951, a public controversy was resentfully conducted against the American attempt to change the German hunting and fishing regulations (considered "feudalistic") for the American pattern (considered "democratic" by United States officials), although it was evident that German and American regulations corresponded well to the very different conditions prevailing in the two countries.

A second root cause of the willing acceptance and development of anti-American stereotypes consisted in the resentment against the shift in power and prestige which suddenly seemed to elevate America far above and beyond the nations of Europe which liked to call themselves "the older nations." If this was a mood prevalent throughout Western Europe, in Germany it came into sharper focus since American domination was here a de jure and de facto situation, while America in its relations with other European nations went to some lengths to demonstrate diplomatic equality and sovereignty. With the national self-respect of Germany, which had been badly shattered after the war, slowly growing again, this mood of resentment was bound also to grow to some extent.

⁶ Department of State Publications, No. 2783 (August 1947), p. 62.

PERSONAL CONTACTS

If there were added many friendlier colors and more pleasant features to the picture of America in German eyes, they came in the main from personal contacts Germans had with Americans (as a substitute for contacts with America itself). Especially when they were able to speak the German language and were not completely alien to and uninterested in the ways of German life, as many Military Government and High Commission personnel were from the top levels down to minor employees, these Americans often contributed to a more balanced, better image of America. Chance contacts with, and observation of, a number of military occupation members had similar effects. After "fraternization" was fully permitted (which happened only in 1950, when uniformed personnel received permission to frequent German public places), "der Ami," the abbreviation which became usual for Amerikaner, the young man in an American uniform was conspicuous in German life and, quite naturally, judged by Germans as a representative product of America's people and civilization. The fact that most of these young men turned out to be kindly, generous, and often poor, without class consciousness, not behaving as overbearing victors, usually ready and willing to help, impressed many Germans favorably.⁷ Negro GI's, whom a prevailing positive German stereotype soon took to be more warmhearted, more humane, and less tough than their white comrades, were on the whole especially well liked.

⁷ On such incidents in detail cf. Norbert Muhlen in The New Leader, New York, February 4, 1950; The Reader's Digest (May 1950), pp. 95-98.

Those strongly prejudiced tend to see, of course, what they want to see, and for them it was not difficult to see quite a few Ami's—a small minority, yet more conspicuous than the more typical large majority—who misbehaved in almost every way conceivable, on occasion in quite serious matters. Yet seen against the background of the Soviet Union, its traits and its occupation, as many Germans saw the Ami's, the Americans in general, and America itself, were preferred by the majority. Their value judgments tended often to rationalize their personal choice.

PUBLIC OPINION STUDIES

"Which of the four occupation powers do you prefer?" the EMNID (Institut für Marktforschung und Meinungsforschung) Institute of Public Opinion in Bielefeld asked a representative sample of West Germans in the fall of 1951. While 12 per cent refused to give an answer, 1 per cent expressed preference for the Russians; 1 per cent for the French; 8 per cent for the British; and 33 per cent for the Americans. Almost one out of two questioned, or 45 per cent, said they did not prefer one power to the other. The latter group has, however, decreased since then to approximately 30 per cent, and almost 50 per cent now prefer the Americans.

In 1952, the Allensbach Institute for Demoscopy asked a stratified cross section of the German people (including refugees from East Germany) about their experiences with the Americans since 1945. Of this cross section, 36 per cent had seen little of the United States troops; 15 per cent had had pleasant experiences; 32 per cent had had unpleasant experiences; and 17 per cent very unpleasant experiences. While the British rated somewhat better and the French considerably worse in the same test, all three evoked incomparably better memories than the Soviet occupation. Only 5 per cent had seen little of them or had had pleasant experiences, while 24 per cent had had unpleasant—and 71 per cent very unpleasant—experiences.

In November 1953 EMNID conducted a very careful and thorough study of opinions and attitudes of Germans in the age groups between fifteen and twenty-four. To the question "Can we Germans learn something from other peoples?" 65 per cent answered in the affirmative; when this answer was followed up by the question "From which people can we learn most?" the answer given most frequently was: "From the U.S.A." Of the total youth sample, the United States was named by 23 per cent; England by 10 per cent; Switzerland, 7 per cent; France, 5 per cent; Sweden, 3 per cent; Russia and Holland, 1 per cent each. The subjects to be learned from America were, in frequency of mention as listed, its economic and social order, technological and scientific progress, tolerance, readiness to help, and habits of free living.⁸

SUMMARY

To sum up, "anti-Americanism" of the violent, obsessively prejudiced type is very rare in Germany, and usually to be found among the "lunatic fringe" of unreconstructed Nazis and Communists, comprising together less than 3 per cent of the total population.⁹ The number of passionate and unqualified pro-Americans seems hardly to be much bigger—mainly among intellectuals and very young people. Between these two extremes, on the wide and varying scale of images determined by individual, economic, social, educational, and political factors, it may be said that we find most frequently attitudes which tend to express feelings of cultural superiority, political and moral distrust, personal and national resentments toward what is supposed to be America—a picture that often conflicts with American realities, yet much more often than not accepts America as "the lesser evil" in comparison with Soviet Russia, and accepts it increasingly often as "a necessary evil" to support Germany in her defense against the Soviet evil.

⁸ EMNID-Institut für Meinungsforschung, Jugend zwischen 15 und 24; Eine Untersuchung zur Situation der deutschen Jugend im Bundesgebiet (Bielefeld, 1954), pp. 313-17.

⁹ L. L. Matthias, Die Entdeckung Amerikas Anno 1953 (Hamburg, 1953), a violently anti-American work, was successful neither with critics nor with the public, while Simone de Beauvoir, Amerika Tag und Nacht (Hamburg, 1952), and Robert Jungk, Die Zukunft hat schon begonnen (Stuttgart, 1952), more temperate and seemingly more balanced yet unfairly critical books on America, were very successful. On the other hand, none of the detached, nonstereotyped, and friendly travelogues from and reports on America by German authors published over the last years has been given attention by critical and public opinion.

Norbert Muhlen, Ph.D., New York City, reports from abroad for American and British magazines, and from the United States for German and French magazines, dividing his time about evenly between this country and Europe. After leaving his native Germany for political reasons in 1933, he lived in Switzerland, Saarland, and France before coming in 1941 to this country, of which he is now a citizen. He is author of The Return of Germany: A Tale of Two Countries (1953), Schacht, Hitler's Magician: The Life and Loans of Dr. Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht (1939), and other books.

Indian Students and the United States: Cross-cultural Images*

By RICHARD D. LAMBERT and MARVIN BRESSLER

THE emergence of India as a major world power, sympathetic but uncommitted to the West, has created a measure of self-conscious curiosity, sometimes anxiety, in many Americans concerning the reactions of Indian leadership and public opinion to the United States. It is inevitable that the image of the United States conveyed to the Indian public should be somewhat selective and distorted, inasmuch as the Indian media of mass communication concern themselves largely with American foreign policy and neglect broader sociocultural aspects of the American scene. Such information on the United States as is exported characteristically fails to provide a substantial corrective—neither the superficial frivolities emanating from Hollywood nor the excessively grim realities of the protest novel are capable of transmitting a representative picture of the United States.

The nature of this picture formed at a distance is illustrated by the preconceptions entertained by Indian students upon arrival in the United States—a stereotypical, indistinct, and limited image composed of uncorrelated fragments. They had anticipated that the United States would be a land endowed with abundant natural resources and wealth, whose inhabitants worked feverishly and constantly to command a whole host of mechanized wonders, whose cities were dominated by skyscrapers, whose ethos was scientific and rationalistic to the neglect of the spiritual, whose social relations were marked by casualness, rudeness, and violence, frequently institutionalized in the person of the gangster, whose social system was equalitarian except for discriminatory practices directed against colored peoples; and whose labor force contained a disproportionate number of cowboys. The students were aware that some of these images were oversimplified, bordering on caricature, but in essence these grotesqueries constituted almost the whole of their expectations.

One expression of official concern with this naïve and unflattering stereotype takes the form of encouraging Indian students to attend American institutions of higher learning with the expectation that these foreign visitors, having observed the "American way of life," will return to their home country prepared to convey a more favorable image of the United States. The exchange-of-persons program reflects a basic confidence in the capacity of American institutions to arouse admiration: there seems to be some assumption that the sustained and intimate scrutiny implied in the process of guided culture contact will foster accurate perceptions which confirm the excellence of American institutions and thereby create the basis for favorable attitudes to the United States.

The actual mechanism of image formation and the development of favorable attitudes toward the United States appear to be considerably more complex. It is quite obvious that at the very minimum the student's personality, life history, preconceptions, experiences en route and in the United States, and anticipation of return all contribute to the content of his perceptions and to a generally favorable or unfavorable appraisal of the United States. However, our data indicate that the primary determinant of image formation involves a process by which American institutional areas are perceived and interpreted in the context of their relevance to Indian culture, history, and aspirations. This mechanism of cultural reference is operative among all students and is applicable to all institutional areas over all points of time, whether or not images of American life are derived from the media of mass communication or from direct observation. Other personality and behavior dimensions not specific to the Indian culture usually assumed their chief significance as superimpositions on this basic process. The emphasis of this article, therefore, is upon cross-cultural links; how the "Indianness" of the student affects his image of the United States.

We have chosen three important areas of American life¹ illustrating three different types of cultural reference which the Indian student brings to bear on his American experiences: family practices, political behavior, and race relations.

The Indian student's perception of American family practices indicates the operation of two basically antithetical frames of reference among Indian intellectuals: the traditional family of India's ideal culture and the Western liberal-humanitarian ethic with its strong emphasis on the emancipation of women and suppression of status inequalities. Political behavior is perceived and measured by the extent to which a given political philosophy implicitly suggests sympathetic kinship to doctrines justifying India's struggle for freedom and her current political policy. The perception of American race relations not only occurs within a context of historically rooted racial grievances, but also includes strong individual involvement arising out of fear of personal discrimination and status deprivation. This image is accordingly much more complex, personality oriented, and subject to gross distortions of perceptions.

¹ The images of American educational practices will be treated fully in a forthcoming article by the authors in the Journal of Higher Education.

It should be emphasized that an overall orientation to a foreign culture is more than a simple summation of discrete images. The concluding section will be devoted to a brief discussion of an additional set of processes resulting from the students' confrontation with Americans' image of India, and the way in which these processes influence his over-all assessment of America.

THE FAMILY

The comments of the Indian student about the American family system tended to cluster around three areas: (1) the family's restricted function and interaction; (2) the role and status of its various members; and (3) family emphasis upon the gratification of personality needs rather than societal ends, with a resulting general orientation of capriciousness and frivolity in family institutional practices.

Restricted function and interaction

The Indian joint family is a unit comprising several degrees of kinship and several generations organized communally and usually living in the same household. It is an economic unit, a graduated status system with clearly defined roles, a vehicle for ritual and the observance of religious practices, a common commensal unit, a dormitory arrangement, and a sphere of relationships within which primary psychological needs are met.

*This project is part of a program sponsored by the Committee on Cross-Cultural Education of the Social Science Research Council and supported by grants to the Council from the Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation, and the Rockefeller Foundation.

Family roles are hierarchically stable, clearly defined, and reciprocal duties and obligations take precedence over individual motives. The effect of any act on other members of the family may be anticipated and therefore conflicts can be kept to a minimum. To be sure, intrafamily clashes do occur, but many of these are institutionalized, culturally acceptable, and thus do not constitute a serious disruptive force. For instance, quarrels between the sisters-in-law and between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law are a culturally required part of joint family living, even though the outcome is predictable and the victors never vary. These and other sporadic conflicts can be resolved by a final arbiter, the patriarchal figure. The individual spends his life in some joint family. If for any reason a joint family splinters it breaks into segments, but seldom involves the departure of isolated individuals. The occasional mobile member, not essential to the family welfare at the moment, can leave to pursue his own ends, but the price of his freedom is a willingness to return in the event of family need.

The joint family so described was widely admired among the Indian students for ensuring stability and performing most of the functions necessary to individual members, and for providing a satisfactory, conflict-free psychological setting. The admiration persisted in spite of the fact that none of the students identified his own family as fulfilling all the requirements of the ideal type.

In contrast to the satisfying and benevolent despotism of the joint family the Indian students perceived in America a loosely knit structure providing for limited interactions and restricted functions. The simple quantitative fact of a three-, four-, or five-person household limited to two generations provides a striking contrast to the emphasis on the intimate relationships among the members of the joint family. While several commented that the complexity inherent in large numbers is reduced in the American small family, the net effect is diminution of the responsibility, warmth, and serenity associated with the orderly relationship of the extended group. From the standpoint of the Indian student, there is ample evidence of the lesser importance of the home in American life. For example, lack of elaborate family ritual at meal time, restrained rather than demonstrative greetings at family reunions, the brittle casualness of the chic middle-class mother in dealing with her children, ready divorce, serial monogamy, and the increasing vogue of the psychiatric couch and the marriage clinic.

Role and status

The Indian student is not likely to become sufficiently intimate with any one American family to observe the subtle interplay of "real" family relationships. Few American families can resist the temptation to display the "typical American family at home," a dramatization which frequently results in an exaggerated caricature of the official norms. Consequently, the perceptions of Indian students tend to be influenced by consistently overplayed family roles. The specific roles which impress themselves most upon Indian students are the role of women and the role of the aged—those most markedly different from the Indian pattern. The traditional literature, current folklore, songs, and moving pictures depict a vast number of heroines who embody an ideal role for women which is widely accepted by all segments of Indian society. She is to be docile, patient, submissive, a paragon of housewifely virtues, but at the same time full of charm, a companion, and wise in the ways of beauty. Above all, she should be modest and show continued awareness of the double standard by observing rituals of inferior status, and by exhibiting proper embarrassment and constraint in interactions with men. While in actual practice, of course, woman's role is considerably more complex and ambivalent, nevertheless this ideal image served as one standard by which all women, and consequently American women, could be judged.

In addition, the Western liberal-humanitarian system of values which is opposed to all immutable status distinctions, including those pertaining to women, has been internalized to a varying extent by all of the Indian students. In general the inferior role assigned to women jars against the Western ideals of equality of individuals and greater emphasis on achieved rather than ascribed status. Indians apply the emancipation ethics fully to certain isolated women—brilliant women in the professions, arts, and politics—and favor such lesser commitments to emancipation as disapproval of "cruelties to women" such as suttee, prohibition of remarriage, complete dependence upon males.

In view of these contradictory philosophies—the Indian ideal woman and the Western emancipation ethic—the student sometimes finds himself in favor of the role-status structure of the American family when he perceives it in equalitarian terms, but opposed to the same characteristics when he views them in the context of the ideal role assigned to Indian women. However, American family life is presumably characterized by so much of this allegiance to the humanitarian individualistic ethic that it excludes cherished values still present in the Indian social framework and still held by our subjects. It would be possible to marshal an impressive array of quotations to illustrate this feeling among the students, but the following passage will suffice to show the attempt to reconcile the contradictory philosophies.

I might say something regarding the social life of the people, absolute equality among the two sexes and how the women also help the family by supplementing the income, how these ladies are also educated, they can talk on public affairs. . . .

I mean it has its advantages to some extent, I thought, that the woman is independent and she can look after herself. If she has some work or something important and if the husband is not at home or nobody is at home, she could do it herself. Now in our society she wouldn't know what to do because she wouldn't have been taught.

I should say, the freedom you allow your women, I was very much struck by it. I should say that in my experience it is more than what the woman deserves. Women we consider to be something delicate and feminine. She must distinguish herself in dress, manners, and everything, which is not the case here. She wears blue jeans and walks like a tractor truck. In that case I can't appreciate the femininity of women.

Old people

There were considerably fewer data indicating contradictory feelings concerning the role of the aged in the American family. All Indian students who had occasion to speak to this subject disapprovingly noted the comparatively inferior status of old people. As they recalled India, it seemed to them that:

. . . there is greater affection and love between father and son, because there they regard that it is the sacred duty of the father to look after his son during his infancy and it is the sacred duty of the son to look after their older parents.

By contrast:

Here we find that people have greater individuality, and they will not like the fathers or grandfathers to live with them because that interferes with the development of individual personality.

There was very little disposition to dismiss this particular status pattern as one of those inevitable cultural differences which are likely to distinguish one nation from another. Characteristically, the student felt obliged to determine the causes of the relegation of the aged to an inferior status—it was seldom mentioned without accompanying analysis. Those students who were troubled by this question, but whose tact or approval of the United States forbade wholesale condemnation, struggled to explain it by appealing to the authority of some larger, more acceptable value, such as individual responsibility. More commonly, so fundamental a violation of what they consider to be a basic and universal ethical imperative implied deeper revelations about the spiritual basis of the entire social structure. The lack of respect for age sometimes confirmed latent suspicions that the student was observing a culture which was devoid of real ethical principles and which was dominated by a complete and all-embracing utilitarian complex.

Self-gratification and capriciousness

The supremacy of group values as a governing principle in Indian family life leads the Indian students to consider American emphasis on individual gratification and sexual compatibility to be misguided. They perceive in the American institutional pattern an acceptance of hedonistic pursuits unrestrained by the "higher ideals" which alone are capable of ennobling the marriage relationship.

Critical statements included not only disparagement of American family values but also the paradoxical assertion that even individual happiness is not so well achieved as by the Indian model, whose social arrangements provide personal satisfactions only as a peripheral by-product. So even though in India the marriage takes place before you are independent enough to think of selecting your own partner . . . I think I am very happy, and these marriages are generally happier than the marriages which are by choice of the partner.

Closely related to the contention that there were defects both in the dominant value system and in the familial institutional structure is a less clearly defined, but apparently intense feeling that Americans as individuals have a common failing; namely, they lack the proper high moral seriousness in their approach to family life. The Indian students discerned an element of light-headed frivolity and capriciousness in courtship and family behavior. This view was sometimes expressed in the sternest moralistic terms as in "embracing and kissing and these things I take to be just the road for going into debauchery or the lack of morals." At other times it was contained in the assertion that the slightest irritation or weariness was apt to be accompanied by divorce in contrast with the Hindu practice where, in the higher castes, divorce is forbidden, and where in fact it is largely unnecessary, "because the girl who marries a boy is very much faithful to the boy . . . she is always so much devoted to the husband and the husband to the wife." On still other occasions this feeling is implied in the discovery of such terms as "boy friend," which is not as one might expect, "that one whom she would actually marry, but she would at any time drop him too . . . if she comes across a better or someone whom she likes later much more, she would drop." Or to summarize the complex more explicitly, "I mean, to me it is not bad at all to go with a girl, but the only thing is that I think to go you must be serious. It shouldn't be just one of those things."

The impression should not be conveyed that the Indian students perceive American family life as entirely uniform or that their reactions were wholly unfavorable. The "what were your first impressions" or "what struck you most" type of question which is inevitably present even in the most nondirective interviews tends to bias responses toward generalizations emphasizing perceived differences rather than toward those elements mutually present and approved in both cultures. The interviews indicate that the students are sometimes aware that although there may be customary patterns and practices which tend to distinguish the entire social structure, various social strata and groups in the United States exhibit pronounced differentials in their behavior. Thus there were some comments on the greater simplicity, refinement, and spirituality of family life in religious homes, especially among the Society of Friends. There was also some recognition of rural-urban and regional differences. Nevertheless, the differences were perceived as minor variations on a common pattern, and it was the common pattern which figured in comparisons with India.

POLITICAL BACKGROUND

Indian students are much more attentive to politics than are their American counterparts. The political intricacies of a long nationalist struggle made complex political ideas and parliamentary practices commonplace knowledge among Indians. The visiting students are thoroughly conversant with detailed political histories of a vast number of Indian political figures and recall as part of their shared experience years of highly emotional political involvement. The Indian student's image of American political processes is best understood against the background of the nationalist movements which have engaged the energies of Indians and other Asian peoples throughout this century. The logic which underlies nationalist movements demands that the aspirations of the struggle include more than the mere transfer of power and authority from a set of foreign functionaries to their native counterparts. Slogans of liberation included more than opposition to "imperialism" and "foreign oppressors." They also promised that with liberation would come redress of domestic inequities and grievances. Consequently the Indian intellectual tended to be identified both in foreign and domestic affairs with intense humanitarian sympathy. Except for the special interest groups such as the landlords and princes, there is now virtually no vocal conservative group in matters economic and political. Conservatism in India takes the form of urging the return to a pristine religious state. There is no significant segment among the Indian intelligentsia which feels the need to resolve the conflict between individual liberties and governmental planning implied in the term "creeping socialism." Among those who are politically effective the extreme rightist position is somewhat left of center in the normal liberal-conservative continuum.

It follows that as members of the intellectual class at home the Indian students in the United States tend to respond sympathetically to political movements which seem to be dedicated to the interests of the "masses" and the "common man." They perceive in terms of a symbolic vocabulary which makes generous use of slogans carrying strong emotional connotations in India. Their general approach is often supported by detailed knowledge. Nevertheless, the students are judging American political processes in terms of an abstract liberal ethic which is concrete and relevant in its reference to India, where political necessity at this stage of development demands emphasis upon nation building, uplift of the masses, social planning, and an educated electorate. It is in this context that the liberal-humanitarian standard applied to American political life should be understood.

AMERICAN POLITICS: WHAT THE STUDENTS SAID

The images described in the following sections are brief composite summaries of common sentiments revealed in student responses. Those sections outside of the quotation marks are paraphrases of statements in the interviews; those within quotes are the actual words of the students.

Interest groups

Ideally the democratic process should give every individual equal access to power—the greater the diffusion of power in a society the more nearly does it approach the democratic model. The United States deviates considerably from this ideal because there is “control by a party, rather than an individual—and when it comes to elections you have to please every boss. It is not exactly on principles.” The existence of lobbies accentuates the concentration of power because legislative bodies are sensitive to the wishes of small groups which do not represent the wishes of the people as a whole. The small groups with the greatest influence are likely to be “financially strong interests” because they “can organize themselves better.”

The one restraining influence on irresponsibly wielded power is the recognition on the part of the bosses and lobbyists that ultimate veto power resides in the people, whose dormant disaffections may occasionally be translated into effective political protests against the more cynical practices. This consideration requires a continuous assessment of the limits of public patience and some concessions to the popular will. However, such restraint should not obscure the fact that the American political structure is characterized by dominant power groups whose existence “is not consonant with the spirit of democracy.”

Mass communications in politics

On the whole the American people are reasonably well informed on current affairs because they have ready access to information media such as the press, radio, and television. On the other hand, news is presented in a provincial and superficial manner, overemphasizing trivia and matters of local interest. Moreover, the media of mass-communication are concentrated in the hands of the “wealthy section,” who control public opinion for the benefit of right-wing political elements. As a result the universal literacy of Americans is not always a guarantee of a high level of information or of a considerable degree of political sophistication. The American is especially untutored in foreign affairs, and his ignorance of India is “no less than colossal.”

Political parties

It is frequently difficult to discern the differences “between the so-called Democrats and the so-called Republicans.” They do not disagree on fundamentals, and there are men in each party who seem ideologically more appropriate to the other. However, the Democrats more nearly “symbolize the close identity with the great mass of people, with the laboring class, with the farmers, with the Negroes . . . it symbolizes more a party for the common man than the Republican party.” Likewise in the sphere of foreign policy the party of Roosevelt and Truman can be expected to be more ungrudgingly internationalist in outlook than the Republicans. The Republican party by contrast tends to be dominated by the wealthy and the powerful, who have an excessive allegiance to anachronistic conceptions of laissez-faire capitalism. If they pursued their own inclinations, they would transform government into a subsidiary of “big business.” The selection of candidates in the presidential election of 1952 was indicative of Republican-Democratic party orientations. It is unfortunate for the United States that Mr. Stevenson did not become the President, for his administration would have been more humanitarian and more germane to twentieth-century realities than Mr. Eisenhower’s.

Political atmosphere of the United States

The predominant fact of current American political life is an excessive fear of Communism.

I mean, the fear of Communism, it is a sort of craze . . . I mean sort of hysteria in this country, and actually, as a matter of fact, I didn’t think that this American society is being threatened by Communism. Communism can never ruin this society. I mean for many years to come.

Obsessive anti-Communism has unfortunate social consequences because in its name even gradualistic social changes are assailed. While the implementation of welfare measures under government aegis may depart from traditional capitalist practice, “a certain degree of socialism is healthy,” or at least inevitable. However, capitalism as it exists in the United States modified by the New Deal philosophy is basically healthy and has produced “economic wonders.” American capitalism is by no means decadent nor has it reached “maturity.” In view of the essential soundness of the American socioeconomic structure there are no compelling domestic reasons to justify the prevalent anti-Communist preoccupation in the United States.

In foreign affairs there should be no fear of direct Communist military aggression against the United States. Moreover, Communism is making fewer inroads in other nations than Americans suppose. In India, only a very small percentage of the population is cordial to Soviet doctrine. Hence the existence of “anti-Communist hysteria” may best be interpreted as an opportunistic attempt to find a scapegoat, “something like Hitler or Pakistan,” and as a capitulation to the most irresponsible elements in American politics.

The chief victims of the current political climate are “liberals.” When even General Marshall is publicly maligned it is obvious that less influential men will be reluctant to engage in free discussion of controversial social issues. Militant anti-Communism constitutes as great a threat to democracy as do the few adherents of the Communist party.

I oppose Communism because it represents fear, curtailment of political freedom, and so on. I cannot see any difference between McCarthyism and Communism in this respect. It is, however, encouraging to see that some of the greatest intellectuals and biggest newspapers are rallying against McCarthy.

NEGROES IN AMERICA

The area of white-Negro relations tends to elicit images which once again seem to lie within the anticipated and familiar context of the liberal-humanitarian orientation. However, this element of the liberal syndrome differs from other expressions of humanitarian good will and outrage in the degree of intensity with which it is held, in the extent of the personal involvement which it entails, and the fullness of the preconceptions about this area prior to the arrival of the students in the United States.

Most Indian students were not conspicuously well read on American life upon arrival, yet a surprising number of them were conversant with Myrdal's multivolumed American Dilemma, were shocked by its contents, and sympathetic to its thesis. Several revealed detailed knowledge of the legal niceties connected with the approaching Supreme Court ruling on educational segregation in the South, while one or two knew of isolated cases of racial violence in several small American communities.

Personal experiences of discrimination

Much of the intensity of interest and feeling concerning the role of the Negro in the United States is in part a result of the latent and sometimes overt color tension which lay beneath the surface of British-Indian relations prior to Indian independence and which still exists between Western and Asian nations. A more immediate explanation lies in the fact that of all the values incorporated in the American social structure the existence of discriminatory practices based on color was most capable of jeopardizing the status of the Indian students during their stay in the United States. Color was a potential disqualifying factor in the acquisition of desirable housing arrangements, in comfortable tourist mobility, and the accessibility of desired social contacts.

There were in point of fact a number of instances in which students experienced situations in which they reported personal inconvenience and embarrassment. One student was advised by a friend not to visit a New York night club because he might not be served. Another was served with a separate set of utensils at a restaurant. Still another sensed that he was giving offense when he "danced with a white girl." Such incidents did not occur frequently but they were constant reminders of the possibility of recurrent humiliations.

It is not surprising that certain individuals departed from an otherwise balanced approach to America to display a color sensitivity and a distortion of experience almost pathological in nature. To cite one of many examples: a student who was not selected to accompany a tour to Hyde Park sponsored by his orientation center gave this account of the incident:

There was a competition between a number of candidates for going to Hyde Park and there was a limited number of tickets. I went to the place from which we were to leave for Hyde Park right on time, I think before the time, but I was not selected for being taken. I don't know what criterion was adopted and, rightly or wrongly, it led me to the feeling that it might have been prejudice against the colored people since they are not taking me and they are taking people from other lands.

However, the greater number of the Indian students never experienced any manifestations of real or fancied discrimination because much of their time was spent in the company of fellow nationals, American students, and Americans especially sympathetic to foreign students. This circumstance may contribute to the fact that for the most part the Indian students' perception of race relations in the United States lacks anecdotal substance and is generally vague and symbolic. The students are seldom indignant about general economic deprivation, poor housing, and dirty neighborhoods; they reserve their most bitter remarks for "the white man's complex," "social discrimination," "white chauvinism"—all presumably artificial barriers to social intercourse unworthy of the American creed.

Race and caste

One may suspect that the existence of the alleged "white superiority complex" provides some sense of gratification for the Indian students. The recognition of what seemed to them an indisputable vulnerability in the American ethic seemed to mitigate criticisms of practices in India. If American treatment of the Negro is so conspicuously poor then it must follow that India, faced with problems of greater proportions, should not be condemned for her failure to solve them.

Negroes follow your dress. They follow your manner. I mean they are not much different. They may be inferior mentally in some cases, but they are not given an equal chance. So I said naturally you must take less time to wipe off the differences; whereas we must take relatively more time to do away with the caste system. But we are progressing better than you have progressed.

Whatever the merits of this line of reasoning it appears clear that from the perspective of the Indian student an America which countenances differential treatment of the Negro must forfeit much of its claim to the moral superiority which should characterize the most powerful leader of the democratic West.

THE SENSITIVE AREA COMPLEX

It is difficult to determine the extent to which perceptions of major but segmental aspects of American life contribute to the development of an overall "favorable" or "unfavorable" attitude toward the United States. Elsewhere² we have advanced the thesis that visitors from low-status countries develop their attitudes towards the United States not so much on the basis of their reactions to American life, but rather as an end product of a "looking-glass" process based on their perception of the American image of their home countries. The process of temporary international migration characteristically impels the visitor to reappraise his own culture appreciatively and is usually marked by a heightened identification with his own country and an increased sensitivity to its status. Very early in his visit the Indian student perceives an American image of India which contains elements appearing to him to imply low status for his home country and by extension for him. Americans, in talking with him about India, allude to certain specific subjects (such as caste, untouchables, population expansion) which are associated with colonial status and reactive nationalism and thus have become "sensitive." The mere mention of these subjects even in a neutral or favorable context will cause the visitor to feel that Americans are hostile to India, a condition which will in turn predispose him to a general negative view of the United States.

If confirmed by subsequent research, the implication of this thesis is that so long as Indian students and visitors from other "low-status" countries correctly or incorrectly perceive that Americans hold an unfavorable image of their home countries even extravagantly favorable assessments of American life will be largely irrelevant to the formation of "friendly" attitudes toward the United States. Therefore, our foreign policy and public pronouncements with respect to countries recently emerged from colonial status must carefully avoid these emotion-laden areas of cultural conflict.

² Richard D. Lambert and Marvin Bressler, "The Sensitive Area Complex: A Contribution to the Theory of Guided Culture Contact," The American Journal of Sociology, Fall, 1954.

For amity, contact is not enough, especially if protracted contact serves only to accumulate a series of assaults on the self-esteem of nationals of low-status countries. Among other things, friendliness is a function of both personal and cultural security, and only after the viewer has a minimal feeling of security can the hostile elements of an image surrender to a more objective assessment.

Richard D. Lambert, Ph.D., Philadelphia, is assistant professor of the sociology of India and Pakistan at the University of Pennsylvania, where he has taught since 1947. Since 1951 he has held a position jointly in the South Asia Regional Studies and the Sociology Departments. As a fellow of the Social Science Research Council during 1949-50 he conducted a survey of the causes of Hindu-Muslim riots in India and Pakistan, and he has been adviser to Indian students for several years. He is assistant editor of THE ANNALS.

Marvin Bressler, Ph.D., Philadelphia, is assistant professor of sociology at the University of Pennsylvania, where he has taught since 1948. As a fellow of the Social Science Research Council in 1950 he completed an analysis and reconstruction of W. I. Thomas' unfinished study of Birtil Brief. In 1952 he served in various capacities with the Institute of Urban Studies. At present he is director of a project in the sociology of the nursing profession, conducted under a grant of the American Nursing Association.

Images of the United States and Britain Held by Foreign-educated Indians

By RUTH HILL USEEM and JOHN USEEM

THIS account concerns the way a sample of Indians educated in the United States and the United Kingdom appraise American and British character and assess certain aspects of American and British life. It also includes the consequences of these attitudes for the foreign-educated Indians and for the immediate social world in which they live.¹

Our information is based on the life histories of a sample of Western-educated Indians who reside in the small towns and cities of Bombay State, located in the central-western section of India. The cases include persons who were trained in the West both before and after India attained its independence (1947). The majority are currently employed in colleges and universities, the government, business and industry; a few are unemployed; and the rest are engaged full time in political affairs, as editors of newspapers, and in the social services. They stem from a variety of social classes and subcastes; most rank now as members of the middle classes in their communities.

By comparing the attitudes toward the two nations, we can discern which of the images held are common to Western countries and which are confined in particular to the United States and to the United Kingdom.

When a person looks at another society, certain factors bias what he observes. He usually makes comparisons with the individuals and patterns known to him in his own society, for the only standards he has for interpreting what he views abroad are those of his own social world. What he notices are more likely to be the contrasts than the similarities between the foreign country and his homeland. Furthermore, the social functions of human behavior within institutions may be missed and the discrete forms used as a basis for interpretation, and from fragments of the whole a model of social life imputed.

SOCIAL STRENGTHS OF THE WEST

Seen through Indian eyes, the most visible sphere of foreign life is the behavior of people in "public" situations.

To understand what they see and how they interpret it, it is necessary to give some background on "public" relations in India. Social interaction in India, outside of the family and community, tends to occur in a kind of "no man's land." It is an area of social life in which not only do contacts take place with "outsiders" who do not "count" because they are strangers, but also the contacts are with persons of whom one should be wary. The climate of opinion is analagous to that of the passengers on a New York subway. To some extent the traditional provincialism is disappearing among the middle classes in towns and cities where outsiders are in continuous juxtaposition.

The system has protective functions, for it provides security against masses of people whose identities are unknown and whose motives for establishing a personal contact in a casual meeting may be suspect. Relatives are trustworthy or, if not trustworthy, they can, at least, be held accountable for their acts; others are neither predictable nor can they always be held responsible for what they do. It is best to be cautious.

¹ This material is drawn from a larger study sponsored by the Edward W. Hazen Foundation, cosponsored by the Area Research Center, Michigan State College, and to be published by the Dryden Press.

The close and heavy personal involvement with kin restricts the depth of self-involvement not only with strangers, but also with others in work relationships. On the job it is somewhat foolhardy to put too much faith in others—superiors, peers, inferiors—with whom one has no kin or communal ties. There may be only a modicum of reward for craftsmanship and extra effort, for it is commonly believed that opportunities to advance go to favored relatives rather than to the most competent, or are dispensed on the basis of seniority rather than ability. Some think that superiors grab all the credit for whatever is done by an inferior, that fellow workers have to be watched lest they manipulate to their own advantage, and that subordinates will deceive or shrug off responsibilities.

In the wider society, middle-class life moves at a less intense, frenetic pace than in the West. There are ups and downs in the pace, but the average individual neither is pushed quite so hard to get things done nor is as overcommitted as the middle classes of the America we know.

Attractive aspects of public behavior

To the foreign returned, the dissimilarity between foreign public life and their own way of life is conspicuous. Certain aspects seem attractive; a majority from the United Kingdom look with favor on four attributes of British character. The Indian designations for these are "personal integrity," "self-discipline," "reserved but helpful," and "thorough in whatever they do." They are applied to the manner in which the individual Englishman acts in nonfamily relationships—with strange Englishmen as well as with foreigners—on the job, in civic groups, and in public places where each man is anonymous and so thought to be free from "normal" social controls. Phrases used to portray integrity are: "solid," "reliable," "steadfast," "fair," and "people you can count on." Self-discipline appears impressive as "control over one's emotions," "strength of purpose," and "perseverance"; it is doubly so as to respect for the opinions and rights of others—including the right to privacy. On first contact, at the surface, the Britisher seems entirely formal, taciturn, if not cold, but when the ice is broken there emerges from beneath the surface layer a self that is called "goodhearted" and "hospitable." The foreign returned have much to say about the earnestness with which individuals go about their work and daily life (trying to get the most out of it), their methodical orderly nature, and the durability of the things they make.

The top four American qualities which are approved by the foreign trained overlap to a degree with the British characterization, yet they carry dissimilar referents in their concrete forms of behavior. Americans are known as individuals who are "friendly," "equalitarian," "generous," and "energetic." In any social situation, it is commonly said, the American is easy to meet, easy to mix with, and easy to get along with—the American is characterized as being pleasingly personable and informal, having a sense of humor, and enjoying life. "Everyone tried to make us feel at home." "They talk freely with anyone." "Americans at once see you as a person—I was received with open arms everywhere."

The equalitarian features of the individual that strike the eye of the for-ign returned cover a wide spectrum of human relations. One man tried to put it all together in his mind's eye as "freedom—which is only in America, pure and straightforward freedom—a regard for the other fellow—that is the real American life."

Most are captivated by the opportunities for an open class system with its ample chances to climb on the basis of ability and work and with the widespread sharing of a high standard of living.

In contradistinction to the social distance in India that insulates the higher and lower classes and the economic chasm between class levels of living, they see Americans openly mixing in public places as equals and being consumers of the same products. The foreign returned remember that even working class families often had cars, that people dressed alike, and that "everyone had access to food." The American symbols of class differences are not seen or are overshadowed by the fact that all classes "have so much," just as Westerners may not see the configuration of status differences within a non-Western society, so overwhelming may be the mass poverty.

The energetic American comes into full view at work, in play, on the streets, and at home. "There is ceaseless activity. The people rush about from morning to night. They have boundless energy and work themselves to a premature death." "They go at a fast pace, everyone is busy, the tempo of life is fast—what they call progress."

SOCIAL WEAKNESSES

The one outstanding social weakness of the West, both the United Kingdom and the United States, that most of the foreign returned mentioned is that of racial discrimination. Race relations serves the foreign educated as an acid test of Western attitudes and values.

Racial prejudice is a hypersensitive spot whether the Indian is the object of discrimination or only a spectator of discrimination imposed on other colored peoples. Around this issue high interest can be alerted, lurking suspicions activated, and a whole train of antipathies concerning colonialization set under way.

Less than 5 per cent of the sample studied were apathetic about the entire subject before they went and afterwards. For the majority, the foreign experience did change the conceptions of racial relations which they held. One conception which many held before going abroad but which tends to become obsolescent among the foreign returned is the simple division of mankind into two opposing camps—white Westerners and the colored peoples of the rest of the world. They are as indignant as are others in India over any signs of Western imperialism and claims of white supremacy in Asia or Africa, but they do not state the issues exclusively along racial lines nor put all the whites into one class of men.

Before, I thought that all white people were alike. I had very deep prejudices before about white skins. Now I feel that everyone is the same, that human beings are all the same.

Again:

I used to think that all Westerners were pro-British and that all were different from us. I did not have any contacts with whites before. I learned about the differences between various Europeans, and that Americans are not the same as other whites. This left a very lasting impression on my mind.

The treatment accorded Indian students in the United Kingdom is used by them as one test of the Englishman's willingness to accept them as equals and not to relegate them to the status of inferiors. In the United States the treatment of the Indian student and the treatment of the American Negro is used as a yardstick to gauge the sincerity of the American's belief in democracy. Persons who were subjected to discrimination in Britain say that they were disappointed but not surprised; persons with the same experience in America remark that they were not only disappointed but somewhat shocked.

The color bar in the United Kingdom before independence aroused resentment as being another proof of the ranking of Indians as a subject race; since independence, it is viewed as being an unfortunate flaw in British character that is offensive to a free people. The color line in the United States for the earlier generation of students was not an anxious one so far as they personally were concerned but in connection with the Negro was deemed analogous to British-Indian relations in India. The later students point to racial discrimination as an anachronism in a nation that is holding itself up to the world as the proponent of democracy.

Discrimination against Indian students

Less than one-fourth of the foreign educated in either the United Kingdom or the United States had actually been the personal object of discrimination in a specific instance which they could recall; more than three-fourths had heard of Indian students who had been discriminated against. Any incident which happens to one Indian becomes known to all; stories accumulate within Indian student groups abroad and are passed on to each incoming person. If the person was the only Indian in the American or British school he was less preoccupied with the likelihood of there being discrimination against Indians—he did not have a constant stream of stories coming his way and his exceptional status often meant he was lionized as an "interesting" person.

We asked the foreign returned who were the objects of or who had observed racial discrimination while they were overseas how they felt while it was happening. The answers given add up to this proposition: For most, if the discriminatory act was directed against the self, the occurrence was not interpreted as being a threat to their own ego but as insulting to their status rights and a violation of their beliefs as to what is right.

The United Kingdom cases who experienced race discrimination say that the color bar was no worse in England than what they were used to in India before independence—and in some respects, not so bad, or that the behavior of the Englishmen was pretty much what they expected from a people with the reputation for being prejudiced and thinking of themselves as the "master race." Many add that it was not easy to distinguish between British reserve with strangers and racial prejudice, but that in most instances, once they got to know an Englishman well, they were accepted as equals. Nearly all report no discrimination in the academic community, in their intellectual relations with professors and fellow students. A number remember that their teachers took an extra amount of interest in them because they were Indians. Although away from the college they might encounter children who would yell, "Look, Mom, there is a black man," or "Look at that nigger," adults did not talk that way. The chief area of discrimination occurred in trying to get housing accommodations in which the obvious reason for rejection was race.

The American cases had more varied responses. A few took a sympathetic or neutral point of view, for example,

"I knew the background of American actions and knew they were mixed up on this." "When I saw discrimination in the South, I knew these people did not know any better." "Every country has its own dirt. America has, just as we do, but we are interested in America not because of its dirt but for what it can teach us." The majority grumbled, gossiped within their own Indian group, and acted opportunistically. Inside their in-group they talked wryly about the contradictions between democracy and discrimination and how strange it was for an advanced country to have racial prejudices. A minority fully identified with the Negro as being another oppressed people, sought them out as friends, were keenly offended by discrimination against this ethnic group, and now say: "American democracy is for whites." As in the case of the British educated, the American sample report with but rare exceptions that they were not discriminated against on the campus and, far more than the British educated, speak warmly of professors who took an exceptional interest in them and who went out of their way to be helpful.

OTHER REACTIONS

About other social strengths and weaknesses of the West there is no consensus. There are, however, reactions common to the British returned and others held by the American returned.

Those trained in the United Kingdom feel fairly sure that they know what the British are like but those trained in the United States are not equally sure that they know what makes Americans tick. One plausible, though untested, hypothesis is that the British culture may be more homogeneous than its American counterpart. And as a result, perhaps the Indian has a more standardized set of expectations in the United Kingdom than in the United States. It may also be that the British in their personal conduct in varying types of situations are more consistent and Americans more flexible.

Still another hypothesis can be inferred from the side comments of those who say, "The people are frank—but." The "but" refers to the observation that the English are hard to make out before a friendship is established; the Americans, after a contact is made. The Indian student is puzzled by the British because, "They want to take the initiative in deciding when to get acquainted and they resent inquisitiveness"; hence the Indian does not know where he stands until the Englishman tells him. Once the Britisher has opened up, the Indian adds, "He says what he means and means what he says."

Friendships with Americans are established more quickly, and either person is free to take the initiative. Although rarely rebuffed in starting a friendship, the Indian is not confident of the solidity of the bond: "You cannot assume that because Americans are friendly you are fully accepted. You still have to watch what you say." "Americans are free to talk but their freeness is a mannerism and we Indians often misunderstood." The American is described as smiling, polite, congenial, and careful not to offend. At first Indians impute from these cues more than they are intended to convey in American culture. Most of an Indian's friends take a span of time for each to test the other's involvement. The foreign returned are impressed by the rapidity with which strangers in America form friendships—and are upset when the attachments prove to be so temporary. It causes some to say, "Americans are friendly, but are they really sincere?" "Everyone is friendly—but it is hard to have a friend."

Eight out of ten of the foreign returned have a favorable image of the British and Americans as people, as distinguished from their political and social patterns. Those back from the United Kingdom respect the British people (whether they like them or not) and those returned from the United States like the Americans (whether they respect them or not). Before going overseas, the students tended to be antagonistic toward the British and idealistic about the Americans; after being in the West, approximately 80 per cent revised their images—losing much of their antagonism toward the British and becoming more realistic about the Americans.

Three out of four now distinguish between the character of the foreigners in India, who are viewed most often adversely, and the character of the foreigners in their homeland, who are seen most often in a favorable light.

The Britisher at home appears to them to be a more decent person than the Britisher abroad.

There I became acquainted with Englishmen for the first time and I began to appreciate their character. I did not like them as rulers but there I found them most human.

Or:

Here in India, they are very obstinate, unbending, intolerable, aloof, arrogant, and pompous. There I met a different type—they were polite, they judged the individual as an individual and then formed an opinion, they were helpful. I am still no admirer of the British but my attitude has mellowed, and I respect them.

During the period of British rule there were few Americans in India. Beginning with the American soldiers who were stationed in India during World War II, large numbers of Americans have descended upon India. Consequently to many of the American trained, their first experiences with Americans in India came after their favorable experiences with Americans in the United States. The United Kingdom trained are surprised to find that the British in Britain are "human," the United States trained are shocked to find that Americans in India are snobbish.

It is easier to get along with Americans in America than in India. In America there is little chance to show off, for everybody has so much; here the Americans show off. Here they tend to look down on Indians. Americans here lose much of their humility—they start feeling intellectually superior. Americans here are more authoritarian than in America.

Again:

Here the Americans are clannish, they restrict themselves to their own group. Americans at home are hospitable but here they do not ask you to their house; they remain more to themselves.

And:

The foreigners in India differ from those in their own country. At first when they come they are sympathetic to Indians but in time they become anti-Indian. They forget their modesty and their notions of equality when they come here.²

Enigmas of Western society

There are some aspects of Western society which remain enigmatic to the foreign returned.

Family life is one. It appears disorganized to some, democratic to others. The instabilities of the home, particularly in America, seem odd to most, in contrast to the stability of the Indian home. Whereas fellow feeling among coworkers is admired, the slim ties among relatives are frowned upon.

² We are concerned not with the validity of these judgments, but only with the objective presentation of a common point of view. Our own observations were that there are foreigners who do not fit the description but, as is the case of any stereotype, these are looked upon as being "different."

Some say, "The children are taught to be independent at a young age. This is a very good thing. But a person does not know the work his father is doing, where his sisters are, and whether or not his brothers will help him. It is a curse to be old, they get little respect and they cannot maintain themselves." "There is no love in family life. I found that affection is only skin deep there." "The attachment to the family is not real. Every man and woman is interested in himself, not in parents, brothers and sisters, husbands and wives. No one gets a happy home life." Some have the opposite reaction:

There is more democracy in family life. The individual is treated on his own merits with due respect for his needs. The elders consult with the junior members and their advice or suggestions are really considered; here the elders make the decisions.

Materialism is another enigma. The preoccupation with economic gain, the identification of an individual with the work he does, the premium placed on having an ever ascending level of living draws mixed responses—hostility and envy.

The average American lacks a sense of balance between materialism on the one hand and a faith or philosophy on the other. He feels an urgent need of faith, but scientific development is far outstripping the developments in the spiritual world. He has not been able to adjust his community living with the material progress of his country. There is a general nervous condition. The interesting thing is that the people there are the first to admit all this.

Again:

They are constantly in a hurry to get done whatever they are doing and give very little thought to the meaning of what they are doing. They see only the material values in life—get more money, get more luxuries; little else matters as ends. But it is an easy life—people are not worried about tomorrow.

Others are impressed by the spirit of "always trying to make improvements in efficiency and production" and say that "spiritualism is humbug—a fact which the foreigners already know and Indians should learn." The United States is more the object of criticism for "overdoing" materialism than the United Kingdom, and the main center of attack is not on the levels of living but on the discrepancy between the economy and other phases of culture.

Each culture contains its own premises by which a member's behavior is judged—the areas in which he is supposed to exercise authority and responsibility on his own and the areas in which he is supposed to submerge himself to the group; when he can compete or must co-operate; and so forth. The stranger in a society has difficulty perceiving the premises, the behavior, and the relationship between the two, as the next three quotations show:

America is based on egotism. For example, neighbors did not once pay any attention to the problems of others. In India we talk about our neighbor's troubles and are sincerely sorry. Everyone there is busy and minds his own business.

As a group they work better than as individuals—which is conducive to social welfare. They are willing to co-operate to bring credit to the group. This is the paradox of American individualism—they want to do things in a group way, one has a sense of achievement in a group and a sense of frustration as an individual. The American mind is confused.

In America, the individual thinks that by helping the individual he is helping the community.

THE ROLES OF A MIDDLEMAN IN A CROSS-CULTURAL RELATIONSHIP

The foreign educated comprise only one group of the many intermediaries between India and the West. Numerous Indians each year make trips to the United Kingdom or the United States for business, on holidays, to attend conferences, and as official representatives of the country. Several thousand Englishmen and Americans work, visit on good-will tours, serve as teachers and technical advisers, and are posted on diplomatic assignments in India. There are expatriates from India in the West and from the West in India. A continuous flow of news and views is transmitted via the radio, press, and movies.

After their return, nonstudent visitors to the West usually move in social circles which include the social elite who can afford vacations abroad, the business tycoons, and the high-ranking officials who already are personally acquainted with Westerners. In contrast to these other intermediaries, a larger proportion of the foreign educated typically interact with people who know no foreigners personally.

Social influence

The foreign educated as a middleman in Indian social groups has an impact on the group members in proportion to the social capital he possesses that makes him influential and to the social response of the members who are open to being influenced.

The social capital of the foreign educated held in lowest esteem is the prestige of being foreign returned. The fact that they can say, "I was there," gives a certain margin of credence to what they say about the United Kingdom or the United States, but the extent to which their opinions are accepted depends upon their social position.

Certain forms of personal behavior are a social liability. Those few who patently play the foreigners' game or who, overly identified with the United Kingdom and the United States, zealously defend Western ways and are offensive in viewing local ways, are discounted. Individuals rated as influential in a social group do not act as blatant cultural hucksters. This personal element may seem amorphous; nevertheless, it is concretely evidenced in the social circles we studied.

When the sample cases are sorted out into uninfluential and influential, a large percentage of the persons with low influence show comparable social disabilities. In their own words:

People say I have become americanized. They criticize me at home for saying so much is good in America. They say that I say everything in America is good.

Again:

My ideas were too advanced for the people I had to live with here. I do not criticize the people, I merely make a statement, "This is the way it is done there." They usually are unconvinced.

The influential

The pile of influential cases contains these three representative comments:

Only if I find that they ask and really want to know do I talk about America. If I talk about good living there, they would be frustrated, so I talk tactfully. I do not say America is better but point out different things I saw there which I think could be used here.

There is no label of "foreign" on what I do and say. I wait for the people to turn to me for advice.

I talk about England to many, even to illiterate people, both in my family and outside. But I adjust what I say so that it can be understood. When a topic comes up, I do not make the point that I know about it directly. I never say outright, "This is how we do it in England." I correct local ideas informally, never in lectures or talks. This way, people ask you and you can fit the conversation to their interests and background. People do ask and so you can build up to the point.

Those who are influential, however, have more than communication skills.

They deftly, and often unself-consciously, earn a reputation of being just like everyone else in a group. A fine compliment bestowed on a foreign returned is, "He is just like he was before." The term most frequently used by their associates to describe them is sincere—a quality respected in Indian culture and unexpected in the foreign returned of whom the image is one of being high-hat and supercilious. Most of the highly rated influential individuals responded to our question "What kind of adjustment did you make when you got back?" by saying, in one way or another, "I tried to fit in."

The influential are located in all age grades; the mature, however, have a larger amount of social capital in a society that respects men and women in the advanced years of life. The young are influential with their immediate friends, whereas the older persons may wield influence throughout the community.

The audience

The people who are open to being influenced can be classified into members of primary groups and members of secondary groups. Primary types of groups are those in which the foreign returned have more or less continuous face-to-face contacts with relatives, persons belonging to the same subcommunity, a few friends, students, and in some cases an occasional subordinate or fellow worker. They are in a sense a captive audience who have at least to pretend to listen when the foreign returned talk. Word-of-mouth communication in India, as in most societies, often is believed more than word that is transmitted via the printed page—and of course, in those social groups with no literacy, it is the main source of all information about the outside world.

Provided the foreign returned is respected within his social circle, he has free access to all of the informal discussions that take place and, as a participant, can introduce his ideas about the foreigners in a manner to fit the conversation. Probably the greatest impact of the foreign returned is not the initial period of storytelling in the first flush of being back home, but in the intermittent and unorganized sessions that take place subsequently. When we tried to pin down the persons being interviewed as to exactly how often and under what circumstances they brought up ideas learned abroad, hardly any could say; yet many said they were sure that their ideas slipped into the discussion. The relatives and friends of the foreign returned replied in the same fashion.

The social circles in which the foreign educated move vary in their receptivity to what the foreign educated have to say. Groups which have high access to information from the West and whose members are knowledgeable about the West are less likely to turn to the foreign educated as an "expert" than are others. Again, the foreign educated are more of a source for learning what Western people and their institutions are like than for finding out the international policies of the great powers. Finally, it needs to be pointed out that the prevailing sentiments toward the Western powers are governed more by the course of international events than by any interpretation of these events by the foreign returned.

Most of those who were highly critical of Americans and their ways while in the United States become defenders of America in India. With a change in the audience, from persons who know much about America (and so can see the disapproved patterns in a total social context) to persons who have little knowledge about America (and have peculiar notions without any context to explain them), a majority shift from expressing doubts about American ways to giving the reasons why Americans act the way they do.

THE WISH TO BE UNDERSTOOD

The use of knowledge from one society by the members of another is animated by a demand that grows out of practical need. When India was under foreign rule, its people had to learn the ways of the British in order to deal with the governors. British authorities responsible for policy making and administration required knowledge of Indian conditions—even though most of the British people did not have to know much about Indian customs. It was not until the United States became a global power that the social facts about places like India seemed vital to the nation's leadership; at the same time, as India became a nation fashioning its own foreign policy, it has had to know more about the United States.

An American assumption is that understanding of America by Indians would enable them to recognize that American values are not inimical to India's interests and that the nation's foreign policies are idealistic in conception. An Indian assumption is that if America understood Asia and the real issues, its policies would be better. Perhaps it would not be unreasonable to observe that both parties are anxious to be understood and that currently both may be more eager to be understood than to understand.

In an increasingly interdependent world in which India is a co-ordinate rather than a subordinate power, it seems highly probable that mutual understanding will increase in the long run. It will do so in the "one world" that is coming into being, not because that would be nice but because it will be necessary. It seems appropriate to suggest in this context that the foreign educated, along with certain other segments, have the potential of acting as interpreters of the West on a face-to-face basis with a wide range of Indian groups.

Ruth Useem, Ph.D., is assistant professor (research) in the Department of Sociology and Anthropology, Michigan State College. She has taught at the University of South Dakota, Queens College, and the University of Wisconsin. In addition to having spent several years in field research among the Sioux Indians, she served as codirector of this study.

*John Useem, Ph.D., is professor of sociology and anthropology, Michigan State College. He has served as visiting professor at the Foreign Service Institute, Department of State, and has spent several years in field research among the South Pacific islanders. He is coauthor with Ruth Useem of a series of articles in scientific journals and recently contributed to Planning Micronesia's Future (D. Oliver, Ed.), Cultural Patterns and Technical Change (M. Mead, Ed.), and Human Problems and Technological Change (E. Spicer, Ed.).*

The America-educated Japanese,* I

The Student in America: Theory; Background; Images

By HERBERT PASSIN and JOHN W. BENNETT

THIS two-part paper endeavors to describe the most important images of American life and culture held by Japanese who have been educated in the United States, and to shed some light on how these images form and change in the course of their experience in America and in Japan. The analysis is based upon a study of Japanese students on American university campuses, and a companion study of returned students in Japan.¹

Within the total research program, images were only one of the problems studied. In its most general terms, the research was directed primarily toward the analysis of study abroad as an instance of intercultural experience. Apart from its theoretical importance for the study of culture contact and change, intercultural experience is of critical significance in international relations today, characterized as they are not only by the impact from afar of ideas and institutions but also by the direct personal contact of foreigners with every level of the home population.

* This project is part of a program sponsored by the Committee on Cross-Cultural Education of the Social Science Research Council and supported by grants to the Council from the Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation, and the Rockefeller Foundation.

¹ Bennett directed the research on Japanese in America, Passin on the returnees. The materials are being worked into book form at Ohio State University. The one hundred individuals studied intensively in both projects included pre-World War I students as well as younger people still in the student category. The field data were supplemented by extensive documentary materials.

THE NATURE OF THE SUBJECTS

It should be understood at the outset that the sample on which this analysis is based—namely, Japanese who study in the United States—is in no sense a cross section of the population of Japan. They are, in the first place, drawn from the best-educated sectors and generally from above-average socioeconomic levels. By contrast with the average Japanese, they may be characterized as politically aware and culturally sophisticated, usually in a somewhat Western direction; they usually have more familiarity with Western life, they are more attracted by the West, and they are more skilled in foreign languages. Within educated circles, they can be counted among those most favorably inclined toward the United States.

Thus, we will not expect to find among this group of Japanese extreme negative opinions of the United States (although these may develop in suitable circumstances), and by the same token we may expect to find them representing a generally "alienated" group in their own society. By "alienated" we mean having an attitude of critical detachment from one's own culture, tradition, and social order. This is, of course, a matter of degree, and we have in general reserved use of the term for only the more extreme cases.

IMAGES—DEFINITION AND DESCRIPTION

The term "image" has come to be used in a number of different ways and to characterize a number of different phenomena. As we shall use it here, it is a descriptive summation of percepts—what people see—and attitudes—how they feel about it. "Image" can be used to describe such diverse things as patterns of information and interpretation found in the mass media, the general tendency of "public opinion," or the views of particular individuals or groups.

It is important to remember that the educated foreigner who visits America is not a tabula rasa, but rather a complex human being, with the usual battery of feelings, goals, and frames of reference with which all people perceive and evaluate their environment. These frames of reference develop both from the individual's experience and from the historically conditioned atmosphere of his own culture. The historically conditioned images of his background society and culture determine or influence his view of America; and, in turn, his experience in and with America influences his image of America.

As we shall endeavor to suggest in the following section the special character of Japanese-American relations has created certain historical images of America which are widely prevalent in Japan. We have found, however, that the images with which the student starts his contact with America—whether they be favorable or unfavorable—are substantially influenced by the nature of his experience. The bulk of both parts of the paper is devoted to the analysis of the factors which seem to be most influential in affecting his image.

To describe images, we have distinguished between image content, image judgment (or type of critical perspective), and image attitude. When describing image content, we will often use the terms "stereotypic" and "realistic"; for image judgment, the terms "negative" and "positive"; and for attitude, "friendly" and "unfriendly." Although these three aspects of the image often follow the same direction,² there are important cases in which they do not.³ In the following pages there will be found examples of the many possible permutations and combinations.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUNDS

In Japan's modern relations with the Western world, it is America—in the shape of Commodore Perry's ominous "black ships"—that has been identified as historically responsible for the "opening of the country." The decision to enter the world portended, on the one hand, danger to Japan's independence and traditional way of life, and, on the other, tempting advantages and exciting new prospects. The balance of these conflicting moods is evident in that approach to the West which the leaders of Meiji Japan were able to sustain with remarkable success: to change whatever interfered with the development of industrial nationhood, but to retain as much of the traditional social structure and culture as possible. Thus, the historical agent which forced Japan to her decision, America, is firmly embedded in the Japanese outlook as the source of danger and threat, as well as of the techniques to dispel them.

Japan learns from America

Throughout the years that followed the opening of Japan, America played a role of intermittent but substantial importance in the development of Japan's modern institutions. The more prominent examples include American technical assistance in the development of cold-climate agricultural methods; the influence of American educators and missionaries in the development of an educational system; and American influence in the development of modern industrial and commercial methods.⁴

² When people are "positive" and "friendly," we speak of them as "favorable"; when "negative" and "hostile," as "unfavorable."

³ The conservative position in Japan today is often "negative" towards American civilization, but "friendly" to America for political reasons; the liberal, contrariwise, is often positively disposed towards the democracy of American life, but "hostile" to America because of her foreign policy in Asia.

The cumulative effect of this long history of contact and relationships was the emergence of an image of America which had decidedly favorable lineaments on the one hand, but on the other, elements of criticism, anxiety, and ambivalence. America was accepted as an ideal model of Western energy and achievement, and, as the youngest and most "promising" country of the Western world, she was considered in many respects the most suitable model for Japanese industrial reconstruction. But by the same token her suitability as an ideological, social, and cultural model was brought into question. In the moral sphere there has been from the very beginning of serious relations between Japan and America an ineradicable critical suspicion that America was shallow and immature. The anxiety and ambivalence, for their part, developed out of feelings of inferiority which inevitably accompany strong achievement-oriented activity on the part of people who have not yet accomplished their goals. Therefore, the revision of the "unequal" treaties, which had been based on the Western assumption that Japan was a "backward" country—like China or Siam—was peculiarly symbolic of the recognition that Japan demanded of the world.⁵

⁴ Cf. Edwin O. Reischauer, The United States and Japan, Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1950; especially Chap. II. It should be noted that America was not the only model for Japanese reconstruction. Other European nations were important in various ways, particularly in the early years of the opening, when American political and economic institutions were undeveloped. But, as Reischauer concludes, "in the long run the Japanese probably borrowed more from the United States than from any one European nation" (p. 11).

The role of American education

The popularity of American education has varied with the changing context of relations between Japan and America. In the first phase of Japan's entry into the modern world, students flocked to American universities, and persons with American training found all doors open to them to put their new knowledge to work in solving the urgent problems facing the country. When the mission of Prince Iwakura arrived in the United States in 1871, only three years after the Restoration of the Emperor, it counted over two hundred Japanese students in actual attendance in American institutions.⁶ These early students played a key role in Japan's modern institutional development, and the romantic flavor of greatness, pioneering, and adventure invoked by their names still attaches, however insecurely, to the latter day overseas students.

In later years a change in atmosphere could be detected. In their search for models, the Japanese came to feel that American conditions were so different from their own that perhaps more could be learned from European countries where the nature of the social and economic structure more closely approached Japanese conditions. Moreover, the growth of a Japanese university system, modeled on German institutions, meant that Japan came to be able to train her own people. Therefore foreign education came to be viewed more as a chance to add polish than as a means for fundamental training. In many fields, the United States was regarded as inferior to certain European countries for providing this "polish."

⁵ Historical commentators have frequently observed that Meiji Japan wanted the techniques of the West, but not the consequences of these techniques, that is, it was willing to accept industrialization but not developments in the direction of a "mass society" which industrialization implies. (Cf. E. & F. Lederer, Japan in Transition, New Haven (Conn.): Yale University Press, 1938; especially Chap. VIII.)

⁶ Cf. Charles Lanman, Leaders of the Meiji Restoration in America (Tokyo: Hokuseido Press, 1931), p. 52. Also G. H. Blakeslee (Ed.), Japan and Japanese-American Relations, New York: G. E. Stechert & Co., 1912. R. S. Schwantes, in a personal communication, has suggested that Lanman and other early observers, both Japanese and American, may have exaggerated somewhat.

After World War I American's stock as a place for training rose for a time, but then quickly declined with the rise of a militaristic regime which exploited anti-American sentiments for its own ends.⁷ With defeat and occupation after World War II, America once more became a popular place for all types of education and training, but of course doubts and suspicion of the value of such experience never disappeared completely. The great movement of overseas students to the United States in the postwar period must be attributed not only to America's popularity, but also to the superior availability of financial aid for going to America.

The postwar atmosphere

However, the immense interest and curiosity in things American, so apparent in occupied Japan, should not be underestimated. The defeat apparently persuaded the Japanese that they still had much to learn from the West—particularly from their conqueror, America—and they plunged themselves into an amazing emulation of American life and customs. Aside from the remarkably facile acceptance of reform measures introduced by the occupation, the Japanese copied American mass consumption standards, linguistic expressions, and interpersonal behavior patterns—often in superficial and meaningless fashion.

⁷ There is little doubt that the blow to national pride of America's Oriental Exclusion Act played a part in this change of attitude.

Thus, for a brief period in the occupation, all the previous roles the United States had played in Japanese life and thought—instructor, tutor, paternal figure, most powerful nation—were brought to a new focus.⁸ At the same time, an expectable ambivalence over this dependence began to reassert itself. The experience of living under Americans as rulers, changes in occupation policy, and the problem of Japan's relation to the "cold war" have all contributed to a growing "anti-American" feeling. As will be shown later, this feeling has carried over to some extent in the attitudes toward American education and has had some effect on the position of the American-educated Japanese after his return home.⁹

THE CONTEMPORARY JAPANESE VIEW OF AMERICA

We can see from these brief historical considerations that there has always been a good deal of ambivalence in the Japanese approach to America. America's position as "teacher" and "superior" has often aroused a reactive hostility and resentment. In the present section, we shall examine the resultant contemporary outlook, which can be broken down into six major types of image content.

These types are not logical categories, but rather identifiable, salient groupings with psychological unity. They are the images one is likely to encounter if one talks with the "man on the street"; the images which appear in the mass media and even in the textbooks of history and geography;

⁸ See Kazuo Kawai, "American Influence on Japanese Thinking," THE ANNALS, Vol. 278 (November 1951), pp. 23-31.

⁹ A special section on the influence of the occupation period on the Japanese outlook on America forms part of the conclusions of Part II.

the images which are part of the most generalized frame of reference of most Japanese, regardless of how sophisticated they may be with respect to the details of American life and behavior, and regardless of their attitudes toward America. These are also the images which have the greatest relevance for the understanding of Japanese political attitudes.¹⁰

It also will be observed that a description of the Japanese images of America will serve fairly well as a description of the images of America current in other countries. This would seem to be explicable on two grounds: First, in many nations outside of the Iron Curtain there is a common stock of information about the United States that has been made available—at least to the educated classes—through the diffusion of education and the impact of the mass media. Thus, many similar things about America are known in all countries—although there may be substantial individual, group, class, and national variation. Second, the position of many countries in relation to American power today is very similar: dependent, in need of American economic help, pressed for ideological commitment. It is therefore not surprising that the same reactions of irritation, resentment, and ambivalence develop.

Japanese images of America therefore share certain qualities with those found in Europe and in Asia. Indeed, the context of world politics and the effectiveness of mass communication are such that Americans frequently perceive their own country in similar terms.

¹⁰ Details on the methods used in constructing these image types cannot be given here. Briefly, they have been prepared on the basis of an intensive study of contemporary Japanese public opinion surveys, current published literature, personal discussions with Japanese of all social positions, and interviews with the one hundred or so students and former students studied in the research program.

What is distinctively "Japanese" about the images presented here is not the image content so much as the attitudes attending them: the selective emphasis of different elements, the extent of involvement, and the distribution of the images in the population resulting from unique factors in the historical development of Japanese-American relations. For example, Japanese, by comparison with most other peoples, seem to be more emotionally involved in their images of America, and their images seem to have a larger proportion of unrealistic, "exalted" elements.

Six images of America

We now consider the six major image-content types found widespread in contemporary Japan. The first four types are essentially groups of percepts to which entirely contrary attitudes may be assigned by different individuals. The last two images are inherently vectorial; the nature of the percept automatically implies a negative judgment and often unfriendly attitudes. These two negatively inclined images reflect important contemporary criticism of the United States, appearing in abundance in the Japanese mass media. They also can represent, for many Japanese, what might be called unfavorable "counterimages," available for use if attitudes shift in an unfavorable direction.

The neutral character of image types I, II, V, and VI, may be illustrated very simply. A Japanese who sees America as "democratic" (Image II) may not necessarily approve of this; he may dislike democracy. Or, while most Japanese would agree that America is a place where women are indulged (Image I), there would be much division of opinion, especially between men and women, on the virtues of sex equality. A recognition of America's superior standard of living (V) does not necessarily imply a favorable attitude toward material wealth; it also can be seen as evidence of American "materialism."

Images emphasizing ideological aspects of America

I. America as the home of women's rights. Women have substantially equal rights and opportunities with men; marriage is based mainly on love and free choice of partner; wives have equal voice in family decisions; children are treated as individuals rather than as subordinate units for the convenience of the family; women can pursue any career they wish; they can even excel men in certain spheres.

(Comment. America has always been an important symbol in the struggle of the Japanese woman for equal rights. Educated Japanese women find that America exerts a powerful fascination for them; it is common for them to want to travel and live in the United States and to communicate their knowledge of American sex equality to their compatriots. Men, on the other hand, are less enthusiastic; although many "democratically" gulp down their disapproval and say "it might be a good thing," conservative men openly disapprove.)

II. America as the land of freedom, democracy, humanism. Human relationships in America are free, open, devoid of arbitrary status considerations; American life centers on the needs and interests of the individual rather than of the group; the values of humanism, tolerance, freedom of inquiry dominate.

(Comment. A broader and less specialized version of I (above). Often defined, as in the case of I, as the "opposite" of Japan: where Japan is feudal, hierarchical, ordered in its social relationships, group centered, inclined to stress obedience and conformity, America is democratic, free, open, individualistic, tolerant. Aspects of this image are often combined with V (below), to stress "freedom" plus "achievement." The image is based on a liberal criticism of Japan, and it can become the basis of conservative criticism of America.)

III. America is an unreliable democracy.

America has too much democracy; she cannot be relied upon because she is subject to changing whims, fashions, and pressures of public opinion; America is overly materialistic, uncultured, impulsive, disorderly, shallow, superficial, too individualistic; she looks down on Japan and "colored races."

IV. America on the road to totalitarianism. Whatever democracy America may have had in the past, she is fast becoming the land of race prejudice and discrimination, anti-intellectualism, and suppression of democratic rights; there are strong tendencies toward cultural authoritarianism and domination by big business and the military; she is shallow, superficial, soft, politically unreliable; she worships power and gadgetry.

(Comment. Image III is a negative view largely deriving from a conservative or authoritarian critique of American institutions; IV is based on a liberal critique. It will be noted that the two share some common elements.)

Images emphasizing material aspects of America

V. America as technically the most advanced nation. The material side of life is more highly developed in America than anywhere else: a high standard of living; high productivity; efficiency; ingenuity; high educational level; many scientists and skilled workers; opportunity for achievement and success (for Americans, not necessarily for foreigners).

(Comment. When approved, this image is probably typical of Japanese businessmen, engineers, and certain conservative leaders. When disapproved, it may become the focus of attack by liberal elements [see Image IV]. This image has played an important part in Japanese-American relations because of America's contributions to Japan's industrial, technical, and administrative development.)

VI. America as a stable world power. A powerful, well-organized, orderly, law-abiding, civilized nation; roles are clearly defined, and people know their place in society although there is relative freedom; very stable and predictable; the people have good public manners [like traffic "courtesy"]; individuals know how to subordinate themselves willingly, not by force, to the public interest; the class system is ideal—it is hierarchical, but it still permits upward achievement.

(Comment. Really an extension of V into nontechnological spheres; the image is favorably held by people who are primarily concerned with Japan's power and stability and feel that America may be a guide and a model; but the same elements can be the focus of criticism by liberals, although some will accept a few of these elements as necessary for Japan.)

THE JAPANESE STUDENT IN AMERICA

We now turn from a generalized discussion of contemporary Japanese views of America to the particular images held by representative types of students who come to the United States for study. Our attention here will be centered upon the way these images form and change in the course of experience in the States and after return to Japan, and on the factors responsible for these changes.

Accordingly, our discussion of the America-trained Japanese will be divided into two sections: the American sojourn and the return to Japan.¹¹ This division follows a natural break in the research itself and permits the development of problems unique to the two phases of the experience. The American sojourn is generally an intense and strongly focused experience, since it is highly motivated, and it is also a relatively brief incident in the student's life. On the other hand, the "return" is a more diffuse experience, since it means no less than the totality of the adult life of the individual; it is an unlimited and continuing experience.

¹¹ The return to Japan is analyzed in Part II of this paper, which follows as the next article.

Thus, while the individual is in the United States, the problem of finding personal satisfaction may appear in fairly specific forms, accomplishing specific goals and having pleasant experiences. But back in Japan, satisfaction or gratification takes on new dimensions with every stage in the individual's life and with every change in the historical situations which affect his life. Consequently while his image of America may change once, or possibly twice, during his stay in America, it can change many times in the remainder of his lifetime.

The materials concerning image and image change will be presented in the form of a description of representative types of Japanese students of the postwar period. The reader should be cautioned that these postwar students do not correspond completely to the prewar variety and that the most important type of prewar America-educated Japanese is omitted. This type, who was thought of in prewar Japan as the "typical" America-educated person, was usually the young man who had his college education in America, returned to Japan, and thereafter based his entire career on his American training and connections—generally remaining friendly to the United States for the rest of his life. He was a staunch supporter of the occupation and, especially in its early years, was a familiar figure around General Headquarters. He is also commonly found around foreign-linked enterprises, such as missions, churches, embassies, import-export firms, English teaching, and youth groups.

Since he was not represented in the particular sample of Japanese students studied in the United States, in order to attain maximum congruity of the two sections of this paper it was decided to exclude him and to concentrate primarily on the postwar student types.¹²

A note on our method of explanation of image formation and change is necessary at this point. It has been found that an individual's image of America is best understood by determining the rather complex relationship between several factors, namely: (1) the individual's own goals in coming to the United States; (2) the extent to which he is able to satisfy these in his American sojourn and, in general, whether he has satisfying experiences while here; and (3) the kinds of ties he has back home which may predispose him toward one kind of image or another. In reading the descriptions of the representative types of students, the reader may note that the relationships among these three groups of factors take different forms for each type.

The Japan-alienated people

It is possible to divide the Japanese who come to the United States for study into two major groups: those who are alienated from their own society and those who are oriented towards it. This should be understood as referring to relative position on an extremely complex continuum, but the broad distinction has been found to be very meaningful. In their relationship to their own culture, educated Japanese tend toward a highly polarized view, in which the "outside," or the West (and especially America), is felt as an alternative. If one rejects Japan, one must accept the other. As one young Japanese doctor studying in the United States put it:

¹² Although he did not appear in our State-side sample, this does not mean that he cannot be found among the postwar students. The evidence, however, is that the type referred to in this paper as the "ideologist" has probably replaced him in frequency. See Part II, note 2, for further details.

We Japanese have no choice today but two: America or Japan. It is hard to find a compromise. You have to decide just how much of an American you want to be, or can afford to be, and the more American you become, the less Japanese you are.

This is putting it strongly, but typically.

Within this group of Japan-alienated people, it is possible to find different percepts of and attitudes toward America. However, these people can be divided broadly into two groups: those who have dominantly favorable views of America and those who are or can become dominantly unfavorable.

The woman rebel

Perhaps the most familiar case of the Japan-alienated, pro-American group is the Japanese woman who comes to the United States in search of the promised land of feminine role freedom and equality. This phenomenon, which has produced a notable literature,¹³ has been a standard facet of Japanese-American relations for the past three generations. To this "woman rebel," America is often the antithesis of everything Japanese she perceives as restrictive and unfair to her sex. Consequently her image of America (usually Type I mixed with II and aspects of III) is drawn in sharply positive and friendly, although often stereotypic, terms. It should also be noted that the chances of her actually gratifying her goals and desires in America are very good.

Since from her point of view, America is a land of opportunity for wish-gratification, the Japanese woman rebel has a tendency to interpret her experiences in this country as contributing to the liberation of her spirit and to the fulfillment of her desires. Although she may be interested in the political and economic aspects of American life, she is characteristically more sensitized to the roles of men and women in America, family life, feminine rights, competition with men, the rearing of children, and the arts. In all these areas she perceives, on the whole, what she was looking for, and to the extent that she is able to participate in the American scene, she can, in a very real sense, gratify her interests. Her putative identification with America, which is only the obverse of her alienation from Japan, is thus reinforced, and Japan may appear all the more alien and oppressive.¹⁴

¹³ Cf. Sumie Mishima, My Narrow Isle, New York: The John Day Company, 1941; Shizue Ishimoto, East Way—West Way, New York: Farrar & Rinehart, 1935; Michi Kawai, Sliding Doors, Rutland, Vt.: Charles E. Tuttle, 1950; Etsu Sugimoto, Daughter of the Samurai, New York: Doubleday, Doran & Company, 1934; Yoko Matsuoka, Daughter of the Pacific, New York: Harper & Brothers, 1952; and others.

In spite of this fact, it is interesting to note that the Japanese woman rebel often does not reject the role of "Japanese woman," assigned to her by Americans, because she may discover that the designation is a ticket to privileges and special consideration. A common case is that of the Japanese girl who has succeeded in securing financial support for her American study from Americans by appealing to them on the grounds of her sweet Japanese femininity, so "unfortunately" repressed by Japanese social conventions.

Since most women visitors from Japan are alienated from their own society and are able to find what they want in America, their behavior often changes considerably, even after a short exposure to American life and ideas. While the Japanese woman at home is characteristically meek, shy, and reserved, when she comes to America she often blossoms out and becomes much more outgoing than her male countryman. She is generally more willing and able to enter into social relations with Americans and to live a well-rounded existence in the community at large. For many women, to have these very participative experiences was one of the principal goals in coming to America.

¹⁴ Of course, not all Japanese women who come to America are rebels and not all are so completely gratified. Thus, a woman professor in a woman's college, who was a subject in the research program, came to America chiefly for specialized training in her field, organic chemistry, and she had little interest in American life and ideas. Her role in Japan was secure; she had succeeded in developing a comfortable niche in her own society which gave her considerable satisfaction, and therefore America did not have for her the special quality that it does for the majority of other women students from Japan.

The methods a foreign visitor uses to "get along" in our society may be grouped together and termed his "adjustmental strategy." As in the case of military strategy, it is possible to be ingenious and efficient or clumsy and ineffective in the way one adjusts to given situations. On the whole, it is found that the "women rebels" have efficient strategies of adjustment in the United States, which means that they are able to accomplish their goals and "get along" in American life with relative ease. However, some of them are unable to overcome their inhibited social behavior, which may mean that they will have difficulties in adjusting to American life. But for virtually all of these women, whatever their success or failure in overcoming their inhibitions, the United States remains the land of opportunity and freedom.¹⁵

¹⁵ This is strikingly illustrated in the case of a schoolteacher who remained as inhibited in America as she had been at home, a source of great anxiety and feelings of failure. Her American associates regarded her as a shy, "typical" Japanese woman, although it was precisely from this role that she was trying—so unsuccessfully—to escape. And yet, in spite of her difficulties and inability to share in the give and take of American friendship circles, she did everything in her power to

While of all Japanese who visit the United States, the woman rebel is least likely to develop an unfavorable image, it should be noted that she is not entirely immune to negative judgments. When she sees aspects of American life which appear to her to obstruct feminist objectives, she will often add specifically disapproving judgments to her dominantly friendly attitudes toward America. Another of the mechanisms which can produce a drift toward unfavorable views is the tendency, observed in some women studied, to "blame" America for their sense of alienation; this may occur to them even before their return to Japan. However, this type of reaction should not be overstressed; the woman rebel is remarkably resistant to disillusionment over America.

The ideologist

Continuing our inquiry into the Japan-alienated person, we may now consider another type of person, who, in contrast to the woman rebel, does not always have satisfying experiences during his stay in America and who is prone to develop negative attitudes toward the United States (see image types II, IV, V). We refer here to the Japanese student—almost always a young man—with high intellectual ideals and strong liberal and equalitarian values, who is, in consequence, substantially alienated from many important areas of life in Japan. He may be found in almost all occupations and fields represented among Japanese exchange students. If he is strongly identified with any group, it is with one composed of people like arrange to return to the United States after spending a year back in Japan. She was successful and did return to America—giving up her high post in the public school system of one of the largest Japanese cities. She commented that even though she had a very high position, she could "go no higher because I am a woman."

himself, that is, alienated individuals. Intellectually aware, and with a tendency to be articulate—and sometimes emotionally so—about his ideological goals and problems, he comes to America principally hoping to "find himself," to establish identifications and allegiances, through experiencing a free and stimulating environment which he anticipates will be both ideologically and emotionally gratifying to him. He wants to test or "measure" himself against America; he also wants to "measure" America, to see if she really is as people say.

Pressed by his internal needs and hoping to find much in America, the expectations of the "ideologist" are very high, perhaps too high for reality. He is often anxious to establish communication with Americans, but he may find that his adjustmental strategy is unequal to the task. Thus, he may discover that he cannot handle the language well enough for his purposes; or that he is unable to overcome his "Japanese" inhibitions. He may also discover that Americans habitually classify him, along with traditionalistic students whom he dislikes and rejects, in the category of "Japanese student." This assigned role and all it implies can offend him deeply, because he often may be anxious to avoid Japanese identity, preferring the role of "intellectual" or "man of the world," or even wishing some degree of "American" identity.

The environment to which the ideologist is exposed may also be an important factor in his changing view of America. If he is sent to an American environment which is unable to meet his needs—as, for example, a school lacking the intellectual atmosphere he desires—he may be severely frustrated. If, on the other hand, his strategy is flexible enough, he may abandon his intellectual goals and find other satisfying experiences in America. But in many cases—if not most—he is unable to do this, and his image of America develops in decidedly ambivalent, if not negative, directions. He often comes to feel that the United States possesses the same features he dislikes about Japan; he begins to "accentuate the negative" in his perceptions of the American scene.

Since the ideologist is deeply interested in ideas, his perceptions of America are centered strongly on those aspects of the society and culture which have often been a challenge for Japanese. Political affairs are important here, and it goes without saying that the young ideologist will be sensitive to any American political developments which appear to him in violation of his expectations. Likewise, he will be sensitive to what he feels is excessive emphasis on advertising in the mass media and the general shallowness of radio, television, and popular magazines. The American educational system often appears to him in the guise of a "conveyor belt," as one student put it, particularly if he has come to a large state-supported institution, fresh from one of the elite Japanese secondary schools or universities. We have already mentioned his desire to mingle socially and intellectually with Americans. In these four areas—politics, popular culture, education, and social relations—the "ideologist" finds aspects of American life which are highly charged for the Japanese constantly being evaluated pro and con: he is searching for answers, and his opinions on these issues are like a teeter-totter, likely to swing to opposite extremes.

The end product may be a partial loss of his initial favorable predisposition towards America, and sometimes—since he has to that extent failed to establish a satisfactory identification with America—a compulsive effort to establish new identification with Japan. One of the students observed reached this stage before his stipulated period of study was over and returned to Japan as quickly as possible. In other cases there is no attempt to rejoin Japanese society, and a state of "double alienation" develops. This is, however, a very fluid point in a continuing process; although the young ideologists reached a stage of double alienation in their ideological perspective¹⁶ soon after their arrival in the States, by the time of their departure they had all grown somewhat closer to Japan and definitely farther from America (although it would be incorrect to view them as completely hostile to the United States). The predeparture images of this type of student are likely to be negative in judgment, but with a mixture of friendliness and hostility. This mixed perspective may be illustrated by the remarks of a young socialist, made in his final interview:

I admit I am more of a reactionary over here—lately. I am undergoing a sort of reaction to the American environment, so it is a sort of Japanese patriotism while I am in the United States. . . . I have become more critical of American culture—and of Japanese culture to some extent. But, I mean that Japanese democracy or Japanese socialism should derive from the Japanese background. . . . The Japanese are too pro-America. . . . They should be more critical of America. . . . In terms of the American concept of democracy, the United States has generally succeeded, but in terms of an outsider's concept—such as a Japanese—she has failed in many areas. This idea of individualism has failed—it won't fit every society.

It should be noted that apart from the drift back toward a Japanese identification, the quotation also reveals the obtrusiveness of the polarity, Japan-

¹⁶ As measured by a special questionnaire on American and Japanese ideology and values, one of a number of instruments used in the study in addition to interviewing.

America. The two do not blend, they contrast.

The Japan-oriented people

In this section, we will examine some types of people who are predominantly oriented toward their own society. It will be found that these, like the alienated people, can have either favorable or unfavorable perspectives toward the United States.

The adjustors

The majority of young Japanese who come to the American campus do so in order to obtain specific training in business and technical fields, such as engineering, administration, or English teaching. In the case of the ideologists, this objective is secondary to other goals, but for the "adjustors," whom we now discuss, it is primary. For the adjustors, America is a source of useful knowledge which will enhance their own careers and, incidentally, serve Japan in good stead. (They usually will be found to emphasize image types V, VI, and parts of II.)

Such students are usually highly identified with Japan as a whole, but their identification is not of such character as to demand an unfavorable orientation towards the United States. Frequently they already have a job or the guarantee of one, and their study in the United States is accepted not as a break, but as an extension of their Japanese educational career. Their image of America—which usually centers around the material rather than the ideological aspects—tends to be moderately favorable, moderately friendly, and rather more realistic as contrasted with the stereotypic images held by many of the women rebels and ideologists. The adjustors characteristically exhibit a "double acceptance" profile in their ideology and values tests, suggesting a high ratio of acceptance of both Japanese and American culture, at least of those aspects in both which they approve—and they tend to perceive in America, as in Japan, largely what they approve. Putting this another way, they habitually "accentuate the positive" in their perceptions of the American scene.

Their adjustmental strategies are, on the whole, efficient and capable. Gratification for them means, by and large, a successful learning experience in their professional fields, and frustration can easily result from attending an institution which does not give them what they want professionally. However, their adjustmental strategy and secondary goals are important here. Take, for example, the case of a young electrical engineer who acquired his Ph.D. in an American university in three years. He had come to the conclusion early in his stay that the electrical engineering curriculum there was actually somewhat inferior to that of his own university in Japan. However, he stayed on because he was able to satisfy secondary goals centering around the need for new and broadening social experiences, and he estimated that whatever his private judgment might be, the American academic degree would be highly valued in his particular field back home. His image of America, in spite of the frustration of his primary goals and objectives, remained positive and friendly.

As might be expected, the adjustor characteristically does not resent the identification of "Japanese" given him by his American hosts. Many of them feel that in some sense they are ambassadors of their country or of its more presentable aspects, and they are anxious to show themselves and Japan to Americans in the best possible light. They are relatively secure in their role of "Japanese" and can derive considerable satisfaction from it, as may be seen in the following quotation:

At this large university, I feel very much a part of the total picture . . . there are many foreign students so that I am only one among many, and I do not attract much attention. When I spent some time in a small town in Indiana I was rather a center of interest and at the same time I felt my role to be somewhat that of ambassador or representative of Japan. Here, though, I simply feel like one of the students. I like both ways, of course.

The adjustor's perception of America can be either broad or narrow; he can be interested in "loaded" aspects of the American scene, as is the ideologist, and in many other things as well. It is not uncommon to find the young adjustor dwelling chiefly on sports, the characteristics of the American landscape, the beauty of American girls, and the marvels of American home comforts. The adjustor attempts to travel in the United States, as do all Japanese students, and when he does he is likely to be interested in the folkways and in the people as interesting human beings, more than in the social, economic, and political trends of the locality. He is, in short, typically less intent than the ideologist upon measuring America, testing hypotheses, or "finding himself"—although these motives are by no means entirely absent from his outlook. All Japanese students in America have them to some extent, because it is an inescapable part of the contemporary atmosphere of Japanese-American relations. But there are differences of degree, and the ideologist-adjustor distinction suggests such a difference.

The nationalist position

The class of Japan-oriented people who are for the most part negatively disposed toward America does, of course, exist, and even within the adjustor group negative views are frequent enough. However, extreme anti-American attitudes or unfavorable images, combined with strong orientation toward Japan, are rare among the exchangeers for the reason that few persons with such views are interested in coming to the United States. This category would include, politically speaking, both extreme right-wing conservatives and pro-Communists. A distinction should be made between Japanese students in America who may possess partially negative views of America and these extreme anti-American, hostile images, which may be called "nationalist." This is particularly important because the negative views of the ideologists and adjustors are likely to be highly realistic (some disapproval may indicate an ability to make realistic discriminations, not stereotypy in these cases), while the genuinely anti-American and nationalist views are often stereotypic.

REALISM VERSUS STEREOTYPY

Therefore, in some sense, the net effect of a stay in the United States is to promote more realistic, if not more favorable, views of America among Japanese. Regardless of the type of student—woman rebel, ideologist, adjustor—there appear to be some grounds for accepting the truism that "travel is broadening," if by "broadening" is meant the formation of a wider reality basis for appraising situations. Unless a Japanese has extreme unfavorable biases (and, as indicated, few of these come to America), he is likely to go home with a firmer basis for judging the pros and cons of life in the United States than he had when he first came. Although he may respond to severe pressures back home to be anti-American, and may even show a disposition in this direction while he is still in America, he has usually learned that the United States is more complex and less formidable than many of his initial stereotypes had suggested.

Thus, while the encounter with American life is a difficult experience for all Japanese, it is apparent that an unfavorable reaction is not inevitable. Adjustments can be made, and exposure to the richness and variety of American life has, to some extent, the effect of promoting a realistic understanding entirely independent of likes and dislikes. This may be accounted a real gain in international understanding, but its durability depends upon the atmosphere encountered by the student after his return to Japan. This subject will be examined in detail in Part II of this paper.

Biographies of Herbert Passin and John W. Bennett appear at the end of the next article, The America-educated Japanese, II.

The America-educated Japanese, II

Images After Return to Japan; Conclusions

By HERBERT PASSIN and JOHN W. BENNETT

AS the student steps from ship or plane and sets foot on the soil of Japan once more, he carries in his miscellaneous assortment of baggage a picture of America which is different from the one he took away with him. For a majority it is a clearer, more realistic picture than the indistinct image with which they left; for some it is much the same old picture; for others it is completely new, even to the frame, the canvas, and the pigments. Just as their image of America had been painted by the totality of their experiences up to that point—before they went abroad as well as during their experience in an alien land—so the retouching and the revision, the setting right of a line, the addition or subtraction of a color, will go on for the rest of their lives. It is our purpose in Part II to inquire into the forces which continue to act upon that inner portrait of America—along with all the attitudes, ideas, hopes, aspirations, and conceptions of one's own country and its institutions that this implies.

THE PROBLEM OF REINTEGRATION

Whatever the views of the particular returnee concerning America may be, all will face one vital problem: how to achieve reintegration into Japanese life. This problem of reintegration has two aspects: acceptance in a career and social acceptance. The career problem is to make the American training a "plus," not a "minus"; social acceptance is a problem of reintegration into cliques and social circles, as well as of adjustment to the contemporary stream of ideas, and is therefore more complex than the career problem.

The most important aspect of social acceptance is what to do about new habits of life, new ways of self-realization and self-expression acquired in America, which may be inappropriate to Japan and which will serve to distinguish the returnees from their fellows. For some, this will be a minor problem, easily resolved, but for students who have been in America a long time and have become thoroughly accustomed to American freedom of interpersonal relations and material comforts, the readjustments may be very painful. They will also have to contend with a general public disposition to be envious of them for having had the privilege of transcending the routine, humdrum existence of their fellows, and critical of them for what is suspected as cultural alienation. They are often felt to be "americanized" in manner and values, critical of Japan, and regarding themselves as superior.

In the career area, the main problem is to secure acceptance of the value of their American education. Persons who go from an established position to study in America will have little difficulty, but those who have had all of their higher education abroad may find that the market value of their training is substantially less than that of an elite Japanese education. They will also discover, possibly, that they are out of touch with the important cliques which serve as channels of advancement in their intended careers.

The strategy of return

Confronted by these problems, the student usually develops for himself what might be called a general "strategy of return"—analogous to the "strategy of adjustment" in America.¹ This may be a very conscious plan of attack or it may be a vaguely systematic way of responding to the pressures which are felt or anticipated. The strategies will differ with the returnee's estimate of the situation that confronts him, his characteristic psychological style, and the nature of his goals. His image of America affects this general strategy and is also affected by it.

Three general factors seem to influence the stability of the images of America which the returnees bring home with them: (1) the extent of identification and alienation in regard to their principal membership groups and to Japan as a whole; (2) the extent to which America and the American experience are a source of gratification and self-esteem in their lives in Japan; and (3) the extent to which, from the perspective of their life plans, America's behavior and relations with Japan allow them to identify with or accept the role of "America-educated returnee," assigned them by the public.

Conflicting identifications

Although for purposes of convenience we speak of the individual's identifications as if they were unidirectional, it should not be assumed that in fact the student is identified with only one group. More characteristically, he is identified with many groups—deriving from family, school, peer, business, and religious connections—whose several atmospheres with respect to the image of America may differ widely. Consequently he may experience conflict on several levels. First, there may be a conflict among his home membership groups. As a member of the class of "intellectuals," he is under the general pressures of the stratum as a whole, which today is somewhat hostile to America. But as a Christian, he may be impelled toward a more favorable interpretation. Second, his conflict of identifications may lie not among specific groups so much as between America "as a whole" and Japan "as a whole." "Japanese or American!" cried a brilliant newspaperman, "that's the question I have never been able to decide all my life." Among older returnees, this problem of conflicting identification, "Japanese or American," has plagued them with tragic tenacity. Some never fully resolve the question; all must deal with it in some manner.

¹ See Part I, section on "The woman rebel."

Obviously the longer the student is in America, the more serious this problem is for him, because there is more time for his American identifications to be strengthened and his home identifications weakened. The problem of divided loyalty, of conflicting identification, is therefore often not as severe in the case of postwar students, especially those who have gone abroad under special governmental programs, because they usually stay for relatively short periods of one or two years. Beyond that point however, the problem of conflicting identification becomes increasingly serious.

The returnee and America's behavior

In the course of his experience, the student develops a set of expectations about what America is and how she will act in certain situations. If America's behavior is in conformity with his expectations, then he finds himself able to identify with her. However, when America's actions violate his expectations, then he is often resentful and disillusioned, and in some cases—as has

THE WOMAN REBEL

The "women rebels," like other extremely alienated students, are so deeply involved with America, and their images of America are so favorable, that in many cases they should properly be characterized as "americanized," that is, they tend to perceive Japan from a strongly American point of view. When the woman returns home, often with great reluctance, it is once again to the situation from which she had "escaped." This time, however, she hopes to make a new, emancipated life for herself and to put into practice her new skills, ideas, and habits of self-expression. By contrast with the Japan she encounters again, she recalls America as a land of freedom for her, where women are given every opportunity for full self-realization. They may have a career if they like, or marriage and family life, which she now feels need not mean the traditional Japanese subordination of the wife to the arbitrary will of the husband and of the needs of the individual to the demands of the traditional family unit, but rather mutual respect and consideration among the members of the family.

To the extent that her experiences in America were enhancing and liberating, she feels her experiences back in Japan as constricting and confining. She is unable to act the part of the traditional meek, submissive Japanese woman which may often be demanded of her, especially in relations with males. If she is not married, she will find that many men (and their families) do not want her for a wife because they think she is too americanized, too forward and aggressive for a woman, too intractable—in fact somewhat defeminized. If she is lucky, she may find a Westernized man whose own values are such that he prefers a wife who can be a companion rather than just a household drudge.

happened in the postwar period—he has felt betrayed and let down. If America does not act as he feels it should, whether it be in regard to liberalism, respect for individual rights, "fairness," or equality of treatment of Japanese, he finds it difficult to continue to accept the American label applied to him by the public. Many make efforts to disassociate themselves from America; or reflect sadly that "this" is no longer the "America that we knew"; or feel that the "true" Americanism—what they had learned and absorbed and accepted as American democracy—must be defended against the Americans themselves.

In order to illustrate these various forces affecting the returnee's image of America, we shall follow the return careers of the three types discussed in Part I under the section "The Japanese Student in America." It will be remembered that they represent selected postwar types, and are not completely illustrative of the prewar student types and their problems.²

² As noted in Part I, the most characteristic prewar type is not discussed except incidentally. This was the young man who came to the United States before completing his Japanese schooling and before establishing secure peer group identifications; or one who stayed in America a long time, usually with some strong revolt motive. Like the woman rebel, their American experience was usually extremely gratifying, and they underwent substantial personality and behavioral changes. Like the women, again, they found their return adjustment to Japan extremely difficult. Unlike the postwar ideologists, who rather quickly become negative towards America, the prewar group remains extremely friendly to America throughout most of their lives, often to their own great detriment. They seem to differ from the postwar ideologists in several key respects: (1) they were more alienated; (2) they came at an earlier age, so that they were more plastic and less attached to Japan; (3) they were more highly gratified while in the United States; (4) they became more americanized; and (5) they were more isolated from peer group attachments upon their return.

Otherwise she may be condemned to spend her days in lonely spinsterhood or seek some desperate solution to the problem of realizing her femininity.

Or she may, instead, elect to devote herself to a career. Here too she will run into many difficulties, although not as many as before the war. There are fewer opportunities for educated women than for men, her tenure will be somewhat insecure, and her pay will be lower than a man's. However, no matter what work she goes into, her American education will be a great asset to her, and today many new opportunities are opening up in such areas as elementary education, girls' colleges, English teaching, women's affairs, foreign trade (especially in foreign firms), and Japanese-foreign liaison. Since the occupation, there has been a vast increase in the number of jobs as well as in the range of roles permitted women.

Whatever course she takes—unusual circumstances aside—the woman rebel's image of America tends to be confirmed and reinforced by her experience. From the point of view of her American experience, she perceives the position of women in Japan as highly constraining; this in turn confirms her image of America as a place of freedom for women. Her relations with Japanese men persuade her all the more firmly that the American norms are superior. If she finds work for which she considers herself qualified, she tends to credit it to her American education. If she is unable to do so, then she blames Japan for not giving women a chance and sees this as further confirmation of her contrasting images of America and Japan.

Group pressures

Although the women rebels are alienated from the traditional norms of Japanese custom, they are not necessarily isolated. At worst they may belong to groups of other women just like themselves. However, it should be noted that many of the groups with which the woman rebel would normally associate are today extremely critical of America, and she must come to terms with them. Some respond by a more tenacious reassertion of their favorable attitudes toward America and withdraw to circles where these are acceptable. Others, however, as part of the process of identifying themselves with the group's goals, may come to share its views of America, or at least to give more prominence to the negative components—always present, even if subordinated—of their own image. Although she is unlikely to have changed her conception of America as a land of freedom for women, she will then be more likely to associate with it her negative judgments of other aspects of American culture, such as race prejudice or restrictions on freedom of speech or the growing "militarization" of American life or the "shallowness" of American culture. This may be accompanied for her by regret that the America she has known is "changing" or is in danger of being displaced by the "new forces."

It is important in this connection to remember that the present atmosphere in Japan exerts very strong pressure on the woman returnee to become unfavorable towards America. If she is associated with groups where American connections are accepted, then she may have no difficulty. But many of the groups to which the woman rebel is drawn because of their general sympathy with the feminist movement are today hostile to the United States, so that the returnees are under pressure to accommodate themselves in order to retain the association. Furthermore, within these groups, increasingly, Russia and China are being offered as competing models for the woman rebel,³ because they too are dedicated to the emancipation of women. Therefore the ideologically oriented woman rebel can turn somewhat away from America without giving up her devotion to the feminine cause; there are other directions in which she can express it.

THE IDEOLOGIST

It will be recalled that these young people are generally disillusioned with their own society and inclined to feel that America holds the answers to their questions. In Japan, they scornfully identify themselves with the so-called après-guerre generation and are often considered Amerika-akogare ("America struck"). Since their expectations are unrealistically exalted, as has been shown in Part I of this paper, they are rather easily frustrated by their experiences in America, and they often return substantially disenchanted with America.

If the ideologist is still in the state earlier referred to as "double rejection," he may withdraw from association with people and escape from both Japan and America, as for example to "French culture," "Asianism," or some other exotic field. He will remain dissatisfied and will continue his search for values and identifications that he can accept.

Very often, however, his partial dissatisfaction with America leads him to search for a basis for re-establishing identifications at home. In some cases it was found that the ideologist's disillusion with America led him to compulsive efforts to identify himself with something in Japan and to a retrospective approval of many things in Japan of which he had disapproved before.

³ A striking example is the recent publicity about the so-called "Russian" and "Chinese" methods of "painless childbirth." A few prominent institutions have begun to offer the treatment on a voluntary basis.

"All this bowing and scraping isn't so bad after all," said a young diplomat. "I used to hate it, but now I think there's something to it. It has an order, a graciousness, and a sense of measure which I had never realized before."

Group pressures

Because of the negative predispositions which may develop during his stay in America, the ideologist tends to be responsive to groups in Japan also having a negative orientation toward America. Since the Japanese intellectual world as a whole is today somewhat negatively disposed on political grounds toward the United States, in almost any identification the returnee establishes therein he will find his own unfavorable inclinations supported by the group atmosphere. In turn, his unfavorable attitude, based on "direct experience" in America, will tend to strengthen the negative direction of the group atmosphere. His own negative dispositions and those of the identification group will echo and amplify each other.

Even if he were not completely negative at the time of his return, the returnee often finds his lingering hesitations swept away by the pressures of the groups with which he desires to identify himself. Their negative orientation will swamp his remaining friendly images and inclinations and will confirm whatever negative ones he has. It must be understood that in many cases this is no simple abstract search for identification. Very often the returnee feels that he will have to make terms with the surrounding pressures if he wishes to continue his career. The atmosphere of the identification group will press the returnee to adapt his image of America by a very selective recall of his American experience. Since most intellectual groups hold the liberal-critical image of America (Type IV) the ideologist will often find in his experience confirmation of "fascist" trends in America, "decline of civil rights," "shallowness" or "lack of culture," "absence of idealism." Some may respond to this pressure with reluctance, but others will not be unduly distressed to give whatever mark of good faith is required by the new identification groups.

In some cases, the disillusioned ideologist may find his identification with groups that are not necessarily negative towards America. In this case, his negative disposition may be somewhat tempered, or, where his hostility to America is only partial, it may be checked.

The extent to which the American experience is a source of professional and social gratification will also be important in the development of his attitudes. In many circles, having been to America will give him no prestige at all, but on the contrary will lay him open to suspicions of being too "pro-American" or "americanized" or "reactionary" or whatever other epithet reflects the bias of the group. Professionally as well, unless he has started from a firm position in Japanese society to which he returns after his American study, he often finds that American training—especially in nontechnical fields—may open no doors for him. In other fields, however, his American experience will be a definite "plus," whatever his own attitude may be. If the social capital brought him by his American study is substantial enough, socially and professionally, he may very well temper his hostility and in some cases even recover a more favorable view of America than he had when he arrived home. Some negatively inclined ideologists are surprised to discover that their status at home has improved because of their American experience, and that the language ability and technical skills they acquired in America are highly esteemed in circles which they respect.

Japanese-American relations

The public identification of "American returnee" is peculiarly important for the ideologist. Since he is very sensitive to ideological issues, he is very attentive to the course of Japanese-American relations. If America pursues a course which is accepted in his groups or which he can defend as "democratic" or "favorable to Japan," then he is able to identify himself with it and to take some pride in his American connection. In this case, the favorable elements of his image of America are strengthened: America is a democratic country; it is helpful to Japan; it does support the position of his group. If America's course is defined in a contrary manner, then his negative views are strengthened. In the early period of the occupation, for example, many returnees along with other intellectuals enthusiastically espoused the American reforms. When occupation policy shifted to emphasis on economic rehabilitation and then later to the reconstitution of Japan as an ally, many of them felt not only in disagreement but also peculiarly outraged and betrayed.

Since one of the ideologist's main goals has been to associate with Americans on a level of equality, he will often be extremely sensitive to anything that suggests a slight or a failure to accord him the treatment to which he feels he is entitled. The occupation period has therefore been peculiarly trying, because Americans inevitably had a superior status to which it has been difficult for these returnees to adjust. For students who had learned in America how to interact with Americans on a plane of equality, to return to a situation of inferiority has been extremely galling.

One young man of upper-class origin sneered:

Look at these colonels lording it over everybody here. You'd think that they had always been used to this high living. But I have known them in America; I have seen them washing dishes and helping with the household chores. They're just ordinary people. I have utter contempt for the way they behave here.

Even the prewar group—who, by contrast with the postwar "ideologists" discussed here, have managed to retain their favorable attitudes towards America throughout their lives—are vulnerable to this experience.

THE ADJUSTOR

The adjustor usually returns from America feeling that he has had a satisfactory experience and that he has acquired skills and knowledge which he will be able to use. Although he thinks highly of America, and especially of her technology, power, and efficiency, he is glad to be back home in Japan. His life in America has been satisfying, he has had new experiences, and he has perhaps experienced a freedom in living styles and a vacation from home responsibilities that he has enjoyed. But he is glad to return to customs, habits, and behaviors that are more familiar and less of a strain.

Since he usually starts from a fairly secure position at home, very often it is expected that he will put the ideas, knowledge, and skill he has acquired in America to work. Therefore he has gratifying experiences immediately. He soon learns, however, that it is advisable for him to be cautious about flaunting his American experience, because some people will be jealous and resentful, and others will be hostile to America.

If, however, he is unable to make use of his American training, or if he receives no recognition for it—because, let us say, he did not have a really secure place, or his employers are not interested—then the adjustor may see this as further proof of Japan's backwardness and of America's advancement. His negative feelings about Japan—that it is backward, unprogressive, rigid—will be strengthened.

Group pressures

The highly alienated people⁴ are often outside and independent of home groups, or else they may keep themselves within milieux which are extremely indulgent towards their American experience, such as American returnee circles and mission institutions. But the adjustor types, with fairly strong original ties in Japan, are peculiarly affected by the atmosphere within which they must live. It is therefore very important to understand the images of America which characterize the specific groups in which they interact.

If his major home membership groups are somewhat hostile to America, the adjustor will incline to acquiesce in their views, because even if he has developed a somewhat friendly view of America during his stay, he is not strongly committed to it and not deeply involved in it. This can happen to many of the adjustors whose main sphere of activity is in intellectual areas as, for example, universities or certain newspapers or the higher levels of government service.

However, there are many groups in Japan which have a dominantly favorable image of America or an outlook not incompatible with a favorable image. When the returnee's identification is with such groups, his favorable images are subjected to much less pressure. For example, people associated with church activities, engineering, and business circles, or with the Boy Scouts, are able to maintain a favorable image more easily than are people associated with, say, the Teachers' Union. Again, upper-class identification seems to allow the individual considerable latitude; upper-class returnees often retain their favorable images of America fairly easily not only because the upper classes are somewhat favorable to America today, but also because they seem to be able to accommodate nonconformity more easily.

⁴ For example, women rebels or "ideologists." Among the prewar students, almost all of those who had gone at an early age or had stayed a long time would have been in this category.

Advancement in a career

Generally, the adjustor has acquired some social capital as a result of his American study. Since he is able to attribute his gratifications and the enhancement of his position and his self-esteem to America, his favorable images are strengthened. An engineer, for example, who is able to put his newly acquired skills to work in his company, and perhaps receive a promotion, feels very warm towards the United States. In many cases, individuals are accepted specifically because of their American experiences as, for example, an English teacher who receives respect and advantages because he has studied English literature in America, or a person who becomes an accountant because he has learned American double-entry book-keeping. In these cases, the favorable images of America tend to remain steady, and they will even resist substantial attack.

Japanese-American relations

Although the adjustor has a relatively stable position at home and is not too deeply involved with America, he is, like all returnees, affected by changes in the atmosphere of Japanese-American relations. Like the others, he has the problem of the extent to which he can accept the public identity of "America-connected" that may be thrust upon him. Since he is less ego-involved with America, he may be able to handle it somewhat more easily than other types, but he cannot escape the matter entirely. When America's course appears congenial to his reference groups—whether in business or the intellectual world—he can identify himself with America easily. But when America's action is contrary to his expectations and causes him difficulties, he is able to reject the identification fairly easily because of his relative noninvolvement. If his position is very secure, however, he may be able to exert a moderating and tempering influence around him by being "objective" about America. But if in his associations with Americans—individuals, companies, government agencies, embassies, institutions—he is not accorded the equality and respect he feels he deserves, then, like the other types, the adjustor may easily become very resentful and hostile.

In general, however, since the adjustor sees himself primarily as a Japanese, securely identified and located at home and relatively uninvolved emotionally with America, he can adjust his image of America rather easily to whatever the circumstances of his life—his identifications and associations, his career situation, the general political atmosphere—seem to require.

SPECIFIC PROBLEMS

Having considered the general character of the Japanese student's image of America both during his American sojourn (Part I) and upon his return home (Part II), we wish now to turn our attention to two specific problems: (1) the effects of the American occupation on the Japanese student image of America and (2) the development of a "realistic" view of American life and culture.

THE OCCUPATION

The occupation has dominated contemporary Japanese experience in a way that has yet to reveal its full significance. As noted in the section "Historical Backgrounds" in Part I, the occupation was in a sense the culmination of several generations of Japanese-American relations in which America played a kind of tutorial role, with Japan as disciple or pupil. The occupation reaffirmed that role, but because the context of relations it created was on the whole unpleasant for Japan—dependency, helplessness, subordination—the ambivalent attitudes were intensified.

The "power image"

Very briefly, the occupation brought with it an intensification of several elements of the traditional images of America, namely, those concerned with America's power and strength. On the unfavorable side, Americans are seen as arrogant, demanding, pushing, disrespectful, high living, luxury loving, and corruptible. The more favorable obverse of this is that Americans are skillful, accomplished, generous, bighearted, and tolerant. Obviously this occupation-period power image is related to the images described earlier, but since it has been reinforced by the direct personal experience of many people it has the possibility of becoming the dominant image of America in Japan.

For a good part of the younger generation in Japan, it is this image of Americans which has replaced, or fused with, the images which derive from the earlier historical relations between Japan and America. Many of the younger students who have come to the United States in the postwar period have had a substantial part of this view built into their composite image of America. For many, the image has not been a settled thing so much as it has been a question, an issue to be resolved: Are Americans the powerful, arrogant people we see or are told about, or are they the accomplished, considerate, friendly people that they sometimes appear to be? Many Japanese endeavor to resolve this question in their own minds while they are in the United States. Therefore their judgment of the Americans they see in Japan forms an important part of the framework of perception with which the postwar students see America.

Throughout the occupation period, Japanese had to "look upward" to Americans because of their power and status—even if not because of their presumed personal qualities of intelligence and ability. Therefore there has been a strong appeal in the idea of sharing some of the "superior" qualities they perceived in Americans by going to the same fount of wisdom, America or, alternatively, American educational institutions. The occupation period has seen the revival of the "Western fever" which raged during the Meiji era when the West exerted an irresistible fascination.

A typical case is an upper-class college student who had gone to work for the occupation because he was attracted by the strength and energy of the Americans and also because he had to earn money to go through school. He was so much impressed by the Americans that he could not rest until he had left his university in mid-term and gone to America. "I wanted to see what it was they had, these bright young men who were running our country. I felt that whatever it was, we Japanese should have some of it too." The Americans with whom he associated in Japan became for him a standard against which to measure himself: was he as good as they or not? It was under the impulsion of this combined image motivation that he spent three years in the United States, learning what he could for himself and for his country and measuring himself in the process. When he returned to Japan, he had finally come to feel that Japanese could stand up to Americans, that he had acquired what he needed from America (and, incidentally, that it was not so much), and that there was much he still needed from Japan rather than from America.

EXPERIENCE IN AMERICA

While they are in the United States, many young Japanese respond to this power image with an attitude of virtual self-abasement before the "superior" Americans—these poised, self-confident, breezy, achieving people. This high-status image of Americans—which existed in the past but has been intensified by the occupation—can constitute an insurmountable obstacle to social interaction with Americans, and many postwar Japanese students are unable to transcend it in the short year or two of their stay in the United States.⁶ Others find that they can interact with Americans on a basis of equality, and the discovery that a Japanese can attain a common level with Americans, in America, is a gratifying experience indeed—although, as has been made clear in other contexts, this gratification by itself will not necessarily ensure a friendly view of the United States. In some cases, it serves as a demonstration that Japanese can do as well as Americans if they choose.

These exalted images of America have been strengthened by the tensions of ⁶ This problem is the subject of special investigation in the research program and involves the concept of "cue confusion"; that is, a misunderstanding, by both the Japanese and the American, of the appropriate "cues" for behavior in social interaction.

the unique historical experience of defeat and occupation by a reforming conqueror. Consequently, an exposure to American life as it is actually lived tends to break up the "superman" stereotype. The longer the student is in the United States and the wider his circle of contacts and relationships, the more he comes to develop a realistic perspective toward the superman components of his image. Americans come to be seen in different contexts: they, too, are pitiable, weak, ordinary, prone to make mistakes, confused—like other people. Many are able to see American power as an incident of current world developments rather than as an inherent attribute of American national character. This exposure to American life unquestionably helps to reduce the excessive emphasis on power and wealth which is so characteristic of many contemporary images of the United States, and it makes Americans appear, not cold and remote, but human and fallible.

THE REALISTIC VIEW

It is therefore to be expected that many students return with more moderate views of America than those with which they went. Those who went with exalted images of America usually return seeing America as somewhat less than they had imagined. They feel that it is no longer unattainable and that, however advanced it may be in many respects, America differs from Japan only in degree. A newspaperman who went to the United States to study public opinion techniques had gone with the idea that American techniques were hopelessly beyond the attainment of Japanese. But, "I was able to put things in perspective," he said.

I had always felt, like all Japanese, that the United States is much more advanced than Japan. And this I found to be true. But I was also able to discover the limits of this advancement. I gained confidence that American advancement is not completely out of sight, that it is attainable for us too. Japanese who have never been to the States think of the United States as a paradise, perfect in all respects. But I have seen it whittled down to size. I know what is strong about it, but I also know what is weak. The main thing I have learned is that it is normal and human. There are poor people as well as rich people. Not all houses are big and beautiful. On the other side of the fence, the race problem is not all as bad as it is supposed to be. . . . Americans are not all happy in their paradise. The great technical advances in the United States are not miraculous and mysterious; they are the result of favorable circumstances and hard work. Japanese can attain them to the extent that they are necessary.

It is not only the exalted views that change, of course. Students with extremely unfavorable components in their image of America also seem to undergo a tempering experience. A brilliant young diplomat of aristocratic, nationalistic lineage, who retained much of his hatred of Americans as the wartime enemy, found that two years in America changed his conception of what Americans were like. They did not all look down on Japan, as he had suspected; they were not all arrogant and ruthless; and they were not all shallow. At the same time, however, he noted that life in America was not quite as unfettered and free as he had believed.

In the words of a crack newspaperman who has had the advantages and disadvantages of public association with America throughout his adult life:

That exchange program's a great thing, I'm telling you. Those kids come back convinced; they learn all kinds of things. They see America as it is, not as they thought it was. They see it's better than they thought and worse than they thought.

Precisely how many Japanese who visit the United States return with this realistic image is not known, but to the extent that they do the exchange program may be regarded as successful. For, in the last analysis, what more can we ask of foreign visitors than that, whether they like us or not, their attitude be based upon America as a reality, not as a stereotype?

Herbert Passin, Columbus, Ohio, research associate in anthropology, Ohio State University, has served on the faculties of Northwestern University and the University of California (Berkeley) in anthropology and was formerly deputy chief, Division of Public Opinion and Sociological Research, Civil Information and Education Section, Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers, Japan. He is coauthor of The Japanese Village in Transition (1950) and of numerous articles on social change in rural southern Illinois, culture and food habits, culture change among the Tarahumara Indians of Mexico, and Japanese and other Far Eastern subjects. He was formerly contributing editor of Acta Americana (journal of the Inter-American Society for Anthropology and Geography).

John W. Bennett, Ph.D., Columbus, Ohio, is associate professor of anthropology at the Ohio State University. He has served as chief of the Public Opinion and Sociological Research Division of the Occupation of Japan and has conducted research for the United States Department of Agriculture, the University of Chicago, the Social Science Research Council, and several wartime governmental agencies. He is presently supervisor of the Research Program in Japanese Social Relations, at Ohio State, and is author of a series of research monographs on Japanese society. He is a social anthropologist by training, but has done extensive work in the fields of sociology and social psychology, and is Vice-President of the Society for Applied Anthropology. In addition to numerous articles in professional journals, he is coauthor with Melvin Tumin of Social Life: Structure and Function (1949).

The Mexican Student Views the United States*

By RALPH L. BEALS

THE close proximity of Mexico and the United States means that the Mexican student usually arrives in this country with enough knowledge to make a rapid and satisfactory adjustment. Many students spend several years in this country, interspersed with visits home. They tend to scatter widely through the country, and it is difficult to find a reasonably large group for study at a single university.

This paper is based primarily upon intensive guided interviews with ten students at the University of California at Los Angeles; the total hours for each student ranged from five to more than twenty. Confirmatory evidence is provided by background information, a simple projective test, and an ideological test from over forty additional students from seven other universities and colleges. The majority of the students interviewed were graduate students. All were mature, serious, and intelligent. Opinions often were positive and the result of serious reflection. Overwhelmingly they come from middle- and upper-class urban backgrounds.

On arrival the Mexican student finds the material surroundings and living conditions much as he expected. He is prepared to adjust his way of living in situations where a student from a more similar Anglo-Saxon background may see only a senseless and irritating deviation from a familiar pattern. On the other hand, unlike the Japanese student, he is able to accept most American behavior at face value. But when less tangible aspects of culture are encountered the Mexican student has to modify many of his views. These modifications consist primarily in discovering the limited applicability of opinions and the development of complementary or extended images.

MACHINES AND WEALTH

The student changes little in his view of United States material culture. Although students know some Americans are poor, American living standards are believed to be high. Expectations of a mechanical civilization with many gadgets are fulfilled. American diet is good but the food is without inspiration. Large cities, big buildings, and heavy traffic the student expects, but he usually comes from or has lived in the fourth city of the hemisphere and reiteration of "the biggest and the best" irritates him mildly. The United States is ... a big country with civilized people, all of them, or at least most of them, having a high standard for living well. ... I knew that ... the worker of a factory has his own car and his refrigerator ... all the things that make for a comfortable living which in Mexico our laborers don't have.

SPIRITUAL VERSUS MATERIAL VALUES

On arrival most students accept and are little disturbed by the technical and mechanical superiority of the United States because they are convinced of the moral superiority of Mexican culture with its primary emphasis upon spiritual values. They are sure that, although relatively few are in want, Americans are selfish and irreligious. Family life is lacking, divorce is almost universal, children are without discipline, "all American girls are easy," and there is no respect for art, literature, or music. These views are modified but not without struggle.

The impression we had was that the United States didn't care very much about art or people who really counted. I believed Americans did not teach anything about living; being phlegmatic, practical, not sentimental, not having poetry. ... Of course, afterwards, this changed when I began reading other things.

Not only are the moral aspects of social relations seen to be very different (these will be discussed more fully later), but some come to feel that Americans are more religious than Mexicans. At least, most are aware that church attendance, especially among men, is greater. The number of Catholics and Catholic churches and the number of Catholics in high position are a great surprise to many students. Others develop considerable interest in the role of Protestantism. One thoughtful Catholic student regularly attended services at a Protestant church. At the end of a year he concluded that he must respect sincere Protestants as he had come to respect any group with sound moral standards. (At the same time, he was convinced that Catholicism was best for Mexico and for himself.)

Some students continue to complain that they find less opportunity to attend cultural events, such as concerts, than they had in Mexico, although in fact they fail to attend convenient, high quality, and inexpensive concerts, theater, and lectures on campus. Other students recognize that desires for a good income, a good home, and a car are equally strong at home. The major difference is seen to be that these are realizable goals for many more people in the United States. Many say that American students are motivated in their studies only by desires for personal advancement, while Mexican students wish to contribute to the development of their country. At the same time, paradoxically, they feel that Americans are less egocentric and more sociocentric, more willing to devote themselves to the welfare of society.

The discovery that the dichotomy between materialistic and spiritual goals is less sharp than expected seems to pose a severe threat to the self-esteem of the Mexican student. Only students with an objective sense of cultural relativism seem undisturbed. Others either seem ripe for alienation from their own culture or take refuge in an iteration of moral superiority.

Thus a student admires the high standard of living in the United States but finds social patterns "much looser than ours," and thinks that the achievement "led them [Americans] to lose all those moral values of our time." "I still think that we pay more attention to moral values." "I still think that almost all the people in the United States think that the only goal in life is to get money, to get work. ... Besides making money, we have another goal."

INDIVIDUALISM WITH ORDER

Initially the student often sees in the United States the apex of "mass culture" and the prototype of the "mass man." He is apt soon to recognize that there are other kinds of individualism than the Spanish derived "egoismo" of the Mexican. It is true that few make the connection between United States individualism and the relative independence of children and of women.

In Mexico ... a boy of eighteen years old is really a boy; he belongs completely to his parents. Here an eighteen-year-old boy, he knows how to do things, he knows how to choose between things, he knows how to answer for himself. That's what I mean by individualism.

* This project is part of a program sponsored by the Committee on Cross-Cultural Education of the Social Science Research Council and supported by grants to the Council from the Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation, and the Rockefeller Foundation.

Most students observe more respect for law and order in the United States and relate this to greater respect for others and their rights. One student early said, "There exists here a great liberty which is frequently converted into license, a license which is beyond that which is moral." Later he said:

... here in America they have really a wider freedom than we have back home, in everything. And they have a more wide concept of democracy, and their system of education creates more individualistic ways, and they are brought up in a more independent way of thinking. . . . The standard of living is more standardized than back home, and that happens with education, and so the social circle you can live in here is wider than back home.

The same student at first said Americans were superficial; later he remarked: "... now I've met more of them . . . now I can realize very clearly that they have another character and another way of thinking."

Previous attitudes toward economic life are affected by the new view of individualism. Thus, one student points out that the American economic system is more practical than the Mexican because all Americans work together for common goals. At the same time, as another comments, "In the United States great companies, great capital, exist, but still there is opportunity for competition."

More than on any other single aspect, Mexican students agree that what they like best in the United States is order. This emerges repeatedly in both interviews and projective materials. Expressions range from admiration for the greater respect for law and order to the way traffic is regulated, to the ease of getting a laboratory experimental animal. The order of American life appeals even to those who maintain relatively hostile attitudes toward the United States. After an unpleasant experience on a visit home, one hostile subject exclaimed: "This could never have happened in the United States!"

SOCIAL RELATIONS

Although most students reject traditional Mexican society, they are surprised by the weakness of class distinctions in the United States. One student, here for several years, says his worst shock was to see the president of a bank wash the living-room windows in preparation for a party. Another remarks that here even a boy of the upper class does not mind working in a gas station or a grocery store, or selling papers. In Mexico this would be considered "... a terrible thing for those who do it. 'Can't his family support him?'" "Something that impressed me very much was the confidence of the people themselves."

The father of this girl was working until eleven or twelve o'clock at night, and he got his hands covered with oil. His behavior and way of treating us [were] exactly the same as the wealthy people, so that they don't feel bad if they are workers and if they have dirty hands, and they try to have the same things the wealthy people have—a refrigerator and a radio and a stove, and some things that can make life comfortable. That impressed me very much. In my own country the people that work with their hands are considered very low and, well, their behavior is in general really low.

Great differences are perceived between child-rearing practices and the social position of women in the two countries. Except for a few males, students shift images radically and favorably. Although students continue to feel that American family life is less close and rewarding, that our divorce rate is undesirably high, and that many children have insufficient discipline, they reject the authoritarian family patterns of Mexico in favor of the better examples of American family life and child rearing. Shifts are most marked among women and among males resident some time in the United States, least marked or absent among a few males retaining a highly traditional outlook.

Mexican males revise their opinions that "all American girls are easy," but, regardless of time spent in the United States, they react strongly to the subject of American women with many contradictory comments. American girls are found easy to meet and to get on with. Often men admire the relaxed and sexually impersonal friendships that may exist between boys and girls. On the other hand, casual affections and intimacies which in Mexico are associated either with a serious courtship or with looseness here mean neither, to the confusion and perplexity of the Mexican male.

Mexican girls have less difficulty in understanding the United States male, although the greater informality is at first interpreted as lack of respect and is resented. Girls like the greater freedom they have in the United States, but American boys seem superficial. One girl at first thought American boys would make good husbands; later she hoped that she could find a Mexican "with something inside him," but who had been in the United States long enough to have acquired American attitudes toward women. Put crudely, some Mexican girls want continuation of the extreme formality and courtesy they might expect in upper-class circles in Mexico before marriage, but they also want a husband who will wash the dishes.

Mexicans feel that Americans are very friendly and courteous, but that they do not make friendships. The majority wish to be associated with American students and to know them better; inability to do so often is a major source of disappointment. Mexicans recognize that the American student is busy and preoccupied with the established ties of his home environment, but they find social relationships to be highly superficial and somewhat disappointing. Many say that they associate with other foreign students only because of insufficient social contacts with United States students. On the other hand, some students find that to know foreign students from many countries is an important unexpected gain from their stay in the United States. Often they form quite new impressions: "I considered [some of] them backward countries, I didn't know of many of the latest advances—so I had to change my mind on many things."

THE UNIVERSITY

The Mexican student often is shocked at the competitiveness engendered by the university grading system in the United States. Others apparently expect it. Some think the professors present their material in less organized fashion than in Mexico, but most say that the informality of presentation makes teaching more effective. Greater opportunities for discussion, less authoritarian presentation, and more contacts with the professor are seen as advantages, although some had expected to find more than exists. Those few, however, in whom some professor has taken close personal interest obviously find this tremendously rewarding. Success in achieving academic goals and the establishment of reasonably satisfying social relationships increase favorableness toward the university.

DEMOCRACY AND IMPERIALISM

United States politics and foreign policy are of deep concern to a substantial number of Mexican students. This concern seems to be more objective and less emotional than is the case with students from some other countries. The importance of the United States on the world scene is no new thing to the Mexican, and he has learned to live with the facts even though he may not entirely like them.

The Mexican student tends to support current United States foreign policy, although he has misgivings about the future. He believes the United States is and should be economically and militarily strong and must maintain a firm policy toward Russia. Although he does not believe that the United States is always right and Russia is always wrong, few consider the United States today militarily aggressive or politically imperialistic. In part this is because the American people are seen as not imperialistic; indeed, some students, especially those who have been in the Middle West, feel Americans are too isolationist. Economic imperialism is thought to exist, but the Marshall Plan and Point Four are generally viewed as primarily altruistic, despite elements of self-interest.

Students who formerly regarded the United States as imperialistic tend to modify their views. One rather anti-American student admits that some kinds of "economic imperialism" can be beneficial for underdeveloped countries. Others recognize differences in corporations, and all tend to make sharper distinctions between corporations, government, and the American people. As one said:

Before the war I had a certain prejudice against the United States. . . . During the war they were constructing a big plantation. . . . I saw one camp, a working camp. It was one of the most pitiful things I have ever seen.

Yet he added:

Some of my best friends are Americans. . . . I'm not prejudiced against Americans. No, I really like people for what they're worth, and I do like Americans, and I do like certain parts of the way of living, the American way of life. . . .

Most students may feel that the United States is not today imperialistic, except to some degree in the economic field, but they fear a revival. In evaluating these fears it should be remembered that memories of United States intervention are still vivid in Mexico. They anticipate that America will in the future re-embark upon an imperialistic course.

The United States is thought by most students to have an effective functioning political democracy. Some feel the effectiveness is lessened by the power of the mass media and perhaps underestimate the long range discrimination of the American voter. Few know much of the history of liberalism or the labor movement in the United States, and some are deeply concerned with what they perceive as trends toward fascism. Domestically they cite such names as McCarthy, Jenner, and McCarran in support of their view. Externally, they point out United States support of fascist governments in Latin America and elsewhere, governments they feel will turn against the United States whenever it is to their interest to do so. Fear of fascist trends is associated with fear of imperialism and a revival of past United States policies in Latin America. To these fascist trends they attribute the rising anti-American sentiment throughout Latin America.

Discrimination

Linked to belief in fascist trends in contemporary United States political life is the amount of intolerance and discrimination encountered. Even the best-prepared students are surprised and shocked by the discrepancy between professed democratic ideals and the discrimination against Negroes in the United States, especially in the South. On the other hand, little room tion can be discovered toward discrimination against Mexicans and Mexican-Americans in the United States.

Acceptance of discrimination against Mexican-Americans reveals the strength of class attitudes and class identifications among even the most liberal students. Few students have themselves experienced discrimination in the United States; individual maliciousness or bigotry is not so interpreted. Rather, discrimination against Mexican-Americans is interpreted in "home country" class terms. Thus a student who is deeply moved by the condition of the Negro in the South can say:

Of course, we know that Mexicans are discriminated against in a social way, because they are poor; but if they are rich they are not discriminated [against]. . . . I think people in Mexico believe that Mexican-Americans are discriminated [against] not exactly because they are Mexican, but because they are poor and ignorant, just like they would be discriminated [against] even in Mexico.

SOURCES OF PRECONCEPTIONS AND THEIR CHANGES

In few other countries are opportunities to learn about the United States as good as in Mexico. Mexican periodicals carry considerable United States news. Many United States radio stations may be heard in Mexico. Students often have read widely in American literature. Friends, relatives, and associates have been in the United States, and most students have had some contact with the many American visitors in Mexico. Finally, more than half of the students have traveled in the United States before coming to school here. More than a quarter have attended more than one United States school, and two-fifths have relatives in the United States.

Observation and personal contacts contribute more to preconceptions about the United States than do books or the mass media. Motion pictures in particular are heavily discounted. Most students believe Mexican-made motion pictures give a totally false picture of Mexico and see no reason to place greater reliance on the Hollywood product. Some, however, think that while motion pictures give a distorted view of life in the United States they reveal much about the psychology of the North Americans. The unfavorable image of family life in the United States and belief in the near universality of divorce very likely come from the motion picture.

Another potent source of unfavorable impressions is the behavior of many tourists and students in Mexico. Although Mexicans meet some moral, well-behaved, and good-mannered tourists and students, the observable scandalous or ill-bred conduct of some is taken to be the norm for the majority and to be a reflection of the general moral level of the nation.

The Mexican social and political environment and intellectual traditions likewise contribute to student attitudes. Anti-Americanism is popular in Mexico. The student who elects to study in the United States knows that a political career will be impossible; nevertheless, he absorbs some of the atmosphere about him. Moreover, the tradition of the superiority of European, and particularly French, culture persists. Most students strongly oriented toward humanistic values—and this includes many students of the social sciences—would have gone to European universities had they been able to do so.

Books and periodicals play a larger part in forming favorable preconceptions. But personal contacts again seem the primary source, in this case either with returnees who give favorable reports or with respected United States citizens, usually through friendships, or with business or school associates.

CHANGING IMAGES AFTER ARRIVAL

Length of stay, closeness of contacts, and types of interest have much to do with the degree to which images change after arrival. Students here for a short time are not apt to become familiar with domestic politics; some have never heard of McCarthy and one thought Dean Acheson British. Students in some technical fields learn little outside their specialty; one of the students most favorable to the United States knew the least about it. Whether preconceptions are favorable or unfavorable, the most usual shift is not to discard them completely, but to discover that they are not representative. Students who admire United States democracy discover segregation. Critics of American family life discover examples they admire. In all but the most superficial matters, however, only time and favorable personal contacts can provide opportunities for better understanding.

Background, field of interest, and motivations likewise affect the student's perceptions in the United States. Those interested in technical training in the physical or biological sciences or engineering may have limited experience and interest, while those concerned with social and political problems often show considerable insight and are constructively critical.

Whatever their field of interest, students come overwhelmingly from middle- to upper-class families with fathers engaged in business or a profession. While about 20 per cent are born in small towns, the majority are educated in the city (including elementary education). Half received all or part of their secondary education in Mexico City and another quarter in one of the three next largest cities. More than a quarter have had some secondary education in the United States, and nearly a quarter have attended a "foreign" school in Mexico (for example, the American School in Mexico City).

That nearly a third are wholly or partially self-supporting while about two-fifths are wholly supported by their families suggests strong motivations. Students on fellowships are the smallest category. Nearly half are graduate students. About a third are in professional schools and curricula; the next largest number are studying business subjects. Nearly one-third of the group have teaching, research, writing, or similar pursuits as goals. Ability and seriousness of purpose are suggested by University of California statistics for a six-year period showing that Mexican undergraduates make better grades than do United States students or foreign students from Canada, England, Scandinavia, and a number of other countries.

The Mexican student is not typical even of his middle- and upper-class urban background. The career goals of women students set them apart from most Mexican women. Men students present a more complex picture. Those oriented toward the industrialization of Mexico are apt to be economically and politically conservative, as these terms are understood in the United States; at the same time, they represent the sharpest break with Mexican tradition. A substantial number, imbued with ideas of social reform and progress, are more closely identified with the Nationalistic agrarian reform movements characteristic of all but recent post-Revolutionary governments. A lesser number, primarily oriented toward research or professional training, tend toward traditional values. To the confusion of the North American, such individuals may also be strongly anticlerical, for the distinction between the devout Catholic, the anticlerical, the nonreligious, and the Protestant cuts across many other categories.

Nevertheless, most Mexican students see Mexico as a country undergoing major social, cultural, and economic changes, and on many subjects consider themselves more "liberal" or "advanced" than is the average Mexican. Virtually all students see themselves in advance of their fellow-countrymen in concern with functioning political democracy and in the rejection of authoritarian patterns both in public life and in the family (although here contradictory attitudes emerge). They favor greater liberality in child training, and much greater social equality for women. On the other hand practically all students give higher value to humanistic and cultural goals than to materialistic and economic goals. Finally, with few exceptions, the Mexican student believes himself to be motivated at least in part by patriotic, unselfish goals and wishes to contribute to the welfare of his country. Such goals need not conflict with desires for personal wealth, prestige, and achievement.

LIMITATIONS OF THE STUDY

A final word of caution seems necessary. Mexican students probably differ markedly from other Latin American students; certainly many Mexican students believe this to be the case. Consequently, without further study, application of the remarks in this paper to other Latin American students would be quite hazardous. Closer prior contacts and more serious motivation account in part for differences. Even more important is the overwhelming influence of the Mexican Revolution and its violent disruption of the essentially feudalistic social patterns still characteristic of much of Latin America. Class and status considerations still are important, but most Mexican students are strongly oriented toward a dynamic society recognizing individual achievement and with an expanding economy. Interview materials reiterate the themes of progress, of social service and democracy, to a greater degree than is to be expected among most other Latin American students.

Numerous aspects of the Mexican image of the United States have not been touched upon. Neither has it been possible to give attention to the range of individual variation. Few students are either wholly favorable or wholly unfavorable. Students with predominantly antagonistic attitudes may state that their professors are magnificent. Students who are friendly and intelligent critics contrast with students who exhibit generalized hostility and rejection. Deserving of further investigation is the student who is equally hostile toward his home culture and toward the United States. In a word, students are people, and however valid generalizations can be concerning the group, variations in class, occupational, and regional origins, the idiosyncratic nature of personal experience, and the rich variety of human personality must be taken into account in understanding the individual student.

Ralph L. Beals, Ph.D., Los Angeles, California, is professor of anthropology and sociology in the University of California at Los Angeles. He has served as president of the American Anthropological Association and board member of the Social Science Research Council, and is present chairman of the Council's Committee on Cross-Cultural Education. He is author of numerous papers and monographs dealing for the most part with Latin America, including Cheran: A Sierra Tarascan Village (1944), Culture Patterns of Mexican-American Life (1951), Acculturation, Economics and Social Change in terms of Mexican-American Life (1951), Social Stratification in Latin America (1953), An Introduction to Ecuadorean Village (1951), Social Stratification in Latin America (1953), and The Village in an Industrial World (1953).

The Mexican Image of Americans*

By NORMAN D. HUMPHREY

THE images that Mexicans have of the United States result not only from a wide variety of experience with Americans and American culture, but also from the different social perspectives of Mexican viewers.

RURAL AND LOWER-CLASS MEXICANS

Rural and lower-class persons have few mass-media contacts with the United States. Few images reach them through the printed word, and, although half of the movies shown each week in the Mexican theaters are about the United States, almost all are "Westerns" which depict an outmoded if not fantastic version of American society and culture.

On the other hand, they have a good deal of experience with Americans directly. The majority of adult males in many small towns in such centrally located states as Michoacan or Jalisco have been in the United States, and in nearly every Mexican town and urban neighborhood will be found some residents who have visited the country. Millions of contrabandos, or "wet-backs," cross the border each year for varying lengths of time, and virtually every Mexican has some close friend or relative who is a permanent resident in the United States. The number of upper- and middle-class Mexicans who have been students in American universities and who thereby "know" Americans and United States civilization is small compared with that of lower-class migrants.

* This project is part of a program sponsored by the Committee on Cross-Cultural Education of the Social Science Research Council and supported by grants to the Council from the Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation, and the Rockefeller Foundation.

Discrimination and friendliness

In view of the discrimination they experience in the United States, surprisingly few of this vast population of working-class and rural ex-migrants have come back with unfavorable reports. In fact, as a group they bear amazing good will to the country. One reason for this is that they are used to class discrimination at home. Moreover, Texas and Texans are regarded separately and known only incidentally as belonging to the United States. These semiliterate ex-migrants are regarded with favor by their working-class peers for their American knowledge and thus constitute a great reservoir of good will for the United States.

UPPER-CLASS ATTITUDES

In this attitude they contrast sharply with their literate, striving, strongly nationalistic "intellectual" superiors, who generally do not possess such favorable imagery, or do so only occasionally under circumstances evoking sentimental nostalgia. Educated persons who have not been in the United States, correspondingly, often view Americans as crass materialists—engineers or businessmen—wealthy yet eager for money and quite devoid of culture in its highest sense. The United States with its vast technology and power, as portrayed in periodicals, is to many of them a Roman Empire on the edge of catastrophe. It has the minor virtue, however, of opposing Russian Communism. Among such persons great value is placed on technology, on the one hand, but on the other there is a firm and unequivocal belief that technology as an alleged basis for culture is inferior to poetry, philosophy, and a feeling for art and music, which Mexicans regard as peculiarly Latin concerns. Their conception of American power, especially the power to intervene actively in the civil affairs of Mexico, is much greater than any ever contemplated by Americans themselves.

AMERICANS VISITING MEXICO

The usual conception of the touring American, from whatever Mexican perspective, is that of a person who is rich and powerful, and who, despite the fact that he buys respect, is worthy of extreme courtesy. The American's forthrightness and bluntness indicate his lack of courtesy and insensitiveness to the feelings of others. Since the United States is a powerful and rich country, any representative of the American people (and each tourist is such) is in some degree powerful, and at the same time not completely trustworthy. He should be, however, dealt with in an extremely courteous way. With the American, as with any stranger, a Mexican must be on his guard and at the same time extend the generosity which should be given to anyone from another land. The Mexican's image of the American depicts a man of wealth and power, devoid of higher culture and lacking the elements of urbanity.

The forthrightness of Americans, their tendency to "rib" each other and to make bitter remarks to each other, offend the dignidad of the Mexican peasant or urban worker, as well as the intellectual. The American lacks the proper forms for manifesting noblesse oblige. In contrast to the German, he holds himself aloof and distant with the peasant. This, in turn, tends to impinge on the sense of self of the Mexican peasant or urban worker and may fortify the unpleasant aspects of the stereotype or image of the American.

Religiously, it is believed, the American is a Protestant who either has no serious religious convictions or, what is even worse, will try to evangelize Mexico to Protestantism. Protestantism is often regarded as a unified and un-Christian faith. The high divorce rates of the United States and other such phenomena indicate the basic irreligious orientations of Americans. A widely held notion is that Americans are devoid of honor in family matters and that the sexual morality of American women borders on that of the prostitute. The American phenomenon of the guilty conscience on "the morning after," however, is not readily comprehensible to the Mexican observer.

Perhaps the most significant in a land in which racial differences are culturally minimized, the image of the American is that of one who would impose racial discrimination on Mexico and who wrongfully practices it on Mexicans who are resident in the United States. The Mexican who has not traveled has very vague conceptions of the color line in the United States and knows the American Negro largely through his occasional portrayal of a movie role. His concern is not with the color line in its broader implication, but with the American's imputation of inferiority to persons of Indian ancestry and the unwarranted social discrimination practiced against them.

Since American tourists in Mexico tend to subordinate such racist feelings, the conception of the American as a race baiter is not strengthened by the observation of visiting Americans' behavior. Undoubtedly those peasant or urban-worker Mexicans who have suffered discrimination in the United States, on meeting Americans in Mexico, in part have tended to play the role they judge Americans expect them to play, but in general this is not the case.

American Babbitts

The most generalized image of the American, in whatever Mexican terminology it may be expressed, is that of an overactive, puritanic Babbitt, with more money than "culture," who buys respect but minimizes urbanity, yet who nonetheless should be dealt with properly because he represents wealth and power.

"RACE," CLASS, AND FELT NATIONAL STATUS

Several major facets of the Mexican's mentality are relevant to his conceptions of Americans and of American culture. Among them are the self-image of Mexican nationals and the intensity of their nationalism. Here strong class differentiations are evident. Although lower-class urban and virtually all rural Mexicans are strongly aware of la raza Mexicana and willing to defend it if necessary with their lives, it is largely the rising middle class (not so deeply entwined in American business enterprise as to be biased toward it but strongly identified with Mexican government bureaucracy) that is the most vehemently and sensitively nationalistic. Politicians are almost instinctively "anti-gringo." This vociferous nationalist element molds anti-American opinion by word of mouth, letters to the press, articles in periodicals, and the like. Yet, anomalously, it is also from this group that a vast number of fellowship students are drawn to American universities, especially on a graduate level.

From the fringe of this highly nationalist segment come those parents who early send their children to English language schools in the Mexican national and provincial capitals, believing it advantageous for the children. These schools, in turn, tend to direct their students toward American undergraduate colleges. Students in such schools early are faced with problems of cultural duality and emotional allegiance. Where strong national identifications and strong school loyalties both provide basic reference groups for the student, a normal (in the sense of statistically predominant) consequence of such conflict is frustration. Such "marginality" in Robert E. Park's sense, with its attendant frustration, introduces severe emotional problems. In rare cases the individual will become alienated from Mexican cultural values. Ordinarily his personal unhappiness is resolved by hostility toward and generally unfavorable images of the United States.

Latin American variations

This is a singularly Mexican, and not necessarily a Latin American, phenomenon. In contrast to Colombia, for example, where students who have returned from American universities appear to have favorable images (with appropriate reservations) of the United States, their Mexican equivalents, despite ambivalence, tend to weigh their sentiments toward the negative pole. One factor centers in the class character of the American experience. Very few lower-class Colombians, of course, ever experience Americans or American culture directly, and if they do, Colombians tend to categorize Americans confusedly with northern Europeans.

AMBIVALENCES AND ANOMALIES

Americans are praised, of course, especially by intellectuals, for their efficiency (not only in mass industrial production but, for example, in library systems) or, somewhat sardonically, for their willingness to form lines at ticket windows. Americans are well regarded for their "organization" (including the relative lack of favoritism, clique groups, and "influence"), for minimization of rivalry and hostility, for genuine cooperativeness and willingness to trust one's fellows in bureaucratic functioning, and, somewhat reluctantly, for a relatively strong sense of "fair play," democracy, and willingness to let the political victor receive the fruits of his legitimate conquest. While intellectuals do not question American technological superiority, they resent it, are jealous of it, and damn Americans for purporting to contend that it is the be-all and end-all of civilization.

Mexican intellectuals freely admit that advanced technology is an area in which they can learn. They feel that in time, if properly controlled by Mexicans, American technology can beneficially be introduced into Mexican civilization. But they dislike Americans for what pochos (American-born Mexicans), agringado individuals, and such Americans as missionaries and businessmen have introduced into Mexican civilization. They are disturbed by the penetration of elements of American mass culture. A Mexican intellectual can become as exercised, for example though with less economic rationality—about a stand bearing the sign "Hot Dogs" or "Hot Cakes" as a Frenchman can over one saying "Coca-Cola." The linked nature of cultural elements is not recognized.

Few Mexican intellectuals are aware of the significance of Tylor's concept of adhesions. Few have thought through the "undesirable" effects such things as the introduction of "desirable" trucks and automobiles will have on seemingly unrelated areas of strong emotional-cultural value which they want to retain, like the continued protection and seclusion of women. Pragmatism and materialism are inordinately condemned by an intellectual group which acts in terms of the most pragmatic precepts and adheres functionally to the most materialistic values. While no figures can readily be shown to support it, the observation can be made, for example, that there are more Cadillacs in proportion to the population in Mexico City than there are in Detroit. To be sure relatively few "intellectuals" drive such cars, but they do not feel it beneath them to want them.

In other less obvious areas, however, pragmatic tests are employed. The basic and, for many, only value of American education is to extend and intensify specialization in some technical areas, and even this is regarded as largely fruitless if it does not have direct application to the Mexican scene. The concept of "halo" or auxiliary benefits, if considered at all, is likely to be explicitly denied. One highly trained technical specialist whose graduate work at Harvard involved a term project on problems in his field in literature concerning India inquired: "Of what value was that to me? India is totally unlike Mexico. Hence, that was useless endeavor."

Spiritual values

Furthermore, since virtually all Mexican intellectuals are convinced of their superiority through the maturity and "richness" of their civilization in the realm of "spiritual values," they can learn nothing from so philistine a nation as the United States. A prominent historian, when asked if any possible value (even in the relatively technical realm of historiography) might accrue to a Mexican historian's research technique were he to engage in the unlikely role of graduate student in the fact-oriented university world of American academic history, commented: "What could a Mexican, immersed in the processes of history, learn from a people virtually devoid of history?"

Protestant America

Interaction between the Mexican intellectual's self-image and his image of American culture focuses in this area of spiritual values. The spiritual values popularly centering in the "Protestant ethic," which have even permeated the conduct of a large segment of American Catholicism, are not generally considered by Mexican intellectuals in other than terms of their purported threat to Mexican spiritual civilization and hence, in large degree if naively, are regarded as negative forces in the American image. Certainly from one perspective the activities of Protestants themselves, quite apart from the ethic, are lumped together in an indivisible and largely barbaric phenomenon which stimulates in Mexico what, to an American, seems like a highly disproportionate unfavorable response. The activities of a few largely fundamentalist, dedicated, and certainly atypical Protestant missionaries, working especially in the Mexican hinterland, receive discussion in the Mexican press far out of proportion to their true merit, even as news value.

Threats to Mexican interests

Other American behavior which threatens Mexican interests is headlined in the press and creates much unfavorable imagery. What is often popularly regarded as truly—and typically aggressive—American behavior, the illegal fishing by American shrimp boats off the gulf coast within the Mexican defined eight-mile limit, focuses hostility. A recurring threat to Mexican social structure is coeducation. The desire on the part of one segment of the Mexican public for the extension of coeducation of the sexes is associated with American cultural imperialism. The character of sexual morality, the divorce rates, the disorganized family of the United States, are all spuriously regarded as horrible consequences of the system of coeducation there, and firm and highly public resolves that coeducation should not happen in Mexico are vociferously aired.

ALTERED IMAGES OF EXCHANGE STUDENTS

The returned student has altered some facets of his image of America. He is convinced, partly as a consequence of his relative lack of success in areas of sexual conquest with American girls, that his prior conception of the accessibility of American women for those ends was slightly erroneous. His image of what are proper family status roles has altered. He begrudgingly admits some value in the more elevated position of American women and favorableness toward granting her opportunities for intellectual and other areas of self-expression and fulfillment. He comes to regard the American family as a much more stable, reasonable, and likable unit and possesses such an image of it after his American experience. As a male reflecting this image, he plans on being a less formidable tyrant in his role of father and husband than his cultural due at home would permit him.¹ His observation of the "freedom of cults," the religious tolerance observable on a surface level in the United States, has altered his image of the American in a favorable direction, and he regards American Catholics as more genuinely pious than he had anticipated.

The typical returned student hates the United States when he feels it openly ridicules Mexico. For example, he dislikes as denigrating Mexican civilization tourists who take pictures of beggars at the doors of cathedrals and basically, albeit secretly, subscribes to camera smashing as a just measure, but at the same time he smiles tolerantly at the prospect of the government campaign to eliminate begging.

¹ That some of these values are manifestations of the "Protestant ethic," with its emphasis on a controlled individuality which hesitates directly to exploit one's fellows rather than on weight placed on the values of submissiveness to human and ecclesiastical authority, is never brought clearly to view.

Racial and political bigotry

He dislikes the United States for its racial discrimination, not so much as a consequence of having experienced it as on the nominal grounds that he opposes the underlying values of physiognomic or biologic caste discrimination. But he is not opposed to strong class discrimination and, even though he himself may be upwardly mobile in this regard, he does not juxtapose the two value systems of caste and class. Hence, although he is opposed to "racial" discrimination against Mexicans in the United States on the basis of notably identifiable Indian ancestry, he understands it and tolerates it if he regards it as stemming from class values. It is partly on this ground of opposition to caste discrimination that he finds discrimination against the Negro particularly abhorrent, but he tolerates it in class terms.

Virtually no Mexican student, in contrast to braceros or other migrants, was himself discriminated against on a university campus on any perceptible ethnic grounds. But his over-all image of the United States, and especially of Texas and tejanos, nonetheless is that of racial bigotry. He cannot bring this image into accord with the loud protestations by Americans about democracy and their image of themselves as democrats. He has almost equal difficulty understanding the American bigotry manifested toward minority political groups. A Mexican Communist prosecuted in New Mexico is first of all a Mexican, despite the ex-student's anti-Communist orientation. If Americans regard him as overestimating the threat to Mexico of Protestantism as a clear and present danger, he feels that Americans are equally hysterical about unpopular political minorities and the nature of their threat. He has mixed elements in the montage of imagery regarding political order in the United States, although the relative absence of graft and the mordida creates a favorable imagery, when political facets are collated with those of his homeland. The image of the American and of American culture is obviously conditioned by the class position of the family of the ex-student, his politico-religious orientations, his predilections in terms of conservatism and radicalism, and the like.

Undergraduate and graduate students

Ex-students of American universities fall largely into two classes. One group consists of those who took the four years of undergraduate work in the States. On return to Mexico they are faced with problems of re-establishing themselves in the Mexican economy in terms of licensing for professions, of being regarded by parents as adults, and of finding clique and friendship relationships. The other group is composed of persons who received their basic professional training and education in Mexico. Thus having already met their problems of licensing for professional activity normally, and having established in regular fashion clique and "influence" relationships with superordinates and peers, they then come to the United States for a year or two as graduate students for the purpose of intensifying competencies in technical areas.

This latter group is perhaps more representative than the former in the sense that it has undertaken its residence in the United States under auspices of fellowships usually supplied by American foundations through joint action and selection of the two governments. It is "representative" also since members of the group are in accord with Mexican conceptions of what is most desirable in the exchange relationship, namely, that Mexicans can gain most by undertaking specialized training in technical areas.

The class origins of these two groups overlap. Those who have attended American colleges and universities as undergraduates tend, however, to derive more than fellowship students from the extreme upper class in small cities, from the nouveaux riches, and from middle-class families with American business connections. A disproportionate number have attended the private "American" senior high schools in Mexico City. As these schools are not accredited by the Mexican Department of Education beyond secundaria (roughly equivalent of American junior high school), graduation from them does not prepare for entrance into Mexican universities or higher technical schools. Such American-Mexican high school graduates are therefore faced with the necessity of repeating several years of work in Mexican schools and, as often as not, are additionally tempted by some financial aid from American colleges and universities. Consequently they often go on to continental American schools, usually to technical training courses; the higher the status of the American college, the more favorably viewed it is in prospect.

Professional status on return

But when such an undergraduate returns to Mexico with an American degree in an engineering specialty, or in some other technical area which requires governmental licensing for practice or complete government bureaucratic functioning in Mexico, he is faced with problems of legal licensing or university "revalidation," or both.

Very frequently, especially in engineering fields, returned students discover that what is suggested by Mexican authorities is several more years of university training in subject matter they have already studied, when in their own minds they are already more adequately prepared than they would have been had they stayed in Mexico. The other alternative is an extremely long, arduous, costly, quasilegal procedure to have their training declared equivalent to that provided in Mexico at the national university.

An alternative is work as an employee of an American concern without full licensing at a salary perhaps a third less than that which an American citizen of equivalent training would receive. All of this adds up, in the returned student's mind, to a great deal of frustration, soul searching, and rationalization, and frequently to a feeling of having been robbed of opportunity and unjustly penalized by the American experience. The frustrated returnee often exhibits occasional strong hostility toward the United States, and, as circumstances demand it, a not too favorable image of the American.

A person with undergraduate American training who on return went into one of the numerous governmental bureaucracies would find himself devoid of the significant and extremely important clique support normally acquired through Mexican university or school associations, would be constantly subjected to the charge of being agringado by his jealous and distrustful associates, and would be subjected to various and repeated informal tests of purported ability and competency by his superiors, tests which would not be required of Mexican-trained associates. Woe unto him if he used American, in preference to Mexican, technical terminology. He would in all likelihood be stymied in licensing by the highly nationalistic, legal requirements and university regulations, which he could not readily meet. Under the circumstances the normal consequence appears to be that his image of American training, while immediately on return quite favorable, deteriorates, and he comes to regard much of it as a handicap and a burden. He feels, without real justification, that even the English language benefit could as readily have been acquired in Mexico, along with the additional benefits that "pull" and clique alignments would have afforded had he been trained wholly in Mexico. He begins to hide his Americanization, publicly to ridicule those who identify with it, and to be basically more nationalistic than he would have been had he not possessed the American experience.

Those who go into private industry suffer least. The tendency toward augmented national loyalty and allegiance is less true of those genuinely upper-class persons, especially those of mixed ethnic grandparental origins, who have studied as undergraduates in the United States. These individuals already feel confident of the superior character of various areas of Mexican culture, such as its spirituality and philosophic depth, and are more internationally oriented than their "inferiors"; consequently they are less threatened by purported American superiority in realms of organization, system, and efficiency, especially in technology and economic apparatus. Moreover, since on return they invariably find niches in the economic structure of a private sort, in which profitable connections with American business firms are maintained, they have tended to remain more internationally minded, as is profitable to them, and to align their sentiments much less with national in-groups than with class benefits, regardless of nation. In this secure, cosmopolitan segment the reflected self in Cooley's sense does not involve a referent group of aspiring middle-class clique mates but a secure "old family" and friendship network, or at least an economically successful population segment, which operates on both sides of the border.

The successful scientist or technician who simply received advanced training in American universities develops a somewhat similar orientation. His reflected self was enhanced in large degree by American study. He tends to have an international view of the nature of his discipline and as a consequence is not threatened by American "cultural imperialism."

OVER-ALL REACTION TO THE U. S.

It is possible to distinguish "types" of Mexican intellectuals who have had American university experience and returned to find their niches in the Mexican social structure, and among them prior and subsequent images of Americans and of American civilization vary. The student who has attended American secondary schools in Mexico is likely early to develop conceptions of himself as a relatively inferior individual (in spite of a command of English greater than that of Mexican age mates in other schools) and ambivalent feelings toward Americans. His resident American high school classmates tend to discriminate against him socially, and because of the unaccredited character of his schooling for Mexican university entrance and the more advanced training of his age mates in such institutions as the national preparatoria, he comes to feel already deprived of opportunity in his home milieu. Once in an American continental college, however, he finds himself able to compete equally with American citizens, and, apart from his bilinguality and cultural value dualism, he finds American civilization and American individuals largely to his liking. Only on return, when he discovers that his marginality has been accentuated and that his major status role in the eyes of his peers is that of an inferior (albeit highly educated) pocho, regarded in his native land by his colleagues and even to some degree by his family as an agringado foreigner, only then by a gradual process does he become more Mexican than the Mexicans and more nationalistic than his age mates who have not been to the United States.

The person who has received professional training at a Mexican institution of higher learning, and consequent legal sanction and licensing to engage in his profession, and who then, through foundation fellowship aid, has temporarily left his job in a governmental bureaucracy for further specialization in the United States, experiences a very different transformation of his "looking-glass self." Secure in his profession, properly lodged in a niche with already formed clique arrangements of colleagues, he finds his American university experience rewarding, if sometimes disappointingly irrelevant to his future role. On the American scene he was always sufficiently "foreign" so that he was never taken for an American in social interaction, and he assimilated so little of the nonacademic American culture as not to have it intrude upon his social personality on return to the homeland.

On return, he finds it much easier to slough off superficial signs of American residence which might annoy his untraveled colleagues, and he early learns that little can be transplanted without opposition even in technical areas, especially if it is labeled American in origin. A cultural nationalist, with fewer ambivalences at the outset than the undergraduate parallel, he can maintain a more mildly favorable attitude toward Americans without endangering or impinging upon his sense of self. Since his reflected self has experienced less alteration, the degree of his marginality on return is less, and he can consequently have a more favorable image of Americans than his more assimilated and alienated coworker.

Both types of personality discussed above derive characteristically from the rising middle class, the most nationalistic segment of the population. The general orientations of the upper-class persons who attended an American university either as graduate or undergraduate students are less nationalistic to begin with. On return their roles are more likely to be found in enterprises which tie in with American production and trade organizations. Thus no profound alteration of the sense of self is required, and the image of Americans and American cultural influence tends to be regarded with much less nationalistic hostility, and accordingly with greater equanimity.

FUTURE IMAGE CHANGES

The Mexican image of Americans, like the American image of other peoples, in all probability will be altered with the passage of time. As Mexico develops industrially and the standard of living is raised, there will undoubtedly be fewer attitudes on the part of self-conscious Mexican intellectuals in defense of deficiencies in their civilization and a more grounded pride in its areas of genuine achievement and superiority.

Alterations in licensing procedures on the Mexican scene, frank recognition of the inevitability of cultural penetration, anticipation of an altered social structure in which practices which are today precious for their antiquity will inevitably change, all will alter the Mexican image of Americans probably in a favorable direction.

The familiar deterrents to a favorable imagery, the basic and unassimilable conflict in value systems, the political and selfish machinations of nationalist groups on both sides of the border, in short, any hostile effort, especially American instituted, which impinges on the Mexican's sense of self-worth and personal dignity, will function to perpetuate an unfavorable image of Americans and of American civilization.

Norman Daymond Humphrey, Ph.D., Detroit, Michigan, is associate professor at Wayne University, Detroit; he has taught anthropology and sociology there since 1939, with the exception of social anthropological field studies in Tecolotlán, Jalisco, Mexico (1944-45, 1947) and Sesquilé, Cundinamarca, Colombia (1950). He has also taught at the Universities of Texas and Southern California and at Michigan State College, Mexico City College, and the Escuela Normal Superior, Bogotá. In 1952-53 he was field representative for the Committee on Cross-Cultural Education of the Social Science Research Council in Mexico. With Alfred McClung Lee he is coauthor of Race Riot (1943) and articles in academic journals.

Scandinavian Students' Images of the United States: A Study in Cross-cultural Education*

By WILLIAM H. SEWELL, RICHARD T. MORRIS, and OLUF M. DAVIDSEN

DURING the past two years an investigation of visiting students from Scandinavia has been carried out at the University of Wisconsin. The central purpose of this study was to explore the processes involved in cross-cultural interchanges of students and to attempt to arrive at a more adequate understanding of the effects of foreign educational experiences. The following presentation of selected aspects of findings which have emerged from this investigation will center around the students' perceptions of various major areas of American society. Since many of these perceptions are expressed comparatively, a brief sketch of Scandinavian culture will precede the description of the students' impressions of the American personality and norms, the American educational system, family life, politics, and economics. Following this, certain characteristics of the Scandinavian students' reactions to the American experience will be discussed. Two major patterns of orientation will be described, and phases in the students' orientation toward America as well as attitude mechanisms employed in dealing with the new environment will be identified. Finally, one aspect of the anticipated effects of the foreign visit will be briefly discussed.

The study is based mainly on intensive interviews with 38 students from Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. This group, which varies in age from eighteen to about forty, is made up of 34 male and 4 female students. Twenty-one of the visitors came from Norway, 8 from Sweden, and 9 from Denmark. Most of them are here on individually planned and privately financed study programs. Nine out of the 38 are engaged in the study of engineering, while of the rest 8 are studying one of the physical sciences and 21 are working within the fields of the liberal arts or social sciences. Of the total, 16 are doing graduate work and the others are undergraduates.

*This project is part of a program sponsored by the Committee on Cross-Cultural Education of the Social Science Research Council and supported by grants to the Council from the Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation, and the Rockefeller Foundation.

In spite of the fact that the Scandinavian countries under study are three politically independent constitutional monarchies with detectable cultural differences, the results of the present investigation indicate that, in regard to the students' images of America, they can properly be treated as a unit. Also by virtue of their linguistic similarities, their common traditions, and cultural homogeneity, they appear as an entity in the eyes of many Americans.

The desire on the part of each country to remain independent is strong, and attitudes of nationalism or patriotism are very common. Far from being militaristic or isolationist in nature, or taking the form of fear of disunity or subversion, these attitudes manifest themselves in great pride in accomplishments within cultural, social, and technical fields of human endeavor. They are continuously being passed on to the younger generation and reinforced through a variety of direct and symbolic means.

The preconceptions of America which the Scandinavian students bring with them form a picture which is by no means a clear one. It is however quite apparent that attention and interests have been guided to certain aspects of American culture more than to others. For this reason, the students are more aware of American technological developments and popular music, for example, than they are of religion, moral orientation, or patterns of social interaction.

Since in physical appearance the visiting Scandinavian student is not especially foreign-looking, and since his English-speaking facility is comparatively great, he is generally able to move around in the community without being detected as a native of a foreign country. At the same time, he makes no attempt to hide his identity as such, and he may even be observed to exhibit conspicuously his Scandinavian background by wearing certain kinds of clothing. This finding is compatible with our observation that the Scandinavian student comes to the United States with feelings of very high national status. In no way does he as a representative of Scandinavia feel inferior to his American fellow men. He is quite confident that the standing of Scandinavia in the United States is very good.

IMAGES OF AMERICAN PERSONALITY

One of the striking impressions resulting from interviewing Scandinavian students is that they all consider Americans rather immature in one respect or another, whether their general attitude toward America is favorable and tolerant or impatient and antagonistic.

The positive interpretation consists, first of all, in admiring the warm friendliness and spontaneity of Americans, the informality of dress and address, the quick acceptance of the stranger into the group and the family. This admiration is tempered, sooner or later, by the feeling that much of this warmth and acceptance is merely skin-deep.

The superficial nature of American friendliness may be positively appreciated. Several of the Scandinavian students felt that the ease of social relationships here, the emphasis on social activity, joining, and party going had been beneficial for them personally—that it had made them able to get along better with others and to know others more quickly, had reduced their shyness and improved their social graces. One student remarked after a considerable stay in this country:

I now feel the urge to associate with people—to call up somebody to go out and have a beer or something. . . . I have never felt that way before. I spent a lot of time alone while at school in Scandinavia, just alone with a book. I don't think I can go back to that now; it would bother me quite a bit. . . .

A large number of the students have expressed a desire to see some of the American informality and spontaneity in social relationships transferred to their own culture.

On the other hand, the discovery of the seeming shallowness of friendships may come as an unpleasant shock and bring with it accusations of hypocrisy: the charge that informality is in itself merely a formality to cover up a lack of real concern for the other individual. Americans are said to have hundreds of acquaintances but no true friends:

They are not deeply interested in you as a person (which is reflected in their general lack of interest—and knowledge—about your country) and are apt to resent it if you are frank with them, or look too closely into their personal affairs.

There is another set of American personality characteristics which is commonly perceived as immature by the Scandinavian students, but which again may draw forth opposite reactions: Americans are happy-go-lucky, self-confident, exuberant, fresh, careless, reckless, uninhibited, flippant, wasteful, noisy, inconsiderate. These adjectives seem to have some sort of common descriptive base, but carry with them varying interpretations and evaluations of such behavior. On the positive side, the ebullience of the American spirit is seen as one of the strong motivating forces for the tremendous technical and commercial advances typical of America. The American emphasis upon constant activity and motion—the intense drive of the businessman, the bustling sales personality—fits in the same syndrome. It is admired by many of the students, who compare it with the relatively more stable, tradition-bound, and restricted distribution and consumption patterns found at home.

Negatively, this carefree, self-confident nature is detected by the visitors in the excessive spending and installment-plan buying in this country, which they feel give a false impression of the standard of living. The happy-go-lucky attitude toward life often turns into inconsiderate behavior, which the students see reflected in a lack of concern for community property. One of the first impressions of several of the students, which came as something of a shock to them, was the dirtiness and sloppiness found in the cities and on the campus itself:

It would be inconceivable at home for the students to throw papers around the way they do . . . and not to bother even to pick them up. . . . Do they like to live in a pigsty? Or do they think somebody else will pick up after them? It's disgraceful!

Intellectual and aesthetic immaturity

There is a rather different set of perceptions which touches upon another facet of the over-all image of America, namely, the general intellectual and aesthetic immaturity of Americans. This perception is common to almost all the students in the study and, unlike the characteristics previously discussed, brings forth a common, unfavorable reaction. The chief focus here is upon the inability of Americans to carry on a serious conversation or discussion: they not only are ignorant of the serious affairs going on in the world, but they are not even interested in finding out. The reasons for this superficiality are assigned in several directions—the overemphasis on material, practical events, the lack of tradition in America, isolationism, rigidity of values, excessive emotionality, conformity—but the perceptions of the presence of this intellectual immaturity are constant:

Americans do not think deeply enough; they have no intellectual curiosity; they have no real opinions on serious topics; politics here is all emotion, not intellectual; there are no books on the bookshelves in the homes; they can't think logically.

The image of America as aesthetically immature or uncultured carries with it a general assumption that causes may be found in the very heavy stress placed on the technical, materialistic aspects of life:

Americans don't know what they want except money; there are hardly any pictures on the walls; American jazz is their only cultural export; students here learn art, music, and architecture without sentiment; emphasis on the technical makes them forget art and nature.

Some of the students also see the lack of artistic tradition as a cause of the immaturity. The negative reaction to America's cultural standards is reinforced in the criticism of mass media:

Advertisements spoil the radio; movies are inferior to European products; TV is low-grade vaudeville; burlesque shows and the worship of movie idols are symbols of American cultural attainment.

Reactions to the image

It should not be inferred from some of the rather scathing comments quoted that even the typical negative reaction to the perceived American personality is bitter, angry, or resentful. The general tone is quite different, and can be best summarized by another quotation from a Scandinavian student:

I realized that I would dislike many things here but I tried to tell myself that I must not judge Americans according to European standards of judgment but that I had to judge them by other measurements because America is a young country and Europe is old.

Conversely, a favorable attitude toward American character does not necessarily mean that the student wishes to be like the American or that he wishes to take back American ways to his own country. An illustrative comment here is:

I would not want a child of mine to go through an American public school—not because I worry that he would learn less but because I know it would make him an American and I want my children to be Danish. . . . We do things one way in Denmark—Americans do differently—I like Danish ways better because I am a Dane. An American would like the American ways better because he is an American. . . . Everyone likes his own country better than any other country.

All in all, there seems to be a common set of perceptions which are then interpreted and evaluated differentially in a rather detached fashion, with generally more light than heat. As one student put it: "I figure a country is a country; if other people can live there, I can live there."

IMAGES OF AMERICAN NORMS

The visiting Scandinavian students all claim that the numerous pioneer novels, Indian stories, and Wild West movies which they read or saw before coming to this country had little direct effect upon their preconceptions of America. They do, however, concede that these sources of information have undoubtedly aided in building up in their minds a picture of America as a country where individualism flourished, where strong opinions were strongly voiced, and where mobility and lawlessness were pronounced.

To their surprise, and sometimes to their dismay and disappointment, they find quite the opposite in many areas of American life. They perceive a mass culture which implacably forces every individual into a mold of conforming behavior. In art, in dating behavior, in sports, in clothes, in party behavior, and even in the use of swear words, there is a definite lack of variety, a hesitance to express originality. Generally this fear of appearing different is not seen as a result of any lack of intelligence or creativity, but as careful conformity to a set of externally imposed rules, for fear of being disliked. It is undesirable to behave differently as an individual. The American code seems to the Scandinavian student to be: Do not be different, but if you have to, be different together.

The consistent conforming of Americans to norms of the group or the organization is seen by many of the Scandinavian students as a form of superficiality in values. For example, one of the students observed:

At home an act is more apt to be moral or amoral depending upon its consequences in each situation for human happiness and well-being, not because it follows or violates some rule.

The perceived low incidence of individually reached moral judgments in America is evidenced in several ways:

There are too many laws here, and too little control. Police interfere in too many spheres of private life.

Political ideas all come from newspapers. Americans are like a flock of sheep. They don't think for themselves.

Religion is external. They go to church, but they aren't really religious in the way they choose to act.

Boy-girl relations are artificial and based on popularity. Too many moral restrictions have to be obeyed according to a rigid sex code, not the way they really feel about it. . . . It is all false modesty based on what the other person might think of you.

The students' negative reactions to conformity are most marked in the areas of sports and social recreation. There is an almost universal criticism of American commercialized, spectator sports, which provide so little in the way of physical exercise for the majority of those involved and which impose such a rigid seasonal restriction on sports conversation and participation. The contrast with the many individually oriented sports of Scandinavia, such as skiing, hiking, and the like, is continually, and unflatteringly, brought out. In response to the question "What about your own country have you missed the most while here?" practically all of the students mentioned fresh air and natural facilities for non-organized recreation as the deprivation felt most strongly. A main objection to social gatherings, and to the few individual sports in which Americans are engaged, is the overemphasis on planning and organizing the activities:

You can't just go on a walk or sit down and talk with people in your own way, you always have to do things, in just such an order and in just such a way, one after another . . . always a program, always pre-arranged. . . .

The pressures for conformity are seen to be reinforced by the Americans' fear of being alone:

Americans like to have many friends, but with no reason for making them. . . . People want to be popular with everybody. . . . You have to be a social animal and belong to all sorts of social organizations to be respected here. . . . Americans value social contacts highly and get lonely without them.

It must be stated, however, that at least one of the students was able to interpret his own perception of American conformity as partially a function of his unfamiliarity with subtle differences in the new culture:

Americans and American ways all look alike, but maybe that's just because they are different from us. They are probably just as different to each other as they seem alike to us.

IMAGES OF AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS

In the case of practically all the students of our sample, attendance at an American university was the primary reason for their visit to this country. Also, the great majority of them had attended a university or other institution of higher learning at home prior to coming here. This means not only that their educational experiences in this country represent roughly comparable shared activities but also that these experiences contain a relatively high degree of psychological meaningfulness in the sense that the students have been exposed to two different university environments in the same sequence. Their contacts with other aspects of American culture are so varied that comparability is often very difficult.

Preparatory to entering a Scandinavian institution of higher learning the students went through four years of secondary school or Gymnasium. During these years they were held to a very rigid schedule of classwork with almost no freedom of choice in selection of courses. Attendance was required, the competition was keen, and with three or four hours of homework daily, little time was left over for social or other extracurricular activities. The continuation of study at a university marked a definite break in the type of schooling. At this point they were considered intellectually and socially mature and sufficiently independent to pursue specialized study with little supervision. They were free to attend lectures or to stay away and took their exams when they felt ready to do so.

American universities

It is against this background of previous experience that the Scandinavian students' reaction to the American university system should be seen. Only by so doing may one understand the reasons why the topic of supervision of students elicits more unfavorable responses in an unstructured interview than any other aspect of American university education. They say that "required class attendance is childish" and that "frequent exams interfere with studying." While they find the physical facilities excellent and generally favor the student-teacher relationships, which are closer than at home, they are not impressed with the standards of education in America, particularly at the high school and undergraduate levels. They attribute this especially to the less rigid selection procedures and to the considerable amount of time spent by American students in social activities. In this connection the Scandinavian students are greatly surprised about the lack of distinction between work and recreation which their American fellow students exhibit. The sight of a group of young scholars engaged in studying midst half-empty Coca-Cola bottles and blaring radios or phonographs never ceases to amaze them. It is perhaps significant that every Scandinavian student who initially lived in a dormitory soon moved out.

Family life

The opportunity for contacts with American family life varies widely among the group of visiting students. In spite of this, their evaluation of this phase of the American culture shows a certain consistency which no doubt derives from the fairly uniform background of family life and customs in Scandinavia with which the students compare it. They come to see the American home as one in which "the family bonds are not very strong," where "recreation is not family centered," and where "the wife dominates the family picture too much." They also find that "there is not enough control over smaller children." It is worth while noting that these observations are related to the interviewer with special emphasis and conviction by those students who come from rural areas in Scandinavia where family life is relatively more patriarchal and autocratic, and where, in the absence of many commercial recreational facilities and convenient means of transportation, family life is comparatively close.

Religion

Perhaps no other aspect of the American culture puzzles the Scandinavian students so much as does religion. Their first impression is one of great diversity and much competitive activity in interdenominational relations. In view of the religious homogeneity of Scandinavia this could perhaps be expected. The students are further amazed by the large number of people in America who go to church on Sundays. Their surprise in this respect could also be anticipated, because the proportion of people in Scandinavia who go to church more than a few times every year is quite small. However, the visiting students also come to a conclusion which is less readily comprehended: they are quite in agreement that Americans are hypocritical. As one said: "They go to church but they aren't really religious; their religion is external and not so deep." Perhaps this impression should be seen against the background of a rather common belief in religious circles in Scandinavia to the effect that true religiosity is incompatible with any excessive or conspicuous concern for worldly goods or money. The students feel that "churches in America are too money oriented" and that "collection of money in churches is undesirable." While in this country, only one out of the 38 students attended church regularly. The majority never went, or on occasion attended mainly to "see what it was like." With one exception, the students all claimed to be fairly or very liberal in their orientation toward religion.

Political issues

The students as a group considered themselves somewhat to the right of center politically at the time when they arrived in the United States. At that time their knowledge of and interest in American political matters were very limited, and, in general, the group can be said to be a politically unalert and uninterested one. They rarely avail themselves of the opportunities offered by the various campus organizations to hear lectures or participate in the discussion of domestic or foreign political issues. Perhaps this is the reason why their impressions of politics in America show little pattern. On the other hand, the students often point out that they find it difficult to get into a discussion of political or social issues with Americans in informal social settings, and if they succeed in initiating such discussions, the conversation very seldom goes much beyond casual observations of current happenings.

One may detect a considerable degree of concern in the students' evaluation of freedom in America. Responses such as "America is losing her freedom" or, more specifically, "Freedom of speech in America is curtailed" are not uncommon. Nor are the visitors impressed with the standards of political behavior in this country. Those who were here during the last presidential campaign and conventions are especially prone to make this known. On the further question of equality in human relations as it relates to the students' perception of American democracy, the visitors find more equality in professor-student and employer-employee relationships than they are used to. They completely approve of this and often express a desire for adoption of such practices in Scandinavian industries and institutions.

Prior to coming here the Scandinavian students had heard about discrimination against Negroes in America. However, they believed that it was largely a problem of the past and almost exclusively confined to the South. While they find little evidence of discrimination against Negroes after coming to this country, they are quite surprised by the tensions here between gentile and Jewish people.

In regard to the question of postwar American foreign policies in general and foreign aid programs specifically, it is surprising to these students to find in America a considerable degree of disregard for the United Nations and disapproval of the foreign aid programs. It obviously irritates them that "many Americans think Europe ought to be very grateful for this aid, when, in effect, it is really good business for America."

The picture which the Scandinavian students develop of economic matters in the United States is a much more favorable one. They commend the American people for their industriousness and efficiency and attribute much of the credit for the high standard of living to these qualities. It also pleases them to see that private enterprises in this country have maintained a comparatively high degree of independence from governmental influence, but in the same vein they disapprove of having their own countries labeled with "the American interpretation of socialism." Those who have held jobs here, in particular, are favorably impressed by the efficient methods of production in America. They would like to see these methods transferred to their home countries.

IMPACT OF STAY

Reports from studies of students from other cultures reveal that, by comparison, the Scandinavian visitors approach America in an objective and practical manner. In their appraisal of this country they do not often feel compelled to judge in terms of ultimate pros and cons, but instead direct their evaluation to fairly specific areas or incidents. The preponderance of remarks during the interview which were critical of the United States should not necessarily be interpreted as a sign of dissatisfaction with the sojourn. Rather, such criticism should be seen in the light of the fact that the Scandinavian students generally do not consider the conditions under which they live and study in America superior to those available in their own countries. Consequently they do not deem it necessary to refrain from criticizing these conditions. It is quite obvious, also, that the Scandinavian visitors feel under no obligations to express feigned niceties about America in front of the interviewer, who is considered by them as a representative of their own culture.¹ Furthermore, they readily admit that a good share of their criticism is nothing but banter. While the national awareness of the Scandinavian students is naturally heightened by their presence in a foreign country, they do not seem to consider their experiences here as a threat to their national status, and emotional reactions are largely confined to situations where they feel curtailed in their effort to accomplish the specific purposes for which they come. In general, by comparison with other foreign students, the Scandinavian visitors seem to adjust to the American scene with remarkable ease.

Two patterns of orientation

Relying on those findings that emerge most clearly from our data, we can distinguish certain differences between Scandinavian students in their orientation and adjustment to the new environment. At the risk of making unfounded generalizations at a point when our material has not been exhaustively analyzed, we may differentiate between two major patterns of orientation.

We have been dealing with one group of students whose social and academic adjustment has been relatively easy, who have associated extensively with Americans, and whose attitudes toward the new culture are comparatively favorable. More often than not, the English facility of these students is high, they have previously had contacts with other cultures, and their prior knowledge of the United States is relatively broad. Transferring into the American university was a smooth process for this group, involving no academic prestige or credit loss. While here, these students have been relatively free from financial worries, and their behavior has indicated a comparatively high degree of personal flexibility.

¹ All of the interviewing was done by Oluf M. Davidsen.

This orientation pattern contrasts with one which is manifested by a group of students whose attitudes toward America at the end of their stay are relatively unfavorable, who have experienced varying degrees of difficulty in academic adjustment, and whose social contacts in this country have not extended far outside of the Scandinavian student subculture on campus. Typically, this group uses the English language with relatively limited proficiency, and their rate of improvement in this respect is slow. They have had no or few previous contacts with other cultures, and their prior knowledge of America is slight. Personal rigidity, occasionally to the point of stubbornness, is likewise characteristic of these individuals. Upon entering the university here, these students have often encountered difficulties in the process of transfer of credits, or they have interpreted the transfer experience as constituting a loss in academic prestige. Financial worries and dissatisfaction with their educational experience here also typify this group. The group is, however, decidedly in the minority.

This attempt to distinguish in the sample of visiting Scandinavian students between the two sets of attitudinal and behavioral patterns contains striking omissions. It is anticipated that more sharply focused and further differentiated pictures will result when the analysis of data has been completed.

Time changes

Our interviews with each student have been spread out over a period of time ranging anywhere from a few months to almost two years. This has provided opportunity to observe the students' orientation to the United States as a process in time. At the present stage of our analysis there is beginning to emerge a certain relationship between the students' reactions to their experiences here and the length of time they have spent in this country. With a considerable degree of clarity, our data point to three such orientation phases which seem to indicate a U-shaped curve of favorability toward America. The initial stage is characterized by fascination and by many superficial social contacts with Americans. During the intermediate phase, the number of social contacts with Americans appears to decrease, and the students seem to become increasingly critical in their evaluation of America. Finally, in the case of students whose sojourn extends beyond eighteen to twenty-four months, a much more relaxed attitude in matters pertaining to social relations is observed, and their judgments about the new culture become more favorable and differentiated. Among the numerous factors which influence the duration of each of these stages, language facility, social ease, and personal flexibility seem to be of special importance.

The relationship between the reactions to social and educational experiences in America with which foreign students leave this country and their orientation toward America after they have returned to their own countries is one about which very little is known and also one about which doubtful assumptions have been made. Careful follow-up studies would be required to bring this relationship completely to light. However, it seems appropriate to point out certain types of behavior on the part of our sample of visiting Scandinavian students which pertain to this issue. As has been stated previously, these students come to America with feelings of high national status. These feelings manifest themselves in surprise about the ignorance of Americans about Scandinavia and in annoyance when attempts at overcoming this ignorance are limited to casual and superficial questions and inquiries. They also show up in the form of a high degree of identification with the home culture and in the students' anxiety to convey information about the Scandinavian countries. In the presentation of such information many of the students seem to be somewhat selective in favor of those aspects of their own culture which they deem desirable. While the operation of this attitude mechanism is perhaps a common phenomenon, it is felt that in the case of the Scandinavian students it is used more as an offensive than a defensive mechanism. Whatever its nature, it is significant that our data point to a reversal of this attitude mechanism after the students have returned. Those of our sample who are in this country for the second time are quite in agreement that such is the case. "Once you are home, everything over here looks brighter" or, "When you get home, you forget the bad things and remember only the good things about America," are statements frequently made by such students. They also maintain that they are much more prone to defend America when home than while here. Even the students who are here for the first time expect to experience this same reversal.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE INVESTIGATION

The principal aim of the present investigation was to develop leads and researchable hypotheses pertaining to the area of cross-cultural education. The exploratory nature of the methods and techniques used in pursuing this aim clearly requires that the generalizations about Scandinavian students' reactions to the American experience should be thought of as suggestive contributions to a widening field of scientific interest rather than final judgments or established facts.

William H. Sewell, Ph.D., Madison, Wisconsin, is chairman of the Department of Rural Sociology and of the Social Science Division at the University of Wisconsin. He has taught at the Universities of Minnesota, Texas, Puerto Rico, and Washington, and the Columbia University. His work abroad included a post as research leader with the Strategic Bombing Survey in 1945-46. He is president of the Midwest Sociological Society and president elect of the Rural Sociological Society. He is the author of numerous monographs and articles on social psychology, research methods, and rural sociology.

Richard T. Morris, Ph.D., Los Angeles, California, is assistant professor of sociology in the Department of Anthropology and Sociology, University of California at Los Angeles. He has taught at Northwestern University, the University of Wisconsin, and the Ohio State University.

Oluf M. Davidsen, M.A., Madison, Wisconsin, is project assistant for the Social Science Research Committee at the University of Wisconsin.

The Swedish Students' Image of the United States*

By FRANKLIN D. SCOTT

SWEDES are intensely aware of the United States: "America is the great fact in the world today." They appreciate the vastness of America and the magnitude of her technological achievements and productive capacity. Yet this awareness of a distant land is due not only to the power and wealth of the United States, but fully as much to the more intimate fact that at least half the families of Sweden have relatives across the Atlantic. Swedes perhaps indulge a tendency to feel more closely acquainted with America than is actually the case. The old myths of gold in the streets, of opportunity and unlimited freedom, die hard. But they are being brought into question.

Sources of information about the United States for Swedes in general, as well as for Swedish students prior to a trip to America, are comparatively easy to identify. In the schools and in the universities specific instruction about lands beyond the ocean is meager indeed. Basic geography is taught, but American history comes into the curriculum merely as a part of world history. Students learn about the American Revolution; they gain some acquaintance with George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln; they know the part played by the United States in the world wars of the twentieth century. American literature is notably neglected in the secondary schools and is only beginning to find a place in the universities; the English language is learned in the "English" manner and through the literature of England. But English is the first foreign language taught in the schools, it is taught exceptionally well, and it provides a tool for wider and deeper learning.

The newspapers of Sweden carry a large amount of news about the United States, and some of the great liberal newspapers are outspokenly friendly to America. Nevertheless the news they print, like the news printed in newspapers everywhere, is predominantly news of the unusual rather than the usual, the unique rather than the common events. Even in the friendly papers negative types of information overbalance the positive. Conservative papers until very recently were inclined to a supercilious attitude toward American culture. Left-wing papers have never missed the opportunity to report lynchings and graft in the great democracy of the West. From Russia, on the other hand, little news is available, and the inherent evil of the eastern neighbor is taken for granted—it simply is not news. Hence negative news and critical comment about the United States occupy far more space than any news about the U.S.S.R. Tarnish on the democratic idol is more newsworthy than the obvious viciousness of the Soviet ogre.

Sweden claims more movie houses per capita than the United States, and these theaters show many American films—more of them second-rate rather than first-rate. From these pictures Sweden gets an impression of American life and taste. And she builds impressions from Swedish-Americans returning to the homeland bragging about their new country, and from tourists who carry evidence of wealth but not always of culture.

American democracy has long been idealized in Sweden, and the United States has been the promised land for hundreds of thousands of Swedish immigrants. Now in the mid-twentieth century the flow of immigration has ebbed, while the travel of students and trainees, hundreds each year, is at high tide. These intelligent and alert young people are learning their special fields, and they are also re-examining the myths held by their countrymen. America is up for inspection, and a clearer, more realistic appraisal is taking shape.

Hundreds of Swedes from all walks of life have contributed to the impressions here summarized. Newspapers, articles, books, letters, and reports have been examined. An evening with the "gossip mirror" reflected the ideas of ninety-two persons in Stockholm, and thirty-three others answered a questionnaire. Fundamentally, however, the conclusions rest on research in Sweden through one year, during which fifty selected "subjects" and acquaintances of these subjects were carefully interviewed. Each of these subjects had studied somewhere in the United States for one year or more in the period between 1920 and 1953.

STUDENT BACKGROUND

Who are the Swedes who come to the United States as students? The question is important, for these young men and women are not a cross-section of the Swedish public. In the first place they are, almost without exception, graduates of the "student examen" or a course in technology, commerce, or some other special branch of equivalent standing; they have attained an academic status comparable to the sophomore year of college, roughly, in the United States. This means more than it does in the United States, both because of the disciplined factual education which it implies and because such graduates represent a smaller proportion of the total population than do high school graduates or college sophomores in the United States. In 1910, only 2.8 per cent of the men of twenty years of age had taken "student examen" or its equivalent, and only 0.4 per cent of the women had done so; the percentages have risen since then, but in 1950 stood at only 8.5 for men and 4.4 for women. The percentages tell only a small part of the story: most important is the fact that "students" come from certain rather clearly defined elements of the population. Farmers and workers comprise the overwhelming majority of the people, but as late as 1950, less than 4 per cent of the sons of farmers continued their education to the level of the "student examen," and only 4 per cent of the sons of laborers; on the other hand, 45 per cent of the sons of school teachers, 70 per cent of the sons of men who had themselves taken the "student examen," 60 per cent of the sons of officers, and 26 per cent of the sons of businessmen, took "student examen" or its equivalent.¹ Young men of the cities are about five times as likely to become students as are those of rural districts. Academic and professional training is obviously a matter of tradition and social class.

In their school training these young people have begun the study of English at the age of ten or eleven, and most of them have studied one or two other foreign languages; the majority of them have studied mathematics and history but little social science in the secondary school. Despite the social revolution of the last half century and new democratizing tendencies in education, the general pattern remains the same. It is, therefore, a select group which pursues academic training in Sweden, and it is the elite of this group which has the best chance to get scholarships and fellowships for study abroad. Young men and women who travel to the United States for advanced study and research are thus screened from a small proportion of the total population; they are young people of high intellectual ability and they are from homes of "culture."

¹ The statistics are from an elaborate statistical study by Sven Moberg, Vem blev student och vad blev studenten? (Lund, Sweden: Gleerup, 1951), pp. 53, 55.

* This project is part of a program sponsored by the Committee on Cross-Cultural Education of the Social Science Research Council and supported by grants to the Council from the Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation, and the Rockefeller Foundation.

What then are the elements of the new appraisal of America by the youthful intelligentsia of Sweden?

FAVORABLE REACTIONS

The primary and the all but universal reaction of Swedish students to their American experience is amazement and gratitude for the outpouring of hospitality heaped upon them. One speaks of his reception as "not only friendly, unbelievably friendly." One is "overwhelmed," and another "cannot recall one person being unfriendly to me." Still another expresses his surprise that "Americans even succeeded in giving you the feeling that they were glad to help you." The wondrous awe with which they speak of the human warmth of Americans continues for years after their return. They marvel at the generosity of Americans, their openness and their cheerfulness. Some of them suspect, however, that much of the friendliness is superficial, and that Americans also in their relationships with one another lack the depth of true understanding and mutual regard that Swedes feel for one or two close friends.

Swedes sense the surging self-confidence of Americans, and the pervading optimism and hope of American society. This boldness was more marked in the generation preceding the 1950's, but Swedes still feel in the United States the daring to try new things as a contrast to the caution and the personal security-mindedness of their home country.

One of the faults that Swedes most readily admit in themselves is the "royal Swedish jealousy" or envy. In Americans they see envy reduced to a minimum; they marvel at how Americans can rejoice in each other's successes, at how men sincerely congratulate their colleagues on promotions, and at how women will admire each other's hats. Above all, they admire the American capacity for teamwork in factory, office, and laboratory. One man who had studied also in Paris compared his experiences in the bickering, the short-sighted selfishness, and the frustrations of a French laboratory with his later experiences in an American laboratory where, despite personal dislikes, men co-operated wholeheartedly for the achievement of a common goal. This broad-mindedness may well be a function of the size of America and the manifold opportunities available, but the ability to work together is nevertheless regarded as one of the most noteworthy and praiseworthy characteristics of the American people. Many a Swedish student takes home with him a realization of the importance of teamwork, and a determination to practice it. In medical research, in technical laboratories, in business, returnees are stimulating co-operative work and a freer interplay between individuals.

The "poised skeptic onlookers" from small Sweden enjoy in America the "generosity of wide horizons and the vagabond temper," and they admire the creative energy of the people. One recent returnee remarked on the American will to make things better. . . . The great discovery for me was that there exist so many things in America that we have no idea about, and they are mostly the positive things. . . . I find the American elite more to my taste than any other group of people I have ever met—the teachers, the serious students, the writers, the painters.

Positive appreciation is pleasant to hear, and it is the dominant note in the complex of reactions of students who have been to America from Sweden. Of those who had stayed in the United States at least nine months, not one was found who could be called unfriendly to the country or the people. They are, however, keen and judicious observers as well as appreciative visitors. The culture and the value systems of Sweden and the United States are sufficiently similar, yet sufficiently different in emphases, for visiting Swedish students to be forced to make comparisons on a highly refined level. They do not feel the strong contrasts sensed, for example, by Asian students. They move among their relatives and their fellow students, and in American society at large, inconspicuously. They participate easily in American life, and they experience minimal barriers to intellectual intercourse. They are accepted rather than challenged. Often they enjoy higher status in American academic life than in their home environment. Their evaluations and critical judgments deserve therefore special consideration. They speak as understanding friends who identify themselves as members of the same Great Society.

POLITICS

These friends are frankly puzzled by American politics. They are accustomed to a multiparty system in their own country and in the neighboring lands of Europe. They are accustomed to political parties which emphasize principle as well as the struggle for power, and of governments which more often than not must be formed by coalitions of parties. Political morality is high, and a known crook finds it practically impossible to maintain a position in government. These Swedish students are therefore puzzled by a system which requires the basic political compromises to be made within the parties instead of between the parties at the time of forming a ministry; and they are shocked by a system in which men who have been exposed as grafters and crooks can yet be elected to local and state offices and even to represent the American people in Congress. They find it impossible to reconcile their observations of American political life with their observations of American morality and idealism in other spheres, and shake their heads in bewilderment. Many of them are particularly interested in the public schools, and they are astonished at the evidences of politics connected with school administration. Their own schools are subject to a nationally centralized supervision and seldom become involved in politics except on a policy level.

The gulf between principle and practice in American politics is most sharply criticized in connection with broader issues. Though the Swedes live in the shadow of the Iron Curtain and have a long record of fearing and fighting the Russian bear, they condemn the McCarran Act as a petty thing for a great state and an unreasonable restriction on the liberty of the individual; they cannot reconcile such laws with their concept of American freedom. As to McCarthyism, they are amazed that the state will permit open violations of basic principles, astounded that a liberty-loving people will tolerate deceitful exaggeration and browbeating. While leftist papers ridicule the hysteria and crow over the resultant factionalism, the friends of America maintain a sad quiet—for they cannot themselves either explain or defend what they regard as tragic excrescences on the face of American society. These evidences of fear and frustration indicate to the Swedes an immaturity and a peculiar lack of faith in proclaimed principles on the part of the American people, and a lack of self-confidence in dealing with greater issues which contradicts the customary self-assurance of the American as an individual. Because they like American people, these Swedes are saddened; because they hope for strong and idealistic leadership from America, they are concerned.

When these Swedish returnees view American foreign policy they are both sympathetic and suspicious. They are sympathetic with American goals, which they feel correspond closely with their own hopes for peace and for the betterment of conditions of life the world over. But they are distressed by the shifts and uncertainties of American diplomacy, and by the tendencies they observe for Americans to regard the issues of foreign policy as all black or all white. They but dimly appreciate the greatest difference between the United States and Sweden: that the United States is sufficiently powerful to feel a possibility and a responsibility to do something about world conditions, while Sweden is small and deliberately renounces responsibility for the major course of world events. Swedes are generous in attempts to alleviate human suffering and to help far countries in programs of technical assistance, but they carefully abstain from participation in the conflicts between states and ideologies. The Swedes who have spent time in the United States have a deeper understanding and sympathy than their fellow nationals for the basic American motivations in foreign policy. These visitors become convinced that the American people are guided by righteous desires and moral purpose. Yet they, like the rest of their countrymen, look East as well as West and prefer compromise to crusade.

POLITICAL ACTIVITY OF RETURNEES

It should be added that the Swedes who cross the Atlantic to study do not come with any deliberate purpose of finding or studying a new "way of life." Most of them have very little political consciousness on arrival. The all-pervasive social and political discussions in American colleges open up new vistas, and the visitors are challenged to explain and compare. The process makes them more aware of political problems both in America and in Sweden. This statement is confirmed by the frequent comments by recent returnees that they had no political interests before going to the United States, but that classes in the social sciences had awakened them to a new world of interests, that "bull sessions" had for the first time forced them to assess the value of Sweden's social-welfare system and to compare it with the American methods and ideals. Several of these young people on returning to Sweden began to enter political activity. Of the older, prewar generation of students back from America, it is significant that several whose fields of study were wholly academic are now among the top political leaders of the country. It is still more significant that their leadership shows its strength in the center, in the liberal party and the moderate wing of the social democratic party. The leader of the liberal party is a former fellow to the United States, the liberal editor of the most vigorous and most widely read daily newspaper in the country is another, a professor-parliament member is yet another, and now on the world stage, a director of research in UNESCO is another. These people are Swedes and independent thinkers, they are not in any sense American "agents," but there is no doubt that American experience stimulated their political thinking and that they understand and respect American political ideals—especially the ideals dominant in American life in the prewar decade when they studied in the land of Jefferson and Lincoln.

THE SOCIAL AND CULTURAL SCENE

Toward the American social scene, basically similar to their own, the Swedes find themselves antagonistic at only a few points. Brought up in an atmosphere of sincere regard for the individual, and with virtually no minority problem, the Swedes at home have no occasion to question the basic doctrines of human equality. Those who come to America sometimes notice there for the first time the treatment of Jews "as a different kind of people." They condemn race prejudice in any form, although some interesting exceptions can be cited. One who observed the coming of the Negro into a northern college town developed a mild sympathy, or at least something of an understanding of the reason, for the existence of race feeling. Another who spent a year in a southern college went back to his Scandinavian home deeply imbued with the attitudes of the "southern gentleman." These cases at least highlight the fact that personal experience has a profound effect on attitudes, and prove the point that a year in America may significantly alter the outlook of a young man or woman.

The superficiality and materialism of America are clichés of Swedish thinking that are only slightly modified by closer acquaintance. The abundance of American wealth in "things," the habit of speaking in terms of dollar measurement, and the social prestige of the banker and the businessman tend to leave the average visitor with the same opinion he had before he left home. Many of them nevertheless modify this concept a little; some profess that their former attitudes were completely wrong. Some arrive at the eminently reasonable conclusion that although Americans are materialistic, they are no more so than Swedes, that they have more money and more things only because of hard work and great resources, and that they look upon things as means to a better life, not as ends in themselves.

Swedes tend to retain an image of America as a land of limitless resources, vast distances, massive buildings, assembly-line production. It is the land where accomplishment is restricted only by will, it is where their cousins and their uncles made great wealth. It is new and strong and crude.

The belief that America has no "culture" is widespread among the European bourgeois and the untraveled portion of the intellectuals. The belief is actually reinforced in the minds of some of those who travel to the United States and fail to find oil paintings on middle-class living-room walls or to meet with businessmen who can talk about Faulkner or Hemingway. A Swedish fellowship student may very likely discover that his American cousins have automobiles and television sets, but meager "intellectual" interests. Both the young student and the mature researcher frequently complain that they cannot find among their opposite numbers in the States the breadth of cultural interest and knowledge which makes for stimulating conversation. Frequently the Swedish engineer or businessman has read more American literature than his host, and because he has read with the purpose of more clearly understanding American life and thought, he may have attained more penetrating insights than the more casual-reading American.

Music is the one field of the arts in which Swedes recognize superior American achievement and appreciation. It is odd, however, that many Swedes are themselves uninterested in music and unconscious of the part played by music in American life. Those who are aware of it are invigorated and deeply impressed by the emphasis on music in schools, music festivals, and summer camps, by such modern composers as Copland, Piston, and Halsey Stevens, and by the great city orchestras. Most of all, they are impressed by the wide popular interest in music, the like of which, according to one expert, is not found elsewhere in the world.

RELIGION AND THE MORAL CODE

The reaction of Swedes to American religious thought and practices runs the gamut of all possible attitudes, and it is probably impossible to generalize about a Swedish image of America in this aspect. All are aware that religion is more vital in the United States than it is in Sweden and that it is expressed through a vast variety of denominations (which they call sects). Some are annoyed by the emphasis on religion in the denominational colleges, some are convinced that religion is mostly hypocrisy, some profess that they are more negative toward Christianity after seeing it in the States. Very few return to Sweden thinking of themselves as more deeply religious. The most common reaction, perhaps, is a somewhat puzzled recognition of the fact that a great people attends church in large numbers, treats religion as important, and supports by private contributions a multitude of different denominations. This is regarded as extraordinary, something little short of an aberration. The America-visiting academic Swede, who is of course not representative of the Swedish people as a whole, may even put it as one of them did:

Americans are so religious simply because they have not thought things through; they do not want to think things through, or think about serious things as we do—by serious things I mean art, music, literature.

The moral code which is associated with religious beliefs and emphases is still more baffling to the practical Swede. The Swede is likely to pride himself on the fact that he has accepted sex as one of the natural facts of life; he finds American attempts to deny freedom in sex an abomination. Ultimate results in the two cultures may be similar, but the conflicting enticements and restraints accompanying sex in America he finds frustrating, immoral, and physically deleterious. This is the aspect of American life in which he finds the greatest hypocrisy.

EDUCATIONAL SYSTEMS

Education is the one subject on which one can expect from students universal, if not unanimous, reactions. In Swedish ideas about American education are many keen insights and appraisals. Generally accepted is the view that colleges and universities are so different in standards and quality of instruction that it is impossible to generalize about them—and with this point established, everyone begins to generalize! Also widely current is the idea that the elementary and high schools "comprise more social activities than studies," that school is play until the college and graduate years. Swedish students realize that the United States produces top-notch scholars, great scientists, effective businessmen, but they cannot understand how our easygoing schools have anything to do with the process. The educationally disciplined Swede thinks the American high school is a "great waste of time and energy"; "the Swedish student after twelve years knows much more than the American"; "the difference is amazing."

The college students from Sweden are, on the other hand, annoyed by the academic discipline of quizzes, examinations, term papers, and reports. Such assignments were the stuff of their secondary education; they wonder how the supposedly mature student can tolerate this paternalism, this petty oversight. Basically the puzzle stays in their minds because they do not quite realize how fundamentally reversed are the two systems of education: American primary and secondary education allows freedom, while college and graduate school provide discipline; Swedish primary and secondary education provides discipline, while the university allows freedom. Results seem to indicate that either system may be good in itself, but an individual may find it difficult and disturbing to shift in mid-career from one to the other.

Despite irritations, the Swede finds much in the American collegiate system which he prizes: class discussion, the close contact between teachers and students, and the extracurricular activity which helps young people in "getting rid of shyness and teaches you to express yourself." One remarks that "perhaps the American educational system gives a better preparation for life." One wants utopia: an educational system for Sweden which would give "both the freedom of the high school and a knowledge similar to that given by the Swedish secondary schools."

Variations

Although Swedish students' views of America show fundamental similarities there are also significant variations, variations in degree if not in kind. Among the American factors causing these variations in attitude, the institutional environment probably deserves first place. Students who attend the small colleges feel more fully acquainted with the United States than do the Swedes who attend the universities, live in the cities, and perhaps associate largely with other foreign students in the "international houses" rather than with Americans in private homes or in fraternities and sororities.

SECTIONAL AND PROFESSIONAL VARIATIONS

Section of the country makes a greater difference than would normally be supposed. The Swedish student is usually most cordially received by his hosts. If the hosts are the boys in a southern fraternity house the Swede is likely to return to Sweden with the racial prejudices of a southern colonel; if the hosts are the girls of a select eastern college the young Swedish visitor will in all probability view race and capitalism in their fashion. The persuasive power of sympathetic association acts strongly on impressionable youth in a foreign and complex culture. Reactions contrary to the climate of opinion in the most intimate host group occur, but they are rare. And second-hand American sectionalism encountered in Upsala is both amusing and frightening!

For the older group of students, especially, the significant variations come through professional contacts. Research scholars in medicine and technology and students of business in all stages seem to find their American counterparts thoroughly congenial; their impression of America is most vivid through these associations, and beyond them it is often vague. Students in the fields of the social sciences and humanities may have just as high personal regard for their professional friends in the United States, but they are likely to be more critical of American society as a whole than are the doctors, the engineers, and the businessmen. This is partly owing to the nature of their fields of study, which demands a critical approach to man and his works. It is also due to the fact that America's most obvious achievements are in the realm of technology, science, industry, and commerce. In these fields, the foreigner can have only admiration for Americans and what they have done. Also, the visiting businessman feels less keenly than the humanist the differences in cultural emphasis between Europe and America. The artist, the literary man, and their ilk not only sense these differences but are likely also to have, consciously or unconsciously, the feeling that Europe's last claim to importance must rest upon her "culture," and they slightly resent America's claims in the realm of art and thought—while being quite willing to acknowledge American pre-eminence in the material realm.

POSITION OF THE RETURNEE

Except in a few self-conscious bastions which make it a duty of pride to defend and preserve Swedish culture, the returnee from America enjoys a certain glamor and prestige. Frequently he is asked to write articles for his home-town newspaper or a national magazine describing his experiences, American education, and student life; the specialist publishes detailed reports on his observations and research results; and the journalist or other general observer occasionally writes a book squeezing the whole of America between two covers. All encounter an eagerness at home to know more about the puzzling but powerful land of the West. They enjoy a preferred position in job getting: employers value the recognition of worth evidenced by scholarships, the adventuresome spirit which inspired travel, and the broadening effects of experience in a stimulating foreign society. In certain fields, such as economic research and medicine, study in the United States is so highly regarded and so generally practiced that those who have not had transatlantic experience feel apologetic. Swedes regard their homeland's basic training in most fields as equal to or better than that obtainable elsewhere, but they admit the superior facilities for specialization in the United States, and study trips abroad are proudly listed in the Swedish Who's Who. Returnees do not stand apart as a special group, but their experience in America is known; and a few words from a respected returnee have more impact than hours of propaganda out of either Washington or Moscow.

U. S. INFLUENCE IN SWEDEN

The results of student travel to the United States, greatly increased since World War II, are evident in an increased understanding of America, the use of American machines and methods, the reading of American magazines and books, the visits to Sweden of friends and professional associates encountered in America—innumerable influences which add to and blend with other influences in ways both manifold and subtle. To weigh the effect of each such influence separately from the others is impossible; to disregard the total impact is unthinkable. From both friends and foes one hears that Sweden is becoming "the most Americanized country in Europe." Educational reactionaries may abhor the infiltration of the evil "American individualistic psychology," and other theories coming "along with the Gulf Stream"; but the fact is that Swedish education is being re-examined and reformed. The elementary school reform now under way would lead Sweden in the direction of the more democratic American system, and exhaustive governmental reports on higher education in the social sciences and in medicine advocate introduction of policies observed in the United States.

Sweden has not joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; she maintains a proud and rigid independence in the political sphere, and still more so in the cultural realm. But politically she will co-operate with the West in every way except by signing on the dotted line. Similarly, in techniques and theories applicable to business, engineering, education, medicine, and other fields, Sweden recognizes no subservience to the United States, but she is ready and eager to watch, to learn, and to adapt to her own uses whatever is thought to be more efficient and more fruitful. Her students find much of this adaptable material in the United States, and they are using it vigorously and effectively in their home country. They have not the Arabs' fear of American imperialism, no sense of cultural inferiority, no deep-seated historical resentments; they are free psychologically and actually to choose or to reject, to accept and modify what and when they will. They use their American experience, therefore, not as disciples of America, but as discoverers for Sweden.

Franklin D. Scott, Ph.D., Evanston, Illinois, is professor of history at Northwestern University. Since 1930 he has traveled and studied repeatedly in the Scandinavian countries, and in 1942 was a research specialist with the Office of Strategic Services in Washington. He has written a number of articles for the Encyclopaedia Britannica and the Britannica Book of the Year, articles in the field of modern European history in historical journals, and several books, including Bernadotte and the Fall of Napoleon (1935) and The United States and Scandinavia (1950).

Book Department

	PAGE
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND WORLD GOVERNMENT	146
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY	150
ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY	163
SOCIOLOGY AND EDUCATION	171
PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION	179
SPECIAL TOPICS ABROAD
COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS	187
SLAVIC COUNTRIES	193
WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE	197
OTHER COUNTRIES	205
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR	207
OTHER BOOKS	208

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND WORLD GOVERNMENT

WRIGHT, QUINCY. Problems of Stability and Progress in International Relations. Pp. xii, 378. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1954. $5.00.

In May 1952 Professor Wright delivered two papers on the occasion of the retirement of Professor Hans Kelsen at Berkeley. These carried the titles "Should International Peace and Security Be Institutionalized?" and "How Can International Peace and Security Be Suitably Internationalized?" According to the author's own words in his preface, they contained "a summary of the ideas upon the general problem of stability and progress in international relations" which he had been expressing since 1945. Consequently, when the question of the publication of the two papers arose, it seemed to the author advisable to include other articles and essays which he had written, published and unpublished, which developed these ideas in more concrete form. This is the genesis of the book, and explains its general structure.

Professor Wright does not indiscriminately support the idea of institutionalizing international peace and security. To him, institutions can have bad as well as good effects. What is important is that institutions be adapted to the changing conditions of an ever shrinking and changing world. He therefore concludes that "our problem is one of institutionalizing peace and security in the right direction, of the right type, and at the right speed."

How to do this, how to make progress in the suitable institutionalization of international peace and security, is the question with which most of Professor Wright's book is concerned. The author suggests four major approaches to the problem. First, there is need of a quantitative science of international relations to provide better guidance in determining the direction and amount of international regulation. Secondly, education must be more concerned with the world point of view, which can hardly emerge without a universal center of co-ordination and research. Thirdly, a constitution is needed which makes "the sentimentalized symbols and general purposes sufficiently ambiguous so that different views can be included and adaptation to new circumstances can be possible," while at the same time law and procedure are sufficiently precise to guide action. Finally, it is of the utmost importance that the powers and functions of the international institutions be interpreted in such a way that their authority will keep pace with the opinion necessary to support it.

Without sharing to the full Professor Wright's contagious optimism regarding the application of reason to international relations, one may yet feel that he has by these essays made an important contribution to our understanding of the conditions of a better ordered world.

LELAND M. GOODRICH

Columbia University

JACOBINI, H. B. A Study of the Philosophy of International Law as Seen in Works of Latin American Writers. Pp. viii, 158. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1954. Guilders 11.50.

It is unfortunately true, as the author observes in the Introduction to his scholarly study, that Latin American contributions to international law are virtually unknown in the United States except in very restricted circles. Hence his examination of the attitude of Latin American writers towards the philosophy of international law will be welcomed by students, and they will be surprised to note the wealth of treatises and monographs that have come from countries which, in spite of their common traditions, have developed strong national points of view.

In separate chapters the author examines the work of nineteenth- and twentieth-century writers, distinguishing in the nineteenth century between positivists, eclectics, and naturalists, and in the twentieth century merely between positivists and eclectics. But the author is quite aware that the distinctions between the three groups are at times difficult to draw, and while it may be easy to set an extreme positivist against an extreme naturalist, there is a middle zone in which the distinctions are relative rather than absolute. The problem is one, he observes, not of separating "the sheep from the goats," but of determining the greater or less degree in which one or other attitude is to be found.

A closing chapter deals with "American International Law" and is marked by a careful analysis of the thesis of Alejandro Alvarez followed by the opposing points of view of a number of writers, including Ruiz Moreno, Podestá Costa, and Ulloa. Perhaps the contrasting views are over-emphasized; and the question is best answered by the comment of the Dominican writer, Sánchez y Sánchez, that "the adjective [American] must not be taken as the expression of a distinct law, but as the expression of a particular application of general and universal public international law."

C. G. FENWICK

Pan American Union

DEUTSCH, KARL W. Political Community at the International Level. (Doubleday Short Studies in Political Science.) Pp. x, 70. Garden City: Doubleday & Company, 1954. 95 cents.

This monograph gives a historical survey of political communities in the contemporary terminology of social science, it elaborates a conceptual framework of international society, and it provides fourteen tests useful in measuring the degree of political integration. Deutsch's components for a stable international society follow Quincy Wright: political amalgamation supported by a psychological "we feeling," a degree of cultural standardization, and co-operation through trade, defense, and through the mutual recognition of vital interests. If the development of international society keeps pace with the increasing volume of political, cultural, and economic transactions; and if it not only solves the problems raised by these transactions, but creates the expectation that future problems will continue to be solved, then it can be said to be stable.

The fourteen tests designed to measure political integration cover three areas: the compatibility of autonomous groups, the extent to which international intercourse is mutually satisfying, and the volume of transactions. With real ingenuity the author indicates the importance of investigating mutually disruptive behavior; interchangeability of social roles; predictability of behavior; the number and relation of mutual economic, political, and cultural interests; the balance of transactions between areas; and the extent to which social communications integrate and penetrate social as well as geographical groupings.

Deutsch has made a significant contribution to the study of international relations. The elaboration of his fourteen tests for measuring political integration is both imaginative and suggestive. A useful appendix outlines ranges of transactions relevant for mapping a potential political community. However, one might criticize such conceptual tools as "integration load" or "integration capabilities" as being neither precise nor clear nor particularly helpful in analyzing peaceful change. Or it might be regretted that a greater attempt was not made to conform to standard terminology in the field (for example, use of "stable international society" would be quite as satisfactory as continuing the use of the unfortunate phrase "security community," which is dynamic only by definition). This reader, for one, is puzzled by the author's statement that communications must be considered a burden or problem in international relations, not a condition of stable international society (p. 34, note 17) after which he proceeds to outline six tests of political integration which are designed to measure the frequency, speed, fidelity, and effectiveness of communications (pp. 59-63). Could it be that communications create adjustment problems in the short run, but indicate the degree of integration in the long run? Finally, if these fourteen tests are going to be used effectively, it must be both by placing them in a historical perspective and projecting them into the future by assessing the rate of growth.

MARTIN B. TRAVIS, JR.

Stanford University

HOFFMANN, STANLEY. Organisations internationales et pouvoirs politiques des états. Pp. 428. Paris: Librairie Armand Colin, 1954. No price.

In No. 52 of the Cahiers de la Fondation des Sciences Politiques, Mr. Hoffmann seeks to measure the influence of states upon the organizations of which they are members and, conversely, the influence of the organizations upon states. The study is limited to the political field and traces the inquiry through three periods: the concert of Europe; the League of Nations; and the United Nations. In the end he has not been able to find much advance.

The Great Powers constitute both the hope and the difficulty in three various eras. The United Nations, based on unanimity among these powers, was rendered impotent when they failed to agree. Members have sought to break this circle of impotence by evading the veto (for example, usage of abstention), by increasing the jurisdiction of the General Assembly, and by regional developments. The zone of national sovereignty is being reduced by political votes of a majority of small states, whose decisions interpret such things as human rights or self-determination as superior to Charter restrictions, since these are political votes; and, since they refuse to ask judicial decision, no state can feel any certainty as to its rights under the Charter. The votes, of course, are only recommendations, but few states are willing, thus far, to reject them.

On the other hand, states incline to settle their problems by negotiation, in which the United Nations plays a subsidiary role; it does not conduct, but only facilitates, the negotiations. The United States, he says, does not "go it alone"; even the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) is subject to the Charter, and in the Korean affair the United States submitted to the collective will. While the United Nations is extending its limited power of action to invade domestic jurisdiction, it remains true that states settle their own affairs, and the United Nations merely furnishes machinery for their negotiations. He concludes that where solidarity exists among the Great Powers, organization is not needed; where solidarity does not exist, organization is impotent. His hope for the future rests in the development of such a community of nations as is now being shaped up in Western Europe.

It is a penetrating and useful study.

CLYDE EAGLETON

New York University

TURNER, ARTHUR C. Bulwark of the West: Implications and Problems of NATO. Pp. iv, 106. Toronto: Ryerson Press, 1953. $2.00.

The author was the secretary of a study group under the auspices of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs which, from March 1952 to January 1953, devoted itself to an examination of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The original draft of the book was made by Dr. Turner, and the present publication is based on that draft as it emerged after group discussions.

As regards the inspiration for the North Atlantic Treaty, Mr. Louis St. Laurent, in 1947 Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada, is credited with possibly the earliest public expression of the need for such an organization, when he pointed out that the Security Council of the United Nations had become "frozen in futility and divided by dissension," and (in a speech in 1948) that in their search for peace "it is possible for the free nations of the world to form their own closer association for collective defence under Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations . . ." (pp. 8-9). In the negotiations for the Treaty which followed the passage of the "Vandenberg Resolution" clearing the way for the participation of the United States, Canada played an important part, particularly in her successful effort to have it broadened from a strictly military alliance into an enterprise fostering fruitful collaboration among its members.

In discussing the problems encountered in the implementation and functioning of NATO, the part played by national pride and prejudice is pointed out. Likewise, the author observes that although the signatories of the Treaty agree in Article 5 that "armed attack against one or more of them shall be considered an attack against them all," each one retains the right to take "such action as it deems necessary." At this hour such hedging seems to this reviewer rather antediluvian, but apparently concessions had to be made to those whose nostalgic feelings blind them to the requirements of the present.

NATO's interest in and relation to the movement for European integration, evidenced on the one hand by the Council of Europe, and on the other by the Schuman and Pleven plans, are discussed at length. Succeeding chapters deal with NATO in relation to the British Commonwealth and the United Nations, as well as "the general appropriateness of regional organization in the present world situation" (p. 88).

Space precludes the raising of but one query: Does it follow that as soon as it became evident that the Great Powers would not, as originally assumed, attain unanimity on major questions "the United Nations ceased to make sense, and it was impossible that it should work" (p. 77)? Were the Security Council the United Nations this sweeping conclusion might stand.

FRANK M. RUSSELL

University of California
Berkeley

THOMAS, NORMAN. The Test of Freedom. Pp. 211. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1954. $3.00.

As a pacifist Mr. Norman Thomas did not blind himself to threats which force war even upon the most peace-loving nation, and as a Socialist he never ceased to be, first and foremost, a liberal. So he can give a candid account of his own political past which, without concealing errors of judgment, bears testimony to his unwavering and enlightened faith in Jeffersonian democracy. From this vantage point he reviews the present "state of liberty under the twin attacks called Communism and McCarthyism." The drama recorded in these pages is exciting enough, but it is related with an even and dispassionate voice, vibrant, however, with a deep devotion to America and American ideals. The desire to be just is dominant throughout, and equity is consistently placed above partisanship. Mr. Thomas analyzes with sympathetic understanding the conditions which rendered American liberals susceptible to the attraction of an illiberal doctrine: hatred of fascism, faith in social progress, and a critical attitude toward capitalism combined with loyalty toward a wartime ally and victim of Hitler's aggression. The author, who must have felt the strength of the temptation and who manfully resisted it, speaks here with singular authority. His arguments may exonerate erstwhile fellow travelers. But he is far from condoning the disreputable and traitorous acts which were inspired by allegiance to Communist principles. His indictment of Bolshevik theory and practice is of uncompromising stringency. Again, looking at the other side of the picture, he does not mince words in pillorying those who defend liberty by methods utterly inconsistent with liberty. But his disgust with McCarthy's demagoguery does not tempt him into either belittling the Communist danger or adding to the Senator's stature by painting him as the arch-enemy of democracy.

Sane and sober are the words which well describe this book. But they fail to do full justice to it. The balanced record and analysis of facts are interspersed with passages worth remembering for the political wisdom which they convey. On page 61 we read: "At no point in the world—except in Tito's Yugoslavia—is there any evidence of any change in the essential nature of communism." And on the preceding page: "It is always necessary for the lover of civil liberty to reflect that men seek to escape as well as to win it; that they are interested not so much in the abstract freedom as in particular freedoms, of which the group freedom called national independence is at the moment the dearest in Asia."

HELMUT KUHN

Munich, Germany

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY

HART, ALBERT G. Defense and the Dollar: Federal Credit and Monetary Policies. Pp. xiv, 203. New York: Twentieth Century Fund, 1953. $2.00.

At times in reading Defense and the Dollar I almost had the feeling of talking with a doctor eager for a patient on whom he could try a pet technique.

Dr. Hart says: "Despite inflation danger, we accept the judgment of our military leaders that we must spend faster for a time to build up an armament of planes, tanks, ships and guns." From that starting point, he examines mechanics for stabilization.

In the opinion of this reviewer (who does not claim to be a monetary expert) budget-makers and appropriation committees should never overlook the fact that blind, unquestioning pouring out of dollars in response to requests by military leaders who think in terms of "missions" rather than of costs can defeat the procurement of wanted items by pricing them out of the market. During the first year of Korea, it might be remembered, our military effort lost more aircraft to rocketing prices than to enemy action.

The author, then, in this reviewer's opinion, is a bit too inclined to say in effect, "Let the military write the check—we can manage the flow of credit."

The evidence of good management assembled by Mr. Hart, however, is not reassuring.

He makes a detailed examination of the application of Federal Reserve policies from 1917 through 1952, and comes up with this record—

12½ years of "Clearly Appropriate Policies"

9¾ years of "Doubtful or Unobjectionable Policies"

13¾ years of "Clearly Inappropriate Policies"

Yet, his prescription seems to be "more of the same." He closes his book with the recommendation of the Clark committee that "The Congress should direct the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury to emphasize the requirements of economic stability in their open-market and debt-management operations."

Earlier in his book, however, Mr. Hart recognizes that "the Treasury leans toward easy money" by "a bias" which "arises naturally enough because each of the frequent flotations of government securities involves anxious moments; to make the flotation succeed, buyers must have plenty of funds" and that "the Federal Reserve 'as fiscal agent' sets up market contacts and handles bonds and checks as called for by the Treasury decision."

Mr. Hart neatly points out in an early chapter that funds are "created" by a normal bank lending operation and that "using these funds does not use them up."

When the borrower repays his loan, "the newly created funds will be retired."

During the period of the loan and the circulation of the created funds, an increase in buying power has taken place. The larger the period of circulation, the greater the turnover, the greater the volume of loans, the greater the increase of funds to compete for a dwindling production of consumer goods. In short, the greater the inflation.

Mr. Hart turns his back on gold or even a commodity-reserve as a limitation upon the volume of currency in these newly made funds. He thinks that the public "sees that we need an official defender of the integrity of the dollar." He concludes that "if the Federal Reserve (or any top monetary authority set up to co-ordinate the Federal Reserve and the Treasury) can fill this part worthily in the next few years, this country will have a good start toward a sound long-run monetary policy."

In view of Mr. Hart's own documentation of the 23½ years of doubtful or clearly inappropriate policies against 12½ years of appropriate ones, that seems to be a large and disappointing "IF."

If we need an official defender of the integrity of the dollar, it would seem more consideration might be given to permitting gold to resume more of its natural role of policeman through free convertibility. At least the policeman would be more than the opinion of some "expert" after a bad breakfast.

FRANCIS CASE

United States Senator from South Dakota

PAUL, RANDOLPH E. Taxation in the United States. Pp. xii, 830. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1954. $15.00.

Taxation in the United States tells the story of how our Federal tax system came to be what it is, it offers a judicious appraisal of recent developments and trends in that system, and it suggests the directions toward which the author would like to see our tax structure evolve.

Perhaps no one in the United States is so eminently qualified as Mr. Paul to write this kind of book. He has devoted a lifetime to taxes: as a distinguished legal practitioner, as a Treasury official devoted to the public welfare, as a meticulous scholar, and as a humane individual who has never lost sight of the fact that the tax system exists only to serve mankind. The book is a direct product of this broad experience, careful scholarship, and humane outlook. Altogether, it is a major contribution to the literature of public finance. It will become a classic to be consulted not only by students of public finance but also by students of American history.

One of the most noteworthy features of the book is the exceptional quality of its literary style. It tells the story of American taxation clearly, logically, authoritatively, and with a fine sense of historical perspective. It conveys the drama of the struggles and ordeals out of which the American system of taxation has emerged. Yet it is consistently restrained and scholarly. It is historical writing of great eloquence and charm. From a literary point of view, this book stands alone in the entire field of public finance.

The central characters of the book are the individual income tax and its cousins the corporation income tax, and the estate and gift taxes. Mr. Paul traces the evolution of these taxes from earliest beginnings in the United States to the present. Two themes are stressed: first, the political struggles relating to the introduction of these taxes—struggles centered on the question of constitutionality; and second, the political, legal, and economic forces and necessities which have led to the numerous modifications of these taxes. While the book emphasizes the income and death taxes, it never loses sight of the total federal tax system—including the excises, import duties, and all the others.

The number of pages devoted to the various periods of American tax history is correlated with the amount of revenue collected during these periods: 104 pages on the period prior to World War I, 131 pages on the inter-war period, and 390 pages on World War II and after. The final section (141 pages) is devoted to commentary on the preceding history and to appraisal of the present tax system.

I hesitate to single out one part of the book for praise, because it is of uniform excellence. However, the final section seemed to me to be the most illuminating and helpful reading on general tax policy that I have encountered. The chapter on the judicial process is a remarkably lucid commentary on the role of the courts in the evolution of our tax system. The chapter, "The Unfinished Task," treats with uncommon sanity the effects of our tax system upon our economic and social life. The chapter, "The Story of Progressive Taxation," is an outstanding summary of the issues concerning graduated rates—issues which many had thought were settled but which are again coming to the forefront of political discussion. The final chapter is an eloquent plea for adequate tax and fiscal policy as a vital part of our effort to sustain our way of life against implacable totalitarian threats. As Mr. Paul puts it (p. 637), it is "the question whether Americans are willing to pay, in taxes, the price of the kind of civilization they have chosen for their own."

The final pages on the responsibility of tax "experts" should be read by every person who regards himself as a student or practitioner of taxation.

HOWARD R. BOWEN

Williams College

Temple University Survey of Federal Reorganization, The. 2 vols. Pp. 118; 117. Philadelphia: Temple University, 1953. $5.00.

Dr. Robert L. Johnson, President of Temple University, whose services in marshaling citizen support for the objectives of the Hoover Commission have been a major civic contribution, has presided over another project of immense significance in federal administrative reorganization. Financed by private enterprise and undertaken by private citizens, this report contains one hundred twenty-six recommendations for improving governmental structure.

In October 1952, the Temple University program of research was begun in order to bring up to date researches for the Hoover Report completed in 1949 and to provide the new administration, whether Republican or Democratic, with guidelines for continued reorganization. These recommendations were completed early in 1953 and transmitted to a special committee which had been appointed by President-elect Eisenhower. The Survey therefore represents proposals seriously considered by the new administration as it went into office.

Publication of the recommendations, not released during the initial stages of their consideration by the administration, is now a public service of practical reference value. An impressive group of public-spirited citizens served without compensation as advisers for the project. Twelve reports, plus a special statement on foreign affairs and mutual security, afford brief summaries of major administrative problems and specific suggestions for improved organization. The volumes do not include supporting studies representing the work of some 100 specialists in many fields. The materials are therefore of primary interest to specialists in public administration, but they are not the less valuable for their succinctness. This Survey, as it was designed, bridges the gap between the first and second Hoover Commissions. It is a monument to the tremendous civic support for better government and evidence of an abiding American determination to seek administrative progress through research and analysis.

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE

University of Maryland

RANNEY, AUSTIN. The Doctrine of Responsible Party Government: Its Origins and Present State. Vol. XXXIV, No. 3 in "Illinois Studies in the Social Sciences." Pp. xi, 176. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1954. $4.00.

In his brief volume, The Doctrine of Responsible Party Government: Its Origin and Present State, Austin Ranney has made an analysis of the theories concerning party government formulated at the turn of the century by a distinguished group of scholars and publicists, all Americans except one, and has made an attempt to describe the status of these ideas today. Ranney's careful and precise summary of the ideas of Wilson, Lowell, Ford, Goodnow, Ostrogorski, and Croly is the first attempt to study the history of American theories about party politics. It ought to do something to arouse interest in a neglected field of political thought and may even persuade a few scholars to reread some of the classics of American political science. The intellectual materials examined are intrinsically so interesting and exciting that it is a sheer delight to rediscover them.

It seems to the reviewer that Professor Ranney is a little less successful when he attempts to formulate a party theory of his own. It is excessively academic to argue that the practical consequences of Wilsonian ideas of party government have been small because Wilson and his contemporaries did not develop fully the majoritarian implications of their theories, nor is it likely that the party system will remain static until the American public is converted to Willmoore Kendall's concept of unlimited majority rule. It is more probable that the idea of responsible party government had little immediate effect on American politics for the simple reason that from 1896 to 1932 there was no satisfactory way to implement the idea by holding the party in power responsible to the public. The election of 1896 produced a sectional alignment so overwhelming and so stable and developed one-party areas so extensively that the party system ceased very largely to be competitive. Talk of party responsibility made no sense under these circumstances.

On the other hand, the new national alignments resulting from the party revolution of 1932 have given a new meaning to Woodrow Wilson's concept of the role of the parties in American politics. The nationalization of party alignments since 1932 makes possible the kind of alternation in power which is the first prerequisite for party responsibility. The party system is now so widely competitive that responsibility is likely to be imposed on the parties whether they like it or not. It follows that it is now not very important that there are some people in the country who do not like the idea of majority rule.

In these times theorists may become influential by inventing those rationalizations needed by politicians who find themselves in unfamiliar situations. If the test of an idea is going to be its capacity to get itself accepted, theorists ought to examine the market for their ideas. In one of the most dynamic periods in the history of the world it is a poor theorist indeed who cannot find people who see the relevance of his ideas to the things they want to accomplish.

E. E. SCHATTSCHNEIDER

Wesleyan University

KRAUS, MICHAEL. The Writing of American History. Pp. x, 387. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1953. $5.50.

The present book is the second, enlarged edition of a work previously entitled A History of American History (New York, 1937). Though Professor Kraus has attempted to take account of significant books published in the interval, the fundamental character of his work remains unchanged. The new title is however somewhat more descriptive, since the emphasis continues to be placed upon the actual writing of history and not upon the institutional development of the historical profession, the character of historical instruction in the schools and colleges, or the impact of historical scholarship on the popular imagination. This limitation would seem to be perfectly justifiable.

In general, historians are grouped together in large categories, with major figures tending to receive some half-dozen pages each. Francis Parkman and Henry Adams, but not George Bancroft or Frederick Jackson Turner, attain the dignity of separate chapters. Non-American writers are not on principle excluded, but only Sir George Otto Trevelyan and John A. Doyle receive extended treatment. William Robertson and W. E. H. Lecky are mentioned only in passing, and the most influential living historian in the English-speaking world, Sir Lewis Namier, figures only in a footnote. This is all the more surprising in that Professor Kraus has a chapter on "The Imperial School" of historians of the American Revolution which might well culminate in an analysis of Namierism. For most of the historians treated by Professor Kraus he supplies a brief but helpful selection from the biographical and critical literature about them, but he does not give a systematic catalogue of their own principal articles and books. The bibliographical value of the work is correspondingly limited.

It must be said that the criticisms made of the first edition of this book apply with equal force to the second. Perhaps inevitably, many of the chapters are disjointed. But Professor Kraus has made his task more difficult by the choice of meaningless and unhelpful categories for organizing his material. Why except for chronology should Jared Sparks, George Bancroft, and Richard Hildreth be lumped together as "Patriots, Romantics—and Hildreth"? What exactly is the science shared in common by Professor Kraus's "Scientific School"? In what useful sense do von Holst, Schouler, Fiske, McMaster, Winsor, and Channing deserve the collective title of "The Nationalist School"? And, finally, who would guess in 1954 that Charles A. Beard and Vernon L. Parrington are "Contemporary Trends"?

These rather mechanical juxtapositions are a function of the central weakness of the book, an almost total lack of feeling for historical writing as a part of the history of ideas. It is no accident that Professor Kraus's discussion of Puritan historians is substantially uninformed by a reading of Perry Miller's New England Mind and his discussion of Charles A. Beard not visibly influenced by Morton G. White's Social Thought in America—the two subtlest books of recent years which treat of historical writing in America as a mode of thought and a paradigm of intellectual history. One may here add that Professor Kraus's book is seriously impaired by his failure to recognize Perry Miller as the most vigorous creative intellect now at work among American historians. But intellectual history and intellectual historians are obviously not congenial to Professor Kraus. For his own part he gives what many people will be glad to have, an undemanding account, not from within but from without, of what historians have said about America from colonial times to the present.

DONALD FLEMING

Brown University

COTTERILL, R. S. The Southern Indians: The Story of the Civilized Tribes Before Removal. "The Civilization of the American Indian Series," Vol. XXXVIII. Pp. xiii, 255. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. $4.00.

From their discovery by De Soto in the Gulf and Southern Appalachian region in 1540 to their forced removal to Oklahoma three centuries later the Cherokees, Chocktaws, Chickasaws, and Creeks, with their Seminole offshoot, made a powerful impact upon the history of the white man in North America. This book is an account, based on much scholarly research, of these complex Indian-white interrelations.

In his preface the author disclaims this limitation; it was his aim "to write a history of the Indians, as distinguished from a history of their foreign relations." The purpose proved to be beyond the spiritual insight of this historian from an alien culture; but narrowing his study down to its proper field, he has done well.

He writes with a clear, vigorous style illuminated by flashes of wit. Thus he succinctly sums up the argument of English Superintendent Stuart to the Cherokees that if they would cede the land overrun by white trespassers "the trespassers would no longer be trespassing." When Spain entered the war against England in the American Revolution, the pro-British Chickasaws "remained unconscious of their conquest by a Spanish proclamation." The conscientious American agent Hawkins "returned to his task of promoting civilization and discord among the Creeks." When the Seminoles were induced to accept an uninhabitable reservation in Florida "where they would be free from white encroachment, the commissioners spoke with complete, if unintentional accuracy."

Such expressions are more than witty comments on specific happenings. Each of them could be the thesis of a book on the white man's Indian policy; they are completely typical, true for any locality, any tribe, and any period of American history.

Unfortunately this cleverness is actually misleading in interpreting the obscure motives behind Indian actions, the emotional responses that constitute Indian reasoning. The author understands one fundamental native institution: the communal ownership of land as an economic system and a mystical concept. But aside from this he is lost.

He is equally obtuse in brushing aside the influence of white missionaries. Why, for example, does he not only ignore but deny their native language studies?

The real excellence of the book then is confined to the history and interpretation of the white man's official policy, more particularly the American policy, towards the Indians. The effect is not very gratifying to national pride, but this is a phase of American history that needs to be told.

ANGIE DEBO

Oklahoma Agricultural and Mechanical College

JEFFERSON, THOMAS. The Papers of Thomas Jefferson. Vol. 8: 25 February to 31 October 1785. Edited by Julian P. Boyd, Mina R. Bryan, and Elizabeth L. Hutter. Pp. xxix, 687. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1953. $10.00.

The eighth volume of this monumental series, for which the world of scholarship is so deeply in debt to the editor and his associates, brings sharply into focus two aspects of Jefferson's many-sided personality. One is the diplomat, engrossed in public negotiations. The other is the intelligent observer of his contemporaries with a philosopher's flair for reflective generalization.

As a diplomat this year, 1785, finds Jefferson busily occupied. The return of Franklin to the United States and the transfer of Adams to London leave Jefferson as the sole American Minister in Paris. The correspondence contains much information about the various drafts and discussions that culminated in the signing of a treaty of friendship and commerce with Prussia. Much time was also devoted to the preliminaries of sending a representative to the Barbary Coast to come to terms with the pirate states located there. The picture that emerges is of a diplomat who is cool, realistic, shrewd, and well able to calculate matters of power and interest.

The private reflections that unfold in his letters to family and friends depict his character, tastes, and preferences. Writing to Abigail Adams, he remarks about himself: "I do not love difficulties. I am fond of quiet, willing to do my duty, but irritable by slander and apt to be forced by it to abandon my post" (p. 548). He has some judicious descriptions of American characteristics, contrasting North and South (p. 468), and of France and Frenchmen. By the latter he is alternately attracted and repelled. While full of admiration for French culture and polish, he is shocked at the unequal distribution of wealth, at the vicious form of government, and at the dissoluteness of many among the aristocracy. A simple pietist, a Puritan ascetic, rises in him to proclaim the simple virtues of rustic living and to warn against European "grand tours" for any American aged less than thirty. At the same time, his fundamental belief in people, and a readiness to distinguish between the individual human being and his social conditioning, evoke that noble humanism which befits the author of the words that "all men are created equal." He criticizes and condemns the institution of slavery and looks forward to its eventual abolition (pp. 184, 356). He begs that the American Indians be judged by their potential abilities rather than by their actual state, considering them in no wise an inferior stock (p. 185). For the horizons of his thought and sympathy are no less extensive than mankind itself.

LESLIE LIPSON

University of California
Berkeley

SCHACHNER, NATHAN. The Founding Fathers. Pp. x, 630. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1954. $6.00.

Beginning with the inauguration of Washington in April 1789 and ending with the inauguration of Jefferson in 1801, Mr.

Schachner's latest book offers the best modern survey of the politics and diplomacy of the Federalist era. It treats all the familiar subjects that figure in a college textbook. Interesting, fair, straightforward, and full of essential information, it is best suited to serious amateur students or beginning teachers. Especially good are its concluding chapters on the administration of John Adams. The writing is clear and generally forceful, though hardly distinguished. Mr. Schachner portrays the 1790's as a time much like our own and the Founding Fathers as men much like ourselves. The reader feels a sense of kinship with the past rather than that he is viewing from afar an age of supermen. The moral is that, despite earlier strains, the Republic endured.

The work falters when it touches the West. More serious is the lack of pointed background sketches that are needed to vitalize details. Incidents of minor importance are described, presumably for a human interest value. Actually, they obscure the essentials and give a disjointed effect. Mr. Schachner's two main themes, apart from party politics and personalities, are foreign affairs and the financial policies of the Federalists. In each case, decisions and events were influenced by economic conditions that should be analyzed. Mr. Schachner has not done this. He does not even show what economic goals the Federalist leaders sought to reach. His studies of Jefferson and Hamilton have led him to exaggerate the importance of those two colorful men, whose prolific writings give a distorted view of the period. Adhering to the common view, Mr. Schachner pictures Hamilton as the Federalist titan and Washington as little more than a figurehead. Actually, Washington was the guiding genius. All the major Federalist policies harmonized with ideas which he had repeatedly expressed. On January 29, 1789, he wrote: "... my endeavours shall be unremittingly exerted (even at the hazard of former fame or present popularity) to extricate my country from the embarrassments in which it is entangled, through want of credit; and to establish a general system of policy, which if pursued will ensure permanent felicity to the Commonwealth. I think I see a path, as clear and as direct as a ray of light, which leads to the attainment of that object."

Hamilton went down rapidly after he ceased to be Washington's principal lieutenant.

Since a lack of understanding of Washington's ideas, purposes, methods, and influence is Mr. Schachner's chief weakness, his book gains considerably in interest, weight, and momentum after the General leaves the main scene of action.

CURTIS P. NETTELS

Cornell University

DAUER, MANNING J. The Adams Federalists. Pp. xxiii, 381. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1953. $6.00.

This book is a competent and well written analysis of the political crosscurrents within the Federalist party during the Adams administration. The author develops very nicely the split between the moderate Adams Federalists on the one hand and the Hamiltonian High Federalists on the other, a split which played a principal part in the destruction of the Federalist party. The High Federalists, Dauer emphasizes, had a positive program for converting the United States into a thoroughly aristocratic and hierarchical society and were intent upon using the new army, the Alien and Sedition Acts, and the quasi-War with France as instruments to this end. They were utterly disgusted with John Adams when he insisted on a program of internal moderation and a peace settlement with Bonaparte. The resultant party quarrel ruptured the cabinet, cost the Federalists the election of 1800, and set the Federalists far on the road to extinction. This interpretation of the High Federalists, incidentally, as extremists who deliberately sought to prepare for the destruction of the Jacobins through force and civil war follows the interpretation first set forth by Henry Adams in his Gallatin; it is at odds with what Morison, Bassett, Channing, and others have since had to say upon the same subject.

Not the least interesting part of the present work are the tables, which show in complete detail the voting records of all members of the several Congresses up through 1800, and the congressional maps which show the distribution of High Federalist, moderate, and Republican districts throughout the United States in the same period. The author, it may be observed, is very plainly devoted to the Turner-Craven school of history, in that he believes that markets, land fertility, and soil exhaustion were the decisive factors in the distribution of Federalist and Republican political strength in the country. The result in this case is altogether convincing. However, one may express some cautious doubts about the proposition set forth in the preface that the quantitative inductive method applied to historical analysis will lead to general areas of historical agreement and lessen the controversies over rival interpretations of the social forces at work in an era. History, after all, is at once an art, a philosophy, and a mode of social analysis, and no amount of quantitative material can eliminate the decisive personal creative element in its production.

ALFRED H. KELLY

Wayne University

FREMANTLE, JAMES ARTHUR LYON. The Fremantle Diary. Edited by Walter Lord. Pp. xv, 304. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1954. $4.00.

This interesting work consists of the day to day observations of Lieutenant Colonel James A. L. Fremantle, of the Coldstream Guards, a fair-minded, intelligent Englishman, who in the fateful year of 1863 journeyed through the heart of the Southern Confederacy from the mouth of the Rio Grande to Gettysburg. Traveling, as he did, by train, steamer, stagecoach, and horseback, he had a fine opportunity to observe and evaluate all classes of people. His sympathy with the Southern cause, his adaptability, and his attractive personality won for him exceptional popularity wherever he went.

Coming with letters of introduction from influential men in England and receiving others from Southern generals, he was able to meet practically all the leading civilian and military leaders in the area through which he passed. Included in the list of the prominent men with whom he had interviews were Generals Beauregard, Hood, Bragg, Joseph E. Johnston, Longstreet, and Lee. He was also cordially received by President Davis and Judah P. Benjamin, Secretary of State.

He was greatly impressed with the spirit of self-sacrifice on the part of the Southern people and the equanimity with which they bore their sufferings and the loss of their property. The beauty of the women had a strong attraction for him. The ladies he met were often described as "pretty" and sometimes "extremely pretty." Nor was his admiration for the Southern people dampened by his opposition to slavery. On the contrary, he seemed to feel that they were doing their best with a bad situation which had been thrust upon them. Indeed, he went out of his way, more than once, to point out instances of good treatment of the blacks by the whites and of the loyalty of the slaves to their masters. He was not unmindful, however, of the shortcomings, and objectionable practices of the people, but even these he viewed with charity, in some instances mixed with a sense of humor. For example, he observed with amusement, rather than hostile criticism, the fine marksmanship displayed by his fellow travelers in disposing of tobacco juice through open coach windows.

The most interesting and valuable portions of this book are the descriptions of the countryside and cities through which he passed, his account of the military situation in Mississippi and the fighting at Gettysburg (some of which he saw from a treetop), and his appraisal of the prominent men with whom he came in contact. He spoke in the highest terms of President Davis and Generals Lee and Longstreet and expressed favorable opinions of nearly all of the other military leaders. He was the guest of Longstreet during the period of fighting in the campaign at and near Gettysburg.

A good map in the front and end linings makes it easy to follow the narrative.

This journal gives us a good view of life in the South at the halfway point in the Civil War, and one finishes reading it with a good taste in the mouth.

O. P. CHITWOOD

West Virginia University

LEFLER, HUGH TALMAGE, and ALBERT RAY NEWSOME. North Carolina: The History of a Southern State. Pp. xii, 676. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1954. $7.50.

A praiseworthy development of the last two decades has been the publication of readable single-volume state histories written at the adult level, characterized by professional standards, and far better suited for both classroom and popular usage than the formidable compendia of history and biography that have been traditional.

The University of North Carolina Press, which has been responsible for such volumes on Georgia, Florida, Arkansas, and South Carolina, has now turned its attention closer home with the publication of this excellent volume on the Tar Heel State. It is the distilled essence of many years of teaching and research in the history of their state by Hugh T. Lefler and the late Albert Ray Newsome, both professors at the state university, the latter at one time Secretary of the Historical Commission of North Carolina.

The treatment given in this book is extremely well balanced with respect to those matters which present particular problems to the authors of state history. It avoids the purely antiquarian interest to give proportionate attention to all periods of the state's history and brings the narrative down to 1953. Ample space is devoted to social, intellectual, and economic development as well as to the traditional political and military history. And the difficult problem of placing the state in perspective with relation to national history is conveniently solved by interspersing chapters on pertinent national developments which in classroom usage might be omitted or assigned as background reading.

In general the text has successfully avoided the filiopietistic for the more critical approach. In certain minor respects, however, the inevitable pressures of state patriotism have manifested themselves. This reviewer is compelled to point out that Andrew Jackson was a native son of South Carolina and not North Carolina as the text implies while attempting to evade the issue. On the other hand, it would have been a valuable contribution to have included some explicit treatment and explanation of North Carolina's reputation as the South's most progressive state.

These are, however, but minor reservations. The book is, on the whole, a comprehensive and balanced treatment within the limits of available space. Its usefulness is enhanced by the device of topical headings and by the inclusion of appendixes giving the governors, information on the counties, population, and a chronology of significant events. The selected bibliography is arranged by chapter headings to provide a guide to further reading. This will be for some years to come the basic textbook for North Carolina history.

GEORGE B. TINDALL

Louisiana State University

FITE, GILBERT C. George N. Peek and the Fight for Farm Parity. Pp. xiii, 314. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. $4.00.

George Peek fathered the idea that came to be known as the McNary-Haugen plan. He led the fight for its adoption. In this struggle, the farm groups learned for the first time how to use effectively the political power which was inherent in their position in the economy and in the Congress. The campaign Peek initiated was the most sustained, highly organized, and ably led farmer movement in the nation's history. It became also the most controversial political issue of the 1920's.

Professor Fite's study will be welcomed as a significant contribution to our understanding of Peek and of the part he played in this struggle. The book is neither a biography, in the ordinary sense, nor a balanced and critical examination of the issues of the period, though it contains some elements of both. The picture of Peek that emerges is, we believe, a different one from what the author felt he was presenting. Peek does not appear as a great thinker or student of the problem. He is rather a genial, likable, and tireless salesman of an idea. His sincerity and selflessness can scarcely be challenged, but his lack of understanding of economic issues stands out with almost equal clarity.

It is in this realm that the author's treatment of the period is least satisfying. He writes as a historian but touches on many economic issues which unfortunately are not handled with sureness, objectivity, or understanding. There is a tendency to accept things as true because these leaders said they were true. It must be kept in mind that they were in the midst of a hot political campaign. Their statements and analyses, and those of their opponents, are obviously distorted and partisan as is to be expected in situations of that kind.

The good salesman convinces himself that the product he seeks to sell is the best in the market. George Peek was a good salesman. He was also an ardent protectionist. His understanding of the problem and his prescription for solving it changed very little even after the world market collapsed in 1930. Many of his later troubles stemmed from this over-rigidity of mind and his lack of understanding of the economic problems with which he was concerned.

Fite's account makes a worth-while contribution, but it should not be regarded as the whole story. As many biographers do, he has absorbed the thinking of the principal character to such an extent that he presents it uncritically. The treatment of the economic aspects of the problem is particularly unfortunate in places, but the space assigned to this review does not allow for discussion of them. Also the struggle of the 1920's seems to this reviewer to be pictured too much as a one-man affair. The opposition too seems to be given less than fair treatment. Calvin Coolidge was as stubborn and unyielding as Peek and probably as fully convinced that he was right.

Despite these defects, the student of farmer movements will find much to admire in the careful search of original records which the author has made and in the readable and interesting summary he has presented.

M. R. BENEDICT

University of California
Berkeley

VAN DEUSEN, GLYNDON G. Horace Greeley: Nineteenth-Century Crusader.

Pp. 445. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1953. $5.00.

Horace Greeley was one of the most contradictory personalities our history has turned up. I can think of no one more capricious and unpredictable. It was impossible to know in advance whether, in any particular situation, he would prove to be on the side of the angels or the devil's advocate.

Consequently, preparing an evaluation of his life, character, and contribution presents formidable difficulties. Some of these Dr. Van Deusen handsomely surmounts. For example, he shows a shrewd insight into Greeley's usefulness to liberal causes when he observes:

"This reputation was largely undeserved. For the Tribune editor was not half the reformer he was supposed to be. There was a Greeley who yearned to build the New Jerusalem and whose sword leaped lightly to his hand, but there was also another Greeley who was calculating, conservative and full of shifts and evasions, not to mention a third Greeley who sought refuge from reality in Utopia."

Yet I am afraid that the promise implicit in such a searching analysis has hardly been kept in this biography as a whole. It is not soundly proportioned. True, Greeley's greatest contribution has been as an editor, as the purveyor of news and the molder of opinion. But the areas in which Greeley failed are as important for a true portrait as those in which he succeeded, and it is not enough just to acknowledge them. They must also be described and analyzed.

It seems to me that here the author has not wholly met his responsibilities. When the Civil War came to an end, it is fair to say that Greeley's greatest days as a journalist were also over. After that he gave more and more of his time and attention to politics, and never effectively. I cannot but feel that the story of these irascible and barren years isn't very adequately presented. Neither in space nor in content has Greeley's impact—or lack of it—during the Johnson and first Grant administration, followed by the debacle which ended in Greeley's defeat, dethronement and death, been successfully described.

Typical is the handling of the weeks between the election of 1872 and the end. These were for Greeley a period of unbearable torture. Although it has been fifteen years since I read the letters he wrote then, I still recall with a shudder how they revealed a soul in torment, a mind falling apart under unendurable anguish. This is recorded here, of course, but certainly not in any way which makes the lay reader aware of its intolerable poignancy.

ALPHONSE B. MILLER
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

NOEL, MARY. Villains Galore: The Heyday of the Popular Story Weekly. Pp. xi, 320. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $5.00.

During the years between 1840 and 1890, thousands of middle-class Americans found escape in the emotion-charged fiction of the popular story weeklies.

Villains Galore is a skillful and fascinating recounting of the rise and fall of these low-priced weeklies. The first thirteen chapters are devoted pretty largely to historical aspects; the concluding section is concerned with content, authors, editorial and business policies, audience, and influence.

The author lists some forty publications, most of them published either in Philadelphia or Boston, which dominated American periodical reading during the half-century span of this era of American journalism.

The Flag of Our Union, established in 1846 by Frederick Gleason, a Boston job printer, was probably the first real family story paper. It was cheap and appeared weekly. Circulation income was its chief source of revenue. The content was "original" and paid for. It avoided politics and sectarianism while boasting of a high moral tone. It was sheer entertainment.

New York City, which became the home of a number of great daily newspapers when the Penny Sun was founded in 1833, was the site of the establishment in 1856 of what was probably the most successful popular story weekly of all—the New York Ledger, published by a wealthy and shrewd Scotch-Irishman named Robert Bonner. A near rival appeared in the same city three years later in the form of the New York Weekly, published by Francis S. Street and Francis S. Smith.

Bonner knew all of the answers. He understood mass circulation practices, the value of advertising in other media, and reader interest. He hired the best authors, with Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth heading the list, and paid the best rates. His editorial rule was a model of simplicity: "Each installment must be packed full of incident and suspense, and each much be free from obvious improprieties."

The content of the popular story weeklies offers a rich field for investigation and analysis and Miss Noel makes the most of her opportunity.

Sweetness and violence are the unchanging elements. The Grand Reunion theme underlies all plots. Characters tend to be artificial because they are entirely controlled by the exigencies of the plot. The chief sins were tobacco, blasphemy, gambling, drinking, dueling, and suicide. The chief tabo was controversial politics.

A novel feature of the story weeklies was the correspondents' columns, composed usually of questions and answers but occasionally resembling the still popular letters-to-the-editor departments in newspapers and periodicals. A somewhat curious feature was the devotion of page 4 to material of a more high-brow nature.

Miss Noel freely admits the faults of the story weeklies but stanchly defends the role they played in the society which made them possible: "To millions of poor, hard-working, monotony-ridden lives, the story papers were a wide new world of high adventure and lovely sentiment, of mysterious danger, of wonderful escape. They were not only the popular magazines of the nineteenth century America, they were its Hollywood and radio."

FREDERIC E. MERWIN

Rutgers University

LINK, ARTHUR S. Woodrow Wilson and the Progressive Era, 1910-1917. Pp. xvii, 331. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $5.00.

With the publication of this book, "The New American Nation Series," edited by Henry S. Commager and Richard B. Morris, makes an auspicious beginning. If the approximately 40 volumes that are to follow equal Woodrow Wilson and the Progressive Era in judicious selection of materials, in scope of treatment, in objectivity of interpretation, and in interesting style of narration, students of American history are in for a treat. Amply illustrated with cartoons, maps, and pictures, and with the text supplemented by numerous explanatory footnotes, the needs of all types of readers are met. One of the best features of this scholarly book is the critical essay of more than 30 pages on the sources. This section is not a repetition of the references found in the footnotes but is a general and comprehensive bibliography. An adequate and accurate index completes the book.

The author begins with a discussion of the contrast between the New Nationalism and the New Freedom as evidenced in the leadership of Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson. The former accepted the Hamiltonian philosophy of centralized government control whereas the latter was at heart a Jeffersonian liberal with laissez-faire leanings. Roosevelt failed to win the election of 1912 because he could not entice the progressive Democrats away from Wilson.

Anyone familiar with Wilson's writings would anticipate that he, upon becoming President, would "inaugurate a new system of presidential leadership." Moreover, he had fostered executive aggression as a policy when serving as Governor of New Jersey. By the fall of 1916 the New Freedom became a veritable economic reformation. The tariff was lowered, the currency was further controlled and given elasticity, the anti-trust laws were strengthened, the farmers were furnished financial credit, and labor was granted more recognition. But Wilson was no socialist nor even an ardent social reformer. The influence of Wilson's early Southern environment was revealed in the treatment which the Negro received at the hands of his administration. It was probably the greatest blot on his executive leadership.

It would be the irony of fate, said Wilson upon beginning his administration, if he should be forced to deal chiefly with foreign affairs. Wilson was plagued with many diplomatic sore spots. The President and Bryan muddled through the increasingly trying situation of our relations with Mexico. The issue was compromised when we prepared to enter the European War almost two years after Bryan had given way to Lansing as Secretary of State. As strained as were our relations with Latin America from 1913 to 1917, recurring crises with the European belligerents were even more crucial.

With the campaign of 1916 impending, Wilson returned his attention to progressivism and peace. Congress, when pricked into action by the executive spur, enacted several liberal laws which helped Wilson to stay in power. By April 1917, we had drifted into war, and a new epoch in American history was begun.

GEORGE C. OSBORN

University of Florida

WHITE, WILLIAM S. The Taft Story. Pp. 288. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $3.50.

Students of history are aware of the fact that historians have an uncanny habit of correctly reassessing the success or failure of dead statesmen. As an illustration of this, the reputation for statesmanship of Franklin D. Roosevelt is decidedly on the down grade today. The reputation of John Quincy Adams has been rapidly rising for the past century, and now he is looked upon by many historians as one of our greatest statesmen. But it usually takes some time for authors or students of contemporary men to become nonpartisan and objective in their writings. All this makes the book by Mr. White the more remarkable. He has written a favorable assessment of Robert A. Taft with keen insight and also with great fairness. The book is of the highest journalistic quality, using the word "journalist" in the best sense.

The author divides his work into four parts, each one which is of absorbing interest and shows sound judgment. They are entitled: (1) The Fundamental Taft; (2) Taft in Responsibility and Irresponsibility; (3) Taft in Foreign Policy; and (4) The Last, Best Taft.

The author is evidently well aware of the fact that, as stated to this reviewer by one of the leading men in Washington, "Taft was the most brilliant man in the Senate, but he did not have enough patience with the dumbbells." It was this lack of patience rather than the fact that Taft thought more quickly and also more deeply than the average politician of his time that caused him to lose the support of many of the common fry of politicians.

It is just an illustration of the old dictum of James Bryce who, sixty or more years ago, wrote the famous judgment in his American Commonwealth asking "Why the best men do not become President?" Recent history has thrown some doubt upon the final worth of this judgment since our Presidents have become national party leaders as well as executives. This goes far to explain not only the failure of Mr. Taft to become Republican candidate for President, but also in contrast the popular appeal of the vibrant and unreliable Franklin Roosevelt.

The Taft Story is a "must" reading for the intelligent citizen of today, irrespective of party, who desires to get at the inner meaning of American politics during the past few years. Its author has done a real public service in writing this book with such remarkable detachment so soon after the death of Mr. Taft.

WILLIAM STARR MYERS
Princeton, New Jersey

BURNHAM, JAMES. The Web of Subversion. Pp. 248. New York: John Day Company, 1954. $3.75.

The subtitle of this book by a well-known expert on Communism is "underground networks in the U. S. Government." Using the published reports of congressional committees as his source material, Mr. Burnham attempts to chart the course of Soviet espionage and infiltration in Washington from the New Deal to the present. The Web of Subversion falls short of Burnham's generally high standard; it bears the scars of haste, and it is only moderately accurate as to facts.

On page 29, Burnham states that where men are named who denied charges of subversive activity under oath, "such denials will in each case be noted." An excellent procedure provided it is consistently followed. There are seven references to a certain Solomon Adler who appears as an accused Red espionage agent, but there is no allusion to Adler's categorical denial of these charges in published testimony before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Naturally, there is no suggestion here that the omission of the denial was deliberate. It is suggested that when a man chooses to write about a subject which touches on the honor and reputation of his fellows, he has the duty to take the trouble to ascertain the truth.

Yet, on the whole, the story is factual and clearly told. It is a story that has been dinned into American ears for the past six years until the public has become thoroughly indoctrinated as to the power of the Communist underground. In fact, the current tendency is to project the dangers of the 1940's into the present and for the public to falsely assume that the Government is still caught in a vast web of treason. Burnham's view is that we have only cut a few filaments of the web, that we have merely eradicated "several advanced and exposed echelons." The evidence he offers for this conclusion is unconvincing. Thus he states that the McCarthy Committee discovered two Communist cells at Fort Monmouth and in the Government Printing Office, "both of which were still in existence when the hearings took place" in 1953. If this is true, it is strange that Senator McCarthy was too modest to make any such claim in the 1953 Report of his Committee. Moreover, the evidence which Burnham cites in his reference note does not substantiate his charge. It is high time to put the entire question of the extent and character of current Communist penetration of American security-sensitive areas in the hands of a study group of the stature and capacity of the Canadian Royal Commission.

NATHANIEL WEYL
Washington, D. C.

NICHOLS, LESTER M. Impact: The Battle Story of the Tenth Armored Division. Pp. 356. New York: Bradbury, Sayles, O'Neill, 1954. $7.50.

This is by far one of the best unit histories to come out of World War II. The Tenth Armored Division was the first unit to defend Bastogne in the German winter campaign of 1944, "The Bulge," and it played a major role in saving Bastogne. Tankers of the division, who called themselves "The Tigers" and who were termed "The Ghosts" by the Germans, served in all four American armies and in seven corps overseas. They captured 56,000 prisoners, 650 towns and cities, and dashed some 600 miles across five European countries.

The dramatic story of this famous division is told by Lester M. Nichols, who was the team's historian throughout its operational days and who served in all ranks from private to major. The author recounts the history of the division from its baptism of fire in the Mars La Tour area to the epic of Bastogne and the pursuit of the Wehrmacht into the Austrian Alps. Throughout, the emphasis is upon eyewitness reports, anecdotes, and personal observations. The reader obtains a vivid first-hand account of what these 37,000 men accomplished and suffered.

This book is a magnificent tribute to the men who wore the triangular red, yellow, and blue shoulder patch. The author attributes their brilliant combat achievements to disciplined teamwork and first-rate leadership. The division sustained more than 4,000 casualties and received more than thirty battle honors, awards, and citations. Perhaps the most frustrated young Tiger was the one who was denied a Purple Heart, despite the fact that German shrapnel had knocked out one of his front teeth. He was declared ineligible for the award when it was discovered that the tooth was false.

The author is not a professional historian, but his research in compiling this volume is within the best tradition of historical writing. Aiming to present a completely accurate and carefully documented account, he used not only war communiques, orders, staff and unit commander reports, and his own personal records as press officer, but he also submitted his manuscript to fourteen battle and staff commanders for review. The value of the book is considerably enhanced by battle maps, charts, and photographs.

In the recently published Hitler's Secret Conversations, 1941-1944, the Nazi leader is quoted as saying: "There's nobody stupider than the Americans. . . . I'll never believe the American soldier can fight like a hero" (p. 149). This battle story of the Tenth Armored Division, a superb contribution to the military history of the United States Army in World War II, should be assigned as required reading to the Führer in his personal Valhalla.

LOUIS L. SNYDER
The City College of New York

ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY

MYRDAL, GUNNAR. The Political Element in the Development of Economic Theory. Translated from the German by Paul Streeten. Pp. xvii, 248. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $5.00.

This important book by a distinguished scholar is, like Schumpeter's Theory of Economic Development, an instance of delayed impact on the English-reading world, for the Swedish lectures on which it is based were given in 1928. Like Schumpeter, but far more explicitly, Myrdal reflects the dissatisfaction of a penetrating European intellect with the British economic tradition in which he himself participated. This book is almost wholly given to criticism and, as Myrdal states, merely foreshadows the methodological appendices to his work on the Negro problem, An American Dilemma.

Myrdal has made a major contribution to the continuing debate over the boundaries of the economist's discipline and its relation to ethics and politics. But, being a philosophical critique of economic thinking and an exercise in intellectual history, it may be resisted by the very economists to whom it is addressed. Myrdal attacks some of the basic attitudes and assumptions of the modern welfare economists and the devotees of model building. He describes utilitarianism as only a new guise for the Enlightenment's natural law reasoning, and by extension, much the same can be said of both marginal utility and contemporary welfare analysis. He argues that the main stream of economic thought employs concepts of general welfare which both logically and in historical origin inevitably involve interpersonal comparisons and—more importantly—into which the economist's value judgments must inevitably enter. Myrdal finds that the economists' practice of defining much of the social complex as external to their subject does not really free them to develop an independent science, but rather hampers them, as both scientists and citizens, in facing their most important problems. He holds that economic analysis should take into account not only differing institutions but the actual attitudes (value constellations or structures) of real people. He urges that a writer state his own pattern of values explicitly, and that economists devote themselves to "economic technology": the study of the likely effects of a particular policy in the light of a thorough exploration of the attitudes of relevant groups.

The core of Myrdal's position is what may be called a value-guidance theory of social causation (not unlike that of R. M. MacIver's Social Causation). He therefore wishes to consider the entire value complex of a group, rather than its economic standards of judgment alone. This outlook enormously complicates the task of the economist, and entails abandonment of his quest for laws of universal validity, but would it not make his work more realistic, and more useful?

EUGENE O. GOLOB

Wesleyan University

SCHUMPETER, JOSEPH A. History of Economic Analysis. Pp. xxv, 1,260. New York: Oxford University Press, 1954. $17.50.

History of Economic Analysis, published posthumously, will undoubtedly rank as the work which most fully reveals Joseph A. Schumpeter's scholarship and intellectual powers. Professor Schumpeter's untimely death left the manuscript uncollated and certain portions of it incomplete as well. Fortunately, his wife, the late Elizabeth Boody Schumpeter, herself a reputable economist, was able to collate and edit the manuscript for publication. She has also contributed a valuable foreword and appendix.

The book is unique with respect to both the range and sophistication of its analysis of the development of economics as a science. It covers a vast period from the first glimmerings of economic theory in the writings of the Greeks to many of the most recent contributions. Schumpeter's treatment of the medieval scholastic writings is particularly noteworthy, for it is probably the most comprehensive and sympathetic analysis of their economic content.

There are numerous histories of economic thought and histories of political economy, but, as Professor Schumpeter points out, these are concerned mainly with questions of economic ideology. Schumpeter's main concern, on the other hand, is with those technical and theoretical tools of economics which serve as an "engine" of analysis. The numerous economic works that are considered are judged primarily on the basis of their scientific merits, apart from the particular author's ideological preconceptions and attitudes. Professor Schumpeter prides himself on his consistency in this respect. He maintains this approach and method of analysis even when he deals with the works of Karl Marx. Thus although Marx's value structure and ideology are repugnant to him, Schumpeter concludes that because of his scientific contributions, Marx deserves to be recognized as one of the intellectual giants of the nineteenth century.

It should not be assumed, however, that Schumpeter ignores values and ideology. On the contrary, these matters are fully and interestingly discussed, but in such a manner as to bring out their influence on economics as a science. The book is further enriched by a number of valuable chapters on philosophy, mathematics, political science, sociology, and psychology, and their influence on the development of economics. In addition, there are descriptions of the social and intellectual backgrounds of many of the economists whose work is discussed.

It is possible to disagree with Professor Schumpeter. Many persons, for example, may consider that he goes too far in his distinction between science and ideology. One might also disagree with the relative importance he assigns to the contributions of certain writers. Whatever the points of disagreement, however, no reader will fail to admire the sincerity, intelligence, and skill with which Schumpeter develops his subject; and few readers will fail to be enriched and stimulated by his analysis.

LEO FISHMAN

West Virginia University

PEACOCK, ALAN T. (Ed.). Income Redistribution and Social Policy: A Set of Studies. Pp. 296. London: Jonathan Cape, 1954. 25s. net.

The editor states the main purpose of this set of studies as follows: "to investigate the nature and magnitude of the redistribution of incomes brought about by social policies and to examine the likely consequences of the redistribution" (p. 7). Part I presents two theoretical studies: the first by Harry G. Johnson entitled "The Macro-Economics of Income Redistribution," and the second by Denstone Berry entitled "Modern Welfare Analysis and the Forms of Income Redistribution." The major part of the volume, Part II, is devoted to "regional" studies covering Denmark, France, Great Britain, the United States, and underdeveloped territories. The study of the United States was made by Alfred H. Conrad of Harvard Economic Research Project, Cambridge, Massachusetts. In these the emphasis is on measurement.

The authors have assembled and examined what they feel are the best data available to throw light on the extent of redistribution of income as a consequence of actions that provide revenue for the state and finance transfer payments and free goods, such as taxation schemes, social security, and government expenditures for schools, health, roads, and general protection. The studies for the most part relate to a single year; in several this year is 1950. A good deal of attention is given to whether redistribution is vertical, that is, taking money away from a given income group and returning it in the form of "free" goods and transfer income; or whether it is horizontal, that is, taking income from the rich and using it in such a way as to increase the equality of real income or consumption levels. Little attention is given to the relation of the redistribution programs to incentives to produce. Georges Rottier and Jean François Albert in concluding the analysis for France pointed out, "There has . . . been a marked decrease in the share of . . . income which a wage or salary earner can spend as he likes. . . . One may wonder whether this is not one cause of the social difficulties which France has known since the end of the war" (p. 136).

The book will be of interest chiefly to specialists in income measurement. Much space is devoted to description of data used and laments as to their inadequacies. The book will, however, give lay readers who may dip into it "here and there" a genuine appreciation of the difficulty of answering the seemingly simple question: "Do various programs designed to make income more equal actually accomplish that purpose?"

MARGARET G. REID

University of Chicago

LANE, ROBERT E. The Regulation of Businessmen: Social Conditions of Government Economic Control. Pp. xiii, 144. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1954. $3.75.

Professor Lane utilizes the concepts and tools of social psychology to analyze the attitudes of businessmen toward public regulation. He explores the sources of their hostility, measures its changing intensity, observes the operation of the adaptive process, and suggests policies for the reduction of conflict between bureaucrats and businessmen.

The study covers the New and Fair Deal periods, excluding the war years. Selected types of control are examined, specifically: trade practices, antitrust, wages and hours, and labor relations. Documentary material is supplemented by interviews with twenty-five business men in two New England states and seven ranking officials in Federal agencies. A content analysis of Connecticut Industry, the magazine of the Manufacturers Association of Connecticut, for 1934-40 and 1946-48, provides information on the ideological orientation of businessmen. Evidence on violations is derived from a special study of the New England shoe industry.

Economic factors are a minor cause of hostility to regulation; it is the "psychic costs" that are determinative. Regulation challenges the businessman's belief system, profanes his idols, and depreciates his myths; it denigrates the businessman himself, lowers his status, and subordinates his role; it frustrates him; it arouses in him new anxieties. When exposed to such deprivations and frustrations he reacts aggressively, particularly against the bureaucrats who administer the hated regulation. Gradually, however, the processes of adaptation and adjustment temper this original hostility and a partial reconciliation is effected. But this can never be complete because bureaucrats and businessmen remain divided by differences in occupational traits, language, value systems, and reference groups. More harmonious, efficient, and less wasteful regulation can be achieved if administrators, through opinion surveys and content analysis, understand the causes of conflict. They can then take positive steps to reduce conflicts, such as: minimizing damage to the business ego, reassuring businessmen of their status and role, relieving uncertainty, restructuring attitudes by improved communication. By the application of such techniques it now seems possible, the author says, to adjust these conflicts without weakening the force of regulation.

This is doubtful, for regulation dominated by the psychopathology of businessmen and the desire to avoid conflict will almost certainly sacrifice the public interest to appease this "powerful and reluctant minority." The author overlooks the fact that in a democracy, regulation is based on public interest and supremacy of law; that society regulates business organization and economic behavior, not businessmen as individuals; and that the psychological reactions of those regulated are largely irrelevant. There is no need to appease their wrath for it is assumed they will conform to the public interest.

HORACE M. GRAY

University of Illinois

HAMILTON, DAVID. Newtonian Classicism and Darwinian Institutionalism: A Study of Change in Economic Theory. (University of New Mexico Publications in Economics, No. 1.) Pp. 138. Albuquerque: The University of New Mexico Press, 1953. $1.00.

The lengthy title of this volume suggests a degree of objectivity which the author has been unable to maintain. Still, his firm belief in institutionalism could have added to the charm of his performance if his arguments were as convincing to the readers as they were to himself. He tries to prove that the essential difference between classicism and institutionalism is to be found in the concept of change. The classicists—he summarizes—held that "the cause of change is independent of the economy and that change is caused by disturbing elements from without the system." On the contrary, the institutionalists consider change to be a part of the economic process and believe that, at all times, the economy undergoes a process of cumulative change (p. 27).

The first part of his argument hardly deserves detailed comment. Since, in the classical model, the economic process was essentially harmonious and automatically tended towards equilibrium, change could originate only from outside data. Yet this proposition is inaccurate if interpreted in the sense that the classicists ignored evolution. As the author remarks, they considered social structure "as something fixed in the natural universe." Owing to their failure, the economists had to wait for the advent of institutionalism, which taught them in accordance with the Darwinian revolution that "social structure was something arrived at through a process of cumulative change and as something undergoing further change" (p. 35).

Examples to the contrary are well known. On various occasions, the builder of the classical system accounted for the impact of social change on economic processes, for instance by distinguishing stages of economic evolution and advancing different wage theories for the periods before and after the appropriation of land and the accumulation of capital. Even to the uncontested master of economic statics, Ricardo, social structure was subject to change rather than being "something fixed in the natural universe." Otherwise, he would have failed to demonstrate the historical trend of the land rent to increase with the progress of society. Too much has been said in recent years on Malthus' historical, comparative, and evolutionary approach to blame him for unawareness of the role of social change.

Also, the second part of the argument is deficient. The analysis of economic change as an endogenous factor goes back far beyond institutionalism. The frontal attack against the mechanistic view of the classicists started on the threshold of the nineteenth century with the romantic notion of organic growth. Economic development and growth remained the points at issue as long as there was a historical school. It would be difficult to prove that this turn in mind originated from the Darwinian revolution.

If, however, the main argument of the author breaks down, does he help us in other ways to better understand the reorientation due to institutionalism? Fortunately, he dismissed the elementary textbook proposition linking classicism with statics and institutionalism with dynamics. He should be commended for his discussion of other contributions of the institutionalists such as their concept of culture, their negation of individual behavior, their disregard for the price mechanism and pecuniary phenomena, and their identification of progress with technological development. Apparently, however, he has not told the whole story. In spite of his creditable effort, there is still room for a more thorough and less subjective comparison of the socio-philosophical roots of classicism and institutionalism.

FRITZ KARL MANN

The American University

BARLOW, E. R. Management of Foreign Manufacturing Subsidiaries. Pp. xii, 223.

Boston: Harvard Business School, 1953. $3.50.

For those interested in foreign manufacturing operations, the author has presented the results of a study of some of the management problems involved. Basic information is taken from a study of the Mexican operations of seventeen companies.

Few of the companies studied found it possible to manufacture at lower costs in Mexico than in the United States, despite lower wage rates in the former. The small size of the Mexican market results in shorter production runs and greater use of general purpose machinery.

Organization. According to the author, it seemed immaterial from a performance viewpoint as to whether the foreign subsidiary was organized as a division, a department, or a separate corporation. The preferred organization method seemed to be dependent upon the legal or tax advantage for each particular company.

Supervision. Although there was considerable variation in the degree of control maintained by parent companies over subsidiaries, all companies studied exercised parent control over the following: (1) products to be manufactured or sold, (2) appointment and promotion of key personnel, (3) the type of accounting methods to be used and the financial information reported to the parent, and (4) expansion of local operations.

Ownership Policy. Attention is given to the advantages of a 100 per cent owned foreign subsidiary as compared with participating local capital in a jointly owned company. The chief reasons for joint ownership were found to be as follows: (1) desire to limit capital investment by the parent company, (2) fear of discrimination against U. S. concerns, and (3) belief that local owners could contribute special unique experience and skills in the management area. Jointly owned companies typically returned a smaller profit to the parents than did 100 per cent owned ones. However, there was less risk involved.

Executive Personnel. In selecting executives for new subsidiaries, most companies required men with the following: (1) experience in the company and knowledge of its methods and practices, and (2) knowledge of the country in which operations were performed. There was found to be a difference of opinion as to which requirement was most important.

The material presented in this study is admitted to be exploratory by the author. There were not sufficient examples or a wide enough geographic area involved to warrant definite conclusions. Although the study is limited in scope, it is interesting, well organized, and a pioneering effort in the field.

JOHN F. MEE

Indiana University

BLOOMFIELD, ARTHUR I. Speculative and Flight Movements of Capital in Postwar International Finance. Pp. 88. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press (Princeton Studies in International Finance, No. 3), 1954. $1.00.

In this, the third of the Princeton series of less-than-book-length "studies," Dr. Bloomfield deals with postwar "hot money" movements. Noting the meagerness of the literature, he proposes to bring together and analyze the available information and to consider possible counter measures. An economist with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, Bloomfield is an experienced observer and writer in the field of international finance and has been closely associated with the United States government statistical program on international capital transactions.

"Hot money" movements are identified as international movements of private capital which involve exchange rate speculation or flight from feared losses through war or other contingencies and which accentuate disequilibrium in the balance of payments. The study deals topically with the motivations for and the mechanisms and effects of these movements, and with measures for controlling them or minimizing their effects. A section on "Illustrations" gives separate concise running accounts of the experiences of the sterling area, France, Canada, and several other countries or areas which have been importantly affected. Particularly helpful are the explanations, under "Mechanisms," of "leads and lags," underinvoicing and over-invoicing, black market deals, and various other means of exporting capital from exchange control countries in the face of official disapproval.

The analysis, one which invites quantitative judgments, is admittedly hampered by the lack of statistical data on hot money. Although we may hope for future improvement in the statistics of private capital movements, there will remain the inherent difficulties, recognized by the author, of classifying transactions by motive and of measuring clandestine transactions.

Bloomfield finds these hot money movements to have had seriously disturbing effects, including balance of payments distortions, drains on reserves, prolonged or intensified trade and payments restrictions, and inflationary pressures. Such disturbances, he finds, have been unmatched by compensating benefits.

Various possible solutions are weighed, and the author concedes some value in exchange-control or other technical measures. But, disclaiming originality, he urges the importance of attacking the underlying problem of economic and political disorder. Offering no suggestions for dealing with the political and social causes of capital flight, but focusing on speculative movements, he recommends attacking international financial disequilibrium through monetary-fiscal policies, trade liberalization, and other familiar measures.

This well-ordered and thoughtful discussion contributes toward the understanding of an important and difficult problem. While not forbiddingly technical, it will appeal chiefly to readers with more than a casual familiarity with recent international financial developments.

EDWARD T. CROWDER

U. S. Bureau of the Budget

HARROD, ROY. The Dollar: Sir George Watson Lectures, 1953. Pp. vii, 156. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1954. $3.50.

The reader will not be astonished to learn that a book written by a Briton, under this title, is an argument for a correction of the currency imbalance between the United States and foreign countries, for mutual benefit. Only politicians need be told this. But will they read it?

The first of the four chapters centers around the evils growing out of the "Crime of 1873," which really is a crime on page 17, but becomes just a series of accidents on page 154. It is refreshing to read that "... highbrows incline to bimetalism, while the naïve and simple-minded favour monometallism" (p. 8), but J. Laurence Laughlin would not have relished being called simple-minded. Furthermore, the argument for bimetalism works even better for greenbackism. The chapter would have been more accurate and effective if the author had studied a little more American history. Least important of all historical shortcomings is the triple reference (pp. 24-25) to a mythical [Daniel] Shay. Anyway the author did not spell it "Shea."

Mr. Harrod's grasp of American financial and monetary history is much better in the last three chapters (after 1900), but a wider use of other developments would have been useful. The Federal Reserve System, international co-operation, and the dollar gap occupy these chapters. The treatment is as good as can be expected in a brief space and from the Keynesian point of view. The author opposed the devaluation of the dollar in 1933 but believes it should be further devalued now for the good it would do Great Britain and other foreign countries (pp. 67-68). A dyed-in-the-wool Keynesian, following the party line and ignoring all arguments and facts unfriendly to the thesis, will agree with Harrod. Others will grant him a friendly smile, for after all he does write in a friendly style.

Nevertheless, the substance of the whole work comes on page 143: "Clearly an imbalance can only be rectified by an increase of world exports to the United States or a diminution of world exports from it." It did not require even a small book to lead up to this sensible conclusion, which is not at all essentially Keynesian. Why should not we of the United States take a long vacation while Europe supplies us with the good things of the world in exchange for the surplus of that huge pile of junk metal at Fort Knox which, as it is, is doing nobody any good? Why should not America get some of the handouts while restoring a balance to the world's currency?

FRED A. SHANNON

University of Illinois

JAMES, MARQUIS, and BESSIE ROWLAND JAMES. Biography of a Bank: The Story of Bank of America, N.T. & S.A. Pp. vii, 566. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1954. $5.00.

This rather massive volume portrays in considerable detail the founding and growth, and the vicissitudes and successes pertaining to its development, of what is today the world's largest bank with the largest—in fact the only significant—system of branches in the United States, Bank of America, National Trust and Savings Association, with head office in San Francisco, California. As indicated by the authors, at the beginning of 1953 the Bank of America had "538 branches in 317 California cities and towns, and 9 branches overseas [and had] resources of $8,201,689,369.88" (p. 1).

Bank of America had its origin almost half a century ago with the founding of the Bank of Italy in San Francisco on October 17, 1904, by A. P. Giannini. The original Bank of Italy was a small, unit bank serving quite largely at first small Italian interests in the city and near vicinity. Mr. Giannini, however, had no intention of confining his operations to so circumscribed an area and shortly embarked on a program of expansion which eventually resulted in emergence of the financial titan described in the preceding paragraph.

Limitations of space preclude tracing the multifarious steps by which the Bank of America attained its present stature. Aided by the California banking law of 1909, which permitted the establishment of statewide branch banking systems by state banks, Mr. Giannini set out to attain his goal of a branch system that should serve every nook and cranny of California. In fact, at one time, he had visions of a nationwide branch system, and set out to attain that end through Transamerica Corporation, a holding company that might control banks in states other than California. Although frustrated in this effort, he did attain his desired end in California. The Bank of Italy and the Bank of America in California, both large state branch-bank systems and both controlled by Giannini, were merged in 1927 as a national banking institution. Not until 1930 was the title changed from Bank of Italy, N.T. & S.A. to the present title.

One factor that keeps cropping up throughout the entire book is the ever present desire on the part of A. P. Giannini to help the small farmer and the small businessman. His ideal was always that of a bank for all the people, not just a privileged few, and he achieved a notable success in attaining that ideal.

In conclusion, it should be pointed out that the authors have performed a difficult task with better than average success. A book of half the length could have provided a more fascinating but less scholarly and complete biography. To do a satisfactory job, it was necessary to introduce a certain amount of statistical and factual data that makes for dull reading, but the authors have kept this to the least amount compatible with sound biographical standards.

FREDERICK A. BRADFORD

Lehigh University

NEVINS, ALLAN. Ford: The Times, the Man, the Company. Pp. xx, 688. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1954. $6.75.

Every aspect of Henry Ford's early life is treated in this book—the infant, the lanky youth, the boy who everlastingly tinkered with machinery, the young man who lived on a "shoe string" while making determined efforts to get ahead. Not only did the author use the Ford Archives at Dearborn, rich as they are in documentary materials on Ford's early life, but he interviewed many people who knew Mr. Ford intimately.

Ford, the man and successful industrialist, is allotted only a part of the space in this very readable book. Here the reader also finds a biography of a company. Although Ford certainly was in control of the Ford Motor Company down to 1915, others had a voice in its affairs. Frequently involved in court actions over patent rights, the Ford Company has awaited this book to clarify, for the lay reader, the details of these early legal battles. There are vivid descriptions of this corporation's early growth, its expansion in floor space, its increases in capital, its initiation of the assembly line, its contributions to mass production, the relations between the laborers and management, Ford's early opposition to unionism, the five-dollar-per-day wages episode, and numerous other phases of this remarkable company's history.

Mr. Ford's efforts to produce a cheap car that millions of Americans could be induced to own are treated in detail. This company grew on one innovation after another. As the price of the Ford car decreased, the company increased the efficiency of its sales and service organization. No other automobile producer equaled the Ford Motor Company in advertising, in number of sales, and in service rendered to car owners.

Dr. Nevins concludes this book in 1915. Certainly, a second volume on the last three decades of Henry Ford's life should be written. Although by 1915 many of Ford's useful years were spent, by no means was he through. In fact, some of his greatest achievements lay ahead. The company was to meet the crises of two world wars and an intervening major depression, and was to expand into an international industrial empire. It is to be hoped that Professor Nevins will write a second volume on the next thirty years of "Ford: The Times, the Man, the Company."

This book is well illustrated, has ample footnotes at the back, contains several enlightening appendixes, a well selected bibliography, and an accurate index.

GEORGE C. OSBORN

University of Florida

GILMORE, HARLAN W. Transportation and the Growth of Cities. Pp. vi, 170. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1953. $3.00.

This is a relatively brief, and clearly written, statement of the relation of transportation methods to economic systems and types of urban communities. The author summarizes the experience of ancient, medieval, and modern times. As so much time is covered in so little space, it is probable that the main lines of thought are familiar to students of this field. Still, the presentation is clear and, perhaps, all the more forceful because of the lack of detail. The relation of the city to the country and the fiscal policies which exemplify this relationship are described. The volume should be particularly useful as collateral reading for young students of city government who are sometimes slow to grasp the basic relationships which are treated here. The study on which the publication is based was made possible by Tulane University.

LEE S. GREENE

University of Tennessee

SOCIOLOGY AND EDUCATION

ALLPORT, GORDON W. The Nature of Prejudice. Pp. xviii, 537. Cambridge, Mass.: Addison-Wesley Publishing Company, 1954. $5.50.

In the present-day world of intensified functional interdependence among groups, problems of intergroup relations have forced themselves to the foreground. As a consequence this problem area has increasingly become a focal preoccupation of social scientists. Professor Allport's book is representative of the growing concern with this vital area.

Part I of this eight-part volume is devoted to "Preferential Thinking." Following a brief account of the categorizing process, the analysis of group prejudice proceeds directly to the central importance of in-group membership and identification with in-group values. This is followed by a chapter on "rejection of out-groups." It is pointed out that while in-group formation need not necessarily result in antagonism toward out-groups, psychological reference to an in-group possessing a social distance scale in terms of which out-groups are categorized is a crucial factor in understanding prejudice. This take-off with in-group membership and out-group delineation and their consequences in determining the individual's intergroup attitudes and behavior definitely represents the modern developing trend in the study of intergroup relations, as contrasted with approaches which tended to explain intergroup behavior taking the individual in isolation.

Part II summarizes methods and findings on group differences. Part III, which is logically related to Part I, includes general accounts of cognitive processes, the effects of categorization with separate chapters on linguistic factors and stereotypes in particular.

Part IV considers sociocultural factors (e.g., social structure, intergroup contacts). In Part V the acquisition of prejudice is treated, the point of departure being the general problem of conformity to in-group values.

Part VI, entitled "Dynamics of Prejudice," is concerned with the scapegoat theory, frustration, aggression, guilt, projection and other "mechanisms" derived largely from psychoanalysis. In Part VII on "character structure," the currently popular work on the "prejudiced personality" is presented, the "tolerant personality" sketched, and religion and prejudice considered.

Finally Part VIII deals with the reduction of group tensions, legislative and judicial decisions, evaluation of action programs, and some general guides for action.

This volume takes the view that a many-sided approach to prejudice is necessary for a comprehensive understanding of the problem. This fact has important implications for practice. "Since the problem is many-sided, there can be no sovereign formula" (p. 507). The author points out that historical, sociocultural, situational, personality, phenomenological approaches and characteristics of the stimulus objects (groups) all have to be considered in accounting for prejudice. Rather than be one-sided, Professor Allport utilizes concepts and features of most of these various approaches: "Our own approach to the problem is eclectic. There seems to be value in all of the six main approaches, and some truth in virtually all of the resulting theories. It is not possible at the present time to reduce them to a single theory of human action" (p. 208).

Professor Allport's book may render sovereign-principle theorists more sensitive to factors which they have overlooked. Social scientists and practitioners will welcome its humane concern with eliminating existing prejudices among human groups.

MUZAHER SHERIF

University of Oklahoma

PORTERFIELD, AUSTIN L., and ROBERT H. TALBERT. Mid-Century Crime in Our Culture: Personality and Crime in the Cultural Pattern of American States and Cities. Pp. ix, 113. Fort Worth, Texas: Leo Potishman Foundation, 1954. $2.25.

The authors, Professors in the Department of Sociology, Texas Christian University, are already well-known as experts on the specific crime problems of the American South. The present book is a collection of revised articles published in various sociological journals by Porterfield alone or in co-operation with Talbert or others. While this makes the book as a whole slightly incoherent, its main theme, as expressed in the title, nevertheless remains throughout clearly discernible. As in their previous book Crime, Suicide, and Social Well-being (1948), it is again the authors' principal object to examine, by the application of statistical and sociological techniques, the relationship between crime and various other indices of social disorganization. They make it clear that the exclusion of psychological and psychiatric factors involves no adverse criticism of individualistic interpretations of crime as such, but only a rejection of the one-sided claims made on their behalf by some of the extremists. Their first two chapters are in fact essentially an attempt to arrive at a reasonable, though not altogether original, compromise, stressing the importance of "multiple interactive factors" in crime causation and leading to two of the principal topics of the book, that is, crime in the Southern States of the United States and the relation between crime, in particular homicide, and suicide. Again, as in their previous book, the authors find that homicides are far more frequent in the South and suicides in the North and that these differences are due not to genetic and racial, but to cultural factors. For the twelve Southern States with the highest proportion of Negroes, the correlation between crime and heterogeneity of population is, according to them, strongly negative. In the third chapter, some results are given of a study of 222 cases of homicide in a southwestern city, showing that there is often not much to choose between murderer and victim, except that the former may be a conformist and the latter a non-conformist to local mores.

The most interesting aspect of the book is the attempt made in Part II to establish various new indices: first an "Index of Secularization" and another, more complicated and regarded as more useful, of "Depressed Folk Societies in Local Conflict." This Index, a composite of thirty-two sub-factors, gives a very high positive correlation with homicide and other serious crime, and a fairly high negative correlation with suicide. This is followed by a special study of crime and suicide in the different Census Tracts of Fort Worth, the results of which are interpreted as indicating that there is more homicide in districts with more interpersonal relations and more suicide in those with more impersonal ones—an interpretation which, though plausible, seems to be purely speculative on the strength of the material so far presented, as no explanation is given why, regardless of size, relations should be more impersonal in northern than in southern cities. In the comparison, made in Chapter VI, of the crime rates of forty-three southern and forty-three non-southern cities of equal size and showing a much higher rate for the first group the method of selecting the second group is not explained, which may leave the reader with the feeling that a different selection might have produced different results. In spite of such doubts, the book is, however, a valuable and stimulating contribution to the understanding of the pattern of crime in the American South.

HERMANN MANNHEIM

University of London

HENTIG, HANS VON. Zur Psychologie der Einzeldelikte, I: Diebstahl, Einbruch, Raub. Pp. viii, 195. Tübingen, Germany: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 1954. Paper DM 12.80; cloth DM 15.80.

This monograph on The Psychology of Individual Offenses is the first publication to come from the pen of Professor Hans von Hentig since his return to Germany where he is now professor of criminology at the University of Bonn. Professor von Hentig is known to a number of American criminologists from his teaching and research in several universities in the United States during the past decade.

In this short publication, which purports to be the first in a series sponsored by an association of German jurists, Professor Hentig analyzes some of the psychological, sociological, and statistical factors involved in three specific types of offenses: theft, burglary, and robbery. Somewhat after the method of the late Dr. E. Sutherland, the author explains the patterns of behavior of criminals (professional, white collar, and so forth) in terms of motives and certain pathological conditions. He explains how the "purse snatcher," the jewel thief, the fur-coat thief, and others operate in the larger cities.

In the material dealing with burglary the author describes the various Modi Operandi in breaking and entering homes, business houses, and public places. He gives an account of how burglars work in pairs or in gangs and their relationship to the "fence."

In the third part of the book Professor Hentig discusses the social factors relating to robbery as well as some of the techniques and procedures. He reviews the details in the well-known Brink's Company robbery in Boston and describes the psychological characteristics of the men who carry out such bold acts.

In the statistical data the author presents information dealing with prewar, war and postwar conditions in Germany. In addition, he shows how offenses vary by days of the week, by months, and by seasons. In general this monograph is an interesting document, but it does fall short of what is usually thought of as the psychology of theft, burglary, and robbery. It is descriptive rather than analytical. Also the question may be raised as to whether there is a psychology of offenses, or is there only a psychology of offenders?

WALTER A. LUNDEN

Iowa State College

PECK, HARRIS B., and VIRGINIA BELLSMITH. Treatment of the Delinquent Adolescent: Group and Individual Therapy with Parent and Child. Pp. iv, 147. New York: Family Service Association of America, 1954. $2.00.

The value of this well-written paper-covered book—and it has considerable value—is in its presentation of what is involved in the treatment of delinquents by a clinic that is officially connected with a children's court. Such an alliance obviously connotes certain conditionings of the treatment process, not the least of which is that assignment of a delinquent to the clinic must give some coloring of duress to his visits there. That various features of court clinics are widely considered inimical to favorable therapeutic results is shown by the fact that, though the earliest child guidance clinics were established, to be sure mainly for their diagnostic aid, as a branch service of the courts, later clinics concerned more with treatment fought shy of any court connections. This book offers an opportunity to form judgment on this important question of the value of a court clinic.

The authors, highly experienced in their respective fields of psychiatry and social work, describe some of the difficulties inherent in their working situation, but the reader discerns that there are some real advantages. Since, aside from the special exigences and opportunities of their particular setting, their methods of individual treatment naturally differ little from that of others of their craft, their emphasis is properly on group treatment, to which over half of their contribution is devoted.

Now it must be clear that with less, at least implied, authority back of the clinic it would hardly be possible to bring together groups of delinquents and, for that matter, of parents of delinquents in therapeutic sessions. The case studies of these groups are interesting and instructive; one wishes there were more of them with further candid analyses of successes and failures.

Yes, and with the teaching values of their rich case material in mind one might willingly have dispensed with paragraphs and pages dealing with commonly known facts about delinquency and also with hortatory interjections. The argument for this is that, as the authors state, work like theirs is only for a well-trained professional staff; the book itself is hardly for beginners except as it may stimulate them to develop their own capacities.

Merited praise for this contribution taken as a whole outweighs various minor criticisms.

WILLIAM HEALY

Clearwater, Florida

VIRTUE, MAXINE BOORD. Study of the Basic Structure of Children's Services in Michigan. (Report of a legal study made for the James Foster Foundation.) Pp. xxviii, 391. Ann Arbor, Mich.: The American Judicature Society, 1953. $5.00.

Juvenile courts are considered with reference to their various functions, which vary within the limits of a single state, some courts developing extensive administrative structures while others lean upon departments of public welfare and sometimes even upon voluntary agencies for services to court wards or persons appearing before the court. It is observed that "the practice with respect to 'unofficial cases' appears to have grown so far beyond the statutory language and intention as to jeopardize, in some instances, the identity of the court as a judicial agency." There is a nation-wide tendency to disregard rules of evidence and certain constitutional rights of the child or parent, as judges and probation officers study situations and dispose of cases according to their own understanding and sense of obligation. It is pointed out that children's cases do not receive the attention they deserve, and that consequently decisions of juvenile courts have not been tested by appeal as have the findings of other courts.

The discussions of guardianship and ward and adoption practices are among the book's most valuable contributions. The reminder that "custody is a slippery word" is amply illustrated. Carelessness in termination of parental rights is too often a characteristic of divorce actions. Inadequately drawn court orders, lack of consent of parents, and failure to give adequate notice of adoption proceedings are among the factors which lead to the statement that in Michigan "the available material suggests that most adoptions now taking place may be deficient in legality."

The need for more and better threshold services is a recurrent theme. The visiting teacher, the county welfare worker, and the district child welfare consultant are among Michigan's resources for detecting a serious problem of a child and his family at a point when the child first exhibits need for help.

Lack of training in the law is a common deficiency among social workers. This is pointed out by the author and several of those she quotes, among them Dean Roscoe Pound, who also notes that lawyers need to get a more adequate picture of the needs of juvenile courts, and the relations of those needs to the whole system of judicial organization. We social workers may properly add that lawyers need to learn more about social work and that professional schools in all fields should pave the way, more than they have, for interdisciplinary study and practice.

HOWARD W. HOPKINS

Louisville & Jefferson County
Children's Home
Anchorage, Kentucky

ELLIS, ALBERT. The American Sexual Tragedy. Pp. 288. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1954. $4.50.

Dr. Ellis has put together here out of researches into the attitudes expressed in the mass media of communication an unrelieved indictment of American sexual mores. He appears to be greatly surprised and horrified by the fact that he has found a number of truths which almost all informed people have known for a long time. He has one emphatic point to make, namely, that the American culture is one that is split between its convictions and its actions as to its sexual morality. This, while it is an important aspect of American sexual feeling and thinking, is neither new nor startling. His studied and over-emphasized research into the reports from the public sources of information seems overdone and without conspicuous value. Almost everyone who is able to read Dr. Ellis has been already able to draw the same deductions he has drawn from a careful and, presumably, searching examination of the mass public prints, the celluloids, the advertising material therein, and sundry other of the so-called media of communication.

His conclusions from these researches are heavily pessimistic and there is an unrelieved attitude of censure in them. He states that Americans are doomed to unrewarding and blunted sexual lives because of the demand for conformity to a set of outworn regulations. Dr. Ellis is particularly concerned with the demand for conformity to one simple ideal; namely, that adult and mature sexual individuals shall have their sexual lives inside of marriage and by a union of the male and female genital organs. This may seem neither startling nor disturbing to most people, but to Dr. Ellis it seems to be a gross form of pressure and even authoritarianism.

The plain facts of the case are that Dr. Ellis has tried to oversell his argument. His book lacks profundity or real scholarship. Unfortunately, he has the habit also of saying what he has to say in the most banal, elaborate, and labored fashion that it is possible to conceive. Altogether, the book has very little merit. Not to seem wholly nil admirare, it should be said again that he has one point to make, namely, that in our culture we say one thing and do another in our sexual attitudes. That definitely required saying and it is good that it has been said.

MARYNIA F. FARNHAM, M.D.

New York City

YOUNG, LEONTINE. Out of Wedlock. Pp. x, 261. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $4.00.

Using her extensive social work experience, the author presents a study of the complex factors operating in the problem of birth out of wedlock. Considering the difficulties inherent in obtaining accurate information about this cruelly stigmatized situation, the study is comprehensive in scope. Although addressed particularly to social workers, the book should serve to broaden the thinking of any professional person who may be confronted with some aspect of the problem by any of the principals entangled in it. As the book points out, the principals in this tragedy include not only the unmarried mother and child, but the father and the two families.

The introductory review of the historical attitudes toward unmarried parents and the "illegitimate" child indicates much less progress in the development of desirable attitudes on the part of the general public than is generally believed by professional people to exist. In presenting reasons for the persistence of negative attitudes in what one thinks of as an enlightened age, the author offers justified criticism of the legal handling of various aspects of these cases.

Contrary to the customary belief that pregnancies outside of marriage are largely accidental, the cases studied indicated that behavior leading up to the pregnancy is purposive, even though on an unconscious level. Even those women whose knowledge would normally be expected to include the use of contraceptives rarely use them. The possibility of abortion is considered by only a few. Also, once the pregnancy is established, loss of the baby before term and complications of pregnancy are unusual.

The seed of the relentless urge for baby sans husband, according to the author, is planted in the girl's own family background. The major family factor is domination of the home by one parent, most frequently the mother.

In addition to the intensive consideration given the problem and background of the unmarried mother, the unmarried father also is considered, as are the child, the case-work approach in attempts to help these people, and suggestions for handling of the out-of-wedlock problem as a whole. The value of the book is enhanced by the use of illustrative case material.

If it succeeds only in stimulating wise contemplation of this grave social problem, the book will serve a worthy purpose.

Conceivably it will do much more than this by providing information for those unfamiliar with this subject. Some readers will undoubtedly object to Miss Young's sweeping approach and tendency to generalize, but this need not interfere with the book's usefulness. At the end of the book is included a postscript for his "analytic colleagues" by Robert Fliess, M.D. (who wrote the foreword also) which interprets the author's premises in Freudian terms.

GENEVIEVE BURTON

University of Pennsylvania

RUOPP, PHILLIPS (Ed.). Approaches to Community Development. Pp. xvi, 352. The Hague: W. Van Hoeve, 1953. $3.00.

Approaches to Community Development is an international symposium to which 22 writers, each "with authoritative and extensive experience relevant to the subject about which he writes," have contributed. It is claimed by its publishers to be the first of its kind. It is therefore most welcome, considering the urgent demands for such literature, so that informed guidance is available for those engaged in the development of the so-called under-developed and backward countries of the world.

The articles contributed are instructive and cover all aspects of community development. This can be seen from the groupings: The Sociology of Community Development; The Economics of Community Development; Education for Community Development; and Regional Considerations of Development Programs as found in Africa, the Middle East, India, Indonesia, and Latin America. The editor of the symposium, Phillips Ruopp, chairman of Community Development Projects, Ltd., contributes the first article. Here he defines the approach to community development very clearly in the following statement: "It is in the nature of community development that it must come from within through the greatest possible participation of the people in accordance with needs determined by their values, relying on persuasion rather than compulsion, and mediating with the needs of region, nation and world. In this mediation the Great Societty and Small Community meet and sustain one another."

With this start he gives the lead to the other contributors who in turn examine community development from their different standpoints as sociologists, anthropologists, economists, educationists, and experts on agrarian law and "agricultural industries. Problems resulting from social changes are also discussed by them and an apt warning given that "Community Development is more often seen primarily as a problem of promoting material interests and goals than as a problem of values and human relations."

This caution brings out the absence of the significant contribution that a social worker might have made, had he also been invited to join the social scientists and educationists in presenting his point of view. The social worker is slowly being recognized as an important member of the team working in the field of community development, because he is the one most vitally concerned in the difficult but urgent task of stimulating people's participation. Once this is evoked his next responsibility is to help the same people make their adjustments to the social changes that inevitably follow such development programs. Aid of this kind is necessary if integrated and harmonious development of the community is to take place. Consequently, more than the other field workers he sees in true perspective the need for balancing the material blessings of community development with the spiritual and moral. His experiences might therefore have added to the value of an otherwise interesting and notable publication.

DOROTHY MOSES

UNESCO, Colombo, Ceylon

MAURER, DAVID W., and VICTOR H. VOGEL. Narcotics and Narcotic Addiction. Pp. xv, 303. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, Publisher, 1954. $7.50.

In this book a professor of English and a psychiatrically trained medical man present an over-all view of the narcotics problem. The first chapter of about 45 pages gives a brief historical and descriptive account of the habit and of the problem in the United States. The next hundred or so pages deal mainly with technical medical matters. The last half of the volume includes chapters on the treatment of addicts, legal controls, addiction and crime, juvenile addiction, and addict argot. There is an index. The volume suffers from the authors' efforts to include too much in too little space.

To understand the views expressed and the limitations of this work it should be kept in mind that Dr. Vogel is a member of the Public Health Service and formerly was medical director of the Lexington Hospital for addicts. The manuscript was cleared for publication by the Headquarters of the P. H. S. in Washington. The authors may therefore have been under some constraint in the expression of opinions that might have been deemed critical of official ideology and of what may be called the "Washington line" determined mainly by the Federal Bureau of Narcotics.

It may be for the reason indicated above that Maurer and Vogel are rather cautious in suggesting that addiction per se should not be viewed as a crime, that the evil effects of marihuana have been grossly exaggerated, that the social evils connected with alcoholism far eclipse those connected with drugs, that opiates do not directly cause crime, and that the current trend toward harsher penalties indiscriminately applied to addict and peddler alike is neither just nor effective. At the same time that they venture these departures from orthodox opinion they also appear to support the status quo and to deny the implications of the above heresies. They favor compulsory treatment and do not clearly oppose present penal practices with respect to addicts. They flagrantly fail to discuss the apparent success of nonpenal control systems used in Europe, they do not adequately emphasize the dependence of the illicit traffic on drug prohibition, and their discussion of the clinic idea is grossly unfair, unrealistic, and incomplete.

The authors cite their own previous publications somewhat too liberally even when they are of only peripheral relevance and in one instance at least do not acknowledge a source of borrowed materials. There is also some overemphasis on publications and accomplishments of the Lexington institution where Vogel was stationed for a time.

Apart from the limitations and biases indicated, this work is far superior to most current publications on this subject. Its authors have wide and direct acquaintance with the problem, and their discussion of its social aspects is usually moderate and sensible.

ALFRED R. LINDESMITH

Indiana University

LOOMIS, CHARLES P., JULIO O. MORALES, ROY A. CLIFFORD, and OLEN E. LEONARD (Eds.). Turrialba: Social Systems and the Introduction of Change. Pp. viii, 288. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1953. $3.50.

This book is described as a report on "the results of an interdisciplinary research program on the introduction of change and the nature of the social systems in the Central American community of Turrialba, Costa Rica" (Preface, p. v). The chapter headings, after an Introduction, are: The Setting of the Study, Social Status and Communication, Informal Social Systems, Economic Systems, The Ecological Basis of Social Systems in Turrialba, Demographic Characteristics of the Population, Health Systems, Religious Systems, Educational Systems, Agricultural Extension Systems, Political Systems, Levels of Living on Haciendas and Small Farms, Study of the Strategy of Changes on Large Estates and Small Farms in Latin America. This is an extensive program for a single monograph, even when done by several authors; but this work does manage to give at least a survey of the main aspects of each of its topics.

One reason for the comparative success of the book is that the frames of reference have been explicitly stated (p. 2-3). The research concentrated on "social relationships," organized into "social systems . . . which structure activities as individual and group needs are met," the structuring being "influenced in important ways by ecological and demographic factors." Change involves "changing the relative importance of the different social systems," "creating new social systems," and "changing relations of the individuals to their social systems."

Throughout the study much is made of the difference between the "formal" and "informal" systems. As "formal" is used here it refers to the structural arrangements of hierarchies on the haciendas, to the school-system, to the health services, to the church and its rituals. "Informal" refers to the communication systems between individuals, to "key" persons, and to "elites." The reviewer finds this dichotomy an advance over the more usual studies of this kind which treat everything at one level. He suggests, however, that the two terms are not enough, and that there are actually three levels of systems, for which he uses the terms formal, informal, technical. Most of the things here treated as "formal" are in what he would call the technical sphere (school system, health service, religious rituals). A few (church beliefs, attitudes toward hacienda owners) are in his formal category—traditional, unquestioned, hard to change. Much of what is called "informal" is actually his formal—for example, traditional relations between social levels, who speaks to whom, and so forth. The real informal behavior—largely out of awareness, and hardly subject to verbalization by its practitioners—is not made very explicit. In changes of culture, the informal systems, which are the individual's adaptations to his formal culture, become technicalized; then the technical systems—easiest to change and replace—become more and more out of keeping with the formal culture, and finally bring about the erection of new formal systems; then the process begins again. Formal systems change only from within; informal ones by being brought into awareness; technical ones easily, by explicit description. In the book under review, with its two-fold characterization of cultural systems, this process is blurred and the dynamics of change are not made clear.

The book is lithoprinted from typewritten material, with uneven right margins, and some of the figures are too small to be read easily, but the general appearance is pleasing.

GEORGE L. TRAGER
Georgetown University

MACKENZIE, GORDON N., and STEPHEN M. COREY, in association with JAMES HALL, VERONICA CASEY, MARY NEEL SMITH, and others. Instructional Leadership. Pp. xiii, 209. New York: Bureau of Publications, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1954. $3.25.

This book is dreary reading. Vague and unexplained phrases, such as "benchmark," and fabricated postulates, like "action research," confuse the reader and impede communication. The slovenly practice of yoking nouns together, such as "behavior modification" and "problem definition," adds to the reader's burden. In the face of these and other difficulties the conscientious reader will wonder whether the heights of profundity that glimmer dimly just beyond his perception are real or whether he is bedazzled by semantic mirages. In places he will become quite certain that he is witnessing the garrulous unveiling of the obvious.

These deficiencies in communication are regrettable, because the book makes three significant contributions—contributions that are valuable in other areas as well as in education. First, the authors strip the concept of leadership of its false trappings and let the whole world see that the collection of tricks and techniques displayed on the dais of status are empty baubles. This exposure and analysis of what has hitherto masqueraded as leadership are pitiless, complete, and overwhelming. Leadership consists of action and not qualities.

The second contribution is interwoven with the first. The authors demonstrate that leaders are merely procurers of means for individuals and groups and not fore-runners or commanders. Politics as well as education should henceforth divest itself of the phony chatter about the need of strong leaders, towering personalities, and men of action.

The third contribution is the demonstration that group dynamics in all its ramifications can be used to develop leadership, and that status leaders need training in leadership almost as much as unlabeled privates.

These contributions grew out of a prolonged experiment among the principals, co-ordinators, and supervisors of the Denver schools. The two consultants from Teachers College (the authors) planned, replanned, criticized, evaluated, and re-evaluated the experiment in the development of leadership. Their findings unquestionably have a high transfer value. Educational leaders have no excuse henceforth for confusing status with leadership.

EDGAR B. WESLEY

Stanford University

WASHBURN, CARLETON. The World's Good. Pp. xiii, 301. New York: John Day Company, 1954. $4.00.

The subtitle, "Education for World Mindedness," gives the key to the contents of this interesting and realistic analysis of the role of education in "influencing the oncoming generation toward an enlightened world-wide cooperation for man's well-being."

Part I emphasizes the changes necessary in our schools if they are: to provide the basis for a truly democratic experience; to appreciate and value cultural differences of groups; to understand the way prejudices are formed and perpetuated; to establish the dual concepts that wars bring more problems than they solve and every possible means should be taken to prevent them; yet, if war comes, each individual must give everything he has to bring about military victory; and to cultivate the attitude that "in the world's good is your own, and in yours the world's."

Part II is a clear exposition of the agencies and activities of governments aimed to establish world co-operation. These include: the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF), World Health Organization, Food and Agriculture Organization, Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), and Technical Assistance. The concluding chapter, "Patriotism and World Mindedness," describes attacks on these organizations and expresses the conviction that only through the education of children and adults throughout the world can "ignorance and confusion regarding the United Nations and its agencies be overcome."

This book is written primarily for teachers at all levels from the grade school to the university. But it would be of interest also to parents and to all who are seeking to create attitudes essential to world-mindedness.

FRANCIS J. BROWN

American Council on Education
Washington, D. C.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

PERRY, RALPH BARTON. Realms of Value: A Critique of Human Civilization. Pp. xii, 497. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press, 1954. $7.50.

This is a splendid work. It has been awaited for many years as the promised sequel to the now classic General Theory of Value, published in 1926. Such a book can issue only from a lifetime of dedicated exploration in the vast domain of man and his works. It is a comprehensive survey of many-faceted human civilization, grounded throughout upon a general theory of value. The book thus restates the thesis of Perry's earlier volume and extends it to a comparison and critique of the special realms of value represented by man's moral, political, economic, legal, scientific, esthetic, educational, and religious activities. As the culmination of the most sustained, penetrating, and comprehensive inquiry into human values that has yet been made, Realms of Value is a monumental philosophic achievement.

Perry regards value in general as a function of interest: "A thing—any thing—has value, or is valuable, in the original and generic sense when it is the object of an interest—any interest," and "a thing is an object of interest when its being expected induces actions looking to its realization or non-realization" (pp. 2, 3). Value is thus conceived relationally in terms of interests and their fulfilling (or non-fulfilling) objects. Values are properties of things not in isolation, but of things considered "interestwise," considered in their capacities to fulfill, sustain, and engender interests.

From this point of view the delineation of the various special realms of value is made in terms of the isolation of basic types of interest. Esthetic values answer to the esthetic interest in "joy of apprehending"; scientific values to the interest in "highly qualified cognition"; religious values to man's interest in "the fate of that which he accounts most valuable"; moral values to "the interest in interests," the interest in "the organization of interests for their greatest possible benefit, and embracing as many interests as possible." Correspondingly, the interrelation of the realms of value follows the interrelation of interests. And the criticism of various values is to be made in terms of how adequately they fulfill the interests to which they minister, and how they affect other interests in the total domain of human activity.

Realms of Value is not merely close analysis; it is also a "critique of human civilization." It not merely defends democratic liberalism, but it celebrates it, advocates it, and challenges it to assume moral responsibility for the human future. Realms of Value is a credo, a manual, and a testament of the democratic vision.

CHARLES MORRIS

University of Chicago

LEVINSON, RONALD B. In Defense of Plato. Pp. 674. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $10.00.

There is probably no single philosopher in the history of western thought whose influence even approaches that of Plato. One reason of this predominance has been the matchless beauty and persuasiveness of Plato's style; another, the fact that Plato's principal ideas—both in general philosophy and in political thought—have been very close to the predominant traditions of the West, idealism in philosophy and authoritarianism in politics. As empiricism developed in modern philosophy, and as democracy acquired respectability and prestige in modern politics, Plato has been subjected to more and more critical examination. From Jefferson to Bertrand Russell there is a consistent line of opposition to Platonism; it is not surprising that anti-Platonism has been so slow in developing in England, whose aristocratic traditions, deliberately fostered until recently by her ancient universities, have provided the natural setting for the acceptance of Platonic ideas in education and politics. In the United States, the long cultural dependence upon England has delayed a fresh approach to Plato, viewed in the light of American thought and American political experience. During the last twenty years, there has been a considerable amount of new work on Plato, both in Europe and the United States, and much of it has been highly critical of Plato. Warner Fite's The Platonic Legend (New York, 1934) and Hans Kelsen's essays on Plato's concepts of love and justice (published around the same time in European and American journals, but unfortunately not brought out as yet in book form), started a new era; other significant critiques of Platonic thought were published by R. H. S. Crossman, A. D. Winspear, and Karl Popper.

Professor Levinson's In Defense of Plato will be strongly welcomed by all students of Plato, whatever their own interpretation of Plato. It is perhaps a sign of the times that a massive volume needs to be written, entitled In Defense of Plato. This would have been hardly possible only a generation ago, and it shows that Fite, Kelsen, and Popper have not done their pioneering work for nothing. Levinson's volume is above all useful as a source of reference with regard to recent research and writings on Plato. He recapitulates in detail the arguments put forward by the anti-Plato critics, and his summaries of those writings are usually fair and exact. There is no other book which provides the reader with a similar guide through the recent critical literature in this vast field. Secondly, the author takes great pains in not defeating his own purpose by drawing a caricature of the anti-Platonic argument: he makes concessions to Plato's recent critics where such concessions seem indicated. To this reviewer it seems that the author does not go far enough in conceding validity to some of the principal arguments of Crossman, Fite, Kelsen, and Popper; and on the whole, Professor Levinson adheres to the orthodox interpretation of Plato. He dismisses too lightly, for example, the extent to which Plato has been idolized by the Nazi and fascist regimes; and while Plato cannot obviously be made responsible for all crimes and misdeeds of those two regimes, one is impressed by the fact that Nazi and fascist ideologies perceived a deep spiritual and intellectual kinship in Plato rather than in, say, John Locke or Thomas Jefferson. The author concludes as follows: "The essentials of Plato's vision still stand: the prophetic image of a social brotherhood, growing up in grace and harmony and understanding, under justice, toward an ideal perfection never quite to be reached." Even those who find this position unacceptable will gain immensely from In Defense of Plato.

WILLIAM EBENSTEIN

Princeton University

NEILL, THOMAS P. The Rise and Decline of Liberalism. Pp. xi, 321. Milwaukee: Bruce Publishing Company, 1953. $5.50.

A book should be dealt with in the light of its defined limits. Here, these limits are set forth in the text, but are not indicated by the title. The volume under review is concerned with the rise and decline of classical liberalism. This it does and in good measure. The author proposes a second volume on Liberalism in Prospect which will deal with the contemporary scene, as the present study deals with the nineteenth century.

The introductory chapter, "Liberalism: Toward a Definition," does survey representative views on liberalism down to the present. The author well says that "it is obvious that there is no formula of faith which can be labeled Liberalism at all times and all places. It is, indeed, of the very nature of Liberalism to have no set creed, no formula of faith to which all true Liberals must adhere." He shows also how the theory of liberty was changed from a negative to a positive concept in the latter half of the nineteenth century. Due tribute is paid T. H. Green's services in transferring the positive concept of liberty to the Anglo-American tradition. Nevertheless, it is the negative concept of classical liberalism which draws most of the author's attention and suffers most of his strictures.

After dealing with the many—and often contradictory—attitudes which stem from loose definition, the author follows Carlton J. H. Hayes in distinguishing "ecumenical" liberalism from "sectarian" liberalism. The former refers to that liberalism which is identified with generosity of spirit or liberality of mind, while the latter refers to a precisely defined and rigidly held body of doctrine, a secular religion. The author concentrates on secular liberalism in Britain, France, and on the Continent in general. The last half of the book is an appraisal of various aspects of classical liberalism.

The well-scotched faith in the inevitability of progress is dispatched again. The author is concerned, and he is not alone in this, because society has become rootless and is living on its spiritual momentum. Is this, however, a liberal failing or the dilemma of modern man in general? Speaking of the origins of liberalism, the author concludes that "from the very beginning, therefore, Liberalism develops as a body of thought and as a system which cannot work, for . . . it is based on a false concept of man and of society which leads logically—almost necessarily—to anarchy and from there to some form of totalitarian tyranny."

The twentieth century is no stranger to totalitarian tyranny. One wonders just when tyranny arose in any country that respects the dignity of the individual in the liberal sense, led by a man or a movement holding that the individual, applying his reason as developed by education, is not less capable of making a good decision than is external authority.

RALPH G. JONES

University of Arkansas

UNESCO. Interrelations of Cultures: Their Contribution to International Understanding. Collection of Intercultural Studies. Pp. 387. Paris: United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, 1953. $2.00.

The activities and publications of UNESCO have been viewed by its enemies as those of the propaganda ministry of an ominous "internationalist" conspiracy and by its friends as a marshaling of the spiritual and intellectual resources of the world in the cause of mutual understanding and world peace. If we are to judge by the present volume of essays, both these views are somewhat exaggerated. The only propaganda they seem to contain is the bias each author exhibits in favor of the country whose culture he is describing. Since this is in most cases his native country, or one to which he has devoted close study, these sympathies are understandable. Since, too, at least eight different cultures are so discussed (Japan, China, India, Negro Africa, Spain, Mexico, Spanish America, and the United States), the total effect of the volume is rather that of a quick visit to a museum than that of a monolithic propaganda "line."

This variety of impression is re-enforced by the variety of interpretation and method which the authors have brought to the common subject of "the present stage of the indigenous cultures of the various peoples of the world and . . . the relations existing between these cultures." Some have written historical surveys of major cultural epochs, others have sought to analyze a culture into constituent cultures, still others have tried to trace a culture's essence in its literature, arts, and sculpture, and one essay sets out the explicit theological, philosophical, and ethical principles of Indian culture. Professor McKeon, moreover, in a subtle essay on "Philosophy and the Diversity of Cultures" develops additional possibilities of interpretation which are not exemplified in this volume. The essays by Shih-Hsiang Chen on Chinese literature, by Alain Danielou on traditional arts in India, and by Michel Leiris on African Negro carving and sculpture, are interesting and distinctive. However, readers may also find in some of the others conveniently brief summaries of material that is usually widely scattered.

There are two essays, both rather slight and casual, on American culture, which fall in with the old stereotype that while other cultures have historic traditions, "philosophies," literatures, arts, problems, and so forth, in American culture there is only diversity, dominated perhaps by science and efficiency. It is also curious that except for Spain, no essays were included in this volume on European culture.

Clearly the organization and methodology of intercultural studies need much improving before they will serve to advance the international understanding sought by UNESCO.

MILTON SINGER

University of Chicago

NEUTRA, RICHARD. Survival Through Design. Pp. xi, 384. New York: Oxford University Press, 1954. $5.50.

This feu d'artifice is the reflection of a pyrotechnic personality. This distinguished modern architect-planner can sweep into his orbit observations and experiences in Ceylon, China, and Japan as well as in Europe and the Western Hemisphere, and can bring to bear the thinking of Sigmund Freud (in whose home he played as a boy), his friend Charles A. Beard, Zola, Serge Eisenstein, Erwin Schroedinger, Norbert Wiener and his Cybernetics, Roman lawyers, Adolf Loos (the pioneer German modern architect), Pavlov and a host of physiologists, Adelbert Ames and a host of experimental psychologists.

Neutra characterizes these 47 chapters (some only four or five pages long) as a "loose and yet linked cycle of writings collected over almost a lifetime." There is no table of contents to guide the reader to the author's scheme of organization. There are no chapter titles; each section has as motto a gnomic utterance. In short, this volume is a Commonplace Book or Table Talk. If the reader will accept it as such, he will find it studded with exciting ideas and striking phrases ("obsolescence precoc"). He will also find it studded with italics and capitals that show Neutra's impatience with the printed page as a means of expression; and he will find it strewn with the obfuscation apparently inevitable when a modern architect turns philosopher. ("Gradual increase of functional perfection in design seems to be accompanied by a proportionate decrease of extra-functional supplementation. Here emerges a psychological law of human production," p. 101.)

The central theme of this collection of reflections is not the challenge of the H-bomb: it is the vital importance of molding man's environment to meet his neurological and physiological requirements: "physiological space must prevail . . . over any other arbitrary notion on space." Closely linked to this theme is the concept of the design of environment as a four-dimensional space-time continuum. It is fascinating to read how an architect like Neutra sees responses to the senses of smell and sound as part of his problem.

Neutra preaches the replacement of the "GRAND, GODLIKE ORIGINATOR" by "a cooperative team which then reveals its own peculiar physiology of production"; "COMMUNITY PLANNING is an art, but one in need of a large scientific advisory board, CHAIRED BY AN EXPERT IN BIOLOGY." With this as a main thesis, it is odd that I find only one passing reference to Patrick Geddes, the great preacher of "biotechnics" (whose centenary is celebrated this year), and apparently none to Lewis Mumford. (The lack of an index makes it impossible to be certain that there may not be one.)

CHARLES S. ASCHER

Brooklyn College

MAYER, CHARLES. In Quest of a New Ethics. Translated and with a Preface by Harold A. Larrabee. Pp. 321. Boston: Beacon Press, 1954. $4.00.

A little more than one-third of this book is devoted to what the author calls "principles"; the remainder consists in "applications." As regards principles, we find that the mind is material; that there is no soul; that there are no final causes; that the assumption of God's existence "leads to inescapable inconsistencies" (p. 32); that "duty," "rights," and "virtue" are useful illusions (pp. 86, 92); that all truth is relative (p. 136). Unhappily the author deals dogmatically—perhaps "cavalierly" is a better description—with the many thorny questions that these views raise. His arguments are not likely to convince his opponents (Thomism, idealism, intuitionism, pragmatism, phenomenalism, existentialism, and several other rival schools are, for instance, considered and disposed of in some ten pages). And even those who accept M. Mayer's naturalistic principles are likely to feel that the arguments by which he supports them are inadequate.

Turning now to "applications," we find a great variety of topics discussed in more or less random fashion. The author holds that "we cannot have both economic liberty and [social] security at the same time"—security means "social leveling"; leveling results in equality; "equality is opposed to liberty." The conclusion of this syllogism seems to be that equalitarianism is more harmful than totalitarianism (pp. 144-47). Further, M. Mayer argues that "economic crises are necessary" (p. 192) and that "the state of affairs which is most likely to conserve and promote the progress of all humanity is that of free competition" (p. 154). He rejects wage and price controls, even when the state is "under the pressure of special circumstances" (p. 157). He defends the gold standard (p. 181) and puts Keynes right on the subject of the role of savings in bringing on economic crisis (p. 196). In the area of political institutions M. Mayer thinks that "democratic regimes are badly equipped to do great things," and that "unity of direction in the hands of a very capable man invested with dictatorial powers would seem to assure the maximum of efficiency at all levels of human activity." Unfortunately, because they abuse their powers, "most dictators come to a bad end." Under these circumstances, it would seem that the best regime would "consist of a dictatorship in which the holder of the supreme power could be replaced at any moment by a senate elected by the people" (p. 296).

The author is bitter about American opposition to colonialism. For the colonial powers there is, he says, a simple alternative: "subdue and dominate, or give up and leave" (p. 231). M. Mayer seems to choose the first alternative, for, "far from appeasing the ambitions of the backward peoples, the Occidentals, in raising them to their own standard of living, have only sharpened these ambitions" (p. 213).

M. Mayer prefaces his whole discussion by declaring, "We shall try to give straightforward answers to the principal questions of metaphysics, ethics, and social relations." This was an ambitious undertaking.

ing; unfortunately it does not seem to this reviewer that M. Mayer has been successful. He has indeed given us "straightforward answers" in the sense of leaving us in no doubt as to where he stands on a number of contemporary issues. But answers in the more fundamental sense of reasoned and connected arguments are singularly lacking.

W. T. JONES

Pomona College

GOLOB, EUGENE O. The "Isms": A History and Evaluation. Pp. xii, 681. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $6.00.

This is history with an element of direction—the sort of thing criticized by Buckley in God and Man at Yale. Its reception will depend on the sympathies of its readers, but probably most of those who read it will find it enlightening.

Classical capitalism is dismissed briefly as a system which evolved into monopolistic capitalism. Due attention is given to the neo-Mercantilist interventionism which characterizes the modern mixed economy. Well over half the book is devoted to socialism.

The author disparages classical economics. Among economists, he would be labeled an Institutionalizer. He deals with the Russian variety of Marxism at length and in a sharply critical manner. He applies the name corporatism to a system of political pluralism in which various organizations act as checks and balances. He comments pertinently that "The defeat of fascism . . . , far from removing corporatism as an ideological issue and social option, has made it possible . . . to consider its essential character and strength, unconfused by the fantasies of manic nationalism." His solution is found in neo-Mercantilist corporatism, with the government acting to promote the general welfare, but with the society which it governs composed of groups powerful enough to influence policies, and with the "Judaic-Christian tradition" supporting democratic discussion. There is much of this in our present society.

Modern nationalism might be assessed more incisively than is done here. No doubt Golob's Institutional predilections explain his neglect of welfare theory, but, when social solutions are suggested, it is reasonable to expect more examination of ethical theories than he attempts. Lack of objectivity is displayed when he states that proportional representation "can, and has, so well reflected the disagreements of the people as to render effective government impossible, discredit democracy, and justify dictatorship," without saying anything on the other side. Very likely, Golob had Germany in mind here; but is proportional representation to be blamed for the rise of Hitler? It should be pointed out that the dire consequences to which Golob refers have not occurred in the Scandinavian countries.

The book is well-documented, largely from secondary sources. Disadvantages in textbook use may be the ornate literary style and the great length of the chapters, insufficiently subdivided for easy student assignment. But, within its limitations, it is very well worth-while, and it should be read by a wider circle than those who teach and study "isms" courses.

EDMUND WHITTAKER

Colorado Agricultural and Mechanical College

CHATTERJEE, MANMATHA NATH. Out of Confusion. Pp. xvii, 165. Yellow Springs, O.: Antioch Press, 1954. $3.00.

The difficulty of distilling the essence of an inspiring teacher into a series of chapters is illustrated by this work from the pen of the Brahmin-born, European-trained American citizen Dr. Chatterjee, for three decades professor of the social sciences at Antioch College. A foreword by Arthur E. Morgan, former president of Antioch, and an introduction by Harry Elmer Barnes, leave no doubt about the Socratic evocativeness of his teaching. The book, however, is "a mixture of autobiography, personal philosophy, and social theory," the value of which lies in "flashes of intuition" rather than in logical argument.

Dr. Chatterjee finds Western society "delinquent" and "confused" because it lacks a "well-defined objective." The result is no unity of purpose in our institutions. As Barnes puts it: "Governments are nation-minded; religions are church-minded; labor unions are union-minded; business men are business-minded. But, although all of these exist for the benefit of humanity, none seems to be truly people-minded." As a cure for this chaos, the author has a formula: Man-Society-Discrimination-Responsibility, or M-S-D-R. His third word, discrimination, is poorly chosen, since what he means is simply the necessity of choice. "From time immemorial up to the present, mankind, though still groping in the dark, has had occasional glimpses" of this formula, the application of which would exalt spirit over matter, make men more consciously social, and abolish war. Indeed, five words sum up the gist of the matter: "Let There Be More Love."

Unfortunately the book's concrete proposals do not take us very far out of confusion into a sun-lit world. Some of them, indeed, such as "Live above the law," are themselves anything but clarifying. Mankind has been told again and again to "make friends even of his enemies," to stop exploiting the Asian peoples, and to "arrest the ever-increasing demand for national defense to avert the constant threat of war." Many will second the author's plea to "push the Point Four program in the spirit of Servus servorum"; but his advocacy of a research Institute of Peace to study such questions as "Is it possible to have a highly industrialized society without a philosophy of war?" seems to ignore a host of existing agencies which do not happen to start from ultra-pacifist premises.

HAROLD A. LARRABEE

Columbia University

JOHNSTON, RUBY F. The Development of Negro Religion. Pp. xxi, 202. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $3.00.

This book deals with an important subject which is worthy of the attention of any social scientist interested not only in the social development of the Negro in the United States but also in the evolution of religion generally as a social and psychological phenomenon. Unfortunately, it is evident that the person who undertook the study of this important subject did not possess the necessary training and knowledge to treat the subject adequately.

In the Preface, which is partly hortatory, and in the Introduction, which is a mixture of common sense and confused notions, the author proposes to study the relation of the Negro's religion to his social experience. Part I is supposed to be a condensed history of Negro religion. But it turns out to be a poorly integrated and uncritical use of various sources of information on the religion of the Negro before the Civil War. Part II, which is supposed to deal with "Religion in Transition," opens with a chapter entitled "Religion in a Sensate Culture." The title of this chapter is typical of the sociological and psychological jargon that is interspersed in the text throughout this part of the book and adds to its confusion. The materials on Negro religion, which were gathered in the South, could have counterbalanced to some extent the bad features of this study. They were used, however, without any understanding of their relevance to the general subject.

Although it was once thought, and may still be believed by some people, that anyone can study the Negro, it is difficult to understand why the publisher would permit such a work to appear among its titles.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Howard University

ANDREWS, THEODORE. The Polish National Catholic Church in America and Poland. Pp. ix, 117. New York: The Macmillan Company (originally published by SPCK, London), 1954. $2.50.

Today there are between four and five million people of total Polish stock in the United States. Though there were Poles in the United States in considerable numbers previous to the Civil War, the great influx of Polish people did not begin until after 1870, reaching its apex in 1912-1913 when nearly two hundred thousand entered in that one year. This vast immigration was motivated largely by economic conditions in Poland, due mainly to overpopulation and backward agricultural methods. Thrifty and capable of hard work, many found employment on farms, and soon farming communities of Poles were to be found in sections of New England—especially in the Connecticut river valley—as well as in the middle states and Texas, but the great majority became city dwellers. Three-fourths of the Polish immigrants were devout Roman Catholics and were fanatically loyal to Polish cultural patterns; largely they lived apart from other groups, developed a vigorous American-Polish language press, and formed unions and alliances in large numbers, which kept alive the Polish language bond and a Polish national spirit.

The rise of the Polish National Catholic Church in America can be understood only in the light of the above facts. On their coming to America the Poles soon discovered two distressing facts. The first was that their churches in America were controlled by the Irish and to a lesser extent by the Germans. Today of the more than 165 Catholic bishops in the United States only seven are Polish, and only one of the seven is a diocesan. The second discovery was that even in a 100 per cent Polish parish the church property was held in the name of the bishop of the diocese, who was most frequently an Irishman who could neither speak nor understand Polish. In 1896 a delegation of laymen from a Polish congregation in Scranton came to their bishop requesting that the congregation be represented in the management of parish affairs. Both the parish priest and the bishop of the diocese peremptorily rejected their request, while the bishop threatened them with a civil penalty if they did not submit. The congregation now turned to the Reverend Francis Hodur, a former priest of the parish, and under his leadership a new Polish parish was formed and a church erected. When the bishop of the diocese refused to consecrate the church unless the title be placed in his name, the congregation turned to Father Hodur who consented to be their pastor, the final result being the establishment of an independent parish. Soon there were other independent parishes in other Polish communities. In 1904 these congregations were consolidated at a Synod attended by 147 clerical and lay delegates, where the Polish National Catholic Church in America was formed. Similar movements had already begun in other Polish communities, and in 1914 a Lithuanian National Catholic Church was formed along similar lines. These groups in revolt have retained the Catholic ceremonial as well as Catholic doctrine in the main, though rejecting papal claims and hierarchical control.

The Polish National Catholic Church has a membership and constituency in the United States of more than 200,000 and maintains a mission in Poland—begun in 1923. Its clergy are permitted to marry, and intercommunion with the Protestant Episcopal Church was established in 1946.

This informative study was prepared as a Th.D. thesis at the General Theological Seminary (Episcopal) in New York, and it makes a welcome contribution to our understanding of a little-known phase of American church life among a sturdy body of "New Americans." Unfortunately there is no index.

WILLIAM W. SWEET

Southern Methodist University

BARTH, KARL. Against the Stream: Shorter Post-War Writings, 1946-52. Pp. 253. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $3.75.

These postwar writings have decided advantages for revealing Barth to us. Despite all talk about an independent Christian message, he seems much immersed in the currents of affairs. One result is a theological existentialism. Revelation and faith are geared to bring a "direct, unshakable and absolute certainty." Revelation means "the action of a Subject" whereof faith speaks "with absolute assurance." All down the line, psychological conviction takes over the work of logical evidence. Barth opposed Hitlerism. He advised Hungarian churchmen to be neutral about Communist totalitarianism. Bruner's open letter of protest fell on stony ground. Even his charge that Christians are thereby urged to give ethical sanction to what they were powerless to prevent made little impression. The one basic difference in these forms of tyranny Barth finds in Hitler's "basic crime" of distorting the church's message.

Why the policy of neutrality? A major part of the answer is that historical events are couched between two theological stations within the drama of human salvation. Political policies are not to be taken too seriously; they are incidental. Authoritative action taken by God with respect to lost mankind is the decisive thing. That action centers in His appointments for Jesus the Messiah.

From this divine-action-core theory of history Barth deduces his doctrine of God. He arrives via our need for certainty and authority. "The very instability of political history should serve to confirm the Christian assurance that only the love of God is eternal." Of course, that is not the only alternative. It is Barth who takes social instability as an occasion for appealing to a God who compensates for human deficiencies. Logic is bent to religious zeal and takes an all-or-nothing form.

Barth's agile mind has an urgent case to make. We do need assurance and a decisive word for human affairs—at least an individual in a turbulent world does. The Word of God comes therefore in Jesus Christ as the authoritative revelation, as indeed the essence of biblical faith. Bible content to one side, the individual needs status which gives him independence from his surroundings. In this either-or situation, religion becomes a divine transaction with respect to the soul. God acts once and for all, and for every individual. His part is to give assent, intellectual and emotional.

This transactional religion continually asserts its mastery. It is everywhere assumed and goes without questioning. To a legalistic authoritarian it undoubtedly sounds convincing. Otherwise it could not continue to dominate thinking among Christians as it does. It has one sound idea, that God is the source of our life. Beyond that, it is most objectionable. It sets out by misrepresenting God as a regal authority whose action precludes significant human response. Jesus the revealer is transposed into a figurine in a manger, on a Golgotha, and at the right hand of God. He is the "propitiation for our sins and accepted by God." Man is a lost unit, the victim of mass guilt and of collective responsibility. The church is an official organ for the propagation of the Word of God thus interpreted. No wonder human problems lie beyond "reason and ethics." Reason is chained to apologetic. Ethics is an aching void.

IRL G. WHITCHURCH

Kingfield, Maine

COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS

BRUNTON, D., and D. H. PENNINGTON. Members of the Long Parliament. Pp. xxi, 256. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $4.25.

To know our own world better we must understand as far as possible the secret springs of ancient struggles, not least of which have been those classic upheavals, the Puritan, American, French, and Russian Revolutions. In the first of these the work of the Long Parliament was central. Traditionally the history of Parliament has been told in terms of neatly categorized groups of merchants, lawyers, and country gentlemen; a method yielding more to the dictates of simplicity than to the dictates of truth. Sir Lewis Namier broke new paths in the 1930's by attacking the problem of Parliamentary history at a more basic level. He investigated the individual human elements of which parliaments were composed. After gleaning new facts from local sources, he found that the strings that moved the puppets on the national stage more often led back to family and county connections than to king and country. The old generalizations crumbled. The historian was hesitant in presenting new ones. Mr. Brunton and Mr. Pennington, both formerly close associates of Sir Lewis at Manchester University, have now brought the history of the Long Parliament under the scrutiny of this new approach.

The "original members" of the Long Parliament were divided into Royalists and Parliamentarians but Mr. Brunton and Mr. Pennington did not find that these divisions corresponded to separate social classes, nor to occupational interests, nor to educational opportunities, nor to political experience. Age alone seemed to set apart the younger Royalists. In social and economic status the Recruiters differed as little from the "original members" as did the Rumpers from those secluded.

Two long chapters deal with the membership from the Eastern Association and the six counties of the South-West. The history of families on both sides has been traced through several generations to ascertain whether old families disappeared and new ones arose. Invariably old families held on and new ones failed. "Enterprise in exploiting the political situation" was not "as important in determining the station in life of the successors of our Members of Parliament as the usual accidents of family history"—births, marriages, deaths.

This is not a book for laymen. It is a tool for scholars. Appendix I contains valuable information on the regional number, age, length of service, and family parliamentary record of the M.P.'s. This volume has an admittedly negative value. It is to humble the student before all generalizations, especially any which speak of this revolution as a class struggle. New interpretations are withheld, but they are foreshadowed in this preliminary study which, even thus far, has well deserved a laudatory introduction from Tawney.

GEORGE C. ROGERS, JR.

University of Pennsylvania

PELLING, HENRY. The Origins of the Labour Party, 1880-1900. Pp. ix, 258. London: MacMillan & Co. (distributed in the U. S. by St. Martin's Press), 1954. $4.00.

The title of the book here reviewed is exact. The author has given us an analysis of the Labour party, not of the labor movement; he has given the story of the birth of a political party that is socialistic and yet he has not recounted the rise of British Socialism. He has limited himself to origins, starting with the first trade union committee that began applying parliamentary pressure and closing with the election of 1906 in which the Labour party was put on a firm footing in Parliament by winning seats for thirty members.

The problem in Britain was to find a political line that could be followed by all of the trade unionists, by most of the Socialists, and by some of the Radicals and Liberals to the end that a permanent parliamentary group could be maintained and that it could win elections on the basis of its own program, and be financed by its own membership.

Records of organizational meetings, publications of societies, correspondence of labor leaders, press notices, and other primary or contemporary accounts form the backbone of the study. Many principals have left their statements in print, as, for example, the Webbs, Shaw, Cole, Hyndman, Mann, Morris, and Pease. There are a number of good biographies and special studies upon which the author has drawn. These materials have been well handled.

There had been liberal and radical thought in England for many years, and there had been Marxist and other types of Socialism for a long time. But when, in 1880, the Lambeth Democratic Association decided that it was time to take political action because laborers were losing their franchise in London and because the caucus system worked to the disadvantage of labor candidates, a committee was appointed. A labor party was decided upon; it was called the Democratic Federation. Hyndman, its leader, made it an openly Socialist body in 1883; and in the following year it became the Social Democratic Federation, somewhat encouraged by its Marxist counterpart in Germany. William Morris, a man of wealth, was its treasurer. But in this year, 1884, Morris left the Federation and formed with Engels the Socialist League which opposed the political approach. On the other hand, in 1884 there was formed the Fabian Society as an outgrowth of the Fellowship of the New Life. It stood for parliamentary action as a means of reform. It helped to color the movement with evolutionary rather than revolutionary spirit. But it was too lofty to get the popular strength necessary for political action.

It is Keir Hardie and his Independent Labour Party, Socialist and favoring political action, that the author credits with the greatest support for the growing party movement. He gives us a fine, critical picture of Hardie, "the only reliable Parliamentary asset of independent labour." It is the reformed Liberal, Ramsay MacDonald, that made Labour politics national in scope. When, partially as a result of the "union smashing" in America and of the Boer War, trade unionism grew and in its strength because political-minded—in about 1899—the backbone of a political labor force had been created.

Hardie, MacDonald, and many Labourites favored "labor" rather than "Socialism" as the basis of the movement for parliamentary power. The testing of the formula that would make a winning party is the story told by Henry Pelling. One does not know at the end from which one of the ingredients of the Labour party the author drew his own inspiration.

The book is especially well edited and manufactured.

W. HENRY COOKE

Claremont Graduate School

ATTLEE, C. R. As It Happened. Pp. viii, 312. New York: The Viking Press, 1954. $5.00.

To the general reader this autobiography will reveal much about its author and the nature of British socialism. The straightforward and unadorned narrative suggests an unassuming man, but one with a great deal of wisdom and practical common sense. Mr. Attlee has always done his own thinking; unlike his early associates he became a socialist; unlike some of his later colleagues he did not take the pacifist line either in the war of 1914 or in the crises of the 1930's. Like most British Labourites the inspiration for his socialism was mainly humanitarianism; fourteen years of settlement work in London's East End convinced him that collectivism was the only solution, but it was a socialism empirical, experimental, and flexible. Disapproval of Marxism is always evident; he never liked the doctrinaire Social Democratic Federation, and the distrust of Communism is apparent throughout, which helps one to understand why the Communist party has failed to infiltrate and destroy the Labour party, and why the latter has remained so democratic, so parliamentary, and so British.

To anyone familiar with recent British history or with Roy Jenkins' biography of Attlee, however, this book will be disappointing. Much space is allotted to conventional matters such as early life and school, while important events get very casual treatment. Two sentences relate the defeat of the first Labour government and two short barren paragraphs the following general election. Mr. Attlee could tell much more about such events as the Labour debacle of 1931, Labour's adherence to the Churchill coalition, and his choice of Ernest Bevin rather than Hugh Dalton as foreign secretary; but he makes few revelations and his account falls short of what can be found elsewhere. The chapter on Commonwealth relations is more satisfying, but with respect to India it would have been more illuminating if he had developed somewhat his theme that his difficulties in arranging for the transfer of power were created by the Indian communities themselves rather than by British unwillingness to withdraw. American readers will note with interest his admiration for President Roosevelt's knowledge of world strategy and prevision of the course of the war. During Attlee's visit of October, 1941, when the British African forces were confined to Egypt and Tobruk and the United States had not yet entered the war, the president discoursed upon the importance of North Africa and, putting his finger on Algiers, said: "That is where I want to have American troops" (p. 173).

CARL F. BRAND

Stanford University

COLE, G. D. H. An Introduction to Trade Unionism. Pp. 324. London: George Allen & Unwin (distributed in U. S. by The Macmillan Company, New York), 1953. $4.25.

Although it bears the title of one of Professor Cole's previous books, this is in fact an entirely new work. Designed as a textbook, this relatively brief volume is exactly what its title indicates—an introduction to the character and the problems of modern trade unionism in Great Britain. With his usual clarity, Professor Cole takes the reader step by step through the complexities of trade union government, finance, and organization. He devotes separate chapters to the changing nature of collective bargaining in Great Britain, to the trade unions and the law, politics, and education, and to a general survey of "trade union policy." This latter chapter deals with questions relating to strikes, wages, and productivity, but it is likely that the discussion of new problems—e.g., the nature and the desirability of "workers' control"—raised by postwar nationalization will be of most interest to American students.

Throughout the book, Professor Cole's comments provide sensible and well-balanced insights. His discussion of trade union "democracy" is a useful antidote, for example, to the conclusions drawn a bit too readily by many readers of Mr. Joseph Goldstein's The Government of British Trade Unions. In trade unions, as in other types of association, he points out, democracy has to do with giving every member a chance to participate actively if he wishes. That most members do not is less the result of calculated planning by trade union leaders than of the apathy characteristic of most forms of voluntary association, whether political or social or economic. Similarly, for American students accustomed to regard the Trades Union Congress as a colossus dominating the organized labor movement in Britain, his analysis of the narrow limits within which the T. U. C. conceived of its functions in the past—and, to a lesser extent, conceives of them in the present—will be of considerable value.

The one real weakness of the book, surprisingly enough, is in the chapter devoted to "strength and weakness" of the trade union movement. Here we have a summary of the state of organization in the various major trades and industries, but very little in the way of an analytical assessment either of particular unions or the trade union movement as a whole. This is especially disappointing since Professor Cole is perhaps uniquely qualified for the task. But there is enough material here, at any rate, to enable the student to begin to make his own generalizations. Finally, since the book is likely to be reprinted in the future, several mechanical faults may be noted. On page 31 an entire line of print which belongs in the second paragraph appears also in the first. And, in the review copy at least, pages 113–128 are bound out of sequence before pages 105–112. These minor annoyances, however, do not seriously mar this clear, straightforward, and very readable survey of contemporary trade unionism in Britain.

HENRY R. WINKLER

Rutgers University

MACPHERSON, C. B. Democracy in Alberta: The Theory and Practice of a Quasi-Party System. Pp. x, 258. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1953. $5.50.

This, the fourth of a series sponsored by the Canadian Social Science Research Council dealing with the background and development of the Social Credit movement in Canada, is an extremely significant volume. The author, an associate professor of political economy at the University of Toronto, has indeed, in the words of Clark, the editor of the series, "struck on a new, bold approach to the study of Canadian politics." His analysis not only "constitutes an important contribution to an understanding of western Canadian political development" but also offers a tentatively rewarding approach for the study of political and social movements in this and other countries.

What Professor Macpherson, in effect, does is to offer an explanation of the appearance in Alberta, within a relatively brief period, of two new movements, each demanding the abandonment of the party system and the traditional cabinet system and the adoption of a new and more democratic type of government—a government capable of implementing popular demands and of protecting the people from economic exploitation. These movements were (1) the United Farmers, which dominated the provincial scene from 1921 to 1935; and (2) the Social Credit, which has controlled the Alberta government since 1935. His thesis, briefly stated, is that both movements can be traced to "the needs of a society that is politically and economically a subordinate part of a mature capitalist economy, and whose people, at the same time, have preponderantly the outlook and assumptions of small-propertied independent commodity producers." Such a society, in certain circumstances, is led to reject the orthodox party system. But the party system performs one function indispensable for democracy in a mature capitalist economy: it moderates and contains the opposition of class interests. Thus the Alberta reformers were forced to find a substitute for the party system. This they found in what Professor Macpherson calls the "quasi-party system."

Whether this new system can properly be called democratic is open to question, for the influence of the voters over their government, admittedly, has been quite limited. There can, however, be no doubt that a new, and probably permanent, political system has emerged. Whether such a system will eventually find acceptance in other provinces and on the federal level only time can tell. But it unquestionably is true that the conditions that gave rise to Alberta "radicalism" are "not entirely lacking in Canada as a whole."

WILLIAM R. WILLOUGHBY

St. Lawrence University

DAY, BRIGHAM. Le Canada et les droits de l'homme: Le Concept des droits de l'homme dans la politique étrangère et la Constitution du Canada. Pp. ix, 154. Paris: Librairie du recueil Sirey, 1953. 900 fr.

This little volume, a doctoral thesis from Paris, should prove of interest not only to those who follow Canadian affairs but also to those concerned with the interrelations of national and international policies. Indeed it may unintentionally provide some comfort for the proponents of the recently defeated Bricker amendment, for the author concludes that the legislative and normative action of the United Nations is incapable of overcoming the resistance of even a law-abiding country such as Canada.

Mr. Day is concerned with bridging the gap between the anarchy of state sovereignties and the implementation of acknowledged human rights. His analysis of the Canadian course leads him to the conclusion that even a well-intentioned democracy may escape the internal consequences of international declarations and legislation. As an avowed and ardent internationalist he is finally led to turn from reliance on the United Nations and to seek a more effective organization in some other quarter. After a brief examination of the British Commonwealth and the Pan-American Union, the last hope for realization of his ideals is found in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. This is perhaps a curious conclusion (and contrary to his thesis), for there is no reason to expect NATO to be more effective respecting the rights of man than the United Nations. If the expanding membership of NATO has not already weakened the sense of community standards, there is no ground for thinking other members attach the same importance to Article II as Canadians do. In any case, as a voluntary organization, NATO will be exposed to the same defects that are found in the United Nations.

This is not the first French thesis on "rights" in Canada and their relation to international law, but it is distinguished by a thorough basis of Canadian constitutional law and history. The concepts of the constitution, the federal background, and the disputed "treaty" jurisdiction are carefully and selectively examined, as are the chief examples of provincial legislation, judicial decisions, and the recent parliamentary inquiries respecting a proposed bill of rights. The merit of the volume, however, lies not in any new information but in the utilization of what is known to argue the deficiencies of existing policy.

H. MCD. CLOKIE

University of California
Berkeley

DEANE, PHYLLIS. Colonial Social Accounting. Pp. xv, 360. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954. $9.50.

Miss Deane has done excellent pioneering work in the very difficult field of national income and product in the African colonial territories. The work under review, the second and final report on the economies of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, is based on a compilation of official and other documents and firsthand field experience acquired in 1946 and 1947. The interim report, The Measurement of Colonial National Incomes, based on materials available in London, was published in 1948 and included estimates for Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland for 1938 and Jamaica for 1929 to 1938. The result is a cogent, lucid, and searching exposition of the economic structure and growth factors and problems in primitive economics on which has been superimposed an advanced Western technology. In spite of Miss Deane's modest contention (p. 229) "that this particular experiment has [not] done more than collect, sift and discuss the readily accessible evidence for two Central African economies," it is evident that she has applied with perspicacity and clarity the conceptual apparatus of the national income approach to underdeveloped territories and has helped lay the foundation for further study in other areas leading to the eventual measurement and international comparison of real income and welfare. The author has also succeeded in providing a set of accounts and much analysis which will be of value to those responsible for formulating and administering economic policy for the new Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. This is no mean achievement considering the formidable problems of measuring subsistence production, the inaccuracy of census statistics, the unreliability of data on the labor force, and the lack of a satisfactory census of agriculture and a systematic survey of internal trade.

It is unfortunate that there was a time lag of almost four years between the dates of writing and publication; much has occurred in that interval affecting income and product in the area. Obviously, the most important event was the federation of the two northern territories with Southern Rhodesia. Miss Deane does discuss some of the area's problems in a chapter entitled "The Central African Economy" comparing the income components and status of development in each territory and analyzing the common problems arising from the relatively low level of African productivity. Of significance also was the transfer of domicile of the major mining companies from London to Northern Rhodesia; thus they can no longer be considered foreign companies although they will still remit dividends to stockholders abroad. Still another development was the sharp spurt in copper prices which led to increased investment by the mining companies in Northern Rhodesia, expanded European and African incomes, and enlarged governmental surpluses for development programs. Finally, considerable financial assistance was extended for the development of transportation, power, and metal output by the United States government and the International Bank.

FRANK R. LAMACCHIA

Department of State

LEAKEY, L. S. B. Mau Mau and the Kikuyu. Pp. xi, 115. New York: John Day Company, 1954. $2.50.

Dr. Leakey's book is unique in two important respects. It is written by an authority on the Kikuyu and it is the first one to provide a proper background for an understanding of Mau Mau. The author possesses the unimpeachable credentials of an observer who grew up among the Kikuyu, learning their language and achieving tribal membership and status. His appraisal in late 1952 of Mau Mau as an anti-European and anti-Christian terrorist society bent on driving all foreigners from Kenya has indeed been substantiated, although subsequent developments indicate that the movement is all this and more too.

The first part of the book describes native law, custom, and belief as they once operated and as they now appear after prolonged contact with European institutions and influences. Dr. Leakey believes the Kikuyu have had substantial benefits from European civilization but is nonetheless convinced that all too often the stabilizing factors in Kikuyu society have been impaired or destroyed without adequate substitutes to replace them. The conviction that these conditions have made Mau Mau possible he sets forth in discussing land ownership, marriage customs, initiation ceremonies and education, religion, and other elements.

The second part of the book shows how astute Mau Mau leadership has capitalized on Kikuyu concern with land and population problems, on the social and economic consequences of living in a "money economy, and on the existence of separatist churches and schools established by some Kikuyu after quarrels with missionaries over scriptural interpretation and over female circumcision. Dr. Leakey also provides a sketch of the organizational antecedents of Mau Mau and gives special attention to the now notorious oath which plays so important a role in its strategy.

The last chapter offers proposals to prevent a recurrence of the present troubles. These proposals call for changes in policy with respect to land, water supply, urban housing, birth control, education, the color bar, and Christian missions. The fact that the resolution of the present crisis in Kenya may render some of the suggestions unusable cannot detract from the worth of the book as a clear and valuable exposition of basic problems and their current political expression through the Mau Mau movement. Like the 1952 English edition, this American edition contains useful maps as endpapers.

WILLIAM E. DIEZ

University of Rochester

CALPIN, G. H. (Ed.). The South African Way of Life. Pp. ix, 200. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $3.50.

Prepared under the auspices of the South African Institute on International Affairs by the International Studies Conference, at the instance of United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the terms of reference of this collection of essays are indicated in its subtitle, "Values and Ideals of a Multi-Racial Society." Its theme, quoted in the Foreword by A. L. Irvine from the final paragraph of the "Introductory" by David Marquand, who repeats the passage in the concluding discussion, sets the tone of the intervening chapters: "For the past 150 years the history of South Africa has been a history of struggle and conflict. Conflict between black man and black man, between white man and black man, between white man and white man; struggle of white and black against a not over-generous nature—this is the background of its present problems."

Its authors include members of all the racial groups of the country except the Indians, who are discussed in a chapter written by the editor. The roster includes five Afrikaners, two Englishmen, one African, two Colored, one Jewish, and one born in Holland. Political affiliations vary; not all the Afrikaners are Nationalists, though the two Colored authors are or were members of the Coloured Advisory Council, a government-sponsored organization opposed by a considerable number of the Colored community.

The various contributions, as might be expected, do not have equal value, but their quality is on the whole high, and their respect for the facts admirable. We got from them a profound sense of the historical depth to which the roots of present tensions strike, the reasoning by means of which historically derived present positions are rationalized, and the basic dilemma of a multiracial society where a determined minority maintains a preferred position. The Afrikaans-English conflict is well described, the tone of the chapter on the English-speaking community showing by clear implication how much on the defensive this group, earlier dominant in South African society, has come to be.

The one defect of the book arises from the fact that most of its chapters seem to have been written in 1950, so that a number of critical developments, introduced to implement militant apartheid-ism, such as the transfer of the education of Africans from the Department of Education to the Department of Native Affairs, are not mentioned. It is a pity that an appendix of such recent events could not have been provided. The criticism, however, is minor in view of the fact that, on the whole, the book is probably the best all-round exposition of the South African scene that has appeared in recent years.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Northwestern University

SLAVIC COUNTRIES

DEGRAS, JANE (Ed.). Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy, 1917-1941. Vol. III: 1933-1941. Pp. xxii, 500. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $8.50.

Superlatives have already been exhausted in reviews of the two preceding volumes in this admirable series on Soviet foreign policy, compiled and edited by Mrs. Jane Degras. The third and final volume, covering 1933 to 1941, maintains the high standards of accurate translation, judicious selection, and careful editing which characterized its predecessors. Mrs. Degras and the Royal Institute of International Affairs have rendered an invaluable service for which students of international relations must remain deeply indebted.

No period of Soviet foreign policy presents such dramatic events as the years preceding World War II. The general pattern is well-known—the shift from militant anti-fascism to Nazi-Soviet pact, the assiduous efforts for collective security within the League of Nations followed by Soviet partition of Poland, attack upon Finland, and expulsion from the League. Less familiar, however, are the many clues in Soviet foreign policy documents which show these changes to be carefully considered tactics within a coherent and comprehensible framework of policy. Here lies the chief contribution of Mrs. Degras's work.

Orthodox diplomatic historians insist on archival research as a basis for analyzing foreign policy. As these volumes indicate, however, Soviet policy reveals its basic motivations in official speeches, editorials, and newspaper reports. One need not trace the detailed secret negotiations between the Wilhelmstrasse and the Narkomindel to understand Soviet objectives in Finland, the Baltic states, and Eastern Europe. In the formal statements of Stalin and Molotov and in the many revealing Tass reports these objectives emerge in a coherent pattern. Similarly Soviet-Japanese relations, moving from a cautious pas de deux in Manchuria to indirect warfare in China and open clashes along the Mongolian border, can be traced with surprising completeness in the published record. In short, a thorough study of this book provides a fairly comprehensive picture of Soviet strategy and tactics in international relations.

Only the subversive aspects of Soviet foreign policy as expressed through the Communist International remain outside the scope of Mrs. Degras' work. Her preface indicates that companion volumes are already in preparation to remedy this defect. This is not a crippling limitation, however. Contrary to Sir Winston Churchill's famous epigram, Soviet foreign policy is susceptible to the same method of analysis as that of other countries. Within the limitations imposed by Soviet secrecy, Mrs. Degras provides a broad yet reliable record of that policy as it evolved during the first 25 years of Soviet rule.

ALLEN S. WHITING

Taipei, Taiwan

MOORE, BARRINGTON, JR. Terror and Progress USSR: Some Sources of Change and Stability in the Soviet Dictatorship. Pp. xvii, 261. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $4.50.

In his own words, Barrington Moore attempts 'to weigh, with an eye to the future, the sources of stability and the potentiality for changes in the Bolshevik regime.' He also writes in his preface: "... the test I have tried to apply in including or omitting any particular piece of information was the clue that it might give to the future, rather than its desirability in rounding out our image of the present." Correspondingly the last chapter of the book has the title: Images of the Future.

To write about the future is always a risky undertaking. However, the reader need not be frightened by the dangers of "an exploratory foray" as the author himself characterizes his book. Barrington Moore does not indulge in prophecies. He uses abundant and well arranged evidence in order to determine the more probable alternatives of future development in the Soviet Union. The book, while less adventurous than the author himself seems to believe, certainly is very informative and stimulating.

Dr. Barrington Moore undertakes to explore the interplay of the three, in his opinion, most important elements influencing the development of the Soviet regime: power, rationality (technical and economic), and tradition. He recognizes that "these three elements do not necessarily exhaust the criteria according to which decisions can be made in the Soviet system." He assumes, however, that most probably the future shape of the Soviet regime will be determined by an increase and corresponding decrease in the emphasis of each of these three elements. And his final conclusion is: "If peace should continue for a decade or more, the rationalist or the traditionalist forces in Soviet society, or some unstable combination of the two, may do their work of erosion upon the Soviet totalitarian edifice."

The method itself has its advantages, but also limitations and shortcomings which cannot be discussed in this review. At any rate, one wonders whether while concentrating only on those three elements the author has not omitted too many factors of possible import. In the scope of the study as chosen by the author, his analysis is very enlightening and convincing as far as "power" and "rationality" are concerned. The same hardly can be said about his observations concerning "tradition." In this reviewer's opinion, the author's concept of tradition is too vague, embracing very disparate elements as, for instance, the attachment of peasants to their personal plots and the inertia of the bureaucratic routine.

GEORGE DENICKE

Washington, D. C.

BLACK, C. E. (Ed.). Challenge in Eastern Europe. Pp. xviii, 276. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1954. $4.00.

These twelve essays, dealing primarily with the region embracing Albania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Poland, were originally presented in somewhat different form as lectures at the Institute of Public Affairs and Regional Studies of the Graduate Schools at New York University in the summer of 1953. They were prepared and are now published in co-operation with the Mid-European Studies Center of the National Committee for a Free Europe, Inc. In a brief foreword Joseph C. Grew states: "To sustain the hope of freedom in half a continent; to learn and to contribute to truth and knowledge; in enlightened self-interest to dedicate ourselves and our country to freedom's cause and restitution—this is the Challenge in Eastern Europe."

The essays bear the mark of their origin and are able general surveys, omitting footnotes, bibliographies and other monographic apparatus. The editor contributes an introduction on "Eastern Europe in Historical Perspective" which is limited largely to a survey of nineteenth-century developments and a conclusion, on "Eastern Europe and the Postwar Balance of Power," which is the highlight of the volume. He has grouped the essays into three parts. The first of these deals with "The Politics of Eastern Europe." In a discussion of "The Liberal Tradition" Hubert Ripka stresses the influence of western liberal ideals, but points out that the liberals in the east were not convinced of the virtues of competition in a free market and were always willing to take a degree of state control. Arnold J. Zurcher presents a well organized and temperate account of the "Authoritarian Forms of Government Between the Wars," while Stanislaw Mikolajczyk gives a more impassioned denunciation of "People's Democracy in Theory and Practice."

The second group of essays considers "The Development of an Agrarian Society." Here Ladislav Feierabend writes on "Land Reform and Agricultural Improvement"; Branko M. Pešelj on "Peasantism: Its Ideology and Achievements," Geza Teleki on "Industrial and Social Policies Between the Wars," and Jan H. Wszelaki on "Industrial and Social Policies of the Communist Regimes." Although this region has been a predominantly agricultural area in the past, industrialization is now being pushed with marked success but also at tremendous cost to the general well being of the peoples. There has been rapid urbanization but the overpopulation of agricultural areas still remains a fundamental problem. Illiteracy has steadily decreased since World War I, and the present regimes have done much in this field. They have also paid much attention to advanced specialized technical training from which they will recruit their future administrative personnel.

In the final section, entitled "The Search for Regional Security," Henry J. Roberts writes on "International Relations Between the Wars"; Jacob B. Hoptner on "The Structure of the Soviet Orbit" in which he discusses the various political agreements among the satellite states and the U.S.S.R.; and Karl W. Deutsch on "Problems and Prospects of Federation." The latter is a penetrating analysis in which the author, however, develops more problems than solutions.

There are other topics which might well have been considered in this Challenge of Eastern Europe. There is, for example, practically no mention of the role of the church in this area, nor is there an adequate treatment of the minority problem during the interwar years, with an evaluation of how the system of minority treaties under supervision of the League actually functioned. The book, however, is not meant to be a history of Eastern Europe, and it fulfills admirably its purpose of providing interesting and informative essays on many social, political, and economic problems of this area.

E. C. HELMREICH

Bowdoin College

GADOUREK, I. The Political Control of Czechoslovakia: A Study in Social Control of a Soviet Satellite State. (Library of the Czechoslovak Foreign Institute in exile, No. 1.) Pp. xvii, 285. Leiden: H. E. Stenfert Kroese N.V., 1953. $3.25.

The importance of any scholarly book on today's Czechoslovakia is given by two facts: (1) the country is part of the Communist empire in Central Europe, and (2) because of the depth of its democratic tradition, it is probably Communism's weakest link.

It is gratifying to note that several young Czech scholars in exile, grouped around the Czechoslovak Foreign Institute established in Holland, are undertaking a systematic study of the Czechoslovak problem. Mr. Gadourek's work is the first of a series which the institute intends to publish in English.

The book under review is a scholarly sociological study which has earned its author a Ph.D. degree at Leiden University. Its first part is a detailed and well-organized description of the Communist tyranny in Czechoslovakia. In the second part the situation created by the oppressive regime and the reaction against it, present and potential, is analyzed. Both the description and the analysis are clad in technical sociological terms, a fact which will be appreciated by the experts in that field but which will somewhat puzzle the average reader. As a sociologist, Mr. Gadourek has focused his attention on the oppressors rather than on the oppressed so that the tremendous drama of the people as a whole remains on the margin. Moreover, his approach, being too theoretical and abstract, proves a handicap in his evaluation of Czech resistance. For that purpose a broader knowledge of the history and psychology of the Czech people should have been brought forth. As their history shows, the Czechs are one of the most resistant and vital people in Europe, stubbornly and intelligently opposed to any foreign ideology and domination.

The real political situation in the Communist Czechoslovakia is illustrated by the following quotation from an underground report of May 1952: "Then a question may be raised: on whom, on which social strata, on which people is this regime actually based? Any dictatorship is necessarily bound up with a group of people who profit from it and who support and defend it. Fascism is said to have been supported by capitalists; who are the supporters of communism? The working-class perhaps? Definitely not. Neither the farmers or the intellectuals. Communists form a certain privileged class but the position of the individual members is unstable and uncertain. This is the case even with the high officials of the Party, the secretaries of the County Committees, or the members of the Central Committee, as is generally known" (p. 211).

Much credit must be given to the author for the clear and systematic picture of the Communist Party and Government in Czechoslovakia, based on what must have been a great amount of painstaking research. The Party-State combination is described in particularly interesting manner in the three spheres of the legislative, judicial, and executive power, the distinction among which is necessarily fictitious in a totalitarian system. Perhaps the Ministry of States Security with its multiple police organizations, including the 150,000-man-strong National Security Guard (SNS), equipped with tanks and artillery, which is in direct contact with the Politburo in Moscow through a special secret code, represents with the army the two main elements in the true balance of power of a Soviet Communist State. The facts which have been collected and analyzed by the author make this book a most valuable addition for those who seek a broader knowledge of the Communist satellite world.

VLASTIMIL KYBAL

New York City

WANKLYN, HARRIET. Czechoslovakia. Pp. xviii, 446. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1954. $6.25.

After a detailed survey of the regional geography of Czechoslovakia, the author devotes 28 pages to the climate of Western Czechoslovakia, and 43 pages to vegetation, soils, forests, and forest industries of the same regions; then, for some unaccountable reason, outlines of the histories of Western Czechoslovakia and Slovakia follow (pp. 136-214); next come the chapters on farming, industry, trade, and communication (pp. 215-377); the chapters on population and settlement (pp. 378-406) and Sub-Carpathian Russia (pp. 407-430) conclude this strange study.

Although the all-embracing title would seem to indicate that this might be an all-embracing survey of Czechoslovakia, actually the coverage is limited mostly to a detailed survey of the physical geography of the pre-Communist Czechoslovakia and Carpathian Russia. In this respect Wanklyn has produced an excellent reference book, compiled "from other people's written work" (p. v), mainly from the writings of de Martonne, Ancel, Defontaine, Tibal, Martel, Mousset, Kral, Pohl, Moschales, Maschatschek, and Blau, and from the Czechoslovak studies in the National

Atlas and the Czechoslovak Encyclopaedia. But hardly any attempt has been made to relate the facts of physical geography to social and anthropological geography. Only here and there does the author touch on the geopolitical aspects of that phase of Czechoslovakia. The chapters on history are weakest. Wanklyn spends a lot of time reciting the names of kings and dynasties, and the overwhelming impression is that there is hardly any meaning to the history of Western Czechoslovakia and Slovakia.

Probably the basic trouble with the author, an Englishwoman, is that she rehashed "other people's written work," without gaining anything at all from taking "cross-country journeys for two months in 1947 by train and bus." Furthermore, in the true typical English fashion, she stresses overwhelmingly only the English references, together with the authors noted above, without being aware that in recent years excellent studies have also appeared in the United States—specifically R. J. Kerner's Czechoslovakia (University of California Press, 1940) and S. H. Thomson's Czechoslovakia in European History (Princeton University Press, 1943, recently revised). The maps and drawings are mostly excellent and obviously reprinted from expert sources. But many of the photographs are really poor, and the author should have asked the Czechoslovak information services for help. This should also have been done in regard to the extensive use (and sometimes misuse) of the diacritical signs so freely used in the numberless Czech names here.

JOSEPH S. ROUCEK

University of Bridgeport

WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE

WILEY, W. L. The Gentleman of Renaissance France. Pp. xii, 303. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $5.00.

No one with a shred of imagination who has wandered through the châteaux along the Loire or elsewhere in provincial France remains unshaken in his devotion to the idea of progress. Never before or since have men fashioned for themselves residences of such charm and grace. As the cathedrals of earlier centuries bear witness to an age of religious aspiration, as the crushing mass of Versailles bears witness to the veneration which a later age was to accord to political power, so the châteaux of sixteenth century France stand as reminders of an age in which men attached supreme importance to the pleasures of living in spacious elegance.

It is to the men and women who made their homes in these châteaux that Professor Wiley direct his good-humored and perceptive attention in this admirable study of the gentleman of Renaissance France, taking the Renaissance as meaning simply the sixteenth century. After a glance at the legal and social position of the gentleman and the sources of the conception of gentlemanliness, he proceeds to describe the manners, dress, conversation, and diversions of the gentleman, his education, his sense of honor, and his attitude towards women.

The France here described is a land which knows peace at home and growing opulence, a land in which the king is master but not a despot, a land in which men of noble birth hold a secure pre-eminence. Not yet has Versailles become the shrine of a political absolutism which will reduce the gentleman to the role of a mere domestic servant of the king. Not yet have the provinces been reduced to a hinterland of Paris, nor has the bourgeoisie begun to contest the privileges of aristocratic birth. For a moment, France seems to be attaining an equilibrium between monarchical and aristocratic interests, between the landed estate and the bourgeoisie, between the metropolis and the provinces, such as was to develop in England during the next two centuries.

The reader cannot close this admirable study without feeling a twinge of regret that France did not continue in the evolution which the sixteenth century seemed to presage, without wondering what France might have become had the provinces held their own against Paris and Versailles, had the gentleman withstood the king and the bourgeois. And the reader cannot help but wish the author would provide a sequel to this study dealing with the Bourbon age, to help explain how the aristocracy passed so soon from its golden age, here described, into the decadence of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

PAUL FARMER

University of Wisconsin

CASE, LYNN M. French Opinion on War and Diplomacy During the Second Empire. Pp. xxii, 339. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1954. $6.00.

A generation ago, public opinion studies enjoyed a brief spell of popularity among historians and then went into almost total eclipse. Professor Case has now returned to this somewhat neglected field. Unlike most of the earlier studies, his work is not based on newspaper sources, but rests for the most part on official reports furnished to Napoleon's government by bureaucrats scattered throughout the country. This vast bulk of archival material offers the historian a reasonably accurate insight into the public temper; for it was part of the job of these officials to keep a finger on the public pulse. Of course the materials are not foolproof. Then as now, there were officials who were stupid or bigoted, or who reported what they thought Paris would like to hear. On the whole, however, Napoleon wanted facts rather than flattery, and most of the procureurs were astute enough to recognize this preference.

Professor Case has sought to analyze the shifting currents of French opinion during the major foreign policy crises of Napoleon's reign. He has done the job in the same competent manner and judicious spirit which gave weight and authority to his earlier books on the Second Empire. The volume is the product of many years of research and reflection; its conclusions are buttressed by a thorough study of all the relevant sources. The nature of the subject matter pretty well precludes any startling new interpretations. Perhaps the most intriguing bit of revisionism is Dr. Case's contention that French opinion in July 1870 was at least potentially pro-war, and that the government's decision to fight was taken in part because it expected an explosion of pro-war sentiment. The author argues his case well, though he shows also that Napoleon had consciously flouted public sentiment when he entered earlier wars.

The exact impact of public opinion on Napoleon's foreign policy decisions is difficult to judge. Professor Case suggests that this influence was too great for the good of the nation or the regime. He feels that in matters of foreign policy both then and now, the men at the top are usually more competent and far-sighted than the masses; that in such matters, "Jacques and his fellow compatriots . . . can only help in making blunders." Whether or not this rather pessimistic view is justified, Mr. Case's book deserves to be praised—and, better still, to be read. It is a valuable addition to the scholarly literature on the Second Empire.

GORDON WRIGHT

University of Oregon

MUNDY, JOHN HINE. Liberty and Political Power in Toulouse, 1050-1230. Pp. xiii, 402. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $6.50.

This is the story of a mediaeval town in the period of its youth and vigor. While Mr. Mundy's interest centers in the political institutions of Toulouse, he devotes sufficient attention to its economic and social structure to make the political history intelligible. He also sets Toulouse in its wider background in relation to the county of Toulouse and the country-side about the town. In short the reader feels that he understands the place of Toulouse in mediaeval society as well as the society of Toulouse itself.

Mr. Mundy has achieved the unusual feat of making a contribution to historical literature at two different levels. The text is well-written in a lively style and contains the minimum of unexplained technical terms. A general reader who wants to know what a French mediaeval town which developed in the Mediterranean tradition was like can read this book with both pleasure and profit. It will be a boon to the teacher of courses in mediaeval history. We have good works in English on northern towns, but nothing on southern towns outside Italy. At the same time the notes and appendices make this a valuable study for the specialist. In addition to extensive and detailed notes showing the sources for the statements made in the text Mr. Mundy supplies lists of officials and the full text of many important documents. He has produced a book that will stand for a long time as the standard monograph on Toulouse.

It is impossible in the space at my disposal to give more than a very meagre outline of the development of Toulouse as told by Mr. Mundy. First came the growth of the town with the aid of the count and the lay and ecclesiastical lords who lived in it. The Gregorian reforms brought a decrease in the secular authority of the ecclesiastical lords. Then bit by bit the lay aristocracy reduced the power of the count. By the end of the twelfth century the patrician consuls were masters of Toulouse. Early in the thirteenth century for reasons not clear to me and I suspect not clear to Mr. Mundy the consular government became more democratic or at least less patrician. During this same period it tightened its hold on the town government at the expense of the remnants of the count's authority and the privileges of the private jurisdictions within the walls. Mr. Mundy ends his account before the town felt the heavy hand of Alphonse of Poitou who brought a restoration of the count's authority.

This is a book that everyone interested in the Middle Ages should read. The more time and care he or she can give to its perusal, the greater will be the reward, but a rapid reading of the text alone is eminently worth while.

SIDNEY PAINTER

Johns Hopkins University

LOWIE, ROBERT H. Toward Understanding Germany. Pp. ix, 396. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1954. $6.00.

The Germans are neither a racial nor a political but a linguistic unit which, consequently, includes the Austrians and the Swiss. To show the heterogeneous nature of this unit established in the Introduction, Professor Lowie discusses German particularism and social stratification. A major objective of his chapters on German family types is the refutation of the stereotyped tyrannical German father. In the last part of his book, central problems of contemporary Germany are tackled: anti-Semitism, Nazism, and democracy.

The great merit of this work lies in its exhibition of numerous facts which often are illuminating and corrective. Its crucial weakness is its failure to connect these facts in a way which would contribute much more significantly toward understanding Germany. In the author's passionate effort to be fair, his subject matter tends to disappear: the Swiss family is as patriarchal as the German, or more so (p. 252); "anti-Semitism cannot be regarded as a specifically German phenomenon" (p. 324). When he discusses German behavior toward Jews during the Nazi period, episodes involving help and risk strike one less as instances of human greatness and dignity than as entries in a ledger. The effect is "on the one hand, on the other," which may convey "objectivity" but keeps the subject matter at best in the museum. As elsewhere, the tabu on value judgments excludes from analysis what can only be perceived by means of them—notably political and moral phenomena. Judgment intrudes anyway either directly or in the form of questionable parallels (pp. 67, 353), or in the obscure assertion that in World War II "naturally towns without military interest escaped" destruction (p. 166), or, in its particular context, in a reference to the "countrymen of Kant and Goethe . . . a highly cultured nation" (p. 347).

At the end of the book, the author expresses the expectation that comparative studies of other Western European cultures will provide us with "a sounder factual basis for dividing . . . [their common] area into cultural subdivisions than the inexpensive one of national or even linguistic boundaries." His book would have contributed much more toward this aim and gone far beyond being a mine of information if he had transcended classificatory ethnology toward analysis in terms of social relations, culture patterns, and configurations, even national character, but above all, politics and morals.

KURT H. WOLFF

Ohio State University

HOCKING, WILLIAM ERNEST. Experiment in Education: What We Can Learn from Teaching Germany. Pp. xvi, 303. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1954. $5.00.

Developments of such magnitude have taken place in the world during recent years that it is difficult to pause to examine experiences, even when they are as significant as that of the United States and its Allies in the occupation of Germany. Professor Hocking performs a useful service when he reminds us that there is much to be gained from a consideration of what has gone on in Germany since 1945, though he seems, to this reviewer, to assume too much when he maintains that the time has arrived when a definitive evaluation of American occupation policies and programs can be made—at least another decade will be required before it will be possible to determine with any degree of certainty the full impact.

While the announced purpose of Professor Hocking's book is impressive, serious students are likely to be disappointed with his finished product. The inclusion of a considerable amount of reminiscing drawn from many years of teaching and travel in the United States, the Far East, and Europe makes for a certain interest, but it also confuses the picture. The early section of the book, which deals with the American record in Germany, is based on a brief visit to Germany in 1948 and on a formal directives, and reports. A casual reader would perhaps find such a treatment useful, but a serious student discerns many gaps, inaccuracies, and unsupported generalizations. It is difficult to conclude that the analysis which Professor Hocking offers constitutes an adequate base for evaluating the justification of American efforts to assist the Germans in reconstructing their system of education. One rather gains the impression that the author has not even attempted to examine the involved record carefully, difficult as that might be on the basis of a brief visit and consultation of the directives, but has started out with the thesis that military defeat imposed upon the Germans was all that could be justified in the way of an Allied program in the education field.

The second section of the book purports to evaluate American education in terms of the occupation experience in Germany. Actually, it is difficult to discover much evidence of a serious and dispassionate effort to perform such a task. The author uses what he maintains to be the American record in Germany to support his long-held ideas that the main basis of university education should be historical surveys, philosophy, mathematical physics, economics, and law. The social sciences are discarded because of their "ambiguity." He concludes, on the curious evidence of experiences of a friend and presumably his own as a student in Germany in 1902, that German universities actually did a better job of giving an insight into social, political, and economic forces in human society through outstanding professors in philosophy, history, and other fields than American universities can claim to do.

HAROLD ZINK

Ohio State University

LANGE, M. G. Totalitäre Erziehung: Das Erziehungssystem der Sowjetzone Deutschlands. Schriften des Instituts für Politische Wissenschaft, Vol. 3. Pp. xxviii, 432. Frankfurt am Main: Verlag der Frankfurter Hefte, 1954. DM 21.80.

This is a scholarly study of totalitarian education in the Soviet Zone of Germany, written by a schoolman who taught under the East German Republic and edited the official educational periodical before emigrating to West Germany. The author is an authority in the social philosophies of contemporary education, a master of the German and Russian pedagogical literature, and a writer able to present an esoteric subject to the Western world. A cynic might, however, add that the first draft of this book was actually written behind the Iron Curtain and therefore makes out the best possible case for education under an aggressive and terroristic dictatorship. The Institute for Political Science, Berlin, is to be commended for publishing this volume as the third of its series of studies.

The development of the rule of the Communist dictatorship over the East German school system identified education as the expression of the will and goal of the state and the fountainhead of patriotism for youth. From the Soviet Union were imported the thought shibboleths, the dialectic of authority and freedom, Marxist semantics, in fact, the great directives for "a pseudo-rational educational system" and "an anti-fascist democratic order." The majority of the school bureaucracy had to be oriented toward Communism. Only a few teachers among those considered Marxists had really studied Marx and Engels, Lenin and Stalin, and Soviet pedagogy as a party science. An elaborate system had to be worked out in order to catch teachers who were concealed enemies of Stalinism. Finally, an effective public school organization was taken over by a handful of Moscow-trained educators with the support of the dictatorship.

In his survey of the Russian science of education, the author points out that the Anglo-American Dalton plan was adopted with modifications in 1924, the project method in 1930, and other important contributions of "reform pedagogy" before the great renunciation of 1936. The survey of "totalitarian psychology" is especially timely now that the dictatorship suddenly demands increased emphasis on research into creativity. History has, however, consistently covered the important developments in the Western world since the seventeenth century with emphasis on the English revolutions, the American War of Independence, the French Revolution, and the European revolutions of 1848.

Since the Communist state does not tolerate any independent influence of science, religion, art, or pressure groups, there emerged a new type of a pseudo-rational educational system. To be sure, it was tinged with medievalism and Russian imperialism, especially in "the rules for students," "the seven principles" of pedagogy, and the encyclopedic "student note book" which every scholar at regular intervals must show to his parents. Professor Lange states that the acute danger to the free world is the determination of the totalitarian state to go beyond the complete submission of youth to a rigorous training of the younger generation as devoted fighters for the dictatorship.

RALPH HASWELL LUTZ
Stanford University

SWEET-ESCOTT, BICKHAM. Greece: A Political and Economic Survey, 1939-1953. Pp. viii, 207. New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1954. $4.00.

This book is an authoritative description of economic and political affairs in Greece from the beginnings of World War II in 1939, through the years of Communist-inspired guerrilla warfare after the war, and into the period of recovery to 1953. It is studded with facts gleaned from most of the none-too-plentiful and secondary materials available in English. The author himself spent a period of time in Greece and was in close contact with the resistance movement during German occupation as a member of the British Force 133 Mediterranean Expeditionary Force.

The intricate complexities of the resistance movement are traced as they are reflected in postwar politics and international affairs. The division of the resistance forces into the Nationalist and Communist elements after the Germans had gone, and their war with one another, is the modern Greek tragedy in which many patriotic citizens were unwittingly trapped and which even now divides the nation underneath. But Greece is still a free and sovereign country thanks to British and American economic and military aid without which it would have surely been joined to her Russian satellite neighbors to the north. The West, because it has Greece and Turkey on its side, still can contain the Cominform in the eastern Mediterranean and the Near East.

Twenty-five hundred years ago, Herodotus said: "Poverty is the inheritance of Hellas from of old." How much more true this is in modern times after four years of German occupation and four more of revolution the author sets down in bristling detail but with clarity. How utter the devastation was cannot be learned in a book, one must see in the flesh the ruins of countless villages, the absolute poverty of the masses in Greece, and the total absence of facilities for living that Western people regard as basic. But things are improving in Greece, if but slowly and haltingly, impeded as improvement is by the whirling gyrations of Greek politics.

If there is any weakness in this fine account of the problems of modern Greece it is in the absence of an evaluation of the structure and operation of the Greek government distinct from its politics. It is very important to know that the Greek state is highly centralized, so much so that it is top-heavy, and that local government has been strangled almost to death since the days of the first Venizelos. They say in Greece: Athens is Athens, and Greece is Athens, and today this is almost entirely true, and thereby hangs a tale. The nation would be much stronger if the national government would decentralize some of its powers to its local units. But this, too, may come in time, and here, too, there has been improvement.

Altogether, Mr. Sweet-Escott has written a very good book and has made a substantial contribution to the knowledge of Greece today that is available to us in the West.

HAROLD F. ALDERFER
The Pennsylvania State University

LUKACS, JOHN A. The Great Powers and Eastern Europe. Pp. xii, 878. New York: American Book Company [c. 1953]. $7.50.

After World War I the area extending from Finland to Greece and comprising the Baltic region, eastern Central Europe, and the Balkans, was divided into thirteen small nation states, enjoying for a brief time the illusion of independence. Too weak and distracted to shape their own destinies they became pawns and prizes in the power politics of their larger and more powerful neighbors. The political relations between the states of this area and the Great Powers of Europe is the theme of this book. From 1917 to 1934 they enjoyed the illusion of independence; a diplomatic revolution occurred between 1934 and 1938 with the revival of German power and the withdrawal of France and Britain from the area; from 1938 to 1941, a contest ensued between Nazi Germany and Communist Russia for mastery of the region, ending in the "War of Wars"; the wartime domination of this region by Hitler ended in 1944 as the "Russian Era" began; the imposition by Russia of satellite status upon the area, excluding Finland and Greece, is the theme of the "Epilogue" covering the years 1946-1952.

Post-mortems are painful and the one presented in this study is especially so because of its twin themes—the abandonment of Eastern Europe to Hitler by France and Britain between 1934 and 1938, and the abandonment of the same region and peoples to the Soviets by Britain and the United States between 1943 and 1946. The seeds of catastrophe were sown in the first period, and the harvest reaped in the second.

A commendable book in many respects, Lukacs' work possesses, in the reviewer's opinion, certain weaknesses: the approach is almost completely that of diplomatic narrative; the presentation of American policy makers as naïve and purblind, or worse, is overdone; by excluding all war issues and aims excepting those concerned with Eastern Europe, a highly distorted view of British and American policies is produced; and exceedingly complicated narrative materials are presented in an overly complicated pattern of organization. In the strength column one should note: the exploitation of a great quantity of relevant documentary and memoir material; the presentation of little-known domestic political developments in these thirteen states during their bondage to the Axis and their "liberation" by the Soviets; the author's familiarity with the politics and personalities of Eastern Europe; and the generous bibliographical notes and the enlightening commentary upon the sources. Finally, the author has produced an interesting and valuable work. If somewhat one-sided, it assuredly presents a challenging thesis.

ORON J. HALE

University of Virginia

NELSON, GEORGE R. (Ed.), assisted by AUNE MÄKINEN-OLLINEN, SVERRIR THORB-JÖRNSSON, KAARE SALVESEN, and GÖRAN TEGNER. Freedom and Welfare: Social Patterns in the Northern Countries of Europe. Pp. xiii, 540. Copenhagen, Denmark: Ejnar Munksgaard. (Sponsored by the Ministries of Social Affairs of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden), 1953. $6.50.

Sponsorship of this volume by the Scandinavian Ministries of Social Affairs effects a circumspection not entirely conducive to impartial examination of the problems of welfare or freedom. Within this limitation, however, the volume's authors and editors have accomplished a remarkable weaving of infinite detail into a comprehensible whole. Readers familiar with Social Sweden will recognize the model and appreciate added data on the other countries.

Criticism of the volume is difficult both because of its limitation and the extensive, almost encyclopediac, information it contains. Any government agency would be incapable of impartiality in the long debate over establishment of the Scandinavian welfare system, but on "social patterns" no one could expect a fuller descriptive treatment, especially from the legislative and political side. The book's language is often technical and shows marks of translation in its idiom and phrasing. But why carp at these details when the book fills a gap made obvious by the recent new edition of Social Sweden?

The contents of this handsome volume are of interest to a variety of persons, whether inspired or not by Marquis Childs. For the labor economist there are sections on labor relations, collective bargaining, the labor courts, and problems of full employment; for the sociologist chapters or parts on the family, treatment and care of children, health and rehabilitation, and housing. The economist will be rewarded by some quite new details of recent legislation on social security, and the political scientist and historian will appreciate the entire volume for its depiction of phases of contemporary Scandinavian life.

Emphasis on welfare and freedom focuses attention on the tradition of "welfarism" in Scandinavia which began at the century's turn and which has continuously been extended. Recent legislation concerning welfare, especially in Norway, Denmark, and Sweden, has been based on foundation established long ago by Conservative and Liberal parties. "Creeping socialism" began with them and Socialists twenty or thirty years later broadened and improved on these basic principles. The missing debate on these principles dismays the political scientist and the historian who desire closer examination of fertile periods of inception of programs, such as the extensive system of Scandinavia, which has been noticed and praised the world over.

An excellent index and brief bibliography for non-Scandinavians accompany the volume; the format is luxurious, the pictures beautifully illustrate the text, and the printing is superb. The five Scandinavian countries are justifiably proud of their co-operative effort, and the editors deserve credit for their difficult but rewarding task.

RAYMOND E. LINDGREN
Occidental College

STURMTHAL, ADOLF. Unity and Diversity in European Labor: An Introduction to Contemporary Labor Movements. Pp. 237. Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press, 1953. $3.75.

As the title indicates, the author, who has been associated for many years with European movements, sees in the European trade unions a rich diversity of organization, ideology, and problems. Yet, if compared with trade unionism in the United States, European labor shows a different spirit which may make it appear to the American observer as more unified than it is. These common features are partly due, as Sturmthal demonstrates, to the feudalism of the past which fixed the status of everybody within a hierarchy as a member of a well defined class, in contrast to the American spirit of getting ahead. Opposition to the social degradation of the worker in feudalism, and the wish to reverse the social order were strong motivating forces at the origin of the European labor movement. Thus feudalism determined the class consciousness of the European worker and enlightened absolutism convinced him that political power was the key instrument of social transformation. Therefore, the close alliance of all European trade union movements, with the exception of the French, with political parties developed. Political unionism, says the author, is the fate of European labor. Another uniform feature, the influence of the intellectual on the European trade unions, is likewise ascribed to the legacy of feudalism and may be expected to diminish with the progress of democracy.

In opposition to Selig Perlman, who contributes the ideological and political elements in the European labor movement to the influence of intellectuals—an opinion likewise held by Lenin—the author describes how German workers regarded the revisionist movement as a revolt of moderate intellectuals against radical workers, an attempt to lead the Socialists into "weak compromises" with capitalism.

However, far more striking than such uniform features is the diversity of the European trade union movements. A short sketch of the historical background, the multifariousness of traditions, of economic, political and social conditions, shows the roots of this variety and explains the affiliation of trade unions to political movements. Relationship to socialism, syndicalism, and Communism is discussed. Working class internationalism, both political and within trade unionism, is dealt with from its beginning to the present, and the role of American labor in the postwar international movements explained. This is followed by a presentation of present day unionism and a discussion of two of its burning problems, collective bargaining in a full employment society and the union function in nationalized industries.

In a simple, lucid way some developments are brilliantly presented, especially the Neo-Marxism of German labor and the rejection of Communism by Continental Social Democracy whose adherents claim true descent from Marx.

This book, which is the outcome of classes the authors gave for members of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, is an excellent contribution to workers' education. It is written for a reader who wants to familiarize himself with the essentials of a situation rather than with its details. It gives a vivid account of the atmosphere in which European labor functions.

FRIEDA WUNDERLICH
New School for Social Research

OTHER COUNTRIES

SHAH, K. T. The Promise That Is New China. Pp. viii, 342. Bombay: Vora & Co., 1953. $2.00.

Since the publication of this book, the author, Professor K. T. Shah, well known in India for his comprehensive if controversial scholarship, has died. The painstaking thoroughness which distinguished his earlier writings is evident in this book which is the outcome of a tour in China undertaken on the occasion of the May Day celebrations of 1952 at Peking. The writer was one of a group of Indian Trade Union delegates invited to participate in these celebrations by the All-China Federation of Labor. As such, he was an official guest, subject to the limitations of an official and guided tour.

Nevertheless, Professor Shah, with the eye of a trained observer and with his considerable economic background, saw perhaps more deeply into the Chinese scene than most of his colleagues. The book is in the form of a diary and would have been the better for more careful editing. It is diffuse and in parts unduly discursive. It also suffers from being overloaded with a minutiae of trivial detail. Inevitably also it suffers from the defects of a day to day account which in the best of circumstances must seem superficial.

There is little attempt made to assess and analyze the achievements, such as they are, or the totalitarian pattern of the Communist dictatorship. Professor Shah is content to recite the facts as he saw them and as he was told them by his Chinese guides through the familiar red litany of "facts and figures." To these Professor Shah adds his own not inconsiderable academic knowledge. The picture which emerges appears factual but in the Communist context need not necessarily be so.

Had Professor Shah lived longer, it is possible that he might have found time to collate his facts and figures and present the Chinese scene not through the shifting kaleidoscope of a daily diary but from the objective standpoint of a spectator and analyst.

FRANK MORAES

Bombay, India

BEN GURION, DAVID. The Rebirth and Destiny of Israel. Edited and translated from the Hebrew under the supervision of Mordekhai Nurock. Pp. xv, 539. New York: Philosophical Library, 1953. $10.00.

This is a remarkable volume, but a strange volume. The language is deeply moving and replete with the noblest quotations from the Hebrew prophets, and from Ben Gurion himself! But to the reviewer, filled with admiration for the spiritual claims of Judaism, but lacking in appreciation for the inaccuracies and embroiling attitudes of current Zionism, this is a strange volume.

Perhaps it is inevitable that Ben Gurion, who for almost half a century has lived and worked for the consummation of the political state of Israel, should see only moral purpose and peace through the establishment of this sovereign state. But these purposes appear to be monopolized by Israel and Jewry. "We fall short of other nations, being few, and less imperial, but in intellectual gifts we admit none our better." "Moral strength has made us what we are to-day." "Love thy neighbor as thyself" this is the one and only key to the legislation and laws of Israel."

Given such superiority for Israel, it follows that others must be quite different. As for the British, although there are passages that admit that "British officials are not all our enemies," nevertheless the undercurrent of hatred against them constantly appears. As for the Arabs, Ben Gurion's scorn is great. "The sloth of our Arab periphery will be a drag upon our forward-looking system." The destiny of Israel is rebirth, but apparently there is no such chance for the renaissance that has already appeared among the Arabs!

We are told of Israel's desire for peace with her Arab neighbors, but the acts of recent years have been odd if that is the goal. "Have we not," declares Ben Gurion, "held out our hands in peace to all who dwell with us and on our borders, since our third homecoming? We will give all possible help to the peace envoy of the United Nations, but not for peace at any price." And as for Count Bernadotte, that great peace envoy, there is only a single mention of him in all the 539 pages. Indeed, there is no mention in the entire book of the murder of the impartial United Nations envoy, Count Bernadotte, by Jewish terrorists in Jerusalem.

For the non-Jewish layman one of the most interesting chapters is "Mission and Dedication," an historical outline of the cultural and religious contacts of the Jewish people. "We are now at odds not only with our Arab neighbors," said Ben Gurion, "but to a certain extent with the greater part of the world organized in the United Nations. The issue is Jerusalem." That "we must be prepared for a protracted spell of peacelessness" has a ring of reality.

To Ben Gurion and his fellow Zionists, this volume sets the charge to struggle and ultimate victory, regardless of what happens to the rest of the world. To the non-Zionist, whether Christian, Jew, or Moslem, it raises doubts because of its many inconsistencies and contradictions. This is an impressive but strange volume!

EDGAR J. FISHER

Amherst, Virginia

GAMBLE, SIDNEY D. Ting Hsien: A North China Rural Community. Pp. xxv, 472. New York: Institute of Pacific Relations, 1954. $6.50.

Mr. Gamble, whose pioneering research in Peking is well known to students of Chinese sociology and economics, directed the studies of rural life carried out in Ting Hsien between 1926 and 1933. The surveys and projects completed there in co-operation with the Mass Education Movement make of that "model" county in Hôpei probably the most thoroughly studied area of its size in China. The major results were published in Chinese in the mid-thirties, when they had a salutary effect on the development of the social sciences and of rural reconstruction in China. Mr. Gamble has now performed a valuable service by making available in one English volume the full results of the research program he so ably conceived, including data heretofore unpublished in any language.

The findings concern varied facets of demography, agricultural economics, domestic budgets, public finance, village industry, governmental structure, family, religion, and education. Among the more significant data presented are those relating to family and marriage and their economic correlates. It should be noted that good use is made of historical material. The placement of Ting Hsien, 1926-33, in the stream of Chinese history and the attention paid to aspects of culture change lend a welcome dynamic quality to the volume. The most obvious deficiencies of the research program and of the book lie in the unconcern with cultural depth and integration. The reader is presented with intriguing statistics, intelligently discussed, but they do not add up to the way of life of the Ting Hsien inhabitants. The series of projects unfortunately did not include any intensive anthropological community studies to bring the functioning culture into focus. As it is, many questions of interest were apparently not asked of the data. The fascinating texts and summaries of folk songs, plays and proverbs, for instance, have not been analyzed for the light they can obviously throw on cultural norms.

It is ungracious, however, to raise objections which are largely irrelevant to the original objectives of the research. The field workers wanted a statistically valid picture of the major social and economic characteristics of the families in the hsien, in order more effectively to develop and carry out a program of rural reconstruction. This practical aim was largely achieved by the survey techniques employed, and in the process, extensive data were gathered that are of great value to Western students of China today. The wealth of material in this book, presented precisely and dispassionately, is somewhat overpowering for the general reader; it is made more accessible to the specialist by an introductory summary pointing up the more significant findings in various fields, by well presented tables, and by an adequate index.

G. WILLIAM SKINNER

Cornell University

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Sir:

The objectionable features of the review, by Samuel Koenig, of Alfred M. Lilienthal's book, What Price Israel, in your March issue, should perhaps most properly be pointed out to you by the author. This organization, however, has an interest in what Dr. Koenig calls "an objective evaluation" of the issues raised by the establishment of the State of Israel. It seems to us that in his review Dr. Koenig himself displays an attitude which is anything but objective.

Dr. Koenig compares the relationship of American Jews to Israel with that of American Czechs, Poles, and Lithuanians "toward their countries of origin" after World War I. In thus comparing Jews, many of whom regard themselves solely as a religious community, with Czechs, Poles, and Lithuanians, who are nationality groups, he reveals his acceptance of a basic Zionist thesis. Objectivity would at least have required noting that not all Jews consider themselves members of a "Jewish" nation, that probably the majority of them consider themselves nationals exclusively of the countries where they live.

As for Israel being the "country of origin" of American Jews, Dr. Koenig would have a difficult time proving this. Six years ago the State did not exist. If he means the ancient state of Biblical times, Christians and Moslems are equally entitled to think of it as their "country of origin."

Later, Dr. Koenig speaks of "the Jews, like other ethnic groups in America." Here again, Dr. Koenig accepts the Zionist view of Jews and ignores the large number of American Jews who regard themselves as Jews only by religion.

Dr. Koenig professes skepticism concerning the charge that American Zionists may be more concerned with Israeli than with American national interests. Yet it has been made clear that American national interests now call for "impartiality" in relation to the Middle East. Two recent speeches by Assistant Secretary of State Henry A. Byroade, chief of the section on Near Eastern, South Asian and African Affairs, have spelled out in detail the vital need for such a policy. The second of these speeches has been described as reflecting Administration views—an Administration elected to office by an overwhelming majority of the American people. Yet for Zionists to support such a policy would force them to stop being Zionists who are, by definition, committed to the upbuilding of but one of the states of the Middle East.

Mr. Lilienthal's book may not be the "objective evaluation of an historical event and its implications for America and American Jews" which Dr. Koenig would have preferred. But Dr. Koenig's review can itself certainly not be characterized as an objective evaluation of that book.

VICTOR RAPHAELS

Assistant Executive Director

The American Council for Judaism

Dear Sir:

Since the remarks regarding my review of Lilienthal's book, for reasons not quite clear, do not come from the author but from an officer of the American Council for Judaism, I shall address my reply to the latter and the organization he represents.

In comparing American Jews with American Czechs, Poles, and Lithuanians, I am not subscribing to "a basic Zionist thesis" but am stating a view widely accepted by sociologists, anthropologists, and other social scientists, namely: that the Jews are best classified as an ethnic, cultural, or nationality group. As such they are quite comparable to those groups. Mr. Raphaels and members of the Council could easily ascertain this by referring to almost any modern work on ethnic or minority groups, particularly one published in the United States. Mr. Raphals and other members of the Council have, of course, a right to hold the view that Jews are merely a religious group, but they should be aware of the fact that this is a basic Council thesis and not a scientifically arrived at or objective view.

Nowhere in my review are the Jews referred to as a nation. Neither is it anywhere stated that Israel is their country of origin. What is implied is an interest on the part of Jews in this country and elsewhere in Palestine, now Israel, which is comparable to that shared by the above-mentioned and other American ethnic groups regarding the countries of their origin.

As to what serves the best interests of America in the Middle East (or elsewhere) there is a division of opinion, which, in a democracy, is not only permissible but desirable. In taking the view that America's interests are best served by a policy favorable to Israel which, demonstrably, is the only democratic state in the Middle East, an American does not necessarily put the interests of another country above those of his own. On the other hand, in taking the opposite view, or in advocating a pro-Arab policy, one does not automatically become a loyal or patriotic American as is implied throughout Lilienthal's book.

SAMUEL KOENIG

Brooklyn College

OTHER BOOKS

- ADAMS, RAMON F. Six-Gun & Saddle Leather: A Bibliography of Books and Pamphlets on Western Outlaws and Gunmen. Pp. xiii, 426. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. $12.50.
- ADAMS, WALTER (Ed.). The Structure of American Industry: Some Case Studies. Pp. xvii, 590. Rev. ed. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $5.75.
- ALEXANDER, W. P. Education in England: The National System—How It Works. Pp. xi, 147. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1954. $2.50.

- ANDREW, THURMAN. Property, Profits and People. Pp. vi, 242. Washington, D. C.: Progress Press, 1954. $3.75.
- ANSHEN, MELVIN, and FRANCIS D. WORMUTH. Private Enterprise and Public Policy. Pp. xiv, 742. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $6.75.
- Assassination of President Lincoln and the Trial of the Conspirators, The*. The Courtroom Testimony as Originally Compiled by Benn Pitman. With an Introduction by Philip Van Doren Stern. Pp. xxiv, 421. Facsimile ed. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1954. $7.50.
- BARRELL, JOSEPH. A Philosophical Study of the Human Mind. Pp. xii, 575. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $6.00.
- BAUMOL, WILLIAM J., and LESTER V. CHANDLER. Economic Processes and Policies. Pp. viii, 690. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $5.75.
- BAUS, HERBERT M. Publicity in Action. (American Series of Public Relations Books, Rex F. Harlow, Editor.) Pp. xii, 335. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $4.50.
- BEASLEY, CHRISTINE. Democracy in the Home. Pp. xiv, 242. New York: Association Press, 1954. $3.50.
- BERNDT, RONALD M., and CATHERINE H. BERNDT. The First Australians. Pp. 144. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $4.75.
- BILL, ALFRED HOYT. A House Called Morven: Its Role in American History, 1701-1954. Pp. xvi, 206. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1954. $3.00.
- BLANK, DAVID M. The Volume of Residential Construction, 1889-1950. Pp. xii, 99. New York: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1954. $1.50.
- BOGARDUS, EMORY S. Sociology. Pp. xv, 616. 4th ed. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $5.00.
- Book Review Digest, The*. Forty-ninth Annual Cumulation, March 1953 to February 1954 inclusive. Edited by Mertice M. James and Dorothy Brown. Pp. ii, 1157. New York: H. W. Wilson Company, 1954. No price.
- BOWEN, HAROLD G. Ships, Machinery, and Mossbacks: The Autobiography of a Naval Engineer. Pp. ix, 397. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1954. $6.00.
- BURT, (SIR) CYRIL. The Causes and Treatment of Backwardness. Pp. 128. New York: Philosophical Library, 1953. $3.75.
- BRYSON, LYMAN, LOUIS FINKELSTEIN, R. M. MACIVER, and RICHARD MCKEON (Eds.). Symbols and Values: An Initial Study.

- Thirteenth Symposium of the Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion. Pp. xviii, 827. New York: Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion in Their Relation to the Democratic Way of Life, Inc. (distributed by Harper & Brothers, New York), 1954. $6.00.
- CAIRNCROSS, A. K. (Ed.). The Scottish Economy: A Statistical Account of Scottish Life by Members of the Staff of Glasgow University. Pp. xvi, 320. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954. $6.00.
- CAROTHERS, J. C. The African Mind in Health and Disease: A Study in Ethnopsychiatry. Pp. 177. Geneva: World Health Organization (Palais des Nations). Distributed in the U. S. by Columbia University Press, 1953. $2.00.
- CHAMBLISS, ROLLIN. Social Thought from Harurabi to Comte. Pp. ix, 469. New York: Dryden Press, 1954. $5.00.
- CHEEVER, DANIEL S., and H. FIELD HAVILAND, JR. Organization for Peace: International Organization in World Affairs. Edited by Dayton D. McKean. Pp. x, 917. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1954. $7.00.
- Civil-Military Relations: An Annotated Bibliography, 1940-1952*. Prepared Under the Direction of the Committee on Civil-Military Relations Research of the Social Science Research Council. Pp. xiv, 140. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $2.00.
- COWAN, L. GRAY. A History of the School of International Affairs and Associated Area Institutes, Columbia University. Pp. vii, 106. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $2.25.
- DAVID, RENÉ, and JOHN N. HAZARD. Le Droit soviétique. Vol. I: Les Données fondamentales du droit soviétique, by René David. Vol. II: Le Droit et l'Évolution de la société dans l'U.R.S.S., by John N. Hazard. (Les Systèmes de droit contemporains, published by l'Institut de Droit Comparé de l'Université de Paris.) Paris: Librairie Générale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, 1954. No price.
- Documents Diplomatiques Français (1871-1914)*. (First Series [1871-1900], Vol. XIII. 16 octobre 1896—31 décembre 1897.) Ministère des Affaires Étrangères. Commission de publication des documents relatifs aux origines de la guerre de 1914. Pp. xxxvi, 677. Paris: Imprimerie Nationale: Alfred Costes, Libraire-Éditeur, 1953. No price.
- DUE, JOHN F. Government Finance: An Economic Analysis. Pp. xviii, 562. Homewood, Ill.: Richard D. Irwin, 1954. $6.00.

- ERGANG, ROBERT. Europe Since Waterloo. Pp. xx, 836. Boston: D. C. Heath and Company, 1954. $6.25.
- Federal Constitution of Switzerland, The*. Translation and Commentary by Christopher Hughes. With German Text. Pp. vii, 223. New York: Oxford University Press (published in England at the Clarendon Press, Oxford), 1954. $4.00.
- Federal Reserve System, The: Purpose and Functions*. Pp. xiii, 208. 3rd ed. Washington, D. C.: Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, 1954. No charge.
- FISHER, ERNEST M., and ROBERT M. FISHER. Urban Real Estate. Pp. x, 502. College ed. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1954. $5.00.
- FOURQUEVAUX, RAYMOND DE BECCARIE DE PAVIE SIEUR DE. The Instructions sur le Faict de la Guerre. Edited by G. Dickinson. Pp. cxxxvi, 111 (two sides to each page), and cxxxviii-cxlvi. London: University of London. The Athlone Press (distributed by John de Graff, New York), 1954. $8.00.
- FRASCONA, JOSEPH L. Business Law: Text, Statutes, and Glossary. Pp. xii, 961. Homewood, Ill.: Richard D. Irwin, 1954. No price.
- FRIEDMAN, PHILIP (Ed.). Martyrs and Fighters: The Epic of the Warsaw Ghetto. Pp. 327. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1954. $4.00.
- GALDSTON, IAGO (Ed.). Beyond the Germ Theory: The Roles of Deprivation and Stress in Health and Disease. Pp. viii, 182. New York: Health Education Council, 1954. $4.00.
- GOLDSMITH, RAYMOND W. The Share of Financial Intermediaries in National Wealth and National Assets, 1900-1949. (Studies in Capital Formation and Financing, Occasional Paper No. 42.) Pp. ix, 120. New York: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1954. $1.50 paper.
- GRAHAM, GERALD S. (Ed.). The Walker Expedition to Quebec, 1711. (Publications of the Navy Records Society, Vol. XCIV.) Pp. xx, 462. Greenwich, England: Navy Records Society, Royal Naval College, 1953. 45s.
- GRUNBAUM-BALLIN, P., and RENÉE PETIT. Les Conflits collectifs du travail et leur règlement dans le monde contemporain: Grèves, procédures de conciliation et d'arbitrage. Pp. iii, 324. Paris: Librairie du Recueil Sirey, 1954. No price.
- GUTKIND, E. A. Community and Environment: A Discourse on Social Ecology. Fore-

- word by Martin Buber. Pp. xiv, 81. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $3.75.
- HALL, COURTNEY ROBERT. History of American Industrial Science. Pp. xix, 453. New York: Library Publishers, 1954. $4.95.
- HAMMOND, HAROLD EARL. A Commoner's Judge: The Life and Times of Charles Patrick Daly. With an Introduction by Allan Nevins. Pp. 456. Boston: Christopher Publishing House, 1954. $5.00.
- HANSON, ARTHUR W., and JEROME B. COHEN. Personal Finance: Principles and Case Problems. Pp. xi, 682. Homewood, Ill.: Richard D. Irwin, 1954. $6.00.
- HARRISON, DAVID. Tudor England. Vol. I. Pp. xv, 204. London: Cassell and Company, 1953. $14.00.
- HOWELLS, WILLIAM. Back of History: The Story of Our Own Origins. Pp. 384. Garden City, New York: Doubleday & Company, 1954. No price.
- INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE. Thirty-seventh Session. Geneva, 1954. Report of the Director-General. First Item on the Agenda. Report I. Pp. iv, 144. Geneva: International Labour Office (distributed in U. S. from Washington, D. C. office), 1954. $1.00.
- Internationales Jahrbuch der Politik, 1954*. Pp. 176. Munich: Isar Verlag, 1954. DM 9.
- KARVE, MRS. IRRAWATI. Kinship Organisation in India. (Deccan College Monograph Series, No. 11.) Pp. viii, 304. Poona, India: Deccan College, Post-graduate and Research Institute, 1953. No price.
- KATZ, DANIEL, DORWIN CARTWRIGHT, SAMUEL ELDERSVELD, and ALFRED MCCLUNG LEE. Public Opinion and Propaganda. Pp. xx, 779. New York: Dryden Press, 1954. $6.25.
- KESSELRING, ALBERT. Kesselring: A Soldier's Record. With an Introduction by S. L. A. Marshall. Pp. xviii, 381. New York: William Morrow & Company, 1954. $5.00.
- KLEM, MARGARET C., and MARGARET F. McKIEVER. Management and Union Health and Medical Programs. Pp. ix, 276. Washington, D. C.: U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Public Health Service, Division of Occupational Health, 1953. Order Superintendent of Documents. $1.00.
- KUCZYNSKI, R. R. Demographic Survey of the British Colonial Empire. Vol. III: West Indian and American Territories. Pp. xiii, 497. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $11.20.
- LEIBENSTEIN, HARVEY. A Theory of Economic-Demographic Development. Pp. xi, 204. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1954. $4.00.
- LIPSON, LESLIE. The Great Issues of Politics: An Introduction to Political Science. Pp. xvi, 431. New York: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1954. $7.00.
- LOUGH, J. (Ed.). The Encyclopédie of Diderot and d'Alembert: Selected Articles. Pp. xvi, 227. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954. $3.00.
- LUMER, HYMAN. War Economy and Crisis. Pp. viii, 256. New York: International Publishers, 1954. $2.75, cloth; $1.75, paper.
- LUNT, HORACE G., and ASSOCIATES (Eds.). Harvard Slavic Studies. Vol. II. Pp. vi, 390. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $6.00.
- MCCAIN, PAUL M. The County Court in North Carolina Before 1750. Pp. vii, 163. Durham, N. C.: Duke University Press, 1954. $2.50.
- MCCULLOCH, J. R. (Ed.). Early English Tracts on Commerce. Pp. xv, 663. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954. $6.50.
- MACDONALD, AUSTIN F. Latin American Politics and Government. Pp. viii, 712. 2nd ed. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company, 1954. $6.00.
- MACLEAN, JOAN COYNE (Ed.). Africa: The Racial Issue. Vol. 26, No. 1, "The Reference Shelf." Pp. 198. New York: H. W. Wilson Company, 1954. $1.75.
- McLOUGHLIN, EMMETT. People's Padre: An Autobiography. Pp. 288. Boston: Beacon Press, 1954. $3.95.
- MALACH, VERNON W. International Cycles and Canada's Balance of Payments 1921-33. (Canadian Studies in Economics.) Pp. xii, 154. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1954. $3.00.
- MAMMUCARI, GIOVANNI. Note sull'amministrazione fiduciaria internazionale. Pp. 71. Rome: Tipografia dell'Orso. No date. Lire 350.
- Man Against Ignorance*. Pp. 81. Paris: UNESCO (distributed in the U. S. by Columbia University Press), 1953. 50 cents.
- MARTIN, JOHN BARTLOW. Break Down the Walls: American Prisons: Present, Past, and Future. Pp. vii, 310. New York: Ballantine Books, 1954. 50 cents paper, $3.50 cloth.
- MATTHEWS, MARK S. Guide to Community Action: A Sourcebook for Citizen Volunteers. Pp. xiv, 434. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $4.00.
- MAULDIN, W. PARKER, and DONALD S. AKERS. The Population of Poland. Pp. vi, 198. Washington, D. C.: U. S. Bureau of the Census, 1954. $1.00.
- MOLONEY, JAMES CLARK. Understanding the Japanese Mind. Pp. xix, 252. New York: Philosophical Library, [c. 1954]. $3.50.
- MURPHY, CAMPBELL G. Community Organization Practice. Edited by Marion Hathway. Pp. xii, 444. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1954. $4.50.
- NORDSKOG, JOHN ERIC (Ed.). Contemporary Social Reform Movements: Principles and Readings. Pp. x, 550. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1954. $6.00.
- OSGOOD, PHILLIPS ENDECOTT. Religion Without Magic. Pp. xi, 204. Boston: Beacon Press, 1954. $3.00.
- PATE, JAMES E. Local Government and Administration: Principles and Problems. Pp. ix, 595. New York: American Book Company, 1954. $5.75.
- PEARSON, GERALD H. J. Psychoanalysis and the Education of the Child. Pp. x, 357. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1954. $5.00.
- PLANTY, EARL G., and J. THOMAS FREESTON. Developing Management Ability: 600 Questions and Answers. Pp. xii, 447. New York: Ronald Press Company, 1954. $7.00.
- POSTAN, M. M. The Famulus: The Estate Labourer in the XIIIth and XIIIth Centuries. (The Economic History Review Supplements, No. 2.) Pp. 48. New York: Cambridge University Press (for the Economic History Society), No date. 7s. 6d.
- PREST, A. R., assisted by A. A. ADAMS. Consumers' Expenditure in the United Kingdom, 1900-1919. Pp. xiii, 196. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954. $7.50.
- ROCHE, JOHN P., and MURRAY S. STEDMAN, JR. The Dynamics of Democratic Government. Pp. ix, 445. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $5.00.
- ROEDER, WILLIAM S. (Ed.). Dictionary of European History. Pp. viii, 316. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $6.00.
- RUSSELL, WILLIAM HOWARD. My Diary North & South. Pp. xvi, 268. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $4.00.
- SALTER, W. E. G. The Measurement of Australian Industrial Production: An Examination of the Problems. (Department of Economics Publications, Series A, No. 3.) Pp. iv, 63. Nedlands, Western Australia: University of Western Australia Press, 1954. 5s.
- SCHANCK, RICHARD L. The Permanent Revolution in Science. Pp. xvi, 112. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $3.00.
- SCHMID, CALVIN F. Handbook of Graphic Presentation. Pp. viii, 316. New York: Ronald Press Company, 1954. $6.00.
- Socialpolitikken i Danmark siden socialreformen belyst ved udviklingen i de sociale udgifter. En undersøgelse ved Arbejds-Of Socialministeriets Statsvidenskabelige Konsulent. Pp. 183. Copenhagen: Adviser in Social Sciences to the Danish Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, 1954. No price.
- SOROKIN, PITIRIM A. (Ed.). Forms and Techniques of Altruistic and Spiritual Growth: A Symposium. Pp. xi, 476. Boston: Beacon Press, 1954. $6.00.
- SPENCER, ROBERT F. (Ed.). Method and Perspective in Anthropology: Papers in honor of Wilson D. Wallis. Pp. xii, 323. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1954. $4.50.
- SPURR, WILLIAM A., LESTER S. KELLOGG, and JOHN H. SMITH. Business and Economic Statistics. Pp. xi, 579. Homewood, Ill.: Richard D. Irwin, 1954. $6.00.
- SUFIRIN, SIDNEY C., and ROBERT C. SEDGWICK. Labor Law: Development—Administration—Cases. Pp. xvi, 590. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company, 1954. $3.95.
- SULLIVAN, HARRY STACK. The Psychiatric Interview. Edited by Helen Swick Perry and May Ladd Gawel. Pp. xxiv, 246. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1954. $4.50.
- SWABEY, MARIE COLLINS. The Judgment of History. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $3.75.
- THOMAS, MAURICE J. Public Education and a Productive Society. Horace Mann Lecture, 1953. Pp. vi, 95. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1954. $1.00.
- TRIPP, L. REED, J. KEITH MANN, and FREDERICK T. DOWNS. Labor-Management Relations in the Paducah Area of Western Kentucky. Pp. iv, 103. Lexington, Ky.: University of Kentucky, 1954. No price.
- VON GRUNEBaum, G. E. (Ed.). Studies in Islamic Cultural History. The American Anthropologist. Vol. 56, No. 2, Part 2, Memoir No. 76. Pp. xi, 60. Menasha, Wisc.: The American Anthropological Association, 1954. No price.
- WATKINS, HAROLD. Time Counts: The Story of the Calendar. Pp. xi, 274. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $4.75.
- WEBER, MAX. Max Weber on Law in Economy and Society. Edited by Max Rheinstein. Translated by Edward Shils. (20th Century Legal Philosophy Series, Vol. VI.) Pp. lxxii, 363. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $6.00.

- WHITTLESEY, CHARLES R. Principles and Practices of Money and Banking. Pp. xiii, 579. Rev. ed. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $6.25.
- WINDSOR, H. R. H., THE DUKE OF The Crown and the People, 1902-1953 Pp. ix, 43. New York: Funk & Wagnalls Company, 1954. $1.50.
- WRIGHT, DAVID MCCORD. A Key to Modern Economics. Pp. x, 520. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $4.75.

- Acheson, Dean, 114
- Adler, Alfred, 15
- Adolescence, 12, 13, 17-18
- Adorno, T. W., cited, 12
- Advertising, 16, 93, 129
- Aged
- in India, 65
- in U. S., 64, 65-66, 79
- Allensbach, Germany, Institute for Demoscopy, 60-61
- American Institute of Public Opinion, 1
- Arabs, relations with U. S., 30, 145
- Armed services, GI's, effect on stereotype of U. S., 7, 8, 35, 40, 54-55, 60-61
- See also Japan—occupation of
- Armenians, stereotype of, 4
- Aron, Raymond, 28
- Arrogance and conceit, U. S., 9, 11, 53, 57, 58, 59, 105, 107
- Artzybasheff, Boris, 16
- Associations, private (voluntary), 27-28
- Atomic energy and weapons, 5, 29, 39, 45, 50-51
- See also Hiroshima
- Australians, image of U. S., 9
- Austria, 49
- Avigdor, Rosette, cited, 6
- Bacon, Francis, 38
- Bacteriological warfare, 45, 51
- BARGHOORN, FREDERICK C., The Soviet Image of the United States: A Deliberately Distorted Image, 42-45
- Barghoorn, Frederick C., cited, 44
- Barzini, Luigi, 40
- Bateson, Gregory, 14
- cited, 12
- Bauer, Raymond A., cited, 42
- BEALS, RALPH L., The Mexican Student Views the United States, 108-115
- Beauvoir, Simone de, 28, 61
- Béguin, Albert, 36
- Benedict, Ruth, 14, 16
- cited, 12
- BENNETT, JOHN W., see Passin, Herbert, jt. author
- Bennett, John W., 83
- Bennett, Wendell C., viii
- Beria, Lavrenti P., 46, 49
- Berlin Conference, 48, 49
- Bielefeld, Germany, see EMNID
- Bill of Rights, 33
- Blakeslee, G. E., editor, 85
- Bolshevism, 43, 45, 47
- Boveri, Margret, cited, 53
- Braisted, Paul, viii
- BRESSLER, MARVIN, see Lambert, Richard D., jt. author
- Bressler, Marvin, cited, 63, 71
- British
- German opinion of occupying troops, 60
- image of U. S., 9, 10, 38-39, 53
- See also Bryce, James
- Indian relations with and image of, 70, 73-82
- stereotypes about, 3, 8, 40
- See also Great Britain
- BRODERSEN, ARVID, Themes in the Interpretation of America by Prominent Visitors from Abroad, 21-32
- Brogan, Denis W., 28, 38
- Brusilov, Aleksei A., 45
- Brutality (cruelty, toughness), U. S., 9, 54, 55, 58
- Bryce, James, 21-22, 24-26
- quoted, 25, 26
- BUCHANAN, WILLIAM, How Others See Us, 1-11
- Buchanan, William, cited, 3
- Bulganin, N. A., 50
- quoted, 49
- Bureaucracy
- and U. S. occupation of Germany, 58
- Mexican, 118, 122, 124
- Weber on, 27-28
- Burns, Robert, 11
- quoted, 1
- Cantril, Hadley
- cited, 3
- quoted, 2
- Capitalism, 16, 26-27, 34, 39, 54, 69, 143
- Carnegie Corporation, viii, 62, 83, 108, 116, 126, 136
- Caste, 71
- Catholicism, 109, 120
- Centralization and decentralization, Tocqueville and Mill on, 23
- Change, in American life, 19, 29, 31, 38, 88
- Children
- Swiss, studies of stereotype formation in, 5, 6
- U. S., 16, 17, 88, 109-110, 111, 131
- See also Family
- China, People's Republic of, 45, 47, 48, 100-101
- Chinese, stereotypes about, 3
- Churchill, Winston, 46
- Civil liberties and rights, 29, 30, 88, 99, 100, 102, 132

INDEX

- Civil liberties and rights (cont.)
 See also McCarthy
 Civil War, 25 Classes, social in India, 71, 75
 in Mexico, 113, 115, 116, 121
 in U. S., 17, 25, 27, 30, 50, 60, 75, 88-89, 108, 110
 See also Democracy: Equalitarianism
 Colombia, 118
 Colonialism, viii, 35, 71-72, 75
 Comics, 55
 Commager, Henry Steele, cited, 21 Communication, mass media of and stereotype development, vii, viii, 6, 11, 29, 52, 62, 63, 84, 86, 87, 113, 116 and U. S. politics, 24, 68, 112 indicative of low cultural level in U. S., 128-129 political effect in prewar Germany, 28
 See also Motion pictures; Press; Radio; Television
 Communism, 44-45, 47
 Communist image of U. S., vii-viii, 40, 42-51
 in France, 35
 in Germany, 54, 56, 59, 61
 in India, 69
 in Italy, 39, 40
 U. S. attitudes toward, 40, 50, 69, 116, 121
 See also McCarthy
 See also Russians; Soviet Union
 Conformity, in U. S., 16, 18, 36, 39, 128, 129-130
 See also Civil liberties and rights; Individualism
 Congress, 7, 39, 50, 139
 Cooley, Charles Horton, 123
 Copland, Aaron, 142
 Crime, U. S., 55
 Crutchfield, Richard S., quoted, 2
 Cultural values, U. S., 18 foreign reactions to, 21, 22, 29, 31
 French, 36
 German, 54, 58, 59
 Italian, 40
 Japanese, 85, 88, 93, 100, 102
 Mexican, 109, 113, 116-117, 118, 119-120
 Russian, 47, 50
 Scandinavian, 128-129, 136, 137, 139, 141-142, 144
 in U. S. education program in Germany, 57-59
 Danish students, 126, 129
 See also Scandinavians
 DAVIDSEN, OLUF M., see Sewell, William H., jt. author Davidsen, Oluf M., 133
- Democracy
 and U. S. occupation of Germany, 55, 57, 59 in Germany (Weimar Republic), 28 in Great Britain, 30
 in Mexico, 115
 in Scandinavia, 30
 in U. S., 21
 Bryce's view of, 24-26 contemporary visitors' views of, 28-32
 French view of, 33-34
 Tocqueville, 22-24, 33
 Indian views of, 68, 69, 76, 77, 78, 79
 Japanese views of, 84, 87, 88, 93, 99, 102
 Mexican views of, 110, 112, 114, 119, 121
 Scandinavian views of, 132, 136, 137
 Weber's view of, 26-28
 Democratic party, 68-69
 Denmark, see Scandinavia
 DENNEY, REUEL, How Americans See Themselves: Studies of American National Character, 12-20
 Denney, Reuel, cited, 12, 14, 19
 Descartes, René, 38
 Deutsch, Karl W., quoted, 6-7
 Dickens, Charles, quoted, 25
 Dienbienphu, Vietnam, 45
 Divorce, 64, 66, 108-109, 110, 112, 117, 120
 DOXA (Istituto per le ricerche statistiche e l'analisi dell'opinione pubblica), Italy, 1, 10, 40
 Duhamel, Georges
 cited, 34
 quoted, 37-38
 Dulles, John Foster, 46, 48, 50
 Dutch
 image of U. S., 10
 stereotypes about, 9, 10
 See also Netherlands
- East Germany, 49, 52, 60
 Education
 in Japan, 85-86, 94, 97
 U. S. influence, 85-86
 in Mexico, 122, 123, 124
 American schools in, 114, 118, 122, 123
 in Scandinavia, 130-131, 136, 137-138, 139, 142-143, 144
 U. S. influence, 144-145
 in U. S., 31, 32
 and man's perfectibility, 22
 Indian views of, 63
 Japanese views of, 86, 88, 93, 94, 97
 Mexican attitudes and experiences, 109, 110, 111, 113, 120, 121-124 public schools, 17, 139
 Scandinavian views of, 129, 130-131, 132, 139, 142-143, 144

- U. S. education program in occupied Germany, 56-59 Efficiency and skill, U. S., 29, 32, 37-38, 79, 88, 103, 118, 123, 133
 See also Technology
 Eisenhower, Dwight D., 46, 50, 51, 69
 EMNID (Institut für Marktforschung und Meinungsforschung), Bielefeld, 60, 61 Employment effect of technology on, 16 of the foreign educated after return home, 85, 94, 97, 100, 101-102, 103, 122-123, 144
 Energy and activity, U. S., 32, 74, 75, 85, 105, 118, 128, 138
 See also "Hard-working"; Tempo of life
 Engels, Friedrich, 43
 English, see British; Great Britain
 Equalitarianism, 22, 23, 26, 30, 74-75, 78, 132, 141
 See also Classes, social; Democracy: Race relations and discrimination Erikson, Erik H., 14, 16
 cited, 12
 Ethics and morals, U. S., vii, 12, 16, 22, 26-27, 50, 66, 85, 108-109, 113, 117, 118, 120, 127, 129-130, 139, 140, 142
 See also Idealism
 Exchange program, 58, 59, 62, 107, 122
- Family, the, and family life in India, 63-64, 66-67, 74, 78
 in Japan, 99
 in Mexico, 110-111, 115, 120
 in Scandinavia, 131
 in U. S., 18, 30, 63, 64-67, 78-79, 88, 99, 108-109, 110-111, 113, 114, 117, 120, 131
 See also Children; Women
 Farnsworth, P. R.
 cited, 2
 quoted, 7
 Fascism, 39, 44, 112
 Faulkner, William, 141
 Fedotoff White, D., cited, 45
 Fetchit, Stepin, 6
 Fitzgerald, F. Scott, quoted, 17
 Ford Foundation, viii, 62, 83, 108, 116, 126, 136
 Foreign aid, 30, 37, 40, 87, 132-133
 See also Marshall Plan
 Foreign policy, U. S., vii, 11 foreign reactions to, 8, 10, 30
 British, 39
 French, 34, 35, 37
 German, 55-56, 59-60
 Indian, 62, 63, 71-72, 82
 Italian, 40
 Japanese, 84, 88
- See also Japan—U. S.—Japanese relations
 Mexican, 111-112
 Russian, 46, 47-49
 Scandinavian, 132-133, 140
 See also World power, U. S. as
- Foreign students adjustment in U. S., 77, 90-96 (passim), 99, 102, 103, 106, 108, 111, 114, 127, 130, 131, 133-134, 139, 143 employment on return home, 85, 94, 97, 100, 101-102, 103, 122-123, 144 images of U. S., viii, 62-145 influence of returnees in native land, 79-82, 85, 104, 140-141, 144-145
- France
 centralization in, 23
 German opinion of, 61
 Pravda on (1953), 46
 See also French
 Franklin, Benjamin, 27, 33
 Freedom, in U. S., 21, 24, 26, 30, 32, 33, 39, 52, 53, 58, 61, 75, 88, 95, 97, 99, 107, 110, 132, 139
 See also Civil liberties and rights
- French
 German opinion of occupying troops, 60
 image of U. S., 7, 9, 10, 33-37, 53
 See also Tocqueville
 stereotypes about, 3, 5, 40
 See also France
 French Revolution, 33
 Frenkel-Brunswick, Else, cited, 12
 Freud, Sigmund, 15
 FREYMOND, JACQUES, America in European Eyes, 33-41
 Friendliness and friendship, in U. S., vii, 10, 29, 31-32, 74, 77, 91-92, 111, 127, 130, 138
 See also Kindness and generosity
 Friends, Society of, 67
 Frost, Robert, quoted, 19-20
- Gaulle, Charles de, 35
 Generosity, see Kindness and generosity
 Geneva Conference, 45, 48
 Geneva Protocol, 51
- Germans
 comparative opinions of various countries about, 60-61 emigrants to U. S., 52-53
 image of U. S., viii, 52-61
 See also Weber, Max
 stereotypes about, 3, 40
 See also Germany
 Germany, 30
 and Soviet Union, 46, 48, 49, 52, 54, 56, 58, 60-61
 and World War I, 28, 34, 53

- Germany (cont.)
 occupation of, viii, 52, 54-61
 Weimar Republic, Constitution, 28
See also Germans
- Gerth, H. H.
 cited, 16, 26, 27, 28
 quoted, 28
- Ginsberg, Morris, 14
- GI's, see Armed services
- Glazer, Nathan, cited, 12, 14, 19
- Gorer, Geoffrey, 14, 16, 28
 cited, 16
- Graham, Milton D., 9-10
 quoted, 6, 8
- Great Britain
 discrimination against Indian students in, 75, 76
 German opinion of, 61
 Indian travelers to, 79-80
Pravda on foreign policy of (1953), 46
See also British
- Gurian, Waldemar, cited, 42
- "Hard-working" (industrious), as American characteristic, vii, 9, 26-27, 29, 32, 62, 75, 107, 133, 141
- Hartley, Eugene L. and Ruth E., quoted, 2
- Hazen, Edward W., Foundation, viii, 73
- Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, 19
- Hemingway, Ernest, 141
- Herder, Johann Gottfried von, 19
- Herring, Pendleton, viii
- Hiroshima, 8
- Hitler, Adolf, 8, 54, 69
- Hitlerism, 57, 58
See also Nazis
- Hocking, William Ernest, quoted, 57
- Holland, see Dutch; Netherlands
- HUMPHREY, NORMAN D., The Mexican Image of Americans, 116-125
- Husler, Angelo, 33
- Hydrogen bombs, 50-51
- Hypocrisy, U. S., 53, 55, 57, 58, 127, 132, 142
- Idealism, 21, 34, 102, 139, 140
- Images, see Stereotypes and images
- Immaturity, see Youthfulness and immaturity
- Immigration and immigrants, to U. S.
 German, 52-53
 Mexican, 116
 Swedish, 137, 141
- Imperialism, 34, 37, 67, 75, 112, 145
- India
 as a world power, viii, 62, 82
 British and Americans in, 78, 80 caste and class in, 71, 75
 Communism in, 69
 family life in, 63-64, 66-67, 74, 78 influence of foreign educated in, 79-82
- old people in, 65 political activity in, 66-67
 public behavior in, 73-74
 U. S. image of, effect on Indian image of U. S., 63, 71-72
 U. S. interest in, 62, 68, 82
 women in, 64-65, 66
See also Indians
- Indians discrimination against in India, 76
 in United Kingdom, 75, 76
 in U. S., 63, 70, 76, 77
 image of U. S., viii, 62-82
See also India
- Individualism, 27, 30, 79, 88, 89, 93, 109-110, 120, 129, 144
See also Conformity
- Indochina, 45, 48
- Industrialism
 British, 13
 French, 33
 Japanese, 84, 85
 Mexican, 114, 124
 United States
 American comments on, 12, 13, 15-16, 17
 foreign reactions to, 21, 26-28, 85, 88, 118
- Industriousness, see "Hard-working"
- Inkeles, Alex, cited, 42
- Institute for Demoscopy, 60-61
- Institute for International Education, viii
- Ishimoto, Shizue, cited, 90
- Istituto per le ricerche statistiche e l'analisi dell'opinione pubblica, see DOXA
- Italians
 image of U. S., 10, 39-40, 53
 stereotypes about, 3
- Iwakura, Tomomi, 85
- Japan
 education in, 85-86, 94, 97
 European influence on, 85, 86
 family life, 99
 occupation of (U. S.), viii, 86, 89, 102-103, 104-105, 106 status of returnees, 97-107
 U. S.-Japanese relations, effect on image formation, 84-86, 87, 88, 95, 99, 101, 102-103, 104, 105 women in, 88, 90-92, 99-101, 103
See also Japanese
- Japanese
 image of U. S., viii, 83-107
 stereotypes about, 3, 8
See also Japan
- Jefferson, Thomas, 33, 136, 141
- Jenner, William Ezra, 112
- Jews, 3, 132, 141
- Jobs, see Employment

- Jung, Carl Gustav, 15
- Jungk, Robert, cited, 61
- Kant, Immanuel, 19
- Kardiner, Abram, 14, 15
 cited, 14
- Kawai, Kazuo, cited, 86
- Kawai, Michi, cited, 90
- Kennan, George, cited, 42
- Kilpatrick, F. P., editor, 8
- Kindness and generosity (bigheartedness), U. S., 8, 9, 10, 25, 29, 40, 54, 60, 61, 74, 105, 138
See also Friendliness and friendship
- Kirst, Hans Hellmut, cited, 55
- Klineberg, Otto
 cited, 8, 19
 quoted, 2
- Korean War, 44-45
 Armistice, 45-46, 47
- Krech, David, quoted, 2
- Labour party, 39
- Lafayette, Marquis de, 33, 34
- LAMBERT, RICHARD D., Foreword, vii-viii
- LAMBERT, RICHARD D., and MARVIN BRESSLER, Indian Students and the United States: Cross-cultural Images, 62-72
- Lambert, Richard D., cited, 63, 71
- Lanman, Charles, cited, 85
- La Pierre, R. T.
 cited, 2
 quoted, 7
- Laski, Harold, 28
- Lasswell, Harold, editor, 14
- Latin America
 students from, 115, 118
 U. S. policy in, 112
See also Mexico
- Law, attitudes toward, in U. S., 22, 24, 88, 110, 129, 130
- Lederer, E. and F., cited, 85
- Lee, A. M., cited, 1
- Leighton, Alexander H., cited, 8
- Leites, Nathan, cited, 42
- Lenau, Nikolaus, 52
- Lenin, Vladimir Ilich, and Leninism, 42, 43, 49-50
- Lerner, Daniel, editor, 14
- Levinson, Daniel J., cited, 12
- Liberty, see Freedom
- Lincoln, Abraham, 33, 136, 141
- Linton, Ralph
 cited, 14, 15
 quoted, 4
- Lippmann, Walter
 cited, 4
 quoted, 1-2, 4
- Literature
 American and American popular views of national character, 18 as source of foreign images of U. S., 25, 58, 62, 113, 129, 136, 141 English and stereotype development, 6
 by visitors to U. S., 28
 See also Bryce, James taught in Sweden, 136
 French, on U. S., 28, 35-37
 See also Tocqueville
 German, on U. S., 53, 54-55, 61
 Italian, on U. S., 40
 Lobbying, see Pressure and special interest groups
- McCarran, Patrick A., 112
- McCarran Act, 139
- McCarthy, Joseph R., and McCarthyism, 36, 39, 50, 69, 112, 114, 139-140
- McIntosh, Thomas J., 33
- Malenkov, Georgi M., 47, 48, 49, 50, 51
- Mannheim, Karl, cited, 42
- Marshall, George C., 69
- Marshall Plan, 8, 44, 112
- Marx, Karl, and Marxism, 42-43, 49-50
- Mass media, see Communication, mass media of; Motion pictures; Press; Radio; Television
- Materialism
 British, 13, 79
 United States
 American analysis of, 13
 Foreign views of, vii, 10, 21, 29, 31, 32
 French, 22, 34, 35-36, 37
 German, 26-27, 53, 54, 58
 Indian, 79
 Japanese, 88
 Mexican, 109, 116, 119
 Scandinavian, 128, 132, 141
- Matsuoka, Yoko, cited, 90
- Matthias, L. L., cited, 61
- Mead, Margaret, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19
 cited, 12, 14
 editor, 16
- Mechanization and machines, U. S., 15-16, 33, 36, 62, 108, 144
See also Industrialism; Technology
- Métraux, Rhoda
 cited, 16
 editor, 16
- Mexicans
 discrimination against, in U. S., 113, 116, 117, 121
 image of U. S., viii, 108-125

- Mexicans (cont.)
See also Mexico
- Mexico
 agrarian reform movements, 114 changing culture and economy, viii, 115, 124-125 class distinctions and discrimination, 110, 113, 116, 118, 121
 education, 114, 118, 122, 123, 124
 family life, 109, 110-111, 115, 120 knowledge of U. S., viii, 108, 113, 116
 motion pictures, 113
 nationalism, viii, 116, 118, 120-125 (passim) professional licensing, 121, 122, 124 Revolution, effect of, 115 spiritual and cultural values, 108, 117, 123 status of foreign-educated returnees, 121-124
 U. S. influence in, 119, 120
 U. S. intervention, 112, 117
 women, 111, 114, 115, 119
See also Mexicans
- Michigan State College, Area Research Center, 73
- Middle East, 49
- Mill, John Stuart, 24
 quoted, 23
- Mills, C. Wright
 cited, 16, 26, 27, 28
 quoted, 28
- Minority groups and study of stereotypes, 2, 4
See also Jews; Negroes; Race relations and discrimination
- Mishima, Sumie, cited, 90
- Missionaries and missions, 85, 89, 103, 119, 120
- Moberg, Sven, cited, 137
- Molotov, V. M., 48, 49, 50
- Moore, Barrington, Jr., cited, 42
- Morality, see Ethics and morals
- Morgan, George A.
 cited, 42
 quoted, 43
- MORRIS, RICHARD T., see Sewell, William H., jt. author
- Motion pictures
 and stereotype development, 29, 55, 62, 80, 113, 116, 129, 136 artistic inferiority of, in U. S., 129
- MUHLER, NORBERT, America and American Occupation in German Eyes, 52-61
- Muhlen, Norbert, cited, 52, 60
- Music, in U. S., 127, 128, 141-142
- Myrdal, Gunnar, 70
- National character, U. S. foreign views of, 3, 9, 10, 21-32
See also image of U. S. under British; Dutch; French; Germans; Indians; Italians; Japanese; Mexicans; Russians; Scandinavians
- U. S. views of, vii, 10, 11, 12-20, 53, 62, 82, 87 variations in, 33, 67, 78, 107, 130, 141, 142, 143-144
- Nationalism and national status (inferiority and superiority), and image formation, vii
- British, 38
 French, 34, 37
 German, viii, 54, 61
 Indian, viii, 67, 71-72
 Japanese, viii, 85, 86, 93, 95, 104-107
 Mexican, viii, 116-118, 120-125 (passim)
 Scandinavian, viii, 126, 127, 129, 133, 134-135, 144-145
- Nazis, 54, 55, 61
See also Hitler; Hitlerism
- Negroes
 GI's in Germany, 60 stereotype of, 2-3, 5 treatment of, in U. S.
 European reactions to, 10, 23, 132, 141
 Indian reaction to, 69-71, 76-77
 Mexican reaction to, 112-113, 117, 121
- Netherlands, 46, 61
See also Dutch
- Netherlands Institute of Public Opinion (NIPO), 1, 9, 10
- New Deal, 69
- Newcomb, Theodore M., quoted, 2
- Newspapers, see Press
- North Atlantic Treaty Organization, 30, 48, 144
- Norway, see Scandinavia
- Norwegian students, 126
See also Scandinavians
- Office of Public Opinion Research, 3, 4
- Office of War Information, 8
- Oriental Exclusion Act, 86
- Pakistan, 49, 69
- Park, Robert E., 118
- Parsons, Talcott, 17
 cited, 17
- PASSIN, HERBERT, and JOHN W. BENNETT, The America-educated Japanese, I and II, 83-107
- Passin, Herbert, 83
- Perry, Matthew C., 84
- Perry, Stewart E., editor, 4, 15
- Pershing, John Joseph, 34
- Philippov, I., cited, 50
- Piaget, Jean, quoted, 5
- Pierson, George Wilson, cited, 23, 24, 25
- Piovene, Guido, 40

- Piston, Walter, 142
- Plato, cited, 1
- Point Four Program, 112
- Poland, 45, 46
- Political parties, 68-69, 139
- Politics, in U. S., 30 corruption in, 25-26, 30, 139
 Indian opinions of, 63, 67-69
 Japanese reactions to, 93, 101
 Mexican reactions to, 112, 114, 119, 121
 Scandinavian reactions to, 128, 130, 132, 139, 140-141
See also Communism—U. S. attitudes toward; Democracy; Foreign policy; McCarthy
- Pool, Ithiel de Sola, cited, 42
- Pospelov, P. N., 45
- Potsdam Conference, 37
- Press, 80
 British, and stereotype development, 6
 German, and U. S. occupation, 56, 58-59
 Mexican, 118, 120
 Soviet, 46-47, 48, 50, 51
 Swedish, 136, 139, 140, 144
 United States, 48, 68, 93, 130
- Pressure and special interest groups, 68
- Princeton University, students, experiments on, 2-3
- Prisons, U. S., Tocqueville's report, 22
- Propaganda
 Chinese Communist, 45
 Nazi, 54, 58
 Soviet, 42-51, 58
 U. S., in Germany, 55, 56-58
- Protestantism, 26-27, 109, 114, 117, 120, 121
- Public opinion surveys, 1, 3-4, 5, 8-10, 40, 60-61, 87
- Race relations and discrimination, 10, 29, 30, 62, 63, 69-71, 75-77, 88, 100, 112-113, 114, 116, 117, 121, 123, 132, 141, 143
See also Minority groups
- Radio, 80
 in Germany, 28, 54
 in Mexico, U. S. stations, 113
 in U. S., 15, 24, 68, 93, 110, 129
- Rand, Ayn, cited, 18
- Rastvorov, Yuri Aleksandrovich, 49
- Reeve, Henry, translator, 23
- Reischauer, Edwin O., quoted, 85
- Religion
 in Mexico, 109
 in Scandinavia, 131-132, 142
 in U. S., 26-27, 108-109, 117, 120, 127, 130, 131-132, 142
- Republican party, 68-69
- Revolutionary War, 33, 38, 136
- Riesman, David, 16
 cited, 12, 14, 19
- Rockefeller Foundation, viii, 62, 83, 108, 116, 126, 136
- Roosevelt, Franklin D., 33, 35, 69
- Ruesch, Jurgen, cited, 12
- Russia, 28
See also Russians; Soviet Union
- Russians
 friendliness to U. S., 42
 German opinion of occupying troops, 60-61
 Soviet propaganda image of U. S., vii-viii, 42, 45-51
 stereotypes about, 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10
See also Soviet Union
- Salomon, Ernst von, cited, 55
- Sanford, R. Nevitt, cited, 12
- Scandinavia
 democracy, 30
 education, 130-131
 family life, 131
 ignorance of, in U. S., 135 moral standards, 129 nationalism, viii, 126, 127, 133, 134-135
 religion, 132
 similarities and differences of countries in, 126
 social relations, 127
 socialism, 133
 sports, 130
See also Scandinavians; Sweden
- Scandinavians, image of U. S., viii, 126-145
- Schwantes, R. S., cited, 85
- Schwartz, Harry, cited, 50
- Science, in U. S., 31, 38, 61, 62, 79, 88, 142, 143-144
- SCOTT, FRANKLIN D., The Swedish Students' Image of the United States, 136-145
- Segregation, see Race relations and discrimination
- Sensitive area complex, 71-72, 75
- SEWELL, WILLIAM H., RICHARD T. MORRIS, and OLUF M. DAVIDSEN, Scandinavian Students' Images of the United States: A Study in Cross-cultural Education, 126-135
- Sherif, Muzafer, quoted, 2
- Shuster, George N., 57
- Siegfried, André, 28
 quoted, 34, 36
- Slavery, 23
- Smith, M. Brewster, viii
- Social Science Research Council, Committee on Cross-Cultural Education, viii, 62, 83, 108, 116, 126, 136
- Socialism, 43, 45, 67, 69, 93, 133
- Soviet Union and emancipation of women, 100-101 and Germany, 46, 48, 49, 52, 54, 56, 58, 60-61

- Soviet Union (cont.)
 and U. S. occupation policy in Germany, 56 Mexican attitude toward, 112 propaganda image of U. S., vii-viii, 42-51
 Swedish attitude toward, 136, 139
See also Communism; Russians
- Spain, 49
- Spillane, Mickey, 55
- Sports, 95, 130
- Stalin, Joseph, 43, 46, 47, 49, 51
 cited, 45-46
- Stanton, Alfred H., editor, 4, 15
- Stapel, Jan, 1
- Stereotypes and images changes in, 3-4, 9-10, 11, 83, 89, 97, 124-125 during foreign residence, 75-76, 78, 93, 95-96, 97, 101, 106-107, 108-114 (passim), 120, 134, 141 on return home, 81-82, 89, 97, 101-102, 103-104, 123-124, 135 comparative bases of, 63, 73, 74, 126, 130-131 definition and origin of terms, 1-2, 83-84 individual variations in, 21, 25, 33, 76-77, 78, 84, 87-88, 90, 97-107, 109, 114, 115, 118, 121, 123, 132, 143-144 influence of, 7-8 relation to reality, 2, 4, 11, 21, 78, 84, 87, 94, 95-96, 97, 101, 106-107 sources of, 5-7, 21, 29, 33, 40-41, 62-63, 71-72, 84, 87, 113, 116, 121, 127, 136-137 See also Nationalism and national status sources of information on, and experimental techniques, viii, 2-6, 12-13, 15, 18, 21, 28-29, 40, 52, 60-61, 62, 73, 83, 86-87, 93, 108, 126, 136, 137
See also National character
- Stevens, Halsey, 142
- Stevenson, Adlai E., 69
- Sugimoto, Etsu, cited, 90
- Supreme Court, ruling on education segregation, 70
- Sweden
 and Soviet Union, 136, 139
 education, 136, 137-138, 139, 142-143, 144
 foreign policy, 140, 144-145
 German opinion of, 61 knowledge of U. S., 136-137 movie houses, 136 press in, 136, 139 religion and moral standards, 142
 status of foreign-educated returnees, 140-141, 144
 U. S. influence in, 144-145
See also Scandinavia; Swedes
- Swedes
 image of U. S., viii, 126, 136-145
See also Scandinavians; Sweden
- Switzerland
 German opinion of, 61
 schoolchildren in, studied for stereotype development, 5, 6
- Technology, U. S. and employment, 16
 foreign reactions to, 29, 31, 32
 French, 36, 37
 German, 61
 Japanese, 88, 94, 103, 106-107
 Mexican, 108, 116, 119, 121, 122, 123
 Scandinavian, 127, 128, 136, 143-144, 145
- Television, 15, 24, 68, 93, 129, 141
- Tempo of life, in U. S., 29, 31, 32, 36, 38, 74, 75, 79, 128
- Tocqueville, Alexis de, 21-24, 25, 26
 quoted, 22, 23, 24, 25, 33, 41
- Totalitarianism, vii, 42, 57, 88
- Tourists, American, vii, 7, 35, 40, 113, 117-118, 121, 137
- Travelers, to U. S., 33 books on and by, 28, 35-36, 61
See also Bryce, James; Tocqueville, Alexis de; Weber, Max desirability of, 11
 Indian, 79-80
 Mexican, 113, 116
 preconceptions of U. S., 28-32
- Truman, Harry S., 50, 51, 69
- Truman Doctrine, 44
- Tucci, Niccolò, 40
- Turkey, 47
- Tylor, E. B., 119
- United Kingdom, see Great Britain
- United Nations, 51, 132
- United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, 140 inquiry into national stereotypes, 3, 4, 5, 9-10
- University of California, 108, 114
- University of Wisconsin, 126
- USEEM, JOHN, see Useem, Ruth Hill, Jr. author
- USEEM, RUTH HILL, and JOHN USEEM, Images of the United States and Britain Held by Foreign-educated Indians, 73-82
- Varga, Eugene, cited, 50
- Versailles Peace Treaty, 53
- Violence, in U. S., 29, 31, 62
- Wall Street, 10, 29, 30, 34
- Washington, George, 136
- Wealth, in U. S., 5, 25-26, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 35, 39, 53, 54, 62, 88, 106, 116, 117, 118, 136, 137, 141
- Weber, Max, 16, 21, 26-28, 29
 quoted, 27, 28
- Weil, Anne-Marie, quoted, 5
- Wilson, Woodrow, 33, 34, 53
- Women
 Indian, 64-65
 Japanese, 88, 90-92, 99-101, 103
 Mexican, 111, 114, 115, 119
 Russian and Chinese emancipation of, 100-101
 U. S.
 American comments on, 13, 17
 Indian views of, 64-65
 Japanese views of, 87, 88, 90-92, 95, 99, 100
 Mexican views of, 109, 110, 111, 117, 120
See also Family
 Word-list method of research, 2-3, 4, 7, 9-10
- Work relationships
 Indian and Western, compared, 74, 78
 U. S. and European, compared, 132, 138
 U. S. and Mexican, compared, 110, 119
- World Peace Council, 47

- World power, U. S. as, 82, 87, 140 contemporary visitors on, 29-30, 31, 32
 German view of, 56, 59-60
 Japanese views of, 88-89, 106
 Mexican view of, 112
 Tocqueville on, 23
 Weber on, 28
See also Foreign policy
- World War I, 13, 28, 34, 53, 54, 136
- World War II, 8, 14, 19, 34-35, 44, 45, 58, 78, 86, 136
See also Hitler; Hitlerism; Nazis
- Wyllie, Philip, 18
- Yakovson, Sergius, cited, 42, 51
- Yalta Conference, 37
- Youthfulness and immaturity, of U. S. and Americans, vii, 19-20, 29, 30, 32, 36, 38, 39, 40, 52, 85, 127, 128, 129, 140
See also Adolescence
- Yugoslavia, 47
- Zhdanov, Andrei A., 44

VOLUME 296

NOVEMBER 1954

THE ANNALS

of The American Academy of Political and Social Science

THORSTEN SELLIN, Editor

RICHARD D. LAMBERT, Assistant Editor

THE FUTURE OF THE UNITED NATIONS ISSUES OF CHARTER REVISION

Edited by

PHILIP E. JACOB, Ph.D.

Professor of Political Science, University of Pennsylvania

69625

Copyright 1954, by

THE AMERICAN ACADEMY OF POLITICAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCE

All rights reserved

JL
M73, N54
N54

PHILADELPHIA

1954

CONTENTS

	PAGE
FOREWORD	vii
HOW THE UNITED NATIONS CHARTER HAS DEVELOPED Francis O. Wilcox	1
RE-EVALUATING THE SCOPE OF UNITED NATIONS FUNCTIONS
THE PEACE AND SECURITY FUNCTIONS
STRENGTHENING THE UNITED NATIONS Carlos P. Romulo	14
LIMITS TO THE POWERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS Raymond Aron	20
DEVELOPING THE PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT FUNCTIONS OF THE UNITED NATIONS Elmore Jackson	27
THE WELFARE FUNCTIONS
BARRIERS TO THE EXPANSION OF UNITED NATIONS ECONOMIC FUNCTIONS Raymond F. Mikesell	36
PROTECTING THE RIGHTS OF MAN
HUMAN RIGHTS AND CHARTER REVISION Quincy Wright	46
INTERNATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR NON-SELF-GOVERNING PEOPLES Sergio Armando Frazão	56
YARDSTICKS FOR UNITED NATIONS ACTION
THE YARDSTICK OF INTERNATIONAL LAW Clyde Eagleton	68
THE YARDSTICK OF NATIONAL INTEREST Hans J. Morgenthau	77
THE YARDSTICK OF COLLECTIVE INTEREST Aleš Bebler	85
PROBLEMS OF UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION
EXPANDING THE UNITED NATIONS COMMUNITY: ANALYSIS AND PROPOSITION R. W. Van Wagenen	93
Comments by Heinrich von Brentano, Clement Davies, Rajeshwar Dayal, R. W. G. Mackay, Lester B. Pearson, and You Chan Yang	97
IMPROVING THE POLICY-MAKING PROCESSES: ANALYSIS AND PROPOSITION H. Field Haviland, Jr.	106
Comments by Lawrence S. Finkelstein, G. A. Lincoln, Louis B. Sohn, and Kenneth Younger	110
INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF ARMAMENTS: ANALYSIS AND PROPOSITION David F. Cavers	117
Comments by Grenville Clark, Benjamin V. Cohen, W. Sterling Cole, and Percy C. Spender	124
STRENGTHENING THE SECRETARIAT: ANALYSIS AND PROPOSITION Waldo Chamberlin	131
Comments by W. Friedmann, Awni Khalidy, Jacob Robinson, and Wallace S. Sayre	134
PROSPECTS OF REVISION
THE RISKS OF REVISION: APPRAISAL OF UNITED NATIONS PREPARATIONS FOR CHARTER REVIEW Salah el dine Tarazi	140
SOVIET POLICY TOWARD REVISION David McKendree Key	151
UNITED STATES PLANNING FOR CHARTER REVIEW Alexander Wiley	156
THE SENATE AND THE REVIEW OF THE UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

BOOK DEPARTMENT

	PAGE
ADUARD, BARON E. J. LEWE VAN. Japan From Surrender to Peace. Albert E. Kane	223
ANGUS, H. F. Canada and the Far East, 1940-1953. Murray G. Lawson	206
BARCLAY, GEORGE W. Colonial Development and Population in Taiwan. Warren S. Thompson	218
BARNES, WILLIAM WRIGHT. The Southern Baptist Convention, 1845-1953. Ira De A. Reid	197
BEALE, HOWARD K. (Ed.). Charles A. Beard: An Appraisal by Eric F. Goldman, and Others. Robert E. Spiller	173
BERGER, MONROE, THEODORE ABEL, and CHARLES H. PAGE (Eds.). Freedom and Control in Modern Society. Morton A. Kaplan	185
BLACKHAM, H. J. The Human Tradition. Louis William Norris	200
BLUM, JOHN MORTON. The Republican Roosevelt. Arthur S. Link	174
BOWLES, CHESTER. Ambassador's Report. Robert I. Crane	206
BRADSHAW, MARION J. Free Churches and Christian Unity: A Critical View of the Ecumenical Movement and the World Council of Churches. William W. Sweet	195
BRANDT, KARL. In Collaboration with Otto Schiller, and Franz Ahlgrimm. Management of Agriculture and Food in the German-Occupied and Other Areas of Fortress Europe. Wilfred Malenbaum	211
BUCKLEY, WILLIAM F., JR., and L. BRENT BOZELL. McCarthy and His Enemies. John Sparkman	169
BUDENZ, LOUIS F. The Techniques of Communism. Anthony T. Bouscaren	173
CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER. The Heart of Africa. William O. Brown	215
CAMPBELL, ANGUS, GERALD GURIN, and WARREN E. MILLER. The Voter Decides. Dayton D. McKean	171
CATTON, BRUCE. U. S. Grant and the American Military Tradition. Wood Gray	177
CLARK, GRENVILLE, and LOUIS B. SOHN. Peace Through Disarmament and Charter Revision. Philip E. Jacob	163
DANDEKAR, V. M., and KUMUDINI DANDEKAR. Survey of Fertility and Mortality in Poona District. Judith Blake	191
DAVID, PAUL T. MALCOLM MOOS, and RALPH M. GOLDMAN (Eds.). Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952. Vols. I-IV. Wilfred E. Binkley	170
DAVIDSON, BASIL, and ADENKAN ADENMOLA (Eds.). The New West Africa: Problems of Independence. Peter C. W. Gutkind	215
DEARING, CHARLES L. Industrial Pensions. Gordon S. Watkins	183
EATON, CLEMENT. A History of the Southern Confederacy. David M. Potter	176
FRIEDMANN, EUGENE A., and ROBERT J. HAVIGHURST. The Meaning of Work and Retirement. Clark Tibbitts	188
GIPSON, LAWRENCE HENRY. The Great War for the Empire: The Culmination, 1760-1763. T. Walter Wallbank	203
GOGUEL, MAURICE. The Birth of Christianity. Erich Dinkler	197
GOULDNER, ALVIN W. Patterns of Industrial Bureaucracy. Goodwin Watson	180
GRANICK, DAVID. Management of the Industrial Firm in the USSR. Holland Hunter	207
GRÉGOIRE, ROGER. La Fonction Publique. Johannas Mattern	213
GROSS, BERTRAM, and WILFRED LUMER. The Hard Money Crusade. M. Bronfenbrenner	178
GUINS, GEORGE C. Soviet Law and Soviet Society. John N. Hazard	208
HALLGARTEN, GEORGE W. F. Why Dictators? The Cause and Forms of Tyrannical Rule Since 600 B. C. Peter H. Odegard	201
HALLOWELL, JOHN. The Moral Foundation of Democracy. Ernest S. Griffith	200
HAMMER, ELLEN J. The Struggle for Indochina. William B. Dunn	220
HANDLIN, OSCAR, ARTHUR MEIER SCHLESINGER, SAMUEL ELIOT MORISON, FREDERICK MERK, ARTHUR MEIER SCHLESINGER, JR., and PAUL HERMAN BUCK. Harvard Guide to American History. Sidney I. Pomerantz	169
HOWELL, TREVOR H. Our Advancing Years: An Essay on Modern Problems of Old Age. Dorothea Ramsey	189
HOWLETT, DUNCAN. Man Against the Church: The Struggle to Free Man's Religious Spirit. Leo Pfeffer	193
HOYT, ELIZABETH E., MARGARET G. REID, JOSEPH L. MCCONNELL, and JANET M. HOOKS. American Income and Its Use. Wilbert E. Moore	181
HUGHES, PHILIP. The Reformation in England. Vol. II: Religio Depopulata. Mildred Campbell	203
HYMAN, HAROLD MELVIN. Era of the Oath. T. Harry Williams	176
JENKINS, SHIRLEY. American Economic Policy Toward the Philippines. Grayson Kirk	167
JENSEN, VERNON H. Nonferrous Metals Industry Unionism, 1932-1954. Herbert J. Lahne	182
JONES, LAWRENCE A., and DAVID DURAND. Mortgage Lending Experience in Agriculture. Naomi Riches	181
KALLAY, NICHOLAS. Hungarian Premier. Wayne S. Vucinich	208
KIMPEL, BEN. The Symbols of Religious Faith. Wilson D. Wallis	198
KOHN, HANS (Ed.). German History: Some New German Views. Louis L. Snyder	209
LEOPOLD, RICHARD W. Elihu Root and the Conservative Tradition. Kenneth W. Hechler	175
LINEBARGER, PAUL M. A., DJANG CHU, and ARDATH W. BURKS. Far Eastern Governments and Politics: China and Japan. Werner Levi	220
LINKE, LILO. Ecuador: A Country of Contrasts. Frank Tannenbaum	217
LOGAN, RAYFORD W. The Negro in American Life and Thought. Roi Ottley	186
LONGRIGG, STEPHEN HEMSLEY. Oil in the Middle East. Douglas D. Crary	218
MCCORMICK, MARY J. Diagnostic Casework in the Thomistic Pattern. Arthur P. Miles	193
MCGRAW, PEG, and WALTER MCGRAW. Assignment: Prison Riots. Harry Elmer Barnes	190
MCNEILL, WILLIAM HARDY. America, Britain, and Russia: Their Co-operation and Conflict, 1941-1946. A. O. Sarkissian	168
MÉTRAUX, RHODA, and MARGARET MEAD. Themes in French Culture. Edgar S. Furniss, Jr.	214
MIKESELL, RAYMOND F. Foreign Exchange in the Postwar World. Arthur Leon Horniker	166
MUNK, ARTHUR W. A Way of Survival. Martin B. Travis, Jr.	202

	PAGE
MURRAY CLYDE E., MARX G. BOWENS, and RUSSELL HOGREFE (Eds.). Group Work in Community Life . W. I. Newstetter	192
NU, THAKIN. Burma Under the Japanese . Edited by J. S. Furnivall. Herbert Passin	221
OSBORNE, HAROLD. Bolivia: A Land Divided . Frank Tannenbaum	217
OXNAM, G. BROMLEY. I Protest . Ralph L. Roy	194
PADOVER, SAUL K., with the collaboration of FRANÇOIS GOGUEL, LOUIS ROSEN-STOCK-FRANCK, and ERIC WEIL. French Institutions: Values and Politics . Edgar S. Furniss, Jr.	214
PANIKKAR, K. M. Asia and Western Dominance . Woodbridge Bingham	219
PENDLE, GEORGE. Paraguay: A Riverside Nation . Frank Tannenbaum	217
PETERSON, EDWARD NORMAN. Hjalmar Schacht, For and Against Hitler . Kenyon E. Poole	210
RITCHESON, CHARLES R. British Politics and the American Revolution . Max Beloff	205
ROOSE, KENNETH D. The Economics of Recession and Revival: An Interpretation of 1937-38 . K. E. Boulding	178
ROSE, ARNOLD M. Theory and Method in the Social Sciences . Joseph B. Casagrande	185
ROSENBERG, STUART E. The Jewish Community in Rochester, 1843-1925 . Solomon Grayzel	188
SAENGER, GERHART. The Social Psychology of Prejudice . George E. Simpson	187
SHUSTER, GEORGE N. Religion Behind the Iron Curtain . N. S. Timasheff	196
SMITH, D. MACK. Cavour and Garibaldi, 1860 . Garland Downum	212
STEVENS, DAVID H. The Changing Humanities . Whitney J. Oates	199
SUNDBORG, GEORGE. Hail Columbia: The Thirty-Year Struggle for Grand Coulee Dam . Morris Llewellyn Cooke	180
TAYLOR, HENRY C., and ANNE DEWEES TAYLOR. The Story of Agricultural Economics in the United States, 1840-1932 . H. C. M. Case	184
THORP, WILLARD L. Trade, Aid, or What? Irving B. Kravis	166
TINLEY, J. M. South African Food and Agriculture in World War II . Edwin S. Munger	216
TURNER-HIGH, HARRY HOLBERT. Château-Gérard: The Life and Times of A Walloon Village . Felix Oppenheim	213
UPTHEGROVE, CAMPBELL L. Empire by Mandate . Vernon J. Poryear	204
WARNE, J. D. N.A.T.O. and Its Prospects . Alfred J. Hotz	164
WILDES, HARRY EMERSON. Typhoon in Tokyo: The Occupation and Its Aftermath . Harold S. Quigley	222
WORMSER, RENÉ. The Myth of the Good and Bad Nations . James Burnham	165
ZELLER, BELLE (Ed.). American State Legislatures . Roy V. Peel	172
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR	223
OTHER BOOKS	224
INDEX	228

The articles appearing in THE ANNALS are indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature and the Industrial Arts Index.

FOREWORD

This volume of THE ANNALS is concerned with the future direction of United Nations development and in particular with the basic issues which must be confronted as the time approaches for a comprehensive reappraisal of the Charter.

Although the question of subjecting the Charter of the United Nations to formal review will not be decided until the General Assembly holds its tenth session in the autumn of 1955, intensive study and discussion are already under way by the major governments concerned, by the Secretariat, and by private organizations and scholars. Vigorous debate in the Sixth Committee of the General Assembly during the fall of 1953 preceded adoption of a resolution instructing the Secretary-General to compile the full documentation of the San Francisco Conference and to prepare a "repertory" of the practices of United Nations organs. A special subcommittee of the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations has been examining the problems connected with a review of the Charter and assessing the attitudes of the American public toward possible revisions. In France, a special commission has been appointed to conduct a similar study. Active policy preparation is also under way, of course, in the executive departments of most of the Member States. Among private efforts, the Brookings Institution is undertaking a most thorough study of the Charter's evolution and implementation. The boldest proposal for actual revision of the Charter is a detailed redraft advanced by Mr. Grenville Clark and Professor Louis Sohn which would transform the United Nations into a supranational authority.

As compared with these essentially technical studies, the present volume focuses attention on some of the broad problems of policy which lie behind the review of specific Charter provisions and shows the principal lines of approach being taken towards them by responsible statesmen and scholars. What is the proper scope of United Nations functions? By what yardsticks does—or should—the United Nations determine its actions? How inclusive should the United Nations community become and what are the most appropriate procedures for reaching decisions within such an organization? How can it be adapted to implement the control of arms under conditions of atomic technology? What are the necessary conditions of an effective Secretariat? The articles and comments which follow, as they come to grips with these questions, evaluate the probable effects of Charter revision upon the future potentialities of the United Nations in its manifold tasks.

In the first part, "Re-evaluating the Scope of United Nations Functions," the question is directly faced as to the Organization's intrinsic capacity to fulfill the tasks to which it has been committed. Two of the authors urge that the present provisions of the Charter can be so sharpened as to strengthen substantially the authority of the Organization, especially as an instrument for the maintenance of security and as a guarantor of the rights of non-self-governing peoples. Two others conclude, however, that the effectiveness of the U.N. in the settlement of disputes and in the promotion of respect for human rights does not demand changes in the Charter, but depends rather on improving the climate of international relations and fully utilizing the possibilities for action within the present framework of the Organization. A third approach is skeptical as to the potential value of the United Nations—with or without Charter revision—and suggests that there are strict practical limits to its initiative both in security and in economic matters. This third point of view was to have been challenged by one of the principal leaders in the development and expansion of the economic and social welfare functions of the United Nations. At the last minute, unforeseen circumstances prevented the preparation of the article; the omission of an adequate presentation of recommendations to extend this phase of United Nations activities is much regretted.

In the second part, "Yardsticks for United Nations Action," three contrasting views are expressed concerning the adequacy of the Charter in defining the proper criteria by which U.N. actions should be governed. The failure of the Charter to lay down clear legal standards has left most United Nations decisions to be determined by political considerations, based on national interest. But it is pointed out that in the give and take of policy formulation purely self-centered national interest has tended to yield to a broader concept of collective interest, or at least to an acceptance of compromise in the interest of longer-run national objectives. The issue then joined is whether the formal confirmation of frankly political—but international—yardsticks through Charter revision would strengthen the over-all impact of the United Nations or would instead nip a budding sense of community interest among the members of the Organization.

In the third part, "Problems of United Nations Organization," specific proposals for the solution of four key problems are evaluated by panels of commentators who have closely observed, or themselves participated in, the day-to-day operations of the Organization. An initial position paper was prepared on each problem and circulated to the panels as a springboard for their critiques. The members of the panels were deliberately chosen to bring out essential differences of view or emphasis, and the editor has been gratified by the willingness of all the participants to respond so carefully under the pressures of time and limitations of space placed upon them.

The current preparations for Charter review in the United Nations and the United States and the present policy orientations of the Soviet and American governments on this issue are set forth in the last part, "Prospects of Revision." The risks—and some of the positive potentialities—in attempting to remodel the United Nations are thereby sharpened, and the prospects for revision weighed against the anxiety to leave well enough alone.

A wide range of personal views and a broad representation of the countries belonging to the United Nations, as well as of some of the nonmembers, characterize the contributors. Authors and commentators of fifteen nationalities are included. Most of them have had direct personal experience in or with the United Nations—as representatives of their governments to U.N. organs, members of the Secretariat, consultants, or observers. Two of the authors have been President of the General Assembly. Six have headed their country's delegation to the United Nations. Three are currently their nation's Ambassador to the United States. The chairman of the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, the Assistant Secretary of State for International Organization Affairs, the Deputy Foreign Minister of Yugoslavia, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada have, despite heavy official commitments, made a most significant contribution to the volume.

PHILIP E. JACOB

How the United Nations Charter Has Developed*

By FRANCIS O. WILCOX

IN some respects the Charter of the United Nations is much like the Constitution of the United States. Both are written in form and both would be classified by political scientists as fairly "rigid" in character because they contain rather difficult amendment procedures. The Charter, like the Constitution, was designed to lay a broad base for an institution which might develop to meet changing needs. And the Charter, like the Constitution, has proven flexible enough to be adapted to many new situations without the need for formal amendment.

It is important to keep this fact in mind when the problem of Charter revision is under consideration. In the eight years of U.N. existence not a single formal amendment has even so much as reached the final voting stage in the General Assembly. Even so, many far-reaching changes have taken place within the U.N. system. Some important articles of the Charter have already fallen into disuse. Others have been applied in a way that the San Francisco drafters did not contemplate.

We are by no means examining the Charter that was drafted in San Francisco in 1945. We are examining the Charter of 1954 as it has been amplified by custom and usage, resolutions of the various U.N. organs, and treaties, like the Atlantic Pact, which are consistent with the Charter and have a heavy impact on the U.N. system. If we should proceed now to consider amendments to the old Charter rather than the new, it would be much like a surgeon planning a major operation on the basis of a diagnosis made nine years ago.

The purpose of this paper is to examine briefly the growth of the United Nations Charter. First it reviews the provisions of the Charter relating to the formal amending process. Then it surveys the informal means by which the Charter has developed since 1945.¹

¹ On this question of Charter amendment and Charter growth see the following: L. M. Goodrich and E. Hambro, Charter of the United Nations: Commentary and Documents (second and revised ed.; Boston, 1949), Chap. XVIII; Hans Kelsen, The Law of the United Nations (New York, 1950), pp. 816-24; A. Vandenbosch and W. N. Hogan, The United Nations: Background, Organization, Functions, Activities (New York, 1952), Chap. XX; S. Engel, "The Changing Charter of the United Nations," in The Year Book of World Affairs (New York, 1953), pp. 71-101; E. P. Chase, The United Nations in Action (New York, 1950), Chap. XVIII; E. Gross, "Revising the Charter: Is It Possible? Is It Wise?" Foreign Affairs, January 1954. See also U. S. Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Review of the United Nations Charter: A Collection of Documents (Senate Document No. 87, 1954); Report to the President on the Results of the San Francisco Conference (Department of State Publication 2349, June 26, 1945), Chap. XVIII; N. L. Hill, International Organization (New York, 1952), Chap. XVII; S. Engel, "De facto Revision of the Charter of the United Nations," Journal of Politics, February 1952; H. Shaw, "The Constitutional Structure of the cross," Nebraska Law Review, November 1950; N. de M. Bentwich and A. Martin, A Commentary on the Charter of the United Nations, . . . With an Appendix on the Developments of the Charter Between May 1949 and March 1951 (London, 1951); Yearbook of the United Nations, New York, 1946-47, 1947-48, 1948-49, 1950, and 1951;

* This article is based on a staff study prepared by the author for the Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter, created pursuant to Senate Resolutions 126 and 193, Eighty-third Congress.

FORMAL AMENDMENTS TO THE CHARTER

At the San Francisco Conference two different methods of amending the Charter were finally agreed upon. The ordinary procedure is set forth in Article 108.

Amendments to the present Charter shall come into force for all Members of the United Nations when they have been adopted by a vote of two-thirds of the members of the General Assembly and ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the Members of the United Nations, including all the permanent members of the Security Council.

Article 108 thus outlines two distinct steps that are to be followed in the normal amending process: (1) adoption of the proposal by a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly; and (2) ratification by two-thirds of the members of the United Nations, including the permanent members of the Security Council. Four important points should be noted in connection with these steps.

1. Proposed amendments may be adopted by the General Assembly without any action on the part of the Security Council. In the initial stages, at least, the will of a majority of two-thirds of the members prevails. No single state or small group of states can prevent an amendment from being approved and sent on to the member nations for further consideration and possible ratification.

2. Article 108 reiterates the predominant position of the great powers in the U.N. The requirement that amendments must be ratified by two-thirds of the U.N. members, including the five permanent members, simply means that no amendment can become effective if it meets with the disapproval of any of the permanent members. By failing to take positive action on an amendment adopted by the General Assembly any one of the five great powers can prevent its entry into force even though it may be ratified by all the other members of the United Nations.

3. Once an amendment receives the required number of ratifications, including those of the five permanent members, it becomes effective with respect to all members, even those who voted against it or failed to ratify it. This is an interesting example of the impact of the Charter upon the traditional concept of state sovereignty. For, apart from the permanent members, the entire membership of the U.N. has committed itself in advance to accept any new obligations that Charter changes might bring in their wake.

4. It should also be noted that amendments must be ratified by Member States "in accordance with their respective constitutional processes." While this proviso is a bow in the direction of popular government, it is not altogether clear what practical effect it has. In a few countries the chief executive, acting on his own authority under the constitution, would have power to approve amendments. In most states, however, positive action by the legislative branch would be called for.

In one sense, even with the great power veto, the amending process set forth in the charter is a comparatively liberal one. Many multilateral treaties cannot be amended without the consent of all the signatories. The North Atlantic Treaty is a good case in point. No change, however slight, in the text of that agreement could be accomplished without the specific approval of each one of the fourteen treaty members.

Theoretically, at least, the Charter is much more flexible. If forty U.N. members agree, it would be possible to bring about far-reaching changes in the Charter even against the opposition of as many as twenty nations, excluding the Big Five.

Article 109

The normal amending procedure outlined in Article 108 was not enough to satisfy the demands of many delegations who were displeased with the Charter as it emerged at San Francisco. Some delegates argued that they would be unable to secure ratification of the instrument in their states unless assurance could be given that, within a reasonable period of time, there would be an opportunity to review the Charter and strengthen its provisions in the light of experience. For this reason Article 109 was developed. Basically it is the residue of an attempt to set up a second method of Charter amendment different from and easier than that found in Article 108. The attempt fell short of its mark. A reading of the text shows that while Article 109 establishes a somewhat different procedure, it is certainly no easier than that envisaged in Article 108.

1. A General Conference of the Members of the United Nations for the purpose of reviewing the present Charter may be held at a date and place to be fixed by a two-thirds vote of the members of the General Assembly and by a vote of any seven members of the Security Council. Each Member of the United Nations shall have one vote in the conference.

2. Any alteration of the present Charter recommended by a two-thirds vote of the conference shall take effect when ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the Members of the United Nations including all the permanent members of the Security Council.

3. If such a conference has not been held before the tenth annual session of the General Assembly following the coming into force of the present Charter, the proposal to call such a conference shall be placed on the agenda of that session of the General Assembly, and the conference shall be held if so decided by a majority vote of the members of the General Assembly and by a vote of any seven members of the Security Council.

It will be observed that Article 109 does not guarantee that a review conference will be convened on any fixed date. The only guaranty involved is that the question of calling the conference will be placed on the agenda of the General Assembly after ten years have elapsed. This in itself is not a concession of any great moment, since any member has the right to request that an item be placed on the agenda and the General Assembly approves its agenda by a simple majority vote.

One significant concession however, should be noted. If ten years elapse and the question of calling a review conference is automatically placed on the General Assembly's agenda, the decision to call the conference may be taken by a majority vote of its members instead of the two-thirds vote required under paragraph 1. This decision must be concurred in by an affirmative vote of any seven members of the Security Council. Thus no great power, by its negative vote, can prevent the convening of a review conference.

Differences between Articles 108 and 109

Basically there is little difference between Article 108 and Article 109. Actually, the General Conference contemplated in Article 109 has the same composition as the General Assembly

C. Eagleton and R. N. Swift (Eds.), Annual Review of United Nations Affairs, New York, 1949, 1950, 1951, and 1952; A. H. Feller, United Nations and World Community, Boston, 1952; H. Morgenthau, "The United Nations and the Revision of the Charter," The Review of Politics, January 1954; J. F. Dulles, War or Peace, New York, 1950.

referred to in Article 108. In both cases, each member of the U.N. would be represented and would have one vote. Likewise any amendment approved by either the General Assembly or the General Conference would require a two-thirds vote of the entire U.N. membership. Moreover, whether one thinks in terms of "alterations" or "amendments" to the Charter, they would come into force under exactly the same circumstances—namely, through ratification, in accordance with their constitutional processes, by two-thirds of the members of the United Nations including the permanent members of the Security Council.²

Thus Article 109 is no easier from a legal point of view than is Article 108. The gamut an amendment has to run is just as long and just as difficult under one article as the other. There is no reason to suppose that a fundamental change in the Charter that has been rejected by the General Assembly would muster any more support in a General Conference called under Article 109.

In some respects it might prove simpler to secure action through the General Assembly since that is an established organ of the U.N. and meets at least once every year. It is regularly available. No special effort, no positive vote, is required to bring it into being as is the case with the General Conference.

On the other hand, there are practical difficulties involved in attempting to divert the attention of the General Assembly to such a controversial matter as the amending process. Confronted each fall with an overflowing agenda, most delegates have been inclined to postpone any serious discussion of Charter amendments pending the convening of the first General Conference under Article 109.

² See Kelsen, op. cit. supra (note 1), pp. 817-18.

The atmosphere in a General Conference should be much more conducive to a balanced appraisal of the various arguments relating to Charter revision and review. That will be the task of the conference. It will be convened for that specific purpose. Delegations will be briefed on the issues involved and will have instructions from their governments.

The question of whether to hold a General Conference for Charter review will, therefore, be on the agenda of the tenth annual session of the General Assembly in 1955 and it is likely that the conference, if agreed to by a majority vote, will be held the following year. Secretary of State Dulles, as early as August 1953, announced that the United States would vote in favor of convening such a General Conference.

INFORMAL CHARTER CHANGES

The Charter has been subjected to what one might call informal amendments in a variety of ways: (1) through the nonimplementation or nonapplication of certain provisions of the Charter; (2) through the interpretation of the Charter by various organs and members of the U.N.; (3) through the conclusion of supplementary treaties or agreements, such as the Headquarters Agreement of 1947 and the North Atlantic Pact; and (4) through the creation of special organs and agencies.

These informal amendments substantially affect the provisions of the Charter although they leave its text intact. In some cases they create gaping holes in the document as it was drafted at San Francisco. In other cases they merely fill in the interstices. In still other cases they chart fundamentally new paths of progress for the U.N.

It is outside the scope of this study to examine in detail the growth of the Charter since 1945. But it does seem desirable to take a quick look at the process in general terms, for without a knowledge of what has been happening during the past eight years one cannot tackle intelligently the broader problem of Charter revision.³

Nonimplementation or nonapplication of Charter provisions

In a number of instances organs or members of the U.N. have disregarded or have failed to implement certain Charter provisions. As a result several articles which the framers believed were highly important in making the U.N. an effective instrumentality for world peace have already fallen into disuse.

Perhaps the best example is Article 43. That article was designed to put teeth into the United Nations system. Under its terms the members of the U.N. agreed to make available to the Security Council the armed forces, assistance, and the facilities necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security. But after eight years of fruitless negotiations the great powers remain deadlocked over such questions as the numbers and types of forces each country shall make available, their locations, their degree of readiness, and so forth. Consequently, the agreements referred to in Article 43 have never come into existence and that provision of the Charter remains a dead letter.

Much the same situation exists with respect to Articles 44, 45, 46, 48, and most of Article 47, which relate to the use of armed forces by the Security Council. These provisions of the Charter are largely contingent upon the entry into force of Article 43. Taken together they constitute the heart of the U.N. collective security system as it was envisaged at San Francisco.

³ On this problem of informal Charter change see the articles by S. Engel cited above (note 1). Portions of this section are based on these articles.

Article 106 offers still another striking example. Briefly put, this article provides that prior to the time the Security Council is ready to begin its peace-keeping functions under Articles 42 and 43, the five permanent members should consult with one another with a view to such joint action as may be necessary to maintain world peace. The great powers, in other words, were given the joint responsibility for maintaining peace, on a transitional basis, until the new organization was properly equipped to perform its functions in an effective manner.

But the split between the East and the West has not only hamstrung the Security Council; it has also prevented giving effect to the transitional arrangement which was supposed to hold the line until the full organization could swing into action.

Mention might also be made of Article 23, paragraph 1. This article provides that the General Assembly in electing the six nonpermanent members of the Security Council shall pay special regard, in the first instance, to the contribution of U.N. members to the maintenance of peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization and also to equitable geographical distribution. In actual practice the General Assembly has pretty largely disregarded the first two criteria, placing most of its emphasis on equitable geographical distribution. Normally two members have been elected from Latin America, one from Western Europe, one from the British Commonwealth, one from the Middle East, and, during the first few years at least, one from the Soviet satellite bloc.

Of course it can be argued that these criteria are in no way legally binding upon the General Assembly. Certainly if they are disregarded there is no method provided for appealing the action of the General Assembly. Yet when the guideposts are ignored it simply means that, in effect, Article 23, paragraph 1, has been dropped, at least temporarily, from the Charter.

Interpretation of the Charter

It is a confusing fact that the Charter makes no provision for its interpretation. In practice the organs and members of the U.N. are left free to interpret the various articles according to their own discretion. Consequently, any meaning which a provision of the Charter might reasonably have can prevail in any particular instance. This flexibility has led to a number of interesting developments.

Voting in the Security Council. One of the most significant of these developments relates to the all-important question of voting in the Security Council. The language of Article 27, paragraph 3, seems quite clear. It provides specifically that for other than procedural matters decisions of the Security Council are to be made "by an affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the permanent members."

Does this mean that action cannot be taken by the Security Council unless it is concurred in by all five of the great powers? Does it mean when a permanent member abstains or is absent at the time the vote is taken that no decision can be reached? Certainly any strict construction of the Charter might lead to that conclusion.

Early in its history the Security Council took the position that an abstention or an absence of a permanent member did not constitute a negative vote. It was this liberal interpretation of the Charter, coupled with the absence of the Soviet representative from the meetings at the time, which paved the way for swift Security Council decisions when the Republic of South Korea was attacked in June 1950. With only four permanent members present, the Security Council brushed aside a number of neat legal problems and approved three resolutions which made possible U.N. decisions against the aggressor in a way not contemplated by the Charter.⁴

Before leaving Article 27 it might be well to point out that that article, perhaps more than any other, illustrates how differently the Charter may be interpreted by certain members on the one hand and by an organ of the U.N. on the other. At San Francisco the great powers agreed upon a very narrow interpretation of "procedural" questions. For the most part these were the organizational matters referred to in Articles 28-32 of the Charter; the adoption of the rules of procedure of the Council, the selection of the President, the time and place of meetings, the establishment of subsidiary organs, etc. Beyond this point, argued the sponsoring governments in their statement of June 7, 1945, decisions of the Security Council might have "major political consequences," and accordingly would require the unanimous vote of the permanent members.⁵

Since that time the General Assembly—in an attempt to narrow the area within which the veto applies—has been inclined to define procedural questions very broadly. On April 14, 1949, the General Assembly recommended to the Security Council that a long list of some thirty-one decisions be considered

⁴ For a fuller discussion of the practice of abstention, see United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter Staff Study No. 1, The Problem of the Veto in the United Nations Security Council.

⁵ United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Subcommittee on the United Nations S. Doc. 87, Review of the United Nations Charter: A Collection of Documents (hereinafter referred to as Collection of Documents), p. 362.

procedural and that the Council conduct its business accordingly. Included in the list were a number of decisions—such as the admission of states to U.N. membership—which had heretofore been considered substantive in character.⁶

The distance between the narrow interpretation of the sponsoring governments at San Francisco and the liberal interpretation of the General Assembly is considerable. Since the Charter itself does not spell out the distinction between procedural and substantive questions, either of these two interpretations could apply. Clearly there is great elasticity in this part of the Charter if the members wish to use it.

The Secretary-General. There has also proved to be considerable elasticity in the Charter provisions relating to the role of the Secretary-General in the United Nations. Articles 97-100 might leave the impression that his political functions were to be quite limited in scope. Only in Article 99, under which he may bring to the attention of the Security Council matters which in his opinion may threaten world peace, is there any real grant of political initiative.

Yet, in fact, influence exercised by the Secretary-General has been one of the significant developments within the United Nations. Both the General Assembly and the Security Council—and still more important the Secretary-General himself—have taken a broad view of his functions. He has made statements before both bodies on a variety of questions, and he has undisputed authority to place any item he considers necessary on the General Assembly's provisional agenda. One has only to recall his vigorous role in the Korean crisis, his proposal for a U.N. guard force, and his attempts to bring about a rapprochement between the Soviet bloc and the free world, to understand the expanding nature of his political activities.

Non-self-governing territories. Still another demonstration of what custom and usage can do is reflected in the General Assembly's interpretation of Article 73 (e) regarding non-self-governing territories. According to that article the Member States are obligated to submit to the Secretary-General, "for information purposes," data of a technical nature relating to the economic, social, and educational conditions in the non-self-governing territories for which they are responsible. Presumably this language does not grant to any U.N. organ the authority to deal with the information furnished or to make recommendations about it. The General Assembly, however, has gone considerably beyond the letter of Article 73. In 1949 it created a special committee to examine the information transmitted and to submit reports thereon to the General Assembly:

containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual territories.⁷

With this as a starting point, the General Assembly has gradually expanded its influence. It has approved a standardized form for governments to use in submitting information. It has requested additional information from Member States. It has debated at length the reports submitted to it on the information received. If the present trend continues, the time may come when world opinion would expect the colonial powers to account to the U.N. for the efficient administration of their non-self-governing territories.⁸

The General Assembly. Finally, perhaps the most significant change in the Charter has taken place as a result of the sharp shift in the balance of power between the Security Council and the General Assembly. During the past five years the Security Council, meeting less and less frequently, has faded into the background. The General Assembly, on the other hand, has played a more important role than the framers of the Charter anticipated.

⁷ Collection of Documents, p. 728.

⁸ Ibid., Part C (X), pp. 749-79.

⁶ Collection of Documents, p. 572.

At San Francisco much emphasis was placed upon the Security Council's primary responsibility for the maintenance of world peace. It was to meet in continuous session. Armed forces were to be placed at its disposal. It could make decisions binding on all U.N. members. It was to be a small body capable of acting with vigor and dispatch in order to keep the peace.

The General Assembly was designed to be a much less powerful organ. It was scheduled to meet in regular annual sessions. It was to have no armed forces at its disposal. It could not make decisions—only recommendations. Its main weapon was discussion and debate.

As the Security Council has fallen into disuse, largely because of dissension among the great powers, the General Assembly has become a stronger and more vigorous organ. By various devices, including the creation in 1947 of the Interim Committee, or the so-called "Little Assembly," ways and means have been found to keep the General Assembly in virtually continuous session. Moreover, the "Uniting for Peace" resolution, which was approved in 1950 after the attack on Korea, geared the General Assembly to take quick action against an aggressor in the event the Security Council failed to exercise its responsibility for the maintenance of peace.⁹

⁹ Ibid., Part C (V), pp. 494-556.

Today, the General Assembly may be convened in emergency session in twenty-four hours. It may make appropriate recommendations to the members for collective measures, including the use of armed forces. It has created two important subsidiary organs: (1) a Collective Measures Committee to report on the methods which might be used to strengthen international peace and security; and (2) a Peace Observation Commission to observe and report on any situation which might endanger international peace and security. Finally, Member States have been asked to earmark certain of their armed forces so organized, trained, and equipped that they could be made available promptly for service as United Nations units.¹⁰

In filling this new role the General Assembly has already demonstrated that it can make far-reaching recommendations. Thus, on February 1, 1951, it approved a resolution finding that Communist China had engaged in aggression in Korea.¹¹ This was followed on May 18, 1951, by a second resolution calling for an embargo on the shipment of war materials to Communist China and North Korea.¹²

It can be argued, of course, that resolutions of this kind are only recommendations to the Member States and have no binding effect. But in fact, the strategic materials embargo has been put into operation by some forty-five countries and has considerably limited strategic trade with aggressor nations.

The conclusion of agreements which supplement the Charter

The character of the Charter has also been changed as a result of numerous treaties and agreements which have been entered into by various Member States. These agreements define in greater detail the general provisions of the Charter. They usually spell out in more specific form the rights and duties of Member States and the powers and functions of U.N. organs. In some instances they lay down obligations and commitments which go beyond those contained in the Charter. A few examples may be helpful to show the nature of this development.

¹⁰ Ibid., p. 557.

¹¹ Ibid., p. 596.

¹² Ibid., p. 597.

The Charter itself, for example, sets forth in broad terms the basic principles relating to the legal capacity of the U.N. and the privileges and immunities to be enjoyed by representatives of the Member States and by U.N. officials. (See Arts. 104 and 105.) At San Francisco it was assumed that these were matters which could be worked out more properly at a later date. Indeed, Article 105 specifically calls upon the General Assembly to make recommendations with a view to determining the details of the application of the principles regarding privileges and immunities or to propose conventions to the members for this purpose.

Under the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations of February 13, 1946, what was once two short articles of the Charter—some nine lines—has grown into a document of thirty-six sections, setting forth in some detail the juridical personality of the U.N., the immunity of U.N. property, funds, and assets, the right of the U.N. to use communication facilities, the privileges and immunities of officials accredited to the U.N., and so on. As of October 1953, forty-two nations—the United States not among them—had ratified the convention.¹³

In the same category is the Headquarters Agreement between the United States and the United Nations signed on June 26, 1947. This agreement defines the headquarters district in New York and clarifies the rights of the U.N. with respect to postal and radio facilities, the use of an airport, the inviolability of the headquarters, police protection, and related matters. Like the Convention on Privileges and Immunities it gives substance to the general provisions of the Charter.¹⁴

Of a somewhat different character are the declarations which some forty-four nations have made, voluntarily accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. It is true, of course, that all members of the U.N. are obligated to settle their differences by peaceful means.¹⁵ But the Charter does not impose any particular method of solution upon the parties to a dispute. Consequently, when U.N. members accede to the so-called optional clause of the Court Statute (Art. 36) and agree in advance to submit their legal disputes to the Court for settlement, they not only enlarge the competence of that body but also accept obligations over and above those already embodied in the Charter.

Most important, from the point of view of the future development of the U.N., are the changes which have taken place as a result of the conclusion of such agreements as the Brussels Treaty, the Rio Treaty, and the North Atlantic Pact.¹⁶ The United Nations Charter was designed to tackle the problem of collective security on a world-wide basis. That grand design soon proved inadequate. As a consequence, U.N. members who feared the threat of Soviet aggression were compelled to continue their quest for security in other directions. In such agreements as the Rio Treaty and the North Atlantic Treaty they shifted their emphasis from uni-

¹⁴ Ibid., p. 197.

¹⁵ Ibid., p. 2, Art. 2 (3) of the Charter.

¹⁶ Ibid., Part C (VIII).

¹³ Ibid., p. 191.

versal collective security to security based on regional pacts and the idea of collective self-defense as expressed in Article 51.

Thus the United Nations is a very different organization from what it was eight years ago. Then it stressed the essential unity of all members against aggression anywhere. Now it is an organization within which groups of states are seeking to preserve the peace by uniting their strength in order to deter aggression from Communist sources.

There are, to be sure, some critics who still argue that the Atlantic Pact is not a regional arrangement and that it violates the spirit if not the letter of the United Nations Charter. Whether the Atlantic Pact is based upon the regional chapter (Arts. 52-54) of the Charter, or whether it derives its existence from Article 51, is beside the point. The real point is that these agreements have added new wings to the U.N. structure. In developing, as they do, new techniques for joint action against armed attack they give new meaning and new vitality to Articles 51-54.

In this connection mention should also be made of the bilateral mutual defense treaties which the United States has concluded with the Philippines, Japan, and Korea, and the tripartite pact with Australia and New Zealand. These treaties, which also spring from Article 51, outline a somewhat different approach to the security problem in an area of the world which is not quite ready for the kind of commitments contained in the Atlantic Pact. The words in Article VIII of the treaty with Australia and New Zealand, "Pending the development of a more comprehensive system of regional security in the Pacific area," carry the implication, however, that the treaties are only the first step in the building of a more effective security system for the Pacific.

The creation of subsidiary organs

Somewhat akin to the conclusion of supplementary agreements, although of less constitutional significance, has been the creation of special organs within the U.N. system. While both these devices were anticipated by the Charter, they have helped to round out that document in a way that probably was not foreseen a decade ago.

The Charter provides that both the General Assembly and the Security Council may establish such subsidiary organs as are deemed necessary for the performance of their respective functions. (See Arts. 22, 29.) A good many standing committees have been set up under the Rules of Procedure of the two bodies. In addition, a large number of committees and commissions have been established by resolution of the two parent organs to perform certain specific functions. Some of these are of a semipermanent nature, like the Interim Committee of the General Assembly, the International Law Commission, and the Disarmament Commission. Still others are ad hoc bodies, like the U.N. Commission for India and Pakistan, the U.N. Special Committee on the Balkans, the Palestine Conciliation Commission, the U.N. Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, and the Special Committee on the Question of Defining Aggression. As of March 1953 there were at least thirty-two subsidiary organs of the General Assembly and three of the Security Council.¹⁷

The Interim Committee, or the "Little Assembly," is perhaps the best example of this type of constitutional development.¹⁸ Since it was created to strengthen the General Assembly and thus to offset the veto-ridden Security Council, it was given broad competence to deal with questions within the jurisdiction of the General Assembly when the latter was not in session. For the proper exercise of these functions the Interim Committee was given the power to conduct investigations, to appoint commissions of inquiry, to adopt additional rules of procedure not inconsistent with those of the General Assembly, and to advise on the calling of special sessions of the General Assembly.

¹⁷ United Nations, Department of Public Information, Structure of the United Nations (Sixth Revision; May 1953), U.N. Document ST/DPI/7*.

The resolution creating the Interim Committee underlined its character as a subsidiary organ of the General Assembly in accordance with the terms of Article 22. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union and its satellites challenged the constitutionality of the Committee. They charged that it was designed to circumvent and weaken the Security Council. They insisted, too, that the Committee possessed such broad powers that it was equal in rank with the General Assembly and consequently did not constitute a "subsidiary organ" within the meaning of Article 22.

These arguments were not accepted by the General Assembly. At the same time the terms of reference of the Interim Committee were narrowed somewhat so as to meet the criticisms launched against it. Its authority to conduct investigations was circumscribed and its power to advise on the calling of special sessions of the General Assembly was limited to questions actually under discussion by the Committee. In addition, it was made clear that the Committee was not to trespass on the sphere of activity of any other organ of the United Nations.

Despite these assurances the Soviet Union and its satellite states continued to regard the Interim Committee as unconstitutional and refused to participate in its work. The Committee has not met since 1952.

The Soviet bloc has vigorously opposed the creation of other subsidiary organs on constitutional grounds. They attacked the U.N. Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, insisting that it constituted illegal intervention in a civil war and interference in the internal affairs of another state. Similarly they held that the terms of reference of the U.N. Special Committee on the Balkans were incompatible with the Charter and the principle of the sovereign equality of states. But these organs were established and discharged their responsibilities.

Out of U.N. experience with subsidiary organs to date the following principles emerge:

1. The power of the General Assembly and the Security Council to establish subsidiary organs to perform a wide variety of functions has been established. The authority which these agencies exercise, however, cannot go beyond the authority possessed by the parent organ under the Charter.

2. Most of the subsidiary organs exercise their mandates within a definite time period, the length of which depends upon the nature of the task to be performed.

3. The subsidiary organs are strictly accountable to the General Assembly or the Security Council and must submit reports on their activities at regular intervals.

The subsidiary organs by no means have a free rein; rather they are carefully hedged about by restrictions and limitations. They do not amend the Charter in any substantive way. Yet they do constitute a significant part of the Charter structure.

¹⁸ Collection of Documents, pp. 499-505.

CONCLUDING COMMENTS

As the time for the review of the United Nations Charter approaches, those who are interested in determining whether the United Nations can become a more effective instrumentality for world peace will want to examine carefully the alternatives open to them. Should an effort be made to bring the Charter up to date through the formal amending process? Or would it be more prudent to wait upon the normal development of the Charter through informal adaptation and change? This is a fundamental question that must be faced before the Charter review conference is convened.

In his book, War or Peace, published in 1950, Secretary of State John Foster Dulles commented as follows:

I have never seen any proposal made for collective security with "teeth" in it, or for "world government" or for "world federation," which could not be carried out either by the United Nations or under the United Nations Charter.¹⁹

Many of the imperfections in the U.N. system could be remedied without the change of a word in the Charter. Certainly the impact of the veto could be softened quietly and quickly if the permanent members would informally agree to refrain from using it. Likewise, many nations now awaiting admission to the U.N. could be admitted without any formal Charter change.

While the Charter is gradually being developed by these informal methods, certain disadvantages stem from relying on them instead of amendments of a more formal nature. For one thing, they are much less permanent in character. A formal amendment is firmly imbedded in the Charter for all to see for years to come. But an informal

¹⁹ P. 204.

Charter change can be modified or abrogated with relative ease; it may be here today and gone tomorrow, depending upon the will of certain states or the action taken by a particular organ of the U.N.

More important still, informal changes may be much more limited in scope because they apply only to those states responsible for them.

The Atlantic Pact, for example, binds only the fourteen nations members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. And a particular interpretation of the Charter agreed upon by the five great powers has no legal validity beyond this limited group. On the other hand, a formal amendment, once in effect, is binding upon all the members of the U.N. whether they vote for it or not.

Some people, also, are inclined to question the constitutionality of informal amendments. In practice, however, there is no satisfactory way in which the constitutionality of an informal amendment can be effectively challenged. To be sure, the International Court of Justice may hand down advisory opinions, but such opinions are purely advisory in nature and have no binding effect either upon the members or upon the organs of the U.N. There is no power of judicial review within the U.N. system.

The members and the various organs of the United Nations are alone competent to pass upon the constitutionality of their actions. This being the case, changes brought about through the informal amendment processes must be considered constitutional so long as the states involved remain within their obligations under the Charter.

On the other hand, Charter growth through interpretation can only proceed within well-defined constitutional limits. The United Nations is not a superstate. It is based squarely upon the principle of the sovereign equality of all its members, as Article 2 constantly reminds us, and it must function within the specific limitations laid down in the Charter. However broad an interpretation one might place upon the Charter, the United Nations—under the limiting language found in Article 2, paragraph 7—is not authorized to intervene in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state. Likewise the authority of the General Assembly cannot be increased beyond a certain point for, under the express provisions of the Charter, it can only recommend; it cannot make decisions binding on U.N. members.

The foregoing paragraphs indicate that many changes in the United Nations have been brought about by informal methods and by agreements made outside, but at the same time collateral to, the Charter. Some changes which have been proposed, however, could only come about by formal amendment. Thus, a change in the permanent membership of the Security Council, a change in the formal amending process, or a grant of authority to enable the General Assembly to make decisions instead of recommendations would undoubtedly require formal amendment before they could be made effective. In fact, it has been argued (by the Soviet Union) that some of the informal changes mentioned in preceding paragraphs, many of which were developed as the result of American leadership, are of the type which should have been submitted for approval by the formal amendment procedures provided in the Charter.

Our government has indicated that when the question arises in 1955, the United States will favor calling a review conference. The existence of the veto does not mean that such a conference would be a waste of time. The only logical course of action now is to proceed with a careful study of the entire problem and the formulation of proposals which we may find in our national interest, on the assumption that no single nation will willfully block approval of any desirable amendments.

This assumption may prove wrong. If it does, supporters of the U.N. may well conclude that their objective of developing an organization that can better serve the cause of world peace can still be attained without invoking the formal amendment process. Since its inception the Charter has demonstrated a remarkable facility for adapting itself to changing needs and circumstances. This flexibility may provide the way in which the United Nations can be made more effective in protecting the interests of the United States and preserving peace.²⁰

²⁰ On the desirability of calling a review conference, see article by Ernest A. Gross cited above (note 1).

Francis O. Wilcox, Ph.D., Washington, D. C., is Chief of Staff of the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. He was chairman of the Division of Social Sciences at the University of Louisville and has held several posts in both the executive and legislative branches of the government. He served as an adviser to the United States delegation at the San Francisco Conference on the United Nations Charter. Since that time, he has participated in most sessions of the United Nations General Assembly.

Strengthening the United Nations

By CARLOS P. ROMULO

"... we must boldly explore ways of so strengthening the United Nations that it may have ... the power to prevent universal catastrophe."

IN his now historic address to the General Assembly of the United Nations on December 8, 1953, President Dwight D. Eisenhower prefaced his proposal for an international pool of atomic energy for peaceful purposes with a heart-warming tribute to the United Nations. He said:

At the same time that I appreciate the distinction of addressing you, I have a sense of exhilaration as I look upon this Assembly.

Never before in history has so much hope for so many people been gathered together in a single organization. Your deliberations and decisions during these somber years have already realized part of those hopes.

But the great tests and the great accomplishments still lie ahead. And in the confident expectation of those accomplishments, I would use the office which, for the time being, I hold to assure you that the Government of the United States will remain steadfast in its support of this body. This we shall do in the conviction that you will provide a great share of the wisdom, the courage, and the faith which can bring to this world lasting peace for all nations, and happiness and well-being for all men.

To make this speech, President Eisenhower flew into New York directly from Bermuda, where he had been in conference with Prime Minister Churchill of Great Britain and Premier Laniel of France about the grave issues of war and peace. The event thus possessed all the elements of high drama. First, the Bermuda Conference was held in the framework of the old classical diplomacy, wherein the heads of the three great powers of the Western world met together in secret in an attempt to maintain peace by strengthening the free-world coalition against a potential enemy. Second, President Eisenhower, as head of the most powerful nation in the world, spoke on a matter truly of life and death for all humanity. And third, the General Assembly of the United Nations was deliberately chosen as the platform from which the historic message would be given to the world.

What President Eisenhower told the General Assembly has been heard around the world. His bold proposal on atomic energy has become the number one item of world statesmanship and will so remain in the anxious months to come. But this event is significant for another reason. It dramatically points up the degree in which the United Nations has been sadly left behind in the furious pace of scientific progress in the modern world. It was appropriate that President Eisenhower should have chosen to submit his fateful proposal on atomic energy to the United Nations. But the United Nations lacks the authority to act promptly and effectively on the Eisenhower proposal.

A VESSEL TOO FRAIL

Suddenly we realize that no political instrument exists today which could cope with so great a need. Somewhat sadly we realize that the United Nations has become a vessel too frail to be the repository of humanity's hopes and fears in the atomic age.

Nine years ago, I represented the Philippines during the San Francisco Conference which gave birth to the United Nations. As the representative of a country that had suffered grievous loss of life and destruction of property during the war, I gave earnest support to every proposal which was intended to enable the United Nations to cope with the menace of future war. After two months of strenuous effort, the Conference completed the Charter of the United Nations, the first words of which proclaim the determination of the peoples of the United Nations "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind."

The Charter of the United Nations was completed on June 26, 1945. Twenty days later, on July 16, the United States set off the world's first atomic explosion. In another twenty days, on August 6, the first atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima.

In retrospect, these dates are significant. The final blueprint of the United Nations was completed shortly before the world was aware that atomic power had become a reality. The eloquent words with which the Charter opens, affirming mankind's determination "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war," referred therefore to the only kind of warfare which men had known until then. It was murderous and destructive warfare which made no distinction between combatants and noncombatants, but it was nevertheless one which was waged with conventional weapons of finite potency. It was total war, and it was right that those who founded the United Nations in San Francisco should have established as the primordial aim of the Organization the prevention of similar wars in the future.

Meanwhile, the world has moved from the menace of total war with conventional weapons towards the menace of absolute war with bacterial, atomic, and hydrogen weapons. The United Nations probably has the means to intervene effectively and in time to prevent or halt a war fought with conventional weapons. But it does not have the means to do so in the case of a war fought with absolute weapons.

The reason is simple: the United Nations was not built to the scale of the atomic age in which we live. Another way of putting this idea is to say that, in the short space of nine years, the Charter of the United Nations has become dangerously obsolete to the degree that under its existing provisions the Organization is powerless to act effectively to forestall universal catastrophe.

IMPOTENCE OF SECURITY COUNCIL

The most convincing proof of this statement is the confirmed impotence of the Security Council. This is the organ which has primary responsibility for maintaining or restoring international peace and security. I shall not take away from this organ the credit which rightly belongs to it for settling or helping to settle disputes between nations and for preventing or stopping a number of threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression. But in the only instance among these which involved large-scale fighting and which had the actual potentiality of leading to a third world war—namely, the Communist aggression in Korea—the Security Council was saved from total impotence only by the narrowest of accidents, that is, by the providential absence of the Soviet Union from the meeting which ordained military sanctions against the Communist aggressors. Moreover, Korea happened to be a theater of war which the Soviet Union did not consider to be important enough to require its actual participation and all-out effort.

Under the Charter, the Security Council is responsible for organizing readily available armed forces from Member States for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security. In the past eight years nothing concrete has come out of its efforts in this field. It was left to the General Assembly, under the "Uniting for Peace" resolution, to formulate plans in advance for the organization of collective measures against future acts of aggression.

Furthermore, the Security Council is primarily responsible for formulating plans for the establishment of a system for the regulation of armaments. The records dealing with this matter form the most dreary chapters in the history of the United Nations. In eight years of study and discussion nothing has been accomplished. The armaments race has proceeded without interruption and at a faster pace than during any other peacetime period in the history of the world. Today, having wasted eight years in a fruitless search for an acceptable formula for the regulation of armaments, including atomic weapons, we have the sinister spectacle, to use the words of President Eisenhower, of two atomic colossi, the United States and the Soviet Union, malevolently eyeing each other across a trembling world.

The great weakness of the Security Council, of course, is that while it has all the attributes of authority, it lacks the actual instruments of power necessary to make that authority real.

MORAL POWER OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

It is significant that President Eisenhower chose to speak before the General Assembly. This body, in which all the sixty Member States are represented, has been variously called an international debating society, the forum of humanity, and the town meeting of the world. It is weak where the Security Council is strong, at least on paper. It has none of the outward attributes of authority, but it has power over the hearts and minds of men out of all proportion to the actual authority it wields. Far from being a Parliament of Man, it has authority only to make recommendations to Member States, and a state may fail to comply with these recommendations without running the risk of coercive sanctions.

I have said of the United Nations in general that it has become a vessel too frail to serve as the repository of the hopes and fears of humanity in the atomic age. Lacking something better, we have at least in the General Assembly a repository of the good sense and good conscience of humanity.

It used to be said that while the United Nations has not achieved much success in the political and security field (disarmament is one of its more awesome failures), it has done much useful work in the economic, social, cultural, humanitarian, trusteeship, and legal fields. During the past seven years, this has been largely true. Despite the cold war, the United Nations has accomplished tasks of international cooperation which, against the background of previous history, are nothing short of prodigious. The problems of world economic and social development, particularly the effort to raise standards of living, the promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms, the march of the trust and non-self-governing territories towards eventual freedom, the continued development of international law—all these have been faced and measurable progress has been made in their solution, in the very shadow of the cold war.

We have the Technical Assistance Program and we have the useful work continually being done by the specialized agencies in the fields of agriculture, industry, science, education, health, finance, trade, transportation, and so forth.

CONCERTED CAMPAIGN TO ARREST PROGRESS

All this is true. But today there seems to be a general feeling that the possibilities of United Nations action even in these nonpolitical questions have become nearly exhausted. We have come to a point of diminishing returns. There is growing reluctance on the part of the developed countries to assist the underdeveloped countries in their programs of economic development. One example is what has happened to Point Four in the United States; another, the freezing of the Expanded Program of Technical Assistance; yet another, the virtual pigeonholing of the project for the establishment of the Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development.

In another field, there is the growing resistance of the more advanced countries to any action designed to promote respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world. The reasons they give are strange indeed: either they say that they do not wish to risk lowering their own standards by signing conventions or covenants concerning these matters with the less developed countries, or they say (as they do on questions like those of Tunisia, Morocco, and race conflict in South Africa) that the United Nations is forbidden by the domestic jurisdiction clause of the Charter from interfering in these matters.

In the matter of trusteeship and non-self-governing territories, we have come to a point not only where activity has ceased but where the trusteeship system and the principles underlying Chapter XI of the Charter are "withering on the vine."

It is difficult to escape the feeling that, on all sides, there is a concerted and deliberate campaign to arrest progress in these nonpolitical fields under the auspices of the United Nations.

One generous way of explaining this is to say that since so much progress has been achieved in these fields during the past seven years, we ought prudently to settle down and consolidate the gains that have been made. I am afraid, however, that the real reason is twofold: first, that further progress in these fields must now await the conclusion of the cold war and the establishment of genuine international cooperation among the great powers; and, second, that the United Nations has exhausted the limits of its possibilities of action under the Charter as it exists.

We are back where we started. We realize that there is something naïve and unreal in trying to promote higher standards of living, human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the rule of law in a world where men are condemned to live in constant fear of universal death. We are compelled to admit that under the present Charter, the United Nations is incapable of performing the service that it should for the peoples of the world in the atomic age; and the most important and urgent single element of that service is to save humanity from the menace of atomic destruction.

President Eisenhower, in the speech already referred to, justly credited the United Nations with realizing "part of the hopes" which had been pinned on it by the peoples of the world. But, in his own words, "the wisdom, the courage, and the faith which can bring to this world lasting peace for all nations" are yet to be provided.

NARROW MARGIN OF SAFETY

In other words, the question remains whether the good sense and good conscience of humanity will be asserted effectively and in time to forestall a war of annihilation with atomic and hydrogen weapons. Since our margin of safety is so narrow, we must ask ourselves whether we should be content with the United Nations as it is, knowing that it was tailored to the needs and uses of a preatomic age; and whether we should accept the terrible risk which attends the widening gap between our onrushing atomic science and the inertia of our political know-how.

The answer is not easy. For, throughout history, men have sought to retain the forms and institutions of their daily life long after these have been outmoded by the ideas and precepts of advancing science. In the past, however, there was always a margin of safety sufficient to afford men time to adjust themselves to the new conditions. Except for sudden revolutionary short cuts often necessitated by a massive accumulation of intolerable evils, it has nearly always been possible to remodel the old forms and institutions for the more spacious requirements of the new ideas and principles.

The question, I repeat, is whether in this atomic age, we are permitted the time to do this. It is a serious question, but one which should not lead to panicky solutions.

We must reject, to start with, the notion that the United Nations should be scrapped. I think that, faced with the possibility of universal disaster, sensible people everywhere are inclined to feel somewhat more comfortable and secure with the United Nations than without it. If it gave us nothing more than this sense of added comfort and security, the United Nations would be worth having.

However, a sense of security is not enough. The danger which mankind faces is both real and immediate, and it must be met simultaneously on two levels. First, we must endeavor to make the United Nations function to the utmost of its possibilities under the Charter, using its undoubted moral influence to help prevent impending disaster. Secondly, we must boldly explore ways of so strengthening the United Nations that it may have, before it is too late, the power to prevent universal catastrophe.

In other words, it is not enough to say that the United Nations is better than nothing. We shall find before long that the United Nations is not good enough unless it is the best that human ingenuity can fashion, unless it is able to provide "the wisdom, the courage, and the faith which can bring to this world lasting peace for all nations."

REVOLUTION FOR SURVIVAL

To cope with the atomic revolution, we need a political revolution of at least equal imagination and magnitude.

In accordance with Article 109 of the United Nations Charter, the tenth regular session of the General Assembly, which will be held in 1955, will discuss a proposal to call a conference to review the Charter. While such a conference will almost certainly be held, it is generally doubted whether any major amendments to the Charter will be approved. Since amendments are subject to the veto of the permanent members of the Security Council, it is naturally assumed that amendments purporting to strengthen the United Nations at the expense of the big-power veto and of the principle of state sovereignty will have little if any chance of adoption.

Nevertheless, necessity is still the mother of invention. Our need is for peace, no longer as a mere convenience but as the indispensable condition of human survival. This thought will not sink in easily, for men's minds have been inured to situations of measurable and surmountable danger. But the irrevocable finality of the danger we face will inevitably moderate the prevailing pessimism and compel all Member States, especially the great powers, to be more receptive to proposals for revision of the United Nations Charter, no matter how radical they may seem.

SCOPE OF ESSENTIAL CHARTER REVISION

In considering amendments, the yardstick should not be what seems possible in the context of the present international situation, but rather what is necessary to enable mankind to avoid atomic destruction. Accordingly, any and all proposals which would make it possible for the United Nations to cope with this danger should merit careful consideration. Such proposals would certainly include: the restriction of the scope of domestic jurisdiction and of the concept of state sovereignty, the limitation or abolition of the veto, the establishment of a system of weighted representation of Member States, and the placing in the hands of the United Nations of the means to enforce decisions involving international peace and security, particularly as regards the regulation of armaments, control of atomic energy, and prohibition of atomic weapons.

There are those who will say, "This is 'world government'"—and dismiss such proposals as utopian and impractical. But in the present context of human affairs, any revision of the United Nations Charter would be less than practical that did not attempt wisely and courageously to bridge the gap between what is possible and what is necessary. This can be done only by a bold new approach, a desperate frontal assault if you will, upon the problem of international organization, undeterred by the limitations of past or present experience. Do we discount the inertia which induces the human mind to seek the line of least resistance and to devise partial or makeshift remedies for recognized evils? By no means. However, while the force of custom is indeed powerful, it is not more so than the instinct of survival. Therefore, in this matter, we must not only think in terms of the improbable but also attempt the seemingly impossible.

The alternative is to let the world drift willy-nilly towards disaster, borne on the ancient tides of power politics and war.

I am aware that there are those who would choose this dread alternative. Their attitude has taken the form of an aggressive attack against the United Nations, not because it needs to be improved and strengthened, but because they would destroy it utterly and let every nation withdraw into the hard shell of its sovereignty like a turtle.

The reference to the turtle is a deliberate one. It emphasizes the fact that it is impossible, in this age of the jet plane, to return to the age of turtles. It is much later than we think.

General Carlos P. Romulo, Ph.D., Lit.D., D.H.S., LL.D., Makati, Rizal, the Philippines, was President of the fourth session of the United Nations General Assembly (1949-50) and Chief of the Philippine Delegation of the United Nations (1945-53). He headed the Philippine delegation at the San Francisco Conference. From 1950 to 1952 he was Secretary of Foreign Affairs of the Philippine Republic and from 1952 to 1953 Ambassador to the United States. He is now Chairman of the Philippine Delegation to the ninth session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Limits to the Powers of the United Nations

By RAYMOND ARON *

"The United Nations does not have the capacity to ensure collective security. . . . It would be a . . . mistake, through false idealism, to seek in the Charter the secret of salvation and a substitute for force."

IS the United Nations—and can it be—an essential instrument of security in the world of today? Can a revision of the Charter add decisively to the effectiveness of the international organization? It seems to me that the answer to these two questions must be negative. To attribute the impotence of the U.N. to the right of veto or to the division of powers between the Security Council and the General Assembly is to take the effect for the cause, to confuse the symptom with the disease, or to imagine that legal texts can change the ways of those strange monsters, the national states.

UNATTAINABLE PREREQUISITES OF UNITED NATIONS EFFECTIVENESS

Under what conditions would an organization of the United Nations type be able to guarantee security and peace? (By "organization of the United Nations type" we understand an organization created by states that subscribe to certain obligations; agree to abstain from certain acts, but do not renounce the defense of their interests, of which they remain the sole judges; do not alienate any part of their sovereignty; and do not stipulate in advance what military contribution they will provide to execute the organization's decisions.)

The first condition is that in case of unqualified aggression by a state the Security Council be unanimous in recognizing the aggression and in designating it as such, and unanimous in calling upon the Member States to come to the the same civilization, later like the non-Member States have both the determination and the military capacity to coerce the aggressor and punish him.

The second condition is that the conflict submitted to the U.N. be juridically defined, that it lend itself to the legal formalism of the Charter so that the wrongs of the parties may be determined, not according to political expediency, but by reference to the letter of fundamental texts and concepts.

Never in history have these two conditions been fulfilled; never have they been so far from fulfillment as in the present-day world.

THE IMPOTENCE OF THE PEACEFUL

It was imagined originally that the immense majority of peaceful states would alone always be able to control the aggressor state in a military way. Even if the states we are assuming to be peaceful were ready to go to war out of respect for a universal principle—which is not the case—the concentration of military might makes it impossible, at present, to coerce one of the two great powers by the threat of war alone. Against the Soviet Union or the United States, this threat would be totally ineffective since each of the two is alone capable of resisting the combined forces of the small and medium-sized nations and would not yield except at the end of a devastating war exhausting for all participants. We may add that the present grouping of states is such that neither of the great powers will ever be isolated. Each will always have with it those states which, because of geographic proximity, economic or military subordination, or ideological solidarity, will have no other recourse than to share their leader's fate to the end.

Moreover, let us not imagine that the uncommitted states, those that refuse to enter either of the two camps, would act more disinterestedly, with a more acute sense of equity. When his interests are involved, for example in Kashmir, Mr. Nehru does not differ from the foreign minister of any other country. When an international question not directly concerning India is at issue, he by no means says only what is true and just. His positions on Tibet (which, however, concerned India), on Korea, and on Indochina are compromises among truth, personal passions (anticolonialism, antioccidentalism), and realistic calculations (fear of China and desire to appease her).

In the last century, certain political writers placed their hopes in a world conscience: the judgment of public opinion would suffice to prevent crime or to check the criminal. Let us recognize the facts: in international relations, there is no world conscience—first, because the world is divided into two camps, each adhering to its own system of values; second, because even in those countries that subscribe to our system of values statesmen speak and act according to expediency. So much is this the case that if one of them, against his interest, were to proclaim a policy based upon pure morality, all observers would look for cynical motives behind such a noble and surprising conduct.

NATIONAL SELF-PRESERVATION: UNJUSTIFIABLE ISSUE IN INTERNATIONAL CONFLICT

As for the second condition, reality is more remote from it today than in any other period of history. The principal reasons for this seem to me to be the following: the juridical formalism of international organization supposes that states exist, and that the conflict submitted to the organization concerns essentially, if not exclusively, relations among states. However, in our era, every conflict involves the existence of one or several states, not the relations between them.

For the U.N., the crossing of the 38th parallel was a case of aggression in both the juridical and military senses of the term, since only the state of South Korea was recognized by the U.N., the government of North Korea having refused to apply the decisions made at Lake Success concerning elections and the establishment of a state for the entire country. But, within the ideological system of the Communist camp, only the North Korean government was legitimate, and the crossing of the parallel was not an act of aggression but an episode in a civil war for the liberation and unification of the entire country. Such at least was the esoteric version intended for the initiated; for the general public, it was proclaimed that South Korea began the war.

When the conflict is not between two governments of the same country, each justifying itself according to the principle of legitimacy of one of the two camps, it is likely to oppose a government which, formally, is in rebellion and a legitimate sovereign which, however, represents a distant imperial power. Such was the case of Indochina. Holland's sovereignty over the islands of Indonesia having been accepted and recognized by all states, there is no doubt that in positive international law the men who today form the Indonesian government were rebels in 1945, and that the problem was an internal one. Juridically, France can plead the same thesis with regard to Tunisia and Morocco. If one day a "revolutionary" Tunisian or Moroccan party were recognized as a government by the states of the Soviet bloc (as was Vietnam in Indochina), we would shift from case number two to case number one, that of two legitimate governments. The wording of the Charter empowering the U.N. to act in matters affecting world peace is so vague and open to such broad interpretation that the U.N. took jurisdiction in the case of Indonesia. In reality, the majority of the great powers, the Soviet Union and the United States, also sided with the rebels, and the Dutch government gracefully yielded to pressure. Thus the U.N. favored Indonesian independence, a fact which certainly may be considered a success, but which has little or nothing in common with "collective security."

* Translated by J. W. Smith.

A third possible case is that of the conflict among the Jewish Agency, the mandatory power (Great Britain), and the Arab countries. The U.N. was not called upon to prevent or sanction aggression, but had rather to arbitrate among incompatible claims. Following the departure of the mandatory power, the arbitrational decisions were not accepted, either by the Jewish Agency, transformed into the State of Israel, or by the governments of the Arab states. This double rejection meant war in Palestine. It has not been forgotten how the two series of events, deliberations and decisions in the U.N. on the one hand, military operations and the supplying of Israel with arms by the Communist bloc on the other, finally led to the creation of the State of Israel and a precarious armistice in Palestine. The intervention of the U.N. was neither decisive nor sterile. It was an element in an evolutionary process, as was also the local war. The U.N., in this case, was an organ of mediation and arbitration. It attempted not so much to state the law as to express what was expedient. Comparable to the concert of the great powers, it tried to shorten the war and give its sanction to a compromise among the conflicting interests, a compromise acceptable to the great powers. Would the intervention of the latter have been more or less easy in the absence of the U.N.? It is difficult to judge. Probably the state of public opinion makes it preferable to camouflage the intervention of the great powers under the U.N. formulas.

We see that in these typical cases what is involved is not collective security against an aggressor, but the very existence of the state, disputed between two governments that claim justification according to rival concepts of legitimacy, between a rebel government and a colonial power, between a governmental authority seeking to transform itself into a state and neighboring states that deny its right to a territory. In none of these can it be clearly perceived in what way a modified Charter would have facilitated the U.N.'s action or made it more effective.

THE ILLUSION OF COLLECTIVE SECURITY

The examples that we have just analyzed permit us to define the United Nations' function¹ in the world of today. The United Nations does not have the capacity to ensure collective security, a concept for which we vainly seek a meaning in the present world situation. Neither is it able to put an end to the cold war or diffuse a general feeling of security. The concentration of power in two continent-states, the ideological incompatibility between the ¹ It is obvious that we are considering solely the problem of war and peace, and that we are excluding social and economic functions, etc.

Soviet and the Western regimes, the reciprocal fear aroused by the accumulation of atomic bomb stock piles, and the growth in the destructive force of weapons of war are facts that it is not in anyone's power to eliminate.

The idea of world unity is the expression of a desire or of an illusion. It is of course true that the diffusion of Western civilization has spread a thin layer of uniform technology over the surface of all continents. From New York to San Francisco, passing through London, Paris, Rome, Beirut, Karachi, Bangkok, Hong Kong, Tokyo, and Hawaii, the air-line passenger will find the same airports, but he need only leave the fields to find the most varied means of transportation, from the donkey and the pushcart to the American car, the most varied clothing, ways of eating, and family institutions. In the sphere of international relations, it seems to me that the truth lies between the superficial uniformity of certain techniques and the infinite diversity of customs. The concentration of power and the progress of the means of transportation and destruction have placed the Soviet Union, Europe, the United States, China, and Southeast Asia in the same international political system. A sort of world concert has replaced what, fifty years ago, was called the concert of Europe. The diplomatic practices of Europe have become general, and the representatives of all continents and cultures converge upon New York.

But the unity of diplomatic forms, the unity of the world field of forces, does not constitute the equivalent of what was dreamed of in the ideology of "one world." Whatever may be the similarities of industrial structure in the United States and the Soviet Union, rivalry between the two countries has sprung up at first like conflicts of the past between the two leading states of the same civilization, later like the conflict between a state bearing a new universal religion and other states.

The conflict between the two leading states is made all the more serious, in Europe, by the unnatural division of Germany and Berlin; in Asia, by the internal weakness of the states that have succeeded the colonial empires of Europe, by the confusing of nationalism and Communism, by the revolt of the peasant masses, and the frustration of the intellectuals. None of these real causes of insecurity could be obviated by a system of collective security.

RELEVANCE OF THE U.N. IN THE BIPOLAR CONFLICT

Such a system, in theory, should prevent military aggression, the crossing of the border between Bulgaria and Yugoslavia, or between the German Democratic Republic and the Federal Republic. With or without the U.N., these kinds of aggression are improbable for they would entail a serious risk of generalized hostilities. (They are improbable, that is, as long as the Soviet leaders wish to avoid a general war.) The U.N., in this situation, is not powerless, but neither is it indispensable. It reinforces the unwritten guarantee given to most countries by American determination to resist Soviet expansion. But if the U.N. did not exist, it is to be doubted whether the Soviet Union would invade Iran or Yugoslavia militarily. The existence of the U.N. makes such an eventuality even more unlikely.

The usefulness of the U.N. is more marked in the case of conflict in which Soviet ideology justifies military action, but in which Western ideology forbids it. We are thinking of the case of Korea. The esoteric doctrine of the Communists did not exclude recourse to arms to extend the reign of popular democracy to a portion of a country still subjected to imperialism. If, in the absence of the U.N., the two governments had been on the same plane, neither one having a better title than the other, American leaders would perhaps have been more reluctant to intervene.

It must be admitted, however, that this advantage was compensated for by the difficulties resulting from the contradictions between the U.N. as an organism stating the law, and the U.N. as an organism attempting to limit hostilities. If North Korea was an aggressor, if the motion recommending that the United Nations Command unify the country was valid, China was guilty of aggression in sending its volunteers into combat. The U.N. did indeed proclaim it to be an aggressor, but shortly thereafter decided to open negotiations with the aggressor states. North Korea, which the U.N. did not recognize before June 1950, was recognized in effect at the end of its unjust war. Standing by a formalistic position, refusing negotiations with the aggressor, would have meant the risk of prolonging and expanding the war. It was judged preferable to accept the contradiction between legal and expedient action. But in the end the victim suffered as much as the guilty party, and the experience might well be as frightening to protected states as to aggressors. Even so, we may say that the U.N. tends to prevent the possible repetition of attempts to unify by force of arms countries divided between rival governments, that it aids, to a limited degree, in rallying a coalition against the aggressor without hindering realistic compromises between the two camps.

THE U.N.'s FICTITIOUS ROLE IN SMALL-STATE CONFLICT

What is the U.N.'s function in the case of conflict between two small states, both independent, neither of which is attached to the Soviet camp? We are thinking, for example, of the conflict of India and Pakistan over Kashmir, or of the absence of a peace treaty between Israel and the Arab countries. One is hesitant to answer because it is by no means certain that events would take an essentially different course if the U.N. did not exist. Perhaps the intervention of the great powers to stop hostilities between India and Pakistan was facilitated through the use of the international organization as an intermediary. But the recommendations concerning a plebiscite, made by a U.N. mediator, have not been accepted by the state that fears the results of consulting the people's wishes. I believe, after my experience in New Delhi, that basically the leaders of India do not consider themselves morally bound to subscribe to the results of a plebiscite. Strategic or geographic arguments seem to them to win out over the desires of the populations concerned. Quite obviously, no great power is interested in using coercion to make India and Pakistan comply with U.N. law. The matter will be decided locally in a manner determined by the facts and the relation of forces. Perhaps this is a deplorable conclusion, but it would be still more deplorable for us to give way to illusions dangerous for the values we profess to defend.

As for Israel and the Arab countries, peace between them will be established not by the U.N. but, sooner or later, by the pressure of Western countries, which are as anxious to pacify local disputes outside the Soviet zone as the U.S.S.R. is to inflame them.

U.N.'s IRRESPONSIBLE SPONSORSHIP OF COLONIAL "LIBERATION"

Finally, there remains the possible U.N. action in case of conflict between "rebels" and a "colonial power." It would seem that there are as many problems as there are concrete situations. According to the circumstances, one is tempted either to blame or to praise the U.N., never to count on a revision of the Charter to increase its merits or diminish its shortcomings.

This is not the place to evaluate French policy in North Africa. Appeal to the U.N. has resulted in many speeches condemning France, and in others, made by the representatives of the colonial powers, denying the right of the international organization to intervene in internal questions. Have these speeches influenced French leaders? I fear not; I fear they have awakened hopes in the minds of nationalist leaders, and have contributed to "hardening" the attitude of the French administration. Abstractly, one may say that the U.N., by the tribute it offers, by the ideology on which it is based, and by the inquiries it conducts, supports "liberation" movements in the nonautonomous territories of the non-Soviet world (obviously the very existence of nonautonomous territories in the Soviet Union is ignored by the U.N.). There are some who will take satisfaction in this fact. We could be surer that satisfaction is appropriate if the U.N. were able to create states and establish an order in place of those whose authority it undermines. Such is not always the case, unless a great power continues to support the structure upon which the U.N. places its seal, for example, Great Britain in the independent kingdom of Libya.

Perhaps in Southeast Asia appeal to the U.N. will favor the Western effort to prevent the sovietization of this economically and strategically important zone. The difficulty will be the same as in Korea: in Vietnam, in Laos, in Cambodia, tomorrow perhaps in Thailand, there will be two governments. There will probably be a majority in the General Assembly ready to proclaim that in Laos and Cambodia only the non-Communist governments are legitimate, which is likely to be true there, though not in Vietnam. Even if the Communist states oppose this majority decision, it will facilitate the formation of a regional alliance and perhaps American military intervention.

It is obvious that this hypothesis will be confirmed only if the United States decides to act, and carries with it the interested parties—the threatened Asian countries and the countries of the Atlantic alliance. The U.N. cannot stop the Sino-Communist expansion which advances by infiltration, guerrilla warfare, the formation of rival governments, and the regrouping of populations scattered among several countries (the Thai). The U.N. can only facilitate the rallying of public opinion in the United States, and the creation of a common front. In other words, if governments were free to make decisions through an untrammelled exercise of authority, the U.N. would scarcely be useful. Recourse to the U.N. is less the homage paid to virtue, less the evocation of an unreal dreamworld than an acknowledgment of democratic ideologies that constitute a determining factor by the influence they exercise over the minds of men.

Perhaps it would in fact be difficult, men and circumstances being what they are, to defend Southeast Asia against Sino-Communist expansion without creating a regional alliance, itself placed under the sponsorship of the U.N., to calm the scruples of the independent states of Asia. It is obvious that this formal framework will never be more than a condition of the essential factor, namely the great powers' will to act. It would be a mistake through false realism not to recognize the necessity of this framework. It would be an equal mistake, through false idealism, to seek in the Charter the secret of salvation and a substitute for force.

THE REALISTIC REVOLUTION AGAINST WAR

Perhaps the preceding discussion will be judged cynical. Personally, I do not so regard it. To say that the establishment of the U.N. has not essentially changed international relations is a judgment of fact, not a value judgment. The critic of these views should prove that the judgment is false before accusing us of cynicism. If he admits that the judgment is true for the past, but holds that it must cease to be so in the future, it is incumbent upon him to show in what way we may modify the fundamental conditions of the present historical situation which limit the effectiveness of the U.N.

Raymond Aron, Doctor of Letters, Paris, is professor at the Institut d'Études politiques and the École Nationale d'Administration. He is contributing editor of Le Figaro and author of Le Grand Schisme (1948), Les Guerres en Chaîne (1951; published in the United States as The Century of Total War), and other works.

Real discussion, beyond these observations which are difficult to refute, should deal with the significance of this analysis. Can we conceive of an international system in which the U.N. would genuinely guarantee the security of all and every one? Would it be enough to change certain elements in the situation, or would it be necessary to change the essential characteristics of relations between states as we have known them for the past six thousand years?

Such a discussion would go beyond the scope of this short study. Permit us to advance, without demonstration, the following hypothesis: the progress in arms of mass destruction or the spread of a world-wide empire will perhaps eliminate wars between states from history. I doubt whether an international organization will ever be capable of such a revolution.

Developing the Peaceful Settlement Functions of the United Nations

By ELMORE JACKSON

"... we are not making effective use of the legal instrument we now have. . . . the essential problem . . . is that of creating out of the United Nations an instrument of trust. . . ."

IS there enough power undergirding the efforts of the United Nations to settle political disputes? If not, what types of additional power, or authority, would contribute to the effectiveness of the U.N.'s peaceful settlement work?

These questions are basic to the considerations surrounding any Charter review conference. There is no reason, however, for these questions to be any easier to answer in the field of international disputes than would similar questions which might be asked in the field of labor-management disputes—or indeed in any form of conflict settlement. Every dispute has its own characteristics and its own human equation. The general field of dispute settlement has always been one in which generalization is hazardous. But with a Charter review conference in prospect, some analysis should now be attempted. Before venturing on this uneasy ground let us look briefly at the general setting in which the U.N.'s more specific mediation and conciliation work takes place.

Undergirding the special efforts of the United Nations to settle particular conflicts such as those in Palestine, Indonesia, Kashmir, and South Africa has been the general work of the organization in the economic, social, and trusteeship fields. By the constant adjustment of conflicting economic interests, by stimulating economic-development programs through the provision of technical assistance, by helping to establish common objectives in the social field, and by providing a framework through which dependent peoples can progress toward self-government, the United Nations is helping to channel into patterns of orderly evolution a multiplicity of problems—many of which would otherwise develop into threats to peace. This is peaceful settlement at its best—in the early stages and on a preventive basis.

No less important is the general political work of the General Assembly. Here, at the beginning of each Assembly, each national delegation has the opportunity to air its grievances, to state its concerns, and to make its contribution to the climate of opinion in which the succeeding political business will be conducted. While more and more specific disputes are being brought to the attention of the General Assembly, the Assembly is especially well adapted to the transaction of what might be called "general political business of international interest."

The Assembly is the town meeting of the world. Thus to refer to it is not to deprecate its power—as anyone familiar with a New England town meeting should know. Trial balloons are sent up—and brought down! Log-rolling and block voting take place. But beneath it all essential fact finding and fact assessing take place. Influences of conciliation and mediation are brought to bear. Important principles are delineated and agreed upon. Adjustments and compromises take place. This is essential international political business in the modern world—conducted as it must be in a common setting.

If the Assembly is to play an increasingly effective role in the peaceful settlement of disputes, either directly or through subsidiary bodies, must it be given more legal power through a Charter review (or revision) conference?

SCOPE AND POWERS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

While the United Nations Charter conferred upon the Security Council special responsibilities in the maintenance of international peace and security, substantial responsibilities were also given to the General Assembly. Under the Charter the General Assembly may (1) "discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter . . .";¹ (2) "consider the general principles of co-operation in the maintenance of international peace and security . . .";² (3) "discuss any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security brought before it by any Member of the United Nations, or by the Security Council, or by a state which is not a Member of the United Nations . . .";³ (4) "initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of . . . promoting international co-operation in the political field. . . ."⁴ "Subject to the provisions of Article 12 [consideration by the Security Council], the General Assembly may recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations, including situations resulting from a violation of the

¹ Art. 10.

² Art. 11, par. 1.

³ Art. 11, par. 2.

⁴ Art. 13, par. 1.

provisions of the present Charter setting forth the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations."⁵

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish any problem of peaceful settlement which would be excluded from General Assembly consideration under these broad provisions. Excepted only are questions under consideration by the Security Council. A means for the orderly and vetoless transfer of any of these problems to the General Assembly "if the Security Council is failing to exercise its function of maintaining international peace and security" is provided by the "Uniting for Peace" resolution adopted by the General Assembly in 1950, following the outbreak of the Korean War.

If the General Assembly has sufficient scope to consider any problem which might arise, what of its power to deal with this wide range of issues?

There are two principal aspects to this felt need for more power in the United Nations. The first concern is for an organization with sufficient moral, economic, political, and police strength for would-be adventurers to be deterred by this combined strength (and by predictable consequences) from embarking upon, or continuing, a course of action leading to the disruption of the international public order. A second concern is for the authority and prestige to deal with political disputes—if possible before they become threats to the peace.

The United Nations Charter distinguishes, in general, between the functions of the Organization in handling threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, or acts of aggression (Chapter VII) and the settlement of the background political disputes which may have caused the disruption of public order (Chapter VI). In the former case the Organization may make recommendations for (or, in the case of the Security Council, decide upon) measures, including the use of armed force, to maintain or restore international peace and security. In its efforts, however, to get a settlement of the political issues which may have caused the dispute, the primary reliance is upon the methods of investigation, conciliation, and mediation. In dealing with threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, or acts of aggression under Chapter VII it is even suggested that, in calling upon the parties to a dispute to comply with provisional measures, these measures might well be "without prejudice to the rights, claims, or position of the parties concerned."⁶ In its work under Chapter VI the Security Council may go so far as to recommend terms of settlement if it "deems that the continuance of the dispute is in fact likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security."⁷ Otherwise, while the Council may recommend or initiate appropriate methods or procedures of adjustment, it may make recommendations with regard to terms of settlement only on the request of the parties.⁸

⁵ Art. 14.

It is evident that those who framed the Charter believed that the full power of the United Nations should be used to restrain threats to the peace and, if a breach of the peace or an act of aggression had already occurred, to restore international peace and security. While they were not prepared to have this same power used to enforce a particular form of political settlement, the Security Council was empowered to recommend terms of settlement if the Council concluded that international peace and security were "likely to be endangered." A similar power appears now to reside in the General Assembly under the "Uniting for Peace" resolution.

⁶ Art. 40.

⁷ Art. 37.

⁸ Art. 38.

In other types of conflict settlement a public recommendation by the mediating body has often proved an effective means of securing agreement. The fact that even this limited power of recommendation has been used so infrequently by the U.N. suggests that Charter limitations may not at the present time be a major handicap to the development of the U.N.'s peaceful settlement activities. If the members of the United Nations have been reluctant to encourage the use of that power which the Organization now possesses, it is even more unlikely that they would, barring a drastic alteration in international legal relationships, take the further step of bringing some form of compulsory arbitration more into the forefront of the U.N.'s peaceful settlement work.

NEED FOR MORE POLITICAL POWER?

Not all the advocates of more power for the General Assembly are seeking an increase in its legal power. Mr. John Foster Dulles in his speech of January 18, 1954, before the Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, said:

In the General Assembly, each nation has one vote—is this the best arrangement? If the General Assembly is to assume greater responsibilities, then should there not be some form of weighted voting, so that nations which are themselves unable to assume serious military or financial responsibilities cannot put those responsibilities on other nations? Should there be, in some matters, a combination vote whereby affirmative action requires both a majority of all the members, on the basis of sovereign equality, and also a majority vote, on a weighted basis, which takes into account population, resources, etc.?

The Secretary obviously had in mind the exploration of possible Charter changes which might give more practical political power to the General Assembly. It is difficult in theory to argue against Charter modifications which it might at some future time be possible to achieve along these lines. The present voting system does exert certain restraints on the large powers. This makes for a system in which at times the full scope of the diplomatic resources of these powers has been used in the search for support on certain issues. While there are some countries that would look with favor on voting changes in the Assembly, it seems likely that if the United States were to emphasize such revision as one of its principal objectives in a Charter review conference, many of the small countries would lose some of their interest in such a conference. They are not likely to look with favor on revisions which would reduce their power. Even a simple majority vote on the holding of such a conference might under these circumstances be very difficult to obtain.

CREATING AN INSTRUMENT OF TRUST

In questions of the settlement of international disputes, the essential problem is not that of the legal power of the United Nations. The problem is that of creating out of the United Nations an instrument of trust which can be relied upon to render effective service in the peaceful settlement field. While certain minor adjustments in the Charter might facilitate the creation of such an instrument, the basic problem is not the formal enabling powers of the Charter. It is a question of assembling within this area of U.N. activity persons who because of their political wisdom and experience, their insight into contemporary issues, and their personal integrity inspire confidence that the vital national interests with which they deal will be handled with resourcefulness, patience, and care. It is also a question of establishing a more effective means through which certain lessons can be drawn from past experience—experience both inside and outside the United Nations.

Let us look first at this question of past experience. The United Nations staff is now engaged in the assembling of a general repertory of Security Council experience and of general experience under the Charter. But not since the Interim Committee was, for all practical purposes, laid to rest in 1950 have the members of the United Nations made any sustained effort to draw lessons from the U.N.'s past work in dispute settlement. Luis Padilla Nervo of Mexico in September 1952, on the occasion of his turning over the presidency of the General Assembly to Lester B. Pearson of Canada, suggested that the General Assembly establish a committee to concern itself with the development of the U.N.'s peaceful settlement work and that this committee operate parallel to the Collective Measures Committee. This apparently useful suggestion was not taken up by the General Assembly.

What new approaches might a review of past experience suggest?

While different disputes call for different handling there has been a general trend in recent years away from extensive debate and "instructed" commissions toward a more flexible and informal use of the United Nations' peaceful settlement facilities. It is easy to understand the reluctance of states to turn to the United Nations for help in a dispute in which they are a party if the U.N.'s first move is to be a public debate in the Security Council or in the General Assembly. The debate is certain to bring new political influences into the situation, some of them extraneous and many of them unpredictable. The general debate has the possibility of aggravating the dispute and sometimes of making its ultimate solution more difficult. Thus a state's decision to submit a dispute to the United Nations is usually based on its estimate of the possibilities of picking up support for its case.

But suppose it were possible for the United Nations to provide, initially, a more informal (and less legislative) type of aid to the disputants. Might there not under these circumstances be a freer turning to the United Nations and a freer use of its facilities?

THE SECRETARY-GENERAL'S KEY ROLE

The initial point of regular informal political contact in the United Nations is the office of the Secretary-General. It would appear to have been the intention of the framers of the present Charter that the office of the Secretary-General should, in its political functions, be developed over and above that of the comparable office in the League of Nations. Under Article 99 of the United Nations Charter, "the Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security."

It is apparent that both the first Secretary-General and the present one have conceived of their role as being a broad one. Probably no single individual connected with the U.N.'s peaceful settlement work can have as much influence as the Secretary-General in building confidence in the United Nations political work and in making the Organization a "trusted instrument." In order to fulfill effectively, however, his oft-times quiet and backstage role, the Secretary-General must have a group of senior officers in the political field who can keep him constantly apprised of important developments in all major geographical regions with which he must deal. The method through which this skilled political advice is made available is less important than that it should be available within the Organization as a whole. The dictates of good administration would appear to suggest that such a staff should either be located in the Department of Political and Security Council Affairs or attached to the Executive Office of the Secretary-General.

Supplemental to those on his own staff on whom he can call, the Secretary-General has two other principal sources of political and diplomatic experience to which he can turn—for either informal or formal assistance.

The heads of the sixty permanent delegations to the U.N. are continuously available. Some of them have had extensive diplomatic experience and many of them can be focal points of conciliation as issues are weighed and negotiated both before and during consideration by the Security Council or the General Assembly. The representatives of certain countries are often able, for reasons both of geography and interest, to be of special assistance to the Secretary-General on an informal basis. In making the United Nations a trusted instrument of political negotiation there can be no substitute for the closest diplomatic relationship between the Secretary-General and the heads of the delegations representing the Member States.

PANEL FOR INQUIRY AND CONCILIATION

The Secretary-General and the principal officers of the General Assembly and the Security Council have another diplomatic resource which could be much more fully used. On April 28, 1949, the General Assembly established a Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation. The international panel was to be composed of persons who "by reason of their training, experience, character and standing, are deemed to be well fitted to serve as members of commissions of inquiry or of conciliation and who would be disposed to serve in that capacity." Each Member State was permitted to designate five persons. The Panel was to be available to the Security Council and the General Assembly, to their subsidiary organs, or to Member States involved in controversies. The method of selection was to be determined in each case by the appointing organ. Upon the joint request of the parties to a controversy, appointment could be by the Secretary-General, the President of the General Assembly, or the chairman of the Interim Committee. The administration of the Panel was lodged with the Secretary-General.

The theory behind the Panel was an eminently good one. It was believed that it would facilitate the U.N.'s dispute settlement work to have in being a roster of persons well qualified for service as members of mediation or conciliation commissions—persons who in accepting designation had entered into certain informal undertakings as to availability and interest and who were of sufficient eminence to have been designated by their own governments. Initial designations were for five years. These five years have elapsed, and the time has now come for the Panel to be reconstituted.

The United Nations Charter encourages parties to a dispute to attempt to settle the conflict themselves before bringing it to the United Nations. Should disputing parties not at times be encouraged to turn to the international Panel and by agreement to secure the services of one of its members as a mediator and conciliator? Following the lead given by other types of contracts or commercial agreements, treaties between states might provide for certain types of disputes under the treaty to be subjected to mediation or to arbitration by a qualified person selected from the Panel by the two parties or by the Secretary-General. The Panel has to date been used only once—in the selection by the Security Council of Dr.

Frank P. Graham as mediator in the India-Pakistan dispute over Kashmir. The Panel constitutes a resource for peaceful settlement which could be more fully used by the United Nations.

President of General Assembly in conciliatory work

The trend toward a more informal type of political negotiation is further indicated in the increasing use which has been made of the office of the President of the General Assembly. At the first part of the third session of the General Assembly, held in Paris in 1948, Mr. Evatt of Australia was associated with an effort, authorized by the Assembly, to conciliate the dispute over the Greek children. In 1950, as President of the Assembly, Mr. Entezam of Iran served as chairman of two different good offices commissions set up by the General Assembly in an effort to seek a solution of the Korean conflict. During the fall of 1951 Mr. Padilla Nervo of Mexico, as President of the Assembly, served as the chairman of a closed conference of the principal powers concerned which made an effort, during the Assembly, to break the disarmament deadlock. Mr. Pearson of Canada during his presidency of the General Assembly in the fall of 1952 was deeply involved in efforts to achieve an armistice in Korea.

Possibilities of the Panel

The articles relating to the composition and use of the Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation permit the President of the Assembly and the Secretary-General to appoint persons from the Panel to undertake tasks of inquiry or conciliation when requested to do so by a treaty or by the parties to a dispute. There would appear to be no reason, however, why the President of the General Assembly and the Secretary-General could not, if they so desired, associate some member of the Panel with them in any informal conciliatory work in which they were engaged. Both men are free to appoint such assistants as they require. Through such informal association, experience could be gained against the time when formal appointment might be made by conflicting parties or some special responsibility assigned by the Security Council or the General Assembly. Persons from the reconstituted Panel could be asked occasionally to serve as rapporteur of the Security Council, in keeping with the recommendation of the Interim Committee in April 1949.

The history of international mediation has been a history of the search for the impartial and effective third party. We have commented on the importance of having readily available, competent, and impartial individuals who are in a position to use their good offices in disputes previous to or during the more formal consideration of these questions by one of the established organs of the United Nations. Let us now turn to alternative methods that might be employed by the Security Council, the General Assembly, or a subsidiary organ in the consideration of disputes.

PRIVACY IN NEGOTIATION

It has been suggested that a rapporteur might be appointed to negotiate with the parties following the opening statements by the parties in the Security Council or in the General Assembly. The President of the Security Council has at times performed this function. There are times when it is desirable for the opening statements of the parties to be followed by statements on the part of other members which reveal the degree to which sentiment exists for peaceful settlement—or for a particular type of settlement. To allow the debate to go on to the passage of a resolution frequently results, however, in a hardening of positions and an exacerbation of the conflict.

It has been suggested, therefore, that the Security Council and possibly even the General Assembly should experiment with a plan under which, in certain cases, it would terminate debate following the principal statements on the part of all interested parties and at that point turn the negotiation over to a more private treatment. This suggestion is well worth exploring. It is not unlike the use of working parties which has been developed by the Assembly during two of its recent regular sessions. We have mentioned the working party approach as used on the disarmament question at the 1951 session of the General Assembly in Paris, when the debate in the Political Committee was adjourned to permit a ten-day closed conference of the countries principally concerned to meet under the chairmanship of Mr. Padilla Nervo, the President of the Assembly. A similar approach was used by the Second Committee during the 1953 session, when a subcommittee met in closed session under the chairmanship of Mr. Mates of Yugoslavia in an effort to reach agreement on the Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development.

Perhaps enough has been said to indicate that the United Nations has by no means exhausted the possibilities of further shaping its procedures and its personnel in ways which could aid it in gaining the confidence and trust of its members in its work in peaceful settlement. It is not so much by reaching after the spectacular as by "month to month" gains in these areas that the U.N.'s reputation will eventually be built.

POWER TO RECOMMEND TERMS OF SETTLEMENT

Let us return now to the question of the power of the Security Council or of the General Assembly, or of one of their subsidiary organs, to recommend terms of settlement to parties in dispute. We have indicated that this was a power which the United Nations has thus far been reluctant to use. Mediators or conciliation commissions have frequently urged the parties in private to accept particular terms of settlement, but the Council and the General Assembly have been chary of attempting to go on record on behalf of such detailed terms. The veto is a constant hazard in the Security Council, and the General Assembly because of its size is hardly adapted to the detailed consideration required in these matters. Furthermore, such resolutions tend to freeze the situation and reduce possibilities of later compromise. There are, therefore, substantial arguments against more frequent attempts by the Security Council or the General Assembly to recommend specific terms of settlement.

Could not a case be made, however, for subsidiary negotiating organs, appointed either by the Security Council or the General Assembly, to have more freedom to make recommendations for settlement, and to release these recommendations if they felt that public consideration of them might promote a settlement? It seems likely that if the negotiating organs had the power to publicize recommendations, the disputing parties might take these recommendations more seriously in the preceding private negotiations. We have suggested that this has been the experience in other types of conflict settlement. It is the usual practice for the parent body to retain its freedom of action, but public discussion of recommendations made by a subsidiary body enables both parties to assess more accurately their respective positions—and the needs and possibilities of compromise.

It would undoubtedly be very much easier for U.N. commissions and mediators to develop and use recommendations if, as proposed by the Vandenberg resolution adopted by the Senate in June 1948, the veto could be removed by voluntary agreement from "all questions involving peaceful settlement of international disputes and situations." The Security Council would then be able by simple majority vote to fix flexible terms of reference for its subsidiary negotiating bodies. It would also be freed to give more active support to such bodies, including, if it appeared in order, support to either general or specific recommendations for settlement.

To what extent is Article 37 of the Charter a handicap to the development of this procedure? This article permits the Security Council to make recommendations on terms of settlement in cases in which the Council decides "that the continuance of the dispute is in fact likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security." The General Assembly has not been given such powers explicitly, but it would be difficult, following the series of Assembly resolutions on Palestine and the subsequent passage of the "Uniting for Peace" resolution, to maintain that such powers were lacking.

There is an understandable reluctance among states to have disputes to which they are a party deemed a danger to the peace. The words of Article 37, however, are mild ones—"likely to endanger." It would be difficult in this anxious and frequently trembling world to conclude that any dispute between two countries of sufficient importance to be put on the agenda of the Security Council or the General Assembly did not in fact fall into this category. There may be times, however, in which it is not politic or conducive to a prompt settlement to say so. It might thus be wise, at some time when other Charter revisions are being made, for Article 37 to be redrafted. In the meantime, in an international situation in which we are in much need of plain speaking about the importance of avoiding disturbances to the peace, this Article should not be a serious handicap to the development and use of the power to recommend terms of settlement.

In a world so unsteadied by the ever present possibility of the misuse of unprecedented power, who is there among us to say that our intergovernmental institutions would not serve us better if they could, with common consent, be substantially altered? But any such common consent will only flow from a much clearer conviction than appears now to be evident that our principal difficulty lies in Charter limitations. Any general sampling among those reasonably well versed in United Nations affairs would, I believe, show an overwhelming conviction that we are not making effective use of the legal instrument we now have. Greater use can be made of the offices of the Secretary-General and the President of the General Assembly. The Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation can be reconstituted. Further use can be made of the power to make public recommendations. While we seek opportunities and agreements to perfect the Charter, let us realize that in creating an institution of trust, it is the human equation that makes the greatest difference.

Elmore Jackson, New York City, is director of the Program at the United Nations of the American Friends Service Committee. He has served as personal assistant and political officer to the United Nations mediator in the Kashmir dispute between India and Pakistan. He was for a time personnel director and later assistant executive secretary of the American Friends Service Committee. He is the author of Meeting of Minds (1952), a comparative study of conflict settlement in the labor and international fields.

Barriers to the Expansion of United Nations Economic Functions

By RAYMOND F. MIKESELL

"... while there is plenty of room for improvement in the organizational structure of the United Nations and its specialized agencies, the basic problems with respect to the role of the U.N. in economic and social affairs cannot be resolved by changes in its constitution. . . . International economic co-operation . . . must be based on a foundation of political security and trust."

THE United Nations Charter rightly recognizes the intimate relationship between international peace and security and the solution of economic problems. Paragraph 3 of Article 1 of the Charter states as one of the purposes of the U.N. "To achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character. . . ." In addition members pledged themselves "to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom" and "to employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples." But the U.N. has no power to compel action in the economic and social sphere on the part of its members, nor was it given a clear authority to initiate action beyond the making of studies and recommendations, preparing international conventions for the signature of governments, and convening international conferences. The Organization could, however, perform services upon the request of member governments, and there is no limit to the number and functions of specialized agencies which might be created for operating assignments.

The question of how far the U.N. should extend itself into the field of operations for implementing the purposes of the Charter in the economic and social field has rarely been debated as a constitutional issue, and a change in the language of the Charter could scarcely be expected to resolve the fundamental differences among the members in this field. Moreover, it is difficult to see how a formula could be devised, and still less agreed upon, which would provide the answer for all situations which may arise in the future. Take for example the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA). Korean relief was a responsibility of the United Nations arising out of the Organization's "police" action in Korea. Similarly relief and resettlement of the Palestine refugees is intimately related to the political activities of the U.N. in connection with the Arab-Israeli war.¹ Even if it were considered desirable for the U.N. to refrain from administering action programs in the economic field, it cannot escape responsibility for economic problems growing out of its political or military activities.

So long as the principle of noninterference with the internal affairs of the members is maintained and so long as members cannot be required to contribute specific sums of money for special economic and social activities, the problems of implementing the economic and social objectives of the U.N. will continue to be dealt with on an evolutionary basis and will be governed in large measure by the political relationships between and the political attitudes within the Member States. It is the position of this paper, therefore, that while there is plenty of room for improvement in the organizational structure of the United Nations and its specialized agencies, the basic problems with respect to the role of the U.N. in economic and social affairs cannot be resolved by changes in its constitution. The nature of these problems will be discussed in the remainder of this paper.

¹ The General Assembly established in 1950 the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East to administer a program of relief and rehabilitation among the Arab refugees.

THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

Chapter X of the United Nations Charter established the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) as the principal U.N. organ, under the General Assembly, for discharging the functions of the U.N. in the field of international economic and social co-operation outlined in Chapter IX of the Charter. The Council is a political body of eighteen members, with a number of functions requiring a variety of competence and organizational structure for effective fulfillment. The Council undertakes studies, issues reports, and makes recommendations on a wide variety of economic and social matters. To assist in this work it has established commissions such as the Economic and Employment Commission and the Fiscal Commission, which are composed of government nominees who debate issues in public session for the benefit of their constituents, just as do the members of the Council when the resolutions are referred to that body. Since the functional Commissions have tended to be little more than subarenas for the cold-war debate, most of them have been inactive in recent years. The Council's other duties include the co-ordination of the activities of the specialized agencies, calling conventions for the establishment of new specialized agencies, advising the General Assembly, and performing services at the requests of members of the U.N.² Thus ECOSOC combines in one agency the functions of one or more specialized agencies, that of a co-ordinator of other specialized agencies, an economic and social adviser, a research institute, a high level forum for debating divergent social and economic philosophies, and a propaganda medium for the opponents in the cold war. While it is not the primary purpose of this paper to discuss organization, it would appear that the ineffectiveness of the U.N. may be due in part to the multiplicity of its functions. In addition, there should be a clear distinction between bodies which are supposed to do a technical job and those whose members represent governments and which are supposed to negotiate and debate. Finally it should be recognized that serious negotiations cannot be conducted in public forums.

A more fundamental barrier to effective action by ECOSOC in implementing the purposes of the Charter is to be found in the cold war itself and in the lack of any political basis for co-operative action between the East and the West on economic and social matters. While this barrier has been dealt with in certain of the specialized agencies through the virtual exclusion of Soviet bloc members, the most important operative organs, the Organization for European Economic Co-operation (OEEC), the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and the European Payments Union (EPU), have been entirely outside of the U.N.

² For a critical discussion of ECOSOC see A. Loveday's "Suggestions for the Reform of the United Nations Economic and Social Machinery," International Organization (World Peace Foundation), August 1953, pp. 325-41.

It has been suggested that the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly could carry out their functions more readily if they had greater powers over the operations of the specialized agencies, particularly those with substantial resources at their disposal. There is no doubt that better co-ordination is needed between the specialized agencies, particularly in the field of technical assistance, and perhaps between technical assistance and the leading activities of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD). There are also problems of co-ordination between the contracting parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) which have not been satisfactorily dealt with. However, if the U.N. were given powers over the IBRD or the IMF it would strike at the principle of weighted voting in these institutions. Moreover, not all U.N. members belong to each of the specialized agencies, and these agencies would not welcome dictation by nonmembers.

THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

Many of the international agencies responsible for implementing the broad economic and social objectives of the U.N. either had been established or had had their charters negotiated before the U.N. came into existence. These organizations include the International Labor Organization (ILO), the Food and Agricultural Organization (FAO), the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the Universal Postal Union, and the International Telecommunication Union, to name a few. These organizations tend to have highly specialized functions and operate on the basis of international agreements with respect to the rules of conduct in their respective fields. Except for the Fund and the Bank the operations of these agencies do not involve large amounts of money. The Fund and the Bank make loans in accordance with well-defined criteria. Moreover, the interests of the countries supplying the bulk of loan funds are well protected by a system of weighted voting and in the case of the Bank, by the necessity of maintaining the confidence of the American money market in the soundness of the Bank's obligations.

Several specialized organizations carry on technical assistance activities related to their special fields. These include the World Health Organization (WHO), FAO, ILO, and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), whose technical assistance activities are co-ordinated to a degree at least by the Technical Assistance Board of the U.N. The technical assistance functions of the U.N. will be taken up in a later section.

Finally, certain specialized agencies have been created by the U.N. for dealing with emergency relief and rehabilitation problems. These include the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF), the International Refugee Organization (IRO),³ the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), and UNKRA in Korea. While these organizations have distributed substantial sums of money for economic assistance, they have special characteristics which distinguish them from certain other types of economic aid programs which have been suggested as appropriate for the U.N. With one exception, they are emergency programs for particular areas or groups of peoples and deal with problems arising out of political or military developments in which the U.N. has been closely associated. Moreover, in the case of Arab refugee relief, the complex political nature of the problem would have made it difficult for individual countries like the United States to deal with it on a unilateral basis.

³ Now terminated.

In the light of the controversy over the continuation of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Organization in 1946—an organization which antedated the U.N.—we might raise the question as to whether or not all relief problems should be handled by a U.N. organization. Aside from the political split between the East and the West, in which UNRRA ultimately foundered, there are other difficulties inherent in multilateralized charity. There are first of all no adequate criteria for relief needs on a national basis, although starvation and the absence of clothing and shelter represent fairly definitive criteria for individual needs. But the question of whether or not a nation can or should meet the relief needs of its own people without outside help is a politico-economic one of the greatest complexity. There are countries where millions of people live their lives at what the Western world would regard as a subrelief standard. A relief standard to some peoples would seem like luxury to others. If Greece has civil disorder and widespread crop failures combined with an earthquake or two, should she receive relief or be asked to draw down her exchange reserves or borrow from the IBRD, the IMF, or the Export-Import Bank?

International relief in general is too broad and too vague a function to be administered by an international political body. It is extremely difficult to establish definite criteria for the carrying out of such a function by an international secretariat, and its administration by a large committee of members might mean little more than a political grab bag.

REGIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

The principal regional organizations within the U.N. framework are the Economic Commissions for Europe (ECE), for Latin America (ECLA), and for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE). Their activities, like those of the Economic and Social Council itself, are largely in the realm of study and debate, directed toward the economic problems of their respective regions. But the great diversity of economic structure and interests and the wide differences in political orientation which exist among the nations and territories of these huge geographical areas make these groupings somewhat artificial. An organization designed to deal with economic problems must have something more in common than geography. There must be at least a minimum of political cohesion and agreement on common goals, and there must be economic problems which are not only common to the geographical area but are capable of solution on a group basis.

Trade and foreign exchange relationships provide the most promising field for group action on a geographical basis, especially if the economies are sufficiently complementary to make possible and advantageous a larger amount of intra-area trade. This is true to a high degree in Europe, except that the split between the East and the West greatly limits the effectiveness of the ECE in the field. There are some possibilities for improving trade relations among the countries of the Far East by reducing trade barriers or the formation of customs unions. However, the fact that trade within the area is largely financed with Western European currencies which are already more or less interconvertible greatly limits the need for action in the field of foreign exchange. In Latin America the opportunities for an expansion of intraregional trade are far less promising, and the countries are divided between those which trade on a dollar basis and those which trade on an inconvertible basis. Solution to this problem must be found outside of the area.

Contiguous countries may find a basis for co-operation in the field of economic development, particularly in the development of rivers flowing through the territories of both, but it is difficult to see how effective co-operation in the development field can take place between Indonesia and Pakistan or between Ecuador and Argentina. Under certain conditions transportation and communications provide a basis for regional co-operation. Regional development funds would seem to make sense only if capital exporting countries are included in the region, and even here the economic advantages of regional over free-world funds or loan institutions are sometimes difficult to see. On the other hand, there may be a political basis for regional activity. For example, the United States might want to establish an intra-American bank, such as was planned before the war, as a part of a program of hemisphere solidarity.

It is worth noting that the most important regional economic organization from the standpoint of its concrete accomplishments is the OEEC, which is not associated with the U.N. This is an organization originally established in response to a request by the United States for joint planning of European recovery and composed of states with certain common political and economic aims. However, its greatest achievements lie in the field of trade and foreign exchange.

The purpose of the above remarks is not to deny the desirability of regional commissions as forums for the discussion and study of regional problems, but to raise certain questions as to their feasibility in the field of operations. Special regional organizations can only be effective in the fields of trade, finance, communications, and joint development if there exists a concrete basis for joint action in these fields. Geographical orientation alone is not a basis for action on a regional basis.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The demand for expanded economic functions of the U.N. stems largely from those who believe that economic development should be promoted by large grants and so-called soft or non-bankable loans, on a multilateral basis. This view is by no means confined to the representatives of the underdeveloped areas, although official support for U.N. development programs involving substantial sums of money is largely confined to the spokesmen for the underdeveloped countries.⁴ A contingent endorsement of the principle of a substantial U.N. development fund was given by the United States when it initiated a resolution in the U.N. General Assembly favoring the establishment of such a fund when sufficient progress had been made in internationally supervised disarmament.⁵ However, the United States has recently opposed the establishment of the proposed Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (SUNFED) which provides for initial contributions total-

⁴ The International Development Advisory Board in its Report to the President of the United States recommended the establishment of an International Development Authority to operate under a management contract with the IBRD. The Authority would have an initial capital not to exceed 500 million dollars of which the U. S. subscription would be 200 million dollars. Partners in Progress, Washington, D. C.: U. S. Government Printing Office, March 1951.

⁵ This resolution was adopted on December 7, 1953.

ing 250 million dollars. SUNFED was not officially opposed in principle but on the grounds that continued world tensions and the large United States defense and foreign aid budgets make a substantial contribution from the United States unwise at this time. However, many United States officials and Congressmen are privately opposed to the proposal in principle. Somewhat less controversial is the position that the activities of the U.N. Technical Assistance Board, which now operates on a budget of about 20 million dollars, should be substantially expanded.

Few would deny that there is a close relationship between world peace and security on the one hand and the realization of the aspirations of the peoples of the low-income areas of the world for a better life on the other. The fact that these areas are the most important battle ground in the cold war makes the promotion of economic development a vital aspect of the free world's struggle against Communist aggression. However, the fact that the U.N. includes the Soviet bloc has led many people to doubt the appropriateness of U.N. action in this field.

The basic argument for international programs for economic development as against unilateral ones administered by the capital-supplying countries is that only in this way can foreign aid be divorced from the sordidness of international politics and the fear of political dictation by the Western powers. It is also argued that an international institution can have a greater influence over the internal economic policies of the recipients of loans and grants, since recommendations from international civil servants are less likely to be considered as being motivated by special political or economic interests of foreign powers. Thus the countries from whom the bulk of the money for economic development must come are asked to employ a nonpolitical instrument for achieving what they regard to be long-term political or security objectives.

Difficulties of international economic programs

This thesis must, I believe, stand or fall on whether or not the internationalized activity is capable of being administered by technicians and administrators in accordance with objective criteria upon which the Member States are in reasonable agreement. If decisions as to the allocation of funds must be made in part at least on the basis of political interests of the members, the members contributing the bulk of the resources will insist either upon a veto or upon dominating the management of the organization. But an institution whose policies are dominated by the United States and a few Western powers may fail to satisfy the desire of the underdeveloped countries for an international institution whose policies are determined on a one country-one vote basis.

The experience of the IBRD provides a case in point. For various reasons the Bank is largely dominated by the United States, a fact which is frequently referred to by other countries. The Bank's charter lays down some rather specific rules for the guidance of its management, rules based on what have been regarded as conservative financial principles. And while one may argue that the Bank has been over-conservative in the implementation of those rules, they provide at least an approach to objective criteria for the administration of a loan fund by international civil servants. Yet if the Bank's policies were controlled on the basis of one country-one vote, its operations would undoubtedly be fraught with political difficulties and disagreements. Some countries have taken the position that the Bank's lending and loan-supervising policies represent an undue interference with their sovereignty. In fact some have expressed a preference for Export-Import Bank loans over those made by the IBRD on the alleged grounds that the standards of the United States government institution are somewhat more liberal.

While the criteria for the administration of an international grant fund would be somewhat less objective, it is quite possible to develop criteria for making capital grants in terms of the soundness and priority of the projects. In fact the standards for making sound capital grants which are capable of expanding the social product by something more than the rate of depreciation are similar to those for making bankable loans. It is quite likely therefore that the problem of allocating grants among the various claimants on an international fund would be solved for a time at least by a dearth of sound projects. But would such policies be satisfactory to a democratically chosen board of directors of an international grant fund? Or would the countries which made available the bulk of the resources be satisfied with what they might regard as unsound and wasteful policies?

There is perhaps an even more serious barrier to internationalized economic assistance today. Foreign aid, particularly in the United States, has come to be regarded as a political weapon for achieving specific objectives in the cold war. While it is true that we share the more fundamental objectives with the other countries of the free world, there are special political and economic objectives of the United States which could not always be realized through a multilateral development fund. For example, the international agency might not adopt the same regulations with respect to the trade relations between the aid recipient and the Soviet bloc which the United States requires of bilateral aid recipients. Or this country might want to deny aid entirely to countries with neutralist or Communist leanings, or to give the bulk of the aid to certain countries in strategic positions. On the economic side the United States has sought to make foreign aid available in certain forms such as surplus agricultural commodities, and has required that a portion of its aid funds be spent exclusively for United States commodities and that 50 per cent of the aid exports be carried in United States ships. Without passing judgment on these objectives, it is safe to say that these specific political and economic objectives could not well be realized in an international organization.

Technical assistance

Technical assistance, provided it does not involve a large element of commodity aid, is free of many of the difficulties referred to in connection with internationalized development grants. Technical assistance is necessarily limited by the availability of well-defined projects and of specially trained personnel. Within the free world at least the sharing of technical knowledge and experience has not given rise to political controversy and the criteria of administration can be made reasonably objective. In spite of problems of coordination and duplication, the technical assistance activities of the U.N. have been fairly successful, and there has been little political bickering over the allocation of the funds made available by the Technical Assistance Board. U.N. technical assistance has some real advantages over bilateral programs, principally because the former is non-political and also because the U.N. can draw its experts from all over the world. Its principal disadvantage as compared with the United States program is the lack of integration with loan and grant programs including the administration of counterpart funds. As long as the United States has large bilateral foreign aid programs it is unlikely that it will disband its own Point Four activities in favor of wholly international technical assistance.⁶

ECONOMIC STABILITY

Second only to economic development is the demand that the U.N. take action in promoting international economic stability and preventing sharp fluctuations in the prices of primary commodities. This has been the subject of three reports to the Secretary-General of the U.N. by committees of experts,⁷ has been discussed in a number of publications of the U.N. Secretariat, the Commissions, and the specialized agencies, and has been widely debated within the U.N. Three types of programs to be administered by the U.N. or its specialized agencies have been proposed for dealing with international economic instability: (1) stabilization of the flow of international capital through an expansion of the lending activities of the IBRD; (2) stabilization of the flow of international trade by requiring countries whose imports have declined by reason of a fall in internal business activity to make available additional amounts of their currency to the International Monetary Fund for meeting deficits of countries whose exports have declined; and (3) international commodity stabilization schemes.

A discussion of the technical details

⁶ For an excellent discussion of this problem see W. R. Sharp, "The Institutional Framework for Technical Assistance," International Organization, August 1953, pp. 342-79.

⁷ See National and International Measures for Full Employment, December 1949; Measures for International Economic Stability, 1951; and Commodity Trade and Economic Development, 1953, all prepared by committees of experts for the U.N. and published as U.N. documents.

of these proposals, which have been developed in U.N. reports and debated in the Economic and Social Council, cannot be undertaken within the space of this article. Each of them would require substantial sums of money to be subscribed largely by a few countries to international agencies for use in implementing rather broad economic objectives. While it may be possible to devise automatic rules for the guidance of administrators in these fields, the technical details of each of these proposals have been severely criticized by leading economists who are both competent and internationally minded.⁸ In fact the major proposal for stabilizing trade contained in the U.N. report entitled National and International Measures for Full Employment was criticized in a subsequent U.N. report of experts under the chairmanship of Professor James W. Angell entitled Measures for International Economic Stability. Satisfactory means of determining the causes of a decline in a country's imports do not exist. Nor is it always possible to stabilize the total flow of investment capital through public lending agencies while at the same time following investment standards which could be agreed upon by both the capital lending and the borrowing countries alike. Equally difficult would be the determination of criteria for commodity price stabilization which would be acceptable to both consuming and producing countries. However, there is good reason to believe that an international buffer stock scheme could be administered successfully on the basis of objective criteria, provided these criteria could be agreed upon by all countries concerned, and provided the secretariat were left free from political interference.

⁸ See for example Jacob Viner's "Full Employment at Whatever Cost," Quarterly Journal of Economics, August 1950, pp. 385-407; and H. C. Wallich, "United Nations Report on Full Employment," American Economic Review, December 1950, pp. 879-83.

But the problem goes deeper than that of devising administrative criteria and technical standards. Each of these action programs involves conflicting national interests which cannot be resolved by international secretariats operating institutions in accordance with broad objectives. The operating decisions of these proposed institutions are in large measure political, and an international political climate which would make it possible to leave the proposed functions to an international secretariat simply does not exist.

TRADE AND FOREIGN EXCHANGE

Postwar experience has indicated that the field of trade and foreign exchange is one of the most fruitful areas for multilateral action programs. The most successful organization in this field has been the OEEC, which organized the European Payments Union and administers the Code of European Trade Liberalization.⁹ World disequilibrium and the dollar shortage have limited the effectiveness of the International Monetary Fund and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, but once convertibility of the major trading currencies is restored, these institutions should have greater success in obtaining compliance to a code of fair trade and exchange practices. Their strength must lie in persuasion through consultation rather than any attempt to enforce a rigid set of rules through sanctions.¹⁰

The Fund, like the IBRD, administers substantial resources for specific purposes laid down by its charter, and their employment is controlled in large measure by the United States government. From its inauguration it has been criticized on the grounds that (1) it does not permit automatic access to its resources by members in accordance with a fixed formula to be administered by the secretariat and (2) that it has been too niggardly in its lending policies. The fact is, however, that the United States would very likely withdraw from the Fund if the dollars which it has contributed, were not used in accordance with what it regarded as reasonably sound financial policies. This country has insisted that the Fund's resources be carefully managed by its politically appointed executive board and not left to the decisions of international civil servants.¹¹ Schemes advanced both in this country and abroad for an automatic international clearing union not only have little chance of acceptance in this country but overlook the basic political element in all international economic assistance.

⁹ The International Materials Conference had a considerable degree of success in the allocation of scarce sources within the free world.

¹⁰ See R. F. Mikesell, Foreign Exchange in the Postwar World (New York: Twentieth Century Fund, 1954), Chap. XXII.

CONCLUSION

International economic co-operation, except possibly in a few innocuous areas such as the exchange of freight cars, must be based on a foundation of political security and trust. Moreover multilateral action programs in the economic field require common political objectives, since action at a governmental level cannot be divorced from political aims. This would seem to rule out most forms of economic co-operation between the free world and the Soviet bloc, and certainly will make impossible multilateral action programs involving objects of national interest such as trade and money. Thus joint membership in international economic organizations other than debating societies can only be successful if the free world can control the organizations so as to prevent their being sabotaged by the Soviets. This represents perhaps the major barrier to any expansion of U.N. economic activities in which the Soviet bloc participates to any significant degree. There is simply no common ground for joint economic activity between nations where one is seeking to destroy the others.¹²

¹¹ See R. F. Mikesell, United States Economic Policy and International Relations (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1952), pp. 157-62.

Apart from the basic contradictions inherent in action programs in U.N. organizations involving both the free world and the Soviet orbit, there are severe limitations on U.N. activities which involve substantial expenditures of funds even when the activities are confined to non-Soviet countries. Economic assistance programs in specific areas or situations in which the U.N. has assumed military or political responsibility represent an appropriate and perhaps necessary field of U.N. activity. On the other hand economic assistance programs for budgetary support or economic development for large areas inevitably involve conflicting national interests which cannot be dealt with by a nonpolitical secretariat. Where such institutions exist, as in the case of the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund, their policies necessarily tend to be dominated by the major creditor country. Criteria for the dispensing of grants are less definite and objective than those provided by the charters of the Bank and the Fund. The possibility of international action programs in this field will depend largely upon (1) the willingness of the underdeveloped countries to accept the more conservative standards of the countries supplying the bulk of the funds, plus a considerable degree of domination of the management by these same countries; and (2) the willingness of the United States to give up certain national political and economic objectives in the administration of that portion of her total aid program which is taken over by an international body.

¹² Until recently the Soviet bloc had not contributed to the economic and social programs of the U.N. The recent action of the Soviets in contributing to the Technical Assistance Board may envisage a change in this policy.

Economic action programs have been most successful in the fields of trade and foreign exchange relations, but the most important work has been done by regional organizations outside the U.N. Overshadowing all U.N. activities are the political relations between the Soviet and the free world and, to an increasing degree, divergent political attitudes among the free-world states toward the Soviet orbit and the cold war. While this problem has been solved by some specialized agencies by the virtual exclusion of Soviet members or by de facto domination on the part of the major Western powers, an extension of U.N. activities into other fields of economic activity may be inhibited either by the necessity of including Soviet members or by divergent cold-war philosophies among the free-world members themselves.

Raymond F. Mikesell, Ph.D., Charlottesville, Virginia, is professor of economics at the University of Virginia. For a number of years he served as consultant on foreign exchange to the Department of State. He took part in the monetary and financial conferences at Bretton Woods (1944) and Savannah (1946), and has been a staff member of several government missions abroad. He is the author of United States Economic Policy and International Relations (1952), Foreign Exchange in the Postwar World (1954), and numerous articles on international economic organization.

Human Rights and Charter Revision

By QUINCY WRIGHT

"... retrogression in the effort to protect human rights will be temporary. . . . But without an adequate world opinion and suitable national policies real progress cannot be made. With them, the already existing procedures of the Charter permit of continuous progress."

THE effort to protect human rights by international law was not initiated by the United Nations Charter. The conception of a natural law of universal obligation defining certain rights of man was elaborated by Greek philosophers and Roman jurists. This conception figured in the writings of patristic and medieval theologians and in the theory of the Renaissance jurists, who utilized it as the basis for an international law binding sovereign states. Francisco de Vitoria, in his Relectiones de Indis et de jure belli of 1532 which initiated that discipline, asserted that denial of the natural rights of trade and missionary activity to the Spaniards by the Aztecs was sufficient grounds for the conquest of Mexico by Cortés. The subsequent classical treatises on international law generally conceived that law as protecting the fundamental rights of individuals as well as of nations. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, however, international law emphasized the rights of nations. Preoccupation with the sovereignty and independence of states induced a neglect of the rights of individuals. States were said to be the only subjects of international law and were free to deal with their nationals in their territory as they saw fit.¹

Nevertheless interventions to stop

¹ George Manner, "The Object Theory of the Individual in International Law," American Journal of International Law, Vol. 46 (July 1952), pp. 428 ff.

pogroms, persecutions, and inhumanities which "shocked the conscience of mankind" occasionally took place and were considered justifiable, though on moral rather than strictly legal grounds.²

More concrete definitions of human rights developed during the latter part of the nineteenth century in diplomatic pronouncements and arbitral awards establishing the "international standard" to be applied in the treatment of aliens within a state's territory,³ several general treaties came into force concerning the rights of soldiers, sailors, prisoners of war, aborigines, minorities, workers, and women.⁴

The League of Nations system, though designed primarily to protect the rights of nations, especially small nations, affirmed the duty of states to maintain ² Ellery Stowell, Intervention in International Law (Washington, D. C.: John Byrne & Company, 1921).

³ Edwin M. Borchard, The Diplomatic Protection of Citizens Abroad, New York, 1919.

⁴ Geneva Red Cross Conventions, 1864, 1906, 1929, 1949; Hague Conventions on the Rules of Land Warfare and on adaptation of the Geneva Convention to maritime warfare, 1899, 1907; Berlin treaties regarding the Near East, and Central Africa, 1878, 1885; Brussels slave trade convention, 1890; white slavery conventions, 1904, 1910; conventions prohibiting white phosphorus in the match industry and night work for women in industry, 1906. All general international conventions from 1864 to 1914 are listed, and those of later date are printed in full in Manley O. Hudson, International Legislation, 9 vols. (Washington, D. C. [Vols. I-VII] and New York [Vol. IX]: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1931-1950).

"fair and humane treatment" to labor and to secure "just treatment" to the native inhabitants of their territories.⁵ The mandates system and the International Labor Organization were established to develop standards of such treatment and to provide procedures for maintaining those standards. Treaties and procedures for the protection of minorities in a number of countries were also developed within the League system.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt's assertion of the "Four Freedoms" in January 1941, the Atlantic Charter of August 1941, and the Declaration of the United Nations of January 1942, which established the protection of human rights as an objective of the war, were a response to the "shock to the conscience of mankind" by the Nazi barbarities to Jews and liberals. These pronouncements were implemented by prosecutions of "crimes against humanity" in the Nuremberg and other war crimes trials; in the reaffirmation of "faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women" by the Preamble to the United Nations Charter; and in the many clauses of the Charter pledging the United Nations and its members to promote "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion." Realization of these commitments has been imperfect.

In the perspective of history, efforts to implement the concept of a universal protection of human rights have been energetic in proportion as nations have been in close contact and have had common cultural and religious standards. Such an effort was manifested in the Roman jus gentium and jus naturale, in the medieval divine law and natural law, in the Renaissance law of nature and nations, and in the recent movement to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms. In the periods between these efforts—the periods of the lex barbarorum, of the Machiavellian princes, and of the modern sovereign states—national cultures have been so different that universal standards for the protection of individual rights seemed unobtainable and have been so isolated that such protection seemed unimportant.⁶

DIMINISHED EMPHASIS ON HUMAN RIGHTS

It is not, therefore, surprising that the development of "cold war," isolating Western and Soviet cultures from one another and creating belief in the radical difference of these cultures, has led to a renewed emphasis upon national sovereignty and a decline in the effort to protect human rights.

The refusal of Soviet states to accept the Universal Declaration of Human Rights promulgated by the General Assembly in 1948 and to permit investigations or report on the protection of human rights in their territories and the refusal of the United States to ratify the Genocide Convention (which the Soviet government has ratified) or to consider the ratification of human rights covenants are evidences of the waning since 1947 of enthusiasm for the universal protection of human rights. The Bricker amendment movement in the United States and the nonratification of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights negotiated in the Council of Europe constitute further evidence of the reversion to state sovereignty and the decline of faith in a universal culture from which standards of human rights could emerge.

⁶ Quincy Wright, A Study of War (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1942), pp. 909 ff.

⁵ Art. 23.

Apart from this official lethargy, popular discussion of human rights and support for their international protection has greatly diminished, especially in the United States. In 1943 the American Bar Association authorized study of a bill of human rights by its Committee on International and Comparative Law,⁷ but in 1953 it supported an amendment to the federal Constitution to prevent acceptance of such a bill by the United States.⁸ In the hearings before the Thomas subcommittee of the Senate on Charter revision in 1950 discussion concerned proposals for strengthening the United Nations by perfecting collective security arrangements or establishing general or regional federations. Little was said about human rights. The committee report made no recommendations but commented on "the stultifying effect of East-West conflict on the United Nations" and noted that because of American interest in peace with freedom in spite of this conflict "nearly one-half the members of the Senate and more than one hundred members of the House have joined in resolutions calling for the strengthening of international organization."⁹ In the hearings before the Wiley Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter in 1954 emphasis has been upon either strengthening collective security or protecting United States sovereignty. In these ⁷ American Bar Association, Resolution of House of Delegates, March 1943, on an "International Constitution and Bill of Rights," American Journal of International Law, Vol. 37 (October 1943), p. 661. See also draft by a committee of the American Law Institute, "Statement of Essential Human Rights," THE ANNALS, Vol. 243 (January 1946), pp. 18 ff.

⁸ American Bar Association, Report of Committee on Peace and Law through the United Nations, February 1, 1952, approved by House of Delegates, February 26, 1952.

⁹ Eighty-first Congress, second session, Rep. No. 2501, Revision of the United Nations Charter, Report of Committee on Foreign Relations, September 1, 1950, p. 55.

hearings neither the Secretary of State (Dulles) nor the United States Ambassador to the United Nations (Lodge) suggested any strengthening of the human rights provisions of the Charter.¹⁰ Of over seventy statements made to the committee in Akron, Ohio¹¹ and Milwaukee, Wisconsin,¹² only one urged such action. This one made a strong plea for attaching a bill of rights to the Charter itself "to retrieve the loss since 1945 in the matter of protecting human rights."¹³

The conference of ninety-five national organizations held in Washington in March 1954 under the auspices of the American Association for the United Nations vigorously opposed the Bricker amendment; supported covenants of human rights, the Genocide Convention, and the Convention on the Political Rights of Women; and regretted the negative attitude of the United States government toward these treaties. The resolutions of the conference, however, gave primary attention to the strengthening of collective security, the control of atomic energy, and disarmament.¹⁴

NEED OF UNIVERSAL STANDARDS

That retrogression in the effort to protect human rights will be temporary is suggested not only by the continuance of considerable popular demand for such protection and by the repeated reassertion of such a demand in the history of civilization, but also by considera-

¹⁰ Eighty-third Congress, second session, Review of the United Nations Charter, Hearings before a Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations, U. S. Senate, Part I, January-March, 1954.

¹¹ Ibid., Part II, February 12, 1954.

¹² Ibid., Part III, April 10, 1954.

¹³ Statement by Bruno V. Bitker, ibid., Part III, p. 201.

¹⁴ Conference on United States Responsibility for World Leadership in 1954, Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D. C., February 28, March 1, 2, 1954, Resolutions, American Association for the United Nations (New York, 1954).

tion of the conditions of the present world.

The world continues to shrink. Telecommunication, aviation, and atomic energy will increasingly assure that every people will be informed of conditions everywhere and will be vulnerable to attack from anywhere. The material interdependence of the world, in spite of efforts to erect artificial barriers to communication, trade, and invasion, will continually press for moral unity. The conscience of mankind will continue to be shocked by conditions such as exist in Soviet labor camps, in South Africa, in parts of the United States, and in many underdeveloped countries. Such concern is indeed manifested by numerous resolutions of the General Assembly on notorious instances of racial discrimination, oppression, and persecution; on technical assistance; and on care of children.¹⁵ Such sentiments will continually urge more precise standards and more effective implementations of human rights.

The fear of war and the demands for more effective collective security will inevitably lead to a realization that peace is a function of society and that society implies some common standards of value. The world community cannot unite against aggression unless it is united in favor of some human values. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is an effort to define values which can unite mankind. Universal standards of human rights are a condition of a community of nations in which peace can be preserved.

Furthermore, respect for such standards, assuring a modicum of peace and justice within each nation, is a condition of mutual confidence among nations, in turn permitting co-operation. General

Marshall while Secretary of State observed in this connection:

Governments which systematically disregard the rights of their own people are not likely to respect the rights of other governments and other people and are likely to seek their objectives by coercion and force in the international field.¹⁶

THE RIGHTS OF NATIONS AND THE RIGHTS OF MAN

The "self-determination" of nations, demanded by colonial and subject peoples and supported by the United Nations Charter, can be achieved peacefully only through free elections or other manifestation of consent of the governed, and such consent cannot be manifested in the absence of at least moderate respect, within the territory to determine itself, for the human rights of freedom of opinion, communication, and association, and of due process of law in trials and investigations.

Democracy, which means the opportunity for continuous self-determination within an established jural community, implies that the state is for man, not man for the state. An international law that protects the sovereignty of the state to persecute, massacre, discriminate among, and deny justice to its citizens is an international law of autocracy, not of democracy. Except as international law demonstrates its interest in people as well as in peoples it cannot attract the support of educated public opinion, without which it cannot live. While a world "safe for democracy" is not the same thing as a world all of whose states are democratic according to the Western model, yet the world cannot be safe for democracy unless all states, whatever their procedures for ascertaining the values, opinions, and consent of the people, and whether or not they function through voting by the people, respect that essential aspect of democracy, assurance of human rights for the people.

¹⁶ Quoted in Senate Subcommittee Hearings, op. cit. supra (note 10), Part III, p. 203.

¹⁵ Aleksander W. Rudzinski, "Domestic Jurisdiction in United Nations Practice," Indian Quarterly, Vol. 9 (October-December 1953), pp. 313 ff.

International protection of human rights is an ingredient in the demands for collective security, for international justice, for self-determination, and for democracy. Under modern conditions of communication and vulnerability, the rights of nations can be assured only in a world which respects the rights of man.

This assertion does not overlook the relativity of many individual rights to local conditions. Home rule, national autonomy, adaptation of law to particular religious, cultural, historic, institutional, economic, and social conditions is no less important than universal respect for the rights inherent in the nature of man and society. The extreme relativity of rights, asserted by Carneades and some modern anthropologists, which considers all rights products of particular cultures, customs, and conventions, overlooks the aspect of all men as members of an organic species with common biological needs, as moral animals with common psychological wants, and as social animals with common requirements inherent in the nature of any society.

A code of human rights which sought to be too explicit, comprehensive, and centrally enforced would, in the varied conditions of the world, establish a tyranny as dangerous to peace, justice, self-determination, and democracy as would no code at all. The problem of reconciling human rights and national rights, implicit in the United Nations Charter, cannot be evaded. The problem must be worked at continually because the line between universal and locally conditioned rights changes with the evolution of international communication, culture, society, and organization. Whether viewed biologically, psychologically, or socially mankind is not static.¹⁷

Domestic jurisdiction of states

Universal respect for the "domestic jurisdiction" of nations is, therefore, the obverse of universal respect for human rights. Under international law a state's domestic jurisdiction is determined by the absence of international obligations, leaving it free to settle a dispute, controversy, or situation at discretion. A state cannot finally determine the international obligations either of itself or of other states; consequently a controversy, dispute, or situation which involves the interpretation or application of an international obligation is not within any state's domestic jurisdiction "solely," "exclusively," or "essentially."¹⁸ The state may make a preliminary decision upon the scope of its obligations, but international law requires it ultimately to settle the issue by agreement or submission to an appropriate international authority. Apart from its international obligations, a state can regard every question whatever as within its domestic jurisdiction. That is the legal meaning of sovereignty—the quality of being legally bound by no rules, principles, or standards except those of international law. Since, however, determination of the existence and meaning of international obligations is a question of international law, determination of the extent to which in a given situation the international obligations of a state qualify its domestic jurisdiction and legal sovereignty is itself a question of international law.¹⁹

¹⁷ Hersch Lauterpacht, International Law and Human Rights (London: Stevens & Sons, Ltd., 1950).

¹⁸ See League of Nations Covenant, Art. 15 (8); United Nations Charter, Art. 2, par. 7.

¹⁹ Rudzinski, op. cit. supra (note 15); Q. Wright, "Recognition and Self Determination," Proceedings of the American Society of International Law, 1954.

To what extent does respect for human rights qualify the domestic jurisdiction of states? The answer is clear in the abstract: only in so far as a state is under obligations, established by general international law or by treaties to which it is a party requiring such respect, is its capacity to deal with individuals limited. While general international law doubtless imposes obligations in respect to persons in foreign territory and in respect to aliens within a state's territory or on the high seas, in the interest of the state of which they are nationals, such obligations do not seem to be imposed in respect to its own nationals or stateless persons within its territory, unless indeed an argument can be drawn from principles of natural law. Those principles are given some support by practices, of "humanitarian intervention"²⁰ and declarations affirming the dignity of human personality. In the main, international obligations in this field arise from treaty. It belongs to the sovereignty of states to make treaties, but in so far as a state has assumed obligations by treaties to respect or protect human rights it has qualified its domestic jurisdiction.

U.N. Charter

The United Nations Charter is a treaty and undoubtedly the members have assumed certain obligations in respect to human rights by that instrument itself. The "pledge" in Article 56 to take "separate" as well as "joint" action "in co-operation with the organization," to prevent discrimination on grounds of race, sex, language, or religion in the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and the "obligation" "accepted as a sacred trust" in Article 73 and in trusteeship agreements in pursuance of Article 76 "to promote" the "well-being," "advancement," and "just treatment" of the inhabitants of non-self-governing and trusteeship territories clearly constitute international obligations. Whether or not these obligations are "self-executing" in the domestic law of the United States, a question raised in the Fujii case in California,²¹ they are certainly international obligations to be interpreted ultimately by appropriate international procedures, not by the domestic procedures of any state.

Apart from obligations concerning human rights undertaken by the Charter, the purposes stated in the Preamble and Article 1 undoubtedly contemplate that the members will undertake further obligations by entering into general treaties, such as the Genocide Convention and the proposed covenant of human rights. While their commitment to these "purposes" may imply an international obligation to negotiate in good faith, such an obligation is moral and political rather than legal. It raises the issue of the most practical and effective way of "promoting and encouraging respect for human rights" in existing circumstances. On this issue opinions may legitimately differ.

METHODS OF SECURING HUMAN RIGHTS

The United Nations has proceeded on the plan of first drafting and promulgating by General Assembly resolution a Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a guide to policy but without direct ²¹ Fujii v. California (1950) 217 Pac. 2d 481; 218 Pac. 2d 595; (1952) 242 Pac. 2d 617. See also Manley O. Hudson, "Charter Provisions on Human Rights in American Law," American Journal of International Law, Vol. 44 (July 1950), pp. 543 ff.; Q. Wright, "National Courts and Human Rights—The Fujii Case," ibid., Vol. 45 (January 1951), pp. 62 ff.; Lawrence Preuss, "Some Aspects of the Human Rights Provisions of the Charter and Their Execution in the United States," ibid., Vol. 46 (April 1952), pp. 289 ff.; Charles Fairman, "Finis to Fujii," ibid., Vol. 46 (October 1952), pp. 682 ff.

²⁰ Stowell, op. cit. supra (note 2).

legal force, and then of drafting and submitting to states for formal ratification and acceptance as legal obligations "covenants" defining certain human rights in legal form and providing for their implementation by international procedures. In the actual drafts submitted to the General Assembly in 1954 these procedures were confined to investigations and reports on the initiative of states. Individual petitions initiating such procedures, though discussed, have not been included.

The Council of Europe has gone further in providing, in its draft Convention for the Protection of Human Rights for a European Court of Justice to enforce these rights against adverse state action, as the Supreme Court of the United States enforces the rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment against states of the Union. This convention, however, has not gone into force.

It has been suggested that the United Nations General Assembly might authorize the Commission on Human Rights to receive petitions and report on them, applying the obligations of the Charter itself and official interpretations such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and thus gradually build a code of human rights from precedent to precedent. In this way the Supreme Court of the United States has built a code of federal rights from the brief "due process" and "equal protection" clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. A vesting in the world court of authority to issue writs of habeas corpus to states confining persons in alleged violation of human rights might contribute to such a development.²² have also engaged in an educational campaign to instruct peoples as to the history, philosophy, law, and practical necessity under modern conditions of respect for human rights. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights has been an important contribution to this effort, especially as it was accepted unanimously by the General Assembly with the exception of the Soviet bloc, which, though abstaining, did not vote in the negative.

The United Nations and UNESCO

²² Luis Kutner, "A Proposal for a United Nations Writ of Habeas Corpus and an International Court of Human Rights," Tulane Law Review, Vol. 28 (June 1954), pp. 417 ff.

The United States government, having for the time rejected the treaty method in an effort to appease the Bricker amendment group in the Senate, has proposed a program of education, investigation, and report through the Commission on Human Rights. These proposals had not yet been acted upon by the General Assembly in September 1954.

The United Nations General Assembly by its debate on outstanding issues of human rights—the Mindszenty case in Hungary; the nullification of the human rights clauses in their peace treaties by Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania; the labor camps and war prisoners in the Soviet Union; the treatment of Indians and natives in South Africa; and the situation of the inhabitants of some trusteeship and non-self-governing territories—has contributed to public interest, education, and the development of standards in the field.²³

DIFFERENT TYPES OF RIGHTS

Recent discussion has utilized the term "human rights" to cover radically different types of rights deemed to be universal. Of President Roosevelt's Four Freedoms, the first two, freedom of speech and freedom of religion, call upon governments merely to refrain from interference with the individual, while the last two, freedom from fear and freedom from want, call upon governments to protect and assist the individual. In debates in the United Nations the United States has manifested most interest in the first type of rights consonant with the political and economic philosophy of laissez faire, while the Soviet states have emphasized the second, especially the social and economic rights which may be promoted by state socialism, often at the expense of civil liberties.

²³ Yearbook of the United Nations; Yearbook on Human Rights (United Nations); Rudzinski, op. cit. supra (note 15).

A more complete classification of the types of human rights would include: (a) civil liberties, implying freedom from unnecessary governmental restraints and enjoyment of due process of law and equal protection of the laws; (b) individual security, implying protection from violence or restraint, not only from government agencies but also from other persons; (c) social and economic opportunity through provision of education, public health, social security, work and fair conditions of work; and (d) cultural autonomy, implying self-determination of non-self-governing peoples, minorities, and nationalities.

Civil liberties

Civil liberties have constituted the principal content of constitutional bills of rights in the West. As they involve only abstention from action by governments they can be enforced by legal processes nullifying conflicting laws and administrative decisions.

Individual security

Individual security is a consequence of adequate police and criminal laws to maintain law and order in each state. States must act positively to give such protection. International action may contribute to the general enjoyment of this right by providing for co-operation among states in the detection and punishment of crime and by requiring states to enforce laws forbidding genocide and other crimes against humanity which they might not spontaneously include in their criminal codes. The situation where government itself encourages or participates in such crimes presents peculiar difficulties such as were faced in the war crimes trials. These difficulties may be met by establishing an international criminal court of adequate jurisdiction and supported by sufficient force to bring the accused, who may be a high government official, to justice. A convention for such a court has been drafted under United Nations auspices, but the provisions concerning its jurisdiction were inadequate.²⁴ The problem obviously cannot be solved in the absence of effective collective security against aggression by states. Implementation of the right to security—freedom from fear—requires positive action by both states and the international community, not merely the abstention from official action which is adequate to implement civil liberties.

Social and economic opportunity

The necessity of positive action is even more true of the right to social and economic opportunity. Programs of education, public health, social security, full employment, and suitable industrial and agricultural conditions require not only positive government action but also appropriate political organization and large public appropriations. The realization of such programs is, therefore, dependent on the wealth, political organization, and even the social ideology of the state. Exclusive attention to the realization of these rights tends toward an increase in the functions and the power of government. Furthermore, the capacity of a state to progress in these fields often involves its international economic and political relations. Consequently efforts to assure equality in the enjoyment of social and economic opportunity may tend toward excessive governmentalization and centralization dangerous to civil liberties and the self-determination of local or national groups. The Economic and Social Council of the United Nations and the specialized agencies have been established to promote gradual progress in these fields. The problems are so complex, however, that a statement of social and economic rights in a code of human rights can hardly constitute more than a declaration of goals or objectives of national and international administrations, permitting wide variation in the adaptation of means.

²⁴ Q. Wright, "Proposal for an International Criminal Court," American Journal of International Law, Vol. 46 (January 1952), pp. 60 ff.

Cultural autonomy

Respect for the cultural autonomy of non-self-governing peoples, minorities, and nationalities involves particular areas and situations. Some cultures may be incapable of survival in the modern world, some may be as yet incapable of self-determination, and some may exhibit aggressive characteristics dangerous to international peace and security. Statements of such rights can only be in the most general terms susceptible to adaptation to varied situations. It is the function of the United Nations and the nations to deal with such situations as they arise, in the light of the broad principles of the Charter and balancing noninterference with positive efforts to contribute to the advancement of underdeveloped peoples.

All of these types of human rights are matters of international concern under modern conditions, but the obligations of abstention, protection, administration, and political adjustment which they respectively impose upon states are so different that a single legal code and uniform methods of implementation are not possible.

CONCLUSIONS

From this analysis of human rights and the foregoing brief history of past and present efforts to promote respect for and observance of such rights the following conclusions seem justified:

1. A program of education developing a strong and general public opinion favorable to human rights is essential before states will be willing to undertake further legal obligations.

2. Human rights of different kinds should be dealt with separately, implemented by different methods, and kept in balance. Government action to maintain law and order and to assure social and economic opportunity to all may conflict with the claim of individuals and groups to enjoy freedom and self-determination in opinion, association, and many types of action. Respect for human rights implies the maintenance of balance among the different types of rights.

3. Formal definition of human rights and implementing procedures can probably develop best through agreement by the states to be bound. This is because of the variety of rights involved, the different situation of states in respect to them, and the principle of international law—reflecting the dominance of nationalism in the contemporary world—that states become legally bound by new rules, principles, or standards only through consent. It is to be expected that states will be less reluctant to accept procedures of investigation and report than procedures of judicial decision and condemnation.

4. The Charter provides suitable goals and opportunities for reaching agreement to promote respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms. But without an adequate world public opinion and suitable national policies real progress cannot be made. With them, the already existing procedures of the Charter permit of continuous progress. Revision of the Charter in this field is not likely to prove possible at the present time and does not seem necessary.

Quincy Wright, Ph.D., LL.D., has been professor of international law at the University of Chicago since 1931, having previously (1923-31) been professor of political science there. He served as special assistant in international law to the United States Department of State (1918, 1921), consultant to the Foreign Economic Administration and Department of State (1943-44), technical adviser to the American member of the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg (1945), and consultant to UNESCO (1949) and to the United States High Commissioner, Germany (1949-50). He is the author of A Study of War (1942), Problems of Stability and Progress in International Relations (1954), and various other works on international law and United States foreign relations, and editor of A Foreign Policy for the United States (1947) and The World Community (1948). He was president of the American Political Science Association in 1949 and of the International Political Science Association from 1950 to 1952.

International Responsibility for Non-self-governing Peoples

By SERGIO ARMANDO FRAZÃO

"... at San Francisco the national concept of colonization began definitively to surrender to the idea of ... 'colonization as an international public service.' ... the colonial powers should try to consolidate the ideological front of the free world by formulating a new political appraisal of the 'colonial question' and by conceding ... what, according to the majority of the opinions expressed in the forum of the United Nations, is considered to be within the compass of the times."

CHAPTER XI of the United Nations Charter is the first international normative instrument aiming at a comprehensive regulation of the social phenomenon of colonization. From the point of view of originality and innovation, it is indisputable that the Declaration Regarding Non-self-governing Territories stands out as one of the boldest and most positive contributions of the San Francisco Conference to the legal order of international relations. Nor can it be easily denied that Articles 73 and 74 are, amongst all the provisions of the Charter; those which most markedly bear the imprint of the political and juridical philosophy inherent in the system of the United Nations, as they assert the competence of that Organization to deal systematically with a whole set of social problems which hitherto had escaped comprehensive international control. Both these Articles reflect the elemental design of the founders to integrate into a juridical system of ecumenical perspective a gamut of obligations whose implementation was formerly the sole responsibility of the national state. The juridical expression of the ideal of universality, that is, the principle of the extension of the institutional order to all peoples, would have been grossly distorted if the interests and aspirations of hundreds of millions in non-self-governing territories were to be left outside the law of the United Nations and under the exclusive competence of the internal public law of the states holding jurisdiction over them.

EVOLUTION OF THE CONCEPT OF COLONIZATION

Most certainly, the old colonial law was influenced by considerations of a humanitarian nature which, varying according to the moral standards of the times, progressively qualified the content and the objectives of colonial policies.¹ International conventions also intervened to ensure collaboration against the practice of acts offensive to deep-rooted social values of contemporary civilization and, further, to guarantee the observance of these values among certain dependent peoples.² Although these international conventions dispensed some protection to indigenous populations, none of them, not even the rules of internal public law governing the type of relations between metropolitan countries and their colonies, departed from the classic national concept of colonization.³ The idea of having the colonizing power responsible for the well-being and material development of the peoples under their jurisdiction—the "white man's burden"—had indeed become firmly established since the latter half of the nineteenth century and served as an ethical justification for colonial expansion. But until the San Francisco Conference, or, to be more exact, until the Twenty-sixth International Labor Conference (Philadelphia, 1944), effective international control over colonial policies was held to be inadmissible intervention in the internal policy of the metropolitan countries involved.

¹ These influences were responsible for the continuous evolution of the so-called "colonial pact," whose original terms entrusted the metropolitan countries with a monopoly over the economy of, and commercial intercourse with, their colonial possessions.

² See the Final and General Act of the Berlin Conference, February 26, 1885, especially Chap. I, Art. 6; see also the General Act of the Brussels Conference, July 2, 1890.

Timidly, Article 23 b of the Covenant of the League of Nations endeavored, in the wake of the international mandate system, to elevate the "just treatment" of indigenous populations to the category of a legal international commitment. The vagueness of the terms, however, and the lack of precision as to the scope of the obligation to respect the basic rights of the "colonials" resulted in no more than a commitment not to discriminate in favor of the "colonist." Unquestionably, this commitment was already in the nature of a legal obligation. Its content, nevertheless, was still merely a statement of humanitarian principles.

The grammatical and historical interpretation of Chapter XI and its ideological axis of reference make it clear that at San Francisco the national concept of colonization began definitively to surrender to the idea of colonization as an "international function," that is, to the concept of "colonization as an international public service."⁴ The formulation of this concept, however inaccurate, in a special chapter of the Charter, removed the "Off Limits" sign which had been blocking the colonial avenue to the competence of international law. Although the framers at San Francisco were not yet able to internationalize the administration of all non-self-governing territories and were obliged to compromise with the jurisdictional power exercised by the metropolitan countries over the territories not falling under the trusteeship system, it is nonetheless true that Chapter XI introduced a new element qualifying the raison d'être and the purposes of that jurisdiction.

POLITICAL QUALIFICATION OF "WELL-BEING"

The compromise with the classical violation of the right of self-determination still appears in the implicit admission of the "colonial possession." In fact, the legality of colonial conquests, and, by implication, the legitimacy of the political and juridical situations deriving therefrom, were not openly contested at San Francisco and are not evaluated in Chapter XI. It is, however, difficult to dispute that those situations have since been defined as a function of the interests of the international community and of the peoples directly concerned. The ancient maxim, Jus et obligatio sunt correlata, found expression in the specification of the goals to be served by colonization, that is, in the definition of the objectives which render the very idea of colonization acceptable to the conscience of the contemporary world. By comparison with the treatment that the colonial question, as a whole, received in the Covenant of the League of Nations, the progress achieved at San Francisco was immense. The measure of this progress can even be physically ascertained by considering the area and the number of persons coming under the scope of international law. Furthermore, it cannot easily be denied that the Declaration is based on the fundamental political assumption that the situations of colonial subordination as they presented themselves to the United Nations founders should be, by definition, transitory. The sociopolitical dynamics which in colonial areas derive their driving force from the ideal of emancipation and have this emancipation as an ultimate goal were to be, according to Articles 73 and 74, duly encouraged and directed to the attainment of that prime goal. Consequently, Chapter XI should not be considered to encompass solely the already accepted moral responsibility for the well-being of dependent peoples; nor can the importance of Articles 73 and 74 be sufficiently brought out merely by admitting that they were formulated as legal obligations whose violation could eventually set in motion the system of sanctions embodied in the Charter. Over and above those considerations it appears that the true significance of the Declaration resides in the fact that through it a new notion was introduced into the legal system of the international community. This notion, being a consequence of an equally new philosophical approach to the major problem of relations amongst human groups, completely changed the import and the meaning of the colonial problem. The outstanding feature of the Declaration is, indeed, the implicit recognition that the well-being of non-self-governing peoples is inseparable from an ultimate political qualification, for it is in the spirit of Chapter XI that that well-being is strictly dependent upon the development of conditions conducive to the correction of the status of subordination to alien jurisdiction.

⁴ For a doctrinal explanation of these concepts, see Georges Scelle, Cours de droit international public (new ed., revised and enlarged; Paris, 1948), pp. 212 ff.; and A. Mathiot, Les Territoires non autonomes et la Charte des Nations Unies (Paris, 1949), pp. 6 ff.

³ According to this conception, the colonial power could freely and righteously aim at the political and administrative integration and at the cultural and economic assimilation of their colonies.

The second aspect of the international function of colonization may be found in the nexus established between the adequate implementation of the "sacred trust" (involving, among other obligations, that of admitting and aiding aspirations to political autonomy of which social and economic progress are the logical foundations) and the interests of international peace and security.

The full weight which the colonial question acquires when it is referred to as one of the elements of the system of international peace and security does not permit the allusion to the general objectives of the Organization contained in the preamble to Article 73 and in clause 73 c to be considered redundant or merely expletive. On the contrary, it seems apparent that through the references appearing in the preamble to Article 73 and in clause 73 c, Chapter XI stipulates that the promotion of the well-being of non-self-governing populations is one of the means of attaining the over-all goal of international peace and security. By inference, the realization of this fundamental objective of the Organization is made dependent upon the fulfillment of the obligations set forth in that chapter, in the same manner as it is dependent upon the implementation of all the other obligations assumed under the Charter.

CONSERVATIVE REACTION

The experience of the last eight years bears witness to the fact that the United Nations, or rather the majority of the General Assembly, have consistently abided by the interpretation of the Declaration outlined above. The action undertaken by the majority to fill up, by means of resolutions, the lacunae that weaken the efficacy of Chapter XI has been rebuffed by the colonial powers, who, opposed to such a broad understanding of their commitments, have sought to give a much more restrictive definition of their actual obligations towards the United Nations. Some of them have categorically denied that the Organization is authorized to interfere in any way with the administration of territories to which only Chapter XI applies.

Conservative reaction tried its best to entrench itself behind the inaccurate phraseology of Chapter XI; at times it played with grammatical interpretations and very often had recourse to flagrant sophisms to reject any idea of an international accountability for all dependent territories. It so happened that many a progressive stand assumed at San Francisco has come of late to be contradicted by attitudes displayed by the same delegation regarding Chapter XI in action.

Extremist positions even reached the point of contesting the constitutional right of the Organization to pass recommendations on matters dealing with territories covered only by Article 73; by the same token the reach, nature, and juridical content of the Declaration were frontally challenged. Fighting against what they deemed unjustified inroads upon their rights under the Charter, the colonial powers committed the major error of trying to disparage, if not the basic purposes of Chapter XI, at least the reason for its incorporation into the Charter and its normative value. The lax terminology of the commitments they had undertaken provided slippery ground for an elusive interpretation of their obligations to the United Nations.

INSTITUTIONAL NORM AND DOMESTIC JURISDICTION

First of all, the objections raised against any action of the General Assembly on matters regulated by Chapter XI were advanced under a misleading understanding of Article 7, paragraph 2, of the Charter. The privilege of exclusive jurisdiction over dependent territories not coming under the trusteeship system—in spite of the qualifications made as to the objectives that jurisdiction should serve—was considered to be safeguarded by the unilateral character of the Declaration and by the freedom reserved to the colonial powers to specify, in all sovereignty, the territories to which "the general declaration of policy of Chapter XI" should apply.

None of these contentions find support in the legal system of the United Nations. The Charter is more than a mere contractual act of a multilateral character. It is an institutional instrument through which, by original agreement of the parties thereto, an Organization has been created for specific purposes, with interests and rights of its own and of a hierarchy superior to the rights and interests of the Member States. The very idea of unilateral Declaration and, by way of consequence, of the establishment of obligations by unilateral consent is alien to the philosophy of the system whose normative value is rather to be found in the conceptual significance of the institutional norm and not, solely, on the narrower idea of multilateral contract. In the light of the growth and rights of societal institutions, the rule of Article 10 assumes a meaning and scope which would be handicapped and curtailed if it were to be interpreted according to the classical theory of contract.⁵ The statutory authorization received by the General Assembly to discuss "any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter or relating to powers and functions of any organs provided for in the present Charter" and "to make recommendations to the Members of the United Nations, or to the Security Council, or to both, on any such questions or matters," invalidates an easy recourse to the exception of domestic jurisdiction. As has been pointed out, the Declaration in itself, and even more so when considered within the logic of the system, excluded the social relations to which it applies from the sanctuary of domestic jurisdiction by specifying the goals the Organization aims at achieving in the colonial sector. In good faith, what may be questioned is the measure or the extent of the obligation assumed by the administering countries toward the institution, the content of this obligation and its definiteness, but not its existence and its juridical nature.

⁵ The theoretical basis for this reasoning is provided by the juridical conception of the

The arguments to the contrary may be easily traced to the age-old obsession with state sovereignty. The safeguards provided in the system of the Charter for this principle of state sovereignty would be tantamount to an inherent contradiction if they were to be utilized generally and as a means of evading the fulfillment of obligations of a statutory character. A contrariu sensu, could it not be sustained that clause 7 of Article 2 stipulates that all the obligations assumed under the Charter and the actions performed accordingly are not in themselves encroachments upon domestic jurisdiction? Indeed, the whole system would be undermined by the idea of permanent conflicting competences and by the possibility of these supposed conflicts being resolved through the imposition of superior normative force of the institutional norm.

the competence of the national law over the competence of the statutory norm (or of the pertinent and unequivocal rule of international law).

JURIDICAL MEANING OF "DECLARATION"

Carried out to its final consequence, the interpretation which invokes the exception of domestic jurisdiction with a view to depriving the Organization of its institutional authority to deal with matters falling under the provisions of Chapter XI, but not under Chapters XII and XIII, would result in a logical and juridical absurdity. This interpretation would indeed imply that the Declaration Regarding Non-self-governing Territories is an anomaly within the Charter, since Chapter XI would not share in the juridical nature, that is, in the normative character of the constitutional instrument. For the same reasons, it is hard to accept the argument that the binding force of Articles 73 and 74, and, therefore, the jurisdictional powers of the Organization to supervise the colonial policy of its members, is weakened by the significance of the word "Declaration." For those who espouse this misleading interpretation, "Declaration" would be equal to a "statement of principles" grouped in an enunciative text but excluding by its letter and spirit a formal accountability as to the application of such principles. Following through this sequence of ideas, Chapter XI, deprived of its binding force, would add up to an exposition of good intentions as to matters concerning colonial administration. In short, it would have no efficacy but that emanating from its moral reach. Therefore, the progress reflected in the text of the Declaration, by comparison with the philosophy of the Covenant of the League of Nations, would be limited to a more detailed enumeration of the principles of colonial policy.

The weakness of these allegations is plain. To refute them, it need only be borne in mind that even the literal interpretation of a legal text requires the interpreter to have recourse to criteria of legal semantics. In the semantics of international law, Declaration means convention, that is, lawmaking treaty. Even grammatically interpreted, Article 73 sets forth a general obligation—"the obligation to promote the well-being of the inhabitants of non-self-governing territories." It goes on to indicate in four clauses the manner in which this obligation must be fulfilled. This reasoning seems to disprove the objections to the vagueness of the content of the obligation accepted under Chapter XI.

OVER-STRONG COUNTERREACTION OF THE MAJORITY

It is only fair to say that, in many instances, the majority in the General Assembly embarked upon deliberations that could not be considered properly upheld even by the most liberal interpretation of the letter and the spirit of Article 73. Arithmetical victories have imposed the viewpoint of the majority. It is possible, however, that the approval of some resolutions which are not in full conformity with the intentions of Chapter XI has come as a counter-reaction against the conservative trend displayed by the colonial powers. Many of these texts which seem to ignore the differences in statutory discipline established by Chapter XI on the one hand and Chapters XII and XIII on the other are open to a pertinent legal criticism. Not a few resolutions were inspired by political prejudices and substituted political definitions of questionable value for less controversial juridical criteria.⁶

⁶ The decision taken by the General Assembly not to consider the matters relating to

This original bias appears even in the actual wording of the texts, which seemed bound to stimulate divergencies rather than to achieve even partial victories.⁷ It would have been easier to Chapter XI as "important matters" for the application of the voting procedure referred to in clause 3 of Article 18 is legally unsound and a grave political mistake. The records of the discussions in the Fourth Committee of the eighth session of the General Assembly seem to indicate that this decision was worked out for the sole purpose of assuring the approval of the resolution concerning the "factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government"—Resolution 742 (VIII)—whose legal substantive value and whose constitutionality are most dubious.

⁷ The express reference to the "competence of the General Assembly" in operative paragraph 3 of Resolution 742 (VIII) was entirely unnecessary and tactically erroneous. The draft proposed by the Brazilian Delegation tried to surmount this difficulty, although implicitly reaffirming the competence of the General Assembly to decide on the cessation of the transmission of information. Indeed, the whole draft was directed to expressing this competence and its approval by a large majority would have sanctioned the principle (see doc. no. A/C.4/L. 272). Furthermore, this resolution goes beyond the provisions of Chapter XI by introducing some assumptions which cannot claim legal support, be it in the letter or in the spirit of Article 73. Paragraph 6 states, for instance, that the manner in which the territories referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter can become fully self-governing is primarily through the attainment of independence. This contention is politically disputable; juridically, it is an inaccurate statement. All forms of associations are, within the same paragraph 6, considered mere concessions. Moreover, the proviso of association on the basis of absolute equality presupposes independence. Therefore, the interpreter, in a reductio ad absurdum, would be allowed to imply that due to the inaccurate wording of paragraph 6, self-government could be attained through independence. Last but not least, paragraph 6 does not take into account the possibilities for integration in federal or unitary states. This is presently the way in which Greenland is achieving self-government. As to the "list of factors" in itself, in spite of many defects, it is a worthwhile assembling of elements which may help capitalize little by little upon concessions diplomatically gained. Very often, the resolutions approved lost their tactical possibilities by unnecessarily reaffirming principles when in themselves they were already the practical effects of those principles.⁸ This bad diplomacy and these bad tactics prejudiced the flexibility of Chapter XI for growth and further development, not only because the recommendations passed by the Assembly lack binding force but also because they stirred up violent opposition on the part of the Member States which were supposed to implement them. Further, to the attempt by General Assembly to act de jure ferenda to supplement the provisions of the Charter, the administering countries reacted by denying what was jure facta. Therefore, the arithmetical victories became empty triumphs.

THE QUESTION OF POLITICAL INFORMATION

Colonial resistance initially appeared in the refusal to submit information of the Assembly in judging concrete cases, provided the peculiarities of each case are duly considered and the fundamental role given to the right of self-determination.

⁸ The last paragraph of the preamble of Resolution 748 (VIII) concerning the cessation of the transmission of information in respect to Puerto Rico is expletive. It was introduced by way of amendments to the first draft sponsored by seven Member States who, also defending the principle of the competence of the General Assembly, tried a formula to state it without unnecessarily stirring up opposition. This formula appears in paragraph 8 of the operative part of Resolution 748 (VIII): "the General Assembly considers it appropriate that the transmission of information should cease." The competence is implicit in this wording. There are grounds to suppose, however, that the introduction of the amendment was bound to prejudice the compromise appearing in paragraph 8 so as to divert votes on the principal conclusion of the Resolution, that is, the approval of the conclusion according to which Puerto Rico had become self-governing.

a political character. The basis for this refusal may be found in the wording of Article 73 e. However, even conceding that the omission of information of a political character was intentional, through this argument the Organization has been deprived of capital elements of knowledge as to the manner in which the specific obligation assumed under Article 73 b is being performed. The logical contradiction is shocking: the Assembly is informed of the economic, social, and educational conditions in the territories, but not of their political evolution, that is, the development of their capacity for self-government, which is, in the spirit of the Declaration, the very goal of their economic, social, and educational progress. The final destination of the information exacted or, in other words, its ultimate utilization, has also been a matter of controversy, the colonial powers maintaining, even less logically, that the final recipient of information was the Secretary-General.⁹

ESTABLISHMENT OF MACHINERY OF IMPLEMENTATION

The sustained effort with which the majority in the General Assembly en-

⁹ Clause e of Article 73 was not discussed at length at San Francisco, and the reasons for not including information on political conditions were not made sufficiently explicit. (See United Nations Conference on International Organization documents, Vol. II, pp. 421 ff.) The reservations determined by security and constitutional reasons were also not sufficiently clarified. The idea was not to ask for more detailed reports than those submitted to the national Parliaments. This, at least, was the explanation furnished by the delegate from the United States. Implicitly, it was therefore admitted that the United Nations should receive at least as much information as the national Parliaments. In the second session of the General Assembly (New York, 1947), the question of the transmission of information of a political nature was raised. The compromise text finally approved by the Assembly considered the transmission of such deavored to correct the main lacuna of Chapter XI—the absence of machinery for the implementation of its provisions—has since 1946 been blocked by the intransigence of the administering members. Their participation in a body which, even though transitory, could systematically help the General Assembly in the performance of its functions has been secured by means of successive transactions which limited the competence of the First Ad Hoc Committee, subsequently christened the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, to questions of an exclusively technical nature. Ostensibly, the doubts as to the constitutionality of this committee are supported by the same kind of reasoning, by the same interpretation, or misinterpretation, which, in the last analysis, would lessen the significance of Chapter XI to that of generous-hearted impulses inspired by an outmoded colonial paternalism.¹⁰

Article 22 destroys any objection to the legality of deliberations of the General Assembly which aim at creating subsidiary bodies with a view to facilitating the exercise of the functions which are incumbent upon that principal organ of the Organization.

information in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 but admitted that its transmission should be voluntarily effected. See Resolution 144 (II).

¹⁰ The maximum that could be obtained was to give to the Committee a duration of three years. When, in 1952, in the course of the seventh session of the General Assembly, it was again proposed that the Committee should be established on a permanent basis, the colonial powers implied that they would not participate in it. It is to be noted that during the first part of the first session of the General Assembly (London, 1946), the Australian delegate had emphasized the necessity of establishing a machinery which would guarantee the execution of the obligations assumed under Chapter XI. See Non-self-governing Territories: Analysis of Information (United Nations ed., 1948), p. 13.

Historical precedents lead us to believe that all the reservations and mistrust which vainly seek legal supports are born of the fear that there may be created a machinery of control potentially capable of holding, with regard to the non-self-governing territories, in the strict sense, functions similar to those which are exercised by the Trusteeship Council. The hypothesis was, in fact, considered in San Francisco, when the well-known Australian Memorandum came up for discussion.¹¹ The fundamental purpose of the Australian delegation, at that time, was to attribute the same status to and consequently submit to the same international control all dependent territories. The abandonment of that proposition appears in the comprehensive "working document" prepared by the American delegation, finally crystallizing in Chapters XI, XII, and XIII, in the distinction between the two types of dependent territories.

It is necessary not to lose sight of that distinction whenever a definition is sought of what may be called the "effective measure of jurisdiction of the Organization" or the degree of control of the United Nations over the territories to which only Chapter XI applies. There is a great step, however, between that distinction and flat rejection of the admission that Chapter XI also establishes a certain degree of competence of the Organization and, consequently, that it is perfectly legal to provide this Chapter with means of implementation. Once this step is taken, we cross the limits of the reasonable and of what may be termed juridically correct.

It is also to be noted that the Aus-

¹¹ See Document UNCIO 575, II/4/12 (UNIO ed.), Vol. X, p. 697; and for a brief appraisal of the discussion at San Francisco: see Non-self-governing Territories: Analysis of Information, pp. 3 ff.

alian thesis favoring the establishment of a Committee of Experts for the examination of the reports that should come from all the non-self-governing territories was never definitively set aside at San Francisco. The opposition met by the Australian proposition focused chiefly upon the extension of the juridical discipline of the trusteeship system to all dependent territories.¹²

THE ROOTS OF DISAGREEMENT

The analyses which have been made as to the content and nature of the Declaration lead to the conclusion that Chapter XI is an integral part of the normative system of the Charter, to the same extent that the objectives set forth therein are part of the general objectives of the Organization.

From the practical point of view, however, any critical evaluation of the eventual possibility of redrafting Chapter XI should primarily take into account the difficulties encountered by the United Nations in implementing its present provisions. As we have tried to indicate, the root of such difficulties lies in the conceptual divergencies as to what the Declaration really intends to declare. These conceptual divergencies were responsible for many an embittered discussion on "principles"; starting from conflicting assumptions, colonial and noncolonial powers have not only been unable to agree on the nature and purposes of Chapter XI but also on the very significance—the political, the juridical, even the current significance—of the phraseology of Chapter XI. Such a basic disagreement is the constant and immediate cause of the mistrust with which administering and nonadministering members envisage their mutual intentions, the former protesting against the usurpation of, or encroachment upon, the rights they did not relinquish by signing the Charter, the latter alleging the failure of the colonial powers to comply with their specific obligations towards the United Nations.

Certainly, the complex of elements determining the political approach of administering and nonadministering members to the colonial question sharpens the antagonism which stems from the two unbridgeable interpretations. For that same reason, the discussions of colonial subjects in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly have very often been influenced by considerations of national policy or by international political issues which had no direct bearing upon the merits of the actual problems under consideration. Nevertheless, the good faith with which the colonial powers are endeavoring to accomplish the sacred trust of civilization has not, as a rule, been denied. The systematic criticism launched against them, individually or as a group, may be traced to: (1) a demagogic anticolonialism either ignoring political, economic, and social realities or nourished by restive memories of a recent colonial status or (2) a tangible wish to utilize anticolonialism not to favor the aspirations of colonial peoples in general, but to play it as a card in the game of international politics or to serve some clear, specific interest, however just.

BASIC ASSUMPTIONS FOR REVISION

Hence, the eventual revision of Chapter XI should seek primarily to eliminate the causes of conflict regarding its interpretation. The redrafting of Article 73 should necessarily be based on two fundamental assumptions: (1) a political premise to the effect that the concessions already made by the administering authorities and generally expressed in the idea of international accountability are irreversible and (2) a juridical propositio pursuant to which this international accountability should have a clear-cut legal definition and be formulated with the exactness and precision in which legal commitments are stated so as to avoid all possible misunderstandings concerning the nature and object of the obligation assumed and, especially, to dispel any doubts regarding the statutory powers of the Organization.

This latter aspect of the problem is by far the most important. It has already been said that Chapter XI was born out of misunderstanding. This derisory remark is not entirely justified by the historical antecedents of the Declaration, but it is unfortunately true that the political compromise arrived at in San Francisco was not couched in the best terms. It cannot be questioned that the colonial powers were obliged to yield to the idealistic and liberal forces which stamped the historical postwar moment and called for a new pattern of international relations. The victory over the undemocratic conceptions of life and the state lent momentum to the "colonial rebellion" and enriched it with an ideological content.

It is, therefore, hard to agree with those representatives of administering authorities who recently declared that their respective governments would never have signed the Charter if the provisions of Chapter XI were to be interpreted in the manner imposed by the majority in the General Assembly. This is tantamount to saying, "if they had thought that Chapter XI would ever be implemented." On the contrary, it is to be noted that the colonial powers were perfectly aware of the importance of the commitments they were assuming towards the Organization to be. They labored and maneuvered to preserve the original title of their jurisdiction over their colonial possessions; and they obtained a remarkable victory when, in its final form, Chapter XI ended by compromising with the principle of national sovereignty by implicitly acknowledging that the power of jurisdiction over the dependent territories to which Chapters XII and XIII were not to apply had as its source the internal public law of the respective metropolitan countries.

As of 1947, however, one would be inclined to believe that the colonial powers par excellence had entered into the colonial agreement in San Francisco with mental reservations, with an interpretation of their own as to the extent of their obligations to the international community organized in the United Nations. It would also seem that the vague formulation of their commitments, the ambiguity and the lack of basic definitions in Chapter XI had not been entirely unintentional.

CENTRAL POINTS TO BE REVISED

The uncertainty of the phrasing which later hindered the acceptance of commonly agreed criteria for interpretation of the Declaration begins with the definition of the territories involved. To the misleading heading of Chapter XI, Article 73 adds a new element of confusion by broadening that heading with a new qualification: "a full measure of self-government." What does this mean? From the juridical point of view—and that is the criteria of interpretation to be applied to legal documents—self-government means autonomy, a constitutional status of internal political autonomy inside a larger political system, by contrast with the international status of independence. The reference in the Covenant of the League of Nations to "fully self-governing dominions and colonies," as well as the absence in the text of Chapter XI of the word "independence," and still further the concessions made in the Declaration to the principle of state sovereignty—all these considerations seem to justify the legitimacy of the conceptual distinction between the two expressions. But it is also true that this restrictive interpretation would gravely imperil the exercise of the right of self-determination, which is one of the fundamental principles of the Charter and is implicitly reaffirmed in Article 73 b. Some delegations aimed at identifying a full measure of self-government "with independence"¹³ with a view to recognizing in the latter the sole objective of Chapter XI and to denying that a full status of self-government could exist within a form of association or a compact with the old metropolitan country. There is reason to suppose that such a stand was, for the most part, inspired by political prejudices which, by implication, went so far as to trample upon the right of self-determination of the peoples concerned.

¹² This point was made by the Brazilian delegate, Professor Vicente Rao, in the Fourth Committee of the fifth session of the General Assembly. See Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifth Session, Fourth Committee, p. 5, in fine.

All this points to the necessity of finding in the revision of Chapter XI a formula to combine the objectives of self-government and eventual progressive independence. By contrast, and with the help of juridical criteria, it would not be impossible to define both concepts.

On the other hand, the institutional nature of the interests of the Organization and the principle of collective responsibility as to their realization logically determine that the Organization should decide in the final instance exactly when its droit de regard over colonial administrations should cease, that is, when the obligation to supply information disappears because it has lost its purpose.

The competence of the General Assembly to decide on this cessation of transmission of information is, indeed, the most logical consequence of the whole system. As previously pointed out, the endeavors to work out formulae which, without compromising with the principle, intended to soothe wounded sensibilities, were hindered by the intransigence of the most radical currents of opinion. Consequently, many opportunities were lost for the United Nations to establish a kind of case law which would benefit from the support of a large majority. Assuming that colonial resistance will continue to oppose the rule of competence from being explicitly formulated—and in all probability this assumption is accurate—the most satisfactory political solution, and legally the most advisable, would be listing in the text of the Charter the territories to which a revised Chapter XI would apply. At the very least, the contractual agreement implied in this enumeration would disavow any further argument that a Member State could decide on its own when and why a territory would fall outside the scope of Chapter XI.

Another capital point that should be cleared in the revision is the one concerning the machinery of implementation. The establishment of such machinery, which is already outlined in the resolutions concerning the Committee on Information, would practically solve many questions as to the actual efficacy of the obligations assumed by the Member States with colonial responsibilities and as to the rights of supervision by the United Nations. Such a step, also by implication, would eliminate one of the reasons for the highly critical attitude of the majority of the United Nations members as to the real intentions of colonial policies.

POLITICAL PERSPECTIVE BEFORE WESTERN POWERS

From a political perspective, that is, bringing into the picture the fundamental issues of the policies of the Western powers, it is perfectly obvious that a just treatment of colonial aspirations is closely tied up with the aims that the free world claims to be fighting for. The ill-inspired tendencies to play down such an intimate connection have proved disastrous to the cause of Western civilization. Every move which is suspected of complying with colonial interests has failed to win support even amongst those Member States who have sided with the colonial powers in fundamental political issues; such moves have also provided grounds for the not entirely unjustified mistrust which equates "Occident" with "imperialism."

It seems, therefore, that even for selfish purposes, or as political tactics, the colonial powers should try to consolidate the ideological front of the free world by formulating a new political appraisal of the "colonial question" and by conceding, without engaging in hopeless struggles, what, according to the majority of the opinions expressed in the forum of the United Nations, is considered to be within the compass of the times.

The ideal solution would certainly be to resume discussions by taking again as a working document the Australian Memorandum which, at San Francisco, was by far the most progressive and realistic approach to the colonial problem. Admitting, however, that the administering powers will firmly oppose a radical transformation of the legal status quo, it will be extremely dangerous for them not to accept an unequivocal definition of their obligations toward the United Nations and a larger and more clearly determined measure of control by the United Nations over the fulfillment of the "sacred trust" of civilization. For what has to be borne in mind is that the idea of international accountability will never more be wiped from the political and juridical conscience of the world.

Sergio Armando Frazão, New York City, is Brazilian adviser on political affairs to the Permanent Delegation of Brazil to the United Nations. He has been vice-president of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (1953), adviser to the Brazilian delegation to the Fourth Committee of the eighth session of the General Assembly, alternate representative on the Committee on South West Africa, and in 1952 assistant professor and examiner of international law at the Brazilian Diplomatic Academy (Instituto Rio Branco). He is the author of The Autonomy of the Will, a thesis on the theory of contract, awarded a prize by the Brazilian Bar Association and published in the Biblioteca Jurídica Brasileira (1937).

¹³ See Note 7 above.

The Yardstick of International Law

By CLYDE EAGLETON

"The United Nations is undoubtedly a political order, but it was intended to be a legal order also. . . . The peoples of the world . . . will not accept a system in which their disputes are settled by majority vote without regard to justice; and they will not give the United Nations authority to do more than recommend unless that authority is carefully restricted by law."

IT is a question of deep-lying importance in the future of the United Nations, and of mankind, whether that institution should be a legal or a political order; it would be better, doubtless, to ask whether it is to be more of a political or more of a legal order. Actually, it was conceived as both, and it is so described by those who know it. Thus, Mr. Feller, who was Legal Counsel for the United Nations, said of it:

The Charter is a legal text, but it is also a political document in which the representatives of many nations decided to set forth statements of aspiration, of ideals and of moral sentiments. . . . The United Nations was born into an atmosphere shot with the clashes of ideology and political strife. It was only by going forward that it could survive. The road of broad construction was the one along which it could progress. . . .

At the same time, the process of adaptation through interpretation and usage has its defined limits. The United Nations is a legal order and it cannot tear itself loose from the specific restrictions of the Charter, irksome though they may be from time to time to one interest or another.¹

The representatives of states often insist upon respect for law and Charter, even though on other occasions, or on the same occasion, they say "don't be legalistic." Mr. Byrnes, at the end of his educational experience as Secretary of State, asserted that

The struggle for peace is the struggle for law and justice. It is a never-ending struggle. Law and justice can be developed and applied only through living institutions capable of life and growth. And the institutions must be backed by sufficient force to protect nations which abide by the law against nations which violate the law.

And Secretary of State Acheson said that the United Nations is a means to the end which is "progressive development of a peaceful and stable world order where law rather than force and anarchy will govern the nations in their foreign relations." Democratic and Republican presidents alike have asserted this objective; so has the Secretary-General.

This is natural enough, for people through centuries have come to believe that law is the best device so far discovered for handling disputes between human beings in order to avoid or prevent the use of force; and it was easy to transfer this concept to disputes between nations which are, after all, composed of human beings. This is not to say that law is the only method, or that it is an adequate one, or that all thinkers agree that it is the proper answer in international affairs. Most disputes between individuals are settled between the parties without recourse to the courts, though even in these cases, law is in the background, which greatly influences the agreement reached between the parties. In the same sense, Article 33 of the Charter of the United Nations makes it the first duty of the parties to a dispute to try to settle it by "means of their own choice."

THE RECOURSE TO LAW AMONG NATIONS

International law, of course, is weak and inadequate; there are some, indeed, who say that it is not law. Lawyers, I regret to say, frequently say this; they, like others, seem to think that international law should grow all by itself. Lawyers believe in law; they know what a struggle it is to get a new rule of domestic law into being, and they may be willing to work hard to help; but it does not seem to occur to them that international law must have similar support. People say that they want law between nations, but do nothing to build it up; when it is unable to meet needs, they jeer at it. Nevertheless, and doubtless because it is indispensable, there is an international law; at any rate, there is a set of rules governing the conduct of nations. Governments base their claims against other governments upon the basis of this law, use legal procedures in the argument, refer cases to tribunals, accept and obey the decisions given and pay indemnity where ordered. No state ever denies the existence or the binding force of these rules. It is difficult to deny the name law to such rules.

The trouble is that this law does not reach out to cover those matters which peoples would most like to see covered—vital questions such as economic relationships, the prevention of the use of force, the rights of individual human beings, et cetera. Furthermore, this law does not have behind it the procedures found in domestic law, by which a nation can be brought to court even when it does not want to go, nor does it have means of enforcing the law when it is clearly applicable. The reason for this is that those very persons who criticize it for these defects are unwilling to have such requirements applied to their own nation, or, at the least, make no effort to have their own nation develop the law and submit to it. This is not surprising; nations have for centuries been accustomed to being sovereign, to defend their rights by themselves, to depend upon themselves. Along with this, they claim the right of free decisions upon all matters with no limitation from any outside authority.

With such habits of thought reaching back for centuries, it is not easy for people to think of submitting their nation's disputes to, and relying for protection upon, the community of nations. The state was created for the purpose of protecting and advancing the interests of its individual members, and it is difficult for these members to accept the idea that their interests can no longer be adequately protected by the state, and can be better protected in some respects by the organized community of nations. In the interdependent state of the world today, and with the weapons and methods of modern war, no state can even fight a war with its own unaided efforts; it must have help from the outside.

There is a school of thought which argues that the state should pursue its national interests in whatever way would achieve them, regardless of law or morals. Those who think in this way either live in the past, unable to give up the idea that the state is the supreme human institution; or they may prefer politics to law, particularly since international law is so weak an institution; or they may simply be recognizing a factual situation, and be unable to think beyond this situation. These "realists" prefer to depend upon national power, though not more than two states in the world today are really able to think in terms of national power—which, ultimately, means war. They talk of “wise statesmanship” as a better solution, but the road of history is strewn with the wrecks of states which sought to depend upon shrewdness and national power. Wise statesmanship is desirable and has at times been most helpful; it is not always present on both sides at the same time, or in sufficient quantity and virtue.

¹ A. H. Feller, United Nations and World Community (Boston, 1952), pp. 42-43.

“Power politics” is frequently set up against law, but there is no necessary conflict between them; they are not necessarily alternatives; both have their part to play in human affairs. Within any human society, the game of power politics is constantly being played, from the women’s society in a church to municipal government to Congress (where we have lately had a horrible demonstration of the way in which the game can be played). There are pressures other than physical force which may be employed, and we shall have to learn the methods of “cold war.” But it is just this struggle which has produced law. Intelligent human beings have become convinced, through painful experience, that there must be rules within which this struggle for power is to be carried on; they have concluded that mere power, brute force, should not be allowed to override the opportunity of the individual to develop his life and talents in his own way, insofar as they do not damage the same right on the part of other individuals.

On the record, it would appear that in the past power politics has been dominant; this is not certainly true, for many episodes of history have been adjusted by law and morals, rather than by superior force. But if it is true, the conclusion does not follow that we will continue the record of the past; indeed, it may be impossible to follow it under present conditions. Each state, like each individual, must be prepared to stand up for his own rights, to fight for them if necessary, but alone he cannot succeed. This is why he has built up and believes in law. Whatever arguments may be put forward for “power politics,” it is no complete answer; it provides no ultimate and satisfactory answer. When “wise statesmanship” has failed, as it must on many occasions, a nation must fall back upon law or upon war, and today, men do not want war. There must be law within which the game of power politics is played; this law is the yardstick of advancing civilization as between nations.

With this by way of background, perhaps unnecessary, let us ask whether the United Nations was set up as a legal order and how far in practice it is moving in that direction. For this purpose, we may consider its habits as to the settlement of disputes, the respect which it has shown to the Charter and its provisions for the development of international law.

SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES

The makers of the Charter did not evidence much interest in international law. The Dumbarton Oaks proposals contained only one reference to it, and this was taken out at San Francisco. Originally, as in the Covenant of the League of Nations, the provision was that the decision whether or not a matter was a domestic question was to be made in accordance with international law. At San Francisco, when the clause was moved back under “Principles,” the reference to international law disappeared. Many states, however, noted this complete exclusion of law, and their efforts resulted in two inclusions: one in Article 1, paragraph 1, where it was said that a dispute would be settled “in conformity with principles of justice and international law”; and the other in Article 13 where, in weak words, the General Assembly was instructed to make recommendations for the purpose of promoting political co-operation and encouraging the development of international law. Compulsory jurisdiction of the Court over members for legal disputes was of course rejected; and the only vestige of law as regards the functions of the Security Council was that it should take into consideration (Art. 36, par. 3) that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred to the International Court of Justice.

It cannot be said that any greater interest in law has been shown in the practice of members in United Nations organs. There may be occasional references to law in the debates in the Security Council, but it is never a determining factor in a decision. Article 36, paragraph 3, has been used on only one occasion, and that was when a veto had frustrated the Council so that it could do nothing itself with regard to the dispute. The parties were encouraged to take this case (Corfu Channel) to the Court, and did so; but Albania paid no attention to the decision of the Court when it was given. Nor has the Council ever asked the Court for an advisory opinion. It is authorized to do so, and it could ask for advice on points of law, as the Council of the League of Nations did, the decision of the dispute remaining in its own hands; but it has shown no interest in the Court. The suggestion has often been made in the Council that a matter be referred to the Court for an advisory opinion and occasionally a motion to that effect, but none has been passed; and even those who in discussion seem to favor such reference rarely vote for it, and usually abstain.

The Charter, of course, provides no legal principles to guide the Security Council in settling disputes, and no criteria of any kind; it is absolutely free to do what it can get votes to do. There is not even a definition of aggression—which, as the experience of the League of Nations showed, is extremely difficult to work out—though it was fought for at San Francisco and is again being fought for in the United Nations. The recommendation made by the Council is, then, a purely political one; whether it is a legal matter or not, it will be decided on a political basis. The prevailing belief seems to be that disputes are better handled through conciliation—if the Council action can be called conciliation—than through judicial settlement. The latter, it is said, is a harsh and final decision, and in these days it is better to bargain and reach a compromise which will not leave either party in a bitter frame of mind. The Council itself can do no more than recommend; a judicial decision is binding. One may reserve his bit of doubt as to this reasoning. A political vote leaves one free to work for his friends or to veto action against them. If the majority is on your side you are lucky; if not, you veto. There should be better ways of handling disputes than this. The Netherlands is probably no more happy over the political votes which resulted in her losing Indonesia than she would have been if a court had issued a decree to this effect; Pakistan would doubtless be as happy over a judicial decision concerning Kashmir as she is in facing the political power of India. And always in the Security Council is the frustrating effect of the cold war, by which a court would be little affected.

RESPECT AND DISRESPECT FOR THE CHARTER

The Charter is both a constitution and a treaty, and in either case is entitled to great respect as a legal instrument. As a treaty it is under international law entitled to legal interpretation, and this was affirmed by the International Court of Justice in the case concerning conditions of admission to membership, in answer to the claim that it was a political question: "The Court can not attribute a political character to a request which, framed in abstract terms, invites it to undertake an essentially judicial task, the interpretation of a treaty provision." As a constitution, it should provide its own means of interpretation, but this was not done at San Francisco. Here, as elsewhere, the Court was rejected, and there can be no such directing and controlling guidance as the Supreme Court of the United States has been able to give concerning its Constitution. A committee at the conference reported that no means of interpreting the Charter had been agreed upon but that it was probable that each organ, or each member, would interpret it for itself.

So far as one can speak of interpretation, this is what has happened. Each organ decides its own powers for itself, for the most part simply by going ahead to adopt whatever a majority wishes to adopt, and without bothering to consider the challenge someone may have raised concerning competence to do what was proposed. Out of some seventy-two (which does not cover all such cases) instances in which a proposed action was challenged (not necessarily by motion) as contrary to the Charter, on fourteen of these a vote was taken—a vote, that is, on the question of competence, as differentiated from the vote on the proposal itself. Of these, only three were in plenary Assembly; they were on domestic questions, the right to define "self-governing," and membership with regard to Italy in the Trusteeship Council. Eight of the fourteen votes were on the domestic questions clause, all but one being taken in committee. In nine of the fourteen instances, the organ concerned declared itself competent; in five, it held itself incompetent. It is to be noted as to these votes that in every case in which the organ said that it was incompetent to act, it was with regard to a motion which had been introduced by a representative of the Soviet bloc, and in two of the cases in which the competence of the organ was sustained, it was done through defeat of a Polish or Yugoslav motion which would have denied competence. On the other hand, and except for the two just mentioned, every case in which competence to act was upheld was on a proposal in which the anticolonial majority were intensely interested.

It is a strange fact with regard to the above that, though someone raises a question as to constitutionality on a very large number of proposals, very rarely does one make a motion calling for a decision. Such a motion is provided for under Rule 80 of the Rules of Procedure of the General Assembly, which gives priority to it, but the rule is practically never used. It is strange that delegates who say in the debates that the proposed action is illegal and/or should be referred to the Court, will in either case usually abstain rather than vote against the proposal which they have asserted to be illegal. This is strange only if one is thinking in terms of law; the delegates for the most part are making their decisions on a political basis. They have done their duty, apparently, when they have pointed out the unconstitutionality.

An explanation of this attitude is to be found, on the part of many delegates, by their expressed view that it is not necessary to take a vote on competence, since the vote on the proposal itself implies belief that it is a constitutional action. The President of the Security Council on one occasion said: "Those who believe that the matter is within the competence of the Council may vote affirmatively or negatively on the Australian resolution; however, those who believe that the matter is outside the competence of the Council will certainly vote against the resolution."² It is probable that the President was not so naïve as to believe this; certainly, the records do not support this optimistic view. It is very convenient for a Member State which eagerly wishes some proposal to be adopted to be told that if a majority votes for it, that proves it is constitutional. It saves him the trouble of recording his state on the question of legality, and saves him the risk that the action he desires might be blocked by a vote that the organ was incompetent to adopt it. We have noted above the practice of abstaining, rather than voting against, on the part of some who have expressed the view that the proposal was unconstitutional. The representative of the United States declared on one occasion that he would abstain because he thought the Council did not have jurisdiction, and at the same time asked: "How are we to support the rule of law in the world if we treat lightly the basic law in the Security Council itself?" How, indeed?

To add to the difficulty of obtaining a proper interpretation of the Charter, states take positions which are inconsistent. In practice, practically every state can be shown to have voted for competence when it wanted something and against competence when it was opposed. The Soviet Union has often and emphatically asserted that when a proposal has been voted, that proves that the organ believed it to be constitutional; when, however, the proposal was one that it did not like, it asserted (and quite correctly) that repeated violations of the Charter do not make an illegality any more legitimate. There have been occasions on which decision as to the right to adopt a proposal was postponed until after the proposal had been adopted.

The most fundamental issue, and the one over which most disputes as to interpretation have occurred, is derived from Article 2, paragraph 7, which forbids the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state. This clause is for the United Nations what is the most fundamental question within any government: where is the line to be drawn between the power of government and the freedom of the subjects thereof? The clause applies to everything in the Charter except enforcement action under Chapter VII. It is a drastic statement, which would appear to leave each member free to exclude the United Nations on the mere assertion of the member that it was a domestic question. A liberal interpretation of the clause might be expected and be justifiable; what has happened is that from the beginning and more extensively, the clause has been disregarded and thrust aside. In the cases of Franco Spain, and of the Indians in South Africa, where the matter was first debated, reference to the Court for interpretation was rejected, and efforts to have the organ concerned vote first as to whether it was competent in these cases was also refused. It was several years before a committee voted on the question of competence and not until the seventh Assembly that the plenary body for the first time voted on competence. The argument was made that other clauses, such as those dealing with human rights, which were regarded as in conflict with Article 2, paragraph 7, prevailed over the latter article, which begins with the words "Nothing in this Charter shall. . . ." The situation is made more confused by the inconsistency of the members. Thus Australia at San Francisco sought to tighten Article 2, paragraph 7; later, as against Spain and the Netherlands she maintained that any matter covered by the Charter could not be a domestic question (which leaves little reason for putting the clause into the Charter) but with regard to South Africa, she thought that the clause should apply. Similar inconsistencies could be shown with regard to most members.

² Security Council, Official Records, Second Year, No. 68, p. 1687; ibid., Sixth Year, 562nd Meeting, p. 2.

It seems highly improbable that a court, through judicial process, would have arrived at such a conclusion. Members have been unwilling to commit themselves through formal vote and, when they have done so, it was clearly a political vote, and possible because of the prevailing majority of small states which are anticolonial and anti-great power and who assert the superiority of the vague provisions concerning human rights and self-determination et cetera over the restrictive clause. It is a strange paradox; Article 2, paragraph 7, is intended to protect national sovereignty, and these smaller states assert their sovereign independence most strongly; yet they attack the clause which protects them. That the decision is a political one is indeed affirmed in the only study of the clause from a constitutional viewpoint made by an organ of the United Nations:

... the organs of the United Nations take the final decision on competence, on whether, from a political standpoint, the question before them is or is not within the domestic jurisdiction of the State and whether it is sufficiently serious and important to arouse international concern. ...²

DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

With regard to the development of international law, there is as little interest and quite inadequate methods. An International Law Commission was set up, it is true; and it is a fairly competent body, doing its work sincerely and seriously. But it is limited in its choice of topics for study, particularly as to the new law so badly needed; and above all, its work requires the ratification of states individually to become effective as law. Thus far, interrupted as it has been by uncongenial tasks unloaded upon it by the General Assembly, it has succeeded in preparing only one draft convention, which is now being considered by states. It remains to be seen whether they will approve.

² General Assembly, Eighth Session, Official Records, Supplement No. 16, Report of the United Nations Commission on the Racial Situation in the Union of South Africa, 1953, A/2505, p. 22.

If one may judge by the past, the chances are that half of the states will take no action at all, a number will sign, and a smaller number will finally ratify and be bound by the rule. While it will be helpful to this extent, it can hardly be called a rule of law binding upon all members of the community of nations. This is the weakest aspect of international relations and little improvement is to be found in the practice of the United Nations. No systematic provisions have been made for international legislation. There is no agency to study and report upon what legislative treaties are needed or which ones could be undertaken with some prospect of acceptance. There is no expert body provided for drafting a treaty intended to lay down a new rule. Such a draft convention may originate in any part of the U.N.—for example the Transport and Communications Commission or the Commission on the Status of Women—which may or may not have available persons competent in drafting. The United Kingdom, disturbed by this situation, sought to have drafting of legal documents put into more competent hands, but made little headway. There is no method for ascertaining the view of governments in order to decide whether the instrument is ripe for ratification. And, above all, there seems to be no advance whatever in getting around the principle that no state can be bound except by its own consent.

The General Assembly can only make recommendations; it cannot pass laws binding upon members. These recommendations may have great weight, and they may lead to sufficient acceptance in practice by states to result ultimately in the establishment of a rule of customary international law. It does not seem probable that the Assembly could be given any legislative power so long as it operates on the principle of equal voting, which enables the majority of small states to have their will. From the viewpoint of making or developing international law, then, the United Nations has made little progress—though legislative treaties do occasionally have some success; and in practice, it has paid little attention to this problem.

CONCLUSIONS

The record shows easily that the members of the United Nations have little interest in law as a means of adjusting differences between themselves, and as little in the constitutional system which the Charter was intended to provide. This is not surprising. The majority of members are small and many of them new states, which wish to develop; the Soviet bloc in a parallel sense wishes to develop its ideology and controls. International law is for either of them a set of rules of the past, which stand in their way; they are looking to the future and wish no restraints. A constitution has as one of its primary purposes to restrain the government and protect its subjects and one might expect the weaker states to rely upon the Charter; in fact, it works the other way, for they constitute a majority and do not want the Charter restrictions to prevent them from moving as they want to move. It is the older and stronger states, having vested interests, who support international law and wish to rely on the constitutional protections given by the Charter. Of course, a smaller state may itself occasionally be the object of attack, in which case it hastily scampers back under the shelter of the Charter; and a large state has more than once been willing to stretch its interpretation of some Charter restriction to gain votes in the cold war or for other purpose.

This is doubtless normal development in the chronology of history; it takes any new government a long time to shake down into smooth running; Americans especially can reflect upon the difficulties of bringing together thirteen sovereign pygmies into the mighty nation of today.

But one should not mistake a factual situation for political or moral principles. It does not follow from a circumstantial situation in which political methods are preferred to law that it is logical and desirable that the United Nations should be a political order. The struggle for political power goes on always and everywhere, but unless it is brought under control in the sense of rules within which it is to be carried on, the inevitable end, the final solution, is physical conflict. States joined the United Nations on the understanding that their freedom of action would be limited only in a few and slight ways, and they were more interested in the restrictions set in the Charter to protect them against the United Nations than they were in the authority of the United Nations to do things. These protections are now being removed through an interpretation of the Charter by a majority acting upon a political motivation. The situation would doubtless have come to a head long before now had the United Nations the right to do more than make recommendations. Even so, South Africa rejects its resolutions and reacts bitterly against the United Nations; more than one member has walked out of meetings, refusing to participate in what it regarded with good justification as illegal action; now the more powerful states—upon whom the United Nations depends—are being forced to oppose the unrestrained desires of an impatient majority. How long those whose constitutional rights are thus disregarded will continue to have patience with it is uncertain; it is an evidence of the need and the value of the United Nations that no state has even threatened to withdraw.

The United Nations is undoubtedly a political order, but it was intended to be a legal order also, based upon a treaty and a constitution. If the present trend continues, it will be no more than machinery for conferences, at which states can vote anything they wish. But in such a system, only those states participate which wish to; the system offers no security, no sufficient assurance of help, to justify membership. There is no need for a charter if it is not heeded, and there is no need for an organization in which all states work together if all that it can do is what conferences of the old order could do. Unless the United Nations can offer more, in the way of legal rules which provide some security for members and some authority through which progress can be made, it is apt to disintegrate.

This does not mean that the United Nations is falling apart; on the contrary, it hangs together and accomplishes things in a degree which shows how members realize that they must hang together. But the centrifugal forces are present and should be recognized. If one thinks in terms of improvement of the United Nations, the fundamental decision is whether the proper course is toward a political order, with little attempt to restrain sovereign states. The latter is the way of the past; its ultimate solution is war. The hopes of the peoples of the world are for a United Nations which can solve community problems without war. But they will not accept a system in which their disputes are settled by majority vote without regard to justice; and they will not give the United Nations authority to do more than recommend unless that authority is carefully restricted by law. Review of the Charter will not answer this question. The Charter is there now and, weak as it is, members pay little attention to it, except in oratory. Amendment of the Charter is not enough; the answer must be provided by a changed attitude of members, individually supporting law and the Charter.

Clyde Eagleton is professor of international law at New York University. He worked in the Department of State on the making of the Charter of the United Nations, was an assistant secretary at the Dumbarton Oaks conversations, attended the San Francisco Conference with the delegation of the United States, and has twice served as consultant to the United Nations. He is president of the American branch of the International Law Association and a member of the Executive Council and Board of Editors of the American Society of International Law.

The Yardstick of National Interest

By HANS J. MORGENTHAU

"... the United Nations emerges as a new and important instrument for the pursuit of national interests. . . . it performs that service by the very restraint it imposes upon its most powerful members in the pursuit of their respective national interests."

THE United Nations is today an instrument through which its members try to protect and promote their respective national interests. Whether it be disarmament or collective security or Korea or Palestine or trusteeships or East-West trade, these issues do not change their nature because they are raised within the United Nations rather than without. They owe their existence as controversial issues to conflicting national interests. Their being raised in one of the forums which the United Nations provides may mitigate or aggravate their controversial nature, facilitate or hamper their peaceful settlement; it cannot sever their organic connection with the interests of the nations concerned. This being so, the issue of whether or not to submit a certain problem to the United Nations or even whether or not to remain a member of the organization must be determined exclusively by the usefulness of the United Nations for the protection and promotion of the interests of the nations concerned. A nation must ask itself whether or not it serves its interests better to submit a certain issue to the United Nations rather than to settle that issue otherwise, and to retain its membership in the organization, using or not using it as it sees fit, rather than as a matter of principle to pursue its interests outside it.

This pragmatic and instrumental approach to the United Nations must contend with two strong popular tendencies, one internationalist, the other isolationist in character, and both taking a utopian view of the United Nations. Their view is utopian because both of them misunderstand in different ways the distinction between organization and substantive policy. An organization is a mere instrument which lends itself to all kinds of uses, a mere framework within which all kinds of structures can be erected, an empty shell, as it were, which can be filled with all kinds of content. An organization, through its procedural requirements, may force a policy into a certain mold, altering its methods and dynamics; it cannot alter the core of the policy itself. Thus the United Nations is nothing more than a club in which all kinds of members can pursue all kinds of policies, a stage on which the drama of international politics is played again in a new setting. The setting is new, but the plot is as old as history. In one word, the United Nations presents a new production of the same old play.

Both internationalists and isolationists have shared in the utopian expectation that the United Nations would change not only the setting but the plot as well. Since that expectation was disappointed, as it was bound to be, both now share a disillusionment which tends to transform itself into hostility to the United Nations itself.

The isolationist thinks of the United Nations as an instrument of American policy pure and simple, knowing only of one national interest worth pursuing, that of the United States. He cannot accept a situation, let alone an organization, which compels the United States to come to terms with other interests equally legitimate. For him, it is either all or nothing. Either the United States deals with the world on its own terms, or it refuses to deal with it at all. Either the United Nations can be used as an instrument of American foreign policy, like the Department of State or the Army, or it is of no use to the United States at all. More than that, membership in the United Nations is even harmful to the interests of the United States in that it prevents the United States from having its own way all the time and compels it to adapt its own policies to those of other nations.

The internationalist, on the other hand, has looked at the United Nations as an alternative to power politics, that is, the kind of politics which nations have pursued traditionally and which they still pursue today within the United Nations. He expected the United Nations to initiate a kind of international politics in which nations would pool their power for common purposes rather than pit them against each other in competition. This expectation was supported both by the spirit and the letter of the Charter of the United Nations and by the climate of opinion prevailing at the end of the Second World War.

PHILOSOPHY UNDERLYING CHARTER

The Charter predicates the successful operations of the United Nations upon the continuing unity of the great powers, working in harmony within the framework of the Charter. The Charter assumes that harmony, it cannot itself create it. The functions and structure of the Security Council, especially the provisions for the veto, are derived from that assumption. This assumption reflects in good measure a climate of opinion which expected the wartime unity of the allies to continue after the war. The rifts between the Soviet Union and the Western allies which became wider and more numerous as the war drew to a close were regarded as the usual difficulties, to be expected among friends, which would be ironed out by good will, understanding, and mutual concessions.

Thus the utopian hope which made the internationalist look at the United Nations as a new and radical departure in international relations was in a measure shared by the philosophy underlying the Charter itself and was deeply imbedded in the spirit of the times. When that initial hope of a dawning millennium had been disappointed, it was replaced by another hope, equally utopian, that the United Nations could establish peace between East and West if only the conflicts which could not be settled by diplomatic negotiations were submitted to the United Nations. It was widely believed that a dispute, by being put on the agenda of an agency of the United Nations, would somehow lose its sting and become susceptible to a peaceful settlement which could not be otherwise obtained. To "by-pass the United Nations" was in this view the cardinal sin of American statecraft, as though there were in the United Nations a healing power which need only be invoked to make itself prevail.

BY-PASSING U.N.

The fact of the matter is that nations which cannot help pursuing policies designed to serve their national interests are compelled by the very character of the United Nations as a potentially supranational organization to by-pass it under certain conditions. Insofar as substantive matters are concerned, the Security Council of the United Nations operates through seven of its members, of which the permanent ones must form a part; the General Assembly, through a two-thirds majority. It follows that it makes sense for a nation to submit an issue to the United Nations only if it has a chance to obtain the support of the Security Council or the General Assembly. In other words, only those issues lend themselves to disposition by the United Nations with regard to which the interests of one nation or a small group of nations happen to coincide with the interests either of seven members of the Security Council, the permanent ones included, or of two-thirds of the members of the General Assembly. Where such a coincidence between an individual national interest and the collective interests of a qualified majority of the United Nations does not exist from the outset, the individual nation cannot help but by-pass the United Nations in order to pursue its own interest, or else it must create a collective interest within the United Nations which coincides with its own. At this point the United Nations emerges as a new and important instrument for the pursuit of national interests. It owes this importance both to the character of contemporary world politics and to the procedural requirements of the Charter.

ALLIANCES VS. U.N. ACTION

It is one of the distinctive characteristics of contemporary world politics that most of the objectives which nations pursue on the international scene are not peculiar to themselves, but are shared by other—generally many other—nations. It is safe to say that the traditional pattern of national objectives which could be defined as the possession of a particular piece of territory has virtually disappeared from contemporary world politics. The dispute between India and Pakistan over Kashmir is the only important example of this obsolescent pattern that comes to mind. On the other hand, the dispute between France and Germany over the Saar, and that between Italy and Yugoslavia over Trieste, which on the face of them seem to revert to the traditional pattern, are in actuality inseparably fused with the issue of Western defense and of the Western alliance in general.

In consequence, all great powers have a direct—positive or negative—interest in the settlement of these issues. A civil war between North and South Korea or a colonial war between Indochina and France involves directly the national interests not only of the immediate parties, but of all great powers. The interests of the great powers in such local issues are so direct and paramount that they tend to overshadow the interests of the original parties to the dispute. The interests of the latter become mere pawns in a world-wide power struggle, and the locale of a particular dispute becomes a mere accidental theater where the world-wide struggle happens to be fought out.¹

A great nation, such as the United States, can pursue its interests, which it has in common with other nations, either through the traditional instrumentality of alliances or through the United Nations. Either instrument offers advantages and presents liabilities for the United States. But the very fact that the United Nations is available as an instrument of national policies, that, in other words, the United States has a choice between the United Nations and the traditional instruments of foreign policy, gives to the policies of the United States an opportunity for flexibility which would be valuable under all circumstances and which is particularly so under the conditions of the cold war, characterized by the unprecedented rigidity of foreign policies.

¹ It has been shown elsewhere how that internationalization of local issues results inevitably from the bipolarity of power and the tendency toward a two-bloc system, characteristic of contemporary world politics; see my Politics Among Nations (2nd ed.; New York, 1954), pp. 322-40.

If the United States chooses to pursue its interests through the traditional instrumentality of an alliance, as it is doing for instance in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and in its relations with Japan, it has the advantage of being able to bring the paramountcy of its power directly to bear upon the policies to be pursued in common by a limited number of nations. Such an alliance lends itself easily to the translation of a common interest into a common policy, devised and decisively supported by the preponderant member of the alliance.

Yet such an alliance is in the contemporary world exposed to a liability which cannot help but seriously impair its chances for success in pursuing common policies and may even jeopardize its cohesion as an effective instrument for common policies. It is not by accident that the West intervened in the Korean War not as an alliance of nations who were willing and able to make effective military contributions to the common cause, but in the form of a police action of the United Nations, supported by many more nations than participated actively in the military operations. We are here in the presence of a revolutionary and little-understood change in the character of world politics. National policies, pursued as such, have become discredited for two reasons, growing from the objective character of contemporary world politics.

National policies pursued by one of the superpowers through traditional methods carry within themselves the possibility of a third world war which would inevitably destroy the respective allies of the superpowers, if not the superpowers themselves. The more self-centered and traditionally oriented the national policies of the superpower are, the more likely are they to be self-defeating in terms of the voluntary support they can expect from their respective allies. The policies pursued by the Soviet Union under Stalin since the end of the Second World War which, with the exception of China, found support only among nations which had first been conquered by the Red Army are a case in point. The crisis in the Western alliance which has been smoldering for a long time and has become acute at the moment of this writing illustrates in a different setting the same self-defeating consequences of national policies oriented toward a national interest defined in particularistic terms. Thus we are here in the presence of the paradox that a national policy, in order to have a chance to prevail, must define itself in terms transcending the national interest of a particular nation and comprising the national interests of those nations whose support it seeks.

THE UNDERLYING PARADOX

This is so even with respect to policies, such as economic and technical aid, which by their very nature seem to transcend the national interest of any particular nation. The immediate effects of such a policy can only be disadvantageous to the giving nation since they entail for it an economic sacrifice; and they can, in view of the intent of the giver, only be beneficial to the receiving nation. Yet there are nations which have refused economic and technical aid proffered by the United States, and there are many more who have accepted it but grudgingly. It can safely be said that the small amount of good will which the United States has earned by assisting needy nations is out of all proportion to the amount of money spent for that purpose. One might well summarize the paradox of this situation by saying that the United States has never done more for other nations than it did in the last seven years, and that its prestige among these nations was never lower than it is today.

One of the main reasons for this paradox—there are others which do not concern us here—must be sought in the fact that the United States appears to other nations not primarily as the unselfish dispenser of aid, but as one of the superpowers pursuing its own national interest in the world. Thus the recipient nation cannot help suspecting a sinister connection between the unselfish appearances of the proffered aid and the traditional selfish objectives of a great power.

It so happens that there is a point in such suspicion, even though it is not quite the point which has given rise to that suspicion in the mind of the recipient nation. The United States has indeed embarked upon a global policy of economic and technical assistance not for humanitarian, but for selfish reasons. It has done so in pursuit of its national interest. Yet that national interest is not the traditional one, peculiar to one and perhaps a few other nations. Rather it is an interest which the United States shares with the other nations on this side of the Iron Curtain: the containment of Communism within the limits reached at the end of the Second World War. For such a policy, which serves the interests not only of the nation undertaking it but of most nations of the world, to be effective, it must both in its formulation and execution bring out those of its elements which transcend the exclusive national interest of a particular nation.

INSTRUMENT FOR COMMON POLICIES

The United Nations has become an instrument for the pursuit of national interests which a nation has in common with many others. Two organs of the United Nations have lent themselves particularly for that purpose: the General Assembly and the specialized agencies.

Little needs to be said about the qualifications of the specialized agencies for this purpose. For it is the constitutional function of these agencies to serve objectives which by definition transcend the interests of any particular nation. The very fact that on these agencies the recipient nations are represented cannot but have a salutary effect upon the political relations between giver and recipient, to which we have referred above.

The General Assembly, conceived by the Charter as a deliberative agency subordinated to the Security Council and limited to making recommendations without binding force, has become the politically dominant organ of the United Nations. It has been shown elsewhere how the General Assembly reached this position of political eminence;² it must suffice here to consider the results of this development. Within the United Nations as conceived by the Charter, a new United Nations has arisen, operating within the framework of the Charter but not by its assumptions and objectives. The Charter assumes the continuing unity of policy and purpose of the permanent members of the Security Council, and it seeks the preservation of peace and order in the world through the harmonious co-operation of these permanent members. The new United Nations assumes the continuing cleavage of the world into two warring camps and seeks the protection of one group of nations against infringements by the other. The nations which feel themselves so threatened are able to use the General Assembly of the United Nations for their purposes because they comprise at least two-thirds of its members, which is the majority required by the Charter for substantive decisions of the General Assembly. The core of that majority is composed of the United States, the nations of Western Europe, and most members of the British Commonwealth, amounting to nineteen votes. This core has attracted a group of other nations, changing in its composition from issue to issue and ranging in numbers from all members of the General Assembly with the exception of the five members of the Soviet bloc to a bare two-thirds majority.

² Hans J. Morgenthau, "The United Nations and the Revision of the Charter," The Review of Politics (Notre Dame, Indiana), Vol. 16 (January 1954), pp. 3-21. See also Morgenthau, op. cit. supra (note 1), pp. 453-65.

This new United Nations pursues the traditional objective of a grand alliance: common protection from the imperialism of a great power. Yet in its operations it differs in significant respects from the traditional pattern of an alliance. These differences are due to the distribution of power within the group and the limitations which the procedures of the United Nations impose upon the exercise of that power.

DISTRIBUTION OF POWER IN ALLIANCES AND U.N.

While in a traditional alliance at least some members were of approximately equal strength, the new United Nations is grouped around a nation whose strength is much superior to that of any single member of the group and even greater than that of all of them combined. The success of the common enterprise depends primarily upon the leadership and power of the United States. For better or for worse, at least the members of the core are tied to that leadership and power, and they can escape it only at the price of the common purpose, that is, protection from Soviet domination. The inescapable weight with which the leadership and power of the United States presses upon this core forces its members to adapt their peculiar national interests to the common purpose and to redefine them in its terms.

The relationship is different between the predominant power and those nations which cluster around this core in ever-changing combinations to make up the two-thirds majority of the General Assembly. For these nations are less exposed to pressure from the predominant power and, hence, have a freedom of movement which is gainsaid to the members of the core. They can abstain from voting or even vote with the Soviet bloc without jeopardizing their national interests as they understand them. Since without their votes there can be no two-thirds majority, it is for the predominant power to redefine its interests in order to make them acceptable to these nations, and to adapt its policies to their preferences.

The Charter requirement of a two-thirds majority, then, diminishes the power even of so powerful a nation as the United States. Dissent on the part of the weaker members, which such a nation might disregard or dissipate in a traditional alliance, must be taken into consideration when it comes to fashioning a two-thirds majority in the General Assembly. A traditional alliance reposes upon power relations pure and simple which, through their very operations, establish a community of interests. For getting a resolution adopted by the General Assembly, it is not necessarily sufficient to have unchallengeable power; what is needed here is suppleness and accommodation in the formulation of interests and policies in order to gain the support of two-thirds of the members of the General Assembly. The actual weakness of a nation whose vote is needed counts for little if the nation who needs that vote has no lever through which to make its superior power prevail. Thus the very necessity for a powerful nation to pursue some of its interests through the instrumentality of the United Nations may require a modification, however superficial, of those interests and of the policies designed to secure them.

Viewed from the traditional perspective, this necessity, dictated by the preferences of other nations, for a nation to redefine its interests and change its policies however slightly may be considered a liability. Circumstances may indeed arise when a nation may be reluctant, for the sake of co-operating with other nations, to modify policies which it deems right. Yet membership in the United Nations does not preclude a nation's pursuing its interests with its own policies in isolation or in co-operation outside the United Nations. As has been pointed out elsewhere, the Charter of the United Nations itself provides for the traditional methods of diplomacy as an alternative to its own.³ The United Nations does not impose upon its members a single pattern of action. Quite to the contrary, it adds to the traditional methods of pursuing the national interest a new one which, as we have seen, reflects certain fundamental changes in the structure of contemporary world politics.

U.N. SERVES CAUSE OF PEACE

The new procedures of the United Nations have still another virtue which, paradoxical as it may seem at first glance, results from the very fact that they limit the freedom of action of even the most powerful of its members. Peace and freedom—domestic as well as international—depend upon the power of the powerful being kept within tolerable bounds. No society can rely permanently upon nothing but the self-restraint of the powerful for the preservation of its peace and of the freedom of its members. The mechanics of the traditional balance of power imposed such checks upon even the most powerful nations. With the state system having been transformed into a bipolar one, those traditional checks have largely disappeared, and the two superpowers oppose each other restrained by virtually nothing but the common fear of universal destruction. It is here that the United Nations performs yet another service for the national interests of its members, not of one or a group of members but of all of them, and it performs that service by the very restraints it imposes upon its most powerful members in the pursuit of their respective national interests.

Today all nations have one interest in common which transcends almost all others: the avoidance of a general war. The chance is slim that one or the other of the superpowers would deliberately start such a war. The chances are much greater for such a war to break out by the superpowers being sucked slowly into a local conflict which they feel compelled to expand step by step until they are face to face with the alternative between ignominious retreat and a third world war. The chances are perhaps even greater for a third world war to develop from the improvidence and blunders of one or the other or both superpowers. Thus it is the pattern of the outbreak of the First rather than of the Second World War which one must keep in mind when one thinks about how to prevent a third one.

To the prevention of a third world war the United Nations can make two contributions. The restraint which its procedures impose upon the policies of its members might well be able to mitigate the improvidence, the blunders, and the complete identification, heedless of its world-wide effects, with a local interest, to which the policies of the superpowers, freed of most of the traditional restraints, cannot help being prone. Thus the United Nations may well contribute to the cause of peace by preventing the superpowers from going to the extremes which virtually nothing else prevents them from going to except their self-restraint born of mutual fear.

³ Hans J. Morgenthau, "Diplomacy," Yale Law Journal, Vol. 55 (August 1946), pp. 1067-80.

The United Nations can serve the cause of peace in yet another, more intangible, way. It can render that service by its very existence. In a period of history when the exchange between East and West of information, views, and propositions through the traditional diplomatic channels has been reduced to a minimum, the very possibility of carrying on such exchanges unobtrusively through the intermediary of the United Nations offers opportunities for the promotion of peaceful settlements, of which the great powers have made too little use. The success which they achieved when they chose to avail themselves of the United Nations as a discreet instrument for negotiations, as they did in the case of the Berlin blockade, ought to have encouraged them to make further use of this instrument.

Instead, they have yielded to the temptation to misuse the United Nations as a platform from which to make propaganda speeches, as a stage on which to strike poses for the home audience, as a kind of theater prop with which to strike ineffectually at the enemy. This misuse has not served the interests, however conceived, of the nations concerned. And it has spread and deepened that disenchantment with the United Nations which has obscured in the public mind the contributions which the United Nations could make to the national interests of its members.

Hans J. Morgenthau, Chicago, Illinois, is director of the Center for the Study of American Foreign Policy and professor of political science at the University of Chicago. He has taught at Brooklyn College and the University of Kansas City since coming to the United States in 1937. Prior to that time he practiced law in Munich and Frankfurt. His most recent books are Atomic Era (with others); Germany and the Future of Europe (with others); In Defense of the National Interest; The H-Bomb (with others); and Aspects of American Government (with others).

The Yardstick of Collective Interest

By ALEŠ BEBLER

"... the United Nations as-a whole was created primarily for the protection of peace. . . . The outcome of the Korean War has . . . proved that in the final analysis solutions governed by the yardstick of collective interest are best even for the parties directly involved in the conflict."

THE basic question which, in my opinion, should be answered before we undertake a further analysis of viewpoints and proposals concerning the strengthening and improvement of the system of collective security is the following: What is the "collective" interest or, more exactly, what yardstick should be used in determining this interest?

Obviously, it is not sufficient to seek this yardstick in the special interests of particular states and nations. Although lasting peace and security can be ensured only through a harmonization of national interests, it is also clear that threats to peace and security result from the clash of differing national interests which—from purely national points of view—appear of equal legitimacy. Therefore, it seems necessary to recognize above the purely national interests a higher general interest—the common interest in the progress of all mankind.

The history of the establishment and work, and even of the failure, of international organizations in this century indicates awareness of such an interest. Today, the maintenance of peace and avoidance of a general conflict is the foremost object of common interest. The ever enlarging and destructive power of war, as demonstrated by the two world wars fought in the twentieth century and by recent experiences with nuclear armament, has given substance and impetus to this concept of a supreme collective interest.

PEACE—BASIC CRITERION FOR U.N. ACTION

The United Nations Charter is the most explicit and recent document expressing this concept. It limits narrowly conceived national and regional interests, establishing certain common basic principles and aims which are indispensable if we wish to avoid a renewal of the devastations of war and to lead humanity along the road of progress. It sets forth as the foremost aims of the United Nations:

To maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace. . . .

Thus the Charter recognizes that the maintenance of peace stands above everything as the yardstick by which the Organization's actions should be governed.

The struggle for peace is important not only to avoid the suffering and devastation that wars bring to people. Peace is indispensable to social progress, to the development of non-self-governing peoples towards independence, to the development of economically underdeveloped areas towards a more modern way of production—in short, to all the revolutionary changes in social relations which characterize our era and which have so transformed my own country. Viewed in this light any aggressive war is reactionary and cannot be justified by anything, even by seemingly progressive aims. Experience has shown that even wars which have some of the characteristics of a struggle for national liberation may, by endangering peace and injecting elements of aggression, defeat their own purpose and jeopardize the very aims which perhaps subjectively inspired some of their protagonists.

Therefore, the criteria of the collective interests must specifically include protection of peoples and states from pressure, be this pressure of a political, military, or economic character. A broad definition of aggression is then required, extending not only to acts of overt hostility against a national territory. As a matter of fact, the internal organization of the United Nations, whose various organs are empowered to deal with all the sources and forms of aggression, political, economic, and military, confirms this concept of the broad scope of the collective interest in resisting aggression.

DETERMINING COLLECTIVE INTEREST

The United Nations also represents a new phenomenon in international law which makes it unnecessary to limit the criteria of the collective interest to those legal principles which have already been crystallized. The international community as personified in the United Nations has become an active factor in the development and broadening of the domain of international law in relations among states. It can itself take a hand in the determination and implementation of the collective interest.

The universality of the United Nations, furthermore, as conceived by its founders with equality of rights among all states, presumes no priority of the great powers in determining the collective interest. The point is that peace must be peace for all, both for the great and the small! The tendency to reduce the problem of security in the world to arrangements between the great powers is still strong. Without denying the primary responsibility of the great powers for the maintenance of world peace, an unbiased yardstick for the collective interest is necessary, outside of, and even contrary to, the narrowly conceived interests of one great power or another, or even a group of such powers. The yardstick lies in the interest of the community. Viewed from this angle, not even the right of veto, although constituting one of the cornerstones of the special responsibility of the great powers for the maintenance of international security and peace, can be the decisive criterion for determining what represents the collective interest. It is conceivable, though—at least under present conditions—that the veto could thwart certain misuses of the claims of collective interest, arising from the relations of political and economic inequality which today exist between the great powers and individual small or medium-sized countries.

In determining the yardstick of collective interest one must exclude ideological considerations and controversies. The simultaneous existence of countries with different social systems and different ideologies is a rule in our era. Nonrecognition of the necessity of the parallel existence of such different systems and ideologies paves the way for fatalistic views regarding the unavailability of armed conflict, views which characteristically help to instigate war. It is precisely the existence and realization of differences in the degree of development and progress of individual countries that represents the basis for the continuous broadening of the activities and tasks of the United Nations in economic, cultural, social, and humanitarian fields, activities which do not merely supplement the activities of the Organization in preventing war, fighting aggression, and promoting peaceful settlement of disputes, but are an actual prerequisite for the achievement of collective security. It is not accidental that ideological motives usually lie at the root of attempts to bypass the United Nations in international questions and that they often, although perhaps not always, conceal other negative tendencies, such as intervention in the internal affairs of other countries, the policy of spheres of interest, and ideological intolerance and discrimination.

DEMOCRATIC DECISION AND COLLECTIVE INTEREST

The practice of the United Nations has at the same time pointed the way toward a unique method for determining the collective interest, namely, the application of democratic principles to the organization of work within the international community. This democracy within the United Nations is, unfortunately, not yet sufficiently expressed. And it must not be forgotten that even when decisions are reached under conditions of formal democracy the positions of individual delegations or groups of countries can be influenced by outside pressures and considerations which limit the independence of their participation in the discussions and recommendations of the Organization or reduce it to a mere formality. In the broad perspective, however, the struggle for the democratization of the work of the United Nations is not only leading to an enhancement of the role, authority, and relative importance of the Organization in international relations, but will also lead to greater independence and a freer stand of individual small and medium-sized countries. This in turn will assure their becoming more active in the promotion of peace and security and hence in determining the true nature of the collective interest.

CLARIFICATION OF COLLECTIVE INTEREST THROUGH CHARTER REVISION

What practical conclusions follow from this general analysis of the concept of the United Nations during the nine years since its birth? First, a condemnation of aggressive war as a crime against humanity should be inserted in the Charter. The Charter could at the same time contain more precise obligations on the part of the Member States concerning the prevention, in their territories, of activities or propaganda directed against the independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of other countries, and the prohibition of intervention in the internal affairs of other countries, including not only the threat and use of force in the narrow, purely military, sense of the word but also economic and political pressure exerted with the view to curtailing and abolishing the sovereign will of a given country in the field of international relations.

The experience of the Security Council in dealing with instances of a threat to peace or of open aggression indicates, in my opinion, that the only acceptable criterion for determining the collective interest is the practical political effect of the action taken as against even the most perfectly designed legalistic constructions or a one-sided confidence in ad hoc settlements based on a unilateral presentation of national or regional interests in a given case. This experience simultaneously points out the danger of partiality in decisions reached by the Council, owing to the indisputable influence exerted by the great powers over the smaller ones, be it for internal political reasons or because of certain likes or dislikes due to ideological or other reasons.

DEFINING AGGRESSION FOR CHARTER

Therefore, one of the basic practical problems in the work of the United Nations, and especially of the Security Council, in preserving collective security and resisting aggression, is the effective and speedy identification of aggression and of the aggressor. My country has taken steps designed to achieve this aim as simply as possible. The Yugoslav position has neither limited the definition of aggression to certain specific qualifications nor left the characteristics largely undetermined, but has provided—in addition to enumerating the types of aggression that have appeared so far—room for a subsequent inclusion of new and unexpected forms of aggression. It is also important to mention the Yugoslav proposal concerning the duties of states in the case of an outbreak of hostilities, which was prompted by the situation in 1950 and the experience gained from the aggression in Korea. This imposes on states that have been drawn into an armed conflict the obligation to declare, within twenty-four hours of the beginning of hostilities, their readiness to retreat to their national territories and to cease all hostilities, while the conflict is referred to the competent international bodies. Adoption of this proposal by the General Assembly has considerably extended the scope of international law and at the same time has limited, for the purpose of protecting the higher interest of collective security, one of the "classical rights" of a sovereign state—the right to legitimate defense. Thus, a new opportunity has been created to expose the aggressor before the international community and to facilitate the establishment of a yardstick of collective interest, which can serve as a basis for the undertaking of collective action in case the conflict is not halted.

Full implementation of these concepts regarding the determination of responsibility for the beginning of hostilities calls for the insertion of increased international legal power in the United Nations Charter. (This is particularly necessary since it is hardly possible to expect a change in the application of the right of veto under present conditions of international relations, at least in so far as the application of collective measures is concerned.)

With this we have come to the central problem of the yardstick of collective interest at present, namely, the not yet completely regulated relation between the role of the Security Council as conceived by the Charter and the role of the General Assembly as confirmed by practice during the Korean War, especially by the introduction of the resolution "Uniting for Peace."

INEFFECTIVENESS OF SECURITY COUNCIL

Theoretically, with the world divided into "camps," a threat to collective security through an act of aggression (or of a threat to the peace or a violation of peace) may find both countries in question belonging to the same camp or to opposite camps. It is obvious that in the first instance grave consequences could not result in the Security Council, and furthermore outside the Security Council many means exist within regional and other organizations to avert conflict. However, in the case of a conflict of the second type, the situation would be reversed. The permanent members of the Security Council would be divided, and the veto of one or several great powers could, as has been seen, become an obstacle to the reaching of decisions indispensable for collective interest. Thus the position of the aggressor and his initial advantage would be protected, whereas the position of the victim of aggression would be made more difficult. It is precisely this situation—in connection with the struggle for a new division of the world, necessarily involving a clash of opposite "camps"—that is fraught with the danger of the outbreak of a new world conflict.

The conclusion to be drawn is that if the present system of voting in the Security Council remains in full force (and the consent of its permanent members is also necessary to amend it), then the danger arises that this body, whose primary duty is to be the guardian of peace and the representative of the endangered collective interest of the world community, will be paralyzed at the moment when the danger to the cause of peace is the greatest.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY AS AGENT FOR U.N. COMMUNITY

Consideration of this situation caused Yugoslavia to support the "Uniting for Peace" resolution and to vote for its partly amended version. Adoption of this resolution represents an important phase in the development of the yardstick of collective interest, adapting the yardstick less to the letter than to the spirit of the United Nations Charter. The governing principle is that the United Nations as a whole was created primarily for the protection of peace and that, therefore, the Organization as a whole is responsible before mankind for the maintenance of peace. It is logical, therefore, that it should have the last word in applying the yardstick of collective interest, that is, the possibility of stepping in and undertaking the indispensable actions in the event the Security Council is paralyzed. The wording of the present Charter, however, still limits the General Assembly to recommendations of appropriate measures. Therefore, the forthcoming revision of the Charter will inevitably raise the further question: In the event of a division in the Security Council, how can the international community, represented in the United Nations, make not only recommendations, but decisions regarding the application of coercive measures?

SHOULD GENERAL ASSEMBLY MAKE DECISIONS?

Is such a change useful and necessary? The reasons which led to the adoption of the "Uniting for Peace" resolution apply also today. The possibility of reaching actual decisions to invoke coercive measures would increase the moral pressure on the potential aggressor. The cause of peace and collective security could only gain thereby.

However, in such an application of the yardstick of collective interest a decision, once reached, would not be a light one, as its consequences would be very grave. Such a decision could result in heavy material pressure on the part of the majority of the members of the United Nations and possibly even in a war launched by this majority on behalf of and taking advantage of the authority of the United Nations, against one or several protégés of one or several great powers, and possibly even against one or several of these great powers! One could expect to hear the partly plausible observation that the United Nations would thereby only start what was its main task to prevent, that is, a world war. On the other hand a threat to a possible aggressor, pronounced in advance, could discourage him from an adventure or force him to localize the adventure, which was actually what happened in Korea. A final argument would be that if there had to be a war and if the United Nations were on the right side, then the authority of the United Nations in such a just war would help to assure the defeat of the aggressor and shorten duration of the conflict.

All this, taken abstractly, sounds convincing and seems to guarantee a more or less safe scheme for the application of the yardstick of collective interest in any situation. However, in a concrete case, a systematic application of even the best and most well-meaning principle could be fraught with grave dangers. How certain can we be that, in the event agreement is reached on the abolition of the veto in the Security Council, the majority in the Security Council would be on the right side? Can it even be taken for granted that the majority in the General Assembly would necessarily and automatically be on the right side?

DANGERS OF MAJORITY DECISION— KOREAN EXPERIENCE

In the case of Korea, where on the whole the United Nations unquestionably played a progressive role in localizing the conflict and in resisting aggression, some events occurred which showed that the right of the United Nations to reach binding decisions on the application of coercive measures could endanger the collective interest. The Yugoslav Delegation warned against these dangers as early as the discussions on the "Uniting for Peace" resolution, as well as during the discussions on Korea in the General Assembly in 1950. The danger lies in the fact that even a majority may reach biased decisions, may erroneously determine the responsibility for the outbreak of hostilities, may declare a civil or national-liberation war as aggression, may go too far in sanctions against the aggressor and thereby increase the danger of extending the war to new areas, and so forth.

Although the main feature of the Korean War was aggression on the part of North Korea, a state within one world camp, against South Korea, a state within another such camp, this war also contained, beyond any doubt, certain elements of a civil war and, in the view of a large number of Koreans, even elements of a national-liberation war. This came as the result of the fact that this unfortunate country had been thrown into a state of internal tension as a result of the artificial division of the country into two parts (through no fault of its own) by the great powers, so that the desire to attain unity—a desire generally accepted by world public opinion as justified—played an important role in the war. The failure on the part of the majority in the United Nations to take into account these elements manifested itself in the treatment accorded to the government of North Korea in the Security Council and the General Assembly, that is, failure to invite this government to appear before these bodies, and also its exclusion from the work of the United Nations because the majority of the United Nations members did not recognize it. Recognition of the South Korean government and nonrecognition of the North Korean government was influenced in fact by the atmosphere of the cold war going on between the East and the West. By permitting these occurrences, full advantage was not taken of opportunities to advance the settlement of the conflict as effectively and with as little sacrifice as possible.

KOREAN TRUCE—DETERMINING COL- LECTIVE INTEREST THE HARD WAY

The second, even more characteristic, example is the carrying over of the Korean War beyond the 38th parallel. If the aggression on the part of North Korea against South Korea was a disguised attempt on the part of the Soviet bloc to broaden its own "sphere of influence" by force, the decision of the General Assembly of October 1950, whereby the armed forces of the Unified Command were permitted to cross the 38th parallel to the north and to occupy North Korea, could only serve the purpose of reducing this sphere by force. The Chief of the Yugoslav Delegation to the 1950 session of the General Assembly, Mr. Edvard Kardelj, pointed out that:

... [such] a settlement ... could serve as a very dangerous precedent for the future, a precedent which would, theoretically, justify in certain circumstances the intervention on the part of the United Nations in the internal political struggle of any country. Such a settlement would not be in the concrete interest of our efforts exerted for peace either, as it would complicate and create even more tension in international relations. Moreover, such a settlement could only undermine the strength and authority of the United Nations, as it would be freely exploited as a means to ruin the reputation of this Organization. And it would not be in the interest of the Korean people either ... as it would automatically lead to the expansion of the power of the South Korean Government over all of Korea. ... The United Nations cannot and must not take upon itself the responsibility for the expansion of the power of one or the other government. It is the Korean people themselves who will have to decide on a unified government. ...

Later developments justified Mr. Kardelj's prediction that "any attempt at changing unilaterally the situation in Korea by war ... in itself carries the seeds of an expansion of the war." The war expanded with China's entry and ended only after huge sacrifices had been sustained. The basis of truce was precisely what the Yugoslav representatives had been proposing from the very beginning, that is, agreement not to attempt to bring about a change in the Korean situation by armed force.

It is significant that such a settlement was rejected in the course of 1950, once by the representatives of the camp which was responsible for the aggression in Korea and the second time by the majority in the United Nations through the adoption of the resolution on the expansion of the war beyond the 38th parallel. Yet, after great devastation and destruction, affecting all the Korean people and all armies engaged in the conflict, this basis of settlement was adopted. Hence it is obvious that under the given circumstances such a settlement represented the right gauge of collective interest in the Korean War.

We have dwelt on the well-known facts of the Korean conflict at length, in order to illustrate our concept of the real character of collective interest, as well as of the difficulties in determining this interest. This situation also demonstrates the inadequacy of the narrowly legalistic or the nationally limited approaches to determining such interest and the paramountcy of a broader, primarily political evaluation of the interest of the community. The outcome of the Korean War has further proved that in the final analysis solutions governed by the yardstick of collective interest are best even for the parties directly involved in the conflict. Otherwise—by the expansion of the conflict, the broadening of the scope of operations, and delay in the solving of controversial questions—they stand to suffer great sacrifices in men and material, as well as in possible political advantages which they enjoy in a given area.

CONCLUSIONS

What concrete conclusions connected with the envisaged revision of the United Nations Charter are implied by the criteria of the collective interest of the international community? In what way can real democracy in the work of the United Nations as a whole be ensured? How can the whole United Nations be made the most responsible guardian of world peace and security—the highest collective interest of all mankind—in view of the fact that the great powers have such a special position of responsibility in the world today and that even a majority in the United Nations can accept solutions that are not conducive to this highest interest?

Certain changes in the text of the United Nations Charter appear advisable in the light of the Korean War, as well as experience to date in overcoming the most difficult periods of international tension arising from the division of the world into opposite blocs.

1. It seems necessary to insert in the Charter definite criteria regarding responsibility for the outbreak of hostilities, criteria which would in advance comprise the possibilities available to the potential aggressor, and thus reduce the possibility of aggression.

2. The collective interest of the international community requires insertion in the Charter of the clearest possible provisions to prevent the application of coercive measures when they contravene the real purposes of the Charter. For instance, such measures should not be applied for the purpose of interfering with domestic affairs, intervening in civil or national-liberation wars, and so forth. Such a modification of the provisions concerning collective measures for the maintenance of international peace and security would ensure against their possible misuse for the purpose of retarding and diverting the normal social and political development of a country.

3. In view of the great importance of the Security Council in protecting the collective interest, perhaps the broadening of the Council by inclusion of at least one permanent and one alternate member could be discussed, whereby the Council would acquire a more universal character, and a wider scope and variety of views would be obtained in appraising questions of collective security and determining the collective interest, giving to this appraisal a broader and more impartial character and reflecting more closely the attitude of the entire Organization.

4. In the event that a certain limitation of the right of veto should be possible, the decisions on coercive measures in accordance with the provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter should by all means require a large, almost unanimous, majority in the Council.

5. The broad criterion of collective interest seems to require that the General Assembly should also be given jurisdiction in the confirmation of such measures by a definite large majority of votes (possibly a larger majority than the two-thirds required for the adoption of recommendations), which would not only broaden the democratic and universal character of the decisions concerning collective interest but would also remove the possibilities of taking rash and too severe measures.

Such changes would better enable the international community to apply to the question of the maintenance of collective security in the face of aggression, violation of the peace, or threat to the peace, a genuine yardstick of collective interest, which is represented—in the final analysis—by the United Nations itself.

Alaš Bebler, Doctor of Laws (Paris), Belgrade, was Permanent Representative of Yugoslavia to the United Nations (1950 to 1952) and in this capacity was a member of the Security Council at the outbreak of the Korean War, as well as delegate at all regular sessions of the General Assembly. He is now Deputy Foreign Minister of Yugoslavia.

Expanding the United Nations Community

ANALYSIS AND PROPOSITION BY R. W. VAN WAGENEN

COMMENTS BY HEINRICH VON BRENTANO, CLEMENT DAVIES, RAJESHWAR DAYAL, R. W. G. MACKAY, LESTER B. PEARSON, AND YOU CHAN YANG

WE have been asked to discuss the broad problem of expanding the United Nations community, with special reference to the narrower and more concrete questions of membership and regionalism.

Expansion of community is considered here as having two dimensions—breadth and depth. In terms of breadth, the United Nations “community” certainly includes all its members, whether or not they always support the organization; it may also include those nation-states which normally support its aims and activities, but which are not card-carrying members. In terms of depth, the problem of expanding the community is that of strengthening its cohesive forces. The strength of those forces, in turn, seems to rest upon a “sense of community” which can usually be observed in stable national governments and in smaller human groups, but which is to be found also between some nation-states.

Briefly, the hypothesis runs along these lines: (a) Nation-states generally control themselves no better than smaller groups when it comes to intergroup fighting. (b) Smaller groups have solved this problem permanently either by having no relations with each other or by achieving a very strong sense of community which is able, if necessary, to support some kind of restraining institution. (c) The burden of proof is somewhat heavier upon those who believe that nation-states can handle the problem by some really different method than it is upon those who believe that the tried-and-true method used by smaller groups might eventually be made to work for these large but unique groups called nation-states. Such a sense of community might eventually become strong enough to support a real system of collective security or even a nuclear government, or it might not. But in any case the development of a sense of community seems likely to be the crucial element in the problem of long-run war prevention.¹

On these assumptions, one way to frame the greatest question of our time is this: Can a sense of community be developed in depth over a wide enough area to support institutions for the long-run prevention of war?

BROADENING U.N. MEMBERSHIP

Broadening the membership of the United Nations would not necessarily broaden the sense of community, but limiting the membership would seem even less likely to do so. One may be well aware of the dangers of personal contact between people of incompatible cultures and still estimate that the net result of such contact among large numbers is on the plus rather than the minus side—at least under conditions where the United Nations is likely to be involved. One need not travel all the way with the functionalist doctrine in order to believe that sense of commitment is one important element in sense of community. Also, broader membership need not mean universality.

¹ This brief statement leaves large gaps in definition and connective reasoning. Some of these gaps may be reduced by reference to an earlier discussion of “expanding community” in Research in the International Organization Field: Some Notes on a Possible Focus (Princeton University, Center for Research on World Political Institutions, Publication No. 1 [Princeton, N. J., 1952]).

Provided that the states sponsored by the West are also admitted and provided that this is not accomplished by means of the "package" trade which has been frequently proposed and rejected, there should be some gain from the admission of the European non-member Soviet satellites. The United Nations as a whole, and the Western states in particular, have an interest in reducing the opaqueness of such "windows on the world" as Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania already have. There is even less doubt about the value of admitting such states as Germany and (to mention some of the fourteen already vetoed by the Soviet Union) Austria, Cambodia, Ceylon, Italy, Japan, Libya, and Portugal. If it be argued that new states which have emerged from non-self-governing or trusteeship status are likely to cause trouble for their former masters, one answer is that on balance the cases like India and the Philippines may be more typical than exceptional. The indications are that the balance of political forces would not substantially change, but only the size of the forces—much like what resulted when eighteen-year-olds became voters in Georgia. If the new states should turn out to be recruits for neutralism, it would be well to have this fact register inside as well as outside the United Nations.

Is there any way in which membership could be increased without Charter amendment? Obeying in a rough way the architectural principle that form follows function, the draftsmen who framed the Charter designed two types of regular membership: one with veto power and one without. They also permitted nonmembers of the United Nations to hold membership in the specialized agencies and the regional economic commissions. A fourth type has been added which is legally not membership at all, but which might be called "functional participation": Italy, by virtue of being the administering authority of Somaliland, sits with the Trusteeship Council in all its meetings but does not vote. A fifth type, associate membership, would be very similar and might be useful. This is already a practice of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East. Secretary Dulles has suggested publicly that the same sort of device might be used for the U.N. itself. He pointed out that if the unanimity requirement on recommendations for membership cannot be amended out of the Charter, some type of associate membership could be established. Such members would be permitted "to come in and take part in the proceedings, to express their views, and to record their votes."² This might be done without Charter amendment, presumably by a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly. It should have the effect of pulling into somewhat deeper commitment at least those nonmembers who are free of Soviet domination.

THE PROBLEM OF REGIONALISM

If the first dimension of sense of community—breadth—applies mainly to the membership problem, the second dimension—depth—applies mainly to the problem of regionalism. Both problems embody the great dilemma of tightness as against comprehensiveness. Is it most effective that an international organization for the prevention of war consist entirely of a small but hard core, with the punch and maneuverability which comes from unanimity? Or is it more effective for it to be large and comprehensive, so that even though its movements are lumbering it will not overlook any important segment of political power? This is the dilemma of a deep but narrow commitment as against a broad but shallow one. Of course there is no general solution which can be substituted for sound political judgment in each case. But the Charter device of tying both regional and collective self-defense arrangements into the universal organization has been as good a reconciliation as could be expected, even though it has been only lightly tested. When Costa Rica was invaded by armed forces coming from Nicaragua in 1948, would it have increased that member's sense of commitment to the United Nations if the Security Council had acted on the case instead of the Organization of American States? Or was Costa Rica's sense of commitment to the United Nations increased indirectly, through a tightening of the sense of commitment to the Organization of American States? The Guatemalan case of 1954 does not furnish a good test because of the particular domestic relations between the defender and the invader.

² U. S. Congress, Senate, Review of the United Nations Charter, Hearing before Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter of the Committee on Foreign Relations, U. S. Senate, Eighty-third Congress, Second Session, Part I, January 18, 1954, p. 20.

Divided commitments can hardly be avoided when neighbors already enjoying a strong bond for historic or geographic reasons are asked to forge a bond with a wider group. Yet divided commitments need not always be conflicting commitments, so that to strengthen the region is not necessarily to weaken the universal organization. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization, for example, is frequently referred to as a pillar of support for the United Nations.³ This, it is usually said, is because the members of NATO are themselves the firmest advocates of the principles of the Charter, and therefore whatever strengthens them also strengthens the Charter. There is another and different kind of reason, however, why NATO may be contributing in the long run to a sense of commitment to the United Nations. One of the great obstacles to the evolution of community is sometimes an exaggerated "none of your business" tradition, the psychological equivalent of the domestic-jurisdiction tradition. The habit-forming effect of international relations has been neither proved nor disproved, and common sense is by no means firmly attached to one side of the argument or the other.⁴ It may well be, however, that we can overcome in one region of the world the psychological obstacle to sharing certain types of national decision with certain friendly states. If we then find that we recover from the anguish of this experience, it may be less of a shock later to find ourselves minding other people's business, a bit more, as well as the converse. Again, this could hardly help contributing toward commitment, involvement, and sense of community over whatever area the habit grew to cover.

³ The legal question as to whether or not NATO is a regional organization in the eyes of the Charter is not at issue here.

Over against the advantages of strong regionalism are the dangers of a new localism leading to a new neutralism. If a sense of commitment by a nation-state to its region becomes so strong that it cannot bring itself to be concerned about events outside the area, localism may set in at the regional level. If a state has geared its military forces into a regional defense system, it might feel less willing, and indeed less able, to answer a general call which would take its troops away from the region. There is also the problem of multiple commitments faced by a state like Australia, which finds itself tied into a Southeast Asian regional organization in addition to ANZUS (Pacific Security Treaty, Australia, New Zealand, United States) and NATO (the latter psychologically, through the Commonwealth).

⁴ See the brief treatment of this question by Howard C. Johnson and Gerhart Niemeyer, "Collective Security: The Validity of an Ideal," in International Organization, Vol. 8, No. 1 (February 1954), p. 35.

CHARTER REVISION

This brief discussion of membership and regionalism in the light of the "expanding community" concept does not lead us to Charter revision. Judged by the effect which they would probably have upon a sense of community, any Charter amendments which have been proposed so far in these two fields seem either to be of doubtful relevance or of doubtful possibility by themselves. One exception might be the elimination of the veto on membership, and even this could be achieved in part without Charter amendment. With regard to regionalism, the progressive and realistic plans being prepared by the Collective Measures Committee would not require more than a series of General Assembly resolutions to put them into effect if they could be thoroughly agreed upon beforehand. Perhaps it is unnecessary to add that if events should unexpectedly permit a sweeping revision of the Charter in the direction, for example, of a true international police force or an effective agency for the control of atomic energy, the present discussion would have to be completely re-examined.

POLITICAL REALISM

Those of us who take the hardheaded, practical idealist position usually have to explain that our views are based upon the national interest. The approach called "expanding community" belongs here. "Sense of community" and "sense of commitment" can both be read as "sense of common interest" if it remains clear that the long run, and not simply the short run, is understood. It is taken for granted by the practical idealist that national interest should lie at the root of national action; but he refers to a very deep root.

Although this is not the place to reopen fully the great debate about "realism" in international politics,⁵ a few words should be said at this point about the "practical idealist" position because of the clear and full statement of the "realist" position published so recently by Professor Morgenthau.⁶ Although some room for exception still remains, Morgenthau has unfortunately described political realism so very broadly that most serious scholars will find the issue defined almost out of existence. He has included so many positions in the realist camp that former opponents now find themselves tagged with the same label. For example, both the school of thought which regards law and morals as being largely irrelevant to national power and the school of thought which feels that this view largely misses the point⁷ now qualify as political realists.

⁵ Among the many pieces contributing to this debate, see the issue of THE ANNALS edited by Norman D. Palmer and devoted to The National Interest—Alone or With Others? (Vol. 282, July 1952), especially the articles therein by A. H. Feller and Hans J. Morgenthau. The latest statement by George F. Kennan has been published as Realities of American Foreign Policy (Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1954).

⁶ Hans J. Morgenthau, Politics Among Nations (Revised ed.; New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1954), pp. 3-13.

⁷ Quincy Wright, for example, has long and ably emphasized the importance of the second view. Most recently: "Clearly what is needed is a balance between politics and law in the world. Law must be corrected and kept up to date by politics and politics must be regulated by law."—In George A. Lipsky (Ed.), Law and Politics in the World Community (Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1953), p. 13.

The only recourse for those who do indeed regard themselves as realists in the Morgenthau sense and as practical idealists in another sense is to maintain their factional differences within the realist camp. (Their view remains, of course, distinct from that of altruists and of impractical idealists.) The effort to develop broader and deeper sense of community is focused upon the possibility of change rather than upon its difficulty; yet both aspects are included under realism.⁸ Thus we can have our realism and eat it too—provided we do not have an appetite for sudden, sweeping change.

⁸ Morgenthau goes so far as to say this: "Nothing in the realist position militates against the assumption that the present division of the political world into nation states will be replaced by larger units of a quite different character, more in keeping with the technical circumstances and the moral requirements of the contemporary world." But he immediately points out that "The realist parts company with other schools of thought before the all-important question of how the contemporary world is to be transformed."—Op. cit. supra (note 6), p. 9.

It is within this sort of framework that the criterion of "expanding community" can be applied to the question of Charter revision. Applying it to the limited problems of membership and regionalism, it seems to say this: The United Nations has real potential for increasing the sense of community among certain nations, and the Charter itself puts no major obstacles in the way. Only one provision places a large but passable stone in the rocky road of progress—the veto on admission of new members. If real progress can be made at all, however, it can be made within the present terms of the Charter unless a massive change in political climate should suddenly occur.

EDITOR'S NOTE. Professor Morgenthau has related his concept of realism in national policy to the specific issues of Charter revision in an article in this volume of THE ANNALS. See above.

Richard W. Van Wagenen, Ph.D., is associate professor of politics and director of the Center for Research on World Political Institutions at Princeton University. His field is international organization and he has taught political science at Stanford, Yale, Duke, Columbia, and Princeton universities. Earlier, he was on the staff of various organizations in the field of public affairs. During the period 1942-47 he served as an Army officer, mainly in military government, and was for two years Deputy United States Secretary of the Allied Control Authority for Germany. He is author of The Iranian Case: 1946 (in consultation with T. Cuyler Young, 1952) and Research in the International Organization Field: Some Notes on a Possible Focus (1952).

COMMENTS

HEINRICH VON BRENTANO

There are two problems which appear to me to be of special significance. The first relates to the function of regional organizations within the framework of a universal organization, the second to the significance of the veto.

1. A universal organization, that is to say, an organization with world-wide intercontinental membership as the United Nations in fact is, depends for its operation upon the homogeneity of outlook in the realm of international law and collective security of its most important members, as long as these members retain as individual states sufficient strength to cause them to believe that they are not yet irrevocably dependent upon international solidarity. Now the Soviet Union aims at a system profoundly different from that aimed at by the free nations. At the same time the Soviet Union in its concentrated effort proves so strong that individual nations of the free world standing alone and by themselves cannot hope to resist successfully. Under such circumstances the creation of a community like that of NATO is the very condition of creating a balance of power, the balance of power being in turn the prerequisite of the preservation of peace. Thus it may be said that NATO forms a necessary means to fulfill the aims of the Charter of the United Nations.

2. The veto power is essentially the reflex of the belief of the states which insisted on it that they are strong enough, if need be, "to go it alone." The veto is essentially the reflex of sociological realities, if not objectively then at least as viewed by the individual states in question. As long as the recognition does not prevail that an attempt "to go it alone" is bound to fail, willingness to surrender this reserve

CLEMENT DAVIES

Dr. Van Wagenen's article setting out the immediate considerations involved in expanding the United Nations community, with particular reference to the problems of membership and regionalism, is an analysis which, to me at any rate, reveals almost total gloom as to the possibilities for betterment. It reminds me somewhat of the relevance of the directive given to those who had to plan the construction of the Mulberry harbors for the D day invasion of Normandy: Sir Winston warned his team not to waste time on the reasons why it power will normally be very limited indeed. On the other hand if this recognition of the futility of isolated action really prevails, the use made of the veto power, even if technically given, will certainly diminish rapidly. One might, therefore, be inclined to use the paradoxical formula that the abolition of the veto will be possible the moment it is no longer particularly necessary to proceed to such abolition.

Taking a general view, I should like to insist on the importance of a worldwide forum, on the futility of attempts at formal change when not implemented by sociological reality, on the necessity for the free world to build up strength to create a balance of power, and on the urgent need to promote co-operative efforts designed to foster the appreciation of values dear to our society (such as the underdeveloped countries program). Finally, I would emphasize, wherever possible, the necessity of co-operative efforts designed to bring nations together in fields of common interest, where the power aspect is not exclusively dominant.

Heinrich von Brentano is chairman of the parliamentary group of the Christian-Democratic Union in the Bundestag of the Federal Republic of Germany, Bonn.

could not be done "as the difficulties argue for themselves." While Dr. Van Wagenen sees clearly enough the advantage of universalizing the U.N., he obviously does not think it will happen. In general, I suppose, Dr. Van Wagenen represents the so-called "realist" approach to the problem—although he hints at the insufficiency of that approach when he writes, . . . "if events should unexpectedly permit a sweeping revision of the Charter . . ." and again at the end of his article when he says, ". . . unless a massive change in political climate should suddenly occur." But if the U.N. does not go forward in 1955-56 it will go backwards; it is certain that it will not stay still. The lesson of Dr. Van Wagenen's article for me is that nothing much is to be hoped for from the present setup unless new forces are brought to bear.

I am dismayed that there seems to be so little awareness of the critical point which the U.N. has now reached. Is it seriously thought that the nations at present outside the U.N.—comprising half Europe and half Asia, a third of the world's population—will be content to remain outside or even to accept a second-class associate membership? or, if they do, that the U.N. can continue the pretense that it is really a world organization? Have we not seen already at Geneva, in the discussions on Korea and Indochina, that if the U.N. does not put its house in order, then another organism or, at least, mechanism will take its place? It may well be, as Dr. Van Wagenen suggests, that regionalism can in certain measure be a substitute; but even then, there will be a need for some permanent forum where the different regions can meet on equal ground. If the U.N. cannot develop in such a way as to provide this, then it is doomed.

WORLD FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

According to the excerpt from Mr. Morgenthau's book on the realist point of view, quoted in note 8, larger groupings of nations are not ruled out, but there is no agreement on the means whereby they may be achieved. In these few brief comments I should like to propose that far greater emphasis should be given to the constructive movements outside the U.N. which, with totally inadequate funds in comparison with those on the other side of the Iron Curtain, are trying to break the present deadlock. The prime need, as I see it, is for leadership to be given to the untold millions throughout the world who loathe war and will certainly support any real solution that abolishes it. These millions see clearly enough that nation-state politics have brought us to the present impasse and that nothing much further is to be hoped for from them. The only hope really is to go back to the ordinary folk in the world who are the deus ex machina able, if they once perceive the answer, to insist upon its implementation. That answer is of course World Federal Government, which Mr. Van Wagenen seems afraid to mention, even though countless leading statesmen throughout the world have supported the idea and a recent poll in the United States has shown that 46 per cent of the American public is in favor of a United Nations strengthened into an organization that would have sufficient power legitimately to be called a world government. It may interest your readers to know that operating on a shoestring, a few of us in the British Parliament have been able to build up a group of over seventy members of Parliament here, and in the space of three years the movement has spread to Parliamentarians all round the world. These new forces will, we believe, soon receive backing from many of the non-governmental organizations attached to the U.N., since they can thrive only if business between countries becomes less subject to obstacles than it is at present. Furthermore the U.N. Charter revision conference itself in its composition and form could reflect a far more democratic basis of representation than is the case at present in the General Assembly. That might be a beginning towards a U.N. more firmly based in the peoples and not only the governments of the world.

It may be argued by the realists that leadership in governments is unlikely to heed these forces and frame the necessary policies at U.N. to reflect them. But is there not already the dreadful logic of the hydrogen bomb to constrain them? We must hope, pray, and assume that faced with his logic, with "equality of fear," governments will have the courage to make a reality of the hopes and longings of ordinary folk

RAJESHWAR DAYAL

In certain circumstances it may be misleading to regard "expansion of community" as having the two dimensions of "breadth" and "depth." By separating these dimensions we tend to regard them as contrasting, and perhaps eventually as conflicting. It might be simpler and more accurate to say that the United Nations community should include and should fully represent all the varied political and ideological elements existing in the world today, and that any increase in the cohesiveness of this community must be built upon the foundation of this inclusiveness. Indeed, if cohesiveness is purchased at the price of exclusion, it is likely to prove a wholly fictitious gain.

A further disadvantage of this terminology is that no term seems to have been devised to express proper representation in the United Nations of its membership. Breadth is defined as including both the membership of the United Nations and those who support its ideals and activities. Depth is equated with cohesiveness, but representation of Member States by governments which are in effective control of them and which can undertake international responsibilities for them has obvious consequences both in terms of breadth and depth and can have an extremely powerful impact upon the degree of international community and the preservation of international peace.

the world over who all wish for the abolition of war.

Clement Davies, Q.C., M.P., London, has been leader of the Parliamentary Liberal Party in Great Britain since 1945. He is president of the Parliamentary Association for World Government. He has had a leading place at the commercial bar and has been chairman of numerous committees of the House of Commons.

Proper representation of China in the United Nations is, of course, the most important example, and no discussion of "community," even in the abstract, can be entirely relevant unless it provides terminology for recognizing and discussing this problem. It is extraordinary that there is no reference to the question of Chinese representation either in the abstract or specifically in this paper.

U.N. MEMBERSHIP

In discussing the advantages of the large-scale admission of new members, it is pointed out that new states which have emerged from non-self-governing or trusteeship status are more likely to follow the example of India and the Philippines than to "cause trouble for their former masters," that the balance of political forces would not change but only the size of the forces, and that if the new states should turn out to be recruits for neutralism, it would be just as well to register this fact within the United Nations. It does seem to us that the aim of the United Nations is not to create a membership which would not cause trouble for colonial powers, nor to preserve the present balance of forces in the United Nations if that balance is not representative of actual trends in the world. The United Nations must be conceived of as a dynamic and growing organization in which balances must change precisely because the world is always changing.

Professor Van Wagenen observes that the veto on membership could be eliminated in part without Charter amendment. If this means that it can be done by voluntary agreement among the permanent members of the Council not to use the veto on membership questions, it is merely stating the obvious without adding that it is improbable. If, on the other hand, it is suggested that the veto can be limited without the Charter being amended, and without the five permanent members agreeing on its limitation, we are at a loss to see how this can be done.

REGIONALISM

The article observes that while "breadth" applies mainly to the membership problem, "depth" applies mainly to the problem of regionalism. Both problems, it states, "embody the great dilemma of tightness as against comprehensiveness. Is it most effective that an international organization for the prevention of war consist entirely of a small but hard core, with the punch and maneuverability which comes from unanimity?" We doubt if unanimity is a proper ideal for the United Nations, and punch and maneuverability become very much less important if problems can be settled by conciliation and mediation within the United Nations.

Reference is made in the paper to the Costa Rican question being dealt with in 1948 by the Organization of American States. But no previous reference of the matter to the Security Council had been made. In the recent case of Guatemala, the matter was passed on to that Organization after the Council had already been seized of it. Can it be argued that the application of this reverse process has increased the sense of commitment to the United Nations?

It can hardly be argued that regionalism enhances the sense of world community. It is precisely certain states who are members of regional organizations who have most often invoked Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter, and opposed the inscription on the agenda of items unpalatable to them.

There are deep dangers in regarding regionalism as an alternative to the United Nations or as a means of divesting the latter of its primary responsibilities. If there is a sense of separate or divergent interests between certain countries or groups of countries, such organizations tend to increase that sense. If there are latent antagonisms between such groups, they may very well be intensified. The result may be to undermine and make considerably more difficult the achievement of the larger unity of the United Nations. It is only when the principle of universality is fully recognized and applied that the United Nations can adequately fulfill its great role for the preservation of peace.

Rajeshwar Dayal, New York City, has been representing India to the United Nations since 1952.

R. W. G. MACKAY

A sense of community has been developed in depth over a wide area to support institutions of government in India, China, the Soviet Union, and the United States, but the last country is by far the best example. Without the institution of the federal government, the United States would not have developed as it has.

Cannot similar federal institutions be created in Eastern and Western Europe, Latin America, Africa, the Middle East, and Southeast Asia? A Federation of Western Europe, of which Great Britain was a part, would create one government over a wide area of 280 million people, among whom a sense of community already exists. Such a federation could lead to the Union of Africa, as most of Africa forms part of the colonial territories of one or other of the states of Western Europe. Furthermore, it should not be beyond the capacity of American diplomacy to create a similar federal institution for Latin America as a whole.

The Security Council of the United Nations is not really representative of the peoples or governments of the world. Red China is not a member, and France and Britain, who are members with a veto, certainly do not speak for Europe. If the Security Council were to consist of representatives from North America, India, China, the Soviet Union, Western Europe, Eastern Europe, Latin America, Africa, the Middle East, and Southeast Asia, it could provide an institution capable of arriving at decisions binding on, and supported by, the peoples of the world. Moreover, with the creation of these regional institutions, war would be banished in the individual regions, and there would be a possibility that the world-wide institution created on the basis of the regional organizations could in the long run prevent war.

If we wish to expand the United Nations community, there are at least two problems to face: first, it should embrace all the peoples of the world regardless of color, race, religion, or ideology;

LESTER B. PEARSON

The further development of our sense of community is unquestionably, as Dr. Van Wageningen emphasizes, the crucial need of our time. In a sense, this has always been man's crucial need—the history of political actions and social relations in any period may legitimately be regarded as that age's attempt to work out answers to the basic question "Who is my neighbor?" But though the essential problem is as old as history, the technical advances which we have made during recent decades in communications and in the power of

Thus, an effective world organization being premature, we can work towards it by creating regional organizations which have a sense of community and which function over a wide enough area to make them both effective and stable.

R. W. G. Mackay, M.A., LL.B., London, a lawyer, was a Labour Member of Parliament in Great Britain from 1945 to 1951. He is the author of Federal Union and You Can't Turn the Clock Back. A leader in the organization of the European movement.

be regarded as that age's attempt to work out answers to the basic question "Who is my neighbor?" But though the essential problem is as old as history, the technical advances which we have made during recent decades in communications and in the power of weapons have faced our generation with the need for a decisive and fairly rapid advance in the scale and level of community organization and attitudes—as the only alternative to serious risk of unparalleled destruction.

I like Dr. Van Wageningen's point that the expansion of community should be considered in terms of two dimensions—breadth and depth. There will also, I think, be agreement that progress is desirable in a third and qualitative dimension—for the community which we seek must be something more than the ant colony or the regimented monolithic society of the totalitarians. Cohesion is necessary but not enough.

EXPANSION IN BREADTH

As to expansion in breadth, I agree that the United Nations would benefit if it included more of the sovereign states which exercise influence in their parts of the world. I do not agree with the view of the United Nations as a form of anti-Communist alliance, which would be much improved if the few Communist members were ejected. The United Nations was not designed to be such an alliance, nor is it needed for that purpose. It is the invaluable role of the United Nations to serve as the constitutional framework for international co-operation: a unique forum and focus for negotiations, which, as I see it, requires as wide a membership as possible of states which qualify under the Charter.

The United Nations as a focus for negotiations is, I think, most useful if, like an honest mirror, it reflects the political face of the world as it is.

To those who complain that the United Nations provides Communist nations with an opportunity for propaganda, I would point out, as Mr. Lodge did at a recent hearing of a United States Senate subcommittee, that the U.N. arena provides us with an invaluable chance to refute false Communist propaganda before an audience which includes those nations whose sympathies are uncertain.

If vetoes, or the threats of vetoes, continue to prevent the entry into the United Nations of new members, we might in time have to explore ways in which qualifying nonmember nations might be associated with United Nations work. But I do not think we should abandon the far preferable possibility of reaching some agreement on the entry of applicants. I would not be opposed to a "package deal" as such. Where moral principles are not betrayed, compromise is the civilized and traditional method of making progress with competing interests. This is as legitimate in politics as in business. Where "package" deals are objectionable, it is the contents, and not the wrapping together, to which exception is sensibly taken.

I certainly agree with Professor Van Wageningen's point that deeper or more far-reaching and precise commitments to narrower groupings such as NATO or regional organizations need not in any way conflict with loyalty to the United Nations, and can indeed strengthen it.

As I have already suggested, the primary value of the United Nations flows precisely from the fact that it is so nearly universal, that it does embrace within one constitutional system, however embryonic, both sides in the cold war, and many nations whose attitude to that prevailing tension is "neutralist." It is precisely this near universality that can make the United Nations valuable if we are ever to move toward the gradual relaxation of tension and lowering of temperatures essential to any secure peace.

Meanwhile, the United Nations can also serve effectively for international police actions, as the Korean example illustrates. The "Uniting for Peace" resolution gives added flexibility for this function, should it be needed. Where more fully articulated and more highly organized collective security arrangements are necessary, these can be and are achieved through such arrangements as NATO or ANZUS.

Conflict is no more inevitable in the multiple loyalties which simultaneous membership in the United Nations and in other organizations entails than it is in an individual's loyalty to family, school, town, and nation.

EXPANSION IN DEPTH

I agree wholeheartedly that we must extend our community in depth, and agree too that this is above all a problem of psychology—of political habits, intellectual outlook, and moral attitudes. As Professor Van Wageningen says, the sense of commitment is an important element in the sense of community. This is why threats by one party to withdraw from the community if outvoted on some question tend to jolt and weaken the community as a whole: for threatened withdrawal implies so limited a commitment, so feeble a loyalty, to the international system itself.

Probably the most important contribution which political leaders can make to any "expansion in depth" of international community lies in the field of more adequate consultation between friends. For it is consultation alone that can produce democratic unity, and that distinguishes free allies from reluctant camp-followers. In this con-

YOU CHAN YANG

I recognize that Dr. Van Wageningen's thesis is an effort to be fair and to balance carefully what I term the pros and cons of the United Nations, but it is difficult for a Korean to be philosophical and restrained when his country has nection I was somewhat puzzled by Dr. Van Wageningen's statement that "the habit-forming effect of international relations has been neither proved nor disproved." Surely the attitudes of awareness, consideration, and understanding generosity which prompt consultation with others can become habitual in international society as elsewhere. These qualities never come easily, but on them the unity and therefore the fate of the free world may well depend.

There is another way in which the United Nations community can be increased in "depth." Although its members are national states, its success depends in the last analysis on the support of the peoples who are in the widest and truest sense the U.N. community. That is why the work done by private organizations within Member States to educate the public about the United Nations, and to enlist their thinking support, is a significant but often overlooked pillar of that community. The present studies connected with a review of the Charter may themselves, by stimulating and increasing public interest in the United Nations, aid in this vital work.

Lester B. Pearson, M.A. (Oxon.), LL.D., D.C.L., Ottawa, Canada, Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada, was senior adviser of the Canadian delegation to the San Francisco Conference and has represented Canada at subsequent meetings of the United Nations General Assembly. He was chairman of the Canadian Delegation from 1948 to 1951 and President of the seventh General Assembly (1952-53).

been ravaged by a cruel and remorseless enemy, and he pictures homeless women and children fleeing before the roaring guns and the heavy tanks of aggressive Communism.

The pros of the United Nations were, so far as its inception was concerned, deeply rooted in the hearts of all who believe in freedom and the preservation of the dignity of man. When the United Nations was brought into being, it seemed to be a further affirmation of the Four Freedoms and the Atlantic Charter, and it gave hope to all whose dream was peace.

But the cons were not long in developing. The magnificent effort of the United Nations in Korea, wherein collective security was invoked for the first time, has since been dissipated because the Communist aggressor remains in control of half of Korea and is even being considered for membership in the United Nations as I pen these words.

I hope and pray that the United Nations will not die, but revision of its Charter, "enlargement of the community interest," and other devices to restore its onetime vigor and to prolong its life will all fail, in my opinion, unless it returns to the basic principles adopted when it was founded.

The past months have seen further and further disregard of its utility and possibilities. It has been bypassed in numerous conferences by powers large and small. As a consequence, many nations—and particularly the smaller nations—have had their initial faith in it weakened to such an extent that even now they are doubtful of an effective future for it, while it has yet to attain its tenth birthday.

Why cannot the United Nations operate like the forty-eight states of the American Union? Some observers in this country have pointed out, for example, that apparently the state of Texas has little in common with, say, the state of Vermont. Texas is vast and expansive, full of oil and millionaires, we are told, whereas Vermont is small and compact with little farms and slow population growth. Yet when the security of the United States is at stake and the state of the Union is endangered, Texas responds to the alarm and so does Vermont—and so do the other states.

I am proud of the Korean people for their response in the face of the Communist danger, and all Koreans will forever be grateful to the American people for coming to our rescue; we are grateful also to those other United Nations Member States who likewise responded.

But until and unless the United Nations—at least the free members of it—answer instinctively and instantly when freedom is at stake anywhere in the world, its future cannot but be enshrouded in doubt.

You Chan Yang, M.D., Washington, D. C., is Ambassador of the Republic of Korea to the United States.

Improving the Policy-making Processes

ANALYSIS AND PROPOSITION BY H. FIELD HAVILAND, JR.

COMMENTS BY LAWRENCE S. FINKELSTEIN, G. A. LINCOLN, LOUIS B. SOHN, AND KENNETH YOUNGER *

"... the Knight said, ... 'The great art of riding ... is to keep your balance properly. ...' He let go the bridle, and stretched out both his arms to show Alice what he meant and this time he fell flat on his back. ..."

DESPITE loud and frequent declarations of what ought to be done, the United Nations has found it just as difficult as Alice's friend, the White Knight, to stay astride its own lively aspirations. Moreover, the swelling legions of enthusiastic advisers who are preparing their champion for the review joust of 1956 run a similar risk of letting hopes outrun reality. It is important, therefore, as we reflect for a moment on the policy-making processes of the major U.N. organs, particularly the General Assembly and Security Council, to see those processes as part of the total world environment within which they have developed and must continue to develop in the future.

To try to squeeze the essence of that environment into a brief paragraph, one is bound to begin by pointing out that the dominant forces that have shaped the U.N. have been the interests of the most powerful nations, particularly the United States and the Soviet Union. Another major factor has been the rising level of expectations of the underdeveloped and non-self-governing peoples, who have found it advantageous, as well as painful, to be fought over by the behemoths. Finally, our ever accelerating-technological development has made all nations more intimately dependent on each other than most of them—small as well as large—have been ready to acknowledge through a pooling of powers and resources.

Besides reminding ourselves of the impact of these forces, we must avoid the easy luxury of unco-ordinated hit-and-run recommendations, aimed primarily at our pet hobbies among the U.N.'s many functions. Rather we must relate our advice to the whole pattern of U.N. responsibilities and, furthermore, measure all suggestions in terms of carefully thought out basic assumptions underlying the entire structure. The first assumption, I suggest, should be that the United States and the Soviet Union are likely to remain the two most crucial powers in determining the success or failure of the U.N. and that it would be foolhardy to attempt any revision of the U.N. that would force either one outside the pale. Second, I assume that, since the "veto" governs all amendments to the Charter, it is improbable that any basic revision of the U.N. can run the gauntlet successfully. Third, I assume, nevertheless, that, within these limits, there is considerable leeway for improvement through making more effective use of what now exists. Fourth, I assume, concomitantly, that our gravest world problems today—economic and social as well as political and military—require increasing integration of our separate national communities, that such integration can prosper only if organized along democratic lines, that we should take bold and immediate steps towards that goal with all countries that believe in and practice at least the minimal concepts of democracy, and that the necessarily limited membership of such arrangements need not hinder but can help the cause of peace.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

With these basic assumptions in mind, let us look at the policy-making processes of certain major U.N. organs, noting past trends and weighing possible alternatives for the future. In the case of the General Assembly, the most striking and generally recognized trend has been its rapid blossoming into prominence in the political field in contrast to the progressive wilting of the Security Council. Yet the public at large is not generally aware of all the factors which have encouraged this development or of all its negative as well as positive aspects. While it is true that the major anti-Soviet powers, and chiefly the United States, have led the way, it is also true that the Soviet bloc itself has advocated a stronger role for the Assembly when such a tactic has seemed to favor Soviet interests, as in connection with the situations involving Spain, the Soviet complaint of United States aggression against China, the status of the former Italian colonies, and Palestine. The smaller countries, of course, have also favored vigorous development of the Assembly's role, as they did at the San Francisco Conference, although some of them have occasionally been alarmed at the weight of the political burdens which the United States and others have wanted to shift to the Assembly, notably various aspects of the Korean conflict. At the same time, many of the underdeveloped and non-self-governing nations have increasingly appealed to the Assembly to counteract what they take to be excessive inertia on the part of the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council, and the Assembly's Special Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, in which the great powers are heavily represented.

Against this background we must consider the question: What are the relative advantages and disadvantages of this development in the light of the basic assumptions set forth above? On the positive side, one can say that resorting to the Assembly has avoided complete paralysis on some issues, particularly those due to stalemates among the great powers in the Security Council. Moreover, though the Assembly is limited to a recommendatory role, it has been able to generate a significant degree of compliance in some instances, as in the enforcement of an embargo on the shipment of war materials to Communist China and North Korea. Its deliberations also involve the broadest range of nations represented in any U.N. organ and hence the broadest range of potential collaboration. Finally, although some observers deplore the absence of weighted voting in the Assembly, one should recognize that there is informal weighting due to the obvious influence of leading powers—India, for example, as well as the United States—and the deference shown them in appointments to all U.N. subbodies and in other organizational arrangements.

On the negative side, however, there is still the disadvantage that the voting strength of a country in the Assembly bears no necessary or direct relation to its actual significance in terms of human or material resources. Recommendations can be, and have been, passed without the endorsement of the only nations capable of supplying the support necessary for their success. To take an extreme example, the Assembly, during its 1948 session, approved a resolution on the financing of economic development without the backing of a single permanent member of the Security Council. Some of the less powerful nations are also capable of exercising a kind of "veto" to the extent that they can control, particularly through the Latin American and Asian-Arab blocs, approximately one-third of the votes on any question.

* Editor's Note: Additional consideration of the issues discussed by Professor Haviland appears in the articles by Carlos Romulo, Raymond Aron, Hans Morgenthau, Aleks Bebel, and David Key, and in the comments by Heinrich von Brentano and R. W. G. Mackay.

A second disadvantage is that, if the Assembly is pushed too far, some of the most influential members, such as the Soviet Union or India, may be seriously alienated, even to the extent of being forced out of the U.N. altogether. A third objection is that this trend has sometimes resulted in a maddening duplication of debate on such issues as human rights, which have dragged from subcommittee to committee to Economic and Social Council to Assembly main committee to plenary meetings of the Assembly, and then around the barn again. A fourth criticism is that appeals to the Assembly promote excessive laundering of dirty linen before the world public, although this argument is apt to underestimate the ample opportunities that exist for off-the-record negotiations in the corridors and lounges at U.N. headquarters. Others have said that easy access to the Assembly relieves the great powers, in too high a degree, of the responsibility for working out compromises among themselves on situations in which they are the principal determinants of an effective solution.

What, then, are likely alternatives for the future? To what extent should the Assembly be utilized in preference to other channels? One extreme alternative would be to expand the Assembly's appetite to devour most of the functions of the other U.N. organs. But this would probably lead to severe indignation and certainly deprive the Assembly of the invaluable assistance of smaller, more flexible, and specialized bodies. In the other direction, one might try to bar the Assembly from even discussing certain matters (perhaps questions requiring "action") or certain subjects at certain times (possibly political issues on the agenda of the Security Council). Yet we have learned that there are decided advantages, within limits, to be derived from using the Assembly as a relatively free, though weak, general forum of last resort.

A third alternative is to use the Assembly only to the extent of, and not beyond, its capacity for effective performance. For example, until the Assembly can be endowed with the prerequisites necessary for an adequate collective security system, it can be said that it should rely primarily on either the Security Council or complementary external arrangements such as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Nor does the Assembly seem equipped to engage in exhaustive analytical studies or drafting efforts required for U.N. economic and social activities, such as the human rights program. For these functions it can be argued that the Assembly should depend principally on its related councils, commissions, and committees, which, in turn, may need reorganization (discussed in separate articles above).

Another question is: What powers should be granted the Assembly? At the outset it should be recognized that there is little evidence that the major powers would approve any real legislative authority for the Assembly. Yet we have seen that there are considerable opportunities for developing widespread compliance within essentially the present framework. Moreover, the Assembly can improve its peaceful settlement procedures, including the skills, timing, level, and other aspects of such negotiations, in order to take fuller advantage of those situations that are ripe for such efforts.

Another question is: Can Assembly voting be improved? Here again, the principal powers do not seem inclined to alter the Charter. One possibility, however, would be to place certain operational programs under somewhat autonomous subbodies, such as the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), with provision for weighted voting in their governing councils. Further efforts might also be made to clarify the application of the two-thirds rule.

THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Now turning to the Security Council, one can say that, in spite of that organ's relative decline in comparison with the Assembly, it is still a useful instrument, given the proper climate. It was designed to facilitate collaboration among the great, and near-great, powers, and it can continue to function in this role whenever feasible, as it has in connection with situations such as those involving Palestine, Indonesia, India, and Pakistan. As for the Council's basic authority, any change requiring Charter amendment seems out of the question. One alternative, however, would appear to be to continue the present pattern of depending primarily on the Council's recommendatory rather than its binding authority, as in the situations just cited. More might also be done to improve the Council's peaceful settlement functions as already suggested with reference to the Assembly.

Should the Council's voting procedures be altered? Once more, it is improbable that the United States and the Soviet Union can agree on any formal change in the Charter, but it may prove feasible to ease the situation in practice. It has already been possible to achieve at least tacit agreement that an abstention is not a veto, and it might be possible to expand the category of "procedural" questions to be decided by simple majority, as suggested in the studies of the Assembly's Interim Committee.

Again emphasizing one of the basic assumptions set forth above, it would seem shortsighted, to say the least, to destroy the bridge in the process of repairing it. Improvement should not be sought at the risk of jeopardizing the participation of the United Nations' most influential members. At the same time, we should do more to increase public understanding of another assumption referred to above; namely, that current world problems call for increasing international integration. True, integration will not guarantee peace, but it can remove many of the most divisive barriers that are constant invitations to conflict. Yet we must also recognize that integration comes most easily at the less universal level, where there is the greatest consensus, and most painfully at the most universal level, since it is there we find the greatest heterogeneity of cultures and interests.

H. Field Haviland, Jr., Ph.D., is associate professor of political science at Haverford College. He has also served recently as chairman of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation's Seminar on the United Nations and as consultant to the Brookings Institution. He is coauthor, with Daniel S. Cheever, of American Foreign Policy and the Separation of Powers (1952) and Organizing for Peace: International Organization in World Affairs (1954). His own work, on The Political Role of the General Assembly (1951), appeared as the seventh volume in the United Nations Studies series published by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

COMMENTS

LAWRENCE S. FINKELSTEIN

Implicit in many of Professor Haviland's conclusions is a verity about the United Nations which comes near to being an eternal one—at least as far into the future as it is possible to project—namely, that the United Nations for most important purposes is little, if anything, more than the sum of its national components. The interplay of national policies through the United Nations and the balances struck among those policies largely determine how the United Nations operates, what it achieves, and what its potential may be. Professor Philip Jessup used to pose the question for his graduate classes by asking: "Is the United Nations an 'it' or a 'they'?" The answer is clear: The United Nations is a "they."

This assumption, it seems to me, is crucial for any examination of how the United Nations policy processes can be improved. For it suggests, as Mr. Haviland has implied, that the place to turn for the most important answers is to the policies of the national members of the United Nations. In this conception, the United Nations is an instrumentality through which nation-states can strive to accomplish their national objectives, especially the ones which they have set forth in Article 1 of the Charter as the "Purposes of the United Nations." This does not deny that there are useful questions to be asked about the procedures of the Organization itself, about the practices of the organs, or the wording of its rules of procedure. But it does assert that those questions are secondary to the more basic ones about the conceptions which nation-states have and which they follow concerning the place of the United Nations and the role they will play in it.

In these terms, the key question for Americans is not "In what ways can we improve the operation of the United Nations by changing the provisions of the Charter or by modifying the procedures under which it operates?" but "How far has the United States made the most effective use of the United Nations as it is and how can better use be made of the United Nations in the future?"

This brief "comment" does not permit examination of the many directions in which the question may lead. There is space for only one sally—and a brief one at that.

Since 1950, the most dangerous threats to peace and security in the world—and to the peace and security of the United States—have arisen in the Far East, in the Korean and Indochinese conflicts. A comparison of these two cases, especially in terms of how United States interests were served, is revealing.

KOREA

In the case of Korea, the United States moved immediately to stem aggression through the United Nations. The United Nations served as a vehicle for mobilizing diplomatic, political, and material support for the defense against aggression which was mounted on United States initiative under United Nations auspices. The result was a final triumph for freedom in the world and for American interests, not only because the aggression was thwarted and the cost of overt aggression amply demonstrated, but also because these results were accomplished in a local war which was prevented from becoming a general conflagration. The importance of the United Nations in focusing and per-magnifying the pressures against total war cannot be definitely calculated, but it was certainly great.

The North Korean advance across the 38th parallel which initiated the hostilities was unmistakably identified as an act of aggression, even by neutral-minded India, because (1) the Korean case had been on the General Assembly agenda since 1947, as a result of United States initiative; (2) the legitimacy of the government of the Republic of Korea had been recognized by the General Assembly; and (3) a United Nations team in the field was able to certify that it was the North Korean forces which began the fighting by moving across the parallel. Had it not been for these three facts many governments would have been strongly impelled to regard the fighting as a civil war between rival claimants to control of Korea. Once the act of aggression was identified, the United Nations helped to solidify and expand the working alliance of free nations against the aggression.

Finally, the United Nations served as a means of permitting the mediatory influence of the uncommitted countries to be effectively exerted. The fighting was ended and the Armistice Agreement signed partly because of the role which countries such as India were able to play in the United Nations in drawing the opposing sides toward a common denominator.

INDOCHINA

Contrast this history with the case of Indochina, which never came before the United Nations. The recent settlement in Geneva, enforced no doubt by circumstances, was a grave blow to freedom in the world. The losses which Geneva ratified are the most severe suffered by the democratic world since Czechoslovakia fell in 1948 and China shortly thereafter. Beyond these, there was the unhappy spectacle of American diplomacy isolated as it has never been since we turned our backs on "isolationism" at the outset of World War II. In Indochina, there was never an identified "act of aggression" which could serve as the rallying point for free-world resistance. On the contrary, many nations continued until the very end to regard the fighting in Indochina as a colonial war, in which their sympathies were with the forces opposing the French.

WHAT WAS THE DIFFERENCE?

It is no doubt a great oversimplification to suggest that the difference between the two cases lies in the fact that one was handled by the United Nations and the other was not. And it would be grossly unfair to the United States government to imply that there was not awareness of the value of employing the United Nations and even an effort to persuade the French to submit the Indochina case for United Nations action. But it may well be that in this difference may lie an important part of the difference in the results. Who can say that three or four years of United Nations discussion would not have convinced even the "neutral" nations that the Vietminh stood for the subjugation rather than the liberation of Indochina? The opportunity for exposure was not exploited. Who can say that a United Nations guarantee of Indochinese independence in the future would not have gone far to eliminate the confusion over "colonialism" which permeated all consideration of the issue? The guarantee was never sought. Who can say that the United States might not have won in the United Nations diplomatic and political support for a solution in Indochina which would have safeguarded Indochinese independence and guaranteed free elections? We could certainly not have been more isolated than we were at Geneva. Who can say that the United Nations arena and the intervention of United Nations agencies might not have facilitated an earlier cessation of fighting and better terms? In any event, the costs of continued fighting could hardly have been much greater than they were or the terms of settlement much worse.

FULL USE OF U.N.

This analysis at least suggests that before permitting full rein to our zeal for reforming the United Nations we ought first to attempt to use it as well as it can be used. The Korean case amply demonstrated the rewards of doing so, although not, of course, without travail and difficulty.

In using the United Nations to the full, there is always the risk, to which Professor Haviland referred, that the Soviet Union will feel itself forced to withdraw from the organization. With him, I agree that it would be "foolhardy" to force the Russians out by attempted revision of the Charter; and to that I would add "or by any other means," except in the direst circumstances. But this is a risk which has already been taken many times. The "Uniting for Peace" resolution ran that risk. So did the United Nations firmness in Korea. The Korean experience suggests that the Soviet interest in staying in the United Nations is fairly strong. Despite the fact that the United Nations was used in Korea to thwart Soviet objectives, over Soviet opposition, the Russians did not withdraw. This is not to deny that the risk exists. But at what point the risk becomes operative it is hard to predict. And against the risk there is balanced the certainty that, if the United Nations is not employed to help deal with the major problems of our times, it will atrophy and die. No better instrument exists to help strive for the purposes set forth in the Charter.

Lawrence S. Pinkelstein, New York City, on the staff of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace since 1952, was formerly with the Division of Dependent Area Affairs of the Department of State, the Trusteeship Division of the United Nations Secretariat, the Council on Foreign Relations, and the Institute of Pacific Relations.

G. A. LINCOLN *

Dr. Haviland has taken a reasonable and realistic approach to the question of Charter revision, and his point that we might "destroy the bridge in the process of repairing it" should be given the most serious consideration by both those who are enthusiasts and those who are skeptics concerning the U.N. Although this point is clearly made, I wish he had stressed it more and had taken the opportunity to stress also that capabilities for Charter revision are, in fact, inherent to the day-to-day operation of that Charter. The "living Charter" has been evolving, like the British Constitution, very rapidly through usage. It would seem that this method and direction hold more hopes and less hazards, for the present, than any attempt at formal review and revision. Dr. Haviland has done a service in shooting some well-aimed shots into the rather usual United States faith that improvement can certainly be attained by institutional and procedural changes.

* With the assistance of Captains Griffith, Klemmer, and Traber, U. S. Military Academy.

The article does not appear to define precisely what we expect the U.N. to contribute to the operation of affairs among nations. Although the point is not stressed, perhaps because it is so obvious, the operating aspects of the U.N. in the security field were conceived on the assumption of substantial unanimity among the great powers. This situation has not come about. Furthermore, the concept of the U.N. as being a policy-making (rather than a policy-recommending) body may tend to be dangerous because, to some minds, there may be a strong implication of too close a similarity to national democratic legislatures. The U.N. makes vital contributions as a clearinghouse for diplomacy, as a forum, and as an essential institution for achieving maximum understanding and identifying maximum areas of agreement on difficult problems—these are vital contributions. But the U.N. does not make the policy; rather, the states which are members make U.N. policy, and it is effective policy only in so far as Member States accept and support U.N. conclusions.

SOME SUGGESTIONS

Following the line of these summary and admittedly incomplete thoughts, it seems that even more stress might be placed on (1) the importance of the recommendatory role and (2) on the need for restraint in proposing and pressing matters which some states consider contrary to their vital interest. As to the first point, the recommendatory role could be well and effectively argued for as achieving the maximum effectiveness that the U.N. can be expected to attain in the near future. If a state cannot be brought to react favorably to a recommendation, it is difficult to see how any working of the U.N., as conceived at San Francisco, could force it to react. As to the second point, the need for restraint is, of course, inconsistent with the almost uncontrollable urge of small or new states toward using this unprecedented opportunity to throw their weight about in world affairs.

Rather than a policy-making process, there is a tendency toward use of the U.N. to further changes. Sometimes these changes are opposed by affected nations on the grounds that they are not the concern of the U.N.

Dr. Haviland's article might have brought out somewhat more clearly that the various committees and commissions of the Assembly have some similarity to the committees of a national legislature. With more maturity, proposals impossible of acceptance might be kept in committee until an area of agreement is reached which would seem to permit some useful exercise of the recommendatory role of the Assembly. Such a perfected method of operation should eliminate some of the concern over an expanded "appetite for problems." These thoughts, however, presume much more restraint in using the U.N. as a propaganda sounding board than currently exists.

SOME QUESTIONS

There are at least two matters touched on in the article on which I should like to hear more of Dr. Haviland's views. First, what are the appropriate areas for U.N. policy making in a divided world—if analysis, determination of areas of agreement and disagreement, and exercise of the recommendatory role are called "policy making"? Second, by what policy and administrative expedients do we bridge the gap between the universal U.N. and the regional organizations and nation-state executive agents (the United States in the case of the Korean War) which logically have to carry out a collective security action of any magnitude? When successful policy necessitates a program of execution, what are the guidelines for that execution? This is a most important aspect of the policy-making process. If we define such practical guidelines, perhaps we shall know more about practical policy making.

Colonel G. A. Lincoln, West Point, New York, professor and head of the Depart-

LOUIS B. SOHN

While I agree to a large extent with Dr. Haviland's analysis of the present situation, I believe that his "alternatives for the future" do not properly present the choices with which we are now confronted. Though he himself advises against "hit-and-run recommendations," his suggestions cannot be easily fitted into any clear pattern.

The basic points in Dr. Haviland's analysis are that the Security Council has not been able to discharge the principal responsibilities imposed upon it by the Charter and that the General Assembly has unexpectedly taken over many of the functions of the Security Council. But he admits that the Assembly does not exercise its newly acquired functions in a responsible manner, and seems to recommend that maintenance of peace should be put again in the hands of the Security Council and that the Council should use for that purpose only its recommendatory powers, abandoning its power of making binding decisions. Dr. Haviland does not believe in the possibility of changing the voting rules in the Assembly or the Council; he suggests only such minor changes as can be made without a Charter amendment.

We should not try to turn the clock of progress back. The great powers were given a chance to direct the affairs of the world by means of the Security Council, and they failed ignominiously. The power has shifted to the General Assembly and it should stay there. The only question before us is: How can we make sure that the General Assembly will properly exercise its new responsibilities?

ment of Social Science of the United States Military Academy, is coauthor of Background for Our War (1942) and International Politics (1954) and author of Economics of International Security (1954).

The first step would be to make the General Assembly more representative of the peoples of the world. This can be best accomplished by replacing the present "one state—one vote" system by a weighted voting system which would ensure that a decision of the majority of the General Assembly would represent actually the will of the majority of the world's population. Dr. Haviland asserts that the principal powers do not seem inclined to alter the Charter provisions on voting, but it is quite clear that they would be the chief beneficiaries of any such change and there is no reason to assume that any one of the great powers would veto an amendment granting to them larger representation than they now possess. The Secretary of State of the United States has recently suggested that weighted voting be introduced in the United Nations, and it may be expected that the United States will press for an appropriate amendment and that other great powers will rally behind it.

Once that problem is solved, it will be much easier to grant to the General Assembly officially the powers which it is now exercising in a manner not always consistent with the Charter. It might even be possible to endow the Assembly with new powers which would enable it more effectively to perform its role as the chief guardian of world peace.

Louis B. Sohn, M.Dipl.Sc., LL.M., Cambridge, Massachusetts, is professor of law and John Harvey Gregory lecturer on world organization at Harvard University.

KENNETH YOUNGER

Dr. Haviland's reflections lead him to the conclusion which most serious students of United Nations Charter reform have found inevitable—that major changes in the Charter cannot be forced through without driving some major members out of the organization, and that this is far too high a price to pay. The only changes which can be seriously contemplated are therefore either quite minor in character or involve modifications of practice and procedure rather than Charter revision.

MEMBERSHIP QUESTIONS

Dr. Haviland rightly stresses the decisive influence of the United States and the Soviet Union, and sees clearly that any action which would drive either out of the United Nations would be not so much a reform of the United Nations as its abolition and a replacement by something quite different. I should like to see him carry the argument further, and point out that the absence of other major powers from the organization is also a serious obstacle to the effective handling of world affairs through the United Nations.

The case which leaps first to mind is China, for no one, whatever his views on the government which sits in Peiping, can seriously maintain that the Chinese state is now effectively represented in the United Nations. But there are other instances almost as damaging. In the Far East, it is not only China but also Japan which is without a voice in the world organization. What serious discussion on Far Eastern problems can, in such conditions, take place in the United Nations?

Europe is no better. How can the United Nations play a significant role in Europe when Germany, Italy, and numerous smaller European states are not there? The answer is that it cannot and does not play a significant role in Europe. This situation was accepted in the immediate postwar period, when the settlement with enemy states was deliberately left to the Council of Foreign Ministers. Ten years later, however, this "transitional" arrangement must somehow be superseded. Otherwise the United Nations will inevitably be relegated to a subordinate status and become quite unimportant.

For this reason the decision which is most urgently needed in the United Nations is about its own membership. This is not a question of abolishing or circumventing the veto. The only way to secure effective membership for the United Nations is by a horse trade, whereby all the controversial applicants are balanced against each other and admitted together—China with Japan, Spain with Hungary, perhaps even East with West Germany, and so on.

This idea will shock many, but it is not really shocking, for there are certainly states already in the organization whose claims to "peace-loving" status or even to effective independence are as dubious as those of any new applicant. The problem is not a moral one at all. It is simply the question whether disputes between the real antagonists in world affairs are to be handled in the United Nations or elsewhere. If the present membership remains unchanged they will be handled elsewhere.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY AND SECURITY COUNCIL

Beside this, the relationship between the General Assembly and the Security Council—on which I broadly share Dr. Haviland's approach—is of secondary importance.

There is still a role for the Security Council, especially in the field of disarmament where great-power agreement is indispensable. The increased influence of the General Assembly is, however, to be welcomed. It does not give the United Nations the authority for which the makers of the Charter hoped, but in the absence of great-power unity and a mandatory enforcement system it provides a certain check to open aggression and, if the worst occurs, substantial moral backing for collective resistance to aggression.

Kenneth Younger, M.P., London, was a member of the United Kingdom Delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations (1946-50), Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Home Affairs (1947-50), and Minister of State for Foreign Affairs (1950-51). He is vice chairman of the Royal Institute of International Affairs.

International Control of Armaments

ANALYSIS AND PROPOSITION BY DAVID F. CAVERS *

COMMENTS BY GRENVILLE CLARK, BENJAMIN V. COHEN, W. STERLING COLE, AND PERCY C. SPENDER

POLITICAL tensions induce increased armaments; increased armaments heighten political tensions; heightened political tensions . . . and so on. At what point should we try to cut into this circle? And could this action be taken within the framework of the present Charter or would revision be necessary?

In seeking a point of beginning, I turn to arms control in part because I am pessimistic about political settlements. We may succeed in negotiating this treaty or that truce, but I suspect we shall find that ending the particular disputes has not ended either the prevailing rivalry or the tension that accompanies it. But, after all, do we really shrink from rivalry or even tension? Is not what we fear the very real risk that, under present conditions, they may lead to atomic war?

Arms control could cut down that risk materially, even though the free nations remained pitted against the Communist states. The fears that have always resulted from a race to achieve security by arms are being magnified many dimensions today by the combination of military secrecy on an unprecedented scale with the widespread realization that, behind whatever curtains the other side has drawn, it is building up a terrible potential for atomic destruction. When fears of this sort become acute enough, people seek release, and talk of preventive war can command a hearing—on both sides.

A control plan worthy of the name would end the dangerous secrecy and the arms race as well. The very act of entering it would gainsay warlike intentions, at least for the short run, since the disclosures required by the plan would go sharply counter to the war-maker's interest. Moreover, the adoption of the plan itself would have disposed of a number of issues (for example, various rearmament problems) which are commonly regarded as political but which the plan's designers would have had to resolve in setting up a workable control mechanism.

Happily, every day a control plan lasted, the harder it would become to discard. A people can regret a political settlement bitterly; the sacrifices entailed by its inevitable compromises are called appeasement. But how many people would lament a cut in the arms bill? And if the first cut had been small, would not political pressures grow for more? Arms limitation could become a vested interest, since at least some of the funds it freed would find their way into budgets for peaceful development in which millions would have a stake.

The difficult part of the business is getting started. I see no evidence that

* The writer is indebted to his colleague, Professor Louis B. Sohn, for helpful criticism and references to United Nations experience.

The record of the London meeting in May and June of the five-power subcommittee of the U.N. Disarmament Commission was disclosed after this article was written. Held at a time of great political uncertainty, the meeting was an exercise in reconnaissance, neither side being ready to make major concessions. Our own were concealed in ambiguity.

drastic proposals can command acceptance now or that complex plans can be negotiated. However, the start must be genuine. A false beginning would make it harder to muster support for a second try. Therefore, the most hopeful move toward peace may be the least ambitious control plan that is consistent with national protection.

BLUEPRINT FOR CONTROL

A blueprint for control may be magnificently simple and demonstrably effective, and yet be ignored. To secure the support of the rival blocs calls for motives on their part other than admiration for the control plan. Such motives may exist today, but, before noting them, I shall outline a minimal control plan and consider its relation to Charter revision.

First, a point of clarification. Standing alone, the reiterated Soviet proposal, a pledge against the use of atomic weapons, is not a control plan, however sweeping its terms. It typifies the dangers of a false start. Ought the men responsible for the size of America's atomic arsenal to reduce it by one kilogram because the Soviets gave such a pledge? Ought the Soviet promise to induce us to be any more lax as to defense measures than we already are? And would the Soviets be any less vigilant because the United States had taken oath? Of course not. And would not the reports of a continuing atomic arms build-up after the pledges had been solemnly signed and the souvenir pens distributed induce in newspaper-reading citizens everywhere either cynicism or hopelessness? If this is to be avoided, the pledge must be accompanied by a control plan.

A second point: an atomic weapons control plan is not a sufficient control plan. Today such a plan could give no assurance that at least some, and possibly a good many, atomic bombs were not hidden away, and thermonuclear fusion has multiplied the destructiveness of even a small supply. Control of the air would, therefore, remain a rational military objective, and a good excuse for a race in conventional armaments. And the hard task of policing atomic operations without uncovering the secrets of the uncontrolled armaments would sharpen, not quiet, suspicions.

DISARMAMENT AND ARMS-REDUCTION PLANS

What we need, then, is a control plan that actually controls and that extends to all weapons. Must it forbid all weapons, compel true disarmament? No. That is a long, hard step, a step we ourselves are far from ready to take. At this stage, it remains a goal, not a means. But should a control plan not require at least the reduction of present armaments? That, in some respects, is a move even harder to negotiate than abolition. If reduction does not operate equally, one side has had its position worsened and may be endangered. But how is equality to be measured, given the prevailing diversity of defense needs, weapons, and auxiliary devices? How are we even to begin to balance reductions until both sides have disclosed their present arms? Yet, having thus surrendered the shield of secrecy, suppose they failed to agree on controls? It is easy to see why proposals for arms reduction which begin with an arms census get nowhere.

STANDSTILL PLAN

A minimum arms control plan is one that would do no more than stop the present arms race and keep it stopped. After such a standstill agreement had been put into effect—and it need have no limit as to time—the control agency would then have to take an arms census both to police the arms standstill and to work out the details of permitted replacements. But by that stage the agreement would have been reached and both sides would have bound themselves not to increase armaments, whatever imbalances the census revealed.

Suppose a standstill plan were in operation. The still suspicious nations would have such protection as existing armaments give; they need have no fear that their rivals were outstripping them in an arms race; they would be assured that no decisive new weapon of offense or defense was being produced in quantity; and they would know that preparations for war by their rivals would almost certainly be detected by the inspectorate well before an attack could be launched. As this degree of assurance was achieved, the dread of sudden catastrophe that now overhangs the world would gradually fade away.

The initial arms census might, of course, reveal that one side had more of this or that weapon than the other side had suspected. Whatever these disparities, neither side could hope for an easy victory. The status quo would be preferable to reciprocal atomic attacks. Disclosure would document what daily is becoming clearer: we have achieved with the Soviets what amounts to an effective, working balance in armaments: the mutual power to devastate.

TOTAL WAR—MUTUAL SUICIDE

This is a broad statement. In support, I offer Air Marshal Sir John C. Slessor, one of the West's leading strategists of the postwar period. Air Marshal Slessor recently wrote:

The Second Air War—if it should come—would not remotely resemble the first one. . . . The picture we have to envisage is a rapid succession in the first few weeks of cataclysmic disasters, compared to which the Hamburg "catastrophe" (as the Germans called it) would be child's play. . . . To admit that this terrible fate would not fall upon one side alone is merely to acknowledge that we have at last reached that stage, which men have thought before now that they were reaching, when total war would amount virtually to mutual suicide.¹

THE CONTROL AUTHORITY

If the powers wish to substitute an effective standstill control plan for the costly pursuit of arms supremacy, this would, of course, require the creation of an authority to administer the controls. This could be done either by an annex to the Charter, adopted as an amendment, or by a multilateral treaty. In neither case would change in the Charter's present terms be required. This annex or treaty could include a prohibition against the use of atomic and other specified weapons. The relationship between the control authority and the Security Council, the General Assembly, the International Court of Justice, and the Secretariat could be carefully worked out, and the rules of those bodies could be adjusted to accommodate the new agency.

Neither the annex nor the treaty method is novel. The Statute of the International Court of Justice is an annex to the Charter, and the specialized agencies in the economic field exemplify the use of the treaty device.²

¹ Slessor, "Has the H-Bomb Abolished Total War?" Air Force, Vol. 37, No. 5 (May 1954), pp. 23, 25; also published in Boston Sunday Herald, May 2, 1954, p. 1.

² The United States delegation to the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission submitted on July 12, 1946, a detailed memorandum outlining treaty provisions to implement the Baruch plan, then before the U.N. Commission. See U.N. Atomic Energy Commission, Space is lacking to project a structure for a control authority thus created, but one central point should be made concerning it. Arms control is a matter of utmost gravity. The power of decision on big issues should be closely linked with responsibility. Basic policy problems of military significance should be resolved by the states having militarily significant forces, however helpful the views of other states may be and however indispensable their contribution to administration. An allocation of power that departs from customary U.N. patterns may be required.³ If this were hard to work out in an annex, resort to the treaty method would be indicated.

Pursuing the implications of this idea further, the authority's designers should recognize that arms control can exist only by virtue of the acquiescence of the great military powers, so long at least as the controllers are not as strong as the controlled, a proviso likely to persist for some time to come. Therefore, with acquiescence setting the actual limits of authority, issues of the veto and of sanctions should not be exaggerated. They should be resolved in such a way as to facilitate initial agreement.

Official Records, Spec. Suppl. (1946) Memo. No. 3, p. 106, reproduced in U. S. Department of State, International Control of Atomic Energy: Growth of a Policy (1947), Appl. 16, p. 160. This treaty was to embody the charter for the projected Atomic Development Authority and define its relationship to the U.N. Neither the United States Delegation nor the Commission itself seems to have resolved the question whether the relinquishment of the veto, proposed by Mr. Baruch in atomic sanctions cases, should be by treaty or Charter amendment.

³ Compare the provisions for weighted voting in the Articles of Agreement of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund.

Either the annex or the treaty method would allow the adherence of nonmember states, hopefully a vanishing category.

I hope this does not seem cavalier. It is the gravity of the problem that dictates this view. Let us look at a hypothetical case—and without recourse to Ruritania. Suppose an inspection team from the U.N. authority uncovered an undeclared atomic bomb cache in, say, Czechoslovakia. Suppose that the Czechs refused to give up the bombs, and, in the Security Council, Russia vetoed an order directing their surrender to the U.N. Immediately the question would arise whether, as a practical matter, the treaty still survived or whether, instead, we should have to resume building up our own atomic armaments and defenses.

If the veto had been renounced, the situation would be much the same. When the U.N. made its demand on the Czechs, they could thwart the control plan by refusing to comply. Suppose that in this they had the Soviet's express approval. It would be necessary to decide, just as in the veto case, whether the treaty's usefulness was ended.

FUNCTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COURT

The fact that such a crisis might arise does not mean that legal procedures could not be set up to deal with it. Thus, either the annex or the treaty could include a provision that would apply if a party to the agreement failed to live up to its terms and, in so doing, created a substantial risk to the peace and security of other signatories. The latter should then be authorized to withdraw from the agreement. The power to determine whether such a breach had occurred, however, could be vested in the International Court. In case of need, the Court would have power to "indicate interim measures of protection" against the breach.⁴ It could act on an emergency basis,⁵ and then proceed to a full judicial inquiry. The agreement could properly provide that resort to the Court would not preclude the complaining powers from proceeding at once to take such precautionary measures, short of war, as they thought wise. An orderly procedure need not limit their right to self-defense.

⁴ International Court of Justice, Statute of the Court, Chap. III, Art. 41, par. 1, Rules of

In the operation of a control plan, most of the serious issues jeopardizing effective control would doubtless be disposed of in the Security Council rather than in the Court. But there would be a host of lesser questions arising in the interpretation and application of the treaty, despite the fact that it should be as precise and specific a document as human skill and foresight would permit. Most of these questions would arise out of day-to-day operations and could be worked out between the authority's executive (which might well be staffed chiefly from the less military nations) and the state or states involved. But a board might be provided to hear appeals from the executive, and the authority could, of course, resort to the Court for advisory opinions.

INSPECTION FUNCTION OF CONTROL AUTHORITY

The inspection function of the control authority would impose a large but not overwhelming burden upon it. The same reasoning that makes it possible to say that our armaments are in effective balance even though no arms census has been taken would make small-scale breaches of the standstill relatively inconsequential. Major departures could be detected by a knowledgeable inspectorate with freedom to check military forces and supplies, key industrial installations, reactors, and power sites, and to conduct aerial surveys with reasonable frequency. Quantitative determinations could be made without entailing disclosure of secret devices and processes. Laboratory weapons research might be allowed—it could scarcely be prevented—but developmental work calling for pilot plants and test models could and should be controlled. The time span between drawing board and production line for the complex mechanisms of modern warfare should enable a technologically competent inspectorate to detect and abort new monsters in embryo.

Court, Art. 61. The President may act alone if necessary; Art. 61, par. 3.

⁵ The Permanent Court of International Justice, pursuant to rules similar to those of the International Court, took interim action on one occasion two days after such action had been requested. Pless Case, P.C.I.J. Series C, No. 70, p. 429. In the recent Anglo-Iranian Oil Company Case, the International Court took interim action in two weeks. Order of July 5, 1951, I.C.J. Reports, 1951, p. 89.

The control authority might well have a division with a secretariat and technical staff directed to the study of problems in the reduction of existing armaments and charged with the formulation from time to time of reduction proposals.

ATOMIC DEVELOPMENT FOR PEACE

So far I have barely mentioned atomic development for peace. The Authority we proposed in 1946 was to have developmental responsibilities, a corollary of the monopoly of fissionables it was to have. Under a control plan that left nuclear weapons and stockpiles lawfully in the hands of their possessors, obviously these nations could undertake their own atomic development programs. However, the agreement creating the control authority could also provide for a development authority with functions similar to those outlined by President Eisenhower in his speech to the General Assembly on December 8, 1953.

body could work closely with control authority in dealing with the problem of the production of fissionables. Suppose a control plan were to go into effect tomorrow. Would our reactors be permitted to operate? I should think only those engaged in research and development ought to be free to do so. The needs of peacetime reactors in the near term could readily be supplied from military stockpiles. But in time this situation would end. Reactors producing fissionables should then be permitted to operate at a rate and frequency that would serve only to satisfy the needs of domestic power reactors and for such exports as the President's (or the Politburo's) plan may contemplate. No large new stockpile should be allowed anywhere under the guise of meeting civilian needs. Nuclear fuel in use in the power reactors would be less dangerous than stockpiles. Not only would its withdrawal disrupt those dependent on this source of power, but the fuel itself might require fairly protracted reprocessing to be ready for use in bombs. Therefore, whenever the development authority found that a nation's atomically powered electric industry required more fuel, it should have to certify that fact to the control authority, and the latter should authorize the operation of fuel-producing reactors long enough to meet the industry's needs. On motion of a state aggrieved by either ruling, the authority complained of should be required to submit the issue to the International Court for an advisory opinion and to be bound by the Court's ruling.⁶

CIVIL WARS

This sketch must pass over technical difficulties such as the determination of arms replacement rates and the handling of unfinished ships and installations. But the really tough problem for this and any other arms control plan is what to do about civil war. Suppose that Iran blows up in a rebellion against the Shah's government, strife that the West believes is being fomented by the Soviets. The Loyalists claim the rebels are being armed by Russia and ask for Western planes, tanks, and artillery. At this point the inspectorate attains critical importance. It would have the responsibility of determining the facts as to the alleged flow of munitions across the Russo-Iranian frontier. If this was occurring, a protest would follow, and, if that were not heeded, the case would go to the Security Council or to the Court, or both. Even though Council action were vetoed, still, if the Court found a major violation, the complaining powers could hold the annex or treaty to be at an end and decide whether to back the Shah or let Iran be swallowed up in the now familiar fashion. The same problem and the same choice could be posed by the falling out of two neighbor states, if either or both had powerful backers.

⁶ Compare the analogous provision (Art. VIII, Sec. 30) in the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations.

Is there any reason to hope that, given an arms control plan, such incidents would stop? I think so, and for a simple reason, a reason that also leads me to believe that a standstill plan, if adopted, would not be sabotaged by the obstructionist tactics that for the Communists seem standard operating procedure. The reason is this: The great military powers would not adopt an arms control plan unless they wanted arms controlled. Entry into the plan would exact a heavy price: the disclosure of military secrets and the cessation of developing defense programs. If the powers thought that price worth paying, they would not throw away the benefits of control just to back a local struggle. (This does not mean, incidentally, that the plan would assure tranquillity for Iran and like countries. There are subtler ways of upsetting a regime than by shipping arms—and, note too, there are subtler ways to defend one.)

U.S.S.R. AND COMMUNIST CHINA

But is there any real chance that the Soviet government and its Chinese ally would regard the cessation of the arms race as a benefit worth buying? So far their interest in disarmament has seemed centered on exacting a pledge against atomic weapons with the evident purpose of embarrassing the United States. They may believe that they can carry the armaments load better than we and our allies. They may look to the arms burden as a growing source of friction in the Western camp and as a block to economic and social progress among all nations not under their domination. But against this view are other considerations, among them those "political" settlements that are necessary incidents of arms control.

Despite the defeat of the European Defense Community, Russia must reckon with German rearmament as a probable next step. A powerful Germany separated from Russia only by a cordon of untrustworthy satellites is a prospect that Russia seems to fear. China may also view a rearming Japan with disquiet. A standstill would block the rearming of both Germany and Japan. Moreover, both Russia and China have economies that have been retarded by the drying up of East-West and the China trade, not to mention the exactions of military expansion. The barriers to trade would fall as the barrier to arms increases was erected. And since no arms control plan operating through U.N. machinery would be effective if China did not take part, the curbing of Chinese military expansion would entail acceptance of Red China's U.N. claims (though not to Formosa).

These are potent affirmative attractions. Moreover, acceptance of the plan would call for no major internal reorganization in Russia; no loss of the power to say Nyet in the U.N.; no subservience to a Western majority in the development of Russia's atomic resources. Can we really be sure the Soviets would reject such an opportunity? Or that the Chinese would refuse to go along?

THE UNITED STATES

The foregoing says nothing of the reasons why the United States might wish to enter such a plan. These can be entrusted to the thoughtful reader. Among them he may stress the hope that, if the world can control the instruments of its own destruction, perhaps in time it will have the good sense to abolish them.

David F. Cavers, LL.B., Cambridge, Massachusetts, is Fessenden professor of law and associate dean of the Harvard Law School. During World War II he served as associate general counsel for price in the Office of Price Administration. He is an associate of the Special Committee on Atomic Energy of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York. He was formerly editor of Law and Contemporary Problems (1933-45) and is author of a number of articles on the international control of atomic energy, chiefly in the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists.

COMMENTS

GRENVILLE CLARK

With the "improvement" of the A- and H-bombs, our civilization faces so unprecedented a problem that one must welcome any serious suggestion toward a solution, especially a proposal from so careful a thinker as Professor Cavers. And yet I am obliged to consider his proposal unsatisfactory because, on analysis, it is inadequate to meet the situation.

Be it noted that in so far as any binding obligation is concerned, Professor Cavers' proposal is confined solely to a "standstill" in the arms race. For, although he hopes that a standstill will lead to something more, he proposes no binding obligation whatever for any reduction in national armaments, not to speak of their abolition.

It seems clear that the proposal does not sufficiently take into account the immense destructive power of the new bombs which already exists or soon will. Professor Cavers recognizes the necessity of establishing an effective inspection system as an essential part of the standstill agreement. No one would predict that the very complicated agreement that would have to be negotiated for the setting up of such an inspection system could be achieved within less than two or three years. During that period it seems inevitable that the nations, and especially the two superpowers, would accelerate their production of bombs, so as to start the standstill at the highest possible levels.

These increases, when added to the present stocks, would produce an accumulated power of destruction almost beyond belief.

It has been reliably calculated that by the end of 1957 the United States will possess fissionable material suitable for A-bombs equivalent in explosive power to 430 million tons of T.N.T. Since the Hiroshima bomb had an explosive power of about 20 thousand tons of T.N.T., this prospective stockpile would be the equivalent of 21,000 Hiroshima bombs; and it would be about 320 times the explosive power dropped on Germany in World War II, officially reported as the equivalent of 1,340,000 tons of T.N.T. In addition there would be H-bombs of a number and power that is anybody's guess, but which by 1957 might well double our total bombing potential. It is staggering to note that a potential equal to 800 million tons of T.N.T. would be nearly 600 times the explosive power dropped on Germany in World War II.

Obviously, if even a small fraction of such an arsenal could be dropped, the United States would be able to devastate not only Russia and China but all the larger cities of the entire world. By the same token, if Russia possessed bombs with only one-tenth of this power, she could at the least devastate Britain and Western Europe to an unimaginable extent.

In the light of this situation, it is hard to see how a mere standstill agreement, whereby the nations while not increasing might nevertheless keep intact their vast destructive power, could appreciably lessen the mutual tensions and fears that now bedevil the world.

What is required is something far more radical and far more adequate, namely, complete disarmament. By this I mean the total abolition of all national military forces and armaments of any description right down to the level of lightly armed and strictly limited forces for internal order only. I say complete disarmament because in the H-bomb era nothing less will suffice, and because both common sense and the record of history show that all efforts at mere reduction will bog down in disputes over "quotas" and "needs" of the various powers.

It may be argued that a standstill, even though no solution, would represent some progress and would at least be easier of achievement than complete national disarmament. But this I venture to doubt. If a man finally comes to realize that he is very ill, it is often no more difficult to persuade him to accept a major operation that can cure him than to obtain his acceptance for a severe but inadequate treatment that can probably do no more than keep him from getting worse. I suggest that this

BENJAMIN V. COHEN

Time and space limits do not permit a balanced appraisal of Professor Cavers' article; I can make only a few observations which I hope will be helpful.

1. In connection with the general problem of Charter revision, Professor Cavers' conclusion, with which I wholly agree, that no change in the present terms of the Charter of the United Nations is required to permit the adoption of an effective plan for the international control of armaments, is most significant.

It is one of the basic principles laid down in the existing Charter that neither force nor the threat of force shall be used by Member States in their international relations in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the Charter. The Charter has not been rendered obsolete by the discovery of atomic weapons. Effective disarmament arrangements are not excluded by the Charter, but are necessary to carry out its stated objectives.

We have failed to implement the analogy may apply to the present world situation. For I do not really believe that the peoples are so lacking in intelligence and will as to tolerate the present arms race without a vigorous effort to rid themselves, through complete disarmament, of the intolerable threat of modern war.

Grenville Clark, LL.B., Dublin, New Hampshire, lawyer, has been a vice-president of the United World Federalists since its founding in 1947. He was chairman of the National Emergency Committee for Selective Service (1940-41) and of the Citizens Committee for National War Service (1944-45). He is the author of A Plan for Peace (1950) and coauthor with Louis B. Sohn of Peace Through Disarmament and Charter Revision: Detailed Proposals for Revision of the United Nations Charter (1953).

Charter with respect to the control of arms, but that is not the fault of the Charter. No mere formula of words which could possibly be added to the Charter by way of amendment would ensure the development and observance of an effective plan for the international control of armaments. If there should be a general conference for Charter revision, the Soviet Union would probably call for an amendment embodying its brief and magic formula forbidding the use of all atomic weapons. But neither that or any other paper formula would be of any practical value or effect until the principal military powers agreed upon a concrete and workable plan for the international control of armaments.

As Professor Cavers has pointed out, within the framework of the present Charter, treaty arrangements may be made for the effective international control of armaments if the principal states concerned can agree on the terms of such arrangements. Such arrangements could impose additional powers on existing organs of the United Nations or on newly created organs, and could provide special voting procedures for determining violations or settling disputes arising thereunder.

Much should and must be done to stop the nations racing with more and deadlier arms to their common destruction. But we should not let ourselves be diverted from the difficult task of working out and securing acceptance of concrete plans for the effective international control of armaments by indulging in false hopes and expectations as to what may be accomplished by Charter revision.

STANDSTILL ARRANGEMENT

2. Professor Cavers performs a distinct service in calling for consideration of the possibility and feasibility of a standstill arrangement, a minimum control plan which would stop the present arms race and keep it stopped. Since some sort of a standstill is likely to be the first stage or a part of the first stage of any armaments control plan, political leaders should be in a position to appraise the possible effects of such an arrangement. Indeed the British and French representatives at the recent meetings of the subcommittee of the Disarmament Commission suggested that a standstill or freeze should be a part of the first stage of the disarmament program.

Professor Cavers believes that there is good chance of agreement on a standstill because it would preserve rather than disturb the existing working balance in armaments between the United States and the Soviet Union, particularly in the reciprocal power to devastate. There may be some merit in Professor Cavers' desire to achieve in the first instance a simple standstill, without trying to secure anything in the way of a balanced readjustment or reduction in armaments, but I should think it would be wise to guard against any rigid or inflexible position in this regard. Professor Cavers may have more faith in the nature of the unverified working balance in armaments which has come about through the armaments race than those who would have to accept responsibility for the standstill. Some over-all ceilings or limitations on the numbers of persons to be permitted in the armed forces and on the kinds of armaments to be allowed might help to increase the confidence of all concerned in the nature and workability of the balance in armaments to be obtained by the standstill.

A standstill arrangement has considerable attractiveness as an entering wedge to balanced disarmament, but I cannot share Professor Cavers' apparent hope that a general standstill by itself, without reasonable expectation or assurance of further advances in the way of more definite agreement on the quantity and kind of permitted armaments, could last very long. The problems of inspection, verification, and enforcement under a general standstill would in time become, I fear, even more difficult than under a more definite arms control agreement. After a while the difficulties of distinguishing between replacements and betterments or additions might become virtually insoluble.

FLEXIBILITY NEEDED

Certainly Professor Cavers' plan is excessively rigid if he contemplates, as he apparently does, that the standstill should be inflexibly applied to all nations. He states without qualification, for example, that it would block the rearming of Germany and Japan. Of course the object of a standstill would be defeated if the Soviet Union and the United States were free without restraint to add to the arms of their allies. But a workable standstill arrangement must be flexible enough to avoid creating or maintaining a really dangerous disequilibrium of power in any important strategic area. Professor Cavers' standstill if inflexibly applied across the earth would neither afford nor permit any adequate defensive counterpoise to the power of Red China in Asia. The present power situation in Asia is not particularly conducive to peace and stability. Perhaps that situation cannot be remedied over a short period. But a standstill agreement which would render such a situation irremediable for the indefinite future might be a doubtful contribution to the peace of the area or of the world.

A standstill arrangement as an approach to balanced disarmament is a constructive suggestion which merits thoughtful exploration. But in our quest for a simple start to stop the armaments race we must be careful to guard against any serious imbalance of power which may endanger the peace.

Benjamin V. Cohen, LL.D., J.D., S.J.D., was counselor of the Department of State from 1945 to 1947 and a member of the United States delegation to various international conferences during this period, member of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly (1948-52), and U. S. representative on the U.N. Disarmament Commission (1952).

W. STERLING COLE

Dr. Cavers frankly states that he "turns to arms control" in part as a means of reducing international tensions and cutting down risks of atomic war, because he is "pessimistic about political settlements." As a member of the school of practical politics, and a more than casual observer of foreign affairs, I am more inclined to look to the political arrangements which Dr. Cavers rejects to obtain the desired ends. Although I confess I partially share Dr. Cavers' pessimism about political settlements, I am far more doubtful of the effectiveness of any arms control that we might negotiate in the foreseeable future.

In theory, the plan Dr. Cavers proposes seems desirable—but so did the Baruch plan for international control of atomic energy. It looked mighty good on paper. Yet, despite the fact that more than fifty members of the United Nations endorsed it, and leading statesmen described it as the most magnificent and generous offer in history, it foundered on the rocks of Soviet opposition. The various proposals of the defunct League of Nations for limitation and reduction of armaments and for collective security, and the Locarno and Kellogg-Briand peace pacts were hailed as panaceas for international ills, yet Mussolini in Ethiopia, Tojo in Manchuria, Hitler in Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland, and Stalin in Finland proved how little weight such treaties really carried when the chips were down.

POLITICAL SETTLEMENTS

I am ready to concede that the "political settlements" which I would advocate in preference to "arms control," and by which our present foreign policy is regulated, can be transitory and an illusion. They are of value only so long as they are mutually or multilaterally acceptable. Admittedly, they are negotiated with escape clauses and loopholes and even with crossed fingers. When ratified they are devoid of teeth. But a "political arrangement" (for example, a pledge to renounce war as an instrument of national policy) does not leave us with our defenses impaired, as would a sanctionless armaments control; nor are we left in an inferior position militarily unless, as we have all too often done in the past, we stupidly disarm ourselves. Treaties, like any unsecured contract, are scraps of paper to those who wish to break them, and there are rarely any peaceful means of specific enforcement.

Democracies such as Britain, France, and the United States, and small neutrals like Belgium, Norway, Holland, and Denmark, who in the past counted on treaties alone for protection, were caught short when the dictators acted. But it must be considered that they were not bound by treaties to let their defenses crumble or their offensive strength grow blunt.

It would be far more indefensible in today's world voluntarily to lay oneself open to aggression, or even to invite it by espousing an armaments control which at best would be unilateral. The day of dictators is not past—we have powerful ones with us still. Is it permissible to assume that history will not repeat itself if given a chance?

ARMS CONTROL AND COMMUNISM

If Dr. Cavers could guarantee that all governments concerned with armaments—the U.S.S.R., the United States, Britain, Germany, France, Japan, and China—would see eye to eye, be practicing democracies, and have the same concepts of political morality, then a plan for control or even limitation and reduction of existing armaments would conceivably be possible. But the irreducible objectives of Communism (and the openly avowed means of securing them) and the objectives of democratic states are as far removed as the poles. We have police states against free peoples; Iron Curtains against Open Doors; the concept of government as the master rather than servant and of citizens as slaves rather than sovereign; and we have the Kremlin, despite Moscow's mouthings on "peace," "democracy," and coexistence, sworn to destroy capitalism by any means whatsoever, preferably foul rather than fair. It is not coexistence that is all-important; it is co-survival.

Dr. Cavers' plan envisages, first, a simple standstill agreement; then a control agency which would (1) police the standstill, (2) take an arms census, (3) conduct effective inspection on the spot by checking military forces and matériel de guerre, key industrial and atomic installations, and laboratory weapons research, (4) make aerial surveys, and so forth. In short, it is a reworking of the stillborn Baruch plan to which the Soviets gave a thundering Nyet.

To assume that the Soviets would accept any such plan, or surrender one iota of their national sovereignty, or agree to revision of the United Nations Charter, is naïveté. To expect the Kremlin to consider as sacred any treaty whatsoever, if it were to their advantage to break it, is to be deliberately blind to precedents; vide the Russo-Finnish War, Russia's expulsion from the League of Nations, the fate of the Baltic republics and the Balkan states, Korea, and postwar Germany.

Arms control with the U.S.S.R. is an illusion; with other countries it is unnecessary. Since it is impossible for the Soviets to meet even our minimal security demands for limiting our own defenses and at the same time maintain their police state—the sine qua non of Communist dictatorship—to pursue the matter further would be to lull our people inexcusably into a false sense of security. That we must not do.

In my view, we will be wise to resign ourselves to political realities and to become accustomed to the world's perils, rather than to invite the aggression and possible national destruction which would come with unilateral armaments control.

PERCY C. SPENDER

Little discernible progress has been made this year towards achieving any degree of disarmament in a world equipped with weapons of unprecedented destructive power. But unlike 1953, when the United Nations Disarmament Commission met only once just before the eighth session of the General Assembly so that it could report it had nothing to report, there have been attempts this year to come to grips with the disarmament problem which lies uneasily on the conscience of mankind.

There have been public and private exchanges in New York, London, Washington, Berlin, and Geneva. We all know they ended seemingly in deadlock, and Secretary of State Dulles has commented wryly to the press that because of a fundamental difference in approach, private talks with the Russians seem to produce no more agreement than do public exchanges.

How next, then, to tackle this problem of disarmament? There is, I am afraid, no ingenious elusive key which once found will unlock the door. Viewed from Olympian heights, it would seem that only time will provide an answer, that armaments will be reduced or abandoned only when rendered redundant through long years of peace which terror, perhaps, rather than statesmen, may ensure. When I speak of terror I mean, of course, fear of the terrible consequences of global war—a fear which may give us a protracted global peace, albeit an uneasy one.

The key to this disarmament problem does not lie in protocols, pacts, or international conventions, important though these may in themselves be. It passes beyond such machineries to the meta-physical—to the minds of men. There can be no disarmament while sullen distrusts smolder and anxious tensions remain.

W. Sterling Cole, LL.B., LL.D., Washington, D. C., is Representative from New York in the United States Congress, has been a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy since 1947, and was elected its chairman in April 1953.

Let us examine the stalemated position on the control of atomic and hydrogen weapons. The non-Communist world adheres to its position that such weapons should be outlawed, but only after arrangements for international inspection and policing have been made. The Russian position demands an immediate and unconditional ban of the atomic and hydrogen bombs, with a system of international control thereafter to be worked out by the Security Council—where of course the Soviet has a veto.

Naturally, the West cannot agree to such a proposition. But what is the working of the Russian mind? Is it possible that it too suspects a trick; that it fears that any international disarmament body—on which the Communists would be outnumbered just as they are in the U.N.—would be used against them? What is the real reason why the Soviet will not agree to an effective banning of atomic weapons? Reduced to conventional weapons for defense, one might argue, the Soviet Union would be far less vulnerable than it is today. But as it is, our positions remain poles apart.

Everyone who prays for peace is praying that somehow means will be found to enable the Communist and democratic systems to exist peacefully together. History has shown how societies or creeds hostile to each other have nonetheless learned to live side by side. Under the overhanging threat of atomic war and in the face of stiffened Western resistance, Communist pressure—in a global sense—has eased a little, I think it fair to say.

Along the periphery where Communist and anti-Communist forces come into contact with each other are situations sure to generate tensions. If we can keep these dangerous tensions under control without sacrificing any of our principles, we may develop a long uneasy peace with lessening strain, less reliance on costly arms, and increasing amenability towards international co-operation.

EXPLORING EVERY POSSIBILITY

This will be a long process, and meanwhile we must keep striving for disarmament, whatever the disappointments or frustrations. By all means let us press forward with President Eisenhower's suggestion for an international agency to further the peaceful application of atomic power, with or without Soviet Russia; by all means let us examine amendments to the Charter of the United Nations and consider whether the control of the use of weapons of mass destruction requires more specific treatment in the Charter itself; by all means let us amend the U.N. Charter to set up a control authority, if it is feasible and would help. And let us have continuing talks on the problem in public and in private, particularly among the big powers. Some day, something will have to give somewhere; a suspicion may abate; a tension be removed. If we remain in touch with the Communists, exploring every possible formula and establishing our good intent by the manner in which we conduct ourselves, some day we may find a shifting of their position which will enable us safely to modify our own and to achieve real progress towards disarmament.

The Disarmament Commission has met in New York on at least two occasions this year and its special subcommittee conferred in London between May 19 and June 22; although no progress was discernible, it could not have been less than in 1953 when there were no meetings at all.

Following President Eisenhower's atomic proposals to the United Nations Assembly last December, Secretary of State Dulles this year conferred with Soviet Ambassador Zarubin in Washington and with the Soviet Foreign Minister Mr. Molotov in Berlin and Geneva. Again no visible progress was made, but who knows? These cumulative endeavors may have allayed suspicion enough to make possible at least one step along the road we must travel.

The achievement of disarmament, as I said before, is a matter of men's minds and political philosophies rather than of formula or procedure. But to bring about the fusing of the former we must persevere with the latter, in the full knowledge that until we succeed, mankind can never rest secure.

Sir Percy C. Spender, K.B.E., Q.C., LL.B., Washington, D. C., Ambassador of Australia to the United States since 1951, was Vice-President of the United Nations General Assembly (1950-51) and chairman of the Australian Delegation (1950, 1952-54).

Strengthening the Secretariat

ANALYSIS AND PROPOSITION BY WALDO CHAMBERLIN

COMMENTS BY W. FRIEDMANN, AWNI KHALIDY, JACOB ROBINSON, AND WALLACE S. SAYRE

THE Secretariat of the United Nations is large, and its approximately seven thousand employees are scattered all over the world, about half of them working elsewhere than at the headquarters in New York. It should be noted that there is no fundamental difference between the Secretary-General and the Secretariat, because the final and complete responsibility for the latter rests with the former. "His choice of staff, more particularly of the higher staff—and his leadership, will largely determine the character and the efficiency of the Secretariat as a whole."¹ The Charter gives this group of people two broad functions: those that are political and are implied under Article 99 of the Charter, and those that are more specifically stipulated as administrative in Article 97. The gap between political and administrative is partially bridged by the Secretary-General's role in the General Assembly and the Councils, specified in general terms in Article 98. The rules of procedure of the organs have reinforced this interrelationship by extending to political fields the Secretary-General's right of participation in the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council, and their subsidiaries. If the Secretariat is to be strengthened, the problem arises as to which of the two roles, or what combination of them, is to be emphasized.

The first Secretary-General had before him the precedents of two very different but successful international officials, Albert Thomas of the International Labor Organization and Sir Eric Drummond of the League of Nations. Thomas' concept of the role of the head of an international secretariat was one of dynamic leadership, extending to presentation of proposals and vigorous argument and negotiation in support of them in constituent bodies. He also took an active part in directing the administration of his secretariat. Drummond, on the other hand, exerted a great influence on the substantive work of the League of Nations by working in the background and eschewing public participation in the policy-making process. He, too, saw his administrative role as an important part of his over-all task. Mr. Trygve Lie apparently believed that his time and energy should be devoted to political negotiations in the interests of world peace, and that the administrative aspects of his role should be delegated to assistants. He did give strong support to the substantive work of his senior officers, particularly in the economic, social, and dependent-area fields; it would be unfortunate if that feature of his leadership were not retained. In each of the three examples, the question was one of emphasis. Where Drummond and Thomas believed that the success of their tasks required a balance between the political role, which each carried out in a different manner, and the administrative function, in which both took an active part, Mr. Lie emphasized the political role and delegated his administrative functions.

¹ Report of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations (London, Doc. PC/20, 23 December 1945), p. 86.

The second Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Hammarskjöld, appears to be moving toward Drummond's concept of the post. He has taken a much greater part in the administration of the Secretariat than did Mr. Lie and seems aware that in the present political situation in the world an individual, even the Secretary-General of the United Nations, can exert little influence on the international tensions that exist.

A major reorganization is now in progress in the Secretariat, little of which has been formalized but parts of which have been put into practice. This makes it difficult to state what the situation is at the moment, or what the future Secretariat will be.

BALANCE OF CENTRALIZATION AND DECENTRALIZATION

An important change which would strengthen the Secretariat would be to secure a better balance between the desirable aspects of both centralization and decentralization. The problem is not unlike that of a large university which tries to retain the benefits of having strong departments without losing the advantages of a co-ordinated university educational program. Within the Secretariat a number of methods might assist in achieving such a balance, one of which could be to have more units responsible directly to the Secretary-General. This would make it possible to break up some of the catch-all Departments such as Security Council Affairs, Public Information, Conferences and General Services, and Administrative and Financial Services. In turn, this would permit bringing together units with more nearly identical interests and duties, with possible (or probable) elimination of some duplication of efforts and services. Units devoted primarily to field activities, research, writing, area study, relations with specialized agencies and nongovernmental organizations, distribution and sale of documents, and legal work appear to be particularly appropriate for combination and reallocation. There are many indications that the reorganization is moving along these lines.

More units reporting directly to the Secretary-General will require the elimination of a considerable number of high posts, as has been suggested by members of the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly. This may also tend to reduce the undesirable gap between the Secretary-General and a considerable number of his senior officers. This policy has clearly been that of the second Secretary-General, even before the reorganization started.

Effective centralization will require an expansion of the immediate office of the Secretary-General, which many observers have considered too small for the nature of the tasks that center therein. The probable creation of two deputies to assist in developing the political role of the Secretary-General appears to be a salutary step. However, if overcentralization is to be avoided there will also have to be a clearer delegation of authority than existed in the past. In considering the size of the Secretary-General's immediate staff and the functions which should be delegated elsewhere, consideration might well be given to the creation of an intelligence service which could provide him with the type of information needed to exercise the immense responsibility conferred by Article 99. Such a service, to be effective, would have to be very close to the Secretary-General on a personal basis. Mr. Lie was fortunate in having a United Nations commission on the ground in Korea on June 25, 1950, but it is conceivable that had he been permitted to have an adequate intelligence service of his own, it might have been able to warn him of the impending aggression in time for him to have prevented the attack by calling to the attention of the Security Council the preparations that were being made for the attack.

The very extensive operations of the Secretariat away from headquarters suggest the possibility of adapting to all field operations the system of Regional Technical Assistance Representatives (RTAR's) used by the Technical Assistance Board. Perhaps the concept of regional offices could eventually be expanded to include field personnel of the specialized agencies—a step that might lead to the realization of an international civil service such as was proposed by the Preparatory Commission in 1945. Adaptation of the RTAR concept might provide part of the better balance between centralization and decentralization of field activities which are presently decentralized.

STAFF MORALE

No other steps, perhaps, would do more to improve the quality and effectiveness of the Secretariat than to improve the morale of the staff. It would be difficult to improve upon the devotion of most of the personnel to the cause of the United Nations, but there has been a growing dissatisfaction with the lack of diversification of work. The rather rigid compartmentalization that has existed has made it difficult for members of the staff to know about or understand what transpires elsewhere, even in their own units or department. "Jobs" have been broken down into their component parts, as in large factories, and the various parts assigned to personnel of increasingly lower grades. This has led to boredom and dissatisfaction, running from low to high. It should be possible to redefine many posts so as to make them more interesting and stimulating for capable people, while at the same time providing greater opportunity for rotation between units and between headquarters and field services.

Much has been done to clarify and settle the tenure problem since the advent of the Walters Committee in 1952 and the Kerno and Mudaliar Committees in 1953 and 1954, but the very breadth and scope of the reorganization now under way has caused considerable uncertainty in the minds of many members of the Secretariat. Some of this insecurity is unavoidable in a Secretariat that lacked effective leadership for seven years. A closely related but different problem, to which there is no clear answer, is that of geographical distribution, a problem which is very often present in any personnel issue. In an international organization, perhaps even more than in a national government, there will probably always be a certain number of employees appointed for political reasons, some of whom will be highly competent and some of whom will not. If the latter were taken out of the administrative or operational stream and used as advisers or consultants, or simply not used at all, the permanent career service would be freed for greater development and effectiveness.

Waldo Chamberlin, Ph.D., New York City, has been professor of government at New York University since 1949, and is now director with the university's Program of Studies in United Nations. He was chief documents officer of the San Francisco Conference and in United Nations. He was chief documents officer of the San Francisco Conference and in United Nations Preparatory Commission (1945-46), deputy director of the Documents and Sales Division of the United Nations (1947), and director of Documents Control Staff (1948).

COMMENTS

W. FRIEDMANN

I am not qualified to comment on Dr. Chamberlin's technical suggestions regarding the reorganization of the Secretariat of the United Nations. With regard to the improvement of the morale of the Secretariat, however, to which Dr. Chamberlin refers, there is much evidence that the greatest threat has resulted from recent loyalty investigations and the very serious doubts as to the extent to which the Member States of the United Nations will be permitted to superimpose their "loyalty" standards on those of the United Nations. The legal position should be clear enough. Article 100 of the United Nations Charter provides that "in the performance of their duties the Secretary-General and the staff shall not seek or receive instructions from any government or from any authority external to the Organization," and that "each Member of the United Nations undertakes to respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary-General and the staff and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities." That the United States now requires clearance by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of all United States citizens before they apply for a United Nations post may still be regarded, although with some difficulty, as a legitimate application of internal policies. Far more serious is the acceptance by the previous Secretary-General of the so-called "jurist's report," a hastily compiled and poorly reasoned document, which came to the conclusion that not only United Nations employees (of United States nationality) convicted of a criminal offense involving national disloyalty but also those who in the course of any authorized national investigation exercise their constitutional privilege against self-incrimination should be absolutely barred from further employment by the United Nations. In the pursuit of this policy Mr. Trygve Lie dismissed a number of United Nations employees of American nationality, many of whom were later reinstated by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal. The United States delegate to the United Nations then declared that his country would seek to have this award nullified by a United Nations resolution. It is arguable (although very doubtful) that a United Nations resolution could effectively annul such awards, on the theory that a United Nations resolution established the Tribunal. But there can be no doubt that if it became a practice for lawmaking bodies to annul the judgments of courts which they dislike on the ground of legislative sovereignty, judicial independence would become a farce. Certainly such a precedent would gravely jeopardize the value of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal.

AMENDMENT OF STAFF RULES

The present Secretary-General has sought and obtained an amendment of the staff rules which enables him to terminate the appointments of permanent staff members who inter alia do not meet the highest standards of integrity required by Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter:

(i) If the conduct of the staff member indicates that the staff member does not meet the high standards of integrity required by Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter;

(ii) If he learns of facts, anterior to the appointment of the staff member and relevant to his administrative suitability, which, if they had been known when the staff member was appointed, should, under the standards established in the Charter, have precluded his appointment; or

(iii) If such action would be in the interest of the good administration of the Organization and in accordance with the standards of the Charter.

Although in the first two cases termination will not take place until after consideration by a special advisory board and is subject to appeal to a staff board and ultimately to the Administrative Tribunal, the Secretary-General in his report of November 1953 has expressed his view that the Tribunal should not review the exercise of his discretion but broadly speaking only the abuse of powers or illegal procedure. In other words, in the hands of a strong Secretary-General the present staff regulations will be good protection; in the hands of a weak one they will not. The situation still remains uncertain as to the extent to which the Secretary-General should be compelled to accept the standards of "loyalty" or "subversion" used by any one Member State. While this has

AWNI KHALIDY

The first duty of a good Secretary-General of the United Nations is to put his house in order. Unless that machinery is organized on efficient lines its chief will be unable to make use of it to discharge his duties under the Charter. To ignore this premise would defeat the very purpose of the machinery and would result in unfortunate circumstances such as the sensation about the existence of subversive elements in the Secretariat in 1952.

The Secretary-General has two capacities under the Charter, political and administrative. Dr. Chamberlin puts the problem clearly when he says, "If the Secretariat is to be strengthened, the problem arises as to which of the recently been primarily an American problem, it can, of course, arise in regard to any other member. The spirit as well as the letter of Article 100 should be clearly confirmed, perhaps by express reference to the "general principles of law recognized by civilized nations" (Art. 38, Statute of the International Court of Justice) as the standard applicable to United Nations employees accused of conduct incompatible with their duties. It would be equally beneficial for the morale of the staff if Member States undertook to stand by the awards of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal and channeled their dissatisfaction into attempts to revise the law for the future.

W. Friedmann, LL.D., Dr. Jur., LL.M., professor of law at the University of Toronto, was visiting professor at the New York University School of Law (summer 1954) and expert consultant to the United Nations Seminar on Public Industrial Enterprise in Rangoon (1954). He is the author of Legal Theory (3d ed., 1953) and Law and Social Changes in Contemporary Britain (1951).

two roles, or what combination of them, is to be emphasized." If a choice between the two roles has to be made it is healthier to opt for the administrative role. But a balance could be struck between the two roles, delicate though it may be. It is right that the Secretary-General should have a political responsibility to suggest and guide. But care should be taken lest this develop into interference or intrigue; nor should it take the color of mobilizing forces against one or more members of the United Nations. Dr. Chamberlin correctly estimates that Sir Eric Drummond's method was both administrative and political, the latter taking the form of exerting influence in the background.

This seems to me to be the ideal balance between the two roles and the best in ensuring efficiency and dignity, without dragging the Secretary-General into open controversy.

What kind of Secretariat should the United Nations have, and how big? The present Secretariat is too big, and it is an open secret that many of its posts are duplicatory. In a number of other positions there is very little to do. An unduly large organization becomes unwieldy and inefficient.

If the present Secretariat is to be curtailed of what type should it be? It can be either a vast pool satisfying geographical distribution or an expert international civil service. The first type is, for many reasons, undesirable; it is the one which mainly prevailed in the first seven years of the United Nations. Perhaps the best method of curtailing the Secretariat is to organize it as a compact international civil service aimed primarily at efficiency and impartiality. If this method is to be adopted the Secretariat should have two types of posts, one the expert type comprising the heads of departments and sections, the other the clerical type providing the necessary help. Accordingly, a number of posts, such as heads of departments, should be connected directly with the Secretary-General. This would enable him to be in constant touch with his main advisers, and therefore aware of the currents in the Secretariat. It would also contribute to smoother and speedier work, to say nothing of the elimination of duplication in posts. This appears to be the policy of the present Secretary-General.

U.N. INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

On one issue I would disagree with Dr. Chamberlin. To organize an intelligence service of the Secretariat is indeed undesirable. Morally it is against the spirit of the Charter, which advocates open diplomacy. If that diplomacy has failed it should be reviewed. Then, it is doubtful whether the Secretary-General, to fulfill his responsibility under the Charter, really needs an intelligence service of his own. A United Nations Intelligence Service would never be as strong as the services of individual countries; it would certainly cost a tremendous amount of money, for which it would be difficult to account to the Fifth Committee with the gallery listening in. Moreover, such a service would inevitably clash with the services of Member States in the field, with the probable result that they would end up by spying on each other. But perhaps the most potent argument against this idea is that a U.N. Intelligence Service would become in the hands of an unscrupulous Secretary-General a destructive weapon used for dangerous purposes, in which the losers would be the vast majority of the small countries in the United Nations.

ABILITY AND IMPARTIALITY

If the Secretariat is to be a compact and efficient organism it must be selected primarily on two bases, ability and impartiality, with reasonable regard to geographical distribution. In the first seven years of the United Nations impartiality was a mere expression, with the result that some Secretariat members meddled in private politics and some even abused their responsibilities. Under the new Secretary-General the United Nations has the right to expect strict impartiality as well as real ability among his staff. If those two attributes are aimed at, in a Secretariat organized on an expert-clerical basis, the problem of geographical distribution as it now exists will have lost its force. More stability in the Organization would contribute to its efficiency.

A word about United Nations personnel abroad. The specialized agencies are very large in themselves. More emphasis should be put on field work, reporting to a small but efficient headquarters, in line with the type of Secretariat outlined above.

Awni Khalidy, New York City, is the Permanent Representative of Iraq to the

JACOB ROBINSON

Professor Chamberlin, writing of methods for strengthening the Secretariat, mentions also en passant its research activities. This aspect of the work of the Secretariat calls for some comments.

It is not generally realized that the Secretariat of the United Nations is the greatest institute of social research in the world. A glance at the six catalogues of economic and social projects containing lists of 1,663 projects of the United Nations Secretariat (together with 1,910 additional projects of the specialized agencies) reveals a scope and extent of research work unparalleled in this field.¹ The subject matters range over a wide area of economic and social problems, including economic stability and development, statistical questions, transport and communications, fiscal questions, regional economic activities (Europe, Asia, and the Far East, Latin America), human rights, narcotics, population, social welfare, cartographic questions, technical assistance, economic and social conditions in trust and non-self-governing territories, and codification of international law.

The characteristic features of United Nations research projects are supposed to be their anonymity, collective responsibility (co-operation of various experts), their practical (not academic) orientation, their spirit (the paramountcy of the interest of the international community), and their objectivity.

United Nations. He has been associated with the Organization since its beginning in various capacities, and has been in the Iraqi diplomatic service since 1934, mainly in Europe, having served with the Iraqi delegation to the League of Nations in 1936-37. In 1953 he was chairman of the Administrative and Budgetary Committee of the General Assembly.

DEFECTS IN U.N. RESEARCH ORGANIZATION

What are the defects of the present organization of research in the United Nations? In the first place, not all the projects are within legitimate limits of the activities of the Secretariat. The Secretariat should limit itself to research projects of comprehensive, not to say universal nature, where access to information from a great number of states is required and where the mentality of the international civil servant is the one best suited for such a research project.

Secondly, not all the projects undertaken on orders by the United Nations or engaged in motu proprio by the Secretariat are absolutely necessary. In numerous cases reference to existing literature would suffice.

Thirdly, the methods used in the various publications of the United Nations are far from being uniform and of the same scientific standard.

Fourthly, students of social problems (in the widest sense of the word) cannot but be distressed by the lack of common knowledge about this field of activities of the Secretariat and in particular by the lack of appreciation of it in the special literature on the subject matter concerned. Even printed publications of the United Nations are given much less attention in the reviews of scientific journals than is given to individual publications with or without the imprint of a university press.

¹ It is regrettable that the Secretary-General intends to discontinue this important reference publication; see United Nations Document E/2398 of 13 May 1954, par. 27. The same document indicates a tendency to reduce the research activities of the Secretariat.

Finally, the organs of the United Nations rely mostly, if not exclusively, on projects prepared by the Secretariat, discounting research done elsewhere. A welcome addition to such Secretariat projects could be abstracts of the existing literature on any particular problem for the benefit of the interested United Nations group.

In order to put an end to these defects in an otherwise highly valuable field of activities, the suggestion is hereby made for the Secretary-General to have in his inner cabinet a director of research who would concentrate in his hands the responsibility for all research work and make the appropriate selection of research projects to be un-

WALLACE S. SAYRE

Professor Chamberlin's prescription for strengthening the United Nations Secretariat amounts, in essence, to a proposal that the Secretary-General should undertake a more modest political leadership, that he should refine his administrative organization, and that he should lean more heavily upon the senior career officers in the Secretariat. It is true that some of Professor Chamberlin's suggestions do not have these declared purposes, and indeed one or two of his recommendations would seem to have an opposite intention; but, on net and in result, the program suggested would move the Secretary-General toward the pattern of Eric Drummond's muted political role and away from the stronger political leadership demondertaken. Thanks to his erudition, he would also be able to discard those projects which are repetitious. Furthermore, in order to avoid duplication, he would arrange for co-operation with the specialized agencies, with private scientific institutions, and with individual scholars. He would see to it that the research projects receive the necessary attention of the scientific world, and in particular of the scientific periodicals. Finally, he would introduce strict and uniform rules for methodological problems, as well as for the use of source material and bibliography.

Jacob Robinson, LL.D., New York City, legal adviser to Israel's Permanent Delegation to the United Nations since May 1948, was previously in charge of the Institute of Jewish Affairs (1941-47). In Lithuania, he was a member of the bar (1922-40), member of Parliament (1922-27), and legal adviser to the Foreign Office. He is the author of numerous works on legal and sociological problems.

strated by Albert Thomas and Trygve Lie.

The strength of the Secretariat, as Professor Chamberlin correctly notes, depends upon the nature of the leadership exercised by the Secretary-General. A strong Secretariat is the product of a Secretary-General who understands the primacy of his political role and sees his administrative role as instrumental to his political leadership. Such a Secretary-General is not cut to the pattern of a high career official, exercising his political influence anonymously and demonstrating his skill in the arts of administration as the larger half of his responsibility. There is no chief political official in the United Nations comparable to a Prime Minister (or to the President of the United States) whom such a career-type Secretary-General can serve. The Secretary-General himself has an inescapable political leadership role; he is accordingly, as are all political leaders, a risk taker and an expendable, not a career official.

The Secretariat will be strengthened, then, by a Secretary-General who consciously seeks, not to "balance" his political and administrative roles in ways which de-emphasize his political leadership, but rather to fashion his administrative organization to strengthen his political performance. It is doubtful whether this purpose is served by increasing the number of administrative units reporting to the Secretary-General or by immersing him in more numerous contacts with the senior career staff. The Secretary-General's greater need is for broadly conceived and creative political advice.

The Secretary-General is not strengthened by trends toward a self-directing, autonomous bureaucracy within the Secretariat. All bureaucracies have strong aspirations toward such status; in the United Nations staff such tendencies reduce the political role of the Secretary-General and pull him toward preoccupation with technical problems of management and of specialized programs.

The main road toward strengthening the Secretariat would seem to be to remove the ambiguities, in the Charter and in the precedents, concerning the political leadership responsibilities of the Secretary-General, and to make such responsibilities unequivocal and of first priority. If this were done, problems of administrative structure and procedure would come into meaningful perspective as methods for strengthening the political leadership of the Secretary-General.

Wallace S. Sayre, Ph.D., is professor of public administration at Columbia University. Besides service on university political science faculties, he has been consultant to various federal, state, and local agencies. He is the author, among other books, of The United Nations Secretariat.

Risks of Revision: Appraisal of United Nations Preparations for Charter Review

By SALAH EL DINE TARAZI *

THE Charter of the United Nations has been the object of much criticism ever since it came into force. On several occasions liberal thinkers, little concerned with political, social, and economic situations, have brought to light the shortcomings of this document of world-wide import. Certain critics, imbued with legalistic formalism and idealistic precepts, have attacked, in the pertinent Articles, what may be termed "inadequate and ineffective." On the other hand, diplomats and thinkers from countries with colonies and overseas possessions have deemed exaggerated the dose of anticolonialism contained in the Charter.

Owing to the fact that revisionist ideas had become current, some countries wished to give them more concrete form. Article 109 of the Charter provides in paragraph 1 that convocation of a conference for the revision of the Charter may be decided at any time "by a two-thirds vote of the members of the General Assembly and by a vote of any seven members of the Security Council." Paragraph 3 of the same Article hastens to add that "if such a conference has not been held before the tenth annual session of the General Assembly following the coming into force of the present Charter, the proposal to call such a conference shall be placed on the agenda of that session of the General Assembly, and the conference shall be held if so decided by a majority vote of the members of the General Assembly and by a vote of any seven members of the Security Council."

* Translated by Eric Sellin.

As a result of reading these two paragraphs, we note that the General Assembly, in the course of its tenth session, will be forced to solve the problem of convoking a conference for the revision of the Charter. Subsequently, the Security Council will find it equally necessary to face its responsibilities squarely. On the other hand, this conference could not, in accordance with paragraph 2 of Article 109, adopt any decision without a two-thirds majority. Furthermore, modifications of the present text of the Charter will not take effect until they have been "ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the Members of the United Nations including all the permanent members of the Security Council" (Art. 109, par. 2).

Under these conditions, it appears quite difficult to arrive at any modification of the present text of the Charter, inasmuch as, after the terms have been adopted by the conference—assuming that two-thirds of the members ratify them—a single one of the five permanent members of the Security Council can prevent their coming into force by refusing ratification. Fully to understand this state of things it is necessary to look back and consider the "climate" in which the San Francisco Conference of 1945 took place. This conference did not deliberately undertake the task of conferring dictatorial attributes on the Big Five when it permitted each of them to exercise a right of "veto" in the Security Council and in connection with the ratification of amendments to the Charter. The political conditions that governed the world in 1945 imposed that formula; they continue to impose it on us today, as we shall see further on.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY, EIGHTH SESSION

With these essential facts in mind, three countries approached the Secretary-General of the United Nations with the request that he place on the agenda of the eighth session of the General Assembly three items different in nature but possessing a common denominator—the future revision of the Charter. The three countries in question were Argentina, the Netherlands, and Egypt.

The point proposed by Argentina appeared rather modest. Its object was to entrust the Secretary-General with the preparation of a study of the interpretation of the Charter by the various members of the United Nations.

The Delegation of the Netherlands asked that the General Assembly call on the governments of the Member States to present their suggestions on the amendments they planned to formulate.

Egypt, much like the Netherlands, requested that a special committee of fifteen members be created with the duty of undertaking the preparatory study necessary for eventual revision of the Charter. The report of this committee could, according to the Egyptian Delegation's way of thinking, be placed before the revision conference and would thus facilitate its task.

The General Assembly decided to include in its final agenda the three points mentioned above and referred them for study to the Sixth Committee, entrusted with the examination of legal questions.

DEBATE IN THE SIXTH COMMITTEE

The Sixth Committee decided, first of all, to proceed with a general debate on the three points concerning the revision of the Charter. This debate proved instructive from all points of view. It furnished, in any case, substantial proof that the idea of a revision was not yet ripe and that one should not venture to put the cart before the horse. Furthermore, after several meetings, Egypt hurriedly withdrew a draft resolution it had presented in order to give effect to the item on the agenda that had been placed there at its request. Egypt thus abandoned the idea of the establishment of a special committee to study eventual amendments to the Charter. From then on, the debate in the Sixth Committee was confined to the preparation of an official document containing various interpretations of pertinent provisions in the Charter and to the possibility of ascertaining to that end the opinion of the governments of Member States.

Although the question under discussion lost much of its scope after the withdrawal of the item proposed by Egypt, debate was lively and animated. Certain delegates concentrated their efforts on condemnation of the rule of unanimity among the permanent members of the Security Council, which is found in Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter and which has come to be known, since San Francisco, as the "right of veto." Actually, it is clear that, in criticizing the "veto," one criticizes the Soviet Union. This attitude would appear normal if it were exhibited in a revision conference, but from the way the matter progressed it became quite apparent that the criticisms were strictly polemical rather than animated by a wish to remedy real defects, which, if allowed to remain, could even constitute a risk to the future of the Organization.

In spite of these polemics, a great many of the countries who had often declared themselves against the veto did not approve of the idea of asking the governments for their opinions on the terms of an eventual revision. They had their own reasons—which, as a matter of fact, they did not all share. For the colonial powers, it was a question of avoiding any reformulation of the provisions dealing with trusteeship or non-self-governing territories, as a new draft might carry a somewhat more precise definition of the concept of autonomy or independence and might shorten the period during which the administering powers would continue their management of the territories in question.

The Soviet Union fought against asking the governments for advice, claiming this procedure to be illegal, premature, and of a nature to embitter international relations rather than to ease them. This was also the view of Poland and of Czechoslovakia. It rose from the basic idea that one could not express opinions on the subject of the revision of the Charter except at a specific revision conference, in the event of its being called in accordance with Article 109. Any contrary procedure should be condemned, for it would not be likely to foster peace and direct it into a safe and certain path.

Certain countries of the African-Asiatic bloc, in agreement with some countries of Latin America, felt that one should not insist on having the opinion of the governments, but should be content with requesting the Secretary-General to prepare a study of the implementation of the provisions of the Charter. Although these countries had amendments to formulate, notably in the economic and social fields and in that of non-self-governing territories, they nevertheless thought that it was by no means necessary to risk undermining an edifice whose construction had been paid for by the sufferings and misery endured by mankind in the course of World War II. One could wait, after all, till 1955 to adopt (in the course of the tenth session of the General Assembly) a decision with respect to the convocation of a revision conference. In the last analysis, there was no sense in hurrying if people were not ready to adopt any concrete solution right away.

At the conclusion of a prolonged debate, rich in nuances, the Sixth Committee adopted a resolution whereby it entrusted to the Secretary-General the preparation of a series of documents, among which a "repertory of the practices of United Nations organs" figures conspicuously. These documents were to be completed and communicated to the Member States in 1954 or a little later. At a meeting on November 27, 1953, the General Assembly approved this resolution, which received the number 796 (VIII).

INDICATED COURSE OF CHARTER REVISION

Thus it was quite clear that the idea of requesting the opinion of the Member States had been definitely set aside. The procedure of revision of the Charter would have to take the most usual course. The question would be included on the agenda of the tenth session, and the responsibility for calling the conference would devolve on the General Assembly by virtue of the clear and exact provisions of Article 109, paragraph 3. The delegations, however, would have the opportunity of drawing their arguments from the documents which would be put at their disposal by the Secretary-General.

This historical and legal survey permits us to estimate even now the intrinsic value of the modifications which might be made in the present text of the Charter of the United Nations. The Charter constitutes, without a doubt, a document unique in the history of international relations and in the progress of mankind. If certain groups of powers had in mind to retouch this document without the nearly unanimous consent of all the partners, sad and even disastrous consequences might result from such an action, which, far from serving the cause of peace, would instead endanger it.

SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

We have already mentioned the political climate that prevailed at the San Francisco Conference. It is impossible to overemphasize the fact that this climate was the result of the coalition that events had forced on all the democracies independent of the color of their social convictions. The capitalistic powers, namely, England, the United States, France, and China, were forced to fight side by side with the Soviet Union to destroy the forces of evil incarnated in German Nazism, Italian Fascism, and Japanese imperialism, forces that tried to halt the progress of man and turn back the clock of history. Thanks to this obstinate battle, the coalition of the democracies dedicated its victory with the adoption of the Charter of the United Nations. This marked the beginning of a new era.

Thus the United Nations Organization is the fruit of a long and careful collaboration of countries of various kinds. For the first time in history, the idea had arisen of a universal merger of forces in order to maintain peace and security and to promote higher economic and social standards in all countries. It is indeed too early to pronounce any judgment on the concrete value of these efforts, but it would be equally inappropriate to apply a brake to such a momentum.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS PRIOR TO THE U.N.

Before the creation of the United Nations, international relations had always served policies tending to assure the supremacy of one state or group of states to the detriment of others. Everything done in this field bears witness to the truth of this claim. The Treaty of Westphalia in 1648 marked the political defeat of the German Holy Roman Empire, to the profit of England, whose economic aspirations spanned the horizon. The relations between France, England, Spain, and Russia in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were marked by a reciprocal wish for mutual destruction. Alliances were made only with a view to counteracting or nullifying other alliances. There were successive wars; some rulers profited from them, others were forced to pay the price with the blood and wealth of their subjects. Territorial changes depended on the outcome of battles and were without previous consultation of the populations involved. In spite of this uncertain, arbitrary, and chaotic state of affairs, the rules of international public law only held for countries belonging to what was then called "Christendom"; the countries "outside Christendom" or of the "Barbary Coast" were considered outside the law. The relations that European powers maintained with the Ottoman Empire were stamped with the seal of discrimination and legal inequality. The Sublime Porte was obliged to bow to the injunctions in the treaties of surrender, and the citizens of the victorious states enjoyed, even inside the Ottoman Empire, a more favorable treatment than that accorded to the subjects of the Sultan.

Eighteenth and nineteenth centuries

Two events marked the end of the eighteenth century: on the one hand, the revolt launched by the colonies in the New World against England, which terminated in 1788 with the Constitution of the United States of America, and, on the other hand, the French Revolution of 1789. These events had their repercussions on the course of international public law. For the first time in history, colonies had succeeded in shaking off the yoke of the parent country and proclaiming their right to live in sovereign independence. Likewise for the first time, in one of the greatest powers of the world feudalism received a mortal blow from which it never recovered. The bourgeoisie, having gained the power in France and subsequently been ensconced in Europe by the Napoleonic conquests, frightened England and the reactionaries in the Russian and Austro-Hungarian Empires. The fall of Napoleon I provided all these forces with an opportunity to injure the prestige of France. The Congress of Vienna of 1815 revealed their plans. It was followed by the Holy Alliance initiated by Czar Alexander I, the object of which was to protect the monarchs and those who supported them from popular upheavals. It was unable, however, to weather the blows of the Revolution of 1848 in France and those that followed in Europe. From that time on, the will of the people became an element which had to be taken into account in the conduct of diplomacy. Unfortunately, balance-of-power politics continued to prevail. During the second half of the nineteenth century the German Empire was reborn, thanks to a subtle game which Bismarck played both with Austria-Hungary in 1866 (the Seven Weeks' War) and with France (the war of 1870). It became necessary once more to establish a power balance; it was set up to the detriment of Russia, France, Austria-Hungary, and, especially, of "the Sick Man of Europe," an epithet applied to the Ottoman Empire. For the first time, Turkey, a non-Christian power, was allowed to participate in the "concert of Europe." Discontented with the Treaty of San Stefano which had put an end to the Russo-Turkish war, Bismarck, with the aim of robbing Russia of the fruits of victory, invited the Sublime Porte to participate in the Berlin Congress of 1878.

The Berlin Congress inaugurated a new stage with reference to the political equilibrium of Europe. It stimulated France and England to follow a path of colonial expansion in Africa as well as in Asia. The goal of the campaigns of "conquest" and "pacification" was to create markets and outlets and, as a means to this end, to reinforce political influence by military occupation of the overseas territories now transformed into protectorates or into colonies pure and simple. The allocation was often unsatisfactory in the eyes of the partners and created dissensions among them which succeeded in threatening the security of Europe. In this manner rivalry set France against England in connection with Egypt and North Africa; it was resolved by the compromise hidden in the Entente Cordiale of 1904. Similarly, the Franco-German quarrel on the subject of Morocco was terminated as a result of the Conference of Algeiras.

All these quarrels revealed a lust for power and a struggle for markets characterized by a refusal to grant to weak powers the attributes of state sovereignty and by a complete scorn for the aspirations of colonial peoples.

The United States

In the nineteenth century, the United States of America took no active part in European affairs. Guided by the Monroe Doctrine, it engaged in building up its economy and consolidating its power by limiting its political activity to the sphere of the New World. It was the first to proclaim the necessity of applying the principle of nonintervention. Moved by this ideal, Wilson proclaimed, after America's entry into the war in 1917 on the side of the Allies, his Fourteen Points that stressed the free exercise by a people of the right of self-determination. Unfortunately, Wilson's ideas, which appeared to be a harbinger of the League of Nations, were not put into practice.

The League of Nations

The League of Nations, created in 1919, was the forerunner of the United Nations Organization. It was, however, full of the defects which had stymied the concert of Europe. In fact, power politics continued to reign within the new organization. One large allied power, the United States of America, refused to participate in it. Another large European power, the Soviet Union, born out of the October Revolution of 1917—which also constitutes an important date in history—was not admitted until 1934.

The League of Nations was not in a position to prevent the avalanche of World War II. There is no need to dwell here on the causes that made it totter to its final ruin. It is enough to point out the advantages of the United Nations Organization compared to the League of Nations.

VIRTUES OF THE U.N. CHARTER

Three basic concepts mark, in our opinion, the superiority of the United Nations. These are its appeal for universality, the respect for the sovereignty of its members, and the outlawing of war.

The universality of the United Nations is first of all a result of the fact that two power blocs drew up its Charter: there were both capitalist and socialist countries at the San Francisco Conference. Agreement prevailed among them, a fact which proves that the coexistence of the two types of regime was possible.

Today one may divide the members of the United Nations into three distinct categories: countries with a capitalistic regime, countries that base their economy on socialism, and underdeveloped countries. The present Organization aims to embrace as many states as possible.

The concept of universality is also apparent in the number of matters submitted to the various organs of the United Nations for examination. Today no aspect of human activity escapes the notice of the Economic and Social Council. Specialized agencies are attached to this Council, and through them the Organization rallies the world in an attempt to make it an indivisible entity.

However, the intimate collaboration of the states cannot take place without a respect for their independence. That is why the Charter of the United Nations rests on the principle of the sovereign equality of all Member States, large or small. Power politics have disappeared, at least in the spirit of the Charter. The respect of sovereign equality means that there is no difference among the states; it means that nonintervention in their domestic affairs is the dominant rule. This rule is but a necessary corollary to the principle of coexistence. Each country has the right to have a political and social regime of its own choice; other countries do not have the right to attempt, by any subversive activity inside or outside another country, to overthrow the government of that country, regardless of how this government came into power.

In order to put these principles into practice, the Charter denounced war as a method of solving international conflicts and replaced it with collective security on a world-wide scale. The armed forces of the Member States may intervene only in case of "any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression" in accordance with Article 39. Consequently, it is impossible, according to the spirit of the Charter, to create alliances or power coalitions directed against other states under the pretext of a future or imminent danger.

These are the virtues found in the Charter of the United Nations. Of course, it has its defects as well. One of its most conspicuous faults is the insufficiency of the provisions concerning trusteeship and non-self-governing territories; the former are subject to control through the medium of the Trusteeship Council, but, as far as the latter are concerned, the Organization is satisfied with receiving information about them. The colonial powers seem to be jealous of their prerogatives and will not submit to taking orders. Moreover no time limit has been fixed as to when these countries may gain their autonomy or independence.

Salah el dine Tarazi, alternate representative of Syria to the United Nations and a member of the Sixth Committee of the General Assembly, has been a member of the Syrian Delegation since 1950. He is a professor on the Faculty of Law of the Syrian University and was in law practice in Damascus from 1940 to 1945. In 1948 he was first secretary of the Syrian Legation in Paris.

WARNING ON REVISION

However, in spite of the shortcomings that the Charter may contain, it is necessary, in the best interests of mankind and its needs, to undertake a revision only with the utmost prudence and skill. We must not risk ruination of what we have gained. The hour of world government has not yet struck. As long as inequality in fact exists among the states, it is imperative that they conserve their sovereignty intact and not lose it within the world Organization. To revise the Charter in the direction of suppressing sovereignty and creating organs exerting direct action on the states is simply to return to a policy of force and the balance of power.

Soviet Policy Toward Revision *

DURING the discussion on the inclusion in the agenda of the proposals on "preparatory work with regard to the possible holding of a general conference" to review the Charter, the delegation of the Soviet Union pointed out that those proposals were in no way technical or procedural, nor entirely unrelated to the revision of the Charter, as their advocates asserted.

In the course of the debate in the Sixth Committee, it was repeatedly demonstrated that the fact that this question had been raised at the present session of the General Assembly could not be dissociated from the campaign which is being waged against the fundamental principles of the Charter, and in particular against the principle of the unanimity of the great Powers, the corner-stone of the United Nations. The debate bore out the case put forward by the Soviet delegation during the discussion on the inclusion of these proposals in the agenda of the present session.

It was proved beyond all dispute that another purpose of this campaign was to exacerbate the cold war. The reactionary circles in the United States are trying, by means of this campaign, to divert the attention of public opinion in the United States and a number of other countries from the incontestable fact that the current serious crisis of the United Nations—now degraded to the role of an appendage of the North Atlantic bloc—is due not to the shortcomings of any of the provisions of the Charter, but to the fact that the fundamental provisions of the Charter have been disregarded and violated by a number of countries and particularly by the United States. It has thus become quite clear that the reason why the General Assembly is being asked to adopt a decision relating to "preparatory work with regard to the possible holding of a general conference" for the review of the Charter is that it desired to use the name of the United Nations to cover up and justify the great campaign against the fundamental principles of the Charter which is being conducted by the United States and certain other countries.

The preamble of the draft resolution adopted by the Sixth Committee, in particular, has that end in view. In this connexion, we believe it should be remembered that in the Sixth Committee sixteen delegations voted for the replacement of the preamble by another form of words containing no reference to "preparatory work with regard to the possible holding of a general conference" for the review of the Charter. As you know, the majority of the Sixth Committee rightly deleted from the operative part of the draft resolution an appeal to Member States of the United Nations to submit their views with regard to the possible review of the Charter; the operative part, in the form in which it was adopted by the Committee, now calls merely for the publication of certain documents connected with the San Francisco Conference and of a repertory of the practice of United Nations organs. We consider that the request to the Secretary-General, contained in sub-paragraph

* Text of statement by Mr. P. D. Morozov, delegate of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, before the United Nations General Assembly, eighth session, November 27, 1953. United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Eighth Session, 458th Plenary Meeting (A/PV. 458).

(c) of the operative part, to prepare a repertory of the practice of United Nations organs, imposes on him an obligation which it is not within his competence to fulfil; it entails the type of research which, by definition, cannot be effected without commenting in one way or another on decisions taken by the various organs of the United Nations.

For these reasons, the USSR delegation will vote against the preamble and against sub-paragraph (c) of the operative part of the draft resolution submitted by the Sixth Committee. If the preamble is adopted, my delegation will vote against the draft resolution as a whole.

The Soviet delegation wishes to emphasize that the tremendous value of the United Nations as an instrument of peace depends first and foremost on unswerving fidelity to the provisions of the Charter and, above all, on adherence to the principle of the unanimity of the permanent members of the Security Council. What is needed to extricate the United Nations from the serious crisis in which it finds itself is not a revision of the Charter, but the return of the Organization to the road which was marked out for it by the Charter. The entire work of the United Nations should be concentrated on the fulfilment of its essential task, which is to promote the solution of international problems and to prevent, with the co-operation of all its Members, any possibility of aggression by one State against another and, in particular, to prevent the outbreak of a new world war. In the present international situation, any proposals for the review of the Charter can result only in weakening and undermining the Organization and increasing international tension. For that reason we consider that delegations which are sincerely interested in the maintenance of international peace and security should unite their efforts to prevent the adoption of decisions capable of being exploited to the detriment of the United Nations.

* * *

A summary of the statement made by Mr. Morozov before the Sixth Committee of the General Assembly, November 2, 1953, follows: †

8. . . . The debates [in the Sixth Committee] had confirmed a primary truth: the international atmosphere was such that to raise the question of review was to risk providing the forces of aggression with weapons. The representatives of Poland, the Byelorussian SSR, the Ukrainian SSR and Czechoslovakia had demonstrated very clearly that the question before the Committee was linked to the campaign launched by the United States against the principles of the Charter, against the maintenance of peace. He fully shared that view.

9. In a statement made at a previous meeting, Mr. Byrnes had maintained that it was not the United States which was instigating the campaign for a review of the Charter. He had said nothing about the campaign being conducted in the United States under the influence of reactionary elements against the principles of the Charter, but he had wished to make the Committee believe that other countries had in fact started the campaign for revision. Moreover, Mr. Byrnes had contradicted himself repeatedly. He had said that the United States would vote for the calling of a General Conference for a review but later had said that the United States delegation did not yet know whether a review was possible or desirable. Those two statements were surely irreconcilable.

† United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Eighth Session, Sixth Committee, Summary Records of Meetings, 16 September to 28 November, 1953, pp. 93-94.

10. There was no doubt that the United States was anxious for a review of the Charter, for as early as 1948 the United States Senate had adopted a resolution calling for the abolition of the unanimity rule in the Security Council. Since then, on 28 July 1953, the Senate had authorized the establishment of a special sub-committee of the Committee on Foreign Relations, with large resources, to study proposals for amending the Charter. In a plenary meeting of the General Assembly early in the current session,¹ Mr. Dulles had stated that good use should be made of the opportunity to review the Charter.

11. He wondered what direction that review was to take. In a speech made at Boston on 26 August 1953, Mr. Dulles had stated that the unanimity rule in the Security Council no longer met the requirements of the present situation. That was the view generally held in reactionary circles, which wished the rule—the keystone of the United Nations—to be eliminated. The world was told that the inadequacies in the United Nations action were attributable to defects in the provisions of the Charter. However, the world was not told that the severe crisis through which the Organization was passing was to be explained only by the fact that the Charter had not been respected, particularly by the United States. The great people of China were deprived of their legitimate right to participate in the Organization's work. In many other respects the provisions of the Charter had been flouted.

12. Many delegations had said that the preparatory work should not serve as a pretext for encouraging hatred of certain States. Yet that was a real danger. Even though some delegations had endeavoured to confine the debate to procedure and to inject a moderate note, violent and vicious attacks had been made upon the principle of unanimity and, through that principle, upon certain States. He wondered what would happen if that discussion were to continue unabated for two years.

¹ See Official Records of the General Assembly, Eighth Session, Plenary Meetings, 434th meeting.

13. The speech of the representative of Panama (372nd meeting) was one example of that aggressive attitude. He had said that at San Francisco the principle of the equality of States had been disregarded for political reasons. According to him, as a result of the domination of the great Powers, the United Nations was inferior to the League of Nations. That was false and misleading. The League of Nations had demonstrated its impotence. The lessons of experience had been heeded. The Organization had been made more effective by the establishment of the fundamental principle of the unanimity of the permanent members of the Security Council. The representative of Panama had also claimed that the unanimity rule was contrary to the interests of the smaller Powers. Mr. Molotov had said, however, that the right of veto prevented the formation of aggressive blocs, was an obstacle to intrigue and, although not a panacea, was an effective tool for better co-operation in the interest of all the Powers, large and small.

14. The proceedings in the Committee illustrated the struggle between two schools of thought, one which desired international co-operation through the United Nations, the other which reflected a desire for world domination. The value of the United Nations depended on its effectiveness in maintaining peace. As the Committee had probably noted, the effectiveness of the Organization could be ensured through respect for the Charter and a sincere desire for co-operation; it was not necessary for that purpose to amend the fundamental provisions of the Charter. The Syrian and other representatives had rightly said that any attempt to alter the Charter might have disastrous effects on the very existence of the Organization.

15. For the reasons he had just explained he was opposed to any proposal for preparatory work in any form whatsoever which would be connected with the idea of a review of the Charter. . . .

United States Planning for Charter Review

By DAVID MCKENDREE KEY

PREPARATIONS by the United States for a possible conference to review the United Nations Charter are currently proceeding through three channels: the country's private organizations, the Senate subcommittee on this subject, and the Department of State. Secretary of State Dulles has urged citizens' groups throughout the nation to give serious study to the question so that the government may have the benefit of their thinking and a measure of public opinion. The Senate, in 1953, established a special Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter which, during 1954, under the chairmanship of Senator Wiley, has been holding public hearings in different parts of the country. This subcommittee is directed:

to make a full and complete study of proposals to amend, revise, or otherwise modify or change existing international peace and security organizations, for the purpose of guiding the Senate in the fulfillment of its responsibility . . . to advise the President with respect to the foreign policy of the United States, and particularly with reference to the policy of the United States at the General Conference of the United Nations for review of the Charter. . . .¹

In the Department of State, an increasing amount of time and attention is being devoted to the technical analyses and appraisals that must underlie eventual policy decisions concerning Charter review. The results of these separate efforts, taken in conjunction with the views of other friendly nations and with the world situation at the time the conference is held, will determine the United States position at such a conference.

PROCESS OF POLICY DETERMINATION

This government has made no commitments with respect to Charter review beyond indicating that it expects to favor the holding of a review conference when, under the Charter, this question comes before the tenth session of the General Assembly in the autumn of 1955. In their statements before the Senate subcommittee, Secretary Dulles and Ambassador Lodge have said that final policies in relation to Charter review will not be decided until the views of the American people and of the Congress have been ascertained.² These views are not likely to become crystallized before some time in 1955. The problems involved are complex and the range of reactions to them wide. Much study will be required if the conclusions ultimately reached are to be soundly based, and much discussion will be needed before the general consensus of the country can be discerned. The Senate subcommittee is not expected to report until February 1955.³

When these views have become crystallized, it will be the task of the administration to merge them with its own thinking on Charter review for the purpose of determining a United States position on the specific problems involved that will most accurately reflect our national objectives and most effectively further our national interests as they relate to the United Nations.

² Hearings before a Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Eighty-third Congress, second session, on Proposals to Amend or Otherwise Modify Existing International Peace and Security Organizations, including the United Nations, Part I, January 18 and March 3, 1954.

³ Senate Resolution 193, Eighty-third Congress, second session.

¹ Senate Resolution 126, Eighty-third Congress, first session.

At this stage, consultations with other friendly nations will be necessary before final decisions can be made. Charter review is essentially a political problem and must be considered in the context of existing relations among states and the demands of the world situation, from the standpoint not only of United States interests but also of the parallel interests of the rest of the free world. The United Nations is a voluntary association of sovereign states, which depends for implementation of its decisions on the free co-operation of its members. Care must therefore be taken at a review conference to avoid action that would jeopardize this co-operation, and to assure that the decisions reached will contribute to, rather than detract from, the free world's sense of common interest.

SUPPORT FOR A REVIEW CONFERENCE

In deciding to favor the holding of a review conference, the administration was responsive to public sentiment as reflected in the Senate resolution establishing the special subcommittee. It also took into account the fact that at San Francisco in 1945 many states had accepted Charter provisions to which they had strong objections on the understanding that there would be an opportunity to review these provisions at the end of ten years. The United States had indicated at San Francisco that it would support the holding of a review conference after ten years, and, as Secretary Dulles has pointed out, it would appear to be a matter of simple good faith on the part of this government not to reverse its position now. That a majority of United Nations members will still wish to hold a review conference when this question arises in 1955 appears likely from the discussion at the eighth General Assembly of certain procedural proposals looking toward Charter review.

Further, the administration thinks that a review conference can serve a useful purpose, despite the fact that under the Charter, the U.S.S.R., along with the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and China, has a veto over any proposed amendments. A careful reappraisal of the Charter against the background of ten years' experience should, at the least, serve to clarify that the failure of the United Nations entirely to fulfill the high hopes held for it in 1945 is primarily a matter of the performance of Member States, and particularly of the Soviet Union, in observing their Charter obligations. It should serve to bring about a greater understanding of the potentialities of the Charter and a greater realization of the development within its framework that has already taken place in order to meet a world situation that was not foreseen in 1945. Such a reappraisal could also serve to develop agreement on improved practices under the Charter as it now stands, which would strengthen the Organization immeasurably. Where amendment may seem desirable, the conference will make clear whether nations generally are prepared to go any further in their commitments than they were in 1945. In this connection, the possibility should not be entirely precluded that, should there be general agreement on the desirability of some change in the Charter, the U.S.S.R. might prove susceptible to the pressure of world opinion and refrain from exercising its veto, particularly if alternative methods of achieving the same end, but without amendment, have been developed.

The potential value of a review conference, therefore, appears to the administration to outweigh the two principal dangers in such a conference; namely, that its calling will arouse false hopes, which can only lead to later disillusionment, and that it will stimulate efforts to rewrite the Charter, which could destroy the United Nations in the present circumstances of international tension.

SCOPE OF REVIEW

President Eisenhower has said of the United Nations that "it still represents man's best organized hope to substitute the conference table for the battlefield" and has characterized it as a "sheer necessity."⁴ In his testimony before the Senate subcommittee, Secretary Dulles emphasized that "the Charter as it is can be made to serve well the cause of international peace and justice" and warned against pressing differences of opinion on how to strengthen the United Nations to a point where they undermined or disrupted the Organization.

There is in this country strong support for the United Nations. There is also some disillusionment. There are those who feel that the failure of the United Nations to fulfill all their hopes arises from the fact that it does not go far enough, and they advocate its transformation from a voluntary organization of sovereign states into some sort of superstate. At the other extreme are those who are basically skeptical of all world-wide efforts toward international co-operation, and they would like to see the United States withdraw from the organization. Still others would like to see the U.S.S.R. and its satellites expelled, and the United Nations turned into a closely knit military alliance. Some Americans have in mind specific amendments of a less far-reaching nature which they believe would enable the Organization to function more effectively, while others are averse even to considering changes in the Charter for fear that in the present world situation the end result will be a loss of ground.

⁴ Statement by the President on September 23, 1953, to the members of the U. S. Committee for United Nations Day, Department of State Bulletin, Vol. 29, no. 745 (October 5, 1953), p. 457.

In the view of the Department of State, proposals along the lines of the first three do not fall within the proper scope of Charter review, since the purpose of such review is to strengthen the existing Organization—not to destroy it or to change completely its character. To try to write a completely new Charter would, in the words of Secretary Dulles, be to "open a Pandora's box," and the chances of bringing together in a new organization anything approaching the present membership of the United Nations would not be good.

It is therefore with the thinking of the fourth group mentioned above that the Department of State is primarily concerned in its studies preparatory to Charter review, since it does not support the view that it is too dangerous even to consider amending the Charter.

PRINCIPAL ISSUES

No decision has yet been taken on what, if any, amendments to the Charter the United States should advocate. The past nine years' experience in the United Nations, however, points to certain major questions as likely to arise at any review conference.

Membership

One of these questions is the scope of United Nations membership. Should we move toward making that membership as nearly universal as possible, always remembering, of course, that there are some regimes whose complete disregard of accepted standards of international conduct is such that they cannot properly be brought into organized international life? The United Nations nine years ago was much more nearly universal than it is now. Since 1945, many new nations have come into being, and the ex-enemy states, excluded from original membership in the United Nations, are again becoming important members of the world community. There are now nineteen applicants for United Nations membership, fourteen of which would have been approved except for the Soviet veto. The other five—sponsored by the Soviet Union—have never received a majority vote, since it has not been thought that they meet the Charter qualifications for membership. This impasse with respect to new members has caused growing concern, and at a review conference two questions in this connection may be raised: (1) Does Article 4 of the Charter set forth the proper criteria for membership? (2) Should the veto on the admission of new members be eliminated? The Vandenberg resolution adopted by the United States Senate on June 11, 1948, recommended a voluntary agreement among the five permanent members of the Security Council to remove the veto in this regard.

The Security Council

The obvious inability of the Security Council in this sharply divided world fully to exercise its "primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security" raises the basic question whether there are any feasible Charter changes that would enable the Council more effectively to discharge this responsibility or whether we should rely, rather, on alternative arrangements. For example, could the Charter provisions for membership and voting in the Council be improved? Should the veto be removed from the pacific settlement of disputes under Chapter VI of the Charter? This also was recommended by the Vandenberg resolution. Carrying forward the line of development begun in 1950 with the "Uniting for Peace" resolution, should greater responsibility in the security field be assigned to the General Assembly, where there is no veto? Or in the present world situation should we leave primary responsibility for security to collective self-defense and regional organizations authorized by Articles 51 and 52 of the Charter?

Economic and social issues

The growing importance of the General Assembly in the security field, together with the increasing attention being given by the Assembly to economic and social problems and to "colonial" issues, suggests the question whether some type of weighted voting is needed in that organ, reflecting the capacity of members to assume economic and military responsibilities. Further, there is the question whether under these circumstances some reallocation of functions as between the Assembly and the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council is needed to enable the United Nations to function more effectively. The magnitude of the program in the economic and social field, as well as its importance in strengthening the free world, points also to a re-examination of the relationships between the United Nations itself and the specialized agencies to see whether any greater integration of the latter with the former would contribute to the efficient operation of this program.

There has been a growing tendency in the United Nations for states whose sympathies are aroused by conditions outside their own boundaries to bring these conditions to the attention of the Organization. This development has given rise to questions concerning the interpretation of Article 2 (7) of the Charter, which stipulates that the United Nations shall not intervene in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a state, and to grave apprehensions on the part of some members. It may be asked, therefore, whether Article 2, paragraph 7, adequately delimits the competence of the United Nations or whether a more precise line should be drawn between the common interests within the scope of the association and the individual interests that remain the exclusive concern of a Member State.

Regulation of armaments

While the question of regulation of armaments did not receive particular emphasis in the writing of the Charter, the awful destructiveness of atomic and nuclear weapons has since heavily underscored this problem. Much effort therefore has been and is being spent by the United Nations in seeking a solution to it. The lack of progress is directly attributable to Soviet policy, but the question still remains whether anything was omitted from the basic structure of the United Nations that if added now might assist our continuing effort to reach general agreement on a comprehensive program of safeguarded disarmament.

International law

There has also been little progress made toward the development of a real international law, generally accepted by the community of nations, to replace political considerations as the basis for decision by the United Nations. This raises the question whether the Charter provisions designed to encourage such a development are inadequate or whether the lack of progress is a matter of the disposition of Member States.

In the view of the Department of State, these are the major questions—as they have arisen out of our experience over the past nine years in the United Nations—that should be considered in connection with Charter review. It is therefore toward determining where the answers to them lie that the Department is currently directing its preparatory studies. Further consideration, and experience between now and any review conference, may either broaden or contract the list.

David McKendree Key, Washington, D. C., is Assistant Secretary of State for International Organization Affairs. He entered the Foreign Service in 1925 and thereafter held many posts of increasing responsibility in different parts of the world. He was United States Ambassador to Burma from 1950 to 1952, when he retired from the Foreign Service. He served as adviser on Far Eastern affairs to the United States Delegations to the sixth, seventh, and eighth sessions of the General Assembly (1951-54).

The Senate and the Review of the United Nations Charter

By ALEXANDER WILEY

TO illustrate the problems involved in the review of the United Nations Charter I have frequently used this example: "You can have a mechanically perfect automobile, the finest automobile in the world. Put it in the hands of bad drivers and it won't be a fine automobile for very long. You might not even have a car at all!"

This analogy seems to me to indicate the basic limitations of any review of the Charter. We can work to perfect the machinery of the United Nations and other international organizations to which we belong. We can even try to improve our own driving. We cannot, however, control the quality of all the driving; the steering wheel, for better or for worse, is shared by many nations.

It does not follow from the analogy, however, that a review of the Charter at this time is without value. To carry the example a little further, suppose the engine of the automobile is missing or is not delivering the amount of power the salesman said it would. Just because the driving has been bad is no reason why we should not raise the hood and try to find out whether or not we can tune up the engine. If this is done, a number of interested observers will soon gather around; some of these may be experts on engines and some will be wise, helpful laymen. They will analyze the difficulties and offer advice. People will almost certainly ask first whether there is any gas in the tank. There will be, in all probability, some extreme suggestions on what ought to be done, like junking the automobile or replacing the engine completely with a new one.

There will also be some moderate ideas on what is wrong with the carburetor or the valves, the spark plug and the radiator. Out of the wisdom of the observers, in short, may come some of the answers as to how the drivers, inadequate as they are, may still proceed on the road to decent, peaceful relations among the nations of the world.

SENATE RESPONSIBILITY FOR CHARTER REVIEW

Among the interested observers in any examination of the Charter of the United Nations is the Senate of the United States. The Senate has a dual constitutional responsibility in any conference that may be called to review the Charter.

In the first place, under our Constitution no amendments that may be proposed can become effective without the consent of the Senate. Under Article 109, paragraph 2, of the Charter:

Any alteration of the present Charter recommended by a two-thirds vote of the conference shall take effect when ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the Members of the United Nations including all permanent members of the Security Council.

The Senate of the United States has the additional function of "advice" in foreign relations, and this function may be brought into play in connection with the review of the Charter. That is, the Senate need not stand apart from the review conference and wait to see what may be produced in the way of amendments to the Charter. It may instead come in on the ground floor and suggest to the President what changes, if any, are believed desirable or acceptable.

THE SENATE AND U.N.

Full participation in this fashion would be in accord with the long-standing interest which the Senate has had in the United Nations. It is an interest which was first manifest in the Fulbright and Connally resolutions in 1943 and has persisted ever since that time.

In those resolutions, the President was advised, in effect, to co-operate with other countries in the creation of an international organization to keep world peace. Various senatorial groups subsequently assisted the executive branch in planning our national policy during the drafting of the Charter. At San Francisco, members of the Senate and the House made outstanding contributions as members of the American delegation. On July 28, 1945, the Senate consented to ratification of the Charter by a vote of 89 to 2.

Nor did the interest of the Senate wane after ratification. In the ensuing months, a considerable body of legislation was approved which made possible our effective participation in the United Nations and its various specialized agencies, and in each year since, the Senate has considered appropriations growing out of our membership in the organization.

The Senate has not always waited for the initiative in United Nations affairs to come from the executive branch. From time to time it has given specific guidance to the President on American policy in the United Nations as, for example, in the resolution adopted January 23, 1951, expressing the sentiment of the Senate that Communist China should not be represented in the organization.

The Senate has even taken the lead in seeking fundamental adjustments in the United Nations system. In the Vandenberg resolution, adopted June 11, 1948, the President was called upon to seek voluntary agreement to remove the veto from all questions involving pacific settlement of international disputes and situations, and from the admission of new members. In the same resolution, the Senate also encouraged the President to seek regional security arrangements for the defense of the United States and to press for the international control of armaments, within the framework of the Charter.

The Vandenberg resolution was adopted at a time when one of the fundamental premises of the United Nations Charter, unity of the permanent powers, had collapsed under the pressure of Communist aggression. It was an attempt by the Senate to bring about an adjustment in both United States policies and the United Nations system, in the light of the changes which had taken place in world politics.

Part of the Vandenberg resolution, those portions dealing with regional security, have already borne fruit in such arrangements as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and our security pacts in the Pacific area. These arrangements were designed to buttress the security of the United States and world peace at a time when it had become evident that the collective security provisions of the Charter would not prove as effective as originally expected. Other parts of the resolution have not been carried out, but they have become integral parts of our foreign policy. They represent objectives still being pursued by our government. In short, then, the effect of the Vandenberg resolution, even though only partially implemented, has been to strengthen the hand of the executive branch in matters involving the United Nations system. As a result of this resolution, two Presidents have been able to negotiate and to act with confidence, because they had before them certain visible boundaries of senatorial consent.

The Vandenberg resolution suggests the role which the Senate can play in a review of the Charter. It can advise the President as to whether it believes the United States should support the holding of a review conference and, if so, what changes if any he should seek to bring about in the Charter at such a conference. It can also use the occasion of a general review to examine the policies which are being pursued by this country in the United Nations and other international organizations and make recommendations thereon if such are deemed desirable.

PROBLEMS AND NEEDED FACTS

An old professor of mine many years ago taught me a very fundamental principle in the practice of law. He said: "Whenever you have a case first make sure you get the facts, all the facts; then look up the law." The same principle, it seems to me, applies in a review of the Charter. Members of the Senate must familiarize themselves fully with the facts involved in Charter review before they can hope to deal effectively with this difficult question.

The facts today are more extensive and more complicated than those which were involved in drawing up the Charter a decade ago. Major questions which were debated and discussed then are likely to arise again. In the first flush of peace at the end of World War II, it was easy to regard as settled matters which in reality were unsettled. Eight years of operating experience with the Charter has shown this to be the case. It has shown, too, that while parts of the Charter have worked effectively, other parts have worked badly, in ways not anticipated, or not at all.

It is likely that member countries, including the United States, will want to take a fresh look at many of the questions that were considered at San Francisco in 1945. Among these questions are those involving the impact of the United Nations on domestic jurisdiction, the problem of membership, the voting procedures in various organs, the respective functions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, trusteeship and non-self-governing territories, control of armaments, regional security arrangements within the United Nations system, and the status of the specialized agencies.

Such questions, complicated in themselves, will moreover have to be reviewed in the light of the collapse of a fundamental premise of the Charter—harmony among the five permanent powers. In 1945, a continuance of this harmony was assumed and written into the Charter. In 1954, however, there is a situation of world-wide tension produced primarily by forces of aggression emanating from the Communist states.

To this complication of the problem of review must be added one other. During eight years of operation the United Nations has evolved into an organization quite different from what was originally anticipated. This development has come about largely, though not exclusively, as a reaction to the intransigence of the Soviet Union. Whatever its causes, the development has produced changes and adjustments in the United Nations system which were not foreseen. It would be highly unrealistic, then, to review the Charter except in this larger setting.¹

¹ The Chief of Staff of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Francis O. Wilcox, has shown in a staff study prepared for the subcommittee the ways in which the U.N. has grown within the framework of the present Charter.

EDITOR'S NOTE. This study served as the basis for the opening article in this issue of THE ANNALS.

SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ESTABLISHED

In these complex circumstances how is the Senate to obtain the facts necessary for effective participation in the impending review? On July 28, 1953, it passed Senate Resolution 126, introduced by Senator Guy Gillette of Iowa, establishing a special Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter under the Foreign Relations Committee. The subcommittee consists of six members chosen from the Committee and two additional members selected from the Senate at large by the Vice-President.²

In setting up this subcommittee, the Senate provided itself with a special channel of information on the subject of Charter review. There are, of course, many other sources of information available to members of the Senate, such as the daily press and constituent correspondence, to note only two. The subcommittee, however, is an arm of the entire Senate and it acts as a kind of clearinghouse for relevant information on Charter review.

Under the terms of Senate Resolution 126, the Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter "is empowered and directed to make a full and complete study of proposals to amend, revise or otherwise modify or change existing international peace and security organizations."

The purpose of the study is clearly set forth in the resolution, namely, to assist the Senate in discharging its function of advising the President with respect to the foreign policy of the United States and particularly with reference to the policy of the United States at the General Conference of the United Nations for the review of the Charter to be held in accordance with article 109 of Chapter XVIII of the Charter.

² The subcommittee is bipartisan, with a present membership that includes Senators Ferguson, Knowland, Cooper, Holland, Sparkman, Gillette, and Mansfield, in addition to myself as chairman.

SUBCOMMITTEE FUNCTIONS

The subcommittee, as an agency of the Senate, is only one of many groups, official and unofficial, in this country and abroad that are participating in the general preparations for a review of the Charter. There is, so to speak, quite a crowd of interested observers gathered round examining the engine under the raised hood.

The Department of State, for example, is making a thorough study of the technical questions involved in review. Other foreign offices are undoubtedly doing the same. The United Nations General Assembly at its last session voted 52 to 5 to direct the Secretariat to undertake certain preliminary study in anticipation of a conference. Individual students, private organizations, and research foundations in considerable number are examining the question.

The very extensiveness of the preparations for the review suggests the limitations as well as the potentialities of the subcommittee. We have neither the intention nor the capacity to duplicate the efforts of all the other examiners of the Charter. On the contrary, we have drawn upon their work and will continue to draw upon it to the fullest possible extent. The job of the subcommittee is one of fact gathering from many sources, and it is also a job of fact digesting. What we are trying to do is to bring to the attention of the Senate the fullest possible amount of usable information on the subject of Charter review.

To do the job effectively requires that members of the subcommittee inform themselves fully on the general issues of Charter review. We must examine and weigh numerous analyses of the problems and proposals for dealing with them. We must seek information emanating from many sources and representing many points of view. We must study the issues and the possible alternatives for their solution in a framework of how best to protect the interests of the United States in a world at peace. We are expected, finally, to report to the Senate with respect to the Charter and the United Nations system so that the Senate will be better equipped to discharge its functions of "advice" in connection with the impending review conference.

SUBCOMMITTEE METHODS

The subcommittee has interpreted its directive under Senate Resolution 126 to include two principal fields of study. We are concerned, first, with issues arising out of the operation of the United Nations system under the Charter. We are also concerned with United States policies in the United Nations and related international agencies of which this country is a member. Criticisms, analyses, proposals, and suggestions which fall within these two categories are regarded as germane to the work of the subcommittee.

In carrying out its responsibilities under Senate Resolution 126, the subcommittee has used two methods that are commonly employed by congressional bodies of this kind. We have drawn upon the research facilities available to the legislative branch of the government, particularly the subcommittee staff and the Library of Congress. We have also used the device of the public hearing.

One of the first actions of the subcommittee was to collect basic documentation relative to Charter review. As published in Senate Document 87, the collection contains the international instruments related to the adoption of the Charter, a documentary history of United States legislation since 1943 which has helped to shape the course of our participation in the United Nations system, and an illustrative selection of official studies, acts, and statements dealing with some of the principal issues of Charter review.

As additional background for its study, the subcommittee has in process a series of staff studies, each analyzing a principal problem of review. At present, five of these analyses have been completed; they deal with the veto, the development of the Charter and the amending process, membership in the United Nations, representation and voting in the General Assembly, and peaceful settlement of disputes.³

The other principal device of the subcommittee, the public hearing, has already been employed eight times, and further use of it is contemplated. Early in 1954, the subcommittee received the testimony of the Secretary of State and the United States Ambassador to the United Nations.⁴ Both Mr. Dulles and Ambassador Lodge dealt with the problems of Charter review as seen from the perspective of the executive branch and helped the subcommittee thereby to delineate the scope of its own study.

³ The five studies referred to are Staff Study No. 1, The Problem of the Veto in the United Nations Security Council; Staff Study No. 2, How the United Nations Charter Has Developed; Staff Study No. 3, The Problems of Membership in the United Nations; Staff Study No. 4, Representation and Voting in the United Nations General Assembly; and Staff Study No. 5, Peaceful Settlement of Disputes in the United Nations. U. S. Senate, Committee on Foreign Relations, Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter, Committee Prints, 1954. Others dealing with collective security, the specialized agencies, trusteeship, human rights, and similar issues are in various stages of preparation.

⁴ U. S. Senate, Committee on Foreign Relations, Subcommittee on the United Nations, Hearings, Part 1, January 18 and March 3, 1954.

Grass-roots hearings

One of the most important actions of the subcommittee has been to invoke in a new setting the old device of the public hearing of interested citizens. Beginning in Akron, Ohio, on February 12, 1954, the subcommittee has met at intervals of several weeks in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Greensboro, North Carolina, Louisville, Kentucky, Des Moines, Iowa, and Minneapolis, Minnesota.

These "out of Washington" or "grass-roots" hearings, as they have sometimes been called, represent something of an innovation in the field of American foreign relations. Committees of Congress have frequently met in cities outside Washington to consider domestic issues. The present series, however, represents the first attempt to take a major question of foreign policy directly to the people of the United States for testimony and discussion.

The subcommittees has gone out into the country to obtain analyses, criticisms, and ideas with respect to United States policies on the Charter and the United Nations system. We have not been disappointed. Wherever the subcommittee has convened, the response of the local citizenry has been substantial, stimulating, and creative.

These hearings have not been lacking in qualities of humor which represent the essence of the wisdom of the American people. One witness in Akron, for example, commented: "As for the United States, our people as yet are not ready to substitute 'My world 'tis of thee' for 'My country 'tis of thee.' I couldn't sing that." And when questioned about the advisability of keeping the Soviet Union in the United Nations, he added: "I want her in. We can watch her better. If she gets out, you can't tell where she will ramble."

As many as fifty witnesses have sometimes been heard in a single day of testimony in these grass-roots hearings. The witnesses have been drawn from all walks of life, and their observations have served to enrich our understanding of the problems before us. The conduct of these hearings is not without difficulties. The United Nations is a subject which arouses strong and sometimes conflicting passions in the communities of the United States. However, by making every effort to keep the proceedings impartial and objective and to hear all points of view (so far the subcommittee has heard or received written statements from every person requesting an audience), it has been possible to reduce the heat to a minimum and increase the light to a maximum.

These hearings are not, of course, a public opinion poll on the popularity of the United Nations and are not intended to serve that purpose. They do, however, tap sources of wisdom throughout the country on the problems of Charter review, sources which otherwise might lie dormant. The data collected from these hearings will be weighed, together with other information obtained from research, official sources, and national organizations. This vast accumulation of raw materials should provide the basis for judgments by the subcommittee which will be rooted in the intelligence and understanding of the American people.

CONCLUDING COMMENTS

The work of the subcommittee on the United Nations Charter shows clearly that there is a widespread and informed interest in the United States in the question of Charter review. Few, if any, of the individuals and groups with whom we have come into contact in this work are seeking miracle solutions to the complex problems that arise from the fact that nations live together today in a shrunken world in which the threat of Communist aggression is ever present. For the most part they are deeply concerned with these problems and are looking for sensible, practical ways of meeting them.

The subcommittee shares this concern. We are examining along with others the mechanism under the hood of the United Nations system. It is highly important, in my opinion, that we do so. The security of the nation and the peace of the world are closely connected with this mechanism.

Alexander Wiley, LL.B., Washington, D. C., United States Senator from Wisconsin since 1938, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter, was a delegate to the seventh session of the United Nations General Assembly (1952). He has also served as American delegate at numerous international conferences. He is a member of the bar in Wisconsin and practiced law there for many years before his election to the Senate.

Book Department

	PAGE
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND WORLD GOVERNMENT	163
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY	169
ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY	178
SOCIOLOGY AND EDUCATION	185
PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION	193
SPECIAL TOPICS ABROAD	203
COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS	207
SLAVIC COUNTRIES	209
WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE	215
OTHER COUNTRIES	223
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR	224
OTHER BOOKS

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND WORLD GOVERNMENT

CLARK, GRENVILLE, and LOUIS B. SOHN.
Peace Through Disarmament and Charter Revision: Detailed Proposals for Revision of The United Nations Charter. viii, 149. Preliminary Print by the authors, Dublin, N.H., 1953. No Price.

Peace Through Disarmament and Charter Revision is the most judicious and explicit of the proposals to establish some form of world government as a guarantor of international peace and security. Advanced by two eminent lawyers in preliminary form as a basis for discussion and criticism prior to final publication in 1955, the work embodies a comprehensive textual revision of the United Nations Charter and a point-by-point commentary giving the rationale for the amendments proposed. It is therefore germane to the current public and governmental consideration of Charter review, in anticipation of the Tenth Session of the General Assembly when a decision must be reached whether or not to initiate the procedures of Charter amendment.

The authors have no doubt that the maintenance of genuine peace demands a "disarmed world governed by law," and that this in turn will require the acceptance of world political institutions endowed with supra-national authority. In contrast to some other proponents of world government, however, they believe that this transformation should and can be achieved through the established procedures for the revision of the United Nations Charter, and they assume the retention of the United Nations as the basic framework for world government. They anticipate furthermore the continuance of national states as important political units, but with representation in the United Nations weighted according to population and delegates free to vote as individuals unstructured by their governments.

The most significant distinction between the Clark-Sohn approach and previous plans for world government is the clear priority given to disarmament as an essential condition of world order. National disarmament—universal, enforceable by United Nations inspection and military forces, and complete in all arms down to the limited requirements of internal police—is held to be the prerequisite for world government, not its incidental by-product. In linking disarmament with the strengthening of United Nations authority, the one inescapably dependent on the other, the authors have struck a note of realism which has not been characteristic either of "revisionists" or of those who have extolled United Nations action in Korea and elsewhere as an effective practice of collective security. They cogently urge that the main features of a disarmament plan must be included in the Charter itself as "constitutional legislation" because, unless there is agreement in advance on this matter, there is no likelihood that any other Charter revisions will be accepted or indeed that any alternative arrangement could effectively provide for security. The futility of the eight years of disarmament negotiations which followed upon the failure at San Francisco to face the crucial necessity of taking decisive action then on the principles and machinery of disarmament bears out the position taken in the Proposals on this point.

How far this positive "realism" will convince those who make official policy decisions in the militarily potent states is questionable. The delusion that the key to security lies in massive national armament holds a strangely persistent power over the minds of men on both sides of the cold war, in spite of day-to-day demonstrations that weapons no longer serve as persuasive instruments either of physical defense or diplomatic strategy. Clark-Sohn nevertheless urge that theirs is a practical approach. They admit that adoption of Charter revision along the lines they suggest presupposes a general East-West political settlement. But they urge that their proposals for disarmament and for a monopoly of armed force in the United Nations, by providing assurance that the agreed terms will be enforced, will meet a basic condition for the negotiation of a general East-West settlement.

All else hinges on the validity of this expectation because the authors concede that the drastic reorganization of the United Nations they propose could hardly prove acceptable unless states—in the face of the danger of mutual annihilation if they pursued present security policies to their conclusion—were ready to think in realistic terms of how to get along together. Membership in the revised United Nations is to be universal and automatic for all states—and indissoluble. The General Assembly becomes the unicameral legislative body of the United Nations, with broad powers to enact binding laws relating to questions of armament and security, to settle disputes, to tax and borrow, and to define and provide for the punishment of offenses by individuals against the Charter. The Security Council is abolished and an executive council is made the executive arm of the General Assembly and responsible to it. The "veto" is abolished and decisions in the General Assembly are reached by a majority of the representatives, voting as individuals. A bill of rights would safeguard the individuals against the violation of basic rights by the United Nations or anyone acting under its own authority, but would not attempt to safeguard him against acts by his own national or local government.

PHILIP E. JACOB

University of Pennsylvania

WARNE, J. D. N.A.T.O. and Its Prospects. (The Army Quarterly Series.) Pp. vii, 110. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1954. $3.00.

As a member of General Gruenther's staff at Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe, Wing-Commander J. D. Warne of the Royal Airforce is highly competent to speak on the development of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and its prospects for the future. Like most British authors, he writes succinctly, confidently, and comprehensively, mellowed with intelligent qualifications to illustrate his mature reflections on the many imponderables involved. Whether he deals with the political structure and command organization of NATO, or with Soviet military power, with special reference to the Soviet build-up of strategic air power, Commander Warne speaks with authority and realism.

While advocating the development of NATO into a real political community, the author takes a dim view as to its possibility. He is convinced, however, that "habits of co-operative action" in various fields, taking place gradually under the pressure of day-to-day problems, may bring progress in this direction. He observes that one of the gravest problems has been the difficulty of ascertaining an equitable "burden-sharing" of military costs, which mounts in intensity because of the disparities in the national wealth of the NATO membership.

Paradoxically, this provocative little volume tells us more about Commander Warne as a political analyst than as a military strategist. One of its strangest omissions is its failure to expound upon the strategic military concept that undergirds this unique military alliance—whether NATO is designed to fight a "total war" or a possible "brush-fire war"; what type of defense, mobile or static, is to be employed; what kind of offensive or defensive weapons will be utilized.

As a politico-statesman, the author declares his central thesis as follows: "N.A.T.O. could perform a useful role in the development of Western policy. . . . It is perhaps time that the generals should remind the politicians that diplomacy is too important a matter to be left to chance." Lest perchance the politicians have neglected their responsibility for postulating a positive political objective and commensurate policies, Commander Warne unhesitatingly offers his conceptual framework: "Containment as a policy is, moreover, clearly not enough. A basis would, on the other hand, already seem to exist for superimposing a long-term policy upon short-term requirements for military security. A basic task for the West, however, is to think out what the long-term objective really should be vis-à-vis the East-West cleavage itself, rather than any single aspect of it. The greatest need, and perhaps the most likely to go by default, is for open minds."

Commander Warne's open-mindedness is revealed when he attempts to hypothesize on the crucial issue as to whether Soviet hostility to the West is based upon Russian traditional national interest or upon Communist ideology that views capitalism and Communism as incompatible. His personal ambivalence on this point does not, however, detract from the fact that it is heartening to find a military man deeply concerned about political objectives and political methods. Our own Chiefs of Staff could well emulate this author's example.

ALFRED J. HOTZ

Western Reserve University

WORMSER, RENÉ. The Myth of The Good and Bad Nations. Pp. ix, 180. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1954. $3.00.

Mr. Wormser would have done better to have stuck more closely to his title. It is true that others before him have criticized the popular idea that the world is divided into inherently good and inherently bad nations. Still, it is worth while to expose once more the fallacies of this mode of political thinking, and the grievous consequences which it has spawned.

Mr. Wormser, rushing headlong in his journalistic chariot, is not content with so restricted a course. He swerves back and forth over the whole field of "revisionist" doctrine with a momentary pause for a flashback survey of post-Renaissance European imperialism. The revisionist critique of twentieth-century United States history and historians can be sufficiently serious, but it is unconvincing when packed untidily into a short, derivative book that argues by simple declarative sentences rather than by evidence.

Mr. Wormser, like some other revisionists, is simplistic. He finds unjustified our interventions in World Wars I and II. He explains the first as the result of the machinations of bankers and President Wilson. The second he pretty well reduces to the scheming of President Roosevelt. Things just aren't that simple, especially if we keep in mind the problem of possible alternatives.

Rightly rejecting the starry-eyed view of Britain and France as permanently "good" nations that are always trustworthy friends and allies, it is hard for Mr. Wormser, in spite of his disclaimers, to resist the temptation merely to substitute Germany, Italy, and Japan on his moral pedestals. He would solve our present tribulations through an alliance resting primarily on these three. He does not explain to us on what grounds he thinks Italy, with its massive Communist controlled parties, would be a firmer ally against Moscow than Britain or even France. He does not observe that today it is Japan, not Washington, that is coy about Japanese rearmament. Nor does he seem to realize how a "pro-German" European policy, with the perspective of the return of the "lost colonies," might become the one factor that would consolidate Eastern Europe and Moscow.

JAMES BURNHAM

Kent, Connecticut

THORP, WILLARD L. Trade, Aid, or What? A Report Based Upon a Conference on International Economic Policy at the Merrill Center for Economics, Summer 1953. Pp. xv, 224. Homewood, Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1954. $4.50.

The title and subtitle accurately describe the genesis and nature of this book; it is a report based on eight weeks of discussions by experts of the topic "trade, aid, or what?" Nearly sixty men, recruited mainly from academic and government circles with a sprinkling of business men, contributed their ideas on commercial policy (that is, trade controls and tariffs), exchange rate policy (for example, fixed versus fluctuating exchange rates, problems of convertibility), or foreign investment policy (for example, role of foreign capital in the economic development, problems of increasing private and public foreign investment). The author, formerly Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, and now an economics professor at Amherst College, has not tried to present a consensus of opinion or even to summarize the areas of agreement or disagreement. He has instead attempted to outline the problems that were discussed and indicated the various considerations affecting each.

The result is a lucid and straightforward statement of a complex and difficult range of problems. Occasionally, the author expresses his own view of the directions in which a solution must be sought, but for the most part he confines himself to a thoughtful discussion of the ins and outs of the problems that come within his purview. Furthermore, this is done with only an infrequent reliance upon the special jargon of the professional economist. The result is a book that is recommended reading for every citizen who is interested in obtaining a better understanding of the international economic problems that give rise to the headlines in our daily newspapers.

IRVING B. KRAVIS

University of Pennsylvania

MIKESELL, RAYMOND F. Foreign Exchange in the Postwar World. Pp. xv, 658. New York: Twentieth Century Fund, 1954. $5.00.

Ever since the war of 1914-18 destroyed "a world payments system based upon sterling as the principal international medium and gold as the common regulator of national monetary systems," the "complexities and difficulties" of exchanging currencies across national boundaries have constituted a "most perplexing" economic problem, particularly so since the close of World War II. The subject has indeed been discussed in innumerable articles and official documents, but there has been no comprehensive investigation of it. Now Professor Raymond F. Mikesell fills the gap with the substantial volume under review. His study is the first detailed examination of trade and financial policies and practices, and currency and exchange controls as they have developed throughout the world in the postwar years. The author's remarkable enterprise merits the warmest praise, and the sustained lucidity of his writing will appeal to a wide audience of students and specialists.

Mikesell's work seeks 1) "to provide a better understanding of foreign exchange practices and policies since World War II" by bringing together information on the exchange control systems and international payments arrangements of more than seventy-five countries and evaluating the policies underlying the exchange practices as to their economic effect; 2) to formulate suggestions for dealing with disequilibrium and dollar shortage, the development of a code of fair exchange practices, and sterling convertibility, with the ultimate aim of attaining as high a degree of convertibility as possible among the currencies of the nations of the free world; and 3) to propose policies for the United States in dealing with this problem.

Because of limitation of space it is not possible to summarize or comment adequately on the many aspects of the book. The following will therefore be limited to some brief remarks on Mikesell's opinion on the urgent problem of convertibility. The central conclusion of Mikesell's study is "that trade discrimination and exchange restrictions on current transactions are not only economically harmful, but they are responsible for a misallocation of resources which the free world can ill afford if it is to defend itself against internal and external aggression." Therefore, the one way in which western nations can preserve their strength in the cold war is to reduce trade barriers and restore freely convertible currencies among themselves. In this program, the author maintains that "the assistance of the United States would be crucial to the success of any convertibility plan which is likely to succeed. Such assistance would include a liberalization of U. S. trade policies, a substantial stabilization loan to the United Kingdom, and eventually, an additional subscription to the Monetary Fund."

However, as Mikesell correctly emphasizes, for convertibility to succeed it must be "undertaken gradually and through the cooperative action of Britain and the leading Western European countries." "It must be achieved by concerted action of the leading countries of the free world to create a system of universal multilateral settlements." In this respect, the author is at variance with the International Monetary Fund's individual country approach to convertibility, but his views are supported by all public authorities in western Europe. Thus, to cite only two cases, the recently reported agreement of the West German and British governments on a European convertibility plan pointed out "that the problem would have to be approached collectively and not by individual governments" while the Nederlandsche Bank declares in its annual report for 1953 that "from the technical monetary point of view, our country can thus be regarded as standing on the threshold of convertibility. But this certainly does not mean that it could cross that threshold alone."

ARTHUR LEON HORNIKER

Washington, D. C.

JENKINS, SHIRLEY. American Economic Policy Toward the Philippines. Stanford University Press. Published Under the Auspices of the American Institute of Pacific Relations. Pp. viii, 181. $4.00.

The recent experience of the Philippines indicates clearly many of the difficulties faced by the newly independent states of the southeastern Asia region. The structure of every sovereign state must be underpinned by as stable an economy as possible, but, in this part of the world, the forces of history, geography and circumstance have generally fostered an economy which is relatively undiversified, relying for exports on handicrafts, foodstuffs and industrial raw materials of a narrowly limited variety. On the other hand, the thirst for the myriad products of modern industry has grown apace in every land. The consequence tends to be economic instability, exchange difficulty, and a publicly supported program of industrialization. Under such circumstances, political and economic tensions multiply alarmingly and demand for their solution a level of statesmanship which is not invariably to be found.

In this respect, the economic history and problems of the Philippines deserve more attention than they have received. Here is the one area in this part of the world which is blessed with the combination of good agricultural land, many natural resources, and extremely low population pressure. Nonetheless, the record of the last three decades illustrates the great difficulty of expediting industrial development in a land long given over to another way of life.

In a sense, the carefully documented analysis of Mrs. Jenkins points quite properly to the responsibility of the United States in failing to help the Filipinos plan more effectively for economic independence. It is true that American guidance was impaired by a lack of clear-cut understanding as to the political future of the archipelago, and, as well, by conflicting economic pressures at home. It is also true that no other colonial power has undertaken this kind of planning. Even so, the fact remains that the United States, throughout most of its half century of political relationship with the Philippines, gave more lip service than hard thinking to the implications of trusteeship.

Mrs. Jenkins has examined the economic record with great care and her account is lucid and well-balanced. Since economic policy issues in these days are seldom motivated solely by nonpolitical considerations, the political setting outlined in a lengthy introduction by Dr. Claude A. Buss is particularly helpful.

GRAYSON KIRK

Columbia University

MCNEILL, WILLIAM HARDY. America, Britain, and Russia: Their Co-operation and Conflict, 1941-1946. (Survey of International Affairs, 1939-1946.) Issued under the auspices of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Pp. xviii, 819. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $15.00.

This significant piece of contemporary history dealing with the most critical period of the twentieth century was written at Chatham House by a young history professor at the University of Chicago. It is the most weighty contribution yet made by an overseas author to the Survey series.

In conformity with the established arrangement scheme of the Survey volumes the author divides his work into parts, chapters, sections, subsections and subheads. The first and longest part of the book (pp. 1-375) is the history of the two-year period (December, 1941-December, 1943) of "co-operation to fight the war." Therein the author has carefully compressed nearly all the history of those two war years. Nothing of importance is omitted; nothing extraneous is included. It is a sweeping survey of facts and figures, of military, political and economic planning on global scale. This period might be called the romantic period of the grand alliance. Each partner took some pains, at least in appearance, not to offend the others, though this conventional etiquette was often discarded by the late American President in some of his dealings with the British Prime Minister, especially at the Teheran Conference. Part II (pp. 376-565) deals with the period between Teheran and Yalta (December, 1943-February, 1945). Here again Mr. McNeill is eminently successful in presenting a coherent and comprehensive narrative of the decisive fifteen-month period of the war during which most far-reaching and disastrous decisions were made. The division of Germany into occupation zones and the West's tacit acquiescence to the eventual loss of Eastern Europe and of the Balkans (except Greece) have their origin in this period. Part III (pp. 567-746) covers the period of "break-down of Allied co-operation" from February, 1945, to the end of 1946. Even though this period includes the birth of the United Nations, it is the period of disappointment and disenchantment, of frustration and failure. Part IV concludes with the author's "reflections and general observations" (pp. 747-68). There is also Appendix I listing major conferences and meetings, and Appendix II (pp. 772-89) on Lend Lease by Sir David Waley.

In this magnum opus Mr. McNeill has produced a thorough compendium of World War II, and therein lies its real value. As a contemporary history, however, the work is not without serious blemishes: it is seriously marred by the author's personal views. Towards the end he is clearly conscious of the fact that the high hopes of the West were shattered, but throughout his viewpoint is that no serious diplomatic mistakes were made by the leaders of the West, that most of the agreements arrived at on controversial issues were the result of mutual concessions, and if at times West's spokesmen conceded more to Stalin than what they hoped to receive, this was done partly for the sake of expediency and partly because they had no choice. Besides, "top-level negotiations were handled with extraordinary dispatch, even though it often happened that the concessions Stalin made were subsequently nullified by the failure of his subordinates to translate agreements into deeds" (p. 80). This seems to imply that Stalin worked under certain constitutional checks and balances. His acceptance of our proposed "compromise" on the veto question is considered, in all seriousness, a concession. His acquiescence to allow French representation on the Allied Control Commission in Germany is mentioned as another concession (p. 549).

In 1947 in his The Greek Dilemma Mr. McNeill did a good day's work and thereby earned deserved recognition. In the opinion of one reader this more important work does not measure up to the fine standard set in his earlier work. For a more balanced and realistic appraisal of events and forces during this period one must turn to Wilmot's The Struggle for Europe and General Deane's The Strange Alliance.

A. O. SARKISSIAN

Library of Congress

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY

BUCKLEY, WILLIAM F., JR., and L. BRENT BOZELL. McCarthy and His Enemies: The Record and Its Meaning. Pp. xviii, 413. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1954. $5.00.

With admirable forthrightness William Schlamm opens the Prologue by stating that Buckley and Bozell "have chosen to study and take sides in the most scandalous fracas of the century," so from the beginning the reader is warned that this report of the record is not without prejudice.

The book is remarkable for many reasons. Here is a presentation of an individual who, to quote Charles Murphy, "more than any other contemporary United States politician has made himself the excavator of political corpses, the rattler of skeletons, the resurrector of the past. Inevitably a man who works with such varied materials means many different things to the company that is for him."

Just what he means to these two young Yale graduates is never quite clear, because they never discuss McCarthy the man. Nowhere in this account do they give him any personality and background, any record of his own such as was published in the Milwaukee Journal some years ago. With the studied precision of tightrope walkers they restrict themselves to McCarthy's public utterances in connection with Communist infiltration of the Federal government.

In doing so they use a great many of the Wisconsin Senator's well-known techniques. The volume is a hodgepodge of footnotes and citations, liberally sprinkled with italics, and backed up with six lengthy appendices covering almost fifty pages—a fitting counterpart of the fistful of confidential papers, the photostats, and the bulging briefcase that have such an important place in McCarthy's panoply.

These young men have a great deal of ability, and they have done a prodigious amount of work. That they are bewitched by McCarthy is evident. That they have no great admiration for him seems also true. Time and again they concede he has played loosely with the truth, that he "hadn't a leg to stand on," or even that "some of his specific charges were exaggerated, a few had no apparent foundation whatever." Yet this was unimportant in their argument. The Committee, the Department, the opposition were wrong.

Like the Senator, they appear to ignore the fact that changing circumstances alter men's decisions, that hindsight is vastly more prevalent than foresight, and that attitudes once right and just may seem ludicrous or even horrible ten years hence.

Why was this book written? Is it a spontaneous eulogy of the ism not the man? Though its 400 pages seem tedious beyond all hope of being widely read, only the naive would be impressed by such academic pyrotechnics. Surely politically informed readers will sense beyond this verbose collection of irrelevancies the pertinent facts that are a rightful part of the record.

JOHN SPARKMAN

United States Senator from Alabama

HANDLIN, OSCAR, ARTHUR MEIER SCHLESINGER, SAMUEL ELIOT MORISON, FREDERICK MERK, ARTHUR MEIER SCHLESINGER, JR., and PAUL HERMAN BUCK. Harvard Guide to American History. Pp. xxiv, 689. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1954. $10.00.

Let it be said at the outset that here is a worthy successor to Channing, Hart, and Turner's Guide to the Study and Reading of American History, first published in 1896 and revised in 1912. Like the older work, it is designed to serve as a teaching instrument and a bibliography, and, as such, it deals critically and analytically with the methods and materials of historical research, and provides, as well, valuable and detailed topical references within a chronological framework. Much that is covered treats of American cultural and intellectual developments, so that this is very definitely a work broad in conception, and, as it turns out, remarkably complete in execution. Like the old Guide it now supplants, and a brief Harvard Reading List in American History that appeared in 1949, it is destined to have a decided influence in its field and should prove a major stimulus to scholarly endeavor.

The greater part of the volume consists of reading lists, beginning with the prehistory of the continent and going down to 1952. Each topic is informatively outlined, and recommended general and special references, sources, and bibliographical aids are noted. In many instances, specific chapter citations are listed, and scholarly journals and state publications have been intelligently culled for pertinent articles and documents. There is an exceedingly useful 142-page author, title, and subject index.

In comparing the contents of the Guide of 1912 with the present work, it is clear how considerable is the newer emphasis in the study of American history and civilization. In the Harvard Guide, for instance, we find sections devoted to graphic materials, sound recordings, mechanical devices for copying manuscripts, and even suggestions for financing research. The numerous special bibliographies and manuscripts surveys made available since the 1930's, and duly recorded here, have opened up a wealth of primary sources to the ambitious researcher. As for the products of scholarship, the publications of the university presses alone over the past few decades have enriched the literature of the subject tremendously and blazed new paths for fruitful investigation. From art and architecture to transportation and travel, examples may be cited of how full and reliable the reading lists are. Some eighty-four pages of bibliography are devoted to twentieth-century America, and the book and article references for the period 1941-1952 are commendably up-to-date. Not only has significant note been taken of all the new trends, but, in addition, much that was important in the old Guide has been retained.

As is inevitable in a work of this magnitude, there are some typographical slips and other errors (the full title, for example, of Channing, Hart, and Turner's Guide is incorrectly given in the very first paragraph of the preface). On the whole, however, this is a sound and painstaking job, a tribute to the enormous industry and erudition of the men who compiled it and an example of the high standards of the university which published it.

SIDNEY I. POMERANTZ

The City College, New York

DAVID, PAUL T., MALCOLM MOOS, and RALPH M. GOLDMAN (Eds.). Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952. Vol. I: The National Study; II: The Northeast; III: The South; IV: The Middle West; V: The West. Pp. xxii, 256; xi, 369; xi, 363; xi, 334; and xi, 298. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, May 10, 1954. $3.50 per vol. or $17.50 per set.

These five volumes contain the net product of the most notable research project ever undertaken by the American Political Science Association. As early as November, 1951 the Executive Director of the Association got a plan adopted to make a comprehensive study of the election of the delegations to the Republican and Democratic National nominating conventions and of their activities before and during the conventions as well as the proceedings of the conventions as they occurred.

In due time several hundred members of the Political Science Association got busy on the field work of gathering pertinent matter about the delegations in each state. Grants of funds enabled Paul T. David, director of the project, to assemble a staff of specialists who, in collaboration with other political scientists, observed first hand the work of the delegations at Chicago and the proceedings of the conventions. Then the staff, in close cooperation with the Brookings Institution, assembled the rather inchoate mass of data expressed in millions of words and began the arduous task of its organization, analysis, and interpretation and finally the writing of these volumes.

Only Volume I deals with the project as a whole. The others give the results of the field work by regions: The Northeast, The Middle West, The South, and The West. Here the case history of each delegation representing a state or territory can be found. Each of these regional volumes opens with a brief prefatory note giving key facts and a commentary followed by essays on the case findings of each state in the region, and each essay is concluded with a "review and appraisal."

Volume I, entitled "The National Story," is the most fascinating of the five. The foreword was written by Ralph Bunche, President of the American Political Science Association, who pronounced this "by far the most ambitious attempt undertaken to apply the case method to research in the field of politics." Paul T. David wrote the chapters entitled "The Presidential Nominating Process," "Procedures and Experience in the 48 States," "Basic Issues of Nominating Procedure" and "The Record and the Future" which closes the volume. Malcolm Moos wrote "The Pre-convention Campaigns of 1952" and "The Republican National Convention," while Ralph Goldman collaborated with the other two scholars in writing the chapter, "The Democratic National Convention."

One of the most astonishing revelations of this study is the wide range of variations in the political process from state to state. Here is something that should reduce the propensity of politicians and commentators to make easy generalizations. At long last speculation can be tempered at least by a body of factual data, scientifically analyzed and evaluated.

Most important of all, we suspect, is the pause this study should give to the tendency of those unfamiliar with the social process to brush aside the national convention as an outmoded and unworthy institution. The scholars who produced these volumes made no categorical judgments, but between the lines this reviewer thinks he can read the conclusion that no foreseeable substitute for the convention can provide the absolutely indispensable means of arriving at the party consensuses that the convention affords.

Here we can read: "A national primary would disregard the necessity for sectional, factional and group compromises that are the price of [party] union" while "the convention environment puts emphasis upon the process of compromise and adjustment through face to face negotiation. It brings representatives of every section and group together in one place, where they are required to think about the problems of the party from the national point of view."

These scholars have not said it, but out of the results of their labors there emerges this reader's convictions that the national nominating convention, growing naturally out of the folkways and mores of a politically gifted people, justifies its existence as an institution.

WILFRED E. BINKLEY

Ohio Northern University

CAMPBELL, ANGUS, GERALD GURIN, and WARREN E. MILLER. The Voter Decides. Pp. xiii, 242. Evanston, Illinois: Row, Peterson and Company, 1954. $4.25.

This unique study of a presidential election was made in 1952 by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan, supported by a grant from the Carnegie Corporation of New York. We have here, as V. O. Key, Jr., says in his foreword to the volume, "the most impressive analysis yet made of a national election." In the past, the armchair generalizations of journalists about the meaning of an election have been just as valid as the off-the-cuff assertions of politicians. When, for instance, Ambassador Clare Booth Luce said, "The American people voted [in 1952] for a more dynamic and a more radical foreign policy," her declaration, though implausible, was on the evidence as good as the next one.

It is impossible in a brief review to mention all of the important findings of this study or to comment upon the scores of tables. It is notable, however, that the voters preferred the Democratic to the Republican party: "The Democratic party elicited more feeling, both of approval and of disapproval, than the Republican party, with a net of greater apparent popularity." Communism in government was an issue of such slight interest to voters as to be barely statistically reliable in the responses. "More people made unfavorable comments about Eisenhower than about Stevenson" (45% to 35%). Why, then, did Eisenhower win? He aroused more enthusiasm among Republican voters than Stevenson did among Democratic voters; he was far better known, and enough Democrats voted for Eisenhower to turn the tide: "Had these 1948 Democrats stayed with Stevenson in 1952, General Eisenhower would not have gone to the White House."

In spite of all the campaigning, "About one in every three adults felt that it would make no difference [to the country] which party won."

If studies such as this could be made of future congressional and presidential elections, preferably in such form that the statistics are comparable, we would be on our way to a better understanding of American political behavior; we could take more and more of the guesswork out of political analysis. At any rate, nobody who writes or speaks about the 1952 election should be taken seriously if he has not studied this book.

DAYTON D. MCKEAN
University of Colorado

ZELLER, BELLE (Ed.). American State Legislatures: Report of the Committee on American Legislatures. Pp. ix, 294. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company, 1954. $3.50.

Probably the best way to introduce comment on this report is to quote from the Preface. At the beginning of its study, the Committee established as objectives: (1) The collection of a body of factual data, to serve as a basis for recommendations; (2) the encouragement of the study of state legislative processes; (3) the stimulation of grants of funds by the legislatures to their own research agencies; (4) the enlisting of the help of various organizations in promoting state legislative reforms; (5) the encouragement of the establishment of a "citizen's clearinghouse"; and (6) the stimulation of "broader research in the legislative process with the assistance of foundation and government funds."

The first objective has been met—here is the report with the recommendations. One might say that the second objective bids fair to be realized. As for the rest of them, only time will tell if any one is "encouraged" or "stimulated." Actually there is a "citizenship clearing house" already in existence: it has different aims. However, if the 1313 group is regarded as a center for administrative research and integration, the Citizenship Clearing House, now located in New York City, could become a center for political (policy) study and encouragement. It is my own view that there should be close cooperation between those studying the political party system in the United States and those who have taken policy formation in legislatures as their province. We know that there are serious deficiencies in the party system which are closely involved in the entire legislative process. Dr. Zeller says, "The conclusion is clear that the state legislatures are poorly equipped to serve as policy-making agencies in mid-twentieth-century America."

Most of the data constituting the factual basis of the report is taken from the writings of political scientists and official documents emanating from state legislative councils and similar agencies. These sources have been supplemented by confidential questionnaires and the personal experiences of such Committee members as the late Professor Chamberlain and Dr. George B. Galloway, both of whom enjoyed many opportunities to study the legislative process at first hand.

All of those who have a genuine interest in state legislation (the politician, the enterprising citizen, the editor, the teacher, the student) will find much value in these rather economically summarized facts and opinions about legislatures. Obviously, in a book of less than 300 pages, none of these matters is exhaustively discussed. It is equally clear that a short review cannot find flaws in the presentation without doing injustice to the scholars who worked for four years gathering the information, consulting about it and reducing it to statements which they felt were valid.

Briefly, this book urges more "delegation" of legislation and devolution of authority. Sympathetic consideration is given to proportional representation, unicameralism, objective and automatic redistricting and reapportionment, annual sessions, and various procedural and organizational reforms. The most important recommendation is the general one that legislatures be made more powerful, be given more work to do, and adequate facilities and prestige. It is to be hoped that this report will be carefully studied. Dr. Zeller is to be congratulated for her part in this work. She will probably be happy if only some of the recommendations are adopted. Not all of them can be, but it is urgent that something be done soon about state legislatures.

ROY V. PEEL

University of Utah

BEALE, HOWARD K. (Ed.). Charles A. Beard: An Appraisal by Eric F. Goldman, and Others. Pp. xiii, 312. Lexington: The University of Kentucky Press, 1954. $4.50.

In an era when the philosophy and the methodology of historical writing were being thoroughly revised, Charles A. Beard was a leader of change. An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution was a turning point in historical thinking when it appeared in 1913, and The Rise of American Civilization, written with his wife Mary Ritter Beard in 1927, applied the same principle of economic interpretation to the entire American story. If Beard had written only these two books, his place would be secure as the master who had succeeded in adapting the principles of modern economics to political problems and, with this instrument, had rewritten American history. His method uses the techniques of Marx and Hegel without becoming involved in the doctrinaire programs of Communism, fascism, or other "foreign" ideology. His patriotism remains unchallenged while he destroys the false idealization of the American "fathers." Then in 1934, he wrote The Open Door at Home, a "trial philosophy of national interest," and the implications of his ideas as applied to foreign policy began to be felt. In 1939, two volumes of testimonial essays were projected in his honor. They were never published. Beard died in 1948.

This book, which is an appraisal (in the main, sympathetic) rather than a Festschrift in the ordinary sense, comes belatedly six years later. Instead of former students, its contributors are chiefly younger historians who have been influenced by the master, but reserve the right to be critical. Most are unhappy about Beard's isolationism of the later years, many take pains to emphasize the difference between his economic determinism and that of Marx. There is some inevitable overlapping in the discussions of various aspects of his thought and achievement. George R. Leighton finds himself in sympathy with perhaps the most generally controversial phase of the problem, Beard's foreign policy and the attack on Roosevelt; Merle Curti offers a gracious analysis of his historical criticism as revealed by his many reviews, and the editor of the volume, Howard K. Beale, gives a careful appraisal of his achievement as a historian.

But for the reader who wishes a fair and summary estimate of Beard's final place in history, Richard Hofstadter's "Charles Beard and the Constitution" is best. As the book on the Constitution is the key to Beard's thinking, this "placing of the ideas of the volume in their historical context" unlocks the larger problem.

Among other contributors are Harold J. Laski, Max Lerner, George Soule, and George S. Counts. A bibliography is supplied, but the book lacks an index.

ROBERT E. SPILLER

University of Pennsylvania

BUDENZ, LOUIS F. The Techniques of Communism. Pp. ix, 342. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1954. $5.00.

At long last we have a basic textbook on the theory and practice of Soviet Communism by one who knows what he is talking about. Louis Budenz's new book is must reading for all those who profess to know anything about Communism. It should prove invaluable in courses on Communism not only in schools and colleges, but also in community study groups.

There has never appeared such a superb analysis of Communist techniques, from both the theoretical and practical point of view, particularly as they apply to the United States. It is incumbent on political scientists who have been critical of congressional investigations of subversion to read this book with an open mind.

A few of Budenz's more striking observations deserve quotation: "It is precisely the ability of a small group, the vanguard, moving in a strictly disciplined manner and under concealment, into non-Communist organizations, that makes Communist activity so effective." "Every move by the United States in the international scene which is based on appeasement containment, or accommodation... is therefore futile." "It has been the disbelief that anyone rich or educated could be Communist-minded, which has caused such havoc in American thinking." "The constant reiteration of 'civil liberties' is a ready made device to gather the largest support against any effort to curb the conspiracy." "The Red functionary or member never reads a Communist article merely to get information. He always looks for the order that is given by it." "The strength of the Red press... lies in... prevail(ing) upon non-Communist organizations to speak out for the Kremlin's position at any given time." This latter statement is documented in the cases of the Korean truce, attacks on Rhee and Chiang, and attacks on committees investigating subversion.

Of especial concern to thinking Americans is Budenz's statement that "the Soviet fifth column in this country has not made as much headway among the working people as among industrialists, educators, and other professional groups." The author's presentation of quite a few case histories documents the charge. He indicates that a little house cleaning is in order for the double standard academicians who stoutly opposed fascism but today insist on accommodating Communism.

The most important single quotation in the book is especially good food for thought as of the moment: "It is the records of pro-Communists in education, government, or other agencies which should be primarily considered, and not whether technically they can be proved to be Communists. If those records reveal a consistent aid to Soviet Russia, its fifth column here, and its fronts, then these individuals are enemies of the United States and should be recognized as such."

ANTHONY T. BOUSCAREN

Marquette University

BLUM, JOHN MORTON. The Republican Roosevelt. Pp. viii, 170. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $3.50.

Having completed his monumental work as one of the editors of the eight-volume Letters of Theodore Roosevelt, Mr. Blum has endeavored to distill his findings and thought concerning the role of Theodore Roosevelt in the American political tradition. The result, The Republican Roosevelt, is neither a biography nor a complete account of Roosevelt's public career; it is instead, as the author explains, "an interpretation of the purposes and methods of that career."

Such a study has long been badly needed. Under the impact of The Letters of Theodore Roosevelt, historians have begun to examine their old glib assumptions and to see Theodore Roosevelt as one of the most important as well as one of the most fascinating individuals in American history since the 1890's. Mr. Blum's discerning book is such a literary tour de force and achieves its objectives so successfully that it will at once give impetus to the campaign to re-evaluate Roosevelt and take high rank in the literature of recent American history. It is all the more important, therefore, that we assess the author's accomplishments and note the limitations of his work.

In general, Mr. Blum has painted the whole Roosevelt—the man of extraordinary personal warmth and political wisdom as well as the impulsive adolescent so vividly depicted by earlier biographers. But the author has chosen to emphasize two important and usually neglected aspects of Roosevelt's career and contribution—his virtuosity as a political leader and the conservatism that underlay his theory and practice of government.

Mr. Blum proves beyond cavil that Roosevelt the politician was shrewd, resourceful, and before 1912 successful—in fact, that he ranks with his cousin and nephew-in-law among the great politicians in American history. There was the way in which he used the patronage and personal influence to gain control of the G. O. P. and name his successor, for example, or the way in which he maneuvered to obtain passage in 1906 of the Hepburn railroad measure, in spite of the opposition of powerful interests that heretofore had controlled the party.

In evaluating Roosevelt's basic conservatism—his distrust of violent solutions, his sense of continuity, and his obsession for controlled change as an alternative to revolution, Mr. Blum has made a second important contribution. This reviewer would suggest, however, that he has ridden this theme so hard as to obscure another and equally important Roosevelt—the man who grew in political thought and became a prime, if not the most important, public champion of the modern progressive doctrines that culminated in the New Deal and Fair Deal legislation of our own time.

Mr. Blum does not ignore, but he does fail to give sufficient weight to this contribution. Moreover, he does not sufficiently emphasize the impact on American political practice of Roosevelt's other great contributions—his emphasis upon leadership and efficient administration. In brief, this reviewer would suggest that Roosevelt's contribution was considerably more important than Mr. Blum has indicated.

Mr. Blum's final chapter shows Roosevelt out of power from 1909 to his death in 1919. It is a sort of case study in failure and frustration, and the story that the author tells is not a happy one. Everything that he says is true, but again he overlooks the contribution that Roosevelt made to Wilsonian reform and to the movement to prepare America to play a leading role in world affairs.

However, these are minor criticisms. We must be grateful to Mr. Blum for giving us one of the liveliest, best-written, and most thoughtful books in American history during the year.

ARTHUR S. LINK

Northwestern University

LEOPOLD, RICHARD W. Elihu Root and the Conservative Tradition. Pp. x, 222. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1954. $3.00.

This is a dispassionate account of a dispassionate man. The author is Professor of History at Northwestern University. The volume is one of the Library of American Biography series, which aims to portray each subject "as neither the maker nor the product of his times, but instead seeing each as a force reacting on the other."

It is in this context in which Elihu Root's long and selfless career is treated, thus furnishing a different type of contribution than Professor Philip C. Jessup accomplished in his superb two-volume biography. The author achieves objectivity and readability in weaving his way through the many turbulent issues and events with which Root was intimately associated and on which he left his imprint. The book is well organized and contains a good discussion of the many sources used.

Professor Leopold correctly writes off the first fifty-four years of Root's life as of "minor importance," and measures his contributions from the time he joined McKinley's cabinet as Secretary of War in 1899. One might question the very high rating which the author accords to Root for smoothing out the administration of an efficient colonial system at the turn of the century. The author indicates that for this work Root "receives some credit but little glory." Due credit is given to Root for his pioneer work in creating the General Staff and firmly reasserting civilian supremacy. The author throws fresh light on a little-known aspect of Root's career—his tireless work to strengthen the frayed bonds of friendship with Latin America, for which Root deserves to be remembered as an outstanding precursor of the Good Neighbor policy. Wilsonians may quarrel with the author's sympathetic analysis of Root's conduct during the Great Debate over the League of Nations. Most observers would agree with the author on Root's contributions to international arbitration and his influence in making this country aware of its stake in Europe and Asia.

Some of the most interesting parts of the book deal with the development and application of Root's conservatism. The author concludes: "As the unending battle between liberalism and conservatism surges into the future, the cause of the latter could benefit from a little more daring, imagination, and faith in the people than Root was able to contribute; but it can never do without his integrity and fair-mindedness, his intelligence and good humor, his intuitive judgment and mastery of the facts, his respect for efficient administration and insistence upon balancing power with responsibility."

There is only one significant omission in this book. The author claims that "this book is designed to acquaint the general reader with the significance of Root's public service and its meaning for today." The conservative tradition today has become tarnished by its pussyfooting approach to McCarthyism, an approach fostered and encouraged by the leading conservative of this generation, the late Senator Taft. It is unfortunate that American conservatism in 1954 does not have an Elihu Root to lead the battle for the traditional liberties which are being trampled.

KENNETH W. HECHLER
Washington, D. C.

EATON, CLEMENT. A History of the Southern Confederacy. Pp. xi, 351. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $5.50.

American historical literature has long and conspicuously lacked a balanced one-volume history of the Southern Confederacy. The military record, to be sure, had been treated in detail by a number of writers; but the civilian record awaited basic research. By 1950, this research had been done, and E. Merton Coulter was thus able to achieve the first full-scale history of the home front, but he sacrificed overall coverage by crowding the military narrative into a single chapter.

Clement Eaton's study may be described, therefore, as the first concise general history based upon modern research. In such a book, proportion, fairness, and thoroughness are especially to be desired, and Professor Eaton displays all three qualities. He presents many topics in very limited compass, but with judicious inclusion of essential information and with the kind of basic explanation that the hopeful reader does not always find in closely-digested accounts. The character sketches of the chief military leaders perhaps suffer somewhat by their brevity, but in general the book gains by its conciseness.

The author has also maintained a discriminating impartiality in his treatment of controversial questions both between North and South and within the Confederacy. For instance, he holds that southerners were justified in fearing that, in ultimate terms, the North threatened their way of life, but he also believes that Lincoln's purpose in sending the Sumter expedition was not aggressive. Or, with reference to Jefferson Davis, he recognizes the confederate President's many defects but points out that "his greatest service . . . was his selection of superior officers from the very beginning."

Most writers, when undertaking to distill and integrate a large body of monographic and periodical material, would feel no responsibility to add research of their own, but Professor Eaton has used manuscript sources very effectively—especially the highly-illuminating papers of Katherine Ann Edmondston and Robert Keen. He has combined this new material with his printed material so well that any criticism is, perhaps, captious. I, personally, wish that he had recognized the value of Clifford Dowdley's Experiment in Rebellion and that he had emphasized more the division between the upper South and the lower South just before Sumter. Various readers will perhaps wish for changes of emphasis at various points. This is inevitable. But no one is likely to question the sound craftsmanship, the admirable conciseness, and the justice, both in matters of proportion and in matters of treatment, of this valuable history.

DAVID M. POTTER
Yale University

HYMAN, HAROLD MELVIN. Era of the Oath: Northern Loyalty Tests During the Civil War and Reconstruction. Pp.

xiv, 229. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1954. $5.00.

The title of this book was suggested by an address delivered by Alan Barth to the American Association of University Professors. Mr. Barth hazarded the guess that historians of the future would refer to our troubled and suspicious times as "the era of the oath." Professor Hyman believes, with much justification, that the same phrase can be applied with equal accuracy to the Civil War and Reconstruction periods.

This work, a doctoral dissertation at Columbia, is another of the books appearing in the last few years that have dealt with relatively unexplored research fields in Civil War and Reconstruction history: medicine, ordnance, and legal and constitutional developments. The gaps in our knowledge of these areas are slowly being closed by the efforts of people like Mr. Hyman. His book is a welcome companion piece to J. T. Dorris' recent volume on pardon and amnesty. Together they provide a new and authoritative account of the constitutional aspects of the Civil War and its aftermath.

In the years of which Professor Hyman writes, and apparently also in our years, the dividing line between loyalty and disloyalty was vague and was often confused with the line between conflicting political opinions. That is, an unpopular opinion was sometimes defined as disloyalty. The great difficulty was, as the author shows in his descriptions of test oaths being administered to civil servants, military personnel, jurors, lawyers, and a host of others, that nobody knew how to define loyalty and nobody knew how to frame an oath that would measure loyalty. Most of the oaths of the period and especially the famous ironclad oath, to which Mr. Hyman rightly devotes most of his attention, required that the swearer not only promise good conduct in the future but pledge that he had done nothing wrong in the past.

The motive back of the wartime oaths was legitimate enough, but in the Reconstruction period they were used frankly by the Republicans for partisan purposes. It is the author's conclusion that the oaths failed to identify the disloyal and might as well never have been created.

Professor Hyman has written a sound book based upon solid research. For this he deserves commendation. The general excellence of the work is marred by careless proofreading and by fuzzy identifications of the characters. As examples of the latter, on page 125 a mysterious "Sheridan" is quoted. Only by turning to the notes in the book can the reader learn this is General Philip Sheridan. On page 145 Samuel S. Cox is introduced as the leading opponent of test oaths. Four pages later he is introduced again at greater length and rises to the dignity of Samuel Sullivan Cox.

T. HARRY WILLIAMS

Louisiana State University

CATTON, BRUCE. U. S. Grant and the American Military Tradition. Pp. x, 201. Boston: Little Brown & Company, 1954. $3.00.

Even the notable success of Mr. Catton's trilogy on the Army of the Potomac will hardly have prepared his readers for this superb little volume in which the triumphs and failures of Grant's career are presented not only as a means to understand the man and his profession, but as clues to the inner secrets of the American character. A soldier against his will, Grant was able to achieve success only in two wars which he believed should never have occurred. But, contrary to the popular impression, he was an intelligent and articulate commander, a master of speed and finesse who had learned his trade soundly. From the Mexican War he obtained a grounding in logistics. In the first year of the Civil War he completed his education. He learned not to overestimate the enemy, McClellan's besetting sin; and, at Shiloh, not to underestimate him, a shortcoming that much later ended the military career of our most spectacular recent commander.

But military experience not only failed to qualify Grant for the presidency, it served actively to disqualify him. Handicapped by the professional soldier's awe of Congress, of men of wealth, and by the habit acquired in wartime of accepting presents from grateful civilians (starting with the cigars to which a reporter at Donelson had erroneously declared him to be addicted), he not only failed but to a degree was disgraced. Only at the end with bankruptcy and inoperable cancer in his path did he rally for one last heroic victory before the dark closed in. Keeping himself painfully alive by an exercise of will he wrote the Personal Memoirs that left a fortune to his family and rehabilitated his reputation.

In this first volume to appear of the new Library of American Biography edited by Professor Oscar Handlin of Harvard, Mr. Catton proves beyond question his competence to complete the definitive biography of Grant begun by the late Lloyd Lewis. In his preface Mr. Handlin calls attention to present day parallels.

WOOD GRAY

George Washington University

ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY

ROOSE, KENNETH D. The Economics of Recession and Revival: An Interpretation of 1937-38. (Yale Studies in Economics, Vol. 2.) Pp. xi, 280. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1954. Price $4.00.

Dr. Roose has made a careful study of the short but sharp depression of 1937-38 which interrupted so alarmingly the recovery of the thirties. He uses mainly the tools of national income analysis, interpreting the movement of national income in terms of its three major components: household consumption, private investment, and government expenditure. His main conclusion is that the government and investment sectors, rather than the consumption sector, were responsible for the decline. The decline in the government contribution was associated directly with the rise in government cash receipts as a result of the introduction of social security and the consequent reduction of the cash deficit to zero. The decline in investment is associated with a decline in profits, and is further attributed to various unfavorable factors such as a rise in costs, the hostility of government to business, the undistributed profits tax, and the trauma produced by the recent Great Depression.

There is an extensive discussion of the various theories and opinions which have been put forward concerning the episode, which points towards a certain lack of unanimity among professional opinion. The evidence which the author presents in support of his main thesis, though not conclusive, is certainly impressive, and his general point of view that depressions are not to be regarded as part of a regular cyclical phenomenon, but that each depression is in an important sense unique and must be analyzed with the tools of national income analysis, is one with which the reviewer has much sympathy.

It is in a study of this sort, however, that the weaknesses as well as the strengths of national income analysis emerge. The principal weakness seems to be the absence of any adequate over-all view of the causes of distributional shifts. In particular, the absence of any adequate explanation of the decline in profits in 1936-37 is a marked defect of the study—a defect, however, which reflects the present state of received economic theory. To attribute the fall in profits to a rise in costs, as Dr. Roose seems to do, surely merely states the problem in other words.

The style of the work betrays its origin in a Doctor of Philosophy thesis. One sometimes wonders if the main function of a doctoral committee is not to remove any trace of humor, lightness, or interest from the work. The presentation of the data is not always done in a way that makes it easy for the reader. Nevertheless, a great deal of interesting material has been collected, and one hopes that Dr. Roose's interest in this area will inspire him to continue a similar type of analysis for other depressions because the value of this type of study grows by the availability of comparisons.

K. E. BOULDING

Ann Arbor, Michigan

GROSS, BERTRAM, and WILFRED LUMER. The Hard Money Crusade. Pp. xiv, 178. Washington: Public Affairs Institute, 1954. $2.00.

Here we have a throwback to the eighteenth-century tradition of pamphleteering in political economy. This little book combines the lively and sometimes vituperative style of campaign oratory with a scholarly treatment of a serious economic problem—the role of interest rates and credit restrictions in the control of inflationary booms.

Such attempts are to be encouraged, although this particular volume is less an outstanding success than a dive between two stools. It contains too much economics for Boobus Americanus, but the economics is not quite of specialist quality.

Hindsight makes it easy to argue that the Eisenhower Administration was wrong to inaugurate a "Hard Money Crusade" by tightening credit and raising interest rates in the Spring of 1953. (The Administration reversed its policy in the summer.) But when one looks at the figures for the fourth quarter of 1952—a sudden rise of $7.2 billion in consumption and another rise of $5.6 billion in private investment (seasonally adjusted annual rates)—it seems a pardonable error to have concluded that more inflation was in the offing, and to have acted on this conclusion.

But Gross and Lumer are not concerned with this mundane problem of timing and forecasting. Their thesis is the broader and bolder one that tight money should never, NEVER be imposed on an economy regardless of price movements, and that only wicked men on Wall Street can possibly think otherwise. An introduction, a foreword, and a preface (by Dr. Dewey Anderson, Rep. Wright Patman, and Prof. Seymour E. Harris) serve mainly to underline these points.

The supporting case is part of the orthodoxy of the Fair Deal, with which both the authors were associated for considerable periods. Its Point I is essentially this: Money, credit, and interest rates cannot be used in controlling inflation. In small doses they do no good, and in large doses they kill the patient by provoking depressions. There is nothing in between. Point II of the supporting case is essentially this: The aim of financial policy should be continuous full employment, and economic growth at the maximum possible rate, with prices controlled directly if they get out of hand.

A brief review is not the place to argue Point I, although I suspect that it implies a highly peculiar (discontinuous) relationship between interest rates and other economic variables. Point II is a matter of choice rather than of economic analysis. Gross and Lumer, however, either fail to see the full implications of their system or fail to be candid in presenting it. Under this system, the threat of unemployment and underproduction will no longer be effective in restraining the wage and price demands of organized labor and the farm bloc. The financial authorities are to guarantee full employment and production, whatever wages and farm prices may be. In such a case, the economy will require something like permanent price controls to prevent a runaway inflation. These controls will presumably operate largely to force the business group to pay wages and farm price increases out of profits, instead of passing them on to the consumer. We need not argue whether such a system is or is not "socialism," or whether the resulting income distribution would be more or less "equitable" than the present one. Our points are only that major institutional change is implied by Fair Deal monetary philosophy, and that it is less than completely frank to conceal the implication from the reading and voting public.

Academic discussions of the criteria of monetary policy usually omit bank profits as unclean and unworthy. They are a little like Victorian anatomy textbooks, with the reproductive system omitted. Bank profits can be an important factor in determining monetary policy, as economists with Treasury or Federal Reserve experience can testify. Gross and Lumer have done a service in stressing the financial community's interest in dear money, although they have gone to the opposite extreme (like an anatomy 99 44/100 per cent sexual) in ascribing the "Hard Money Crusade" to Wall Street and its Washington agent, Mr. Randolph Burgess. Students will also find the statistical appendices useful, especially where they assemble in one place data on money rates not easily obtainable elsewhere.

M. BRONFENBRENNER

University of Wisconsin

SUNDBORG, GEORGE. Hail Columbia: The Thirty-Year Struggle for Grand Coulee Dam. Pp. xvii, 476. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $5.75.

Between the covers the reader will find three fascinating and important stories.

First there is a detached recital of the myriad steps, some of them heart-rending, made inevitable by our democratic ways in building the world's most powerful power plant. With a capacity of two million kilowatts it is the biggest one-piece structure ever built by man. The crusade for this public improvement began with an idea, pure and simple, entertained by only a few unlettered but loyal souls who believed that the Columbia's mighty flood could and should be harnessed for the service of man. The vision of pouring these limitless waters through irrigation works over two million acres of fertile but thirsty land provided the boundless enthusiasm which put through a plan over a thirty-year period which any gambler would have rated as not better than one in a thousand.

Secondly, threading through the book, the author has given us a graphic and carefully annotated story illustrating the tragic part electric power politics plays in the life of our people. There is no other place where the details of the techniques used by the commercial electrical industry in seeking to have its own way, regardless of what may be the real public interest, have been so adequately described. The test for an electrical enterprise should be the efficiency with which the property is operated, not who owns it. But at times it seems as if a publicly owned system may be the only way by which we can escape private power company conniving and lobbying.

But thirdly, and by all odds the most unique feature of this book, is the moving delineation of the towering figure of James O'Sullivan, without whose indefatigable and wholly competent labors the project would have been neither started nor completed.

O'Sullivan was a model servant of the Republic. He had character to burn and an integrity always evident. He avoided being chummy with the opposition but always held their respect. He never let up, sought always to keep one step ahead of the opposition whatever it might be, and had no vestige of personal interest which had to be safeguarded. Without a formal engineering education he always seemed to turn up with unanswerable arguments. In these days of fabulous compensations for recent technical graduates, one stands in respectful awe of one who kept going with or without food and enduring privations of all manner of things which most humans consider essential. He won and kept the confidence of those he most cared about. The author wisely dedicates his book whatever their names and causes.

To

All Jim O'Sullivans

MORRIS LLEWELLYN COOKE
Philadelphia, Pa.

GOULDNER, ALVIN W. Patterns of Industrial Bureaucracy. Pp. 282. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1954. $4.50.

This case history in industrial sociology offers a satisfying balance between theory and concrete factual observations. The starting point is Weber's recognition that norms in a bureaucracy "may be established by agreement or imposition." Gouldner hypothesizes that differences in the source of rules, the values which legitimate them, and the status of those whose interests are affected by them lead to significant differences in the way the system operates.

Working with a team of students, Gouldner observed the operation of a gypsum mine and factory. (An appendix describes the field work procedures, among which a partially nondirective interview played a large part.) They found impressive differences between an earlier, indulgent, flexible administration, and the regime of the successor whose suspicion that men might be loafing led to efforts to tighten up and to check up. Gouldner explains why such efforts were inaugurated in the factory but not in the mine, where a stronger tradition of independence prevailed.

From the analysis emerge three types of bureaucracy:

(a) "Mock" Bureaucracy, in which rules are imposed upon the group by some "outside" power; neither management nor workers want these rules and they are not enforced. The "no-smoking" rule was of this type.

(b) "Representative" Bureaucracy, in which both management and workers want the rules; both see value in them; both cooperate in enforcing them. Some safety rules are of this type.

(c) "Punishment-centered" Bureaucracy, in which either management or workers initiate the rules while the other group does not recognize them as rational, necessary, or legitimate. One party enforces; the other evades. In this company, a system of open bidding for jobs higher up was forced on a reluctant management by the union.

Weber's concept of bureaucracy as based on recognition of the expert role accords with Gouldner's representative bureaucracy, although it is inadequately defined in terms of the expert only; his concept of authoritarian discipline in democracy arises from Gouldner's punishment-centered "type."

Bureaucratic measures do not arise, as some earlier writers have implied, simply for the welfare of the institution as a whole. Rules function to reduce certain tensions for certain people in one or another status. This more differentiated analysis is the significant step which Gouldner takes.

The book reads easily. Direct quotations keep the atmosphere of realism. The theoretical discussion is fairly simple. Undergraduates should have no trouble with it.

GOODWIN WATSON

Columbia University

HOYT, ELIZABETH E., MARGARET G. REID, JOSEPH L. MCCONNELL, and JANET M. HOOKS. American Income and Its Use. Pp. xxi, 362. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $4.00.

This volume is one of the series on "Ethics and Economic Life" sponsored by the Federal Council of Churches. This sponsorship helps to account for the very considerable space devoted to ethical aspects of consumption trends and differentials.

Part I, by Elizabeth E. Hoyt, treats various aspects of "The Ethics of Consumption." Part II, by Margaret G. Reid, deals with "Distribution of Income and Consumption" and presents the principal statistical materials in the book. Part III, "The Changing Family and Its Dependents," by Joseph L. McConnell and Janet M. Hooks, indicates the ways the changing size and kinship structure of the family affect consumption. Part IV consists of a "Conclusion" by Elizabeth E. Hoyt, and Part IV, which paradoxically follows the "conclusion," presents comments by Walter G. Muelder on "Ethical Aspects of Income Distribution and Consumption."

The book is primarily intended for the general reader, rather than for specialists in the economics of consumption, family sociology, or social stratification. Its usefulness to the specialists is likely to rest solely on the circumstance that it provides some bridges among these fields.

Aside from the obvious circumstance that a book by many hands will be uneven in style and somewhat inconsistent in point of view, one additional critical comment is in order. In virtually all of the textual and appendix tables relating to Part II, the author has failed to provide summary or total figures appropriate to the statistical universe that the tables describe in terms of various categories. This lack of tabular tidiness is not uniformly unfortunate, but occasionally does make the data difficult to interpret.

WILBERT E. MOORE

Princeton University

JONES, LAWRENCE A., and DAVID DURAND. Mortgage Lending Experience in Agriculture. Pp. xxii, 248. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1954. $5.00.

This study is the result of co-operation between the National Bureau of Economic Research and the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. It is a well documented readable account of mortgage lending experience for farms in the United States with emphasis on the period between World Wars I and II, although the introduction briefly summarizes appropriate data since 1800 through 1953.

The authors have no axe to grind or thesis to prove. They let the forty-nine tables and thirty-nine charts tell the story with careful analysis pointing out the limitations of each set of data. The volume is especially valuable to those responsible for the investment policies of banks and life insurance companies.

However, the book will interest the thoughtful general reader who often wonders whether to be annoyed at pressure groups in Congress who may be making it possible for even inefficient farmers to get rich, or whether to remind himself that food at stable prices is the most vital single need of all human beings, not only farmers. Part I covers farm mortgage distress by areas and gives state data so that each reader may see how his state compares with others. Part II covers farm mortgage distress by individual farm organization. The conclusions are, as would be expected, that farm mortgage distress is due to many causes—each carefully analyzed. The stepped-up agricultural production during the two world wars of course set the stage for trouble, but many contributing factors added to the distress.

One complication which is a characteristic of American agriculture is the fact that real estate speculation has been tied in with farming. Farm land has been purchased not with an eye on its productivity, but with the expectation that price per acre would rise along with the general price level. In addition the decentralization of metropolitan areas has created the "farm" which is primarily a residence and whose value does not lie in its productivity.

The reader puts down the book with increased respect for the complexity of the problems faced by the farmer and his financial backers who have to forecast long range price levels, and allow for the hazards created by nature in weather and pests as well as man-made hazards such as technological changes.

NAOMI RICHES

Social Security Administration

JENSEN, VERNON H. Nonferrous Metals Industry Unionism, 1932-1954: A Story of Leadership Controversy. (New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations, Cornell Studies in Industrial and Labor Relations, No. 5.) Pp. xv, 328. Ithaca, New York: Cornell University, 1954. $4.00.

To those who have read Professor Jensen's Heritage of Conflict, the present volume continues and brings up to date part of the story of the earlier work—that of the union itself, and touches only incidentally on labor-management relations. For those who are unfamiliar with Heritage of Conflict, the new volume stands as a self-contained piece of writing. For here is the story of the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, descendant of the Western Federation of Miners, a union of militant workers, proud of their democratic ways and faced nearly always with bitter employer opposition, rising from the ashes of depression only to succumb to an unwanted Communist domination. Carefully, and step-by-step, Professor Jensen shows how the machinery of democracy is captured and manipulated by a small minority. Playing on the vanity of some leaders, and on the fears and ambitions of others, the disciplined single-purposed minority slowly and surely, and despite temporary setbacks, takes over the lines of communication between member and union, brings in seemingly innocent outsiders to fill key staff positions, and soon the simple unionists find themselves enmeshed in a web. Physically and mentally they are surrounded by a group which meets with Communist party functionaries to take orders and plan strategy. And when the Executive Board meets, the unionists find not discussion and persuasion ahead of them, but a solid pre-determined front already under orders on every matter.

The awakening is not only rude, but too late. The unionists are neither united nor disciplined. The whole official machinery of the union is thrown against them. By now the Communist officials are the union, and the fight in which the anti-Communists need help from the Congress of Industrial Organizations and other unions is hampered by all the niceties of inter-union courtesy, consideration of international autonomy, and so forth. Secession seems to be the solution, but secession to a variety of other CIO unions still keeps the anti-Communist hard rock miners separated, and leaves MMSW even more firmly in the captor's hands. And it is here that Professor Jensen scores the failure of the CIO. It is notable that the only real success of the CIO in fighting the expelled unions has been in the electrical field where money and men went into a new and separate union—the International Union of Electrical Workers—and where local leadership was utilized effectively. By contrast, the attempts in the non-ferrous metals field have been little more than a series of fumbles.

There is, of course, much more to the story, as Professor Jensen elucidates. Paradoxically, but as others have also pointed out, the long employer tradition of crying "Red" at every militant unionist has inured the MMSW members to the point where the accusation is taken as meaningless. And now, as Jensen also points out, the employers prefer the MMSW to a much better heeled and stronger union such as the Steelworkers.

This is a fascinating account, necessarily in detail, for it was by attention to many seemingly unimportant details that the web was spun. And when the victims began to struggle, it became clear how well the Party had done its job.

HERBERT J. LAHNE

Washington, D. C.

DEARING, CHARLES L. Industrial Pensions. Pp. x, 310. Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution, 1954. $3.75.

The persistent quest for economic security in old age is nowhere more clearly manifested than in the industrial pension movement of which the present volume is an up-to-date description and analysis.

The author's purposes are clear. He seeks, first, to appraise the industrial pension method of providing money income for retired workers as (1) a means of solving the problem of old-age security, (2) a method of supplementing federal social security benefits for those covered by that program, and (3) a minimum guarantee of income for the workers involved.

A second principal purpose is to measure the financial impact of such pension programs both on industry and on the economy in general. The final purpose is to weigh critically the basic economic and social issues that emerge from the industrial pension movement.

Within the framework of these major objectives, the first three chapters review the economic and social problems characteristic of an aging population and the traditional distribution of responsibility for solving these problems. The following three chapters analyze the principal factors and forces responsible for the accelerated growth of the industrial pension movement in recent years, describe the structure and functioning of pension plans, and project estimates of the number of industrial workers who may eventually be covered under such a program and the amount of money required annually to support the program. The balance of the study comprises a presentation and evaluation of the basic economic and social issues which may emerge if the industrial pension program develops as indicated in the author's analysis.

Through carefully reasoned analysis, amply supported by statistical data and other quantitative evidence, the author presents the inescapable economic burden which is rapidly issuing from an increasingly large aged population produced by increasing longevity, the inadequacies of a non-contributory pension system, the deficiencies of all plans which contain no vestment of rights for the workers and only insufficient financial protection for the corporations involved, and the urgent need for a reappraisal of the whole industrial pension system in relation to the federal security program. The author's findings indicate with unmistakable clarity that the primary responsibility for the provision of old-age security is a joint responsibility of government and the individual, but that in the development of old-age income industrial management has a major role to play.

This study is a worthy representative of the high quality of research which we have come to expect from the Brookings Institution. Moreover, it is the best addition to the literature of industrial pensions that has appeared in a very long time. The data have been carefully collected, the analysis of facts and points of view is scholarly and brilliant, and the conclusions are drawn with admirable frankness and objectivity. This is a volume which should be read carefully and thoughtfully by labor leaders, representatives of management, legislators concerned with the solution of the old-age security problem, labor economists, and the interested citizen who seeks reliable enlightenment on one of the nation's most difficult and perplexing problems.

GORDON S. WATKINS

University of California
Riverside Campus

TAYLOR, HENRY C., and ANNE DEWEES TAYLOR. The Story of Agricultural Economics in the United States, 1840-1932. Pp. xxvi, 1121. Ames: The Iowa State College Press, 1952. $10.00.

The Story of Agricultural Economics in the United States, 1840-1932, written by Dr. Henry C. and Anne D. Taylor, is a signal service to the agricultural economics profession. Much of the historical background pertaining to men and their contributions would be lost to younger men in the profession except for this type of treatise prepared by one closely identified with the field during its early history. The book represents a patient, painstaking search of historical documents to trace out the sequence of events and contributions that entered into the shaping of ideas, theories, and trends in teaching and research pertaining to agricultural economics.

Only persons who have been closely associated with the pioneers in the agricultural economics field and who have the historical approach which is well represented in the combined effort of the Taylors can give glimpses of the interplay of personalities and events in past generations. This is particularly true of Parts I and II which the student of current problems would not find time to discover for himself.

Part III devoted to an "Economic Analysis of Farm Management Problems," including choice of a farm, choice of farm enterprises, intensity of culture, size of farms, variations in production factors, and the national viewpoint, while reflecting the historical approach probably gives a closer view to the things that Taylor, the teacher, considered of major importance.

In treatment and scope, parts IV and VIII reflect the Taylor concept of the field of agricultural economics which took form when he became the head of the agricultural economics work of the United States Department of Agriculture in the Office of Farm Management in 1919 and especially after all agricultural economics work was co-ordinated into the Bureau of Agricultural Economics in July 1921.

The contribution of Norman J. Wall in Part VIII, on "Farm Finance" covering the same period of time, is well done. Some of the other more recent history presented by the Taylors hardly lends itself to the same detailed treatment as that found in the earlier chapters of the book, merely because the work in individual states was becoming too far flung to be treated in the same detail; nor can points of view of individuals be as intimately treated as in the days of a few leaders of independent lines of work.

The Taylors have done a good historical study. Agricultural economics is a difficult field to discuss in a detached way and particularly since the senior author was closely identified with controversial points of view in a period when these views needed to be harmonized in order to weld the disassociated parts into an orderly arrangement identified as agricultural economics. Some readers will consider that there are some omissions which participants from other vantage points would have given emphasis. Also, even a 1,100-page book must omit some matters of historical interest, and the author must select those he considered most important.

The Taylors chose a good stopping point, 1932. It would be interesting, however, while facts can readily be obtained, for someone to prepare the agricultural economic history following that date. Present day federal administrators might well consider some of the historical background that gives reason to the specific co-ordination of agricultural research work in the period 1922-32.

H. C. M. CASE

University of Illinois

SOCIOLOGY AND EDUCATION

BERGER, MONROE, THEODORE ABEL, and CHARLES H. PAGE (Eds.). Freedom and Control in Modern Society. (Van Nostrand Series in Sociology.) Pp. 326. New York: Van Nostrand and Company, 1954. $6.00 trade; $4.50 text.

Freedom and Control in Modern Society, edited by Monroe Berger, Theodore Abel and Charles H. Page, is a collection of fourteen original essays written in honor of Robert Morrison MacIver, Francis Leiber Professor Emeritus of Political Philosophy and Sociology, Columbia University, by his colleagues and former students.

The tribute is well justified by Professor MacIver's distinguished contributions to political and social thought. David Spitz examines Professor MacIver's political philosophy and presents an incisive critique of his theory of political obligation, while, in a separate essay, Harry Alpert examines and evaluates his sociological contributions.

The twelve other essays explore important areas of political and social thought but have no direct reference to the work of Professor MacIver. Perhaps the most rewarding of these is "The Internationalization of Social Controls" by Gardner Murphy of the Menninger Foundation. Professor Murphy presents impressive experimental evidence concerning the effect of social situations upon the individual process of perception.

In a joint essay on "Friendship as a Social Process," Paul Lazarsfeld makes a methodologically formal analysis of Robert Merton's substantive examination. Whatever its ultimate merit, I cannot help feeling that the formalization did not justify the authors' present belief in its effectiveness.

Robert Bierstadt's paper on "The Problem of Authority" seems to encounter semantic difficulties. However, Milton Gordon of Haverford College presents an interesting paper on the role of the subculture in modern society and its relationship to alternate goal possibilities, while Florian Znaniecki gives a lucid account of the motivation of social groups. Nathan Glazer makes a contribution to the understanding of the social role of ethnic groups in society.

Seymour Lipset presents a provocative account of the political process in trade unions and J. M. Clark of Columbia presents us with a distinguished discussion of the relationship between the economic and political processes which undermine the old wives' tale that the economic system functions according to iron laws which are or can be independent of politics. Kingsley Davis employs the science of demography in a survey of national power.

Thomas I. Cook and George Catlin provide discursive observations on the subjects of political values and political science.

It is not possible to give an illuminating account of so large a project in so brief a review. The editors state that the contributions were aimed at the general reader, the student, and the professional social scientist and they hope that it will also prove useful for classroom purposes. It would have been impossible to satisfy these divergent criteria with equal success, although the authors have made a reasonably successful attempt. The quality of the contributions is uneven and several of the essays are not up to the high standards of the others. The book may not be too useful as a text, but several of the articles should be excellent for classroom purposes. However, with a few exceptions, the specialist will have little new to learn from the volume.

MORTON A. KAPLAN

Haverford College

ROSE, ARNOLD M. Theory and Method in the Social Sciences. Pp. xii, 351. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1954. $5.00.

As the author admits, the title of this book misrepresents its contents. In it Dr. Rose, who is professor of sociology at the University of Minnesota, has collected twenty-two essays addressed to a variety of theoretical, methodological and technical issues in social science research, particularly within the fields of sociology and social psychology. Thus, although there are linkages between the individual chapters, the treatment is neither systematic nor comprehensive. Rather, the intent is primarily to "encourage research in sociology along certain neglected channels and with certain relatively neglected research tools" (p. v).

In Dr. Rose's view, much current sociological research is unduly trammled by a narrow preoccupation with methodology at the expense of research oriented to practical problems of contemporary social importance. Moreover, the present emphasis on technical rigor and objectivity has led, the author feels, to the comparative neglect of nonquantitative methods such as are exemplified in history, case studies, and functional and logical analysis, to the distrust of personal observations, and to the unwarranted aloofness of the researcher from the social phenomena he would scrutinize. Proponents of a similar position will find in these pages numerous arguments to buttress their views; opponents will find therein an unequivocal statement of a widely held orientation to social research against which they may tilt their lances.

Thirteen of the papers are based on previously published articles, the majority in familiar journals, but most of them have been extensively revised for the present book. One of these, "Problems in the Sociology of Law and Law Enforcement," originally printed in 1953 in a more recent periodical, the Journal of Legal Education, is of especial interest in the light of a budding rapprochement between law and the more traditional social science disciplines.

Of the hitherto unpublished papers, two are particularly noteworthy. The first, "A Theory of Social Organization and Disorganization," which won the 1952 prize awarded by the American Association for the Advancement of Science for an essay on social theory, attempts to articulate a theory drawn from work in the tradition of such scholars as Durkheim, Weber, Simmel, Cooley, Sumner and the Chicago sociologists. In skeleton form, the theory, from which Professor Rose derives sixteen hypotheses for research, states (1) that social organization depends upon the persistence of internalized meanings and values in a society on the basis of which its members can accurately predict one another's behavior, and (2) that social disorganization occurs "when a significant proportion of meanings and values are no longer sufficiently internalized to guide the behavior of a significant proportion of the individuals still in physical contact with one another" (p. 12). The second is a long paper on voluntary associations in France, prepared while the author was a Fulbright research scholar in that country, in which an historical-legal approach is convincingly employed.

JOSEPH B. CASAGRANDE
Social Science Research Council
Washington, D. C.

LOGAN, RAYFORD W. The Negro in American Life and Thought: The Nadir, 1877-1901. Pp. x, 380. New York: The Dial Press, 1954. $5.00.

The Negro, a minority in the U. S., has shaped the character of American life profoundly, even though his influence has been indirect and often negative. He has divided political parties. He has split the Protestant churches into factions. He is the reason for countless laws, and three amendments to the Constitution. But perhaps most important, he is indeed the cause of sectionalism, a development which reached a crisis with the Civil War and had violent overtones in every decade since.

Rayford W. Logan, a professor of history at Howard University, undoubtedly had this in mind when he wrote this well-documented and lucid history of the period 1877 to 1901, described inaccurately as "The Reconstruction Period." He speaks of the period as "The Nadir." For much was done during those tragic days, which must be now undone to enable the Negro to enjoy the privileges of full citizenship and justify the nation's great democratic promise. The fact is, a wide understanding of the period would give perspective to the present, and even indeed indicate what is possible in the future.

Thus, Mr. Logan's book is a first-rate instrument for gaining insights into the era, as well as the forces that were at work. Not since Black Reconstruction by W. E. B. DuBois, has a more comprehensive analysis of the Negro in the period been made. But where Mr. DuBois laid his emphasis upon the economic factors working to bring about a decline in the Negro's social status, Mr. Logan has stressed the political aspects, thus lighting up a whole new area.

He has meticulously explored the Congressional Record, the messages and papers of the presidents, and the platforms of the two major political parties. Even more revealing, perhaps, are his direct quotations from some of the most representative newspapers and literary publications of the day, both North and South. He found them "shocking," particularly those published in the North where it is presumed racial prejudice is less violently articulate.

But Mr. Logan is no crepe hanger. He concedes that Negroes have made notable progress toward first-class citizenship, so much so that he believes it should even encourage the faint-hearted. But it is clear that he is not an admirer of Booker T. Washington, who advocated a policy of gradualism. And he subjects his position to searching inquiry.

He comes to the conclusion, though Washington received national acclaim for his "Atlanta Compromise Speech" in 1895, that actually the Negro leader renounced "social equality" and political participation by the Negro, and even offered Negroes to industry as strike breakers. His analysis of the southern newspapers immediately before and after Washington's famous address brings him to the conclusion that they do not entirely justify Washington's assertion that the southern white man was the Negro's best friend.

Mr. Logan, a disciplined and industrious historian, has performed a distinct service in filling a gap in the story of Negroes in the U. S.

ROI OTTLEY

Chicago, Illinois

SAENGER, GERHART. The Social Psychology of Prejudice. Pp. xv, 304. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953. $4.00.

Written primarily as a guide for those interested in improving racial and ethnic relations, Professor Saenger's book succeeds in achieving its purpose. Many of its most recent findings of sociological, social psychological, and anthropological research are brought together in convenient and readable form in this relatively brief treatment of prejudice and discrimination. Less technical and less comprehensive than G. W. Allport's recent work, The Nature of Prejudice, it is exceedingly valuable for the audience to which it is addressed.

Saenger discusses the nature, extent, and costs of prejudice in American society, the determinants of prejudice, and the principles and techniques of reducing prejudice and combating discrimination. Current scientific viewpoints on races as biological groups, race mixture, alleged racial superiorities and inferiorities, differences in emotionality and other personality characteristics according to ethnic origin, are reviewed and appraised. Saenger's excellent discussion of social perception drives home the effects of stereotypes held about Negroes, Jews, and other minorities.

The author of this book recommends concentrating the attack on discrimination in areas of life where there is least resistance, and, where several possibilities are open, using the approach "most likely to have the most far reaching consequences." Merton's suggestion that strategies might be varied according to the types of persons addressed, and Lillian Smith's recommendations for action in terms of the kinds of individuals who are interested in attempting to reduce prejudice and discrimination, are not mentioned. Thoughtful sections on propaganda, re-education, contacts, self-surveys, integration in industry, and the legal approach—including the effectiveness and the shortcomings of existing laws—constitute important parts of this book.

The scientific studies of prejudice and discrimination have multiplied in recent years, and research techniques have improved greatly. In reading a book like Saenger's, the conclusion can hardly be avoided that our understanding of ethnic relations is considerably greater than it was twenty years ago. Also, despite some critical situations, especially in the field of housing, it appears that the over-all situation in racial and ethnic relations in the United States shows a great deal of improvement in the middle fifties as compared with the middle thirties. The behavioral sciences have already begun to have a practical impact, but, as Professor Klineberg points out in the Introduction, much remains to be done before the United States lives up to its democratic ideology.

GEORGE E. SIMPSON

Oberlin College

ROSENBERG, STUART E. The Jewish Community in Rochester, 1843-1925. Pp. xv, 325. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $4.50.

The year 1954 marks the tercentenary of Jewish settlement in North America. Though the publication of this volume was not necessarily planned for this year, the date enhances its significance. The facts it marshals and the story it tells add up to further proof that Jewish life on this continent has been far from static, but that, on the contrary, a new type of Jew has come into being as well as a new form of Jewish community living.

The Rochester Jewish community is, of course, neither the largest nor the most important in the United States. Its beginnings go back to only 1843, when a certain Myer Greentree (could his name have been Gruenbaum?) removed his peddler's pack and chose Rochester as his permanent home. Yet, in this brief time this comparatively small Jewish group has built religious, social and educational institutions, contributed its share to local and even international philanthropies, and in general made its influence for good felt in the wider community. Its sons and daughters have Americanized themselves, not only in language, but also in thought, habit, interests and sympathies. Dr. Rosenberg has labored assiduously to trace the steps by which the transformation has been achieved. But spiritual transformations do not lend themselves to factual documentation. Perhaps the second volume of his history, which will carry the story of the community from 1925 to the year of its eventual publication, will offer statistics or find some other means of showing how the existing situation has evolved and what the changes have meant in terms of gain or loss to Jewish religious tradition and personality.

In those areas of life to which Dr.

Rosenberg devotes most attention, he is eminently successful. In the economic sphere the Jews of Rochester have played a role of importance to the entire country; they built up the clothing industry of Rochester as well as its obverse, the labor unions. Dr. Rosenberg also describes the painful accompaniments of the process. The latter were the more unpleasant in that they emphasized the social breach between the two parts of the Jewish community: that of German origin and that of the later arrivals from Eastern Europe. This socioethnic division is the scarlet thread that runs through the entire story. The religious history of the Rochester community was especially affected by it. Not that division between Reform and Orthodox, and later also Conservative was peculiar to Rochester; but in the earlier days an intensity about the religious cleavage seems to have manifested itself there which may have grown out of economic hostility in addition to the purely theological differences. This in turn affected community life, each group building institutions of its own, social and philanthropic as well as religious.

In time the misunderstandings were overcome, the people learned to live with one another, and a community spirit emerged out of the common Americanism within which the second and third generations grew up. This is the interesting, encouraging, and promising story of the book. It is also the point which Professor Salo W. Baron makes in his brief preface to the volume. This is why the Jewish community of Rochester may serve as an illustration of what has taken place in every town and city where Jews settled during their first three hundred years in America.

SOLOMON GRAYZEL

Philadelphia, Pa.

FRIEDMANN, EUGENE A., and ROBERT J. HAVIGHURST with others. The Meaning of Work and Retirement. Pp. vii, 197. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1954. $3.75.

Encouragement of public and private annuity and pension systems for all older workers acquired the status of a national policy about twenty years ago. The basis lay in recognition of the hazards leading to unemployment in old age and in the conviction that a surplus of workers made it desirable to move the older ones out of the labor force in favor of youth and of those with family responsibilities. Underlying the whole matter was the convenient and common belief that, for most persons, work meant nothing more than a means of earning a living.

During the past decade, however, studies of old-age and survivors insurance beneficiaries and of several other groups have shown that there is considerable reluctance to retire, and that many retirees are poorly adjusted, even when retirement income is sufficient to provide reasonable security. These exploratory studies have led to the development of hypotheses regarding broader meanings of work, and of the importance of satisfying these meanings in other ways if workers are to accept retirement.

The Committee on Human Development at the University of Chicago was among the first to develop these hypotheses. A Committee for the Study of Later Maturity, consisting of Ernest W. Burgess, Robert J. Havighurst, and Ethel Shanas, supported with funds from the Rockefeller Foundation, initiated a series of studies related to work and adjustment in the later years. The Meaning of Work and Retirement is the first comprehensive presentation of objective data on this subject.

Central to the report are chapters dealing with the meanings of their jobs to samples of workers in five occupations: steelmaking, coal mining, printing, retail selling, and private medical practice. Preceding these analyses, a frame of reference is developed in terms of the function of work in American culture and the corresponding significance or meaning to the individual. In addition to income, work provides a means of expending time and energy, affords identification and status in the group, brings one into association with others, and gives purpose to the life experience.

The studies yield several important conclusions: the job does, indeed, have these additional meanings; there are variations among occupations; variations are still greater among individuals within occupations; and attitudes toward retirement vary significantly among occupations and individuals. Among occupations, there appears to be a clear progression to desire to continue at work and the variety of meanings attached to the job, even when retirement is assured.

This study, together with those of Hall and Lorge and Tuckman, should put an end to some of the generalizations freely made about work and retirement. Hopefully, it should lead to the focus of more attention on finding new sources of satisfaction for the years in the postwork period. For, as Havighurst suggests, we may be shifting to an economy of consumption in which not all who can earn are needed as workers, and we may find other activities that yield even greater satisfaction than work in the later years.

CLARK TIBBITTS

U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

HOWELL, TREVOR H. Our Advancing Years: An Essay on Modern Problems of Old Age. Pp. 192. London: Phoenix House, 1953; New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $3.50.

Dr. Trevor Howell has called his latest book on Gerontology "an essay on modern problems of old age." This is too modest a title for such a broad and enlightened study, which is both practical in its application and full of insight into the problems discussed.

As Dr. Howell states in the Preface, his viewpoint is that of a physician whose daily professional work lies mainly among the aged and chronic sick, and he has written this book to draw attention to the problems of old age and to make certain recommendations for the solution of some of these problems.

In his first chapter emphasis is laid on the waste of the productive capabilities of men and women retiring at the traditional ages of sixty-five and sixty, and an appeal is made for a reexamination of the whole question of retirement and the capabilities of the older generation. The importance of a correct assessment is not confined to the older generation but affects the community as a whole, if the burden of maintaining the elderly people is not to become intolerable for the working age group. "In fact," he says, "the continued productive activity of older workers will act as a financial safety valve to the country. Otherwise we shall be unable to afford the money needed to provide the pensions which should be paid to elderly people."

Money, however, is not enough and Dr. Howell stresses the importance of adequate housing and of practical services to enable older people to remain independent. Among these services emphasis is particularly laid on the work of the district nurse, the home help and the need for more laundry services to relieve old folks at home of the weekly wash.

One of the interesting characteristics of social work in the United Kingdom is the multiplicity of agencies which concern themselves with social problems; this is especially the case with the welfare of old people. A great merit of this book is that it gives a complete and accurate picture of the voluntary societies (private agencies), both social and medical, which are concerned with old people and pays tribute to the co-ordination of these services by the National Old People's Welfare Committee. It should just be noted that the figures for the latter are rather out of date as there are now well over 1,000 branches.

When Dr. Howell comes to trace the development of the old Public Assistance Institution into the modern home for the old, he speaks with considerable personal experience. Particularly interesting is his account of his work at The Royal Hospital, the home of the famous "Chelsea Pensioners," originally founded by Charles II in 1682, which provides for 500 pensioned soldiers right in the heart of London.

The last part of the book traces the story of Geriatrics and again here his story becomes alive as he names and describes the work of some of his pioneer colleagues. While the medical section of his story will be of great practical value to other doctors working in this field, it is also of absorbing interest to the layman interested in the welfare of the older generation, and to the individual facing old age.

Throughout, practical advice is given about hazards to be avoided "as we slip into the smaller life of the older man," and an unusual and erudite history of old age provides us with something approaching a philosophy.

Dr. Howell has written a book of real value full of sensitive understanding of the attitudes and wishes of old people. A visit to one of his wards is an exciting and stimulating experience as the reviewer knows, and we should be grateful that Dr. Howell has found time to pass on some of this excitement to those who read Our Advancing Years.

DOROTHEA RAMSEY

Cumberland, England

McGraw, PEG, and WALTER McGRAW. Assignment: Prison Riots. Pp. xii, 270. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1954. $3.95.

During the last two or three years there has been an epidemic of prison riots without precedent in American penal history—over forty of them altogether.

This upsurge of violence brought no surprise to veteran penologists. The conventional prison system keeps the convicts on the verge of rebellion at all times. Any considerable increase in the tensions of prison life brings actual rioting. Conditions which inevitably produce greater tensions have been general in prison experience all over the country since the end of the war.

Prisoners were rather fully employed during the later years of the war, but prison industry has gone into a slump since hostilities ceased. This has meant loss of work for prisoners and the resulting demoralizing idleness. Appropriations for prison service have remained static or have been reduced while costs have skyrocketed as the result of inflationary trends. This has meant poorer food, inferior service, and a lower type of custodial force.

Hence, it is no wonder that we have been treated to a rash of riots. These will continue until economic conditions within prisons are improved and, along with this, better and more humane living conditions are provided.

It was natural that the spectacle of widespread prison rioting would produce a good book dealing with the situation. The volume by Mr. and Mrs. McGraw has been the answer and it serves the need very well indeed. It has a special appeal for a popular audience, and this is the only audience which requires a book to explain the morbid situation and to indicate possible remedies to bring about an amelioration.

The authors give evidence of a respectable knowledge of the essentials of enlightened penology. They did a great deal of hard work in assembling the material they present. They demonstrate a high order of repertorial ability. If much of the material they give us is sensational, it is always cogent and interesting. It invariably serves to drive home an important truth or principle. The public now possesses an adequate guide to prison riots and their possible remedies.

The authors show clearly enough that the real culprit is the repressive prison system which has changed only slightly in over a century. There is no rational place for this system in a civilized society except for the segregation of the small fraction of incorrigible and nonreformatable prisoners—not over thirty per cent of the convict population. Even in dealing with these, the system should be humane and self-supporting, while properly stressing custodial security.

The traditional prison system neither protects society nor reforms convicts. At least three-fourths of the dangerous criminals are at any given time roving about freely without either arrest or custodial restraint. If any convicts are reformed in the course of their prison experience, it is more likely to be the result of increasing maturity than of penal treatment. Crime and criminals are a medical, psychiatric, and social work responsibility in which the conventional prison has no rational role whatever.

It is regrettable that a book of such merit was printed without an index.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Cooperstown, N. Y.

DANDEKAR, V. M., and KUMUDINI DANDEKAR. Survey of Fertility and Mortality in Poona District. Pp. 191. Poona, India: Gokhale Institute of Politics and Economics, 1953. Rs. 5 or 7s. 6d.

One of a series of inquiries into population problems in India under the auspices of the Gokhale Institute of Politics and Economics, this study contains an analysis of survey data on births and deaths; knowledge and use of family planning and limitation; and attitudes toward reproduction. The material was derived from a sample of about 2,000 families located in Poona City and in five towns and thirty villages in the Poona District. Although, as the title indicates, information was obtained on mortality, the investigators' central problem was that of differential fertility.

Perhaps the most unique feature of the inquiry is the section concerned with family planning and limitation, although it suffers from the most serious methodological shortcomings. Some of the more interesting results of this part of the work are: the concern shown by males over the education of their sons and the general weight of responsibility felt by males for their children's welfare; the considerable proportions of the urban and rural samples of both sexes who expressed a desire for knowledge of birth control methods; the further substantial number of these who volunteered that they would adopt such methods immediately; and the low level of positive opposition to family planning expressed by the respondents. In addition, the incidence of sterilization (male and female) among the very small proportion of birth control users is striking.

Certain drawbacks of the study must, however, be mentioned. First, the family planning and limitation questions were not, in many cases, asked of matched husbands and wives. Given the subject matter of the interview, a far superior type of analysis is possible if this matching process is adhered to, especially as it does not add greatly to field problems. Second, there are, in this reviewer's opinion, too many respondents who refused to answer the knowledge-and-use questions because they claimed these questions did not concern them—either because they had no children, were too old, or for similar reasons. The investigators accept these refusals as "understandable" in view of the reasons given.

The refusals are somewhat "understandable" in regard to the questions on use of birth control, but are inadmissible in regard to knowledge of family limitation practices. Over a quarter of the males, rural and urban, and well over a quarter of the urban females did not answer the knowledge questions because they considered them irrelevant. Two further criticisms, perhaps minor, concern the presentation of the tables and the general form of the analysis. It is often very difficult, if not impossible, to relate the figures in the tables to those in the text. This problem is particularly evident in regard to the no-answer and not-concerned categories. In addition, there is a lack of both conceptual focus and selectivity in the analysis; the reader is confronted by a somewhat dreary rendition of the results of the "next question" in paragraph after paragraph.

In spite of the above criticisms, it must be remembered that studies of this type are relatively new to the field of population and can, therefore, be counted on not only for their share of errors but for much valuable information not obtainable in any other way.

JUDITH BLAKE

Columbia University

MURRAY, CLYDE E., MARX G. BOWENS, and RUSSELL HOGREFE (Eds.). Group Work in Community Life. Pp. x, 245. New York: Association Press, 1954. $4.75.

Here reported are a series of interesting and annotated experiences questionably termed "group work experiments," all developed to meet specific community need and not confined to the usual building operations. Learnings for group work practice are summarized and analyzed briefly.

This book seems to express a sort of yearning for what might be characterized in the universe of social work as a general practitioner unshackled either by the chains of agency setting or by narrow specialization, but dedicated to helping people meet those priorities of social welfare need as may be determined by appropriate and responsible groups in light of local community subcultures and need. This calls for professional problemsolving competence and statesmanship of the highest order. It is not here suggested that we should do away with specialization, but that it should follow a comprehensive social work education.

Group work almost always takes place in agency building facilities of one kind or another, but it is often disassociated from community life. Groups always consist of individuals, and communities always consist of groups as do neighborhoods. At least, so this reviewer contends. He also maintains that there is no such thing as group work method, nor casework method, nor intergroup work method as such. Generalized knowledge we believe may be classified as theoretical knowledge and as applied knowledge. In the realm of applied generalized knowledge are certain methods such as scientific method, interviewing method, group discussion method, project method and the like. All these are used as deliberate methods in various combinations and directed toward initiating, developing, sustaining and even terminating certain processes (social processes to be sure) dominated by a distinctive value system we identify as "social work philosophy." These particular processes we term social casework, social group work, and social intergroup work.

The methods employed are not unique to social work either singly or in combination, but the processes are because they embrace philosophy, methodology, and purposes of worker; responses of clientele; interaction between these two; and social agency function. The methods are employed by the disciplined professional worker, but the process developed is as much the creation of clientele as of the worker and therefore are different or may be different in every culture or subculture.

Social work discovered Freud some few years ago, but as yet has not really discovered social process with all of its implications and ramifications including the contributions of social psychology and social anthropology. It is hoped by this reviewer that it will be the next big social work discovery. To the extent that it is, then as day follows night, discourses on group work, group workers, and group work method will largely give way to discussions of social work, social work methods, and the like.

In our opinion, there are no methods now utilized in group work not also utilized in casework and intergroup work as well. These methods are also employed in many other nonsocial work efforts as is a common core of basic theoretical knowledge. But the use of knowledge and methods made by social work practitioners is unique, not the methods.

This volume should be required reading for all social work educators, students, practitioners, and board members. It is interesting and provocative.

W. I. NEWSTETTER, DEAN

University of Pittsburgh

MCCORMICK, MARY J. Diagnostic Casework in the Thomistic Pattern. Pp. xii, 239. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $3.50.

Diagnostic Casework in the Thomistic Pattern is a real contribution to the literature on the theory and philosophy of social work. Dr. McCormick is to be congratulated for handling the subject with intellectual maturity and philosophical sophistication. It illustrates a point made by Hollis and Taylor in their well-known study of Social Work Education in the United States (Columbia University Press, 1951)—Catholic scholars have given special consideration to the philosophy of social work.

Dr. McCormick's study attempts to relate Thomistic philosophy to one of the methods of social work, social case work. Inasmuch as the basic theory of case work has been built almost exclusively upon Freudian psychology, she had to relate Freudianism (both as a philosophy and as a therapeutic system) to the philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas.

The author was very skillful in selecting citations from the Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas, various works of Sigmund Freud, and the statements of friendly commentators on these subjects. She did not consider Mortimer Adler's opinions on Freudianism; she merely quoted, on occasion, from his volume on Art and Prudence, A Study in Practical Philosophy (1937). She was not embarrassed by the critique of Freudianism written by the Catholic psychologist Dr. Rudolph Allers (The Successful Error: A Critical Study of Freudian Psychoanalysis (1940)); she ignored it. She was not concerned with the brilliant work of Joseph Jastrow (The House That Freud Built (1932)) comparing psychoanalysis with the confessional; she did not mention it.

The result, from a literary point of view, is a production that in many places is as dull and uninspiring as a Doctor of Philosophy thesis. Fortunately this is not true of the entire book. In the chapters on "Diagnostic Method and the Habit of Prudence: Interpretation and Choice" and "The Perfection of Prudence" Dr. McCormick rises to heights that approach originality. Here she is concerned primarily with relating Thomas Aquinas' concept of prudence to case work, rather than in justifying Freudianism in the light of Thomistic philosophy. There is also an excellent appendix on "The Philosophical Basis of Functional Casework" wherein she deals with the Rankian concept of personality development in casework.

The book is recommended reading for all students of social work. Many of them will find it to be more meaningful for our time than the scientific humanism and economic dissenting of the interwar years. It is doubtful, however, if they will all be convinced that the mechanistic and instinctive psychology of Freud is wholly compatible with any Christian philosophy, Thomistic or otherwise.

ARTHUR P. MILES

University of Wisconsin.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

HOWLETT, DUNCAN. Man Against the Church: The Struggle to Free Man's Religious Spirit. Pp. viii, 247. Boston: Beacon Press, 1954. $3.50.

The theme of this book by the minister of the three-century old First Church in Boston is the contradiction between religion, which represents the highest and most noble of man's aspirations, and the church, which so often reflects the most base and ignoble of man's motivations.

Throughout the ages, says the author, religion has been leading man toward a nobler vision, a better day, a higher hope, and a fuller life. The church, on the other hand, has been worldly, obscurantist, arrogant and predatory.

What the church lacks, Dr. Howlett says, is integrity. Integrity is consistency between what it preached and what is practiced, and the church through the ages has had none or precious little of it. The church preaches honesty but practices duplicity; it preaches the laying up of treasures in heaven while it accumulates the treasure of the earth; it preaches humility but is full of pride and arrogance; it preaches peace and love but foments hatred and persecution against those who will not submit to its authority.

What, too, the church lacks is democracy. This is but an aspect of its lack of integrity. For it preaches the equality of all before God, yet is authoritarian, hierarchical and dominating. It preaches the priesthood of all believers but at the same time claims exclusive possession of the keys to the kingdom. It suppresses all independent expression within it and casts out the doubters and the questioners. It equates itself with God by condemning as atheists all who challenge its dogma and question its letter of authority from God.

Moreover, this lack of integrity in churches is congenital and ineradicable. Whenever men of religion and integrity within a church, after a vain effort to purify it, separate themselves and establish a new church purged of the evils of the predecessor, it is only a matter of time before the new church acts like all ill bred churches and behaves with duplicity and arrogance.

In view of this sorry state of affairs, it would seem that the only solution is the elimination of churches. Man in the state of religion is noble; only the church corrupts. Hence logic would seem to require that the church be gotten rid of. Dr. Howlett, however, stops short of the logical conclusion. Anarchy in the religious society is as undesirable as it is in the secular world. We need a church no less than we need a state. Authoritarianism is bad; but authority is needed and is good.

The solution, says Dr. Howlett, is not the elimination of the church but the establishment of a church of democracy and integrity. It is a church which churches best because it churches least. It is a church wherein the goal, not the starting point, is truth; where every man is a prophet and in equal communion with God. It is a church where practice is in harmony with precept and where what is taught and what is done are identical. It is a church with religion but without creed or dogma. If this church happens to bear a striking resemblance to what the Unitarian Church is or would like to be, the fact that Dr. Howlett is Minister of the mother church of Unitarianism in America is perhaps only coincidental.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. I have found this an absorbing book, written out of deep conviction by a person of integrity—in the generally accepted sense of the word as well as in the sense used by the author. The indictment rings true; the problem presented is real and disturbing. My quarrel is only with the author's conclusion. Essentially, his solution amounts to little more than an admonition to the churches to do good and eschew evil. The churches have been getting that at least since Amos and Isaiah. But perhaps a little more won't hurt.

LEO PFEFFER

American Jewish Congress

OXNAM, G. BROMLEY. I Protest. Pp. 186. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $2.50.

On July 21 1953, G. Bromley Oxnam, Bishop of the Methodist Church, and a symbol of militant, progressive elements within Protestantism, entered into public combat with the House Committee on Un-American Activities. After a gruelling ten-hour session, the articulate cleric was widely acclaimed the victor. Already several contemporary prophets have suggested that history will judge the "Oxnam hearing" as the turning point in the continuous battle of this generation against wholesale character assassination through the application of indiscriminate labels.

In I Protest, the Bishop presents an absorbing, informative, and compact summary of his encounter; gives further evidence of his own integrity; and shows the shameful incompetence of the Velde Committee. Verbatim extracts from the hearing, interspersed with interesting commentaries, comprise the major part of the book. The Bishop organizes these data around eight specific protestations, beginning with an acrid denunciation of the use of the House floor to broadcast falsehoods under the protection of congressional immunity. In this connection, he singles out Representative Donald L. Jackson's crass accusation that Oxnam "served God on Sunday and the Communist front for the balance of the week"—a charge that led the Bishop to demand a public hearing to clear his name. In characteristic fashion, the author does not mince his words in dealing with Jackson; he flays the California Republican as "a smooth talking, superficial opportunist."

The Methodist prelate condemns many other undemocratic and unethical practices as well. He gives abundant testimony to the Velde Committee's ignorance and inefficiency, its "Big Bully" attitude, and its frantic efforts to manufacture headlines. He castigates its practice of releasing, under its letterhead, unverified and incomplete material which is frequently inaccurate and usually misleading. He points out a fact generally unknown to the public: that the Committee obtained much of its "information" on alleged subversion among the clergy from the American Council of Christian Churches, a fancy title shielding a tiny group of self-styled "Bible Believers" led by a deposed preacher.

I Protest is a small book and it does not pretend to analyze adequately many of the broader issues which it raises. Bishop Oxnam is not only objecting to the treatment he received at the hands of the Velde Committee; he is speaking out against the whole spectacle of irresponsible red hunting today. He freely acknowledges that there is a "rightful and necessary place" for congressional inquiries, and he is fully aware that the Communist party is a conspiracy and that conspirators "ought to be discovered, tried in due process, and, if found guilty, punished." He objects to unfair procedure, however, and to reliance upon the professional informer, described by Oxnam as "a man of the shadows, born of fear and contributing to it . . . a creature of the police state, and alien and malignant growth."

Like millions of other citizens, the Bishop fears for the future of America's unique experiment with democracy. I Protest serves to arouse the complacent and to give new hope and inspiration to those who share the author's concern. Perhaps it will prove to be one of the most significant tracts of our generation. Certainly, every serious student of current trends will find it indispensable to his understanding of our age.

RALPH L. ROY

Union Theological Seminary

BRADSHAW, MARION J. Free Churches and Christian Unity: A Critical View of the Ecumenical Movement and the World Council of Churches. Pp. xiv, 225. Boston: Beacon Press, 1954. $3.50.

It is surprising that such a book should not have appeared before this since the traditional position of all congregationally governed churches is opposition to "man made creeds" and any overhead control. These, the so-called "free churches," are the Congregationalists, the Baptists and the Disciples, to name only the largest and most influential. Besides these large bodies there are numerous small sects, many of them of recent origin, that are also congregational in their form of church government, and none of which have had any part or interest in the ecumenical movement. The Congregationalists, the Northern Baptists, and the Disciples have been active participants in church union movements, but the great Southern Baptist denomination has had no part in it.

The author of this able criticism of the ecumenical movement has been for many years a member of the faculty of Bangor Theological Seminary. He was ordained as a Christian or Disciple Minister and for thirty years has been a Congregationalist. Thoroughly ecumenical in his personal relationships, he has come to think that the ecumenical leaders in his own communion are finding centralizing tendencies irresistible and are willing that all Congregational churches be destroyed in the interest of one world-wide church. He quotes a distinguished professor of ecumenical Christianity as stating that there can be no question, whatever, but that the ultimate goal of the ecumenical movement is a complete, organic union of the various branches of the existing churches of Christ throughout the world. In a chapter entitled "Is the World Council Totalitarian?" he quotes the General Secretary, Dr. W. A. Visser't Hooft, at length to show that from his utterances the Council is definitely tending in that direction, a conclusion which to this reviewer seems unjustified.

The author notes the common tendency to exaggerate the value of unity. Quoting William E. Barton in the heading of Chapter Five "Let us stop wailing about our divisions and emphasize our unity. . . . Whatever unity the Church possessed in . . . the Apostolic Age . . . was unity of the Spirit, manifest through widely differing modes of organization." The author fears that great unity movements will almost invariably take on a theological basis which will exclude or compromise honest liberals, and that other things may become more important than unity.

It is safe to say that none of the ecumenical leaders are thinking in terms of creating an organic union of the World Council of Churches. If some of them have said things which when taken out of context seem to indicate otherwise, it undoubtedly needs correction, and the author of this book has done well to bring such statements into the open.

In closing, it may be appropriate to call the author's attention to the fact that the Congregational Church was established by law in the three New England colonies and was the only American Church that ever exacted the death penalty for heresy.

WILLIAM W. SWEET

Dallas, Texas

SHUSTER, GEORGE N. Religion Behind the Iron Curtain. Pp. xxi, 281. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $4.00.

Dr. Shuster's scholarly book consists of a series of narratives about the religious or, more exactly, antireligious effects of the overflow of Communism into the area of the satellites, Yugoslavia, and the Baltic states which technically form part of the Soviet Union. Each story is preceded by a clear and concise description of the social and religious situation of the country prior to its "liberation" by Soviet armies. Of course, the author analyzes the measures taken by the new rulers to curb religion. They have been somewhat different in the various countries, depending on the religious composition of the population and the peculiarities of the national culture. However, all could be explained (though the author does not do that) as a rational application to a newly conquered area of the experience accumulated in Russia prior to the Second World War, and to the turn from direct persecution to the somewhat milder, but probably more effective, practices of our day. Of course, the author also tells, in well chosen instances, the story of the resistance of the believers, in the beginning fiery, but later on concentrating on efforts to preserve for religion whatever could be preserved; this second phase seems to have coincided with the spread of the conviction that the Western powers would not intercede in favor of the peoples of the satellites. And, of course, the author does not conceal the many cases of subservience, servility, even treason which he explains in terms of the general climate of hopelessness now prevailing in the part of the world studied by him.

Time and again, Dr. Shuster asks the question, "how could such a catastrophe happen? The proximate cause is obvious; this was the inability of the western powers to establish themselves in positions of strength in Central Europe. He looks however for a deeper cause and finds it in the failure of the victors of the First World War to preserve Austria-Hungary in the form of a federation.

The conclusions of the author are rather pessimistic. First, he sees no indication that a Christian view of how to make industrial society function to the advantage of the majority of men has gained in popularity. Second, although the Marxian faith has lost many followers in many parts of the world "the dominant intellectual caste" continues using it as their master-plan. At the very end, Dr. Shuster rather unexpectedly asserts that an international code of minority rights would in the long run become truly revolutionary. The reviewer disagrees with this idea; much stronger ideas than a code of minority rights have proven impotent against the brutal force of a totalitarian dictatorship.

N. S. TIMASHEFF

Fordham University

BARNES, WILLIAM WRIGHT. The Southern Baptist Convention, 1845-1953. Pp. 340. Nashville, Tenn.: Broadman Press, c. 1954. $3.75.

The social organization of the Baptist church in the United States is divided into two major conventions, the American Baptist, formerly the Northern Baptist, and the Southern Baptist. At the time of its organization in Augusta, Georgia in 1845, the Southern Baptist Convention was established to give formal associational relations to that group of churches in the southeastern part of the country which had what then seemed to be fundamental disagreements with their sister churches over theological, missionary, and slavery questions. (Presbyterian and Methodist churches experienced a similar bifurcation during the mid-nineteenth century.)

At its San Francisco meeting in 1951, the Southern Baptist Convention proposed that "whereas, the Convention has defined its territorial position . . . by removing territorial limitations, and, whereas, the Northern Baptist Convention has changed its name so that it is continental in scope, the Home Mission Board and all other Southern Baptist boards and agencies be free to serve as a source of blessing to any community or any people anywhere in the United States."

Barnes' history of the Southern Baptist Convention is a report of the various actions and activities that attended the development of this the largest of indigenous religious groups. With a membership of approximately 10,000,000 communicants, the convention now exceeds the territorial limits suggested by its name and follows its church constituents and the communicant market into the North and the West. From four to five times larger than its sister convention, the Southern Baptist Convention has successfully invaded the areas of new population concentration with its "Simultaneous Crusade" of evangelism and its "Five Year Crusade" for more conferences, more mission stations, and more effective witnessing. In the process, the Bible Belt has shifted.

The Southern Baptist Convention is essentially a conservative religious organization, despite the fact that the Baptist church in the United States finds its spiritual heritage in the radical wing of the European Protestant upheaval of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Barnes' history of the convention validates without emphasizing this conservatism. The recital of "facts"—names, dates, and excerpts from "proceedings"—does permit the student to conclude that the role of the association of churches, so common to early European Baptist history, the belief in the autonomy of the local church and in the priesthood of believers, continue to be significant tenets of Baptist church organization within that convention. These beliefs have been able to withstand the ideological onslaughts of Unitarianism, Universal Restoration, Millerism, Landmarkism, and slavery. And though Dr. Barnes gives more attention to the names of those who vied on these issues than to the contextual meaning of the issues themselves, one can discover their significant relationships in denominational history in the more lucid and interpretive writings of A. H. Newman, W. W. Barnes, Robert G. Torbet, and others.

IRA DE A. REID

Haverford College

GOGUEL, MAURICE. The Birth of Christianity. Translated from the French by H. C. Snape. Pp. xviii, 558. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $7.50.

The author of our book is the well-known senior and master of French protestant scholarship. Less interested in theological implications and philosophical problems, he presents historical facts in an excellent way, reconstructing the past as far as possible. The Birth of Christianity is the second volume of a planned trilogy, which began with The Life of Jesus. The present volume thus presupposes the historical Jesus and his teaching. It begins with "The Birth of the Belief in the Resurrection of Jesus" and follows the historical development under different viewpoints up to the first half of the second century A.D. The caesura between Vol. I and Vol. II is well chosen.

We are not going into detailed criticism of Goguel's book; comprehensive handbooks like this will always present us with a good deal of places where individual judgment differs. No doubt that the author who has dealt with the chief problems of earliest Christianity in many articles, is excellently acquainted with all questions of the period. • The scholarly apparatus of the book is the reference to the most important sources, quotes, and other studies of the period, primarily European ones.

Yet when dealing with the history of the early, indeed the earliest church as an intramundane development as our author does, the question comes up: where lies the chief interest of the historian? Is it the beginning as such and therefore the viewpoint: how did all the different phenomena come to pass and how have they set forth such and no other consequences? Is our historical development a linear, logical result of causes? Or does the primary interest of an author lie in final results of history, so that we search for different reasons? Here we carry with us the general assumption of unity and an inherent logicism behind the surface of historical phenomena. In this case the scholarly interest searches for teleological forces and the constructive imagination designs a well-balanced, unified historical picture.

To illustrate these two historical aspects we may point to Harnack with his primary interest in final results on the one side, and to Bultmann on the other side, whose main concern is the question of the very beginning and how things came into existence.

What about M. Goguel who, born in 1880, belongs to the generation between Harnack and Bultmann? His approach presents some kind of a via media, that is, he tries to bring into balance the divergent aspects. This attitude can be seen also in his methodology, where he prevents extreme positions, for instance, a fundamentalistic lack of criticism as well as critical radicalism. The general line of Goguel's book may perhaps be characterized as a synthesis of liberalism and conservatism, making use of psychology and psychological explanation more often than I personally can agree with.

Yet, the present volume of Goguel as well as his Life of Jesus is an outstanding masterpiece of greatest importance for modern historical research. For nontheologians, the Birth of Christianity represents a reliable handbook of facts.

ERICH DINKLER

Yale University, Divinity School

KIMPEL, BEN. The Symbols of Religious Faith: A Preface to an Understanding of the Nature of Religion. Pp. xxiv, 180. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $3.75.

A Criterion of Religious Phenomena would be a more accurately descriptive title of this work. The author is concerned throughout with the problem of what constitutes religious phenomena in contradistinction to the nonreligious. He professes entire disagreement with the school of Rudolf Otto which finds a concept of the holy the distinguishing trait in religious manifestations. As the author points out, there is a circular procedure in empirical studies of religion.

One must have a definition, that is to say, a concept of religion before he can select those phenomena from which he will adduce the traits that are peculiar to religion.

He will then find that these phenomena do exemplify the characteristics which he believes constitute the religious.

Underlying all religious life, we are told, is acknowledgement of "man's total dependence upon an ultimate reality. An understanding of behavior, whether it be institutional ritual or individual prayer, is a definition of religion" (6). "Religious life includes all that men do to acknowledge their ultimate dependence upon a reality, or realities, which control, directly or indirectly, whatever they regard as the essential goods of life. Whatever is regarded as essential to life, therefore, may acquire religious significance" (28). Later the author adds the criterion that religion "includes all that men do to acknowledge their ultimate dependence upon a reality revered as transcendent both of human resources and the physical world" (30). "There would be no motive for man to turn beyond his resources to another reality if every requirement of his life were fulfilled within his own resources" (136). "Religious faith is not a philosophy of the nature of human life, or the human soul, or even of the destiny of human life. It is an affirmation about the existence of a reality which is supremely worthy of man's trust, both in this life, and in another—whatever such a life may be" (145). The thesis is throughout illustrated by examples drawn from some primitive cultures and to a greater extent from the early historic civilizations of the Near East and Far East.

WILSON D. WALLIS

South Woodstock, Connecticut

STEVENS, DAVID H. The Changing Humanities: An Appraisal of Old Values and New Uses. Pp. xiv, 272. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1953. $4.00.

In this volume the former Director for the Humanities of the Rockefeller Foundation puts to use a lifetime of varied experience as he analyzes the nature of the humanities, what has happened to them in the last fifty years, and what they can contribute to the lives of men in the world both now and in the future. Mr. Stevens opens his discussion with a review of the patterns of humanistic research and teaching. This is a more or less theoretical section, which identifies the sources of the humanities as falling under four categories: languages, histories, philosophies, and literatures. He then devotes a chapter to each of these categories and concludes with two chapters which treat new areas of research and teaching, and the need for balance in studies.

The tone of the book is vigorously optimistic, so much so that often when the author is describing in general statements the condition of the humanities in American education, one feels that the declarative "is" should be changed to "ought." In particular, when he asserts that departmentalism in universities is much less powerful than it used to be, he seems to be flying in the face of much relevant evidence. On the other hand, it is high time that some one brings to the attention of the gloom mongers among the humanists the record of concrete achievement which has been wrought in the last half century.

Mr. Stevens is unwavering in his insistence upon the supreme importance of the human individual, whose freedom and responsibility it is the task of the humanities to serve. Perhaps a clue to his attitude can be found in his central chapters which deal with languages, not Language; histories, not History, and so on. This bespeaks Mr. Stevens' profound belief that the highest obligation of the human being is to make up his own mind by exercising a discriminating sense of values as he chooses his own course of action out of the plurality of alternatives available to him.

Mr. Stevens is at his best in the sections on languages and literatures in which he shows how the humanist scholar and teacher, whether he is dealing with problems of simple communication or with a master work of literary art, really occupies a position of the highest significance, for through him ultimately as an interpreter comes the public understanding of the material in question. Although the deep relationship between history and philosophy is explored with nicety, the section on philosophies leaves something to be desired because it concentrates too much upon the thought of the recent past without establishing its connections with the whole tradition of philosophical speculation. In the chapter devoted to new possibilities for research and teaching, Mr. Stevens gives a complete conspectus of the area study programs now in existence in the country with an indication of the needs in the future. Unfortunately, he has little to say about the role of the fine arts and music as humanities.

Anyone who believes that the humanities are the concern of all men can understand the grounds of his belief much better by reading this book.

WHITNEY J. OATES

Princeton University

BLACKHAM, H. J. The Human Tradition. Pp. vii, 252. Boston: The Beacon Press, 1954. $3.00.

Here is a deep-running treatment of what Blackham considers to be the chief ideological schemes competing for contemporary loyalty. Marxian Communism, Christianity, and secular or scientific humanism are re-examined with a penetration and breadth of perspective that commands respect. It is an "iceberg book," most of its significance lying beneath the surface.

Blackham demonstrates that he is thoroughly at home in the humanist tradition. As secretary of the Ethical Union in England, editor of The Plain View, a humanist periodical, and co-author of Living as a Humanist, he has become an authority on the humanist point of view. Those who line up with the Marxians or the Christians, who believe in the church, must reckon with him.

In order "to inspire a will to civilization and inform a vision of it" (p. vi), one must realize that science and democracy unencumbered by theology or dialectical materialism are the two wheels which make human progress practicable (p. 237). The "heady idea of progress" as something inevitable in nature is "clean gone" (p. 236). Blackham confesses with due modesty that humanism has not yet reached "an intellectually coherent and compelling form" (p. 210), yet he believes its critical "love of culture" (p. 208), its orientation in actual human problems, provides the most persuasive incentive for providing such remedies as evils may ever have (p. 188).

To reject Marxianism for any but the strongest reasons would be frivolous for it, not the thought of Hegel and Bergson, constitutes the watershed of modern thought (p. 100, cf. 97, 140). It is "a grand vision and none has been so near the truth" (p. 109). Consequently, it is "a threat to something considerably better" (p. 143), presumably humanism. But Blackham rightly shows that Marxianism vitiates itself by holding up such an inspiring ideal of vigorous effort at social reform, when the dialectic of history is then held to be necessitarian. Ideals as consciously chosen ends are basically irrelevant in such a scheme. His conclusion is acute that Communist is the response of backward people to the challenge of the industrial revolution as they seek quickly to equip themselves for survival in such a vastly changed world (p. 243).

Blackham's indictment of historical Christianity as a destroyer of civilization (p. 171) gives only one side of its course. His conclusion that its lasting contribution has been its challenge to man's confidence in himself and the self-sufficiency of things (p. 172) lies much nearer the truth. Nevertheless, this is a negative conclusion which ignores its tremendous power of inspiration for personal morale and social reform. That Christianity has become a complex private philosophy in which the masses are not interested or sufficiently competent to comprehend (p. 201), raises wrinkles in one's brow. This thesis may have enough truth in it to hurt.

One might quarrel with Blackham's definitions of such terms as "ideology," "science," "morality," "philosophy" (pp. 61, 70, 74, 55), but none is trite. All illuminate the subject, and that is of course the chief purpose of definitions. Yet when he comes out with a purely empirical theory of ethics where the good life is taken largely to be what is actually chosen to be good by the greatest number (pp. 81-83, 87), this is only psychology. Humanism here reveals its thinness. Its frail love of ideals posed as what life ought to become, to say nothing of its disdain of theism and metaphysics, leaves most of us cold.

LOUIS WILLIAM NORRIS

MacMurray College

HALLOWELL, JOHN. The Moral Foundation of Democracy. Pp. x, 134. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954. $3.50.

The early decades of the Twentieth Century saw the devotees of values and faith in intellectual circles fighting a defensive and rear-guard action. This makes the unmistakable change of the last ten years all the more significant. The atom bomb and the march of Communism have sent more than the natural scientists to their knees. While the physicist unloosed the atomic age, it was the task of the social scientist to control it, and it is no exaggeration to say that he was almost totally unprepared.

Professor Hallowell's excellent book is symptomatic of the new trend. His main thesis is that the democratic way requires the Hebraic-Greek-Christian faith to undergird it.

In a succession of critiques of varying potency he attacks the anti-intellectualism of Pareto, Arnold, Freud and others, basing this attack on their necessary reliance upon intellectual weapons to demonstrate the fallacy of rationality. He then turns his attention to their opposites: the positivists and the modern liberals. The positivists by limiting their methods and "knowledge" largely to the natural sciences knocked out the props of ethics, faith, and conscience. These latter had subjected man's desires to refining and restraining forces which were required if he were to be a good citizen. Liberalism, influenced by positivism, had degenerated until natural rights had become merely legal rights—and the latter had no norm other than the will of those in power. Pragmatism subjected truth to the domination of human desire, erecting "wishful thinking" into a philosophy of life. Here the reviewer believes the author has slipped a bit, for later on he holds, "Man does not make his nature; he must conform to it." If our nature is true to the purpose for which we were created, then experience would validate this truth. While pragmatism is dangerously weak as a basic argument, it may well be useful to buttress conclusions as to the essence of morality arrived at on other grounds.

Professor Hallowell's affirmative case is powerful. Democracy must be grounded in the kind of individual that will make it work. That individual must believe he has responsibilities transcending the demands of the natural world. As a free man, he must accept principles of conduct as universally valid, and the obligation to discover and abide by these principles. In this he needs the help of a Higher Power, to turn his redemption from evil into an effective reorientation of his personality. He must regard his fellows as moral and rational beings, equal in the sight of God. Freedom is freedom under the laws of the universe by which laws human enactments are to be judged. We submit to the will of the majority only on the basis of the latter being reasonable and devoted to the common good. A Christian theology is a necessity if democracy is to survive and spread.

ERNEST S. GRIFFITH

Library of Congress

HALLGARTEN, GEORGE W. F. Why Dictators? The Cause and Forms of Tyrannical Rule Since 600 B.C. Pp. xiii, 379. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $5.50.

"Hardly anyone," writes author Hallgarten, "has as yet published a comparative analysis of the political technique of dictatorship and of the social and political chances that favored the careers of a few dozen mortals at the expense of other candidates less assisted by Fate. The present book is meant to fill this gap."

It is apparent that Mr. Hallgarten takes a dim view of most other studies of dictators and dictatorships. Of Jonathan Chambers' book on Dictators, for example, Mr. Hallgarten laconically says it "does not meet expectations raised by its title." After reading his own book I am inclined to repeat after him, "does not meet expectations raised by its title or its declared purpose." At any rate, Mr. Hallgarten hasn't answered the question his title poses, "Why Dictators?"

This is not to say the book is without interest. Indeed, it is filled with an astounding miscellany about dictators. Tales are told of Caesar's love life, and of the loves (natural and perverse) of Pisistratus of Athens, Dionysius I of Syracuse, Caesar Borgia, Napoleon, Hitler, and others. Their addiction to pomp and splendor, to monument building, censorship of art and thought, is described. We are told of their deeds and misdeeds in the fields of law and administration, taxation, foreign policy, war and peace. Mr. Hallgarten reminds us that although dictatorship is a hazardous and often short-lived trade, it is not unremunerative. "In the year X of the [French] Republic," he writes, "(1801-1802) the fortune of the former penniless lieutenant [Napoleon] was already 17,000,000 gold francs [sic] (well over $5,000,- 000)." Giangaleazzo Visconti is reported to have had an income in excess of £4,000,000 a year, and many another dictator did almost as well. Some dictators, we are told, are downright sadists, although it isn't quite clear whether it is sadism that makes for dictatorship or vice versa.

For the most part, Mr. Hallgarten's book is one of just such bits and pieces without much in the way of theory or structure. The Soviet dictatorship of Russia—more particularly under Stalin—comes in for more extended treatment, but without much that is new in either fact or theory.

According to the author, dictatorships assume one or more of four basic forms. These are (1) the "Classical," associated with a rising and flourishing money economy; (2) the "Ultra-revolutionary" or Communist dictatorships; (3) the "Pseudo-revolutionary" or fascist dictatorships; and (4) the "Counter-revolutionary" dictatorships, like those of military juntas in Spain or Latin America, which are more or less legitimate offspring of the fascists.

In describing these basic forms, Mr. Hallgarten paints on a large canvas. Every dictator he or anyone else ever heard of is here, if only for a word or two. The result is a book not unlike those heroic paintings in which hundreds of minor figures not only blot out the landscape but one another as well. In the end, this reader at least was left still searching for an answer to the question Mr. Hallgarten posed at the beginning—Why Dictators?

PETER H. ODEGARD

University of California, Berkeley

MUNK, ARTHUR W. A Way of Survival. Pp. 164. New York: Bookman Associates, 1954. $3.00.

As the cold war has unsettled the minds of men and fear has created psychological fox holes, philosophy and religion have been re-emphasized to expand horizons, give new perspectives and reaffirm a shaken faith in the future. It might be expected, therefore, that an author who tends to view all problems in terms of "social philosophy, ethics, and theology," and who writes on the international crisis of our time has an attentive and ready-made audience. Dr. Munk is the chairman of the Department of Philosophy at Albion College and has recently written History and God.

Part I of this book looks toward an adequate philosophy of peace. The author surveys and deplors such dangerous philosophies as materialism, fatalism, escapism, relativism and dogmatism. Cromwell's injunction against dogmatism is noted: "By the bowels of Christ, I beseech you brethren to remember that you may be mistaken." The author's own philosophy would be universal and comprehensive and it would support the absoluteness of truth and moral law, affirm a central humanism, and be characterized by a realistic idealism.

Part II of Mr. Munk's essay is concerned with an adequate peace strategy. He distinguishes between the supposed enemy, Russia, and the real enemy, the third world war. His approach to the prevention of war is synoptic and he is optimistic in noting "signs of hope." His "stars in the night" include the United Nations, neutral nations, and peace-minded minorities. Finally, the author believes that the crucial hour has come when not less than eight significant steps must be begun toward peace. These one must read for himself to appreciate. Mr. Munk concludes:

"Rough and difficult as the way to the temple of perpetual peace may seem during our darker hours, yet we must never despair of finally reaching it. . . . business, labor, the farmer, certainly all teachers, and above all the mothers of men whose sons the terrible Mars ever and anon demands in bloody sacrifice—all these must be rallied in one mighty endeavor for survival and a better day."

To support his case the author is generous in his citation of the Bible, various religious and philosophic writers, and the Detroit Free Press. It is to be hoped that these authorities together with the homespun style of Mr. Munk will be sufficient to arouse the ordinary reader, if not the scholar, to the danger and possibilities inherent in the present world situation. If the author's peace strategy has the ring of appeasement rather than peaceful conciliation, it would only suggest how far American opinion has drifted toward world war III.

MARTIN B. TRAVIS, JR.

Stanford University

COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS

HUGHES, PHILIP. The Reformation in England. Vol. II: Religio Depopulata. Pp. xxv, 366. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $7.50.

This is the second of two large volumes designed to retell the story of the English Reformation. A third is yet to come. The extent of the work provides something of a key to its fullness. The table of contents—eleven pages of fine print—is reminiscent of the Victorians. The illustrations, photographs of portraits and documents are numerous, handsomely executed, and fully annotated. Documentary appendices, a bibliographical note, and an excellent index complete the book. It is rather refreshing in this age of short cuts and the tyranny of high printing costs to see scholarship reclaim these externals of its time-honored kinship with leisure and contemplation.

The author works within the traditional framework, but does not, in the main, follow traditional interpretations (traditional at least in some countries). Not all of his contentions are new. Mary Tudor has already had a good deal of rehabilitation. Only the wholly prejudiced fail now to recognize harshness towards heretics as a malady of the age, not a single group. The myth of Edward VI as patron of education was long ago exploded. And few will rush to the defense of Henry VII, though there will be more who are reluctant to see Lady Jane Grey shorn of her timorous glamor.

Still there is much to offer new food for thought. Pollard, whom the author selects as a spokesman of the views he wishes to refute, is challenged again and again. His treatment of Bishop Gardiner's defense is labeled a "complete misunderstanding" (p. 94) and that of Cranmer's views on heretics a "masked apologetic" (p. 132). His interpretations of Cardinal Pole, the marriage negotiations of Philip and Mary, John Foxe's use of "facts," Mary Tudor's motives for punishing heretics, and other key points are all refuted. Some corrective was certainly needed; but it is doubtful whether as stalwart a giant as Pollard can be so completely demolished, and because of its controversial nature the chapter on "Changes in Belief" will probably not prove wholly acceptable to everyone, though its presentation of the contents of important documents will surely be welcomed by all scholars.

Students particularly interested in the interaction between the Reformation and contemporary social and economic developments will find especially rewarding the chapters that deal with the popular reaction to the ecclesiastical changes, the uprisings, and the role of the "new men"—"My father made the more part of you out of nothing" (Mary Tudor—p. 174)—all adding fresh material if not wholly new interpretations. The final chapter "Disension in Both Camps" is one of the best and should go far towards breaking down stereotypes that have grown up among the descendants of both camps. Whether regarded as a corrective or as a new challenge this book is an important contribution that no scholar of the period can ignore.

MILDRED CAMPBELL

Vassar College

GIPSON, LAWRENCE HENRY. The Great War for the Empire: The Culmination, 1760-1763. (The British Empire Before The American Revolution, Vol. VIII.) New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1954. $7.50.

In a recent essay on historical scholarship Professor W. Stull Holt decries the vogue of specialization and monographic preoccupation on the part of contemporary American historians. He mentions Professor Gipson's great study of The British Empire Before the American Revolution as the outstanding exception to this trend and the most distinguished multivolumed history written thus far by an American historian in the twentieth century.

The volume under review is the eighth in the series with three more to come.

Starting with the threat of French invasion of the British Isles in 1760, which was averted by the great English naval victory at Quiberon Bay, the historical narrative then proceeds to narrate the rising fortunes of Britain against France and her ally, Spain. The scene of battle is world-wide as the author recounts accurately and in detail the British conquests of Montreal, Guadalupe, Senegal, Pondicherry, Havana, and Manila. The reviewer, whose main interest is the British period in Indian history, was impressed with Professor Gipson's two chapters dealing with Anglo-French rivalry in India. One finds an accurate and comprehensive picture of the complex state of Mogul politics and the interaction of the designs of native potentates with those of French and English leaders.

The author seeks to destroy the old historical myth that British victory in the colonies was won in Germany, that Pitt's Prussian alliance was the major factor in the defeat of France. The real reason, the decisive factor, according to the author was superior naval power in the hands of Britain. This was the major key to victory.

In this volume one feels Professor Gipson's love of his subject, his admiration for the heroism and reliance of the "embattled island kingdom." He writes always with sympathy and often with admiration for the various British statesmen and commanders who played a leading part in the exciting duel for empire. Even George III, formerly so severely castigated by our older school of historians, ceases to be an ogre and appears as a king temperate in his habits, deeply religious, conscientious in his royal duties if mistaken in his policies. The volume concludes with a justification of the claim that the so-called Seven Years' War was one, not for empire, but for the empire; for the preservation of the British Empire. This point is buttressed by showing how moderate and reasonable were the peace terms incorporated in the Peace of Paris.

Three additional volumes dealing with the theme of the Triumphant Empire have been planned by Professor Gipson. The reviewer speaks not for himself but for the larger fraternity of historical scholarship when he expresses the hope that the author, septuagenarian as he is, will be able to complete his magnum opus.

T. WALTER WALLBANK

University of Southern California

UPTHEGROVE, CAMPBELL L. Empire by Mandate: A History of the Relations of Great Britain with the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations. Pp. 239. New York: Bookman Associates, 1954. $3.50.

Nonsell-governing territories present many difficult international problems, even if it seems evident that traditional colonialism is suffering a slow but certain death. The "in-between" period of transition from colonialism to nationalism is made less difficult for such areas whenever the international trusteeship system is permitted to function: orderly evolution and not revolution is thereby offered as the means to eventual independence.

Back of many recent developments is the tendency of other powers to follow Britain in surrendering the ties and the philosophy of outmoded colonialism.

A concise history of the relations of Great Britain with the Permanent Mandates Commission which operated under the League of Nations has been long overdue. Empire by Mandate fills this gap, being a detailed analysis of British experience in policy and practice in administering the several nonsell-governing territories mandated to that empire following the First World War.

The book explains the mandate system and discusses the general problems affecting the British mandates down to 1941. Separate chapters concern the island of Nauru, British Togoland, the British Cameroons, Tanganyika, Iraq, Palestine, and Trans-Jordan. The creation of a free Iraq was the greatest achievement in the relations between Great Britain and the Mandates Commission, the latter's contribution being to set up criteria for determining Iraq's capacity for independence. The greatest difficulties, conversely, came over Palestine. As for Palestine, the Mandates Commission approved neither Britain's proposal of 1937 to divide that country into three parts nor its plan of 1939 to grant independence to it after ten years.

Yet one looks in vain for anything of current developments in this study. Nowhere is the Trusteeship Council mentioned. The work simply covers an historical interval and is presented almost as it was first written. The present tense, which is widely used, consistently means 1941 and not 1954. Thus the reader himself must draw contrasts and comparisons with the developments since 1941. But even this earlier interlude suggests that a reader might well speculate, to discern what lessons can be learned now from the situations of the 1920's and 1930's. This reviewer's speculation makes the contrasts seem more striking than the comparisons, because colonialism, nationalism, and Communism are all involved (as best illustrated in Indochina) in the present widespread moves for national independence.

VERNON J. PURYEAR

University of California

RITCHESON, CHARLES R. British Politics and the American Revolution. Pp. xv, 320. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. $4.00.

For some time it has been a complaint among British students of the eighteenth century that their American colleagues have not yet fully appreciated the difference their researches have been making to the generally held view of British politics in the reign of George III, and so to our understanding of the causes and nature of the American Revolution. To some extent Professor Ritcheson's study will provide an answer to criticism of this kind, though it is to be regretted that the limitations of space which he has imposed upon himself prevent him from doing more than indicating the lines upon which he has been working and put considerable obstacles in the way of the general reader. The book will thus hardly stand comparison with the first volume of Professor V. T. Harlow's The Founding of the Second British Empire which appeared in 1952, but it not referred to in the bibliography. Furthermore Professor Ritcheson is inclined to take for granted a perhaps oversimple interpretation of the Revolution of 1688 and would have done well to check his views against another work which he omits from the bibliography, Professor G. H. Guttridge's English Whiggism and the American Revolution. Professor Pares's King George III and the Politicians was presumably published too late for Professor Ritcheson to use, but it would have helped to clarify the constitutional issue. It suggests that Professor Ritcheson attaches too much importance to the view that there was opposition to the strengthening of the Crown in America largely on the ground that it might then be too independent of Parliament at home. Again, Miss L. S. Sutherland's The East India Company in Eighteenth Century Politics (1952) would have been usefully referred to in connection with Professor Ritcheson's allusion to India as an alternative source of imperial revenue after the Seven Years' War.

The chief criticism against Professor Ritcheson must however be that he has got himself involved in a confusion of his own making. His thesis put briefly is this: the answer to the problems of Anglo-American relations in the second half of the eighteenth century should have been a federal one. This was not possible because although British opinion moved under pressure in this direction—a process culminating in the Carlisle Peace Commission of 1778—it would have meant the abdication of the monarch from a direct role in politics, and his willingness to become a mere symbol of unity between the different parts of his dominions. This did happen, so Professor Ritcheson assures us, but only after America was lost. There is thus a direct connection between the modern Commonwealth and the American Revolution. In reality this line of argument breaks down for the simple reason that the modern evolution of the Commonwealth has not been in a federal direction at all. Federalism—meaning the distinction between "local" and "imperial" affairs—had a long and subsequent history but every time proved unworkable. To call the association of independent nations which form the Commonwealth a federal system is strange doctrine from a countryman of the authors of the Federalist. Professor Ritcheson has made admirable use of British archives and drawn many plums; perhaps the process left him no time for a study of our contemporary institutions.

MAX BELOFF

Nuffield College
Oxford

BOWLES, CHESTER. Ambassador's Report. Pp. x, 415. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. $4.00.

It has been apparent for some years that American opinion regarding the untoward course of events in Asia has reflected considerable frustration and fear. It has also been apparent that the policies of the government of India, since the attainment of independence in 1947, have contributed to public bitterness in this nation. To many of us it also seems apparent that public bitterness about Asia has in large part been the product of public ignorance regarding the mainsprings of thought and action in that distant part of the globe.

For this reason, if for no other, a new book dealing with part of the contemporary Asian scene demands careful reading from the reviewer before it can be recommended to the public. When a work covers India and other aspects of current events in Asia it merits even greater attention. If the book proves to be illuminating it merits considerable approbation and support. If it goes so far as to explain to Americans how important segments of Asians think and why they think that way, it is almost a miracle.

Chester Bowles, recently our Ambassador to India and Nepal, provides such a volume, and it certainly merits careful and extensive reading from Americans. His book will also receive this reviewer's constant support, even though he may have to quibble with bits of it. For, writ large, his effort is to explain to an American public that is increasingly unhappy about the course of events in Asia, what the Indians are about and why they are motivated as they are. I can think of few tasks that need doing more urgently.

Since Mr. Bowles tries to say a great deal in a few pages he has, at times, to oversimplify . . . cut his explanation so short that it distorts some of his implications. In other places he allows his natural optimism to carry him away, as in his chapter on the Indian village development program. In spite of this the bulk of Ambassador's Report is thoughtful, acute, and perceptive.

We are faced with the task of leading a coalition of free nations and in order to measure up we are required to comprehend the views, attitudes, and aspirations of the millions of people who should be part of our coalition. Mr. Bowles's book does a fine job of explaining to this country what the people of South Asia think. At the same time his constructive proposals merit the most serious attention from our public. Finally, the very tone of his book constitutes a primer for Americans in the difficult task of working with other freedom-loving nations in defense of a common value—liberty.

ROBERT I. CRANE

University of Chicago

ANGUS, H. F. Canada and the Far East, 1940-1953. Pp. x, 129. Toronto: University of Toronto Press (issued under the auspices of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs and the Institute of Pacific Relations), 1953 (released 1954). $3.50.

To attempt in just 119 pages both an account and an interpretation of Canada's relations with the Far East and Southeast Asia since 1940 (pp. vii & 3) may be fashionable, but two careful readings of Professor Angus's slim volume have caused this reviewer to wonder whether brevity is not just another of the false idols to which historians have paid homage in the past.

Canada's hitherto unimportant role in the Pacific Professor Angus ascribes to the operation of three factors. First, Canada is not Pacific-oriented—"the primary interests of Canadians . . . lie elsewhere" (p. 101). Second, because of its traditional Atlantic orientation and small-to-middle power status Canada has no distinctive Pacific policy—it is merely "the resultant of Canadian policies in general" (p. vii). Third, Canada's position on any particular Pacific issue is "inevitably" influenced by its Commonwealth membership, but most of all by its close proximity to the United States—Canadian policy, "if it is to be effective, cannot deviate far from that pursued by the powerful neighbor" (p. 40). Canada's involvement in the Korean war, its participation in the Japanese peace treaty, and its current most-favored-nation trade treaty with Japan seem to indicate an increasing Canadian interest in the Pacific region.

The account of Canada's relations with "the countries beyond the Pacific" that Professor Angus has given is thin, disjointed and unbalanced as compared to that which appears in Professor A. R. M. Lower's Canada and the Far East—1940 (which, incidentally, this reviewer has just reread). For example: Can Canada's postwar "contacts" with Indonesia and Indochina be truly described in just thirteen and forty lines, respectively? If the special "qualities" of Canadian nationalism have influenced Canada's attitude to the new Asian nationalisms, why is so important a theme given but two-thirds of a page (p. 9)? If "trade . . . has been traditionally at the heart of Canadian interests in the Far East and the principal determinant of Canadian policy there" (p. 67), why is there no description of either the character or value of this trade? Finally, is there actually so "little Canadian opinion about the Far East" (p. 101), that parliamentary debates, newspapers and public opinion polls can be completely ignored in favor of a lengthy exposition of the official point of view?

MURRAY G. LAWSON

Arlington, Virginia

SLAVIC COUNTRIES

GRANICK, DAVID. Management of the Industrial Firm in the USSR: A Study in Soviet Economic Planning. Pp. xiii, 346. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $5.00.

The symbolism of planning has exerted an enormous attractiveness in the modern world since it conjurs up a vision of accurate and orderly prevision in men's affairs by contrast with the painfully visible muddling of our present mixed economy. Technicians of the Central Planning Board will somehow, it seems, establish consistent instructions for every unit in the economy, and each firm will only have to carry them out. A plant manager, here, would bear no resemblance to the old decision-making capitalist entrepreneur.

But in the USSR, where a planned economy is said to have been established, is this the way plant managers operate? The evidence presented in the highly rewarding study under review shows clearly that it is not.

Professor Granick has made a pioneering study of industrial administration in a totalitarian society, carefully based on inductive evidence from primary sources. His analysis will permit all those who are interested in planning, socialism, decision-making, public administration, or institutional economics, to add the flesh of experimental evidence to the bony abstractions of previous speculation. And they will probably be forced to revise at least some of their views.

The book applies the tools of an interdisciplinary social scientist to evidence collected, not only from hundreds of Soviet operating decrees, but also from thousands of day-to-day cases of management activity reported in the newspapers and journals published for domestic circulation within Soviet industry. It is a good example of the kind of research which is gradually putting our understanding of Soviet society on a solid foundation. And its general findings, based on internal literature for the 1934-41 period, are given dramatic confirmation by an independent analysis of Soviet firms based on exhaustive postwar interviews with a group of former Soviet plant managers (see Joseph S. Berliner's report in the Quarterly Journal of Economics of August, 1952). The two scholars do not reach identical interpretations, but they are clearly describing the same system.

After an opening survey of the organizational framework within which the Soviet firm operates, a sketch of typical personality types found among plant managers, and an excellent description of the process of plan making, the author devotes eight chapters to analysis of: (a) interaction between centralized controls and independent activity by the directors of firms, (b) criteria for the evaluation of managers' performance and devices for stimulating maximum effectiveness, and (c) party and worker participation in the decision-making process. He concludes with a stimulating twenty-four page discussion of bureaucracy, performance criteria, and the role of "politics" in economic affairs.

To this reviewer, at least, it seems clear that the vague slogans of "State ownership of the means of production" and "a planned economy" fade away when confronted with the complex problems of a modern industrial society. Certain arrangements "work"; others do not. Professor Granick's evidence suggests that the Soviet plant manager is not utterly unlike his capitalist counterpart. Yet the two systems are by no means identical, and it is important both scientifically and ideologically that we should be deeply informed concerning the differences. The contribution of this book toward improving our understanding in this field is a substantial one.

HOLLAND HUNTER

Haverford College

GUINS, GEORGE C. Soviet Law and Soviet Society. Pp. xv, 457. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1954. Guilders 27.50.

The author, a former Imperial Russian judge now teaching Soviet law at Berkeley, has set as his task the preparation of a manual contrasting Soviet legislation with the fundamentals underlying the law of the West. Soviet law is described as an instrument of politics whose detailed study is valuable only as an indication of Soviet policy and current trends in the Soviet Union. The principal trend is found to be increasing centralization of authority with consequent reduction in personal freedom. No student of Soviet politics will quarrel with this finding. The author then goes further to declare that he expects no reversal because socialism cannot produce the abundance promised. Consequently, the continuing poverty of a large segment of Soviet society will evoke ever increasing harshness to preserve order for the benefit of a favored few on whom the top leadership must rely for support. Proof of this thesis is found especially in recent increases in penalties for crimes of violence and for theft.

To cover the whole field of public and private law and the economic conditions of Soviet society in brief space, the author has necessarily had to compress his material greatly. There is no room for shading or speculation. Perhaps for this reason, the valuable case material available is omitted almost entirely with a consequent loss in reader interest to those trained in the common law. Perhaps also, it is necessary to adopt the view of a single school of jurisprudence as representative of the western thinkers. This leaves Dr. Guins saying that the West rejects Soviet law because it contradicts the psychology of the ordinary man. For proponents of other schools, no less hostile to Marxism, this may seem to be an oversimplification.

For political scientists the chapters on international law will probably have primary interest, for the author has demonstrated with abundant references that the Soviet position shifts to meet the needs of the occasion. The chapters on the structure of the state and the Communist party plow fields which have already been crossed several times in good English language books.

Dr. Guins' study should be judged for what it is—an instrument for use in winning literate men without legal training to our side in the cold war. As such, it has undoubted value as evidenced by the fact that its publication in Holland was instigated by the Secretary of the International Commission of Jurists. If judged as a contribution to what is known already by American political scientists and lawyers, the book is able to add little of depth to present knowledge because it treats of too many subjects in too little space.

JOHN N. HAZARD

Columbia University

KÁLLAY, NICHOLAS. Hungarian Premier: A Personal Account of a Nation's Struggle in the Second World War. Pp. 518. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $6.00.

Kállay's book is essentially an apologia justifying Hungary's politics since 1918 and defending his own wartime policies. In addition, he ascribes the present plight of Hungary to Allied decisions preceding, during, and following two world wars. The author explains how at the end of World War I the Allies "mutilated" Hungary, although neither she nor Austria, he says, is responsible for the war. The students of prewar diplomacy will learn that Germany "presumably had imperialist objectives" but that the Dual Monarchy entered the War in "pure self-defense" (44).

The author's observations on prominent personalities, political parties, and social classes in interwar Hungary are both interesting and illuminating. He has nothing but scorn for those who exaggerate the evils of Hungarian feudalism. Hungary, according to the author, could not become a democracy because her enemies "called themselves democrats" (28). Kállay speaks of his nation's neighbors with an air of arrogance and conceit. Hungary in his opinion represented an eastern extension of the western and Roman system; other peoples in eastern Europe were "Oriental pseudodemocrats" (27). He regards Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia as historical "fictions" (54-55), and his hatred of Edvard Beneš is indistinguishable from his hatred of Communism. The author presents his version of the history of Transylvania to disclaim any Rumanian rights to the territory (57-58).

Kállay goes to great pains to justify his wartime policy of attempting to preserve Hungary's independence and her peculiar system. The massacre of the Serbs at Ujvidek (Novi Sad) was openly discussed in the parliament, a situation which in his opinion would not have been possible in a satellite country (107-111). Incidentally, our author insists, the massacre of the Serbs was perpetrated not by the real Hungarians but by the Hungarians of "German origin" (109); nor was the repugnant leader of the fascist Arrow Cross (Francis Szálasi) a real Hungarian but a Hungarian of Armenian-Austrian origin (93). In contrast, Kállay writes, the good and honorable Hungarians like the Zrinyis were "a noble Hungarian family of Croatian origin" (468).

The author describes Hungary's part in World War II and especially her difficult position on the Eastern front. Together with the Italians, he writes, the Hungarians defended long stretches of the front alone, while the Rumanians were favored by the presence of supporting German troops. The author tells us how he provided his Axis allies with the minimum of economic and military assistance, ordered the newspapers to circulate news from the West, and accorded the most humane treatment possible to war prisoners and the escapees. He distinguishes his reasonable anti-Semitic policy from the more ruthless program of the extremist groups.

The summary of the author's conversations with Hitler and Mussolini and the description of the author's visit to the Vatican are of some interest. Perhaps the most important part of the book is the author's discussion of the wartime contracts between his country and the western powers and the nature of the secret accord he had reached with the British in September 1943.

The book is an epitome of the beliefs and desires of the Hungarian gentry, and the author belongs to that group of prominent refugees who, while striving toward the liberation of Europe, have weakened their cause by perpetuating the old country nationalistic and religious squabbles on which the Communism they hope to destroy feeds and thrives. Indeed, he deliberately promotes the divisive forces and mutual antagonisms among the people of enslaved Europe instead of espousing the supreme goal of liberation from Communism.

The foreword sketches the interwar period of Hungarian history; it is sympathetically presented by C. A. Macartney, noted for his many works on Hungarian history.

WAYNE S. VUCINICH

Stanford University

WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE

KOHN, HANS (Ed.). German History: Some New German Views. Pp. xi, 224. Boston: The Beacon Press, 1954. $4.00.

The distinguished historian, Hans Kohn, has performed a notable service in collecting and editing these essays written by German historians since 1945. The outcome of two visits Professor Kohn made to Germany in 1951 and 1952, the book includes two of his own introductory essays written in that superb style that has made the author famous as one of our great American historians.

The scholars represented in this book range from the recently deceased nonagenarian, Friedrich Meinecke, to his biographer, the thirty-four year old Walther Hofer, now Dozent at the Free University of Berlin. Eight of the historians represented are German, Dr. Hofer is Swiss, and Hajo Holborn, born and educated in Germany, now occupies the Randolph W. Townsend, Jr. chair at Yale University.

The essays are uniformly excellent. Karl Buchheim discusses the via dolorosa of the civilian spirit in Germany. Franz Schnabel, the leading spokesman today of non-Prussian German historiography, re-evaluates the Bismarck problem, concluding that the Iron Chancellor, despite his achievements, never realized that in history only those forces are preserved which devote themselves to world and historic goals. In another essay on Bismarck, Alfred von Martin tells his countrymen that they have trod the path of error, "because they are always impressed by the cavalryman's boot and a fist banged upon the table" (p. 100). Of equal merit are Hans Hertzfeld's treatment of militarism, Ludwig Dehio's review of Germany and the epoch of World Wars, Johann Albrecht von Rantzau on the glorification of the state in German historical writing, and Walther Hofer on revisionism in German history. Meinecke gives a penetrating picture of his predecessors, Ranke and Burckhardt, but fails to emphasize their misunderstanding of the moral and historical resources of Western modern democracy. In a brilliant concluding essay, Hajo Holborn calls for the formulation of a new German concept of history and new forms of social and political organization.

The importance of this book lies in the encouraging fact that German scholars have started seriously to face the trends and ideas of the recent German past. They have begun to understand the meaning and consequences of State worship and blood-and-iron implicit in the rigid conservatism of Bismarck and the irrationalism of Hitler. They are now asking themselves whether the road followed by professional historians since Ranke has not been a wrong one, not as far as facts are concerned, but on the crucial matter of value judgments.

Professor Kohn's judgment of his collection of essays is a valid one: "There are some hopeful signs at present that several German historians are seeking ways which will help to integrate the Germans into the West and thus provide a new opportunity for their creative contribution to a common civilization based on a common heritage" (p. 43). The new trends of rethinking German history, evident in this book, may well be one of the factors deciding Europe's future. Professor Kohn's significant volume is indispensable for the large public interested in Germany's future as a member of the Western community of nations.

LOUIS L. SNYDER

The City College of New York

PETERSON, EDWARD NORMAN. Hjalmar Schacht, For and Against Hitler: A Political-Economic Study of Germany, 1923-1945. Pp. 416. Boston: Christopher Publishing House, 1954. $5.00.

Dr. Peterson has written a highly diverting account of the economic and political career of Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht, and of the vast backdrop against which he was to display his talents and record his failures. Schacht is portrayed as a man of many contradictions; a man courageous and able, but willing to compromise his principles if the occasion seemed important enough; a man of great vanity, but on occasion daring to speak out against the excesses of the party and the policies of the Führer; a very politically conscious economist who was, however, capable of misjudging much of what was going on around him. Politically astute in many ways, he nevertheless, in 1936, was urging increased output of consumers' goods in order to sustain the demand for investment goods on which his conception of economic recovery depended; yet this at the moment when Hitler was about to order the German nation to make itself ready for war, including "economic rearmament in depth," within four years. The surrender of economic power by Schacht, the sponsor of colonies, trade, and sound money, to Goering, the autarchic planner, was inevitable.

It was perhaps the misfortune of Schacht that his special talents lay in the realm of monetary control and international currency problems at a time when aggressive elements of the National Socialist party were becoming convinced of the essentially subordinate role of money and international trade in a dictated economy. Inflation, said Goebbels, could be made acceptable to the public by propaganda. International trade and the balance of payments, said Goering, were of little importance in a nation skilled in the art of Ersatz. Indeed, at times the recital of events in the not so distant past has a somewhat archaic ring; as, for example, Schacht's belief that Hitler would permit a restriction of Reichsbank credits to the government to hinder the pace of rearmament, or even to put a brake on the excessive spending of the Nazi party.

Interesting figure that Schacht is, the author's purpose is not primarily to attack or defend him, but rather to help the reader "better to appreciate the past and present problems of Europe, political and economic" (pp. 15-16). This is a large order, which would seem to require a much longer book; but the author has succeeded in presenting a series of highly readable summaries of important political and economic issues. What is inevitably lacking in the treatment of such a broad subject in relatively limited space is sufficient detail to permit the reader in every instance to evaluate properly the author's opinions.

The author is to be congratulated for his thoughtfulness in preparing an extensive and very useful critical bibliography. Similar approval cannot be granted to the practice of relegating footnotes to the back of the book.

KENYON E. POOLE

Northwestern University

BRANDT, KARL. In Collaboration with OTTO SCHILLER and FRANZ AHLGRIMM. Management of Agriculture and Food in the German-Occupied and Other Areas of Fortress Europe: A Study in Military Government. Pp. xxxiv, 707. Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1953. $10.00.

During the war years, Festung Europa provided the Reich and the Wehrmacht with about fifteen per cent of their total grain supplies and a larger proportion of their meats, edible fats, and vegetables. But the normal surpluses of European countries were scarcely easy takings. First, Hitler's Europe contained important deficit areas; for these, new sources of food imports had to be provided in order to assure the bare minimum of subsistence or to maintain the flow of some surplus products, both agricultural and industrial. In addition, Germany supplied a large corps of agricultural advisers, managers and supervisors to assure necessary changes in the agricultural pattern and a flow of produce from the rural areas. This also required the formulation and management of a large number of incentive devices, and the establishment of some working relationships between occupying authorities and conquered, often unsympathetic, populations. Add to all this the unrealistic expectations and pressures on the part of the high command in Berlin, and one gets a general measure of the difficulties which the Germans encountered in establishing some more or less systematic inflow of foods and fibres.

It is indeed surprising not that exports from the occupied areas failed to achieve some theoretically attainable level but that enough were actually obtained to assure that food supplies would not interfere with the German conduct of the war. This achievement was partly a reflection of the skills of the German-appointed officials. It was also related to the degree of success with which German administrators were able to shield the economic and emotional realities in their individual areas of responsibility from the unreasonable expectations, attitudes and demands of Berlin. If there are general lessons to be learned from the German experience, they concern the importance of establishing programs in which both the foreign and indigenous authorities will want to co-operate for mutually acceptable goals. In general too, the German experience supports the proposition that it is the advanced, intensive, productive agriculture which tends to be responsive to change, while it is in the underdeveloped areas, where technical practices and levels of output are relatively low, that adaptation is most difficult.

Dr. Karl Brandt and his associates tell the story of objectives and achievements with great skill. To understand performance, however, one needs not only the actual record of wartime food and agriculture developments, but also a full picture of the facts and interrelationships of European agriculture before occupation. Indeed, I would consider this last one of the most valuable contributions of the study. The book becomes one of the best references, at least in English, on European agriculture.

The real achievement of the study is in the analyses by individual country. Less was done in integrating these analyses. They are tied together partly regionally, partly by the chronology of Nazi occupation. There is of course some comparison of policies and performance in different areas. Could this be carried to a point where the effects of different kinds of specific incentives might be contrasted? The study has a brief concluding chapter in which German imports from all the occupied areas are aggregated. It would have been valuable to have a comparable total of the "exports" which Germany had to provide for these. This would also serve to highlight the purely domestic aspects of Germany's foreign agricultural activities. Some answers, particularly on this last, may be provided in another Food Research Institute volume, soon to appear, on the food and agricultural operations within Germany.

WILFRED MALENBAUM
Center for International Studies
Massachusetts Institute of Technology

SMITH, D. MACK. Cavour and Garibaldi, 1860: A Study in Political Conflict. Pp. xii, 458. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954. $8.50.

When this book came to my desk, I held doubts about $8.50 and 458 pages for ten months of Italian unification, all in good solid prose little relieved by sprightliness. I am now a convert. With the detail usually reserved for May, 1789 and July, 1914, Mack Smith has written an exacting, archival narrative of the Cavour-Garibaldi relationship during the exclusion of the Bourbons from the Kingdom of the Sicilies. This is a sharply delimited book. Scarcely is there mention of events before April, 1860 or after the following December. Rigorously excluded also are Cavour's general diplomacy, papal politics, economic development; Mazzini is peripheral. Minute actions of Garibaldi, or say Crispi or Depretis, are documented; whereas major actions of Napoleon III are merely reported.

After Piedmont under Cavour had annexed in 1859 and 1860 Lombardy, Parma, Modena, Romagna, and Tuscany, Garibaldi and his Thousand took advantage of a Sicilian revolution to seize the island and then the mainland south of Rome. This he did in full loyalty to Victor Emanuel and his minister Cavour in the expectation of adding the whole Kingdom of the Two Sicilies to Piedmont in the name of nascent Italy. Smith makes it clear that for many reasons Cavour, though committed to unification, feared Garibaldi's successes to the extent of doing all in his power to limit or block them. He feared regional autonomy, radicalism, and republicanism; for Cavour's liberalism stopped far short of manhood suffrage. He feared, too, French intervention at Naples or Rome precipitated by Garibaldian recklessness. Smith holds that Garibaldi and his followers were more able, generous, realistic than they are usually represented. Cavour, by preventing Neapolitan and Sicilian autonomy favored by Garibaldi, made Italy's "Southern problem" difficult. Although Garibaldi never considered revolt against Cavour or his king, Cavour willingly planned to stop Garibaldi by force. Hence Cavour's armed intervention in the papal states to forestall a loyal but "filibustering" Garibaldi. No wonder the book closes with a breach between Cavour and Garibaldi; the former triumphant, the latter broken in power and dejected.

Smith's researches, which include recently available Cavour papers, are confirmatory more than revisionary. For individuals to whom the risorgimento and its international setting are well known, this book is rewarding and, indeed, almost imperative.

GARLAND DOWNUM

Arizona State College
Flagstaff

TURNER-HIGH, HARRY HOLBERT. Château-Gérard: The Life and Times of a Walloon Village. Pp. xviii, 297. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1953. $5.50.

Most sociological and anthropological studies originating in this country deal either with primitive cultures or with "Yankee cities." In the present book, an American sociologist applies the "Middletown" approach to a community belonging to a non-American, yet highly civilized culture. Château-Gérard is the fictitious name of a real village in the French-speaking part of Belgium not far from the industrial city of Liège.

The smallness of this village (population 877) enabled the author to rely almost exclusively on his own observations and informal talks rather than on sample interviews, informants, and questionnaires. Historical analysis was the only nonobservational tool used extensively; justifiably so, since many of Château-Gérard's present day customs, beliefs, and attitudes can best be explained by tracing them back to their origins in feudal or even Roman times. The author was well aware of the danger that the object of his study might be modified by his studying it. To reduce self-consciousness and suspicion among the inhabitants, he became familiar with the region's dialect, a foreign language even to many French-speaking Belgians. Professor Turner-High combined the scientist's skill of precise observation with the artist's gift of sympathetic understanding to describe Château-Gérard's family, class, and occupational structure, as well as its social, political, and religious activities. So vivid and accurate is the picture which emerges, that this reviewer felt at once transplanted to this region which he has known since early youth.

Some of the generalizations, on the other hand, are open to challenge, for example, that the Belgian party structure corresponds to class divisions (p. 180), or that secularism is less prevalent in Belgium than in the United States (p. 271). However, this is essentially a descriptive study. And yet, it provides much more than the description of the folkways of a particular village. Like Middletown, Château-Gérard is a typical community. It typifies rural life, not merely in Wallonia, but to some extent in many other parts of Western Europe. This book should therefore be of interest not only to the social scientist, but even to the American tourist traveling in Europe. It might help him to overcome some of his prejudices and to understand some characteristic aspects of the European way of life.

FELIX OPPENHEIM

University of Delaware

GRÉGOIRE, ROGER. La Fonction Publique. Pp. 360. Paris: Librairie Armand Colin, 1954. 1,200 fr.

M. Roger Grégoire is the first director of the Fonction Publique founded in 1945, the French counterpart of the British Treasury and the American Budget Bureau. La Fonction Publique serves the national administration to assure, through harmonious relations, the efficacy of personnel and agencies.

The author has an active part in intellectual organizations such as the Institut d'Études Politiques and the École Nationale d'Administration. He officiates as emissary to the Organization of the United Nations. War, combat, citations, and captivity enhanced his stature as man and patriot.

The book tends primarily to emphasize the human factor in French public administration. The title La Fonction Publique "designates the ensemble of personnel which incarnates the administration." In the past one spoke impersonally of state employees, agents, and functionaries. Under the new formula the author accentuates their role in the compass of a social approach to their personalized official life and labor.

Stability of French officialdom rests basically on royal grants built around the corporative system of the ancien régime. It has survived the Reign of Terror; Napoleon I; the Revolution of 1848; the Second Empire of Napoleon III; World Wars I and II; and the implications of the syndicalist movement of the twentieth century foreshadowing the socialist state. But, with the enactment of the Labor Code of 1946 historic factual stability is no longer one of garanties octroyées, guarantees bestowed by gracious authority motivated by enlightened self-interest. Instead, stability has come to flow from garanties légales, statutory guarantees buttressed by formal legislation enacted with legalized participation of syndicalized public functionaries. The result is a new pattern of stability growing out of an itemized expansion of formal legal rights and duties comprising: schooling, examination, appointment, selection, training, advancement, tenure, toleration of conflicting political affiliations, formal recognition of syndical organization of functionaries, provision of social personal and familiar welfare, and retirement pension. La Fonction Publique is enriched by a comparative treatment of relevant developments in major countries of the West.

In a pregnant Preface M. Louis Camu, President of the Banque de Bruxelles and experienced in administrative legislation, protests that one should not write a preface to a book one would have liked to produce oneself. Yet, warmly sponsoring M. Grégoire's work, he justifies and supports the author's abiding faith in stability of France and her public functionaries despite the all-too-evident instability of French multiparty government.

JOHANNES MATTERN
Johns Hopkins University

PADOVER, SAUL K., with the collaboration of FRANÇOIS GOGUEL, LOUIS ROSENSTOCK-FRANCK, and ERIC WEIL. French Institutions: Values and Politics. Pp. vi, 102. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1954. $1.50.

MÉTRAUX, RHODA, and MARGARET MEAD. Themes in French Culture: A Preface to the Study of French Community. Pp. xi, 120. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1954. $1.50.

These monographs form part of the Hoover Institute Studies of the "world revolution of our time," Dean Padover's in the Institutions Series, Drs. Métraux's and Mead's initiating the Communities Series. They approach from different and, to a certain extent, complementary angles the complex problem of analyzing the French community.

To this reviewer Dr. Padover's study represents an extremely valuable contribution to the understanding of contemporary France, but one in which the element of originality perhaps diminishes progressively. The first and most interesting section, based on a manuscript by Erick Weil, attempts to make explicit basic French values and to relate the difficulty and conflict encountered in reconciling them with the creation of effective political institutions. The ensuing section, written by François Goguel, traces more familiar ground discussing lucidly and succinctly the reflection of disagreements over the idea of democracy in the political structure of the Fourth Republic. Sections III and IV contain a largely factual exposition of social and material conditions, which the reader might wish had been more explicitly linked to French values, institutions, and policies. The title of the final section, "Foreign Policy," conveys the impression of an evaluation of France's external relations in the light of the ideas previously presented. Instead it is primarily a reprinting of an assessment of the reasons for France's defeat in 1940, plus highly condensed remarks on French Communism, neutralism, European Defense Committee, and Franco-German relations. There are useful appendices on parties, elections, and premiers.

The reviewer must of necessity consider the Métraux-Mead monograph with reference to its contribution in the field of political science. As such it is, like so many others of similar genre, alternately suggestive and questionable. Three sections focus on the foyer, the interacting locale of the family group, emphasizing the child's place therein, the process of his education, and the emergent individual's conception of the outside world. Additional sections present background papers analyzing the French Civil Code as it relates to the family, analyzing certain French movies, and presenting French projective tests. The careful reader will find many insights into the origins of French attitudes toward political, social, and economic issues. In this sense the second study complements the first. Inevitably the reader will be troubled, however, by the fact that he must make these links himself on the basis of highly impressionistic evidence. He will also be constantly nagged by questions as to the extent to which the data presented is: a) common to most Western cultures, b) common to all French social and economic classes, c) common to French urban and rural environments. Finally, the reader will be both annoyed and amused at the inclusion of innumerable French phrases beside their English translations. If the authors wish to translate, let them do so. If they fear misunderstanding will result, let them leave the material in its original form. French, in short, might be treated as a less esoteric language than, say, Urdu or Bantu.

EDGAR S. FURNESS, JR.
Princeton University

OTHER COUNTRIES

CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER. The Heart of Africa. Pp. xii, 487. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1954. $5.00.

The Heart of Africa, written by the Johannesburg Bureau Chief of Time and Life, is perhaps the best of the recent accounts on the social, economic and political situations and trends in that vast and variegated region of the world known as Africa South of the Sahara. Mr. Campbell is a knowledgeable and sophisticated reporter who, from his South African base, has traveled widely in the continent. In this volume he gives vivid and dramatic reports, varying in scope and depth, on selected developments in the Union of South Africa, Southwest Africa, Bechuanaland, Portuguese East Africa, the Federation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland, British East Africa, the Belgian Congo, French West and Equatorial Africa, the Gold Coast and Nigeria. The best account is that on the Union of South Africa; the reports on other areas are uneven in coverage and quality. Thus the reporting on Mau Mau in Kenya is superb and the interpretation of the realities in the Congo is perceptive, while the portrayals of Portuguese East Africa and French Africa are less adequate. The reports on the vital political developments in the Gold Coast and Nigeria, particularly the latter, are somewhat disappointing. Considering, however, the fabulously diverse and complex character of the territories surveyed, Mr. Campbell has done a remarkably good job.

In the final chapter, "Continent in Crisis," the author attempts to isolate the more important problems common to the areas surveyed and to generalize the basic trends observed. He quite properly places special emphasis upon problems of labor migration, land use, population pressures observable in some regions, the disruption of indigenous societies, and race relations. He is impressed by the profound social transformations occurring in Africa and emphasizes the revolutionary implications of these changes for the continent and the rest of the world. While he may overstate the extent and depth of these changes, his interpretation is essentially correct. Mr. Campbell perhaps occasionally overdraws the grim aspects of situations described. For example, he gives only limited attention to the forces in South Africa which may effect a more rational resolution of the tensions existing in that country, though admittedly the most optimistic observer would find it difficult to prove that a peaceful resolution of these tensions is certain.

In general, while Mr. Campbell's report does not penetrate "the heart of Africa," it does illuminate many facets of the African scene; and should, therefore, be welcomed both by the novice and the specialist in African affairs.

WILLIAM O. BROWN
Boston University

DAVIDSON, BASIL, and ADENEKAN ADEMOLA (Eds.). The New West Africa: Problems of Independence. Pp. 184. London: George Allen & Unwin, 1953; New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954.

This is a lively and at times penetrating review of Britain's colonial showpiece—West Africa. Her experiment at styling political and economic institutions in Nigeria and the Gold Coast according to her own historical development is watched by many with caution and by some, south of the Equator, with fear and dismay. The authors deal primarily with Nigeria's thirty million people and the four million inhabitants of the Gold Coast.

Geographically, West Africa is defined as that region lying to the south of thirteen latitude and to the west of thirteen longitude. Here dwell some sixty million Negroids of extraordinary diversity, ethnically and linguistically, in an environment ranging from dense and steaming tropical forest to barren desert wastes.

The aim of self-government is not a new one to the peoples of West Africa. Powerful despotic rulers of numerous kingdoms and tribes have for centuries battled one another in an endless series of subjugation and rebellion. Historical records, dating back to 957 A.D. when Arabian and Moorish travelers visited West Africa, give this region considerable time perspective and challenge seriously the conception of primitiveness. On the eve of European conquest, the Vai people of Liberia had virtually perfected the art of writing.

Nationalism in West Africa, as everywhere, is motivated by an economic seeking for improved standards of living. This motive has produced a solid ideological clash between the established chiefs and the commoners. It is against the former that the nationalist movements have thrown themselves with almost as much force as against the men of "sound administration"—the British colonial servants.

The authors establish a continuum of nationalism ranging from the tribal variety to a regionalism to nationhood and, finally, to a West African Federation. Politically, both Nigeria, a federal state based on a series of regional governments and the Gold Coast, a unitary state, have developed articulate party machines of both the right and the left, a civil service, and a hierarchical system of administration which remains so far somewhat top heavy and biased in favour of an elite of lawyers, chiefs, wealthy farmers and traders.

Although political independence is round the corner, the authors insist that economic enslavement remains in the form of foreign investment and a policy of extraction without refunding by the United Kingdom. Purchasing power remains very low while wages are calculated on a subsistence minimum. The wisdom of accumulating forced savings for the African farmer-producer by numerous marketing boards, who pay the grower well below the world price, is seriously questioned. In 1950 all the British colonies earned more than was allocated by the British Government for colonial development over a ten-year period. Could this be the spark which fires the tinder?

PETER C. W. GUTKIND

Makerere College
Kampala, Uganda

TINLEY, J. M. South African Food and Agriculture in World War II. (Food Research Institute, Stanford University, Studies on Food, Agriculture, and World War II, No. 6.) Pp. xii, 138. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1954. $5.00.

Although South Africa is best known for its mineral wealth, vital to its economy are exports of maize, deciduous and citrus fruits, hides, and skins which go largely to Europe. Its food imports include rice (which is important in the diet of the quarter-million Asians), tea, coffee, and wheat needed to supplement a small wheat harvest in the Cape.

Thus in 1939, when shipping was severely restricted, the Union faced the dual problem of agricultural surpluses and shortages.

South Africa fed most of its troops overseas as well as Italian prisoners of war brought to the country and furnished stores for enormous convoys calling at Capetown when the Axis blocked the Mediterranean. Wartime jobs were plentiful, and wages rose under competition for labor leading to marked changes in the consumption patterns of both European and non-European. They bought increasing amounts of fresh fruits, meat, eggs, bread, and butter. All this helped materially to solve the surplus crisis in agriculture but intensified the shortages. Even some vegetables which South Africa usually produced in abundance were scarce, and for a time no maize could be used for livestock feeding.

Food supplies held up well the first three years of the war but deteriorated the last three years—partly due to poor harvests. The government was loath to impose formal rationing, but after the war shortages became more serious and ration books were distributed. A last minute improvement in both domestic productions and imports staved off the actual operation of rationing.

Professor Tinley generally confines himself to a careful discussion of problems and how they were met. He implies that formal rationing would have been difficult but would have meant a more equitable distribution of food; that fertilizers were distributed where they did the most good; that the national diet shifted toward choicer and more expensive foods; and that in general the food situation was improved during the war years.

Students of agricultural economics and of South Africa are indebted to Professor Tinley, of the University of California Davis Campus, and to Merrill K. Bennett, director of the Stanford Food Research Institute, for this fine contribution.

EDWIN S. MUNGER

American Universities Field Staff

OSBORNE, HAROLD. Bolivia: A Land Divided. Pp. 144. New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1954. $2.50.

PENDLE, GEORGE. Paraguay: A Riverside Nation. Pp. 115. New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1954. $2.50.

LINKE, LILO. Ecuador: A Country of Contrasts. Pp. 173. New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1954. $2.50.

Among them, these small, but excellent volumes published by the Royal Institute of International Affairs present a good start for an understanding of the complexities of agricultural countries caught in an industrial age. Of these Bolivia is, because of the importance of its mining industry, most involved with the outside world. But even here, "the majority of the Indians are still living entirely outside the money economy, on a self-sufficient agricultural basis." Out of 3,500,000 people, only 45,000 work in the mines, and at most another 150,000, including women and children, find an occupation in some industrial pursuit. The few cities, the middle class, and the government depend upon the outside world. The rest of the population has little need for, and less knowledge of, the nations beyond their immediate horizon. This indifference to the world is reflected in the fact that, out of 200,000 registered voters legally required to vote, only 50,000 cast their ballots in the election of 1951.

These three agricultural economies, with their large landholding systems and primitive techniques, have to abide in a world of expanding industrialization, increasing costs, and a continuing inflation. The demands for a higher standard of living go hand in hand with an ardent nationalism and a zest for social reform that makes it difficult to find the capital required for new industries. The economic and social history of these countries has discouraged capital accumulation, and shunted what was saved into nonproductive channels. The ruling groups have been luxury rather than productivity minded. These facts, combined with political instability, have put obstacles in the path of economic development.

But apart from these shortcomings, the cultural contrasts, and the great difficulties of transportation would have proven formidable barriers in an effort to combine the tropics and the highlands in a way that would have satisfied the needs of a national economy.

Of the three volumes under consideration, the one on Ecuador is most nearly a compendium of facts with little reflection upon their meaning, while the one on Bolivia is written out of wide contacts and unusual insight into the nature of the country, its people, and its problems. It is one of the best books on Bolivia available in English. The author is fully aware of the essential tragedy of the Andean highlands entangled in an Indian heritage and a never fully assimilated Spanish conquest, and wedged against the demands of modern social reform movements and an impassioned nationalism. Mr. Pendle makes some reflections on Paraguay which deserve fuller treatment. Of these three countries, Paraguay is probably the most fortunate, not because it is richer or politically more stable, but because Paraguay has achieved what the others have not—national homogeneity and racial identity. All the Paraguayans are bilingual, sing their songs and write their best poetry in Guaraní. Good indices and selected bibliographies add to the usefulness of the volumes.

FRANK TANNENBAUM
Columbia University

LONGRIGG, STEPHEN HEMSLEY. Oil in the Middle East: Its Discovery and Development. Issued under the auspices of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Pp. xiii, 305. New York: Oxford University Press, 1954. $4.00.

No words better describe this work than Brigadier Longrigg's own statement on page v of his preface in which "he hopes that his historical and factual method of approach and his intention of objectivity may give to these pages at least the value of a reference book which may be found to assemble and synchronize conveniently the practical oil history of a group of countries and companies. . . ." Both Brigadier Longrigg's hope and intention are admirably and expertly realized.

Oil in the Middle East is a painstaking, precise, and compact account of the development of the world's greatest oil reserve. It traces the industry from its establishment as a modern enterprise in the late nineteenth century to its present spectacular achievement. The book is skillfully organized on a combined chronological and geographical basis, thus enabling the author to give full justice to the effects of the exigencies of two world wars and the opportunities of peace upon the successes and failures of each country and company. The search for oil in the currently nonproducing countries receives the same consideration as for their more fortunate neighbors. Much attention is devoted throughout the work to the organization of companies, their political negotiations with the governments concerned, the terms of their agreements, and their field operations. The work is greatly enhanced by statistical appendices, which give measure to the magnitude of Middle East oil operations, and a set of maps which fix the necessary spatial relationships. From the point of view of coverage the book leaves little to be desired.

In recording the history of Middle East petroleum, the author tends to give precedence to the British position somewhat at the expense of recent American accomplishment. This is a natural consequence of the long period of British tenure in the area, strong feelings engendered by the nationalization of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company (Chapter X entire), and the author's own background (British) as civil servant, military officer, and oil company negotiator and executive in the Middle East. There are few persons of any nationality, however, who are sufficiently experienced to provide the comprehensive view that Brigadier Longrigg has here accomplished. It is simply this reviewer's opinion that more stress on the significance of American participation in the Middle East petroleum industry, particularly in the realms of government and labor relations as well as technology, would have sharpened the focus of a volume already well trained on its objective.

DOUGLAS D. CRARY
University of Michigan

BARCLAY, GEORGE W. Colonial Development and Population in Taiwan. Pp. xviii, 274. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1954. $5.00.

The reviewer is delighted to have the opportunity to make a few comments on this book since it presents a case history of the effects of traditional colonial development on population change in which he has been greatly interested for more than a generation. In his Danger Spots (1929), he wrote, on the basis of 1920 and 1925 census data for Formosa, that "the very conditions necessary to increase considerably the productive capacity of natives in the tropics also make inevitable a rapid increase in their numbers" (p. 40). The author has shown beyond question that the type of colonial exploitation followed by Japan, which was typical of pre-World War II colonialism, had a tremendous effect on the rate of growth of population in Taiwan because it reduced the death rate without in any significant degree altering the family and social culture of the Taiwanese which in turn determined their birth rate. The author points out, however, that although the introduction of more modern methods of production and of more efficient forms of organization had this effect in Taiwan, there is no reason to assume that the modernization of an agricultural society must necessarily issue in such a rapid population growth that it will endanger the maintenance of relatively low death rates and such improvement in the level of living as may have been attained when better methods of production first came into use. The reviewer is in full agreement with the view that in Taiwan, and he would add, elsewhere, the problem of changing the cultural pattern so that the reduction of the death rate, which is now a relatively cheap and easy matter, would be accompanied by a reduction in the birth rate is very complex and is but little understood.

That the author emphasizes the essentially Chinese character of Taiwanese culture also seems highly important to the reviewer since it suggests the probable early effects of the modernization of the economy of China if little attention is paid to the reorganization of the cultural pattern that would make a simultaneous reduction in the birth rate probable.

The author's statement that "the results of Japanese rule in Taiwan are of little consequence to social science as an isolated series of events," but that "they gain their strongest claim to importance by revealing some social and demographic implications of policies that are often urged and undertaken towards non-industrial peoples" seems quite to the point. The reviewer would like to add, however, that those who are skeptical of the importance of population growth as a factor of the highest significance in looking to the future betterment of life in underdeveloped areas, would do well to read this careful and factual case study of what happened in Taiwan when no attention was paid to the demographic consequences of industrial modernization.

WARREN S. THOMPSON

Director Emeritus
Scripps Foundation

PANIKKAR, K. M. Asia and Western Dominance: A Survey of the Vasco Da Gama Epoch of Asian History, 1498-1945. Pp. xxx, 530. New York: John Day Company, 1954. $7.50.

When a distinguished statesman and ambassador of one of the world's great powers writes his story of a major event in history, the book must needs be of concern to everyone. In Asia and Western Dominance we have an Indian interpretation of Indian and Far Eastern history from the opening of the sea routes in the 15th century up to the 1930's. The sections dealing with the history of India during the British period are especially valuable and will be revealing to those Americans who have thought of English imperialism as only a force for ill in India's development.

Three-fifths of the book is concerned with the development of international relations from the coming of Vasco da Gama in 1498 in the "Age of Expansion" to "Europe in Retreat," 1918 to 1939. A wealth of interesting detail on the progress of the maritime powers and their effect on eastern Asia has been brought together. But the presentation is weakened by many obvious errors in names, dates, and so forth. Such slips as: Yoshimitsu referred to as an "Emperor" of Japan, British relinquishment of Indonesia in "1826," Chinese taken as "slave labour" to California, Korean kings sending "tributes to the Japanese Emperor," the Manchus "quietly" occupying Mongol territories, together with many misspellings of proper names necessitate caution in using the book.

Obvious bias is shown in the author's condoning Russian expansion at the expense of the Manchu empire, in a general disparagement of the maritime powers, and in overstressing the social chaos caused by "the missionary aggression to which China was subjected." Japan's actions are those of "an apt pupil of the great powers in their policy of expansion."

A special section of the book is devoted to "Christian Missions." The style here is more objective and the analysis of the reasons for failure is generally sound.

The section containing the most original interpretation of modern events is entitled "The Recovery of Asia" and is devoted to a history of the change of ideas in various countries including the socio-religious revolution in India.

The optimism of Mr. Panikkar's "Conclusion" is well summarized in one sentence. "The period of European control of the States of Asia is a dividing line in their history, for both by resistance and by adaptation they have had to call forth new vitality and consciously adapt themselves to new ideas by which alone they were able gradually to recover their independence and strength."

WOODBIDGE BINGHAM

University of California
Berkeley

HAMMER, ELLEN J. The Struggle for Indochina. Pp. xvii, 332. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press (published under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations), 1954. $5.00.

Dr. Hammer's detailed account of the struggle between France and the Communist-led Viet Minh for domination over Indochina will be of value as the only full study of the conflict in English. The sordid story, distinguished by blundering and bad faith on both sides, moves like a Greek tragedy towards its denouement. Dr. Hammer brings her study to a close just before the Geneva Conference was to show the extent of the division and indecisiveness of the western nations regarding Indochina.

The study seems not to have got to the root of the issue. Dr. Hammer makes much of the shift of the Viet Minh into the Communist camp in 1949. She repeatedly calls it disastrous, which it undoubtedly is for those who must live with it; but Dr. Hammer believes that the "disaster" was for the nationalist goals of the Viet Minh itself, in that it alienated many Vietnamese nationalists and brought American military aid to the French. "The Vietnamese Communists thereby made a military victory impossible," she comments on page 247.

Here Dr. Hammer walks into the trap that stultifies American policy not only in Indochina but in all Asia. What offends us, she seems to think, must necessarily offend everybody else. If she had spent even a little time in Vietnam she would have discovered that the overwhelming majority of the Vietnamese see no conflict at all between Communism and their goal of independence. For them Ho Chi Minh is not a stooge of Communism but a dedicated patriot and their best hope for independence. It is hard to believe that the Viet Minh forfeited much appeal by a shift to the Communist camp. Could any French-sponsored regime have captured this loyalty? Is it possible to "save from Communism" those who do not want to be saved? Can America form a successful anti-Communist alliance in Asia when the peoples immediately concerned consider themselves threatened not by Communism but by ourselves?

Dr. Hammer hardly approaches these questions, although it should have been clear long before July 20 that they are basic, and that the answer to all of them is NO. Americans cannot escape responsibility in the struggle for Asia, yet they can expect only continuing disaster until they realize that they are at cross-purposes with the peoples of Asia. Unless Americans can equate Asian anti-colonialism with their own anti-Communism, the inevitable consequence will be either capitulation or war.

WILLIAM B. DUNN

United States Department of State

LINEBARGER, PAUL M. A., DJANG CHU and ARDATH W. BURKS. Far Eastern Governments and Politics: China and Japan. Pp. x, 630. New York: D. Van Nostrand Company, 1954. $6.50.

Far Eastern Governments and Politics contains two separate historical accounts of the Chinese and Japanese governments and politics. The instructive thesis is maintained throughout the book that in spite of frequent and intensive foreign impacts upon both systems, their politics have always been consistent with fundamental native characteristics. Thus, today the Soviet-inspired Communist regime of China and the American-inspired democracy of Japan are shown to possess typical Chinese and Japanese qualities. This thesis is more successfully worked out in Japan's than in China's case. One reason for this is that the fundamental factors in Chinese government or their effects have not always been fully treated. The Confucian doctrine of the state and society is incompletely summarized. The lasting impressions of the T'ai-p'ing Rebellion upon China's government are hardly mentioned. The regime of Communist China and its place in Chinese political and cultural history are discussed too briefly. A detailed comparison of Communist institutions and practices with those of preceding regimes would have been a new and needed contribution to an understanding of China's government. The contemporary Japanese situation has received fuller and less formalistic treatment. The chapters on Japan, covering the years since 1941, are clear and lively. This cannot be said of all the chapters dealing with prewar Japan.

The authors are using an analytical and interpretative method, an assurance of enduring value. But it has induced them to state or imply some principles of Far Eastern governments or of history in general which occasionally approach the mystical and seem to need more substantiation to be convincing. There is, for instance, talk of "inevitable" events (pp. 120, 121); of China "suffering gigantic trauma from clash of cultures" (p. 25). The inexactness of this language is matched by the use of many terms which are bound to leave the student puzzled. What is an "unsystematic" civil war, what is a "brilliant" and a "lunatic" economy (pp. 347, 322)? Altogether the style of the book is often annoyingly pseudo-sophisticated, for instance when Japan is described as a modern nation-state "sans le savoir" when later the same statement is made in perfectly adequate English; or when "in terms of" is used ad nauseam and mostly unnecessarily if not wrongly in the second section of the book. Perhaps this disrespect for language is responsible for the misspelling of almost every French and German book quoted in the footnotes.

This is a useful book for the student with some background in Far Eastern affairs who wishes to get a summary of Chinese and Japanese politics. It is distinguished by the use of Chinese and Japanese sources.

WERNER LEVI

University of Minnesota

NU, THAKIN. Burma Under the Japanese. Edited and translated by J. S. Furnivall. Pp. xxviii, 132. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1954. $3.00.

It is always a privilege to have a work of history written by one of its participants. To see the relation of the actor to great historic events and the vision of these events in his perspective provides a special illumination obtainable in no other way. Asia, unfortunately, has so far given us little in this genre, principally because the national revolutionary leaders remain too deeply immersed in affairs to be able to write with the leisured reflectiveness granted only by time and distance.

It is therefore particularly welcome to have this brief memoir of the Japanese Occupation from the hand of the Prime Minister of Burma, Thakin Nu (now called U Nu), one of the chief actors of that period. Written in the flush of the events themselves, within the few months immediately following the end of the war, it is not to be compared with the considered, ripe reflection of a Trotsky, Churchill or Nehru. It has the rawness and the intimacy of the diary; it provides brief and enlightening glimpses, not finished analyses; it is a raw document of history, not history itself.

Three portraits emerge most sharply from these memoirs. The first is the attitude of Burma's leaders toward the Japanese occupiers. U Nu's memoirs make it quite clear that the Burmese leaders were not completely taken in by Japan's "Asia for the Asiatics" propaganda. For most of the leaders, the decision to go along with the Japanese was a carefully calculated risk, qualified by a readiness to break with them whenever it might appear necessary.

The differences among the Burmese leaders on this question were essentially matters of tactics rather than of basic outlook on national independence. The division between those who remained behind to operate the government and those who went into guerrilla opposition to the Japanese was not so sharp as has been assumed by the black-and-white moralistic attitude of the West. Ba Maw, the "puppet" himself, was no more motivated by a craven submission to the Japanese than Than Tun, the Communist leader, or Aung San, later the national hero of Burma's independence, or U Nu himself. There was constant communication between the divided segments of the independence movement, and Ba Maw himself could be called upon by the rebels in the field for all kinds of assistance. If Ba Maw overstayed the game on the Japanese side, it was because he misread the power and direction of the wave of history, not because he preferred the Japanese.

Another important picture that emerges from these pages is that of the Japanese as occupiers. For Americans, Japan has always been enemy, pupil, or conquered people. But for the Burmese, the Japanese as the wielders of power were a different animal. From an initial disposition to accept the Japanese as "liberators" or perhaps as the opportune instruments of their liberation, they quickly came to look upon them as arrogant, wily, and ruthless. The adjectives that recur over and over again in U Nu's description of his dealings with the Japanese are: tricky, stolid, expressionless, inscrutable, greedy. Racial similarity did not seem to make the Japanese any more palatable or more understandable to U Nu than they were to non-Asians who had occasion to deal with their harsher side.

Finally, we are given a brief glimpse of U Nu himself, the remarkably dedicated leader of Burma: a man of peace who found himself in the middle of war and an age of war; a quiet literary man who was thrust into the vortex of activity by events; a man capable of embracing both Buddhism and Marxist socialism simultaneously. His warmth, his richness of feeling, his generosity, as well as perhaps a fatal hesitation to be ruthless when ruthlessness is called for, all stand out strongly from these warmly personal pages.

Mr. Furnivall, the British economist who has prepared this book for the English-reading public, is to be congratulated on yet another act of devotion to Burma.

HERBERT PASSIN

Ohio State University

WILDES, HARRY EMERSON. Typhoon in Tokyo: The Occupation and Its Aftermath. Pp. v, 356. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954. $4.50.

This study of the occupation of Japan is the most comprehensive and thoughtfully critical treatment which has yet appeared of an incredibly ambitious effort to bring about basic changes in the ideas and institutions of a conquered state. Its author is an "old Japan hand" who took part in the administration of the occupation as a member of Government Section of Supreme Command, Allied Powers. He knows whereof he speaks; consequently, his book is an authoritative treatment written for the layman, but crammed with interesting data for the specialists. Mr. Wildes is critical, but not captious nor moralistic in his examination of the reform program. He sets the "occupationaires" neatly within the extremely difficult living conditions which the Japanese had to endure. It is apparent that much of his source material has come from Japanese in various walks of life.

The text is arranged in thirty-one chapters, beginning with "Occupation Atmosphere" and concluding with "In Retrospect." Concisely and clearly Mr. Wildes examines the effect of the occupation program upon the emperor, the Diet, the cabinet, the police, public health, and many other political, economic and social institutions. He shows that in numerous instances the publicity of the SCAP sections was unduly optimistic or unblushingly erroneous. General MacArthur himself receives comparatively little attention, credit for his measures being given in many instances to General Whitney, Chief of Government Section. This reviewer would not agree that Whitney rather than MacArthur was the principal inspirer of the new constitution, nor that MacArthur was inclined to be satisfied with the old one. He would prefer "Tycoon" to "Typhoon" in the book's title. The reviewer does agree that major credit for such success as the occupation attained should go to the Japanese people and that the G. I., for all his sins, deserves to rank as the true symbol of freedom.

Mr. Wildes concludes that "despite the occupation and despite the cancellation of its edicts, important changes had occurred. The Bourbons had been discredited; war leaders deflated; the bureaucrats had been jolted out of their insufferable arrogance." One may believe, however, that these results would have followed defeat, occupation or no occupation.

HAROLD S. QUIGLEY

University of Minnesota

ADUARD, BARON E. J. LEWE VAN. Japan From Surrender to Peace. With a Foreword by John Foster Dulles. Pp. xv, 351. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff (published in U. S. by Frederick A. Praeger), 1953. $7.50.

After relating chronologically the principal events leading up to the San Francisco Conference for the signing of the Treaty of Peace with Japan, the author, referring to the Conference opening, aptly remarks: "The drama would begin at the scheduled time." Indeed, the story of the American Occupation and the forces at work behind it has been dramatically and powerfully told, and the reader is carefully led up to the climax. Unfortunately, the plot has been revealed so many times before that it has lost its novelty, and the final denouement can scarcely be called startling. Most people are aware of the fact that "if Japan were denied the necessary economic freedom for the rehabilitation of her overseas trade," the resulting economic crisis might imperil the progress made by democracy in Japan, as might also "rigid state control which might result from an overestimation of the communist menace" (p. 293).

The highlights of the reforms instituted under the Occupation are well set forth and an interesting account is rendered of Japanese political parties, but all in much too brief a fashion to be of great value. In general, the guesses of the author seem to be educated ones such as when he asserts that the then British Foreign Secretary, Herbert Morrison, was convinced by John Foster Dulles of the soundness of an early American compromise formula regarding the signing of the treaty by the Chinese. This Hollander's appraisal of American plans, policies and administrative actions also seems objective and fair. However, the lack of footnotes is disturbing to the scholar, and one may question some of his conclusions such as that "some (farmers) have even reverted to the old practice of selling their daughters as preferable to selling their rice fields" (p. 284).

Although of minor importance, the failure to give more than the surname of many of the personalities mentioned is regrettable and the number of errors of orthography in this highly priced volume is amazing. This is particularly noticeable in the spelling of proper names such as "Pauly" (p. 84) for "Pauley," "Marquet" (p. 242) for "Marquat" and "Conally" (p. 251) for "Connally" et cetera, and one may well wonder for just what audience this book was intended. Nevertheless, one must agree with Mr. Dulles' judgment, expressed in the foreword, that despite being written without benefit of access to important source material not yet available, the book does give a most interesting and, on the whole, reliable account of the Occupation and the steps toward peace as seen by an experienced diplomat in Tokyo.

ALBERT E. KANE

Washington, D. C.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Sir:

On May 10, I sent Messrs. Don L. Kookan and Loren D. Ayres a lengthy letter citing important errors in their January 1954 ANNALS article, "Police Unions and the Public Safety." A summary of that letter follows.

The authors elaborate their ideas of craft union activities, attempting to show that some are illegal or incompatible with police responsibilities. They are unaware of the present nature of police union organization, its methods or its successes.

While I disagree with the estimate given of craft unions, it is important to point out immediately in the limited space allotted me that there has been no attempt in the last twenty years to apply the methods the authors described to police organization.

The American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, American Federation of Labor, is the only union to successfully organize thousands of policemen. In structural terminology, ours is an industrial union which has adapted its approach to special police needs.

Our union's membership pledge is quoted as "... an example of the potential incompatibility of unionism and the professional ideal. ..." This pledge went out of date with our 1940 constitution. With proper research at the time their article was written, the authors would have found that the union policeman pledges to his union "... to perform faithfully all the duties assigned to me. ..."

The authors say that the "... checkoff system ... cannot be legally applied to police service. ..." Many of the police locals do have the checkoff system.

The closed shop is not an issue in police unionization. We do not ask for it. It is not necessary to our successful operation. I believe at the time the article was written, the closed shop was even illegal in private industry. Then why discuss it in an article on police unions?

The authors state: "The courts have declared, however, that municipalities ... are without power to enter collective bargaining agreements. ..." There exist hundreds of such agreements, some approved by court action, others by attorney generals and city solicitors. Are these a myth?

Now the one way to make people worry about police unionization is to raise the bogus of strikes as the authors do. Police charters issued by the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees forbid strikes. We can prove that where there is a history of public employee strikes, unionization has reduced or eliminated them.

The authors refer to professional organizations "in contrast with the selfish interest of craft unions." It appears to me that the authors have rationalized themselves into attacking the non-existent tactics of a mythical craft union of police employees. I know of no such creature.

The article says of unions, "They evince little concern over how their demands will affect the employer." The AFSC & ME is second to none in devotion to public causes, advocating a career service, and higher standards of morality and performance in public service. Our constitution states these objectives.

If the authors say they were not applying these remarks to the AFSC & ME, then they were operating in a vacuum. Essentially there is no other American union among police employees.

LEO KRAMER

International Representative, New England Region

American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees

OTHER BOOKS

- BAYLIFF, RUSSELL E., EUGENE CLARK, LOYD EASTON, BLAINE E. GRIMES, DAVID H. JENNING, NORMAN H. LEONARD. Readings in Social Policy. Pp. xiii, 529. Dubuque, Iowa: William C. Brown Company, 1954. $3.65.
- BERNHARD, RICHARD C. Economics. Pp. xiv, 801. Boston: D. C. Heath and Company, 1954. $6.00.
- BROWNRIGG, WILLIAM. The Human Enterprise Process and Its Administration. Pp. 225. University, Alabama: University of Alabama Press, 1954. $4.50.
- BUSH, GEORGE P. (Annotated by). Bibliography on Research Administration. Pp. iv, 146. Washington, D. C.: University Press of Washington, D. C., 1954. $4.00.
- Chapters in Western Civilization*. Vol. I. Selected and edited by the Contemporary Civilization Staff of Columbia College, Columbia University. Pp. 545. 2nd ed. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. $4.00.
- CORWIN, EDWARD S. The Constitution and What It Means Today. Pp. xiv, 340. 11th ed. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1954. $5.00.
- CURL, PETER V. (Ed.). Documents on Ameri-

- can Foreign Relations*, 1953. Pp. xxii, 458. New York: Harper & Brothers for the Council on Foreign Relations, 1954. $5.00.
- DAVIES, HORTON. Christian Deviations: Essays in Defence of the Christian Faith. Pp. 120. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $2.75.
- DE LUCA, MARIO, et al. Studi di Economia e Statistica. (Publicazioni della Facoltà di Economia e Commercio, Series 1, No. 1.) Pp. 302. Catania, Italy: Università di Catania, 1950-51. No price.
- DE ZENDEGUI, GUILLERMO. Ambito de Martí. Pp. 222. Havana, Cuba: La Comisión Nacional Organizadora de los Actos y Ediciones del Centenario y del Monumento de Martí, 1953. No price.
- Documents on German Foreign Policy, 1918-1945*. Series D (1937-1945). Vol. VIII: The War Years, September 4, 1939-March 18, 1940. Pp. lxxxvi, 974. Washington, D. C.: Department of State, 1954. $4.00.
- EATON, JOSEPH W., and ALBERT J. MAYER. Man's Capacity to Reproduce: The Demography of a Unique Population. Pp. 59. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1954. $2.00.
- FIREMAN, PETER. Preceptualistic Theory of Knowledge. Pp. xii, 50. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $2.75.
- GODE, ALEXANDER. Interlingua a Prime Vista. Pp. 79. New York: Storm Publishers, 1954. $2.00.
- GREGG, JOSIAH. Commerce of the Prairies. Edited by Max L. Moorhead. Pp. xxxvii, 439. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. $7.50.
- GRIFFITH, ERNEST S. The American System of Government. Pp. v, 202. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1954. $2.50 cloth; $1.25 paper.
- GRIMES, BLAINE E., and EUGENE CLARK (Eds.). Values and Policy in American Society. Pp. xv, 528. Dubuque, Iowa: William C. Brown Company, 1954. $4.00.
- GUERRANT, EDWARD O. Modern American Diplomacy. Pp. xiv, 318. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1954. $6.00.
- Handbook of Private Schools: An Annual Descriptive Survey of Independent Education*. Pp. 1,214. 35th ed. Boston: Porter Sargent, 1954. No price.
- INSTITUTE OF LIFE INSURANCE. Life Insurance Fact Book, 1954. Pp. 111. New York: Institute of Life Insurance. No price.
- Institutions of Primitive Society, The: A Series of Broadcast Talks by E. E. Evans-Pritchard, Raymond Firth, E. R. Leach, J. G. Peristiany, John Layard, Max Gluckman, Meyer Fortes, and Godfrey Lienhardt*

BOOK DEPARTMENT

- Pp. viii, 107. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1954. $2.50.
- Introduction to Contemporary Civilization in the West: A Source Book*. Prepared by the Contemporary Civilization Staff of Columbia College, Columbia University. 2nd ed. Pp. x, 1264. New York: Columbia University Press, 1954. No price.
- ISTIQLAL (INDEPENDENCE) PARTY OF MOROCCO. The Morocco Under the Protectorate: Forty Years of French Administration. Pp. 63. New York: The Istiqlal Party of Morocco, 1953. No price.
- JOHNSON, JOHN L. Assisted by Elan Greene. The Economy of Northern Kentucky. Pp. v, 52. Frankfort, Kentucky: Agricultural and Industrial Development Board of Kentucky, 1954. No price.
- KING, FRANCIS P. Financing the College Education of Faculty Children: A Study Conducted by Teachers, Insurance, and Annuity Association for the Fund for the Advancement of Education. Pp. xii, 115. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1954. $1.75.
- LABARRE, WESTON. The Human Animal. Pp. xv, 372. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954. $6.00.
- LETHBRIDGE, T. C. The Painted Men. Pp. 208. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $6.00.
- MACK, RUTH P. Factors Influencing Consumption: An Experimental Analysis of Shoe Buying. (National Bureau of Economic Research, Technical Paper No. 10.) Pp. viii, 124. New York: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1954. $2.00 paper.
- MCAUGHTON, WAYNE L., and JOSEPH LAZAR. Industrial Relations and the Government. Pp. ix, 531. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1954. $6.00.
- MARSHALL, CHARLES BURTON. The Limits of Foreign Policy. Pp. 128. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1954. $3.00.
- MASALDAN, P. N. Evolution of Provincial Autonomy in India, 1858 to 1950; with Special Reference to Uttar Pradesh. Pp. viii, 215. Bombay, India: Hind Kitabs, 1953 (distributed in the U. S. by W. S. Heinman). $3.50.
- MASTERSON, WILLIAM H. William Blount. Pp. viii, 352. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1954. $5.00.
- MILBANK MEMORIAL FUND. The Interrelations of Demographic, Economic, and Social Problems in Selected Underdeveloped Areas. Pp. 198. New York: Milbank Memorial Fund, 1954. $1.00.
- MONELLI, PAOLO. Mussolini: The Intimate Life of a Demagogue. Translated by Brigid

- Maxwell. New York: Vanguard Press, 1954. $4.00.
- PADELFORD, NORMAN J., and SARA L. KRINER (Eds.). Contemporary International Relations Readings. (Third Series.) Pp. xi, 388. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. No price.
- PAILOT, FERNAND, RICHARD DORNEMANN, CARL KURTZ, and GÜNTER SCHMÖLDERS. Internationaler Steuerbelastungsvergleich. Vol. III: Die Besteuerung der gewerblichen Einkünfte in Belgien, Frankreich, Luxemburg, Schweden und der Schweiz. (Schriftenreihe der Deutschen Europa-Akademie, No. 16.) Pp. 183. Frankfurt a. M.: Institut für Europäische Politik und Wirtschaft, 1954. No price.
- PARKS, JOSEPH H. General Kirby Smith, C. S. A. Pp. viii, 509. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1954. $6.00.
- PEALY, DOROTHEE STRAUSS. A Statewide Census Every Five Years. Pp. ii, 16 (appendices A to F inc.). Ann Arbor: Bureau of Government, Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan, 1954. 50 cents.
- PEI, MARIO A., and FRANK GAYNOR. A Dictionary of Linguistics. Pp. vi, 238. New York: Philosophical Library, 1954. $6.00.
- PHILLIPS, JEWELL CASS. State and Local Government in America. Pp. viii, 728. New York: American Book Company, 1954. $6.00.
- PICK, FRANZ. 1954 Black Market Yearbook. Pp. x, 210. New York: Pick's World Currency Report, 1954. $25.00.
- POLLITT, BASIL H. Justice and the Justices. Pp. 210. Daytona Beach, Florida: College Publishing Company, 1954. $4.00 cloth; $3.00 paper.
- PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION ORGANIZATION. A Directory of Unofficial Organizations in the Field of Public Administration in the United States and Canada. Pp. 150. Chicago: Public Administration Clearing House, 1954. $2.50.
- PURCELL, ROYAL. The Three Highways to World War. Pp. 53. New York: Pageant Press, 1954. $2.00.
- RAO, A. V. RAMAN. Structure and Working of Village Panchayats: A Survey Based on Case Studies in Bombay and Madras. (Gokhale Institute of Politics and Economics, Publication No. 28.) Pp. xvi, 218. Poona, India: Gokhale Institute of Politics and Economics, 1954. $1.50.
- RAPOPORT, ROBERT N. Changing Navaho Religious Values: A Study of Christian Mis-
- sions to the Rimrock Navahos*. (Papers of the P.M.A.A.E. Vol. XLI, No. 2.) Pp. xiv, 146. Cambridge, Mass.: Peabody Museum of American Archaeology and Ethnology, Harvard University, 1954. No price.
- ROBSON, WILLIAM A. The University Teaching of the Social Sciences: Political Science. Paris: United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization, 1954 (distributed by Columbia University Press). $1.50.
- SALVEMINI, GAETANO. The French Revolution, 1788-1792. Translated from the Italian by I. M. Rawson. Pp. 343. First English Edition. Original Italian Edition published in 1905. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1954. $5.00.
- SAPIN, BURTON, RICHARD C. SNYDER and H. W. BRUCK. An Appropriate Role for the Military in American Foreign Policy-Making: A Research Note. (Foreign Policy Analysis Project, Foreign Policy Analysis, Series No. 4.) Pp. iv, 64. Princeton: Organizational Behavior Section, Princeton University, 1954. No price.
- SAVETH, EDWARD N. Understanding the American Past. Pp. ix, 563. Boston: Little, Brown, and Company, 1954. $6.00.
- SCHLEICHER, CHARLES P. Introduction to International Relations. Pp. xvi, 941. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1954. $6.75.
- SCHUMPETER, JOSEPH A. Economic Doctrine and Method. Pp. v, 201. New York: Oxford University Press, 1954. $3.50.
- SHELDON, BUTLER, JR. The 5th Freedom: Freedom From Taxation. Pp. xv, 111. New York: Library Publishers, 1954. $2.75.
- SMITH, T. LYNN. Brazil: People and Institutions. Pp. xxx, 704. Revised ed. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1954. $7.50.
- STRAUSZ-HUPÉ, ROBERT, and STEFAN T. POSSONY. International Relations in the Age of the Conflict Between Democracy and Dictatorship. (McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science.) Pp. xiv, 826. 2nd ed. New York: McGraw-Hill Company, 1954. $6.50.
- TAX FOUNDATION. Constitutional Debt Control in the States. (Project Note No. 35.) Pp. 40. New York: Tax Foundation, 1954. No price.
- TRECKER, AUDREY R., and HARLEIGH B. TRECKER. Committee Common Sense. Pp. 158. New York: Whiteside, and William Morrow and Company, 1954. $2.50.
- UNESCO. Basic Facts and Figures: Illiteracy, Education, Libraries, Museums, Books, Newspapers, Newsprint, Film, Radio, and

- Television*. Pp. 84. Paris: United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization, 1954. $1.00.
- USHER, ABBOTT PAYSON. A History of Mechanical Inventions. Pp. xi, 450. Revised ed. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $9.00.
- VALENTINE, ALAN. The Age of Conformity. Pp. xi, 179. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1954. $3.00.
- WHITE, DONALD J. The New England Fishing Industry: A Study in Price and Wage Setting. (Wertheim Fellowship Publications, Harvard Economic Studies, Vol. XCIV.) Pp. xvii, 205. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1954. $4.00.
- WILLIAMS, GEORGE HUNTSTON. The Harvard Divinity School: Its Place in Harvard University and American Culture. Pp. xvi, 366. Boston: The Beacon Press, 1954. $5.00.
- Year Book of World Affairs, 1954, The* Published under the auspices of the London Institute of World Affairs. Pp. xii, 378. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1954. $7.50.

INDEX

- Acheson, Dean, quoted, 68
 Africa, 101-102, 142, 144
See also North Africa; South Africa; and names of individual countries
 Aggression, definition of, 10, 71, 81, 88
 Albania, 71, 94
 Alexander I, Czar of Russia, 144
 Algeciras, Conference of, 144
 American Association for the United Nations, 48
 American Bar Association, 48
 Angell, James W., 43
 ANZUS (Pacific Security Treaty), 10, 96, 104
 Arabs and Arab countries, 22, 24, 36, 39, 108
 Argentina, 40, 141
 Armament regulation and mental attitudes, 18-19, 117, 125, 129, 130
 by U.N., 158 control plan, 117-123, 124, 125-127, 128, 130 control authority, 119-121, 122, 128, 130 standstill plan, 118-119, 124, 125, 126-127, 128 need of, vii, 19, 155, 157 past failures, 16, 155
See also Atomic energy; Baruch plan; Disarmament; Disarmament Commission
 Armed forces, for U.N., 5, 8, 16, 20, 29, 145
 Arms census, 118, 121, 128
 ARON, RAYMOND, Limits to the Powers of the United Nations, 20-26
 Aron, Raymond, cited, 106
 Asia, 23, 25, 99, 108, 127, 142, 144
 Economic Commission for, 39, 94
See also Far East; Southeast Asia; and names of countries
 Atlantic Charter, 47, 105
 Atlantic Pact, see North Atlantic Treaty
 Atomic energy destructive power of A-bomb, 124 development for peace, 121-122
 Eisenhower proposal for international pool of, 14, 17-18, 121, 130 implications for U.N., vii, 14-15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 23, 48, 49, 85, 96, 117, 123, 155
 Soviet-free world equality in, 119
 Soviet plan, for ban of atomic weapons, 118, 123, 125, 129 weapons, prohibition of, 19, 119
See also above Soviet plan
 Atomic Energy Commission (U.N.), 119-120
 Australia, 63-64, 67, 73-74
 ANZUS pact, 10, 96, 104
 Austria, 94, 127
 Austria-Hungary, 144
 Bacterial warfare, 15
 Baruch plan, 119, 120, 127, 128
 BEBLER, ALES, The Yardstick of Collective Interest, 85-92
 Bebler, Ales, cited, 106
 Bentwich, N. de M., cited, 1
 Berlin, Congress and Treaty of (1878), 46, 144
 Berlin blockade, 84
 Berlin Conference (1884-85), on Congo affairs, 46, 56
 Bermuda Conference, 14
 Bismarck, Otto von, 144
 Bitker, Bruno V., quoted, 48
 Borchard, Edwin M., cited, 46
 BRENTANO, HEINRICH VON, Comment on Expanding the United Nations Community, 97-98
 Brentano, Heinrich von, cited, 106
 Bricker amendment, 47, 48, 52
 British Commonwealth, 5, 82, 96
 Brookings Institution, vii
 Brussels Conference (1890), 46, 56
 Brussels Treaty (1948), 9
 Bulgaria, 23, 52, 94
 Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, 148
 Byrnes, James F., 148-149
 quoted, 68
 Cambodia, 25, 94
 Capitalism, 128, 143, 145
 Carneades, 50
 Carroll, Lewis, quoted, 106
 CAVERS, DAVID F., International Control of Armaments, 117-123
 Ceylon, 94
 CHAMBERLIN, WALDO, Strengthening the Secretariat, 131-133 Charter (U.N.)
 amendment, see Charter review conference;
 Charter revision
 as a legal and political document, viii, 56, 61-62, 64-65, 68, 70-76, 155 violations of, 11, 13, 73, 114, 142, 147, 149
 See also below development and change—constitutional issues in and interpretation
 criticism of, 140
 development and change, 1, 4-12, 37, 109, 112, 115, 152, 158
 bibliography, 1-2, 160
 constitutional issues in, 11, 12-13, 61-62, 68, 75-76, 114 See also above as a legal and political document drawn up by capitalist and socialist powers, 145 interpretation of, 6, 12-13, 71-76 revision, see Charter review conference;
 Charter revision
 Charter review conference
 Charter provision for, 3-4, 18, 140 possibility of democratic representation in, 99 preparatory study and discussion, vii, viii, 13, 30, 104, 106, 141-142, 147-153 (passim), 155, 158, 159-162
 U. S. position on, 4, 13, 30, 147, 148-149, 151-153, 158
 Charter revision
 bibliography, 1-2, 160
 Charter provisions for, 1-4, 140, 142 desirability of, discussed in relation to armament regulation, 19, 117, 118, 119, 120, 125-126, 130, 158 clarification of Secretary-General's political role, 139 dispute settlement, see below maintenance of peace and security domestic jurisdiction of states and state sovereignty, 13, 19, 87, 92, 146, 158 economic and social development, viii, 36-37 functions and powers of General Assembly and Security Council, 13, 20, 28, 34-35, 88-90, 92, 108-109, 114, 154-155, 158 human rights, vii, 17, 47, 48, 54-55 international law, development of, 76, 155 maintenance of peace and security, vii, viii, 17, 19, 22, 25, 27, 28, 34-35, 48, 87-92, 105, 154 membership increase, 12, 94, 96, 97, 101, 115, 158 non-self-governing territories, vii, 64-67, 142, 146, 158
 regionalism, 95, 96, 97, 158
 specialized agencies, 158
 voting procedures, 19, 20, 30, 89, 92, 109, 141-142, 148, 149, 154, 158 difficulty of, 18-19, 30, 106, 109, 140, 156, 158 risks of, viii, 12, 106, 109, 112, 115, 142-143, 146, 148, 152, 153 value as compared to informal change, 12-13, 112, 115
 See also Charter review conference
 Chase, E. P., cited, 1
 China, 143
 China, People's Republic of, 21, 23, 80, 107, 111, 127
 and armament regulation, 123, 124, 128
 in Korean War, 8, 24, 91
 sense of community and government in, 101 trade and trade embargo on, 8, 107, 123
 U.N. membership for, 100, 102, 105, 115, 123, 149, 157
 Churchill, Winston, 14
 quoted, 98
 Civil liberties, 49, 52, 53, 54
 Civil service, international, as ideal for U.N. Secretariat, 133, 136
 Civil wars, significance of, 11, 21, 39, 79, 90-91, 92, 111, 122-123
 CLARK, GRENVILLE, Comment on International Control of Armaments, 124-125
 Clark, Grenville, cited, vii
 COHEN, BENJAMIN V., Comment on International Control of Armaments, 125-127
 Cold war, see East-West conflict
 COLE, W. STERLING, Comment on International Control of Armaments, 127-129 Collective Measures Committee (U.N.), 8, 30, 96
 Collective security
 and human rights, 49, 50, 53
 and sense of community, 93
 U.N. system, vii, viii, 5, 9-10, 12, 16, 20-26, 48, 77, 85-89 (passim), 92, 97-98, 103-104, 105, 108, 113, 145, 154, 157, 160
 Colonialism and colonial powers and U.N., 21-22, 24-25, 57-67, 100, 111, 140, 142, 146, 154 anticolonialism, 21, 64, 72, 74, 140 colonial expansion, 19th century, 144 evolution of concept of colonization, 56-58 relation to international peace and security, 21-22, 24-26, 58, 67, 79, 111
 See also National liberation and nationalism; Self-determination Commission on Human Rights (U.N.), 52
 Commission on the Status of Women (U.N.), 74
 Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (U.N.), 7, 63, 107 Communications and regional organizations, 40 freedom of, 49
 International Telecommunication Union, 38 modern conditions of, and national survival, 50, 102-103
 Communism, 104, 105
 and nationalism, 23
 containment of, 81-82
 See also China, People's Republic of; East-West conflict; Soviet bloc; Soviet Union Community, sense of, vii, 93-95, 96, 97, 100, 102-103, 104
 Concert of Europe, 23, 144, 145
 Constitution (U. S.), 144
 Fourteenth Amendment, 52
 U.N. Charter compared with, 1, 72
 Cooper, John Sherman, 159
 Corfu Channel case, 71
 Cortés, Hernán, 46
 Costa Rica, 95, 101

- Council of Europe, 47, 52
 Crime, detection and punishment, international co-operation in, 53
 Czechoslovakia, 111, 120, 127, 142, 148
- DAVIES, CLEMENT, Comment on Expanding the United Nations Community, 98-100
 DAYAL, RAJESHWAR, Comment on Expanding the United Nations Community, 100-101 Declaration Regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories, see (U.N. Charter, chap. XI), 17, 56-57 (passim)
- Democracy
 human rights and the state under, 49-50
 in U.N., 87, 91-92
 in U.N. Charter review conference, 99
 Department of State (U. S.), and U.N. Charter revision, 151, 153, 155, 159
 Disarmament, 32, 33, 48, 77, 116, 118, 124-125, 126, 129, 130, 135
 See also Armament regulation; Disarmament Commission Disarmament Commission (U.N.), 10, 117, 126, 129, 130
 Discrimination, U.N. attitude toward, 49, 51
 Dispute settlement (U.N.), vii, 27-35, 68-69, 70-71, 76, 84, 87, 101, 108-109, 110-112, 154, 157, 160
 See also Collective security—U.N. system
 Domestic jurisdiction of states, 11, 13, 17, 19, 25, 36-37, 50-51, 54, 56, 59-60, 70, 72, 73-74, 87, 92, 95, 145, 154-155, 158
 See also State sovereignty
 Drummond, Eric, 131, 132, 135-136, 139
 Dulles, John Foster, 4, 48, 129, 149, 151, 152, 160
 cited, 2
 quoted, 12, 29, 94, 153
 Dumbarton Oaks conversations, 70
- EAGLETON, CLYDE, The Yardstick of International Law, 68-76
 Eagleton, Clyde, editor, 2
 East-West conflict, 5, 7, 9, 16-17, 21, 22-25, 37, 39, 41, 42, 44-45, 47, 48, 71, 75, 78-84, 88-89, 90, 92, 98, 103, 117, 123, 124, 128, 129-130, 147, 158, 162
 Economic and Employment Commission (U.N.), 37 Economic and Social Council (U.N.)
 and Secretary-General, 131 discussion of human rights, 108 inertia of, 107 structure and functions, 37-38, 39, 43, 54, 145, 154
 See also Commission on Human Rights; Commission on the Status of Women; Regional economic commissions; Technical Assistance Board; Transport and Communications Commission; United Nations Children's Fund Economic and social development
 and armament regulation, 40, 123
 and domestic jurisdiction of states, 154-155
 and national interest, 42, 44, 45, 80-81 and political evolution, 58, 62 as a human right, 53-54 barriers to expansion of U.N. work in, vii, 17, 36-45
 Charter provisions concerning, 36
 General Assembly actions on, 108, 154 international programs, advantages and disadvantages, 41-42 relation to international peace, 19, 27, 36, 41, 58, 85-86, 87 role of Secretary-General in, 131
 U.N. contribution to, 16-17, 27, 54, 137, 154
 See also Economic and Social Council; Technical assistance; Underdeveloped countries
 Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (U.N.), 39, 94
 Economic Commission for Europe (U.N.), 39
 Economic Commission for Latin America (U.N.), 39
 Economic stabilization, 43-44, 137
 Ecuador, 40
 Egypt, 141, 144
 Eisenhower, Dwight D., 14, 121, 130
 quoted, 14, 16, 17-18, 153
 Engel, S., cited, 1, 5
 England international and colonial relations, 17th to early 20th century, 143-144
 See also Great Britain; United Kingdom
 Entente Cordiale, 144
 Entezam, Nasrollah, 32
 Ethiopia, 127
 Europe, 124 effect of East-West conflict on, 23, 39 international relations, 17th to early 20th century, 143-145 regional organization in, 37-38, 39, 40, 44, 101-102 representation in U.N., 5, 82, 99, 102, 115
 European Defense Community, 123
 European Payments Union, 37-38, 44
 Evatt, Herbert V., 32
 Export-Import Bank of Washington, 39, 42
- Fairman, Charles, cited, 51
 Far East, 39, 94, 110, 115
 Economic Commission for, 39, 94
 Fascism, 143
 Federal Bureau of Investigation, 134
 Feller, A. H.
 cited, 2, 96
 quoted, 68

- Ferguson, Homer, 159
 FINKELSTEIN, LAWRENCE S., Comment on Improving the Policy-making Processes, 110-112
 Finland, 127, 128
 Fiscal Commission (U.N.), 37
 Food and Agriculture Organization (U.N.), 38
 Foreign exchange, 39-40, 44, 45
 Formosa, 123
 Four Freedoms, 47, 52-53, 105
 Fourteen Points, 144-145
 France, 102, 128, 143
 and armament regulation, 126, 128
 and Indochina, 79, 111
 and North Africa, 21-22, 25, 144 and the Saar, 79
 colonial expansion in 19th century, 144 commission for study of U.N. Charter revision, vii international relations in 17th and 18th centuries, 143, 144
 Francisco de Vitoria, cited, 46
 FRAZÃO, SERGIO ARMANDO, International Responsibility for Non-self-governing Peoples, 56-67
 French Revolution, 143-144
 Friedmann, W., Comment on Strengthening the Secretariat, 134-135
 Fujii v. California, 51
- General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (U.N.), 38, 44
 General Assembly (U.N.)
 and armament control plan, 119
 and Charter review, 2-4, 140, 141, 142, 147, 152, 159 and constitutional questions, 72, 73 and economic and social development, 37, 108, 154
 and human rights, 49, 51-52, 73, 108
 and international law, 71, 74, 88 and non-self-governing peoples, 7, 58-63 (passim), 65, 66 and regionalism, 96
 and Secretary-General, 7, 131
 and Security Council, 5-6, 6-7, 20, 88, 108, 115-116, 158
 and specialized agencies, 38 and U.N. privileges and immunities, 9
 Committees
 First (Political and Security), 33
 Second (Economic and Financial), 33
 Fourth (Trusteeship), 61, 64
 Fifth (Administrative and Budgetary), 132, 136
 Sixth (Legal), vii, 141-142, 147-148, 148-150 debate in, advantages and disadvantages, 27-28, 30-31, 33, 108
- Eisenhower speech on atomic energy pool, 14, 17-18, 121, 130
 Presidents, viii, 32-33, 35 representation and voting procedures, 19, 29-30, 61, 75, 79, 82-83, 90, 92, 102, 107-108, 109, 114, 154, 160 scope and powers of, 7-8, 13, 16-17, 27-29, 63, 75, 81-82, 88, 89, 107-109, 114, 116, 154-158
 subsidiary organs, 10-11, 28, 34, 63, 113
 See also Collective Measures Committee; Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories; Disarmament Commission; Economic and Social Council; Interim Committee; International Law Commission; Peace Observation Commission; United Nations Administrative Tribunal; United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency; United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine and the Near East voting procedures, see above representation and voting procedures
 See also Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation; "Uniting for Peace" resolution
 General Conference, see Charter review conference
 Geneva Conferences (1954), 99, 111
 Geneva Conventions, 46
 Genocide, 53
 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of (U.N.), 47, 48, 51
 Germany, 23, 79, 94, 115, 119, 123, 124, 126, 128, 143, 144
 Gillette, Guy Mark, 159
 Goodrich, L. M., cited, 1
 Graham, Frank P., 32
 Great Britain, 102, 128, 143
 and armament regulation, 124, 126, 128
 and Libya, 25
 and Palestine, 22
 in a Federation of Western Europe, 101-102
 Parliament, movement for world federal government in, 99
 See also England; United Kingdom Great powers
 and armament regulation, 125-126, 128, 129, 130 and armed forces for U.N., 5 and Charter revision, 2, 3, 107, 109
 and General Assembly, 30, 108, 114 concern with civil and colonial wars, 22, 24, 25, 79, 90-91 failure to use U.N. peaceful settlement functions, 84 harmony of, basis of U.N. Charter, 78, 81, 109, 112-113, 116, 140-141, 143, 145, 147, 148, 149, 158 influence in U.N., 2, 5, 12, 18, 25, 78, 82-83, 86, 87-88, 92, 106, 107, 114, 149

Great powers (cont.)
 war possibilities, 20-21, 83-84, 89
See also East-West conflict; Veto

Greek children dispute, 32

Greenland, 61

Griffith, Wallace H., 112

Gross, Ernest A., cited, 1, 13

Guatemala, 95, 101

Hague Conventions, 46

Hambro, E., cited, 1

Hammarhjöld, Dag, 132

HAVLAND, H. FIELD, JR., Improving the Policy-making Processes, 106-109

Headquarters Agreement, 4, 9

Hill, N. L., cited, 1

Hiroshima, 15, 124

Hitler, Adolf, 127

Hogan, W. N., cited, 1

Holland, Spessard L., 159

Holy Alliance, 144

Holy Roman Empire, 143

Hudson, Manley O., cited, 46, 51

Human rights and state sovereignty, 17, 46, 47, 49-51, 69, 73, 74
 Convention for the Protection of (Council of Europe), 47, 52 different types of, 52-54 diminished emphasis on, 17, 47-48
 education in, 52, 54
 history of, in international law, prior to U.N., 46-47 in U.N., vii, 16, 17, 47, 49-55 (passim), 73, 108 international conventions dealing with, 46 proposed covenant of (U.N.), 51 relativity of, 50
 Senate subcommittee study on, 160
 standards in, 48-50
 Universal Declaration of (U.N. General Assembly), 47, 49, 51-52

Hungary, 52, 94, 115

Hydrogen bomb, 15, 18, 100, 124, 125, 129

Imperialism, 24, 67, 82, 143

India, 10, 94, 100, 101, 102, 107, 108, 109, 111
See also Kashmir

Indochina, 21, 22, 79, 99, 110, 111-112

Indonesia, 21, 22, 27, 40, 71, 109

Interim Committee ("Little Assembly") (U.N.), 8, 10-11, 30, 32, 33, 109

International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (U.N.), 38-45 (passim), 120

International Court of Justice (U.N.), 9, 12, 71, 72, 73, 119, 135
 and armament control plan, 119, 120-121, 122

International criminal court, proposal for, 53

International Development Advisory Board (U. S.), 40

International Labor Conference, 57

International Labor Organization (U.N.), 38, 47

International law
 and domestic jurisdiction of states, 50-51, 60
 and human rights, 46-47, 50-51, 54, 69
 and the colonial problem, 21-22, 56-58, 61
 and U.N., 10, 16, 70-71, 74-75, 86, 88, 97-98, 155 effect of American and French Revolutions on, 143-144
 weakness of, 69

International Law Commission (U.N.), 10, 74

International Materials Conference, 44

International Monetary Fund (U.N.), 38, 39, 43, 44, 45, 120

International Refugee Organization (U.N.), 38-39

International Telecommunication Union (U.N.), 38

Iran, 23, 122-123

Isolationism, 77-78, 111

Israel, 22, 24, 36
See also Palestine

Italy, 79, 143
 colonies of, 107
 U.N. membership for, 72, 94, 115

JACKSON, ELMORE, Developing the Peaceful Settlement Functions of the United Nations, 27-35

Japan, 143
 and U.N. membership, 94, 115 mutual defense treaty with U. S., 10, 80 rearmament, 123, 126-127, 128

Jessup, Philip, quoted, 110

Johnson, Howard C., cited, 95

Kardelj, Edvard, quoted, 91

Kashmir, 21, 24, 27, 32, 71, 79

Kellogg-Briand Pact, 127

Kelsen, Hans, cited, 1, 4

Kennan, George F., cited, 96

KEY, DAVID MCKENDREE, United States Planning for Charter Review, 151-155

Key, David McKendree, cited, 106

KHALIDY, AWNI, Comment on Strengthening the Secretariat, 135-137

Klemmer, Raymond J., 112

Knowland, William F., 159

Korea, Republic of (South Korea), 6, 10, 21, 90, 91, 111

Korean War, 6, 7, 8, 15-16, 21, 23-24, 32, 36, 77, 79, 80, 88, 89, 90-91, 92, 99, 103, 104, 105, 107, 110-111, 112, 113, 128, 132
See also "Uniting for Peace" resolution

Kutner, Luis, cited, 52

Laniel, Joseph, 14

Laos, 25

Latin America, 5, 40, 101-102, 108, 142
 Economic Commission for, 39

Lauterpacht, Hersch, cited, 50

League of Nations and international law, 70, 71
 armament reduction plans of, 127 colonial rights under, 57, 58, 60-61, 65 human rights under, 46-47, 50 secretary-general, 31
See also Drummond, Eric

Soviet Union in, 128, 145

weakness of, 145, 149

Libya, 25, 94

Lie, Trygve, 131-132, 134, 138

LINCOLN, G. A., Comment on Improving the Policy-making Processes, 112-114

Lipsky, George A., editor, 96

"Little Assembly," see Interim Committee

Locarno Pact, 127

Lodge, Henry Cabot, Jr., 48, 103, 151, 160

Loveday, A., cited, 37

Loyalty investigations and standards, in U.N. Secretariat, 134-135

MACKAY, R. W. G., Comment on Expanding the United Nations Community, 101-102

Mackay, R. W. G., cited, 106

Manchuria, 127

Mandates, League of Nations system, 47, 57

Manner, George, cited, 46

Mansfield, Michael J., 159

Marshall, George C., quoted, 49

Martin, A., cited, 1

Mates, Leo, 33

Mathiot, A., cited, 57

Membership (U.N.)
 extension of desirability of, discussed, vii, 93-94, 98, 99, 100-101, 103, 105, 115, 123, 153-154, 157, 158 procedures for, 6-7, 12, 72, 94, 96, 97, 103, 115, 154 from viewpoint of national interest, 76, 77-84
 Senate subcommittee study on, 160
 withdrawals and exclusions, desirability of, discussed, 45, 76, 103, 106, 108, 112, 115, 153, 161

Middle East, 5, 101, 102

MIKESSELL, RAYMOND F., Barriers to the Expansion of United Nations Economic Functions, 36-45

Mikesell, Raymond F., cited, 44

Mindszenty, Joseph, 52

Minorities, cultural autonomy for, 53, 54

Molotov, V. M., 130, 149

Monroe Doctrine, 144

MORGENTHAU, HANS J., The Yardstick of National Interest, 77-84

Morgenthau, Hans J.
 cited, 2, 79, 81, 83, 96, 97, 99, 106
 quoted, 97

Morocco, 17, 22, 144

Morozov, P. D., statement on Soviet policy toward revision, quoted, 147-150

Mussolini, Benito, 127

Napoleon I, 144

National interest, viii, 41, 44, 45, 69-70, 77-84, 85, 96, 106, 110
See also Domestic jurisdiction of states; State sovereignty

National liberation and nationalism, 21, 23, 24-25, 54, 86, 90, 92, 111
See also Colonialism and colonial powers; Self-determination

Nazis and Nazism, 47, 143

Nehru, Jawaharlal, 21

Netherlands, the, 128
 and Indonesia, 21, 22, 71, 74
 on preparation for Charter revision, 141

Neutrality, 42, 94, 95, 100, 103, 111

New Zealand, ANZUS Pact, 10, 96

Nicaragua, 95

Niemeyer, Gerhart, cited, 95

Non-self-governing territories and peoples, vii, 7, 16, 17, 25, 51, 52, 53, 54, 56-67, 85, 94, 100, 106, 107, 142, 146, 158

North Africa, 25, 144
See also Libya; Morocco; Tunisia

North Atlantic Treaty (Atlantic Pact), 1, 2-3, 4, 9-10, 12

North Atlantic Treaty Organization, 12, 25, 37-38, 80, 95, 96, 98, 103, 104, 108, 157

North Korea, 8, 21, 24, 90, 91, 107, 111

Organization for European Economic Cooperation, 37-38, 40, 44

Organization of American States, 95, 101

Ottoman Empire, 143, 144

Pacific Security Treaty, see ANZUS

Padilla Nervo, Luis, 30, 32, 33

Pakistan, 10, 40, 109
See also Kashmir

Palestine, 10, 22, 27, 34, 36, 38-39, 77, 107, 109

Palmer, Norman D., editor, 96

Panama, 149

Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation (U.N.), 31-33, 35

Peace Observation Commission, 8

PEARSON, LESTER B., Comment on Expanding the United Nations Community, 102-104

Pearson, Lester B., 30, 32

- Permanent Court of International Justice, 121 Philippines, 15, 94, 100
 mutual defense treaty with U. S., 10
 Point Four Program, 17, 43
 Poland, 72, 127, 142, 148
 Portugal, 94
 Preuss, Lawrence, cited, 51
 Propaganda, in U.N., 84, 103, 113
 Public opinion
 and human rights, 47, 48-49, 54-55
 education of, on U.N., 104
 Puerto Rico, 62
- Race relations, in South Africa, 17, 49
 Rao, Vicente, 64
 Realism in politics, 69-70, 96-100 (passim), 127, 128-129
 Regional economic commissions (U.N.), 39-40, 94
 Regionalism and regional organizations, 9-10, 25, 37-38, 39-40, 45, 88, 93, 94-96, 97-98, 99, 101-102, 103-104, 113, 142, 154, 157, 158
 See also North Atlantic Treaty Organization Relief and rehabilitation, emergency, 38-39
 Revolutionary War, 143-144
 Rio Treaty, 9-10
 Robinson, Jacob, Comment on Strengthening the Secretariat, 137-138
 Romulo, Carlos P., Strengthening the United Nations, 14-19
 Romulo, Carlos P., cited, 106
 Roosevelt, Franklin D., 47, 52-53
 Rudzinski, Aleksander W., cited, 49, 50
 Rumania, 52, 94
 Russia, international relations, 143, 144
 See also Soviet Union
- Saar, the, 79
 San Francisco Conference, 1, 2, 4, 9, 15, 113, 157, 158 and definition of aggression, 71
 and domestic jurisdiction of states, 73-74
 and international law, 70-71 and non-self-governing peoples, 56-59 (passim), 62-65 (passim), 67 collaboration of great powers at, 140-141, 143, 145 discussion of Charter review conference, 3, 152 documentation of, vii, 147
 failure to provide for Charter interpretation, 72 Security Council discussed at, 5-8 (passim) small nations at, 107, 149
 San Stefano, Treaty of, 144
 Sayre, Wallace S., Comment on Strengthening the Secretariat, 138-139
 Scelle, Georges, cited, 57
- Secretariat (U.N.), viii
 and armament control plan, 119
 and specialized agencies, 133, 137, 138
 balance of centralization and decentralization, 132 bureaucracy in, 139 effectiveness of, vii field work, 132, 133, 137 geographical distribution in, 133, 136 loyalty standards and investigations, 134, 135 political appointments, 133 reorganization, 132, 133 research, 132, 137-138
 Secretary-General's administrative role in, 131, 132
 size, 131, 136
 staff morale, 133, 134, 135
 tenure, 133, 134-135
 See also Secretary-General Secretary-General (U.N.) administrative role, 131-132, 135-136, 138-139 and Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation, 32-33 and staff appointments and dismissals, 134-135 intelligence service for, 132-133, 136 on law and U.N., 68 political role, 7, 31, 35, 131-132, 135-136, 138-139 preparation of repertory of the practice of U.N. organs, vii, 30, 141, 142, 147-148, 159 recipient of information on non-self-governing territories, 62 research director for, 138 role in Korea, 7, 132-133
 See also Hammarskjöld, Dag; Lie, Trygve; Secretariat
- Security Council (U.N.) and armament control, 16, 116, 119-122 (passim), 129
 and General Assembly, 8, 20, 60, 88, 107, 108, 114, 115-116, 158 and Interim Committee, 11 and legal issues, 71, 72-73 and maintenance of peace, 5, 8, 15-16, 20, 28-31 (passim), 33-35, 71, 87-89, 92, 101, 109, 113, 114, 116, 154
 and Panel for Inquiry and Conciliation, 31, 32, 33
 and Secretary-General, 7, 31, 131, 133
 function in Charter revision, 2, 3, 4, 140 functions and structure of, based on great-power harmony, 8, 78, 81, 109, 113, 114, 116, 140-141, 147, 148, 149 membership, 5, 13, 92, 102, 154
 President, 33, 72-73
 procedural questions, 6-7, 109
 repertory of experience, 30

- subsidiary organs, 10, 11, 34
 See also Atomic Energy Commission; Collective Measures Committee; Disarmament Commission voting procedures, 6-7, 79, 89, 92, 109, 114, 154
 See also Veto
 Self-determination, 49, 50, 53, 54, 57, 66, 74, 145
 See also National liberation and nationalism
 Sellin, Eric, translator, 140
 Senate (U. S.)
 appropriations for U. S. participation in U.N., 157 Committee on Foreign Relations, Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter, vii, 1, 29, 48, 149, 151, 152, 159-162 constitutional responsibility for Charter review, 156-157, 158 members at San Francisco, 157 ratification of U.N. Charter, 157 recommendations of Thomas subcommittee, 48 resolutions concerning U.N., 34, 149, 154, 157-158
 Sharp, W. R., cited, 43
 Shawcross, H., cited, 1
 Slessor, John C., quoted, 119
 Smith, J. W., translator, 20
 Socialism, 145
 Sohn, Louis B., Comment on Improving the Policy-making Processes, 114 Sohn, Louis B., 117 cited, vii
 Somaliland, 94
 South Africa, 17, 27, 49, 52, 73, 74, 76
 Southeast Asia, 23, 25, 101, 102
 Soviet bloc, 22, 42, 45, 90-91
 in U.N., 5, 11, 25, 37, 41, 45, 72, 75, 82, 107, 129, 153
 See also East-West conflict
 Soviet Union, 102, 143
 and armament regulation, 118, 120, 122-137 (passim), 155 and Charter violations, 11, 13, 73, 142, 152
 and human rights, 47, 52, 53
 and Indonesia, 22
 and League of Nations, 128, 145 and the veto, 141, 148, 152 and U.N. decision on Korea, 6, 15-16 and U.N. membership increase, 94, 154 desirability of continued U.N. membership, 103, 106, 108, 112, 115, 153, 161
 influence in U.N., 106, 115, 158
 See also Great powers—in Security Council and influence in U.N.
 labor camps and war prisoners, 49, 52 nonautonomous territories in, 25 policy on Charter revision, viii, 109, 128, 142, 147-150
 sense of community and government in, 101
 See also East-West conflict; Soviet bloc
 Spain, 73, 74, 107, 115, 143
 Sparkman, John, 159
 Special Committee on the Question of Defining Aggression (U.N.), 10
 Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development, 17, 33, 40-41 Specialized agencies (U.N.), 157, 158 activities of, co-ordinated by ECOSOC, 37 agencies preceding U.N., 38
 Charter provision for, 36 contributions of, 17, 54, 145 effect of cold war on, 41, 42, 44, 45, 81 effect on Charter change, 4, 10-11 example of multilateral treaty, 119 field and research work, 133, 137, 138 membership in, 94 needed change in organization and co-ordination, 37, 38, 154 Senate subcommittee study on, 160
 size, 133
 See also Food and Agriculture Organization; General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; International Bank for Reconstruction and Development; International Labor Organization; International Monetary Fund; International Refugee Organization; International Telecommunication Union; United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; Universal Postal Union; World Health Organization
 SPENDER, PERCY C., Comment on International Control of Armaments, 129-130
 Stalin, Joseph, 80, 127
 State sovereignty and IBRD, 41-42
 and individual rights, 17, 46, 47, 49-51, 73, 74
 and international law, 69, 76 and U.N. Charter, 2, 12-13, 18, 19, 20, 60, 64, 65, 66, 74, 87, 145 and U.N. Special Committee on the Balkans, 11 and weak powers, 17th to 19th century, 144 right of self-defense, limitation of, 88
 See also Domestic jurisdiction of states
 Stowell, Ellery, cited, 46, 51
 Subsidiary organs (U.N.), see General Assembly—subsidiary organs; Security Council—subsidiary organs
 Supreme Court (U. S.), 52, 72
 Swift, R. N., editor, 2
 Syria, 150
- TARAZI, SALAH EL DINE, The Risks of Revision: Appraisal of United Nations Preparations for Charter Review, 140-146
 Technical assistance, 17, 27, 38, 42-43, 49, 80-81, 137

- Technical assistance (cont.)
See also Technical Assistance Board
- Technical Assistance, Expanded Program of (U.N.), 17
- Technical Assistance Board (U.N.), 38, 41, 42, 45, 133
- Tenure, in U.N. Secretariat, 133-135
- Thailand and Thai people, 25
- Thomas, Albert, 131, 138
- Tibet, 21
- Tojo, Hideki, 127
- Traber, Oscar W., Jr., 112
- Trade
 and armament control, 123
 and regional organizations, 39-40, 44, 45
 East-West, 77, 123 embargo, 8, 107
 stabilization of, 43
- Transport and Communications Commission (U.N.), 74
- Transportation and regional organizations, 40 modern means of, significance, 23
- Treaties
 and state sovereignty, 51
 limited effectiveness of, 117, 127-128, 129 supplementing U.N. Charter, 4, 8-10, 51, 80, 119-120, 125-126
See also Regionalism and regional organizations
 U.N., drafting of, 74-75
 U.N. Charter as a treaty, 51, 71-72, 76
- Trieste, 79
- Trusteeship Council, 63, 72, 94, 107, 131, 146, 154
- Trusteeship system (U.N.), 16, 17, 27, 51, 52, 57, 59, 64, 77, 94, 100, 142, 146, 158, 160
See also Non-self-governing-territories and peoples; Trusteeship Council
- Tunisia, 17, 22
- Ukraine, Soviet Socialist Republic, 148
- Underdeveloped countries, 17, 40, 41, 45, 49, 54, 85, 98, 106, 107, 145
See also Economic and social development; Technical assistance
- United Kingdom, and drafting of U.N. legal documents, 74
See also Great Britain
- United Nations, Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the, 9, 122
- United Nations Administrative Tribunal, 134, 135
- United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), 38-39, 109
- United Nations Commission for India and Pakistan, 10
- United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, 10, 11
- United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, 10
- United Nations Declaration (Jan. 1942), 47
- United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), 38, 52
- United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund, see United Nations Children's Fund
- United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, 36, 38-39
- United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA), 39
- United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, 36, 38-39
- United Nations Special Committee on the Balkans, 10, 11
- United States, 143
 aggression against China, 107
 and armament regulation, 118, 119-120, 123, 124, 126, 127, 128
 and Charter review, vii, viii, 4, 13, 30, 109, 110, 114, 147, 148-149, 151-162
 and Charter violations, 13, 73, 147, 149
 and human rights, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, 53
 and Indochina, 110, 111
 and Indonesia, 22
 and Korean War, 23, 110-111, 113 and OEEC, 40
 and U.N. economic development programs, 40-41, 42 and U.N. privileges, immunities, and headquarters, 4, 9 as superpower core of opposition to Communism, 81-83 control of IMF, 44
 desirability of continued U.N. membership, 106, 115, 153 dominance of IBRD, 41-42 faith in institutional change, 112 foreign aid program, 17, 42-43, 45, 80-81
 foreign policy, 79-80, 111, 127-128, 144-145, 156-158, 161
 influence in U.N., 82-83, 106, 107, 115
See also Great powers—in Security Council and influence in U.N. legislation on participation in U.N., documentation of, 160 loyalty requirements and investigations for U.N. employees, 134 mutual defense treaties, 10, 80, 157
See also ANZUS position at San Francisco on non-self-governing territories, 62, 63 public opinion in, on U.N., 99, 153, 161-162 sense of community and federal government in, 101
See also Constitution; East-West conflict; Export-Import Bank; Senate

- "Uniting for Peace" resolution (U.N.), 8, 16, 28, 29, 34, 88, 89, 90, 103-104, 112, 154
- Universal Postal Union (U.N.), 38
- Vandenberg resolution (U. S.), 34, 149, 154, 157-158
- Vandenbosch, A., cited, 1
- VAN WAGENEN, R. W., Expanding the United Nations Community, 93-97
- Veto (Security Council), 6-7, 11, 12, 13, 18, 19, 20, 34, 71, 78, 86, 88-89, 90, 92, 94, 96, 97, 98, 101, 103, 106, 109, 115, 120, 129, 140, 141, 149, 152, 154, 157, 160
- Vienna, Congress of (1815), 144
- Vietminh, 22, 111
- Vietnam, 25
- Viner, Jacob, cited, 43
- Wallich, H. C., cited, 43
- War crimes trials, 47, 53
- Weighted voting, 19, 29-30, 38, 107, 109, 114, 120, 154
- Westphalia, Treaty of, 143
- WILCOX, FRANCIS O., How the United Nations Charter Has Developed, 1-13
- Wilcox, Francis O., cited, 158
- WILEY, ALEXANDER, The Senate and the Review of the United Nations Charter, 156-162
- Wiley, Alexander, 151, 159
- Wilson, Woodrow, 144-145
- Women, Convention on the Political Rights of (U.N.), 48
- World government, 12, 19, 99-100, 101-102, 146
- World Health Organization (U.N.), 38
- World War I, 83, 85
- World War II, 78, 81, 83, 85, 111, 119, 124, 142, 145
- WRIGHT, QUINCY, Human Rights and Charter Revision, 46-55
- Wright, Quincy
 cited, 47, 50, 51, 53
 quoted, 96
- YANG, YOU CHAN, Comment on Expanding the United Nations Community, 104-105
- YOUNGER, KENNETH, Comment on Improving the Policy-making Processes, 115-116
- Yugoslavia, 23, 72, 79, 88, 89, 90, 91
- Zarubin, Georgi N., 130

3L

YOUNG, J. H.

11.11

